E. DWELLY PRINTING AT THE CROWN FOLIO "CROPPER"
ON WHICH THE WHOLE OF THE REVISED EDITION WAS PRINTED.

The difficulty of printing the two sides of Demy Folio sheet exactly behind one another on a Crown Folio "Cropper" without special appliances must be experienced to be understood.

muileannach, -aiche, a. Of, or belonging to, a mill.

muileannachd, s.f. Occupation of a miller. 2 Grinding.

muileann-brà, s.m. Quern. (for illustrations and names of parts see brà.) The quern was formerly the only mill for corn-grinding used in the Gàidhealtachd. It is still in use in many parts of northern Europe and in Asia, and the "two women grinding at the mill" (quern) may be seen to-day in Nazareth exactly as they were in the days of Christ. The implement consists of two stones, the lower being about two feet in diameter, and commonly hollowed to the depth of about six inches. This hollow is of equal depth and diameter. Within this is placed horizontally, a smooth round flag about four inches thick, and so fitted to the cavity that it can just revolve with ease. Through the centre of this revolving flag there is bored a hole for conveying the grain. In the lower stone, in the centre of its cavity, there is fixed a wooden pin on which the upper stone is placed in such exact equiponderance, that, though there be some friction from their contact, a little force applied will make the upper stone revolve for several times, when there is no grain underneath. On the surface of the upper stone, and near the edge, are two or three holes, just deep enough to hold in its place the stick by which it is turned round. The working of the quern is left to the women, two of whom, when the grain is properly dried, sit squatting on the ground, with the quern between them and singing loudly an appropriate song, perform their work, one turning round the stone with the handle placed in one of the holes, and the other dropping the corn in through the large hole. The law of Scotland attempted in vain to discourage the use of the quern. In the year 1248 it was enacted "that no man shall presume to grind quneit, maisloch or rye, with hand mylnes, except he be compelled by storm, and be in lack of mylnes quhilk should grind the samen; and in this case, if a man grinds at hand-mylnes he shall give the threttein measure as multer; and gif any man contraveins this our prohibition, he shall tyne his hand-mylnes perpetualie."

N n

n, nuin. the ash-tree ; the twelfth letter of the Gaelic alphabet at present in use. N, when immediately preceded by i, sounds like n in English win ; nn, when immediately preceded by i, sounds like gn in French guigner, or ni in English sing. When preceded and followed by broad vowels, nn has a particularly deep and broad sound, which has no equivalent in English. The monosyllable an, when the next word begins with c or g, sounds like ang, as, an cù, the dog. The letter n when aspirated is not followed by h in writing, and a distinction between the plain and aspirated sounds is not generally made in Northern Gaelic, although there is an appreciable difference between the n in, nigh do chasan, wash your feet, which is plain, and that in, nigh e a chasan, he washed his feet, which is aspirated, when they are correctly pronounced.

'S fhèarr am p.-tuathal na bhi gun fheartaighe, better the unnatural crab than to be without a husband—a sarcastic phrase used when a woman consents to marry a diminutive man—the partan always moves northwise, or against the sun's course. [But partan-tuathal is applied to the hermit-crab in some parts, which would suggest a rich wife and a husband who was poor, and who, like the hermit-crab, occupies a house which is another's.] N.G.P. explains the saying as follows: two women lived together, one of whom stole the other's meal out of her bag, the sufferer then put a live lobster (crab) in her bag, and the next time the thief put her hand in she was caught; she cried out "tha 'n Donas 'nad phoca-sa," (the devil 's in your bag,) "tha," said the other, "'nuair 'tha thus' ann," (yes, when you are there.)

The following note is from D.C.

The system of land measure which prevailed in the Western Isles and then took root in Argyllshire, was neither Pictish nor Irish, but Norse. The unit was the "ounce-" land, i.e. the extent of land which paid the rent of an ounce of silver. The word was borrowed by Gaelic, and appears as unnsa. The land term was unga (e.g. Unganab in North Uist and in Tiree.) It appears in old charters as, teroung, teiroung, &c. This extent was divided into 20 parts—sometimes into only 18—such parts being called peighinn ; hence many place-names (e.g. Pennymore, Peighinnhornach, &c.) In some places the penny-land was subdivided. On Lochfyneside we meet with Lephinmore, Lephincorrach, (the big half pennyland and the rough half pennyland) ; also an Fheoirling, (the farthingland.) A conventional use of the term peighinn is met with in Skye—the crofting township of Elgol is separated by a march dyke from the deer-forest, each crofter is responsible for the upkeep of a specified length of the dyke, and it is called the peighinn of his croft. similarly the part of the shore allotted to each croft for seaware is called the peighinn of that croft. The full fractional division of land was carried out in Islay thus :—

1	oz. land	= 20*l.* sterling	= 12 markland	= 133*s.* 4*d.* Scots	= Tirunga
½	"	= 10*d.* "	= 6 "	= 66*s.* 8*d.*	= Leth pheighinn.
¼	"	= 5*d.* "	= 2½ "	= 33*s.* 4*d.*	= { Ceathramh. quarterland.
⅛	"	= 2½*d.* "	= 1¼ "	= 16*s.* 8*d.*	= Ochdamh.
1-16th	"	= 1¼*d.* "	= ⅝ "	= 8*s.* 4*d.*	= Leothras
1-32nd	"	= ⅝*d.* "	= 5-16ths,	= 4*s.* 2*d.*	= { Cóta bán or groat land.
1-64th	"	= 5-16*d.* "	= 5-32nds,	= 2*s.* 1*d.*	= Da Sgillinn.

Lands in Islay were valued in 1541 in quarters, half quarters and eighths ; in 1562 these began to be given as equivalents of multiples and fractions of 10 marks, which sum was taken as amounting in value to an ounce of silver.

peighinneach, -eich, a Full of pence, rich.

The bagpipes are spoken of in Gaelic in the singular—a' piob.

The use of the bagpipe can be traced to the most remote antiquity, although it seems, if not comparatively modern in connection with the Highlands, at least to have held a second place in comparison with the harp in the estimation of the bulk of the people, until during the last few centuries. The Greek word sumphōnía, which appears as an Aramic loan-word in Daniel, iii. 5, is translated "bagpipe" by every competent translator. There is no doubt that the verse relating the arrival of the prodigal son's brother in the New Testament, should be rendered "now his elder son was in the field, and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard bagpipes and dancing."—Expository Times, Jan. 1895.

propataireachd, s.f. There are two games in Uist called by this name.

1. A game like quoits or pitchers. Two large stones or props are set up on end at a distance from each other of about 20 yards. The number of players varies from two to six. If more than two play, they may do so singly or in picked sides. The only articles needed are the props and two flat pieces of stone, as nearly balanced as possible, wherewith to toss. The game goes by points, a certain number, usually 21, being agreed on as game. The pointing or scoring, which is not reckoned in the same way anywhere else, is as follows in Uist. Three points if you knock the prop down fairly, one point if that pitcher lies nearer the prop than any other, one point if your other pitcher lies nearer than any of your opponent's. Thus, if your two quoits be nearer the prop than your opponent's two, you have two points; if only one is nearer then you have only one point. In the case of two players, both stand at the same prop and toss at the opposite prop endeavouring to hit it or lie as near to it as possible. In the case of sides (say, two on each side) one member of each side takes the stones, while the other two stand at the opposite prop, and toss each his two quoits to the best of his ability. These are then in turn tossed towards them again by those at the other end, the game counting, as usual, in points.

propataireachd(2), or leagail shaighdear (felling the soldier.) Game played on the same principle as skittles. There are two equal sides of any number, usually about seven, and each player has a prop, which he sticks in the ground just enough to make it stand. Each player is provided with two stones for throwing at the props. The side which wins the toss then starts to knock as many as possible of their opponents' props down in this way. The first man in the row throws his two quoits trying to knock as many down as he can; his neighbour follows, and so on, till all the row have thrown their quoits. If they knock down all the opposing props, the game is theirs; if not, their opponents start in exactly the same way to knock theirs down. If they succeed, they win the game; if not, the props are set up again and play recommences.—" Uist Games " in Celtic Review, No. 16.

s, (Suil, willow-tree) the 16th. letter of the Gaelic alphabet now in use. It has two sounds—1st., small like sh, in sheet, when, in the same syllable, it is preceded or followed by e or i, as, bris, break; séimh, quiet; sniomh, twine; stéidh, foundation. 2nd. broad, like s in sun, this, in all other situations. Exceptions—is, am. (pron. iss); so, this, (pron, sho, and accordingly spelt seo in this work); sud, yon, (pron. shoot, and accordingly spelt siod in this work.) S, when aspirated, is like h in him, as, shuidh, sat (pron, hooie); shrann, snorted (hrawn.—aw as ow in brown.) Before l and n, sh is almost, if not altogether silent, as, shlannich, healed; shniomh, twisted. S, followed by a mute consonant is never aspirated. S, when preceded by the letter t with a by-phen is silent, as an t-sluaigh, of the people (pron. an tlooay.) 'S in expressions such as "'s e seo an duine," is sounded as sh.

The slender sound of s is heard in Arran in iseal (isal, low,) and treise (treasa, stronger), esan, (pron. eisean) piseir (pease,) uirsinn (door-post,) deis (ready,) dilis (faithful,) faileis (shadow.) There is no s sound in Arran and Kintyre in the combinations rd and rt, as, bòrd, mart, cairt, &c. In rtl, neither s nor t is heard as, ceirtle, fairtlich. An seo, an sin, an siod, are sometimes pronounced an t-seo, an t-sin, an t-siod, and sometimes ann a seo, ann a sin, ann a siod; and ann an seo, ann an sin, ann an siod. Initial sr has no inserted t, as, srath, sruth (not strath, struth), except strac (to tear) strac, (to stroke) and strub (a spout.) Some dialects, on the contrary, have strath, strùn, &c., but srac and srub. Before l, followed by a slender vowel, as, slighe, sleamhuinn, s has its sh sound, and not, as in some districts, its broad sound.

's, cont. for agus. 'S their thu, and thou shalt say; là de na làithean 's am famhair bho 'n bhaile, one day when the giant was from home.
's, cont. for is, v. 'S i' it is she; 's e, it is he; 's esan, it is he himself; 's mór t' fhacal, ostentations is thy word.
's, contr. for anns. 'Sa cheò, in the mist, in amazement.
-s', cont. for -sa, -san and -se. Thus' for thusa; iad-s' for iad-san.
-sa, Emphatic adjection used in connection with possessive pronouns and adjoined to the noun following them. If the noun is followed by an adjective, the syllable -sa is placed after the adjective, thus, do làmh-sa, thine own hand; do làmh gheal-sa, thine own white hand. It becomes -ne when used in connection with ar, our, as, ar n-athair-ne, our own father; and -san when in connection with an, am, their, as, an taigh-san, their own house.
sa, Emphatic syllable used in combination with the personal pronouns. It becomes se after a small vowel (ne in the 1st. per. pl.) and san in the 3rd. per. sing. & pl. Mi, mise; thu, thusa; e, esan; i, ise; sinn, sinne; sibh, sibhse; iad, iadsan.
'sa, cont. for anns an. In the. 'Sa cheò, in the mist, in amazement. 2 cont. for anns, prep., and a, pers.pron.
sa, prov. for seo. (Used as a suffix.)

seonadh, -aidh, s.m. Augury, sorcery. 2 Druidism. Martin says that Seonaidh is the name of a water-spirit which the inhabitants of Lewis used to propitiate by a cup of ale in the following manner. They came to the church of St. Mulway, each man carrying his own provisions. Every family gave a pock of malt, and the whole was brewed into ale. One of their number was chosen to wade into the sea up to his waist, carrying in his hand a cup filled with ale. When he reached a proper depth, he stood and cried aloud "Seonaidh, I give thee this cup of ale, hoping that thou wilt be so good as to send us plenty of seaware for enriching our ground during the coming year." He then threw the ale into the sea. This ceremony was performed in the night-time. On his coming to land, they all repaired to church, where there was a candle burning on the altar. There they stood still for a time, when, on a signal given, the candle was put out, and straightway they adjourned to the fields where the night was spent mirthfully over the ale. Next morning they returned to their respective homes, in the belief that they had insured a plentiful crop for the next season.

towards one is nuas. 2 (shios) Resting below.

In W. of Ross shios and sios naturally mean west and westward respectively, that is, down the course of the streams and valleys, and shuas and suas, east and eastward. Yet, shios rathad Chataibh, down the way of Sutherland, is the usual way of speaking of the part of Sutherland on the Moray Firth. These meanings of sios and suas are now perpetuated in a curious way in the east of Ross-shire when speaking English; e.g. "go east to the kitchen," "go west to the byre," &c., expressions that strike anyone as very comical till he understands how they originated and that they have no connection with ear and iar. This does not apply exclusively to Ross-shire.

In Gairloch, shios and shuas mean practically north and south. South Earradale, for example, in the south of the parish, is called Earradal shuas and Earradal a deas, and North Earradale is Earradal shios and Earradal a tuath. Am baile shuas and Am baile shios at Red Point, furnish another instance —CR. in Gael. Soc. of Inverness, xxiv, 369.

In Perthshire, East, eastward. 2Future.

S. ud [or s. an siod], down yonder; a' dol s., going down, setting, as the sun; o shiùbhal s. agus suas, from going down and up; s. agus suas, eastwards and westwards; "but and ben" of a house; falbh suas do 'n t-seòmar, go "ben the hoose" (in some places, go west to the room); cluinnidh aimsir sios ar clìù, future times shall hear our praise; cuir s., send eastward or downward—Perthshire.

In Sutherland, it is invariably "tha a' ghaoth à shuas," for westerly wind, and "a' ghaoth à shios" for easterly wind.

In all parts, the use of sios and suas is regulated by the direction in which the water flows, thus, it is customary to say, "a' dol suas gu ceann an loch," or "suas do 'n eaglais," if in a contrary direction to the general flow of the surrounding streams, even although the journey may be dowhill all the way from where the speaker stands.

sithich, -ean, s.m. Fairy, elf.

The sithich is the most active sprite of Highland mythology. It is a dexterous child stealer and is particularly intrusive on women in travail. At births many covert and cunning ceremonies are still used to baffle the fairies' power; otherwise, the new-born infant would be taken off to fairy-land, and a withered brat laid in its stead. They are wantonly mischievous, and have weapons peculiar to themselves, which operate no good to those at whom they are shot. A clergyman of the kirk, who wrote concerning fairyland about the end of the 17th. century, says of these weapons that "they are solid earthy bodies, nothing of iron, but much of stone, like to a yellow soft flint spur, shaped like a barbed arrow-head, but flung like a dart with great force—.

sloc-buntàta, s.m. Potato-pit. The potato-pits in Sutherlandshire before the clearances were made about 3 ft. square and nearly 3 ft. deep. In a shelving bank that greatly resembles an old beach, above the shepherd's house at Learable in Kildonan, may be seen in a row some twenty or thirty such pits, now partly filled up by the falling in of the sides. In olden times, when a blacksmith's customers had to bring him their own fuel, an empty potato-pit was used to convert the necessary quantity of peat into charcoal. This kind of pit is still used for potatoes in the county—CR.

It was, of old and till recently, the custom in Uist to dig a hole in the floor near the hearthstone, and now and again take a live peat from the fire, dip it in water and put it into this hole. The charcoal thus accumulated was for use in the smithy, as everyone who needed the smith's services had to provide the necessary charcoal.—DC.

speileau, s.m. Uist game corresponding to the game of "cat and bat." The necessaries for the game are the Speil or Cat, the Driver or Bat, and the Ball of worsted or hair. Two sides of equal numbers are picked, one side taking the first of the batting and the other of the fielding, as they win or lose the toss.

A hole is made in the ground with the heel, and one end of the Speil (a small piece of wood) is put into it. The ball rests in the hole on the inner end of the speil. The first batter strikes the end which protrudes with the driver, thus sending the ball into the air. While the ball is in the air, he smites it with all his power, the object being to drive it as far as possible from the hole. If any of the opposing side catch it before it touches the ground the striker is out, but if no catch is made the first fielder to reach the ball gives a bowl (faireag) to the batsman. The latter again drives the ball as far as possible, and if a catch be made he is out. If, however, no catch be made, the first player of the opposing side to reach the ball, throws the ball into, or as near as be can, the hole. This is called" pieeadh." If it goes into the hole the player is out. If not, he measures the length of the ball from the hole by means of the bat. If it is not one bat's length he is out, if it is one or more, he plays on until he is out, when another member of his side comes in in his place. This continues till one side counts 100, or is all out, when the opposite side comes in. If neither side reaches the set number of points, whichever scores the highest is said to be the winner. This game is fairly popular still and is one of the healthiest and best of Uist games —Celtic Review, Vol. IV, p. 362.

spidean, s.m. Game which resembles closely the common game of "pitch and toss," the difference being that buttons are always used in place of coins. A small stick is set up as a "spid," and a line drawn at a distance of about 10 feet. At this line the players take their stand. The game is open to any number of players—in fact, the more players the better the game. Each player tosses his button at the spid, his object being to come as near it as possible. He whose button lies nearest the spid gathers the other buttons in his hands, shakes them, and finally tosses them in the air. All which fall face downwards he gathers and keeps; the remainder are lifted by the player whose button lay second, and thrown by him, those falling face upwards being in turn claimed by him. This continues till the buttons have all been gained, the first man often getting a second throw if the buttons last so long. The players all take their stand again on the line, the last tosser of the former time being the first to play this time, and continue throwing till they have lost all their buttons, or are otherwise forced to desist.
Should the spid be hit fairly by any man except the first, all buttons, no matter how near, must be lifted and re-tossed. The advantages in being first man consist in the following. The first player may, if he choose, reclaim his toss by saying, "Cha luigh mi" (I shall not lie,) but if his toss be good enough, he says "Luighidh mi," (I will lie,) thus compelling all who follow to "lie," no matter how poor their attempt may be. If, however, the first player says "Cha luigh mi," those following can all say the same, till such time as someone remarks "Luighidh mi," after which they are all forced to "lie." Another advantage the first man has is, that though he strike the spid fair he can yet "lie." Still popular, this was one of the most cherished games of the young Gael of former times, and many were the severe thrashings meted out to them for its sake. A boy departed to school with perhaps 30 buttons on a string and returned home with none, yea, without one on his clothes, which were held in place by pieces of wood or string—Uist Games in Celtic Review, Vol. IV [Called an "Uist" game in above, but it is in reality as much an English as an Uist one.]

spiol, s.m. Wool from a dead sheep, pluck. A skin of this sort (marbhchann) is often washed first in the strong lye in which clothes have been steeped for the wash. It is washed in each lather as the clothes are taken out, and after rinsing, hung on a paling to drip and nearly dry When a skin is sufficiently dry to be plucked, it is placed on the back of a chair near the fire—the warmth makes the plucking easier—with a clean creel underneath into which the tufts of wool fall as they are plucked The cutch, or coarse wool, remains on the skin, if the fingers are deft enough The wool is then either teazed for carding, or dyed should it be needed for mixtures. This kind of wool is not generally considered so excellent as that shorn from the sheep, but serves admirably for tweeds, or for dyeing and mixing with the better quality of wool in common use—K.W.G. in Mòd prize paper.

t, teine, the 17th. letter of the Gaelic alphabet now in use.

T, not aspirated has two sounds. (1)Nearly like t in town, exactly like t in Italian tocco, or in French toucher. (2) Like ch in check. as, tighinn, coming; sailte, salted. When aspirated, it sounds like h in him, as tràinig e, he came. Th is silent in the middle of words, in the end of long syllables, in some tenses of certain irregular verbs, and in thu, thusa; as maitheas, goodness (pron. my-yes) ; maoth, gentle (meu); an d' thàinig thu ? art thou come? T, is sometimes used before fh followed by a vowel in the Western Isles, as, an t-fhardach, the household. T', is used before vowels instead of do, thy.

t-, so-called euphonic,(once part of the article) is used (1) between the article and a masculine noun beginning with a vowel, in the nominative case singular, as, an t-each, the horse. (2) between the article and a masculine noun beginning with s followed by a vowel or l, n, or r in the genitive and dative cases singular, as, anns an t-solus, in the light; glac cinn-fheadhna an t-sluaigh uile, seize all the heads of the people. (3) between the article and a feminine noun beginning with s followed by a vowel, or l, n, or r, in the nominative and dative cases singular, as, an t-slighe, the road; cha toir an t-saighead air teicheadh, the arrow doth not cause him to flee; anns an t-sùil, in the eye.

t', (for ta) v. Is, am, are.

t', (for do before a vowel) poss. pron. Thy. Dr. Stewart does not approve of t' instead of d', but it is correct according to pronunciation and usage.

The performance consisted in roasting cats alive, one after another, for some days, without tasting food; which if duly persisted in, summoned a legion of devils, in the guise of black cats, with their master at their head, all screeching in a way terrifying to any person of ordinary nerves.—NGP. "The divination by the t. was once a noted superstition among the Gael, and in the northern parts of the Lowlands of Scotland. When any important question concerning futurity arose, and of which a solution was, by all means, desirable, some shrewder person than his neighbours was pitched upon, to perform the part of a prophet. This person was wrapped in the warm smoking hide of a newly-slain ox or cow, commonly an ox, and laid at full length in the wildest recess of some lonely water-fall. The question was then put to him, and the oracle was left in solitude to consider it. Here he lay for some hours with his cloak of knowledge around him, and over his head, no doubt, to see the better into futurity; deafened by the incessant roaring of the torrent; every sense assailed; his body steaming; his fancy in a ferment; and whatever notion had found its way into his mind from so many sources of prophecy, it was firmly believed to have been communicated by invisible beings who were supposed to haunt such solitudes."—

[The following is from Armstrong.]

At the sight of a vision of this kind, Dr. Martin observes, the eyelids of the gifted persons were erected, and the eyes continued staring till the vision disappeared. If an object is seen in the morning, it will be accomplished in the afternoon ; if at noon, on that very day ; if in the evening, that very night ; and if after candles are lit, on that night for certain. If a shroud is seen about a person, it foretells approaching death; and the time of it is more or less distant, according to the height at which the shroud is observed on the body. If it be seen about the middle, death is not expected within a twelvemonth ; if as high as the head, it is not many hours distant. To see a spark of fire falling on one's arm, foretells that a dead child shall be seen in the arms of that person. To see a chair empty at at the time a person sits in it, is a sure sign of approaching death to that person. Seers did not observe supernatural appearances at the same time, though they might happen to be in the same apartment ; but when one of them who saw a vision, touched any number of his brethren, they all saw it as well as the first.

The following are three instances recorded by an English nobleman in the 17th. century, who, previous to his going to the Highlands, was one of the sturdiest unbelievers in the second-sight.

1. "In the year 1652 I was travelling in the Highlands, and a good number of servants with me, as is usual there. One of them going a little before me, entering into a house where I was to stay all night, and going hastily to the door, he suddenly stepped back with a screech, and did fall by a stone which hit his foot. I asked what was the matter, for he seemed to be very much frighted. He told me very seriously that I should not lodge in that house, because shortly a dead body in a coffin would be carried out of it, for many were carrying it when he was heard to cry. I neglecting his words, and staying there, he said to the other servants he was sorry for it, and that what he saw would surely come to pass. Though no sick person was then there, yet the landlord died of an apoplectic fit before I left the house."

2 "In January, 1652, Lieut.-Col. Alexander Munro, and I, were in the house of one Wm. MacLeod, of Ferinlea, in the county of Ross. He, the landlord, and I, were sitting on three chairs near the fire ; and in the corner of the great chimney were two islanders, who were that very night come to the house, and were related to the landlord. While one of them was talking to Munro, I noticed the other looking oddly towards me. From his look, and his being an islander, I supposed him to be a seer, and asked him what he stared at. He answered me by desiring me to rise from the chair, for it was an unlucky one. I asked him why. He answered me, because there was a dead man in the chair next to me. Well, said I, if he be in the chair next to me, I may keep my own. But what is the likeness of the man ? He said he was a tall man with a long grey coat, booted, and one of his legs hanging over the arm of the chair, and his head hanging dead on the other side, and his arm backward, as if it were broken. There were some English troops then quartered near that place, and there being at that time a great frost after a thaw, the country was covered all over with ice. Four or five of the English riding by this house some two hours after the vision, while we were sitting by the fire, we heard a great noise, which proved to be those troopers, with the help of other servants, carrying in one of their number, who had had a very bad fall, and had his arm broken ; and falling frequently into fits, they brought him into the hall, and set him on the very chair, and in the very posture that the seer prophesied. The man did not die, though he recovered with great difficulty."

3 "Among the accounts given me by Sir Norman MacLeod, there was one worthy of special notice—There was a gentleman in the Isle of Harris, who was always seen by the seers with an arrow in his thigh. Such in the isle who thought these prognostications infallible, did not doubt but he would be shot in the thigh before he died. Sir Norman told me that he heard it the subject of their discourse for many years. At last he died without any such accident. Sir Norman was at his burial at St. Clement's Church in Harris. At the same time the corpse of another gentleman was brought to be buried in the very same church. The friends on either side came to debate who should first enter the church, and in a trice from words they came to blows. One of the number, who was armed with a bow and arrows, let one fly among them. (Now every family in that isle have their burial place in the church in stone chests, and the bodies are carried in open biers to the burial-place.) Sir Norman having appeased the tumult, one of the arrows was found shot in the dead man's thigh. To this Sir Norman was a witness."—Succinct accompt of my Lord Tarbolt's Relations, in a Letter to the Hon. Robert Boyle, Esquire, of the Predictions made by seers, whereof himself was Ear and Eye-witness.

By pretension to second sight, no profit was ever sought or gained. It is an involuntary affection, in which neither hope nor fear are known to have any part. Those who profess to feel it do not boast of it as a privilege, nor are considered by others to be advantageously distinguished, They have no temptation to feign and their hearers have no motives to encourage an imposture.

Armstrong concludes his account with a lengthy description of the theories of Dr. Beattie of Aberdeen and the celebrated Dr, Samuel Johnson, but as they are only theories they have been omitted here.

tein'-éigin, s.m. Fire by friction, forced fire or fire of necessity.

The tein'-éigin was considered an antidote against the plague and murrain and all infectious diseases among cattle. Dr. Martin says all the fires in the parish were extinguished and 81 married men, being deemed the proper number for effecting this purpose, took two planks of wood and nine of them were employed by turns, who by their repeated efforts, rubbed the planks against each other, till the heat thereof produced fire, and from this forced fire each family was supplied with a new fire. No sooner was the fire kindled than a pot filled with water was put thereon, which was afterwards sprinkled on people who had the plague, or on cattle that had the murrain, and this process was said to be followed invariably by success.—

A term applied to fire produced by friction—in olden times a means employed to check evils arising from being bewitched. If a household suffered loss such as indicated being under evil influence, all fires in the district between two running streams were extinguished on a set day. Then a spinning-wheel was put in motion, and kept going furiously until the spindle became heated. Tinder or tow was applied to the hot spindle, fire was thus procured and distributed to all households affected by evil influences. Within the memory of persons still living, fire was thus procured to check witchcraft in a township in Uist where some sickness, supposed to be evil eye, carried off some cows and sheep. It is odd that neither cow nor sheep died after, possibly the epidemic had exhausted itself.—DC.

Last made in N. Uist about 1829, in Arran about 1820, in Helmsdale about 1818, and in Reay about 1830—AC.

PAST PART. tugta, given.

☞ This verb has two other forms for the past subjunctive, which are used after interrogative and negative particles. They are, (an ? nach ?) toirinn, would I (not) give; cha toirinn. I would not give; and (na'n) tugainn, (if) I would give. These two forms are conjugated as bheirinn, in the various persons —(sing. 1st. -inn, 2nd. -eadh, 3rd. -eadh; pl. 1st. -eamaid, 2nd. -eadh, 3rd. -eadh.)

The past subj. passive, bheirteadh, is impersonal, and requires a prepositional pronoun after it to distinguish it from the same tense of beir. Bheirteadh mi. I was born; bheirteadh dhomh, (it) was given to me. The passive voice has parallel impersonal forms, as an toirteadh, would (it) be given, and an tugtadh, ma theirteadh, if it would be said, but, na n abairteadh; o 'n chiteadh, since it would be seen; but, nach faicteadh, would it not be seen; ged gheibhteadh, though it should be got; but, muc faighteadh e, if it should not be got.

The word thabhair may be substituted for thoir in the following, or any similar sentences.

Thabhair (or thoir) air falbh, take away, carry off; thabhair (or thoir) leat e, carry it with you; tabhair a mach, win; thugadh a mach a' cheud duais leis, he won the first prize; bheir iad a mach nithean àrda, they will do (win) great things; thug mi { siorradh / sgiutadh / saighde } asam, I made a dart (or bound); thug e mo char agus mo leth-char asam. he cheated me all round; th. seo d' a iomsuidh, take this to him; th. d' an iomsuidh, take to them; thugaibh am monadh oirbh, betake yourselves to the mountain.

thu. pers. pron. 2nd. pers. sing. Thou. 2 Thee. Emphatic, thusa, thyself; thu-féin, thine own self.

Tu, when nominative to a verb is always aspirated (thu), except with is, and in the future indicative, and the two tenses of the subjunctive active. The unaspirated form is never used with the passive forms of the verb The accusative form is always thu. A tendency to use tu instead of thu after verbs ending in s must be carefully guarded against. 'S e chrùnas tu le coron gràidh, given in some editions of the Scriptures (some are correct) as the equivalent of it is he who will crown thee in Ps. ciii, really means "it is he whom thou wilt crown." In the same manner tu is erroneously used in, an Tighearna a shàsaich-thu, ma tè e annu a fhreagaireas thu, co a bhratuis thu? &c. "Thusa" ach sibh-se dar bhios sibh anns 'ur taigh féin. "thou," but "you" when you have a house of your own— uil'-loc, s. Mistletoe—viscum album. [Said by some to be the badge of the Hays, but it does not grow wild in Scotland.] [March. The Druids gathered the mistletoe on 10th. Pliny, in the 16th. book of his Nat. Hist., says "The Druids hold nothing in such sacred respect as the mistletoe, and the tree on which it grows, provided it be an oak. They select certain woods of oak, and they do not perform any sacred rite without the leaf of that tree; so that hence it is likely they have been called Druids, explaining the name from the Greek drus, an oak; Druidæ, oakites. Whatever grows on that tree, more than its natural growth, they think has been sent from heaven, and is a proof that the tree has been chosen by God himself. However that [species of mistletoe] is very rarely found, and when found it is sought after with great devotion, and especially at the sixth moon, which is the beginning of their months and years, and when the tree has passed its thirtieth year, because it has already abundant vigour, though not half-grown. They call it by a word signifying in their own language, "all-heal"; and having prepared sacrifices and feasts under the tree, they bring up two white bulls, whose horns are then first bound; the priest in a white robe ascends the tree, and cuts it off with a golden knife; it is received in a white sheet. Then, and not till then, they sacrifice the victims, praying that God would render his gift prosperous to those on whom he had bestowed it. When mistletoe is given as a potion, they are of opinion that it can remove animal barrenness, and that it is a remedy against all poisons.

The ùruisg had the qualities of man and spirit curiously commingled. He had a peculiar fondness for solitude at certain seasons of the year. About the end of harvest he became more sociable, and hovered about farmyards, stables and cattle-houses. He had a particular fondness for the products of the dairy, and was a fearful intruder on milkmaids, who made regular libations of milk or cream to charm him off, or to procure his favour He could be seen only by those who had the second sight; yet I have heard of instances where he made himself visible to persons not so gifted. He is said to have been a jolly personable being, with a broad blue bonnet, flowing yellow hair,and a long walking-staff. Every manor-house had its ùruisg, and in the kitchen, close by the fire, was a seat which was left unoccupied for him. The house of a proprietor on the banks of the Tay is, even to this day, believed to have been haunted by this sprite, and a particular apartment therein has been for centuries called Seòmar Bhrùnaidh (Brownie's room.) When irritated through neglect or disrespectful treatment, he would not hesitate to become wantonly mischievous. He was notwithstanding, rather gainly and good-natured than formidable. Though, on the whole, a lazy,lounging hobgoblin, he would often busir himself on behalf of those who understood his humours, and suited themselves thereto. When in this mood, he was known to perform many arduous exploits in kitchen, barn and stable, with marvellous precision and rapidity. These kind turns were done without bribe, fee or reward, for the offer of any one of these would banish him for ever. Kind treatment was all that he wished for, and it never failed to procure his favour. In the northern parts of Scotland the ùruisg's disposition was more mercenary. Brand, in his description of Zetland, observes, "that not above forty or fifty years ago almost every family had a brownie, or evil spirit, so called, which served them, to which they gave a sacrifice for his service; as when they churned their milk, they took a part thereof, and sprinkled every corner of the house with it for Brownie's use; likewise, when they brewed, they had a stone which they called Brownie's stane, wherein there was a little hole, into which they poured some wort for a sacrifice to Brownie. They also had stacks of corn which they called Brownie's stacks, which, though they were not bound with straw ropes, or in any way fenced as other stacks used to be,yet the greatest storm of wind was not able to blow away a straw off them." The brownies seldom discoursed with man, but they held frequent and affectionate converse with one another. They had their general assemblies too, and on these occasions they commonly selected for their rendezvous the rocky recesses of some remote torrent, whence their loud voices, mingling with the water's roar, carried to the ears of wondering superstition detached parts of their unearthly colloquies. In a certain district of the Highlands, Peallaidh an spùit, Slochdaill a' chuirt, and Brùnaidh an easain, were names of note at those congresses, and they still live in legends which continue to amuse old age and infancy.—

Proper Names

It must be borne in mind that Gaelic surnames, in the English sense, are not generally in use, at least in colloquial Gaelic, except when speaking of strangers. Every one living in a Gaelic-speaking district has a local name describing his trade or some physical peculiarity as, Donnachadh reamhar, An saor, &c. Sometimes they are named after the place they lived in last, or were born in, as, An t-Americanach, &c. If the person named is of a family long settled in the district he will probably be named after his father or grandfather, as Seumas a' phiobair, (the piper's James.) Where a person's mother is a native married to an outsider, he may be called after her, as Domhnall Ciorstan. Thus a Gaelic student whose friend is plain John MacDonald in the city, must not be surprised when he meets him at home, to hear his companions speak of him as, Iain Mhurchaidh Dhomhnuill Alasdair! The sole object of Gaelic surnames is to make the identity of the person spoken of as clear as possible through the speaker reminding his hearers by means of his name every time it is mentioned, to whom or where he "belongs."

Considerable care must be exercised in translating English surnames into Gaelic, for example, Donald Black is Domhnall Mac a' Ghille Dhuibh. The literal translation, Domhnall Dubh, may, if used, prove very misleading, for that is much more likely to be the local appellation of Donald Cameron or Donald Smith, both of whom have dark hair, than of Donald Black who may even be fair and locally known as Domhnall Bàn, but more probably as Domhnall Alasdair or Domhnall Iain. Domhnall Dubh is also a familiar Gaelic name for the devil!

The following list of names is the result of the compiler's collecting from all available sources from 1880 to 1911. The names are not inserted here with the idea of setting forth any new theory regarding the correct form of any Gaelic name, but it is merely an attempt to gather into one alphabetical list, from all the newspapers, magazines, books, &c. in which they have appeared, the most up-to-date forms used by the best Gaelic scholars. A few of the names have been taken down orally by the compiler, but, owing to the authorities for the remainder not having been noted as the list was collected, it is impossible to give here the source whence each was obtained. The absence of such a list from all other Gaelic dictionaries is a cause of continual disappointment to Gaelic students. Much pains has been taken to secure accuracy, and Dr. W. J. Watson, Edinburgh, has kindly revised and added to the list. Dr. Watson's additions are marked *, and are original Gaelic forms taken from the mouths of the people—not Gaelic translations of Anglicized forms. Quotations from the Ordnance Survey Maps, are marked OSM.

The list may be added to in any Gaelic-speaking district, but care must be taken to spell the names exactly as they sound, and not according to what either the collector or native informant think they mean.

As quite 20 Gaelic students require the Gaelic form of an English name to every one who requires the English form of a Gaelic one, the English forms are here placed first.

A SHORT ACCOUNT

OF THE PRINCIPAL

Persons and Places

MENTIONED IN

OLD GAELIC FOLK-TALES AND POETRY.

(From Armstrong's Gaelic Dictionary.)

Aghaidh-an-t-sneachd, (Agandecca), the daughter of Starno, king of Lochlin, whom her father barbarously slew, for having informed Fingal of a plot which had been laid against his life.

Ainnir, (ain-fhear), the father of Erragon, Trothar and Starno.

Allaid, (all-àite) a Druid, or, as Ossian terms him, a son of the rock, in allusion to his dwelling among rocks and caverns.

Alenecma, an ancient name for Connaught in Ireland.

Althan, the son of Conachar, was the chief bard or laureate of Arth or Art, king of Ireland. On the death of Arth, he attended his son and successor as chief bard.

Althos, one of the sons of Usnoth, chief of Etha, by Slissama, the sister of Cuchullin.

Amun, an Irish chieftain, was the father of Feard, who was slain in single combat by Cuchullin.

Aoibhir-dluinn, the daughter of Branno, king of Lego in Ireland, and wife of Ossian. Her beauty is celebrated in the Fourth Book of Fingal and other poems of Ossian.

Aoibhir-chaomha (Evircoma), the wife of Gaul, and daughter of Casduconglas.

Ardar, the son of Usnoth, chief of Etha, and Slissama, the sister of Cuchullin. He was slain in battle at an early age, by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

Artho, king of Ireland, was the father of that Cormac who was deposed and murdered by Cairbre the son of Borbaduthul.

Atha, Cairbre's palace in Connaught.

Baile Clutha, signifies the town of the Clyde, and is supposed to be the Alcluth of Bede.

Beltanno, the wife of Cairbre son of Cormac.

Bolg, The southern parts of Ireland were so called from the Bolg, or British Belgæ, who settled a colony there.

Borbar (borb-fhear), the father of Cathmor the generous, and of Cairbre the usurper. He was brother of that Colcullamh (Colgulla) who rebelled against Cormac, king of Ireland.

Borbaduthul, another name for Borbar

Borgeal, (fair-hand), was daughter of Colgar, a Connaught chief. She was wife of Cairbre, the son of Cormac, king of Ireland, who was dethroned by Cairbre, son of Borbar.

Bosmin (smooth-hand), the only daughter of Fingal, by Clatha, the daughter of Cathula, king of Inuistore.

Bràigh-ghral (fair-neck), wife of Cuchullin.

Bràigh-soluis, the sister of Cairbre, who slew Cridhmor in single combat. B. was secretly in love with Cridhmor. The fatal issue of this contest broke her heart and hastened her death.

Bran, Fingal's favourite dog.

Bran, Brano, A river in Caledonia, probably one which falls into the Tay near Dunkeld Brumo, a place of worship in Craca, one of the Shetland Isles.

Cairbre, lord of Atha in Connaught, and chief of the Fir-bolg. He was the son of Borbor. After the violent death of Cormac, king of Ireland, he usurped the government. He was a man of great bravery, but of an insidious and sanguinary disposition, and would make any sacrifice for power. He bore a lurking hatred to Oscar the son of Ossian. At Gabhra in Ulster, these rival heroes engaged in single combat, and fell by mutual wounds.

Cairbre, the son of Cormac, king of Ireland. He assumed the government after his father, and reigned but a short while. He was succeeded by his son Artho, the father of that Cormac who was dethroned and murdered by Cairbre the son of Borbar.

Caithbaid, the son of Armin, and the rival of Duthchomar, by whom he was slain.

Caithbait, or Cathbait, the grandfather of Cuchullin.

Calthmin, the son of that Rathmor who was murdered by Dunthalmo, a prince residing on the Tweed. C and his brother Colmar were kept in confinement by Dunthalmo, but were liberated by Caolmhal his daughter.

Caoilte, a Scandinavian chief, who was slain by Cairbre.

Caol-abhainn (a narrow river), the residence of Carrul, situated to the south of Agricola's Wall.

Caolmhal (a woman with small eyebrows), the daughter of Dunthalmo, a cruel and ambitious prince, who resided on the Tweed. She rescued from her father's captivity Calthonn and Colmar, the sons of the chief whom he murdered, and afterwards became the wife of the former.

Caomh-mhal, daughter of Sarno, king of the Orkneys.

Carraig-thura, (carraig nan tùr), the seat of Cathulla, king of Innistore.

Carruil, one of the bravest of the sons of Fingal. He was slain in single combat by Gaul, in a dispute of precedence. The bards poured their lamentation over him in the beautiful poem called Bàs Charruil. Another person of the same name was the son of Ceanfeadhna, Cuchullin's bard.

Carthonn, the son of Clessamor and Maona. He was slain by his own father in single combat, in which each had engaged, without knowing his opponent.

Carunn (car-abhainn) A stream in Scotland, now called Carron, falling into the Forth near Falkirk.

Cathbaid or Cathbait, see Caithbaid.

Cathlinn, or Gath-linn, Name given to a certain star by Fingalian mariners. Some apply that name to the North Polar star.

Cathmor, son of Borbar. Unlike his barbarous brother Cairbre, the usurper, his bravery was of the noblest description. He was not more brave than hospitable and generous. His modesty was such, that he could not bear to hear mention made of his own achievements. He was much attached to his brother, but affection towards such an object was more like a crime than a virtue.

Cathul, or Cathul, the son of Maronnan or Moran, was the friend and companion of Oscar, son of Ossian. He was murdered by Cairbre, the usurper, in consequence of his attachment to the family of the dethroned Cormac.

Cathulla, king of Innistore, and father of Clatho, the second wife of Fingal.

Crann-nan-daoine (the head of the people), the son of Duthmaruno or Dubh-mhic-Roinne.

Caon-mhal, an aged bard or druid.

Claon-rath, a district on the shore of Lego in Ireland.

Clatho, the daughter of Cathulla, king of Innistore. She was the second wife of Fingal, to whom she bore Reyno, Fillean and Bosmin.

Clonar, the son of Conglas, of Inor, one of the Hebrides.

Clemo, the son of Sithmhal, of Lora. He became the victim of a jealous Irish chief.

Cluan-fhear (man of the field), was killed in battle by Cormac Mac Cona, king of Ireland, the father of Roscrana, the first wife of Fingal.

Cluth, Clutha, the river Clyde.

Clun-gheal, the wife of Connor, king of Inishuna, and mother of the beautiful Suilmhall.

Colc-ullamh, the brother of Borbar.

Colgach, one of the ancestors of the tribe of Morni.

Colgar, the eldest of the sons of Trathal, the grandfather of Fingal. Another Colgar was the son of Cathmul, and principal bard to Cormac, King of Ireland. The only part of his poems which has come down to posterity, is a tender dialogue on the loves of Fingal, and his first wife Roscrana.

Comal, a Fingalian chief. He was the unwitting cause of the death of his mistress Gealmhin. Brooding over his calamity, he became weary of life, and in battle he threw himself, unarmed into the midst of the enemy, and was slain.

Comhal or Cumhal, the father of Fingal. The accounts of his achievements which have come down to us are but scanty. His life was unfortunate, and his death untimely. He fell in early youth, in an engagement with the tribe of Morni.

Conan, the Thersites of the Fingalians. Ossian and Ullin never mention him but with contempt.

Conar, one of the kings of Ireland. He was the father of that Cormac who was dethroned by Cairbre, and the son of Treunmor, the great grandfather of Fingal. It was owing to this connection that the great Caledonian hero was involved in so many Irish wars.

Con-ban-carglas, the daughter of Torquil-torno, king of Crathlun in Sweden. Her father was defeated by Stairn, and slain, and she was carried off by the conqueror, and driven to distraction by his brutal treatment of her.

Congal, a petty king of Ulster.

Connor, king of Inishuna, was killed in an invasion of his kingdom. His son Cathmor succeeded him.

Connal, the son of Dubh-carron. Another of the same name was a renowned Fingalian, who was slain in battle against Dargo the Druid. Some say that he fell by the hands of his mistress Cridhmor.

Cormac, son of Arth, king of Ireland, He was dethroned and murdered by Cairbre, who usurped the government.

Cormar, one of the warriors who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle with the sons of Morni.

Craca, one of the Shetland Isles.

Cridh-min, the second wife of Dargo. Her premature and sudden death was occasioned by a rash experiment which her husband and his comrades made use of to put her coujugal affections to the test. The catastrophe is related by Ullin, in his pathetic poem, Dàn an Deirg.

Cridhmór, mistress of Connal, the son of Diaran.

Cromghlas, one of the warriors who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle with the sons of Morni.

Cromla, a mountain in Ulster.

Cromthormid, one of the Orkney [or Shetland Isles.

Cronan, a stream which emptied itself into the Carron near Stirling.

Crothar, the ancestor of Cathmor, and the first of his family who settled in Atha.

Cruimthormod, see Croimtuormod.

Cruth-gheal, son of Grugal, was one of Cuchullin's chiefs. He was slain by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

Cuchullin, son of Semma, and grandson of Cathbaid, a wise and warlike Druid. In early youth he married Bràigh-gheal, daughter of Sorglan. His wisdom and bravery procured him the guardianship of Cormac, the young king of Ireland, as well as the management of the war against Swaran, king of Scandinavia. His amazing strength is still proverbial among the Gael. Some say that one of his palaces was in the Isle of Skye, the remains of which are still shewn. Campbell asserts that he was slain on the banks of the Legon, in battle with Torlath, a chief of Connaught.

Daorghlas, one of Cuchullin's followers. Also a name given to Dermid, the progenitor of the Campbells.

Dardulena, daughter of Foldath.

Dearg, son of Collath. He was slain by Ubar.

Dearg, a warlike Druid, who vainly attempted to restore the fallen dignity of his order.

Deo-ghréine, daughter of Cairbre, and wife of that Cruthgheal who was slain in battle by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

Deud-gheal, the adulterous wife of Cairbre. On separating from her first husband she received one half of his goods, of which, at Cairbre's request, a fair division had been made by Cuchullin. She afterwards became the wife of Feaird, the son of Amun, but being incensed against Cuchullin, on account of an imagined unfairness in the division of Cairbre's property, she instigated her husband to a single combat with him, in which Feaird was slain.

Diarmad, son of Duibhne, a young Fingalian warrior, from whom the Campbells derive their pedigree. His encounter with a wild boar, and his death consequent thereon, are celebrated in a poem by Ossian, in Smith's collection.

Dora, a mountain near Temora.

Dubh-chomar, one of Cuchullin's chiefs. He was Cathbaid's rival for the affections of Morna, and slew him in single combat. He brought news of Cathbaid's fate to the lady, and renewed his addresses, in the hope that his bravery might win her heart. She begged to get his sword still covered with Cathbaid's blood, and plunged it into Cathbaid's breast. In the agonies of death he prayed her to extract the weapon. She no sooner did so, than, with a dying effort, he buried it in her bosom.

Dubh-mhic-Roinne, son of Stairnmor. He was a brave warrior, but the poems which give details of his exploits are extinct. He was one of the heroes who attended Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle against the sons of Morni. He lived in the north-east of Caithness.

Dubh-sròn-gheal, one of Cuchullin's horses.

Dubhmor, Dumor, father of that Minshuil who was forcibly taken off by Lamba, one of the leaders of Dumor's army. Minshuil's affections were placed on Ronan, who on hearing of the deforcement, went in pursuit of Lamba, whom he worsted and slew.

Erin, Ireland.

Eubhir-àluinn, see Aoibhir-àluinn.

Embhir-chaomh, see Aoibhir-chaomh.

Evaon, son of Annir.

Etha, a tract of country in the west of Scotland.

Fàil, Ireland.

Feaird, son of Amun, an Irish chief. He fell in single combat with Cuchillin, against whom he had been instigated by his wife, the infamous Deudgheal.

Feargus, second son of Fingal. From him descended Fergus, son of Erc or Arcath, who is styled, in Scottish annals, Fergus II. This Fergus came to the throne about 100 years after the death of Ossian, that is, about the beginning of the fourth century. His genealogy is thus recorded by the Gaelic seanachies — Fergus mac Arcaith, mhic Chongail, mhic Fhearghais, mhic Fhionnghail nam buadh, Fergus the son of Arcath, the son of Congal, the son of Fergus, the son of Fingal the Victorious.

Feradt-Artho, son of Cairbre Mac Cormac, king of Ireland, by Baltanno, daughter of Conachar of Ullin.

Fingal, king of the Caledonians, the hero of one of the most splendid epic poems in any language. He was the son of Cumhal and Morna the daughter of Thaddu. He was the father of Ossian, and his grandfather was Trathuil, the son of Treunmor.

Fidealtan, the first king of Innistore.

Fillan, the son of Fingal and Clatho. He lost his life in the cause of the family of Conar, king of Ireland. He is often called "the son of Clatho," to distinguish him from the sons which Fingal had by Roscrana.

Firbolg, supposed to have been a colony of British Belgæ, who according to Irish antiquarians, settled in the South of Ireland.

Flatha', wife of Learthonu, chief of the Firbolg.

Foldath, the friend of the usurper Cairbre, whom he assisted in dethroning Cormac, king of Ireland. He was of the race of the Firbolg, and was fierce and fearless, although generous.

Gabhra, a narrow vale in Ulster, where Cairbre, king of Ireland, and Oscar, son of Ossian, fought and fell by mutual wounds.

Gealmhin, daughter of Conlaoch, and the mistress of Comal. She was accidentally slain by an arrow shot by her lover.

Goll, Gaul, the son of Morni. He headed his clan for some time, and disputed the superiority with Fingal himself. He was at length worsted and brought to submission. After this he became the most faithful friend and ally of Fingal. He was ardently fond of a warrior's reputation, and sometimes, in the absence of the Caledonian chief, he was entrusted with the command of the Fingalian forces, but his valour was too impetuous for conducting an army. He owed his death to the following circumstance. A party of Fingalians, having gone to plunder the hostile isle of Ifreòine, were followed, some short time after, by Gaul, without any attendants. He landed on the island after his friends had pillaged and left it. He was surrounded by the exasperated inhabitants, against whom, with his back to a tree, he maintained a desperate conflict, until, amazed at his valour, and afraid of his strength, they rolled a mass of rock down upon him which broke his thigh. He thus became incapable of further resistance, and fell a sacrifice to his enemies.

Gorlo, king of the Orkneys.

Gruamhal, the lord of Ardven.

Hidalla, Idalla, the chief of Clanrath, on the shores of Lego in Ireland. In Temora, Ossian speaks in praise of his personal beauty and nostical genius.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Innis-fail, an ancient name of Ireland.

Innis-thona, an island in Scandinavia.

Ithona (the isle of waves), one of the Hebrides, perhaps Luna.

Lamha, one of the leaders of Dumor's forces. He was an admirer of Dumor's daughter Minshúil, to whom, with her father's consent, he paid his addresses, which were slighted. He carried her off by force, but, being pursued, he slew her. He was slain by Ronon, his rival.

Lamhath, a small stream running behind the mountain Cromal (Crom-mheall), in the West Highlands. The rocky banks of this river afforded a hiding-place to Cairbre, the only remnant of the race of Conar, during the usurpation of Cairbre the son of Borbar-duthul.

Lano, a lake in Scandinavia, the mist of which was said to be pestilential.

Lathmon, supposed to have been a Pictish prince.

Leathann, chief of the Fir-bolg, and ancestor of Cairbre and Cathmor.

Lejo, a lake in Ulster.

Lochlann, Lochlinn, Scandinavia.

Lodinn, Loda, a place in Scandinavia, Ossian makes frequent mention of the spirit of Loda, meaning thereby Odin, the divinity of the northern nations.

Lora, a precipitous stream in Argyllshire, near Selma. Also the hill where the stream has its source, and which is remarkable for being the place where Cathmor posted himself previous to his engagement with Fingal.

Lorma, king of Innishuna. He succeeded his father Conmor, and was slain in an invasion of his kingdom.

Lotho, a river in the north of Scotland, perhaps the Lochy.

Luath (swift), Cuchullin's favourite dog.

Lubar, a stream rising in Crom-mheal, a hill in the West Highlands. Near it was fought the first battle in which Gaul, the brave son of Morni, commanded the forces of Fingal.

Lubar, a river in Ulster.

Lulan a river in Sweden, now Lula.

Lumar, a hill in Innishuna.

Mac-an-Luinn, (the son of Luno), the sword of Fingal, so called from Luno its maker, a Scandinavian armourer. A traditional account of it says, that every stroke of it was mortal, and that Fingal only used it in cases of pressing danger.

Malmhin (Malvina) the daughter of Toscar. She was the mistress of Oscar, the son of Ossian.

Manos, king of Scandinavia. He invaded the dominions of Fingal, and, in a personal encounter with that hero, was worsted, disarmed and bound. He regained his liberty on condition that he would either renew the general engagement, or leave the land as a vanquished foe. He embraced the latter condition with gratitude, and embarked, after swearing that he would never re-invade the country of his conqueror. After setting sail, his men, stung with disappointment and defeat, prevailed on him to return and renew the combat. He yielded to their request, and landed on Fingal's territory. A bloody battle ensued, in which Manos and his bravest chiefs were slain.

Maronnan, the brother of Toscar.

Minvheal, the mistress of Dearg or Dargo, the son of Collath. Her lament over her husband, who was slain by a boar, is still extant, and is full of pathos and affection.

Moilena, a plain lying between the hills Mora and Lena, through which flowed the stream Lubar.

Momad, a name given to Gaul, son of Morni.

Mòra, a hill in the West Highlands.

Móra, a hill in Ireland.

Mòrbheinn, Morven. All the north-west coast of Scotland was so called, yet some learned antiquaries confine the name to the Isle of Mull.

Morna, the wife of Comhal or Cumhal, and the mother of Fingal. Another female, of the same name, was the mistress of Cathbaid, who was slain by Dubhchomar.

Morna, a district in the south of Connaught, once famous for being the residence of an arendruid. Here was a cavern, supposed to have been haunted by the spirits of the Fir-bolg chiefs.

Morni, the father of Gaul. On his death-bed he directed his son to lay his sword (the sword of Strumon) by his side, with injunctions not to take it away but on occasions of imminent danger.

Nathos, the son of Usnoth and Slisama the sister of Cuchullin.

Og gholl, or Oguill, the son of Gaul, one of Fingal's allies.

Ossian, a celebrated Caledonian warrior and poet of the third century, was the son of Fingal, the Caledonian king, and Roscrana. He attended his father in most of his wars in Ireland, and succeeded him in the command of the army. At an advanced age he lost his sight, and became of course unfit for the business of the field. He cheered his misfortune and his solitude by celebrating the exploits of other warriors—the subject of which his poems principally treat. The companion of his misfortune and solitude was Malvina, the amiable widow of his son Oscar. It is probable that it is to this female, who committed these poems to memory, that we ought to attribute their dissemination amongst the bards of her time, and their transmission for sixteen centuries, from one race to another, of appointed rehearsers.

Ronan, the lover of Minshuil, the daughter of Dumor. His mistress was forcibly taken away by his rival Lamha. He went in pursuit, and a bloody engagement ensued, in which Lamha was slain by Ronan, but Lamha, anticipating his fate, put Minshuil to death. The circumstances of this deforcement are recorded in the beautiful poem by Orran, entitled Cathlamha.

Roscrana, wife of Fingal, and the mother of Ossian. She was the daughter of Cormac Mac Conar, king of Scotland.

Runma, the father of Lamhor.

Runi, Ryno, the son of Fingal and Clatho.

Sellama, Selma, the name of a Fingalian palace, of which the ruins are still seen in Argyllshire. There is another Selma in Ulster.

Sith-àluinn, (stately pace) one of Cuchullin's chiefs, who was slain by Swaran, king of Scandinavia.

Sith-fada (long pace), one of Cuchullin's horses.

Sonnor, the father of Borbar-duthul, chief of Atha, and grandfather of Cairbre the usurper.

Starn, king of Lochlin, was the son of the barbarous Annir. He was the avowed foe of Fingal. Revenge, cunning and cruelty, were the prominent features of his character.

Starnmor, the father of Dubhmaruno.

Strumon, a place in the neighbourhood of Selma. It was the residence of Gaul, son of Morni.

Struthmor, one of the warriors who accompanied Cumhal, the father of Fingal, in his last battle against the sons of Morni.

Sulmalla, the daughter of Conmor, king of Inisthuna. She fell in love with Cathmor, the brother of Cairbre, king of Ireland, who had sent him to the aid of her father, whose territories had been invaded. On his departure from Inisthuna, she accompanied him in the disguise of a young warrior, but on the death of her lover, which happened a short time after, she returned to her native country.

Ti-foirmal, Taigh-foirmeil, the only one of Fingal's palaces that was built of wood. Here the bards met yearly to recite their compositions, previously to their being submitted to the judgment of Fingal and the other chiefs.

Taighmór, Temora, the residence of the supreme kings of Ireland, and the name of one of Ossian's poems.

Tlathmin, the mistress of Clonar son of Conglass, chief of Imór.

Tonn-theine, a star so called by the Fingalian mariners.

Torcuil-torno, king of Crathlun, a district of Sweden. He was slain by Starno, king of Scandinavia, in an engagement which took place in consequence of a misunderstanding at a boar-hunt, to which he had invited Starno.

Trathal, the son of Treunmor and grandfather of Fingal.

Treun-fhear, brother to the king of Inniscon. supposed to have been one of the Orkneys.

Treunmor, the great-grandfather of Fingal. Although the poems are extinct which recorded his achievements, he was, without question. one of the first warriors of his time. He collected and joined the warlike Caledonian clans, and opposed their united strength to the Roman invaders, thus forming a barrier, which defeated all the strength and discipline of the legions of Rome.

Tara, a castle in Ulster, and one of Cuchullin's residences, hence he is called Lord of Tara.

Ulrirn (iul-Eirinn), a star known by that name in Ossian's time, meaning the guide to Erin.

Usnoth, the chief of Etho, a district on the west coast of Scotland.

Uthorno, a bay in Scandinavia.
