Philo (B.C. 25–A.D. 50).—We shall touch only on the main points of Philonic eschatology. Philo looked forward to the return of the tribes from captivity, to the establishment of a Messianic kingdom of temporal prosperity, and even to a Messiah. The loci classici on this subject are De Execrat. § 8–9, and De Præm. et Pæn. § 15–20. The inclusion of the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom in Philo's eschatology, though really foreign to his system, is strong evidence as to the prevalence of these expectations even in Hellenistic Judaism. Apparently, he did not look forward to a general and final judgment. All entered after death into their final abode. The punishment of the wicked was for everlasting (De Cherub. § 1); even wicked Jews were committed to Tartarus (De Execrat. § 6). As matter was incurably evil, there could of course be no resurrection of the body. Our present life in the body is death (De Leg. Alleg. § 1).

Slavonic Enoch* (A.D. 1–50).—As the earth was created in six days, its history, according to this book, will be accomplished in 6000 years; and as the six days of creation were followed by one of rest, so the 6000 years of the world's history will be followed by a rest of 1000 years—the millennium or Messianic kingdom. Then time will pass into eternity (32<sup>2</sup>–33<sup>3</sup>). In this Messianic kingdom there is no Messiah. At the close of this kingdom the final judgment is held, variously called 'the day of judgment' (39<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>3</sup>), 'the great day of the Lord' (18<sup>8</sup>), 'the great judgment' (52<sup>15</sup> 58<sup>9</sup> 65<sup>6</sup> 66<sup>7</sup>), 'the day of the great judgment' (50<sup>4</sup>), 'the eternal judgment' (7<sup>1</sup>), 'the great judgment for ever' (60<sup>4</sup>), 'the terrible judgment' (48<sup>8</sup>), 'the immeasurable judgment' (40<sup>12</sup>). But prior to the final judgment the souls of the departed are in intermediate places. Thus the rebellious angels are confined to the second heaven, awaiting in torment the eternal judgment (71<sup>3</sup>). The fallen lustful angels are kept in durance under the earth (18<sup>7</sup>). Satan, being hurled down from heaven, has the air as his habitation (29<sup>4</sup> 5). There is no definite account of the intermediate place for men's souls. The writer declares, however, that places have been prepared for every human soul (49<sup>2</sup> 58<sup>5</sup>). From the latter context these appear to constitute the intermediate place for human souls. In 32<sup>1</sup> Adam is sent back to this receptacle of souls on his death, and is transferred from it to paradise in the third heaven after the great judgment (42<sup>6</sup>). Even the souls of beasts are preserved till the final judgment, in order to testify against the ill-usage of man (58<sup>6</sup> 6). On the conclusion of the final judgment the righteous enter paradise as their eternal inheritance and final abode (8. 9. 42<sup>3</sup> 5 61<sup>3</sup> 65<sup>10</sup>). The wicked are cast into hell in the third heaven, where their torment will be for everlasting (10. 40<sup>12</sup> 41<sup>2</sup> 42<sup>1-2</sup> 61<sup>3</sup>). There is apparently no resurrection of the body—the righteous are clothed with the garments of God's glory (22<sup>8</sup>, cf. Eth. En. 62<sup>16</sup> 108<sup>12</sup>). The seventh heaven is the final abode of Enoch (55<sup>2</sup> 67<sup>2</sup>), but this is an exceptional privilege.

Observe that (1) we have here the first mention of the millennium. (2) There is no resurrection of the body; but at the final judgment the souls of the righteous, which have in the interval been in the intermediate place, are now clothed with God's glory and admitted to paradise.

Book of Wisdom.—In this Alexandrian work there is no Messiah, but there is an expectation of the Messianic or Theocratic kingdom, where the righteous will judge the nations and have dominion (37<sup>8</sup> 9). There will be no resurrection of the body; for the soul is the proper self: the body is a mere burden taken up by the pre-existent soul, but in due season laid down again. Accordingly, there is only an immortality of the soul. The immortality of the righteous soul and its future blessedness are set forth in terms remarkable at once for their beauty and vigour (31<sup>4</sup> 42<sup>7</sup> 7. 10 15<sup>3</sup>). As for the wicked, they will be punished with death (11<sup>2</sup> 16. 22<sup>4</sup>); they will be bereft of hope (31<sup>1</sup> 18. 51<sup>4</sup>): the time for repentance is past (5<sup>3</sup>); they will be utterly destroyed (41<sup>9</sup>), yet not annihilated; for they will be subject to pain (41<sup>9</sup>); and be aware of the blessedness of the righteous (51<sup>2</sup>).

Observe that the righteous in Israel are to judge the nations. This seems to be a later development of the judgment by the sword frequently mentioned in previous literature (cf. Dn 24<sup>4</sup>; Eth. En. 91<sup>12</sup> etc.). Thus the judgment of the saints has become a forensic one, as that of the Messiah (cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>).

4 Maccabees.—This book is a philosophical treatise on the supremacy of the reason. The writer adopts, so far as possible, the tenets of Stoicism. He teaches the eternal existence of all souls, good and bad, but no resurrection of the body: the good will enjoy eternal blessedness in heaven (9<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>12</sup> 13<sup>7</sup> 15<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>); but the wicked will be tormented in fire for ever (9<sup>9</sup> 10<sup>15</sup>).

Apocalypse of Baruch* (A.D. 50–80).—Of this composite work the six or more independent constituents may be ranged in three classes when treated from the standpoint of their eschatology. Thus the Messiah Apocalypses A<sup>1</sup> A<sup>2</sup> A<sup>3</sup>, i.e. 27–30<sup>1</sup> 36–40 53–74, form the first class. i. This differs from the remaining part of the book in being written prior to A.D. 70 and in teaching the doctrine of a personal Messiah. The rôle of the Messiah in A<sup>1</sup> is entirely a passive one, whereas in A<sup>2</sup> and A<sup>3</sup> he is a warrior who slays the enemies of Israel with his own hand. In all three Apocalypses the Messiah-Kingdom is of temporary duration. In A<sup>2</sup> 'his principate will stand for ever until the world of corruption is at an end' (40<sup>3</sup>); in A<sup>3</sup> his reign is described as 'the consummation of that which is corruptible, and the beginning of that which is incorruptible' (74<sup>2</sup>). In A<sup>2</sup> and A<sup>3</sup> the kingdom is inaugurated with the judgment of the sword (39<sup>7</sup>–40<sup>2</sup> 72<sup>2-6</sup>). The Gentiles that had ruled or oppressed Israel should be destroyed, but those that had not done so should be spared, in order to be subject to Israel (73<sup>6-6</sup>). The final judgment and the resurrection follow on the close of these kingdoms. Of the two remaining classes, the second consists of B<sup>1</sup>, and the third of B<sup>2</sup> and B<sup>3</sup>, written after A.D. 70.

ii. In B<sup>1</sup>, i.e. 1–9<sup>1</sup> 43–44<sup>7</sup> 45–46<sup>6</sup> 77–82. 84. 86–87, the writer looks forward to the rebuilding of Jerusalem (6<sup>9</sup>), the restoration of the exiles (77<sup>6</sup> 78<sup>7</sup>), the Messianic kingdom, but no Messiah (1<sup>5</sup> 46<sup>6</sup> 77<sup>12</sup>). There is no consideration shown for the Gentiles (82<sup>2-7</sup>).

iii. In B<sup>2</sup>, i.e. 13–25. 30<sup>2</sup>–35. 41–42. 44<sup>8-15</sup> 47–52. 75–76. 83, the writer has relinquished all hope as to the present corruptible world, and fixes his regards wholly on the incorruptible world that is to be. The world will be renewed (32<sup>2</sup>), and in this renewal, from being transitory and verging to its close (48<sup>90</sup> 85<sup>10</sup>), it will become undying (51<sup>3</sup>) and everlasting (48<sup>90</sup>); from being a world of corruption (40<sup>3</sup> 74<sup>2</sup> 21<sup>10</sup> etc.), it will become incorruptible and invisible (74<sup>2</sup> 51<sup>8</sup>). The teaching as to the resurrection proceeds on parallel lines. Thus in answer to the question, 'Wilt thou perchance change these things (i.e. man's material body) which have been in the world, as also the world?' (49<sup>8</sup>), it is shown in 50 that the dead will be raised with their bodies, exactly in the same form in which they had been committed to the earth, with a view to their recognition by those who knew them. When this recognition is completed, the bodies of the righteous will be transformed, with a view to a spiritual existence of unending duration and glory (51<sup>1-3, 7-9</sup>); and they will be made like unto the angels and equal to the stars, and changed from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory (51<sup>10</sup>). They will surpass the angels in excellency (51<sup>12</sup>). In B<sup>2</sup>, i.e. 85, there is the same despair of a national restoration as in B<sup>2</sup>, and only spiritual blessedness is looked for in the world of incorruption (85<sup>4-6</sup>).

* For further details see Morfill and Charles' editio princeps of this book; also the art. Enoch (Bk. of Secrets of).

* For a fuller treatment of the questions touched upon here see Charles' Apocalypse of Baruch.

Observe that (1) in B<sup>2</sup> Sheol is the intermediate abode of the souls of the departed prior to the final judgment (23<sup>2</sup> 48<sup>16</sup> 52<sup>2</sup>, cf. 56<sup>6</sup>). This intermediate place is one involving certain degrees of happiness or torment. For the wicked it is an abode of pain (30<sup>2</sup> 36<sup>11</sup>), but not to be compared with their torments after the final judgment. As for the righteous, these are preserved in certain 'chambers' or 'treasuries' which are in Sheol (4 Ezr 4<sup>41</sup>), where they enjoy rest and peace and are guarded by angels (Eth. En. 100<sup>2</sup>, 4 Ezr 7<sup>96</sup>). From these they issue forth at the final judgment, to receive their everlasting reward (30<sup>2</sup>). (2) From the account of the resurrection in 49<sup>2</sup>-51, it is clear that the Pauline teaching in 1 Co 15<sup>45-50</sup> is in some respects a developed and more spiritual expression of ideas already current in Judaism.

Book of Baruch.—In this composite work there is little that demands our attention. 1-3<sup>8</sup> is undoubtedly derived from a Hebrew original, and possibly part of 3<sup>9</sup>-5. It is composed of at least three independent writings. As to their dates, nothing satisfactory has been yet arrived at. It is noteworthy that in 2<sup>17</sup> Hades still possesses its OT connotation. The restoration of Jerusalem is looked for (4<sup>10-36</sup>) and the return of the exiles (4<sup>36-5</sup>).

4 Ezra.—We shall adopt provisionally some of the critical results attained by Kabisch on this book. Of the five independent writings which he discovers in it, two were written prior to A.D. 70, and three subsequently. The two former he designates respectively as an Ezra Apocalypse and a Son-of-Man Vision. (a) The Ezra Apocalypse consists of chapters 4<sup>2</sup>-5<sup>13a</sup> 6<sup>13-25</sup> 28 7<sup>36-44</sup> 8<sup>63-912</sup>, and is largely eschatological. The signs of the last times are recounted at great length (5<sup>1-12</sup> 6<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>1-3</sup> 6), the destruction of Rome (5<sup>3</sup>), and the advent of the Messiah, the Son of God (5<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>26</sup>). Certain saints will accompany the Messiah (7<sup>28</sup>), and all the faithful who have survived the troubles that preceded the kingdom will rejoice together with the Messiah for 400 years.* Then the Messiah and all men will die (7<sup>29</sup>), and in the course of seven days the world will return into its primeval silence, even as in seven days it was created (7<sup>30</sup>). Then the next world will awake and the corruptible will perish (7<sup>31</sup>), and all mankind will be raised from the dead (7<sup>32</sup>) and appear at the last judgment (7<sup>33</sup>). Then Paradise (=final abode of the righteous) and Gehenna will be revealed. And the judgment will last seven years (7<sup>43</sup>).

Observe that besides the general resurrection in 7<sup>31, 32</sup> there seems to be a preliminary resurrection of some special saints to the Messianic kingdom in 7<sup>28</sup>, but this is doubtful.

(b) A Son-of-Man Vision.—This writing consists of chapter 13, and was probably composed before A.D. 70. Many signs will precede the advent of the Messiah (13<sup>32</sup>), who will appear in the clouds of heaven (13<sup>32</sup> 32); and the nations will assemble from the four winds of heaven to attack him (13<sup>34</sup>), but the Messiah will destroy them, not with spear or weapon of war (13<sup>9, 28</sup>), but 'by the law, which is like fire' (13<sup>38, 49</sup>). And he will restore the ten tribes (13<sup>40, 47</sup>), and preserve the residue of God's people that are in Palestine (13<sup>48</sup>).

We shall now set forth the eschatological expectations which appear in the remaining three constituents of this work, which were composed between A.D. 70 and 100. (c) The Eagle Vision, i.e. 10<sup>60-1235</sup>. Here the destruction of Rome is predicted, through the agency of the Messiah sprung from the house of David (12<sup>32</sup>), who will judge its people and destroy them (12<sup>33</sup>). He will save the residue of God's people in Palestine, and he will fill them with joy to the end, even the day of judgment (12<sup>34</sup>). (d) An Ezra fragment, i.e. 14<sup>1-17a, 18-27, 36-47</sup>. Ezra is to be translated and live with the Messiah till the times are ended (14<sup>9</sup>). These times are twelve. Of these, ten and a half have already elapsed (14<sup>11</sup>). There seems to be no Messianic kingdom.

(e) The Apocalypse of Salathiel, i.e. 3<sup>1-31</sup> 4<sup>1-5</sup> 5<sup>13b</sup> 6<sup>10</sup> 6<sup>30-725</sup> 7<sup>45-862</sup> 9<sup>13-1057</sup> 12<sup>40-48</sup> 14<sup>28-35</sup>. The world is nearly at an end (4<sup>44-50</sup>). As it was created, so it will be judged by God alone (5<sup>66</sup> 6<sup>6</sup>). Very few will be saved (7<sup>47-61</sup> 82<sup>3</sup>). Judgment and all things relating to it were prepared before the creation of the world and of man (7<sup>70</sup>). The day of judgment will arrive when the number of the righteous is completed (4<sup>36</sup>); for the sins of earth will not retard it (4<sup>39-42</sup>). In the meantime retribution sets in immediately after death (7<sup>69, 75, 80, 86, 95</sup> 14<sup>35</sup>). On dying, the souls of the righteous will be allowed seven days to see what will befall them (7<sup>100, 101</sup>); they will be guarded by angels in the 'chambers' (7<sup>75, 85, 95, 121</sup>). They will have the joy of rest in seven ways (7<sup>91-98</sup>). These chambers form their intermediate abode: after the final judgment glory and transfiguration await them (7<sup>95, 97</sup>). But the souls of the wicked will not enter into the 'chambers,' but roam to and fro in torment in seven ways (7<sup>80-87, 93</sup>). After the final judgment they will be tormented more grievously still (7<sup>94</sup>). Intercession, though permissible now (7<sup>106-112</sup>), will not be allowed on the day of judgment (7<sup>102-105</sup>). All things will then be finally determined (7<sup>113-115</sup>). With the final judgment this world closes and the next begins (7<sup>113</sup>): it will be a new creation (7<sup>75</sup>). With its establishment the righteous enter on their final reward. They shall be bright as stars (7<sup>97</sup>); and, beyond them (7<sup>125</sup>), they shall shine as the sun and be immortal (7<sup>97</sup>). Paradise will be their final abode (7<sup>123</sup>).

Josephus (A.D. 37-101).—Josephus' interpretation of Messianic prophecy as pointing to Vespasian (BJ vi. v. 4) must be set down to the exigencies of his position with regard to the Romans. For it is clear from Ant. iv. vi. 5 that he looked forward to a Messianic era. As the troubles predicted by Daniel had befallen Israel, so likewise would the prosperity (Ant. x. xi. 7). Apparently, he believed in an intermediate state for the righteous. Thus in Ant. xviii. i. 3 it is said that 'souls have an immortal vigour, and that under the earth (ὑπὸ χθονός, cf. BJ ii. viii. 14 καὶ ᾧ δέου) there will be rewards and punishments, accordingly as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; and the latter are to be detained in an everlasting prison, but the former will have power to revive and live again.' Here the wicked enter at once into everlasting punishment. Sheol is here hell. But the righteous rise from the intermediate place of happiness and enter into other bodies, probably spiritual bodies (BJ ii. viii. 14). Such was the Pharisaic doctrine according to Josephus. The Essenes believed that a blessed immortality awaited the souls of the righteous (BJ ii. viii. 11), but that those of the wicked were destined to a dark, cold region, full of undying torment.

* This number has originated as follows. According to Gn 15<sup>13</sup> Israel was to be oppressed 400 years in Egypt. Now in Ps 90 the writer prays: 'Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil.' From the combination of these two passages it was inferred that the Messianic kingdom would last 400 years, as a set-off against the period of oppression in Egypt.

The above account of Pharisaic belief which we derive from Josephus may be regarded as fairly trustworthy; but that which he gives in BJ iii. viii. 5 is misleading in a high degree. There he describes the soul as a 'particle of Divinity' (θεοῦ μοῖρα) which has taken up its abode in a mortal body. After death the souls of the righteous 'receive as their lot the most holy place in heaven, from whence, in the revolution of ages, they are again sent into pure bodies.' For the souls of suicides the darkest place in Hades is reserved.

IV. SYSTEMATIC EXPOSITION OF JEWISH ESCHATOLOGY (B.C. 200–A.D. 100).—In the preceding section we have given a survey of eschatological ideas in the order of their historical attestation, and consequently, in large measure, of their actual evolution. By presenting the eschatological scheme of each writer by itself in that section, we have made it possible for the reader to see the various conceptions, such as Sheol, Gehenna, Messiah, Resurrection, in their actual organic relations and historical environment. In this section, however, we shall isolate several of these conceptions, and deal briefly with the various forms they assumed from B.C. 200 to A.D. 100 in Jewish circles. These conceptions are: the Last Woes, the Messiah, the Messianic Kingdom, the Return of the Dispersion, the Resurrection, Judgment, Sheol or Hades, Gehenna, Paradise, Heaven.

The Last Woes.—It will be sufficient for our present purpose to mention the passages where these woes prelude the Messianic kingdom are recounted. These are: Dn 12<sup>1</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>796-804</sup>, 2 Mac 5<sup>2-3</sup>, Jubilees 23<sup>13, 19, 22</sup>, Apoc. Bar 27, 48<sup>31-41</sup> 70<sup>2-8</sup>, 4 Ezr 5<sup>1-13</sup> 6<sup>18-28</sup> 9<sup>1-12</sup> 13<sup>29-31</sup>. For further information the reader should consult Drummond, The Jewish Messiah, in loc.; Schürer, HJP ii. ii. 154-156; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. ii. 509 sqq. 550 sqq.

The Messiah.—As this subject will be treated under the general art. MESSIAH, we shall sketch here only its leading phases.

i. The Messiah—conceived merely as a passive though supreme member of the Messianic kingdom. He is so represented in Eth. En. 83-90, where his appearance is largely otiose, and due probably to literary reminiscence. He rules over a transfigured Israel, with the Heavenly Jerusalem set up as the centre of his kingdom, and his reign is apparently for ever. In the 1st cent. of the Christian era this conception reappears twice in Apoc. Bar 27-30<sup>1</sup> where his rule is of temporary duration, and in 4 Ezr 7<sup>28</sup> (i.e. in the Ezra Apoc. See p. 747<sup>a</sup>), where he dies after a reign of 400 years. In the second and third cases the Messiah appears after the Messianic woes and judgment; in the third, simultaneously with the first resurrection.

ii. The Messiah—conceived as an active warrior, who slays his enemies with his own hand. This conception is attested in the Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>552-560</sup>, which belongs to the 2nd cent. B.C.; in the Pss. of Sol 17<sup>23, 26</sup>, where the Messiah is to be of Davidic descent—but this book belongs properly to the next division; in Apoc. Bar 36-40; also in another independent writing in the same book, 53-74; 4 Ezr 10<sup>60-125</sup>. In the last the Messiah is of Davidic origin. In all these books save the first (?) the Messianic kingdom is of temporary duration.

iii. The Messiah—conceived more loftily as one who slays his enemies by the word of his mouth, and rules by virtue of his justice, faith, and holiness (cf. Ps.-Sol 17<sup>27, 31, 37, 39, 41</sup>). A similar conception is found in 4 Ezr 13. In both writings his reign is probably of temporary duration.

iv. The Messiah—conceived as supernatural, as eternal Ruler and Judge of mankind (Eth. En.

37-70). This conception of the Messiah is logically in some measure a development of that in the third division, and yet it is chronologically antecedent to it. It is the most sublime conception of the Messiah to be found in all Jewish literature outside the Canon. For further details see above, p. 744<sup>a</sup>.

The Messianic Kingdom.—Three views in the main prevailed amongst the Jews as to this kingdom. i. It was to be of eternal duration. ii. It was to be of temporary duration. iii. There was to be no Messianic kingdom.

i. The Messianic kingdom was to be of eternal duration.

(a) On earth as it is (Eth. En. 1-36, Dn, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>766-788</sup> (?)).

(b) On a transformed earth and in heaven (Eth. En. 37-70). As the Messianic kingdom is here eternal, it is preceded in Palestinian literature by the resurrection and the final judgment.

ii. The Messianic kingdom was to be of temporary duration on earth (Eth. En. 91-104, Ps.-Sol 17, 18, 2 Mac, Jubilees, Slav. En., Assumption of Moses, Book of Wisdom, Apoc. Bar—parts A<sup>1</sup> A<sup>2</sup> A<sup>3</sup> B<sup>1</sup>,—4 Ezr—all parts but Salathiel Apoc.).

When the Messianic kingdom is of temporary duration, there appears to be no transformation of the earth. The resurrection and final judgment take place at its close. The resurrection is all but universally a resurrection of the righteous only. Hence in many of these books the wicked are held to enter at once into their final abode. Thus Hades in these cases becomes Hell.

iii. No Messianic kingdom expected [4 Mac (?), Apoc. Bar (B<sup>2</sup>), 4 Ezr, Salathiel Apoc.].

In these books man does not enter till after the last judgment on his final award. After death he meets with a foretaste of his final lot in Hades or Sheol.

The Return from the Dispersion.—The promise that God would turn again the captivity of Israel is frequently made in the OT; also in Sir 33<sup>11</sup> (AV 36<sup>11</sup>), To 13<sup>13</sup>, Eth. En. 57<sup>1,2</sup> 90<sup>38</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 2<sup>170-173</sup>, Bar 2<sup>27-35</sup> 4<sup>36, 37</sup> 5<sup>5-7</sup>, Ps.-Sol 11, 2 Mac 2<sup>18</sup>, Apoc. Bar 7<sup>76</sup> 78<sup>7</sup> (cf. 84<sup>2, 8, 10</sup>), 4 Ezr 13<sup>12, 38-47</sup>, Targ. Jon. on Jer 33<sup>13</sup>, and Shemoneh Esreh: 'Lift up a banner to gather our dispersed, and assemble us from the four ends of the earth.' Yet Rabbi Akiba (Sanh. 10<sup>8</sup>), in the 2nd cent. A.D., denied this return.

The Resurrection.—The resurrection is very variously conceived. The earliest attested view in the 2nd cent. B.C. is that of (a) the resurrection of all Israel (Dn 12<sup>1-3</sup>). About the same period the doctrine of (b) the resurrection of the righteous only is taught in Eth. En. 83-90. Towards the close of the same century another writer looks forward, not to a resurrection of the body, but to (c) a blessed immortality of the soul or spirit after the final judgment (Eth. En. 91-104). These views hold the field throughout the next century, and it is not till the 1st cent. of the Christian era that they are in some measure displaced by others. These latter, which are developments of the former, are: (d) a blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous after death. This is one side of the larger doctrine of an immediate and final retribution after death affecting only the soul or spirit; (e) a general resurrection of all mankind preceding the final judgment.

(a) The resurrection of all Israel [Eth. En. 1-36 (see 22), Dn 12<sup>1-3</sup>, Eth. En. 37-70 (see 51, etc.), 2 Mac 7<sup>11, 14</sup>, etc. 12<sup>38, 41</sup>, Apoc. Bar (B<sup>2</sup>) (see 24, 30<sup>2-5</sup> 50, 51)].

In 2 Mac 12<sup>42-45</sup> the possibility of a moral change taking place in Sheol seems to be implied.

(b) The resurrection of the righteous only [Eth. En. 83-90 (see 90<sup>38</sup>)].

In this book the righteous have no concern in the last judgment, and do not rise till it is over.

(c) A blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous after the final judgment [Eth. En. 91-104 (see 103<sup>3</sup>, 4 91<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>3</sup> 104<sup>2</sup>, 4), Assumption of Moses (see 10<sup>9</sup>), Slav. En. (?), Eth. En. 108 (?)].

(d) A blessed immortality for the souls of the righteous immediately after death [Jubilees (see 23), Philo, Book of Wisdom (see 31-4 42.7.10 etc.), 4 Mac (see 5<sup>37</sup> 9<sup>8</sup> 13<sup>17</sup> etc.)], Essene doctrine according to Josephus, BJ II. viii. 11.

Observe the expression in 4 Mac 13<sup>17</sup> θανόντας ἡμᾶς Ἀβραὰμ καὶ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ Ἰακώβ ὑποδέξονται (cf. Lk 16<sup>22</sup>).

(e) Resurrection of all mankind [Apoc. Bar 30<sup>2-5</sup> 50-51, 4 Ezr (Ezra Apoc. See 7<sup>32-37</sup>), Test. XII. Patr., Benj. 10].

Judgment.—Judgment is variously conceived, either as retribution which takes effect from day to day, or at great crises in national history, or as retribution which is universal and final. The last may take place either at the beginning or the close of the Messianic kingdom. In Apocalyptic literature little attention is paid to the first division. A most emphatic presentation of the doctrine of retribution in this life pervades 2 Mac and Jubilees. We shall here, however, confine our attention to judgment as connected with the consummation of the world. Now, in the last times there were generally two stages in this judgment. The former was executed by human agents,—the saints of Israel or these led by the Messiah,—and may be designated as the judgment by the sword, or, better, the Messianic judgment; the latter was administered by God or, in one instance only, by the Messiah, and constitutes in reality the final judgment.

(a) The Messianic Judgment.—This judgment (i.) may be realistically conceived as involving the destruction of the wicked by the personal prowess of the Messiah or the saints; or (ii.) it may be forensically conceived: the word of the Messiah or of the saints judges or destroys the wicked. The latter form of judgment is obviously a development of the former, but the two are not always kept apart.

i. The Messianic judgment realistically conceived:

(a) Executed by the Messiah [Ps.-Sol 17. 18 (?), Apoc. Bar 39. 40. 72. 73, 4 Ezr 12<sup>32-34</sup>].

(β) Executed by the saints (Dn 2<sup>4</sup>, Eth. En. 90<sup>10</sup> 91<sup>12</sup> 96<sup>1</sup> 98<sup>12</sup>, Or. Sibyll. 3<sup>781</sup>, Jubilees, Assumption of Moses 10<sup>9</sup>).

ii. The Messianic judgment forensically conceived:

(a) Executed by the Messiah (Ps.-Sol 17. 18, 4 Ezr 13<sup>28</sup> 32-50).

(β) Executed by the saints (Book of Wisdom 3<sup>8</sup>, cf. 1 Co 6<sup>2</sup>).

(b) The Final Judgment.—This judgment is always administered by God save in Eth. En. 37-70, where it is committed to the Messiah, the Son of Man. This judgment takes place either at the beginning of the Messianic kingdom or, where this kingdom is of temporary duration, at its close; or, where no such kingdom is expected, simply at the end of this world (see section above on The Messianic Kingdom, p. 748<sup>b</sup>).

As to Sheol, Gehenna, Paradise, Heaven, see the separate articles.

LITERATURE.—The Jewish eschatology of our period has been greatly neglected in the past. This has been due partly to the ignorance of Christian scholars, and partly to the deliberate ignoring by Jewish scholars of the chief sources of information on this subject, i.e. the Apocalyptic books. To Lücke, Hilgenfeld, and Drummond belongs, in large measure, the merit of emphasizing the importance of this literature. Drummond's work, The Jewish Messiah, is a splendid contribution to our knowledge of Jewish thought, though much of it is no longer abreast of our knowledge of this subject. Schwally's Das Leben nach dem Tode is very stimulating on this period, though frequently misleading. The reader may consult also Salmon's Christian Doctrine of Immortality, and Stanton's The Jewish and the Christian Messiah, where they deal with our subject.

Abundant information, and copious, though indiscriminating, references to authorities will be found in Schürer, HJP II. ii. 126-187. Marti also (Geschichte der Israelitischen Religion, pp. 270-310) is well worth consulting.

The present writer hopes to edit, towards the close of next year (1898), a critical work on Jewish Eschatology from the earliest OT times down to A.D. 100.

R. H. CHARLES.

ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

—The eschatology of the NT attaches itself in the first instance to that of the OT. The Heb. Scriptures do not contain anything like a definite or complete doctrine of the things of the end. They are the records, however, of an important contribution to the faith in a future life, and that contribution was an ever-enlarging one. It had its reason in the two fundamental articles of Israel's faith—the doctrine of one God: a living, personal, righteous, gracious God, who made Himself known to His people and entered into fellowship with them; and the doctrine of Man as a creature different in origin and in end from other creatures, the bearer of God's image, made for communion with God, and for life in that communion. These great truths, unfolding their meaning more and more, and acting on the popular conceptions of Death and the Hereafter which Israel had in common with the Babylonians and other nations, led by steps of gradual advance to a clearer, more determinate, and more moral conception of existence beyond the grave. The experiences and intuitions of saints, the visions and forecasts and inferences of faith, seen in the poetical books, combined with thoughts and words of sublime suggestion occasionally found in the historical books, and with the more definite teaching of the prophets, to further this enlargement of belief and the march towards a definite doctrine. So the popular ideas of a dark Sheol with a chill attenuated existence in its sunless deeps gave way to higher views; the thought of the lot of the individual disentangled itself from that of the destiny of the community; the belief in a moral order with judicial awards following men into the other world took shape and became increasingly distinct; and at last the faith and the teaching of the OT rose to the great hope of a resurrection to life. This eschatology of the OT, which grew from less to more in the course of Israel's history, remained nevertheless incomplete at its highest, and pointed to something beyond itself. The eschatology of the NT became its heir, passing beyond its limits and carrying its principles to their issues.

But the eschatology of the NT attaches itself also, though in another way, to the popular faith of the Jews of its time, and to certain developments of thought and belief which had taken place in the period following that which produced the last of the OT books. These developments were considerable. We gather what they were from the literature of Judaism which has descended to us, the Apoc. of the OT, to some extent the Rabbinical books, and most particularly the pseudepigraphic and apocalyptic writings. This literature furnishes the key to much in the NT doctrine of the Last Things. It shows in what way the OT faith was retained and enlarged in harmony with its essential principles; in what way also it was materialized and subjected to changes which were not consistent with its true spirit; in what directions belief became more positive; and in what respects it became fanciful, speculative, grotesque; how certain OT terms and ideas were modified in sense and application, and in what measure new terms and ideas were introduced. The eschatology of the NT bears the impress of these things. It cannot be understood apart from them. From much that emerged in this intervening period it stands aloof. Other things in this development, which were consistent with the principles of the OT revelation, are reflected in it, purified of the gross, exaggerated, and unspiritual elements which mixed themselves with them.

The eschatology of the NT is not given in systematic form, neither is it expressed in the precise and measured language of metaphysics or theology. It appears in the shape of a number of ideas which are common to the NT books, but which are presented in different aspects and connexions by the several writers. It is given in occasional form, in Christ's words, the discourses in the Bk. of Acts, the records of evangelists, the Epistles of apostles, on the promptings of circumstances which from time to time called forth declarations in speech or in writing on the matters of the end. It is not given in the terms of the schools nor with a view to speculative interests, but always for the purposes of life and practice, and in the language of the people. It makes free use of the figurative, parabolic, imaginative phraseology in which the Eastern mind naturally expresses itself. It never claims to give an exhaustive disclosure or a constructive account of the Last Things. The message of the NT also being distinctively a message of hope, the eschatology is occupied mainly with the issues of the kingdom of God and the destiny of the righteous. It says less of the graver issues of the future of the unrighteous.

The eschatology of the NT being conveyed in this occasional and discontinuous form, we may best understand it by following out the great ideas as they appear first in one and then in another of the main groups of writings. The fundamental question is that of Christ's own mind on the subject. It will be convenient, therefore, to deal with the eschatology first as it appears in Christ's own words reported in the Gospels, and then as it is found in the teaching of the several divisions of the NT writings. It will thus be seen whether or how far the NT has a consistent doctrine of the Last Things.

I. CHRIST'S ESCHATOLOGY.—There are questions of criticism to which regard must be had in studying the eschatology of the NT. In the case of our Lord's teaching there is the debated question of what is primitive and what is secondary in the records of His words, with the various tests proposed for distinguishing between the one and the other. It is impossible to enter at length into these things here. It is enough to say that the substance of Christ's teaching will be found to be the same whichever of the leading theories of the construction of the Gospels is followed. Its main points belong to the large stream of narrative and discourse which is common to the first three Gospels, and in which the most primitive tradition is probably preserved. There is also the question of the relation in which the report of Christ's words given in the Fourth Gospel stands to that contained in the Synoptists. Of this it must suffice to say that the difference in the form is a reason for taking the two accounts separately; from which, however, it does not follow that there is an essential difference between them.

In the Synoptic Gospels the eschatology centres in the great idea of the KINGDOM OF GOD (which see). Christ's whole disclosure of the Future has its point of issue in this doctrine of the Divine kingdom and its consummation. In this His teaching connects itself with the large ideas of the OT, carrying them further and fulfilling them.

As the OT, too, in its conceptions of the future knew nothing of the philosophy of the subject and furnished no reasoned statement, but followed the logic of experience and the heart, giving no dogma of immortality, but the expression of a living fellowship with God which involved the continuance of life; so Christ's teaching lies apart from all theoretic questions, all speculative discussions, all that is of curious interest, and deals with practical relations and broad moral issues. It offers no proof of the reality of a future existence, but presupposes it, and speaks of life as man's destiny. It unfolds the course of the Divine kingdom which had been the object of OT faith and the centre of OT hope. It presents that kingdom as a thing of the actual present, brought to men in and by the Teacher Himself, but also as a thing of the future which looks through all historical fulfilments to a completer realization,—a thing, too, of gradual, unobtrusive growth, yet destined to be finally established by a great conclusive event. Christ's whole teaching on the subject of the Last Things, as regards the Church, the world, and the individual, is connected with this lofty OT idea of a new order in which God shall be confessed to be Sovereign, and has regard to it in its primary deliverances.

Among these deliverances a large place is given to the promise of His own Return. In the OT the consummation of the Divine kingdom was to be brought about by a descent of God to earth, and in certain prophecies it was further connected with the coming of an ideal King, the agent of J' in the fulfilment of His purpose. So Christ connects the completion of the kingdom with a decisive occurrence, the great event of His own Parousia (Mt 24<sup>3, 37, 39</sup>). The time of this new interposition is not declared, it is not known even to the Son (Mt 24<sup>36</sup> RV, Mk 13<sup>32</sup> RV). But it is to come when the times are ripe for it, and there are prelusive tokens of it. This event of His coming is the burden of the great eschatological discourse in Mt 24, 25, in which there are problems both for criticism and for interpretation. In that discourse two distinct occurrences, the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world, seem to be spoken of as coincident and as near. This is in accordance with the nature of biblical prophecy as it is seen in the OT, which brings together in prophetic perspective or 'timeless sequence' events which were widely separated in actual occurrence (Is 8, 9, Zeph, Ob). It does not require for its explanation the affirmation of mistake on Christ's part (Strauss, Renan, Keim, Weizsäcker, S. Davidson, etc.), the supposition of misunderstanding or misreporting on the part of the evangelists (Baur, Colani, De Wette, Holtzmann, etc.), the limitation of the whole declaration to the single catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem and the Jewish state (J. S. Russell, etc.), the theory of a double coming, or the hypothesis either of a Jewish (Weizsäcker) or of a Jewish-Christian (Colani, Keim, Pfleiderer, Wendt, Weißbach, Vischer, etc.) apocalypse in the discourse. Nor is this form of statement confined to this particular section of the Synoptic Gospels. Sayings of similar import are given elsewhere (Mk 13<sup>30</sup>, Lk 21<sup>32</sup>, Mt 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>27, 28</sup>; cf. also Mk 8<sup>38</sup> 9<sup>1</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26, 27</sup>). In these Gospels, too, the Return appears to be an objective event, the expression given to it being such as goes beyond any figurative description simply of the final victory of principles or the supersession of old forms of religion. In the Fourth Gospel the case is somewhat different. It is the coming of the Spirit that chiefly appears there, and that in such measure as to suggest to many that only a dynamical coming is in view (Neander, Godet, etc.). Yet a distinction is observed between the coming of the Spirit and Christ's coming, and there are passages in which the idea seems to be the same as that of the Synoptic records (14<sup>3</sup> 21<sup>22</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup>). The first point, therefore, in Christ's teaching on the subject of the future is the announcement of the objective event of His own Return. But His declarations on this Parousia know nothing of the minute and fantastic inventions of Jewish theology, as seen in the Book of Enoch, the Assumption of Moses, the Sibylline Oracles, and similar products of Jewish thought, with their elaborate machinery of signs and portents and mystic numbers, their extravagant chronologies, their grotesque descriptions of the literal re-settlement of the Jews in their own land, their many eccentricities and ineptitudes. They know as little of those Chilistic conceptions of the future, those curious calculations of the duration of Messiah's kingdom, those puerile ideas of the erection of a new Jerusalem on the ruins of the old, which took hold of the Jewish mind before Christian times, and, entering into Christian thought, gave shape to the doctrine of a millennial reign of Christ on earth which was to end in a great apostasy and to herald the consummation.

With this doctrine of the second advent is associated the doctrine of a Final Judgment. This judgment is presented as the object of the coming, and it occupies a place of like prominence in Christ's teaching. It is expressed in various of His sayings, but at greatest length in the eschatological discourse in the First Gospel. According to the consentient teaching of the Synoptic Gospels, it is a judgment at the end of the world, a judgment of individuals (Mt 22<sup>1-14</sup> etc.), a judgment of universal scope (Mt 13<sup>36-42</sup>, 47-50 16<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>31</sup> etc.), and a judgment in which Christ, the Son of Man, is Himself to be the Judge (Mt 25<sup>31</sup> etc.). In the Fourth Gospel the judgment appears for the most part under another aspect. In that Gospel the emphasis is laid upon a judgment which is present and subjective, fulfilling itself in a probation of character and a self-verdict which proceed now (31<sup>17-18</sup> 12<sup>47</sup>, 48). But this subjective judgment of the present in life and conscience is not inconsistent with an objective judgment of the future. And the latter is not strange to the Fourth Gospel. The Johannine phrase 'the last day' (12<sup>48</sup>) points to it, and it is contained in such words as those in 5<sup>27</sup>, 28 (cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>, in which Johannine writing the judgment is connected, as in the Synoptists, with Christ's coming). The doctrine of a final judgment so declared by Christ stands in intimate relation to certain leading ideas of the OT, completing these and giving them certainty. The Heb. Scriptures, penetrated through and through by the idea of a Divine retribution, have a large doctrine of judgment, a judgment for Israel, more frequently a judgment for the nations or a world-judgment. But for the most part it is a world-judgment which has its scene in this world, a triumph of the kingdom of God in the form of an overthrow of its living adversaries on earth. And in this J<sup>n</sup> Himself is the Judge. In certain prophecies (Is 9. 11, Mic 5, Jer 23. 33. 34. 36, Ezk 34. 37, Zec 9-11) the triumph of the kingdom of God is connected with the advent of a great Davidic King, and Messiah appears as the agent of J<sup>n</sup>. But in the OT the final arbitrament of men's lives is not committed to the Messiah or the ideal King, as in Christ's teaching it is given to the Son of Man. Further, while the foundations of the doctrine of a final universal and individual judgment are laid in the OT ideas of the righteousness of God, His covenant relations with Israel, and His sovereignty over the nations, the conception of a judgment after death does not take distinct and definite form till near the close of the OT. Even when the idea of an individual judgment at the end of things appears, the subjects of the judgment seem to be limited to those of Israel. Christ's doctrine has also its relations to the ideas of the non-canonical literature. In the representative books of Judaism the doctrine of a judgment bulks largely, and is taught with much novel and peculiar detail. It has also different forms. In certain books (e.g. the Book of Enoch 90<sup>18, 19</sup>, the Assumption of Moses 3. 4, etc.) the OT idea of a destruction of living enemies of J<sup>n</sup>'s kingdom here on earth survives. In many cases, though not in all, the Messiah is the agent of God in this judgment; and the judgment is placed usually at the beginning of His reign, but sometimes (where a limited duration is ascribed to that reign) at its close. In other books, however, and especially in the Book of Enoch, this passes over into the idea of a final judgment, in the forensic sense, occurring after death, extending to all men and to angels as well. In these books, too, God is the Judge and Messiah His instrument. Only in the later section of the Book of Enoch does the Messiah appear in any certain and definite form as the Judge at the last day. Christ's doctrine of a universal, individual judgment at the end of things, in which judgment He Himself is Arbiter of human destinies, carried the OT conception to its proper issue, while it gave a new certainty, consistency, and spirituality to the developed ideas which had arisen in Judaism in the period following the last of the Jewish prophets.

In conjunction with these doctrines of the Parousia and the Judgment, the doctrine of a Resurrection has an essential place in Christ's eschatological teaching. The doctrine of a resurrection from the dead is implied in the doctrine of a final universal judgment at the end of things. It lies also in the great principles of OT. The Psalmists and the Prophets have their visions of a limitation of the power of death, a destruction of death, a deliverance from Sheol, a life superior to death; and, in the progress of the prophetic teaching, the faith in a resurrection of the dead rises gradually into distinctness. It appears first as a belief in the re-animation of the dead nation, and at last in Isaiah (26<sup>19</sup>) and Daniel as a belief in the return of deceased individuals to life. In the final utterance of OT on the subject (Dn 12<sup>2-3</sup>) this enlargement of the idea appears to have its occasion in the question regarding the fate of departed members of Israel—whether there is reward for the faithful among these, whether there is penalty for the unfaithful. But OT does not seem to go beyond the case of Israel. It carries with the announcement that Israel's dead, true and false, shall come forth from the dust of earth to receive the awards of their truth or falsehood. In the period between this and the Christian era the belief passed through various fortunes. It did not become the universal faith of the Jewish people. In some of the non-canonical books the old idea of Sheol continues (Sir 17<sup>27</sup>, 28 41<sup>4</sup>, Bar 2<sup>27</sup>). In some the hope appears to be that of an incorporeal immortality (Wis 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>1-4</sup> 4<sup>13, 14</sup> 15<sup>3</sup>, 4 Mac 14<sup>3</sup> 16<sup>12</sup> 18<sup>23</sup>). But in others the belief in a resurrection is seen in more or less definite form (Enoch 91<sup>10</sup> 92<sup>3</sup>, Ps.-Sol 3<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>9</sup> etc., most distinctly and most frequently in 2 Mac, e.g. 7<sup>9</sup>, 14, 23; cf. also Sibyll. Oracles 1<sup>450</sup> 2<sup>74</sup>, 275 4<sup>228</sup>, 229, Apoc. Bar 30<sup>1-5</sup> 50<sup>1</sup> 51<sup>6</sup>, 2 Es 7<sup>32</sup>). Rejected by the Sadducees, it became the belief of the Pharisees and the majority of the Jewish people. It had become, too, a belief in the resurrection of the unjust as well as the just, although in certain cases the limited belief in a rising only of the righteous seems to have persisted (Ps.-Sol 3<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>3</sup> etc.). Opinion varied to some extent as to the object of the resurrection, whether it was for judgment or for participation in the glories of Messiah's kingdom, and as to its time, whether it was to be immediately before Messiah's era or at its close (cf. on the one hand Enoch 51, on the other Apoc. Bar and 2 Es). The doctrine, then, which had its roots in the great principles of the OT touching life, the nature of man, and his relation to God; which in the OT had grown gradually in magnitude and in definiteness; which also in Judaism had undergone changes in part natural and consistent, in part forced and in-harmonious, forms an integral part of Christ's eschatological teaching. It is given in discourses which belong to the triple tradition in the Synoptic records (Mt 22<sup>33-33</sup>, Mk 12<sup>18-27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>27-40</sup>). It is implied in utterances reflecting current Jewish opinion (Mt 8<sup>11</sup>, Lk 13<sup>30-29</sup>). It is presupposed where it is not affirmed in terms (e.g. in Mt 24. 25). It is stated in its essential relations to the great principles of the OT, and is relieved of the extravagances, the crudities, and the literalities with which it had become associated in Jewish speculation and Jewish popular thought. It is the doctrine of a real bodily resurrection, far removed from Hellenic or Essene ideas of a bare immortality of soul, affirming in harmony with the OT view of man's relation to God (Mt 22<sup>31-32</sup>, Mk 12<sup>26-27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>37-38</sup>) a continuance of life for man in his entire self. In this the Synoptic records and the Fourth Gospel agree. In the latter, it is true, the fact of the resurrection is presented mainly in its spiritual aspects and its immediate relations. Some of Christ's largest words on the subject go beyond the idea of the resurrection at the last day (11<sup>21-26</sup>); and others, if they stood alone, might perhaps be taken as strong descriptions of a spiritual renovation only (5<sup>25-26</sup>). But in the Johannine record there are also words too definite to admit of being limited to the expression of a purely spiritual resurrection (5<sup>28-29</sup>). Christ's doctrine, further, is the doctrine of a universal resurrection. Certain passages in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 22<sup>30</sup>, Mk 13<sup>27</sup>, Lk 20<sup>36-37</sup>, Mt 24<sup>31</sup>, Lk 14<sup>14</sup>), indeed, have been supposed to imply that Christ taught only a resurrection of the righteous. But there are others with a different implication (Mt 5<sup>29-30</sup> 10<sup>28</sup>). The 'resurrection of the just' (Lk 14<sup>14</sup>) suggests its own antithesis. The Fourth Gospel, too, declares a 'resurrection unto condemnation' as well as a 'resurrection unto life,' and in speaking of the re-awakening of the dead uses terms too large for the limited view. This resurrection, which extends to just and unjust, is further referred to the last day. In Christ's own words there is no statement of a separation of the resurrection of the unrighteous from that of the righteous as if they were events belonging to different times.

In contrast with the fulness and explicitness of Christ's declarations on the Parousia, the Judgment, and the Resurrection, is the reserve of His teaching on the subject of the Intermediate State. This is the more remarkable in view of the position given to that topic in the theology and the popular thought of the Jews of the time. The OT idea of Sheol, originally that of an underworld forming the final abode of men, in course of time passed through changes which are indicated to some extent in the canonical books themselves, but which took larger effect at a later period, and are known to us from the non-canonical literature. These changes followed different directions, and various ideas of Sheol continued to prevail. In part the old conception survived, with some modification (e.g. Sir 17<sup>23-30</sup> 41<sup>1-4</sup>, Bar 27, To 3<sup>6-10</sup> 13<sup>1</sup>, 1 Mac 2<sup>59</sup> 14<sup>30</sup>); in part the term came to denote a place of relative retribution (Wis 3<sup>1-10</sup> 5<sup>1-14</sup> 6<sup>18-20</sup> 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Mac 7<sup>9-11</sup> 14. 29 12<sup>43-45</sup> etc.). Most particularly in the Apocalyptic books it is found to have assumed the sense of an intermediate state with relative rewards and penalties (Enoch 10<sup>12</sup> 22. 100<sup>5</sup> 103<sup>7</sup>; cf. Jubilees 5<sup>243</sup> 7<sup>248</sup> 22<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>27-36</sup>, 2 Es 7<sup>75-80</sup>, Apoc. Bar 52<sup>1-3</sup>). Jewish thought seems thus to have occupied itself largely with the idea of the period between death and judgment, and with the conditions and the possibilities of an intermediate state. Of all this there is little or no recognition in Christ's words. He uses, it is true, the word Hades, the Greek equivalent to the Heb. Sheol, thrice. But in two of these cases the application is obviously metaphorical (Mt 11<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>18</sup>); and in the third (Lk 16<sup>23</sup>) the term forms part of the imagery of a parable intended to teach the broad moral lesson of the penalty of a selfish life, the retribution that pursues it and changes its conditions in the other world. In the same parable He uses the term Abraham's bosom (Lk 16<sup>23</sup>), but in a connexion that does not suggest a definite doctrinal intention. He also uses the term Paradise, a term with which various and uncertain ideas had been associated in Jewish thought. But He uses it only once (Lk 23<sup>43</sup>), and in a large and general sense, as a word of hope and comfort; in which sense also He uses the word sleep,—not to inculcate the doctrine of an intermediate state as a space of unconsciousness, or as a place for the detention, the recompense, or the purification of souls. Some of His words appear to point rather to the hope of an immediate entrance of the just dead into the Father's house and the Father's glory (Jn 14<sup>2-3</sup> 17<sup>24</sup>). But in general His attitude to the question of the condition between death and judgment is one of reserve, and His words convey nothing approaching to a doctrine of the intermediate state.

It is otherwise with the question of what follows the resurrection and the judgment. The eschatology of NT as it is given by Christ Himself has a pronounced doctrine of the Moral Issues of life. It speaks largely and distinctly of final reward for the good, and final penalty for the evil. These are expressed by a great variety of suggestive terms. The recompense of the righteous is described as an inheritance, entrance into the kingdom, treasure in heaven, an existence like the angelic, a place prepared, the Father's house, the joy of the Lord, life, eternal life, and the like; and there is no intimation that the reward is capable of change, that the condition is a terminable one. The retribution of the wicked is described as death, outer darkness, weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, the undying worm, the quenchless fire, exclusion from the kingdom, eternal punishment, and the like. Different measures of reward and of penalty are intimated, according to different degrees of merit and demerit (Lk 12<sup>47-48</sup>). In Christ's own words there is no certain declaration of the terminableness of the penalty of the finally impenitent, no indication either of an intermediate purgatorial process or of an ultimate universal restoration. In the Synoptic Gospels, and in the groundwork of their narrative, the term Gehenna, Hell, is applied to the future condition of the lost (Mt 5<sup>22-23</sup> 10<sup>28</sup> 18<sup>9</sup> 23<sup>15-33</sup>, Mk 9<sup>43-45</sup> 47, Lk 12<sup>5</sup>). This term, though in the later Judaism it had at times the sense of an intermediate condition, whether as a temporary purgatory or as a place of punishment, appears to have been in the earlier Judaism and in our Lord's time a term for the retributive state after judgment (cf. e.g. Enoch 27<sup>2-3</sup> 90<sup>24-26</sup> etc., which are probably its first occurrences in this sense; cf. also 2 Es 6<sup>1-4</sup> 7<sup>36</sup>). The question whether Christ teaches the permanence of the penal condition resulting from the judgment is variously answered. Certain of His sayings are taken to point to a terminable penalty. These, however, are few in number, and appear either to be irrelevant (e.g. Lk 12<sup>17, 48</sup>, where the question is, not the duration of the judicial awards, but their adjustment to different degrees of wrong), or to suggest the opposite conclusion (e.g. Mt 5<sup>25, 26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>58, 59</sup>, where the idea seems to be that of a liability that cannot be discharged, and a justice that is inexorable; Mt 12<sup>31, 32</sup>, Mk 3<sup>28, 29</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>, where the terms appear to be exclusive terms, expressing the irremediableness of the condition, the fact that there can be no forgiveness at any period for the sin in question). It is urged, too, but on grounds open to challenge, that the distinctive terms 'eternal' (αἰώνιος) and 'punishment' (κράσις) may have in this connexion other than their usual and obvious applications. But, on the other hand, the finality of destiny appears to be expressed unmistakably and in many different forms—in the words with which at the close of the great eschatological discourse the moral issues of life are summed up (Mt 25<sup>46</sup>), in such contrasts as that between the 'kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world' and 'the eternal fire which is prepared for the devil and his angels' (Mt 25<sup>41</sup>); in the statements of the issues of God's kingdom and of man's life given in the parables (e.g. Mt 13<sup>24-30, 37-43</sup>); in the figures of 'the unquenchable fire' (Mk 9<sup>43</sup>), the 'worm' that 'dieth not' (Mk 9<sup>48</sup>), the salting with fire (Mk 9<sup>49</sup>), and the like; in the many other terms of solemn moment by which the final lot of the unworthy is described—banishment from Christ (Mt 7<sup>21-23</sup>), rejection (Mt 10<sup>33</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup>), the loss of the soul or the life (Mk 8<sup>36</sup>), dying in one's sins (Jn 8<sup>21, 24</sup>), perishing (Jn 3<sup>16</sup>), being judged already (Jn 3<sup>18</sup>), its being good never to have been born (Mt 26<sup>24</sup>, Mk 14<sup>21</sup>), etc. These sayings are to be understood in the light of the beliefs which prevailed among the Jews on the nature and the duration of the retribution of the wicked. These are by no means easy to determine, as they varied at different periods and in different schools. Yet the general condition of opinion in our Lord's time and in the immediately preceding period can be stated with approximate certainty. The Jewish books relevant to the question contain little to bear out any large belief in the final restoration of all. They often use terms—death, perdition, destruction, and the like, which might be taken to point to annihilation as the final lot of the wicked, if interpreted apart from the old popular ideas of Sheol (e.g. Ps.-Sol 3<sup>13, 9, 12, 13</sup> 13<sup>10, 15</sup>; cf. 2 Es 7<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>52-62</sup>, Apoc. Bar 30). But in many cases the language is definitely expressive of the finality of the retribution (e.g. Jth 16<sup>17</sup>, 4 Mac 9<sup>8-9</sup>, Enoch 5<sup>4, 6</sup> 10<sup>11-14</sup> 12<sup>6</sup> 22<sup>1-11</sup> 27<sup>2, 3</sup> etc.). The schools of Hillel and Shammai, too, seem both to have taught, though in different ways, the immediate sealing of certain classes of sinners to Gehenna, or their punishment there to 'ages of ages.' It would appear, therefore, that in Christ's time, with certain variations and exceptions, the belief was general in an enduring penalty in the other world for the absolutely evil—unrighteous Gentiles, guilty and apostate Jews. Christ's eschatology is one of grace. His doctrine is a revelation of life. But it throws into strong relief the responsibilities of the present existence, the certainty of the retribution of sin, the possibility of an eternal sin (Mk 3<sup>29</sup>) with an eternal penalty.

II. THE APOSTOLIC ESCHATOLOGY.—Under this title we include the eschatological ideas and truths delivered in the various groups of NT writings outside the evangelical records of Christ's own words. Taking each writer separately, we have to ascertain what contribution he makes to the eschatological system, in what relation it stands to Christ's doctrine, in what sense it is in harmony with that, in what degree it is supplementary. There are questions of literary criticism connected with not a few of the writings, questions both of genuineness and of integrity. Into these it is not necessary to enter here. In increasing measure these writings are being lifted above the uncertainties of criticism. It is enough for our present purpose to take them as representatives of different types of NT doctrine, earlier and later. Their ideas exhibit certain characteristic differences in form in the different groups. They bear the impress of the beliefs, opinions, and ways of speech that were current among the Jews of the time. They have obvious points of affinity with the ideas of the OT. They stand in a special relation, of dependence and agreement, to Christ's doctrine.

The Epistle of James, a notable product of primitive Jewish Christianity, says comparatively little on the things of the end. It speaks most definitely of the Parousia, of that as an event nigh at hand, and as having judgment associated with it (5<sup>7</sup>). It speaks also of a Kingdom that is promised (2<sup>5</sup>); of a Judge who 'standeth at the door' (5<sup>9</sup>); of a judgment that will be according to character and responsibility (2<sup>13, 31</sup>); of recompenses for the tried and proved (1<sup>12</sup>), and retributions for the oppressive rich (5<sup>1, 4-7</sup>); of a penalty which appears to be eternal (5<sup>20</sup>).

In the Epistle of Jude Christ's Return is the great event of the future (v. 24); the reward of the good is 'eternal life' (v. 21); the truth of the final judgment (vv. 7, 14) is asserted; the doom of the evil is described as the 'blackness of darkness,' a doom 'reserved for ever' (v. 13). A peculiar feature (appearing also in 2 Peter), in the eschatology of this Epistle, is the place given to the judgment of fallen angels—a subject on which the Jewish imagination ran riot (see especially the Book of Enoch 6-10, 21; cf. also Jubilees 5, Apoc. Bar 56<sup>10-13</sup>). Here their doom is described, free from the extravagances which meet us in the Apocalyptic books, as that of being 'kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day' (RV v. 6).

The writings bearing Peter's name, together with the discourses ascribed to that apostle in the Bk. of Acts, represent a distinct type of eschatological teaching, as of doctrinal statement generally. The Second Epistle, the genuineness of which has been so largely questioned, exhibits an affinity in many things with the Epistle of Jude. It has the same conception of the coming of Christ as the conclusive event of the future (1<sup>16, 24</sup>). It speaks in much the same terms of the judgment, and of the doom of evil men (2<sup>1, 3, 6, 9, 17</sup>). It designates the recompense of the good as an 'eternal kingdom' (1<sup>11</sup>), as Jude designates it 'eternal life.' It has the same exceptional doctrine of the punishment of fallen angels, applying the unusual term Tartarus to the intermediate place of their detention, and describing them as committed to 'pits of darkness in reserve unto judgment' (2<sup>4</sup>). But it also makes its own peculiar contribution to the eschatology of the canonical writings in a remarkable paragraph, the most detailed of its kind in NT, on the end of the world (3<sup>3-13</sup>). It teaches that Christ's Parousia is to bring the whole present system of things to its conclusion, and the world itself to its consummation. With the great event of His coming the existing order shall be dissolved; the present heavens and earth are to give place to 'fresh heavens and a fresh earth'; and a reconstructed world is to come forth as the abode of righteousness and the scene of the perfected kingdom of God. In this 2 P attaches itself to OT conceptions of a world-conflagration (Ps 50<sup>3, 9, 10</sup>, Is 66<sup>15, 16, 24</sup>, Dn 7<sup>9, 10</sup>), and a dissolution of the present system, effected by fire, in connexion with J<sup>m</sup>'s judgment and the day of His recompense (Ps 102<sup>26, 27</sup>, Job 14<sup>12</sup>, Is 34<sup>4, 6, 22</sup>).

First Peter, which is an epistle of hope, looks at all things in the light of the future. It has a large eschatology, the central point of which is Christ's 'Apocalypse,' His revelation or appearing (1<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>). Its dominant notes are the 'last time,' the 'end of all things,' the judgment (1<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>7-17</sup>). In the judgment God Himself is Judge (1<sup>17</sup>); Christ also appears to be Judge (4<sup>5</sup>). The judgment is universal, alike of quick and of dead (4<sup>5</sup>). It begins with the house of God now, and it has its fate reserved for the 'ungodly and the sinner' (4<sup>17-18</sup>). The judgment of the unrighteous is referred to only incidentally. The reward of the good is declared in various terms, as an 'inheritance,' 'honour,' 'life,' a 'crown of glory,' etc. (1<sup>4-7</sup> 5<sup>4</sup>). The question of greatest interest in the eschatology of this Epistle, however, is its relation to the 'larger hope.' This turns upon the interpretation given to the two famous passages touching the preaching to 'the spirits in prison' (3<sup>18-22</sup>), and the preaching of the gospel to 'the dead' (4<sup>6</sup>). In connexion with these the application which Peter makes of Ps 16 in his Pentecostal discourse (Ac 2<sup>31</sup>) is also brought into view. The terms in which Peter speaks here of Christ, 'neither was he left in Hades, nor did his flesh see corruption,' have been taken to point to a visit of Christ to the under-world, and a consequent activity of His grace there. It is with Christ's resurrection, however, that Peter is specially concerned in that discourse, and the words do not go beyond the broad statement that Christ at His death passed into the world of the departed like other men, but passed thither only to rise again. The two passages in the Epistle itself are of a different nature, and rank among the chief crucis interpretum in NT. The former passage has been expounded in the interest of many different theories—those of the liberation of saints of OT times; Christ's penal endurance of God's wrath; the purgatorial detention and purification of souls; Christ's descent to Hades for the purpose of a judicial manifestation of Himself, for a fresh proclamation of the gospel there, for the provision of a continuous ministry of grace there, for the prolongation of opportunities of repentance and offers of forgiveness to the departed, and the like. The latter passage has also been very differently interpreted. On the basis of both, the eschatology of this Epistle has been understood by many to favour the 'larger hope,' and to suggest that this life is not in every case the theatre of human fates, if not to teach the doctrine of the existence of a ministry of grace in the world of the departed with untold possibilities of after-death repentance and salvation. For the details of the interpretation and for its history the commentaries must be consulted. It must be enough here to say that, while the view in question has been largely adopted, it has not commended itself to all scholars of authority. The exegesis of these passages has still many uncertainties, and waits yet for its key; while the passages themselves stand entirely alone in NT. (See especially Güder, Die Lehre von der Erscheinung Christi unter den Todten; König, Die Lehre von Christi Höllenfahrt; Dietelmaier, Historia dogmatis de Descensu Christi ad Inferos litteraria; Hofmann, Schriftbeweis; Usteri, Hinabgefahren zur Hölle; Schweitzer, Hinabgefahren zur Hölle; Spitta, Christi Predigt an die Geister; Bruston, La Descente du Christ aux Enfers.) The further question has been raised whether Peter's eschatology does not contain the doctrine of a Universal Restoration. In his discourse to the people in Solomon's porch (Ac 3<sup>19-21</sup>) he is reported to have spoken of a restoration or restitution of all things. This has been sometimes supposed to intimate the final restoration of all men. But the words have their key in the passage of Malachi

(4<sup>6-8</sup>) to which they refer, and in Christ's application of that passage (Mt 17<sup>9-13</sup>). So regarded, the restoration of which Peter speaks becomes either the moral renewal of Israel, as some explain it, or the renovation of the world, as others think. It is in any case a restoration, not of persons, but of conditions. Peter's eschatology, therefore, is in general concord with that which has so far been recognized in NT. The points in which it has been supposed to be different yet remain doubtful.

The writings associated with John's name have a distinct and peculiar character in their doctrine of the end as in all things else. There is a marked difference, too, between the Apocalypse and the Epistles. The former is an eschatological writing, following the order of the Jewish Apocalyptic. In the latter eschatological truths also appear, but in a subordinate place. The Epistles of John, with their ideal teaching, find the future in the present. As in the version of Christ's teaching which is given in the Fourth Gospel, their great conception is life, and that as opposed to death and perdition. As in the one, so, too, in the other, this life is in the first instance a present thing (1 Jn 5<sup>12-13</sup>). But it is also a thing of the future (1 Jn 2<sup>25</sup>), and it is an eternal life, life after the divine order, life with the ethical quality of real, perfect life. But it is none the less a life that looks to a future—to a manifestation yet to be made of what the children of God shall be (1 Jn 3<sup>3</sup>). In these Epistles the eschatological relations are not lost in the ideal. They speak of the 'last hour' (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>); of an 'antichrist' that 'cometh' as well as of antichrists that already are (1 Jn 2<sup>18-19</sup>, 2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>3</sup>, 2 Jn 7); of a future 'full reward' (2 Jn 8); of a vision of Christ and a conformity to Him which are not of the present (1 Jn 3<sup>2-3</sup>); of a manifestation of Christ yet to be made, of His expected Parousia (1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup>). The use of the term Parousia, which elsewhere, and especially in the Pauline writings, has a very definite sense, indicates that, while to John Christ's Return was in one sense a spiritual advent, a present act of grace or judgment, it was in another sense an objective event of the future. While in John's writings, too, the Resurrection and the Judgment are for the most part spiritual processes and present conditions, they are also events of the future associated, as they are elsewhere, with the Parousia. That it is so with regard to the former is implied in what is said of the judgment and the manifestation of the children of God. That it is so with the judgment itself appears especially in 1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>17</sup>.

In the Apocalypse of St. John we have a large and impressive eschatology, in which Christian truth appears in the garb of Jewish ideas and Jewish terms. This book is beyond all others the book of the future. That future is near, and it is filled with the figure of the returning Christ. Its whole doctrine of the end has its centre in the event of the Parousia, and that doctrine is conveyed in a form which bears the stamp both of the visions of OT prophets (especially Ezekiel, Zechariah, and Daniel) and the symbolism of the Jewish Apocalyptic books. The Parousia appears occasionally as a spiritual advent taking effect in history (2<sup>5</sup> 3<sup>20</sup>), but usually as the objective return which belongs to the end of things. It is regarded as near (2<sup>17</sup> 3<sup>11</sup> 22<sup>12</sup> 20); it is to be an event of glory, and to have judgment for its object (1<sup>7</sup>). The Judge is God Himself (20<sup>12</sup>); but Christ also appears as Judge (1<sup>18</sup> 6<sup>16</sup>, 17 22<sup>12</sup>). Like the non-canonical books of the same class, it speaks much of the signs of the end, and of the prelusive events, but avoids the trivialities and the gross imaginings, the fanciful and long-drawn-out calculations, which are characteristic of the ordinary Jewish Apocalyptic (e.g. Enoch 10<sup>12</sup> 91<sup>12-17</sup> 93, Assump. Moses 10<sup>29</sup>, Sibyll.

Or. 4<sup>7</sup>, 2 Es 14<sup>11-12</sup> etc.). At times it seems to combine different ideas which prevailed in Judaism of the things of the end. In one paragraph (20<sup>1-10</sup>), of difficult interpretation, it appears to follow a view of the final events which differs from the general doctrine of the NT, but is given in certain of the Jewish books—the idea of a millennial reign of Christ on earth, to be followed first by a final burst of Satanic power, and then by Christ's judicial advent. The paragraph, which will not fit a purely figurative interpretation, represents the Day of the Lord as consisting of two divisions, with a double resurrection and a double judgment—a first resurrection, which is only of the saints, and more particularly the martyred saints, and a second, which is for 'the rest of the dead'; a first judgment taking effect in the overthrow of Satan, and a second, which is in forensic form, and for all classes of the dead. The book is also understood to express two views of the lot of the righteous dead: one in which they are presented as having immediate entrance into heaven (13<sup>9</sup>), another in which they are presented as in the underworld, in consciousness and rest, waiting for their complete reward (6<sup>9-11</sup>). In the latter case, however, the martyrs alone are in view, and in both cases the language is that of the imagination. The Apocalypse, however, has a pronounced doctrine of the final awards. The reward of the righteous is conveyed in a varied imagery of the OT order—'hidden manna,' a 'new name,' the 'crown of life,' 'right to the tree of life,' the place of a 'pillar' in the temple, a reign with Christ, a position before the throne, entrance into the city, the vision of God's face, the heirship of all things (27. 10. 17 31<sup>2-21</sup> 71<sup>5</sup> 21<sup>7</sup> 22<sup>3-14</sup>). The penalty of the unrighteous is described as 'great tribulation,' being 'without,' killing with death, burning with fire (22<sup>2-23</sup> 18<sup>8-9</sup> 22<sup>15</sup>); but above all by two terms, 'the second death' (21<sup>8</sup> 20<sup>6-14</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>) and 'the lake of fire' (19<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>10</sup> 21<sup>8</sup>), which are peculiar to this book among the NT writings, but which occur in one form or other in the Rabbinical and Apocalyptic literature (e.g. Enoch 18<sup>11</sup> 21<sup>7-10</sup> 90<sup>42</sup>). In this book they appear to denote a lasting retribution. Further, the Apoc. expresses the doctrine of a perfected world as well as that of a perfected society. It has the vision of a new heaven and a new earth (21<sup>1-6</sup>) as well as that of a perfected city of God (21<sup>1-22</sup>).

In the Epistle to the Hebrews, where we have a series of ideas and forms of expression in general affinity with the Pauline type of doctrine, and not less with the older apostolic type, eschatology is not the prominent subject. Even the 'rest' and 'the world to come' are not presented primarily as of the future. Yet the things of the end make a considerable element of the thought of the Epistle. The doctrines of 'resurrection of the dead' and 'eternal judgment' are dealt with as things that should be well understood (6<sup>14</sup>). The day of Christ's coming is in the writer's eye; it is a day that draws nigh, and with it the judgment is connected (9<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>24-25</sup>). In the judgment it is God Himself, not the Son, that is Judge, and He is 'Judge of all' (12<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>30-31</sup>). The Epistle also has a definite doctrine of final awards. The recompense of the righteous is the 'heaven' into which the Forerunner and High Priest has passed, an 'eternal inheritance,' an 'enduring substance,' a 'better country,' a 'city prepared,' a 'kingdom which cannot be moved' (4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>19-20</sup> 9<sup>15</sup> 10<sup>34-36</sup> 11<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>28</sup>). The retribution of the unrighteous is 'judgment,' 'fierceness of fire,' 'perdition' (10<sup>27-39</sup>).

In the Pauline Epistles, together with the discourses attributed to St. Paul in the Book of Acts, we find a remarkable eschatology, larger, more developed, and in some points, especially in the doctrine of the resurrection, having more of the aspect of reasoned statement. Even this eschatology, however, is not given in anything like orderly or systematic form, but incidentally as occasion arose from time to time in the discharge of St. Paul's ministry. Nor is it the fundamental doctrine of the Pauline writings. The questions of its precise nature and measure, its consistency, and its relations to what is found elsewhere in Scripture, have been made dependent on questions regarding the authenticity and integrity of the Epistles and the growth of St. Paul's ideas. In its main elements, however, it is unaffected by these questions. Its essential points would remain the same had we only the four primary Epistles accepted by Baur. They appear in all the four distinct groups into which the Pauline writings fall. They do not appear in the same proportions and relations, or under precisely the same aspects, in the several groups. But the differences which have to be recognized do not amount to inconsistency. They do not imply any essential change of view, and do not appear to go beyond what finds its explanation in differences of circumstance, occasion, and circle of readers.

As in other sections of NT, the doctrine of the things of the end is closely related in the Pauline writings to that of the kingdom of God, an idea which recurs in all the four groups of Epistles. This 'kingdom,' though sometimes described as a present kingdom (Ro 14<sup>17</sup>, cf. 1 Co 4<sup>20</sup>, Col 1<sup>13</sup>), is usually a kingdom of the future, and the idea of its consummation is the centre of the Pauline eschatology. A foremost place is given in this eschatology to the doctrine of Christ's coming, which event is described under a variety of terms—His 'day,' His 'revelation,' His 'Parousia,' etc. (1 Co 17<sup>8</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>19</sup> 3<sup>13</sup> 4<sup>15</sup> 5<sup>2-23</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>1-8</sup>, Ph 1<sup>10</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>13</sup> etc.). This Parousia is regarded as an objective event. The passages in which this 'coming' is declared are not confined to any one section of the writings; and when compared with each other they do not suggest a change in St. Paul's mind from a less spiritual idea in the earlier Epistles to a more spiritual in the later. The doctrines of the Resurrection, the Judgment, and the Final Awards also appear in essentially the same form in the Pauline writings, and in the several groups of these writings, as elsewhere in the NT. The resurrection finds its largest exposition in the primary Epistles, but it is given also in others, and it is a real bodily resurrection, a return of the complete man to life (Ro 4<sup>17</sup>, 8<sup>11</sup>, 1 Co 15, 2 Co 1<sup>10</sup> 4<sup>14</sup> 5<sup>1-5</sup>, Ph 3<sup>11-21</sup>). The judgment is the judgment of God (Ro 2<sup>3</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>, cf. 3<sup>19</sup>), of Christ (2 Co 5<sup>10</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), of God through Christ (Ro 2<sup>16</sup>); a future, final judgment (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 3<sup>13</sup>); a righteous judgment, discovering the secrets of all hearts, giving to every man according to his works (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>5</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>); a universal judgment, for both quick and dead (Ac 17<sup>31</sup>, cf. Ro 14<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>). The issues of that judgment are declared with remarkable frequency and variety of statement; they are described as 'eternal' (αἰώνιος), which term in the Pauline Epistles is essentially, and in most applications, one of duration (cf. e.g. Ro 16<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>1</sup> etc.). The lot of the unrighteous has a subordinate place, but is expressed as 'wrath,' 'the wrath to come,' 'death,' 'punishment,' 'destruction,' 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord' (Ro 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, Ro 2<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>21</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>, Ph 3<sup>10</sup>). The lot of the righteous is a salvation 'with eternal glory,' a 'prize,' a 'crown,' an 'inheritance,' a 'manifestation,' a 'reign,' a 'life' with Christ, 'eternal life,' 'the life which is life indeed' (Ro 2<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>9-21</sup> 6<sup>8-23</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>, Gal 5<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>8</sup>, Ph 3<sup>14</sup>, Col 1<sup>12</sup> 3<sup>24</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>12-16</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>1-10</sup> 4<sup>8</sup>, Tit 1<sup>2</sup> etc.).

The Pauline eschatology has elements which are, in some sense, peculiar to itself. Among these are the doctrines of the Rapture of the Saints (1 Th 4<sup>7</sup>) and the Man of Sin (2 Th 2<sup>8-10</sup>). Of these the former has a certain affinity with one of the apocalyptic visions (Rev 11<sup>11, 12</sup>), as well as with Christ's word regarding the 'gathering of the elect' (Mt 24<sup>31</sup>), and the narratives of the ascension, especially those by Luke (Mk 16<sup>19</sup>, Lk 24<sup>51</sup>, Ac 1<sup>9, 10</sup>). The latter takes its form from Daniel's predictions (9<sup>27</sup> 11<sup>36, 37</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>), and is in affinity with Christ's eschatological discourse (Mt 24<sup>24</sup>), and John's declaration on Antichrist (1 Jn 2<sup>18</sup>).

There are also things in the Pauline eschatology on the interpretation and relations of which opinion has been divided. It is thought by some to depart from the general view of the NT, and to join the Apocalypse (20<sup>1-10</sup>) in teaching the intervention of a millennial period between two distinct resurrections. But this idea, which is otherwise alien to St. Paul's writings, turns upon the particular interpretation of a single passage (1 Co 15<sup>22-24</sup>), in which the immediate question is not one of succession or chronological order, and in which nothing is said of any other resurrection than that of those who are Christ's. The Pauline Epistles have also been supposed to contain a definite doctrine of the intermediate state, with activities of grace in it. The doctrine of a purgatory, or some provision for the purgation of souls in the other world, has been ascribed to the great paragraph in 1 Co 3<sup>12-15</sup>, in which, however, the 'day' in question is that of the judgment, and the action referred to is that of testing, not purifying. The doctrine of a middle state, with a descent of Christ implying the extension of grace and opportunity, is supposed to be contained, in particular, in certain passages of the greater Epistles. One of these is the section in Romans (10<sup>8-10</sup>) in which use is made of Dt 30<sup>11-14</sup>. But the main idea there is the accessibility of the Divine commandment, the nearness and attainability of the righteousness of God, and the words say nothing of a Hades-ministry of Christ, nothing of the world of the dead, beyond the fact that Christ entered it and was raised from it. Another is the paragraph in Ephesians (4<sup>7-10</sup>) in which the subject of gifts is dealt with, and the 68th Psalm is introduced in that connexion. It speaks of a descent of Christ, by which some understand the descent from heaven in the incarnation, and others the descent from earth to Hades. But even on the latter interpretation the paragraph says nothing of any work of Christ, or any possibilities for the dead in Hades. Of greater interest is the question whether the Pauline eschatology contains the doctrine of a universal restoration. The answer turns mainly on certain passages of large suggestion in the Epistles of the Captivity, together with one or two in the earlier Epistles. The comparison between Adam and Christ in 1 Co 15<sup>20</sup> is cited in this interest. The universality expressed there, however, does not mean that all shall in the end be made certain of blessedness. The point is either, as some take it, that all who are Christ's shall be raised (the 'all' being limited by the nature of the case); or, as others think, that, as in Adam all are made subject to physical death, so in Christ all shall be raised out of it. The statement in the same chapter (1 Co 15<sup>24-28</sup>) on the subduing of all things, and the consummation in which God shall be 'all in all,' is also supposed to imply Paul's hope of a final restoration of all. But the subjects to be subdued are not sinful men, but 'all rule and all authority and power'—all powers opposed to God; and the end expressed by the 'all in all' is a condition of things in which the world in all its parts will answer to God's will, or in which the will of God will be recognized as the sole authority. The declaration of the universal adoration that is to be paid to the exalted Christ (Ph 2<sup>10, 11</sup>) is also cited as a distinct witness to the same; in which, however, there is probably nothing beyond the broad statement of a homage wide as universal nature, or an acknowledgment of sovereignty made by three great classes of living beings. The passages which are most definite and most relevant are the one in Ephesians (1<sup>9, 10</sup>) which speaks of a 'summing up' of all things in Christ, and the one in Colossians (1<sup>20</sup>) which speaks of a 'reconciliation' of all things. In these the terms are large enough to include all created things, and go beyond the case of universal man, or even the whole animate creation. They are passages which express the cosmic effects of Christ's work, and appear best interpreted as declarations of the Divine purpose to bring back all things to their pristine condition of harmony, through Christ as the centre of unity and bond of reconciliation.

The Pauline eschatology has its point of culmination in its doctrine of the resurrection. That doctrine is a consistent as well as a lofty one. It does not limit itself to a resurrection of the just, but has its place also for that of the unjust. Neither does it regard the resurrection of the just and that of the unjust as two successive acts, separated by a millennial period, the passage (1 Co 15<sup>20-28</sup>) chiefly relied on for that being insufficient to sustain it. Nor does it seem to predicate the provision of an interim body, as some have argued on the basis of a single paragraph (2 Co 5<sup>1-8</sup>), for the existence between death and the resurrection. Nor, again, does it entangle itself with curious questions regarding the how of the resurrection, the nature of the risen body, or the conditions of the future life, but contents itself with the simplest analogies drawn from nature and from Christ's own case. It consistently affirms for man a real and complete continuance of being, not an incorporeal immortality like that to which Greek thought looked, but a bodily immortality, a permanence of life in the integrity of man's entire nature. It connects its doctrine of the resurrection with other cardinal Pauline doctrines—the indwelling of the Spirit, the inward presence of Christ, the mystical union. It links it further with the doctrine of a renovated earth and a ransomed creation (Ro 8<sup>19-23</sup>).

The eschatology of the NT, therefore, is in its broad outlines a consistent though not a systematized doctrine. In the different sections of NT, and with all differences in detail, the eschatology turns on the great truths of the Parousia, the bodily resurrection, the universal, righteous judgment, the final awards of recompense and penalty. It is in essential harmony with the faith and teaching of the OT, and requires for its explanation no theories of derivation from ethnic thought. The distinctive points in the Pauline eschatology are in affinity with Hebrew faith, not, as some argue (Pfleiderer, etc.), with Greek thought. The same is even more obviously the case with the eschatology of the NT writings outside the Pauline circle. Essene or Alexandrian (Philonian) ideas are not in place as sources of Christ's teaching on the things of the end. Even the doctrine of the resurrection as it is given in the NT cannot be said to be dependent, in the sense affirmed by some (L. H. Mills, etc.), on the Zoroastrian theology. It is possible that in some of its affirmations the NT eschatology has been influenced to a certain extent in its form by external modes of thought. In all that is of its substance it is in relation to Hebrew faith, and has its point of issue in the principles and ideas of the Old Testament.

LITERATURE.—The various books on NT Theology, the Biblical Theology of NT, the Teaching of Christ and the Apostles, by Baur, Neander, Reuss, Lechler, Schmid, Oosterzee, Meyer, Weiss, Beyschlag, Wendt, Holtzmann, etc.; the various treatises illustrative of NT Times and Jewish beliefs: Colani, Jésus-Christ et les croyances messianiques de son temps; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah; Drummond, Jewish Messiah; Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah; Hilgenfeld, Jüdische Apok.; Gfrörer, Jahrhundert des Heils; Schürer, IJP; Hausrath, New Test. Times; Weber, Jüd. Theologie; Deltzsch, Biblical Psychology; S. Davidson, Doctrine of Last Things; Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality; Pusey, What is of Faith as to Everlasting Punishment? White, Life in Christ; Petavel-Olliff, Problem of Immortality; Kabisch, Eschatologie des Paulus; Russell, The Parousia; Riemann, Lehre von der Apokatastasis.

S. D. F. SALMOND.

ESCHEW.—In the older versions 'eschew' is common, and is used in two senses. — 1. To 'escape,' as Pr 11<sup>15</sup> Wyc. 'He that escheweth snaris, schal be sikur'; cf. Knox, Hist. p. 70, 'If they will not convert themselves from their wicked error, there shall hastily come upon them the wrath of God, which they shall not eschew.' Of this meaning AV has retained no example.

2. To 'turn away from,' as Pr 17<sup>18</sup> Wyc. 'He that escheweth to lerne, schal falle in to yuels.' Of this AV preserves three examples in OT, Job 11-<sup>8</sup> 23, all in the phrase 'to fear God and e. evil' (Heb. פָּחַד); and one in NT, 1 P 3<sup>11</sup> 'Let him eschew evil, and do good' (Gr. ἐκκλινω). Cf. Is 7<sup>16</sup> Cov. 'But or euer that childe come to knowledge, to eschue the euel and chose the good.' RV prefers 'turn away from' in 1 P, Amer. RV in Job also. Eschew came into the Eng. lang. from the Old High Ger. sciuchen (through the Fr. eschever), whence came also 'sly,' adj. and verb.

J. HASTINGS.

ESDRAELON.—This is the Gr. way of writing the Heb. name Jezreel—אֶזְרָאֵל 'God soweth'—the royal city of Ahab and Jezebel, which, standing on the E. edge, gave its name to 'the great plain' of central Palestine. It is variously given, e.g. Jth 3<sup>9</sup> אֶזְרָאֵל A 'Εσδραήλων (B 'Εσδραήλων); 7<sup>3</sup> A 'Εσδραήλω (B κ 'Εσδραήλων); 4<sup>8</sup> B 'Εσραήλων, A 'Εσραήλων. The name by which it is now known among the natives is Merj Ibn-Amr 'Meadow of the son of 'Amr.'

At one time the mountain range must have stretched unbroken from the uplands of Samaria, behind Jenin, to those of Galilee, which run N. into the Lebanons. Now it is as if a gigantic mass had been torn from the bosom of the range, leaving the rough protuberances of Gilboa, Little Hermon, and Tabor, along the edge of the Jordan Valley, and thrust violently towards the sea, in a N.W. direction. This mass forms the wooded bulk of Carmel, which, rising to a height of over 1800 feet, terminates in a bold promontory, guarding the S. end of the Bay of Acre. The undulating floor of this great gap among the hills forms the 'valley' or plain of Esdraelon. The name by which it is mentioned 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup>, Zec 12<sup>11</sup>, נַחְלָא 'an opening,' from נָחַל 'to split' or 'cleave asunder,' as distinguished from נֶחֱלִים 'a depression' or 'deepening,' applied to its offshoot, the vale of Jezreel, suits the conditions admirably. The word still persists in El-Bekā, the great hollow between the Lebanons; and in its dim. form, El-Bakci'a, a village with a tract of fertile land around it, enclosed by ridges, high in the mountains of Naphtali. So the plain of E. is shut in by hills on every side. It may be described generally as triangular in form. It is bounded by irregular lines, drawn from the foot of Carmel, along the N. edge of the low hills which join Carmel to the Samaritan mountains, to Jenin; from Jenin to the base of Mt. Tabor; and thence under the Nazareth hills, back again to Carmel. The S. boundary is the longest, extending some 20 miles; the other two are nearly equal, being each about 15 miles in length. From Jenin a little bay runs east into the bosom of Gilboa, but finds no outlet. Between Gilboa and Little Hermon a broad and easy descent passes down as far as Beisan, and then, with a sudden leap, plunges to the level of the Jordan Valley. This is properly the vale of Jezreel. Between Little Hermon and Tabor another offshoot of the plain makes its way down to the Ghôr, throwing off a spur to the N.E. of Tabor. Westward the plain narrows to a gorge between the lower hills of Galilee and Carmel, through which the Kishon forces a passage to the plain of Acre, and thence to the sea. We have practically one continuous plain from the sea-shore to the lip of the Jordan Valley. There is the plain of Acre, running up to the gorge at the E. end of Carmel; the great central plain spreading N. and S., and rolling E. to the base of Gilboa and Little Hermon, the general elevation of which is about 200 ft. above sea-level; then the vale of Jezreel, which, in the 12 miles from Zer'in to Beisan, sinks about 600 ft., before falling steeply into the Jordan Valley.

For the most part, the plain consists of deep, rich, loamy soil. After the removal of the crops, where it is cultivated, the autumnal suns burn the surface almost to brick; and when the rains come, it sucks them in like a huge sponge. In winter it becomes a nearly unbroken sheet of mud, extremely dangerous to cross; disaster not seldom befalling those who travel even by the most frequented and thoroughly beaten tracks. Its fertility has always been remarkable, ever generously rewarding the toils of the husbandmen. In season you may pass over many acres where the man on horseback can just see over the tall stalks of grain. Where left to itself, the rank luxuriance it produces is proof enough of what it might do in skilful hands. Of trees, in the plain there are few, but on its borders, esp. at Jenin, there are clumps of olives and other fruit trees, the stately palm waving high over all. The low hills that run down towards Carmel from the N. are thickly covered by oak trees, and are known among the natives as 'the forest.'

The only stream of importance in the plain is the Kishon, visible, for the most part, only from its own steep banks. Rising at Jenin, it pursues its crooked course, justifying its name 'the tortuous,' along a deep muddy bed, gathering contributions from other parts of the plain, and carrying all, through the gorge at Carmel, to the sea. The chief fountains are at Jenin, where, creating the gardens, they gave rise to the ancient name En-Gannim; at Jezreel, where, in close proximity, are three springs, the principal being Ain Jalûd, just under the northern cliff of Gilboa, identified with the well of Harod. The stream which these three supply flows eastward to Jordan. At Lejjûn, the ancient Megiddo, there are also copious springs, sufficient to form considerable marshes to the N., besides turning several mills, and serving largely for irrigation.

The plain owed its importance chiefly to its central position, and to the great highways that lay athwart it. The main gateways of entrance were five in number. (1) That coming down from the N. between Tabor and the Nazareth hills, guarded by the fortress on the mountain. (2) That from the E. up the vale of Jezreel, commanded by this city. (3) The approach from the S. by Jenin. (4) That up Wady 'Arah into the plain by the old stronghold of Megiddo, now Lejjûn. (5) That through the pass under Carmel, from the plain of Acre, dominated by Harosheth—Harithiyeh—on the N., and by Jokneam of Carmel on the edge of the plain. By one or other of these portals the merchant caravans and the armies of contending powers had to enter, and find exit, on their passage N., S., E., or W. These strongholds, together with Bethshean—Beisan, Shunem—Sôlam, Nain, on the N.W. shoulder of Little Hermon, Daberath—Debâriyeh, on the W. slope of Tabor, and Chesul-loth—Iksál, under the Nazareth hills, were the chief cities around the plain. At no time have towns of any importance been built on the plain itself.

E. formed the main part of the 'lot' of Issachar (Jos 19<sup>17-22</sup>). This tribe seems to have reverted at once to the old nomadic life, 'dwelling in tents' (Dt 33<sup>18</sup>), and the fatness of the land becoming a snare to them, they were ignobly content to secure its enjoyment by stooping as servants 'under task-work' (Gn 49<sup>14</sup>). The 'men who had understanding of the times,' of the children of Issachar, who came to David at Hebron (1 Ch 12<sup>32</sup>), were probably astrologers, and skilled in the arts of divination, so popular from of old among the children of the wilds. This goes to show how closely the inhabitants of the plain were identified with their Bedawi neighbours. In the same chapter, v. 40, we have an indication of the character of its ancient produce. The men of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali 'brought bread on asses, and on camels, and on mules, and on oxen, victual of meal, cakes of figs, and clusters of raisins, and wine, and oil, and oxen, and sheep in abundance.'

Four battles, famous in Israel's history, were fought in this plain. On the banks of Kishon Sisera was overthrown, 'the stars in their courses' contributing to his defeat (Jg 5<sup>20</sup>). In the hollow between Gilboa and Little Hermon, the swarms of 'the children of the East' perished in the midnight alarm, before Gideon and his brave 300 (Jg 7). Saul and Jonathan, driven back by the victorious Philistines, retired to the heights, and were slain on the 'high places' of Gilboa (1 S 31). Josiah's disastrous mistake, in attempting to arrest the progress of Pharaoh-necoh in the valley of Megiddo, was paid for with his life. Wounded in the battle, he was carried to Jerus. dead (2 K 23<sup>30</sup>) or dying (2 Ch 35<sup>20-27</sup>). Imperishable memories of Elijah's encounter with the prophets of Baal cling to its western border. Up from the way of the Jordan came Jehu, driving furiously, to the slaughter of Ahab's house, and across the plain fled Ahaziah, to perish by Megiddo. The army of Holofernes spread out from the hills above Jenin to Cyamon—Tell Kaimân (Jth 7<sup>3</sup>). During the long period of the Jewish wars, the plain often resounded with the tramp of armies and the noise of battle. In the vision of the Jewish-Christian seer (Rev 16<sup>14, 16</sup>), the most fitting place whither 'the kings of the whole world shall be gathered together unto the war of the great day of God, the Almighty,' is the level reaches, so often drenched in blood, which take their name from 'the place which is called in the Heb. tongue Har-Magedon.'

Open of old to the eastern tribesmen, who kept the peasants in constant fear, the Romans inaugurated a period of security, and the people made progress in the arts of civilization. But with the fall of the eastern empire, the Arab hordes rushed back, and restored the ancient conditions. In recent years the Turks have established more effectual control over the nomads; and the peasants, delivered from the rapacity of the Arabs, have been handed over to the tender mercies of certain Greek capitalists in Beirút. We may doubt if their burdens have thus been lightened.

LITERATURE.—G. A. Smith, HGIL 381-410; Baedeker, Pal. 3 229; Furrer in Schenkel's Biblex. iii. 302; Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 179 f.; Porter, Giant Cities of Bashan, 245 f.; PEFSt. 1872, 180 f.; 1873, 3 ff., 46, 60; 1875, 40; 1879, 13; Conder, Tent-Work, 58 ff.; Moore, Judges, 197 f.; Schürer, HJP i. li. 89.

W. EWING.

ESDRAS, FIRST BOOK OF.—TITLE.—The titles of the books that deal with the history of Ezra are confusing. In the Sept. this book is entitled Esdras A, Esdras B embracing the canonical books of Ezra and Nehemiah. In the Vulg., however, Jerome had used the words Esdras I. and II. for the canonical books; Esdras A therefore became Esdras III., Esdras IV. being the designation of the other and later apocryphal book. In the sixth article of the Book of Common Prayer, and in all the early Eng. Bibles, the four books are numbered as in the Vulgate. The Geneva Bible (1560) was the first to adopt our present classification, which keeps the Heb. names Ezra and Nehemiah for the canonical, and gives the Latin names Esdras I. and Esdras II. to the apocryphal books.

Another title, ὁ λεπὺς, appears as the heading of Esdras A in Cod. A of the LXX, which also has λεπὺς at the head of Esdras B; the subscriptions in both books give the ordinary names.

Yet another name for our book appears in the subscription to the Old Latin, 'Explicit Esdrae liber primus de templi restitutione,' which aptly describes the contents of the book. To avoid confusion, 'The Greek Esdras' has been suggested as a suitable title.

CONTENTS.—Except for one original section (3<sup>1-5</sup>), the book is made up wholly from materials that exist in canonical books. It is a repetition of the history of the rebuilding of the temple. The first chapter corresponds to the last two of 2 Ch, the last to a portion of Neh 8; the intervening portion runs parallel to Ezra, and contains the whole of that book, with one transposition and one interpolation.

The following scheme gives the canonical parallels, and shows the chronological confusion of the book. (The verses are those of the Camb. LXX.)

Es 1=2 Ch 35. 36. Great passover of Josiah; his defeat at Megiddo, and death; the succeeding Jewish reigns and the Captivity briefly sketched.

Es 2<sup>1-14</sup>=Ezr 1. Cyrus' proclamation. Delivery of the sacred vessels to Sanabassar, and his return to Jerusalem.

Es 2<sup>15-26</sup>=Ezr 4<sup>2-24</sup>. Opposition to the rebuilding of the temple. Letter of Persian officials resident in Samaria to Artaxerxes. The work abandoned till the reign of Darius.

Es 3<sup>1-5</sup>. Original. Story of the three pages at the court of Darius, who each maintain a thesis before the king. The third, Zerubbabel, as a reward for his wisdom, is granted leave to lead a body of Jews to Jerusalem. Departure of the caravan under Joachim, son of Zerubbabel, and others.

Es 5<sup>7-45</sup>=Ezr 2. Lists of those returning with Zerubbabel.

Es 5<sup>46-70</sup>=Ezr 3-4<sup>5</sup>. Altar of burnt-offering set up; Feast of Tabernacles celebrated; foundation of temple laid; offer of 'the enemies' to co-operate rejected. The work hindered through their opposition till the reign of Darius.

Es 6. 7=Ezr 5. 6. Work resumed in second year of Darius. Letter of the Persian governors to Darius, and his favourable rescript. Completion of the temple.

Es 8-9<sup>36</sup>=Ezr 7-10. Return under Ezra in reign of Artaxerxes. The abuse of mixed marriages redressed. Names of the transgressors.

Es 9<sup>37-55</sup>=Neh 7<sup>73-813</sup>. Reading of the law by Ezra.

The history goes directly backwards: first Artaxerxes (2<sup>15-26</sup>), then Darius (3-5<sup>6</sup>), lastly Cyrus (5<sup>7-70</sup>), instead of Cyrus, Darius, Artaxerxes. After expressly stating that it was Darius who gave permission to Zerubbabel to return, the writer in 5<sup>68-70</sup> calmly refers this return to the time of Cyrus.

The book is incomplete. It breaks off in the middle of a sentence, καὶ ἐπισυνήχθησαν (cf. Neh 8<sup>3</sup>). It probably continued the history to the Feast of Tabernacles described in Neh 8, but no further; this is suggested by Jos. Ant. XI. v. 5, who describes that feast, using an Esdras word ἐπαριθμῶν, and at this point, having hitherto followed Es as his authority, passes on to the Book of Neh. The Latin versions add a clause completing the broken sentence of the Greek. There is no indication that the book ever began at an earlier point in the history than it does now.

RECEPTION AND USE OF THE BOOK.—The first witness to the existence of Es A is Josephus, who uses it in place of the canonical book not only in his description of the Return (Ant. XI. i.-v.), but also in his account of Josiah (Ant. x. iv. 5 ff.). He agrees with Es in shifting the first opposition to the work, and the letter to the Persian king, from its place in the canonical Ezr, altering Artaxerxes to Cambyses to correct the chronological error; he introduces the story of the three pages; with Es he passes directly from the end of Ezr to Neh 8; and he borrows a good deal of the language of our book. His preference for it was probably due to its more elegant Gr. style, and a desire not to omit the additional matter contained in it. He occasionally supplements his authority by information derived apparently from the Heb. Ezr; the indications of his knowledge of the Gr. Es B are too slight to warrant the supposition that he made any use of that book (but see XI. i. 3, § 15, ψυκτῆρες; XI. v. 2, § 136). His narrative is worthless as history, since in trying to remove the inaccuracies of his original he has only introduced greater confusion himself.

Our book is quoted fairly often by the early Christian Fathers, both Gr. and Latin. Among Gr. Fathers, Clem. Alex. Strom. I. 392, Potter (ἱεροῦσαλὴμ), σοφία νικῶντας τοὺς ἀνταγωνιστάς, κ.τ.λ.; Origen, Hom. ix. in Josuam, § 10, Comm. in Johann. vi. 1; Eusebius, Comm. in Ps. 70, § 19; Athanasius, Orat. cont. Arianos, II. 20. Tertullian, De Cor. Milit. 9, perhaps refers to 1 Es 52; Cyprian, Ep. 74, 9, quotes the passage, 'Veritas manet et invalescit in æternum, et vivit et obdormit in sæcula seculorum' (iv. 38); and Augustine, de Civ. Dei, xviii. 36, refers to the same passage, suggesting that it may be prophetic of Christ, who is the Truth. No passage has perhaps been more freq. quoted, or misquoted, than iv. 41, Magna est veritas et pravelet 'Great is truth, and strong above all things' (ὑπερῆχον). (The patristic references are collected in the Tübingen Theol. Quartalschrift, 1859, p. 263sq.) The first writer to throw discredit on the book was Jerome. He refused to translate the 'dreams' of 3 and 4 Esdras. His words are (Præf. in Ezechiæ), 'Tertius annus est quod semper scribitis atque rescribitis, ut Esdræ librum et Esther vobis de Hebræo transferam. . . . Nec quinquam moveat quod unus a nobis liber editus est: nec apocryphorum tertii et quarti somnii delectetur; quia et apud Hebræos Ezræ Nehemiæque sermones in unum volumen coarctantur; et quæ non habentur apud illos, nec de viginti quatuor senibus sunt, procul abicienda.' Consequently, the Old Latin was left untouched by him, and the book is absent from the older MSS of the Vulg. (eg. Cod. Amiatinus).

It was probably owing to the influence of this estimate of Jerome, that the Tridentine Fathers in 1546 excluded 1 Es from the Canon. 1 and 2 Es, with the Prayer of Manasses, are the only books admitted as apocryphal into the Romish Bibles, the rest of our Apoc. being declared canonical by the Council of Trent. In modern editions of the Vulg. they form an Appendix, being placed after the NT, with a prefatory note stating that they are placed 'hoc in loco extra scilicet seriem canonicorum librorum . . . ne prorsus interirent, quippe qui a nonnullis sanctis Patribus citantur, et in aliquibus Bibliis tam manuscriptis quam impressis reperiuntur.' In the Eng. Bible our book stands first in the Apocrypha.

RELATION TO THE CANONICAL EZRA.—On this question, the most interesting which arises in connexion with the book, the most opposite opinions have been held. The various theories resolve themselves into three.

1. It is regarded as a mere compilation from the Gr. of the LXX (2 Ch and Es B). Those books, according to this theory, have been worked over and modified for the sake of Greek readers, to whom the Hebraic style of the LXX version rendered it unintelligible. Such is the view of Keil, Schürer (in Herzog, Encycl. i. 496, 'nach der Septuaginta Übersetzung bearbeitet,' and HJP II. iii. 177ff. Eng. tr.), and Bissell (in Lange's OT Comm.). In favour of this view it is urged (i.) that our book often agrees literally with the LXX in the Gr. used, even in rare and unfamiliar words; (ii.) that the LXX is often followed in its deviations from the Heb. text; and (iii.) that in the case of deviations from both Heb. and LXX, the readings of Es A are more easily referred to the latter than to the former. The best instances of (i.) are Es A 8<sup>83</sup> ὁ κουφίσας τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν = Es B 9<sup>13</sup> ἐκούφισας ἡμῶν τὰς ἀνομιὰς, RV 'punished us less than our iniquities deserve'; Es A 9<sup>51</sup> = Es B 18<sup>10</sup> φάγετε λιπῶματα. For (ii.) may be quoted Es A 1<sup>10</sup> καὶ οὕτω τὸ πρῶτον = 2 Ch 35<sup>12</sup> καὶ οὕτως εἰς τὸ πρῶτον, against Heb. 'and so they did with the oxen.' The two Heb. words קָרָן ('oxen') and קָרָן ('morning') are indistinguishable without the vowel points; the agreement need not prove the use of one version by the other. More striking is Es A 1<sup>11</sup> μετ' εὐωδίας καὶ ἀπῆνεγκαν, compared with 2 Ch 35<sup>13</sup> καὶ εὐωδῶθη καὶ ἔδραμον. This looks like a confusion of εὐωδῶω and εὐοδῶω; the Heb. equivalent is 'and in pans.' But here Es renders the Hiphil קָרָן correctly by ἀπῆνεγκαν, which ἔδραμον fails to do, thus showing independent knowledge of the Hebrew. Compare also Es A 1<sup>26</sup> πολέμειν αὐτὸν ἐπεχείρει, and 2 Ch 35<sup>22</sup> ἀλλ' ἡ πολέμειν αὐτὸν ἐκράταιώθη, with the Heb. 'disguised himself that he might fight with him.'

A comparison of the two books, however, renders it impossible to maintain the view any longer, that Es A is compiled solely from the Gr. of the other books. There are numerous passages where Es preserves the Heb. more closely than the LXX, or points to a different word in the Heb. original. An examination of all the passages given by Bissell (p. 69) in support of the opposite opinion will show that there is not one where Es does not preserve some touch in the Heb. which is missed in the LXX Ezr, which cannot therefore have been the only authority possessed by our author in those parts which agree with the canonical book. It still remains possible that Es A is a mere recension of the canonical books by the help of the Heb.; but the Gr. of the two books is of such a different character as to make it improbable that this is the true view of the relation between them.

2. It is regarded as a working over of an earlier Gr. translation of Ch, Ezr, and Neh, but a translation quite distinct from the LXX. This view is held by Ewald (Hist. of Isr. v. 126-128, Eng. tr.). He first gives the alternative that the writer 'was either a translator of the books of Ch, or else found them already translated, and worked up the tr.,' and then decides for the latter view (p. 128 n.). 'He found the work of the chronicler tolerably freely translated from the original. This tr. was different from that of the LXX, and no doubt much older.'

This theory admits an independent tr. of the Heb. as the basis of the book, but denies that the compiler was himself the translator; it presupposes a lost Gr. version of Ch, Ezr, Neh. It gives a satisfactory explanation of the coincidences in tr. and deviation from the Heb. in Es A and Es B, if we suppose that both are to some extent dependent on a lost Gr. original. We should then have in the two books a parallel case to the two Gr. versions of Dn, the LXX very paraphrastic, Theod. fairly literal, both being dependent on an earlier version (Smith, Dict. Christ. Biog. art. 'Theodotion').

3. It is held to be a direct and independent tr. from the Heb., and from a text in some instances superior to the Massoretic; Es B was entirely unknown to the writer. This view is held by Michaelis, Trendelenburg (in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek der bibl. litt. 1787), Pohlmann (in Tübingen Quartalschrift, 1859, p. 257), Herzfeld, Fritzsche, and others. It is simpler than the last, but fails to account for the coincidences in the two books. The question whether (2) or (3) is the true view depends also on the date which, on linguistic and other grounds, we are led to assign to the work. It cannot be said to have been yet decided which is right, but (2) appears to satisfy all the requirements of the problem, while (3) does not.

The two translations are of an essentially different character. While the writer of Es B shows a slavish adherence to the Hebrew, often transliterating his original, and making no pretensions to style, Es A is marked by a free style of translation, an elegant and idiomatic Gr., a happy rendering of Hebraisms, and an omission of difficulties, which make it a far more readable book than the other. It was clearly intended for Gr. readers unacquainted with Hebrew. The writer was a litterateur in possession of a wide Gr. vocabulary.

A few instances of his manner may be given. He consistently translates the phrase 'beyond the river' (the Persian name for Palestine, Es B πέραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ) by Κολή Συρία καὶ Φοινίκη (7 times in Es A; only 3 times elsewhere, viz. in the Books of Mac). He writes ἀγῶνι τὸ πάσχα for Ch τῶν τοῦ πάσχα. A good instance of idiomatic Gr. style is 599.70 (contrast Es B 44.5). A list of some words peculiar to Es A in the Gr. OT may not be superfluous. ἀκαλούως c. dat. for κατὰ (5 times), ἀναγνώστης (of Ezra, ὁ ἱέρους καὶ ἀναγνώστης τοῦ νόμου = Es B ὁ ἱέρους καὶ ὁ γραμματεὺς, 6 times), ἀναμνηστικῆς, ἀρχιερέως (of Ezra), βιβλιοφυλακίου, δημαγωγία, ἐγχαρσιν, ἐκπαίδειν, ἐμψυχοῦν, ἱτακυστός, ἱππόδωξ, ἱππόδωξ (6 times = Es B Ναβινεῖμ), ἱεροστάτης, ἱεροφύλαξ (6 times, Es B ἀδοντες), κάρρον 'a car', μερισσάρχια (4 times), μεταγενέστερος, ὀνοματογραφία, πραγματοῦς (subst.), συμβραβεῖν, συνεορμασθαι, σύνους, διὰ ταλάντων λαλεῖν, χαμαίπετες, χρηματιστήριον. Other words rarely found elsewhere than in this book (which may for the most part be paralleled from Est, Dn, and Mac) are—ἀνερῶν 'confiscate', ἀξίωμα, ἀνενεῖν, δογματίζειν, εἶργον, ἐνακοῦν, ἐπακρωθῆναι, ἐπικομισθῆναι 'attack', ἐπιστάσεις (al. ὑστάσεις), εὐλατος, εὐδοία, εὐρύς (Es B ταχὺς), θυμωρός (Es B τυλμωρός), καταλοχίμερος, κωνωνίσις, μαυιάς, μεταλλάσσειν τὸν β. ο.ν., οἰκονόμος, ὁλοσχερῶς, παστοφόριον.

The passages which point to a more accurate rendering of the Heb., or a different Heb. original from that trd. by the LXX, are collected by Trendelenburg (see also Bissell, 65-69). The foll. instances, partly unnoticed before, may be given:—

In the account of the death of Josiah, Es A 1<sup>25-27</sup> = 2 Ch 35<sup>21-23</sup>. Es 1<sup>25</sup> ἐπὶ γὰρ τοῦ Εὐφράτου ὁ πόλεμος μου ἐστίν; Ch LXX omit; Heb. 'but against the house of my war' (עַל־בֵּיתִי מִלְחָמִי). Es apparently read עַל־הַנָּהָר (Euphrates) for בֵּיתִי. The Heb. as it stands is harsh for 'the house with which I have war'; and Es is a decided improvement.

Es 1<sup>26</sup> οὐ προσέχων ῥήματα Ἱερειῶν προφήτου; Ch LXX οὐκ ἤκουσε τῶν λόγων Νεχαῦ=Heb. Es perhaps read נִכְחַ for לִכְ. Ἱοειμίου is a later insertion; the Vulg. has 'non attendens verbum prophetae.'

Es 1<sup>27</sup> καὶ κατέβησαν οἱ ἄρχοντες ποδὸς βασιλεία; Ch LXX καὶ ἐπέβησαν οἱ τοῦ ἐσθλῶ ἐπὶ βασιλ. = Heb. Es read יָרְדוּ ('and they came down') for יָרְדוּ ('and they shot').

In Es A 8<sup>90</sup> καὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ γραφῆς ἄνδρες ἱστανόν πενήκοντα, the Heb. is more closely rendered by 'and with him were reckoned by genealogy of the males' than in LXX (Es B 8<sup>9</sup>) καὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ τὸ σύστημα αὐτοῦ καὶ πεντ.

In 8<sup>66</sup> ὁ Μωσείρ of LXX is rightly given as Αἰνύστια. A writer working on the LXX without the Heb. could hardly infer that Μωσείρ stood for מִצְרַיִם ('the people of Mizraim').

In 8<sup>68</sup> ἐρρηξα τὰ ἱμάτια καὶ τὴν ἱερὴν ἱσθῆνα, the last words of the Heb. וְרָחַץ ('and my mantle') are rightly given; the LXX twice misconstrues them (93.5), διερρηξα τὰ ἱμάτια μου καὶ ἱσταλῶμαι.

In 8<sup>75</sup> καὶ νῦν κατὰ πόσον τι ἡμῖν ἐγένθη ἔλεος παρὰ τοῦ κυρίου, the Heb. phrase עַל־לִבְּךָ ('for a little moment') is rendered, and the passive construction kept. Es B 9<sup>3</sup> καὶ νῦν ἱτακυσάμενο ἡμῖν ὁ θεός, omits the phrase and changes the construction.

8<sup>94</sup> ἀνεκμύλουμεν παραβῖναι, and Es B 9<sup>14</sup> ἐπεσπρίψαμεν διασπιδάσαι, are independent versions of עָלְנוּ לְפָנָיו ('shall we again break?').

8<sup>90</sup> ὡς ἐκρήθησοι καὶ ὅσοι πευθαρχήσωσιν τοῦ νόμου τοῦ κυρίου, renders the Heb. ('according to the council of my Lord and of those that tremble at the command of our God') where the LXX (Es B 10<sup>3</sup>) departs from it, ὡς ἂν βούλη ἀνάστηθαι καὶ φοβήσιν αὐτοὺς ἐν ἐντολαῖς θεοῦ ἡμῶν.

In 9<sup>2</sup> Es A points to a neat and certain correction of the Hebrew. The LXX (10<sup>6</sup>) runs, καὶ ἱσπερὶ ἐπὶ γὰρ σφραγίσαν Ἰωάννην . . . καὶ ἱσπερὶ ἐπὶ ἐκὼ, where the second ἱσπερὶ ἐπὶ is tautological. Es A has ἱσπερὶ ἐπὶ τὸ παστοφόριον Ἰωάννη . . . καὶ αὐλοῦσθαι ἐκὼ. The compiler clearly read עָלָה לְלֵךְ ('and he passed the night there') for עָלָה לְלֵךְ ('and he went there'). The letters י and ק are very liable to confusion; and αὐλοῦσθαι is the constant rendering of the verb לָלַךְ ('to dwell') in the LXX.

9<sup>10</sup> εἶπον μεγάλη τῇ ὁδοῦ ὅπως ἐς εἰρηκας ποιήσωμεν is a literal rendering of the Heb. וַיֹּאמְרוּ קוֹל יְהוָה וַיֹּאמְרוּ 'and they said with a loud voice'; LXX (10<sup>12</sup>) is again wrong with καὶ εἶπον Μίχα τοῦτο τὸ ῥημα σου ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ποιήσαι.

These few instances out of many show beyond a doubt that the compiler, or the author of the version he is using, had a knowledge of the Heb. as against the other Gr. version, and that Es A is an important authority for a critical emendation of the Heb. text.

The most recent supporter of the third view, and of the claims of this book to attention, is Sir H. H. Howorth, in a series of six articles in the Academy for 1893 on 'The real character and the importance of the first book of Esdras.' His attempt to establish the historical credibility of the book and its chronological accuracy, as against the canonical Ezra, is beset by numerous difficulties, and cannot be maintained. Thus he regards the Darius who despatched Zerubbabel as Darius II. Nothus (424), who was a century later than Darius Hystaspes (522), and is forced to date the return under Ezra, and that under Nehemiah, more than half a century later than the dates ordinarily assigned to those events; he regards Sanabassar or Sheshbazzar as a distinct person from Zerubbabel; he says that the misplaced section Es A 2<sup>15-25</sup> preserves the original order of the Aramaic chronicle from which it is derived; and he regards the story of the three pages as 'equally valuable and worthy of credit with the rest of the book.' It is lost labour to attempt to reconcile this book with history; the compiler has put together his materials regardless of the inconsequences involved. But Sir H. Howorth's views on the relations between the two Gr. books are far more deserving of notice; he has here been partly anticipated by Pohlmann (op. cit. 273-275). He argues that 'Es A represents the true LXX text; Es B represents another tr., which in all probability was that of Theodotion'; and he quotes the parallel of the two versions of Daniel. The existing evidence makes it probable that this view is so far correct, that Es A represents the first attempt to present the story of the Return in a Gr. dress, the story of the three pages being perhaps added by a later compiler. Subsequently a complete and a more accurate rendering of the Heb. was required, and this was supplied by what is now called the LXX version of Ch, Ezr, Neh. Whether this took place so late as the time of Theodotion may be questioned.

In favour of the priority of Es A, these points may be noted:—

1. The Position of the Book and its earliest Title in the MSS ('Esdra a').—The explanation usually given is that the events described in it precede in part the events in the LXX Ezr. It is equally probable that it was assigned the prior position because it was the earlier of the two Gr. versions.

2. The Contents.—These point to a time when Ch, Ezr, and Neh formed one continuous work, and the division into sections had not yet been made. Es A passes without a break from one book to another, and does not contain the reduplication whereby the last two verses of Ch are repeated as the first two of Ezra.

3. The Use of Es A by Josephus.—There is no certain evidence of his acquaintance with the other Gr. book, or of its existence before his time. This looks as if he were using the only Gr. materials available to him; that is, that in the LXX as known to him this part of the Bible was represented by Es A.

4. During the first five centuries the Christian Fathers quote the book with respect as canonical. It was included in Origen's Hexapla.

5. As shown above, it has in many places preserved a better Heb. text than the LXX Ezra.

THE ORIGINAL SECTION (3<sup>1-5</sup>).—The source of the story of the three pages at the court of Darius is unknown. In what language it was originally written is also doubtful; but Ewald is prob. right in holding that while the main body of the book is a tr. from Heb., 'on the other hand the work from which he took the story about Zerubbabel was originally composed in Gr.' At any rate there are no clear traces of Hebraisms (Fritzsche adduces 4<sup>39</sup> τὰ δίκαια ποιεῖ ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἀδίκων = יְהוָה עֲשֶׂה נֶחֱמָה), and the paronomasia ἀνεῖν καὶ ἀφεῖν in 4<sup>62</sup> points to a Gr. original. The compiler seems to have been acquainted with traditions of Persian history. The account of Darius and Apame the daughter of Bartacus (4<sup>29</sup>, Jos. gives his name as Παβεζάκης, so the Latin versions Bezaces) is perhaps derived from some book of Persian court stories.* The presence of Zerubbabel at the court of Darius is, of course, an anachronism: it was Cyrus who despatched him to Jerusalem. It is noticeable that in 5<sup>2</sup>, acc. to the most natural construction, it is Joachim the son of Zerubbabel who spake wise words before Darius. In 4<sup>53</sup> the speaker is merely called ὁ νεανίσκος (a name hardly suitable to Z.), and at his first introduction in 4<sup>18</sup> the third speaker is identified in a parenthesis only ὁ τρίτος . . . οὗτός ἐστιν Ζοροβαβέλ, which is certainly a later addition. This has led to the conjecture that Joachim was the hero of the story, and that there were two expeditions—one in the time of Cyrus led by Zerubbabel, one under Darius led by Joachim (Fritzsche and Reuss). But no Joachim is mentioned among the sons of Z. in 1 Ch 3<sup>19</sup>. These inconsistencies certainly show the composite nature of the book. It would appear that an earlier Pers. story was adopted by the Jews of Alexandria and became attached to Zerubbabel; the speakers in the original story were Persian courtiers (3<sup>4</sup> οἱ σωματοφύλακες). The second of the theses maintained by the third speaker—the superiority of the truth—may also be a Jewish addition to the original, though the eulogy of truth would not be out of place in a Persian story, since the Persians were taught from boyhood ‘to ride, to use the bow, and to speak the truth’ (Hdt. i. 136).

The story is told in what perhaps was thought a more plausible way in Josephus (Ant. xi. iii. 2). There Darius, unable to sleep, proposes a reward to that one of his three pages who shall best prove his thesis: to the first he gives the thesis, that ‘wine is the strongest’; to the second, ‘the king is the strongest’; to the third, ‘whether women are the strongest or truth is stronger than they’? The speeches are held on the following day. In Es the king makes no promise of rewards: the three pages suggest the idea to each other, and while he sleeps they each write the subject which he means to maintain, and put it under the king’s pillow for him to find in the morning. The speeches before the Pers. monarch are not unlike the answers of the 72 translators at the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, as described in the letter of Aristeas. The applause which greets the third speech (4<sup>41</sup>), and the feasting for seven days ‘with music and gladness’ (4<sup>63</sup>), may be illustrated from that work. But there is hardly sufficient ground for saying, with Ewald, that ‘the book of Aristeas must have been already known to the author.’ The story in Es is a composition of the same class, and probably of the same time as the Aristeas letter.

It should be noted that in the third speech there is an allusion to Gn 2<sup>24</sup> (Es 4<sup>29</sup> ἀνδρὶς τὸν ἑαυτοῦ πατέρα ἐγκαταλείπει . . . καὶ πρὸς τὴν ἰδίαν γυναῖκα κολλᾷται).

OBJECT OF THE BOOK.—The body of the book appears, as has been shown, to be the earliest version of the work of the Chronicler. It was written to render Gr.-speaking Jews acquainted with the favour which through the Divine Providence was once shown to their nation by foreign monarchs. The original section (3–4) is perhaps the nucleus of the whole, round which the rest is grouped. One object of the compiler was to give currency to this story, from whatever source, Persian or Jewish, he had derived it. He may also have had an ulterior object in view. The exaggerated accounts of the munificence of Cyrus and Darius lead us to suppose that he aimed at securing to the Jews ‘the favour of a Ptolemaic or other heathen power’ (Ewald).

TIME AND PLACE OF COMPOSITION.—The extreme limits between which the book must be placed are given on the one hand by the date of the composition of the Heb. books of Ezr and Neh, which is fixed as late as B.C. 300 (Ryle, Cam. Bible, Introd. xxvi), on the other by the date of Josephus, A.D. 100. Within these rather wide limits it is difficult to define the time more accurately with any certainty. As Fritzsche remarks, the writer has kept his own personality in the background and nowhere left any traces of his own time (Einleitung, p. 9). Still there remain a few indications to be mentioned. The similarity to Aristeas, as we have seen, shows nothing more than that the Zerubbabel story is of the same character and probably the same time as that book (circa B.C. 150).

1. But Ewald notes further (Abhandl. über d. Sibyll. Büch. p. 36) that this story was known and referred to by the writer of the oldest of the Sibylline books. Now, this book (iii. of the Sibylline Oracles) is definitely fixed to the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (B.C. 181–146). In it is an allusion to Persian kings helping forward the rebuilding of the temple in consequence of a dream: iii. 293–4, Αὐτὸς γὰρ δόσει Θεὸς ἔννευχον ἄγρον θνείρον, καὶ τότε δὴ ναὸς πάλιν ἔσται, ὡς πάρος ἦν περ. This, in Ewald’s opinion, is suggested by Es 3–4. But in Es 4<sup>43,45</sup> there is no mention of a dream, but only a vow, which influenced Darius. Still, as the dream is not alluded to elsewhere, it is not improbable that the Sibyllist had some older form of this story before him, from which our Esdras also borrowed.

2. The book has, further, some parallels with the LXX version of Dn and Est. The opening of Es 3 seems to be imitated from the opening of Est 1<sup>1–3</sup>: the phrases ἐποίησεν δοχὴν, ἀπὸ τῆς ἑνδύκης μέχρι Αἰθιοπίας, and ‘the hundred and seventy satrapies,’ are common to both. Cf. also Es 3<sup>9</sup> οἱ τρεῖς μεγιστάνες τῆς ἑπαρχίας with Est 1<sup>4</sup> LXX, Dn 6<sup>2</sup>. (The Heb. of Est as also Ezr 7<sup>4</sup> name seven Persian councillors.)

The agreements between Es and Dn LXX are remarkable. Of these the most striking is a clause which they have in common in the account of the treasures which Nebuchadnezzar recovered from Jerus. (Es 2<sup>2</sup>=Dn 1<sup>2</sup> LXX, καὶ ἀπηρεύαστο αὐτὰ ἐν τῷ εἰδῶλῳ αὐτοῦ). In this place, since ἀπηρεύεσθαι is an Esdras word, occurring three times in this connexion in Es and nowhere else in Dn, and since εἰδῶλιν renders the Heb. of Ezr (יִדְּוֹל נִיב) but not of Dn (יִדְּוֹל נִיב, Theod. εἰς τὸν οἶκον θησανροῦ Θεοῦ αὐτοῦ), it would seem that the obligation is on the side of the Dn translator.

But, in view of the other parallels between the books, another explanation is more probable, that the translations are the work of one and the same hand. In one place the same Aramaic phrase, ‘And his house shall be made a dunghill,’ is mis-translated or paraphrased in the same way (Es 6<sup>31</sup> καὶ τὰ ὑπάρχοντα αὐτοῦ εἶναι βασιλικά, Dn 2<sup>5</sup> καὶ ἀναληφθήσεται ὑμῶν τὰ ὑπάρχοντα εἰς τὸ βασιλικόν). It may be noted that both books are written in an idiomatic Gr. style foreign to most books of the LXX; both are very free translations; both have interpolations of a similar character (the three pages in Es, the three children in Dn); the original Heb. of both books has Aramaic sections interspersed in it. If this theory be true, the parallel between the two Gr. books of Es and the two versions of Dn is very close.*

* The theory has already been suggested by Dr. Gwynn (Diet. Christ. Biog., s.v. Theodotion, p. 977); cf. Dn 2<sup>11</sup> ἐπιδόξας (Es 9<sup>46</sup> ἐπιδόξας); δογματίζῃν (Dn 2<sup>13</sup>, Es 3<sup>9</sup>); Dn 3<sup>1</sup>, Es 3<sup>2</sup> οἱ προσεγγραμμένοι (Dn 3<sup>2</sup>, Es 6<sup>31</sup> [A] only); use of αἶμα c. inf. αἶμα τῆς

* The name Apame is Oriental, though not found till the Macedonian period. No such person occurs among the wives of Darius I. The first of the name was the wife of Seleucus Nikator, Alexander’s general, and daughter of Artabazus (Strabo). Does this last name give the explanation of the name Bartacus or Παβεζάκης?

3. Graetz (Gesch. der Juden, 1863, p. 445) points to the use of ὑπατοι in 3<sup>14</sup>, and says that the Roman consulate is known to the writer. This would indicate a time later than the first interference of the Romans in the East, i.e. later than B.C. 200.

4. On the other hand, the term Κολλή Συρία which so frequently occurs is used in the sense which it bore during the Gr. period, meaning all S. Syria except Phœnicia. Before the coming of the Romans to Palestine (c. B.C. 63, the date of Pompey's taking of Jerus.) this name had acquired a new significance, being restricted to the country E. of the Jordan (G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. p. 538). The way in which this phrase is used appears, therefore, to afford certain proof that the book is at least as old as the first half of the last century before the Christian era.

Whether it goes back to the 2nd cent. B.C. is more uncertain.

5. That such is the case is the opinion of Herzfeld (Ges. d. Volk. Isr. 1863, vol. ii. p. 73), who dates it before the Maccabæan wars, on the ground that after that date, when the books of Ezr and Neh had become canonical (Ryle, Com. Bible, Ezr. and Neh. lxxv), a translator would not have been bold enough to excerpt and rearrange materials from those books.

6. This view is also supported by Lupton, who has an ingenious theory as to the occasion when the book was written. He regards it as edited at the time (B.C. 170) when Onias, having fled from the persecution in Pal. under Antiochus Epiphanes, petitioned for leave from Ptolemy Philometor to build a temple for the Alexandrian Jews at Heliopolis on the site of a ruined Egypt. temple of Bubastis. At that time 'a work which described the rebuilding of the temple, and the beneficence of foreign kings to the work, and which also introduced the story of Josiah, slain in an invasion of Syria by the Egyptians, would have a special interest.' The account of the building of the Egypt. temple (βίσιον τῷ ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις, μικρότερον δὲ καὶ πενιχρότερον) is given in Jos. Ant. XIII. iii. 1; the reader is referred to the interesting remarks of Lupton (Speaker's Comm., Apoc. vol. i. 11-14). This is, of course, no more than conjectural, and it is unsafe to base any argument upon it; if the theory about the relation to the LXX Dn be correct, the date given is rather too early. The limits within which the book may be placed may be taken to be B.C. 170-100. Most editors, however, assign it to the 1st cent. B.C. (De Wette, Ewald, Fritzsche).

As to the place where the compiler lived, the character of the translation seems to show that it was written for Alexandrian Jews rather than for natives of Palestine, for whom the original Hebrew of the Chronicler would suffice. One slight allusion in 4<sup>23</sup> to 'sailing upon the sea and upon the rivers' for the purpose of 'robbing and stealing' is thought to point to Egypt. Certain small peculiarities of the language also indicate Alexandria as the place of writing: οἱ φίλοι τοῦ βασιλέως (3<sup>26</sup>) takes the place of Es B οἱ σύμβουλοι (οἱ πρῶτοι φίλοι were the third in the scale of courtiers at the Alexandrian court): in 2<sup>18</sup> ἀν φάλνῃται σοι is inserted. The phrase ἐὰν φάλνῃται ('if it seem good') occurs in Aristeas (in Merx' Archiv. i. 1870, p. 19), and repeatedly in Egyptian papyri.

Fritzsche, on the other hand, concludes that the writer was a Palestinian from his knowledge of sites in Jerusalem, referring to 5<sup>46</sup> εἰς τὸ εὐρύχωρον τοῦ πρώτου πυλῶνος τοῦ πρὸς τῇ ἀνατολῇ (=Es B εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ). Cf. also 9<sup>38</sup> ἐπὶ τὸ εὐρύχωρον τοῦ πρὸς ἀποῦσαι (Dn 3<sup>15</sup>, Es 8<sup>68</sup>); καρπῶν = 'to burn' (Dn 3<sup>38</sup>, Es 4<sup>52</sup>); ἀχρηστῶν (Dn 4<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>20</sup>, Es 1<sup>53</sup>); μανιάνης (Dn 5<sup>7</sup>, Es 3<sup>9</sup> only); Dn 6<sup>1</sup>, Es 3<sup>1</sup>; and Dn 4<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> (Sus 5<sup>18</sup>, Es 8<sup>17</sup>). The parallels are chiefly in the first six chapters of Dn.

ἀνατολὰς ἱεροῦ πυλῶνος (=Neh 8<sup>1</sup> εἰς τὸ πλάτος τὸ ἐμπροσθεν πύλης τοῦ ὕδατος).

MSS AND TEXT.—Es A exists in two out of the three oldest MSS of the LXX, viz. Cod. Vaticanus (B) and Cod. Alexandrinus (A). It is not found in either of the portions of the Sinaitic MS (x) discovered by Tischendorf (Cod. Friderico-Augustanus and Cod. Sinaiticus Petropolitanus); but this is perhaps due only to the fact that that MS is incomplete, and, except for some few fragments of the Pent. and a portion of 1 Ch, contains in its present form no part of the OT earlier than Es B 9, after which it is fairly complete. There has been a curious error in connexion with the Esdras books; 13 chapters of 1 Ch having been apparently inserted in the middle of Es B. Cod. Sin.-Pet. contains one leaf with 1 Ch 9<sup>27</sup>-11<sup>22</sup>; Cod. F.-A. has four more leaves headed Es B, but in reality containing 1 Ch 11<sup>22</sup>-19<sup>17</sup>; but in the fourth column of the verso of the fourth leaf we suddenly pass in the middle of a line with no break from Ch (καὶ ἐπολέμησεν αὐτόν) to Es B 9<sup>9</sup> (καὶ ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν καὶ ἔκλινεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ἑλεος). A note at the bottom of that leaf in a later hand calls attention to the seven superfluous leaves that are 'not of Esdras' (τὸ τέλος τῶν ἐπτά φύλλον τῶ περισσῶν γ' μὴ ὄντων τοῦ εὐδρα). Of these seven leaves we now possess five; and reckoning back we find that the divergence must have begun about 1 Ch 6<sup>50</sup> (list of the sons of Aaron). This error, whereby fragments of 1 Ch have been interpolated into the middle of Es B, is probably due to 'a mistake in binding in the copy from which the MS was transcribed' (Westcott, Bible in the Church, p. 307, Appendix B); a less probable explanation is given by Lupton (Introduct. p. 1). The presence of the title Es B is not sufficient by itself to prove, as Lupton supposes, that Es A ever stood in Cod. x; since the same MS contains only the first and fourth books of Maccabees with the headings μακκ. α', μακκ. δ', and the two intervening books certainly never found a place in the MS.

An interesting problem is presented by the relation of the texts of Codd. A and B in this book. The text of A is always the smoother and more readable; and wherever the reading of B suggests a suspicion of corruption, A almost invariably gives the requisite correction. Several of these corrections may be attributed to an 'Alexandrian' revision of the text, removing grammatical solecisms and harsh phrases; such are 1<sup>30</sup> ἰβήριον (B ἰβήριον), 1<sup>38</sup> ἀπεκατέστηεν αὐτόν . . . τοῦ μὴ βασιλεύσαι (B οὐκ ἐβασίλευσεν), 1<sup>39</sup> τὰ σκεῖν κισσοῦ (B τὰς κισσοῦς), 3<sup>9</sup> ἐν κρίνῃ . . . οὐτὶ δὲ λόγος αὐτοῦ σωφρονέει (B ὅτι ἂν κρίνῃ . . . οὐτὶ δὲ λ. αὐτοῦ σοφ.), 3<sup>38</sup> ἔβλεπον τέρας πρὸς τὸν ἱερεῖον (B εἰς τὸν ἱερεῖον), 8<sup>12</sup> ἀκολούθησεν ἡμεῖς ἐν τῷ νόμῳ (B ἀκολ. ἡμεῖς νόμῳ). But in other places it is hard to suppose that A does not preserve the original text. Thus 1<sup>22</sup> (94) καὶ ἐλπίσαν αὐτὸν ἐν αἰσθήσει ('they grieved him to the heart,' a phrase illustrated by Jth 16<sup>17</sup>; B καὶ ἐλπίσαν αὐτὸν ἰσθίον), 1<sup>41</sup> Joachim at his accession ἦν ἱστὸν δεκά ὀκτώ (cf. 2 Ch 36<sup>9</sup>, B ἦν ἱστὸν δεκά), 4<sup>45</sup> τὸν καινὸν ἐν ἐκπύριον οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι (B Ἰουδαῖοι), 5<sup>53</sup> κατὰ τὸ πρόσταγμα (B καὶ τὸ πρῶτον), 8<sup>41</sup> ἐπὶ τὸν λεγόμενον Θερὰν ποταμὸν (B οὐκ. Θερὰν), 8<sup>68</sup> καὶ κατέτιλα τὸν τριχώματος (B κατέτινον τὸν τριχ.). Fritzsche (Erläuterung, 1851, § 8) remarks that B is on the whole a very pure and A an emended text; but it is noticeable that in his subsequent critical edition (Libri Apocryphi Vet. Test. 1871) in the passages given above and in numerous others he adopts the reading of A and abandons 'the pure text of B.' Still more noticeable is it that the earliest author to quote Es A supports the A text against the B. It is not always possible to reconstruct the text which Josephus used owing to his habit of paraphrasing the authority which lay before him; but out of 13 passages in this book where a comparison is possible, in 10 he agrees with A against B, while in three only does he side with B against A. Jos. Ant. xi. liii. 8 προσεστάς τοις Ἰουδαίοις . . . ἀφίναί τις κώμας (Es 4<sup>50</sup> καὶ ἵνα οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι ἀφίσιν τις κώμας, B οἱ Χαλδαῖοι), xi. iv. 1 τοῦ ἐβδόμου μηνός (Es 5<sup>52</sup> ἐβδόμου, B πρώτου), xi. iv. 6 καὶ εὐρήθη ἐν Ἐκβάτανος τῇ βάρει τῇ ἐν Μηδία βιβλίον, ἐν ᾧ κ.τ.λ. (Es 6<sup>22</sup> κ. εὐρ. ἐν Ἐβζ. τῇ βάρει τῇ ἐν Μηδία χώρα τοῖς εἰς ἐν ᾧ . . . B τόπος ἐν ᾧ). A preserves the indefinite article; cf. Es B 6<sup>2</sup> κεφαλὴς μία; B is a corruption of the Greek of A); xi. v. 1 ἀνεγκέκιστο δάμα τῶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ὄψ (Es 8<sup>13</sup> ἀπεπνεύκει δάμα τῶ κυρίου τοῦ ἐλθ. B τῶ κυρίου); id. κολασθήσονται δ' ἦτοι θανάτου ἡ ζήμια χρηματικῇ (Es 8<sup>24</sup> κολασθήσονται ἴαν τε καὶ θανάτου ἴαν τε καὶ τιμωρίαν, ἡ ἀργυρίῳ ζήμια ἡ ἀπαγωγῇ; B μὴ ἀργυρίῳ ζήμια. A is undoubtedly best); xi. v. 2 συναγαγὼν εἰς τὸ πύργον τοῦ Εὐφράτου (did Jos. read εἰς τὸ λεγόμενον ὄψαν ποταμὸν ἐν Es 8<sup>41</sup>? A Θέραν ποταμὸν, B ποταμὸν); id. ταύρους δώδεκα ὑπὲρ κινήσας τοῦ λαοῦ ταυτης, κριους ἐνεγκοντα, κ.τ.λ. with A in Es 8<sup>63</sup> (B omits a line through confusion, perhaps, of ΚΤΙΩ and ΚΠΙΩΤΣ); xl. v. 3 διερρηξεν τὴν ἐσθῆτα (Es 8<sup>68</sup> διερρηξα, B ἐρρηξε); xl. v. 4 ἰωαννου τοῦ Ἐλισαίου (Es 9<sup>1</sup> ἰωαννὸν τοῦ Ἐλισαίου, B ἰωάνν. τοῦ Ναυαίου).

These instances form a strong argument for the early existence if not the originality of the A text. The chief passage where Jos. appears to favour B is Es 5<sup>38</sup> (B καὶ χάρα τοῖς Σιδωνίοις καὶ Τυρίοις εἰς τὸ παράγων; A κάρρα='cars'; Jos. xl. iv. 1 τοῖς τε Σιδωνίοις ἡδὺ καὶ πούφον ἦν . . . καταγρονύσιν).

On the MSS generally see Fritzsche, Einleitung, § 8.

Of VSS, Sabatier prints two Lat. versions, one of which he calls the Vulg., and a 'versio altera' ('ex MS Colbertino annorum circiter 800'). In reality they appear to be two distinct VSS of the O.L. Jerome left the O.L. untouched, and the Lat. now given in the Appendix to the Vulg. is not his work. A third Lat. version of Es A 3-4 (abbreviated) and of a few verses elsewhere in the book is given in Lagarde (Septuaginta Studien, ii. 1892) from a MS in the cathedral of Luca written about 570. The book did not exist in the Peshitta Syriac, but is found in the Syro-Hexaplar of Paul of Tella (A.D. 616); the Syriac is given in Walton's Polyglot, 1657. There is a free rendering of the book in the Armenian version.

LITERATURE.—Fritzsche, Exeget. Handb. z. d. Apokr. i. (Leipzig, 1851), Introd. and Comm.; Fritzsche, Libri Apocr. Vet. Test. graece (Leipzig, 1871), a crit. ed. of the text; Zöckler, Die Apokryphen, 155-161 (in Strack and Zöckler's Kof. Komm. 1889); Schürer, HJP, Eng. tr. ii. iii. 177-181; Ewald, Hist. of Isr., Eng. tr. v. 126-128. Special treatises on the relation between Es A and Es B; Trendelenburg (in Eichhorn's Allgemeine Bibliothek der Bibl. Litt. i. 178-232, Leipzig, 1787); Pohlmann, 'Ueber das Ansehen des apokr. dritten Buchs Esras, in Tübingen Theol. Quartalschrift, 1859, 257-275). In English the best edd. are Bissell (in Lange's Comm. on OT, 1880) and Lupton in The Speaker's Comm., Apocrypha, vol. i. 1888. A series of papers on 'The Character and Importance of 1 Esdras,' by Sir H. H. Howorth in the Academy, 1893, vol. 43 (pp. 13, 60, 106, 174, 326, 524). Jos. Ant. xi. 1-5 (Niese). For further references see Schürer.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ESDRAS, SECOND BOOK OF.—TITLE.—The title which this book bears in the English Apocrypha is derived from the opening words of ch. i., 'the second book of the prophet Esdras'; but it is more commonly known by the name which is given it in most Latin MSS, 'The fourth book of Esdras.' The variation in the titles of the books of Esdras is due to two causes—(1) The adoption of the Latin name Esdras in the Vulg. for the canonical Ezr and Neh; (2) the composite nature of this book, the first two and the last two chapters being later additions to the orig. work, and reckoned by the MSS as separate books. The most frequent arrangement in the MSS is 1 Es=Ezr-Neh; 2 Es=2 Es 1. 2; 3 Es=1 Es; 4 Es=2 Es 3-14; 5 Es=2 Es 15. 16. The central portion of the book bears every number from one to four. The original Greek had probably no number attached to it. Two suggestions have been made for the original title—(1) Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης, adopted by Hilgenfeld in his restoration of the Greek, and based on a quotation of Clem. Alex. from Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης, and of Ambrose from 'propheta Ezra' (Mess. Jud. 18). The title would then be parallel to ὁ ἱερεὺς attached to 1 Es in Cod. A. (2) Ἀποκάλυψις Ἐσδρα, suggested by Dr. Westcott, and found in a catalogue of the 60 books, canonical and apocryphal, made in Asia (Westcott, Canon<sup>6</sup>, 559). The title is far the most suitable to the contents of the book, but has already become appropriated to a later and inferior Greek Apocalypse published by Tischendorf (Apocal. Apocryphae, 1866).

ORIGINAL LANGUAGE AND VERSIONS.—The original language of 2 Es was undoubtedly Greek; two quotations from the Greek exist, Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 16. 100 (=2 Es 5<sup>38</sup>), and Apost. Constitut. viii. 7 (=2 Es 8<sup>29</sup>). Otherwise we possess the book only in versions. The Latin version abounds in Grecisms, such as the use of the comparative with the genit. ('horum maiora,' 'omnium maior,' etc.), the genit. abs. (10<sup>9</sup>), the prepositions ad and pro with the inf. (7<sup>135</sup> 13<sup>23</sup>), de and ex followed by the genit., the double negative ('nihil nemini,' 'nunquam nemo'), redundant prepositions after verbs ('timere a,' 15<sup>3</sup>; 'multiplicare super,' 9<sup>16</sup>). The theory of a Heb. original, of which the Greek was a tr., has now been given up; one Hebraism, which, however, had become naturalized in Greek, is of constant occurrence, namely, the use of the participle with a finite tense of the same verb (e.g. excedens excessit, 4<sup>2</sup>; proficiscens profectus sum, 4<sup>13</sup>).

The popularity which this book has enjoyed is shown by the number of versions that have been made of it. For many years the text of the Latin depended on a few MSS, Codex Sangermanensis (S, A.D. 822), Cod. Turicensis (T, 13th cent.), Cod. Dresdensis (D, 15th cent.), which presented a text from which it was clear that a considerable section was missing between vv. 35 and 36 of the 7th chapter. The other versions contained 70 additional verses in this place. In 1865 Prof. Gilde-meister discovered that this 'missing fragment' had once been contained in Cod. S, from which a leaf had been purposely cut out in early times; and drew the certain and important conclusion that all MSS of 4 Es which do not contain the passages were ultimately derived from Cod. S. The discovery of this missing fragment was made by R. L. Bensly, who in 1874 found a MS of the 9th cent. in the Bibliothèque Communale of Amiens containing the entire Latin text; he thus had the unique distinction of adding a chapter to the Apocrypha, for hitherto the verses in the Oriental VSS had not been universally considered genuine. An account of the MS and its discovery, with a full commentary on the new passage, was published by him in the following year (The Missing Fragment of the Fourth Book of Ezra, Camb. 1875). It subsequently appeared that he had been anticipated in the discovery, for a transcript of the lost passage, made in 1826 from a Spanish MS, was found among the papers of Prof. Palmer: this was not published till 1877 (Journ. of Philology, vol. vii. 264). The excision of 736-105 was probably made for dogmatic reasons. The verses contain a description of the intermediate state of souls, and an emphatic denial of the efficacy of intercessions for the dead (v. 105), a passage which called forth a severe reproof from Jerome ('Tu . . . proponis mihi librum apocryphum, qui sub nomine Esdræ a te et similibus tuis legitur: ubi scriptum est, quod post mortem nullus pro aliis audeat deprecari: quem ego librum nunquam legi,' Cont. Vigilant. c. 7), and this estimate not improbably accounts for the disappearance of the section from Cod. S. The number of known MSS which give a complete text of 2 Es has now been increased, through the discoveries of M. Berger, to five. A complete text of the book, based on four of these MSS and Cod. S, has at length been edited from Bensly's papers, with an introd. by Dr. James (Texts and Studies, iii. 2, Camb. 1895); while the missing fragment has been restored to its place in the English Bible in the Revision of the Apocrypha. The Latin MSS fall into two groups: (1) those which preserve a French text. S (Sangermanensis) once in the Abbey of St. Germain des Prés, now in the Bibl. Nat. Paris, 11504-5, Fonds Latin, dated A.D. 822, the oldest extant MS, and the parent of numerous later MSS, and A (Ambianensis), Amiens, Bibl. Comm. 10, cent. ix., containing a text very similar to but independent of S, and agreeing with the quotations of Gildas the Briton in his Epistle (6th cent.); (2) a Spanish text, perhaps traceable to Priscillian (Texts and Studies, xxxvi.), represented by three MSS. C (Complutensis), now at Madrid, cent. ix., from which Prof. Palmer copied the missing fragment in 1826. M (Mazarinæus), Paris, Bibl. Mazarine, 3, 4, cent. ix.-x., discovered by M. Berger. V (Abulensis), Madrid, Bibl. Nac. E. R. 8, cent. xiii., a copy of C, discovered by M. Berger, and a fourth, not yet fully collated, but probably belonging to this group. L (Legionensis), at Leon, of the year 1162. For one section of the book, the Confessio Esdræ (8<sup>20-30</sup>), which was often copied in collections of Cantica, an additional group of MSS exists. The two groups differ most widely from each other in the interpolated chapters (1. 2, 15. 16). An examination of their relative values in these chs. has been made by Dr. James (T. and S. xliv.-lxxviii.), from which he concludes that in 1. 2. the Spanish form of text is more accurate than the French, which has corrected the text to agree with the canonical Scriptures, whereas in 15. 16 the Spanish is on the whole an emended text, and in 15<sup>30</sup>-16<sup>32</sup> A, which has the support of Gildas, is to be preferred to S C M.

The other versions agree in omitting the interpolated chapters at the beg. and end (1. 2. 15. 16). Of these the best is the Syriac, which exists only in a celebrated MS of the Peshitta in the Ambrosian Library, Milan, B. 21 Inf. The Syriac was edited by Ceriani in Monumenta Sacra et Profana, vol. v. fasc. 1 (1868), and tr<sup>d</sup> into Latin in vol. i. fasc. 2 of the same work (1866). There are two independent Arabic versions: Ar.<sup>1</sup> in an Oxford MS (Bodl. 251, A.D. 1354), of which an English tr<sup>n</sup> was made by W. Whiston for his Primitive Christianity Reviv'd, 1711, and the Arabic text was edited by Ewald in 1863 (Abhandl. der Königl. Gesellsch. d. Wissensch. zu Göttingen); and Ar.<sup>2</sup> preserved in toto in a Vatican MS Arab. 462, and in part in Bodl. 260.

The Ethiopic version was first published in 1820 by Dr. Richard Laurence from a Bodleian MS (Æth. 7). Dillmann collected readings from other MSS, which are given at the end of Ewald's ed. of the Arabic. The Syr. Ar. Eth. versions were probably all made directly from the Greek; the Armenian, however, given in Zohrab's ed. of the Armenian Bible (1805, Venice) was perhaps from the Syriac. A reconstruction of the Greek has been made by Hilgenfeld in his Messias Judeorum.

CONTENTS. — The original Apocalypse (3-14) consists of a series of revelations or visions given to Ezra by an angel.

1st Vision, 31-520. Ezra, in captivity at Babylon in the thirtieth year after the destruction of Jerus. [the date is nearly a century too early], recounts God's favours to Isr. in their earlier history, and while admitting their 'evil heart,' yet complains of their subjection to Babylon, which is more wicked than they (ch. 3). The angel Uriel replies that E. should not enquire into things beyond his understanding. E. pleads with the angel as Abraham did at Mamre ('If I have found favour in thy sight,' 44; cf. Gn 18<sup>1</sup>), and asks, further, whether the time that is past exceeds the time to come; and is told that it is so. The signs of the end are given, 51<sup>13</sup>; and he is ordered to fast for seven days.

2nd Vision, 521-634. E. renews his complaints, and is told why God 'doeth not all at once' so as to hasten the judgment; and of the degeneracy of the world, which cannot produce such children as of old (522). The next world is to follow this as closely as Jacob followed Esau from the womb (610). More signs of the end follow, and E. is again bidden to fast for seven days.

3rd Vision, 635-925. E. recounts the works of creation, including the creatures Behemoth and Leviathan, who were reserved to be meat for the saints (639-52) [this idea is met with also in Enoch 60<sup>7</sup>, Apoc. Bar 29<sup>1</sup>], and asks, why, if the world was made for us, we do not possess our inheritance. He is told that the narrow way must be traversed before the large room of the next age be attained (71-16). Then follows a picture of the Messianic age, the appearance of 'My Son' [or 'My Son Jesus': the name is omitted in the Oriental versions] with His attendants, their reign of 400 years, succeeded by the death of 'My Son Christ' and all living, and the return of the world for seven days into 'the old silence,' and then the resurrection (725-33). The 'missing fragment' describes the pit of torment and the paradise of delight over-against it: ineffectual intercession of E. for the wicked, leading him to exclaim that the beasts are more fortunate than man: the seven ways of punishment for the wicked, and the 'seven orders' of blessings for the righteous: the seven days' respite after death, before the souls are gathered to their habitations; and the severe declaration of the inefficacy of intercession for the departed (736-105). E. says it were better if Adam had never been born ('O tu quid fecisti Adam,' cf. Apoc. Bar 48), but acknowledges God's mercy. Ch. 8 contains the same theme, 'Many are created, but few shall be saved,' and fresh intercession in the Confessio Esdræ. In answer to the question, When shall the end be? fresh signs are given.

4th Vision, 926-1060. E. eats of the herbs in the field of Ardat,* and sees a vision of a woman mourning for her son, who died on his marriage day. The woman, he is told, is Sion lamenting the fall of her city, and her thirty years' sterility represents the 3000 years before Solomon built the city. The city in building, which appears after the woman vanishes, is the heavenly Jerusalem which is to replace the earthly.

5th Vision, 111-1239. Of the Eagle (Rome) with 12 wings and 8 little wings (contraria pennæ) and 3 heads, which bear rule in turn, until sentence is pronounced on the eagle by a lion (the Messiah), and it is burnt up. A partial interpretation is given of the vision.

6th Vision, 131-58. A man (the Messiah) arises from the sea, and graves for himself a mountain (Sion): his enemies collect to fight against him, and are burnt up: and he gathers to him 'a peaceable multitude,' i.e. the ten lost tribes, who are to return from Arzareth (i.e. 'another land' ארצה אחרת, cf. Dt 29<sup>23</sup>).

7th Vision, 141-47. E. is told he is to be taken from men; and to console the people for his departure, he in forty days writes ninety-four books (the twenty-four canonical books of the OT that were lost, and seventy books of mysteries for the wise among the people).

The interpolation at the beginning (1. 2), written in an anti-Jewish spirit, contains a reproof of the Isr. for their desertion of God, and threatens the transference of God's favours from them to the Gentiles. The concluding chs. (15. 16) are not of an apocalyptic character, but a denunciation of woe on the nations of the world (Egypt, Asia, Babylon) in the style of the OT prophets. Both sections have numerous reminiscences of the NT (e.g. 1<sup>30</sup>. 33 = Mt 23<sup>37</sup>. 38, 1<sup>32</sup> = Lk 11<sup>49</sup>. 50, 2<sup>11</sup> 'tabernacula æterna' = Lk 16<sup>9</sup>, 2<sup>13</sup> = Mt 7<sup>7</sup> and 25<sup>34</sup>, 2<sup>38</sup>. 42 = Rev 7<sup>4</sup>. 9, 16<sup>42ff</sup>. = 1 Co 7<sup>29ff</sup>).

CHARACTER AND DATE. — The book is written in a tone of deep despondency, and offers a marked contrast in this respect to the Book of Enoch. The prospect of ultimate triumph and blessedness is almost lost in dismal forebodings about the immediate future and the destiny of the world. The time and place in which the scene is laid demanded that this should be so; but the meaning of this despairing tone is greatly enhanced if we suppose that recent events are referred to, that Jerusalem was in ruins at the time when it was written, and that the whole work portrays the hopeless outlook of the Jew after the terrible events of the year A.D. 70. Hence the gloomy picture of the few that shall be saved (8<sup>3</sup>), the dying of the Messiah and all that draw breath (7<sup>29</sup>), the discussion of the problem of the origin of evil ('quare cor malignum,' 4<sup>4</sup>), the oft-repeated cry that it were better not to be born, or to be without consciousness of our doom like the beasts (7<sup>62-64</sup> 4<sup>12</sup> 5<sup>35</sup> 6<sup>39</sup>), the consolation to be found in the permanence of the law (9<sup>37</sup>) though the city is gone.

The date of the book has been the subject of much controversy. It is obviously not a genuine work of the time of Ezra, as is shown, e.g., by the error in Ezra's date (3<sup>1</sup>) and the allusion to the Book of Daniel (12<sup>14</sup>. 12). An ultimate limit is given by the quotation of Clem. Alex. from it referred to above (A.D. 200). Internal notices must fix it more nearly. Hilgenfeld adduces for the earlier date (B.C. 30) 6<sup>9</sup> 'Finis huius sæculi Esau,' which he thinks proves the time of writing to be the reign of the Idumæan Herod. But Edom is found in Rabbinical literature equally as a designation of Rome; and the Herodian dynasty, if that is referred to, lasted on through the first century of our era. He also draws an argument from the description of the twelve ages of the world, of which ten and a half are past (14th), taken in connexion with 10th (Solomon built the temple in the year of the world 3000), from which he calculates about B.C. 30 as the date (Mess. Jud. 104); but the description of the world-ages is too uncertain (the Syr. omits the verses) to base any inference upon it. Another argument for the early date is that a Jew, writing after the death of Christ, would not have introduced a prophecy of the death of the Messiah (7th) which would have been employed against him by Christians. No inference can be drawn from the signs of the end (5th, 6th, 9th) as applicable rather to the portents that preceded the battle of Actium than to those in the time of Vespasian. On the other hand, the allusion to the pulling down of the walls of Jerus. (11th 'humiliasti muros eorum qui te non nocuerunt') was true of Titus, but not of the capture of the city by Pompey in B.C. 63.

* This name (in the Arm. Ardab) is explained by Rendel Harris as a corruption of (Kiriath) Arba, the old name of Hebron, which is the scene of the visions of Baruch in the sister Apocalypse (Rest of the Words of Baruch, 35). The oak (14<sup>1</sup>) is the terebinth of Mamre. Hilg. takes it to mean Arpad ('Αρπατ, 2 K 18<sup>34</sup>).

But the question of the date really depends upon the interpretation given to the Eagle Vision. The details given about the reign of the several wings show that historic facts are here alluded to; the interpretation which follows the vision is perhaps purposely obscure, and does not help much as to the solution of it. The vision describes the reign of 12 'feathered wings,' 8 subordinate wings, and 3 heads—in all, of 23 kings; the attempt to take the wings in pairs, each pair representing a single king, their number being so reduced to 10 (Volkmar), is opposed to the interpretation given to Esdras (12th 'regnabunt xii reges, unus post unum,' 12th 'exsurgent octo reges'). The following points are to be borne in mind in the interpretation (Schürer, HJP iii. ii. 100). (1) The author writes during the reign of the third head, in which the Messiah is to appear; the subsequent reign of the two last subordinate wings is not history, but prophecy. (2) The second wing reigns more than twice as long as any of the rest (11th). (3) Several wings do not get so far as to reign, and represent pretenders only. (4) The wings and heads all belong to one and the same kingdom. (5) The first head dies a natural death (12th); the second is murdered by the third, who also is to die by the sword (11th 12th). Three main explanations are proposed—(i.) The wings represent Rome under the kings and the republic, and the 3 heads are Sulla, Pompey, and Caesar; the date of the work is shortly after Caesar's death (Laurence, Van der Vlis, Lücke). This view has no probability. Early Roman history would have no interest to a Jew, and there is great difficulty in adapting the 8 minor wings to the period before Sulla. (ii.) Hilgenfeld's view, that the wings represent the Greek empire reckoned from Alexander, either, as he first held, the line of the Ptolemies (Jud. Apokalyptik, 217 ff.), or, according to his later theory, that of the Seleucids (Mess. Jud. liv ff.): in either case the three heads are Caesar, Antony, and Octavian, and the book was written directly after Antony's death in B.C. 30, thirty years after the capture of Jerus. by Pompey (cf. 2 Es 3rd 'in the thirtieth year'). It is true that in 2 Es 11th the eagle is compared to the fourth beast of Daniel (7th=the Greek empire); but the fourth kingdom was often referred to the Romans. The chief objections to this view are—(1) The heads and the wings must all refer to a single kingdom, not to a combination of Roman and Greek rulers; (2) the rule of the second in the dynasty, whether Ptolemy I. Lagi or Seleucus I. Nikator, was not more than twice the length of any succeeding reign; (3) Caesar was assassinated, and did not die in his bed, as the first head is said to have done.

(iii.) It is now the generally accredited view, and it has most arguments in its favour, that the book should be dated in the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81–96). So Gfrörer, Dillmann, Volkmar, Ewald, Schürer, and others. The eagle represents Imperial Rome, the line of the emperors beginning with J. Caesar. The second wing is certainly to be identified with Augustus, who, reckoning from his first consulate, held rule for 56 years (B.C. 43–A.D. 14), i.e. more than twice the time of any of his successors. The three heads with equal probability are referred to the Flavian emperors: Vespasian died on his bed in torment (Suet. Vesp. 24; 2 Es 12th); Titus was commonly believed to have been murdered by Domitian. The difficulty lies in supplying the twenty rulers to precede Vespasian. The following proposals are made—(1) Gfrörer takes the twelve greater wings to be the first nine emperors, Caesar to Vitellius, with three usurpers, Vindex, Nymphidius, and Piso Licinianus: the eight lesser wings are petty kings and leaders in Pal. (Herod the Great, Agrippa I., Eleazar, John of Gischala, Simon Bar Giora, John the Idumean, Agrippa II., and Berenice: the last two attached themselves to Rome in the war). (2) Schürer agrees as to the twelve, but regards six of the lesser wings (the last two being matter of prophecy) as Roman generals who laid claim to the empire in the years of disorder, A.D. 68–70. (3) Wieseler takes the eight subordinate wings to mean the Herodian dynasty, vassals of Rome (Antipater, Herod I. and his three sons, Archelaus, Antipas, Philip, Agrippa I. and II., and Berenice). (4) Ewald, who is followed by Drummond (Jewish Messiah, 107), takes the twelve wings to be the twelve emperors up to Domitian: the eight little wings are the eight emperors among these who reigned less than ten years (Domitian included, for whom a short reign was anticipated), and the three heads are the Flavian princes, reckoned a third time under a different aspect. The double and triple repetition of the same names is unsatisfactory; Schürer's view (2) appears on the whole the most free from objection.

The simpler theory, on the other hand, of Gutschmid and Le Hir (Études Bibliques, i. 181 ff.), that twenty-three actual emperors are intended, the three heads being Sept. Severus, Caracalla, and Geta, is shown to be wrong by the fact that the book was quoted by Clem. Alex. at an earlier date than these emperors, and can be maintained only by supposing an interpolation, of which there is no sign in the Eagle Vision.

In considering the date, reference should be made to a companion volume to 2 Esdras, which curiously reproduces the language and visions of that book, namely, the Apococalypse of Baruch, first pub. in 1866 by Ceriani from a Syr. MS at Milan (Mon. sacra et prof., tom. i. fasc. ii., and tom. v. fasc. ii.; also in Fritzsche, Libri Apoc. V.T. 654). It also is a product of the Jewish literature called forth by the events of A.D. 70, but written before the final destruction of Jerus. in 133, which is not foreseen (Apoc. Bar 32; Jerus. is to be rebuilt, and then again destroyed [A.D. 70] for a time, and then rebuilt for ever). The similarities in tone and language with 2 Es are so striking that Ewald ascribed it to the same author. The general belief now held is that Baruch is the later, and has used Es, because, e.g., Bar corrects the crude notions of Es about original sin (cf. Es 7th 'O tu quid fecisti Adam? si enim tu peccasti non est factum solus tuus casus sed et nostrum,' with Bar 51, 'Non est ergo Adam causa nisi animæ suæ tantum; nos vero unusquisque fuit animæ suæ Adam'); and whereas Ezra complains that Jerus. should at least have been punished by the hands of God (5<sup>30</sup>), Bar accordingly represents it as destroyed by four angels before the entry of the Chaldean army (6-8). Some of the parallels are the division of each book into seven scenes, separated in most cases by intervals of seven days of fasting: the division of time into twelve parts (Bar 27=Es 14<sup>11</sup>): the legend of Behemoth and Leviathan (Bar 29=Es 6<sup>40</sup>): the prayer of Baruch (48, cf. the Confessio Esdræ 8<sup>20</sup>): the importance of Adam's transgression, prefaced in each by 'O quid fecisti Adam?' (Bar 48=Es 7<sup>118</sup>): the vision of a cloud ascending from the sea (Bar 53, cf. Es 13): the permanence of the law though the teachers depart (Bar 77, cf. Es 9<sup>37</sup>): the interest in the lost tribes, to whom Baruch sends a letter of consolation (78-86, cf. Es 13<sup>40</sup>), besides frequent minute resemblances of language.

The writing is a characteristically Jewish work in its apocalyptic form, its knowledge of Jewish traditions (Behemoth, etc.), its interest in the ten tribes, and its deep concern in the fate of Jerusalem. There is no ground for supposing that the author was a Jewish Christian: there is a marked contrast between the Christian interpolations (1-2, 15-16, and the insertion of the name Jesus in 7<sup>23</sup>) and the remainder of the book. The place of writing is given as Rome (Ewald) or Alexandria (Hilgenfeld, lxii, and most edd.), from which the added chapters certainly emanate; this would account for the earliest quotation being found in Clem. Alex. On the other hand, the fall of Jerus. would be more impressive to a Palestinian Jew than to an Alexandrian; and the geography (if Ardat is rightly explained by Rendel Harris) points the same way.

The date of the concluding chs. (15, 16) is placed about A.D. 268 by most critics. 15<sup>10-12</sup> refers to the troubles of Alexandria under Gallienus (260-268), when two-thirds of the population were destroyed by a plague following upon a famine (Eus. HE vii. 21. 22). 15<sup>28-33</sup> refers to the conquests of the Sassanidae ('Carmonii insani-entes'), esp. Sapor I. (240-273), who overran Syria but was repulsed by Odenathus and Zenobia ('dracones Arabum'), the founders of Palmyra; they, in turn, were defeated by Aurelian. 33 describes the murder of Odenathus at Emesa (266) by his cousin Mæonius. 34 ff. are referred to the invasion of Asia Minor by Goths and Scythians from the N. of the Euxine: Gallienus marched against them, but was recalled by the revolt of Aureolus (38 'portio alia ab occidente'). 46 'Asia consors in specie Babylonis' alludes to the association of Odenathus in the empire, A.D. 264 (Hilgenfeld, Mess. Jud. 208).

The chapters were written apparently as an appendix to 3-14, and were never current in a separate form.

Chs. 1, 2 are not fixed so definitely, but are probably earlier than the close. They are a compilation from various sources, and perhaps a fragment of a larger work: they show some relation to an Apocalypse of Zephaniah (T. and S. lxxix).

RECEPTION.—The early quotations from the book are collected by Dr. James (T. and S. xxvii-xliii). The Ep. of Barnabas 12<sup>1</sup> (ὅταν ξύλον κληθῇ καὶ ἀναστῇ καὶ ὅταν ἐκ ξύλου αἷμα στάξῃ) is thought to refer to 2 Es 5<sup>3</sup>, and the Rest of the Words of Baruch (A.D. 136), ch. 9, has similar words; the last scene of that book, where a stone takes the form of Jeremiah and speaks to the people, may be an amplification of 'lapis dabit vocem suam' of 2 Es. But the first express quotation is Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 16. 100, who regards it as the work of 'the prophet' Ezra. It is made use of in an Hippolytean fragment περὶ τοῦ παντός, and quoted in the Greek in the Apost. Constit. viii. 7. The supposed references in Tert. (de præscr. hæret. 3), Cyprian, and Commodian (3rd cent., Carm. Apol. 943, on the lost tribes) are doubtful. But it is quoted very frequently by Ambrose (de bono Mortis, 10-12, and elsewhere), who regards it as prophetic: in his time chs. 15, 16 were already current in the Latin version, and probably attached to 3-14. In Spain it was known to Priscillian and Vigilantius; and in Britain to Gildas, who quotes 15, 16 (Bensly, 36-40). The legend of the restoration of the books of Scripture (2 Es 14) is widespread, and may be derived from tradition apart from 2 Es (Iren. iii. 21. 2; Tert. de cult. fem. i. 3; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 22. 149). Jerome is alone unfavourable to it (adv. Vigilantium, 6, Præf. in vers. libr. Ezræ, quoted in last art.). It was perhaps owing to his estimate that the book was excluded from the Canon by the Council of Trent: it now with 1 Es forms an appendix to the Vulg. after the NT. The liturgical use of the book shows its popularity: the words of 2<sup>34, 35</sup> are employed in the 'Missa pro defunctis' of the Breviary ad Usus Sarum, and the word Requiem is derived from this passage; and 2<sup>36, 37</sup> were formerly used by the Eng. Church as an Introit for Whit Tuesday. Otherwise no use is made of it in the services of the Church.

LITERATURE.—A full list of the wide lit. on the subject is given in Schürer, HJP ii. iii. 93-114. The best critical edd. of the Lat. text are in the Cambr. Texts and Studies, vol. iii. 2, ed. Bensly and James, 1895; and Bensly, The Missing Fragment of the Fourth Book of Ezra, 1875. The versions are collected in Hilgenfeld's Messias Judæorum (Lips. 1869). Eng. commentaries and introductions are Lupton in the Speaker's Comm. on the Apoc.; Bissell (in Lange's OT Comm.); Churton's Uncan. and Apoc. Scriptures; and Drummond's Jewish Messiah, 1877. H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

ESDRIS (Ἑσδρίς).—Mentioned only 2 Mac 12<sup>30</sup>. The text is probably corrupt. AV has Gorgias, and this is likely enough to be correct.

ESEK (עֶזֶק), 'contention,' Gn 26<sup>20</sup>.—A well dug by Isaac, in the region near Rehoboth and Gerar. The site is unknown.

ESEREBIAS (Ἑσέρβιας, AV Esebriasis), 1 Es 8<sup>54</sup>. See SHEREBIAH.

ESHAN (עֶשָׁן), Jos 15<sup>52</sup>.—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, noticed with Arab and Dumah. The site is doubtful.

ESHBAAI.—See ISHBOSHETH.

ESHBAN (עֶשְׁבָּן).—An Edomite chief (Gn 36<sup>26</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>1</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESHCOL (עֶשְׁכּוֹל).—The brother of Mamre and Aner, the Amorite confederates of Abraham, who assisted the patriarch in his pursuit and defeat of Chedorlaomer's forces (Gn 14<sup>13, 24</sup>). He lived in the neighbourhood of Hebron (Gn 13<sup>18</sup>); and possibly gave his name to the valley of Eshcol, that lay a little to the N. of Hebron (Nu 13<sup>23</sup>).

It is noteworthy that Josephus, in recording the event described in Gn 14<sup>13-24</sup>, mentions Eshcol first. 'The first of them was called Eshcol, the second Enner, and the third Mambres' (Ant. i. x. 2). In the Heb. of Gn 14<sup>24</sup> they are mentioned in the order Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre. But in the LXX the order is 'Εσχώλ, Αἰνάρ, Μαμβρή; and this order is found also in Philo (De Migrat. Abrah. § 30, i. 461). H. E. RYLE.

ESHCOL (עֶשְׁכּוֹל), Nu 13<sup>24, 25</sup> 32<sup>9</sup>, Dt 1<sup>24</sup>.—A wady, with vineyards and pomegranates, apparently near Hebron. E. is usually rendered 'bunch of grapes.' The name has not been recovered, since the Ain

Keshkaleh at Hebron has no connexion with the Hebrew.

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP i. 114; Tristram, Land of Israel, 388, 393; Conder, Tent-Work, 237; Bible Places, 89; Besant, Thirty Years' Work in the Holy Land, 70, 84.

C. R. CONDER.

ESHEK (עֶשֶׂק).—A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8<sup>39</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESHTAOL (עֶשְׂתָּאֹל Jos 15<sup>33</sup> 19<sup>41</sup>, Jg 13<sup>25</sup> 16<sup>31</sup> 18<sup>2</sup>. s. 11).—A town in the Shephelah, first assigned to Judah, afterwards to Dan, always named with Zorah, now Sura'a, which is beside 'Ain Shems, where the Wady es-Surar is joined by valleys from the N. and S. and a great basin formed, fertile and well-watered, just beneath the hill country of Judaea. Eshua', close to Sura'a, represents Eshtaol. Guérin says he heard in the neighbourhood that it formerly was called Eshu'al or Eshtu'al, which, if confirmed, might be held decisive; but the degeneration of Eshtaol into Eshua is not impossible. Between Zorah and E. was the 'camp of Dan'; and there (Jg 13<sup>25</sup>) Samson's achievements began, and there he was buried (16<sup>31</sup>). (See Smith's Hist. Geog. p. 218.) The Eshtaolites (lit. 'Eshtaolites') were, according to 1 Ch 2<sup>33</sup>, descended from the families of Kiriath-jearim, etc., who are there described as Calebites. The narratives of Jos 15<sup>33</sup> and 19<sup>41</sup> suggest how mingling of the tribes of Judah and of Dan might arise, perhaps leading to the Danite migration from Zorah and Eshtaol.

LITERATURE.—PEFS<sup>t</sup>, 1874, 17; Conder, Palestine, 49; Smith, HGHL, 218; Guérin, Judée, ii. 12 ff.; SWP Memoirs, iii. 25.

A. HENDERSON.

ESHTEMOA (עֶשְׂתֵּמֹא), named in Jos 15<sup>50</sup> (where it is called Eshtemoh, עֶשְׂתֵּמֹחַ) among towns of Judah. It was made afterwards a Levitical city (21<sup>14</sup>, 1 Ch 6<sup>37</sup>). During David's wanderings in S. Judah its inhabitants were on his side (1 S 30<sup>28</sup>). It is said in 1 Ch 4<sup>17</sup> to have been inhabited by the descendants of Ishbah; and Eshtemoa, its founder, is called (4<sup>19</sup>) a Maacathite, which would naturally suggest that he came from the small kingdom of Maacah (wh. see). It may have been here 'the Maacathite' among his heroes joined David (2 S 23<sup>34</sup>). The site was recovered by Robinson some 8 miles S. of Hebron. It is now Es-Sem'a, a considerable village (BR ii. p. 204), and full of ancient remains (PEF Memoirs, iii. 403, 412).

A. HENDERSON.

ESHTEMOH.—See ESHTEMOA.

ESHTON (עֶשְׁתֹּן, perhaps 'uxorious').—A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>11, 12</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESLI (עֶשְׁלִי, perhaps = עֶשְׁלִי, 'J' hath reserved').—An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3<sup>35</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ESPOUSAL, ESPOUSE.—To espouse (fr. Lat. sponsus, ptep. of spondere, to betroth, through Old Fr. espouser) meant either to betroth or to marry. Thus Camden, Rem. (1637) 414, 'Two Lovers who being espoused, dyed both before they were married'; but Shaks. Rich. III. iv. v. 8—

'Withal, say, that the Queene hath heartily consented,
He should espouse Elizabeth her daughter.'

So also 'espousal' is used in both senses, and Murray (Oxf. Eng. Dict. s.v.) thinks marriage is the primary sense. In AV 'espouse' occurs 2 S 3<sup>14</sup> 'Deliver me my wife Michal, which I espoused to me' (RV, 'whom I betrothed to me,' Heb. לִי אֵשְׂרָשָׁי, which always means 'betroth'); Mt 1<sup>8</sup>, Lk 1<sup>27, 28</sup>, all of the Virgin Mary (RV 'betrothed'; Gr. μηστρεύω, always 'to ask or engage in marriage'); 2 Co 11<sup>2</sup> 'I have espoused you to one husband'

(ἡμυστάμην, lit. 'joined you unto,' and here the ref. seems to be to marriage, not betrothal, 'I have given you in marriage,' though the betrothal, which was also carried out by the bridegroom's friend, may be meant). Espousal is found Ca 3<sup>11</sup> 'in the day of his espousals' (בְּיֵמֵי הַקְּדוּשָׁה, 'on the day of his marriage,' undoubtedly); and Jer 2<sup>2</sup> 'the love of thine espousals' (אַהֲבַת כְּלִילֶיךָ, as Cheyne, 'thy bridal state'). Thus it is probable that AV (following older VSS.*) used these words indiscriminately, or at least with a less clear distinction than now obtains between betrothal and marriage. For the solemnity of betrothal in Italy (= England) in Shakespeare's day, see Twelfth Night, iv. iii. 26: it enables Olivia to speak of Sebastian as 'husband' (v. 146). It was not less solemn and binding in Israel. See MARRIAGE. J. HASTINGS.

ESPY.—The verb to 'esp'y' occurs only six times in AV, Gn 42<sup>27</sup>, Jos 14<sup>7</sup>, Jer 48<sup>19</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>6</sup>, To 11<sup>6</sup>, 1 Mac 5<sup>28</sup>, while the mod. form to 'spy' is found eighteen times, and RV turns 'esp'y' of Jos 14<sup>7</sup> into 'spy.' The word is apparently of Teutonic origin (Old High Ger. spehon), though it is connected with Lat. specere, to look, Gr. σκέπτομαι, and entered Eng. through the Old Fr. espier.

1. The most common and the oldest meaning is to inspect (secretly) a place, as Nu 21<sup>32</sup> 'Moses sent to spy out Jaazer,' when the Heb. is רָגַל, except Nu 13<sup>16, 17</sup> (וָרָג), and the Eng. is always 'spy (Jos 14<sup>7</sup> AV 'esp'y') out,' except Jos 2<sup>1</sup> 'to spy secretly' (סִנְיָלִים סִנְיָלִים, RV 'as spies secretly'), and Ezk 20<sup>6</sup> 'a land that I had espied for them' (אֶרֶץ שִׁנְיָלִים). Once the ref. is not to land but to liberty, Gal 2<sup>1</sup> 'false brethren . . . who came in privily to spy out our liberty' (Tindale's trn.; Wyc. 'to aspice oure freedom,' Gr. κατασκοπήσαι). 2. But we also find the sense of keep watch, as Jer 48<sup>19</sup> 'O, inhabitant of Aroer, stand by the way, and esp'y' (וָרָג). 3. More freq. is the idea of suddenly perceiving anything, as Gn 42<sup>27</sup> 'And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money'; so Ex 21<sup>1</sup>, 2 K 9<sup>17</sup> 13<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>16</sup> (all רָגַל 'see'). 4. Finally, simply to discover or perceive, as 2 K 23<sup>24</sup> 'All the abominations that were spied in the land of Judah . . . did Josiah put away' (וָרָג). Cf. Barlowe, Dialogue (Lunn's ed. p. 73), 'Woulde God they were as prest to remoue ye balk out of their owne eyes, as they be prompte to aspye a lytle mote in other mens.'

The subst. is always plu. 'spies,' except Sir 11<sup>30</sup> 'spy.' The Heb. is generally סִנְיָלִים (Gn 42<sup>27</sup> 11. 14. 16. 30. 31. 34, Jos 6<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 26<sup>1</sup>, 2 S 15<sup>10</sup>); also שָׂרִים (Jg 1<sup>24</sup>, RV 'watchers'), אֶרְסִים (Nu 21<sup>1</sup>, RV 'Atharim' as place-name, wh. see). The Gr. words are κατασκοπος (Sir 11<sup>30</sup>, 1 Mac 12<sup>26</sup>, He 11<sup>31</sup>), the usual LXX tr. of mēraggēlīm; and ἐγκαθ'ερος (Lk 20<sup>20</sup>, lit. 'sent down into,' and so, as Plummer, 'suborned to lie in wait.' The word is not found elsewhere in NT).

J. HASTINGS.

ESSENES.—In regard to the origin and nature of this sect very various views have been held. It is therefore best to confine oneself to stating succinctly what is known about them from ancient authors.

Our earliest witness is Philo of Alexandria, who, having visited Jerusalem in his youth, may have come into personal contact with them. In his treatise Quod Omnis Probus Liber, which is one of * Tindale, in his tr. published in 1525-26, rendered the Gr. μηστρεύσις (Mt 1<sup>8</sup>) by 'married,' and in this he is followed by Coverdale. In the ed. of 1534, however, he altered it to 'betrothed.' In 2 S 3<sup>14</sup> Cov. has 'married,' and so have the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles. In the NT our translators were probably influenced by the Rhemish Version, which in Mt 1<sup>8</sup> has 'spoused,' or by Udall's tr. of Erasmus' Paraphrase (1548) which has 'espouse.'

his earlier works, written probably before A.D. 20, he describes them as follows :—

They were a sect of Jews, and lived in Syria Palestine, over 4000 in number, and called Essæi, because of their saintliness; for hōstos = saintly, is the same word as Essæus. Worshipers of God, they yet did not sacrifice animals, regarding a reverent mind as the only true sacrifice. At first they lived in villages and avoided cities, in order to escape the contagion of evils rife therein. They pursued agriculture and other peaceful arts; but accumulated not gold or silver, nor owned mines. No maker of warlike weapons, no huckster or trader by land or sea, was to be found among them. Least of all were any slaves found among them; for they saw in slavery a violation of the law of nature, which made all men free brethren, one of the other.

Abstract philosophy and logic they eschewed, except so far as it could subserve ethical truth and practice. Natural philosophy they only studied so far as it teaches that there is a God who made and watches over all things. Moral philosophy or ethic was their chief preoccupation, and their conduct was regulated by their national (Jewish) laws. These laws they esp. studied on the seventh day, which they held holy, leaving off all work upon it and meeting in their synagogues, as these places of resort were called. In them they sat down in ranks, the older ones above the younger. Then one took and read the Bible, while the rest listened attentively; and another, who was very learned in the Bible, would expound whatever was obscure in the lesson read, explaining most things in their time-honoured fashion by means of symbols. They were taught piety, holiness, justice, the art of regulating home and city, knowledge of what is really good and bad and of what is indifferent, what ends to avoid, what to pursue,—in short, love of God, of virtue, and of man.

And such teaching bore fruit. Their life-long purity, their avoiding of oaths or falsehood, their recognition of a good providence alone, showed their love of God. Their love of virtue revealed itself in their indifference to money, worldly position, and pleasure. Their love of man in their kindness, their equality, their fellowship passing all words. For no one had his private house, but shared his dwelling with all; and, living as they did in colonies (κώμης), they threw open their doors to any of their sect who came their way. They had a storehouse, common expenditure, common raiments, common food eaten in Syssitia or common meals. This was made possible by their practice of putting whatever they each earned day by day into a common fund, out of which also the sick were supported when they could not work. The aged among them were objects of reverence and honour, and treated by the rest as parents by real children.

The most cruel and deceitful tyrants, says Philo, that had been the scourge of their country, had yet been moved to admiration of their quiet but invincible freedom, of their common meals, of their consummate fellowship.

Perhaps in these last words Philo refers to Herod the Great, whose subsequent rise to greatness was foretold to him as a child by an E. named Manæmus (Menahem), and who in consequence befriended and honoured the sect (Josephus, Ant. xv. x. 5).

Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica has preserved a fragment of Philo's 'Apology for the Jews,' which repeats much of the information given by Philo, but also supplements it.

Our lawgiver, he says, trains into fellowship and communion thousands of his disciples, who for their saintliness (ἁγιότητα) are called Essenes. They inhabit many cities of Judæa, as well as many villages and populous tracts. Their tenets are espoused by them of free choice, and not as a matter of race.

There are no children or youths among them, but only full-grown men, or men already in the decline of life. They have no private property, but put all they have into a common fund, and live as members of a theiasis or philosophic colony, having common meals. They are very industrious, and work hard from early sunrise to sunset, as tillers of the soil, or herdsmen, or bee-farmers, or as craftsmen. Whatever they so earn they hand over to the elected steward (ταμίαι χειροτονήντι), who at once buys victuals for the common repast.

No Essene, adds Philo in this account, marries, but all practise continence. For women are selfish and jealous, and apt to pervert men's characters by ceaseless chicanery and wiles. While, if they have children, they are puffed up and bold in speech; driving their husbands to actions which are a bar to any real fellowship with other men.

The next writer who describes the Essenes is Pliny the elder († A.D. 79), in his Natural History, bk. v. ch. 17. 'The Hessesenes,' he says, 'live on the W. side away from the shores (of the Dead Sea), out of reach of their baneful influences. A solitary race, and strange above all others in the entire world. They live without women, renouncing all sexual love. They eschew money, and live among the palm-trees. Yet the number of their fellows (convenarum) is kept up and day by day renewed; for there flock to them from afar many who, wearied of battling with the rough sea of life, drift into their system' (ad mores). 'Thus for thousands of ages (strange to tell) the race is perpetuated, and yet no one is born in it. So does the contrition felt by others for their past life enrich this set of men. Below them lay Engadi, a town once second only to Jerus. in its fertility and groves of palms. Now 'tis but one more tomb. Next comes Masada, a fort on a rock, and, like the former, not far from the Dead Sea. And here ends our account of Judæa.'

There are two passages in Josephus in which the E. are described at length, and many minor references. The following is an epitome of his information :—

Josephus calls them Esseni in BJ ii. viii. 2, Ant. xiii. v. 9, x. 6, etc., and with Philo, Essæi in Ant. xv. x. 4. They arose along with the sects of Pharisees (Ant. xiii. v. 9) and Sadducees, about B.C. 144, and formed from the first an αἵρεσις or sect.

About B.C. 107 (Ant. xiii. xi. 2) a certain Essene, named Judas, had a school, it would seem, in the temple, in which he taught his companions and pupils the art of predicting events. Again, about B.C. 21 we read (Ant. xv. x. 4) that Herod excused them along with the Pharisees from taking the oath of fidelity to himself. In the Jewish war (BJ ii. xx. 4) we hear of one John the Essene leading the Jewish rebels in Thamma. And at that time (c. A.D. 70) there was a gate at the S.E. corner of the city of David called the Gate of the E. (BJ v. iv. 2), which is proof that they were then a numerous sect.

The E. were so called because of their holiness (σεμνότης) (BJ ii. viii. 5; Ant. xviii. i. 5). They believed that God controls all things, and committed all things to Him. Sometimes, however, Josephus says that they regarded Fate (ἡμαρτυρία) as the supreme determinant of all human affairs (so a Mussulman believes in Allah and Kismet both at once) (Ant. xviii. i. 3).

There was no single city of the E., but they were sojourners (μετανοήσαντες) in many, being in number over 4000 (Ant. xviii. i. 5). They eschewed marriage, and, adopting others' children as their own, imbued them with their own tenets (BJ ii. viii. 2; Ant. xviii. i. 5).

There was, however, another sect (τάγμα) of E., who made trial of women for three years and then married them if they were fruitful (BJ ii. viii. 13). They owned no slaves (Ant. xvii. i. 5), and were wholly devoted to agricultural pursuits. They despised wealth and shared their possessions, so that a rich man among them had no more enjoyment of his own property than had a member who owned nothing (BJ ii. viii. 3 and Ant. xviii. i. 5). For in entering their sect (αἵρεσις) a man made over his property to the institution (τῷ τάγματι) (BJ ii. viii. 3). There was no buying and selling between members; but the elected stewards administered the common fund,* impartially satisfying the needs of all alike (BJ ii. viii. 3). In every city a special relieving officer (ἀνδραμόν) was appointed to take care of the garments and supplies of the sect and entertain its travelling members.

But though so knit together among themselves the Essenes succoured the deserving, and pitied all men and fed the needy (BJ ii. viii. 6). This was a primary duty to be fulfilled by each on his own responsibility, and without waiting for a hint from the overseer (ἐπιμελητής or ἐπίτροπος); without whose authority, however, they might do nothing else, nor even give to their own kinsmen.

Their general mode of life (βίαια) Jos. in one place declares to be the same as that which Pythagoras instituted among the Greeks; in another place he compares them to Dacians, presumably because of their simple and communal mode of living (Ant. xv. x. 4, xviii. i. 5). He thus describes a day of an Essene's life inside his brotherhood :—

As for their piety towards God, it is very extraordinary. For before the sun rises they speak not a word about profane matters, but address to the sun certain prayers, which they have received from their forefathers, as if they supplicated it to rise (BJ ii. viii. 5). After this every one of them is sent away by their curators to exercise those arts wherein they are skilled, in which they labour with great diligence till the fifth hour (11 A.M.). After this they assemble together into one place, and when they have clothed themselves in white veils, they bathe their bodies in cold water. And after this purification is over, they meet together in an apartment of their own, into which it is not permitted to any one of another persuasion to enter; and they themselves being pure enter the dining-room as if it were some holy temple, and quietly sit down. Upon which the baker lays them loaves in order, and the cook also brings a single plate of one sort of food and sets it before every one of them. But the priest says grace before meat, and it is unlawful for any one to taste of the food before prayer is offered. And when they have made their breakfast, he again prays over them. And when they begin and when they end, they praise God as * χειροτονητοὶ οἱ τῶν κοινῶν ἐπιμεληταί.

Him that bestoweth life. After which they lay aside their white garments as holy, and betake themselves to their labours again till the evening. Then they return home to supper after the same manner; and if there be any strangers there, they sit down with them. Nor is there every clamour or disturbance to pollute their house; but they give every one leave to speak in their turn. Which silence thus kept in their house appears to outsiders like some tremendous mystery; and the same is due to their unswerving sobriety, and to this, that their food and drink is measured out to satisfy them and no more.

Like Philo, Josephus is full of praise for their moral qualities, and lauds their self-restraint in anger, their faithfulness, their peace-making, their truthfulness, which made all oaths to them a mere superfluity.

The mode of joining the sect was this. The intending member remained outside the order one year, following, however, the same discipline, and invested with its symbols, namely a spud wherewith to hide his excrement out of sight of God, the girdle and white raiment. After the lapse of a year, if he had given good proof of his continence, he was allowed to join more closely in their way of life and partake of a purer quality of the waters of purification, though not yet to live entirely with them. Two years of moral probation must yet be passed before he was chosen a member of their band (βασιλεις). And then before he touched the common food he took tremendous oaths to them: first to reverence the Deity, next to observe justice towards men, to hate the wicked and assist the just. To be loyal ever to all men, but in especial to those in authority, because none hath authority except by God's help. He swore also, if he should ever be in authority, not to abuse the same, nor outshine those subject to him in his garments or in any other finery; to love truth and repel falsehood; to keep his hands clean from theft and his soul from unholy gain; to conceal nothing from members of the sect, nor reveal aught to others, even at peril of his life. Moreover, he swore to communicate to none the dogmas of the sect, otherwise than as he received them himself, to abstain from brigandage, and to preserve with like care the books of their sect and the names of the angels.

Jos. gives many indications that the E. were very strict Jews (BJ II. viii. 9). They revered the name of the lawgiver next after God, and punished with death one that blasphemed against Moses. Above all other Jews they observed the Sabbath, not only not cooking on that day, and avoiding the lighting of a fire, but forbearing also to move a vessel, or even evacuate. In the Jewish war many died under torture at the hands of the Romans rather than blaspheme the lawgiver or eat unclean food. Many details supplied by Josephus prove how much importance they attached to ceremonial purity. We have seen how they bathed before each meal, and wore linen garments; linen, of course, being prescribed because it was a vegetable substance, and not made of dead animal refuse, as would be a leathern or woollen tunic. That the waters of purification in their purer quality were denied to novices, proves that the water of the bath was ceremonially cleansed, and probably exorcised. By immersion in it they were themselves rendered καθαροί or pure before they sat down to meat, by contrast with the ερεπδόξα, or persons of any other persuasion (BJ II. viii. 10). They were distinguished acc. to their purity and seniority into four grades; and a senior member was polluted by the very touch of a junior member, and had to wash after being so touched, as if he had been jostled by Gentiles. So an Indian Brahman is polluted by the touch and even sight of a low-caste native. They did not anoint themselves with oil, regarding it as a defilement; prob. because they could not easily get oil prepared by members of their own caste. Josephus elsewhere assures us that no Jew would anoint himself except with Jewish oil.

The same pursuit of ceremonial purity is to be noticed in regard to their meals. Their food and viands were specially prepared by their priests (Ant. XVIII. i. 5); just as in a Hindoo prison the cook must be a Brahman, because any lower-caste man may eat what a higher-caste man has cooked, but not vice versa. In each city a special officer (κηδεμών) was appointed to supply travelling E. with their ceremonially pure garments and food. Lastly, an E. expelled for his sins by a court of 100 members from the brotherhood was still so held by its oaths and customs that he could not eat of food provided by others, and in consequence starved to death. To the same concern for ceremonial purity must prob. be ascribed their attitude of reserve towards the temple sacrifices. 'They send offerings (ἀναθήματα) to the temple and perform sacrifices with superiority of purificatory rites,* which they claim to practise (Ant. XVIII. i. 5). And being for this reason excluded from the common court of the temple, they perform their sacrifices by themselves.† These words are obscure, and barely reconcilable with Philo's statement that the E. did not sacrifice animals (Philo, ii. 457 = Quod om. prob. lib. § 12). The offerings sent, according to Jos., need not of course have been blood-offerings; and as to the nature of the sacrifices (θυσίας) which they performed by themselves, i.e. without the help of the temple priests, Jos. tells us nothing; but we should certainly connect it with a practice, which he elsewhere attests, viz. that they elected their own priests for the making of their own food and eatables. This much is clear, that the ordinary lustrations of the temple were not good enough for an E., and were incompatible with his notions of ceremonial purity. Presumably, they were excluded from the temple court for thus flouting the usual lustrations. Unable to enter it, they sent offerings, but did not go themselves. At the same time 'they performed their sacrifices by themselves.' There seems to be some connexion between this statement and Philo's that they offered up the sacrifice of a devout and reverent mind. They could not possibly have offered up animal sacrifices save in the temple and in the ordinary way; and Josephus' own statement elsewhere, that their mode of life was Pythagorean, is in favour of Philo's declaration that they did not sacrifice animals. It is natural to suppose that they regarded their common meals as of the nature of a sacrifice, just as Christians regard the eucharistic elements. Only thus can we explain the fact that they elected priests to prepare those meals; for a priest implies a sacrifice to be offered.

Their abstention from marriage must also be set down to their desire for a levitical purity. For acc. to the Mosaic law sexual relations involved a defilement of the person, and the uncleanness lasted until the even (Lv 15<sup>18</sup>).

Notwithstanding their attachment to the Mosaic law and striving after levitical purity, there were certainly many non-Jewish elements in their religious practices and beliefs. Thus they adored the sun, and prayed to him to rise. In Apian and other writers we find the phrase, 'the god rose,' or 'the god set,' used instead of 'the sun rose,' or 'the sun set'; and Philo regarded the sun and stars as holy and divine natures.

The Essene beliefs about the soul and a future life were also non-Jewish. They believed that they received their souls back after death (BJ II. viii. 11), and so very cheerfully died for the faith. 'The body is corruptible, they taught; and the matter of which it is composed is not lasting. But souls are immortal, and last for ever, and, proceeding out of the most subtle ether, are entangled in bodies as in prison-cells, being drawn down by some natural yearning. But when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh, as being now released from a long bondage, they rejoice and mount upwards. And in agreement with the opinions of the Greeks they declare that there lies away across the ocean a habitation for the good souls, in a region that is oppressed neither with storms of rain or snow, nor with intense heat; a region ever refreshed by the gentle breathing of a breeze blowing from the ocean. But they allot to bad souls a dark and tempestuous den full of never-ceasing punishments.'

* τὰς θυσίας ἐπιτελοῦσιν διαφοροῦται ἀγγεῖων, ὥς νομίζουσιν.
† ἐφ' αὐτῶν.

The Essenes had hereditary prayers to the sun, as well as the usual Jewish sacred books; they had purificatory rites of different sorts or degrees, and utterances of the prophets. By diligent study of these, some of them learned and professed to read the future. And their predictions, says Jos., were rarely belied; indeed he gives several instances up and down his history of the fulfilment of their prophecies (BJ II. viii. 12). They also had compositions of the ancients from which they chose out whatever benefited soul and body; and they inquired after such roots and peculiar stones as would ward off their distempers. The regular books and dogmas of the sect, as we have seen, they took oath to carefully keep, as also the names of the angels. These names, of course, were powerful weapons against evil demons, with a belief in which they must, like other Jews of the age, have been imbued. The stones and roots were the ordinary magic remedies against diseases.

This is the sum of what Jos. has to say about the Essenes. Hippolytus in the 9th Book of his Refutation of Heresies, § 18-28, substantially copies out Josephus' account in the BJ II. ch. 8, here and there adding Christian touches in a way which proves that he was not loth to assimilate them to Christians. Yet some of the information which he adds is not of this sort, but serves to intensify their Jewish complexion. Such are the statements that on the Sabbath some Essenes would not so much as leave their beds (§ 25); that some were so scrupulous that they would not carry a coin, declaring it wrong to carry or look at or make an image (§ 26, cf. Mt 22<sup>20</sup>); that no one of them would enter a city over the gate of which stood a statue (§ 26); that others of them, if they heard any one talking about God and His law, would waylay him when alone, and threaten to slay him unless he were circumcised, and slay him actually if he did not submit; for which reason, says Hippolytus, they got the name of Zealots and Sicarii; that others would call no one Lord (Κύριον) but only God, submitting to torment and death rather than do so. It is difficult to believe that Hippolytus had no authority for these statements; which indeed might seem to be taken from Jos., since they are embedded in his long citation of that author. If so, they have been removed from all the MSS of Josephus. The same account of Jos. was excerpted by Porphyry in the 3rd cent. in his book on Abstinence from Meats, and later by Eusebius in his De Prep. Evang. The account given by Epiphanius of the E. is late, confused, and of little value. It is clear that, even if the majority of the E. were cultivators and voluntarily poor, that did not prevent some of their number from occupying important posts in the court and camp; for we hear of one Simon* the interpreter of Archelaus' dream (Ant. XVII. xiii. 3), and of John the strategus, and of Menahem the friend of Herod. Nor did their gospel of peace and their prejudice against arms, as reported by Philo, prevent them from taking part in the final struggle against the Romans. Jos., moreover, implies that they were constantly moving about from city to city; and we can only suppose that the object of this travelling was to preach their tenets and secure recruits. We should like to know if the sect was not mainly recruited from Greek-speaking Jews, but on this point Jos. tells us nothing. In his autobiog. (Vita, 10) he implies that as a youth he had tried the discipline of this sect, as also of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and this inner acquaintance with them entitles his account to our entire credit; but just because he and his countrymen knew the sect so well, he omits to inform us about so essential a point as in what language their books were written, and what tongue, whether Greek or Aramaic, they usually spoke among themselves.

Some writers, impressed with the fact that Jesus constantly inveighed against the Pharisees and Sadducees, but never against the members of the third of the three great Jewish sects, who yet must have everywhere confronted Him, have inferred that He and John the Baptist, His precursor, were Essenes. The silence of the Gospels about the E. is certainly remarkable; and there are many striking traits in common between the E. and the earliest Christians. These are the following:—

1. The community of goods and voluntary poverty. 2. The art of prophecy. In the earliest Church, as we know from Acts and from the Didaché, there was a regular order of prophets. 3. The teaching about the future life, and about a hell. These tenets, however, were equally found among the Pharisees; nor does Jos. support Hippolytus in the latter's statement that the Essenes believed in the resurrection of the flesh, though the picture of the Islands of the Blest implies as much, and answers well enough to the Refrigerium of later Christian belief. As to the teaching of future punishment, we also find it in Philo. 4. Abstinence from marriage. This was equally a counsel of perfection in the early Church, but was there held to be right in view of the impending second advent and end of the world (1 Co 7<sup>25ff.</sup>). 5. Obedience to established authorities. 6. Internal government. The officers of the E. community were variously termed ἀποδίκται τῶν προσδῶν 'receivers of the revenue,' ἐπιμεληταί 'curators,' ἀνδμόνις 'relieving officers,' ταμίαι 'stewards' (in Philo). These officers were, like the bishops of the early Church, elected by show of hands (χειροτονήντες), acc. to the testimony of both Philo and Josephus. It is significant that Hippolytus calls them outright προεστώτες or presidents (lib. ix. § 25), the regular 2nd cent. equivalent of 'bishop.' 7. The common meals, with which we may compare the picture of the early Church of Jerusalem given in the Acts. But whereas the Essenes dined together because of their anxiety to eat no food but what was ceremonially pure, the Christians were chiefly actuated, it would seem, by charitable and communistic reasons. Their love-feast, however, also had from an early date, if not from the very first, a sacramental character and conclusion, and required, like the Essene common meal, the presence of a priest both to prepare it and to give thanks before and after it to God 'the Giver of Life.' 8. The Essene priests (ἱερεῖς) were elected to preside at the common meal, and make the food eaten thereat. Since the Essene common repasts had plainly a sacramental character, the function of their priests, as of Christian ones, was simply to prepare and preside over a sacramental meal, to which none were admitted save those rendered pure by previous baptism. 9. General organization. (α) Obedience to the Essene officers. The brethren in their department and bodily habit were like children under the eye of a schoolmaster whom they feared (BJ II. viii. 9). (β) They were all brethren, but the elder members were revered by the juniors as if they were their parents. (γ) The entire body or class of Essenes (γένος as Jos. calls it) is a βίαιος, an αἵρεσις, an ὄμιλος, a ταγμα. The two former were generic names for any body of co-religionists, and Christian congregations among the Gentiles were so described. (δ) The travelling precepts of the E. resembled those enjoined by Jesus on the Seventy. They were to take nothing at all with them, but only to go armed for fear of robbers.* (ε) They were to wear their cloaks and shoes right out, never changing them till they were quite worn out. Hippolytus paraphrases this by saying that no E. owned two cloaks or two pairs of shoes (Hipp. l.c. § 20). (ζ) The four grades of E. resembled the steps of the catechumenate. Such a distinction, however, of grades of initiation was common to most ancient mysteries, and was not special to Christianity. The disciplina arcani of the E. was also reproduced in the Christian Church, but equally in the pagan mysteries. 10. Like the Christians, the Essenes were not content with the ordinary lustrations (ἀντίσκις) of Judaism, but had superior ones of their own. Whereas, however, the Christian baptism was conferred once and for all, the Essene baptism was daily. The Essene affectation of a purity of food superior even to the ordinary purity of the Jews, also recalls the eucharistic meal of the Christians. From it the novice was excluded, just as was the catechumen from the Eucharist. And just as the priest among the E. was elected to make the food eaten in their sysitia, so the priest in the Gr. Church, even to this day, himself prepares and takes the eucharistic loaves. Jos. expressly says that the Essenes elected priests. They were therefore not content with the hereditary Levites of Judaism.

More analogies between the Essenes and the earliest Christians could no doubt be discerned. But it is a fatal objection to any real identification, that the Essenes were ultra-Jewish in the observance of the Sabbath, and, if we may credit Hippolytus, in their insistence on the circumcision of converts. The most we can say is that the * οὐδὲν μὲν ὅλως ἐπιφορεζόμενοι, διὰ δὲ τοῦς ληστὰς ἐνοπλοί.

* Σίμων ἄνθρωπος γένος Ἑσσηαίου.

Christians copied many features of their organization and propagandist activity from the Essenes.

The relation of the different sources on which our knowledge of the E. depends requires further sifting than it has generally received. Of course there have been attempts to prove the Philonean sources to be not authentic, but they are based on mere ignorance. There are occasional verbal resemblances* between the accounts of Philo and Jos. which indicate that Jos., besides his own personal experience of the sect, used either Philo or else a document previously used by Philo. The accounts of the two writers, however, do not always agree. Thus Philo says that all the E. were full-grown men, or verging on old age; but Jos. avers that they recruited their sect by adopting other people's children while they were still supple and plastic to receive their teachings (BJ II. viii. 2). Yet in the same context Jos. speaks of those who desired to become members of the sect,† and also of their period of probation, in words suitable only to the view that these recruits were adult men. We may perhaps infer that the sect was recruited in both ways. Pliny's statement that the men from all quarters joined it when they repented of their lives, and left the world, agrees well enough with Philo's statement; and, if we translate penitentia as 'repentance' rather than mere ennui, offers a striking parallel to John the Baptist's preaching: Repent of your sins and be baptized, because the kingdom of God is at hand. There is reason to suspect some close affinity between John, who came fasting, and the E.; the more so as John's sphere of activity in the valley of Jordan lay close to the Essene settlement on the shores of the Dead Sea.

The recluse Bannus, with whom Jos. as a young man spent three years as a disciple, resembled the Essenes. For he lived in the desert, wore garments made of the bark of trees, and lived on anything he found growing about, washing himself often day and night with cold water by way of purification. However, Josephus' context rather implies that he was not one. An almost certain reference to the E. is contained in an eloquent passage of Philo's, from the same treatise in which his longer description of the sect is preserved.

Even in our own day, he writes, there are still men whose only guide is God; men who live by the true reason of nature, not only themselves free, but filling their neighbours with a spirit of freedom. They are not very numerous indeed. But that is not strange. For the highest nobility is ever rare; and then these men have turned aside from the vulgar herd to devote themselves to a contemplation of nature's verities. They pray, if it were possible, that they may reform our fallen lives; but, if they cannot, owing to the tide of evils and wrongs which surges up in cities, they flee away, lest they too be swept off their feet by the force of its current. And we, he continues, if we had a true zeal for self-improvement, would have to track them to their places of retreat, and, halting as suppliants before them, would beseech them to come to us and tame our life, grown too fierce and wild; preaching, instead of war and slavery and untold ills, their gospel of peace and freedom, and all the fulness of other blessings.

The Therapeutæ of Alexandria, of whom Philo has left so striking a description in his tract De Vita Contemplativa, in many ways resembled the Pal. Essenes; but were, as was natural in an Egypt. sect, more addicted to contemplation. Here is not the place for a detailed comparison between them and the E.; nor is it possible to review the numerous theories which have been framed with regard to the origin of the E. It, however, deserves to be remarked that acc. to the evidence of Jos.

they arose just at the time when the friendship between Lacedæmon and Jerus. was at its highest. Areus the king of Sparta had written as early as B.C. 309–300 to Onias the high priest in these terms: 'It is found in writing that the Spartans and the Jews are brethren, and that they are of the stock of Abraham' (1 Mac 12<sup>23</sup>). And in B.C. 144 Jonathan the high priest, in renewing the relations of his country with Lacedæmon, reminded the Spartans of this long-standing friendship based on ancient kinship. Is it possible that the E. sect was partly an outcome of this contact with the Peloponnese—an attempt to imitate on Jewish soil, and in a religious and moral sense only, the Syssitia and organization of the Lyceurgan polity? That most of the Jews mentioned in Jos. as belonging to the Maccabæan period have Greek second names is good evidence of the wide diffusion in Pal. at that time of the Gr. language. And the very information proffered by Jos., that the E. were Jews by race, almost implies in its context that in language they were something else. So Philo assures us that the holy places in which the E. met on the Sabbath were called συναγωγαί, synagogues. Unless they spoke Greek, why should this term rather than the usual one σαββατεῖον* have been employed? Friedländer (Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Christenthums, Wien, 1894) has remarked that the very circumstance of Jos. having used, if not Philo's account, at least a Gr. description of the sect already used by Philo, is some indication that they were a Gr. sect of Jews. Their Pythagorean régime, their belief in the pre-existence of the soul, their view of its nature and incarnation, all point the same way. The statement also of Philo, not repeated by Jos., that they philosophized most things in the Bible allegorically or in a symbolic way with old-fashioned zeal,† is an almost certain proof of their Hellenism. And Philo's own allegorization of the passage Dt 23 ff. is, as Friedländer has seen (p. 118), an allusion to the Essene probation and discipline (Philo, Legis Alleg. i. 117).

Again, Philo, when he states that the E. were taught the art of regulating home and state, and a knowledge of what things are really good and bad and indifferent, how to choose what is right and avoid the opposite courses, seems to imply a familiarity on their part with Greek, especially with Stoic, moral philosophy, inconceivable among Jews who spoke Aramaic only. But here we must be cautious, for Philo would naturally describe any sect in terms of his own Gr. culture. That he twice over described this Pal. sect, yet apparently left unnoticed the purely Jewish schools of Pal., is in any case significant, and suggests that they had a Gr. culture which interested him, and led him to couple them, as he does, with the Alexandrine Therapeutæ.

Jos. equally implies that they were more or less Hellenized. Would he have conspired with Philo to misrepresent them? Nothing is more improbable.

The conclusion, then, is probable that they owed their origin to the introduction and diffusion of Greek culture in the early part of the 2nd cent. B.C. They were in some respects very strict Jews, and even fanatical observers of the Mosaic Law; but in others, notably in their election of their own priests,‡ and in the thereby implied supersession of the Levite hereditary priesthood, and in * E.g. Ant. XVIII. i. 5: τὰδε πρᾶσσουσιν ἄνδρες ὑπὲρ τετρακισχίλιον τὸν ἀριθμὸν ὄντες. Cf. Philo, ii. 457: πλῆθος ὑπὲρ τετρακισχίλιον. It is not likely that their numbers were the same at the very beg. of our era as in A.D. 70. Again Jos. writes (BJ II. viii. 4): τοῖς ἱερωσὶν ἤκουσιν αἰρεσισταῖς παντ' ἀναπίπτουσι τὰ παρ' αὐτοῖς. Cf. Philo (ii. 458): ἀναπίπτουσι καὶ τοῖς ἱερωσὶν ἀρξικονομίοις τῶν ἀμαρτήρων.

† τοῖς δὲ ζηλοῦσιν τὴν αἵρσιν.

* Jos. uses σαββατεῖον (Ant. XVI. vi. 2). It is found in a very early Græco-Jewish papyrus, edited by Mr. B. P. Grenfell, of Oxford.

† τὰ γὰρ πλείστα διὰ συμβόλων ἀρχαιοτρόπῳ ζηλωσὶ παρ' αὐτοῖς φιλοσοφεῖται.

‡ Ant. XVIII. i. 5: ἀποδίκτας τῶν προσδόν χριστοτενοῦντες . . . ἱερὸς δὲ ἐπὶ κοίτῃσι σίτου τι καὶ βρωμάτων. If the Essenes discarded sacrifices, they had no need for priests of the old kind.

their repudiation of animal sacrifices, they were a new departure in Judaism, and very closely akin to Jesus and His disciples.

The literature relating to the Essenes is so vast as to defy detailed reference. The student may be advised to study for himself the very limited documentary sources relating to them, and then to draw his own conclusions.* F. C. CONYBEARE.

ESTATE.—In AV (1611 and mod. edd.) 'estate' occurs 19 times, 'state' 14 times, without difference of meaning; thus Col 4<sup>7</sup> 'All my state (τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ πᾶντα) shall Tychicus declare unto you,' but v.<sup>8</sup> 'that he might know your estate' (TR τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν); and again, Ph 2<sup>19, 20</sup> 'your state' (τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν). Cf. Melville, Diary, 289, 'We fand him in a miserable estate'; Calderwood, History, 144, 'I, Mr. Andrew Melville . . . most earnestly hath prayed at all times, and specially in the foresaid Sermon, for the preservation and prosperous estate of his Majestie.' The meaning is either 'condition' as in those examples, or 'position' as Ps 136<sup>23</sup> 'Who remembered us in our low estate' (קִשְׁקִשְׁנוּ), Ec 1<sup>16</sup> 'I am come to great estate' (הִגְדַּלְתִּי). Cf. T. Elyot, The Governour (Croft's ed. i. 26), 'A man of the base estate of the communalitie'; Calderwood, History, 149, 'They declare how some of low estate, borne to no heritage . . . have crept in favour with the King.' But in Dn 11<sup>7, 20, 21, 33</sup> the meaning seems to be 'high rank,' 'dignity,' as 11<sup>7</sup> 'Out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate.' The Heb. is כֶּן kén, which means 'place' (as RV here) or 'office' (as RVM), and the favourite translation before AV was 'in his stead' (Cov. Gen. Bish.); once, however, the word is translated 'state' (Pr 28<sup>2</sup>, AV and RV). Akin to this meaning is Mk 6<sup>21</sup> 'Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee' (τοῖς πρώτοις, RV 'the chief men'), where, however, the word is used of the men to whom the dignity belongs. Cf. Fuller, Ch. Hist. v. iii. 28, 'Item, that God never gave grace or knowledge of Holy Scripture to any great estate or rich man.' See also Ac 22<sup>3</sup> 'The high priest doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders,' Gr. πᾶν τὸ πρεσβυτέριον, lit. 'all the presbytery,' i.e. the Sanhedrin (which see). Compare Communion Office in Pr. Bk. 1549, 'the whole estate of Christ's Church militant here in earth,' changed in 1552 into 'state.' In Ezk 36<sup>11</sup> 'I will settle you after your old estates,' the plu. is used simply because the ref. is to more than one person; so Pref. to AV 1611, 'support fit for their estates.'

J. HASTINGS.

ESTEEM, ESTIMATION.—'Esteem' and 'estimate' both come from Lat. estimare, the latter directly, the former through Old Fr. estimer. The meaning of estimare is to assign a value, appraise, rate; and that is the meaning of 'estimate' (Heb. תַּחְרִיף) in Lv 27<sup>14 bis</sup>, its only occurrences in EV. 'Estimation' occurs 20 times in the same chapter; elsewhere Lv 5<sup>15, 18, 6<sup>9</sup></sup>, Nu 18<sup>16</sup>, and * Schürer (HJP ii. ii. 188 ff.) has a full record of the literature. The important names are Frankel, 'Die Essäer,' in Zeitschr. für die religiösen Interessen des Judenthums, 1846, 441-461; and 'Die Essäer nach thalud. Quellen,' in Monatschr. für Gesch. u. Wissensch. des Judenth. 1853, 30-40, 61-73; Jost, Gesch. des Judenthums u. seiner Secten, 1857, i. 207-214; Herzfeld, Gesch. des Volkes Isr. (2nd ed. 1863), ii. 363 ff., 388 ff., 509 ff.; Lightfoot in Colossians and Philemon, 82-98, 349-419; same in Dissertationes, 323-407; Lucius, Der Essensismus, 1881; Hilgenfeld, Ketzergesch. des Urchristenthums, 1884, 87-149. Schürer also may be supplemented by adding: Ginsburg in Smith and Wace, Dict. Chr. Biog. 1880; Ohle, 'Die Essäer,' in JPTA (1888) xiv; also 'Die Pseudophilosophischen Essäer und die Therapeuten,' in Beiträge zur Kirchengesch. 1888; Thomson, Books which influenced our Lord, 1889, 75-122; Morrison, Jews under Roman Rule, 1890, 325-347; Cheyne, Origin of the Psalter, 1891, 418-421, 446-449; Cohn in JQ, 1892, 38-42; Friedländer, Zur Entstehungsgesch. des Christenthums, 1894, 98-142; Conybeare, Philo about the Contemplative Life, 1895, 278 ff.—Editor.

always in the same sense as 'estimate,' that is, valuation, price (Heb. תָּקַן). Only once is 'estimation' found in the mod. sense of 'high value,' 'repute,' Wis 8<sup>10</sup> 'For her sake I shall have estimation among the multitude, and honour with the elders, though I be young' (δόξα, RV 'glory').

Cranmer (Works, i. 14) says, 'But to mine estimation, as much as I could view the ground, there was not slain upon both parties two thousand men.' This meaning of 'estimation' is not found in AV, but it is the almost invariable sense in which 'esteem' is used, that is, to esteem is to have an opinion (good or bad), reckon, as in He 10<sup>29</sup> Rhem. 'esteemed the blood of the testament polluted,' where AV and most VSS have 'counted'; and as Knox, Hist. 312, 'he shall be esteemed and holden a seditious person.' Thus Ro 14<sup>5</sup> 'One man esteemeth one day above another: another esteemeth every day alike' (both κρίνει). Then the kind of judgment is expressed by an adverb, 'highly,' 'lightly,' or the like.

Sometimes 'esteem' might appear to be used, like 'estimation,' in the mod. sense of 'think highly of.' But this impression is probably due to the context or the presence of some adverb. Thus Wis 12<sup>7</sup> 'that land which thou esteemest above all other' (ἡ . . . τιμωτάτη γῆ, RV 'is most precious'); Sir 40<sup>25</sup> 'Gold and silver make the foot stand sure; but counsel is esteemed above them both' (ἐυδοκμεῖται); Job 23<sup>12</sup> 'I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food' (תַּחְרִיף, RV 'I have treasured up'), 36<sup>19</sup> 'Will he esteem thy riches?' (תַּחְרִיף). And in particular, Is 53<sup>3</sup> 'He was despised, and we esteemed him not,' is generally taken in the sense of 'highly value'; but the Heb. verb (תָּקַן) is very rare in that sense, and is used in the next verse in its familiar sense of 'reckon'—'we did esteem him stricken.' Cf. Ridley, A Brevé Declaration, 1535 (Moule's ed. p. 101), 'eateth and dryneth his owne damnacion, because he esteemeth not the Lordes body; that is, he reuerenceth not the Lordes bodi with the honour that is due unto him,' where the paraphrase contains more than the translation.

J. HASTINGS.

ESTHER (אֶסְתֵּר, 'Ešthér, Pers. stāra, 'star'), originally named Hadassah (חַדְסָה, 'myrtle').—A Jewess who has given her name to a book of the OT, in which she holds a prominent place. Sprung from a family of the tribe of Benjamin, she spent her life in the Captivity in Persia, where she was brought up in humble circumstances as the orphan ward of her cousin Mordecai (Est 2<sup>5b</sup>). On the deposition of the Pers. queen Vashti for refusing to come at the command of her husband Ahasuerus (Xerxes, B.C. 485-465), 'to show the peoples and the princes her beauty,' on an occasion of high festivity at the court of Susa (1<sup>10a</sup>), E. was selected to fill the vacant place of honour, as the fairest of many beautiful maidens brought before the king (2<sup>8a</sup>). Shortly after her elevation a great disaster threatened her countrymen. The grand vizier, 'Haman the Agagite,' enraged at the refusal of Mordecai to do obeisance to him, accused the whole nation of the Jews to the king as a disloyal and unprofitable people, and undertook to pay 10,000 talents of silver into the treasury as the proceeds of pillaging them. An edict was thereupon issued for the extermination of all Jewish families throughout the empire, and for the confiscation of their property, on a certain day, which Haman had previously determined by lot (ch. 3). In this crisis, moved by the tears of her fellow-countrymen, and incited by Mordecai, who urged her to rise to the great opportunity set before her for the deliverance of her nation, E. (after a fast of three days on the part of the whole Jewish community) resolved to venture uninvited, at the risk of her life, into the presence of Ahasuerus, in order to intercede with him for her people (ch. 4). A gracious reception was accorded to her by the king, who held out the golden sceptre, and agreed to dine with her in her apartments on two consecutive days (ch. 5). On the night preceding the second banquet (at which E. intended to make known her request) it happened by a singular coincidence that there was read to the king, to while away some sleepless hours, a portion of the national archives, which recorded a valuable service rendered by Mordecai in the detection of a plot against the king's life on the part of two of his chamberlains. For this service Mordecai had never been rewarded; and when Haman, elated with the high honour shown him by the queen (who had invited him to the banquet provided for the king), appeared at the palace next morning in order to ask permission to put Mordecai at once to an ignominious death, he was met with the question from the royal lips, 'What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour?' Imagining, in his overweening pride, that it must be himself that was meant, he suggested a triumphal procession, in which one of the chief nobles should act the part of attendant. To his surprise and mortification he found himself called upon to serve in a menial capacity in the triumph of his Jewish adversary (ch. 6). This, as his wife divined, was only the prelude to his downfall, which came to pass next day at the second banquet, when the king, learning for the first time the nationality of the queen, and the distressing position in which the edict had placed her, ordered that Haman should be seized, and hanged forthwith on a lofty gallows which (as the king was at that moment informed by one of his courtiers) had been erected by Haman for the execution of Mordecai (ch. 7). The latter was at the same time raised to the vacant post of honour, and through his influence, and that of E., a second edict was issued and circulated, granting to the Jews the same powers, in the way of self-defence, as had been conferred in the previous edict on their enemies for the purpose of attack,—a direct revocation of the former edict being impossible according to the laws of the Medes and Persians. In consequence of these proceedings a dread of the Jews fell upon all peoples, many proselytes being gained—convinced, apparently, by the logic of events (ch. 8); and when the fatal day arrived, the conflict issued in a great slaughter of their enemies and a decisive victory for the Jews, who, however, waived their right of plunder. To commemorate their great deliverance, the joyful Feast of Purim (which see) was instituted by E. and Mordecai as an annual observance for the whole nation.

How far E. is to be regarded as a historical personage, depends on the historicity of the Book of Est (see below), her name not being mentioned in any other book of the OT, nor anywhere else in pre-Alex. literature. The only queen of Xerxes mentioned by Herodotus (vii. 61, 82, 114; ix. 108–112; cf. Ctesias, 20) is Amestris, a cruel and superstitious woman, whom some (Scaliger, Pfeiffer, Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Bunsen, Shickard, etc.) would identify with Esther. But Amestris was a daughter of a Pers. general connected with the royal family, and the chronology and circumstances of her reign cannot be reconciled with the biblical account either of E. or of Vashti. Xerxes (like his predecessors) may have had more wives than one, but, according to Pers. custom, they must have been taken from some of the great families connected with the throne, or from some other royal house; and the most tenable hypothesis seems to be that E. (as well as Vashti) was merely the chief favourite of the seraglio, gaining a remarkable influence over the foolish and capricious monarch, and using that influence at a critical moment for the benefit of her Jewish compatriots. While there are some things recorded of E. that offend our Christian feeling,—in particular her vindictive treatment of the bodies of Haman's sons (9<sup>7</sup>), and her request for an extension of time to the Jews at Susa for the slaughter of their enemies (9<sup>13</sup>),—regard must be had to the spirit of the age in which she lived, and to the passions that had been excited by Haman's inhuman malignity. On the other hand, her devotion to the cause of her oppressed nationality ('I will go in unto the king; and if I perish, I perish'), and her dutiful bearing towards her foster-father, notwithstanding the sudden rise in her fortunes, explain the honour in which her memory has been held by her countrymen. J. A. M'Clymont.

ESTHER, BOOK OF.—I. CANONICITY.—Est is one of the latest of the Hagiographa or Kethubim, the third and latest accretion of the OT Canon. It may have been among 'the other books of the Fathers' which the Gr. translator of Sir (B.C. 132) mentions (in his Prologue) along with the 'Law and the Prophets' as well known to his grandfather, the author of that book (c. B.C. 180); but this seems unlikely, in view of the fact that neither Esther nor Mordecai is mentioned in the πατέρων ὕμνος towards the close of the book. The earliest undoubted reference to E. is in Jos. (c. Ap. i. 8), who includes it among the 22 books long held sacred (δικαίως θεῖα πεπιστευμένα), as is evident from the terminus ad quem which he assigns to the history (μεχρι τῆς Ἀραξέρξου Περσῶν βασιλείας ἀρχῆς), Artaxerxes being, in Josephus as in the Sept., erroneously identified with Ahasuerus. The secular and foreign character of the book * gave rise among the Jews of the 1st and 2nd cent. of the Christian era to questionings as to its right to a place in the Canon. In the Jerus. Talm. (Meg. 70. 4) there is a statement that 85 elders, including more than 30 prophets, had scruples about the recognition of the Feast of Purim (at which the Book of Est was publicly read) because there was no sanction for it in the law of Moses; and elsewhere (Bab. Meg. 7a) we find traces of various difficulties felt by Rabbis as to the full inspiration of the book. It appears certain, however, that it formed an integral part of the Jewish Canon when the latter was virtually, if not formally, closed at the Councils of Jerus. and Jamnia in the 1st cent. A.D., as the same books that are in our OT are implied (numerically) in ch. 14 of 2 Es, which was written in end of 1st cent., and are embodied in the Mishna, committed to writing by R. Judah I. about A.D. 200. Breathing a spirit of intense patriotism, the book soon became popular with the Jews, and its annual reading in the synagogue was accompanied with lively tokens of sympathy on the part of the congregation, while the reader pronounced the names of Haman's 10 sons in one breath to indicate that they all expired at the same moment, the names being written by the scribes in large letters in 3 perpendicular lines of 3, 3, 4 to signify that the 10 men were hung on 3 parallel cords. Although the last of the 5 Megilloth or Rolls which were read at 5 different feasts,† it came to be known as the Roll (Megillah) par excellence, and we may judge of the honour in which it was held from a saying of Maimonides (Carpzov, Intr. xx. § 6), that in the days of the Messiah the only Scriptures left would be the Law and the Roll. The excessive love which the Jews

* The name of God is never mentioned in it, but the king of Persia 187 times, and his kingdom 26 times; while the nearest approach to any recognition of religion is to be found in the fasting of 416, and possibly also in the confidence expressed in 414.

† The order is different in the Eng. Bible, as also in the Sept and Vulg., where Est closes the historical books.

have ever shown for this book (of which Ewald has said that in passing to it from the other books of the OT 'we fall, as it were, from heaven to earth') illustrates their complete surrender to the spirit of the age in which it was produced. It was an age that had fallen out of sympathy with the teaching of the prophets, and was unprepared for the spiritual conception of the gospel,—when national pride and a certain faith in their own fortunes as a people, with a disposition to make the most of their heathen masters by the use of such worldly wisdom as they possessed, seem to have formed the chief characteristics of those who still claimed to be God's people.

In the Christian Church the book has naturally been less esteemed. It is one of the few books of the OT that are not quoted in the NT (nor in Philo). It has no place in the Canon of Melito of Sardis, who had made careful inquiry among the Jews of Syria regarding the books of the OT; of Theodore of Mopsuestia (followed by the Nestorians); of Athanasius, who put it in the second rank among the ἀναγινωσκόμενα; of Amphilochius, who mentions that 'some add the Book of Esther'; of Gregory of Naz., and others. Junilius in the 6th cent. mentions that there were grave doubts on the subject in his day; while Luther, after referring to 2 Mac, says (Tischreden), 'I have so little favour for this book and the Book of Est that I wish they did not exist; they are too Judaizing, and contain many heathenish improprieties.' In some of these cases, however, it may have been the corrupt Sept. transl. that caused suspicion, while in others it is possible that Est may be included under the name of Ezra or some other book. Est is recognized as canonical by Origen, Cyril of Jerus., Jerome (who puts it last in the list), Augustine, and others. We may also reckon it an indirect testimony to the authority of the book in the beginning of the Christian era, that, according to 2 Mac (15<sup>36</sup>), 'Mordecai's day' (ἡμέρα Μαρδοχαίου), doubtless the Feast of Purim, was observed in the writer's lifetime. The fact that it has a place (in an enlarged form) in the Sept., with an epilogue stating that the tr. was brought (to Alexandria) by one Dositheus in the 4th year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, is regarded by some as a proof that the book existed in its Gr. form as early as B.C. 178, in the reign of Ptolemy VI. (Philometor), who was friendly to the Jews. But there were two later kings of that name, and one earlier (B.C. 204–81), whose wives were called Cleopatra; and the inference is doubtful, even admitting the authenticity of the statement in question (Riehm, HWB; Fritzsche, Handb. z. d. Apoc. i.). While the Heb. text is good, there are large interpolations in the Sept., of which there are two different texts, A and B, the latter, according to Lagarde, Field, etc., being an improved recension of the 3rd cent. These interpolations contradict the Heb. in several particulars,* and betray their later Gr. origin by representing Haman as a Macedonian who sought to transfer the sovereignty from the Persians to the Macedonians (16<sup>10-13</sup>), and by other inconsistencies and anachronisms,† and were, no doubt, the work of successive Hellenistic writers desirous to give a religious character to the book,‡ and to supplement other apparent defects.§ In the Vulg. these additions are all put by Jerome at the end of the book, beginning with a portion that takes up the narrative where the Heb. ends—with notes to show where the other additions occur in the Sept.

* Cf. 22 and Ad. Est 112<sup>ff.</sup>, 63 and 125, 31.5 and 126, 912 and 1518. † For example, 'month Adar' 1620, 'chosen people' 1621, 'Hades' 137, 'I am thy brother' 159, 'Aman's table', 'drink offerings' 147.

‡ Ad. Est 109. 10. 11. 12. 13 1110 139-18 143-9 1528 164. 16.

§ For example, by giving the terms of the royal edicts, which are not at all Oriental in style, 131-7 16.

In the RV Eng. Apoc. (where they are similarly combined under the name of 'The Rest of the Chapters of the Bk. of Esther') these explanations are given in the margin.

Owing to the influence of the Sept. and Vulg. (in the Syr. they have no place) the additions were often read in church, and even regarded as canonical (in common with other Apoc. books of OT), receiving the sanction of several Ch. Councils, from that of Carthage in 397 to the Council of Trent in 1546. They are composed of the following passages—the twofold references showing where they stand in the Sept. and the Rest of Est respectively:—(1) Mordecai's pedigree, dream, and detection of conspiracy, with his immediate reward, exciting Haman's wrath (Intr.; 122-126). (2) Terms of the king's writ, authorizing the destruction of the Jews (after 313 131-7). (3) Prayers of Mordecai and Est (after 4; 138-142). (4) Fuller account of Est's first intercession with the king (in place of 51.2 15). (5) Terms of the king's writ, authorizing the Jews to defend themselves (after 813 16). (6) Mordecai's devout interpretation of his dream in the light of events, and his permanent institution of the Feast of Purim, followed by epilogue regarding the Gr. tr. (End; 104-13 111). In Josephus we can trace other additions to the story not found in the Sept., which shows the popularity of the subject, and the tendency to embroider the Heb. narrative with Alex. inventions. Similar embellishments are to be found in the 'first' and 'second' Chaldaean Targums or commentaries, independent of the Gr. additions, which only found their way into the Midrashim at a much later time through the medium of the writings ascribed to Josippon ben-Gorion (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge; Fritzsche, as above).

II. HISTORICITY.—On this subject the most diverse opinions have been held. Many old and a few modern writers* maintain the narrative to be thoroughly historical. But an increasing number† hold it to be more or less a work of imagination; while some‡ regard it as a poetical invention, having no appreciable basis of fact to rest on.

The following are the principal arguments for the historical character of the book.—(1) The narrative claims to be historical, referring more than once to 'the chronicles' of Persia as containing a record of the events in question (10<sup>2</sup> 223 61); and its admission to the Pal. Canon, notwithstanding the absence of any allusion to the Holy Land or to Jewish ordinances, is so far a confirmation of its claim. (2) The Feast of Purim, with which it was so closely connected as to be known among Alex. writers as 'the Epistle of Purim,' and which, in the time of Jos. (Ant. XI. vi. 13) was observed by Jews in all parts of the world, is a standing memorial of the remarkable episode in Jewish history which the book records. (3) Its lifelike representation of Pers. manners and customs, especially in connexion with the palace at Susa (15. 10. 14 23. 21. 23 37. 12. 13 46. 11 54 88), is borne out by the results of modern travel and research (Rawlinson's Anc. Monarchies, iv. pp. 269-287; Morier, Fergusson, Loftus, Dielafoy), and finds support in Herodotus and other ancient writers. (4) The conduct of Ahasuerus is in harmony with the vain, capricious, passionate character of Xerxes (the identification of the two names was the first result obtained from the deciphering of the cuneiform inscriptions by Grotefend in 1802), as depicted by heathen writers (Herod. vii. ix.; Æsch. Pers. 467 ff.; Juv. x. 174-187); and this may account for some things in the narrative that would otherwise seem almost incredible. (5) It appears from

* Kelle, Vindiciae Est.; Hävernick, Einleitung; Baumgarten, De Fide Lib. Est.; Welte, Einleitung; Keil, Einleitung; Hervey, Smith's DB; Nickes, De Est. Lib.; Cassel, Kom.; Rawlinson, Speaker's Com.; Wordsworth, Com.; J. Oppert, Annales Phil. Chrét., and Revue des Ét. J. n. 1894; J. W. Haley, Bk. of Est.; and, in the main, F. W. Schultz, Lange's Com.; and Orelli, PRE, art. 'Esther.'

† Eichhorn, Einleitung; De Wette, Einleitung; Bleek, Einleitung; Winer, Bibl. RWB i.; Dillmann in Schenkel's Bibellez. art. 'Purim'; Ewald, Gesch. Isr.; Stähelin, Einleitung; Ryssel-Bertheau, Exeg. Handb.; Oettli, S. u. Z. Kg. Kom.; Davidson, Introduction; Hitzig, Gesch. Isr.; Herzfeld, Gesch. Isr.; Stanley, Jewish Ch.; Driver, LOT 449 ff.; Cheyne, Enc. Brit. art. 'Esther'; König, Einleitung.

‡ Semler, Appar. VT; Bertholdt, Einleitung; Kuenen, Relig. Isr., and Onderz. 2 i. 551 ff. (Hist. Crit. vol. i.); Nöldeke, Alttest. Lit.; Reuss, Gesch. AT; Zunz, ZDMG, 1893; Grätz, MGWJ, 1886; Bloch, 'Hel. Bestandth. im Bib. Schr.', Jüd. Lit. BL, 1877; Cornill, Einleit.; Bertholet, Die Stellung der Isr.

Herod. vii. 8 that Xerxes held a great council of war in the third year of his reign before setting out for Greece, and that he returned to Susa in the spring of his seventh year,—which agrees with the dates assigned to the great feast and the choice of a successor to Vashti (1<sup>3</sup> 2<sup>19</sup>). (6) Although the narrative is minute and circumstantial, containing many names (of courtiers, princes, 10 sons of Haman, etc., 1<sup>10</sup>, 14 9<sup>7-9</sup>) as well as other details, it is remarkably free from literary and historical discrepancies, such as have been detected in the Apocr. books of To and Jth and Ad. Est. According to Oppert, there is not a single proper name that may not be regarded as belonging to the idiom of Cyrus and of Darius, and after the conquests of Alexander such writing was philologically impossible. (7) The silence of contemporary and later writings regarding the events narrated in the Bk. of Est is partly due to the disappearance of literature bearing on the history of Persia, and partly to the interest of Herodotus and Ctesias being centred in the points of contact between Persia and Greece. As for the Bk. of Ezra, it leaves the period from B.C. 516 to 459 (between chs. 6 and 7) a blank, except in 4<sup>5</sup>, 6.

On the other hand, the following are the chief objections that have been taken to the historicity of the book. (1) The story bears on the face of it the appearance of a historical romance, a number of its features being in themselves extremely improbable, e.g. the six months' feast, involving such prolonged absence of the governors from their duties in the provinces; the summons of Vashti before the assembled peoples and princes, and the subsequent decree, suggested by 'the wise men,' that every man should bear rule in his own house, which would have been the publication of Ahasuerus' folly; the long interval before the choice of Vashti's successor; the decree for the wholesale massacre of the Jews (not excepting those in Judaea, and numbering probably two millions) on account of the obstinacy of a single Jew; the publication of this decree eleven months before the time for its execution; the issue of a subsequent decree virtually sanctioning civil war; the immense slaughter of the Persians notwithstanding their superiority in numbers, and the wonderful preservation of Jewish lives, as well as the absence of revenge on the part of the Persians; the institution by Mordecai and E. of a feast that would perpetuate the disgrace of the sovereign in the eyes of his subjects, and embitter the relations between Jew and Persian (but cf. the annual commemoration of the massacre of the Magians, Herod. iii. 79—with which Niebuhr was disposed to connect the story). Add to this that the series of coincidences and contrasts culminating in the overthrow of Haman 'the Agagite' (1 S 15—but Oppert connects this name with Agaz, a tribe of Media mentioned in the inscriptions of Sargon) and the exaltation of Mordecai of the tribe of Benjamin, is too perfect to have been drawn from real life. (2) The manifest aim of the writer is to encourage and glorify the Jews; and the whole narrative, which is marked by exaggeration and innuendo, is artfully designed to serve that purpose (2<sup>15</sup>, 17, 22 32, 15 4<sup>14</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, 11, 13 7<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>3</sup>, 15, 17 9<sup>16</sup> 10). (3) The references to 'the chronicles' may be merely a rhetorical device in imitation of similar allusions in Neh and Ezr (in this connexion it is noteworthy that the terms of the royal edicts are not given); or the sources referred to may be like the Bab.-Pers. chronicles, from which Ctesias professes to have derived information—the story being 'an example of Jewish Haggada founded upon one of those semi-historical tales of which the Pers. chronicles seem to have been full' (Sayce, HCM p. 475). (4) A strictly historical interpretation of the narrative is beset with difficulties. Neither Vashti nor Esther can be identified with Amestris, the only queen (judging from Herodotus and Ctesias) that Xerxes ever had. Nor is it easy to reconcile Ahasuerus' and Haman's ignorance of Esther's nationality with the frequent presence of Mordecai (who was known to be a Jew, 3<sup>4</sup>) 'in the king's gate,' and his constant communications with Esther. Moreover, Haman's description of the Jews (3<sup>8-9</sup>), as 'dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom,' and of their disobedience to 'the king's laws,' is not true of the Pers. period (especially so early as the reign of Xerxes), and betrays a Maced.-Greek origin, as does also the stress laid on financial considerations (cf. 9<sup>10</sup>), and the part taken against the Jews by 'their enemies' (9<sup>5</sup>, 16, 22). (5) In several respects the writer's knowledge of Pers. customs is alleged to be defective (Grätz in MGWJ, Dec. 1886), e.g. the '127 provinces,' cf. the '20 satrapies' of Herod. iii. 89; the command to 'kneel' (כרע) before Haman, an act of worship due to God only and the king, while the refusal to 'do him reverence' by prostration (השתחוה=προσκυνεῖν) betrays a Gr. spirit of independence at variance with Gn 23<sup>7</sup> 33<sup>3</sup> (cf. Herod. vii. 136); the un-Oriental toleration so long shown to Mordecai by the vizier; the queen's difficulty of gaining access to the royal presence; the alleged Semitic character of some of the proper names, suspiciously profuse, and very few of which occur elsewhere; and Mordecai's obscurity, notwithstanding his officially-recorded services to the king (2<sup>23</sup>, cf. Herod. viii. 85). Even admitting the general consistency of the narrative, both with itself and with Pers. surroundings, this is held to be sufficiently accounted for by consummate dramatic skill on the part of the writer, and his possessing such a knowledge of Persia and its ancient régime as was attainable by a Jew who had lived in that country or even in Palestine in the Maced.-Gr. period. (6) The true explanation of the silence of ancient Jewish writers (Ch, Ezr, Neh, Sir, Dn, Philo) as well as of profane writers, is held to lie in the fact that no such facts as those related in the Bk. of Est ever took place. (7) The Heb. of the book, which closely resembles that of Ec, belongs to a much later time than that of Xerxes; and the way in which the writer explains Pers. customs (1<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>8</sup>) seems to imply that the Pers. rule was over, while his description of Ahasuerus, and of his wide dominions, and the magnificence of his court, gives the impression that he is recalling the glories of a bygone age. (8) In answer to the argument from the Feast of Purim, it is alleged that the story of Est was engrafted on a festival already in vogue among the Jews, borrowed from a Pers. or a Gr. source, for the purpose of promoting its wider observance or imparting to it a more national character; and various attempts have been made to trace it to a definite heathen source. None of these attempts, however (art. PURIM), can be said to be successful, and the connexion of the book with such an ancient Jewish observance still forms a considerable presumption in favour of its being founded on facts. It may be that fresh confirmation of its truth will be found in some of the monumental discoveries which still await the explorer, and that the suspicion attaching to its contents will yet be removed.

III. DATE AND AUTHORSHIP.—The date generally assigned to the book by those who maintain it to be historical is somewhere in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the successor of Xerxes (B.C. 464-425), or a little later; while most of those who regard the story as more or less of a legend or romance bring its composition down to the Gr. period, say in the 3rd cent. B.C. Hitzig traces its composition (as well as the introduction of Purim) to the Parthian ascendancy after B.C. 238, and in the description of the Jews in 3<sup>8</sup> he finds evidence that it was written subsequently to the colonizing activity of Seleucus Nikator. Others (Reuss, Grätz, Bloch, etc.) give it a still later date, tracing it to the time of the Maccabean revolt (B.C. 167). Bloch regards it as an attempt to justify the Jewish party at the Gr. court, who thought they could best promote the interests of their country by conciliating the heathen power; but with this it is difficult to reconcile Mordecai's attitude towards Haman, or the slaughter of Pers. women and children and its commemoration. Grätz assigns the book to an adherent of the Maccabean party, and, with the ingenuity of a special pleader, presents a great array of arguments to prove that Ahasuerus represents Antiochus (with some intentional vagueness as to the identity of Ah. himself), and that the book was intended to appeal to those who, like the deputies to Tyre (2 Mac 4<sup>18-20</sup>), were disposed to resist the king's attempt to force them into idolatry, although they had very little religion of their own,—hinting at the influences which they might bring to bear upon the king, and at a possible turn in the wheel of fortune,—much as the Bk. of Dn was meant, a year or two later, to tell upon the more devout (Hasidim), who still believed in the possibility of direct divine interpositions. Kuenen and Cornill find in it an echo of the same struggle (cf. 3<sup>8</sup> and 1 Mac 1<sup>41</sup> 3<sup>34</sup>, 3<sup>35</sup>) after it was over (B.C. 135), when religious heroism had given place to animosity and pride. Similarly, Zunz believes it to have been an Eastern reflex (c. B.C. 130) of the Maccabean enthusiasm, and lays stress on the lateness and servility of the language, as well as on the want of any recognition of the Jewish community as a whole, Mordecai and Esther being the only Jews who are credited with any influence. But the language, though late, is very far from exhibiting the stage represented by the Mishna;* and as regards the supposed Maccabean origin for the story, it must be remembered that even under the Pers. rule (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22) there had been times when the Jews suffered persecution for their attachment to their faith. That the book was written by a Persian Jew may fairly be inferred from its tone and structure, notwithstanding Grätz' denial that the use of Heb. for literary purposes was possible outside of Palestine, except during the Bab. Captivity. It is vain, however, to attempt to determine the authorship more particularly. The references to Mordecai's writing in 9<sup>20-32</sup> have given rise to the idea that he may have been the author; but the peculiarities of the passage, both in language and contents, stamp it as an interpolation or interpolations (vv. 20-28 29-32), perhaps borrowed from another book of Purim (v. 32). Moreover, some of the allusions to Mordecai (e.g. 9<sup>3</sup>-4) preclude the idea of his being the writer. All that can be said with confidence is that it was written by a Jew connected with Persia, and full of the nationalist feeling of his time, the absence of religious phraseology being due partly to the decline in the spiritual life of the nation, occasioned by centuries of exposure to heathen influences, leading to reserve in the expression of religious sentiment, partly to the secular character of the Feast of Purim associated with it, which rested on no divine authority, and was marked by a gay conviviality, varied with an occasional outburst of passion that was not favourable to religious solemnity. See further under PURIM.

* At the same time it must be admitted that, even after the Mishna style was formed, books in imitation of the classical style were written, otherwise Ec would have to be placed long after Sirach.

LITERATURE.—Driver, LOT 449 ff.; Cheyne, art. 'Esther' in Encyc. Brit. (1878), Founders of OT Criticism, 359 ff.; Kuenen, Onderzoek 2, 551 ff.; Zimmern in ZAW, 1891, p. 168; Lagarde, Purim; Jacob in ZAW, 1890, p. 241 ff.; Dieulafoy in Rev. d. Et. Ju. 1888; Sayce, Ezr. Neh. and Est., also HCM p. 469 ff.; Cornill, Eintleitung, 253 ff. 281 ff. 308; Ryle, Canon of OT, 139, 205; Wildeboer, Die Lit. d. AT, 444 ff.; Schwalli, Leben n. d. Tode, p. 42 ff.; Bertheau, Ezr. Neh. u. Est. (in Kgf. Hdb.) 1862, 2nd ed. by V. Ryssel, 1887; Oettli (in Strack and Zöckler's Kgf. Kom. 1889, p. 227 ff.); Reuss, AT vii. 193 ff. See also references in footnotes above.

J. A. M'Clymont.

ESTHER (Apocryphal).—See preceding article.

ESYELUS (Ἑσῆλος, B<sup>ab</sup> ἡ σύνοδος, AV Syelus) 1 Es 1<sup>8</sup>=Jehiel.—One of the rulers of the temple in Josiah's time (2 Ch 35<sup>8</sup>).

ETAM (עֲתָם, possibly 'place of birds of prey,' from עֵץ 'bird of prey').—It is uncertain whether there may not have been two places so called in Judah. The town Etam (1 Ch 4<sup>3</sup>, 3<sup>2</sup>) was in Simeon, near Rimmon. It may be the place fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11<sup>6</sup>), though there noticed with Bethlehem and Tekoa. The Rock Etam (Jg 15<sup>8</sup>, 11) was Samson's refuge, and had in it a peculiar 'fissure' (קֶרֶן) or 'cavern' (AV 'top'). In the Talm. an Etam near Bethlehem is noticed (see Neubauer, Geog. Talm. s.v.). These may represent three distinct sites. 1. Etam of Simeon is very clearly the ruin 'Atân near Rimmon of Simeon, on the hills N.W. of Beersheba. SWP vol. iii. sheet xxiv. 2. Etam near Bethlehem is represented by the present 'Atân; at the so-called Pools of Solomon (Rom. reservoirs connected with Pilate's aqueduct to Jerus.), the traditional site of the 'sealed fountain' (Ca 4<sup>12</sup>), identified by the Rabbis with Nephtoah. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. 3. The Rock Etam is an undefined site, but may have been near Samson's home at Zorah. There is a remarkable rocky hill to the E., on which the village Beit 'Atâb now stands, under which is a curious cavern in the rock. The change of B for M is not uncommon (cf. TIMNAH), and this is a possible site for Samson's refuge. SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.

LITERATURE.—Besides the above, see Robinson, BRP 2 i. 477; Guérin, Judee, iii. 117 f., 303; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. 3 134 f.; Schick, ZDPV i. 152 f.; PEFS, 1875, 12; 1876, 175; 1878, 116; 1881, 43, 323; Conder, Tent-Work, i. 275 ff.; Moore, Judges, 342 ff.

C. R. CONDER.

ETHAM (עֲתָם, LXX Ὀθῆμα, Ex 13<sup>20</sup>; Βουθάν, Nu 33<sup>8-7</sup>). The Coptic has πελωμα, Ex 13<sup>20</sup> [Wilkins], and εβουθαι [Wilkins], εβουθαν [Sah. Ciasca]. LXX and Cop. omit Etham in Nu 33<sup>8</sup>.—The station at which the Israelites arrived after leaving Succoth. It is described (Ex 13<sup>20</sup>, Nu 33<sup>6</sup>), as being 'on the edge of the wilderness.' This wilderness (called W. of Etham, Nu 33<sup>8</sup>, and W. of Shur, Ex 15<sup>22</sup>) was traversed by the Israelites after crossing the sea. It must therefore be east of the Isthmus of Suez, and Etham would be on its W. edge. If on leaving Egypt the Israelites went along Wady Tumilat [see EXODUS (ROUTE OF), § i.], they would make for the broad tract of dry ground to the N. of Lake Timsah, and the position of Etham would be where their route crossed the Egyp. frontier, i.e. in the neighbourhood of the modern Ismailia. Naville places Etham here, but explains the word as designating the land of Atuma, which is mentioned in the papyrus Anastasi vi. The land of Atuma there mentioned is generally supposed to be the land of Edom. See PHAHIROTH and the Literature under EXODUS (ROUTE OF), § ii. [Brugsch's 'Exodus and the Egyptian Monuments' may be read in English in vol. ii. of the translation (1879) of his Egypt under the Pharaohs, or in New Ed. (1891, in one vol.) p. 318 ff.]. A. T. CHAPMAN.

ETHAN (עֲתָן).—1. 'THE EZRAHIE' of 1 K 4<sup>21</sup> and Ps 89 (title). In the first of these passages he is mentioned along with other contemporaries(?) of Solomon, who were all surpassed in wisdom by the Jewish monarch. In 1 Ch 2<sup>6</sup> he is said to have been a Judæan of the family of Zerah, which is prob. another form of Ezrah (hence the patronymic Ezrahite). Instead of 'the Ezrahite' it has been proposed to render עֲרָזִי of 1 K 4<sup>21</sup> 'the native,' i.e. the Israelite, in opposition to some of the other wise men named, who were foreigners (Cheyne, Job and Solomon, p. 131). The ascribing of Ps 89 to E. occasioned one of the curiosities of Rabbinical exegesis. עֲרָזִי was connected with קֶרֶחַ (the east), then 'the man from the east' of Is 41<sup>2</sup> was interpreted of Abraham, and Ethan the Ezrahite was identified with the patriarch, who thus became the author of the psalm (Driver, LOT p. xxxiii, n.). 2. An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6<sup>42</sup>). In v. 2<sup>1</sup> he is called Joah. 3. The eponymous ancestor of a guild of temple-singers (mentioned along with Heman and Asaph in 1 Ch 6<sup>44</sup> 15<sup>17, 19</sup> etc.). His genealogy is traced by the Chronicler back to Merari, one of the sons of Levi. He is generally identified with Jeduthun. (See JEDUTHUN.) J. A. SELBIE.

ETHANIM (עֲתָנִים, 'Αθαμίν B, 'Αθαμίν A, Ethanīm, 1 K 8<sup>9</sup>). See TIME.

ETHANUS, one of the 'swift scribes' who wrote to the dictation of Ezra (2 Es 14<sup>24</sup>). The name occurs in the MSS variously as Ecanus, Echanus, Elkana, etc.

ETHBAAL (עֶתְבָּאֵל 'with Baal,' i.e. enjoying his favour and protection; 'Ετεβάαλ B, 'Ιεβάαλ A, 'Ιεθβάαλ Luc.).—King of the Sidonians, and father of Jezebel wife of Ahab king of Israel (1 K 16<sup>24</sup>).

According to Jos., Itobaal ('Ιθόβαλος, Εθόβαλος, i.e. Εὐθόβαλ 'Baal is with him,' a form of the name preferred by Thénius, Stade, etc.) was king of the Tyrians and Sidonians (Ant. VIII. xiii. 1), and is stated by Menander the Ephesian to have been a priest of Astarte who attained to the throne by the murder of the usurper Phelles (C. Ap. i. 18). This identification with the Ethbaal of K is allowed by moderns. The Taylor cylinder, col. ii. 48, mentions a later king of Sidon of the same name; Assy. Tuba'lu (Schrader, COT, on Gn 10<sup>15</sup>).

C. F. BURNLEY.

ETHER (אֶתֶר), Jos 15<sup>42</sup> 19<sup>7</sup>.—A town of Judah noticed with Libnah, apparently near the plain of Philistia, given to Simeon, and near Rimmon. The site is unknown.

ETHICS.—The treatment of this subject is involved in a certain amount of difficulty, from the fact that while the ethical character of the whole Jewish dispensation is strongly and unmistakably marked, there is no ethical system, strictly so called, in the Bible at all. The ethical ideas, like the metaphysical ideas, underlie the histories, the prophecies, the legislation, and the writings of the apostles; they are not deduced or criticised, but assumed as premises. For such a purpose as that of the present article they have to be extracted and presented systematically; and there is always danger that when this is done some greater precision of definition may be given to the ideas than they really possessed.

There is another difficulty, even greater than this, which arises from the critical discussions recently raised over the authorship and date of books. This presses more hardly on the student of OT ideas than of Christianity. For even if the date of individual books of the NT be uncertain, the margin of uncertainty is comparatively narrow; and the period within which they all must fall is, comparatively speaking, a short one. Hence critical questions may be neglected without any serious loss. But with the OT it is different. We can no longer take for granted the traditional order or date of the books; and, what is much more serious, the period within which they must all have been written is a very long one, so that it would be unreasonable to expect that the ethical point of view can have suffered no serious change. It is obviously impossible to discuss the various critical questions by the way. We can only call attention to the part they play in the whole discussion of our present subject, and then leave them aside. The plan of the present article is, then, to set forth the ethical ideas in the Bible, as far as possible, without reference to the literary history of the books, following such order as the subject itself seems to require.

I. IN THE OT AND APOCRYPHA.—The first point requiring attention is one of great importance, which will have decisive significance in regard to our whole subject-matter. With the partial exception (considered later) of the Sapiential Books, the whole of the Jewish Scriptures are under the sway of religion. The ruling idea of life was conditioned by the prevalent conception of God, and the peculiar relation in which the Jewish people stood towards Him. Hence the larger portion of the discussions with which other ethical writings have made us familiar, has no place whatever in Jewish literature. Greek ethical speculation busied itself with the questions of the end of life, or the ideal order of life, or the nature of virtue, or the sanction of the moral law. But to the Jewish mind all these questions were prejudged by the peculiarly close relation of religion with life. The God they worshipped was to the Jews the source and the sanction of the moral law. Their moral evolution consisted in their gradual discovery of the full meaning of their primary ethical conviction. Their notion of the content of the ethical idea varied as time went on; their history is, in a sense, reflected in their ethical evolution. Things which at one time were thought compatible with the due worship of God, cease to be thought so; but the general relation in which they stand to God remains undisturbed: morality is, to them, the embodied will of God.

It follows necessarily from this that there are, roughly speaking, two, and only two, questions for the Jewish moralists. (1) What conduct does God command? (2) What conduct does God forbid? Why He ordains or prohibits one or another line of conduct does not matter to them. They are concerned only with the fact. The answers to these remoter questions may, to some extent, be revealed in the process of moral evolution, but they are not of primary interest or importance. The central question is that of the actual content of the divine law.

It might seem, at first sight, as if this theory of the moral law must exclude a people from any marked development in ethical matters. The most cursory glance, however, at the actual facts would destroy this supposition. The law of God is adapted to various stages in the progress of the people, and enforces the morality characteristic of the stage at which they are. It is obvious that this must necessarily have been the case. If, as the Jews believed, God Himself revealed the moral law to them, it must necessarily have been in terms which they could understand. It would have been idle, for instance, to promulgate to a nation, as yet only in the tribal stage of its existence, a law which assumed the existence of settled civic ideas. Thus the conviction of the special union of God with His people, and interest in their moral life, affects the character of the evolution of ethical ideas, but does not prevent their real growth.

(A) The Pentateuch and the Historical Books.—The note of law is struck in the account of Paradise and the Fall. In this story we have all the elements of the ethical idea as it presented itself to the Jews. God gave a command which man disobeyed. In like manner the sin which led to the Flood was disobedience or rebellion against God. The law of murder, enacted after the Flood has disappeared, is given as a definite act of legislation on the part of God (Gn 9<sup>4-7</sup>). In the same way the sin of Sodom is represented as an outrage upon God; and the destruction of the cities as the judgment of God. When we reach the times of Abraham the same phenomena appear in a more complex form. The intercourse between God and man, of which the covenant after the Flood was typical, is concentrated and intensified in the relation of God with Abraham. A demand is made for a more complete and detailed obedience; and the rite of circumcision has a special significance assigned to it. The special covenant is based on the readiness of Abraham to accept the guidance of God; cf. Gn 17<sup>1-2</sup>. 'The LORD appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am God Almighty: walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.' The same idea of a covenant is sustained throughout the whole history between Abraham and Moses; the people are regarded as standing in a peculiar relation to God, and bound by it to certain lines of conduct. The protection and interest of God in the chosen family is represented as a thing which they are bound to cherish with the greatest care, and it is implied throughout that the arrangement is part of a larger scheme. The sin of Esau consists in the neglect of this covenant right of access to God; and the blessing of Jacob consists in his fitness to be the vehicle of the covenant-relation, rather than in any commendation bestowed upon his own character.

Whatever may be the literary history of the books in which this story is preserved, there is no doubt that it represents the belief of the Jewish people, and, that being so, it characterized their ethical ideas. But it is important to notice also the area of moral action covered by the commands of God. We have already noticed the prohibition of murder, and the condemnation of Sodom. Apart from these, the morality consistent with the stage of civilization so far attained is implicitly permitted. There is no condemnation of polygamy; the fraud of Abraham upon Abimelech is not condemned, though its uselessness is displayed by the action of God; and, in like manner, Jacob's fraud upon Isaac is shown to be unprofitable by the fact of his exile. At the same time the witness of God is sought in order to preserve the validity of treaties (Gn 26<sup>7-10</sup>), and His worship is regarded as distinct from that of many other deities. There is little sign at present of any elaborate moral reform depending on the covenant-relation; and the morality of the people as it is described is strictly governed by principles which prevail in the patriarchal stage. What is new and has the germs of much of the future development in it, is the intensification of the idea of the tribal God. The relation asserted between God and the family of Abraham is peculiarly close and far-reaching in its character; and the ground is prepared for the substitution of a moral for a physical or tribal basis of the covenant.

The next stage in the history as it is presented in the OT books is marked by the Levitical legislation. It is here, probably, that the difficulties caused by critical discussions reach their highest point. In pursuance of our plan we shall describe, first, the facts of the legislation as they stand, and reserve such discussion as there is space for, of the bearing of criticism upon the matter. Under the head of the Mosaic legislation we have to consider the Decalogue, the Priestly Code, and the Deuteronomic exposition of the Mosaic law. This will involve a brief consideration of the meaning and character of Sacrifice, and the meaning of Sin.

Of the Decalogue it is not necessary to say much. We need only call attention to the fact that it consists of two distinct parts: one containing prohibitions concerning man's relations to God, the other dealing more directly with ordinary social questions. The Decalogue throws comparatively little light on the condition of society at the time of its promulgation. It deals with acts forbidden before, such as murder and idolatry; but its last three sections imply the existence of a settled mode of life different from that of the patriarchal family. Theft, false witness, and covetous desire belong to a social state in which there existed within the social whole various houses or families holding property. The process of ἐνοικισμός must have taken place; but beyond this there is nothing that can be said definitely. It is, however, important to notice that the commandments come with the imprimatur of God upon them, and that the covenant-relation is alluded to in the prefatory verse as it stands in Ex 20<sup>2</sup>: 'I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.'

The Priestly Code consists of a number of regulations which are largely ceremonial in character. The laws of ceremonial uncleanness and other kindred matters are precisely defined: the great occasions of the ecclesiastical year are ordained, and the ritual due to them established. Further, the various types of sacrifice are described, the occasions on which they are to be performed, and the method of performing them. In regard to the whole of this legislation, we need only for our present purpose to call attention to two points. In the first place, it is important to observe that the whole order is rested upon the covenant-relation with God, and, more than this, that the character of God is placed in definite connexion with the rules laid down. The holiness of God requires this elaborate ceremonial order to preserve it from the contamination of hasty and unfit intruders, and to retain the condition of the people at a level high enough to enable them to use their covenant privileges. This is proved by the refrain which recurs at intervals in the course of Leviticus—'I am the LORD'; and by such marked phrases as the following: 'Ye shall not profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel; I am the LORD which hallow you, that brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God; I am the LORD' (Lv 22<sup>32-33</sup>). But, in the second place, it is no less important to notice the extraordinarily limited moral range of the laws enacted. In Lv 6 there is a short list of moral delinquencies which require the atonement of a guilt offering. These consist chiefly of broken pledge and other forms of dishonest dealing. Besides this there are sacrifices ordained for sins of ignorance: 'If any one shall sin unwittingly, in any of the things which the LORD hath commanded not to be done, and shall do any one of them; and if the anointed priest shall sin so as to bring guilt upon the people' (Lv 4<sup>2-3</sup>). If we are justified in referring this command to the legislation which appears in Exodus, it will include a certain number of other moral delinquencies. Thus, besides the Decalogue, there are regulations concerning assault and murder, the proper treatment of slaves, the relations of parents and children, and specially concerning idol-worship and magic. Besides these there are ordinances referring to lost property; the duty of actively aiding the restoration of straying animals is inculcated; the poor are remembered, and severe condemnations passed upon those who judge unjustly. The service for the Day of Atonement is placed in close connexion with the unwarranted intrusion of the sons of Aaron into the presence of the Lord (Lv 16<sup>1</sup>), and is apparently intended to do away with ceremonial breaches of the covenant-relation, though the ritual would lend itself easily to a deeper meaning. See ATONEMENT (DAY OF).

The legislation in the Book of Deuteronomy, as it stands at present, covers a good deal of the ground of the preceding books. It repeats and further develops laws elsewhere laid down. There is the same rigorous condemnation of idolatry, the same care for justice and equality between man and man, and the like. But there is a more pronounced insistence on the moral character of God, and the close relation of God to the people in view of His moral character. He is represented as demanding exclusive worship, but as being faithful and long-suffering (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>), caring not only for the people of His choice, but also in a special degree for the fatherless and stranger. The characteristic feature of Dt is that which it is now the fashion to call its parenetic tone; it goes so far, indeed, as to find a spiritual meaning for circumcision as opposed to that which is purely ceremonial. Moreover, the relation of the people to God is presented in a more spiritual manner: the 'first great commandment of the law,' 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind,' is in Dt 6<sup>5</sup>.*

It has seemed hardly consistent with the subject of the present article to go into any preciseness of detail as regards the Pent. legislation. Enough, however, has been said to establish the truth of the position maintained at the outset, that morality for the Jew meant that which God had commanded; immorality, that which God forbade. It is obvious that the Bk. of Dt takes a slightly different view of moral life from that which is expounded in Lv. The laws concerning the functions of judges (12<sup>18, 20</sup>), the kingly office (17<sup>14-20</sup>), the single central shrine, and the killing of animals for food (12<sup>15</sup>), clearly contemplate, either in fact or in anticipation, the position of a settled nation. Similar cases might be quoted from the earlier books. But whereas in Lv the largest portion of the book concerns the ritual order in the land of Canaan, the Bk. of Dt is chiefly concerned with the religious effect upon the people.

One fact, however, is noticeable about all the books alike, and that is the highly archaic character of the regulations themselves. The law and the ritual of sacrifice, the importance given to ceremonial pollution, the practices connected with the avenger of blood, the use of the lex talionis, the levirate law of marriage, the use of the ordeal, are all of them archaic in character, and must have survived into later Judaism out of an archaic state of society. As in other cases upon which anthropology has thrown much light, practices have survived after their primary meaning has been lost. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that the evolution of ethics among the Jews followed something like the same course as among other progressive nations. Having been first expressed in terms analogous to those of early humanity all the world over, the distinctively moral elements were disentangled from the mass of rudimentary ideas, and took their place as the ruling principles of the religious polity of Judea. It has sometimes been maintained that the elaborate ceremonial is a subsequent development to the more spiritual attitude of Deuteronomy. This is surely inconsistent with the teaching of anthropology. The more spiritual conceptions rise naturally out of the less spiritual; the moral truth breaks loose from the half-savage practice in which it was enshrined. It is almost inconceivable that this order should be reversed; and that the mind of the nation should have passed from a lofty spiritual conception of life to one that belongs by natural association to minds largely buried in matter. The characteristic note of this legislation is that God takes command over life as a whole, and, while the actual condition of the people is left unaltered, the way is prepared for further progress. The fundamental ideas as to right and wrong and the proper means of communicating with the national God are left unmodified; but practices are condemned which degrade and materialize the life of the nation and its conceptions of God.*

It has often been observed that the indications of the operation of the Levitical law are rare, if not altogether non-existent, in the historical books. It is certainly true that the supremacy of the sanctuary at Shiloh, and then later at Jerus., falls considerably short of the unique sanctity ascribed in the law to the central shrine of J<sup>h</sup>. Further, there are no records of the celebration of the legal feasts till the time of the later kings. It is plain that the worship of J<sup>h</sup> had not established its hold upon the common people; they are continually liable to defections to the gods of neighbouring races. Moreover, the unity of the people is hardly attained; there are obviously differences of opinion and interest between various tribes. These facts and others like them have been quoted, reasonably enough, as bearing on the literary history of the books of the law. They do not affect what has been said above as to the archaic character of many of the legal enactments. And we may say even more than this. The records contained in the historical books are the records of a people emerging from the tribal state into that of national life. The assumptions of such a state of things underlie the action of Jael: they are displayed in the wars of extermination which form a somewhat repellent feature (to modern eyes) in the history of the invasion of Canaan, and in Samuel's denunciation of the Amalekites; they appear in the attitude of the Jews towards the gods of the neighbouring tribes, still more noticeably in such a story as that of the Levite and his concubine (Jg 19, 20), or that of Micah the Ephraimite (ib. 17, 18).

The means by which the change is effected is, to a large extent, the institution of the Kingship. It is this that prevents the separate action of the separate tribes, and develops the idea of a justice which is due to an individual, as opposed to the tribal notion according to which the tribe, not the individual, is the unit. At the same time it is clear that J<sup>h</sup> is regarded as the protector of moral rights. David, for instance, commends Abigail for preserving him from the sin against the Lord that reckless vengeance implies (1 S 25<sup>37-41</sup>). The eating of blood is a sin against J<sup>h</sup> (1 S 14<sup>33</sup>); there is, to use a modern phrase, a taboo upon the shew-bread offered to J<sup>h</sup>;† and other cases might be quoted showing that, though evidence is lacking for a complete ecclesiastical organization, such as is described in the Pent., much of the legislation embodied therein (and therefore the morality implied by it) dates from a time in which these social ideas prevailed.

(B) The Prophetic Literature.—We must now turn to the prophets and endeavour to estimate the importance of their work in the ethical development of Israel. They are rightly identified with the higher moral progress of the people; but it is necessary in dealing with them, more even than with any of the other OT authors, to remember that their writings are occasional and not systematic. They deal with the condition of the people as it appears to them, they comment on the vices which arrest their attention, and they give special weight to the effect of these lines of conduct on the field of politics.

* Cf. Lv 18<sup>24</sup> 20<sup>1-6</sup>, Dt 12<sup>25</sup> etc.

† It is not accurate to say, with Wellhausen (Proleg. p. 131, Eng. tr.), that there is no distinction between holy and unholy in the matter of the shew-bread.

* The second, 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' occurs in Lv 19<sup>18</sup>.

The cycle of ideas in which the prophets move is much the same in outline, though of course some speak more precisely and fully than others.

(a) The most conspicuous feature in their moral doctrine is their sense of the union of the nation with God, and the interest of God in the moral development of men. Condemnations of idolatry and of all forms of defection from the proper allegiance to God are frequent in the prophetic books. The nation is described under the figure of a bride, bound by the marriage-tie to J<sup>h</sup>, and continually breaking it. This appears in Is, Jer, Ezk, Hos; it will not be necessary to quote passages in illustration of so familiar a phrase. The practices most frequently condemned are unrighteous judgment, oppression of the poor, and various forms of luxury and extravagance, especially drunkenness. These do not take us much beyond the ideas which appear in the earliest legislation. The development is to be found rather in the application of the ideas which have already prevailed, and in the appearance of some of the problems which necessarily belong to moral life. Thus the theory of evil receives some consideration. We have seen that the ceremonial legislation referred largely to ceremonial pollutions. It may possibly have been due to this association that the presence of evil was treated as a taint which affected others besides the actual sinner. On the other hand, holiness or righteousness was also regarded as a state which was effectual as a preservation against judgment. Thus in Abraham's colloquy with God (Gn 18) the presence of righteous persons is admitted as a reason for suspending the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. There is, of course, a real moral difficulty contained in this doctrine. It must be remembered that evil is inseparably connected by the Jews with acts of rebellion, i.e. with individual self-will and disobedience. If, therefore, others who have not taken part in the sin are involved in its consequences, it is obvious that a serious question must be raised as to the definition of responsibility, and the relation of responsibility to guilt. We find in Is a sense of the polluting effect of the presence of evil. Thus in the account of his call to the prophetic work (6<sup>5</sup>) he says: 'Woe is me, for I am undone; because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips.' Isaiah expresses the general effect of evil in the people, and acknowledges its influence upon himself. It is, further, a general doctrine of the OT that the guilt of sin extends to those who are connected with the sinner, as is expressed in the second commandment. These ideas give rise to several lines of moral speculation. In the first place, the sense of individual responsibility is greatly strengthened, so that we find in Ezk a definite restriction or correction of the principle laid down in the Decalogue. Thus (ch. 18<sup>20</sup>), 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die: the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.' This position is carried out on the side of virtue also; the presence even of the three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, shall not avail to suspend judgment upon a sinful city (Ezk 14<sup>12-23</sup>), nor shall righteousness at one time prevent judgment if a soul relapse into wickedness (Ezk 33<sup>10ff.</sup>). Responsibility belongs to the individual soul for actual things done, and for nothing else.

On the other hand, the prevalence of evil and the uncertain incidence of affliction absolutely prevent the adoption of the view that each man is punished simply for his own sins. Evil enters far too deeply into the constitution of things to be explained on these terms. Hence we find in Is and elsewhere the view expressed that God works through evil, and leads men to higher things. This notion is involved in the idea of visitation; it gives meaning to the metaphor of the refining fire; and it expresses itself in the doctrine of the faithful remnant. These are they on whom suffering and trouble have done their proper work; they have learnt the lessons which God was teaching them. This conception reaches a climax in Is 53. The boldness in language, which is so characteristic of the prophets, is nowhere more noticeable than in some isolated statements to be found on the subject of evil. Not content with describing the probationary functions of it in the divine order, both Amos and Deutero-Isaiah speak of it as the direct effect of God's action. 'Shall evil befall a city, and the Lord hath not done it?' Am 3<sup>6</sup>. 'I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I am the Lord that doeth all these things,' Is 45<sup>7</sup>. These passages, in which 'evil' has not the moral sense but = 'calamity,' 'misfortune,' are not inconsistent with the condemnation of sin ascribed to God, and with His character as elsewhere described. Their real aim is to express in the sharpest form the absolute supremacy of God over the whole course of things.

(b) A second point in regard to which the prophetic attitude is fairly consistent is the contrast between ceremonial performance and real morality. The emphasis laid by the prophets upon the moral law, the growing sense of the holiness of God, the comparative lack of moral reference in the ceremonial legislation, are factors in this development. Sacrifice in various parts of the world has tended to pass from an act of communion into an act of commerce. Instead of being a means of reopening intercourse that had in some way become suspended, it is a process of barter by which something valuable is given up or destroyed in order to secure some gain. Further, the tendency to polytheism—so rife in Palestine during the time of the kings—rests upon an assumption that it is worth while to make friends with a variety of gods in hopes of benefits to be received from them. This theory, as well as the other, is inconsistent alike with the ceremonial law as we now read it, and with the prophetic doctrine of God. In proportion, therefore, as the sense of moral conditions to communion with God prevailed over every other, it became necessary to insist on the inadequacy of sacrifice in itself as a means of religious approach. This law is a common subject of the declamation of the prophets. We find it in Is (10<sup>1-17</sup>), Jer (6<sup>19, 20</sup> etc.), Hos (2<sup>11</sup> 6<sup>5</sup>), Am (ch. 6), Mic (ch. 2), Zec (7<sup>5</sup>), and many other places, and in a most elaborate form in II Is (58). In all these, the close relation of J<sup>h</sup> to His people, their sinfulness and His hatred of sin, are the basal assumptions. It is the sense of the failure of material means of intercourse, and the difficulty of the more spiritual view of moral life, that gives force to the whole doctrine of salvation. The moral character of God was itself an assertion that evil was not final. If the means at hand of getting rid of it were inadequate, God Himself must take measures to remove it. The one thing certain is that it cannot remain unmodified; the holiness of God forbids this. Hence we find God continually represented as longing to pardon—rising up early and sending His prophets—that men may come back to their allegiance, and realize the blessings of the covenant-union. The two ideas are here held together—the separation from God caused by sin—the prospect of forgiveness from the side of God. It would take us into the region of theology, pure and simple, if we discussed this matter further; but it is impossible to avoid reference to it, as it is the characteristic feature of the ethics of the prophets, and is perhaps an inevitable result of the peculiarly theological tone of the ethical thought of Israel.

It has already been observed that the ordinary list of virtues and vices in the prophets falls roughly under the same heads as those in the law. They are vices or virtues connected with the intercourse of man with man; in other words, they are political rather than ethical, in the narrower sense. They belong to the political activity of the prophets, and express their influence upon the ordinary life of the State.

There are, besides these, certain other conditions mentioned from time to time which are more purely subjective. Such is the peace which comes to those who are in true union with God, which the wicked can never share. But these are not the most frequent types of virtue. For these and such conditions we must go to the Psalms.

(C) The Psalms really require a treatise to themselves to set forth their ethical contents adequately. They have formed men's devotional handbook for century after century; and this, in spite of the fact that they are full of national feeling, and are unmistakably Jewish. There are frequent allusions in them to the situation of the Jewish people in politics or warfare; they must have been written, in many cases, like the prophecies, in close connexion with various political events. Yet their significance is never exhausted. They have the twofold right to perpetuity, that they regard the current history in the light of the permanent principles that underlie all history and all life, and that they present these in the form of the highest poetry. The Psalmists see in the events of their own day the manifestation of the divine laws, and it is often this aspect of them alone which they present. Hence the task of dating the Psalms is no easy one; the particular immediate event is often lost in the sense of the universal laws, the working of which it displays. In this connexion, as before in this article, we must disclaim any intention of discussing or deciding the dates of the individual psalms, and confine ourselves to a general presentation of the moral indications in the book as a whole.

As before in Jewish writings, we have to notice the decisive way in which the character of God is represented as the rule for the character of man. A very striking expression is given to this principle in Ps 18<sup>25, 26</sup> (RV): 'With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful; with the perfect man thou wilt show thyself perfect; with the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and with the perverse thou wilt show thyself froward.' The reference of all this is put beyond question by the next verse: 'For thou wilt save the afflicted people; but the haughty eyes thou wilt bring down' (cf. Ps 25<sup>3-10</sup> 97<sup>10, 11</sup>, and many other passages). Here, therefore, in the most decisive way, the character of God is represented as the moral ideal. If we ask, further, for greater detail in regard to this divine character, we find many points of contact with the books already considered. It is a commonplace throughout the Psalms that God has a fiery hatred of evil. This is especially displayed in a hatred of all forms of oppression. 'For the spoiling of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the LORD' (12<sup>3</sup>). 'Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it. The eyes of the LORD are toward the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry. . . . The righteous cried, and the LORD heard, and delivered them out of all their troubles. The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart, and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit' (34<sup>14-18</sup>). It is probably this care for the poor that leads, both in the Ps and Dt, to the condemnation of usury (Ps 15<sup>5</sup>) and of unrighteous judgment (Ps 82 throughout). But the Psalmists take us much further than this condemnation of wickedness. God is represented as a God of loving-kindness—that is, looking with interest and love upon mankind. It is this character which, if the phrase may be used, accounts for and is expressed in the special intimacy between the Lord and His people. 'The earth is full of the loving-kindness of the LORD' (Ps 33<sup>5</sup>): it is 'in the multitude of the loving-kindness' of God that the Psalmist goes to the temple (Ps 57): 'He sheweth loving-kindness to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore' (Ps 135<sup>20</sup>). The merciful nature of God shows itself in two directions: in forgiveness and in judgment. The two are not apparently regarded as incompatible. He is full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger and plenteous in mercy (Ps 103<sup>9</sup>). 'If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared' (Ps 130<sup>3, 4</sup>). At the same time, upon those who work wickedness, the judgment of God falls severely and relentlessly. 'Thou settest them in slippery places; thou castest them down to destruction' (Ps 73<sup>18</sup> etc.).

The character of God as thus described forms the model of the true follower of J<sup>h</sup>. His central motive is that of love and adoration to God; but, at the same time, he so far identifies himself with the cause of God that he too burns with anger against the wicked. This is partly the explanation of the tone of unmodified hatred that pervades certain psalms (esp. 69, 109). It is not merely the annoyance of a person whose will is crossed, and who vents himself in petulant cursing of those who stand in his way. It is the wrath of the person who feels that God's cause is attacked through him, and who is persecuted by the powers of evil. Such a condition is no doubt a perilous one; but it is important to observe that these psalms by no means stand alone. The echo of conflict pervades the whole book. The course of this world is largely affected by the presence of sin and unfaithfulness. The followers of God are not by any means in the majority; nor do they always prevail against their enemies. They pass through times of oppression, of menace, of persecution; they are the victims of treachery in the house of friends; they see the ungodly in apparent prosperity, and the holy things of God defiled and insulted. This condition of the world produces the fury against the enemies of God, already mentioned, together with some other remarkable conditions of mind. It is to this—the apparent triumph of the enemy—that we must assign the sense of being forsaken by God Himself which appears in Ps 22; to this also is to be traced the perplexity of mind as regards the providence of God which appears in Ps 73. The moods in which this problem is approached vary greatly. At times it produces deep depression, almost despair; at times it is treated (as in Ps 37) with calm and quiet triumph. But it is important, for it is to the Jewish mind the fundamental problem of ethics, to account for the lack of apparent balance between a man's lot and the life he leads. The idea of the probationary value of suffering appears in some places; but the full discussion of the problem belongs rather to the Sapiential Books than to the Psalms.

It would not, however, be true to suppose that all the evil in the world is due to the action of the enemies of God. There are in many places signs that sinfulness is regarded as a trouble that touches even the good. It erects a barrier between the soul and God which sacrifices and burnt-offerings are powerless to break down. In one place

(Ps 51<sup>6</sup>) it seems to be regarded as affecting the actual birth of men. The man stands in solitary responsibility before God (49<sup>7</sup> 51<sup>4</sup>); and the essence of sin consists in not having the heart right (78<sup>8</sup>). Together with this sense of incapacity and weakness may be classed the yearning after God which marks Ps 42, and the passionate enthusiasm for the service of God which appears in Pss 119 and 84.

There would be no difficulty in extending largely this account of the ethical features of the Psalms; but the space at our disposal does not permit it. We therefore can only point out here the general character of the whole book. It is essentially a book of reflective devotion. The whole of life is viewed from the point of view of the worship of and intercourse with J<sup>n</sup>. It never reaches the point of ethical theory, even in regard to the ethical problem noticed above. The solution, so far as any is offered, is always spiritual and religious, and not philosophical.

(D) The Sapiential Books.—It is in these only that we find any definite ethical philosophy among the Jews; and even in these, speculation moves over a restricted area. As in other nations, speculation begins in the proverbial form; the first moral philosophers were men who spoke proverbs. These trace their intellectual lineage to the wise king Solomon, who was wiser than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Calcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol . . . and who spake three thousand proverbs (1 K 4<sup>31a</sup>). These proverbs, if we may judge from the Bk. of Pr as we have it, were of a somewhat utilitarian tone. They started with the assumption that virtue leads to worldly success and happiness; and they dwelt on this relation with various degrees of insistence. They were maxims of ordinary prudence, rather than speculations as to ultimate moral problems, and the religious view of all these questions was somewhat left on one side. Moral practice is still closely allied with the fear of the LORD, but its natural outcome is expected to appear in the form of worldly prosperity. Thus 3<sup>3</sup> 10 'Honour the LORD with thy substance, and with the first-fruits of all thine increase: so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy fats shall overflow with new wine.' The reflections upon life which fill up the larger portion of the book are also somewhat subdued in enthusiasm, and seem to lack in some degree high moral inspiration. But it must not be supposed that commonplace utilitarian reflections are the sum of the contents of the Sapiential Books. It is to these that we must trace the development of two of the most striking of all the ethical figures of the OT—the Wise Man and the Fool. The wise man is he whose life is orderly and well arranged—the man who follows the law of the LORD. The fool is he who is self-willed and sinful, and whose life therefore lacks principle, and fails to attain success. A large portion of the antitheses in the Bks. of Pr and Sir present the contrasted pictures of these two characters. They are seen in various relations of life; but the essence of the two characters lies in their different relation to the law of the LORD; for the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge (Pr 1<sup>7</sup>, Sir 1<sup>14-20</sup>). 'All wisdom is the fear of the LORD, and in all wisdom is the doing of the law' (Sir 19<sup>20</sup>). The grossest forms of transgression, as well as the less impressive, are regarded as acts of folly (see esp. Pr 7<sup>6-27</sup>, and comp. Pr 10<sup>8</sup> 9 13<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 9 etc.). It is noticeable that the nature of wisdom and of folly consists, not in an accurate intellectual knowledge of things, but in a prudent or imprudent ordering of life. The wise man shows his wisdom by his right choice, his far-seeing plans, his control of passion, and avoidance of all self-assertion. The fool is he who does the exact opposite of all these things. See FOOL.

It is this notion of a wise ordering of practical life which reappears in the far more magnificent conception which we owe to these books—of the wisdom of God. This is conceived partly as an attribute of God, partly as a counsellor standing, as it were, by the throne of God. According to the latter view, which appears in some of the finest passages in these books, wisdom was the counsellor and helper of God in the creation of the world (Pr 8, cf. Wis 10, Job 28<sup>20</sup> etc.), and has been conspicuously embodied in the law (Sir 24<sup>23</sup>). Wisdom is the power that guides the history of man, and has watched over that of the chosen people (cf. Wis 10<sup>15a</sup>). Hence the previous connexion between morality and wisdom is explained. Man's wisdom consists in following out the embodied wisdom of God in the law.

This particular character of the divine wisdom brings us back to the consideration of the problems which, as has been already pointed out, appear in the Psalms. The problem of the true relation of virtuous action or righteousness is set forth, as in a tragedy, in the Bk. of Job. The author emphasizes the fact that Job was free from all blame in the truest and strictest sense. He bewails his misery—the cruel change of fortune which comes upon him; but in it all 'he sinned not.' He neither rejected the verdict of his conscience, which acquitted him of wrong-doing, nor called in question the supreme justice of God. In this he proves superior to the popular opinion on such matters, as it is represented in the utterances of the friends. And the justification of his attitude is found in the answer of J<sup>n</sup> out of the whirlwind, the point of which consists in the assertion of the variety and mysteriousness of the activity of God. The question is not solved by any philosophical formula, but is referred simply to the nature of God Himself.

In the Bk. of Ec we find a much more gloomy point of view. In this case the obscurity of the whole matter presses very hard upon the author's mind. He is impressed with the apparent futility and lack of coherence in the life of man; he can see no purpose served and no object attained by the pursuit of wisdom, or the indulgence of pleasure, or the enjoyment of high place. Everything lies under the doom of vanity; there is no profit under the sun—nothing that endures, and can satisfy man's desire for the enduring. Under these circumstances he approaches the form of ethical thought which, in modern times, is called pessimism. Indeed he only falls short of it in so far as he finds the good of man in the grim adherence to the commandments of God (if Ec 11<sup>18</sup> be genuine).

In both these works the general view of the life of man is closely akin to that which we have had occasion to notice before. It is noted (Job 1<sup>6</sup>) that Job rose up early in the morning and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all (i.e. his family), 'for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and renounced God in their hearts.' He deemed it necessary to provide against inadvertences of this sort as regards God, and this of course adds to the impression of his complete virtue. In later chapters we find the usual emphasis laid upon the protection of the poor, and the wickedness of oppression (cf. ch. 24. 31<sup>16</sup> etc.), upon purity (ch. 31), and justice (29<sup>16</sup>). In like manner, oppression is one of the things which attracts the attention of the preacher (Ec 4<sup>1-3</sup>), as well as the vanity of the efforts of the righteous, when death comes and cuts short all that he is planning to achieve.

We may now review briefly the drift of this very imperfect sketch of the ethical ideas of the OT.

It seems that the central feature of OT morality is that it is religious; it is grafted on to the national faith and worship. But this must not be taken to imply that the ceremonial order was indissolubly bound up with the moral ideas; the various sacrifices, and the like, are, on the whole, held apart from the definite scheme (so far as there is one traceable) of virtues and vices. It would be truer to say that the ceremonial order and the ethical code are two co-ordinate developments of the one principle—the holiness of J'. The character of God was the final rule of the life of man, and the archaic details of sacrificial purification were filled with this meaning; the great holiness of God demanded cautious approach. On the other hand, the general impression left upon the mind by the history of the people and the reflections upon their life is one of considerable simplicity. The acts condemned, the ideals commended, belong to a comparatively simple condition of society. Acts of violence and oppression are the chief burden of denunciation; the tendency is manifest to exact usurious interest; and there are some few other forms of sin noticed, such as drunkenness and impurity. But the real depth and value of Jewish moral teaching is found, not in the political or social sphere, but in the religious life. It is in the Psalms and in those passages of the Prophets which come nearest in tone to the Psalms that we find the permanent and supreme value of the Jewish notion of life. Varieties of religious emotion and aspiration such as we find in these forms are possible only to a people whose whole ethical outlook is religious.

II. IN THE NT.—When we pass over into the NT we come into an atmosphere which is in many respects strikingly different from that of the OT. In the first place, the literature covers a comparatively small area in point of time, instead of containing history and tradition from a long series of ages. Hence the type of life and thought, though there are signs of rapid development in it, is much the same throughout. Further, the history in NT describes in fragmentary style a single life, and the results which flowed from its activity. We are not concerned with the history of a people, but of a body that was included in, but claimed to be wider than, the firmly established Roman Empire. Our knowledge of its external history is comparatively slight; the emphasis falls on the development of its mind. Hence, while a large portion of OT requires to be explained out of the political history of the time, the tone of NT is more definitely moral, and deals more positively with the qualities and errors of individual minds; it is ethical rather than political. And once more, the NT stands in much closer relation to our own modern experience than anything in the OT. At the best, it is always difficult to get back to the point of view from which the OT writers spoke and wrote; there is much which it requires careful argumentation to explain at all. But with the NT this is different. In spite of the obvious differences of national character, and the effects of all the history that has happened since, we still feel that we understand and are in sympathy with the ethical attitude of those who wrote the NT books. Indeed, the fact that they seem so little strange is the measure of their effect.

On the other hand, there are points of very close contact between the OT and the NT. We do not find the same external conditions, but the moral attitude is much the same. The morality of the NT is essentially a religious morality; it stands in very close relation to the worship of God. That which was hope or aspiration under the old covenant is fulfilled in the new; the access to God, which was before an object of longing, is attained through Christ; the forgiveness, the lack of which so seriously complicated the ancient religious efforts, has become possible through Christ. This is, in fact, the central point in the comparison of the two systems; the note of the old covenant is promise, that of the new is fulfilment. From this most of the other differences may be derived, directly or indirectly.

As in connexion with the OT, so here, it will be impossible to enter into the various critical questions raised over the Gospels and Epistles. Taking the NT as it is, we shall endeavour to indicate its bearing on ethical questions.

(A) The Sermon on the Mount.—Different views have been taken as to the actual history of this sermon as it stands in the Gospels, and of its meaning in relation to the purpose of Christ. All are agreed that it stands to the new covenant as the promulgation of the law on Sinai stood to the old; it contains the law of the new kingdom. From this point of view two questions arise in regard to it. (1) What is its relation to the old law? (2) What new features does it add of its own?

(1) In the Sermon on the Mount the old law is revised and fulfilled; the precepts which it contained are interpreted, and their application deepened. Our Lord definitely affirms that He has come, not to destroy (καταλῦσαι), but to fulfil (πληρῶσαι). Hence He touches on a series of points upon which the law had defined its position, and develops them. The law of Murder includes in its prohibition the sin of anger and the harsh unforgiving temper.* The law against Adultery includes lustful thoughts, and condemns them. The law of Divorce and of Perjury are extended in like manner. But the law of Retaliation is reversed; and the narrow command to love the neighbour is extended so as to cover the enemy. In all this the difference lies not so much in principle as in interpretation. We are still in the region of law. Commands are addressed to the will from without, which it has to obey. But the significance of the law is increased tenfold by means of the application of the rules. They no longer concern outward conduct only; they touch the inmost springs of conduct in the heart. In this they are akin to the deeper aspirations of the Prophets and Psalmists; these too, though with less profound and unflinching moral insight, saw that it was in these inward regions that the real issue of right and wrong was to be tried. In the same way, on the positive side, in the matter of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, our Lord lays emphasis on the spiritual side of these acts, without in any way condemning the exterior and formal aspect of them.

(2) But the indications given of the character of the citizens of the new kingdom contain the most significant departures from ancient rule. These appear chiefly in the Beatitudes, and in other parts of the NT in which the character of the new kingdom is described. The nature of the description given in the Beatitudes is not, perhaps, easy to bring into formal order; but there is no question as to the fundamental principles of the character therein set forth. Its rules and interests are in the spiritual world, and there alone. The rewards of its virtues are spiritual. The pure in heart see God; those that hunger and thirst after righteousness gain their desire; the merciful receive mercy; the poor in spirit (or the poor, Lk 6<sup>20</sup>) are those to whom the kingdom of heaven belongs; the peacemakers are called the sons of God. The meek are said to inherit the earth; but this must not be assumed to contradict the blessing upon those whom the world persecutes. The general drift of the passage is to bless those who are characterized by certain spiritual qualities, and to leave on one side their relation to the ordinary standards of the world. The opinion of the world is, as such, of no value; all that matters is the spiritual condition of the citizens of the kingdom. In like manner, later on in the sermon, the motive to prayer and fasting is found in the same region. The critical temper is excluded from the true life (Mt 7<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>37-39</sup>); and it is distinctly asserted that care is to be exercised in the presentation of that which is holy. The whole temper indicated is inward and spiritual, though it is affirmed that the character must be expressed in act: the tree is to be known by its fruit.

* Cf. Philo, De Spec. Legg. Tom. ii. p. 314, ed. Mang.

(B) Similar principles appear in our Lord's Parabolic teachings. A large number of the parables refer to the general characteristics of the new Society, and therefore do not immediately concern us.* But others deal directly with moral character. Thus the Parable of the Unmerciful Servant deals with the law of forgiveness; that of the Pharisee and the Publican condemns self-righteousness; the Good Samaritan defines the duty of the love of our neighbour; that of the Two Sons distinguishes true and false obedience. Dives and Lazarus illustrates the peril of the love of this world. Besides these, the Prodigal Son, the Unjust Judge, and the Friend at midnight declare the relations between the true believers and God. In these, and in the generality of the teaching recorded in the synoptic Gospels, our Lord uses a quasi-proverbial method. He does not promulgate rules of conduct, but describes in indirect fashion the principles upon which true conduct is to be based.

(C) In the more profound teaching recorded in St. John's Gospel, we are taken still further into the inner secrets of the moral life. While in the Synoptists we have the life presented in the simple picture of the Two Ways, St. John represents the true and the false life as two opposed conditions of being—Life and Judgment. This, while it contains ultimately the same idea as the simpler language in St. Matthew, lies deeper, and contains assumptions which do not appear elsewhere. In this type of teaching, as in the other, the essential principle is that human life is truly seen only on its spiritual side, and that in this view of it there is a single issue offered for the determination of each particular man. That course which places man on the side of God is described as Life; the other is in itself Judgment. Further, whereas in synoptic tradition we find our Lord opening His mission with the preaching of repentance, so, in the first discourse recorded by St. John (ch. 3), He sets forth the necessity of regeneration for the recognition of and entry into the new kingdom. Here, again, the positions are ultimately the same, but that in St. John is the deeper. The new birth spoken of is essential to the repentance. Once more, the need of faith, which is constantly emphasized in the synoptic Gospels, is by St. John shown to involve moral issues of a serious kind. It is the self-assertion, the self-seeking of the Jews, that prevents their understanding the claims of Christ. And, lastly, it is union with Christ, and dependence upon His life, which sustains those who are His representatives in the world. And thus, again, a moral virtue inculcated in the synoptic tradition is asserted in deeper form in St. John. The love which the followers of Christ are to have to one another rests upon their union with Christ, the indwelling of the Spirit, and has as its ideal the love of the Father and the Son.

In this Gospel there is very little direct exhortation, even of the proverbial kind. The most conspicuous parenthetic passage is that in which our Lord (as also in the other Gospels) lays down the absolute necessity of sacrifice for all (Jn 12<sup>23</sup>). The discourses are concerned rather with the exposition of the final conditions of moral action, and in this sense they are of vital importance for the Christian ethic. It should be noticed that they deal with action, so it seems at first sight, very simply. Truths which are complementary are stated, sometimes in antithesis, sometimes without any sign in the context of the complementary truth, which may appear elsewhere also without qualification. Thus, in ch. 6, the mysterious relations of the work of the Father and the coming of men to Christ are asserted, but not connected by any theory. Or, on the other hand, the judgment given is said to be the coming of the light into the world, and the consequent action of men (3<sup>19</sup>); whereas in vv. 22, 30 judgment is placed in the control of the Son of Man. This is largely due to the close connexion of the discourses in this Gospel with the circumstances under which they were delivered, and to the fact that, in life, different aspects of complex unities have a tendency to emerge into exclusive prominence. But the great importance of all these passages for our present purpose is this: they represent the Christian development of the principles already asserted in Judaism—the connexion of the character of God with moral life, and the historic operation of God in the lives of men. Where God declares Himself as a merciful God—in answer to the request of Moses to see Him—and declares His condemnation of the guilty (Ex 34<sup>7</sup>), Christ in St. John sets out the love of God as the rule of life for the Christian society (Jn 17<sup>26</sup>). Whereas in the OT the hand of God is seen in the guidance of man throughout his life and history, Christ in St. John affirms definitely the entry of the Father's will into the actual life and choice of individual man. The importance of this, in regard to life, can hardly be exaggerated. It means that the apparent simplification of moral ideas attained by referring all things to a spiritual standard must not be regarded as extinguishing all moral problems. The Gospel of St. John contains no elaborate discussion of such problems, such as we find in St. Paul's Epistles; it only indicates, in the direct way which lies close to immediate experience, that they are present. Thus we derive from the preaching of Christ, not only a deeper view of positive duty, but also an indication of a large field of moral thought of which comparatively little had been known before.

(D) In turning to the Apostolic Epistles we find the Church engaged in the endeavour to introduce the Christian law into the world. We derive, therefore, from these writings some knowledge of the effect of Christianity upon the life of Greece and Rome. And, further, we find in the Epistles, especially in those of St. Paul, an endeavour to connect the faith of the Church with its practice. It will be desirable to consider these points in the reverse order, as the dogmatic basis of Christian practice in many cases largely determines its form. In the first place, let us observe that there are, in the NT writers, certain moral premises or assumptions which are inherited from the OT, and have been accentuated by the teaching of Christ. The end of man is union or intercourse with God, and sin impedes it. Men are in a position of enmity—sin dwells in them—the wrath of God at present abides upon them—they have not passed from death to life. And they have no power of their own to break loose from this position; the old lamentations of the Psalmist over their moral incapacity are taken up and confirmed by the authority of the apostolic writers. However great and sincere man's desire may be to attain to virtue and to holiness, there is an impediment. The law did little to improve the position; it killed instead of reviving; it displayed the real nature of sin, so far as man was capable of appreciating it, but it gave him no power to express his knowledge in his life. The sacrifices and other ceremonies, which were part of the legal dispensation, could never take away sin. They only symbolized a purification which they could never convey.

* Such are: the Leaven, the Draw-net, the Hidden Treasure, the Seed growing secretly, etc.

In all this the apostolic writers are using partly ideas which are inherited, partly ideas which are original in them. The sense of failure and ruin appears, as we have said, in the OT, but in the Epistles it is more precise in itself, and its causes and range are more clearly known. The disabilities thus described are removed by the work of Christ. And it is in consequence of this that the dogmatic basis of the Christian practice is so firmly and carefully fixed. The views of man's condition, with which the apostles start, are such that the first thing to be done in order to attain morality is to remove the impediment which at present bars the way. To describe the advantages or the beauties of moral life—to develop a system of new and attractive moral ideas, is secondary to this; to have made it the first interest would have been to leave mankind in the position of the law. It was power they wanted, more even than knowledge. Christ in His teaching had concentrated attention increasingly upon Himself; the central feature of the discourses recorded by St. John had been the presentation of Himself as satisfying in various ways the desires and the needs of man. Thus the apostles had general guidance as to the way in which they were to deal with life, as well as particular instructions for certain occasions. Christ had not, so far as we can gather from His recorded teaching, entered into any detailed and precise account of the effect of His work in the moral world. It is this that the apostolic writers undertake.

In this respect it is possible to observe development and the presence of individual tendencies of thought. At first, the sum of their preaching seems to be contained in the phrase, Jesus is Lord. The resurrection, of which all are witnesses, is the proof of this; and the effect is that men have repentance and remission of their sins. The Holy Spirit has been poured out upon them, and they have thus gained various moral and spiritual powers. They are not left, as before, to struggle vainly; a new spring of new life has entered into the world, arising from the person of the risen and ascended Lord. St. Paul develops this position with great fulness in his Epistles. 'If Christ be not risen,' he says (1 Co 15<sup>17</sup>), 'ye are yet in your sins.' And this position is elsewhere described as the state 'under law,' the condition of inability and partial knowledge which prevailed in the earlier dispensation (Gal 4<sup>5ff.</sup>). There is no question that to St. Paul's mind the possibility of moral achievement depends absolutely on the person and work of the Son of God. And we can go further than this. The death of Christ, which was the means of removing the barrier of separation between us and God, was of the nature of a sacrifice—a sacrifice of propitiation (ἱλαστήριον, cf. Ro 3<sup>25</sup>). Thus the ancient efforts at reconciliation were made effectual. In similar fashion St. John represents Jesus Christ the righteous as a propitiation (ἱλασμός) for our sins and for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2<sup>2</sup>). The author of the Ep. to the Hebrews dwells at length upon the unique importance of the priesthood of Christ, and emphasizes the effect of it upon man's relations with God. St. John, the cast of whose mind is more contemplative than argumentative, sets forth as the essential condition of real Christian life, the confession that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (2 Jn<sup>7</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>). His characteristic interest is in the truth of the incarnation considered as a fact in history; his treatment of all the other points arises out of this. The others, not less certain than St. John as to the nature of Christ, have given more space to the discussion of the redemptive acts of Christ. But, in spite of differences in the nature and order of the presentation, one salient fact appears on the very surface of the NT, namely, that moral life depends upon the acts and the nature of Christ; in other words, that the true basis for morality is theological. The controversy over the principles of faith and works, which occupies so large a place in St. Paul, has no meaning apart from this; it arises, and is of practical importance, just because it affects the relations of God and man. In like manner, as has been already implied in our remarks upon St. John's Gospel, the controlling will of God in history becomes an element in man's moral life; and in this connexion we have, of course, the Pauline doctrine of predestination. Here, again, we are dealing, not with a mere philosophical speculation, but with a series of facts which must be taken into consideration in any valid account of actual practical life.

It would be beyond our purpose to dwell further on these theological points. We have said thus much about them in order to call attention to the fact that the Christian ethic as it appears in the NT, rests upon certain convictions as to the nature and acts of Christ. The whole bearing and range of morality depends upon these.

We must now return to the other matter remaining for discussion, viz. the attitude of the Church in its endeavour to spread the Christian view of life through the world, and in this connexion we shall consider two points—(1) the general attitude of the Church towards practical life; (2) the system of virtues and vices which flowed from the use of the Christian ideal.

(1) We notice, first of all, that the Church displays an attitude of unflinching hostility to all that is characteristically worldly. The world, to the eyes of St. Paul, presents a spectacle of varied and widespread wickedness. The heathen have lost the light that might once have belonged to them, and, as they have lost the knowledge of God, have fallen into idolatry, and so into gross sin. They have concentrated their attention and interests upon the material side of life, and find their satisfaction in the created world (Ro 1<sup>18ff.</sup>). The same point appears in connexion with the moral use of the term 'the flesh.' St. Paul does not mean by this that the flesh, as such, is the seat of evil; but it is the material and transient side of man's nature, which has no right to stand as the object of his life. The works of the flesh (Gal 5<sup>19</sup>) are all those acts and states of which the real explanation lies in man's choice of the material and transient, his desire for selfish satisfaction. Though there are still higher ideas and signs of moral aspiration among the heathen, yet the predominant note of their life is degradation and sensuality.*

* It is always hard to read St. Paul's descriptions, esp. in Ro 1, without wondering whether he has exaggerated, and, if so, to what extent. It must, however, be remembered that we derive our views of the ancient world rather from the highest minds of the particular periods we consider, than from men on ordinary levels. It was these lower, more ordinary strata of society with which St. Paul was chiefly acquainted. And, further, there can be no question that the entry of Christianity has altered the face of things in many more directions than we ordinarily think; so that, in all probability, the tone of ancient society is much farther from us than we are wont to suppose. St. Paul represents the case of a person with sentiments very like our own acting and thinking under the old conditions. And, lastly, it must always be remembered that St. Paul's method of presenting his ideas is to insist strongly on one aspect of a matter at one time, modifying it or insisting on the complementary truth in

In like manner, St. John speaks of the world as lying in the evil one (κεῖται ἐν τῷ πονηρῷ, 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>), and uses the word κόσμος somewhat in the same way as St. Paul uses the word σάρξ, for the material creation considered, first as apart from, and then as hostile to God. The world is guided by principles of self-will and self-indulgence, and is doomed to pass away with all the objects of its desire. As Christ had anticipated persecution and hatred for those who followed Him, so St. Paul and St. John recognize an endless hostility between the world and those born of God—between the flesh and the Spirit. There is no compromise and no cessation in the strife.

Hence the first thing which strikes us in the general attitude of the Church towards the world is its uncompromising hostility. But in large measure these phrases, the flesh and the world, stand for tendencies or principles rather than for individuals. These tendencies appear in individuals; but there is quite another aspect in which the individuals arrest the attention of the Church. The world from this point of view is capable of being saved; and this fact determines the character of the warfare. There is no limit to the sacrifices which must be expected of the Christian: he must, as Christ said, hate his father and mother if he is worthy of his calling. But he will not retire into himself, and live an isolated withdrawn life in which mankind in general has no part. He will live quietly in the state in which his lot is cast, fulfilling ordinary duties of citizenship (Ro 13, cf. 1 P 4<sup>15</sup>), accepting even such an institution as slavery (1 Co 7<sup>17</sup>, Philem), without strife or cry. At the same time, he will not conceal his way of life, nor evade inquiry into its motive; the power of example, the mere presence of the new principles of action, will tell. The world will know by this the disciples of Christ—by the fact that they love one another. And the love to the brethren, which is the sign that they have passed from death to life (1 Jn 3<sup>14</sup>), is extended to the neighbour, and in this is the fulfilling of the law (Ro 13<sup>10</sup>). As God loved the world, even when men were in a state of rebellion against Him, so those who are called by the name of Christ will endeavour, so far as in them lies, to fulfil God's desire to save it. Thus the Christian's attitude towards the world is partly hostile and partly friendly—hostile so far as the world tries to convert him, but friendly in so far as he endeavours to convert the world. We must now consider certain special conditions of mind which, owing to the peculiar views of life characteristic of the Church, are now brought within the ethical sphere.

(a) We propose to consider, first, three moral conditions which are sufficiently similar to admit of such treatment, and which all depend upon a lack of zeal or whole-heartedness. In Ja 1<sup>5-8</sup> we find a severe condemnation passed upon the δίψυχος or double-souled man. In Rev 3<sup>15-17</sup> the severest judgment of all those passed upon the Seven Churches is the denunciation of the lukewarm (χλιαροί). And, again, in Rev 21<sup>8</sup> the first of those whose portion is the second death are the cowards (δρακοί). These three words, especially in view of the context they are in, seem to convey more than a reproach upon vacillation of purpose. The man who is double-souled and unstable in all his ways fails to obtain his prayers; his life loses consistency and firmness, and becomes like the sea, driven by the wind and tossed. So the lukewarm is worse than the open enemy ('I would thou wert cold or hot'), and the coward is coupled in his condemnation with the unfaithful as well as those who are guilty of open and obvious sin. All three are cases of insincerity. They are attempts to serve two masters, and they lack the absolute singleness of aim which Christ demands of those who follow Him. The severity of the condemnation upon them is the measure of the importance of the demand made upon the believer. He is to live a spiritual life pure and simple, guided by spiritual principles and spiritual aims; cowardice or lukewarmness or double-souledness is nothing less than the surrender of all this; in other words, the rejection of Christ. On the positive side, we have St. Paul's exhortations to sincerity of work (Col 3<sup>22</sup>), to tolerance of weaker consciences in all things lawful (1 Co 8<sup>8-13</sup>, Ro 14), and these exhortations are based upon the same general principle. The sole concern of men is to be their relation to God, and this will colour all that they do in the ordinary ways of life.

Under the same condemnation will be placed various sensual sins. Thus St. Paul bases his exhortation to purity on the true function of the body, and its capacity as a temple of the Holy Ghost (1 Co 6<sup>12</sup> etc.). Covetousness, mentioned at the end of a list of sensual sins, is stigmatized as idolatry (Col 3<sup>5</sup>); the love of money is said to have power to pervert men from the faith, and to be a root of all evil things (1 Ti 6<sup>10</sup>); and again the love of pleasure is set over against the love of God (2 Ti 3<sup>5</sup>). In all these cases the error lies in misdirection of aim, the transient is preferred to the eternal. They are not merely breaches of law, or, as a Greek philosopher might have said, disturbances of the due balance of man's nature. In the light of the faith they are errors in principle, a choice of the wrong thing altogether.

This singleness of aim takes shape in social life in various noticeable forms. The bond which holds the Christian society together is love—love to God and love to the brethren. This, in itself, would prevent any violence of self-assertion or rivalry. But there are also positive virtues based upon the conception of the Christian society. One of the most striking of these is humility. This appears in St. Paul primarily as a social virtue. It consists in voluntarily accepting a subdued estimate of oneself. It is distinguished from all diffidence or indisposition to accept the call of God to special work by the fact that it deals fairly and simply with reality. On the practical side it consists largely in doing without hesitation or discontent the work assigned. So St. Paul exhorts the Romans (12<sup>3</sup>) not to think more highly of themselves than they ought; and gives as his reason their unity in the body of Christ. Immediately afterwards he exhorts them to perform faithfully the function that has been allotted to them in the Church. So in the Epistle to the Philippians (2<sup>3</sup>) the spirit of humility is opposed to the vainglorious temper, and the factious ungracious service of a hireling. So St. Peter finds in humility the principle of church order (1 P 5<sup>5</sup>). Thus the normal aspect of this virtue in the apostolic writings is social; it answers to the social reserve of the Greeks—the disposition to give and take without savage selfishness or personal rivalry. But it differs widely from this, in that it is not based upon the mere fact that all men cannot have the same thing, and must give way to one another; it rests upon a positive love of men, one to another, and a profound conviction of the unique value of spiritual things. Moreover, it goes back upon the example and the precept of Christ Himself; it is a conspicuous embodiment of His mind and temper.

In this connexion it will be well to speak of another virtue which holds a high place in St. Paul's teaching. In the list of the fruits of the Spirit (Gal 5<sup>22</sup>), the virtue which appears at the end as a kind of climax is ἐγκράτεια, self-control. It will not be justifiable to press too far its position in this catalogue; but there can be no doubt that it holds an important position in St. Paul's mind. It is one of the qualities required of the bishop (Tit 1<sup>6</sup>); it is inculcated by the example of the zealous athlete (1 Co 9<sup>25</sup>), and it appears in 2 P 1<sup>6</sup> as a stage in the progress of men in this world. It is in regard to this virtue, probably, that the ethical ideas of the apostolic writers differ most characteristically from the views of contemporary Gr. writers. The Gr. view of virtue was chiefly that of a condition attained after struggle; it did not contemplate the persistence of temptation, or of any disposition to yield on the part of the virtuous man. The material side of man was not, so to speak, an actual element in virtuous action; it required suppression, not control: on the other hand, the Christian virtue does not pretend to introduce warfare or separation into the organization of man. It recognizes the need of self-control, but the character of the man who manages his physical nature and keeps it in its proper relation to his whole life is selected for commendation. The ἐγκράτεια of St. Paul is a more real thing than the σωφροσύνη of a Gr. philosopher; and it is not, morally speaking, a lower conception of virtuous life.

another context. If Ro 1 represents the darker side of his mind, Ro 2, not to mention his practical attitude towards the Gentiles, represents the aspect of the question neglected here.

(b) We now come to consider three states or conditions or virtues which are most of all identified with the Christian point of view. These are the well-known triad, Faith, Hope, and Love. They are for the most part identified with St. Paul, and found especially in 1 Co 13. But it is not true to suppose that they are limited to that passage. They occur in close connexion, both in St. Peter (1<sup>1.21.22</sup>), and in the Ep. to the Hebrews (10<sup>22</sup>), and in other passages of St. Paul (1 Th 1<sup>2-3</sup> 5<sup>8</sup>, Col 1<sup>3-5</sup>). Indeed their connexion is so remarkable that it has been recently argued that it must have been based on the teaching of Christ Himself.* Without committing ourselves on this point, it is at least worth noticing that the connexion is frequent, and it is natural to infer that it had some definitely ethical significance. The question then arises, What is implied by the combination of these three virtues? There is practically no doubt as to the meaning of ἐλπίς and ἀγάπη. It is true that ἐλπίς means sometimes a particular state of mind, sometimes the object on which it rests, but there is no serious ambiguity. But with the third πίστις this is not the case. It is ambiguous (1) because it stands both for the temper of the faithful person and for the object of his faith; but (2) more seriously, because the character of the moral temper is not clear. The word means not only trustfulness, but also trustworthiness. And even in those passages where the context excludes the passive sense, there are further differences in the associations given by various writers to the words. St. James (2<sup>19</sup>) seems to mean by it little more than an intellectual assent to a proposition; it is a state of mind in which the devils can be said to be. The word in St. Paul has a moral rather than a purely intellectual meaning. It describes the temper of one who, in full view of all that makes the other way, trusts in the character and power of God (cf. Ro 4<sup>19</sup> RV). And so St. Paul speaks naturally of faith being made active by love (ἐνεργουμένη δι' ἀγάπης, Gal 5<sup>6</sup>). It is inspired by the love of the person on whom it rests, and therefore does not fail. In the Ep. to the Hebrews we again notice a slight variation in use. The author describes faith in somewhat precise fashion as 'the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen' (11<sup>1</sup>). By this he seems to mean a certainty in the mind of the faithful person that the hopes he has will be realized. The confidence is so great that he seems almost to have in his possession the things which are not yet in being. Such a man, like Moses, 'endures as seeing the invisible.'

It is somewhat difficult to describe succinctly the character in which these three virtues converge. It must be remembered that, for the apostles, the death and resurrection of Christ were the primary and salient facts with which all life had to deal. Hence these determine the primary reference of the faith, hope, and love of the believer. His faith rests upon Christ as risen and ascended; his hope is in the consummation of God's purpose in the world; his love is directed to the Father who guided, and the Son who effected, his redemption. The whole atmosphere of the Epistles is full of these facts, and all practical results which flow out from the presence of these virtues are dependent on the truth of these facts. Thus, because the believer holds to the truth of the death and resurrection of Christ, he has certainty, where others doubt, in his view of the history of the world and of himself. His faith is not a blind acceptance of anything that happens. He knows as well as any one the difficulties in life, and the darkness which hangs over human things. He sees things occur which he did not foresee and cannot explain. But he is not in presence of a mere chaos of irrational forces, with a blind belief in the existence of a purpose behind them; he has a sure confidence in the death and resurrection of Christ; that is, he is able to take them as a type of the action of God, and to find in them a ground of anticipation for the future. Because Christ has risen from the dead, instead of being of all men the most miserable he is the person of all others who has a sure hold upon life. See FAITH.

In like manner, the natural object of the virtue of hope is the second coming of our Lord, and the consummation of all things which that event will bring. It is this hope that enables men to endure the sorrows and pain of the world; it is hidden in some sort in the groaning and travail of creation (Ro 8<sup>18-22</sup>). It results from the steady endurance of persecution (Ro 5<sup>4</sup>), and it does not make ashamed. It is not difficult to see how this confidence in the future will affect life on its practical side. It involves no unreality, and no optimistic veiling of the real evil in things. With a full sense of the presence of pain and other troubles in the world, it looks upon the course of history with certainty and fearlessness. There is no haunting dread lest the world may be, after all, a chaos of irrational forces without purpose or true guidance; because the events of Christ's life, the truth of His person, and the certainty of His promises, prevent all such hazy and depressing conditions of mind. The virtue of hope is closely allied with the virtue of faith. They both rest upon the character and self-manifestation of God; they both affect life by bringing within its sphere the realities of the spiritual order.

And, lastly, the virtue of love depends upon the cessation of the feeling of hostility and estrangement which had so long been abroad in the world. The efforts of God for the salvation of man, His care for the souls of individual men—that is, the prominent events in the incarnate life of His Son—commend the love of God to us. From of old, men had sought by various means for intercourse with God, and yet had fallen short. The life of Christ opened the way to a fuller communion than they had ventured to anticipate. The law of God, seen in the light of the death and resurrection of Christ, could be a regular principle of action; not imposed arbitrarily from without, but accepted and understood as the true form of intercourse with God in life. Again, in regard to men, the old barriers which separated them would tend to be broken down, because all alike came under the condemnation of sin and within the range of salvation. The brotherhood of men amongst themselves is the expression of the knowledge of the love of God towards all. To profess love to God and to fail in love to man is, morally speaking, a contradiction. The one, by the logic of moral life, involves the other.

* Resch, Agapha, p. 181; cf. Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu, p. 24. Both these works are in Harnack's series of Texte und Untersuchungen, Bd. v. 4 and Bd. xiv. 2.

We have now concluded what it seems necessary to say as to the ethics of the Bible. It would be possible to develop the similarities and the contrasts between the ethics of the Greeks or of modern philosophy and the moral doctrines of Christianity. Or we might endeavour to trace the effect of the principles here indicated in the history of the Christian Church. Both of these topics would be necessary to a complete discussion of Christian ethics. Being restricted here to the ethics of the Bible, we must leave them aside as irrelevant. It remains, therefore, merely to emphasize the general principles which follow from our consideration of the subject. It seems to emerge clearly as a result of the whole, that the ethics of the Bible from one end of it to the other are religious. In the early days an ethical meaning was given to religious ceremonies which distinguished them sharply from the generality of such rites. In the hands of the prophets the ethical principles of life were asserted with exceptional vigour and clearness; but always, with however severe a side-glance at ceremonial, as an essential element in the worship of J'. In the Psalmists the various shades of moral feeling are described with infinite knowledge and fulness, but the further reference is always to the desire for intercourse with God. Even in the Sapiential Books, where the tone is least lofty and spiritual, the wisdom of man is found in the fear of the Lord and in obedience to His law.

The change which results from Christianity is partly due to the deeper insight and more alluring attractiveness of the example and preaching of Christ; but it owes more still to the vast increase in knowledge of actual spiritual truth which Christ brought to man, and the infinite significance of the acts of Christ upon the life of men. The truth is summed up, finally, in the words of St. John, 'The law was given by Moses, grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (1<sup>6</sup>). It was not merely that He charmed the world with the example of a sinless Man suffering because other men were sinful; nor, again, does the effect of His life rest merely upon the graciousness or the austerity of His words; but it flows from the fact that He brought truth as well as grace; power to achieve what the world had so long failed to attain; and knowledge of the spiritual order when all had been guesswork and hazardous conjecture before.

Many things follow from this. The various ethical doctrines which are from time to time represented as the only contribution of Christianity to the world's history are really corollaries of the facts upon which Christianity rests. The infinite value of each human soul, with all that has come of it in the changed position of individuals, presupposes, speaking historically, the belief in the scheme of salvation. The idea of universal love is not the result of a change of sentiment in the world, so much as the practical exposition (as we have indicated above) of the true relation of God to man. And, again, the principle of self-sacrifice is not an arbitrary law imposed on men, challenging an explanation which it never receives, but is the practical expression of the law of love, together with the paramount importance of the spiritual world.

We are well aware of the importance and the difficulty of many of the critical questions which surround the books of the Bible. In the present article, as has been already observed, they have been deliberately left aside. It would have been impossible, in the first place, to treat them adequately in passing, and inadequate discussion is useless. But there is a further reason, which, now that the exposition of the ethics is completed, it seems well to mention again and emphasize. These critical questions are not only irrelevant to the present discussion, they are largely irrelevant to any discussion. Speaking generally, we may say that the Bible has had its effect very largely as it stands. It comes before us a whole, and, though criticism may display for us the process by which some of the OT books have come into existence, it will not seriously alter this fact. And in the case of the NT the date of the formation of the Canon and the publication of the various books is now put back so far that there is not room for a complicated evolution of ideas of which the traces are largely lost. Those who are concerned to trace the formative ideas in the Bible must take it as a whole. For it is in view of the unity of thought which runs through it that the separate books have been gathered into one; this was the chief guiding principle in the formation of the Canon.

LITERATURE [added by the Editor: the more useful names are in small capitals].—A. THE OLD TESTAMENT: DILLMANN, Ueber den Ursprung der Alttest. Religion, 1865; BAUDISSIN, Studien zur semit. Religionsgesch. (1878), ii. 1-142; Bestmann, Gesch. der christ. Sitte (1880), i.; KÖNIG (Ed.), Hauptprobleme der alttest. Religionsgesch. 1884; Delitzsch in PRE<sup>2</sup> v. 178; Riehm, IHWB ii. 1274; Kuenen, Religion of Israel, i. 395-397 (Eng. tr. 1874); Mozley, Ruling Ideas in Early Ages, 1877; Luthardt, Hist. of Christian Ethics (Eng. tr. 1889), 33-56; Ebrard, Apologetics (Eng. tr. 1886), i. 236-288; Hessey, Moral Difficulties in the Bible, 3 vols. 1873, 1873; MOORE in Lux Mundi 12, 1891, 52-55; Ladd, Doctrine of Sacred Scripture (1883), i. 454-489, 738-742; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel (Baird Lecture, 1889), 296-325; Caillard, Progressive Revelation (1895), 20-37; SCHULTZ, OT Theol. (Eng. tr. 1892), i. 147 ff., 213 ff., ii. 52 ff.; BRUCE, Ethics of the Old Test. 1895; SMYTH, Christian Ethics (1892), 88-93, 488-489; Stanton in Camb. Comp. (1893), 314-319; STROON, Christian Ethics (BL, 1895), 12-20, 35-46.

B. THE APOCRYPHA: Keerl, Apokryphen des AT, 1852, Das Wort Gottes u. die Apokr. 1853, Die Apokryphenfrage, 1855; Luthardt, Hist. of Chr. Ethics (Eng. tr. 1889), 57-74; Schürer, HJP ii. ii. 90 ff.; MONTEFIORE, Origin and Growth of Religion (Hib. Lect. 1892), 484-496.

C. THE NEW TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIANITY: Böhmer, System des chr. Lebens, 1853; Wendt, Einleitung in die Ethik, 1864; Schmid, Christ. Sittenlehre, ed. Heller, 1867; Maurice, Epistles of St. John, Christian Ethics, 1867; Lightfoot, 'St. Paul and Seneca,' in Com. on Philippi, (1868), 270-333, also in Dissertations, 247-322; Harless, System of Chr. Ethics (Eng. tr.), 1868; Weizsäcker, 'Anfänge christlicher Sitte,' in JDTb, 1876, 1-36; THOMA, Gesch. der christ. Sittenlehre in der Zeit des NT, 1879; Wuttke, Handb. der chr. Sittenlehre (1873), 17-242 (Eng. tr. Christian Ethics, 1873), new ed. by Schulze, 1895; Culmann, Chr. Ethik, 1874; Wace, Christianity and Morality, 1876; Smith (J. G.), Characteristics of Chr. Morality (BL, 1879); von Hofmann, Theologische Ethik, 1878; Lange, Grund. der christ. Ethik, 1878; Martensen, Christian Ethics, Eng. tr., 3 vols. 1878-1882; BESTMANN, Gesch. der christ. Sitte, vol. i. 1880 (ii. 1885); ERNESTI, Ethik des Apostels Paulus, 1880; Pfleiderer, Grund. der Glaubens- und Sittenlehre, 1880; Lecky, Hist. of European Morals, 1882; Frank, System der christ. Sittenlehre, 1884-1887; Martineau, Types of Ethical Theory, 1885; DORNER, Christ. Sittenlehre, 1885 (Eng. tr. 1887); CHURCH, Discipline of the Chr. Character, 1885; Gass, Gesch. der christ. Ethik, 1881-1886; SNOWICK, Outlines of Hist. of Ethics, 1886; Ziegler, Gesch. der christ. Ethik, 1886; Westcott, Social Aspects of Christianity, 1887; Flügel, Die Sittenlehre Jesu, 1888; Hatch, Greek Ideas and the Chr. Church (Hib. Lect. 1888), 158-170; Matheson, Landmarks of NT Morality, 1888; Luthardt, Hist. of Chr. Ethics (Eng. tr. 1889), 77-104; Stanton, Province of Chr. Ethics, 1890; OTLEY, 'Christian Ethics,' in Lux Mundi Chr. Ethics, 1890; SCHARLING, Christ. Sittenlehre, 1892; Bright, Morality in Doctrine, 1892; SMYTH, Christian Ethics, 1892; Caird, Evolution of Religion (Gifford Lect. 1893), i. 389 ff., ii. 92 ff., 127 ff.; KNIGHT, The Christian Ethic, 1893; DRUMMOND, Via Veritas Vita (Hib. Lect. 1894), 209-280; FINDLAY, Christian Doctrine and Morals (Fennley Lect.), 1894; STROON, Christian Ethics (BL, 1895), esp. 20-22, 47-73, and sects. iii. iv.; Harless, Christ. Ethik, 8th ed. 1895; KIDD, Morality and Religion (Kerr Lect. 1895), 303-401; Kuebel, Christ. Ethik, 1896; Luthardt.

Kompend. der theol. Ethik, 1896; Tyms in The Ancient Faith in Mod. Light (1897), 49-58; HARRIS, God the Creator (1897), II. 175-192; BURTON, 'The Ethical Teachings of Jesus in Relation to the Ethics of the Pharisees and OT,' in Biblical World (1897), x. 193-208; BOVON, Morale Chrétienne, 1897-1898.

T. B. STRONG.

ETHIOPIA (Ἰθιοπία), the name whereby the LXX translators rendered the Heb. כְּנַעַן passim, and in Ps 72<sup>9</sup> and 74<sup>4</sup> the Heb. מִצְרַיִם.

1. DERIVATION, etc.—The word occurs in the earliest Gr. literature as the name of a race to be found in the extreme E. and the extreme W.; in later writers* the nation is more definitely localized as dwelling S. of Egypt. The name would seem to be Greek, and to signify 'Red-faces' (cf. the similar word αἶψα applied by Homer to wine), a designation derived from the colour of the people, just as many names given by the Gr. geographers to African tribes are derived from their characteristics, habits, or mode of life; and indeed the present inhabitants of Abyssinia are said to call themselves Kay ('red' in Amharic), as opposed to the Nubians, whom they term black (tekour in Amharic, salim in Ethiopic; Lejean, Voyage en Abyssinie, 1872, p. 77). As, however, the colour that is associated with the 'Ethiopians' is not red, but black (Juv. Sat. ii. 23), it has been suggested that the Gr. name represents the Grecized form of some foreign appellation, such as Atyāb, plural of the Arab. ṭīb, 'scents,' used to designate the inhabitants of the country whence the incense came (Glaser, Die Abyssinier in Arabien, p. 10). The word is a loan-word in the language called Ethiopic, imported from the Greek, and only employed by the Abyssinians in Christian times to denote themselves. In the inscription of Adulis, the Abyssinian king claims to have defeated the Ethiopians among other foreign races; meaning by this name, according to Lejean's suggestion, the Shangallas, a tribe placed in the maps of Harris and Lefèvre to the W. of the Abyssinian province Shirē, between the rivers Mareb and Taccazē. The name Habash, whereby the Abyssinian country and people are designated in Arabic (whence the European Abyssinia), would appear to represent an ancient Egypt. name for some African race (Glaser, l.c., after W. Max Müller); the native name is Geez.

2. GEOGRAPHY.—Although the Gr. geographers after the time of the Ptolemies distinguish the kingdom of Meroë from the neighbouring tribes, they make the term Ethiopia include both. The extent of territory covered by this name is therefore very great: to the ancients it represented all the land bounded by the Upper Nile on the W., and the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf on the E.; the southern extremity they did not profess to be able to fix. Only modern—the most modern—researches have been able to map out accurately the land known to the old geographers by vague reports.

The land whence the Nile derives its waters is described by Lucan as putres arenae, but this description is not true of the whole of Ethiopia. While the political divisions have constantly been, and are still, fluctuating, the natural divisions are three. The highlands of Abyssinia separate the Sūdān (usually spelt Soudan), or 'black country,' on the N. and W. from the Danākīl country, which lies between the Ethiopian range and the sea.

(a) The Soudan, having been rarely traversed by Europeans before Sir Samuel Baker (Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia, 1867), has, since the enterprise of Mohammed Ahmad, been frequently the centre of European interest, and the campaigns that have been fought there have led to the elucidation of its geography; and the works of Wingate (Mahdism in the Egyptian Soudan, 1891), Slatin Pasha (Fire and Sword in the Soudan, 1896), and others, give accurate details both of the nature of the country (2,000,000 sq. miles in extent) and of the tribes that inhabit it. South of the thirteenth parallel of latitude is fertile country with a six months' rainfall; N. of it are vast steppes with frequent thorns and thinly-scattered wells (Wingate, p. 8). A narrow strip of rich vegetation is to be found on either side of the Nile, which flows through it, making a gigantic curve between the third and fifth cataracts, and receiving at Al-Damer (about 33° 45' E. long., 17° 30' N. lat.) the Athara, laden in the rainy season with the waters of Abyssinia, but in the dry season a bed of white sand; and some two degrees farther S. spitting at the modern town of Khartoum into the Blue and White Nile. The scenery is diversified by mountain ranges of no great height.

(b) Very different from this flat rolling plain is the Switzerland of Africa, Abyssinia, a plateau with a mean elevation of 6000 ft., extending from 9° to 15° 26' N. lat., and at its greatest width from 37° to 40° E. long. Never completely severed from communication with Europe, this country was first accurately described in the Historia Ethiopiae of the Ethiopic scholar Job Ludolf (1681), while the scientific observations and measurements of the explorers Rüppell (Reise in Abessinien, 1838), Lefèvre (Voyage en Abyssinie, 1839-1843), and Ferret and Galinier (contemporary with the last), have in recent times vastly increased our knowledge of it, which has been supplemented yet more recently by the researches of M<sup>me</sup> d'Abbadie (Géographie de l'Ethiopie, 1890) and others (e.g. Theodore Bent, The Sacred City of the Ethiopians, 1893; Schoeller, Mittheilungen über meine Reise in der Colonia Eritrea, etc.). Separated on the E. from the Red Sea by the Ethiopian range (as it was first named by M. Theoph. Lefèvre), bounded on the S. by the rivers Hawash and Abay (afterwards the Blue Nile), on the N. by the rivers Ansaba, Barka, and Gash, and on the W. by the Athara, the Abyssinian plateau inclines towards the N.W., but reaches its greatest elevation in the mts. of Samen or Semyen, of which the loftiest, Ras Dedjen, is 14,200 ft. high. The four rivers Taccazē (the Nile of Ethiopia), Mareb, Abay, and Hawash, with their numerous tributaries, divide the country into a great number of natural provinces; and as these rivers flow in deep ravines, intercommunication during the rainy season is frequently suspended; while the Mareb and the Hawash lose themselves in the sand after dividing into many channels, the Taccazē (called during part of its course the Setitte) flows into the Athara at Tomat (in the province of Katarif), while the Abay (which near its rise curves through Lake Tsana, the greatest of the Abyssinian lakes) later on in its course is called the Blue Nile. The political and linguistic division of the country into Tigre, Amhara, Shoa, and Galla districts is recent; a more natural division is that according to which the native geographers divide their land into zones—the Kola or lowlands (below 5500 ft.), the Woina-Deja (5500-7500 ft.), and the Deja (over 7500 ft.), distinguished by their flora and fauna. (See on these esp. J. Dove, Ergänzungsheft 37 to Petermann's Mittheilungen, 'die Kulturzonen Nord-Abessinien,' and for another division A. Raffray, Bulletin de la société de Géographie, 1882.)

(c) Thirdly, on the E. side of the Ethiopian range, and extending to the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden, is a vast tract inhabited now by three Hamitic races called Oromo or Gallas, Afar or Danākils, and Somālis, not yet thoroughly explored, among the descriptions of which may be mentioned Borelli's Ethiopie Méridionale (Paris, 1890), and Paulitsche's Ethnologie Ost-Afrika's (Wien, 1893). The geology, botany, and zoology of 'Ethiopia' are elaborately treated in Deeken's Reisen in Ost-Afrika (1879), ap. iii. 3.

3. SKETCH OF HISTORY.—Portions of this vast region were under some sort of government during the existence of the ancient kingdom of Napata, the earlier history of which has been sketched in the article CUSH. In the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus we find an Amonian king Ergamenes reigning at Meroë (Diod. iii. 6), whose name (Erkamon, 'oath of Amon') was found in cartouches on Nubian monuments shortly after the commencement of hieroglyphic studies (see Champollion, Voyage en Nubie, 119; Rosellini, Monumenti Storici, ii. 321). To the time of the same Ptolemy, Brugsch (Zschr. f. Ägypt. Sprache, etc. 1890, p. 29) assigns the reign of a king Horsiataf or Arsioates (whose stele with a lengthy inscription is reproduced by Mariette, Monuments Divers, plate 11); and two kings of the same family as Ergamenes, Onchmachi and Hormachi, after the death of Ptolemy Philopator seized the Thebaid, where they reigned twenty years (Brugsch, l.c.; Révillout, Rev. Égyptol. v. 39 ff.). As Euergetes I. is said to have sent an expedition into Lower Nubia (Mon. Adul.), the two powers must have been long at variance. The invaders of the Thebaid were ejected by Ptolemy Epiphanes—if the combinations of Révillout be correct—by the aid of the Blemmyans, an Ethiopian tribe, whose princes henceforth become supreme at Meroë, though acknowledging the suzerainty of the Egyptians and their heirs the Romans, whence it comes that inscriptions in honour of Tiberius and Nero have been found at Dakke (the ancient Pselcis).

* Still the confusion of Ethiopia with India continues long into the Christian era (Lefronne, Matériaux pour l'histoire du Christianisme, p. 32).

An attempt was made during the reign of Augustus by a queen named Candace to drive the Romans out of the Thebaid, resulting in the taking of Napata and Meroë by C. Petronius in A.D. 24; but as peace was made with the Ethiopian queen by Augustus at Samos in B.C. 21, the defeat of the former may not have been so complete as Strabo represents it (Book xvii.; Révillout, l.c.). The same queen has been identified with a supia facinorosa, who is mentioned in an inscription of the year B.C. 13 as sending an embassy into Rom. territory (Wilcken in Hermes for 1893, p. 145 on CIG iii. 5080); and this name Kandake (in Egypt. Kallaki-t with family name Anm-arit; Lepsius, Denkmäler, v. 47 a and b; ap. Brugsch, Entziff. der Meroit. Denkm., p. 7) is said to have been the official name of the queen of Ethiopia (Bion of Soli, Frag. Hist. Græcæ, iv. 351, 5). Beyond a solitary allusion to the queen of Meroë in Ac 8<sup>27</sup> the history of this state is blank till a much later period, when the Blemmyans came into collision with the Roman empire (Révillout, Mém. sur les Blemmyens in 'Mém. prés. par divers savants à l'Académie', viii. 2. 371); and Pliny asserts that a tribune with some prætorians sent to reconnoitre by Nero, who was contemplating an Ethiopian war, reported that the regions about Meroë were deserted (Nat. Hist. vi. 35). It has been conjectured by Dillmann ('Über die Anfänge des Aksumitischen Reiches' in Abhandl. der Akad. zu Berlin, 1878, p. 204) that the downfall of Meroë was the result of the campaign of Petronius. Though this may seem doubtful, he is probably right in connecting with the fall of Meroë the rise of another state in Abyssinia; for whereas the classical geographers prior to A.D. 50 (Agatharchides of Cnidus, of the 2nd cent. B.C., excerpted in Photii Bibliotheca; Artemidorus of Ephesus, of the 1st cent. B.C.; Diodorus Siculus, who relies in his elaborate account of Ethiopia, Bk. iii. 10-37, chiefly on Agatharchides, but partly on information which he had himself collected in Egypt; Strabo, and Pliny) know of no other state but that of Meroë, the author of the Periplus Maris Erythræi (of the second half of the 1st cent. A.D.) knows of a metropolis of the Axumitæ (Ἀξουμίται) situated at a distance of eight days from Adulis, 'whither all the ivory from beyond the Nile is brought through Cyenium to Adulis' for exportation. It was governed by a king named Zoskales; and in one of the inscriptions of Adul recorded by Cosmas Indicopleustes, the king, inferred from the phrases he employs to have been king of Axum, a worshipper of the Greek gods Ares, Zeus, and Poseidon, enumerates conquests extending over a great portion of modern Abyssinia, and into neighbouring tribes and countries, in a list wherein many extant names figure for the first time. Since this king claims to have been the first of his line to conquer tribes which, in the time of the Periplus, were subject to Zoskales, Dillmann (l.c. 200) argues plausibly that the monument of Adulis is earlier than the Periplus; whence it would appear that the empire of Axum came into being somewhere in the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. The date cannot be much earlier, since otherwise its existence could not have escaped the Greeks, who had many factories on the Red Sea coast, dating from the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who is said to have organized elephant-hunting expeditions. Although there follows a gap of some centuries in the history of Axum, it is clear that the great antiquity claimed for their empire by the native Abyssinian chroniclers is fabulous (see Dillmann, ZDMG vii.) as well as its supposed Jewish basis. Besides Meroë and Axum, the classical writers know only of tribes existing in Ethiopia in various stages of savagery, some of whose characteristics may well be preserved in extant races, while some may be relegated to the region of fable. (See further CUSH.)

4. LANGUAGE, etc.—The chief monuments of Nubian monarchs are in the Egypt. character and language; although, in the opinion of experts, many of them display a very imperfect acquaintance with both. Ergamenes, however, in the 3rd cent. B.C., after overthrowing the power of the priests (it is thought), introduced the native language of Nubia into the monuments, using for it modifications of the hieroglyphic and demotic writing, in which the phonetic value of the Egypt. symbols seems to have been shifted. In his Nubian grammar (1880) Lepsius speaks of these inscriptions as a still unsolved mystery; and the important study of them by Brugsch (Entziff. der Meroit. Denkm., Leipzig, 1887) is not regarded as having finally solved it, although the discovery by Schäfer (Zschr. für Ägyptologie, 1896) of elements of modern Nubian in the Nubian words recorded by classical writers makes in favour of Brugsch's system. While the basis of the language is, according to these authorities, to be sought, not in the Beja dialect (as Lepsius had imagined), but in modern Nubian, Brugsch has made it probable that the language of the inscriptions was largely intermixed with Egypt. words, and indeed he fancies that many such are to be detected in the existing language. While the Ethiopian Pantheon was largely peopled with Egypt. gods, a few native names are recorded by the ancients, as may be made out from the inscriptions; and likewise Ethiopian civilization, though largely borrowed from Egypt, retained not a few native peculiarities.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.—According to Ac 8<sup>27</sup> an Ethiopian eunuch, minister of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, who was over all her treasure, shortly after the martyrdom of Stephen was met by the deacon Philip when returning from a religious journey to Jerusalem, and converted to Christianity. From the authorities cited in the article ETHIOPIA we know that Gr. literature had spread to the kingdom of Meroë as early as the 3rd cent. B.C.: there is therefore nothing improbable in the LXX translation, which this Ethiopian was found reading, having penetrated thither by the same channels; but whether he also belonged to the Jewish community cannot be made out with certainty. While his journey to Jerusalem 'to worship' (cf. the inscription quoted in ETHIOPIA) might imply it, his apparent unfamiliarity with OT (v. 31) and his physical condition render it improbable. The word 'eunuch' might indeed be regarded as a mistranslation for 'minister' if there were any likelihood that this narrative was originally in Aramaic, since in some dialects of that language the same word signifies both; but the fact that the passage of Isaiah quoted (Is 53<sup>7-8</sup>) is given according to the LXX, takes away the ground from any such supposition.

The notices of the Eth. kingdom for this period failing us altogether, it is impossible to identify this personage from external sources; but the historical character of the narrative seems to be acknowledged in most quarters.

The confession of faith put into his mouth in v. 37 AV is now universally admitted to be an early interpolation. Assuming the Lucan authorship of the Acts, the source of the above narrative may have been personal information received from Philip (cf. Ac 21<sup>8</sup>). Like the baptism of Cornelius by St. Peter, the case of the Ethiopian eunuch marked an important stage in the question of the admission of the Gentiles to the Christian Church. Its bearing from this point of view will be discussed in art. PHILIP (the evangelist). See also CORNELIUS.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN (ἠθίοπη).—According to Nu 12<sup>1</sup> (JE), when the children of Israel were at Hazeroth, Miriam and Aaron 'spake against' Moses on account of his marriage with an Ethiopian (RV 'Cushite') woman. In the sequel, however, Moses' conduct in this matter is neither impugned nor defended; for the complaint brought by Miriam and Aaron turns into a claim of equal inspiration with Moses (v. 2)—a claim which is refuted by J<sup>n</sup> in a theophany, while Miriam is punished with leprosy, from which she is immediately relieved through Moses' intercession made at Aaron's request, but has nevertheless to be confined for seven days (v. 46<sup>n</sup>). As the 'Ethiopian woman' is mentioned nowhere else, and the death of Moses' wife Zipporah is not recorded, some of the early interpreters thought the two must be identical; and this view is favoured by the Jewish expositors, who assign reasons for Zipporah's being called Eth. that are either frivolous (as Rashi) or merely uncritical (as Ibn Ezra); Rashi's interpretation being as old as Targ. Onk. On the other hand, LXX has Αἰθίοπισσα, and Jos. (Ant. ii. x. 2) makes her an Eth. princess. If the woman mentioned in Nu be identical with Zipporah, the word Kāshith must be used in the sense of non-Israelite—a usage which is found in late Rabbin. writings (Levy, NHWB), and cannot be dissociated from the similar employment of Kúthi (properly Samaritan). But besides the improbability of this usage being found in the Bible, the text implies (though it does not expressly assert) that the marriage was of recent occurrence. It is therefore more likely that a black slave-girl is meant, and that the fault found by Miriam and Aaron was with the indignity of such a union; and this accords with the statement (v.<sup>3</sup>) that Moses was the 'meekest' of mankind. The employment of Nubians as slaves dates back to the early dynasties of Egypt (cf. Brugsch, Gesch. Ägypt. p. 266). Although no etym. of the name Hazeroth is given in the text, this word (from the Arab. hazara, 'confine') would seem to stand in some etymological connexion with the confinement of Miriam. Perhaps it is merely accidental that the word hazir in Arab. is employed in an idiom meaning to 'calumniate' (Maydani, c. 3); albeit this double etym. would contain implicitly a large portion of the narrative. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

ETHIOPIC VERSION.—This subject will be treated under the following heads:—

- i. The Ethiopic Canonical Books.
- ii. The Manuscripts.
- iii. Printed Editions.
- iv. Source of the Text.
- v. Critical Value.
- vi. Date.

i. THE ETHIOPIC CANONICAL BOOKS.—(A) Old Testament.—The Eth. OT embraces all the books included in the LXX (except the Books of the Maccabees), together with several others, such as the Book of Enoch, Jubilees, 4 Ezra, Rest of the Words of Baruch, etc. The Maccabees were either never translated or else were early lost. Since, however, the Eth. scholars found the titles of these books in their Sinódos and Fetha Nagast, they proceeded to supply them from their own imagination. In this way these books came into circulation (Dillmann). In later times, indeed, the Latin version of these books was translated into Ethiopic. (See Wright, Cat. Eth. MSS Brit. Mus. p. 14.) No distinction whatever appears to have been made between the canonical and the uncanonical books of OT. The number of books in OT is set down unanimously at 46, but hardly two lists of these books agree. As a rule, the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books which appear in one list are replaced in another by quite different works of the same class of literature. (See Walton's Polyglot i., Proleg. p. 100; Dillmann in Ewald's Jahrbücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft, v. 1853, pp. 144–151; Fell, Canones Apostolorum Ethiopice, p. 46.)

(B) New Testament.—35 books are reckoned in NT. This number is arrived at by including a book of Canon Law with the usual 27 books of NT. As this work, called the Sinódos, is counted as 8 books, we thus get 35 in all. (See Zotenberg, Cat. des MSS Ethiopiens de la Bibliothèque Nationale, p. 141 ff.; Ludolf, Historia Ethiopica, iii. iv. 27; Vansleb, Histoire de l'Eglise d'Alexandria, 239 ff.)

The Western division of the Bible into chapters made its way into Abyssinia through the contact in later times of the latter with Western Christendom. The older MSS exhibit quite a different division of the books.

ii. THE MSS OF THE ETHIOPIC VERSION.—The chief MSS of OT, the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and of NT will be found in the following catalogues:—Wright, Ethiopic MSS of the British Museum, OT and Apoc. pp. 1–22, NT pp. 23–29, 1878; Zotenberg, Catalogue des MSS Ethiopiens de la Bibliothèque Nationale, OT and Apoc. Nos. 1–31, 49–51, NT Nos. 32–48; D'Abbadie, Catalogue

Raisonné de MSS Ethiopiens, Paris, 1859, OT and Apoc. Nos. 16, 21, 22, 30, 35, 55, 99, 105, 117, 137, 141, 149, 195, 197, 203, 204, 205. Some of these MSS contain only single books. MSS of Enoch are found in 16, 30, 99, 197; Gospels, Nos. 2, 9, 47, 82, 95, 112, 173; Pauline Epp. 9, 119, 164; Cath. Epp., Apoc. and Acts, 9, 119, 164. Dillmann, Catalogus MSS Ethiop. in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, 1848, OT and Apoc. 1–9, NT 10–15. There are small collections of MSS also in Berlin. See Dillmann, Abessinische Handschriften der Königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin; OT and Apoc. Nos. 1–6, of the Psalms 7–19; NT 20, 21. Of these, No. 1 is a MS of Enoch. For the MSS in Vienna, see ZDMG xvi. p. 554; in St. Petersburg, see Bulletin scientifique publié par l'Académie impériale des Sciences, ii. 302, iii. 145 ff.; in Tübingen, see ZDMG v. 164 ff. There are also a few MSS in Frankfurt of some value, and in private libraries in England.*

iii. PRINTED EDITIONS.—We shall mention only a few of these. For further information the reader may consult Le Long, Bibliotheca Sacra, 1878, ii. 140–157; Fell, Literarische Rundschau für das Kathol. Deutschland, Feb. 1, 1896.

(A) Old Testament.—Of OT Dillmann has edited vol. i. Gn–Ruth, 1853 (some of the best MSS were inaccessible when this volume was edited); vol. ii. Samuel and Kings, 1861–1871; Joel (in Merx, Die Prophetie des Joels). The Psalms were edited by Ludolf in 1701, and in the various Polyglots and by the Bible Society. Bachmann published texts of Isaiah, Lamentations, and Malachi. The text of the last two books neither adequately nor accurately represents the best Ethiopic MSS in Europe.

(B) Apocrypha.—The honour of publishing the first Apocryphal texts belongs to Oxford. Thus Laurence edited the Ascension of Isaiah in 1819, the Apocalypse of Ezra in 1820, and the Book of Enoch in 1838. These are valuable now only from an historical point of view. Dillmann has given us a splendid edition of the Apocryphal books, Baruch, Epistola Jeremie, Tobit, Judith, Ecclesiasticus, Sapientia, Esdræ Apocalypsis, Esdras Græcus (1894). He edited texts also of Enoch (1851), Jubilees (1859), and the Ascension of Isaiah (1877). In 1893 Charles published an edition of Enoch, in which there is a continuous correction of Dillmann's text from 10 hitherto uncollated MSS, and in 1894 the Ethiopic text of Jubilees from 4 MSS.

(C) New Testament.—The NT was first printed at Rome in 1548–49 by the Abyssinian Tasfä-Sion, with the omission, however, of the 13 Pauline Epistles. As the translator possessed only a fragmentary MS of the Acts, he supplied an Eth. version of the missing chapters from the Greek and Latin. This edition, which is disfigured by countless errors, was reprinted in Walton's Polyglot. Another edition, Nov. Testamentum . . . Ethiopice, ad codicum manuscriptorum fidem, was issued by T. P. Platt for the Brit. and For. Bible Society, 1826–1830. A reprint of this edition appeared at Basle in 1874. These editions are of no critical value.

iv. SOURCE OF THE TEXT.—(A) Old Testament.—The Ethiopic or Geez version, which from the earliest times was universally used in all branches of the Abyssinian Church as well as amongst the Jewish Falashas, was, according to some of the poets of the country, derived from the Arabic, its authors being variously said to be the Abba Salāmā (=Frumentius, the Apostle of the Abyssinians, according to Ludolf, see Zotenberg, Cat. des MSS Eth. pp. 3, 4, or a later Abba Salāmā, see Zotenberg, 194; Dillm. Zur Gesch. des axum. Reichs, p. 20) or the holy Nine (Guidi, Le traduzioni degli evangelii in arabo e in etiopico, p. 33, note). But Ludolf saw reason for doubting this view later (Historia aethiopica, pp. 295, 296) when he came to recognize that the Ethiopic version was closely dependent on the text of the LXX. Subsequent investigation has tended to substantiate the later view of Ludolf. Hence the view of Renaudot, that the version was made from the Egyptian, must be summarily rejected; likewise the preposterous theory of Lagarde, that it was derived either from the Egypt. or Arab. in the 14th cent.

* See also Margoliouth's art. on the Eth. VS in Miller's edition of Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the NT.

It is unquestionable that our version was made in the main from the Greek,—in the main, for there are certain phenomena in the MSS which cannot be explained from this hypothesis alone. These we will touch upon presently, and in the meantime give Dillmann's account of the various texts attested by the MSS. In his V.T. Aethiopici, Tom. i. apparat. crit. p. 8 (1853), he draws attention to a large number of readings which agree with the Hebrew against the LXX, and suggests that these are due to the use of the Hexapla of Origen. Later he revises this theory and replaces it by another; thus in Herzog's RE, 1877, i. 205, he writes that there are three distinct types of text. i. The original translation more or less corrupted but seldom represented in the MSS. (See also Zotenberg, op. cit. 3, 5, 7, 8.) ii. A text revised and completed from the Greek, and found most frequently in the MSS. This is the Eth. Korā or Textus receptus. iii. A text corrected from the Hebrew, younger in age. See also V.T. Aethiopici, Tom. ii. Fasc. i. apparat. crit. pp. 3-6. This theory has been accepted by Zotenberg, and lately by Pretorius, Herzog's RE iii. p. 87 ff.

It is possible, however, to interpret the evidence otherwise. Thus Dillmann may be wrong (a) in his later rejection of his first theory that the Hexapla of Origen was used by the Eth. translators, and (b) in attributing all Eth. transliterations of Heb. words and many Eth. readings which agree with the Heb. against the LXX to the work of later scholars correcting from the Heb. text.

Some evidence will now be cited which points in this direction. This evidence will be drawn from Lamentations and Malachi. First as regards (a), we find that in La 2<sup>13</sup> the Eth. āstamāslakī agrees exactly with the version of Symmachus ἐξισόσω σε against the Heb., LXX, and all other Gr. VSS. Likewise in 3<sup>4</sup> and 5<sup>15</sup> our text again agrees with Symm. against the LXX, but this time it is in harmony with the Hebrew. As some other divergences from the LXX can be explained by this version and that of Aquila, it seems reasonable to conclude that the Hexapla was used by the Eth. translators. These divergences, however, may have been derived directly from the Heb. text. In many passages in all the biblical books the Eth. version is independent of and attests a purer form of text than the LXX. Next as regards (b), it is just as likely that many of the transliterations of Heb. words which are found in certain Eth. MSS,* but not in the LXX, may be survivals of the earliest form of the text made directly in many cases from the Hebrew. If they are all to be ascribed to the corrections of later scholars, how are we to account for their appearance in all MSS of La 3<sup>12</sup> and Job 16<sup>12</sup>? What we usually find in the history of a version is that the unintelligible or foreign words are by degrees displaced either by their native equivalents or by emendations, or else they are simply omitted. The theory that the primitive Eth. version contained a large number of words transliterated from the Heb. receives some confirmation from the fact that the Abyssinians first received Christianity through Aramaean missionaries, and that very many Aram. words were actually naturalized in order to express the new doctrines of the Christian faith. The Levitical character of Ethiopic Christianity points in the same direction, i.e. its acceptance of the rite of circumcision, and the Levitical laws regarding the purification of women.

Until, however, we have a complete and critical edition of the Eth. version, it will not be possible to settle finally the above questions. Even Dillmann's edition (vols. i. ii. v.) is inadequate for this purpose, as vols. i. and ii. were completed before the best MSS were accessible.*

(B) New Testament.—Zotenberg (Cat. des MSS Éth. de la bibliot. Nat. pp. 24, 25, 30, 1877) showed that there were two forms of text present in the MSS,—the first, that which was made from the Greek original; the second, a corrected text. In the same year Dillmann (Herzog's RE i. pp. 203-206) suggested that the numerous variations in the more widely read books of the NT, such as the Gospels, were due to the influence of the Copt. and Arab. versions. That such versions were known in Abyssinia he infers on the following grounds: Prolegomena translated from the Arab. were prefixed to the NT writings; names of NT books derived from the Arab. displaced occasionally in later times the native nomenclature of the NT books; e.g. the Acts were called Abrazis (= Ἰπράξεις), Revelation Abukalamis (= Ἀποκάλυψις). The Arabic-Coptic Sinódos became early naturalized in the Eth. Church.

These hints of Dillmann's are further developed by Guidi, who pointed out that such corrections are derived from an Arab. tr. circulating in Egypt (Guidi, Le Traduzioni degli Evangelii in Arabo e in Ethiopico, Accad. Lincei, 1888, p. 33 ff.). The MSS are affected in various degrees by these corrections. In some they appear side by side with the original text.

v. CRITICAL VALUE.—The Eth. version of the OT is generally a very faithful and verbal tr. of the Greek. It frequently reproduces the very order of the words. On the other hand, it is not possible to explain many of its readings by any extant Gr. text, and over-against the LXX it frequently attests a purer text. But its critical value cannot be determined until the questions discussed in the preceding section have been treated exhaustively.

As regards the NT, this version is related to the older type of text attested by the great Greek Vatican and Sinaitic MSS. It has also Western and Alexandrian and Syrian elements. But no critical text has yet been published.

vi. DATE.—Dillmann (Herzog's RE i. 203, 204) confidently ascribes the Eth. version to the 4th and 5th centuries of our era, and regards it as constituting not only the oldest memorial but also the foundation of Eth. literature. This conclusion he draws from the following facts: i. Christianity was already firmly established in the 5th cent. ii. The poet and musician Jared had already produced a church hymn in the 6th cent. iii. Chrysostom† (Hom. in Johann., Opera

Such as the MS E for the books of the Kings. See Dillmann, op. cit. ii. apparat. crit. p. 5; see also Zotenberg, Cat. pp. 9, 10, 11 on Version corrigée d'après le texte hébreu. Dorn called attention as early as 1825 to the use of the Heb. text in his Introduction to Ludolf's edition of the Psalter.

* For many interesting details see Reckendorf, 'Ueber den Werth der altäthiopischen Pentateuch-Übersetzung für die Reconstruction der Septuaginta,' in ZATW (1887) pp. 61-90. Among other points he controverts Cornill's view in his Commentary on Ezekiel (p. 67 ff.), that the Ethiopic version is derived from the Hesiychian recension of the LXX.

† ἄλλα καὶ Σύροι καὶ Αἰγύπτιοι καὶ Ἰνδοὶ καὶ Περσῶν καὶ Αἰθίοπες . . . εἰς τὴν αὐτῶν μεταβαλόντες γλώττων τὰ παρὰ τοῦτου δόγματα εἰσαχθῆντα, κ.τ.λ.

[Montfaucon], viii. p. 10) appears to have known of an Eth. version of the Bible. iv. The version is made directly from the Greek. Now, it was only in the first period of Eth. literature that translations were made from the Greek; for after the appearance of the Arab. language in Egypt, Eth. literature came under the sway of the Arabic.

The above views of Dillmann have recently been confirmed by the peculiar title used for God in Sir 31<sup>8</sup> 37<sup>21</sup>, i.e. Astár. This shows that heathenism still prevailed when this book was translated (Dillmann, V.T. Æthiopici, Tom. v. p. 117). Guidi assigns the version to the end of the 5th and the beginning of the 6th cent. Lagarde's view (Ankündigung einer neuen Ausgabe der griech. Uebersetzung des A.T.s, 1882, p. 28), that the version was made in the 14th cent., not from a Gr. but from an Arab. or an Egypt. translation of the original, is wholly contradicted by the evidence. We may safely assume that the version was completed before the 7th cent.

R. H. CHARLES.

ETH-KAZIN (ἠθ καζιν, where AV, misunderstanding the π locale, writes Ittah-kazin, as in same verse Gittah-hepher for Gath-hepher).—A town on the E. frontier of Zebulun, whose site has not been identified, Jos 19<sup>13</sup>. J. A. SELBIE.

ETHNAN (ἠθναν).—A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>7</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

ETHNARCH (ἠθναρχος).—In 2 Co 11<sup>32</sup> it is stated that 'in Damascus the ethnarch under Aretas the king guarded the city of the Damascenes,' the word ethnarch being tr. in both AV and RV by GOVERNOR. Its exact meaning seems doubtful: it is used of Simon the high priest (1 Mac 14<sup>27</sup> 15<sup>1-2</sup>), of Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 2), and of Archelaus (Ant. XVII. xi. 4; BJ II. vi. 3). It was also used for the governor of the Jews in Alexandria (Strabo, ap. Jos. Ant. XIV. vii. 2), and the head of the Jewish community in Pal. in the time of Origen (Origenes, Ep. ad Africanum, § 14). The last two instances suggest that the normal use of the word was for the ruler of a nation or ἔθνος living with separate laws and customs amongst those of a different race. But the sense of the term seems to have widened, and it became a little superior to that of tetrarch, but inferior to that of king (Schürer, HJP II. ii. 244, etc.). A. C. HEADLAM.

ETHNI (ἠθν).—An ancestor of Asaph (1 Ch 6<sup>41</sup>, called in v.<sup>21</sup> Jeatherai). See GENEALOGY.

ETHNOLOGY.—See RACES.

EUBULUS (Εὐβουλος).—A leading member of the Christian community at Rome, who sends greeting to Timothy through St. Paul at the time of the second imprisonment (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). His name is Greek, but nothing further is known of him. W. LOCK.

EUERGETES (Prol. to Sirach).—See BENEFACTOR.

EUMENES (Εὐμένης, 'well-disposed') II., king of Pergamus, succeeded his father Attalus in B.C. 197. Through the friendship of Rome he secured a large extension of his territories, so that his kingdom became for a time one of the greatest in the East. In B.C. 169 he was suspected of secret correspondence with the enemies of Rome, but died (probably in B.C. 159; see Clinton, F. H. iii. 403, 406) before an open rupture took place. The principal authorities for his life are Livy (Ann., esp. bk. xxxvii. and Epit. xli.), Polybius, and Appian, with Strabo xiii. p. 264, and Justin xxxi.

8, xxxii. 4. In 1 Mac 8<sup>8</sup> the Romans are said to have taken 'the country of India and Media and Lydia' from Antiochus the Great, and to have given these dominions to E. The MSS agree in this reading, which is, however, impossible, since India was never under the rule of Antiochus. Media, too, on account of its eastward position, is not likely to have ever been ceded to E. The best correction is to substitute, with Michaelis, Mysia for Media, and, with Grotius, Ionia for India. In agreement with this are Livy's statements (xxxvii. 44) that the Roman Senate required from Antiochus the cession of all Asia north of the Taurus, and of these districts granted (xxxvii. 55) the part north of the Mæander to Eumenes. R. W. MOSS.

EUNICE (Εὐνίκη, so Tisch., WH, with all the uncial MSS; not Εὐνελκη, as TR with many cursives).—The mother of Timothy, and probably the daughter of Lois (2 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>). The name is Greek, so that conceivably she may have been a proselyte; but this is not a necessary inference, and more probably she was by birth a Jewess (Ἰουδαίας, Ac 16<sup>1</sup>). She was married to a Gentile husband, and, probably out of deference to his prejudices, her son was not circumcised; but she gave him a God-fearing name (Τιμόθεος), and trained him carefully in the OT Scriptures (2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>). She was probably converted to Christianity on St. Paul's first visit to Lystra, as she is described as already a believer on the second visit (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>). She is not mentioned afterwards, but the curious addition of χόρας (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>) in cursive 25, and the substitution of it for Ἰουδαίας in Gig. fu., may embody a tradition of her widowhood; this would give a fresh point to the injunction in 1 Ti 5<sup>4</sup>. W. LOCK.

EUNUCH (εὐνυχ, σπάδων, εὐνοῦχος).—עֲרֹם is rendered in AV eunuch, officer, chamberlain. The employment of eunuchs in Oriental courts was one of the base accompaniments of polygamy and despotism. The harems of the monarchs were committed to their charge, and they frequently superintended the education of young princes. Much influence was thus at times acquired by them in affairs of state (see Rawlinson, Anc. Mon. iv. 175). They were often closely connected with the palace intrigues, which played so important a part in Oriental history. It seems that the Heb. word was also used in a wide sense of persons not emasculated, who held offices which were usually entrusted to eunuchs. Such is probably its use in the case of Potiphar (Gn 39<sup>1</sup>; Whiston's Jos. Ant. x. x. 2n.). Where the word occurs in 1 and 2 K, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether it bears its proper or its derived signification. Herodotus (viii. 105) says that 'among the barbarians eunuchs are more valued than others on account of their perfect fidelity,' and instances the case of Hermotimus, who was highly esteemed by Xerxes. Xenophon (Cyrop. vii. 5. 60 ff.), in giving the reasons why Cyrus employed them, alludes to the alleged fact that their having no domestic ties rendered them capable of peculiar devotion to the interests of their masters, and of gratitude to those who conferred honour and consideration upon them. They also naturally adhered to one able to protect them, as they found themselves objects of contempt to other men. He denies the allegation that they are lacking in vigour and excellent qualities, and illustrates their tendencies by the case of 'dogs, which, when castrated, cease to desert their masters, but are not at all less fitted for watching and the chase.'

The Law of Dt 23<sup>1</sup> (cf. Lv 22<sup>3</sup>) attaches a religious stigma to the condition. (See, for the prob. ground of this, Driver on Dt 23<sup>1</sup>). The prediction in 1 S 8<sup>15</sup> was designed to intimate the deterioration of the national life consequent upon the establishment of the kingdom, through the adoption of unsanctioned Gentile customs. Acc. to Herodotus (vi. 32), the Persians made eunuchs of the goodliest of the youth of captured countries; but as to whether Daniel and his companions were thus treated by the Bab. conquerors, no absolutely certain conclusions can be reached (cf. 2 K 20<sup>17, 18</sup>). Eunuchs were in the courts of the Herods in our Lord's time (Jos. Ant. xv. vii. 4; xvi. viii. 1); hence His allusion to them (Mt 19<sup>12</sup>) as familiar to His hearers. See ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.

G. WALKER.

EUODIA, AV Euodias (Εὐδία, fem. form of Eὐδολος). Both names are found in Gr. literature and on the inscriptions. The Euodias of AV seems to have arisen from a mistake of the translators, who took Eὐδολαν for the accusative of the masculine form Eὐδολος, and regarded it as the name of a man.—A Christian woman of Philippi, whom the Apostle Paul beseeches 'to be of the same mind in the Lord' with another Christian woman named Syntyche (Ph 4<sup>2</sup>). They may have been deaconesses, or women of some position in whose houses the brethren were accustomed to meet. The language of St. Paul suggests a religious difference rather than a private quarrel (Ph 2<sup>2</sup>). They may have represented different types of piety, or may have differed on some question of church life. St. Paul begs a certain Syzgyus, or, as some critics think, an unnamed 'true yoke-fellow,' to help forward the work of reconciliation, being mindful of the former services of these women to the cause of the gospel (Ph 4<sup>3</sup>). The theory of Baur, Schweigler, and Volkmar, that Euodia and Syntyche are symbolical names for Jewish and Gentile Christianity, is now generally abandoned. A mode of speaking so mysterious is out of harmony with the general tenor of the Epistle. J. GIBB.

EUPATOR (Εὐπάτωρ, 1 Mac 6<sup>17</sup> etc., 2 Mac 2<sup>20</sup> etc.), the surname of Antiochus V., son and successor of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. See ANTI-OCCHUS V.

EUPHRATES (ἡρᾱ, Εὐφράτης).—The Euphrates was called Pura-nun, 'the great water,' or simply Pura, 'the water,' in Sumerian, the pre-Semitic language of Chaldea (cf. Gn 15<sup>18</sup>). From this the Semitic Babylonians derived their Purat or Purattu with the feminine suffix. Purat is the Heb. Pêrath, the Old Persian Ufrātu, where the prosthetic u was explained as the word u, 'good,' and so gave rise to the Greek Eu-phra-tes. In the OT it is generally known as 'the river' (e.g. Dt 11<sup>24</sup>, Ex 23<sup>31</sup>), it being the largest and most notable river of Western Asia, and accordingly in Gn 2<sup>14</sup> alone of the rivers of Paradise no geographical description is given of it.* In Babylonia it was also called 'the river of Sippara' as well as the Uruttu, a dialectical form of Purattu.

The Euphrates (Arab. Frat) has two sources, one of which was called the Euphrates in antiquity; in Armenian, Yephra-; while the other, which rises to the south-east, the modern Murâd-Su, was termed the Arsanias, Arm. Aradzani, Arzanian in the Assy. inscriptions. They rise in two valleys of Armenia, from 6000 to 6500 feet high, the one in the Anti-Taurus, the other in Mount Ararat, and unite near Malatiyeh (Melitêne, Assy. Melid) in a valley about 2000 feet high, whence they flow eastward through a narrow gorge towards Syria. From this point to the alluvial plain of Babylonia the fall of the river is about 1000 feet in 700 miles, so that it is navigable only down stream. The high road from east to west passed it in OT times at Birtu (Birejik) and Carehemish (Jerabis). There was another passage at Thapsakos, the Tiphrah of 1 K 4<sup>24</sup>. A little to the south of Carehemish was Pethor (Assyr. Pitru), on the western bank at the junction of the Euphrates with the Sajur (Assyr. Sagura). Still farther south, but on the eastern bank, it was joined by the Belikh (Assyr. Balikh) and Khabûr (Assyr. Khabur, which came from the land of Gozan (Assyr. Guzanu, 2 K 17<sup>6</sup>). At the mouth of the Khabûr was Circesium (now Karkisia, Assy. Sirki). After this the Euphrates receives no more affluents; but northward of Sippara or Sepharvaim it approaches the Tigris very nearly, and by again widening out forms the plain of Babylonia. The Euphrates and Tigris now unite before falling into the sea, owing to the accumulation of silt at the head of the Persian Gulf, but in OT times they still entered the sea by separate mouths. The water of the Euphrates was dissipated over Babylonia by means of canals for the purposes of irrigation, and at its mouth were great salt marshes, called Marratu by the Babylonians (see Jer 50<sup>24</sup>). Here lived the Kaldâ or Chaldeans, with their capital Bit-Yakin, of which Merodach-baladan was king.

LITERATURE.—Frd. Delitzsch, Paradies, 169 f.; Schrader, KAT 34 f.; Chesney, Euphrates Exped. vol. i.; Loftus, Chaldea and Susiana; Layard, Nin. and Bab. chs. xxi.-xxii.; Rawlinson, Herodotus, i. Essay ix. A. H. SAYCE.

EUPOLEMUS (Εὐπόλεμος), the son of John, the son of Accos, one of the ambassadors sent to Rome by Judas Maccabæus, after his victory over Nicanor, in order to conclude an alliance between the Romans and the Jews in B.C. 161 (1 Mac 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Mac 4<sup>13</sup>, comp. Jos. Ant. xii. x. 6). Eupolemus has often been identified with the author of a history of the Jews, written in Greek, which is quoted by Alexander Polyhistor, Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 23), and Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix. 30-34). Since the historian Eupolemus seems to have written about B.C. 157, and was almost certainly a Jew, this identification may be correct (comp. Schürer, IJP ii. iii. 203 ff.).

H. A. WHITE.

EURAKUILO.—Euraquilo (εὐρακυῖλον) is the reading adopted at Ac 27<sup>14</sup> by WH and the RV, instead of Euroclydon in the TR and AV, as the name of the wind, which, suddenly descending from the heights of Crete on St. Paul's ship as it was sailing closely along the shore, seized it and drove it before the storm, which ended in the shipwreck on Melita. St. Luke describes the wind as, in character, 'typhonic' (RV 'tempestuous'), that is, marked by whirlwinds or 'sudden eddying squalls,' as Ramsay calls them, adding that 'every one who has any experience of sailing on lakes or bays overhung by mountains will appreciate the epithet "typhonic" which Luke uses' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 326), and by way of greater exactness adds its nautical name, 'which is called' (ὁ καλούμενος). Unhappily, the state of the text leaves the precise name doubtful. A summary of the various readings will be found in Sanday, Appendices ad NT, p. 140. The great mass of later testimony yields 'Euroclydon'; the oldest uncials AN have εὐρακυῖλον, and this was probably the reading of B*. To B<sup>2</sup> appear to be due the superimposed T and A which appear in this MS (ETPTAKATATON). B<sup>3</sup> then either turned A into Δ, or, if it was done by B<sup>2</sup>, patched up the letter afresh. Vercellone-Cozza in the appendix to their facsimile say 'εὐρακυῖλον B<sup>1</sup>, εὐρακυῖλον B<sup>3</sup>'. The Vulg. Cassiod. give Euro-aquilo. Apart from ampler attestation, Euroclydon may claim a preference as the more difficult reading, by positing which we may explain the others as emendations, but hardly the converse. The word in this form is not found anywhere else. The meaning of the compound is obscure. Etymologically, it would mean 'a surge raised by Eurys,' the E. or S.E. wind, but such a description of the effect could hardly be applied to the wind itself which caused it. If we should take the form εὐρυκλύδων (which occurs in B<sup>2</sup>, one or two cursives, and a gloss of the Etym. M. s.v. τυφών, and is approved by Griesb.) and derive it from εὐρύς, 'broad,' it would mean 'a wind raising a broad surge or surf'; but besides its lack of attestation, it is for the very reason of its greater suitability dismissed by Meyer as an obvious correction; and it would yield a character more or less applicable to any wind blowing strongly rather than such a note (e.g. of direction) as we might expect to be the basis of a distinctive nautical name. Eurakilo, on the other hand, commends itself not only by its early attestation, but by its special precision, as made up of Eurys the S.E. or rather (as Smith adduces strong reasons for holding) the E., and Aquilo the N.E., wind, fitly expressing the direction E.N.E. whence this wind blew. It well accords (a) with the narrative of the incidence and effects of the storm, and (b) with the experience of navigators in the Levant, quoted by Smith and others, in which 'southerly winds almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind.' The exception taken to the form as 'inadmissible' (Reuss and others), 'because it is composed of a Greek and a Latin element,' vanishes in presence of analogous compounds such as Euronotus and Euroauster, and of the probably mixed nationality of the sailors and traders to whom such coinages were primarily due; to say nothing of the survival, to which Renan calls attention, of the word Eurakilo itself in the name Gregolia given to the same wind by the Levantines 'as Euripus has become Egripou.' Following strict analogy, we might expect the word to be, as in the Vulg., Euroakilo, and the presence of a less regular form may have led to conjectural emendation (Overbeck); but we can hardly see how this should have deviated into so enigmatic a word as Euroclydon. Meyer says, 'Far more naturally would the converse take place, and the Εὐροκλύδων, not being understood, would be displaced by the similar Εὐρακλύδων . . . so that the latter form remains a product of old emendatory conjecture'—a curious anticipation, in this particular case, of the theory more recently formulated by Burgon and Miller as to the older witnesses whom they designate 'the licentious scribes of the West.' For them (Causes of the Corruption of the Traditional Text, p. 46 f.) this passage supplies a signal confirmation of their view, leading them to denounce in strong language Eurakilo as 'an imaginary name,' 'an impossible Latin name,' 'utterly missing the point, which is the violence of the wind as expressed in the term Euroclydon' (a remarkable begging of the question, where the violence of the wind had already been explicitly affirmed in the epithet 'typhonic'!). Why should these early copyists be thus severely blamed for suspecting some corruption to underlie the anomalous Euroclydon, and preferring the more intelligible Eurakilo on such grounds of internal probability as have since commended it to the majority of critics and commentators? But when we consider the mass of testimony on the side of Euroclydon, and the difficulty of accounting for the emergence of this form, if it had not been original, may we not find a feasible key to the solution of the problem in the view put forward by Conybeare and Howson (ii. p. 402 n.): 'The addition of the words ὁ καλούμενος seems to us to show that it was a name popularly given by the sailors to the wind; and nothing is more natural than that St. Luke should use the word which he heard the sailors employ on the occasion'?

* It is disputed whether Jer 13<sup>4-7</sup> really refers to the Euphrates see Ewald, ad loc.

LITERATURE.—The subject is discussed in the 'Lives of St. Paul' by Conybeare and Howson, Lewin, and others; at considerable length, but with unequal relevancy, by Falconer, Diss. on St. Paul's Voyage, 2nd ed. pp. 12-19, 24-26; most fully and satisfactorily by Smith, Voyage and Shipwreck, in his 'Diss. on the Wind Euroclydon,' p. 119 ff., with Appendices from Bentley and Granville Penn, pp. 287-292; cf. Blass, ad loc.

WILLIAM P. DICKSON.

EUTYCHUS (Εὐτυχος).—When St. Paul was at Troas on his final journey to Jerus., on the first day of the week he and his party, with the Christians of the place, assembled in an upper room to break bread. As St. Paul was leaving the next morning, his speech was lengthy, and a young man of the name of Eutychus, who was sitting at the window (ἐπὶ τῆς θυρίδος), fell asleep (perhaps owing to the heat of the many lamps that were lighted), and, falling down from the third storey, was taken up dead (ἦρθη νεκρός). St. Paul went down and embraced him, and bade them not trouble themselves, as his life was yet in him. Then he went upstairs, broke bread, and continued talking until the morning. As they departed the young man was brought to them alive (Ac 20<sup>7-12</sup>).

The incident occurs in the 'we' section of the Ac and is clearly authentic, but two opinions are held. It has been pointed out that it may be capable of a perfectly natural explanation, and it is suggested that it illustrates the growth of mythical stories on a basis of fact, and has been introduced here as a parallel incident to that related concerning Peter (9<sup>33-43</sup>). But Ramsay points out that St. Luke's language is very precise; that he does not, as in 14<sup>19</sup>, merely state that E. was thought to be dead, and that weight must be attached to his medical knowledge. Even if this be (as is perhaps the case) putting an unnatural strain on the words, it is perfectly clear that the story was related as an instance of the exhibition of power by the apostle, and that the writer, who was an eye-witness, believed it to be such.

LITERATURE.—Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 290; Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar. p. 402; Zeller, Acts, ii. p. 62, Eng. tr.

A. C. HEADLAM.

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής),— 'a preacher of good news,' the substantive of εὐαγγελίζω—or εὐαγγελίζομαι, the commoner bibl. form). The verb is used in bibl. Gr. occasionally in the general sense of class. Gr. (1 S 31<sup>1</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>19</sup>), and, when specialized, stands for the work of Gospel preachers of all kinds: the subst., however—which is rare, and entirely sacred and eccles., occurring in bibl. Gr. only in Ac 21<sup>8</sup>, Eph 4<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>—is confined strictly to the Christian good tidings, and, apparently, to a particular office or function (see Hort, Ecclesia, 158). The clearest evidence for the distinctness of office or function lies in Eph 4<sup>11</sup> '[Christ] gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers.' It is true that, in the list at 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, evangelists are omitted (also ἐπισκοποι and διακονοί); but there the point is, perhaps, to illustrate spiritual aptitude rather than to give an exhaustive list of eccles. offices. When a similar omission occurs, Ro 12<sup>6-8</sup>, St. Paul seems bent chiefly on distinguishing certain charismata, being content to leave the catalogue incomplete. Possibly, in each case local considerations partly account for the omissions. But in Eph the context suggests that the writer desires to mention all the principal offices, whereby Christ had provided for the spiritual edification of the Church universal, and εὐαγγελιστής appears to come third in order of institution and of spiritual significance. At the same time it is noticeable that we do not find the word (even in places where it might naturally be looked for) in any of the Pauline Epistles whose genuineness meets with most general acceptance. Subsequent reference will be made to the passage in the Pastoral Epistles, 2 Ti 4<sup>5</sup>; it will be sufficient here to say that the phrase ἔργον πόληρον εὐαγγελιστοῦ, 'do the work of an evangelist,' is too marked and peculiar to be satisfactorily interpreted as merely equivalent to 'preach the Gospel.' The third and last instance—that in Ac 21<sup>3</sup> (a verse in one of the 'we' passages), 'we came unto Caesarea; and entering into the house of Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven, we abode with him'—must be compared with Ac 8<sup>5-40</sup>, where it is said that among those who were scattered from Jerus. after the martyrdom of Stephen, and went hither and thither preaching the word, Philip preached the Christ at Samaria, without being qualified (v. 14<sup>1</sup>), to impart the Holy Spirit; was sent by the Spirit to teach the Ethiopian eunuch in the desert between Jerus. and Gaza; was afterwards carried off by the Spirit and found at Azotus; and, finally, having evangelized 'all the cities' in his route, took up his abode at Caesarea. He may therefore have been called εὐαγγελιστής, not because he had been definitely set apart for the office, but because of the missionary work he had done and was perhaps still doing with Caesarea as centre. He had, in fact, been set apart for something else, 'to serve tables' (Ac 6<sup>1-6</sup>, 21<sup>8</sup>), but had superadded, and possibly, in the end, substituted, the work of a missionary, because he was, like Stephen, 'full of the Holy Ghost' (Ac 6<sup>8</sup>), and possessed the charisma for the work of preaching to those who had not heard the Gospel before.

The three passages, as above discussed and illustrated, suggest the following conclusions: (1) The evangelists were inferior to the apostles. They are placed third in order in Eph; Philip was unable to impart the Holy Spirit to the Samaritans; Timothy was the assistant and delegate of St. Paul. Consistent with this conclusion is the epigram of Pseudo-Jerome (in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) 'omnis apostolus evangelista, non omnis evangelista apostolus.' (2) They were travelling missionaries, preaching the Gospel to those unacquainted with it, yet sometimes with a settled place of abode, as Philip at Caesarea, and Timothy at Ephesus. Thus they were officers acting for the whole Christian community, not for a single church only. Their function could be general, covering wide districts, or it could be, in practice, local and circumscribed. Thus Theodoret's apparently contradictory statements can be reconciled: περίβρτες ἐκήρυττον, yet μη περιβρτες πανταχοῦ. 'Going about they used to preach,' yet 'not going about everywhere' (as apostles might do). (3) They were charismatically endowed. Compare the influence of the Holy Spirit upon Philip, and the χάρισμα of Timothy (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>). Yet the revelations to the prophet and apostle were of a higher and more striking order. The apostles were fitted to be the direct authoritative representatives of Christ (Mt 10<sup>40</sup>, Gal 4<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>23</sup>); the prophets, to sway the heart and conscience by the demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Co 14<sup>24</sup>); the evangelists were more 'matter-of-fact men,' preaching the word, communicating the facts of the Gospel, paving the way for the more systematic work of the pastors and teachers (see order in Eph 4<sup>11</sup>) who watched over and trained the churches when founded (2 Ti 4<sup>2-5</sup>). But while this may suffice for a distinction in work, it must not be taken as exclusive, so that apostles could not be prophets, or that apostles and prophets could not be evangelists, or that evangelists could not be pastors or teachers, or both. In the floating constitution of the half-organized early Church, different kinds of work were amalgamated (as must always happen) according to qualifications and circumstances (cf. 1 Co 1<sup>17</sup>, Ac 8<sup>25</sup>, and the mixed instructions to Timothy and Titus). (4) They were, sometimes at any rate, solemnly set apart for the special function. Thus Timothy (1 Ti 4<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>6</sup>); and probably Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13<sup>1-3</sup>) were (so far as the Church was concerned) set apart, in the first instance, not as apostles, but as evangelists from among the 'prophets and teachers' at Antioch.

But we are still left in much uncertainty as to the exact position of the εὐαγγελιστής, and this uncertainty is increased rather than diminished by the contributions of later literature to the subject. Why, for instance, is there no mention of evangelists in the Apostolic Fathers? Because, says Harnack, there was no definite primitive distinction between apostle and evangelist, and in the Didaché the 'apostles' are just evangelists. But why should not evangelist have survived, and apostle have been reserved (as in later days) for the first direct representatives of Christ? And, further, when in the Didaché the 'apostles' are forbidden to stay more than two days in the same place, can we regard them as parallels to Paul, or Philip, or Timothy, especially as in a letter to the last named such constant itinerancy is condemned (1 Ti 5<sup>13</sup>)? Of course the strict injunction in the Didaché may be due to the growing opportunities for imposing upon the hospitality of well-to-do Christians, and the missionaries referred to in 1 Ti may have been caricatures of the evangelist type; but the difference is striking. A partial reply to the former question may be that the extension of the apostolate beyond the Twelve and St. Paul (an extension obtaining apparently in the apostolic age itself) soon submerged the less familiar and less dignified name of evangelist. This, however, scarcely accounts for the speedy and growing exclusiveness of the apostolic title; or for the fact that Eusebius recognizes in Pantænus the evangelist a type of an old order still largely surviving in the days of the Alexandrian, but not common in his own days (Eus. HE v. 10).

The material Eusebius affords us on this subject, though to some extent unhistorical, throws back light on the primitive use of the term evangelist. He tells how Pantænus found that his arrival in India had been anticipated by the written Gospel of Matthew; he tells how Thaddæus, one of the Seventy, had been sent by the Apostle Thomas, under divine impulse, to Edessa, as a preacher and evangelist of the teaching of Christ (HE i. 13), and this 'teaching' (also called 'the seed of the word of God') is the story of Jesus (§ 19). We may combine these hints with the fact that Eusebius (leaving the rest unmentioned) avowedly records 'the names of those [post-apostolic evangelists] only who have transmitted the apostolic doctrine to us in writings still extant'; that Theodoret definitely restricted the name to this class; that, finally, Ecumenius and Chrysostom confined the name to the writers of the Four Gospels; and that εὐαγγελιστής became (in the Apostolic Ordinances, Harnack, Texte, ii. 5) an appellation of the ἀναγνώστης, the reader of the Gospel for the day, who had also to be διηγητικός, capable of explaining it. We may further recall that Philip interpreted the prophet Isaiah to the eunuch; that Apollos (probably an evangelist) was mighty in the Scriptures; that he had been taught the 'way of the Lord' more perfectly by Aquila and Priscilla (probably evangelists also, as Theophylact believes); that Timothy the evangelist was strong in the Scriptures, one of the reasons doubtless for his choice; that Paul passes on to Timothy the 'deposit' of the Gospel he had received from Christ, exhorts him to keep the original model of sound words, and reminds him of the word that is trustworthy, and of the (open) mystery of godliness which is the story of Jesus (2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>, 1 Ti 6<sup>20, 15</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>; cf. Tit 3<sup>8</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>). We shall, then, favour the conclusion that the NT evangelists, as such, were depositaries of the facts of the Gospel as it gradually crystallized; dealing with these facts orally and in writing, now as missionaries, now as interpreters, without the special σοφία of the apostles, or their peculiar weight and authority; demi-apostolic men, with a charisma, but one not so commanding as that of the apostle, or so striking as that of the prophet. In a word, they might be called specially inspired teachers; the εὐαγγελιστῆς being distinctively and originally a teacher abroad, aggressive, awakening; the διδάσκαλος a teacher at home, quiet and edifying. If this was the practical difference between evangelist and teacher, we can better understand Eph 4<sup>11</sup> 'some (general and missionary) evangelists, and some pastors and teachers' (local officers with the double capacity for moral supervision and for instruction in doctrine). We can better understand 1 Co 12<sup>28</sup>, where διδασκάλους (in the third place) would include evangelists. We can better understand how, in the letters to Timothy the 'evangelist,' so great a stress is laid on teaching. Furthermore, we can better understand the meaning of teacher in the Didaché, when the phrase, 'whoever cometh and teacheth, you,' is followed immediately by 'but in regard to the apostles and prophets' (ch. 11); here the teacher seems to be a wandering teacher, that is, an evangelist; and the order 'apostles and prophets' is so far against the supposition that the apostles are evangelists. This contention is confirmed by the order in other passages, e.g. (ch. 15) 'Bishops and deacons . . . they too render you the service of prophets and teachers' [when, i.e. you have none such sojourning among you]; for 'prophets and teachers' may 'settle among' them (ch. 13), though apostles may not.

If this progressive convergence of evangelist and teacher be a fact, it is easy to see how the title of apostle became increasingly exclusive, and how the title of evangelist gradually confined itself to the writers of the Four Gospels. See CHURCH, p. 433.

LITERATURE.—Zöckler, Diakonen und Evangelisten; Réville, Les origines de l'épiscopat; Sohm, Kirchenrecht; Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age (Eng. tr.); Harnack, Texte u. Lehre der Apostel; Zahn, Missionsmethoden im Zeitalter der Apostel; Smith, DB, art. 'Evangelist.'

J. MASSIE.

EVE (הַבַּיָּהָה havvah),* is the name given in J to the first woman, the wife of Adam, the mother of Cain, Abel, and Seth. In Gn 3<sup>20</sup> (which is sometimes regarded as a gloss) it is said that she was so named because הַבַּיָּהָה havvah 'she was the mother of all living,' i.e. of course, 'all living men.' הַבַּיָּהָה is a form of the widespread Sem. root הָיָה, הֵי, or הָיָה, = life, as LXX, Oxf. Heb. Lex.; rather than living (RVm Living or Life), or life-giving (Symm.), as if a shortened Pi. ptep. W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage in Arabia, p. 177) makes Havvah a phonetic variation of hayy, and thus a personification of the bond of kinship, conceived as exclusively mother-kinship (hayy). Wellh. (Proleg. 303 n. Eng. tr.) follows Nöldeke in suggesting that havvah = serpent, as explained in Philo (de agric. Noe, § 21) and Midrash Rabbah on Gn 3<sup>20</sup>, and finds here a trace of the primitive belief that all earthly life originated in a primeval serpent (cf. the function of Tiamat in the Bab. cosmology, and Arab. hayyatun, serpent).

* LXX Gn 3<sup>20</sup> Ζωή, 41. 25 Εἰσα (the Εἰσαν of v. 25 has no equivalent in the Heb.), so also in NT 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, 1 Ti 2<sup>13</sup>. In Gn 3<sup>20</sup> Aq. has Αἰα or Αἰσα, and Symm. Ζωογίνοτος. Tisch. writes Εἰσα both in OT and NT, but WH (ii. 313) point out that in the absence of MS evidence as to breathings, the only safe guide is the initial η of the Heb. Cf. also the Vulg. Heva, both in OT and NT.

For Eve's relation to Adam, and the account of her in the narrative of the Creation* and the Fall, see ADAM. Her utterance on the birth of Cain, Gn 4<sup>1</sup>, is very obscure, —הָיָה אִישׁ אֶחָד קָנִי 'I have gotten a man,' AV 'from the Lord,' with Targ. Onk.; RV 'with the help of the Lord,' with LXX, διὰ τοῦ θεοῦ; Vulg. per deum; Symm. σύν κυρίου. Another Gr. tr. quoted in Field's Hexapla, ἐκ τῆς ἡμῶν ἀνθρώπων κύριον, 'I have gotten a man, even the Lord,' has been adopted by Luther and others, and understood as expressing Eve's conviction that the promised Messiah of 3<sup>15</sup> had been born. Umbreit proposed 'I have gotten J' for a husband.' The RV is the only probable translation. The text is possibly corrupt. (See CAIN).

W. H. BENNETT.

EVENING.—See TIME.

EVENT occurs thrice in Ec (2<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>2, 3</sup>) as the tr. of mišreḥ in the obsol. sense of 'that which befalls,' 'fate': as 9<sup>2</sup> 'There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked.' Cf. Shaks. 2 Henry IV. iv. ii. 83—

'Against ill chances men are ever merry,
But heaviness foreruns the good event.'

Elsewhere event is found only in the sense of 'issue,' 'result,' Wis 8<sup>9</sup> '[Wisdom] foreseeth . . . the events of seasons and times' (ἐκβάσεις); 2 Mac 9<sup>23</sup> 'expect what shall be the event' (τὸ ἀποβήσμενον). This, which is the common meaning of Lat. eventus, is most frequent in writers of the time of AV, as Shaks. T. of Shrew, III. ii. 126—

'I'll after him, and see the event of this.'

The mod. sense of an occurrence is very rare in writers of the period. Carlyle quotes Cromwell (Letters, 12 Sept. 1650) '[We do not think] of the hand of the great God in this mighty and strange appearance of His; but can slightly call it an "event."' J. HASTINGS.

EVERLASTINGNESS.—For everlasting see ESCHATOLOGY. 'Everlastingness,' once common for 'eternity,' is now used only where its special signification is emphasized, as Cheyne, Isaiah, i. 242, 'The idea of the divine everlastingness is one of the primary notes of the prophecy.' It occurs only 2 Es 8<sup>20</sup> 'O Lord, thou that dwellest in everlastingness' (qui inhabitas sæculum, RV 'abidest for ever,' RVm 'inhabitest eternity'). Wyc. (1388) translates Is 57<sup>15</sup> 'For the Lord high, and enhaunsid, seith these things, that dwellith in euerlastyngnesse.' J. HASTINGS.

EVERY is occasionally found in AV where mod. usage demands 'each,' as 2 S 21<sup>20</sup> 'a man of great stature, that had on every hand six fingers, and on every foot six toes'; 2 Es 3<sup>10</sup> 'it came to pass in every of them' (RV omits); † Rev 21<sup>21</sup> 'every several gate was of one pearl' (RV 'each one of the several gates'). Cf. Cranmer, Works, i. 111, 'In my right hearty wise I commend me unto you, and likewise

* The line of an Assy. Bab. magical text is often read as,

'The woman from the loins of the man they bring forth,' and quoted as a parallel to the formation of Eve from the ribs of Adam. But when this line is correctly tr. and read in its context, the parallel entirely disappears; 'they' are demons, and the passage narrates their ubiquity and mischief; they enter houses through locked doors, like a snake or the wind, and 'A woman [who is] at the loins (?) of a man they lead away.

A child [who is] at the knee of a man they draw forth.

A noble [who is] at the house of his kindred they drive out.'

J. D. Davis, Genesis and Sem. Trad. 49.

See throughout, Oxf. Heb. Lex. הָיָה, Dillm. on Gn 3<sup>20</sup> 41.

† Cf. T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 4, 'he made as wel the great as the smal, and careth for euery of them equally.'

to everich* of you.' Cf. also Ex 35<sup>10</sup> 'every wise hearted among you.'

Trench (On the Auth. Ver. of NT, p. 63) points out that both 'each' and 'every' take occasionally plu. concord, as Ph 2<sup>3</sup> 'Let each esteem other better than themselves'; Rev 20<sup>13</sup> 'They were judged every man according to their works.' He adds, "'each" and "every," though alike implying many, alike resolve that many into its units, and refer to it in these its constituent parts, with only the difference that "each" segregates, and "every" aggregates, the units which comprise it.'

J. HASTINGS.

EVI (עִי 'desire' (?)).—One of the five kings of Midian slain, Nu 31<sup>8</sup>, Jos 13<sup>21</sup> (Edd) P.

EVIDENCE, EVIDENTLY.—Following Coverdale, AV has translated עֵד, šēpher (lit. 'book') by 'evidence' in Jer 32<sup>10, 11, 12, 14</sup> ter. 16, 44. The meaning is 'title-deeds.' Coke (1628) says, 'Writings under seale, as Charters and Deeds, and other writings without seale, as Court Rolles, Accounts, and the like . . . are called Evidences.' RV gives 'deed' throughout. Cf. T. Adams, II Peter, p. 23 (on 1<sup>2</sup>), 'Therefore a man should be often perusing and looking over his own evidence, as we review our assurances of worldly possessions, that he may be sure of the whole and every part of it: for it is dangerous to have any flaw or defect in our conveyance of salvation.'

'Evidence' is also the tr. of *Ἀεγχο*s in its single occurrence in NT, He 11<sup>1</sup> (RV 'proving,' R<sup>V</sup>m 'test') 'Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.' This is the Bishops' tr<sup>a</sup>, Wyclif having 'an argument of things not aperynge,' Tind. 'a certayntie of things which are not sene,' Gen. 'sheweth evidently the things which are not sene.'

'Evidently' is the tr<sup>a</sup> of φανερῶς, Ac 10<sup>3</sup> 'He saw in a vision evidently about the ninth hour of the day an angel of God coming in to him' (RV 'openly'); and of the prep. προ- in προεγράφη, Gal 3<sup>1</sup> 'before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified' (RV 'openly'). In both places 'evidently' has the obsol. meaning of 'clearly,' 'distinctly,' as in Knox, Hist. 261, 'And lest that your Honors should doubt in any of these premises, we offer ourselves evidently to prove, That,' etc.

J. HASTINGS.

EVIL.—This word is likely to become obsolete except in the theological sense of the doctrine of evil (for which see SIN).† In AV it is freely used as subst., adj., and adverb. 1. As subst., often in immed. antithesis to 'good,' as Gn 2<sup>9</sup> 'the tree of knowledge (RV 'the knowledge') of good and evil' (טֹב ורָע); 2 Es 24<sup>4</sup> 'I have broken the evil in pieces, and created the good' (malum et . . . bonum): sometimes in the plu., as Pr 14<sup>19</sup> 'The evil bow before the good' (שָׁלוֹם רָעִים לִפְנֵי טוֹבִים). 2. As adj. 'evil' is applied, not only to things, but even to persons, a usage now quite obsolete; thus Jer 12<sup>14</sup> 'all mine evil neighbours.' Cf. Knox, Hist.

* 'Every' is 'ever each'; the above example shows it in process of formation; and the two words are often practically interchangeable, as Milton, Comus, 311—

'I know each lane and every alley green.'

† The loss of 'evil' seems to be the result of a discrimination in words with cognate meaning. The AV used 'evil,' 'bad,' 'naughty,' quite indiscriminately. Thus in Jer 24<sup>2, 3</sup> 'the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad . . . the good figs, very good; and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.' This goes farther in the way of variety than the earlier versions by introducing 'bad.' The Heb. is the same throughout, and RV gives 'bad' throughout.

In Mt 21<sup>41</sup> the AV has followed the Bishops, 'he will miserably destroy those wicked men,' and has thus lost the force of the Greek (καταστρέψει καὶ ἀπολέσει αὐτούς). Tindale is no better, 'He will cruelly destroy those evyll persons.' But Wyclif, 'He schal leste (=destroy) yuel the yuele men'; Rheims, 'The naughty men he will bring to naught'; and RV 'He will miserably destroy those miserable men,' all give the repetition its advantage.

283, 'He had a very evil woman to his wife.' For 'evil spirit' (Lk 7<sup>21</sup> 8<sup>2</sup>, Ac 19<sup>12, 13, 15, 16</sup>) see DEMON. In Mt 5<sup>37</sup> 6<sup>13</sup> RV prefers 'the evil one' to AV 'the evil,' and in 1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup> for AV 'wickedness': see DEMON, and consult Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision<sup>2</sup>, pp. 269-323; Chase, Lord's Prayer in Early Church ('Texts and Studies,' i. iii.), pp. 71-167. The 'evil eye' is a Heb. expression for ENVY (which see). 3. As adv. chiefly in the phrase 'evil entreat' (Ex 5<sup>22</sup>, Dt 26<sup>6</sup>, Job 24<sup>21</sup>, To 10<sup>12</sup>, Sir 7<sup>20</sup> 33<sup>31</sup>, Ac 7<sup>6</sup>): the other phrases are 'went evil with' (1 Ch 7<sup>23</sup>); 'evil affected' (Ad. Est 13<sup>5</sup>, Ac 14<sup>2</sup>); 'evil spoken of' (Sir 38<sup>17</sup>, Ro 14<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>30</sup>); 'fare evil' (Sir 3<sup>26</sup>). Cf. Grindal, Letter to Q. Eliz. (Parker Soc. ed. p. 381) 'Much like to the Popish Bishops in your father's time, who would have had the English translation of the Bible called in, as evil translated; and the new translating thereof to have been committed to themselves; which they never intended to perform.'

Evilfavouredness.—See FAVOUR.

J. HASTINGS.

EVIL-MERODACH (אֵיל מֶרֶדַּח) was the son and successor of the great Nebuchadnezzar on the throne of Babylon. According to 2 K 25<sup>27-30</sup>, he promoted the captive king of Jerus., Jehoiachin, in the 37th year of his captivity, set his throne above the thrones of the kings who were with him in prison, changed his prison garments, and made him a guest at the royal table to the end of his life. The Sept. reads Εὐθαλμαρωδέκ, and Berosus Ἀμυλμαρωδόκος. The cuneiform equivalent of his name is Amēl(Avēl)-Maruduk (cf. Haupt in Zeitsch. f. Assyriol. ii. 266 and 284 f.), 'man (servant) of Mero-dach.' According to Berosus, he administered the kingdom during his two years' reign (562-560) with indiscretion and wanton unrestraint. Tiele (Bab.-Assyriol. Ges. pp. 457, 464) concludes, on the basis of this character of E.-M., that the benevolent act towards Jehoiachin should be attributed to his successor on the throne of Babylon. We possess as yet none of his annals, though several contract tablets date from his reign. In the year 560 his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (Nergal-šar-ušur, 'Nergal preserve the king'), in a conspiracy, slew him and seized the throne.

LITERATURE.—Meyer, Gesch. d. Alterthums, vol. i. p. 597; Delitzsch, Heb. Lang. p. 12; Boscawen, Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch. vol. vi. p. 1 ff.; and authorities above cited.

IRA M. PRICE.

EVIL SPEAKING.—See SLANDER. EVIL SPIRIT.—See DEMON.

EXACT.—1. The adj., only Sir 51<sup>19</sup> 'In my doings I was exact' (ἐν ποιήσει μου διεκριβασάμην A, but B has ἐν ποιήσει λιμοῦ διεκριβασάμην, 'in the doing of hunger (?) I was exact'; Fritzsche suggests, and most edd. adopt, νόμου, 'in the doing of the law'). Here 'exact' means 'strict,' 'particular,' as Shaks. Troil. and Cres. IV. v. 232—

'Now, Hector, I have fed mine eyes on thee;
I have with exact view perused thee, Hector,' and Herbert, The Temple: 'Faith,' l. 43—

'What though my bodie runne to dust?
Faith cleaves unto it, counting every grain
With an exact and most particular trust,
Reserving all for flesh again.'

2. As verb frequently. Notice Ps 89<sup>22</sup> 'The enemy shall not exact upon him' (לֹא יִשְׁתָּבֵז, R<sup>V</sup>m 'do him violence'): the mod. phrase is 'impose exactions upon.' Cf. Burnet (1687), Trav. ii. 86, 'Innkeepers think they have a right to exact upon Strangers.'

In Lk 31<sup>3</sup> RV has changed 'Exact no more than that which is appointed you' into 'Extort no more,' etc. But 'exact' was surely strong enough; were they permitted to extort anything? Tind. has 'require.' Following the Vulg. faciat, Wyclif has 'do ye no more,' and Rheims 'Doe nothing more,' which seems a natural reply to 'What shall we do?' But the Greek verbs are not the same, τίς οὖν ποιήσμεν (TR ποιήσωμεν) and Μηδὲν . . .

πράσσει; and πράσσειν has the sense of exacting both in class. Greek and in Lk 19<sup>23</sup> (EV 'require'). Agere is similarly used in Lat., and might have been chosen by Jerome here.

Exactly is found 2 Es 16<sup>64</sup> 'the Lord will exactly search out' (scrutinando scrutabit), and Sir 16<sup>25</sup> 'declare his knowledge exactly' (ἐν ἀκριβείᾳ). The sense is the same as 'exact' above, i.e. 'precisely'; cf. Shaks. Temp. I. ii. 499—

'But then exactly do
All points of my command.'

J. HASTINGS.

EXCEED.—The transitive use is now rare and almost confined to the sense of 'preponderate,' as Jowett, Plato<sup>2</sup>, v. 76, 'Men always choose the life which exceeds in pleasure.' But in AV we find the sense of 'go too far,' without introducing a comparison, 1 S 20<sup>41</sup> 'They . . . wept one with another, until David exceeded' (תִּבְרַח); Job 36<sup>9</sup> 'Then he sheweth them their work, and their transgressions that they have exceeded' (תִּבְרַח); RV 'have behaved themselves proudly'; 2 Es 4<sup>24</sup> 'Do not thou hasten above the most Highest: for thy haste is in vain to be above him, for thou hast much exceeded' (excessus tuus multus, RV 'for he that is above [hasteneth] on behalf of many,' reading Excelsus autem propter multos, after Syr.); so Coverdale's tr. of Is 31<sup>6</sup> 'Therefore (O ye children of Israel) turne agayne, like as ye have exceeded in your goinge back' (AV and RV 'have deeply revolted'), and Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. ix. 3 (Selby's ed. p. 53) 'the scruples and superstitions of diet . . . in the law of Mahomet, do exceed.'

Exceeding is rare as an adj., only eight times,* while as adv. it is used 60 times at least, when it always qualifies an adj. Thus Mt 8<sup>28</sup> 'There met him two possessed with devils, coming out of the tombs, exceeding fierce' (χαλῆτοι ἄλαν; so Rheims; but Tind. Cov. Cran. and Gen. 1557, 'out of measure fearce'; Gen. 1560 and Bishops', 'very fierce'; Wye. 'ful wood').

Two cases of 'exceeding' as adv. demand attention: Jon 3<sup>3</sup> 'Nineveh was an exceeding great city,' and Ac 7<sup>20</sup> 'Moses . . . was exceeding fair.' The Heb. of Jon 3<sup>3</sup> is מְעַלְמִית וְנִדְרָה לְאֵלִים, lit. 'a city great unto God,' as RVm; and the Gr. of Ac 7<sup>20</sup> is ἄσπετος τῷ Θεῷ, lit. 'fair unto God,' as RVm again. AV and RV agree in taking both passages as a form of the superlative; and this is supported by 1 Ch 12<sup>22</sup> 'a great host, like the host of God.' But in the only other place where the identical expression occurs, Gn 10<sup>9</sup> (בְּרִיָּה לִפְנֵי יְהוָה), AV and RV give 'a mighty hunter before the Lord'; and it is probable that in the three passages the intention is to express, not merely the superlative, but the ideal of might, greatness, beauty, such as could be admitted into the presence of the All-perfect. There are similar expressions in the Psalter, Ps 36<sup>6</sup> AV 'the great mountains,' RV as Heb. 'the mountains of God'; 65<sup>9</sup> 'the river of God,' AV and RV; 80<sup>10</sup> AV 'the godly cedars,' RV as Heb. 'cedars of God,' 104<sup>16</sup> AV and RV 'the trees of the Lord'; but Perowne (Jonah, l.c.) is right in pointing out that in these passages the thought is different, being that of God's proprietorship, as indeed the last passage indicates, 'which he hath planted.'

Exceedingly also occurs some 50 times, being the form used with verbs (except Ac 26<sup>11</sup>, Gal 1<sup>14</sup>, passages in which AV first of Eng. versions uses this word). 'More exceedingly' is found Mk 15<sup>14</sup> (TR περισσώτερος, edd. περισσῶς, RV 'exceedingly'),

* The eight occurrences of 'exceeding' as an adj. are 2 Mac 8<sup>27</sup> 'yielding e. praise and thanks to the Lord' (τερπόμενος ἐλογονούντες καὶ ἔμολογούμενος τῷ Κυρίῳ, RV 'blessing and thanking the Lord exceedingly'); 15<sup>6</sup> 'in e. pride and haughtiness' (μετὰ πάσης ἀλαζονείας ὑψανθένων, RV 'hearing himself haughtily in all vaingloriousness,' RVm 'carrying his neck high'); 2 Co 4<sup>17</sup> 'a far more e. and eternal weight of glory' (καθ' ὑπερβολὴν εἰς ὑπερβολὴν αἰώνιον βάρος δόξης, RV 'more and more exceedingly an eternal weight'); 9<sup>14</sup> 'for the e. grace of God' (διὰ τὴν ὑπερβάλλονσαν χάριν); Eph 1<sup>19</sup> 'the e. greatness of his power' (τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μὴνθος); 2<sup>7</sup> 'the e. riches of his grace' (τὸ ὑπερβάλλον πλοῦτος); 1 P 4<sup>13</sup> 'that ye may be glad also with e. joy' (ὡς καὶ . . . χαρῆτε ἀγαλλόμενοι); Jude 24 'with e. joy' (ἐν ἀγαλλίσει, RV 'in e. joy'). Thus in every instance the meaning is 'surpassingly great'; the word never has the sense of excessive or immoderate, which we find, e.g., in Sandys, (1585) Sermons, 315, 'Why was Anna so exceeding in craving children at the hands of God?'

Gal 1<sup>14</sup> (περισσώτερος); and 'exceedingly the more,' 2 Co 7<sup>13</sup> 'e. the more joyed we,' (περισσώτερος μᾶλλον ἐχάρημεν). Notice also 'very exceedingly,' Gn 27<sup>33</sup> 'And Isaac trembled very e.' (קָרַע וְיִצְחָק וַיִּרְדָּה לִפְנֵי יְהוָה, lit., as AVm, 'trembled with a great trembling greatly'; LXX, ἐξέστη δὲ Ἰσαὰκ ἐκστασιν μεγάλην σφόδρα; Geneva, 'Then Izhák was stricken with a meruelous great feare'; Bishops', 'And Isahae was greatly astonished out of measure'; Dillmann, 'Da erschrak Isaak grossen Erschreckens über die Massen'; other translations are less forcible).

J. HASTINGS.

EXCELLENCY.—The verb to 'excel' occurs 13 times in AV, translating just as many different Heb. and Gr. words, but always distinctly with the sense of 'be pre-eminent over others,' 'surpass.' The idea of pre-eminence is seen even in Ps 103<sup>20</sup> 'ye his angels that excel in strength,' though the Heb. is הִבְרִיּוֹת gibbôrê kôah, lit. 'heroes of strength'; for, as Delitzsch says, it is because to the angel hosts belong strength unequalled that they are summoned now to praise God in company with the Church on earth, whose dignity surpasses every other created thing.

Pre-eminence is also the leading thought in the word 'excellency.' 1. Sometimes the quality in which the pre-eminence appears is stated; thus Gn 49<sup>8</sup> 'the excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power' (וְהָיָה שֵׁם יְהוָה וְהָיָה שֵׁם יְהוָה, i.e. says Delitzsch, precedence, both in respect and in power, is due to Reuben above his brethren, because he is the first-born; Ezk 24<sup>21</sup> 'I will profane my sanctuary, the excellency of your strength,' i.e. the place of pre-eminent strength (Heb. מִקְדָּשׁ הַכֹּחַ, RV 'the pride of your power'); 1 Co 2<sup>1</sup> 'I . . . came not with excellency of speech or of wisdom' (καθ' ὑπεροχὴν λόγου ἢ σοφίας. 'The word ὑπεροχὴ denotes strictly the act of overhanging, or the thing which overhangs; hence superiority, pre-eminence: by Byzantine writers it is used in the sense "your Excellency"'—Godet); Ph 3<sup>8</sup> 'the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus' (τὸ ὑπερέχον); 2 Co 4<sup>7</sup> 'that the excellency of the power may be of God' (ἡ ὑπερβολή, RV 'exceeding greatness,' but 'superiority,' 'pre-eminence,' is always the meaning of the word). 2. More often the 'excellency' is of no special quality; but even then the Eng. word, as understood in 1611, though less precise is not less forcible than its Heb. or Gr. equivalents, for it has always in it the sense of superiority, uniqueness. Cf. Pref. to AV 1611, 'for the worth and excellency thereof above the rest'; Pr. Bk. 1552 (Keeling, p. 382), 'Forasmuch then as your Office is of so great excellency, and of so great difficulty'; Bacon, Adv. of Learn. II. xiii. 27 (Selby, p. 149), 'Julius Caesar . . . at first was an orator or pleader; but when he saw the excellency of Cicero, Hortensius, Catullus, and others . . . he . . . transferred his designs to a martial greatness.' The two words chiefly translated 'excellency' in AV are: (1) ἵνα γὰρ ὅτι (Ex 15<sup>7</sup>, Job 37<sup>4</sup>, of J'; Ps 47<sup>4</sup>, Am 6<sup>8</sup> 87, Nah 2<sup>2</sup>, of 'Jacob'; Is 60<sup>15</sup> of Zion; Ezk 24<sup>21</sup> of the temple; Is 13<sup>19</sup> of the Chaldeans), a word which primarily means 'exaltation,' hence majesty which is pre-eminent; (2) κατὰ γὰρ ὁὐδὴν (Dt 33<sup>26</sup>, 29, Ps 68<sup>24</sup>, all of J'), a word of less honour than the preceding, being used indeed most frequently of 'pride' in a bad sense; still it is not inaptly translated 'excellency' in those passages, the reference being always to the unique 'dignity' of J'. (See also Driver, Joel and Amos, 1897, p. 238 f.).

In old writers 'excellence' and 'excellency' are both in use without difference of meaning. Shaks. uses 'excellency' 19 times, 'excellency' only thrice; AV has 'excellency' 29 times, 'excellency' not once. 'Excellency' has now given place to 'excellence,' and the word has greatly deteriorated: the only use of 'excellency' is as a term of courtesy, 'your Excellency,' which may be applied to any petty governor; and 'excellence' itself has accepted the vague sense of general worth. The deterioration may be partly due to the still greater loss that has befallen the adj. excellent. In AV 'excellent' is probably never used without a distinct expression of comparison, 'superior,' 'pre-eminent.' Cf. T. Adams, II Peter (1633), p. 83, 'Jacob gave Reuben a blessing, but added, Thou shalt not be excellent'; and p. 83, 'Cain's outlawed stock were yet excellent in worldly things.' But comparisons are odious; Shaks. has a fondness for using it ironically, and in course of time it has dropped down to merely 'very good.' J. HASTINGS.

EXCELLENT, or rather MOST EXCELLENT, is the regular tr. in RV for the word κράτιστος, used as a title of respect four times, and always by St. Luke (Lk 1<sup>3</sup>, Ac 23<sup>26</sup> 24<sup>3</sup> 26<sup>25</sup>). In AV 'most noble' is substituted in the last two instances. In three of those passages we clearly have the formal address of a person of high rank: 'Claudius Lysias unto the most e. governor Felix'; 'most e. Felix'; 'But Paul saith, I am not mad, most e. Festus'; in the fourth (Lk 1<sup>3</sup>) it is used in the address to Theophilus, to whom St. Luke dedicated both his works, and a question of some interest arises as to whether we can assert from the use of the term elsewhere that Theophilus must have been also of high rank and position. So Theophylact, Arg. in Ev. sec. Luc: 'He writes to Theophilus, a man of senatorial rank, and also a magistrate (συγκλητικὸν ὄντα καὶ ἀρχοντα ἴσως), for the word κράτιστος was used of magistrates and governors (ἀρχόντων καὶ ἡγεμόνων), as also Paul says, addressing the governor Festus: "Most e. Festus." The authority of a Byzantine commentator would, however, be delusive on such a question, as the meaning of language changes, and the question must be settled by contemporary usage.

1. There can be no doubt that from the 1st cent. onwards the word was an official title, but there is no proof that it was always so used. For instance in Jos., although in Ant. XVIII. viii. 4, XX. i. 2 we find the technical sense, in Ant. IV. vi. 8 (ὁ κράτιστος νεανίω) it is certainly not so used, while in the dedication of the treatise against Apion to Epaphroditus, who was a freedman and procurator, the variation κράτιστε ἀνδρῶν seems to suggest a different tone (c. Ap. i. 1; Vita, 76). Cf. 2 Mac 4<sup>12</sup>.

2. On the other hand, the usage of St. Luke seems more fixed. In those cases where the word occurs, it is certainly used as an official address, and is probably (we cannot say certainly) so used in the fourth instance. In any case there is certainly a difference in usage between St. Luke and Josephus, which makes it improbable that there is in this case any literary connexion between the two.

LITERATURE.—Otto, De Epistola ad Diognetum, 1845, p. 79, ed. ii. p. 51; Krenkel, Josephus und Lucas, p. 53; Ramsay, St. Paul the Trav. p. 338. A. C. HEADLAM.

EXCEPT.—The verb occurs only 1 Co 15<sup>27</sup> 'But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him,' that is, an exception is made in his favour, he is left out of account. This is Coverdale's tr., and illustrates the oldest meaning of the verb. Cf. Shaks. Jul. Cæs. II. i. 281—

'Within the bond of marriage, tell me, Brutus,
Is it excepted, I should know no secrets
That appertain to you?'

In their Preface the translators of AV use 'except against' for take exception to; 'men not to be excepted against by them of Rome'; 'none of them feare to dissent from him, nor yet to except against him'; 'Truly (good Christian Reader) wee neuer thought from the beginning, that we should neede to make a new Translation, nor yet to make of a had one a good one, (for then the imputation of Sietus had been true in some sort, that our people had hene fed with gall of Dragons in stead of wine, with whey in stead of milke); hut to make a good one better, or out of many good ones, one principall good one, not lustily to be excepted against; that hath been our indeanour, that our marke.' Cf. Knox, Hist. 447, 'the sincerer sort of the Ministrie in England had not yet assaulted the jurisdiction and Church gouernement (which they did not till the year 1572, at which time they published their first and second admonition to the Parliament), but only had excepted against superstitious apparell, and some other faults in the service Booke.'

As past ptep. of the verb to except, we find excepted, as Kingesmyll, Man's Est. v. (1580) 21, 'They eate of the excepted tree'; and Milton, PL xi. 426—

'Some to spring from thee, who never touch'd
Th' excepted tree.'

But more frequently except (as Tindale, Works, i. 213, 'Here is no man except, but all souls must obey'), and then very often following its subst., as Ac 26<sup>29</sup> Cov. 'these bondes excepte'; Bacon, Adv. Learn. i. (Selby's ed. p. 62, l. 8), 'the divineness of souls except.' When this ptep. preceded its subst. it came to be regarded as a prep., though it is obviously hard to say when the change took place. The earliest examples in Oxf. Eng. Dict. quoted as a prep. are Langland, Piers Plowman (B), ix. 140, 'Alle shal deye . . . Except oneliche of eche kynde a couple'; Henry, Wallace, v. 1026, 'Thai entryt in, befor thaim fand no man, Excep wemen.' A little later began its use as a conj., introducing not a subst. but a clause, and being equivalent to 'unless.' In AV and RV it is used both as prep. and as conj., most frequently as conj. Once the conj. is strengthened by 'that,' Mk 13<sup>20</sup> 'except that the Lord had shortened those days' (RV omits 'that'). Cf. Jn 3<sup>5</sup>, Tind. 'except that a man be boren of water and of the sprete.'

The only use of 'except' that is now commended is as a preposition. Hodgson (Errors in the Use of English<sup>2</sup>, 117 f.) quotes two examples from good modern writers of its use as a conj., but says that 'unless would be generally held preferable'; Keble, Memoir<sup>2</sup>, i. 81, 'Do not trouble yourself about writing to me, except you are quite in the humour for it'; Miss Mitford, Letters and Life, i. 150, 'It has no literary pretensions, except the total absence of all pretension may pass for one in these days of abundant conceit.' The Revisers have been somewhat sharply taken to task for using 'except' as a conj. [see esp. Moon, The Revisers' English (1882), 94-97, and Ecclesiastical English (1886), 205-207]. In this, however, they are at one with previous versions and with the history of the word. In the Canonical Scriptures of AV except occurs 73 times, and 67 times it is a conjunction. The Revisers have made few changes. In Gn 47<sup>26</sup> they prefer 'only,' and in Nu 16<sup>13</sup> 'but'; twice (2 S 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Co 14<sup>7</sup>) they turn 'except' into 'if . . . not,' twice (1 Co 14<sup>6,9</sup>) into 'unless,' and once (2 Co 13<sup>5</sup>) into 'unless indeed.' It is only in connexion with Jn 8<sup>24</sup> where they change 'if . . . not,' and 1 Co 15<sup>2</sup> where they change 'unless,' into 'except,' that they are open to criticism; but no doubt both came under the rule of 'uniformity in rendering.' J. HASTINGS.

EXCHANGER.—See MONEY.

EXCOMMUNICATION is the name applied to the temporary or permanent exclusion, for errors of doctrine or morals, of a member of a Church from the privileges of its communion. The word is not used either in AV or RV, but the practice which it describes meets us in NT, both in the case of the Jewish synagogue and in that of the Christian Church.

The practice in the Jewish synagogue is referred to in Lk 6<sup>22</sup> (Blessed are ye when men 'shall separate you from their company,' ἀποφίλω), Jn 9<sup>22</sup> (the case of the blind man cast out of the synagogue, ἀποσυνάγωγος), Jn 12<sup>12</sup> (the rulers who feared to confess Christ), Jn 16<sup>2</sup> (Christ's prophecy concerning the disciples). It rests on the older practice, described in Ezr 10<sup>8</sup> (the case of those Isr. who at the Restoration refused to give up their idolatrous wives), which in turn is a modification of the still older hērem (הֶרֶם) or 'ban,' referred to in Lv 27<sup>29</sup> and elsewhere. The word hērem means literally devoted, and is used in OT in the twofold sense of devoted to destruction (hence accursed) and devoted to God's service (hence consecrated). See CURSE.

The practice of excommunication as we find it among the Jews in the time of Christ is the outgrowth of the ḥērem in the first of these senses. In the early history of Israel the punishment of idolatry or other gross sins was physical death. Thus we find the prophets referring to the future triumph of Israel over their enemies as the wholesale devotion of them to destruction by J<sup>h</sup> (so Is 34<sup>2, 5</sup>, Mic 4<sup>13</sup>, Jer 50<sup>21</sup>), and Zech. looks forward to the happy time in the future when there shall be no more 'ban' (14<sup>11</sup>). Temporary exclusion from the services of the sanctuary meets us only, in the case of ceremonial offences, as part of the general requirement of the ceremonial law. At the time of the Restoration we find a modification of the older practice in the interest of greater humanity. Those Isr. who had married foreign wives, and who refused at the command of Ezra to give them up, instead of being put to death had their substance confiscated, and were separated from the congregation of Israel (Ezr 10<sup>8</sup>). In the time of Christ, exclusion from the synagogue was the regular punishment for serious moral and religious offences, and is distinguished by the Rabbis as ḥērem proper, the formal 'ban,' which could be inflicted by not fewer than ten persons, and which deprived him on whom it fell of all religious privileges, from the milder niddah (נִידָה), which could be inflicted by a single person, and which merely cut off him who suffered it from conversation and contact for a period of thirty days. For a supposed third grade, the so-called shammāthā (שַׁמְמָתָה), there seems to be no good authority.

The origin of Christian excommunication is often found in Christ's words to Peter (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.' (Cf. Mt 18<sup>18</sup>, Jn 20<sup>23</sup>.) But, whatever the particular view taken of this much disputed passage, the reference seems to be rather to the spiritual power which the Church is to exercise through her preaching and witness-bearing than to any formal ecclesiastical procedure. The passage Mt 18<sup>15-17</sup> comes nearer to the mark, and with its threefold admonition, first privately, then in the presence of two or three witnesses (cf. Tit 3<sup>10</sup>), and finally before the Church, reminds us somewhat of the graded procedure of the Jewish synagogue. Hence many critics believe that it represents less a direct utterance of Jesus Himself than the practice in the Jewish-Christian circles for which the Gospel of Matthew was written.

In the letters of St. Paul, besides general directions to 'admonish the disorderly' (1 Th 5<sup>14</sup>; cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>20</sup>), and to hold aloof from brothers who are fornicators, or covetous, or idolaters, or revilers, or drunkards, or extortioners (1 Co 5<sup>11</sup>), or who refuse to obey the word of St. Paul by his letters (2 Th 3<sup>14</sup>; cf. Ro 16<sup>17</sup>), we have in the Church of Corinth at least one case, and possibly two cases, of ecclesiastical discipline. The first is that of the incestuous person, referred to in 1 Co 5, whom St. Paul delivers unto Satan 'for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus' (1 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). The reference in v. 4 to the Corinthians as being gathered together, shows that whatever the exact nature of the punishment described as committing unto Satan, it had ecclesiastical significance. In v. 13 the Corinthians are expressly charged to put away the wicked man from among themselves. If 2 Co 2<sup>9-11</sup> refer, as is most commonly supposed, to this same matter, it would follow that the exclusion from church fellowship was not permanent. 'Sufficient to such a one is this punishment, which was inflicted by the many; so that contrariwise ye should rather forgive him and comfort him, lest by any means such a one should be swallowed up by his overmuch sorrow' (vv. 6, 7). If, however, as seems not unlikely, this passage refers to an entirely distinct case from that mentioned in 1 Co, we have a case of discipline administered by the Corinthians themselves without special instigation by St. Paul. Interesting and perplexing is the mention of Satan in 1 Co 5<sup>5</sup> (cf. 2 Co 2<sup>11</sup> 'that no advantage may be gained over us by Satan'; 1 Ti 1<sup>20</sup> 'Hymenæus and Alexander, whom I delivered unto Satan that they might be taught not to blaspheme'). That St. Paul does not mean by the expression 'delivery unto Satan' a final cutting off from salvation, such as seems to be implied in the anathema of 1 Co 16<sup>22</sup>, Gal 1<sup>8, 9</sup>, Ro 9<sup>3</sup>, is clear from the reference in v. 5 to the salvation of the spirit. On the other hand, that some suffering besides the formal exclusion from church fellowship is intended, seems equally clear from the reference to the destruction of the flesh. Hence the conjecture of some physical punishment miraculously inflicted upon the offender, possibly, as in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, death itself. But the matter is too obscure to warrant a definite conclusion.

The Corinthian letters picture a loose organization, without formal officers, in which discipline is administered, now by the Corinthians, now by St. Paul himself. There is no definite rule of procedure. The general principle is laid down in 1 Co 5<sup>9-12</sup>, and special application is made acc. to the circumstances of each case. In the Pastorals we have already a definite mode of procedure, with its public reproof, and its accusation before witnesses (1 Ti 5<sup>19, 20</sup>). Not moral offences only, but a schismatic spirit may be the occasion for exclusion from church fellowship (Tit 3<sup>10</sup> 'A man that is heretical [factious] after a first and second admonition, refuse.' Cf. 1 Ti 6<sup>3</sup>, and esp. 2 Jn v. 10, where false doctrine is made the ground for absolute breach of intercourse). That excommunication might be inflicted by a faction, as well as by the Church at large, is clear from the case of Diotrephes (3 Jn 9. 10). These later instances show that excommunication was not merely disciplinary, having as its end the penitence and subsequent restoration of the offender, but also protective, being designed to guard the infant Church from corruption. In no case, however, is it regarded as consigning the person cut off to eternal punishment, as later theories have sometimes held. That was the work of God alone, with which man had nothing to do. In general, this brief survey of the NT passages shows that we have to do only with the first beginnings, from which the later ecclesiastical procedure, with its elaborate process, was developed. In this matter, as in so many others of interest, the development was a gradual one, a part of that slow process by which the flexibility of early Christian institutions was gradually transformed into the fixed rules of a powerful ecclesiastical organization.

LITERATURE.—The art. in Smith, DB<sup>2</sup>, by F. Meyrick, unchanged; and Herzog, PRE<sup>2</sup> 'Bann bei den Hebräern,' by Rütschi, where the older literature is given. For the practice among the Jews, see Nowack, Heb. Archäol.; and Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. On the case of the Corinthian offender, cf. Weizsäcker, Das Apostolische Zeitalter<sup>2</sup>. A full discussion of NT passages in their connexion is still a desideratum.

W. ADAMS BROWN.

EXECUTIONER.—Mk 6<sup>7</sup> AV, of the officer sent by Herod to behead John the Baptist, RV 'a soldier of his guard.' The Gr. word σπεκουλάτωρ is a transliteration of Lat. speculator, and the speculatores were originally scouts or spies (speculator, to watch), and then the police or bodyguard of the Roman emperors and military governors. (The word is fully discussed in Benson, Cyprian, 505 f.)

Beheading was a Roman, not a Jewish punishment. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS. J. HASTINGS.

EXERCISE.—As a verb: 1. The primary meaning is to occupy oneself with, engage in, Ps 131<sup>1</sup> 'Neither do I exercise myself in great matters' (נִפְתַּלְתִּי, lit. 'neither do I walk,' as RVm); Sir 50<sup>23</sup> 'Blessed is he that shall be exercised in these things' (ἀναστροφῆσεται); 2 Es 15<sup>8</sup> 'those things in which they wickedly exercised themselves' (quæ inique exercent, RV 'which they wickedly practise'). Cf. Pref. to AV 1611, 'in Latine we have been exercised almost from our verie cradle.' 2. To put into practice, bring into use, as Knox (Works, ed. Laing, iv. 135), 'Even such, deare brethren, is the blessed Evangeliē of our Lord Jesus; for the more that it be entred, the more comfortable and puissant is it to such as do heare, reade, or exercise the same'; or as Dunbar (The Thrissill and the Rois, 16) uses exerce, the obsolete form of the verb, direct from exercere—

'Exerce justice with mercy and conscience.'

So Rev 13<sup>12</sup> 'he exerciseth all the power of the first beast' (ποιεῖ); Jer 9<sup>34</sup> 'I am the LORD, which exercise lovingkindness' (עָשָׂה 'doing'); To 12<sup>9</sup> 'Those that exercise alms and righteousness shall be filled with life' (ποιούντες); Ezk 22<sup>29</sup> 'The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery' (גָּזְלוּ וְשָׁדוּ); Wis 16<sup>4</sup> 'It was requisite that upon them exercising tyranny should come penury' (ἐκείνοις τυραννοῦσι, RV 'in their tyrannous dealing'); and the passages in the Synoptics, Mt 20<sup>25</sup>, Mk 10<sup>42</sup>, Lk 22<sup>25</sup>, where κατακυριεύω (Lk κυριεύω) and κατεξουσιάζω (Lk ἐξουσιάζω) are translated in AV 'exercise dominion' and 'exercise authority' in Mt, 'e. lordship' and 'e. authority' in Mk and Lk; RV gives 'lord it' for κατακ., and 'e. authority' for κατέξ. in Mt and Mk, 'have lordship' and 'have authority' in Lk. 3. To practise for training or discipline, Ac 24<sup>16</sup> 'And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man' (ἀσκήω); 1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> 'exercise thyself unto godliness' (γυμνάζω; so He 5<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>11</sup>, 2 P 2<sup>14</sup>); 1 Mac 6<sup>30</sup> 'elephants exercised in battle' (εἰδότες πόλεμον, RV 'trained for war'); 2 Mac 15<sup>12</sup> 'exercised from a child in all points of virtue' (ἐκμεμεληγκότα). 4. All those meanings belong to the Lat. exercere, and the influence of the Vulg. is conspicuous throughout. There are even two examples of 'exercise' in the sense of 'afflict,' 'torment,' which also belongs to exercere; Ec 1<sup>13</sup> 'this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith,' and 3<sup>10</sup>. The Heb. is נָסָה, 'to be bowed down.' Cf. Fuller, Holy Warre (ed. 1640, p. 155), 'they had to do with Meladine King of Egypt, who lay besides them, . . . exercising the Christians with continual skirmishes.' Milton has the same sense in Par. Lost, ii. 89—

'Where pain of unextinguishable fire
Must exercise us without hope of end'; and Par. Reg. i. 156—

'But first I mean
To exercise him in the wilderness.'

As a subst.: 1. Wis 8<sup>18</sup> 'in the exercise of conference with her, prudence' (ἐν συγγυμνασίᾳ δουλίας, RV 'assiduous communing,' RVm 'practice of communion'); 1 Ti 4<sup>8</sup> 'bodily exercise profiteth little' (σωματικὴ γυμνασία). 2. In 1 Mac 1<sup>14</sup> and 2 Mac 4<sup>9</sup> the complaint is made that a Greek 'place of exercise' had been erected in Jerusalem. The Gr. is γυμνάσιον. See GAMES. In 2 Mac 4<sup>14</sup> ἐν παλαίστρᾳ is similarly translated 'in the place of exercise,' RV 'in the palestra.' See PALESTRA.

J. HASTINGS.

EXILE.—See ISRAEL.

EXODUS AND JOURNEY TO CANAAN.—

- i. Route of the Exodus.
- ii. From Egypt to Sinai.
- iii. From Sinai to Kadesh.
- iv. From Kadesh to the Jordan.

i. ROUTE OF THE EXODUS.—The question of the route of the Exodus has had a good deal of light thrown upon it in recent times, from the standpoint both of archaeology and of literature. On the one hand, the work of excavation of lost cities and monuments has gone far to negative certain hypotheses as to the Exodus, if not to render them impossible; and, on the other hand, the decipherment of inscriptions and papyri belonging to the time of the Exodus has furnished us with geographical and historical annotations of the highest value. It must not be supposed that the result is an unmixed confirmation of the biblical account. A recently-deciphered Egyptian inscription, for example, shows that the Bēn-Israel were already in Palestine at the time of the Exodus, so that the migration must have been partial and not national. But with this point we are not concerned in the present article, whose business is to indicate what was the route of the Exodus on the hypothesis that it actually took place.

Even though we are not yet in a position to completely vindicate the historical character of the Exodus, we may do much to extract a correct geography from the accounts, and so to prepare the way for accurate history. The researches, for instance, of Naville have practically settled the first stages in the line of march; and in the same way a closer knowledge of the Sinaitic peninsula encourages the belief that there is more to be urged in favour of the traditional Sinai than can be brought forward against it. [See SINAI.] We acquire in this way what are almost fixed points in the route, without being troubled by a priori considerations as to whether the whole of the story is historical or whether any of it is miraculous. Indeed this last consideration might altogether be omitted; for as regards such a question as the actual passage of the sea, the configuration of the land at the head of the Gulf of Suez and across the Isthmus is such that the shallow waters of the sea and detached lakes furnish exactly the situation for such a transit as is poetically called a passage 'in the heart of the Red Sea.' Moreover, the action of wind upon shallow water has been constantly the cause of phenomenal effects which are not far removed from the miraculous statements in Exodus. For example, the Russians in 1738 entered the Crimea, which was strongly fortified against them by the Turks, at the Isthmus of Perekop, by a passage made for them by the wind through the shallow waters of the Putrid Sea at the N.W. corner of the Sea of Azov. And Major-General Tulloch has recorded an instance even more to the point, when, as he himself observed, under a strong east wind the waters of Lake Menzaleh at the entrance to the Suez Canal receded for a distance of 7 miles (see Journal of Victoria Institute, vol. xxviii. p. 267). Other instances of the same effect, which would be counted miraculous if they had been biblical, may be found in a paper by Naville (Jour. Viet. Instit. xxvi. p. 12). We may therefore lay on one side any question of direct miraculous agency: where the phenomena are so nearly natural to the country, we may be content to say that they are not necessarily unhistorical, and that the question of miracle is merely one of interpretation. Nor need we be delayed in our inquiry by considerations as to whether the story has suffered from over-colouring; both the numbers of the persons involved and the length of their supposed stay in the desert may be deferred,

SINAI PENINSULA AND CANAAN ILLUSTRATING THE EXODUS

English Miles

0 5 10 20 40 60

Probable Route of Children of Israel

|          |          |          |          |          |          |          |          |
|----------|----------|----------|----------|----------|----------|----------|----------|
| G | R | E | A | T | S | E | A |
| M | E | D | I | T | E | R | R |
|          |          |          |          | A | N | E | A |
|          |          |          |          |          |          | N |          |

if thought fit, for future examination. The account is not to be judged from its weakest points.

The best way to form an idea as to what such a migration would be like, is to compare it with an annual phenomenon of a similar character, viz. the Mecca pilgrimage from Cairo. The analogy is a good one, inasmuch as the account in the Bk of Exodus expressly suggests that the Israelites wished to go into the wilderness for the purpose of a haj (the Heb. word in Exodus 10<sup>9</sup> haj is, in fact, the same that is applied to the modern festival, and to the route taken by the pilgrims). What point was aimed at in the proposed three days' journey into the wilderness must remain uncertain; it has been suggested that it was Sarbut el-Khadeem, on the northern road to Mt. Sinai, where the remains of famous Egyptian temples are still to be seen. But, wherever it was, the Israelites could do what the Mecca pilgrims are in the habit of doing; nor is there any a priori reason why we should regard the account of the migration as antecedently improbable.

We may go further, and say that whatever may be objected against the general facts of the Exodus, the list of stations (or mansiones) in the wilderness which is given in Nu has every appearance of being part of a conventional itinerary or pilgrim book, and is therefore susceptible of identification and verification, altogether apart from the history in which it is embedded. All that we have to do with such data is to make such literary and topographical investigations as will determine whether the routes indicated are possible, and the stages of the journey feasible.

One of the first things that will strike the careful reader of the account of the first stages of the Exodus is that there is a certain verisimilitude about the nomenclature. It is a mixture of Egyptian and Hebrew. Pithom and Pihahiroth are certainly Egyptian; Migdol and Baal-zephon as certainly Hebrew; Succoth will be shown to be a mere Heb. perversion of an Egyp. name; and there is even a suspicion that alternative names in the two languages are found in the narrative, as when the desert into which the Israelites go out is called in one place the desert of Etham, and in another the desert of Shur. This is as it should be, if we bear in mind that we are on the frontier of Egypt, that the country next the frontier on both sides is in the hands of a Semitic people, and that the fortifications and great cities are in the care of the Egyptian Government.

The locality from which the Israelites emigrated is defined by the two store-cities, Rameses and Pithom, which they built for Pharaoh. From Rameses they started, and their first encampment is Succoth, which Naville has shown to be the equivalent of Pithom. The identification of the two cities is of the first importance. According to Brugsch (L'Exode et les monuments Egyptiens, Leipzig, 1875), we are to identify Rameses with Zoan (Tanis), and to place Pithom and the district of Succoth in the N.E. corner of the Delta, between Tanis and Pelusium. He then adopts a surprising suggestion (previously ventured by Schleiden), that the Israelites passed along the shore of the Mediterranean on a neck of land between that sea and the ancient Serbonian lake; that the Egyptians followed them along the same course, but were overtaken by a rush of water from the Mediterranean and destroyed. On this hypothesis he identifies Etham with the fortification on the frontier of Egypt, Migdol with a Magdolon mentioned in the Antonine Itinerary as being 12 miles from Pelusium, and Baal-zephon with Mt. Casius; the supposed Red Sea (yam suph) turns out to be the Serbonian lake, as is suggested by the name (yam suph=sea of weeds). Unfortunately, this theory, which is stated with great confidence and simplicity by Brugsch, appears to be almost fatally vitiated by the fact that Pithom has been found somewhere else than on the Mediterranean seaboard, where Brugsch had located it. It is to Naville that we owe this important discovery. His excavation of the mounds known as Tell el-Mashkuta, in the Wady Tumilat, on the line of railway from Zagazig to Suez, and in close proximity to the modern Sweet-water Canal and to the line of the ancient Sweet-water Canal, has proved conclusively that this place is Pithom ['abode of Tum'], and that its secular name, or at all events the name of the adjacent district, is Thuket, which may be equated with the Heb. Succoth. It is curious that the French engineers had suspected this mound to be the site of Rameses, and had named the adjacent railway station accordingly. It seems probable that Rameses will be found in the excavation of the mound Tell el-Kebir; Tanis is clearly excluded by Naville's discoveries. We are thus led to conclude in favour of an exodus along the line of the ancient canal, and the fugitives following this course would soon reach the frontier of Egypt and be stopped by the fortifications which ran along the Isthmus from north to south. This is the station Etham, which appears to coincide with the Egyptian ḫetem or fortification, and to be the same thing as is meant by the Heb. shur or wall. [The only difficulty in this identification lies in the fact that we should have expected a stronger guttural in the beginning of the Heb. word]. The route is evidently one of the main roads out of Egypt; and we may compare it with a papyrus translated by Goodwin, which describes the pursuit of runaway slaves who follow this very road, and whose journey is described in very similar terms.

Several difficulties now present themselves. One of them relates to the question as to whether the head of the Gulf of Suez was not at the time of the Exodus much farther north than at present, and whether the sea was not actually connected with the Bitter Lakes. In that case the transit may very well have been made at the head of the Bitter Lakes. There is much to be said in favour of this hypothesis.

Unfortunately, none of the places mentioned in connexion with this part of the Exodus have been identified. Pihahiroth, Migdol, and Baal-zephon have all to be located. It has been suggested that Baal-zephon [Typhon] is the mountain Ataka to the S. of Suez, and that it is dedicated to the god of the north wind because Phœnician sailors used to pray for fair wind on their voyages down the Red Sea. Our own impression is that the case has not yet been made out for moving the head of the Red Sea so far north as the Bitter Lakes, and that it is more likely that the crossing took place not far north of the present Suez. [Its ancient Greek name Clysmna appears to carry a tradition of the disaster]. The test for a true solution would appear to lie in a search for Baal-zephon, especially by examination of Mt. Casius on the shore of the Mediterranean, and of Jebel Ataka at the head of the Red Sea.

ii. FROM EGYPT TO SINAI.—After crossing the frontier of Egypt the Israelites go three days in the wilderness and find no water. It has been suggested that they went by the haj route right across the plateau of the Tih to Akabah, and that this Akabah (or Elath, as it is called in OT) is the Elim of the itinerary, where they found wells of water and palm trees, and from which they proceeded to a Mt. Sinai in Midian. We are not able to accept the theory of a Midianite Sinai. It seems more probable that the route described is that taken by travellers to the traditional Sinai, which is the same as was taken by St. Silvia of Aquitaine in the 4th century. The route goes along the wilderness between the plateau of the Tih and the E. shore of the Red Sea. Marah (see sep. art.) is not identified with any reasonable probability; but Elim, which follows it, may very well be the Wady Ghurundel, where there are even at the present time wells and palms (see ELIM). From this point the road to Sinai bifurcates; the northern road goes by the Egyptian mines and temples of Sarbut el-Khadeem, the southern winds by the Wady Tayibeh until it strikes the seashore: this is, then, the encampment by the sea (see sep. art.) of Nu 33<sup>10</sup>; following the shore, the ancient Egyptian port and road are reached, and the route turns inland, passing the entrance to the Wady Maghara, where are the oldest Egyptian mines. This is probably the station Dophkah (see sep. art.) of Numbers, Dophkah being a misreading of Mafkah, the Egypt. name for the blue stone which they obtained from the mines in this region. The next station, Alush, is not known; it was probably not far beyond the Wady Mukattab or 'written valley' through which the road now passes. The next stage is Rephidim, which is commonly identified with Feiran, the oasis of the peninsula, the ancient Faran and Paran, and from this point the road winds through the long Wady es-Sheikh, until by a long detour (or, if preferred, by a short cut through a pass called Nukb el-Hawa, or 'Pass of the Wind') the plain is reached at the foot of Mt. Sinai, where the Israelites are supposed to have assembled for the giving of the Law. The most striking identification on this route is the encampment on the seashore five days after having left it. But it is clear that, striking as this is, the same thing is true of the route of the Mecca pilgrims: so it can hardly be called a conclusive identification. It is a very weighty consideration that the name Sinai implies a place of sanctity [Sin=the Babylonian moon-god] from very early times; but no Babylonian signs or inscriptions have been found which would settle conclusively that the traditional Sinai is the same as the biblical one. The route described is an ancient trade route of Nabatean traders before the Christian era and in the early years of the Christian era. It is not a road worked out by biblical explorers, as has sometimes been suggested. See further art. SINAI.

LITERATURE.—The student should consult, inter alia, Robinson, Biblical Researches (1841, 3rd ed. 1867); Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai (2nd ed. Leipzig, 1881); Lepsius, Tour from Thebes to the Peninsula of Sinai in 1845 (Eng. by Cottrell, London, 1846); Naville, Store City of Pithom (Publications of Egypt. Exploration Fund); Brugsch, L'Ézode et les Monuments Égyptiens (Leipzig, 1875, Eng. tr. 1879); Gamurrini, Peregrinatio Sylviæ (Rome, 1887).

iii. FROM SINAI TO KADESH.—About this portion of the route little need be said. The account in Nu 10<sup>11</sup> states that the first march from Sinai was into the wilderness of Paran. This is described in v. 33 as a three days' journey; and the places mentioned as on the route are Taberah (Nu 11<sup>3</sup>), Kibroth-hattaavah, and Hazeroth (11<sup>24, 35</sup>), whence they removed into the wilderness of Paran (12<sup>16</sup>), and from this place (13<sup>3</sup>) the spies were sent out. Taberah is not mentioned in the itinerary of Nu 33. In Dt 1<sup>2</sup> the whole route from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea is described as eleven days' journey by the way of Mt. Seir. This indicates a route from Sinai by way of Akabah to Kadesh, and accordingly travellers have sought to identify Kibroth-hattaavah and Hazeroth with points in the route between Sinai and Akabah. Further particulars are given in the articles on those names; and for the names which follow

Hazeroth in Nu 33, see iv. and the article on KADESH.

iv. FROM KADESH TO THE JORDAN.—The accounts of this part of the route are found in Nu 20. 21, Dt 1. 2, and in the itinerary of Nu 33. Nu 20. 21 are composite in character, as will be seen from the following analysis (taken from Driver's LOT p. 66):—

|    |                     |                 |      |       |                   |      |        |
|----|---------------------|-----------------|------|-------|-------------------|------|--------|
| P  | 20 <sup>1a</sup>    | 2               | 3b-4 | 6-13  | 23-29             | 4a   | 10. 11 |
| JE | 1b                  | 3a              | 5    | 14-21 | 21 <sup>1-3</sup> | 4b-9 |        |
| P  |                     | 22 <sup>1</sup> |      |       |                   |      |        |
| JE | 21 <sup>12-35</sup> |                 |      |       |                   |      |        |

The first verse of Nu 20 deserves special notice. Its first clause (as far as the word 'month') is due to P. According to that authority, the spies were sent out from the wilderness of Paran, and in that wilderness (Nu 14<sup>29</sup>) the children of Israel remained until the rebellious generation had been consumed. They then moved in the first month (apparently of the fortieth year, and for the first time) into the wilderness of Zin. The next clause, 'and the people abode in Kadesh,' etc., is due to another source, which represents the stay in Kadesh as a prolonged one, and associates with that stay many events, but without assigning dates. Two of these events are recorded in Nu 20<sup>2-21</sup>: the first, the judgment passed on Moses and Aaron at Meribah (vv. 2-13), presents difficulties which cannot here be fully discussed, but the following considerations make it probable that this incident occurred at an early period of the sojourn at Kadesh: (a) the account is in many points similar to that in Ex 17<sup>1-7</sup>; (b) lack of water would have been felt soon after the arrival at Kadesh, rather than at the close of their sojourn there; and the complaint, Nu 20<sup>4-5</sup>, seems more appropriate in the mouths of those who remembered the fleshpots of Egypt, than of those who, having left Egypt in youth, had since passed forty years in the desert; (c) according to Dt 1<sup>37</sup> the exclusion of Moses from the promised land was decreed about the same time as the general sentence was pronounced against the generation which came up out of Egypt. Hence two alternatives: either the account Nu 20<sup>2-13</sup> which gives the reason for the exclusion must describe the same event as that referred to Dt 1<sup>37</sup> (i.e. an event which happened soon after the return of the spies, and therefore at an early period of the journeyings), or there are two varying traditions as to when and why Moses was not permitted to cross the Jordan.

The second passage (Nu 20<sup>14-21</sup>) records Edom's refusal to allow a passage through his territory to the children of Israel, in consequence of which they journeyed 'by the way to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom' (Nu 21<sup>4</sup>). Comparing this with Dt 2<sup>1</sup>, very similar language is there used to describe a compassing of Edom, which is assigned to an earlier stage of the journeyings. It is reasonable to suppose that this circuitous route was adopted because a more direct course towards the E. side of the Dead Sea was not open; Edom's conduct, as described in Nu 20, though not recorded in Dt, was the cause of, and therefore prior to, the compassing mentioned in Dt. Hence both the events in Nu 20<sup>2-21</sup>, though in their present connexion they appear as incidents of the fortieth year, may belong to an earlier period of the journeyings. Two distinct geographical pictures of the period are presented,—the one, that of JE, figures Kadesh as the scene of the middle portion of the journey, and is to be traced in Dt 1. 2 (with which the brief summary in Jg 11<sup>16-18</sup> should be compared); the other, that of P, locates these events partly in Paran and partly in Zin. The combination of the two, with the introduction of exact dates, has produced difficulties which are to be explained, not by the assumption of two places bearing the name of Kadesh, nor by the assumption of a second visit to Kadesh (which is nowhere indicated, and seems excluded by Dt 2<sup>14</sup>), but by the resolution of the narrative into its original components.

In the list of stations (Nu 33) Kadesh does not occur until v. 36, where it is identified with Zin, immediately precedes Mt. Hor, and is only eight stations removed from the final settlement in the plains of Jordan. This itinerary makes the identification of Zin with Kadesh, which is implied in Nu 20, and refers to Kadesh for the first and only time towards the close of the journeyings. It might be expected that Paran would be found in an earlier part of the chapter, but it is not; the stations from Egypt, as far as Hazeroth, correspond closely with those mentioned in the narrative portions of Ex and Nu, but after Hazeroth [instead of either Paran or Kadesh] twelve stations are given (Rithmah . . . Hashmonah, vv. 18-29), the names of which occur only in these verses, and no event happening in connexion with these places is anywhere recorded. It has been suggested that Rithmah, or some other of these names, is a designation of Kadesh, but nothing in the nature of an argument has been advanced in favour of such a hypothesis.

The wilderness of Paran (Nu 13<sup>3</sup>) is a vague indication of locality for the events described in Nu 13, 14, and it may be that more than one of these twelve stations were within that area, but there is no indication that such is the case. The list of Nu 33 has been incorporated with the narrative without specifying the place where the important events recorded in Nu 13, 14 and Dt 1 happened. In this respect the list is independent of the narrative, and any attempt to establish a connexion between the two must be conjectural.

The eight stations following Hashmonah (Moseroth-Mt. Hor) must next be considered. With the first four may be compared the fragment of an itinerary preserved in Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup>. They are as follows:—

| Nu 33 <sup>30-32</sup> . | Dt 10 <sup>6-7</sup> . |
|--------------------------|------------------------|
| Moseroth.                | Beeroth Bene-jaakan    |
| Bene-jaakan.             | Moserah.               |
| Hor-haggidgad.           | Gudgodah.              |
| Jotbathah.               | Jotbathah.             |

There can be little doubt that the same four places are referred to in both passages, and it seems also reasonable to suppose that the same part of the journeyings is described in both. The inversion of order, Moseroth preceding Bene-jaakan in the one, and following in the other, may be attributed to an error of transcription, or explained by supposing that some of the wells of the Bene-jaakan were visited both before and after the encampment at Moseroth. Moserah is noted (Dt 10) as the place where Aaron died and was buried, and must therefore be close to Mt. Hor, probably the place of encampment at its base. Further, as Abronah and Ezion-geber follow these four places in Nu, and the position of Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Akabah is known, it follows that these stations describe the journey from Mt. Hor down the Arabah to the Red Sea. Pursuing the journey from this point, as described Dt 2<sup>8</sup>, the children of Israel passed 'from the way of the Arabah from Elath and from Ezion-geber.' This is generally explained by supposing that they completed the circuit of Edom by compassing it on its E. side. From the S. end of the Arabah a valley called Wady Ithem leads upwards in a N.E. direction to the high table-land which lies to the E. of Edom and Moab, across which runs the Haj route from Damascus to Mecca. Along or near this route the children of Israel, after leaving the Arabah by Wady Ithem, passed in a N. direction until they reached Iye-abarim in the wilderness which is before Moab towards the sunrising (Nu 21), the next definite geographical indication afforded in the narrative.

But against accepting this view of the journey, it may be argued as follows: The two stations in Nu 33<sup>30-41</sup> which follow Ezion-geber are the wilderness of Zin (Kadesh) and Mt. Hor. These verses imply that, after reaching the Gulf of Akabah, instead of bearing eastward as above described the children of Israel retraced their steps along the Arabah to visit Mt. Hor, on the occasion of Aaron's death and burial. Moseroth is separated by six stations from Mt. Hor, and, if the identity of Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup> with Nu 33<sup>30-34</sup> be maintained, there are two statements concerning the time and place of Aaron's death which cannot be reconciled. In order to harmonize the accounts, many commentators consider that the stations in Dt 10<sup>6-7</sup> have nothing to do with the same names in Nu 33<sup>30-34</sup>, but must be supplied as part of the journey from Mt. Hor to Zalmonah (Nu 33<sup>41</sup>). The omission of these stations in Nu 33 is explained by supposing that names which have been previously mentioned are not repeated in this list. Besides the double visit to Kadesh, two visits to Mt. Hor (for Moserah or Moseroth must be considered as equivalent to Mt. Hor) and two journeys down the Arabah to Ezion-geber must be assumed, before the narrative of Dt 2<sup>8ff</sup>. can be combined with Nu 33 from Zalmonah onwards, as representing the final departure from the Arabah on the way to the E. of Moab. This reiterated duplication of events, inferred from combining the accounts, but nowhere indicated in the narrative, raises more than a suspicion that this harmonistic interpretation, though possible, does not represent the actual progress of the journey. The main difficulty arises from the position of Zin and Mt. Hor following Ezion-geber in Nu 33<sup>30-41</sup>. Ewald proposes (Hist. of Isr. ii. 201, Eng. tr.) to remove vv. 30b-41a from where they now stand, and insert them after Hashmonah in ver. 30. The order of the stations would then be Hashmonah, Zin, Mt. Hor, Moseroth, Bene-jaakan, Hor-haggidgad, Jotbathah, Ezion-geber, Zalmonah, etc. The necessity for assuming the unproved duplication of events is removed, and the direction of the journey would be as traced above. The obvious criticism of Ewald's hypothesis is, that if the arrangement he proposes were the original one, it is difficult to understand why a change which introduces such difficulties should have been made. May a slight variation of his hypothesis be suggested? The verses which he would transpose differ in character from the rest of the chapter; instead of giving only names, they relate events and furnish details. May they be regarded as a later addition? If so, they may be either omitted or transferred, and the same result attained. One other alternative remains: the insertion of Zin and Mt. Hor after Ezion-geber indicates a movement up the Arabah northwards. This northern direction may have been continued to the Dead Sea, where a turn eastwards would bring the children of Israel to the E. side of Moab. The compassing of Edom would then be on its W. and N. border. In favour of this it may be suggested that an Israelite might understand the border of Edom to mean the border towards his own land. So long as the sites of Zalmonah and the stations following remain uncertain, this interpretation of the existing text of Nu 33<sup>10ff</sup>. cannot be rejected as impossible, though it would represent a tradition different from that followed in Nu 21<sup>4</sup> and (probably) Dt 2<sup>8</sup>.

The concluding section from the E. of Moab onwards is comparatively free from ambiguity, though definite identification of places is wanting here as in the preceding stages. The children of Israel cross the brooks Zered and Arnon (Nu 21<sup>12, 13</sup>). The latter is by general consent identified with the Wady Mojib, a stream which is fed by many tributaries, and falls into the Dead Sea about the middle of its E. side. The deep valley, about three miles broad, through which it passes, is a marked feature of the district, and forms a natural boundary line. It was the southern limit of the territory assigned to Israel on the E. of Jordan. The position of the brook Zered is uncertain. The Wady el-Ahsa, which runs into the Dead Sea at its S. extremity, is too far south to be identified with it, for Iye-abarim to the E. of Moab is reached before crossing it (Nu 21<sup>11</sup>). The Wady Feranj, the upper portion of the stream passing by Kerak and reaching the Dead Sea at the promontory called El-Lisan, or the main affluent of Wady Mojib (that coming from the S.E.), may with greater probability be considered as the ancient Zered. The nomenclature of the tributaries of Wady Mojib is somewhat unsettled, but Bliss, when exploring the country of Moab in March 1895 (see his memoir in PEFS, 1895) took special pains to ascertain the names assigned to them. He follows Tristram in giving the name of Wady Sa'ideh to the E. affluent of the Wady Mojib and not to the S.E. branch, which is generally so called in maps and commentaries. The description in Buhl (Geog. d. Alten Palästina, p. 51) is again different. Until arriving at the Arnon, the Israelites probably crossed the upper courses of the rivers and kept away from Moab towards the E. They would thus obey the injunction not to meddle with Moab, and find the rivers shallower, and more easy of passage. The deep and rugged sides of these streams for some distance from their outlets into the Dead Sea cause considerable difficulty to the modern traveller, and would have been impracticable for the hosts of Israel. But after crossing the Arnon it was necessary to turn W. and afterwards in a N.W. direction in order to reach Dibon-Gad and the mountains of Abarim—the high ridge to the E. of the N. extremity of the Dead Sea from which they descended into the plains of Jordan, opposite Jericho. The names given in Nu 21<sup>18-20</sup> are different from those in the itinerary of Nu 33, but the last-named place, 'the top of Pisgah that looketh toward Jeshimon' ('the desert' RV), indicates a spot on the Abarim range whence W. Palestine and the Jordan valley were visible. The last stage, Nu 22<sup>1</sup>, is given with additional detail in Nu 33<sup>48, 49</sup>.

LITERATURE.—Commentaries on the Books of Nu and Dt, especially those of Dillmann in the Kurzgef. Ezeg. Handb. z. Alten Testament and Driver on Dt in the Internat. Crit. Comm., may be consulted for further information. Trumbull's Kadesh-Barnea discusses the whole route from Egypt to Canaan, and contains a full list of ancient and modern works dealing with the subject. See also Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, and Köhler, Biblische Geschichte A.T.s.

J. RENDEL HARRIS AND A. T. CHAPMAN.

EXODUS (עֲצוּדָה, or simply עֲצוּדָה; "Ἔξοδος; see HEXATEUCH) is the 2nd Book in the Heb. Canon. It is also the 2nd division of the great composite work which contains in one complex whole all that has been preserved of old Heb. writings about the origins of the Isr. people. So much is here assumed, and, further, that it is generally possible, if not to distribute the material among four distinct documents, at least to assign it to one or other of four differing schools of writing, Jahwistic, Elohist, Deuteronomic, and Priestly (referred to as J, E, D, P),* whose relative age is shown by

* Js (=J-supplements), Es etc., denote later elements, while Ps is often used for the original groundwork of the Priestly Document before enlarged by the numerous additions marked the order of the names, the periods of the first two overlapping. For the proof of this, and for general matters of introduction, see HEXATEUCH.

Our aim here is to exhibit the results of such an analysis in detail, with a condensed account of the chief grounds on which it rests. For information about persons, places, things, events, institutions, laws, the student is referred to the separate articles.

The book covers the period from the death of Joseph to the erection of the Tabernacle, and is mainly historical, but contains important legislative sections. It falls readily into three parts—I. Israel in Egypt; II. From Egypt to Sinai; III. At Sinai. The method of treatment here adopted needs little explanation. In the Summary small reference letters show what documents contain the material next following: the sign || preceding means that the parallel is to be found in another chapter or section. The numbers refer to the chapters.

Thus, by following J, E, and P through in turn, the main contents of the documents can be severally traced, and the amount of coincidence noted.

I. ISRAEL IN EGYPT: 1-13<sup>16</sup>.

A. Summary.

1 <sup>JEP</sup>Increase, and <sup>JEP</sup>Oppression of Israel. 2 <sup>E</sup>Birth and adoption of Moses; <sup>J</sup>his violence, flight, and <sup>JEP</sup>marriage. 3-4 <sup>JEP</sup>Theophany and <sup>JEP</sup>Commission of Mos. and Aar. <sup>JEP</sup>Mos. returns, and <sup>J</sup>convinces the people by signs. 5 <sup>JEP</sup>Freedom claimed, bondage increased. 6-7 <sup>P</sup><sup>JEP</sup>Commission of Mos. and Aar. 7<sup>8-12</sup> Eleven <sup>JEP</sup>wonders—7<sup>8-13</sup> <sup>P</sup>Rod becomes serpent, magicians copy; 7<sup>14-25</sup> <sup>JEP</sup>Nile smitten, <sup>P</sup>magicians copy; 8<sup>1-13</sup> <sup>P</sup>frogs, <sup>P</sup>magicians copy; 8<sup>16-19</sup> <sup>P</sup>lice, magicians fail; 8<sup>20-32</sup> <sup>J</sup>flies; 9<sup>1-7</sup> <sup>J</sup>murrain; 9<sup>8-12</sup> <sup>P</sup>blains, magicians suffer; 9<sup>13-35</sup> <sup>JEP</sup>hail; 10<sup>1-20</sup> <sup>JEP</sup>locusts; 10<sup>21-29</sup> <sup>P</sup>darkness; <sup>J</sup>banishment of Moses, who 11 <sup>JEP</sup>prophesies death of firstborn and release of Isr. 12-13<sup>16</sup> <sup>JEP</sup>Rules for Passover and Feast of Unleav. Bread; <sup>J</sup>death of firstborn, and <sup>JEP</sup>Exodus of Isr.; <sup>J</sup>law of firstlings.

B. Analysis.

* marks editorial revision; * shows supplements from documents of the same school; ' editorial insertions and expansions; " harmonizing and other relatively later additions by R<sup>1</sup>, R<sup>2</sup>, and R<sup>3</sup>; { enclose vv. forming a displaced passage; ... show that something has dropped out; and if with [...] that the material is found elsewhere; a, b, etc., mark vv. subdivided.

|   |                    |                         |                |                                              |                 |                        |
|---|--------------------|-------------------------|----------------|----------------------------------------------|-----------------|------------------------|
| J | 6                  | 8-12                    | 20b            | ...11-23a                                    | 3               | [2-4a 5 7-9a           |
| E | 1                  | ...15-20a               | 21f.           | 21-10...                                     | 3 <sup>1r</sup> | 4b 6...                |
| P | 1-5                | 7                       | 13f.           | 23b-25                                       |                 |                        |
| J | 16-18              | 19f.                    | 1-12 13-16"    | a 19-20a                                     | 24-26 a[...]    | 29-31r                 |
| E | 3 <sup>9b-15</sup> | ...21f.                 | 4              | 714b 17f.                                    | 20b 21-23"      | 27f.                   |
| P |                    |                         |                |                                              |                 |                        |
| J | 5                  | 1ab"                    | 2 4            | 6 <sup>21</sup>                              | 7               | 14...16-17a tosmite... |
| E |                    |                         |                |                                              |                 | 15r ...17b             |
| P |                    |                         |                | 2-5 6-8 <sup>r</sup> 9-12 13-30 <sup>r</sup> | 1-13            |                        |
| J | 7                  | 18                      | ...21a         | 24f.                                         | 1-4 ...8-15     | 20-32 1-7 13           |
| E | 7                  | ...20b                  | 23             | 8                                            | 5-7             | 16-19 8-12             |
| P |                    | 19-20a                  | 21b-22         |                                              |                 |                        |
| J | 9                  | 14-16 <sup>r</sup> 17f. | 19-21"         | 23b 24b 25b-34                               | 1a 1b-3a'       |                        |
| E |                    |                         | 22-23a         | 24a 25a                                      | 35ab"           | 10                     |
| P |                    |                         |                |                                              |                 |                        |
| J | 10                 | 3b-11                   | 13b 14b-15a... | 15c-19                                       | 24-26 23f.      | 4-8 9f.                |
| E | 10                 | 12-13a                  | 14a            | 15b                                          | 20-23           | 27 11 1-3              |
| P |                    |                         |                |                                              |                 |                        |

Ps; Pb stands for the Holiness legislation of Lv 17-26 with kindred passages. R stands for one of the redactors, who (1) edited J and E into a single whole JE, in this case cited as R<sup>1</sup>; or (2) combined JE with D, cited as R<sup>2</sup>; or (3) supplemented Ps and combined P with JED, and so are called R<sup>3</sup>. In Exodus, of course, D is not found, and only here and there traces of R<sup>2</sup>.

|   |    |        |         |        |     |       |               |
|---|----|--------|---------|--------|-----|-------|---------------|
| J | 12 | 21a    | 21b-23° | 24-27" | 27b | 29-34 | 37-39         |
| E | 12 | 1-13   | 14-20'  |        | 28  | ...   | 35f."         |
| P |    |        |         |        |     |       |               |
| J | 12 |        | 3f.     | 5"     | 6f. | 8-10" | 11-13" 14-16" |
| E | 12 |        |         |        |     |       |               |
| P |    | 40-42" | 43-50   | 61"    | 1f. |       |               |

Note that no passage has been analyzed unless there is reasonable probability, usually indeed practical certainty, that it is composite; but obviously some of the details of divisions of verses must be rather possible than always definitely probable. The analysis has, however, been carried as far as possible, as being more helpful thus to the student. If any one will take the trouble to mark, (say) with blue, black, and red inks, the analysis on a copy of the RV or the Heb. text, and to underline the phrases, etc., referred to under iii. and iv., and then read through all the passages assigned to each document consecutively, he will gain the best possible notion of the reality of the analysis, and the distinct character of the documents.

Displaced passage.—The J portions of 3 and 4<sup>1-12</sup> prob. stood originally before 4<sup>20</sup>. Yahweh has already told Moses in Midian (4<sup>19</sup>) to go back to Egypt, and the theophany accordingly seems to belong to Goshen, or (better) to the journey thither.

C. Parallels and Contrasts.

Each set is marked with the same letter under J, E, and P, respectively to facilitate comparison. † after refs. means that all the instances in the OT are given; * that all in the Hexateuch are mentioned; italics denote biblical quotations; and capitals are used sometimes for emphatic words.

J—(a) The people live in Goshen 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>26</sup> Gn 45<sup>10</sup> etc. (only in J); (b) a separate district, so that they and their cattle could be differentiated from the Egyptians 8<sup>4</sup> 9<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>22</sup> 9<sup>4</sup> 6 9<sup>28</sup>; only brought in gangs into Egypt for forced labour 5<sup>5f.</sup>; away from the Nile, so that its pollution seems to cause no inconvenience 7<sup>21</sup> 24; (c) so numerous as to alarm the king 1<sup>9-12</sup>, 600,000 12<sup>37</sup> Nu 11<sup>21</sup> cf. Nu 10<sup>36</sup>; (d) cattle owners Gn 46<sup>32</sup> 34 47<sup>3</sup> 8 having flocks and herds 10<sup>3</sup> 24 12<sup>32</sup> 38 34 Nu 11<sup>22</sup> Gn 12<sup>16</sup> 13<sup>5</sup> 24<sup>35</sup> 32<sup>7</sup> 33<sup>13</sup> 45<sup>10</sup> 46<sup>32</sup> 47<sup>1</sup> 50<sup>8</sup>; (e) Mos. demands 3 days' journey 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>27</sup> cf. Gn 30<sup>36</sup> Nu 10<sup>33ab</sup>, Nu 33<sup>8</sup> R<sup>2</sup>†) that they might sacrifice to Yahweh or (our) God 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 8<sup>17</sup> 8<sup>25</sup> 27<sup>1f.</sup>, or serve Him 7<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>1</sup> 20 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>3</sup>, etc. 12<sup>31</sup>; (f) the wonders or plagues before Pharaoh are 7, and are natural calamities, as disease of fish in Nile 7<sup>14f.</sup>, when Yahweh smites the river 7<sup>17a</sup>, 25; natural causes being sometimes specified, as the wind in the case of the locusts 10<sup>13</sup> 19 cf. 14<sup>21b</sup>; Moses speaks freely on each occasion to Pharaoh, and the wonders follow the mere announcement; the hail is on every herb of the field 9<sup>25b</sup> cf. 9<sup>22</sup> and 10<sup>15c</sup>, and locusts eat the remaining crops and the fruit; (g) the light is hurried, at instigation of the Egypt. 12<sup>31f.</sup> 39; (h) Moses' father-in-law is the priest of Midian 2<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>19</sup> (3<sup>1</sup> 18<sup>1</sup> R<sup>1a</sup>) cf. Gn 41<sup>45</sup>, unnamed here (for Reuel 2<sup>18</sup> is prob. R<sup>1a</sup>), called Hobab Nu 10<sup>29</sup> Jg 4<sup>11</sup> 1<sup>18</sup>; and Moses has one son 2<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>24</sup>; (i) sprinkling of blood is the main thing in the Passover, eating not mentioned 12<sup>21-23</sup> J<sup>2</sup>; (j) the name of God is Yahweh (= Jehovah), or the God of . . .; (k) (l) (see below).

E—(a) The people live in the land of Egypt, with no hint of separate district being assigned them; (b) rather they seem to be herded in the royal city among the houses 1<sup>16f.</sup>; no immunity from plagues mentioned (e.g. hail 9<sup>25a</sup>) except for the darkness; can beg of neighbours jewels, etc. 3<sup>22</sup> 11<sup>2</sup>; near the Nile 1<sup>22</sup> 2<sup>1-10</sup>; (c) only numerous enough to annoy the king, their women needing only 2 midwives 1<sup>16f.</sup>, requiring only 600 chariots for pursuit 14<sup>7</sup>; (d) royal pensioners Gn 46<sup>18</sup> 23, never mentioned as owning cattle; (e) Mos. demands merely that Isr. be let go 3<sup>10f.</sup> 21<sup>1</sup> 5<sup>1a</sup> (5<sup>1b</sup> R<sup>1a</sup>) to harmonize with J 9<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>, ulterior end being to get to Can. 13<sup>17-19</sup> cf. Gn 48<sup>21</sup>, and incidentally to serve God on this mountain, i.e. Horeb, more than 3 days' journey 3<sup>12</sup>; (f) the wonders or plagues are 5, and have the miraculous element heightened, e.g. Moses smites all the waters in the river, and they turn to blood 7<sup>17b</sup> 20<sup>b</sup>; Moses only once speaks to Pharaoh 5<sup>1a</sup>, and the wonders follow his mere gesture; the hail is on man and beast 9<sup>22</sup> 25<sup>a</sup>, while locusts devour every herb of the land 10<sup>12</sup> 16<sup>b</sup>; (g) departure deliberate, the people gathering supplies beforehand 11<sup>14</sup>; time to take up Joseph's bones 13<sup>19</sup>; (h) Moses' father-in-law is Jethro 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>18</sup> 18, and he has two sons 18<sup>5f.</sup>, his wife being a Cushite Nu 12<sup>1</sup>; (j) the name of God is God (Elohim) always up to 3<sup>15</sup> and often afterwards, especially in phrases, e.g. mount of God 3<sup>1</sup> 4<sup>27</sup> 18<sup>5</sup> 24<sup>13*</sup>, rod of God 4<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>†; angel of God 14<sup>19</sup> Gn 21<sup>17</sup> 28<sup>12</sup> 31<sup>1</sup> 32<sup>1*</sup> cf. Ex 23<sup>20</sup> 32<sup>34</sup> Nu 20<sup>16</sup>; statutes of God 18<sup>16</sup>.

P—(a) The people live in Egypt 1<sup>1-5</sup>; (b) not in separate district, for the land was filled with them 1<sup>7</sup>; no immunity mentioned; (f) the direct Divine agency in the wonders is emphasized; Aaron is always with Moses, and speaks, etc. 7<sup>1-7</sup> etc. (while in J the insertion of Aaron 4<sup>13-16</sup> seems due to J<sup>2</sup>, for where Aaron or a plur. is found, as 8<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>2a</sup> 25<sup>28</sup> 28 9<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>16f.</sup>, the sing. is found close by 8<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>2b</sup> 29 9<sup>33</sup> 10<sup>17a</sup>, 18, Moses being sole speaker 7<sup>14</sup> 26 8<sup>20</sup> 9<sup>1-13</sup> 10<sup>1</sup>); (i) in the Passover the eating is the main thing, the sprinkling is not ordered to be repeated 12<sup>1-13</sup> 43-50; (j) the name of the Deity is always God up to 6<sup>2</sup>, and always Yahweh (= Jehovah) afterwards.

(k) Moses' rod is the object of Divine power in J, being turned into a serpent (nahash) before the people 4<sup>2-4</sup>; Moses' rod, given him by God 4<sup>17</sup> and called the rod of God 4<sup>20</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>, is regularly the instrument of Divine power in E 7<sup>15</sup> 17<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>b</sup> 9<sup>23</sup> 10<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>16</sup> 17<sup>5</sup> 9; Aaron's rod is in P the object of Divine power, being turned into a serpent (tannin) before Pharaoh 7<sup>19</sup>, and also its instrument 7<sup>19</sup> 8<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>f.</sup> cf. Nu 17. For describing Pharaoh's obstinacy, we have (l) some form of heavy in 7<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>15</sup> 22 9<sup>7</sup> 34 J; (2) some form of strong 7<sup>23</sup> 9<sup>35</sup> 10<sup>20</sup> 27 E, and 7<sup>13</sup> 22 8<sup>19</sup> 9<sup>12</sup> P, who moulds his almost unvarying phrase on 8<sup>15</sup> J, but borrows strong from E.

D. Other Clues to the Analysis.

J—That generation 1<sup>6</sup> (in P always plur.); mighty 17. 9. 20<sup>b</sup> Gn 26<sup>16</sup> Nu 22<sup>6</sup> etc.; come, or go to 1<sup>10</sup> Gn 11<sup>3f.</sup> 7 33<sup>16</sup>; falleth out 1<sup>10</sup> Gn 42<sup>3</sup> 38 49<sup>1</sup>; enemies (haters) 1<sup>10</sup> Gn 24<sup>60</sup>; taskmasters 11<sup>1</sup> cf. 37 56. 10. 13<sup>f.</sup> 7; afflict 11<sup>1</sup> cf. 37 43<sup>1</sup>; who made thee a prince? 21<sup>4</sup> cf. Nu 16<sup>13</sup>; sought to slay 21<sup>5</sup> 42<sup>4</sup> 21<sup>8b</sup> cf. Gn 27<sup>20</sup>; Angel of Jehovah 32 Nu 22<sup>22</sup> etc. cf. Ex 14<sup>19</sup> etc. E (see C j. above); cry 37. 9 Gn 4<sup>10</sup>; I am come down 38 10<sup>11</sup> 18. 20 Gn 11<sup>3</sup> 7 18<sup>21</sup> cf. Ex 33<sup>9</sup> E; Nu 11<sup>27</sup> 25 12<sup>5</sup> E*; land flowing with milk and honey 3<sup>8</sup> 17 13<sup>5</sup> 33 Nu 13<sup>27</sup> 14<sup>8</sup> 16<sup>13a</sup>. Jos 5<sup>6</sup>, never in E; Jehovah the God of the Hebrews 3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>18</sup> 9<sup>1</sup> 13<sup>1</sup> 10<sup>3</sup>†; 3 signs to convince the people 4<sup>1-12</sup> 30; lodging 4<sup>24</sup> Gn 42<sup>27</sup> 43<sup>27</sup> Jos 43. 8*; intreat 8<sup>8f.</sup> 25. 30 9<sup>28</sup> 10<sup>17</sup>. Gn 25<sup>21*</sup>; to-morrow, 8<sup>10</sup> 23. 29 9<sup>5f.</sup> 18 10<sup>4</sup>; such as hath not been, 9<sup>18</sup> 24 10<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>6*</sup> cf. 10<sup>8</sup>; there remained not . . . 8<sup>27</sup> 10<sup>19</sup> 26 14<sup>28</sup> Gn 47<sup>18</sup> Jos 8<sup>17*</sup>; mixed multitude 12<sup>38</sup> Nu 11<sup>4</sup>; the passover 12<sup>21-27</sup> 34<sup>25</sup>; unleavened bread and firstlings 13<sup>1-16</sup>, apparently quoted in 33<sup>15b</sup> 20<sup>a</sup> J<sup>2</sup> before deuteronomic expansion took place.

E—fear (towards God) 11<sup>7</sup> 21 18<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>20</sup> Gn 20<sup>11</sup> 22<sup>12</sup> 42<sup>18</sup> Dt 25<sup>18</sup> E Jos 24<sup>14</sup> (never in J); by the river's brink 23 7<sup>15</sup>; handmaid 2<sup>5</sup> (=bondswoman RvM 21<sup>7</sup> etc.); never in J; 2<sup>10</sup> cf. Gn 21<sup>8</sup>; Horeb 3<sup>2</sup> 17<sup>6</sup> 33<sup>9</sup>, never in J; . . . here am I 34 Gn 22<sup>1</sup> 7. 11. 27. 18 31<sup>11</sup> 37<sup>18</sup> 46<sup>2f.</sup>; herb of the land 10<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>a</sup>; the man Moses 11<sup>3</sup> Nu 12<sup>3</sup>; by a strong hand, of Pharaoh 14<sup>10</sup>, of Edom Nu 20<sup>20</sup>, cf. 31<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>9</sup> R<sup>4</sup>, and Dt. of God; one (to) another, lit. a man (to) his brother 10<sup>23</sup> 16<sup>15</sup> Gn 37<sup>19</sup> 42<sup>21</sup> 28 Nu 14<sup>14</sup> cf. Gn 26<sup>31</sup> cf. Gn 11<sup>3</sup> Heb. J, Ex 25<sup>20</sup> 37<sup>9</sup> Lev 25<sup>14</sup> P*.

P—See list of peculiar expressions in Driver's Introd., Holzinger's Eint. in d. Hex., or more fully still in the forthcoming Oxford Analytical ed. of the Hexateuch.

II. FROM EGYPT TO SINAI: 13<sup>17</sup>-18.

A. Summary.

13<sup>17-22</sup> JEFchoice of route, Jguided by the Pillar. 14 JEFcrossing of Red Sea and fate of pursuers. 15 JESong of Moses; JMarah, E? Massah (=proving), and JElim. 16 E<sup>1</sup>JGift of manna and P<sup>1</sup>quails, Pprovision for Sabbath and memorial pot of manna. 17 JEWater given in drought, J<sup>2</sup>at Massah, E<sup>2</sup>at Meribah; E<sup>2</sup>victory over Amalek. 18 E<sup>1</sup>Jvisit of Moses' father-in-law, E<sup>2</sup>appointment of judges.

B. Analysis.

|   |   |   |                     |      |    |     |    |    |            |       |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |     |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |      |       |
|---|---|---|---------------------|------|----|-----|----|----|------------|-------|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|-------|
| J | E | P | 13 <sup>17-19</sup> | 21f. | 14 | 5-6 | 7a | 9a | 10a afraid | 11-14 | 10b | 11a | 12a | 13a | 14a | 15a | 16a | 17a | 18a | 19a | 20a | 21a | 22a | 23a | 24a | 25a | 26a | 27a | 28a | 29a | 30a | 31a | 32a | 33a | 34a | 35a | 36a | 37a | 38a | 39a | 40a | 41a | 42a | 43a | 44a | 45a | 46a | 47a | 48a | 49a | 50a | 51a | 52a | 53a | 54a | 55a | 56a | 57a | 58a | 59a | 60a | 61a | 62a | 63a | 64a | 65a | 66a | 67a | 68a | 69a | 70a | 71a | 72a | 73a | 74a | 75a | 76a | 77a | 78a | 79a | 80a | 81a | 82a | 83a | 84a | 85a | 86a | 87a | 88a | 89a | 90a | 91a | 92a | 93a | 94a | 95a | 96a | 97a | 98a | 99a | 100a | 101a | 102a | 103a | 104a | 105a | 106a | 107a | 108a | 109a | 110a | 111a | 112a | 113a | 114a | 115a | 116a | 117a | 118a | 119a | 120a | 121a | 122a | 123a | 124a | 125a | 126a | 127a | 128a | 129a | 130a | 131a | 132a | 133a | 134a | 135a | 136a | 137a | 138a | 139a | 140a | 141a | 142a | 143a | 144a | 145a | 146a | 147a | 148a | 149a | 150a | 151a | 152a | 153a | 154a | 155a | 156a | 157a | 158a | 159a | 160a | 161a | 162a | 163a | 164a | 165a | 166a | 167a | 168a | 169a | 170a | 171a | 172a | 173a | 174a | 175a | 176a | 177a | 178a | 179a | 180a | 181a | 182a | 183a | 184a | 185a | 186a | 187a | 188a | 189a | 190a | 191a | 192a | 193a | 194a | 195a | 196a | 197a | 198a | 199a | 200a | 201a | 202a | 203a | 204a | 205a | 206a | 207a | 208a | 209a | 210a | 211a | 212a | 213a | 214a | 215a | 216a | 217a | 218a | 219a | 220a | 221a | 222a | 223a | 224a | 225a | 226a | 227a | 228a | 229a | 230a | 231a | 232a | 233a | 234a | 235a | 236a | 237a | 238a | 239a | 240a | 241a | 242a | 243a | 244a | 245a | 246a | 247a | 248a | 249a | 250a | 251a | 252a | 253a | 254a | 255a | 256a | 257a | 258a | 259a | 260a | 261a | 262a | 263a | 264a | 265a | 266a | 267a | 268a | 269a | 270a | 271a | 272a | 273a | 274a | 275a | 276a | 277a | 278a | 279a | 280a | 281a | 282a | 283a | 284a | 285a | 286a | 287a | 288a | 289a | 290a | 291a | 292a | 293a | 294a | 295a | 296a | 297a | 298a | 299a | 300a | 301a | 302a | 303a | 304a | 305a | 306a | 307a | 308a | 309a | 310a | 311a | 312a | 313a | 314a | 315a | 316a | 317a | 318a | 319a | 320a | 321a | 322a | 323a | 324a | 325a | 326a | 327a | 328a | 329a | 330a | 331a | 332a | 333a | 334a | 335a | 336a | 337a | 338a | 339a | 340a | 341a | 342a | 343a | 344a | 345a | 346a | 347a | 348a | 349a | 350a | 351a | 352a | 353a | 354a | 355a | 356a | 357a | 358a | 359a | 360a | 361a | 362a | 363a | 364a | 365a | 366a | 367a | 368a | 369a | 370a | 371a | 372a | 373a | 374a | 375a | 376a | 377a | 378a | 379a | 380a | 381a | 382a | 383a | 384a | 385a | 386a | 387a | 388a | 389a | 390a | 391a | 392a | 393a | 394a | 395a | 396a | 397a | 398a | 399a | 400a | 401a | 402a | 403a | 404a | 405a | 406a | 407a | 408a | 409a | 410a | 411a | 412a | 413a | 414a | 415a | 416a | 417a | 418a | 419a | 420a | 421a | 422a | 423a | 424a | 425a | 426a | 427a | 428a | 429a | 430a | 431a | 432a | 433a | 434a | 435a | 436a | 437a | 438a | 439a | 440a | 441a | 442a | 443a | 444a | 445a | 446a | 447a | 448a | 449a | 450a | 451a | 452a | 453a | 454a | 455a | 456a | 457a | 458a | 459a | 460a | 461a | 462a | 463a | 464a | 465a | 466a | 467a | 468a | 469a | 470a | 471a | 472a | 473a | 474a | 475a | 476a | 477a | 478a | 479a | 480a | 481a | 482a | 483a | 484a | 485a | 486a | 487a | 488a | 489a | 490a | 491a | 492a | 493a | 494a | 495a | 496a | 497a | 498a | 499a | 500a | 501a | 502a | 503a | 504a | 505a | 506a | 507a | 508a | 509a | 510a | 511a | 512a | 513a | 514a | 515a | 516a | 517a | 518a | 519a | 520a | 521a | 522a | 523a | 524a | 525a | 526a | 527a | 528a | 529a | 530a | 531a | 532a | 533a | 534a | 535a | 536a | 537a | 538a | 539a | 540a | 541a | 542a | 543a | 544a | 545a | 546a | 547a | 548a | 549a | 550a | 551a | 552a | 553a | 554a | 555a | 556a | 557a | 558a | 559a | 560a | 561a | 562a | 563a | 564a | 565a | 566a | 567a | 568a | 569a | 570a | 571a | 572a | 573a | 574a | 575a | 576a | 577a | 578a | 579a | 580a | 581a | 582a | 583a | 584a | 585a | 586a | 587a | 588a | 589a | 590a | 591a | 592a | 593a | 594a | 595a | 596a | 597a | 598a | 599a | 600a | 601a | 602a | 603a | 604a | 605a | 606a | 607a | 608a | 609a | 610a | 611a | 612a | 613a | 614a | 615a | 616a | 617a | 618a | 619a | 620a | 621a | 622a | 623a | 624a | 625a | 626a | 627a | 628a | 629a | 630a | 631a | 632a | 633a | 634a | 635a | 636a | 637a | 638a | 639a | 640a | 641a | 642a | 643a | 644a | 645a | 646a | 647a | 648a | 649a | 650a | 651a | 652a | 653a | 654a | 655a | 656a | 657a | 658a | 659a | 660a | 661a | 662a | 663a | 664a | 665a | 666a | 667a | 668a | 669a | 670a | 671a | 672a | 673a | 674a | 675a | 676a | 677a | 678a | 679a | 680a | 681a | 682a | 683a | 684a | 685a | 686a | 687a | 688a | 689a | 690a | 691a | 692a | 693a | 694a | 695a | 696a | 697a | 698a | 699a | 700a | 701a | 702a | 703a | 704a | 705a | 706a | 707a | 708a | 709a | 710a | 711a | 712a | 713a | 714a | 715a | 716a | 717a | 718a | 719a | 720a | 721a | 722a | 723a | 724a | 725a | 726a | 727a | 728a | 729a | 730a | 731a | 732a | 733a | 734a | 735a | 736a | 737a | 738a | 739a | 740a | 741a | 742a | 743a | 744a | 745a | 746a | 747a | 748a | 749a | 750a | 751a | 752a | 753a | 754a | 755a | 756a | 757a | 758a | 759a | 760a | 761a | 762a | 763a | 764a | 765a | 766a | 767a | 768a | 769a | 770a | 771a | 772a | 773a | 774a | 775a | 776a | 777a | 778a | 779a | 780a | 781a | 782a | 783a | 784a | 785a | 786a | 787a | 788a | 789a | 790a | 791a | 792a | 793a | 794a | 795a | 796a | 797a | 798a | 799a | 800a | 801a | 802a | 803a | 804a | 805a | 806a | 807a | 808a | 809a | 810a | 811a | 812a | 813a | 814a | 815a | 816a | 817a | 818a | 819a | 820a | 821a | 822a | 823a | 824a | 825a | 826a | 827a | 828a | 829a | 830a | 831a | 832a | 833a | 834a | 835a | 836a | 837a | 838a | 839a | 840a | 841a | 842a | 843a | 844a | 845a | 846a | 847a | 848a | 849a | 850a | 851a | 852a | 853a | 854a | 855a | 856a | 857a | 858a | 859a | 860a | 861a | 862a | 863a | 864a | 865a | 866a | 867a | 868a | 869a | 870a | 871a | 872a | 873a | 874a | 875a | 876a | 877a | 878a | 879a | 880a | 881a | 882a | 883a | 884a | 885a | 886a | 887a | 888a | 889a | 890a | 891a | 892a | 893a | 894a | 895a | 896a | 897a | 898a | 899a | 900a | 901a | 902a | 903a | 904a | 905a | 906a | 907a | 908a | 909a | 910a | 911a | 912a | 913a | 914a | 915a | 916a | 917a | 918a | 919a | 920a | 921a | 922a | 923a | 924a | 925a | 926a | 927a | 928a | 929a | 930a | 931a | 932a | 933a | 934a | 935a | 936a | 937a | 938a | 939a | 940a | 941a | 942a | 943a | 944a | 945a | 946a | 947a | 948a | 949a | 950a | 951a | 952a | 953a | 954a | 955a | 956a | 957a | 958a | 959a | 960a | 961a | 962a | 963a | 964a | 965a | 966a | 967a | 968a | 969a | 970a | 971a | 972a | 973a | 974a | 975a | 976a | 977a | 978a | 979a | 980a | 981a | 982a | 983a | 984a | 985a | 986a | 987a | 988a | 989a | 990a | 991a | 992a | 993a | 994a | 995a | 996a | 997a | 998a | 999a | 1000a |
|---|---|---|---------------------|------|----|-----|----|----|------------|-------|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|-----|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|-------|

Displaced passages.—b is out of place here, and fits a later place in the narrative, as is shown by position assigned to Joshua at 33<sup>11</sup>. c is also subsequent to the legislation at Horeb, and preparatory to departure for Can., cf. 23. d perhaps led up to Nu 10<sup>29</sup>.

C. Parallels and Contrasts.

J—(a) Moses leads Isr. 15<sup>22</sup>, a vast host (see I C c), but unarmed and helpless 14<sup>11-14</sup>, with the Pillar of fire and cloud for guide 13<sup>21</sup> 14<sup>19b</sup>. 24 Nu 14<sup>14</sup>; (b) straight for the Red Sea, perhaps because the Isthmus was fortified: Pharaoh pursues for reasons given 14<sup>5</sup>; (c) Moses uses no gesture, but brave words 14<sup>13</sup> cf. I C f; Jehovah causes the sea to go back by a strong east wind 21a, and then to return to its wonted flow 27b, and the crossing is by night 20b. 24. 27b; the Pillar moving to the rear and giving light to Isr. 19b. 20b (read, and it gave light by night), while obscuring the Egyptians' path 24; Jehovah fights for Isr. 14. 25b; (d) Moses and Israel sing 15<sup>1</sup>; (e) Isr. tempts or proves J' 17<sup>2</sup>. 7ac Nu 14<sup>22</sup> cf. Dt 6<sup>16</sup> 9<sup>22</sup>; (f) see under P below; (g) the people prove J', hence the name Massah or proving (see e above), and murmur against Mos. 15<sup>24</sup> 17<sup>3</sup> Nu 14<sup>2</sup> cf. Nu 20<sup>5</sup>, for water 17<sup>3</sup>. 2b. 7ac, which elsewhere in J is provided by natural causes, as 15<sup>22ff</sup>. 27.

E—(a) God leads the people 13<sup>17</sup> (cf. Jos 24<sup>6</sup> E) few but armed 18; (b) not by the Isthmus for fear of the Philistines 17, but presumably by the next nearest route to Can. (cf. Jos 24<sup>6</sup>, and see I C e); the Egypt. pursue Isr. (Jos 24<sup>6</sup>), who cry out 14<sup>10b</sup> (Jos 24<sup>7</sup>); (c) the rod (I C k) is lifted up 14<sup>16a</sup> cf. Is 10<sup>26</sup>; the sea is crossed by day, for the angel of God (I C j) goes behind and interposes a barrier of darkness 19a. 20a (Jos 24<sup>7</sup>), and then obstructs advance 25a and overwhelms them (Jos 24<sup>7</sup>); (d) Miriam and the women sing responsively 15<sup>20f</sup>. cf. I S 18<sup>6f</sup>, which suggests that we have here an independent account not following on 15<sup>1</sup>, which is thus left for J; (e) God proves Isr. 15<sup>25b</sup> 16<sup>4</sup> 20<sup>2</sup> Gn 22<sup>1</sup> cf. Jg 2<sup>22</sup> (Budde E) Dt 8<sup>2</sup>. 16 13<sup>4</sup> Jg 3<sup>1</sup>. 4 (? R<sup>4</sup>)*; (f) the proving is by the test of their reception of each day's portion (dabar) of bread from heaven 16<sup>4</sup>, the thing (dabar) which Jehovah commanded being to gather only for daily use every man according to his eating, i.e. a variable amount (16a. 19-21) cf. Dt 8<sup>2</sup>. 16; they knew not what it was, and hence the name 15a. cf. Dt 8<sup>3</sup>. 16, and it lasted till they came to a land inhabited 35a; (g) the people strive with Mos. about lack of water, hence the name Meribah or strife 17<sup>2a</sup>. 7b; water comes by smiting the rock with Moses' rod 51. cf. 7<sup>20b</sup> and see I C k.

P—(a) Moses and Aaron lead the whole congregation 16<sup>1-3</sup> with a high hand 14<sup>5</sup>; (b) not by Isthmus because deliberately turned back 14<sup>2-4</sup> to give occasion for a wonder, and Pharaoh pursues because hardened 4. 8. 17 cf. I C l; (c) Moses' hand was stretched forth 16a. 21a. 26<sup>1</sup>, and the waters were divided miraculously, not by a wind, for they were as a wall on their right hand and on their left 21b. 22, and so the catastrophe followed 26. 27a. 28a; (f) the whole congregation murmurs for the fleshpots of Egypt 16<sup>2f</sup>. (cf. Nu 11<sup>4-6a</sup> J); manna, a miraculous gift, is described 14. 23. 31 (cf. and ct. manna, a natural product, described Nu 11<sup>6b-9</sup> J); the quails are mentioned almost casually 13, manna being the main point (cf. Nu 11<sup>13</sup>. 15-23. 31-34 J); a fixed amount of manna was to be gathered 16b; manna is eaten till they came unto the borders of the land of Can. 35b; the two commands about Sabbath observance 22f. and the memorial pot of manna 32f. are not needed by the context of P, and may have been added after the union of J E P in order to supply clearer explanations of the proving of 4.

D. Other Clues.

J—Divine help by natural means 14<sup>21</sup> 15<sup>22-25a</sup> cf. I C e; three days 15<sup>22</sup> cf. I C e; and they came to . . . 15<sup>23</sup>. 27 Heb.; springs (lit. eyes) of water 15<sup>27</sup> Gn 16<sup>7ab</sup> 24 (7 times) 49<sup>32</sup> Dt 37 35<sup>23</sup> Nu 33<sup>9</sup> R<sup>4</sup>.*

E—Joseph's bones 13<sup>19</sup> Gn 50<sup>25</sup> Jos 24<sup>32</sup>; statute and ordinance 15<sup>25b</sup> Jos 24<sup>25</sup>; they cried out unto Jehovah 14<sup>10b</sup> Jos 24<sup>7</sup>; one to another 16<sup>15</sup> see I D; pass on before the people 17<sup>5</sup> Jos 3<sup>6</sup>; Aaron and Hur 17<sup>10</sup>. 12 24<sup>14</sup>; Moses' father-in-law Jethro, wife, and two sons 18, see I C h.

P—I will get me honour 14<sup>4</sup>. 17f. Lv 10<sup>8</sup>; and the Egyptians pursued 14<sup>9</sup>. 23; 15<sup>19</sup> R<sup>4</sup> cf. 14<sup>22f</sup>. 28a; date after . . . departing out of the land of Egypt 19<sup>1</sup> Nu 11<sup>9</sup> 33<sup>3</sup> 1 K 6<sup>14</sup>.

III. AT SINAI: 19-40.

A. Summary.

19 JEP The encampment at P Sinai E the mount of God; J<sup>2</sup> awful sights and sounds introduce a theophany; 20-23 God gives, i. E<sup>2</sup> the Decalogue, ii. E<sup>1</sup> the Book of the Covenant, iii. E<sup>2</sup> the Book of Judgments; 24 E covenant sacrifice and J feast before God, E<sup>2</sup> Moses ascends the mount, and E remains 40 days; 25-31 J<sup>2</sup> gives full directions for the tabernacle, its ornaments and furniture, its priests, their dress and consecration; E<sup>2</sup> J<sup>2</sup> Moses receives the two tables; 32-34 E idolatrous and J<sup>2</sup> mutinous conduct of the people; E Moses breaks the tables and destroys the golden calf; J<sup>2</sup> massacre by Levites; J<sup>2</sup> intercession of Moses; E<sup>2</sup> P usage of tent of meeting; J<sup>2</sup> the ten Words of the Covenant J<sup>2</sup> written by Moses J<sup>2</sup> E<sup>2</sup> on two tables; 35-40 P erection and furnishing of the tabernacle.

B. Analysis.

|   |   |   |    |    |           |
|---|---|---|----|----|-----------|
| J | E | P | 19 | 2b | 3a to God |
|---|---|---|----|----|-----------|

justified by the hopelessness of less drastic methods and the comparative harmony and order which it introduces. There is, however, a growing consensus of opinion in favour of the main conclusions on which the scheme rests. The sources are for clearness given again separately, in the order conjecturally suggested here. The presence of J<sup>a</sup> and E<sup>a</sup> is often felt, especially in 32-34, but cannot be clearly delimited.

J=19<sup>2b</sup>, 20-22, 24, 11b-13, 25 . . . 24<sup>1f</sup>, 9-11 34<sup>1-5r</sup>, 10-28<sup>r</sup>, 32<sup>7-14r</sup>, 25<sup>r</sup>-29 33<sup>1</sup>, 3 (Nu 11<sup>10c</sup>, 11<sup>f</sup>, 14<sup>c</sup>) Ex 33<sup>12-23</sup> 34<sup>6-9</sup> . . .

E=19<sup>3a</sup>, 9<sup>r</sup>-11a, 14-17, 19 20<sup>1</sup>-21 19<sup>6b-8</sup> 24<sup>12-14</sup>, 18b 32<sup>1-6</sup> 31<sup>18b</sup> 32<sup>16-24</sup>, 30-34 33<sup>4</sup>, 6 . . . 20<sup>22-26</sup> 23<sup>10-33r</sup> (with 22<sup>29-31</sup>) 24<sup>3-8</sup> 18<sup>1-27r</sup> 33<sup>7-11</sup> and (after the E passages in Nu) 17<sup>8-16</sup> the war with Amalek, and 21<sup>1-23r</sup> the Book of Judgments, whose original position is supposed to be now occupied by Dt.

Ph=29<sup>42-46r</sup> 31<sup>12-17r</sup>.

Pg=19<sup>1-2a</sup> 20<sup>11</sup> 24<sup>15b-18a</sup> 25-27<sup>19</sup> 28<sup>1-40</sup>, 42<sup>f</sup>, 29<sup>1-20</sup>, 22-37 31<sup>18a</sup>.

Ps=27<sup>20f</sup>, 28<sup>41</sup> 29<sup>38-46</sup> 30-31<sup>11</sup> 32<sup>15b-16</sup> 35-40.

R<sup>d</sup> (or R<sup>le</sup>)=19<sup>3c-6a</sup>, 23 20<sup>2b</sup>, 4b-6, 7b, 9<sup>f</sup>, 12b, 17b 22<sup>21b-22</sup>, 24, 26b, 31 23<sup>9</sup>, 11b, 12b-13, 15b, 17, 19a, 23-25a, 27, 31b-33 32<sup>8</sup>, 13, 25b 33<sup>2</sup>, 5 34<sup>1b</sup>, 4a, 7b, 10b-13, 15, 23<sup>f</sup>.

C. Parallels and Contrasts.

J—(a) J<sup>a</sup> 19<sup>11b</sup>, 18, 20ab, 21ab, 22ab, 24 etc., (b) came down (see I D) (c) in fire 19<sup>18</sup> (cf. Gn 19<sup>24</sup> Ex 3<sup>2</sup>, and the pillar of fire II C<sup>a</sup>, c) (d) upon Mount Sinai 19<sup>11b</sup>, 18, 20, 23<sup>2</sup>, 34<sup>2</sup>, 4 (e) in the sight of all the people, 19<sup>11b</sup>, (f) the PRIESTS only being bidden to sanctify themselves 19<sup>22</sup>, (g) the people being kept at a distance throughout, 19<sup>21</sup>, 24, 12<sup>f</sup>, 24<sup>2b</sup>, 34<sup>3</sup>, (h) while these (so Heb.) 19<sup>13b</sup>, i.e. Mos. and the priests which come near, were to come up, 22, 24 (read in <sup>24</sup> and the priests: but let not the people cf. J) 24<sup>1</sup>, (i) at the BLAST of the RAMS-HORN 19<sup>13b</sup> Heb. (j) Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu with 70 elders accordingly are called and go up, and (k) celebrate a covenant feast before the God of Isr. 24<sup>1f</sup>, 9<sup>f</sup>. (this incident may have been incorporated by the author from another source, as it presents several peculiar features); (l) Moses is then summoned ALONE to the top of the mount 34<sup>2f</sup>, (m) with two tables of STONES (so Heb.) which he is to hew 34<sup>1, 4ab</sup>; (n) upon the tables he is to write 34<sup>2f</sup>, (cf. <sup>1</sup> where the change of one Heb. letter turns I will into thou shalt write) (o) the Ten Words of the Covenant as soon as he receives them 34<sup>2f</sup>, (p) remaining with J<sup>a</sup> 40 days and 40 nights apparently for the purpose of engraving them. (q) The rebellion of the people (32<sup>2b</sup>) being announced to him by J<sup>a</sup> (?<sup>a</sup>), Moses procures by intercession the repentance of Jehovah (11-14), (r) and on descending quells revolt by means of the sons of Levi (32<sup>25-29</sup>). (s) On learning he is to lead alone, Moses intercedes afresh, and procures a theophany, a revelation of mercy, and a promise of J<sup>a</sup>'s presence 33<sup>1, 3</sup> (Nu 11<sup>10c</sup>, 11<sup>f</sup>, 14<sup>c</sup>), which interrupt their present context, fit well here, and, after the great block of P is removed, are seen to lie near at hand) 12-23 34<sup>6-9</sup>. (t) Moses HAD ALREADY made an ark of acacia wood, and puts the tables in the ark (J's account, which Nu 10<sup>33-36</sup> and the many references to the ark in Jos prove to have existed, but which is now displaced in favour of P's, is recovered from Dt 10<sup>1-5</sup>), (u) but no trace remains of his allusions to the tent of meeting.

E—(a) God 19<sup>3a</sup>, 17, 19 20<sup>1</sup>, 19, 20, 21 21<sup>6</sup>, 13 22<sup>8</sup>, 9ab, 11 in LXX 28 24<sup>13</sup> 31<sup>18b</sup> (cf. D) (b) comes 19<sup>9</sup> 20<sup>20</sup> (c) in a thick cloud 19<sup>9</sup>, 16 20<sup>18</sup>, 21 cf. 14<sup>20a</sup>, 33<sup>9</sup> Nu 11<sup>25</sup> 12<sup>5</sup> Dt 31<sup>15E</sup> (d) to the mount of God 24<sup>13</sup> (cf. I C j), (e) that the people may HEAR 19<sup>9</sup>, 19 20<sup>1</sup>, 19, (f) So Moses has to sanctify the PEOPLE 19<sup>10f</sup>, 14<sup>c</sup>, (g) and they only stand afar off through fear 20<sup>21</sup> (h) after Moses has brought them all near 19<sup>17</sup>, (i) when there is the VOICE of a TRUMPET going on and increasing much 19<sup>16</sup>, 19 20<sup>18</sup>. (j) (see below Y, x). Without any individuals drawing nearer, God

speaks the Decalogue to the people 20<sup>1-19</sup>, (k) (see below W, y), and the covenant is assented to by the people 19<sup>5b-8r</sup> cf. 24<sup>3-8</sup> Dt 27<sup>11f</sup>, E Jos 24<sup>16-27</sup> I S 11<sup>14-12<sup>25</sup>E</sup>. (l) Moses is then summoned, and goes up into the mount with Joshua his minister 24<sup>18f</sup>, cf. 33<sup>11</sup> Nu 11<sup>28</sup>, (m) that God may give him the tables of STONE which He has written, and the law and the commandment that he may teach them 24<sup>12</sup> (with a slight transposition rendered necessary by an alteration presumably made when the Book of Judgments was thrust into the centre of the Book of the Covenant to make way for the Deuteronomic law given in the plains of Moab). (n) On the tables God has already written 24<sup>12</sup> 31<sup>18b</sup> (o) apparently the Decalogue, see Dt 5<sup>22</sup>. (p) Moses remains in the mount 40 days and 40 nights for the purpose, it would seem, of receiving the law and the commandment, here supposed to refer to the material of the Book of Judgments 21-23<sup>9</sup>. (q) On descending he discovers with surprise the idolatry of the people, (r) and breaks the tables, and destroys the golden calf 32<sup>15a</sup>, 17-20. (s) Moses then intercedes for the people, is bidden to lead them himself, but has promise of God's angel to go before him: there is a marked tone of severity in the words of J<sup>a</sup> 32<sup>30-35</sup>. (t) That E spoke of the ark here may be implied from his allusions in Jos passim, (u) and that he described the making of a simpler form of the tent of meeting, placed without the camp, and possibly adorned by aid of the abandoned ornaments, seems to follow from 33<sup>7-11</sup> Nu 11<sup>16f</sup>, 24b-30 12<sup>4f</sup>, Dt 31<sup>14f</sup>, with Ex 33<sup>6</sup> 32<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>2f</sup>. (v) J<sup>a</sup> gives the Book of the Covenant 20<sup>22-26</sup> 22<sup>29f</sup>, 23<sup>10-33r</sup>; (w) the covenant is assented to by the people, see k above; (x) certain young men 24<sup>5</sup> cf. 32<sup>6</sup> and Joshua 33<sup>1</sup>, ct. J under k, (y) offer a covenant sacrifice 24<sup>5</sup> cf. 20<sup>24</sup> 32<sup>6</sup> Dt 27<sup>6f</sup>.

P—(a) J<sup>a</sup> (so throughout) (b) makes His glory (16<sup>7, 10</sup> 29<sup>43</sup> 40<sup>34f</sup>, Nu 14<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>19, 42</sup> 20<sup>6</sup> ct. the less local and physical use of the term 33<sup>18, 22</sup> Nu 14<sup>21f</sup> J, Dt 5<sup>24*</sup>) to appear (c) like devouring FIRE (40<sup>38</sup> Lv 9<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>2</sup> Nu 9<sup>15f</sup>, 16<sup>35</sup>) . . . out of the midst of the CLOUD (16<sup>10</sup> 24<sup>15</sup>, 16ab, 17, 18 40<sup>34</sup>, 35, 36, 37, 38 Lv 16<sup>2</sup> Nu 9<sup>15f</sup>, 11 times 10<sup>11f</sup>, 34 16<sup>42</sup>) (d) upon Mount Sinai (e) in the eyes of the children of Israel 24<sup>15b-18a</sup>, (f) no priests having yet been consecrated 29 Lv 8-10, (g) all except Moses being kept at a distance; (l) Moses is called, and goes up into the mount 24<sup>16-18a</sup>, (m) that he may receive the two tables of the TESTIMONY 31<sup>18a</sup> 32<sup>15a'</sup>, (n) which had, written on both their sides 32<sup>15b</sup>, (o) no doubt the Decalogue, a brief account of the giving of which may have been displaced by R<sup>d</sup> in favour of the impressive narrative of JE, 20<sup>1</sup> being perhaps the only fragment preserved. (p) Moses remains in the mount (prob. for 40 days and nights) to receive the pattern of the sanctuary (25-30), (s) with a promise of J<sup>a</sup> to meet with the children of Israel (hence tent of meeting) and to dwell among the children of Israel (hence Tabernacle or Dwelling) 29<sup>42-46</sup>. (t) Moses SUBSEQUENTLY ORDERS to be made an ark of acacia wood, overlaid and ornamented with gold 25<sup>10-22</sup> 37<sup>1-9</sup>, and puts the testimony into the ark 25<sup>16</sup> 40<sup>20</sup>; (u) he also prepares, erects, and furnishes a gorgeous Dwelling for J<sup>a</sup>, large and costly and needing a numerous body of priests and Levites to attend to it (35-40).

D. Other Clues.

J—God, when stress is on His nature, deity 24<sup>11</sup> Gn 32<sup>28</sup> 33<sup>10</sup>; stiff-necked 32<sup>9</sup> 33<sup>3</sup>, 5 34<sup>9</sup>, quoted Dt 9<sup>6</sup>, 13; consume 32<sup>10</sup>, 12 33<sup>5</sup>, 5 Gn 41<sup>30</sup> cf. Nu 16<sup>21</sup>, 45 P etc.; and I will make of thee a great nation 32<sup>10</sup> Gn 12<sup>2</sup> Nu 14<sup>12</sup> ct. Heb. Gn 21<sup>18</sup> 46<sup>3</sup> E and Gn 17<sup>20</sup> P; face of the ground 32<sup>12</sup> 33<sup>16</sup> Gn 26 43, 14 61, 7 74, 23 88, 13 cf. Nu 12<sup>3</sup> E<sup>a</sup> and Dt 61<sup>5</sup> 76 142*; it repented J<sup>a</sup> 32<sup>12</sup>, 14 Gn 6<sup>6f</sup>, ct. Ex 13<sup>17</sup> Nu 23<sup>19</sup>; land flowing, etc. I D; find grace (in the eyes of) 33<sup>13ab</sup>, 16<sup>f</sup>, 34<sup>9</sup> Gn 6<sup>8</sup>, 18<sup>3</sup>, 19<sup>19</sup>, 30<sup>27</sup>, 32<sup>6</sup>, 33<sup>8</sup>, 10, 15 34<sup>11</sup> 39<sup>4</sup> 47<sup>25</sup>, 29 50<sup>4</sup> Nu 11<sup>11, 15</sup> 32<sup>5</sup> Dt 24<sup>1*</sup>; pass by (of J<sup>a</sup> or His glory) 33<sup>19</sup>, 22ab 34<sup>9</sup>; proclaim . . . 33<sup>19</sup> 34<sup>6</sup> (thy) glory 33<sup>18, 22</sup> cf. C b under P; stress on mercy 33<sup>19</sup> 34<sup>6f</sup> Nu 14<sup>19</sup>; I make a covenant 34<sup>10</sup>, 27

E—Prove, 20<sup>20</sup>, see II C e; lord of (wife, etc.), Heb. ba'al, RV married, owner, etc. 213.22.28.29ab 34ab.36 228.11f.14f. 2414 Gn 203 3719 Nu 212<sup>28</sup> Jos 2411, in J only once, in the poem Gn 4913; bondswoman 25 217. 20.26f.32 (Heb. word never used by J); stress on severity of God 2321 3233 Nu 2319 Jos 2419; Aaron and Hur 2414 1710.12; rings (i.e. for ears) 322f. Gn 354 Jg 241f. (perh. E); sin 3221.30f. Gn 209*; Horeb 336, see I D; pillar of cloud 337-11, see C c.

IV. THE LAWS IN EXODUS.

The four earliest Heb. codes occur in this section, all in an expanded form. The principal additions have been shown above (end of III B); they either interrupt the context, or contrast with it in phraseology or material, or seem to be quotations inserted from elsewhere. Limits of space forbid any further attempt to justify their excision from the orig. sources.

It is now generally agreed that E contained three out of the four codes. This confirms the view that this document, like others, represents the end of a long process, during which various elements were successively assimilated. Moreover, those who combined E with J (referred to as R<sup>3</sup>), who added D (R<sup>4</sup>), who finally incorporated the whole in P (R<sup>5</sup>), naturally in the case of such important material showed at its strongest the desire to preserve all they could. Is it unreasonable to conjecture that each fresh combination required some dislocation of the existing material to suit the new adjustment? In the text as we now have it, E's three codes form together the basis of the Covenant. It has been suggested above that in E, in its final form as a separate document, the Decalogue was the basis of the Covenant, the Book of the Covenant led up to the Renewal of the Covenant, while the Book of Judgments belonged to Moses' parting words in the plains of Moab. If R<sup>3</sup> used J's version of the Covenant to serve for the account of the Renewal of the Cov. (341-28), and, to preserve E's Book of the Cov., put it back to form with the Decalogue the basis of the first Cov.; and if R<sup>4</sup>, inserting D in the section about the plains of Moab, kept the Book of Judgments by incorporating it with the Book of the Cov., then the very order which we now have would have been produced. That this actually took place is only conjecture; but it was worth while showing how the present state of the text might have arisen; and this solution has at least the merit that it only presupposes the action of causes which have been clearly traced at work elsewhere.

The Codes compared.

J—The Ten Words of the Covenant (III C 1-p above).—(The list given is only the one thought best of several possible ones. Parallels in E are marked by the corresponding number. Laws in 3 codes are in LARGE CAPITALS; laws given by both J and E in SMALL CAPITALS): (1) MONOLATRY COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; (3) THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD; (4) THE SABBATH; (5) THE FEAST OF weeks of FIRSTFRUITS, and (6) THE FEAST OF INOATHERING, COMMANDED; (7) BREAD WITH SACRIFICES TO BE UNLEAVENED; (8) THE passover sacrifice TO BE ALL CONSUMED; (9) FIRSTFRUITS REQUIRED; (10) SETHING OF A KID IN ITS DAM'S MILK FORBIDDEN.

E—The Decalogue. (1) MONOLATRY COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; false swearing forbidden; (4) THE SABBATH enjoined; reverence to parents commanded; murder, adultery, theft, false witness, and covetousness forbidden.

E—The Book of the Covenant (III C v above). (1) MONOLATRY (?) COMMANDED; (2) IMAGES FORBIDDEN; altars to be built as ordered; (3) FIRSTFRUITS DEMANDED; also FIRSTLINGS (cf. 1311f. J); the Sabbatical year, and (4) THE SABBATH COMMANDED; also (3) THE FEAST OF UNLEAVENED BREAD, (5) THE FEAST OF harvest of FIRSTFRUITS, and (6) THE FEAST OF INOATHERING; (7) BREAD WITH SACRIFICES TO BE LEAVENED; (8) THE fat of God's feast TO BE ALL CONSUMED; (10) SETHING A KID IN ITS DAM'S MILK FORBIDDEN.

[It will be observed that, while the Decalogue (which see) contains both religious and moral laws, the other two concern only religion and the cultus, and are very closely parallel to one another].

E—The Book of Judgments (21-239). This code contains a comprehensive series of laws, civil and criminal, all penetrated by a high ethical and religious spirit. They seem drawn up, perhaps originally in sets of 5 or 10, for use by judges and magistrates, but display no very definite order of arrangement. The appeal lies before God, i.e. (presumably) at the sanctuary, cf. 1813-26. With this code should be carefully compared Dt 12-26, which is based on it, and Lv 17-26, the Holiness Legislation, which presents many parallels.

The chapters in P relating to the Tabernacle (which see) remain to be considered. They are not without difficulty, for a close inspection discovers reasons for believing that they are not all from the same hand. The full proof of the analysis given above (end of III B) cannot be reproduced here, but the nature of the principal line of argument can be seen from the accompanying table, which gives the sections in the order of 35-40 (Heb. text)=H<sup>2</sup>, while on either side are given references to 25-31 (Heb. text)=H<sup>1</sup>, and 35-40 (Gr. text)=G. The letters indicate by their alphabetical order the order of sections in the text referred to; and those sections in H<sup>1</sup> which are judged later than P<sup>2</sup> are marked by an italic capital. A moment's comparison of H<sup>1</sup> and H<sup>2</sup> shows large variations of order. But while the changes of order in A to K and M to U can be readily accounted for by the mere fact that H<sup>2</sup> records the fulfilment and H<sup>1</sup> the ordering, the passages L, W, X, Z, A', B' seem so out of place where they are that it is necessary to suppose them to be later than the context that would otherwise have contained them. The golden altar of incense (W=m) is the most important case. (1) It is out of its natural place in H<sup>1</sup>; (2) the term the altar in 271-8, and 100 times elsewhere in P<sup>2</sup> and (early) P<sup>3</sup>, would be ambiguous if the altar were one of two, and is replaced in 381 etc. by a distinctive term, the altar of burnt-offering, and so constantly in the later strata of P<sup>2</sup>; (3) the incense altar is not mentioned in G; (4) in Lv 10 and Nu 16 we only read of censers for incense, and the

| H <sup>1</sup> | The Dwelling.                        | H <sup>2</sup> | G                        |
|----------------|--------------------------------------|----------------|--------------------------|
| A. 251-9       | gifts asked . . .                    | a. 354-9       | a. 354-8§                |
| ...            | workmen invited . . .                | b. 10-19       | b. 9-19†                 |
| ...            | gifts presented . . .                | c. 20-29       | c. 20-29                 |
| C. 311-11      | Bezalel, etc. . .                    | d. 30-36†      | d. 30-36†                |
| ...            | gifts finished . . .                 | e. 362-7       | e. 362-7                 |
| E. 261-14      | curtains . . .                       | f. 8-19        | k. 371†                  |
| F. 15-30       | boards . . .                         | g. 20-34       | s. 3818-21†              |
| G. 31f.        | veil . . .                           | h. 35f.        | l. 373f.                 |
| I. 36f.        | screen . . .                         | i. 37f.        | m. 5f.                   |
| B. 2510-22     | ark . . .                            | j. 371-9       | p. 381-8§                |
| C. 23-30       | table . . .                          | k. 10-16       | q. 9-12†                 |
| D. 31-40       | candlestick . . .                    | l. 17-24       | r. 13-17†                |
| W. 301-5       | incense altar . . .                  | m. 25-28       | ...                      |
| X. 6-10        | its use . . .                        | ...            | ...                      |
| A'. 22-33      | anointing oil . . .                  | n. 29a         | u. 29a                   |
| B'. 34-38      | incense . . .                        | o. 29b         | v. 29b                   |
| J. 271-8       | brazen altar . . .                   | p. 381-7       | t. 22-24†                |
| Z. 3017-21     | laver . . .                          | q. 8           | w. 26                    |
| K. 279-19      | court . . .                          | r. 9-20        | n. 377-18                |
| L. 20f.        | oil for light . . .                  | ...            | ...                      |
| ...            | summary of gifts . . .               | s. 21-31       | {o. 3719-21y. 391-10 |
| M. 261-5       | priests' dress, ephod . . .          | t. 391-7       | {a'. 3913†f. 268-14  |
| N. 6-12        | breastplate . . .                    | u. 398-21      | g. 3615-29               |
| O. 2813-29     | Urim and Thummim . . .               | ...            | ...                      |
| P. 30          | robe . . .                           | v. 22-26       | h. 30-34                 |
| Q. 31-35       | coats, etc. . .                      | w. 27-29       | i. 35-37                 |
| S. 39-43       | plate on mitre . . .                 | x. 20f.        | j. 38-40                 |
| R. 36-38       | summary . . .                        | y. 32-43       | {z. 3911f.b'. 14-23† |
| ...            | order to erect, etc. . .             | z. 401-15      | c'. 401-13†              |
| ...            | brief execution . . .                | a'. 16         | d'. 14                   |
| ...            | erection of dwelling . . .           | b'. 17-19      | e'. 15-17                |
| H. 2633-35     | furniture placed . . .               | c'. 20-30      | f'. 18-26§               |
| ...            | use of laver . . .                   | d'. 31f.       | z. 3827                  |
| ...            | erection of court . . .              | e'. 33         | g'. 4077§                |
| T. 291-35      | consecration of Aaron and sons . . . | Lv 8           | ...                      |
| U. 36f.        | do. of altar . . .                   | ...            | ...                      |
| V. 38-42       | daily sacrifice . . .                | ...            | ...                      |
| Y. 3011-16     | atonement money . . .                | ...            | ...                      |

§ Part omitted.

† With omissions and variations.

altar is still the only one Nu 16<sup>38</sup>. It may be noted that 23<sup>41</sup> 29<sup>21</sup> are late P<sup>a</sup> because Aaron's sons receive anointing, contrary to the clear intention of P<sup>a</sup> in 29<sup>7</sup> 29<sup>4</sup>, and so Lv 8<sup>12</sup> etc. A further comparison of H<sup>2</sup> with G shows a second set of variations. It is held by many that the facts require us to suppose that the Greek tr. of 35-40 was made before the Heb. text had reached its present symmetrical and complete form. By means of the above table the student can readily test for himself the value of this suggestion.

V. CONCLUDING SURVEY.

i. The History.—If we accept the results of this article as in the main correct, we have passed far beyond the boundary of a merely negative criticism. It might be called destructive work to show by detailed proof that we have no contemporary account of the Exodus and subsequent events. But when it is shown that the present narrative is made up of three, so far contrasting with one another as to prove themselves much later in date than the period of which they treat, and the work, not merely of different individuals, but of different schools of historical writing; and when the further step is taken of disentangling, with infinite pains of many labourers in many lands, the several threads of narrative, and recombining them in something like their original connexions, the work of constructive criticism must be held to have been well begun. The summaries will have shown on how many important points the three witnesses are at one. For fuller particulars see MOSES, ISRAEL.

But, while it is well to remember that contrasts are not always, or even usually, contradictions, it would be idle to try to belittle the extent of the change of view brought about. We may rather think of it as the drawing back of a veil of illusion which God wisely allowed to hang over the past, until the growth of truer ideas about history both took away the veil, and made men ready to make use of the facts, whose real relations were at last adequately discovered.

If, therefore, it has to be admitted that the Priestly history (P) has no independent value as a witness to the Mosaic period, and that the materials in E, and to a less extent in J, require careful sifting before being regarded as correctly representing an age which to them was already a distant age, we may set against that two things. First, an exact view of that epoch might have disappointed us, even as a field sown with corn has little beauty till the seeds have shot up into blade and stem. Secondly, we have instead three views of it, so influenced by the ideas of the writers' own times and circumstances as to reveal to us various stages in the after-growth, which was itself entirely dependent on that germinal time. On the face of it, the book tells of the Exodus of Isr. from the bondage of Egypt; in the soul of it, it speaks, to those who have ears to hear, of successive stages in the great outgoing, at once more glorious and more perilous, of the family of man from the bondage of superstition, ignorance, and sin. The events are not merely typical of spiritual realities; but the very fact that they were thus and then recorded, shows the faith of the men of other days in the God whose hand they loved to trace at work in the world.

ii. The Leading Ideas.—The Heb. writers are not mere annalists, but interpreters of history. Hence their permanent value. They may be criticised as chroniclers of outward events, but they sought and found God everywhere, and they abide to hand on their secret. In all three documents we find the same fundamental verities emphasized, which give to Ex its real unity. J<sup>a</sup> is the supreme God, ruling in Egypt, and master over nature. He is the faithful God who made His choice of the fathers of the Heb. race, and will not draw back. He is the God of grace, and so loves to give guidance, counsel, help, food, drink, every needed supply. He is the Holy One, and requires obedience to His will, and takes steps to make known that will. He is the Jealous God, and demands that due worship shall be paid to Him, and to none else. He is the Covenant God, and the two sides of the Covenant are: J<sup>a</sup> Israel's God, Israel J<sup>a</sup>'s people.

But each document has its individual standpoint, even as each of the synoptic Gospels presents its own picture of the life of Christ. The oldest, J, perhaps coming from the priestly circle connected with Solomon's temple, is written from the point of view of a highminded patriot, keenly interested in every detail of national history, so quick to see God's hand in providence as to be able to make his story religious with but little use of the miraculous, alive to all the shades of character in men, as well as to the richness of the Divine nature, in which mercy rejoiceth against judgment, valuing highly the common ordinances of religion, and recognizing the great opportunities of the priestly office. The document E, probably rather later, and originally coming from Ephraimite circles, reflects the views of the prophets. This work (extending from Gn to Kings) is a series of biographical studies of great prophetic heroes, with Moses as the central figure. Much stress is laid on morality. The people sin, and need to be called to repentance. God is righteous, and His requirements must not be despised. The miraculous element is heightened, of course unconsciously. The moral of each incident must be made clear, the reality of the Divine government set unmistakably forth. Sad experience of the faults of the priesthood leads to the priests being either passed over, or introduced for blame. Worship is strictly secondary to morality.

The priestly writer (P) has lost all hold upon the simplicities and roughnesses of the childhood of the nation. So possessed is he with reverence for the religious institutions of the now ruined temple, that he not only has already in the vision-chamber of his imagination elaborated them to an ideal perfection which they never had, but this ideal picture must be, he has become persuaded, the reflection of what actually existed in the primitive, the perfect days. Each new improvement is unhesitatingly added with the same formula of Divine inspiration, the argument being: 'We see this to be best now, therefore it must have been ordered and done then.' Granted, then, that this stately centralized worship was the Divine purpose for the Second Temple, we may surely accept the unhistorical form of the priestly legislation as being probably the only means by which it could have been successfully introduced. After all, the full corn in the ear is present in the seed, if not in miniature, at least in promise and potency.

The Bk. of Ex is like a grand symphony, which was once thought to give harmony without discord, but is now being found, in virtue of elements which by themselves are sharply discordant, to sound forth a yet richer harmony.

LITERATURE.—See Hexateuch. B. W. Bacon's The Triple Tradition of the Exodus, and his arts, in the Journal of Bibl. Lit. (1890-93) have been of great service to the writer; and Bruston's essay, Les quatre sources des lois d'Exode, is plausible and suggestive. We still wait for a good Eng. com. on Exodus.

G. HARFORD-BATTERSBY.

EXORCISM, EXORCIST.—The word ἐξορκισμός is a later form of the classical ἐξορκία. The latter is employed in Demosthenes in the sense of 'administer an oath to a person.' The verb ἐξορκίζω is used by the high priest to Jesus 'I adjure thee by the living God . . . ' (Mt 26<sup>53</sup>), and corresponds to the Heb. הַיְהוָה. Cf. Gn 24<sup>3</sup> LXX. The subst. exorcist is only once employed in the NT, viz. in Ac 19<sup>13</sup>. The passage is instructive, since it shows that exorcism in those days was practised as a profession by strolling Jews. The method which they pursued we might infer from the example of Eleazar, to which Josephus specially refers in the passage cited from Ant. viii. ii. 5, in the article DEMON, p. 593<sup>a</sup>. The constant and essential element in all these exorcisms was the power wielded by the recitation of special names. In the instance recorded in Ac 19 the Jewish exorcists had observed the expulsions which Paul had effected through the pronunciation of the name of Jesus, and endeavoured, with ludicrously disastrous results, to work the same cures by saying, 'We adjure you (the evil spirit) by Jesus whom Paul preacheth.'

An example of the ancient Babylonian incantations has already been given above, p. 591. Illustrations of Jewish spells may be found in the Talmud. (Respecting these, see Brecher, Das Transcendentale, Magie u. magische Heilarten im Talmud, Vienna, 1850, pp. 195-203.) That these were ultimately derived from Babylonian magic can admit of no doubt. Some Aramaic inscriptions, published in the Zeitsch. für Assyriologie (Dec. 1893 and April 1894) by Wohlstein, contain instructive examples of these exorcising formulae. They are inscribed on the interior surfaces of some ancient bowls that were brought from Baghdad in 1886 and placed in the Royal Museum in Berlin. The mode of expression in all of them possesses broad features of resemblance, but special details vary in each case. For the names of the angels which are recited in each bowl differ widely owing to the prevailing belief, which finds expression in the Jewish Kabbala, that the ruling angels are constantly changing, and those must be addressed who hold the reins of power at that time and place.

The first of the series (No. 2422), from which we shall quote, was evidently employed to exorcise the demon of a man who was suffering from leprosy.

'In thy name I form a heavenly cure for Achdebu[ the son of Achathabu of Daithos, by the compassion of Heaven. Amen, Amen, Selah. Bound, bound, bound shall be all the male spirits and female Astartes' evil spirits, powers of opposition . . . all Satans from West and East, North and South. Bound, bound shall be all evil sorcerers and all who practise violence; bound and sealed shall be all . . . and curses and conjurations. Bound be the angels of wrath, the angels of the house of assembly . . . the mighty princes, the hard princes, the diseases without number, the sufferings, the abscess, the scab, the mange, the skin-eruption, malignant discharge, suppurating wounds, the spirit of the burial-place, the spirit of the dead, the spirit of diseases; bound and sealed up shall ye all be from Achdebu[ son of Achathabu. Go and withdraw yourselves to the mountains and the heights and the unclean cattle [Mt 8<sup>32</sup>, Mk 5<sup>12</sup>, Lk 8<sup>32</sup>]. If ye come on the first of Nisan [regarded as specially favourable for overcoming demons], go away from Achdebu[ son of Achathabu, in the name of Gabriel, who is called Elpassas, and in the name of Michael, who is called (Demu)thja, and in the name of Elbenmez, and in the name of Elba'baz . . . ] [The inscription concludes with the formula Amen, Amen, Selah, which occurs in other incantations, sometimes with the addition of Halle-lujah].

The exorcism No. 2416, transcribed by Wohlstein, is much longer, and other names of angels compounded with the name of deity El (as Nuriel, Chathiel, Sesagbiel, etc.) are quoted, with Myta-we have practically the same word as the Syriac ܫܠܝܚܐ 'idol.' The word אִתְרַתִּי is the Istārti 'goddesses' of the Assyrian. Similarly, the Talmudic flame-demon Rešpa is the Phœnician flame-deity Rešep or Rešpu (see Baethgen, Beiträge zur Semit. Relig.-gesch. p. 60; Wiedemann, Relig. der alten Ägypter, p. 83). Cf. Beelzebub of the NT. These are instructive examples of the wholesale conversion of heathen deities into demons.

* פתיכר דיכר ויאתרתה נוקבתא. Note that in פתיכר 'spirits'

tron at their head, making seven in all. The formula אֵלֶּה אֲשֶׁר אֵלֶּה (from Ex 3<sup>14</sup>), אֵלֶּה וְיִשְׂרָאֵל and all variations on the names of deity, as יְיָ and יְיָ וְיִי, and the Athbash equivalent בָּן בָּן, are pressed into the service.

These spells are ascribed to the 7th cent. A.D., though written in unpainted Hebrew. The characters are of the more recent square type, and a much earlier date than the above is hardly probable. Why they were inscribed in bowls cannot be explained. The bowls were not intended to hold water, otherwise the distinctness of the lettering would have been obscured.

Demonology and exorcism played a conspicuous part in the literature and practice of the Christian Church throughout the earlier period and during the Middle Ages. In the time of our Lord exorcism was regarded as one of the signs of the Messiahship (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>). It was the universal belief of the early church Fathers that a disciple of Jesus was able to exercise power over demons by uttering His name (Tertullian, Apologet. 23; Origen, cont. Cels. vii. 334). Naturally, bishops and other ordained clergy were considered to possess this charisma. But there was a special class of individuals who were so endowed without any ecclesiastical conferment (Apost. Constit. viii. 26, ἐξορκιστὴς ὁ χειροτονούμενος). They received formal episcopal recognition, but not ordination, as exorcistæ per gratiam. Nevertheless, we also find another class who did receive episcopal ordination, and were called exorcistæ per ordinem. In the ceremony of baptism the catechumen of adult age was obliged solemnly and publicly to renounce the devil and his works, but in the case of children the assistance of the exorcist was necessary. By the priest and attendant exorcist the ceremony of exsufflatio and insufflatio was performed on the child, who was regarded as a child of the devil, as being subject to inherited guilt. Sacerdos exsufflat ter in faciem catechumeni semel dicens: Exi ab eo (ea) spiritus immunde et da locum spiritui sancto Paraceto. Hic in modum crucis habet in faciem ipsius et dicat: Accipe spiritum bonum per istam insufflationem et Dei benedictionem. Pax tibi. According to the practice of the Romish Church at the present day, the separate existence of the exorcist is not recognized, but every priest, on ordination, receives previous consecration to the lower orders, including that of exorcist. In Can. 9 of the Fourth Council of Carthage we read: Exorcista quum ordinatur accipiat de manu episcopi libellum in quo scripti sunt exorcismi. At the present time the ordaining bishop places a missal in the priest's hands with the words: Accipe et commenda memorie et habeto potestatem imponendi manus super energumenum [ἡ. ἐνεργούμενον, sc. ὑπὸ πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτων].*

Among the Reformers opinion and practice were divided respecting exorcism. Luther and Melancthon favoured it, but it was decisively rejected by Zwingli and Calvin (Instit. iv. c. 15. 19). For further details respecting ecclesiastical practice the reader is referred to the article 'Exorcismus' in the 2nd ed. of Herzog-Plitt's Realencyklopädie, from which the facts in Christian ecclesiastical tradition have been derived. The article 'Kabbalah,' in the same dictionary, may also be consulted with advantage. OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

* The Ritual for exorcism may here be appended. The priest, having arrayed himself in the official robes, first sprinkles the demoniac with holy water and then recites the prayer of the litany of all saints, the paternoster, and Ps 53; after this the two orationes, in which he makes the sign of the cross over the demoniac, and commands the evil spirit to depart by the power of the mysteries of the incarnation, passion, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and Christ's return to judge the world. After this follows the reading of Jn 1, Mk 16<sup>15-18</sup>, Lk 10<sup>17-19</sup>. Then the priest lays both hands on the head of the demoniac and says, Ecce crucem Domini. Fugite, partes adversæ: viciit leo de tribu Juda. After this comes the Oratio, with the special formula of exorcism, Exorcizo te, immunde spiritus, while the priest crosses the brow and breast of the demoniac three times in the name of the Trinity. If the evil spirit does not then depart, the service is begun anew.

EXPECT, EXPECTATION.—Following Lat. expectare, 'expect' meant in older Eng. not only 'look forward to,' but also simply 'wait,' or 'await.' Thus in Douay Bible the comment on Sir 11<sup>8</sup> is 'Expect the end of another mans speech, before you begin to answer. Expect also if anie that is elder, or better able wil answer first.' Expect is used in this way in Job 32<sup>m</sup>, 2 Mac 9<sup>25</sup>, and He 10<sup>13</sup> 'From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool.' The Gr. of last passage is ἐκδέχομαι, elsewhere in NT tr<sup>d</sup> 'wait for' (Jn 5<sup>3</sup>, RV omits, Ac 17<sup>18</sup>, Ja 5<sup>7</sup>), 'tarry for' (1 Co 11<sup>33</sup>, RV 'wait for'), 'look for' (1 Co 16<sup>11</sup> RV 'expect,' He 11<sup>10</sup>). Cf. Bacon, Adv. of Learning, i. (Selby's ed. p. 14, l. 35), 'The most active or busy man that hath been or can be, hath, no question, many vacant times of leisure, while he expecteth the tides and returns of business.'

Expectation is used throughout in the sense of looking forward to with hope. Thus even in Ps 62<sup>5</sup> 'My soul, wait* thou only upon God; for my expectation is from him,' the Heb. is tiqwach (תִּקְוָךְ), similarly tr<sup>d</sup> in Ps 9<sup>18</sup> and in Pr, but most often tr<sup>d</sup> 'hope,' and the meaning is 'that which I hope for, my deliverance.' In Ro 8<sup>3</sup>, Ph 1<sup>20</sup> 'earnest expectation' is an effort to bring out the full force of the Gr. word ἀποκαρδοκία, which is found nowhere else. It is formed from δέκω in the sense of 'watch,' κάρα, the 'head,' and ἀπό, 'from,' so that it means (Sanday-Headlam) 'awaiting with outstretched head,' the prep. denoting 'diversion from other things and concentration on a single object.' The Vulg. has simply expectatio, whence Rhemish 'expectation.' Wyc. has 'abiding,' But in Ro 8<sup>19</sup> Tind. gives 'fervent desire,' and is generally followed (Cov. 'fervent longing'). 'Earnest expectation' is the Bishops' translation in both places.

J. HASTINGS.

EXPEDIENT is never found in AV in the sense of 'expeditious,' as so often in Shakespeare. On the other hand, it never means merely 'convenient' (opposed to what is rigidly right), as in modern English. The Greek is always συμφέρεi, or (2 Co 12<sup>1</sup>) συμφέρον (= 'it is profitable,' as AV and RV elsewhere tr. the word, except in Mt 18<sup>6</sup> AV 'it were better,' and 19<sup>10</sup> AV 'it is not good,' RV 'it is not expedient'). So even Caiaphas (Jn 11<sup>50</sup> 'it is expedient for you that one man should die for the people') does not openly prefer, as a modern politician, the convenient to the just. His words are like those of Jeremiah (26<sup>14</sup> Cov.), 'Now as for me: I am in your handes, do with me as ye thinke expedient and good,' though his spirit is the opposite.

J. HASTINGS.

EXPERIENCE, which is the result of 'experiment,' was sometimes used for the experiment itself, as Baker, Jewell of Health, 112<sup>a</sup> 'The Authour . . . hath both seen and done many experiences worthy memorie.' This is no doubt the meaning in Gn 30<sup>27</sup>, where Laban says to Jacob, 'I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake.' It is the Douay translation. The Geneva has 'perceived,' but in marg. 'tried by experience.'

The Heb. (עָוָה) means to observe omens, whence RV 'I have divined.' It is used of Joseph's divining by means of a cup (Gn 44<sup>5</sup> 15, with notes by Del. Dillm. Wade) and elsewhere. The ptp. is found Dt 18<sup>10</sup> 'a diviner,' where see Driver's note.

J. HASTINGS.

* There is no suggested connexion between 'wait' and 'expectation,' as the Heb. for 'wait' is 'be silent unto God,' as R<sup>y</sup>m (Cheyne, 'be simply resigned to God').

EXPERIMENT is narrower and more concrete now than formerly. Occurring in AV in 2 Co 9<sup>13</sup> only, 'Whiles by the experiment of this ministration they glorify God,' its meaning is 'test,' 'proof,' as Wither (1618), Motto, Nec Careo, 533—

'I want not much experiment to show
That all is good God pleaseth to bestow.'

The Gr. is δοκιμή (tr<sup>d</sup> 'experience' in Ro 5<sup>4</sup> AV, but RV 'probation'). 'Experiment' is the Geneva word; RV 'seeing that through the proving of you by this ministration they glorify God,' which is a return to Wyclif, 'bi the preuyng of this mynysterie.' J. HASTINGS.

EXPIATION.—See ATONEMENT, PROPITIATION.

EXPOSURE.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS.

EXPRESS.—Only He 1<sup>3</sup> 'the express image of his person' (χαράκτῃς, RV 'the very image,' R<sup>y</sup>m 'the impress'); and Wis 14<sup>17</sup> 'they . . . made an express image of a king' (ἐμφανὴ εἰκόνα, RV 'a visible image'). On χαράκτῃς see Westcott, in loc. The tr. of RV is after Tind.; the Geneva ('engraved forme') tries to bring out the sense of the Gr. word, which is properly what stands engraven on any object, as a seal (Davidson), and this is the meaning of AV 'express image'; cf. Shaks. Hamlet, II. ii. 299, 'What a piece of work is a man! . . . in form and moving, how express and admirable,' which Aldis Wright explains thus: 'Exact, fitted to its purpose, as the seal fits the stamp.' Exprimer (ptep. expressus) has the meaning among others of 'copy,' 'pourtray,' and from this the Eng. word was used before 1611 in the sense of 'exactly pourtrayed.' Thus Sir T. More, (1513) Rich. III. 'This is ye fathers own figure . . . ye playne expresse lykenes of ye noble Duke.'

J. HASTINGS.

EXQUISITE.—From Lat. exquisitus, ptep. of exquirere, to search out, 'exquisite' is properly, and was originally, that which is elaborately devised, 'ingenious,' and its application might be good or bad. In the Arcopaglica (Hales' ed. p. 16) Milton says Mr. Selden's volume 'proves . . . by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea, errors, known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest.' Milton even uses the word actively of persons in Comus, 359,

'Peace, brother, be not over-exquisite
To cast the fashion of uncertain evils,'

as other writers had done before him. Exquisite occurs Sir 18<sup>29</sup> 'They . . . poured forth e. parables' (παροιμίας ἀκριβεῖς, RV 'apt proverbs'), and 19<sup>25</sup> 'There is an e. subtilty, and the same is unjust' (so RV, Gr. πανουργία ἀκριβής). J. HASTINGS.

EXTINCT.—Extinct (Lat. extinctus, ptep. of extinguere, to extinguish) now only expresses a state, 'active and extinct volcanoes'; 'the volcano is extinct.' But formerly it expressed the action which produces the state, and so Job 17<sup>1</sup> 'my days are extinct' (נִכְרַח יְמֵי; and Is 43<sup>17</sup> 'they are extinct, they are quenched as tow' (נִכְרַח). Cf. Shaks. Rich. II. i. iii. 222—

'My oil-dried lamp and time-bewasted light
Shall be extinct with age and endless night.'

'Extinguished' occurs, however, in Wis 2<sup>3</sup>.

In the 16th cent. a verb 'to extinct' was coined, of which the past ptep. was sometimes 'extincted' and sometimes 'extinct.' It is thus uncertain whether 'extinct' as ptep. belongs to 'extinguish' or to this verb. Shaks. uses 'extinct' twice, 'extincted' once (Oth. II. i. 81, 'Give renewed fire to our extincted spirits!'), but never 'extinguished.' He uses the verb 'extinguish' only once. J. HASTINGS.

EXTREME is used as an adv. in Sir 42<sup>8</sup> 'the extreme aged' (εσχάρωτος). So Bacon, Essays (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 156), 'Acting in Song, especially in Dialogues, hath an extreme Good Grace'; and p. 178, 'all Deformed Persons are extreme bold'; and again in Advance. of Learning, II. xxiii. 38, 'it [is] extreme hard to play an after game of reputation.' J. HASTINGS.

EYE.—The verb occurs twice: 1. Gn 29<sup>17</sup> 'Leah was tender eyed' (עַיִן לֵאָה רַחֵם), RV 'L's eyes were tender'). Whether 'tender' is appreciatory or depreciatory is disputed. Modern commentators usually say depreciatory, after LXX (ἀσθενής) and Peshitta. But others, the tender brightness of a child, after Onk. and Sa'adya, and quoting Gn 33<sup>13</sup> 'My lord knoweth that the children are tender' (same Heb.). See Spurrell, in loc.; also Otts, The Fifth Gospel, p. 41 f.; and Expos. Times, v. 97. The Vulg. lippiis oculis, 'blear-eyed,' is certainly wrong. 2. 1 S 18<sup>9</sup> 'And Saul eyed David from that day and forward' (וַיַּחַד עָיִן, Kêrê 'ayin, a denom. from עַיַן to eye). For the construction and Heb. parallels, see Driver, in loc. The meaning is to look on with envy (cf. invidia); and see the 'Evil Eye' under art. ENVY, and Trench, NT Synonyms, p. 106 f.), but there is no other example in English of the verb 'eye' in the sense of 'envy.'

J. HASTINGS.

EYE (עַיִן).—The eyes of Orientals are usually well formed, large, and lustrous, but deficient in that play of expression which accompanies thought, humour, and fancy.

As the chief of the organs of sense, the eye had a leading place in the lex talionis, 'eye for eye' (Ex 21<sup>24</sup>). To put out the eyes of an enemy or prisoner was like breaking the teeth of a captured wild animal, the removal of the chief power to injure. It was also a great degradation (Jg 16<sup>21</sup>, 1 S 11<sup>2</sup>, 2 K 25<sup>7</sup>). Among the begging classes of Palestine, blindness, next to the revolting spectacle of leprosy, makes the strongest claim upon the charity of the benevolent. Blind men are sometimes known to decline the offer of the medical missionary, as restored sight would mean a loss of privilege (see Blindness under MEDICINE).

The fig. references to the eye are many and varied. As the chief means of contact with the outer world, the eye is the source of pleasurable sensations and the principal avenue of temptation (Gn 3<sup>6</sup>, Pr 27<sup>20</sup>, Ezk 24<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup>). Knowledge is the opening of the eyes (Gn 3<sup>7</sup>, Ps 119<sup>18</sup>, Eph 1<sup>18</sup>).

The prophet was first called the 'seer' (נָבִיא) 1 S 9<sup>9</sup>, and his message a 'vision' (חֶזְיוֹן) Is 1<sup>1</sup>, Ezk 7<sup>26</sup> etc. In connexion with the feelings, sorrow is associated with a consumed or wasted eye (Ps 6<sup>7</sup>), and satisfaction in worldly prosperity with an eye standing out with fatness (Ps 73<sup>7</sup>).

Tear-bottles are often found in the ancient tombs, as affecting tokens of regret and grief. This memorial act may be referred to in Ps 56<sup>8</sup> 'Put thou my tears into thy bottle.' (See BOTTLE.) To have the eyes delivered from tears takes rank with the deliverance of the soul from death and the feet from falling (Ps 116<sup>8</sup>); to have all tears wiped from the eyes (Rev 21<sup>4</sup>), is part of the riches in glory.

As a judge of what is pleasant or offensive, the eye indicates an intention of favour or hostility. Thus in an Arabic salutation, in answer to the opening inquiry as to health, the usual reply is, 'Well, by your looking upon me' (favour of your eye), and the conventional parry of politeness is to say, 'By God's looking upon you.' A similar thought of the eye's protective favour lies in the words providence, episcopos, overseer. On the other hand, there is the widespread and deeply-rooted superstition about the power of the evil-eye, and one of the chief uses of the amulet (wh. see) is to obtain protection against it.

The Eyelids (עַלְמַלְמַל) are mentioned as a means of seduction employed by the 'evil woman' (Pr 6<sup>25</sup>), and not infrequently appear in poetical language as a synonym for, or parallel with, the eyes (Job 16<sup>16</sup>, Jer 9<sup>18</sup>, Ps 11<sup>4</sup> 132<sup>1</sup>, Pr 6<sup>4</sup> 30<sup>15</sup>). By a beautiful metaphor in Job 3<sup>9</sup> 41<sup>18</sup> the first rays of dawn are called the 'eyelids of the morning.'

Eye-paint (קְיָן, Arab. kuhl; cf. קְיָן Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>) was a paste made of antimony powder, giving a brown-black burnished stain to the eyelashes. The practice which is depicted on the monuments still continues in Egypt (see Lane, Mod. Egypt, i. 45 f.). The paint is kept in a small horn or ornamental metal vase with a thin rod for applying it. It makes the eyes look larger and more lustrous (2 K 9<sup>30</sup>, Jer 4<sup>30</sup>, Ezk 23<sup>40</sup>). One of Job's daughters was called Keren-happûkh, 'horn of eye-paint' (Job 42<sup>14</sup>).

HORN FOR EYE-PAINT.

The Eye-salve (κολλώριον, collyrium) of Rev 3<sup>18</sup> was a preparation used for healing or strengthening the eye (of. Hor. Sat. i. 5. 30; Epict. Diss. ii. 21. 20, iii. 21. 21; Cels. vi. 6. 7). (See MEDICINE.)

G. M. MACKIE.

EYESERVICE.—This is a literal tr. in Eph 6<sup>8</sup>, Col 3<sup>22</sup> of the Greek ὀφθαλμοδουλεία, and seems to have been coined by Tindale, although he uses it only in Col, in Eph giving 'service in the eye sight.' The word was at once adopted into the language, Crowley (1550), Last Trump, 163, having 'Se thou serve him . . . not wyth eye-service fainedly.' The AV of 1611 is, however, the first Version that has eye service in Eph (it writes two separate words as all the Versions do in Col). The Greek word is found nowhere else: 'This happy expression,' says Lightfoot, 'would seem to be the apostle's own coinage.' J. HASTINGS.

EZBAI (עִזְבַּי).—The father of Naarai, one of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11<sup>37</sup>). The parallel passage 2 S 23<sup>39</sup> reads 'Paarai the Arbite' (פַּאֲרַי הָאַרְבִּי) for 'Naarai the son of Ezbai' (נַעֲרַי בֶּן־עִזְבַּי). It is impossible to decide with any confidence between the rival readings. (See Kittel's note on 1 Ch 11<sup>37</sup> in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT.)

J. A. SELBIE.

EZBON (עִזְבֹּן, עִזְבֹּן).—1. Eponym of a Gadite family (Gn 46<sup>16</sup>), called in Nu 26<sup>16</sup> Ozni (which see). 2. A grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 7<sup>7</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

EZEKIAS.—1. (A Eʿeklas, B Eʿelas, AV Ezechias) 1 Es 9<sup>14</sup> = JAHZEIAH, Ezr 10<sup>15</sup>. 2. (Eʿeklas, AV Ezecias) 1 Es 9<sup>35</sup>.—Called HILKIAH, Neh 8<sup>4</sup>.

EZEKIEL (Vulg. Ezechiel, LXX Ἰεζεκιήλ, Heb. עִזְקִיָּאל, 'God is strong,' or 'God strengthens'), the son of Buzi, was one of the temple priests who shared the exile of Jehoiachin in B.C. 597 (Ezk 1<sup>2-3</sup>, cf. 2 K 24<sup>14-16</sup>). His work as a prophet commenced in the fifth year of his banishment (1<sup>2</sup>), and extended over a period of not less than 22 years (592-570); the latest date in the book being the 'seven and twentieth year' of his sojourn in Babylonia (29<sup>17</sup>). This part of his life was spent (so far as appears) in a Jewish settlement at Tel-Abib (1<sup>1</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>), an unknown place near the 'river Chebar' (כְּבַר), which was probably a canal or a tributary of the Euphrates in the vicinity of Babylon,—certainly not the Haboras (2 K 17<sup>6</sup>) in N. Mesopotamia. The life of this colony of expatriated Jews is but dimly reflected in the pages of Ezk; the picture is partly supplemented by the 29th ch. of Jer. Those carried captive were the élite of the nation; and they seem to have lived in tolerably easy circumstances, enjoying a large measure of freedom and self-government, forming a little world of their own, and cherishing a passionate interest in the concerns of their native land. They kept up by some means an active intercourse with Jerus.; and, in spite of intense mutual antipathy between them and the ruling classes at home, they never ceased to regard themselves as part and parcel of the Heb. nation, confidently expecting that some great political upheaval would speedily restore them to their old place at the head of the state. This delusion was fostered by the rise of prophets of the same type as Jeremiah's opponents in Jerus.,—an event which was hailed with immense satisfaction, not unmixed with surprise, by the exiled community (Jer 29<sup>15</sup>). The false patriotism thus engendered threatened to bring down the heavy arm of Nebuchadnezzar on the captives, and Jer., though his sympathies were with the patrician exiles rather than with the people left in the land (Jer 24<sup>1-3</sup>), endeavoured to allay the dangerous political excitement which blinded them to their true position. Altogether, it would seem that the main currents of feeling and opinion prevalent in Pal. were reproduced with remarkable fidelity in the community where E. was destined to labour.

Although little is known of E.'s previous life, it cannot be doubted that he found himself from the first in an uncongenial social atmosphere. In spite of the statement of Jos. (Ant. x. vi. 3, παῖς ὢν), he was probably no longer a young man when deported to Babylon. The meaning of 'the 30th year' in ch. 1<sup>1</sup> is too obscure to throw light on the matter, but his familiarity with the technical details of the temple and its ritual seems to show that he had officiated for a considerable time in the national sanctuary. The numerous points of contact between him and Jer. would indicate that he had come early under the influence of that great prophet, and from the whole trend of his thinking it seems probable that he had belonged to the reforming party in the state, which sought to purify the national religion in accordance with the requirements of the Deuteronomic legislation. That party had been powerless since the death of Josiah, and it is reasonable to suppose that E.'s stern and even embittered attitude towards the people was in part the fruit of the years of reaction and disappointment spent under the reign of Jehoiakim. As we have seen, there was nothing in the state of mind of his fellow-exiles to draw him into sympathy with them, although he certainly agreed with Jer. in regarding them as superior to those left behind (11<sup>14-21</sup>). Accordingly, at the time of his consecration as a prophet, he appears with his convictions matured as to the character of his countrymen and the reception he may expect at their hands (2. 3 pass.). They are, to use one of his stereotyped phrases, a 'rebellious house,' brazen-faced and stiff-hearted children, a people that refuse to hear J', separated from Him by a moral and spiritual barrier more formidable than that caused by a strange language (23. 4 3<sup>5-7</sup>). Although these facts are expressed in the form of divine communications to the prophet, they are not to be regarded as a new revelation of the disposition of his compatriots; they are rather the settled convictions of his life assuming definite shape in the light of his commission to speak the word of the Lord. They show, at all events, how fully he recognized the depth of the antagonism that prevailed between the prophetic conception of religion and the impulses that swayed the national mind both in Judæa and in Babylonia.

The actual circumstances of E.'s prophetic career are greatly obscured for us by the difficulty we have in separating what is real from what is merely imagined, in the representation given by the book. That everything did not happen literally as it is recorded, is evident enough from several indications. The symbolic actions described as performed by the prophet are in some instances incapable of a literal acceptance (see, e.g. 4<sup>5-6</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 12<sup>18</sup> etc.); yet there is no external criterion by which these can be distinguished from others which are possible. A similar uncertainty hangs over the events that are mentioned. These are never introduced for their own sake, but only as the setting of some idea which the writer wishes to enforce, and it is frequently impossible to determine how far the allusions correspond with actual experiences. In such incidents as the death of the prophet's wife (24<sup>15-16</sup>) or the opening of his mouth in the presence of 'the fugitive' (24<sup>17</sup> 33<sup>22</sup>), fact and symbolism seem to be so intimately blended that we cannot tell where the one ends and the other begins. The book, in short, is not an autobiography, but a systematic exposition of prophetic ideas, and any attempt to extract historical information from it has to be made with a certain measure of caution. At the same time, it is quite incredible that the whole representation should be nothing but an elaborate fiction, without any basis in fact. There can be no reasonable doubt that E. really exercised an oral public ministry amongst his fellow-captives, or that its main outlines may be gathered from the thin thread of narrative that runs through the book. His work was divided into two sharply contrasted periods by the overthrow of the Jewish state in the year 586; or, to speak more accurately, the first period ends with the commencement of the siege of Jerus. (Jan. 587, cf. 24<sup>1</sup>), and the second opens with the reception in Babylon of the tidings of its fall (Jan. 585, cf. 33<sup>21</sup>).* During the interval of two years, his public activity appears to have been suspended. Throughout the first period the almost exclusive theme of his preaching was the approaching destruction of Jerus., and the lessons of that event for the nation. His reiterated predictions of that inconceivable calamity made no impression on the mind of the exiles, and the prophet felt his energies cramped and paralyzed by the stolid incredulity which his message encountered. It is probable, however, that from the outset his character commanded respect; we read of visits paid to him in his own house by the 'elders' to inquire the word of the Lord (8<sup>1</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>1</sup>), and there is no reason to dismiss these as dramatic inventions. Still less can we doubt the popularity of his public orations; for the picture of the people beguiling the tedium of their exile by listening to his fervid eloquence (33<sup>30-32</sup>) is one of the notices which convey an irresistible impression of historical reality. In the second part of his career the tension between him and his hearers is greatly relaxed. The people were crushed by the terrible disaster that had befallen their nation, and the immediate effect was a feeling of despair expressed in such woeful utterances as those of 33<sup>10</sup> 37<sup>11</sup>. The prophet on his part adopts a more conciliatory attitude towards them, as he addresses himself to the task of setting forth the hopes and ideals on which the formation of a new Israel depended. The circle of his immediate auditors was probably widened at this time by the arrival of the new bands of captives from Judæa, amongst whom there must have been at least a few adherents of Jer., who would naturally rally round E. as the representative of their master's teaching. It has even been surmised that it was through this channel that E. first became acquainted with the writings of Jer., which have left so deep a mark on his thinking. This is unlikely, because it is hardly credible that he should have recast the substance of his oral prophecies under the literary influence of another prophet; and, moreover, he must have had abundant opportunity of knowing Jeremiah's teaching before his own captivity. But it must be admitted that with regard to all that took place after the fall of the city we are left almost entirely in the dark. There is but one allusion in the book to the relations between the earlier exiles and the later (14<sup>22f.</sup>); and if it is at all coloured by the prophet's actual impressions after the event, it certainly does not encourage the notion that he found the new-comers hopeful material to work upon. It was probably not very long after the commencement of the second phase of his work that E. prepared the first written edition of his prophecies (see below). There is an interval of about 13 years (584-572) from which no prophecy is dated. What his occupations were during this period is of course unknown, but there are some signs that chs. 1-39 had been edited practically in their present form before the composition of 40-48. This last section may reveal the direction in which the prophet's thoughts had been moving in those years; and a still later oracle (29<sup>17ff.</sup>) shows that he did not cease to be a close observer of public events.

* The MT gives as the date 'the 12th year' of Jehoiachin's captivity, i.e. 584. But it is hardly credible that the transmission of the news should have been delayed so long as 18 months, and hence the reading '11th year' found in the Syr. and some Heb. MSS is generally regarded as correct.

While the character of E.'s ministry does not differ essentially from that of his predecessors, it presents some exceptional features of a very instructive kind. The mere fact of his being an exile accounts for much that is peculiar in his method of working and his conception of his office. To say that he was no prophet at all, but merely a pastor exercising the cure of souls amongst those who came under his personal influence, is an exaggeration, but it is the exaggeration of a truth. His insistence on the independence of the individual soul before God (18. 33<sup>12ff.</sup>), and his comparison of himself to a watchman responsible for each person who perishes through not being warned of his danger (31<sup>7ff.</sup> 33<sup>14ff.</sup>), suggest that the care of the individual must have occupied a larger place in his work than was the case with the pre-exilic prophets. At a time when the unity of the nation was broken up, and the new kingdom of God had to be born in the hearts of those who embraced the hope set before them by the prophets, it was inevitable that a religious teacher should devote much of his attention to the conversion and spiritual direction of individuals. This, however, is a side of E.'s activity which does not directly come to light in the book; there are more subtle indications of the effect which his position as an exile had on his prophetic mission. It was by no means a matter of course, according to the ideas of the age, that prophecy could be transplanted to a foreign soil, and in reality it could not flourish there without losing some of its most characteristic functions. The older prophets had all more or less been religious politicians, in touch with the pulsations of a vigorous popular life, and bringing the word of God to bear directly on those national problems which arose out of the relation between J' and the community of Israel. E.'s audience, on the other hand, was but a dismembered limb of the body politic; his political interests were remote and secondary, and the whole cast of his thinking betrays a sense of isolation from the main current of national life. This appears most clearly in his habit of treating the exiles as representatives of the larger Israel, with whose destinies he never ceased to concern himself. From the first he recognized that his mission had a double aspect: on the one hand he was sent to 'them of the Captivity'; and on the other hand he was a prophet to the whole house of Israel (cf. 31<sup>1</sup> with 23<sup>34</sup>). Thus he had two audiences, one real and present and the other ideal; and for the most part they are identified to such a degree that in addressing the exiles or their elders he fancies himself speaking to the idealized nation, whose members were then scattered far and wide over the world. It is an extension of the same tendency when he delivers imaginary discourses to those left in the land, or apostrophizes the mountains of Israel (6. 36), or exhibits the whole religious history of the people in elaborate allegories (16. 23), or even calls up from the past the vanished cities of Samaria and Sodom, and treats them as if they had a present existence, and a real interest in the unfolding of the divine purpose (16<sup>46ff.</sup> 23<sup>36ff.</sup>). It is obvious that oratory of this description comes very near being independent of an audience altogether; and some perception of this fact is perhaps revealed by the too facile appreciation which it received from the immediate hearers. And although E. never abandoned the practice of public speaking, it is undoubtedly the case that in his hands prophecy became far more of a literary occupation than it had hitherto been. A perusal of the book shows that it has been carefully planned with an eye to literary effect; and if the prophet had simply worked out his conceptions in the solitude of his chamber, the result would hardly have differed much from what we actually find. More than any of his predecessors he lives in a world of abstract ideas, which are more vividly real to his imagination than the circumstances of his everyday life; though now and then an echo from the outer world breaks in to remind us that after all he was no mere recluse, but a man of large experience, keenly observant of the life of his time. Several things, indeed, go to show that his intellectual interests reached far beyond the Jewish world in which he lived. His long and accurate enumeration of the natural and industrial products of different countries (27), exhibits a knowledge of contemporary commerce which is surprising in a Heb. prophet. It is probable also that he had gained some new impressions from his sojourn amidst the monuments of a strange civilization in the Euphrates valley. The conception of the cherubim in chs. 1. 10 appears to borrow some of its features from the composite animal figures of Babylonian art; and in other parts of the book some striking phraseological coincidences have been thought to suggest a direct influence of the cuneiform inscriptions (Müller, p. 56 ff.).

There is, however, another feature of E.'s work which cannot be wholly explained by the novelty of his position, and has sometimes been regarded as the result of abnormal physical states to which the prophet was subject. Amongst the most perplexing references in the book are those to a spell of 'dumbness,' which lay upon him from near the commencement of his ministry till the announcement of the fall of Jerus. (cf. 33<sup>30ff.</sup> 24<sup>27</sup> 33<sup>22</sup>). Closely akin to this is the representation of his being bound with ropes (32<sup>5</sup>), and lying immovable for months together on one side or the other for a sign to the house of Israel, although at the same time performing actions which formed a necessary part of the sign (4<sup>16</sup>). There seems no strong reason why all these descriptions should not be treated as of a piece with the general symbolism which runs through the book. But to some recent interpreters they have suggested the theory that throughout the earlier part of his ministry E. laboured under nervous diseases of the most distressing kind, and utilized his symptoms as a means of impressing certain truths on the minds of his fellow-exiles. This view was first expounded, with great learning and ingenuity, by Klostermann, who found in E.'s condition all the marks of catalepsy, hemiplegia, alalia, hallucination, and so forth. It is difficult to believe that he has advanced the cause of sober and scientific interpretation of Scripture. The truth would seem to lie rather with those writers who regard these representations as imaginative symbols, interesting as illustrations of the prophet's mode of thought, but not answering to anything external in his life. The 'dumbness' is but a strong figure for the sense of restraint and defeat caused by the incredulity of the people, lasting till the prophet's authority was established by the fulfilment of his main prediction (cf. 29<sup>21</sup>). So the actions of ch. 4 symbolize partly the siege of Jerus., and partly the captivity of the two branches of the house of Israel; and their meaning as signs is inconsistent with the supposition that they were exhibitions of a bodily malady, unless we are to assume a miracle, to which the history of OT prophecy furnishes no parallel. It is, of course, equally inconceivable that the signs should have been enacted in pantomime, either in presence of the people or in solitude; and the same remark applies to many others of the symbolic actions which are described. Except in so far as the suggestions may have originated in an ecstatic state of mind, they do not appear to differ from the ordinary operations of the fancy in bodying forth mental processes by means of sensible imagery.

The Book of Ezekiel (save for a somewhat corrupt text) exists in the form in which it left the hands of its author, differing in this respect from the two other great prophetic collections, which took shape through the labours of successive editors. Neither the unity nor the authenticity of Ezekiel has been questioned by more than a very small minority of scholars.* Not only does it bear the stamp of a single mind in its phraseology, its imagery, and its mode of thought, but it is arranged on a plan so perspicuous and so comprehensive that the evidence of literary design in the composition becomes altogether irresistible. Critics are divided as to the best principle of classification, some preferring a twofold, others a threefold or even a fourfold division; but all are agreed that the work falls into certain large sections intended to represent successive phases of Ezekiel's ministry. Within the general scheme the order is on the whole chronological, although it may be doubted how far the chronology is to be taken literally, or how far it is meant to separate different groups of oracles.

CONTENTS.—I. The first division (chs. 1-24) embraces about a half of the book, and corresponds to the first period of E.'s work, consisting almost exclusively of prophecies of judgment, such as he uttered before the destruction of Jerusalem. These have no doubt been considerably altered and amplified in the course of writing, and it is possible that here and there traces of a later point of view may be apparent. Minor sections are partly suggested by the dates prefixed to certain chapters (see §1 20); in other cases they can be recognized by internal indications. 1. Chs. 1-3 describe the ecstatic experiences by which the prophet was prepared for his work, including, first, an elaborate description of the divine chariot which occupies so prominent a place in the book (cf. 3<sup>23</sup> 84 433), and the glory of Him who sat on it (ch. 1); second, his commission to declare the word of God to Israel, his inspiration being set forth under the symbol of eating the roll of a book (chs. 21-31<sup>5</sup>); third (after an interval of 7 days), a more precise definition of his office as that of a watchman to warn every individual of his danger (316-21); lastly, a second ecstasy, in which he receives the command to shut himself up within his house, and to appear in public only when charged with a special message to the people (322-27). It has been supposed that this last passage refers to a time considerably later than the inaugural vision, and marks the close of a tentative phase of the prophet's work, in which he sought to exercise the function of a public censor, until compelled to desist by the obstinate resistance of the community. It is more probable, however, that the verses merely express on its negative side the same conception of his office as is given in vv. 16-21; the prophet is a watchman, because the function of a 'reprover' is denied to him from the outset by his peculiar situation. 2. In chs. 4-7 the fate of the city and nation is set forth, first, dramatically in a complicated series of symbols (41-54), then in three impassioned orations addressed to the city (56<sup>ff</sup>), the land (6), and the people (7). In the signs of ch. 4 the prophet appears to represent simultaneously two facts—the siege of Jerus. and the captivity of the two branches of the Heb. nation. The time of Judah's exile is fixed as 40 years,—a round number for the period of Chaldean supremacy,—that of N. Israel at 390 years in the MT, but 190 according to the LXX. Since the destruction of Samaria preceded that of Jerus. roughly speaking by a cent. and a half, and since both captivities terminate simultaneously, the latter figure must be accepted as the orig. reading. 3. The next group of prophecies (chs. 8-11) is an account of a vision of the destruction of Jerus., which is important for the glimpses it gives into the state of things in the city at that time. After reciting the abominations practised in the temple (8), it describes, under symbols, the slaughter of the people (9), and the burning of the city (10), and ends with the departure of the Lord from the sanctuary, in token that city and temple were abandoned to their fate (11). The visionary form in which these truths are clothed is remarkable; the prophet falls into a trance in presence of the elders of Judah, the scenes mentioned pass before his inward eye, and he awakes with a special message of consolation to the exiles, who felt keenly the reproach of being cast out from J''s heritage. 4. A new section begins with ch. 12, and extends apparently to the end of ch. 19. The fundamental theme is still the same, but the treatment of it is more discursive and theological. The author appears to have in view various false ideals to which the people clung, and which he seeks to demolish as obstacles to the reception of his message. Thus in 12-20 17 19 he announces the fate of the king (Zedekiah), on whom the people naturally looked as the anointed of J'' (cf. La 4<sup>20</sup>), but who, by his perfidy to the king of Babylon (17), had brought ruin on himself and his kingdom. A certain sympathy with the misfortunes of the royal house is manifested by the beautiful dirge of ch. 19. Another section (121-141) deals with the wrong use of prophecy, and the existence of false prophets, as causes of the popular unbelief. Ch. 15 (Israel a charred and worthless vine branch) strikes a blow at the false patriotism which sustained the people's pride under their accumulated national calamities, and ch. 16 exhibits in an allegory the true character of Jerus. as the ungrateful and unfaithful spouse of J''. Ch. 18 asserts the absolute righteousness of God in His dealings with individual men, and thus indirectly assails the prevalent doctrine of the solidarity of the nation, which had begotten a cynical temper of mind expressed by the proverb: 'the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are blunted' (v. 2). But it must be admitted that this group of discourses hardly differs in general character from that which follows. 5. The last division (chs. 20-24) contains three oracles (20. 22. 23) of the nature of formal arraignments of the people of Israel, in which the moral necessity of its destruction is shown from its past history and its present condition. The keynote of ch. 20 is found in the remarkable purpose attributed to the people, that they would assimilate themselves to the heathen, worshipping wood and stone (v. 32). It is impossible to say whether this refers to a particular current of opinion beginning to prevail among the exiles, or whether it is an expression of the spirit manifested by the nation at all times of its history. In either case the argument of the chapter is directed to show that the destinies of Israel had been determined by a power higher than its own natural proclivities,—namely, J''s regard for the glory of His name,—and that that power would yet break the idolatrous tendencies of the nation, and make Israel to be in fact, as it was in name, the people of J''. Ch. 22 is an enumeration of the religious and social corruptions prevalent in Jerus., now on the eve of its destruction; ch. 23 is an allegory, in the manner of ch. 16, exhibiting the immoralities of the two profligate sisters, Ohola (Samaria) and Oholibah (Jerus.). The two remaining discourses were composed under the immediate influence of contemporary events. Ch. 21 (containing the wild 'song of the sword,' vv. 14-21 [EV 9-17]) refers to the march of Nebuchadnezzar's army against Jerus. Ch. 24 records the dramatic close of the first period of E.'s activity. On the very day when the Chaldeans invested Jerus. he uttered a final oracle announcing its fate. The death of the prophet's wife on the evening of the same day becomes the occasion of a symbol of the despair and bewilderment that will seize on the exiles when they receive tidings of the fall of the city.

ii. The next eight chapters (25-32) consist of prophecies against the foreign nations (seven in number) lying immediately round the land of Canaan; viz. Ammon, Moab, Edom, and the Philistines (25), Tyre (26-28<sup>39</sup>), Sidon (28<sup>20-29</sup>), and Egypt (29-32).

* The chief exceptions are Zunz, who first (Gottesdienstliche Vorträge der Juden, 1832) assigned the book to the early Pers. period, and afterwards (ZDMG xxvii. 676ff.) brought it down to the years 440-400 (the earlier view, however, is allowed to stand in the posthumous ed. of the Vorträge, 1892); Geiger (Urschrift, p. 23), who held a similar view; and Seignette (Gesch. d. V. Israel, i. p. 138, 1876), who placed the author as late as a.d. 164-183.

The insertion of these oracles in this place is an instance of the constructive skill which planned the order of the book. They fill up the interval of silence which separates the two periods of E.'s public ministry; and although most of them no doubt belong chronologically to the two years of retirement, there are some which bear a later date (see 29:17-21), showing that the principle of arrangement is literary and not historical. The section, moreover, embodies a distinct idea in the prophet's eschatological scheme. The motive of the judgments announced is to prepare the way for the restoration of Israel, by removing the evil influences which had sprung from the people's contact with its heathen neighbours in the past (28:24-26, 29:16). Historically, these judgments are conceived as taking place within the 40 years of the Chaldean dominion (29:18), and of Israel's banishment. In the case of Tyre and Egypt, Nebuchadnezzar is expressly named as the instrument of J's purpose; the extinction of the smaller nationalities is ascribed to other agencies, which, however, are probably indirect consequences of a Bab. invasion. The supplementary oracle on Tyre (29:17-21) was written after the 13 years' siege of that city by Nebuchadnezzar, and was evidently intended to counteract the impression produced by the non-fulfilment of the original prediction.

iii. Chs. 33-39 contain the discourses delivered in the period immediately succeeding the arrival of the 'fugitive' with the intelligence of Jerusalem's fall, when the prophet's mouth was again opened to declare the word of J' (33:21). The collection is prefaced (33:1-20) by a re-statement of the function of the prophet under the figure of a watchman, as in 3:17 ff.; then comes the account of his meeting with the bearer of the evil tidings, and the oracles uttered (apparently) on that occasion (33:21-39). These are followed by three distinct and complete pictures of the redemption and restitution of Israel: (a) the ideal monarchy as contrasted with the corrupt administration of the pre-exilic kings (34); (b) the land, reclaimed from the Edomites, endowed with supernatural fertility, purified from its ceremonial defilement, shall be given as an eternal possession to Israel (35 f.); (c) the people, now scattered and dead like dry bones, shall arise to a new life, Ephraim and Judah being united under one sceptre for ever (37). Ch. 38 f. describe the final assault on the kingdom of God by the distant nations of the world under Gog from the land of Magog, and their annihilation on the mountains of Israel, resulting in a demonstration of the might of J' to all the ends of the earth. This remarkable prophecy, representing the utmost limit of E.'s prophetic horizon, has the appearance of being intended as a conclusion to the book. This fact, taken in connexion with the long period of silence which follows, and a certain change of view manifested in 40 ff., strongly suggests that the first edition of the prophecies really ended here, the remaining section having been added afterwards as an appendix.

iv. Chs. 40-48, a vision of the ideal theocracy, with the institutions by which the holiness of the redeemed people is to be expressed and maintained. There is, first, a description of the sanctuary where J' is to dwell in visible splendour (40-43); then, regulations as to the ministers of the temple, the duties and revenues of the priests and the 'prince,' and the system of ritual to be observed (44-46); lastly, a delimitation of the holy land,—which is transformed by a miraculous river issuing from the sanctuary,—and a new disposition of the tribes within it (47 f.). Although these chapters may have been a later addition to the volume, they rest throughout on the teaching of the earlier part of the book, and are the development of principles there enunciated. The chief point of difference relates to the position of the prince, whose office is hedged about with constitutional safeguards and restrictions, hardly applicable to the perfect Ruler spoken of in ch. 34.

LITERARY STYLE.—The style of the book exhibits a falling off from the idiomatic purity of earlier writers, like Amos or Isaiah. The influence of Aramaic is more perceptible than in any previous prophet; the construction is loose, and, as a rule, prosaic; the constant recurrence of mannerisms and set phrases is at times monotonous, although the lack of variety is often compensated by a large rhythmic movement of the thought, running like a ground-swell through some of the longer orations. It is, on the whole, the careful and elaborate style of a literary man rather than that of a public speaker in living touch with his audience. With obscurity it cannot fairly be charged, for the serious difficulties which the book presents are mostly due to the imperfect condition of the text.

Of the higher qualities of E.'s genius the most striking is a powerful and grandiose imagination, which reveals itself in a variety of directions, now revelling in weird mythological conceptions (28, 32), and at other times clothing itself in the peculiar artificial realism which has been already remarked as a feature of the book. That there was a vein of true poetry in his nature is proved by his effective use of the kinah or dirge (especially in the beautiful lament over the banished princes of the royal house, ch. 19), as well as by the many fine images which occur throughout the book. His first conceptions, indeed, are almost invariably beautiful and true, although to our minds their æsthetic effect is frequently lost through over-elaboration. E. is perhaps not more deficient in plastic power than Heb. writers generally; but in his case the defect is more apparent from his love of detail, and his anxiety to exhaust the didactic significance of every conception before he can persuade himself to let it go. Thus the comparison of Tyre to a stately vessel, moored by the shore (27), which Isaiah might have presented in a verse or two, is spread out over a long chapter by the help of an inventory of the ship's cargo, which is really a valuable statistical survey of Phœn. imports. Again, the image of Jerus. as a foundling child (16) is intrinsically as beautiful as any to be found in prophecy; but when drawn out into an allegory of the whole history of the nation, its unity is dissipated by the multitude of details that have to be crowded into it. A similar criticism has often been passed on his description of his opening vision, as contrasted with the sixth chapter of Isaiah. On the other hand, the prophet's talent for lucid and methodical exposition appears to advantage when he comes to deal with practical and technical matters, as in the description of the sanctuary (40 ff.). A certain architectonic faculty is, in truth, a marked characteristic of his intellect, being visible alike in his plan of the temple buildings, in his sketch of the theocratic institutions, and in the orderly arrangement and division of the book.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING.—E.'s rank as a religious teacher may be summed up under two general aspects. In the first place, he gave definite and almost dogmatic expression to the great religious truths which were the presuppositions of all previous prophecy, combining these into a comprehensive theory of the divine providence; and, in the second place, by giving a peculiar direction to the Messianic hope, he made it a practical ideal in the life of the nation, and the starting-point of a new religious development.

The first of these aspects is abundantly illustrated by the contents of chs. 1-39. While the substance of these chapters presents no single element which may not be traced in the writings of earlier prophets, there is none which does not receive a more distinct intellectual expression in the hands of Ezekiel. He is concerned to exhibit the immanent logic of the abstract principles involved in the relations between God and the world; and, as we read, the outlines of a grand theological system are gradually disclosed to the mind. Only a few outstanding features of this system can here be mentioned. 1. The prophet's idea of God, which is expressed by the visions in chs. 1, 8, 10, 43, has more of a transcendental character than that of his predecessors. Those divine attributes which we call metaphysical, expressing the relation of the Godhead to created existence as a whole, are emphasized more than by previous writers, and are those chiefly symbolized by the heavenly chariot of the visions. And this view of God enters deeply into the fibre of E.'s teaching. While he does not lose hold of the truth that J' is a moral person having the attributes of anger, jealousy, pity, etc., he is never weary of insisting that the activity of the divine being must be self-centred, the supreme motive of all His dealings with men, whether in mercy or in judgment, being the manifestation of His own Godhead ('They shall know that I am J'). It is easy to exaggerate this doctrine in a way that would misrepresent the prophet's meaning; but the reiterated assertion of it shows that it is a truth to which he himself attaches the utmost importance. 2. Another instance of the same tendency to rigorous and even extreme statement of a prophetic principle is found in his conception of Israel. In opposition to Hosea, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, he denies that there was any good time in the nation's past, tracing the idolatrous proclivities of the people back to the sojourn in the wilderness and the oppression in Egypt (20<sup>b</sup>, 24 23<sup>a</sup>). Thus, while all the prophets teach or assume that the relation between J<sup>y</sup> and Israel rests on a free elective act of God, E. takes the further step of assigning as the positive ground of this relationship J<sup>y</sup>'s regard for the glory of His name in the eyes of the nations (20 pass.). 3. From this position an important consequence follows. Since the honour of J<sup>y</sup> is historically identified with the destinies of Israel, the final disclosure of His divinity can be accomplished only by the restoration of this people to its own land, under conditions which reflect the holy nature of J<sup>y</sup>. E. is alive to the false impression of the God of Israel naturally produced on the heathen mind by the great national calamity of the Exile (36<sup>20</sup>). This effect must be wiped out when the lesson of the history is complete (39<sup>23</sup>). The same principle of the divine action which caused the temporary rejection of Israel becomes the guarantee of its ultimate redemption. The prophet is thus led to a conception of salvation in which everything depends on the sovereign irresistible grace of God, which breaks the stubborn heart of the people, and produces in them an abiding sense of shame and self-contempt, and bestows on them a new spirit, causing them to walk in His statutes and keep His judgments to do them (6<sup>9</sup> 11<sup>9</sup> 16<sup>63</sup> 20<sup>43</sup> 36<sup>26d</sup> 37<sup>14</sup> 39<sup>28f</sup>). 4. The doctrine which is usually considered E.'s most distinctive contribution to theology is the doctrine of the freedom and responsibility of the individual soul before God. But even here he builds on the foundation laid by his predecessors. The conception of religion as personal fellowship between the individual and God is implicitly contained in the consciousness which all the prophets have of their own relation to J<sup>y</sup>; and in Jer the truth is enunciated that what had hitherto been the possession of the prophets is the form which the perfect religion must assume universally. It was reserved for E., however, to formulate the principle logically, showing that neither the burden of hereditary guilt nor the sins of a man's past can hinder the action of God's forgiving mercy towards the penitent sinner (18).

But the part of Ezekiel's work that was destined to have the most direct and powerful historical influence was the ideal embodied in the vision of chs. 40-48. The unique significance of that remarkable creation lies in the fact that under the form of a Messianic prophecy it presents the scheme of a politico-religious constitution in which the fundamental idea of holiness is applied to the regulation of every part of the national life. It is a picture of the kingdom of God in its final and perfect state as this prophet was led to conceive it. The ruling conception is that of J<sup>y</sup> dwelling in visible glory in His sanctuary in the midst of His people, and the practical purpose of the vision is to set forth the conditions on Israel's part which such a relation involves. That the institutions prescribed are mainly of a priestly character is partly due to the fact that E. was himself a priest, deeply imbued with the traditions of his office; but still more to his perception of the inherent fitness of the priestly idea of holiness to be the formal principle of a theocratic polity giving expression to the essential character of Israel as the people of J<sup>y</sup>. How fully the ideal met the needs of the time is shown by its operation in all the best tendencies of the Restoration period. This is not the place to discuss the bearing of E.'s ideal legislation on the development of the pentateuchal laws (see HEXATEUCH). The view of most recent critics is that he occupies a position intermediate between the Book of Deut. and the composition of the so-called Priestly Code; and it can hardly be denied that the peculiar features of E.'s system are more fully explained on this theory than on any other (see esp. the regulations as to the status of the Levites, ch. 44). But, setting aside the purely critical question, the fact is clear that the whole movement by which the new Israel was consolidated proceeded on the lines foreshadowed in E.'s vision. His position in this respect may be compared with that of Augustine in the history of the Latin Church. What the civitas Dei was to mediæval Christendom, that the vision of E. was to post-exilic Judaism: each furnished the ideal that moulded the polity of the age that followed. To what extent this section of the Book of E. was adopted as a legislative programme by the leaders of the Return cannot be precisely determined from the somewhat meagre records at our disposal (see Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 442 f.). But it is important to observe that the Messianic hope as set forth by E. formed one of the most powerful impulses that made for the reconstruction of the Jewish state. We learn from Hag and Zec that the erection of the second temple was carried through under the conviction that that unpretentious edifice was to be the centre of a renovated world, and the earnest of the latter-day glory just about to dawn; while the expectation that the Lord would suddenly come to His temple meets us nearly a cent. later in the book of Malachi. These are conceptions which it would be difficult to understand otherwise than as consequences of the work of Ezekiel.

As compared with his master Jeremiah, or Is 40ff., Ezekiel's teaching as a whole appears lacking in breadth of sympathy and evangelical freedom, and to be a preparation for an age of legalism rather than for the fulness of the Christian dispensation. He is not quoted expressly by any NT writer, and it is doubtful if he has directly influenced any except the author of the Apoc., who was familiar with the book and has drawn largely on its imagery. But while all this is true, there are many things in E. which give him a high place amongst the heralds of Christ in OT. His clear assertion of the value of the individual soul and of the efficacy of repentance, his profound sense of sin as ingratitude, and of the need of a new heart in order to fulfil the law of God, his impassioned vindication of the character of God as merciful and eager to forgive, are amongst the brightest gems of spiritual truth to be found in the pages of prophecy.

LITERARY HISTORY.—Of the literary history of the book little needs to be said. It is mentioned by the son of Sirach (49<sup>b</sup>) in a connexion which shows that it formed part of the prophetic Canon in his time (c. B.C. 200). In the order given by the Talmudic treatise Baba bathra (14<sup>b</sup>) it stands second amongst the greater prophets, being preceded by Jer and followed by Isaiah. A further statement in the same source that the book was written (like Dn, Est, and the Twelve Prophets) by 'the men of the Great Synagogue,' has no significance, unless it be an inference from the theory that no prophetic book could be written outside of the Holy Land (so Rashi, quoted by Ryle, Canon of OT, p. 263 f.). According to Jerome (præfatio ad Ezech.), certain parts of it were, on account of their obscurity, forbidden to be read by any Jew under the age of 30 years; and its deviations from the Mosaic Law caused doubts to be expressed as to its canonical authority as late as the 1st cent. A.D. According to one tradition, it narrowly escaped being 'hidden' (i.e. reduced to the rank of an apocryphal work) for this reason, but was saved from that fate by one Hananiah ben-Hezekiah, who reconciled the discrepancies. Unfortunately, the works of this self-sacrificing scholar have perished as completely as the 300 measures of oil which he is reported to have consumed in their preparation.

LITERATURE.—Ewald, Proph. d. A.B. vol. ii. (1841, 1868); Hävernick, Comm. über den Pr. E. (1843); Hitzig, der Pr. E. erklärt (1847); Fairbairn, Exposition of the Book of E. (1851); Henderson, The Book of the Pr. E. transl. etc. (1855); Hengstenberg, Der Pr. E. (1867); Keil, Der Pr. E. (1868); Currey, Speaker's Comm. vol. vi. (1876); Klostermann in SK (1877); Smend, Der Pr. E. (1880); Cornill, Der Pr. E. (1882); and Das Buch des Pr. E. (1886); v. Orelli, Kurzgef. Commentar (1888); Gautier, La mission du Pr. E. (1891); Davidson, Camb. Bible for Schools (1892); Skinner, Expositor's Bible (1895); Müller, Ezechiel-Studien (1895); Bertholet, Der Verfassungsentwurf des Hes. (1896); and Das Buch Hes. (Kurzer Handkom.) 1897. See also Kuenen, Onderzoek, Godsdienst van Israël, and Profeten en Profetie; Duhm, Theologie der Propheten; Horst, Levit. 17-26 und Hezekiel; articles by Schrader, Diestel, and Orelli in the Encyclopædia of Schenkel, Riehm, and Herzog; and by Black in Eneye. Brit.<sup>9</sup> J. SKINNER.

EZEL (הָזֶל [הָזֶל] '[stone of] departure').—The spot where Jonathan arranged to meet David before the latter's final departure from the court of Saul (1 S 20<sup>19</sup>). The place is not mentioned elsewhere, and it is now generally admitted that the Heb. text of this passage is corrupt. The true reading seems to have been preserved by the LXX, which renders v.<sup>19</sup> καὶ καθήσθη παρὰ τὸ Ἐργάβ (A, ἐργον) ἐκεῖνο, and again, at v.<sup>41</sup> ἐνδ (where the same place is mentioned), renders καὶ Δαυὶδ ἀνέστη ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀργάβ (A, τοῦ ὕπνου). The translators evidently had the same word before them in both verses, and did not understand it; they therefore simply transliterated the Hebrew. If, then, we restore from the LXX in v.<sup>19</sup> הָזֶל (הָזֶל) = 'yonder cairn,' for דָּהָב הָאֵל (v.<sup>41</sup> הָזֶל) = 'from beside the cairn,' for כְּאֵל הָנֶבֶט, the unknown 'Ezel' of v.<sup>19</sup> disappears, and the indefinite terms of v.<sup>41</sup> are replaced by a suitable reference to v.<sup>19</sup> (so Thenius, Wellh., Driver, Budde; cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 2<sup>o</sup> 8f.).

J. F. STENNING.

EZEM (עֶזֶם), 1 Ch 4<sup>29</sup>.—See AZMON.

EZER.—1. (עֶזֶר) A Horite 'duke' (Gn 36<sup>21</sup>, 1 Ch 1<sup>38</sup>). In the latter passage AV has Ezar. 2. (עֶזֶר) A son of Ephraim who, acc. to 1 Ch 7<sup>21</sup>, was slain by the men of Gath. 3. A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>9</sup>). 4. A Gadite chief who joined David (1 Ch 12<sup>9</sup>). 5. A son of Jeshua who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3<sup>19</sup>). 6. A priest who officiated at the dedication of the walls (Neh 12<sup>22</sup>). J. A. SELBIE.

EZION-GEBER, עֶזְיוֹן גִּבְעֹן, is mentioned amongst the stations of the Israelites (Nu 33<sup>35</sup> and Dt 2<sup>9</sup>). In the latter passage and elsewhere in the OT it is coupled with Elath in such a way as to imply that the one was in the immediate neighbourhood of the other. This circumstance enables us to fix the situation of Ezion-geber with tolerable confidence. It lay in the extreme south of the territory of Edom, at the head of the Alaniitis Sinus or Gulf of Akabah. Edom having been subjugated by David (2 S 8<sup>14</sup>), Solomon naturally utilized E. for ship-building purposes, and made it the port for his navy, which was engaged in the gold trade with Ophir (1 K 9<sup>26</sup>). His success encouraged Jehoshaphat to undertake a similar enterprise, but with disastrous results. 'Jehoshaphat made ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold; but they went not, for the ships were broken at Ezion-geber' (1 K 22<sup>48</sup> and 2 Ch 20<sup>36, 37</sup>). Ezion-geber is mentioned also by Josephus (Ant. viii. vi. 4), who tells us that it was afterwards known by the name of Berenice. E. is prob. the modern 'Ain el-Ghudyan (Robinson, i. 169f.). See further, Driver on Dt 2<sup>8</sup>. J. A. SELBIE.

EZNITE.—See ADINO.

EZORA (עֶזְרָא, AV Ozora).—The sons of Ezora, in 1 Es 9<sup>24</sup>, take the place of the strange name Machnadebai (or Mabnadebai, AVm) in Ezr 10<sup>40</sup>, where there is no indication of a fresh family. The first part of the phrase in Es (ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν), representing an original עֲזָרָא, seems to show that the name in the canonical book is due to the running together of two or more words; it is, in any case, a proof that 1 Es is independent of the Greek Ezra, which has Μαχναδῆβαι.

H. ST. J. THACKERAY.

EZRA (עֶזְרָא).—1. The famous leader connected with Israel's Return. Our sources of information concerning him are Ezr 7-10, Neh 8-10, and the apocryphal books.* Some writers have preferred the apocr. 1 Esdras to the canonical Ezra, but on quite insufficient grounds.† The apocr. books are useful in showing the views held about Ezra at a later time, but we must in the main rely upon the canonical books.

E. is called the priest, the priest-scribe, and in 2 Es the prophet. He was of a priestly family, but, as his work was chiefly that of the scribe, that designation gradually supersedes the others. E. represents in a way the transition from the prophet to the scribe, but his prophetic functions are not conspicuous except in the apocr. literature.‡

The Exile had been a period of considerable literary activity. One of the greatest prophets heralded the deliverance of Cyrus (Deutero-Isaiah); Ezekiel had produced his book in Babylonia, drawing up an elaborate scheme for the new state, which he declared would arise upon the ruins of the old; and many noble psalms come from this time. But the period was characterized not so much by the creation of a new literature as by the study of what already existed. E. the 'ready scribe in the law of Moses' was not a mere copyist, nor the author of the law, but a diligent student of the law.

E. longed to go to Jerus. and put the law into effect there, to establish a real hagiocracy, 'the law' being the supreme authority in civil and religious affairs alike. Artaxerxes was not so tolerant of foreign religions as Cyrus had been, nevertheless E. won his goodwill, and secured a royal edict, clothing him with ample authority to carry out his purpose. This edict has been preserved in Aramaic (Ezr 7<sup>12-26</sup>); and while many regard this as a Jewish version, it is in the main trustworthy.§ All Jews who felt so inclined were free to depart from Babylon; E. was authorized to carry the offerings for the temple made by the king and by the Jews; to purchase sacrificial animals, and to use the rest of the money as he and his brethren saw fit; to draw upon the royal treasury in the province of Syria for further necessary supplies; to exempt the temple officers and servants from the Persian tax; to appoint officers to execute the law of God, teaching such as were unacquainted with it; and to enforce the law of God and of the Persian king by penalty even to fines, imprisonment, banishment, or death.

In the year B.C. 458 E. gathered a caravan of some 1800 males, including 38 Levites who had been persuaded to join the company. E. had said so much to the king about God's ample protection to His servants that he was ashamed to ask for the

* On the Apocr. see Bensly, Fourth Book of Ezra, p. 86.

† Kuenen, Relig. of Israel, ii.; see discussion in Academy, 1895-96.

‡ On Ezra the scribe see OTJC 2 p. 42 f.; PRE 2 iv. 335.

§ See under art. EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF.

usual escort. After fasting and praying for a safe journey, the company set out, and in four months reached the holy city.

E. did not find a community ready and eager for the new government which he was authorized to establish. Many of the people were prosperous (Hag 1<sup>4</sup>), but there was not that spirit of simple devotion to the God of Israel which the zealous E. regarded as essential. E. was informed that many Jews, including even priests and princes, had taken foreign wives. He knew the story of Solomon's decline (1 K 11); he perceived the danger now of a relapse into idolatry; above all, he feared the consequences of further disobedience of the law of God (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>). Shecaniah, as the representative of the people who had been much moved by the prayer which E. poured forth in their presence (9<sup>8-10</sup>), proposed that the people should put away the foreign wives and their children. E. accepted the proposition, and exacted an oath on the spot that the offenders would comply with this agreement. A decree was issued by the princes and elders that all the people should assemble at Jerus. within three days, under penalty of confiscation of goods and excommunication. But the assembly found the task too great to be accomplished in an open-air meeting during a severe winter storm, and the matter was referred to a divorce court, with E. at its head.* After three months' labour, and not without opposition apparently (Ezr 10<sup>15</sup> RV),† the work of the court was finished, and many innocent women and children were cast out, as Hagar and Ishmael had been.

The account of E.'s formal institution of the law is found in Neh 8-10. Neh. had come to Jerus. in B.C. 444. His first work was the rebuilding of the walls. According to the compiler of Ezr-Neh (see further on the BOOKS OF EZR AND NEH), it was after this event that E. read the law to the people assembled at Jerus., and obtained their pledge to observe it. It is singular that E., who had brought the law to Jerus. for the purpose of making it the code of the community, should not have promulgated it sooner. It may be that Stade is right in supposing that E. had aroused the hostility of the people by the compulsory divorce, and that the times were not ripe before (Gesch. ii. 173 f.); or it may be that the chronology is not exact, as the compilation was made long after the events described, and the description of the reading of the law interrupts Nehemiah's narrative (cf. 7<sup>4</sup>, 11<sup>1-2</sup>).‡

On the second day's reading the people heard the directions for observing the feast of booths. Steps were taken at once to celebrate this feast, and the reading of the law was continued on each day of its observance. Two days later a great fast was held, the people separating themselves from strangers, and confessing their sin. E. gave utterance to a remarkable prayer,§ praising God for His great goodness to Israel, deploring the apostasy and disobedience of the people, and tracing the past misfortunes of the nation, as well as their present condition of vassalage, to their great sins.||

The relation of E. and Neh. is one of the perplexing problems of this period. Neh. in his memoirs mentions E. but once (12<sup>36</sup>).¶ In the E. portions of Neh, Nehemiah is mentioned but once (8<sup>9</sup>).**

* Reading, after Ewald (Hist. v. 142 n. 4), עָרַךְ, Ezr 10<sup>16</sup>.

† See Bertheau-Ryssel, Ezr., Neh., Est., in 'Kurzg. Ex. Handbuch,' in loc.

‡ On this reading of the law see Trumbull's Yale Lectures on the Sunday School, 1888, p. 7.

§ Following LXX, which prefixes the words 'and Ezra said' to 9<sup>6</sup>. On this passage see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF.

|| E. established the canonicity of the Pent. by those readings; see OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 171.

¶ The Ezra of Neh 12.13.33 is another person.

** The best Gr. versions lack the title Tirshatha (8<sup>9</sup>); 1 Es has the title, but lacks the name (9<sup>19</sup>); Lagarde's ed. agrees with Heb. The Neh. of 10 is the same as that of Ezr 22.

There is scant justification for Ewald's statement that 'the chronicler unites these two men very closely in his representations' (Hist. v. 161). E. and Nehemiah were granted high authority in the Judæan colony, and that in the same sphere. Yet Nehemiah entirely ignores E.* Their purposes were different, it is true, one desiring to promote especially the religious welfare of the colony, the other the political; but among the Jews these spheres overlapped or rather interlaced at all points. It is probable that E.'s chief work in Jerus. was accomplished before Nehemiah's arrival.†

E. made a lasting impression upon the Jewish people. The development of the later Jewish life followed the lines laid down by him. This is due, not so much to his keen foresight in forecasting the future, as to the fact that his influence shaped Jewish life and thought in a way from which it never wholly departed. He gave the law an authority which it had never had before in Jewish history. This zeal was contagious, and accounts for that enthusiasm for the letter of the law which characterizes later ages.

LITERATURE.—Besides works referred to above, see PRE<sup>2</sup> art. 'Ezra und Nehemia'; OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 163; Wellhausen, Hist. of Isr. and Jud. 139 ff.; see also literature at end of foll. art.

2. The eponym of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel, Neh 12.12.33 = AZARIAH of Neh 10<sup>2</sup>. L. W. BATTEN.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, THE BOOKS OF.—

There is much gain in treating these two books together. They present similar problems; they deal with the same period; they were originally one in the Jewish canon; and they were put into their present form by the same hand.

That Ezr-Neh constituted but one book in the early Jewish canon is indisputable. The Massoretes have appended notes to the end of each book of OT, stating the number of verses, etc. There are no such notes at the end of Ezr, but those at the end of Neh include both books: 'the book of Ezr contains 635 verses, and the middle verse is וְרַבִּין עֲלֵיהֶם' (Neh 3<sup>32</sup>). The Massoretic sections show that our two books were regarded as one, one section being Ezr 8<sup>32</sup>-Neh 21.† The twenty-two sacred books do not allow Neh to be reckoned as a separate book. The Talm., in giving the origin of the various books, says that 'Ezra wrote his book,' and does not mention Neh, manifestly including it with Ezr. In LXX the two are included under Esdras B in Swete's ed.; under Esdras A in the ed. of Lagarde.§

Ezr-Neh precedes Ch in the Heb. Bible, but follows it in the LXX. The illogical order of the Heb. has been attributed to the earlier acceptance of Ezr-Neh into the canon. It is by no means certain that the present Heb. order is original. The OT was divided into three portions. At the end of each portion the Massoretes placed notes similar to those found after the separate books. The notes on the Kethubim or Hagiographa are found at the end of Ezr-Neh, not at the end of Ch. Moreover, as Ezr-Neh is a continuation of Ch, and in its present form has come from the same hand, it is altogether unlikely that the original arrangement was so unmindful of chron. order.

A. CONTENTS.—A review of the following outline reveals the striking fact that Ezr-Neh is far from a complete history of the restoration. We find rather a short sketch of a few important events in that history. There are long periods,—one of more than a half-century (515 to 458),—about which our book is absolutely silent. The whole time covered by this book, from the return of the first exiles in 537 to the second visit of Neh. in 432 is more than a cent., but as a matter of fact the actual time covered by the narrative is scarcely more than one-tenth of this time.

* See Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch. p. 168 n.; Kuenen, Critique de L'Ancien Test. p. 510.

† There is an article in TSEA ii. pt. 1, in which the writer argues from the chronology that E. and Neh. came to Jerus. together. The argument is more ingenious than convincing.

‡ See Baer, Libri Danielis Ezræ et Neh. pp. 130, 133; Jos. c. Ap. i. 8.

§ See further Oettli, 'Die Gesch. Hagiogr. und d. Buch Daniel,' 1889, in Strack and Zöckler's Kurzgef. Kom.; Cornill, Einleit. 45; PRE<sup>2</sup> iv. 332 ff.; Ryle, Canon of OT, 134 f.

I.—(1) Ezr 1-4<sup>b</sup>.—The return of the first company of exiles; the register of the heads of houses; the setting up of the altar; the establishment of the sacrifices; the efforts to rebuild the temple, and the opposition of the Samaritans, Ezr 537. (2) Ezr 5, 6.—Stimulated by the prophets Hag. and Zec., the people begin the rebuilding of the temple under the lead of Zerubbabel and Joshua; their enemies try to stop the Jews, but Darius respects the decree of Cyrus, and the temple is completed in his sixth year, Ezr 515. (3) Ezr 7-10.—The return of Ezra and his company with a firman from Artaxerxes; the divorcing of the foreign wives, Ezr 458. (4) 46-52.—Successful efforts of the enemies of Judah to prevent the rebuilding of the city walls, mainly in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, Ezr 465-425.

II.—(1) Neb 1-77<sup>a</sup>.—Neb., learning of the bad condition of affairs in Jerus., obtains permission from Artaxerxes to go to Judah as its governor, and to rebuild its walls. He reaches Jerus., inspects the walls by night, organizes the people for the work, and, in spite of the vigorous opposition of the enemies of Judah, succeeds in fortifying the city by the complete reconstruction of its walls, Ezr 444. (2) 77<sup>a</sup>-10.—Ezra promulgates the law, and the people 'seal unto it,' Ezr 444. (3) 11-12<sup>30</sup>.—Lists of those who dwell in Jerus., and of the Levites who had come to Jerus. with Zerubbabel. (4) 12<sup>37</sup>-13<sup>3</sup>.—The dedication of the walls; regulation of the temple services, Ezr 443. (5) 13<sup>4</sup>-31. Nehemiah's second visit to Jerus., and the reforms accomplished at that time, Ezr 432.

B. SOURCES.—Modern criticism has shown that Heb. literature, like other Sem. literature,* is usually the result of compilation. No trained critical eye is required to see that the book under discussion has reached its present form by compilation from several different sources, and it is not difficult to analyze the book into its constituent elements, though it is not always possible to trace these elements back to their origin. In some cases we must be content with probabilities, and in others must confess ignorance. In the analysis of the book the results will be clearer if we follow an order which disregards the present arrangement of chapters.

The casual reader will not fail to notice that considerable portions, especially of Neh, are written in the first person. The 'I' refers to Ezra everywhere in Ezr, and to Nehemiah everywhere in Neh. The first person is used in Ezr 7<sup>27</sup>-9<sup>15</sup>, Neh 1<sup>1</sup>-77<sup>a</sup> 12<sup>27</sup>-43 13<sup>4</sup>-31. These are portions of memoirs written by Ezra and Neh. respectively. They are for the most part preserved in their original form. It is evident that considerable parts of the memoirs have been lost. Ezra's narrative has no proper beginning; he came to Jerus. to establish the law, but his own narrative tells us nothing about the accomplishment of this design. Neh's narrative breaks off abruptly; the sequel to 7<sup>5</sup> is not found in his account; 13<sup>4</sup> begins in medias res; 13<sup>6</sup> must originally have had another connexion. But, imperfect as they are, these personal records of the two great leaders in the restoration of the Jewish state are of the greatest value. For convenience these memoirs will hereafter be designated by the symbols E and N respectively.†

The other portions dealing with the work of Ezra and Neh. are not original parts of their memoirs, though in part based on them. Ezr 7<sup>1</sup>-10 is an introduction to the story of Ezra written by the compiler. For Ezra is spoken of in the third person: the genealogy of Ezra omits his immediate ancestors, Seraiah, who is named as his father, having been put to death by Nebuchadnezzar in 586; Ezra would hardly have spoken of himself as 'an expert scribe'; this introduction anticipates matter found in E. (See further in Driver, LOT<sup>6</sup> p. 549).

Ezr 7<sup>12</sup>-26 is the firman which Artaxerxes gave Ezra as his authority for governing the Jewish colony. V.<sup>11</sup> is an introduction due to the compiler. The letter itself is in Aramaic, and held by many to be in its original form. Such a document would naturally be written in Aram., and the Jewish colouring, which is so apparent in the edict of Cyrus (Ezr 1<sup>2</sup>-5), is not conspicuous in this passage. Cornill's statement that 'in details it is of such specific Jewish colouring that it at least must have been strongly retouched,'* is not justified by facts; and Driver's, that 'it may have been cast into its present form by one familiar with the terminology of the Jewish sacred books,'† is quite consistent with the view that we have the orig. edict signed by the king, in the preparation of which it is not inconceivable that Ezra himself may have had a hand. At all events, its preservation was probably due to its incorporation by Ezra in his memoirs, for the thanksgiving with which E. begins is naturally connected with the royal edict.

Ezr 10 is the proper continuation of the preceding section of E, but Ezra is spoken of in the third person. All efforts to explain this change of person as due to Ezra have been hopeless failures.‡ The force of the fact lies in the change taking place right in the middle of the narrative without any explicable cause. Moreover, we find one conspicuous anachronism: a room in the temple is called after Jehohanan, the son of Eliashib (10<sup>6</sup>); but Eliashib was a prominent priest in 432 (Neh 12<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>4</sup>), and a room could not have been called his son's in 458.§ Yet there are points of resemblance with E. The passage is probably a revision and abbreviation of E, the work of the compiler.

Neh 7<sup>73b</sup>-10. Of this portion 9<sup>6</sup>-10<sup>39</sup> is regarded by Stade|| as an original portion of E. The prayer 9<sup>6</sup>-38 is suited to Ezra, and the words prefixed in the LXX 'and Ezra said' may be an original note of the compiler's to explain his extract from E. The remainder of the section, 7<sup>73b</sup>-9<sup>5</sup>, is usually accounted for in the same way as Ezr 10, to which it bears striking resemblance. There is room for grave doubt about the chronology.¶ There is practically no guide except the position of the passage. A comparison of 7<sup>73</sup> and Ezr 3<sup>1</sup> shows that the compiler has made a false connexion of this passage with N, and he does not appear to have been an expert in chronology. The section took its present form long after the events described, so that confusion of order was easily possible. Sayce has pointed out that the names in Neh 10 are for the most part found also in Ezr 2.** He regards this section as the work of 'a layman,' and not a priest like Ezra, since he classes himself with 'the people' (19<sup>32</sup>. 37. 38). ††

Neh 11<sup>1</sup>-12<sup>26</sup> is made up of lists extracted from the temple registers, with explanatory notes by the compiler. Ch. 11 is closely connected with 7<sup>5</sup>, and may be based on N. König says that ch. 11 'might indeed have been incorporated by Neh. into his writings,' but that 12<sup>1</sup>-26 'on account of Jaddua (12<sup>22</sup>) falls into the time of Alexander the Great.'‡‡

Neh 12<sup>44</sup>-13<sup>3</sup> cannot be from N, for it uses the expression 'in the days of Neh.' (12<sup>47</sup>), as of a time long past. König admits that 12<sup>44</sup>-47 comes from a later hand, but holds that N begins with 13<sup>1</sup> instead of 13<sup>4</sup>, as most critics maintain. W. R. Smith, OTJC<sup>2</sup> p. 427 n., suggests that 13<sup>1</sup>-2 originally stood between Ezr 10<sup>6</sup> 10.

There remains for consideration Ezr 1-6. Ch. 1 is very likely due to the compiler, though he may have used written sources. . . Vv. 1-3a are found also in 2 Ch 36<sup>22</sup>. The differences are very slight, * Einkl. p. 264. See also Kuenen, Critique de L'A. T. p. 507, for details of the alleged colouring.

† LOT<sup>6</sup> p. 550.

‡ See, e.g., Keil, Ezra, Neh., Esth. 1873, p. 12 f.

§ See Cornill, Einkl. p. 266.

|| Gesch. d. V. Isr. ii. 153 ff.

¶ See art. EZRA.

** Introd. to Ezra, Neh., and Est. 1885, p. 69.

†† Id. p. 30.

‡‡ Einkl. in das AT, 1893, p. 278. On the relation of Neh 11 to 1 Ch 9<sup>3</sup>-22, see Sayce, Introd. p. 32; Oettli, op. cit. p. 150; Bertheau-Ryssel, 'Kgt. Exeg. Handb. z. AT,' 1887, Ezr., Neh., u. Est. p. 12.

* Sayce, HCM c. 2.

† So Kautzsch, Die Heilige Schrift des AT.

and are due to accident in copying, Vv.<sup>2-4</sup> contain the edict of Cyrus. From a comparison with the inscriptions of Cyrus,* it appears to be strongly coloured by Jewish ideas. Cyrus attributes his success to Merodach, not to J'.

2<sup>1</sup>-3<sup>1a</sup> is found also in Neh 7<sup>6-73</sup>. In the latter place it is appended to Nehemiah's memoirs with this preface: 'And I found the book of the genealogy of those who first came up: and I found written in it' (7<sup>5</sup>). There are more than a hundred variations in the two versions. The numbers esp. differ oftener than they agree.† Such variation is always found in duplicates. Cf. Pss 14 and 53, Ps 18 and 2 S 22. This does not destroy identity of origin. It appears from the large number of such lists that the Jews were in the habit of keeping registers of important names. From such a register the Chronicler has incorporated the list into its present place. These lists have been but poorly preserved in the transmission of the original documents, as we find many errors wherever we have data to test them. This list was already a part of a narrative when copied by Neh., since both versions end with narrative. This ending in Ezr introduces the assembling at Jerus. for the setting up of the altar, in Neh the assembling for the promulgation of the law.

3<sup>1-45</sup> is very generally assigned to the Chronicler (so Cornill, Schrader, Ryssel, Driver, etc. For the grounds of this see LOT<sup>2</sup> 547 f.).

4<sup>6f</sup>. These are two fragments from unknown sources. They cannot be from the Chronicler, for they are out of joint with the context. V.<sup>6</sup> contains a statement about an accusation made against the Jews in the beg. of the reign of Xerxes. There is no hint of this elsewhere. 4<sup>7</sup> may have been placed here on the supposition that it was introductory to the passage following, but we shall see that this is not so. There is no reason, however, to doubt the genuineness or authenticity of these verses.

4<sup>8-613</sup>. This passage is written in the Aram. language, and is a portion of a more or less complete history of these times written originally in Aramaic.‡ The compiler, finding his best sources for this period in Aramaic, incorporated considerable portions without translation. In its present arrangement, however, the course of the history is very much obscured, as will be more fully pointed out below. The section falls into two parts, both of which present critical problems of considerable intricacy. For convenience these problems will be discussed in this connexion.

4<sup>8-24</sup>. According to the present arrangement of our book, this part describes the securing of a decree from Artaxerxes to stop the rebuilding of the temple. But, as a matter of fact, the passage has nothing to do with the temple, and is evidently misplaced. According to 4<sup>7</sup> Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of his companions 'wrote a letter to king Artaxerxes in Aramaic.' This letter is not the one found in the verses following, for that was written by Rehum the chancellor and Shimshal the scribe; moreover, the letter which begins with v.<sup>11</sup> is overloaded with introductions in the Aram. passage vv.<sup>8-10</sup>. Since Artaxerxes reigned from 465 to 425, this passage can have nothing to do with the times of Zerubbabel. The correction of Xerxes v.<sup>6</sup> to Cambyses (reigning 529-522), and Artaxerxes to Gomates (pseudo-Smerdis),§ is out of the question, since the contents agree with the date assigned in the text. The letter says that the Jews are rebuilding the rebellious and bad city, and have finished the walls, and repaired the foundations. It further declares that if this city is rebuilt and the walls finished, the Jews will rebel and refuse to pay tribute, 'and in the end it will enslave the king.' The building of the temple cannot be the point of attack, for that would not signify rebellion. If the temple were the matter at issue, the Jews would have appealed to the decree of Cyrus as they did later. The king's answer agrees with this view. He orders that this city be not built, until a decree shall be made by him, but makes no allusion to the temple. If a royal decree had been issued forbidding the rebuilding of the temple, the people would have had ample excuse for their neglect when Haggai reproaches them so sharply. . . Zerubbabel and Joshua would scarcely have ventured to renew the work on the temple with such a decree in force. Finally, Tattenai would not have failed to make use of such a good weapon if it had been at hand.

The passage refers to an attempt to rebuild the walls of the city, which must have occurred in the first part of the reign of Artaxerxes before the coming of Nehemiah. 'The Jews which have come up from thee' (12) refers either to Ezra and his company, or to some other band concerning which the history is silent. V.<sup>24</sup> does refer to the building of the temple, and is the effort of the compiler to harmonize the passage with the history with which he has erroneously connected it.*

5, 6. This section gives a consistent account of the rebuilding of the temple, but difficulties arise in its relation to ch. 3, and to Hag and Zec. In 3<sup>1-7</sup> we are told that Joshua and Zerub. set up the altar soon after the arrival of the first pilgrims. The required sacrifices were at once started. Then the actual work of rebuilding the temple was begun (3<sup>48ff.</sup>). The text is somewhat confused, but it is clear that the writer says that the foundations of the temple were laid at this time; see esp. v.<sup>10</sup> 'and the builders laid the foundation of the temple of J'.' The work thus begun was stopped by the adversaries, who 'weakened the hands of the people of Judah, and troubled them in building, and hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose, all the days of Cyrus king of Persia, even until the reign of Darius king of Persia' (44<sup>5</sup>).

Hag, and Zech., contemporary prophets under whose inspiration the work of rebuilding was taken up and carried to completion, give no hint anywhere that the temple building was but the resumption of a task already begun and laid aside with good reason. Hag speaks of 'the house that lieth waste' (14<sup>9</sup>); he attributes the unprosperous condition to the neglect of the temple; he denies the validity of the excuse that the time was not suitable. The unsuitableness of the time pleaded by the people does not refer to the hostility of their neighbours, but to their poverty. But some of this prophet's utterances go further. He says: 'Lay to heart from this day back to the time before one laid stone upon a stone in the temple of J' (24<sup>5</sup>)—a time evidently within his recent experience. He gives the date upon which the foundation was laid in a prophecy delivered that very day; 'from this day forward, from the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month, from the day that the foundation of J''s temple is laid' (24<sup>5</sup>).

Zech. says: 'The hands of Zerub. have laid the foundation of this house: his hands shall also finish it' (49), referring to the laying of the foundation just accomplished. Two years later he said: 'Let your hands be strong, ye that hear in these days these words from the mouths of the prophets, which were in the day that the foundation of the temple of J' of hosts was laid' (8<sup>9</sup>). The prophets must have been Hag, and himself.

A large part of the letter sent to Darius is taken up with the defence of the Jews. They urge that they were only doing what Cyrus had authorized. Sheshbazzar had been appointed governor, and he came to Jerus., and laid the foundations of the house of God which is in Jerus.; and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not completed' (Ezr 5<sup>16</sup>). Hag 2<sup>3</sup> shows the contempt for the new temple felt by those old men, who still remembered the glory of the temple of Solomon. We find the same feelings expressed in Ezr 3<sup>12-13</sup>. It seems impossible that these two passages do not refer to the same event.

In Ezr 5<sup>1</sup> we read that 'Zerub. and Josh. stood up and began to build the house of God.' Nothing is said about completing a work begun before; the inference is plainly that a new task was taken up. The question of Tattenai in v.<sup>3</sup>, 'Who gave you a decree to build this house?' † and his subsequent action imply not a resumption of a work which had been forcibly stopped, but the coming up of a new issue. The passage in 5<sup>16</sup> already quoted, which may appear to harmonize with the resumption theory, does not do so, for it proves too much; its statement that the temple had been in process of building ever since the decree of Cyrus had been issued, is contrary to all that we know from other sources. It may be a sufficient explanation of this inaccuracy to note that it is contained in the letter, and Tattenai may have misunderstood the Jews, who might have said that from the time of Cyrus they had purposed to build the temple, but had not been able to do so. König holds that Ezr 3<sup>1-49</sup> contains fragments which, by tradition, have been received into the original picture of the temple-building story. It is quite possible that we have here, in fact, poorly preserved fragments of an orig. Heb. account of the rebuilding of the temple. The passage would then be parallel with the Aram. section cc. 5, 6; and in that case the troublesome passage 46<sup>23</sup> would not be seriously out of place; that is, it originally would * Sayce's view that v.<sup>24</sup> properly follows v.<sup>5</sup>, 'as indicated by the grammatical construction of the original Chaldee,' and that the whole passage is introduced here episodically, is quite untenable. See his Introd. p. 22.

† The words following 'and to finish this wall' do not support the view of an earlier work on the temple. אִשְׁכָּנָה rendered 'wall' is a word of doubtful meaning. Kautzsch, Gram. des Bib. Ar. § 62, suggests the emendation אִשְׁכָּנָה 'foundations' as v.<sup>16</sup>. Bleek held that the word refers to the walls of the city, Eint. 5 p. 207. Bertheau-Ryssel interprets after LXX the wooden framework for the building.

* See RP, new ser. v. 144 ff.

† The sum-total in each case is the same, but varies by 12,000 from the sum of the detailed numbers. (See further Kuenen, Rel. Isr. ii. 178).

‡ On Renan's view that the Aram. section is from the Targums, see Expos. Times, iv. 546.

§ Ewald advocated this position, Hist., Eng. tr. iv. 106.

have stood just before the beginning of the history of Ezra. Its present position would simply be further evidence of the limited critical insight of the compiler. For further discussion of this question, see König, Einl. p. 281 ff.; Driver, LOT<sup>6</sup> p. 547 (where other references will be found); Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. p. 400.

To this Aramaic portion a fragment is added in Hebrew, 6<sup>19-22</sup>. It is peculiar in that it applies the term 'king of Assyria' to Darius. It may be due to the Chronicler, who felt the importance of the celebration of the Passover festival after the dedication of the new temple.

We have seen above that the books under consideration were originally one in the Jewish canon. The editor who put the material into its present shape undoubtedly left the book as a unit. This editor, however, found the process of compilation already begun. He did not find all the various sources scattered and independent, but they were already gathered in two main documents, the material having clustered about the stories of the two chief figures in the community. The last editor may have rearranged his sources acc. to his own ideas; he probably made additions from other sources, and we fear omitted portions which we should appreciate more than he did; certainly, he made additions from his own pen. The convincing evidence of the existence of two separate books before the last revision, is found in the presence of the duplicate lists Ezr 2 and Neh 7. The lists were already a fixed part of the narrative in which they are imbedded, so that the Chronicler could not omit either one without disjoining his narrative. The list may have been attached to N by Neh. himself, though it is more likely that a later hand, who felt the propriety of the connexion, is responsible for the addition. When the material was collected for the life of Ezra and the time preceding, the list was naturally placed where it properly belongs.

The first part of these books was undoubtedly the genuine memoirs E and N. To these, other material was added from time to time, to complete as far as possible the history of the restoration. It is highly probable that Neh 8-10, which we have seen reason to believe a revised edition of portions of E, was originally a part of the Bk. of Ezra, and was later transferred from chron. considerations. In the apoc. Esdras, which is preferred by some writers to the canonical Ezr,* a brief account of the promulgation of the law follows immediately the story of the great divorce (see 1 Es 9<sup>37</sup>).

There can be little doubt that the final editor of Ezr-Neh was the author of the Bk. of Chronicles.† He gathered material, and prepared a history, written acc. to his own point of view from Adam to Nehemiah. His work was one long piece, Ezr-Neh being a part of Chronicles. But the latter had a considerable struggle to get into the canon. The Chronicler's novel treatment of the history, already covered by other books, did not win favour at once. But Ezr-Neh was the only source of information for the important period of the restoration. Moreover, the Chronicler's peculiar methods were not conspicuous in the later history. In fact, his Bk. of Chronicles is an attempt to read the conditions of the later times into the earlier. The later portion was therefore separated from the earlier, and found its place in the canon. In the separation, a few verses were retained in each part (Ezr 1<sup>1-3a</sup>, 2 Ch 36<sup>22L</sup>).

The hist. value of these books is very great; for they stand alone for an important epoch, and they contain documents of great importance. But all parts are not equally reliable. The Chronicler was not a discriminating critic. He uses his sources as if all were alike trustworthy. Naturally, E and N are the most reliable. The personal narrative of eye-witnesses and principal participants is of the highest value. Next in importance as hist. sources are the memoirs which have been worked over by the compiler, designated by Kautzsch e and n: e Ezr 10, Neh 8-10; n Neh 11<sup>3-35</sup> (acc. to Kautzsch). Of great value also are the Aram. documents in Ezr 4<sup>8-6</sup> 18 7<sup>12-23</sup>. The other sources are too far corrupted from their original form to be of primary value.

Notwithstanding the inferior trustworthiness of some portions, and the incompleteness of the whole, it is possible with the aid of the prophetic and poetic literature of the period to form a tolerably clear and connected idea of the times.* If much is lacking which we should like to know, that is but common to all periods of history, and there is compensation in the preservation of precious original documents. The case would be different if the Chronicler had worked over the whole of E and N, so that we could only infer their existence, and if he had translated and revised the Aram. documents.

[Since the above was in type, the question of the credence due to the Chronicler's narrative and of the historicity of the Jews' Return under Cyrus has been discussed afresh by Kesters in the ThT (1897), 518 ff. See also the Expos. Times, viii. (1897), 71, 200, 268, 320, 351 (the last by Van Hoonacker), ix. 66.—EDITOR.]

LITERATURE.—(A) INTRODUCTION.—Driver, LOT<sup>6</sup> 540 ff.; Sayce, Introd. to Ezr. Neh. and Est.; Kuenen, Hist.-Krit. Einleit.<sup>2</sup> §§ 29, 33-35; Cornill, Einleit.<sup>2</sup> 262 ff.; Wildeboer, Alttest. Literatur, 404 ff.; König, Einleit.; Wellhausen-Bleek, Einleit.<sup>4</sup>; Ewald, Hist. i. (B) HISTORY.—Stade, Ges. d. Volk. Isr. ii.; Renan, Hist. of People of Israel, Bk. vii.; Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Ges.; Ewald, Hist. v.; Meyer, Ges. d. Alterth. i. (C) COMMENTARIES.—Ryle, 'Ezr. and Neh.', in Camb. Bible; Rawlinson, in Pulpit Com., Speaker's Com., and in Ezra and Nehemiah (Men of the Bible series); Keil, Ezr. Neh. and Est.; F. W. Schultz in Lange's Commentary; Bertheau-Ryssel in Kgf. exeg. Hdbch.; Oettli in Strack and Zöckler's Kgf. Kom.; Kamphausen, Hagiog. d. Alt. Bund. (D) MISCELLANEOUS.—Smend, List. d. BB. Ezr. u. Neh.; Hunter, After the Exile; Schrader, COT<sup>2</sup>; Sayce, IICM<sup>5</sup>; Baer, Dan. Ezr. et Neh. (valuable for the text and Aram. paradigms; cf. Marti, Gramm. Preface, and Kautzsch, p. 54 n.); Kesters, Het Herstel v. Isr.; Van Hoonacker, Nouv. Etud. s. l. Restaur. Juive (mainly a reply to Kesters); Meyer, Entstehung des Judenthums; cf. Wellhausen's review of this book in GGA (1897), ii. 89 ff., and the reply of Meyer, Julius Wellhausen u. meine Schrift, etc. For the Aramaic language see Grammars of Winer (1832), Kautzsch (1884), Strack (1896), and Marti (1896). For critical translations see Scriptures Heb. and Christian, by J. P. Peters; Kautzsch, Heil. Schr. d. AT (in which the sources are indicated by letters in the margin); Reuss, Alt. Test. iv. L. W. BATTEN.

EZRAH (עֶזְרָה, AV Ezra).—A Judahite (1 Ch 4<sup>17</sup>). See GENEALOGY.

EZRAHITE (עֶזְרָהִי, LXX Ἰσραηλῆτης).—A name given to Heman in the title of Ps 88, and to Ethan in Ps 89. It is used also of Ethan in 1 K 4<sup>31</sup>, where LXX (B) reads Ζαβεῖρns. It is best understood as = Zerachite, cf. 1 Ch 2<sup>6</sup>, in which Ethan and Heman are termed sons of Zerach. A double tradition concerning Ps 88 appears to be embodied in the title; it is called a 'Psalm-song of the Korahites,' and 'a meditation by Heman the Ezrahite.' There were also a Heman and an Ethan, Merarites, of the tribe of Levi, according to 1 Ch 15<sup>17</sup>; the Ezrahites belonged to the tribe of Judah. W. T. DAVISON.

EZRI (עֶזְרִי).—David's superintendent of agriculture (1 Ch 27<sup>26</sup>).

EZRIL (B Ἐζριέλ, A -l-, AV Esril), 1 Es 9<sup>34</sup>; AZAREL in Ezr 10<sup>41</sup>.

* On the value of these books, see Ryle, Ezra and Neh. Introd. § 11.

* See Sayce, IICM p. 537.

† See the able discussion by Reuss, Das Alte Test. p. 8 ff.

F

FABLE is usually defined (with Dr. Johnson in his life of Gay) to be 'a narrative in which beings, irrational and sometimes inanimate, are, for the purposes of moral instruction, feigned to act and speak with human interests and passions'; and hence, as such beings do not present analogies to man in the spiritual region, it differs from other tropes (see ALLEGORY) in that its lessons are confined to the sphere of practical worldly prudence. Accepting this prevailing usage, we find (and the rarity is not surprising) but two instances of fable in sacred literature: (1) Jotham's fable of the trees choosing their king (Jg 9<sup>8-15</sup>); and (2) the fable of the thistle and the cedar of Lebanon, in the answer of Jehoash to Amaziah (2 K 14<sup>9</sup>). In neither of these cases, however, is the story described by any appellation. Indeed the word fable does not occur in the canonical OT, nor is μῦθος (its Apoc. and NT equivalent) certainly found in the LXX, except in Sir 20<sup>19</sup> ('a man without grace is as a tale out of season'), where in the next verse παραβολή appears as the parallel, 'a wise saw.' The compound μυθολογος, author of fables, is used in Bar 3<sup>23</sup>; and here the parallel, searcher out of understanding, suggests a similar interpretation. Accordingly, we may conclude that the nearest approach in the OT to the idea of μῦθος is found in māshāl, the dark saying, parable, proverb, adage, in which Orientals clothed their deeper thoughts (Ps 49<sup>1</sup> 78<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 17<sup>2</sup>), and which sometimes appears to stand for a warning example (Jer 24<sup>9</sup> [Judah] 'a reproach and a proverb' παραβολή, LXX). This does not differ materially from the Homeric and almost purely poetical use of μῦθος,—found once or twice also in Plato,—from which the connotation of truth had not yet been entirely banished.

But in Greek prose, as a rule, and even occasionally in poetry as early as that of Pindar (O. 1. 47, N. 7. 34), μῦθος was the Latin fabula, connoting fiction, sometimes (in opposition to πᾶσιμα) spontaneously growing, as, in religious tradition, the myth of god or hero (Plato, Legg. 9. 865 D); sometimes deliberately composed, like Æsop's Fables (Plato, Phæd. 60 C), and then opposed to λόγος, the historic story, or to ἀλήθεια, actual fact (Plato, Phæd. 61 B; Aristot. Hist. An. 9. 12). It is to this usage that the NT μῦθος allies itself (1 Ti 14<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ti 4<sup>4</sup>, Tit 1<sup>14</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>16</sup>).

In 2 P 1<sup>16</sup> the word apparently bears the general sense of fiction, 'what we tell you as to the power and coming of the Lord is not cunningly devised fiction, but sober truth.' But the fables referred to in the Pastoral Epp. as already endangering the soundness of the faith and the health of the churches in Ephesus and Crete, are of a special kind. They are 'Jewish' (Tit 1<sup>14</sup>); they are 'profane and anile' 1 Ti 4<sup>7</sup> (cf. Plat. Rep. 1. 350); they are connected with genealogies, 1 Ti 1<sup>4</sup> (cf. Plato, Tim. 22 A, as to the offspring of Deucalion and Pyrrha), with fightings about the law (Tit 3<sup>9</sup>) and with commandments of men (Tit 1<sup>14</sup>). The two last expressions and the epithet Jewish find some explanation in the rigid asceticism of abstaining from meats and forbidding to marry (1 Ti 4<sup>3</sup>), which was doubtless founded upon Jewish law, and was a characteristic of that side of Gnosticism which was afraid of matter, even as licence (Tit 1<sup>15</sup>, 16) was the characteristic of that other side which affected to despise its power; the 'genealogies' remind us of the worship of angels at Colossæ (Col 2<sup>18</sup>), and the Gnosticism which bridged the gulf between God and the world by means of angelic intermediaries generated from the pleroma and from one another; and when we read also elsewhere in these epistles of the 'gnosis falsely so-called' (1 Ti 6<sup>20</sup>), of the 'resurrection past already' (2 Ti 2<sup>18</sup>), of the 'enchanters' (2 Ti 3<sup>13</sup>), and of the 'doctrines of demons' (1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), we are irresistibly drawn towards the belief that the fables of these epistles are closely akin to the teachings of Ophite Gnosticism—that earliest Gnosticism of Asia Minor, which was a strikingly similar mixture of Jewish and heathen speculation, ritual, and practice. See GnosticisM.

LITERATURE.—Cremer, Bib.-Theol. Lex. s. μῦθος and γενεαλογία; Trench, Parables, p. 2; Goebel, Parables of Jesus, 6ff.; Moore, Judges, 244ff.; Encyc. Brit. 9 and Smith, DB s.v.; and see ALLEGORY; on the 'fables' of Past. Epp. see Lightfoot, Biblical Essays, p. 411ff.; (on the other side—that the heresy is simply Judaistic—Hort, Judaistic Christianity, Lect. 7).

J. MASSIE.

FACE is AV tr. of 1. 78, for which RV in several instances substitutes more exact renderings, such as 'nose' (Gn 24<sup>47</sup>), 'nostrils' (Ezk 38<sup>18</sup>). 2. עַי, lit. 'eye' (e.g. Ex 10<sup>5</sup>, 15, Nu 22<sup>5</sup> 'the face of the earth'). RV rightly gives 'eyes' instead of 'face' in 1 K 20<sup>38</sup>, 41, 2 K 9<sup>30</sup>, Jer 4<sup>30</sup>. 3. עַיִם very frequent both in a lit. and a metaphorical sense (e.g. עַל פְּנֵי 'upon the face of'). The shewbread (see BREAD, p. 318<sup>b</sup>) was called עֶם עַיִם, lit. 'bread of the face, i.e. presence' (see next paragraph). With a personal pronoun 'my (thy, his, etc.) face' may be simply a circumlocution for 'me (thee, him, etc.)'. Hence the substitution by RV of 'them' for 'their face' in Ex 14<sup>19</sup>, and of 'thee' for 'thy face' in Gn 30<sup>33</sup>, Dt 9<sup>8</sup> 28<sup>7</sup>. Conversely, in Jer 17<sup>16</sup> AV has 'thee' and RV 'thy face.'

The face or countenance as the noblest part of the person was used to mean presence, and is often so translated. From the implied invitation or permission to approach (Est 4<sup>16</sup>), it came to mean favour, acceptance. On the other hand, the withheld or averted face was equivalent to disapproval or rejection (Ps 13<sup>1</sup> 27<sup>9</sup> 88<sup>14</sup> 143<sup>7</sup> etc.). Such favour was called the light of the countenance, giving life and refreshment like that of the sun (Ps 89<sup>15</sup> etc.). Among the Arabs, a fit of anger or the sudden effect of hearing bad news is called the darkening of the sky on the face. To 'respect persons' is generally עֲרַם פְּנֵים, but in Dt 17<sup>16</sup>, Pr 24<sup>23</sup> 28<sup>21</sup> it is הִקֵּיר פְּנֵים, lit. to recognize the presence of one (sc. unjustly).

To spit in the face was the strongest possible expression of scorn and aversion (Nu 12<sup>14</sup>, Dt 25<sup>9</sup>, Job 30<sup>10</sup>, Is 50<sup>6</sup>, Mt 26<sup>67</sup> 27<sup>30</sup>, Mk 10<sup>34</sup> 14<sup>65</sup>, 15<sup>19</sup>, Lk 18<sup>32</sup>). In heated altercation, an Oriental often uses an ejaculation which means 'I spit in your face,' at the same time spitting on the ground at the feet of the person he is quarrelling with. Modesty, humility, worship, self-abasement, are expressed by the veils of women (Gn 24<sup>65</sup>), the reverential shrouding of the face with the mantle (1 K 19<sup>13</sup>), the wings with which the seraphim covered the face (Is 6<sup>2</sup>), and the face bowed to the ground (Gn 42<sup>6</sup> etc.). To have the face covered by another, as in the case of Haman (Est 7<sup>8</sup>), was a sign of doom; the napkin drawn over the face and wound round the head was part of the covering of the dead (Jn 11<sup>44</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>).

G. M. MACKIE.

FACT.—A 'fact' (Lat. factum) is any act or deed, good or bad; and this was the commonest meaning of the word till about the beginning of the present century. Thus Spenser, FQ I. iv. 34—

'But, when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruel facts he often would repent.'

Similarly Bunyan, PP (Clar. Pr. ed. p. 42), 'falling down upon his knees, he [Christian] asked God forgiveness for that his foolish fact.' So T. Adams, II Peter (Pur. Divines), p. 3, 'Theodosius excused a foul fact, because David had done the like.' This is the meaning in 2 K 10 (heading) 'Jehu by his letters causeth seventy of Ahab's children to be beheaded: he excuseth the fact by the prophecy of Elijah'; and 2 Mac 4<sup>36</sup> 'Certain of the Greeks that abhorred the fact also' (Gr. συμμοσπονηρόντων καὶ τῶν Ἑλλήνων, RV 'the Greeks also joining with them in hatred of the wickedness.' This is the only example of σύνμ., though μοσπονηρέω is found 2 Mac 4<sup>40</sup> [A. -εῖω] 84). The present use of 'fact' for something that has actually occurred, an undeniable truth, though quite classical for factum, and belonging to all the Romanic equivalents (Fr. fait, It. fatto, Sp. hecho), is not found in English before 1632.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIN is properly 'glad,' as Dyke, Worthy Commun. 56, 'Then full faine wilt thou be to have Christ Jesus receive thy soule'; or 'gladly,' as Jn 12<sup>21</sup> Tind. 'Syr, we wolde fayne se Jesus.' But the commonest meaning has always been 'glad under the circumstances,' and that is its meaning in AV: Job 27<sup>22</sup> 'he would fain flee out of his hand' (עָרָה עָרָה, AVm 'in fleeing he would flee'); 1 Mac 6<sup>54</sup> 'they were fain to disperse themselves' (ἐσκοπισθήσαν, RV 'they were scattered'); Lk 15<sup>16</sup> 'he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat' (ἐπεθύμει). Cf. Shaks. Lear, iv. vii. 38—

'and wast thou fain, poor father,
To hovel thee with swine, and rogues forlorn,
In short and musty straw?'

From this the word easily slipped into the sense of 'obliged,' 'compelled,' as in Pref. to AV 'he was fain to make this answer, I cannot [read the book] for it is sealed'; Is 1<sup>7</sup> Cov. 'Youre londe lieth waist . . . and ye must be fayne to stonde and loke upon it'; and Defoe, Crusoe: 'When the tide was out, I got most of the pieces of cable ashore, and some of the iron, though with infinite labour; for I was fain to go for it into the water, a work which fatigued me very much.'

To the three examples in AV, RV adds two: Lk 13<sup>31</sup> 'Herod would fain kill thee' (θέλει σε ἀποκτείναι); AV 'will kill thee,' the tr<sup>n</sup> of all previous Eng. VSS (Wyc. 'will slay thee'); and Ac 26<sup>28</sup> 'With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian' (Ἐν ὀλίγῳ με πείθεις Χριστιανὸν ποιῆσαι); AV 'Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian,' following TR γενέσθαι for ποιῆσαι).

The reading, ποιῆσαι or γενέσθαι, is discussed in WH 'Select Readings,' ad loc. The best argument for ποιῆσαι is its difficulty: to simplify the construction, γενέσθαι may have been taken in from the next verse.

The translation is, on either reading, nearly impossible. The AV is a combination of the Geneva NT (1557), 'Almost thou persuadest me to become a Christian,' and the Bishops, 'Somewhat thou perswadest me to be a Christian.' But it gives an unknown sense to ἐν ὀλίγῳ, besides following the less probable γενέσθαι. The RV is new, and is got (1) by mentally supplying πόνον (?) 'labour' after ἐν ὀλίγῳ; (2) by translating πείθεις 'wouldst fain,' so as to bring out the sense, which it certainly has, of 'attempt to persuade'; and (3) by supplying ὥστε before ποῖσαι. It is adversely criticised by Field, Otium Norv. iii. ad loc. But Rendall, Acts of Apos. in Greek and English (1897), accepts it, rendering, 'At little cost thou wouldest fain persuade me to make me a Christian!' (The exclamation mark is intended to suggest the irony in Agrippa's voice).

J. HASTINGS.

FAINT.—From feint the ptep. of Old Fr. feindre to feign, faint signified first 'feigned,' 'pretended,' as Earl Rivers, Dictes, 144, 'He that loueth the with feynt loue.' But it passed early into the sense of weak: whether (1) as a purely physical state, as Gn 25<sup>29</sup> 'Esau came from the field, and he was faint' (הָיָה, so 25<sup>30</sup>, Dt 25<sup>18</sup>, Jg 8<sup>4,5</sup>, Is 29<sup>8</sup>; הָיָה 1 S 14<sup>28,31</sup>, 2 S 21<sup>15</sup>; הָיָה 1 S 30<sup>10,21</sup>; הָיָה 2 S 16<sup>2</sup>, Is 40<sup>29</sup>; ἐκλῶμαι 1 Mac 3<sup>17</sup>); or (2) as chiefly moral, almost = 'cowardly,' * which occurs only in the phrase faint-hearted, Dt 20<sup>8</sup> (לֵב יָרֵךְ הָיָה, lit. 'soft-hearted'); Is 7<sup>4</sup> (לֵב יָרֵךְ הָיָה, RV 'neither let thine heart be faint'), Jer 49<sup>28</sup> (לֵב יָרֵךְ, RV 'they are melted away'), Sir 4<sup>9</sup> (μὴ ὀλιγοψυχῆσης, so 7<sup>10</sup>); or (3) as spiritual, through sorrow, Jer 8<sup>18</sup>, La 1<sup>22</sup> (both לֵב יָרֵךְ 1<sup>13</sup> 5<sup>17</sup> (both הָיָה), or calamity, Is 1<sup>5</sup> (יָרֵךְ)). The verb is derived from the adj. It is used in the foregoing senses, and also in the modern physical sense of 'swoon' (Dn 8<sup>27</sup>, Ad. Est 15<sup>7</sup>). Faintness is used physically in Ad. Est 15<sup>15</sup> and spiritually in Lv 26<sup>36</sup>.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIR.—1. Beautiful, as Sus v.<sup>2</sup> 'a very fair woman' (καλὴ σφόδρα); Sir 24<sup>18</sup> 'I am the mother of fair love' (τῆς ἀγαπήσεως τῆς καλῆς). So frequently in OT; but in NT only Ac 7<sup>20</sup> [Moses] 'was exceeding fair' (ἄσπετος τῷ θεῷ, lit. 'fair to God,' see under EXCEEDING. The adj. occurs also He 11<sup>23</sup> and again of Moses; AV 'proper'; RV 'goodly,' the word in Ex 2<sup>2</sup> where the Heb. is טוֹב 'good'). 2. Unspotted, Zec 3<sup>5bis</sup> 'a fair mitre' (תָּהִירָה). Cf. Pr. Bk. (1552) 'a fayre white linnen clothe'; Ezk 1<sup>7</sup> Cov. 'fayre scoured metall'; Wesley (1737), Works, i. 46, 'a paper book; all the leaves thereof were fair, except one.' Wyclif's tr. of Zec 3<sup>5</sup> is (1382) 'a cleene cappe' (1388, 'a cleene mytre'); Douay, 'a cleane mitre.' Coverdale gives 'fair,' and the other VSS follow him. Amer. RV restores 'clean.' 3. Plausible, Gal 6<sup>12</sup> 'to make a fair show' (εὐπροσώπησαι); elsewhere only of speech. In Sir 6<sup>5</sup> 'fair speaking' is used in a good sense, 'a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings' (εὐλαλος). The modern form 'fair-spoken' had also a good meaning once, as Capgrave (1460), Chron. 81, 'He was . . . fayre-spoken, but he spak but seldom.'

In Ezk 27<sup>12-14, 16, 19, 22-27</sup> 'fairs,' i.e. markets, is used in AV (after Wyc. in v.<sup>12</sup> and Geneva throughout) as tr. of Heb. מַרְכָּאִים, which is evidently 'wares' as AV has it in v.<sup>33</sup>, the only other occurrence of the word. RV gives 'wares' (wh. see) throughout.

J. HASTINGS.

FAIR HAVENS (Καλοὶ Λιμένες), one of the places mentioned in connexion with St. Paul's voyage to Rome (Ac 27<sup>8-12</sup>), is a small bay, two leagues E. of Cape Matala, on the S. coast of Crete. There does not seem to have been a town at the place, but there was one near it, called Lasea. Neither Fair Havens nor Lasea is mentioned in classical writings, but the former name survives in the modern Gr. dialect as Λιμέννας Καλούς, and archaeological research has confirmed the identity of both places. It has been suggested that the name is euphemistic, and the fact that an attempt was made to reach Phoenix, the modern Lutro, a considerable distance W. along the coast, in the circumstances mentioned in Ac, adds emphasis to the statement that the haven was not commodious to winter in. On the other hand, it proved a welcome shelter to St. Paul and those who were with him, for a considerable time, at a most critical part of their voyage. The difference between Fair Havens and Phoenix was, that while the former was sheltered only from the N. and N.W. winds, the latter was 'the only secure harbour in all winds on the S. coast of Crete.'

W. MUIR.

FAIRS.—See FAIR, WARES.

* Cf. H. Smith, Works, ii. 219, 'The faint spies that went to the land of Canaan.'

FAITH.—I. THE PHILOLOGICAL EXPRESSION OF FAITH.—The verb 'to believe' in AV of OT uniformly represents the Heb. אָמֵן, Hiph. of אָמַן, except, of course, in Dn 6<sup>23</sup> where it represents the corresponding Aramaic form. The root, which is widely spread among the Semitic tongues, and which in the word 'Amen' has been adopted into every language spoken by Christian, Jew, or Mohammedan, seems everywhere to convey the fundamental ideas of 'fixedness, stability, steadfastness, reliability.' What the ultimate conception is which underlies these ideas remains somewhat doubtful, but it would appear to be rather that of 'holding' than that of 'supporting' (although this last is the sense adopted in Oxf. Heb. Lex.). In the simple species the verb receives both transitive and intransitive vocalization. With intransitive vocalization it means 'to be firm,' 'to be secure,' 'to be faithful,' and occurs in biblical Hebrew only in the past participle, designating those who are 'faithful' (2 S 20<sup>19</sup>, Ps 121 31<sup>23</sup>). With transitive vocalization it occurs in biblical Hebrew only in a very specialized application, conveying the idea, whether as participle or verbal noun, of 'caretaking' or 'nursing' (2 K 10<sup>4-5</sup>, Est 27, Ru 4<sup>16</sup>, 2 S 4<sup>4</sup>, Nu 11<sup>12</sup>, Is 49<sup>23</sup>, La 4<sup>5</sup>; cf. 2 K 18<sup>16</sup> 'pillars' and [the Niphal] Is 60<sup>4</sup>), the implication in which seems to be that of 'holding,' 'bearing,' 'carrying.' The Niph. occurs once as the passive of transitive Qal (Is 60<sup>4</sup>); elsewhere it is formed from intransitive Qal, and is used very much in the same sense. Whatever holds, is steady, or can be depended upon, whether a wall which securely holds a nail (Is 22<sup>23, 25</sup>), or a brook which does not fail (Jer 15<sup>18</sup>), or a kingdom which is firmly established (2 S 7<sup>16</sup>), or an assertion which has been verified (Gn 42<sup>20</sup>), or a covenant which endures for ever (Ps 89<sup>28</sup>), or a heart found faithful (Neh 9<sup>8</sup>), or a man who can be trusted (Neh 13<sup>13</sup>), or God Himself who keeps covenant (Dt 7<sup>9</sup>), is אָמֵן. The Hiphil occurs in one passage in the primary physical sense of the root (Job 39<sup>24</sup>). Elsewhere it bears constantly the sense of 'to trust,' weakening down to the simple 'to believe' (Ex 4<sup>31</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>, Hab 1<sup>5</sup>). Obviously it is a subjective causative, and expresses the acquisition or exhibition of the firmness, security, reliability, faithfulness which lies in the root-meaning of the verb, in or with respect to its object. The אָמֵן is therefore one whose state of mind is free from faintheartedness (Is 7<sup>9</sup>) and anxious haste (Is 28<sup>16</sup>), and who stays himself upon the object of his contemplation with confidence and trust. The implication seems to be, not so much that of a passive dependence as of a vigorous active commitment. He who, in the Hebrew sense, exercises faith, is secure, assured, confident (Dt 28<sup>66</sup>, Job 24<sup>22</sup>, Ps 27<sup>13</sup>), and lays hold of the object of his confidence with firm trust.

The most common construction of אָמֵן is with the preposition בְּ, and in this construction its fundamental meaning seems to be most fully expressed. It is probably never safe to represent this phrase by the simple 'believe'; the preposition rather introduces the person or thing in which one believes, or on which one believably rests as on firm ground. This is true even when the object of the affection is a thing, whether divine words, commandments, or works (Ps 106<sup>12</sup> 119<sup>96</sup> 73<sup>32</sup>), or some earthly force or good (Job 39<sup>12</sup> 15<sup>31</sup> 24<sup>22</sup>, Dt 28<sup>66</sup>). It is no less true when the object is a person, human (1 S 27<sup>12</sup>, Pr 26<sup>25</sup>, Jer 12<sup>5</sup>, Mic 7<sup>5</sup>) or superhuman (Job 4<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>15</sup>), or the representative of God, in whom therefore men should place their confidence (Ex 19<sup>9</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>30</sup>). It is above all true, however, when the object of the affection is God Himself, and that indifferently whether or not the special exercise of faith adverted to is rooted in a specific occasion (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, Ex 14<sup>31</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Jon 3<sup>5</sup>). The weaker conception of 'believing' seems, on the other hand, to lie in the construction with the preposition לְ, which appears to introduce the person or thing, not on which one confidently rests, but to the testimony of which one assentingly turns. This credence may be given by the simple to every untested word (Pr 14<sup>15</sup>); it may be withheld until seeing takes the place of believing (1 K 10<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>9</sup>); it is due to words of the Lord and of His messengers, as well as to the signs wrought by them (Ps 106<sup>24</sup>, Is 53<sup>1</sup>, Ex 4<sup>8-9</sup>). It may also be withheld from any human speaker (Gn 45<sup>26</sup>, Ex 4<sup>1-8</sup>, Jer 40<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 32<sup>15</sup>), but is the right of God when He bears witness to His majesty or makes promises to His people (Is 43<sup>10</sup>, Dt 9<sup>23</sup>). In this weakened sense of the word the proposition believed is sometimes attached to it by the conjunction וְ (Ex 4<sup>5</sup>, Job 9<sup>16</sup>, La 4<sup>12</sup>). In its construction with the infinitive, however, its deeper meaning comes out more strongly (Jg 11<sup>20</sup>, Job 15<sup>22</sup>, Ps 27<sup>13</sup>), and the same is true when the verb is used absolutely (Ex 4<sup>31</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>, Job 29<sup>24</sup>, Hab 1<sup>5</sup>). In these constructions faith is evidently the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen.

No hiphil noun from this root occurs in OT. This circumstance need not in itself possess significance; the notions of 'faith' and 'faithfulness' lie close to one another, and are not uncommonly expressed by a single term (so πίστις, fides, faith). As a matter of fact, however, 'faith,' in its active sense, can barely be accounted an OT term. It occurs in AV of OT only twice: Dt 32<sup>20</sup> where it represents the Heb. אָמַן, and Hab 2<sup>4</sup> where it stands for the Heb. אֱמֵן; and it would seem to be really demanded in no passage but Hab 2<sup>4</sup>. The very point of this passage, however, is the sharp contrast which is drawn between arrogant self-sufficiency and faithful dependence on God. The purpose of the verse is to give a reply to the prophet's inquiry as to God's righteous dealings with the Chaldeans. Since it is by faith that the righteous man lives, the arrogant Chaldean, whose soul is puffed up and not straight within him, cannot but be destined to destruction. The whole drift of the broader context bears out this meaning; for throughout this prophecy the Chaldean is ever exhibited as the type of insolent self-assertion (1<sup>7-11-15</sup>), in contrast with which the righteous appear, certainly not as men of integrity and steadfast faithfulness, but as men who look in faith to God and trustingly depend upon His arm. The obvious reminiscence of Gn 15<sup>6</sup> throws its weight into the same scale, to which may be added the consent of the Jewish expositors of the passage. Here we have, therefore, thrown into a clear light the contrasting characteristics of the wicked, typified by the Chaldean, and of the righteous: of the one the fundamental trait is self-sufficiency; of the other, faith. This faith, which forms the distinctive feature of the righteous man, and by which he obtains life, is obviously no mere assent. It is a profound and abiding disposition, an ingrained attitude of mind and heart towards God which affects and gives character to all the activities. Here only the term occurs in OT: but on this its sole occurrence it rises to the full height of its most pregnant meaning.

The extreme rarity of the noun 'faith' in OT may prepare us to note that even the verb 'to believe' is far from common in it. In a religious application it occurs in only some thirteen OT books, and less than a score and a half times. The thing believed is sometimes a specific word or work of God (La 4<sup>12</sup>, Hab 1<sup>5</sup>), the fact of a divine revelation (Ex 4<sup>2</sup>, Job 9<sup>16</sup>), or the words or commandments of God in general (with בְּ Ps 106<sup>12</sup> 119<sup>66</sup>). In Ex 19<sup>9</sup> and 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup> God's prophets are the object of His people's confidence. God Himself is the object to which they believingly turn, or on whom they rest in assured trust, in some eleven cases. In two of these it is to Him as a faithful witness that faith believingly turns (Dt 9<sup>23</sup>, Is 43<sup>10</sup>). In the remainder of them it is upon His very person that faith rests in assured confidence (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, Ex 14<sup>31</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Jon 3<sup>5</sup>). It is in these instances, in which the construction is with  $\tau\omega$ , together with those in which the word is used absolutely (Ex 4<sup>31</sup>, Is 7<sup>9</sup> 28<sup>16</sup>, Ps 116<sup>10</sup>), to which may be added Ps 27<sup>13</sup> where it is construed with the infinitive, that the conception of religious believing comes to its rights. The typical instance is, of course, the great word of Gn 15<sup>6</sup>, 'And Abram believed in the LORD, and he counted it to him for righteousness'; in which all subsequent believers, Jewish and Christian alike, have found the primary example of faith. The object of Abram's faith, as here set forth, was not the promise which appears as the occasion of its exercise; what it rested on was God Himself, and that not merely as the giver of the promise here recorded, but as His servant's shield and exceeding great reward (16<sup>1</sup>). It is therefore not the assensive but the fiducial element of faith which is here emphasized; in a word, the faith which Abram gave J<sup>h</sup> when he 'put his trust in God' ( $\epsilon\lambda\theta\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omega \theta\epsilon\omega$ , LXX), was the same faith which later He sought in vain at the hands of His people (Nu 14<sup>11</sup>, cf. Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, 2 K 17<sup>14</sup>), and the notion of which the Psalmist explains in the parallel, 'They believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation' (Ps 78<sup>22</sup>). To believe in God, in the OT sense, is thus not merely to assent to His word, but with firm and unwavering confidence to rest in security and trustfulness upon Him.

In the Greek of the LXX  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$  takes its place as the regular rendering of  $\text{יָשָׁר}$ , and is very rarely set aside in favour of another word expressing trust (Pr 26<sup>20</sup>  $\pi\epsilon\lambda\theta\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota$ ). In a few cases, however, it is strengthened by composition with a preposition (Dt 1<sup>32</sup>, Jg 11<sup>20</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, cf. Sir 1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>10</sup> etc., 1 Mac 1<sup>30</sup> 7<sup>16</sup> etc.,  $\epsilon\mu\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ ; Mic 7<sup>5</sup>,  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu$ ); and in a few others it is construed with prepositions ( $\epsilon\nu \tau\omega$ , Jer 12<sup>5</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22</sup>, Dn 6<sup>23</sup>, 1 S 27<sup>12</sup>, 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup>, Mic 7<sup>5</sup>, Sir 35<sup>21</sup>;  $\epsilon\pi\iota \tau\omega$ , Is 28<sup>16</sup> (?), 3 Mac 27;  $\epsilon\pi\iota \tau\omega$ , Wis 12<sup>2</sup>;  $\epsilon\iota\varsigma \tau\omega$ , Sir 38<sup>31</sup>;  $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha \tau\omega$ , Job 4<sup>18</sup> 15<sup>15</sup> 24<sup>22</sup>).

It was by being thus made the vehicle for expressing the high religious faith of OT that the word was prepared for its NT use. For it had the slightest possible connexion with religious faith in classical speech. Resting ultimately on a root with the fundamental sense of 'binding,' and standing in classical Greek as the common term for 'trusting,' 'putting faith in,' 'relying upon,' shading down into 'believing,' it was rather too strong a term for ordinary use of that ungenial relation to the gods which was characteristic of Greek thought, and which was substantively expressed by  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$ —the proper acknowledgment in thought and act of their existence and rights. For this  $\nu\omicron\lambda\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\nu$  was the usual term, and the relative strength of the two terms may be observed in their use in the opening sections of Xenophon's Memorabilia (i. i. 1 and 5), where Socrates is charged with not believing in the gods whom the city owned ( $\nu\omicron\lambda\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ ), but is affirmed to have stood in a much more intimate relation to them, to have trusted in them ( $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ ). Something of the same depth of meaning may lurk in the exhortation of the Epinomis (980 C),  $\Pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\tau\alpha\iota \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \epsilon\upsilon\chi\omicron\nu$ . But ordinarily  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$  appears as the synonym of  $\nu\omicron\lambda\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\nu \tau\omicron\upsilon\varsigma \theta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ , and imports merely the denial of atheism (Plut. de Superst. ii.; Arist. Rhet. ii. 17). It was only by its adoption by the writers of the LXX to express the faith of OT that it was fitted to take its place in NT as the standing designation of the attitude of the man of faith towards God.

This service the LXX could not perform for  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$  also, owing to the almost complete absence of the noun 'faith' in the active sense from OT; but it was due to a Hellenistic development on the basis of OT religion, and certainly not without influence from Gn 15<sup>6</sup> and Hab 2<sup>4</sup> that this term, too, was prepared for NT use. In classical Greek  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$  is applied to belief in the gods chiefly as implying that such belief rests rather on trust than on sight (Plut. Mor. 756 B). Though there is no suggestion in this of weakness of conviction (for  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$  expresses a strong conviction, and is therefore used in contrast with 'impressions'), yet the word, when referring to the gods, very rarely rises above intellectual conviction into its naturally more congenial region of moral trust (Soph. Oed. Rex. 146, 147). That this, its fuller and more characteristic meaning, should come to its rights in the religious sphere, it was necessary that it should be transferred into a new religious atmosphere. The usage of Philo bears witness that it thus came to its rights on the lips of the Greek-speaking Jews. It is going too far, to be sure, to say that Philo's usage of 'faith' is scarcely distinguishable from that of NT writers. The gulf that separates the two is very wide, and has not been inaptly described by saying that with Philo, faith, as the queen of the virtues, is the righteousness of the righteous man, while with St. Paul, as the abnegation of all claim to virtue, it is the righteousness of the unrighteous. But it is of the utmost significance that, in the pages of Philo, the conception is filled with a content which far transcends any usage of the word in heathen Greek, and which is a refraction of the religious conceptions of OT. Fundamental to his idea of it as the crowning virtue of the godly man, to be attained only with the supremest difficulty, especially by creatures akin to mortal things, is his conception of it as essentially a changeless, unwavering 'standing by God' (Dt 5<sup>31</sup>),—binding us to God, to the exclusion of every other object of desire, and making us one with Him. It has lost that soteriological content which is the very heart of faith in OT; though there does not absolutely fail an occasional reference to God as Saviour, it is, with Philo, rather the Divinity,  $\tau\omicron \delta \delta\epsilon\nu$ , upon which faith rests, than the God of grace and salvation; and it therefore stands with him, not at the beginning but at the end of the religious life. But we can perceive in the usage of Philo a development on Jewish ground of a use of the word  $\pi\iota\sigma\tau\iota\varsigma$  to describe that complete detachment from earthly things, and that firm conviction of the reality and supreme significance of the things not seen, which underlies its whole NT use.

The disparity in the use of the terms 'faith' and 'believe' in the two Testaments is certainly in a formal aspect very great. In contrast with their extreme rarity in OT, they are both, though somewhat unevenly distributed and varying in relative frequency, distinctly characteristic of the whole NT language, and oddly enough occur about equally often (about 240 times each). The verb is lacking only in Col, Philem, 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, and the Apocalypse; the noun only in the Gospel of John and 2 and 3 Jn: both fail only in 2 and 3 Jn. The noun predominates not only in the epistles of St. Paul, where the proportion is about three to one, and in St. James (about five to one), but very markedly in the Epistle to the Hebrews (about sixteen to one). In St. John, on the other hand, the verb is very frequent, while the noun occurs only once in 1 Jn and four times in the Apocalypse. In the other books the proportion between the two is less noteworthy, and may fairly be accounted accidental. In OT, again, 'faith' occurs in the active sense in but a single passage; in NT it is the passive sense which is rare. In OT in only about half the instances of its occurrence is the verb 'to believe' used in a religious sense; in NT it has become so clearly a technical religious term, that it occurs very rarely in any other sense. The transitive usage, in which it expresses entrusting something to someone, occurs a few times both in the active (Lk 16<sup>11</sup>, Jn 2<sup>24</sup>) and the passive (Rev 3<sup>2</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>17</sup>, Gal 2<sup>7</sup>, 1 Th 2<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>11</sup>, Tit 1<sup>3</sup>); but besides this special case there are very few instances in which the word does not express religious believing, possibly only the following: Jn 9<sup>18</sup>, Ac 9<sup>26</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>18</sup>, Mt 24<sup>23, 26</sup>, Mk 13<sup>21</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>11</sup>, cf. Ac 13<sup>41</sup> 15<sup>11</sup>, Jn 4<sup>21</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>. The classical construction with the simple dative which prevails in the LXX retires in NT in favour of constructions with prepositions and the absolute use of the verb; the construction with the dative occurs about forty-five times, while that with prepositions occurs some sixty-three times, and the verb is used absolutely some ninety-three times.

When construed with the dative, πιστεύειν in NT preavillingly expresses believing assent, though ordinarily in a somewhat pregnant sense. When its object is a thing, it is usually the spoken (Lk 1<sup>30</sup>, Jn 4<sup>50</sup> 5<sup>37</sup> 12<sup>38</sup>, Ro 10<sup>16</sup>, cf. 2 Th 2<sup>14</sup>) or written (Jn 2<sup>22</sup> 5<sup>47</sup>, Ac 24<sup>14</sup> 26<sup>27</sup>) word of God; once it is divine works which should convince the onlooker of the divine mission of the worker (Jn 10<sup>38</sup>). When its object is a person it is rarely another than God or Jesus (Mt 21<sup>25, 32</sup>, Mk 11<sup>31</sup>, Lk 20<sup>5</sup>, Jn 5<sup>46</sup>, Ac 8<sup>12</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>1</sup>), and more rarely God (Jn 5<sup>24</sup>, Ac 16<sup>34</sup> 27<sup>25</sup>, Ro 4<sup>21</sup> 47<sup>7</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>, Tit 3<sup>8</sup>, Ja 2<sup>23</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>) than Jesus (Jn 4<sup>21</sup> 5<sup>38, 46</sup> 6<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>31, 45, 46</sup> 10<sup>37, 38</sup> 14<sup>11</sup>, Ac 17<sup>8</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup>). Among these passages there are not lacking some, both when the object is a person and when it is a thing, in which the higher sense of devoted, believing trust is conveyed. In 1 Jn 3<sup>23</sup>, for example, we are obviously to translate, not 'believe the name,' but 'believe in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ,' for in this is summed up the whole Godward side of Christian duty. So there is no reason to question that the words of Gn 15<sup>6</sup> are adduced in Ro 4<sup>2</sup>, Gal 3<sup>6</sup>, Ja 2<sup>23</sup> in the deep sense which they bear in OT text; and this deeper religious faith can scarcely be excluded from the belief in God adverted to in Ac 16<sup>34</sup>, Tit 3<sup>8</sup> (cf. Jn 5<sup>24</sup>), or from the belief in Jesus adverted to in 2 Ti 1<sup>12</sup> (cf. Jn 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>30</sup>), and is obviously the prominent conception in the faith of Crispus declared in Ac 18<sup>8</sup>. The passive form of this construction occurs only twice—once of believing assent (2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>), and once with the highest implications of confiding trust (1 Ti 3<sup>16</sup>). The few passages in which the construction is with the accusative (Jn 11<sup>38</sup>, Ac 13<sup>41</sup>, 1 Co 11<sup>18</sup> 13<sup>7</sup>, 1 Jn 4<sup>16</sup>) take their natural place along with the commoner usage with the dative, and need not express more than crediting, although over one or two of them there floats a shadow of a deeper implication. The same may be said of the cases of attraction in Ro 4<sup>7</sup> and 10<sup>14</sup>. And with these weaker constructions must be ranged also the passages, twenty in all (fourteen of which occur in the writings of St. John), in which what is believed is joined to the verb by the conjunction ὅτι. In a couple of these the matter believed scarcely rises into the religious sphere (Jn 9<sup>18</sup>, Ac 9<sup>26</sup>); in a couple more there is specific reference to prayer (Mk 11<sup>23, 24</sup>); in yet a couple more it is general faith in God which is in mind (He 11<sup>6</sup>, Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). In the rest, what is believed is of immediately soteriological import—now the possession by Jesus of a special power (Mt 9<sup>28</sup>), now the central fact of His saving work (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>), now the very hinge of the Christian hope (Ro 6<sup>8</sup>), but prevail-

ingly the divine mission and personality of Jesus Himself (Jn 6<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>27, 42</sup> 13<sup>19</sup> 14<sup>10</sup> 16<sup>27, 30</sup> 17<sup>8, 21</sup> 20<sup>31</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>1, 5</sup>). By their side we may recall also the rare construction with the infinitive (Ac 15<sup>11</sup>, Ro 14<sup>2</sup>).

When we advance to the constructions with prepositions, we enter a region in which the deeper sense of the word—that of firm, trustful reliance—comes to its full rights. The construction with ἐν, which is the most frequent of the constructions with prepositions in the LXX, retires almost out of use in NT; it occurs with certainty only in Mk 1<sup>18</sup>, where the object of faith is 'the gospel,' though Jn 3<sup>18</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13</sup> may also be instances of it, where the object would be Christ. The implication of this construction would seem to be firm fixedness of confidence in its object. Scarcely more common is the parallel construction of ἐν with the dative, expressive of steady, resting repose, reliance upon the object. Besides the quotation from Is 23<sup>16</sup>, which appears alike in Ro 9<sup>33</sup> 10<sup>11</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>, this construction occurs only twice: Lk 24<sup>25</sup>, where Jesus rebukes His followers for not 'believing on,' relying implicitly upon, all that the prophets have spoken; and 1 Ti 1<sup>16</sup>, where we are declared to 'believe on' Jesus Christ unto salvation, i.e. to obtain salvation by relying upon Him for it. The constructions with prepositions governing the accusative, which involve an implication of 'moral motion, mental direction towards,' are more frequently used. That with ἐν, indeed, occurs only seven times (four of which are in Ac). In two instances in Ro 4, where the reminiscence of the faith of Abraham gives colour to the language, the object on which faith is thus said relyingly to lay hold is God, described, however, as savingly working through Christ—as He that justifies the ungodly, He that raised Jesus our Lord from the dead. Elsewhere its object is Christ Himself. In Mt 27<sup>42</sup> the Jewish leaders declare the terms on which they will become 'believers on' Jesus; in Ac 16<sup>31</sup> this is the form that is given to the proclamation of salvation by faith in Christ—'turn with confident trust to Jesus Christ'; and appropriately, therefore, it is in this form of expression that those are designated who have savingly believed on Christ (Ac 9<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>19</sup>). The special NT construction, however, is that with εἰς, which occurs some forty-nine times, about four-fifths of which are Johannine and the remainder more or less Pauline. The object towards which faith is thus said to be reliantly directed is in one unique instance 'the witness which God hath witnessed concerning his Son' (1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>), where we may well believe that 'belief in the truth of the witness is carried on to personal belief in the object of the witness, that is, the Incarnate Son Himself.' Elsewhere the object believed on, in this construction, is always a person, and that very rarely God (Jn 14<sup>1</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>, and also 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, where, however, the true reading is probably πιστοῦς εἰς θεόν), and most commonly Christ (Mt 18<sup>6</sup>, Jn 2<sup>11</sup> 3<sup>16, 18, 36</sup> 4<sup>39</sup> 6<sup>29, 35, 40</sup> 7<sup>5, 31, 38, 39, 48</sup> 8<sup>30</sup> 9<sup>35, 38</sup> 10<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>25, 26, 45, 48</sup> 12<sup>11, 37, 42, 44, 41, 46</sup> 14<sup>1, 12</sup> 16<sup>9</sup> 17<sup>20</sup>, Ac 10<sup>43</sup> 14<sup>23</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>, Ro 10<sup>14, 15</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>8</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>10</sup>, cf. Jn 12<sup>36</sup> 1<sup>12</sup> 2<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>18</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>13</sup>). A glance over these passages will bring clearly out the pregnancy of the meaning conveyed. It may be more of a question wherein the pregnancy resides. It is probably sufficient to find it in the sense conveyed by the verb itself, while the preposition adjoins only the person towards whom the strong feeling expressed by the verb is directed. In any event, what these passages express is 'an absolute transference of trust from ourselves to another,' a complete self-surrender to Christ.

Some confirmation of this explanation of the strong meaning of the phrase πιστεύειν εἰς may be derived from the very rich use of the verb absolutely, in a sense in no way inferior. Its absolute use is pretty evenly distributed through the NT, occurring 29 times in John, 23 times in Paul, 22 times in Acts, 15 times in the Synoptics, and once each in Hebrews, James, 1 Peter, and Jude; it is placed on the lips of Jesus some 18 times. In surprisingly few of these instances it is used of a non-religious act of crediting,—apparently only in our Lord's warning to His followers not to believe when men say "Lo, here is the Christ," or "here" (Mt 24<sup>23, 26</sup>, Mk 13<sup>21</sup>). In equally surprisingly few instances is it used of specific acts of faith in the religious sphere. Once it is used of assent given to a specific doctrine—that of the unity of God (Ja 2<sup>19</sup>). Once it is used of believing prayer (Mt 21<sup>22</sup>). Four times in a single chapter of John it is used of belief in a specific fact—the great fact central to Christianity of the resurrection of Christ (Jn 20<sup>8, 25, 29, 31</sup>). It is used occasionally of belief in God's announced word (Lk 1<sup>45</sup>, Ac 2<sup>37</sup>), and occasionally also of the credit given to specific testimonies of Jesus, whether with reference to earthly or heavenly things (Jn 3<sup>12, 12, 150</sup>, Lk 22<sup>67</sup>), passing thence to general faith in the word of salvation (Lk 8<sup>12, 12</sup>). Twice it is used of general soteriological faith in God (Jude<sup>5</sup>, Ro 4<sup>18</sup>), and a few times, with the same pregnancy of implication, where the reference, whether to God or Christ, is more or less uncertain (Jn 1<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>11</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>13, 13</sup>). Ordinarily, however, it expresses soteriological faith directed to the person of Christ. In a few instances, to be sure, the immediate trust expressed is in the extraordinary power of Jesus for the performance of earthly effects (the so-called 'miracle faith'), as in Mt 8<sup>13</sup>, Mk 5<sup>36, 9, 24</sup>, Lk 8<sup>50</sup>, Jn 4<sup>48, 11, 40</sup>; but the essential relation in which this faith stands to 'saving faith' is clearly exhibited in Jn 4<sup>48</sup> compared with v.<sup>53</sup> and 9<sup>38</sup>, and Jn 11<sup>40</sup> compared with v.<sup>15</sup> and 12<sup>39</sup>; and, in any case, these passages are insignificant in number when compared with the great array in which the reference is distinctly to saving faith in Christ (Mk 9<sup>42</sup> 15<sup>32</sup> [Jn 3<sup>15</sup>], Jn 3<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>41, 42, 53</sup> 5<sup>44</sup> 6<sup>36, 47, 64</sup> 9<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>25, 26</sup> 11<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>39</sup> 14<sup>29</sup> 16<sup>31</sup> 19<sup>35</sup> 20<sup>31</sup>, Ac 2<sup>44, 45</sup> 4<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>13</sup> 11<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>12, 39, 48</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>7, 7</sup> 17<sup>12, 34</sup> 18<sup>8, 27</sup> 19<sup>2, 18</sup> 21<sup>20, 25</sup>, Ro 1<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>22</sup> 10<sup>4, 10</sup> 13<sup>11</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>21</sup> 3<sup>5</sup> 14<sup>22</sup> 15<sup>2, 11</sup>, Gal 3<sup>22</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13, 19</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>10, 13</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, He 4<sup>3</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>). A survey of these passages will show very clearly that in the NT 'to believe' is a technical term to express reliance on Christ for salvation. In a number of them, to be sure, the object of the believing spoken of is sufficiently defined by the context, but, without contextual indication of the object, enough remain to bear out this suggestion. Accordingly, a tendency is betrayed to use the simple participle very much as a verbal noun, with the meaning of 'Christian': in Mk 9<sup>42</sup>, Ac 11<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>21</sup>, Eph 1<sup>13, 19</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>7</sup> 2<sup>10, 13</sup> the participial construction is evident; it may be doubted, however, whether οι πιστεύοντες is not used as a noun in such passages as Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>32</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>10</sup>, He 4<sup>3</sup>; and in Ac 5<sup>14</sup> πιστεύοντες is perhaps generally recognized as used substantively. Before the disciples were called 'Christians' (Ac 11<sup>26</sup>, cf. 26<sup>28</sup>, 1 P 4<sup>9</sup>) it would seem, then, that they were called 'believers,'—those who had turned to Christ in trusting reliance (οι πιστεύοντες), or those who were resting on Christ in trusting reliance (οι πιστεύοντες); and that the undefined 'to believe' had come to mean to become or to be a Christian, that is, to turn to or rest on Christ in reliant trust. The occasional use of οι πιστοί in an equivalent sense (Ac 10<sup>45</sup>, Eph 1<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>3, 12</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, Rev 17<sup>14</sup>), for which the way was prepared by the comparatively frequent use of this adjective in the classically rare active sense (Jn 1<sup>27</sup>, Ac 16<sup>1</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>14</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>15</sup>, Gal 3<sup>9</sup>, 1 Ti 4<sup>10</sup> 5<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>2</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup>), adds weight to this conclusion; as do also the use of ἀπιστοί of 'unbelievers,' whether in the simple (1 Co 6<sup>6</sup> 7<sup>12-15</sup> 10<sup>27</sup> 14<sup>22-24</sup>, 1 Ti 5<sup>8</sup>) or deepened sense (2 Co 4<sup>4</sup> 6<sup>14</sup>, Tit 1<sup>15</sup>, cf. Jn 20<sup>27</sup>, Mt 17<sup>17</sup>, Mk 9<sup>18</sup>, Lk 9<sup>41</sup>), and the related usage of the words ἀπιστία (Mk 9<sup>24</sup> (16<sup>14</sup>), Mt 13<sup>58</sup>, Mk 6<sup>6</sup>, Ro 4<sup>20</sup> 11<sup>20, 23</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>13</sup>, He 3<sup>12, 19</sup>), ἀπιστέω (Mk 16<sup>11</sup> (10<sup>1</sup>), Lk 24<sup>11, 41</sup>, Ac 23<sup>24</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>7</sup>), and δωροπία (Mt 6<sup>30</sup> 8<sup>26</sup> 14<sup>31</sup> 16<sup>8</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup>), δωροπία (Mt 17<sup>20</sup>).

The impression which is thus derived from the usage of πιστεύειν is only deepened by attending to that of πίστις. As already intimated, πίστις occurs in NT very rarely in its passive sense of 'faithfulness,' 'integrity' (Ro 3<sup>3</sup> of God; Mt 23<sup>23</sup>, Gal 5<sup>22</sup>, Tit 2<sup>10</sup>, of men; cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>12</sup> 'a pledge'; Ac 17<sup>31</sup> 'assurance'; others add 1 Ti 6<sup>11</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>22</sup> 3<sup>10</sup>, Philem<sup>5</sup>). And nowhere in the multitude of its occurrences in its active sense is it applied to man's faith in man, but always to the religious trust that reposes on God, or Christ, or divine things. The specific object on which the trust rests is but seldom explicitly expressed. In some six of these instances it is a thing, but always something of the fullest soteriological significance—the gospel of Christ (Ph 1<sup>27</sup>), the saving truth of God (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>), the working of God who raised Jesus from the dead (Col 2<sup>12</sup>, cf. Ac 14<sup>9</sup> 3<sup>16</sup>), the name of Jesus (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>), the blood of Jesus (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>), the righteousness of Jesus (2 P 1<sup>4</sup>). In as many more the object is God, and the conception is prevalently that of general trust in God (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>, Ro 14<sup>22</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, He 6<sup>1</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, cf. Col 2<sup>12</sup>). In most instances, however, the object is specified as Christ, and the faith is very pointedly soteriological (Ac 20<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>24</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16, 16, 20</sup>, Ro 3<sup>22, 26</sup>, Gal 3<sup>22, 25</sup>, Eph 1<sup>15</sup> 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, Col 1<sup>4</sup> 2<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>13, 15</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>, Philem<sup>5</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, Rev 2<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>12</sup>). Its object is most frequently joined to πίστις as an objective genitive, a construction occurring some seventeen times, twelve of which fall in the writings of Paul. In four of them the genitive is that of the thing, viz. in Ph 1<sup>27</sup> the gospel, in 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> the saving truth, in Col 2<sup>12</sup> the almighty working of God, and in Ac 3<sup>16</sup> the name of Jesus. In one of them it is God (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>). The certainty that the genitive is that of object in these cases is decisive with reference to its nature in the remaining cases, in which Jesus Christ is set forth as the object on which faith rests (Ro 3<sup>22, 26</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16, 16, 20</sup> 3<sup>22</sup>, Eph 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>13</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, Ja 2<sup>1</sup>, Rev 2<sup>13</sup> 14<sup>12</sup>). Next most frequently its object is joined to faith by means of the preposition ἐν (9 times), by which it is set forth as the basis on which faith rests, or the sphere of its operation. In two of these instances the object is a thing—the blood or righteousness of Jesus (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>); in the rest it is Christ Himself who is presented as the ground of faith (Gal 3<sup>26</sup>, Eph 1<sup>15</sup>, Col 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>14</sup> 3<sup>13</sup>, 2 Ti 1<sup>13</sup> 3<sup>15</sup>). Somewhat less frequently (5 times) its object is joined to πίστις by means of the preposition εἰς, designating, apparently, merely the object with reference to which faith is exercised (cf. especially Ac 20<sup>21</sup>); the object thus specified for faith is in one instance God (1 P 1<sup>21</sup>), and in the others Christ (Ac 20<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>24</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, Col 2<sup>5</sup>). By the side of this construction should doubtless be placed the two instances in which the preposition πρός is used, by which faith is said to look and adhere to God (1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>) or to Christ (Philem<sup>5</sup>). And it is practically in the same sense that in a single instance God is joined to πίστις by means of the preposition ἐπὶ as the object to which it restingly turns. It would seem that the pregnant sense of πίστις as self-abandoning trust was so fixed in Christian speech that little was left to be expressed by the mode of its adjunction to its object.

Accordingly, the use of the word without specified object is vastly preponderant. In a few of such instances we may see a specific reference to the general confidence which informs believing prayer (Lk 18<sup>8</sup>, Ja 1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). In a somewhat greater number there is special reference to faith in Jesus as a worker of wonders—the so-called ‘miracle faith’ (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 9<sup>2, 22, 29</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> [17<sup>20</sup>] [21<sup>21</sup>], Mk 2<sup>5</sup> 4<sup>40</sup> 5<sup>34</sup> 10<sup>52</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup> 7<sup>9</sup> 8<sup>25, 48</sup> 17<sup>19</sup> 18<sup>42</sup>, Ac 3<sup>16</sup> 14<sup>9</sup>)—although how little this faith can be regarded as non-soteriological the language of Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 2<sup>5</sup>, Lk 5<sup>20</sup> shows, as well as the parallelism between Lk 7<sup>50</sup> (cf. 8<sup>48</sup> 17<sup>19</sup>) and Mt 9<sup>2</sup>, Mk 5<sup>34</sup>. The immense mass of the passages in which the undefined πίστις occurs, however, are distinctly soteriological, and that indifferently whether its implied object be God or Christ. Its implied reference is indeed often extremely difficult to fix; though the passages in which it may, with some confidence, be referred to Christ are in number about double those in which it may, with like confidence, be referred to God. The degree of clearness with which an implied object is pointed to in the context varies, naturally, very greatly; but in a number of cases there is no direct hint of object in the context, but this is left to be supplied by the general knowledge of the reader. And this is as much as to say that πίστις is so used as to imply that it had already become a Christian technical term, which needed no further definition than it might convey its full sense of saving faith in Jesus Christ to the mind of every reader. This tendency to use it as practically a synonym for ‘Christianity’ comes out sharply in such a phrase as ὁ ἐκ πίστεως (Gal 3<sup>9</sup>), which is obviously a paraphrase for ‘believers.’ A transitional form of the phrase meets us in Ro 3<sup>26</sup>, τὸν ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ; that the Ἰησοῦ could fall away and leave the simple ὁ ἐκ πίστεως standing for the whole idea, is full of implications as to the sense which the simple undefined πίστις had acquired in the circles which looked to Jesus for salvation. The same implications underlie the so-called objective use of πίστις in the NT. That in such passages as Ac 6<sup>7</sup>, Gal 1<sup>23</sup> 3<sup>3</sup> 6<sup>10</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, Jude 3<sup>20</sup> it conveys the idea of ‘the Christian religion’ appears plain on the face of the passages; and by their side can be placed such others as the following, which seem transitional to them, viz.: Ac 16<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>13</sup>, Col 1<sup>23</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>9</sup> 4<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, Tit 1<sup>13</sup>, and, at a slightly further remove, such others as Ac 13<sup>8</sup>, Ro 1<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>26</sup>, Ph 1<sup>25</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>10, 12</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>8</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>, Tit 1<sup>4</sup> 3<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 5<sup>9</sup>. It is not necessary to suppose that πίστις is used in any of these passages as doctrina fidei; it seems possible to carry through them all the conception of ‘subjective faith conceived of objectively as a power,’—even through those in Jude and 1 Timothy, which are more commonly than any others interpreted as meaning doctrina fidei. But this generally admitted objectivizing of subjective faith makes πίστις, as truly as if it were understood as doctrina fidei, on the verge of which it in any case trembles, a synonym for ‘the Christian religion.’ It is only a question whether ‘the Christian religion’ is designated in it from the side of doctrine or life; though it be from the point of view of life, still ‘the faith’ has become a synonym for ‘Christianity,’ ‘believers’ for ‘Christians,’ ‘to believe’ for ‘to become a Christian,’ and we may trace a development by means of which πίστις has come to mean the religion which is marked by and consists essentially in ‘believing.’ That this development so rapidly took place is significant of much, and supplies a ready explanation of such passages as Gal 3<sup>23, 25</sup>, in which the phrases ‘before the faith came’ and ‘now that faith is come’ probably mean little more than before and after the advent of ‘Christianity’ into the world. On the ground of such a usage, we may at least re-affirm with increased confidence that the idea of ‘faith’ is conceived of in the NT as the characteristic idea of Christianity, and that it does not import mere ‘belief’ in an intellectual sense, but all that enters into an entire self-commitment of the soul to Jesus as the Son of God, the Saviour of the world.

II. THE HISTORICAL PRESENTATION OF FAITH. —It lies on the very surface of the NT that its writers were not conscious of a chasm between the fundamental principle of the religious life of the saints of the old covenant and the faith by which they themselves lived. To them, too, Abraham is the typical example of a true believer (Ro 4, Gal 3, He 11, Ja 2); and in their apprehension ‘those who are of faith,’ that is, ‘Christians,’ are by that very fact constituted Abraham’s sons (Gal 3<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>16</sup>), and receive their blessing only along with that ‘believer’ (Gal 3<sup>9</sup>) in the steps of whose faith it is that they are walking (Ro 4<sup>12</sup>) when they believe on Him who raised Jesus our Lord from the dead (Ro 4<sup>24</sup>). And not only Abraham, but the whole series of OT heroes are conceived by them to be examples of the same faith which was required of them ‘unto the gaining of the soul’ (He 11). Wrought in them by the same Spirit (2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>), it produced in them the same fruits, and constituted them a ‘cloud of witnesses’ by whose testimony we should be stimulated to run our own race with like patience in dependence on Jesus, ‘the author and finisher of our faith’ (He 12<sup>2</sup>). Nowhere is the demand of faith treated as a novelty of the new covenant, or is there a distinction drawn between the faith of the two covenants; everywhere the sense of continuity is prominent (Jn 5<sup>24, 46</sup> 12<sup>38, 39, 44</sup> 1 P 2<sup>6</sup>), and the ‘proclamation of faith’ (Gal 3<sup>2-5</sup>, Ro 10<sup>16</sup>) is conceived as essentially one in both dispensations, under both of which the law reigns that ‘the just shall live by his faith’ (Hab 2<sup>4</sup>, Ro 1<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>11</sup>, He 10<sup>38</sup>). Nor do we need to penetrate beneath the surface of the OT to perceive the justice of this NT view. Despite the infrequency of the occurrence on its pages of the terms ‘faith,’ ‘to believe,’ the religion of the OT is obviously as fundamentally a religion of faith as is that of the NT. There is a sense, to be sure, in which all religion presupposes faith (He 11<sup>6</sup>), and in this broad sense the religion of Israel, too, necessarily rested on faith. But the religion of Israel was a religion of faith in a far more specific sense than this; and that not merely because faith was more consciously its foundation, but because its very essence consisted in faith, and this faith was the same radical self-commitment to God, not merely as the highest good of the holy soul, but as the gracious Saviour of the sinner, which meets us as the characteristic feature of the religion of the NT. Between the faith of the two Testaments there exists, indeed, no further difference than that which the progress of the historical working out of redemption brought with it.

The hinge of OT religion from the very beginning turns on the facts of man’s sin (Gn 3) and consequent unworthiness (Gn 3<sup>10</sup>), and of God’s grace (Gn 3<sup>16</sup>) and consequent saving activity (Gn 3<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>8, 13<sup>c</sup></sup>). This saving activity presents itself from the very beginning also under the form of promise or covenant, the radical idea of which is naturally faithfulness on the part of the promising God with the answering attitude of faith on the part of the receptive people. Face to face with a holy God, the sinner has no hope except in the free mercy of God, and can be authorized to trust in that mercy only by express assurance. Accordingly, the only cause of salvation is from the first the pitying love of God (Gn 3<sup>15</sup> 8<sup>21</sup>), which freely grants benefits to man; while on man’s part there is never question of merit or of a strength by which he may prevail (1 S 2<sup>9</sup>), but rather a constant sense of unworthiness (Gn 3<sup>21</sup>), by virtue of which humility appears from the first as the keynote of OT piety. In the earlier portions of the OT, to be sure, there is little abstract statement of the ideas which ruled the hearts and lives of the servants of God. The essence of patriarchal religion is rather exhibited to us in action. But from the very beginning the distinctive feature of the life of the pious is that it is a life of faith, that its regulative principle is drawn, not from the earth but from above. Thus the first recorded human acts after the Fall—the naming of Eve, and the birth and naming of Cain—are expressive of trust in God's promise that, though men should die for their sins, yet man should not perish from the earth, but should triumph over the tempter; in a word, in the great promise of the Seed (Gn 3<sup>15</sup>). Similarly, the whole story of the Flood is so ordered as to throw into relief, on the one hand, the free grace of God in His dealings with Noah (Gn 6<sup>8, 18</sup> 8<sup>1, 21</sup> 9<sup>8</sup>), and, on the other, the determination of Noah's whole life by trust in God and His promises (Gn 6<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>5</sup> 9<sup>30</sup>). The open declaration of the faith-principle of Abraham's life (Gn 15<sup>6</sup>) only puts into words, in the case of him who stands at the root of Israel's whole national and religious existence, what not only might also be said of all the patriarchs, but what actually is most distinctly said both of Abraham and of them through the medium of their recorded history. The entire patriarchal narrative is set forth with the design and effect of exhibiting the life of the servants of God as a life of faith, and it is just by the fact of their implicit self-commitment to God that throughout the narrative the servants of God are differentiated from others. This does not mean, of course, that with them faith took the place of obedience: an entire self-commitment to God which did not show itself in obedience to Him would be self-contradictory, and the testing of faith by obedience is therefore a marked feature of the patriarchal narrative. But it does mean that faith was with them the precondition of all obedience. The patriarchal religion is essentially a religion, not of law but of promise, and therefore not primarily of obedience but of trust; the holy walk is characteristic of God's servants (Gn 5<sup>22, 24</sup> 6<sup>9</sup> 17<sup>1</sup> 24<sup>40</sup> 48<sup>15</sup>), but it is characteristically described as a walk 'with God'; its peculiarity consisted precisely in the ordering of life by entire trust in God, and it expressed itself in conduct growing out of this trust (Gn 3<sup>20</sup> 4<sup>1</sup> 6<sup>22</sup> 7<sup>5</sup> 8<sup>18</sup> 12<sup>4</sup> 17<sup>23</sup> 21<sup>12, 16</sup> 22). The righteousness of the patriarchal age was thus but the manifestation in life of an entire self-commitment to God, in unwavering trust in His promises.

The piety of the OT thus began with faith. And though, when the stage of the law was reached, the emphasis might seem to be thrown rather on the obedience of faith, what has been called 'faith in action,' yet the giving of the law does not mark a fundamental change in the religion of Israel, but only a new stage in its orderly development. The law-giving was not a setting aside of the religion of promise, but an incident in its history; and the law given was not a code of jurisprudence for the world's government, but a body of household ordinances for the regulation of God's family. It is therefore itself grounded upon the promise, and it grounds the whole religious life of Israel in the grace of the covenant God (Ex 20<sup>2</sup>). It is only because Israel are the children of God, and God has sanctified them unto Himself and chosen them to be a peculiar people unto Him (Dt 14<sup>1</sup>), that He proceeds to frame them by His law for His especial treasure (Ex 19<sup>5</sup>; cf. Tit 2<sup>14</sup>). Faith, therefore, does not appear as one of the precepts of the law, nor as a virtue superior to its precepts, nor yet as a substitute for keeping them; it rather lies behind the law as its presupposition. Accordingly, in the history of the giving of the law, faith is expressly emphasized as the presupposition of the whole relation existing between Israel and J<sup>u</sup>. The signs by which Moses was accredited, and all J<sup>u</sup>'s deeds of power, had as their design (Ex 3<sup>12</sup> 4<sup>1, 5, 8, 9</sup> 19<sup>4, 9</sup>) and their effect (Ex 4<sup>31</sup> 12<sup>28, 34</sup> 14<sup>21</sup> 24<sup>7</sup>, Ps 106<sup>13</sup>) the working of faith in the people; and their subsequent unbelief is treated as the deepest crime they could commit (Nu 14<sup>11</sup>, Dt 1<sup>32</sup> 9<sup>23</sup>, Ps 78<sup>22, 32</sup> 106<sup>24</sup>), as is even momentary failure of faith on the part of their leaders (Nu 20<sup>12</sup>). It is only as a consequent of the relation of the people to Him, instituted by grace on His part and by faith on theirs, that J<sup>u</sup> proceeds to carry out His gracious purposes for them, delivering them from bondage, giving them a law for the regulation of their lives, and framing them in the promised land into a kingdom of priests and a holy nation. In other words, it is a precondition of the law that Israel's life is not of the earth, but is hid with God, and is therefore to be ordered by His precepts. Its design was, therefore, not to provide a means by which man might come into relation with J<sup>u</sup>, but to publish the mode of life incumbent on those who stand in the relation of children to J<sup>u</sup>; and it is therefore that the book of the law was commanded to be put by the side of the ark of the covenant of the LORD, that it might be a witness against the transgressions of Israel (Dt 31<sup>26</sup>).

The effect of the law was consonant with its design. Many, no doubt, looked upon it in a purely legalistic spirit, and sought, by scrupulous fulfilment of it as a body of external precepts, to lay the foundation of a claim on God in behalf of the nation or the individual, or to realize through it, as a present possession, that salvation which was ever represented as something future. But, just in proportion as its spirituality and inwardness were felt, it operated to deepen in Israel the sense of shortcoming and sin, and to sharpen the conviction that from the grace of God alone could salvation be expected. This humble frame of conscious dependence on God was met by a twofold proclamation. On the one hand, the eyes of God's people were directed more longingly towards the future, and, in contrast with the present failure of Israel to realize the ordinances of life which had been given it, a new dispensation of grace was promised in which the law of God's kingdom should be written upon the heart, and should become therefore the instinctive law of life of His people (Jer 31<sup>31, 34</sup>, Ezk 36<sup>26, 27</sup>; cf. Ezk 16<sup>60</sup>, Jl 3, Hos 2<sup>6</sup>). It lay in the very nature of the OT dispensation, in which the revelation of God was always incomplete, the still unsolved enigmas of life numerous, the work of redemption unfinished, and the consummation of the kingdom ever yet to come, that the eyes of the saints should be set upon the future; and these deficiencies were felt very early. But it also lay, in the nature of the case, that the sense of them should increase as time passed and the perfecting of Israel was delayed, and especially as the whole national and religious existence of Israel was more and more put in jeopardy by assaults from without and corruption from within. The essence of piety came thus to be ever more plainly proclaimed as consisting in such a confident trust in the God of salvation as could not be confounded either by the unrighteousness which reigned in Israel or by J<sup>u</sup>'s judgments on Israel's sins,—such a confidence as, even in the face of the destruction of the theocracy itself, could preserve, in enduring hope, the assurance of the ultimate realization of God's purposes of good to Israel and the establishment of the everlasting kingdom. Thus hopeful waiting upon J<sup>u</sup> became more and more the centre of Israelitish piety, and J<sup>o</sup> became before all 'the Hope of Israel' (Jer 14<sup>3</sup> 17<sup>13</sup> 50<sup>7</sup>, cf. Ps 71<sup>5</sup>). On the other hand, while thus waiting for the salvation of Israel, the saint must needs stay himself on God (Is 26<sup>3</sup> 50<sup>10</sup>), fixing his heart on J<sup>o</sup> as the Rock of the heart (Ps 73<sup>26</sup>), His people's strength (Ps 46<sup>1</sup>) and trust (Ps 40<sup>4</sup> 65<sup>5</sup> 71<sup>5</sup>, Jer 17<sup>7</sup>). Freed from all illusion of earthly help, and most of all from all self-confidence, he is meanwhile to live by faith (Hab 2<sup>4</sup>). Thus, along with an ever more richly expressed corporate hope, there is found also an ever more richly expressed individual trust, which finds natural utterance through an ample body of synonyms bringing out severally the various sides of that perfect commitment to God that constitutes the essence of faith. Thus we read much of trusting in, on, to God, or in His word, His name, His mercy, His salvation (הַיְשׁוּעָה), of seeking and finding refuge in God or in the shadow of His wings (הַקָּנָה), of committing ourselves to God (הַלָּקָה), setting confidence (הַבְטָחָה) in Him, looking to Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), relying upon Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), staying upon Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), setting or fixing the heart upon Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), binding our love on Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), cleaving to Him (הַיְשָׁרָה). So, on the hopeful side of faith, we read much of hoping in God (הַיְשָׁרָה), waiting on God (הַיְשָׁרָה), of longing for Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), patiently waiting for Him (הַיְשָׁרָה), and the like.

By the aid of such expressions, it becomes possible to form a somewhat clear notion of the attitude towards Him which was required by J<sup>o</sup> of His believing people, and which is summed up in the term faith. It is a reverential (Ex 14<sup>3</sup>, Nu 14<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>12</sup>) and loving faith, which rests on the strong basis of firm and unshaken conviction of the might and grace of the covenant God and of the trustworthiness of all His words, and exhibits itself in confident trust in J<sup>o</sup> and unwavering expectation of the fulfilment of, no doubt, all His promises, but more especially of His promise of salvation, and in consequent faithful and exclusive adherence to Him. In one word, it consists in an utter commitment of oneself to J<sup>o</sup>, with confident trust in Him as guide and saviour, and assured expectation of His promised salvation. It therefore stands in contrast, on the one hand, with trust in self or other human help, and on the other with doubt and unbelief, despondency and unfaithfulness. From J<sup>o</sup> alone is salvation to be looked for, and it comes from His free grace alone (Dt 7<sup>8</sup> 78<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>5</sup>, Am 3<sup>2</sup>, Hos 13<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>6</sup>, Jer 39<sup>18</sup>, Mal 1<sup>3</sup>), and to those only who look solely to Him for it (Is 31<sup>1</sup> 57<sup>13</sup> 23<sup>16</sup> 30<sup>15</sup>, Jer 17<sup>7</sup> 39<sup>18</sup>, Ps 118<sup>8</sup> 146<sup>3</sup> 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 S 17<sup>45</sup>, Ps 28<sup>25</sup> 11<sup>28</sup>, Job 22<sup>23</sup> 24 31<sup>24</sup>, Ps 52<sup>9</sup>). The reference of faith is accordingly in the OT always distinctly soteriological; its end the Messianic salvation; and its essence a trusting, or rather an entrusting of oneself to the God of salvation, with full assurance of the fulfilment of His gracious purposes and the ultimate realization of His promise of salvation for the people and the individual. Such an attitude towards the God of salvation is identical with the faith of the NT, and is not essentially changed by the fuller revelation of God the Redeemer in the person of the promised Messiah. That it is comparatively seldom designated in the OT by the names of 'faith,' 'believing,' seems to be due, as has been often pointed out, to the special place of the OT in the history of revelation, and the adaptation of its whole contents and language to the particular task in the establishment of the kingdom of God which fell to its writers. This task turned on the special temptations and difficulties of the OT stage of development, and required emphasis to be laid on the majesty and jealousy of J<sup>o</sup> and on the duties of reverence, sincerity, and patience. Meanwhile, the faith in Him which underlies these duties is continually implied in their enforcement, and comes to open expression in frequent paraphrase and synonym, and as often in its own proper terms as is natural in the circumstances. Especially in the great crises of the history of redemption (Gn 15, Ex 4<sup>5</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>, Is 7) is the fundamental requirement of faith rendered explicit and prominent.

On the coming of God to His people in the person of His Son, the promised Messianic King, bringing the salvation, the hope of which had for so many ages been their support and stay, it naturally became the primary task of the vehicles of revelation to attract and attach God's people to the person of their Redeemer. And this task was the more pressing in proportion as the form of the fulfilment did not obviously correspond with the promise, and especially with the expectations which had grown up on the faith of the promise. This fundamental function dominates the whole NT, and accounts at once for the great prominence in its pages of the demand for faith, by which a gulf seems to be opened between it and the OT. The demand for faith in Jesus as the Redeemer so long hoped for, did indeed create so wide a cleft in the consciousness of the times that the term faith came rapidly to be appropriated to Christianity and 'to believe' to mean to become a Christian; so that the old covenant and the new were discriminated from each other as the ages before and after the 'coming of faith' (Gal 3<sup>23</sup> 25). But all this does not imply that faith now for the first time became the foundation of the religion of J<sup>o</sup>, but only suggests how fully, in the new circumstances induced by the coming of the promised Redeemer, the demand for faith absorbed the whole proclamation of the gospel. In this primary concern for faith the NT books all necessarily share; but, for the rest, they differ among themselves in the prominence given to it and in the aspects in which it is presented, in accordance with the place of each in the historical development of the new life; and that is as much as to say in accordance with the historical occasion out of which each arose and the special object to subserve which each was written.

Indeed, the word 'to believe' first appears on the pages of the NT in quite OT conditions. We are conscious of no distinction even in atmosphere between the commendation of faith and rebuke of unbelief in Exodus or the Psalms and the same commendation and rebuke in the days just before the 'coming of faith' (Lk 12<sup>45</sup>); these are but specific applications of the thesis of prophetism, expressed positively in 2 Ch 20<sup>20</sup> and negatively in Is 7<sup>9</sup>. Already, however, the dawn of the new day has coloured the proclamation of the Baptist, the essence of which Paul sums up for us as a demand for faith in the Coming One (Ac 19<sup>4</sup>), and which John reports to us (Jn 3<sup>36</sup>). In the synoptic report of the teaching of Jesus, the same purpose is the dominant note. All that Jesus did and taught was directed to drawing faith to Himself. Up to the end, indeed, He repelled the unbelieving demand that He should 'declare plainly' the authority by which He acted and who He really was (Mt 21<sup>23</sup>, Lk 22<sup>67</sup>); but this was only that He might, in His own way, the more decidedly confound unbelief and assert His divine majesty. Even when He spoke of general faith in God (Mk 11<sup>22</sup>), and that confident trust which becomes men approaching the Almighty in prayer (Mt 21<sup>22</sup> || Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, Lk 18<sup>8</sup>), He did it in a way which inevitably directed attention to His own person as the representative of God on earth. And this accounts for the prevalence, in the synoptic report of His allusions to faith, of a reference to that exercise of faith which has sometimes been somewhat sharply divided from saving faith under the name of 'miracle faith' (Mt 8<sup>10</sup> 13 || Lk 7<sup>9</sup>; Mt 9<sup>2</sup>; Mt

92<sup>22</sup> || Mk 5<sup>34</sup>, Lk 8<sup>48</sup>; Mt 9<sup>28, 29</sup>; Mt 15<sup>21</sup>; Mt 17<sup>20</sup> || Mk 9<sup>30</sup>; Mt 21<sup>21, 22</sup>, cf. Lk 17<sup>6</sup>; Mk 4<sup>40</sup>; Mk 5<sup>36</sup> || Lk 8<sup>90</sup>; Mk 10<sup>52</sup> || Lk 18<sup>42</sup>; Lk 7<sup>19</sup>). That in these instances we have not a generically distinct order of faith, directed to its own peculiar end, but only a specific movement of that entire trust in Himself which Jesus would arouse in all, seems clear from the manner in which He dealt with it,—now praising its exercise as a specially great exhibition of faith quite generally spoken of (Lk 7<sup>9</sup>), now pointing to it as a manifestation of that believing to which 'all things are possible' (Mk 9<sup>23</sup>), now connecting with it not merely the healing of the body but the forgiveness of sins (Mt 9<sup>2</sup>), and everywhere using it as a means of attaching the confidence of men to His person as the source of all good. Having come to His own, in other words, Jesus took men upon the plane on which He found them, and sought to lead them through the needs which they felt, and the relief of which they sought in Him, up to a recognition of their greater needs and of His ability to give relief to them also. That word of power, 'Thy faith hath saved thee,' spoken indifferently of bodily wants and of the deeper needs of the soul (Lk 7<sup>50</sup>), not only resulted, but was intended to result, in focusing all eyes on Himself as the one physician of both body and soul (Mt 8<sup>17</sup>). Explicit references to these higher results of faith are, to be sure, not very frequent in the synoptic discourses, but there are quite enough of them to exhibit Jesus' specific claim to be the proper object of faith for these effects also (Lk 8<sup>12, 13</sup> 22<sup>32</sup>, Mt 18<sup>6</sup> || Mk 9<sup>42</sup>, Lk 7<sup>50</sup>), and to prepare the way for His rebuke, after His resurrection, of the lagging minds of His followers, that they did not understand all these things (Lk 24<sup>25-45</sup>), and for His great commission to Paul to go and open men's eyes that they might receive 'remission of sins and an inheritance among the sanctified by faith in Him' (Ac 26<sup>18</sup>).

It is very natural that a much fuller account of Jesus' teaching as to faith should be given in the more intimate discourses which are preserved by John. But in these discourses, too, His primary task is to bind men to Him by faith. The chief difference is that here, consonantly with the nature of the discourses recorded, much more prevailing stress is laid upon the higher aspects of faith, and we see Jesus striving specially to attract to Himself a faith consciously set upon eternal good. In a number of instances we find ourselves in much the same atmosphere as in the Synoptics (4<sup>21</sup> sq., 48 sq., 9<sup>35</sup>); and the method of Jesus is the same throughout. Everywhere He offers Himself as the object of faith, and claims faith in Himself for the highest concerns of the soul. But everywhere He begins at the level at which He finds His hearers, and leads them upward to these higher things. It is so that He deals with Nathanael (15<sup>1</sup>) and Nicodemus (3<sup>12</sup>); and it is so that He deals constantly with the Jews, everywhere requiring faith in Himself for eternal life (5<sup>24, 25, 38</sup> 6<sup>35, 40, 47</sup> 7<sup>38</sup> 8<sup>24</sup> 10<sup>25, 36</sup> 12<sup>44, 46</sup>), declaring that faith in Him is the certain outcome of faith in their own Scriptures (5<sup>46, 47</sup>), is demanded by the witness borne Him by God in His mighty works (10<sup>25, 36, 37</sup>), is involved in and is indeed identical with faith in God (5<sup>25, 38</sup> 6<sup>40, 45</sup> 8<sup>47</sup> 12<sup>44</sup>), and is the one thing which God requires of them (6<sup>29</sup>), and the failure of which will bring them eternal ruin (3<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>38</sup> 6<sup>64</sup> 8<sup>34</sup>). When dealing with His followers, His primary care was to build up their faith in Him. Witness especially His solicitude for their faith in the last hours of His intercourse with them. For the faith they had reposed in Him He returns thanks to God (17<sup>8</sup>), but He is still nursing their faith (16<sup>31</sup>), preparing for its increase through the events to come (13<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>29</sup>), and with almost passionate eagerness claiming it at their hands (14<sup>1, 10, 11, 12</sup>).

Even after His resurrection we find Him restoring the faith of the waverer (20<sup>29</sup>) with words which pronounce a special blessing on those who should hereafter believe on less compelling evidence—words whose point is not fully caught until we realize that they contain an intimation of the work of the apostles as, like His own, summed up in bringing men to faith in Him (17<sup>20, 21</sup>).

The record in Ac of the apostolic proclamation testifies to the faithfulness with which this office was prosecuted by Jesus' delegates (Ac 3<sup>22, 23</sup>). The task undertaken by them was, by persuading men (Ac 17<sup>4</sup> 28<sup>24</sup>), to bring them unto obedience to the faith that is in Jesus (Ac 6<sup>7</sup>, Ro 1<sup>5</sup> 16<sup>26</sup>, cf. 2 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, 2 Co 10<sup>5</sup>). And by such 'testifying faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ' (Ac 20<sup>21</sup>, cf. 10<sup>43</sup>) there was quickly gathered together a community of 'believers' (Ac 2<sup>44</sup> 4<sup>4, 32</sup>), that is, of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ (Ac 5<sup>14</sup> 9<sup>42</sup> 11<sup>17</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>), and that not only in Jerus. but beyond (8<sup>12</sup> 9<sup>42</sup> 10<sup>45</sup> 11<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>48</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>), and not only of Jews (10<sup>45</sup> 15<sup>1</sup> 21<sup>20</sup>) but of Gentiles (11<sup>21</sup> 13<sup>48</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> 15<sup>7</sup> 17<sup>12, 34</sup> 18<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>18</sup> 21<sup>26</sup>). The enucleation of this community of believers brought to the apostolic teachers the new task of preserving the idea of faith, which was the formative principle of the new community, and to propagate which in the world, pure and living and sound, was its chief office. It was inevitable that those who were called into the faith of Christ should bring into the infant Church with them many old tendencies of thinking, and that within the new community the fermentation of ideas should be very great. The task of instructing and disciplining the new community soon became unavoidably one of the heaviest of apostolic duties; and its progress is naturally reflected in their letters. Thus certain differences in their modes of dealing with faith emerge among NT writers, according as one lays stress on the deadness and profitlessness of a faith which produces no fruit in the life, and another on the valuelessness of a faith which does not emancipate from the bondage of the law; or as one lays stress on the perfection of the object of faith and the necessity of keeping the heart set upon it, and another on the necessity of preserving in its purity that subjective attitude towards the unseen and future which constitutes the very essence of faith; or as one lays stress on the reaching out of faith to the future in confident hope, and another on the present enjoyment by faith of all the blessings of salvation.

It was to James that it fell to rebuke the Jewish tendency to conceive of the faith which was pleasing to J<sup>h</sup> as a mere intellectual acquiescence in His being and claims, when imported into the Church and made to do duty as 'the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Glory' (2<sup>1</sup>). He has sometimes been misread as if he were depreciating faith, or at least the place of faith in salvation. But it is perfectly clear that with James, as truly as with any other NT writer, a sound faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as the manifested God (2<sup>1</sup>) lies at the very basis of the Christian life (1<sup>3</sup>), and is the condition of all acceptable approach to God (1<sup>6</sup> 5<sup>15</sup>). It is not faith as he conceives it which he depreciates, but that professed faith (ἡ πίστις, 2<sup>14</sup>) which cannot be shown to be real by appropriate works (2<sup>18</sup>), and so differs by a whole diameter alike from the faith of Abraham that was reckoned unto him for righteousness (2<sup>23</sup>), and from the faith of Christians as James understood it (2<sup>1</sup> 1<sup>3</sup>, cf. 1<sup>22</sup>). The impression which is easily taken from the last half of the second chapter of James, that his teaching and that of Paul stand in some polemic relation, is nevertheless a delusion, and arises from an insufficient realization of the place occupied by faith in the discussions of the Jewish schools, reflections of which have naturally found their way into the language of both Paul and James. And so far are we from needing to suppose some reference, direct or indirect, to Pauline teaching to account for James' entrance upon the question which he discusses, that this was a matter upon which an earnest teacher could not fail to touch in the presence of a tendency common among the Jews at the advent of Christianity (cf. Mt 3<sup>9</sup> 7<sup>21</sup> 23<sup>3</sup>, Ro 2<sup>17</sup>), and certain to pass over into Jewish-Christian circles: and James' treatment of it finds, indeed, its entire presupposition in the state of things underlying the exhortation of 1<sup>22</sup>. When read from his own historical standpoint, James' teachings are free from any discord with those of Paul, who as strongly as James denies all value to a faith which does not work by love (Gal 5<sup>6</sup>, 1 Co 13<sup>2</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). In short, James is not depreciating faith: with him, too, it is faith that is reckoned unto righteousness (2<sup>23</sup>), though only such a faith as shows itself in works can be so reckoned, because a faith which does not come to fruition in works is dead, non-existent. He is rather deepening the idea of faith, and insisting that it includes in its very conception something more than an otiose intellectual assent.

It was a far more serious task which was laid upon Paul. As apostle to the Gentiles he was called upon to make good in all its depth of meaning the fundamental principle of the religion of grace, that the righteous shall live by faith, as over-against what had come to be the ingrained legalism of Jewish thought now intruded into the Christian Church. It was not, indeed, doubted that faith was requisite for obtaining salvation. But he that had been born a Jew and was conscious of the privileges of the children of the promise, found it hard to think that faith was all that was requisite. What, then, was the advantage of the Jew? In defence of the rights of the Gentiles, Paul was forced in the most uncompromising way to validate the great proposition that, in the matter of salvation, there is no distinction between Jew and Gentile,—that the Jew has no other righteousness than that which comes through faith in Jesus Christ (Gal 2<sup>15-16</sup>), and that the Gentile fully possesses this righteousness from faith alone (Gal 3<sup>7-8</sup>); in a word, that the one God, who is God of the Gentiles also, 'shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith' (Ro 3<sup>30</sup>). Thus was it made clear not only that 'no man is justified by the law' (Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>11</sup>, Ro 3<sup>20</sup>), but also that a man is justified by faith apart from law-works (Ro 3<sup>28</sup>). The splendid vigour and thoroughness of Paul's dialectic development of the absolute contrast between the ideas of faith and works, by virtue of which one peremptorily excludes the other, left no hiding-place for a work-righteousness of any kind or degree, but cast all men solely upon the righteousness of God, which is apart from the law and comes through faith unto all that believe (Ro 3<sup>21-22</sup>). Thus, in vindicating the place of faith as the only instrument of salvation, Paul necessarily dwelt much upon the object of faith, not as if he were formally teaching what the object is on which faith savingly lays hold, but as a natural result of his effort to show from its object the all-sufficiency of faith. It is because faith lays hold of Jesus Christ, who was delivered up for our trespasses and was raised for our justification (Ro 4<sup>25</sup>), and makes us possessors of the righteousness provided by God through Him, that there is no room for any righteousness of our own in the ground of our salvation (Ro 10<sup>3</sup>, Eph 2<sup>8</sup>). This is the reason of that full development of the object of faith in Paul's writings, and especially of the specific connexion between faith and the righteousness of God proclaimed in Christ, by which the doctrine of Paul is sometimes said to be distinguished from the more general conception of faith which is characteristic of the Epistle to the Hebrews. This more general conception of faith is not, however, the peculiar property of that epistle, but is the fundamental conception of the whole body of biblical writers in OT and in NT (cf. Mt 6<sup>35</sup> 16<sup>23</sup>, Jn 20<sup>29-31</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>3</sup>), including Paul himself (2 Co 4<sup>18</sup> 5<sup>7</sup>, Ro 4<sup>16-22</sup> 8<sup>24</sup>): while, on the other hand, the Epistle to the Hebrews, no less than Paul, teaches that there is no righteousness except through faith (10<sup>38</sup> 11<sup>7</sup>, cf. 11<sup>4</sup>).

That in the Epistle to the Hebrews it is the general idea of faith, or, to be more exact, the subjective nature of faith, that is dwelt upon, rather than its specific object, is not due to a peculiar conception of what faith lays hold upon, but to the particular task which fell to its writer in the work of planting Christianity in the world. With him, too, the person and work of Christ are the specific object of faith (13<sup>7-8</sup> 3<sup>14</sup> 10<sup>22</sup>). But the danger against which, in the providence of God, he was called upon to guard the infant flock, was not that it should fall away from faith to works, but that it should fall away from faith into despair. His readers were threatened not with legalism but with 'shrinking back' (10<sup>39</sup>), and he needed, therefore, to emphasize not so much the object of faith as the duty of faith. Accordingly, it is not so much on the righteousness of faith as on its perfecting that he insists; it is not so much its contrast with works as its contrast with impatience that he impresses on his readers' consciences; it is not so much to faith specifically in Christ and in Him alone that he exhorts them as to an attitude of faith—an attitude which could rise above the seen to the unseen, the present to the future, the temporal to the eternal, and which in the midst of sufferings could retain patience, in the midst of disappointments could preserve hope. This is the key to the whole treatment of faith in the Epistle to the Hebrews—its definition as the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen (11<sup>1</sup>); its illustration and enforcement by the example of the heroes of faith in the past, a list chosen and treated with the utmost skill for the end in view (11); its constant attachment to the promises (4<sup>1-2</sup> 6<sup>12</sup> 10<sup>36-38</sup> 11<sup>9</sup> 13<sup>39</sup>); its connexion with the faithfulness (11<sup>11</sup>, cf. 10<sup>23</sup>), almightiness (11<sup>19</sup>), and the rewards of God (11<sup>6-26</sup>); and its association with such virtues as boldness (3<sup>6</sup> 4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19-35</sup>), confidence (3<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>1</sup>), patience (10<sup>36</sup> 12<sup>1</sup>), hope (3<sup>6</sup> 6<sup>11-18</sup> 10<sup>23</sup>).

With much that is similar to the situation implied in Hebrews, that which underlies the Epistles of Peter differs from it in the essential particular that their prevailingly Gentile readers were not in imminent danger of falling back into Judaism. There is, accordingly, much in the aspect in which faith is presented in these epistles which reminds us of what we find in Hebrews, as, for example, the close connexion into which it is brought with obedience (1 P 1<sup>2-22</sup> 2<sup>7</sup> 3<sup>4-17</sup>), its prevailing reference to what is unseen and future (1 P 1<sup>5-7-10-21</sup>), and its consequent demand for steadfastness (5<sup>9</sup>, cf. 1<sup>7</sup>), and especially for hope (1<sup>21</sup>, cf. 1<sup>3-13</sup> 3<sup>5-15</sup>). Yet there is a noteworthy difference in the whole tone of the commendation of faith, which was rooted, no doubt, in the character of Peter, as the tone of his speeches recorded in Acts shows, but which also grew out of the nature of the task set before him in these letters. There is no hint of despair lying in the near background, but the buoyancy of assured hope rings throughout these epistles. Having hearkened to the prophet like unto Moses (Dt 18<sup>15, 19</sup>, Ac 3<sup>22, 23</sup>), Christians are the children of obedience (1 P 1<sup>14</sup>), and through their precious faith (1 P 1<sup>7</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>4</sup>) possessors of the preciousness of the promises (1 P 2<sup>7</sup>). As they have obeyed the voice of God and kept His covenant, they have become His peculiar treasure, a kingdom of priests and a holy nation (Ex 19<sup>5</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>9</sup>). Naturally, the duty rests upon them of living, while here below, in accordance with their high hopes (1 P 1<sup>13</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>). But in any event they are but sojourners and pilgrims here (1 P 2<sup>11</sup> 1<sup>17</sup>), and have a sure inheritance reserved for them in heaven (1<sup>4</sup>), unto which they are guarded through faith by the power of God (1<sup>5</sup>). The reference of faith in Peter is therefore characteristically to the completion rather than to the inception of salvation (1<sup>5-9</sup> 2<sup>6</sup>, cf. Ac 15<sup>11</sup>). Of course this does not imply that he does not share the common biblical conception of faith: he is conscious of no difference of view from that of OT (1 P 2<sup>6</sup>); and, no less than with James, with him faith is the fountain of all good works (1 P 1<sup>7-21</sup> 5<sup>9</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>5</sup>); and, no less than with Paul, with him faith lays hold of the righteousness of Christ (2 P 1<sup>4</sup>). It only means that in the circumstances of his writing he is led to lay special emphasis on the reference of faith to the consummated salvation, in order to quicken in his readers that hope which would sustain them in their persecutions, and to keep their eyes set, not on their present trials, but, in accordance with faith's very nature, on the unseen and eternal glory.

In the entirely different circumstances in which he wrote, John wished to lay stress on the very opposite aspect of faith. For what is characteristic of John's treatment of faith is insistence not so much on the certainty and glory of the future inheritance which it secures, as on the fulness of the present enjoyment of salvation which it brings. There was pressing into the Church a false emphasis on knowledge, which affected to despise simple faith. This John met, on the one hand, by deepening the idea of knowledge to the knowledge of experience, and, on the other, by insisting upon the immediate entrance of every believer into the possession of salvation. It is not to be supposed, of course, that he was ready to neglect or deny that out-reaching of faith to the future on which Peter lays such stress: he is zealous that Christians shall know that they are children of God from the moment of believing, and from that instant possessors of the new life of the Spirit; but he does not forget the greater glory of the future, and he knows how to use this Christian hope also as an incitement to holy living (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>). Nor are we to suppose that, in his anti-Gnostic insistence on the element of conviction in faith, he would lose sight of that central element of surrendering trust which is the heart of faith in other portions of the Scriptures: he would indeed have believers know what they believe, and who He is in whom they put their trust, and what He has done for them, and is doing, and will do, in and through them; but this is not that they may know these things simply as intellectual propositions, but that they may rest on them in faith and know them in personal experience. Least of all the NT writers could John confine faith to a merely intellectual act: his whole doctrine of faith is rather a protest against the intellectualism of Gnosticism. His fundamental conception of faith differs in nothing from that of the other NT writers; with him, too, it is a trustful appropriation of Christ and surrender of self to His salvation. Eternal life has been manifested by Christ (Jn 1<sup>4</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>2</sup> 5<sup>11</sup>), and he, and he only, who has the Son has the life (1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>). But in the conflict in which he was engaged he required to throw the strongest emphasis possible upon the immediate entrance of believers into this life. This insistence had manifold applications to the circumstances of his readers. It had, for example, a negative application to the antinomian tendency of Gnostic teaching, which John does not fail to press (1 Jn 1<sup>5</sup> 2<sup>4, 15</sup> 3<sup>6</sup>): 'whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God' (1 Jn 5<sup>1</sup>), and 'whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin' (1 Jn 3<sup>9</sup>). It had also a positive application to their own encouragement: the simple believer was placed on a plane of life to which no knowledge could attain; the new life received by faith gave the victory over the world; and John boldly challenges experience to point to any who have overcome the world but he that believes that Jesus is the Son of God (1 Jn 5<sup>4, 5</sup>). Accordingly, it is characteristic of John to announce that 'he that believeth hath eternal life' (Jn 3<sup>36</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 6<sup>47, 54</sup>, 1 Jn 3<sup>14, 15</sup> 5<sup>11, 12, 13</sup>). He even declares the purpose of his writing to be, in the Gospel, that his readers 'may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, they may have life in his name' (20<sup>31</sup>); and in the First Epistle, that they that believe in the name of the Son of God 'may know that they have eternal life' (1 Jn 5<sup>13</sup>).

III. THE BIBLICAL CONCEPTION OF FAITH.—By means of the providentially mediated diversity of emphasis of the NT writers on the several aspects of faith, the outlines of the biblical conception of faith are thrown into very high relief.

Of its subjective nature we have what is almost a formal definition in the description of it as an 'assurance of things hoped for, a conviction of things not seen' (He 11<sup>1</sup>). It obviously contains in it, therefore, an element of knowledge (He 11<sup>6</sup>), and it as obviously issues in conduct (He 11<sup>8</sup>, cf. 5<sup>9</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>22</sup>). But it consists neither in assent nor in obedience, but in a reliant trust in the invisible Author of all good (He 11<sup>27</sup>), in which the mind is set upon the things that are above and not on the things that are upon the earth (Col 3<sup>2</sup>, cf. 2 Co 4<sup>16-18</sup>, Mt 6<sup>25</sup> 16<sup>33</sup>). The examples cited in He 11 are themselves enough to show that the faith there commended is not a mere belief in God's existence and justice and goodness, or crediting of His word and promises, but a practical counting of Him faithful (11<sup>11</sup>), with a trust so profound that no trial can shake it (11<sup>35</sup>), and so absolute that it survives the loss of even its own pledge (11<sup>17</sup>). So little is faith in its biblical conception merely a conviction of the understanding, that, when that is called faith, the true idea of faith needs to be built up above this word (Ja 2<sup>14ff</sup>). It is a movement of the whole inner man (Ro 10<sup>9-10</sup>), and is set in contrast with an unbelief that is akin, not to ignorance but to disobedience (He 3<sup>18, 19</sup>, Jn 3<sup>36</sup>, Ro 11<sup>20, 30</sup> 15<sup>31</sup>, 1 Th 1<sup>8</sup>, He 4<sup>6, 2</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>7, 8</sup> 3<sup>1, 20</sup> 4<sup>18</sup>, Ac 14<sup>2, 1</sup> 19<sup>9</sup>), and that grows out of, not lack of information, but that aversion of the heart from God (He 3<sup>12</sup>) which takes pleasure in unrighteousness (2 Th 2<sup>12</sup>), and is so unsparingly exposed by our Lord (Jn 3<sup>19</sup> 5<sup>14</sup> 8<sup>47</sup> 10<sup>26</sup>). In the breadth of its idea, it is thus the going out of the heart from itself and its resting on God in confident trust for all good. But the scriptural revelation has to do with, and is directed to the needs of, not man in the abstract, but sinful man; and for sinful man this hearty reliance on God necessarily becomes humble trust in Him for the fundamental need of the sinner—forgiveness of sins and reception into favour. In response to the revelations of His grace and the provisions of His mercy, it commits itself without reserve and with abnegation of all self-dependence, to Him as its sole and sufficient Saviour, and thus, in one act, empties itself of all claim on God and casts itself upon His grace alone for salvation.

It is, accordingly, solely from its object that faith derives its value. This object is uniformly the God of grace, whether conceived of broadly as the source of all life, light, and blessing, on whom man in his creaturely weakness is entirely dependent, or, whenever sin and the eternal welfare of the soul are in view, as the Author of salvation in whom alone the hope of unworthy man can be placed. This one object of saving faith never varies from the beginning to the end of the scriptural revelation; though, naturally, there is an immense difference between its earlier and later stages in fullness of knowledge as to the nature of the redemptive work by which the salvation intrusted to God shall be accomplished; and as naturally there occurs a very great variety of forms of statement in which trust in the God of salvation receives expression. Already, however, at the gate of Eden, the God in whom the trust of our first parents is reposed is the God of the gracious promise of the retrieval of the injury inflicted by the serpent; and from that beginning of knowledge the progress is steady, until, what is implied in the primal promise having become express in the accomplished work of redemption, the trust of sinners is explicitly placed in the God who was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself (2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>). Such a faith, again, could not fail to embrace with humble confidence all the gracious promises of the God of salvation, from which indeed it draws its life and strength; nor could it fail to lay hold with strong conviction on all those revealed truths concerning Him which constitute, indeed, in the varied circumstances in which it has been called upon to persist throughout the ages, the very grounds in view of which it has been able to rest upon Him with steadfast trust. These truths, in which the 'Gospel' or glad-tidings to God's people has been from time to time embodied, run all the way from such simple facts as that it was the very God of their fathers that had appeared unto Moses for their deliverance (Ex 4<sup>8</sup>), to such stupendous facts, lying at the root of the very work of salvation itself, as that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God sent of God to save the world (Jn 6<sup>39</sup> 5<sup>24</sup> 11<sup>21</sup>, 42 13<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>37</sup>, 30 17<sup>8</sup>, 21 20<sup>31</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>15</sup>), that God has raised Him from the dead (Ro 10<sup>9</sup>, 1 Th 4<sup>14</sup>), and that as His children we shall live with Him (Ro 6<sup>8</sup>). But in believing this variously presented Gospel, faith has ever terminated with trustful reliance, not on the promise but on the Promiser,—not on the propositions which declare God's grace and willingness to save, or Christ's divine nature and power, or the reality and perfection of His saving work, but on the Saviour upon whom, because of these great facts, it could securely rest as on One able to save to the uttermost. Jesus Christ, God the Redeemer, is accordingly the one object of saving faith, presented to its embrace at first implicitly and in promise, and ever more and more openly until at last it is entirely explicit and we read that 'a man is not justified save through faith in Jesus Christ' (Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). If, with even greater explicitness still, faith is sometimes said to rest upon some element in the saving work of Christ, as, for example, upon His blood or His righteousness (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>), obviously such a singling out of the very thing in His work on which faith takes hold, in no way derogates from its repose upon Him, and Him only, as the sole and sufficient Saviour.

The saving power of faith resides thus not in itself, but in the Almighty Saviour on whom it rests. It is never on account of its formal nature as a psychic act that faith is conceived in Scripture to be saving,—as if this frame of mind or attitude of heart were itself a virtue with claims on God for reward, or at least especially pleasing to Him (either in its nature or as an act of obedience) and thus predisposing Him to favour, or as if it brought the soul into an attitude of receptivity or of sympathy with God, or opened a channel of communication from Him. It is not faith that saves, but faith in Jesus Christ: faith in any other saviour, or in this or that philosophy or human conceit (Col 2<sup>16</sup>, 18, 1 Ti 4<sup>1</sup>), or in any other gospel than that of Jesus Christ and Him as crucified (Gal 1<sup>8</sup>, 9), brings not salvation but a curse. It is not, strictly speaking, even faith in Christ that saves, but Christ that saves through faith. The saving power resides exclusively, not in the act of faith or the attitude of faith or the nature of faith, but in the object of faith; and in this the whole biblical representation centres, so that we could not more radically misconceive it than by transferring to faith even the smallest fraction of that saving energy which is attributed in the Scriptures solely to Christ Himself. This purely mediatory function of faith is very clearly indicated in the regimens in which it stands, which ordinarily express simple instrumentality. It is most frequently joined to its verb as the dative of means or instrument (Ac 15<sup>9</sup> 26<sup>18</sup>, Ro 3<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>2</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>, 2 Co 1<sup>24</sup>, He 11<sup>3</sup>, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 11, 17, 20, 21, 23, 24 || 27, 28, 29, 30, 31); and the relationship intended is further explained by the use to express it of the prepositions ἐκ (Ro 1<sup>17</sup>, 17, 32<sup>36</sup>, 39 4<sup>16</sup>, 16 5<sup>1</sup> 9<sup>30</sup>, 32 10<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>, 13, Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>7</sup>, 8, 9, 11, 12, 27, 28 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>5</sup>, He 10<sup>38</sup>, Ja 2<sup>24</sup>) and διὰ (with the genitive, never with the accusative, Ro 3<sup>22</sup>, 25, 30, 2 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, Gal 2<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>, 26 3<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ti 3<sup>15</sup>, He 6<sup>12</sup> 11<sup>23</sup>, 39, 1 P 1<sup>9</sup>),—the fundamental idea of the former construction being that of source or origin, and of the latter that of mediation or instrumentality, though they are used together in the same context, apparently with no distinction of meaning (Ro 3<sup>25</sup>, 26, 30, Gal 2<sup>16</sup>). It is not necessary to discover an essentially different implication in the exceptional usage of the prepositions ἐν (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>, Ph 3<sup>9</sup>) and κατά (He 11<sup>7</sup>, 13, cf. Mt 9<sup>30</sup>) in this connexion: ἐν is apparently to be taken in a quasi-temporal sense, 'on faith,' giving the occasion of the divine act, and κατά very similarly in the sense of conformability, 'in conformity with faith.' Not infrequently we meet also with a construction with the preposition ἐν which properly designates the sphere, but which in passages like Gal 2<sup>20</sup>, Col 2<sup>7</sup>, 2 Th 2<sup>13</sup> appears to pass over into the conception of instrumentality.

So little indeed is faith conceived as containing in itself the energy or ground of salvation, that it is consistently represented as, in its origin, itself a gratuity from God in the prosecution of His saving work. It comes, not of one's own strength or virtue, but only to those who are chosen of God for its reception (2 Th 2<sup>13</sup>), and hence is His gift (Eph 6<sup>23</sup>, cf. 2<sup>8</sup>, 9, Ph 1<sup>29</sup>), through Christ (Ac 3<sup>16</sup>, Ph 1<sup>29</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>, cf. He 12<sup>9</sup>), by the Spirit (2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>, Gal 5<sup>5</sup>), by means of the preached word (Ro 10<sup>17</sup>, Gal 3<sup>2-5</sup>); and as it is thus obtained from God (2 P 1<sup>1</sup>, Jude 3, 1 P 1<sup>21</sup>), thanks are to be returned to God for it (Col 1<sup>4</sup>, 2 Th 1<sup>3</sup>). Thus, even here all boasting is excluded, and salvation is conceived in all its elements as the pure product of unalloyed grace, issuing not from, but in, good works (Eph 2<sup>8-12</sup>). The place of faith in the process of salvation, as biblically conceived, could scarcely, therefore, be better described than by the use of the scholastic term 'instrumental cause.' Not in one portion of the Scriptures alone, but throughout their whole extent, it is conceived as a boon from above which comes to men, no doubt through the channels of their own activities, but not as if it were an effect of their energies, but rather, as it has been finely phrased, as a gift which God lays in the lap of the soul. 'With the heart,' indeed, 'man believeth unto righteousness'; but this believing does not arise of itself out of any heart indifferently (Mt 13<sup>1</sup>), nor is it grounded in the heart's own potencies; it is grounded rather in the freely-giving goodness of God, and comes to man as a benefaction out of heaven.

The effects of faith, not being the immediate product of faith itself but of that energy of God which was exhibited in raising Jesus from the dead and on which dependence is now placed for raising us with Him into newness of life (Col 2<sup>12</sup>), would seem to depend directly only on the fact of faith, leaving questions of its strength, quality, and the like more or less to one side. We find a proportion, indeed, suggested between faith and its effects (Mt 9<sup>29</sup> 8<sup>13</sup>, cf. 8<sup>10</sup> 15<sup>28</sup> 17<sup>20</sup>, Lk 7<sup>9</sup> 17<sup>6</sup>). Certainly there is a fatal doubt, which vitiates with its double-mindedness every approach to God (Ja 1<sup>6-8</sup>, cf. 4<sup>3</sup>, Mt 21<sup>21</sup>, Mk 11<sup>23</sup>, Ro 4<sup>20</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>, Jude 22). But Jesus deals with notable tenderness with those of 'little faith,' and His apostles imitated Him in this (Mt 6<sup>30f.</sup> 20 14<sup>31</sup> 16<sup>8</sup> 17<sup>20</sup>, Lk 12<sup>28</sup>, Mk 9<sup>24</sup>, Lk 17<sup>5</sup>, cf. Ro 14<sup>1-2</sup>, 1 Co 8<sup>7</sup>, and see DOUBT). The effects of faith may possibly vary also with the end for which the trust is exercised (cf. Mk 10<sup>51</sup> ἵνα ἀναβλέψω with Gal 2<sup>16</sup> ἐπιστεύσαμεν ἵνα δικαιωθῶμεν). But he who humbly but confidently casts himself on the God of salvation has the assurance that he shall not be put to shame (Ro 11<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>38</sup>), but shall receive the end of his faith, even the salvation of his soul (1 P 1<sup>9</sup>). This salvation is no doubt, in its idea, received all at once (Jn 3<sup>36</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>12</sup>); but it is in its very nature a process, and its stages come, each in its order. First of all, the believer, renouncing by the very act of faith his own righteousness which is out of the law, receives that 'righteousness which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is from God on faith' (Ph 3<sup>9</sup>, cf. Ro 3<sup>22</sup> 4<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>3-10</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Gal 5<sup>5</sup>, He 11<sup>7</sup>, 2 P 1<sup>1</sup>). On the ground of this righteousness, which in its origin is the 'righteous act' of Christ, constituted by His 'obedience' (Ro 5<sup>18-19</sup>), and comes to the believer as a 'gift' (Ro 5<sup>17</sup>), being reckoned to him apart from works (Ro 4<sup>6</sup>), he that believes in Christ is justified in God's sight, received into His favour, and made the recipient of the Holy Spirit (Jn 7<sup>39</sup>, cf. Ac 5<sup>32</sup>), by whose indwelling men are constituted the sons of God (Ro 8<sup>13</sup>). And if children, then are they heirs (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>), assured of an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance, reserved in heaven for them; and meanwhile they are guarded by the power of God through faith unto this gloriously complete salvation (1 P 1<sup>4-5</sup>). Thus, though the immediate effect of faith is only to make the believer possessor before the judgment-seat of God of the alien righteousness wrought out by Christ, through this one effect it draws in its train the whole series of saving acts of God, and of saving effects on the soul. Being justified by faith, the enmity which has existed between the sinner and God has been abolished, and he has been introduced into the very family of God, and made sharer in all the blessings of His house (Eph 2<sup>13f.</sup>). Being justified by faith, he has peace with God, and rejoices in the hope of the glory of God, and is enabled to meet the trials of life, not merely with patience but with joy (Ro 5<sup>11</sup>). Being justified by faith, he has already working within him the life which the Son has brought into the world, and by which, through the operations of the Spirit which those who believe in Him receive (Jn 7<sup>39</sup>), he is enabled to overcome the world lying in the evil one, and, kept by God from the evil one, to sin not (1 Jn 5<sup>19</sup>). In a word, because we are justified by faith, we are, through faith, endowed with all the privileges and supplied with all the graces of the children of God. (See further the articles on the several stages of the saving process.)

LITERATURE.—Schlatter, Der Glaube im NT (includes a section on 'Der Glaube vor Jesus') is the most comprehensive work on the biblical idea of faith. The general subject is also treated by Lutz, Biblische Dogmatik, 312; H. Schultz, 'Gerechtigkeit aus dem Glauben im A. u. NT' (in JDT, 1862, p. 510); Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 381; Riehm, Lehrb., d. Hebräerbr. 700; Cremer, Bib. Theol. Lex. s. πίστις, πιστός; Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, 83. For OT, cf. the relevant sections in the treatises on OT Theology, especially those of Oehler, H. Schultz, Riehm, Dillmann; and the commentaries on the passages, especially Delitzsch on Genesis and Habakkuk. For NT, cf. Huther, 'ἁγία und πιστός im NT' (in JEDTh, 1872, p. 182), and the relevant sections in the general treatises on NT Theology, especially those of Neander (Pflanzung, etc.), Schmid, Reuss, Weiss, Beyschlag, Holtzmann, and in the treatises on the theology of the several NT writers, such as Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus; Usteri, Paulinischer Lehrbegr.; Pfleiderer, Paulinismus; Stevens, The Pauline Theology; Lipsius, Paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre; Schnedermann, De fidei ratione ethica Paulina; Hausleiter, 'Was versteht Paulus unter christlichem Glauben?' (in Greifswalder Studien, p. 159); Riehm, Lehrbegr. d. Hebräerbr.; Reuss, 'Die Johan. Theologie' (in Beiträge zur d. Theol. Wissenschaft, i. 56); Köstlin, Lehrbegr. Johann.; Weiss, Der Johann. Lehrbegr.; Stevens, The Johannine Theology; Weiss, Der Petrin. Lehrbegr.; also such commentaries as Rückert on Romans; Sanday-Headlam on Romans; Lightfoot on Galatians; Haupt on 1 John; Mayor on James; Spitta on James. The whole body of doctrinal discussion may be reviewed in De Moor, Commentarius in J. Marckii Compendium, iv. 287 f.; cf. also John Ball, A Treatise of Faith (3rd ed. London, 1637), Julius Köstlin, Der Glaube, sein Wesen, Grund und Gegenstand (1889), and Der Glaube und seine Bedeutung für Erkenntnis, Leben und Kirche (1891). For some interesting historical notes, see Harnack, 'Die Lehre von der Seligkeit allein durch den Glauben in der alten Kirche' (in Zeitschrift. f. Theol. u. Kirche, 1895, p. 88); E. König, Der Glaubensschat des Christen (1891); and for a general survey, Cunningham, Historical Theology, ii. pp. 56 ff.

B. B. WARFIELD.

FAITHLESS occurs only Mt 17<sup>7</sup>, Mk 9<sup>18</sup>, Lk 9<sup>41</sup>, Jn 20<sup>27</sup>, and always in the sense of 'unbelieving' (ἄπιστος). So Shaks. describes Shylock (Mer. of Ven. II. iv. 37) as 'a faithless Jew,' i.e. not 'untrustworthy,' but 'infidel,' an unbeliever in Christianity.

J. HASTINGS.

FALCON.—RV tr. of ἄγυς, Lv 11<sup>14</sup>, Dt 14<sup>13</sup> (AV 'kite'), Job 28<sup>7</sup> (AV 'vulture'). See GLEDE, HAWK, KITE, VULTURE.

G. E. POST.

FALL.—In the sense of happen, 'fall' is both a Heb. and an Eng. idiom. It occurs Ru 3<sup>18</sup> 'Sit still, my daughter, until thou know how the matter will fall'; and 2 Es 13<sup>38</sup> 'such things as fall in their seasons.' Cf. Mt 18<sup>13</sup>, Wyc. 'if it fall that he find it,' and Shaks. Jul. Cæs. III. i. 243—

'I know not what may fall; I like it not.'

Fall away is used in two senses. 1. To lose a position of goodness or of grace. The Greek is either ἀποστῆναι, Sir 16<sup>7</sup> 'the old giants who fell away in the strength of their foolishness' (RV 'revolted'), Lk 8<sup>13</sup> 'in time of temptation fall away'; or παρὰπτεω which occurs in the LXX of Est 6<sup>10</sup>, Wis 6<sup>9</sup> 12<sup>2</sup>, Ezk 14<sup>13</sup> 15<sup>3</sup> 18<sup>24</sup> 20<sup>27</sup> 22<sup>4</sup>, and 2 Mac 10<sup>4</sup> [A], and once in NT, He 6<sup>6</sup> 'it is impossible for those who were once enlightened . . . if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance,' where the meaning is more than is found in the LXX, not merely falling into grievous sin, but renouncing the faith of Christ wholly (see Davidson, in loc.). 'A falling away' (RV 'the falling away') is the Eng. tr. of ἡ ἀποστασία, 2 Th 2<sup>3</sup>, on which see MAN OF SIN. 2. To 'fall away to,' varied with 'fall to,' or 'fall unto' (2 K 7<sup>4</sup> 'let us fall unto the host of the Syrians'), is to desert to an enemy. It is again both a Heb. and an Eng. idiom. See 2 K 25<sup>11</sup>=Jer 52<sup>15</sup>, 1 Ch 12<sup>19 bis</sup>, Jer 21<sup>9</sup> 37<sup>13-14</sup> 38<sup>19</sup> 39<sup>9</sup>, as well as 1 S 20<sup>8</sup>, where the Heb. (if לָלַךְ or לָלַךְ is added after LXX πρὸς μὲ) is the same, always some part of לָלַךְ to fall. For the Eng. cf. Shaks. Henry VIII. II. i. 129—

'Where you are liberal of your loves and counsels,
Be sure you be not loose; for those you make friends is,
And give your hearts to, when they once perceive
The least rub in your fortunes, fall away
Like water from ye.'

Again, Henry VIII. III. iii. 209—

'And as for Clarence, as my letters tell me,
He's very likely now to fall from him.'

J. HASTINGS.

FALL (παράπτωμα, a word used of Adam's transgression in Wis 10<sup>1</sup>, though not restricted to this anywhere in OT or NT).—Few chapters of the Bible have affected religious speculation more continuously and more deeply than the chapter which records the temptation and the weakness of primeval man. It would be out of place here to discuss all the topics which arise out of Gn 3, as to do so would be to write a treatise on Christian Theology. We can only consider—(i.) the character of the record, and its relation to other accounts of man's primitive state, which have come down to us from early times; (ii.) the influence of the story of Paradise and the Fall upon Hebrew belief as to man's destiny and his condition in the sight of God; (iii.) the inferences drawn by the NT writers, and notably by St. Paul, from the story of Adam's sin, read in the light of Christ's redemption. It will be impossible to give more than the briefest summary (iv.) of the interpretations of St Paul's doctrine of the Fall which have most widely affected Christian thought; but something must be said, in conclusion, (v.) of the bearing of modern theories of the origin and development of man upon the general doctrine of the Fall explained in Scripture and received by the Church.

i. We briefly recapitulate the leading points of the narrative in Gn 2<sup>1</sup>-3, which forms the first section in Gn incorporated from the source described by critics as the Prophetic Code (J). Adam and Eve, the parents of the human family, are represented as living in innocence and peace in a fair garden where sin had not entered, and where death had no power, for in its midst stood the Tree of Life, of which they were permitted freely to eat. The fruit of one tree alone, the Tree of the knowledge of good and evil, was forbidden to them; and death was declared to be the penalty of disobedience. But their happy condition of purity and of fellowship with God did not remain undisturbed. The serpent seduced the woman to disobey the divine command; she, in turn, tempted her husband to his fall. And then came upon the guilty pair the consciousness of sin and the fear of the divine wrath, which they vainly tried to evade by excuses for their fault. The voice of God is heard, pronouncing a curse upon the serpent, and declaring a perpetual strife between it and mankind; the man and the woman, for their sin, are for ever subjected to pain in the fulfilment of their destiny, the woman in her childbearing, the man in his daily labour for daily bread. They are both expelled from Eden, and the Cherubim guard its gates against them, lest, eating of the tree of life, they should live for ever. The picture, however, is lightened by one ray of hope; for the seed of the serpent shall not finally prevail over the seed of the woman. 'It shall bruise thy head,' though 'thou shalt bruise his heel.'

Traditions of a state of primeval innocence, of man's fall from his pristine purity, and of the consequent entrance of death into the world, have, it is said, been gathered by travellers from races far removed from Hebrew literature or its sources.* Striking parallels to Gn 3 are to be found in the Zoroastrian legends as to the beginning of man's career. Yima, the first man, is said to have passed his days in a primeval paradise. But after a time he committed sin, was cast out of Paradise, and delivered up to the serpent (identified with an evil spirit), who finally brought about his death. A later version of the story is told in connexion with the first pair Masha and Mashyana. The lying spirit grew bold, and, presenting himself a second time, brought them fruits, which they ate. As a punishment, of the hundred privileges they formerly enjoyed only one was left to them.* Few of the parallel stories that are adduced are, however, so exactly recorded as these; and we are inclined to believe that the similarities to the Bible narrative are often overstated. The fact that many people in many lands have sought to explain the existing disorders in the world as the consequence of man's lapse from a higher condition is deeply significant, and we shall return to it again. But the details of the legends in which such belief is embodied are not, as a rule, interesting save to the curious student of folk-lore, and they throw little light upon Scripture. It is to Assyria and the East that we naturally look for illumination. And it has been pointed out that the mythology of Babylonia and Assyria presents some curious parallels to the story of the serpent in the garden of which we read in Gn 3. On Assyrian inscriptions are found the names Diglat=Hiddekel, and Bura=Euphrates, in connexion with the word Idinu or 'field,' which is identified with Eden. Coniferous sacred trees appear frequently on Assyrian bas-reliefs and Bab. representations of a mythological character. On a Bab. stone cylinder, now in the British Museum, two human figures are depicted with a serpent behind them, having their hands stretched out towards the fruit that hangs from a neighbouring tree.† And the serpent figure is conspicuous in the legend of the Chaldean tablets in which the evil serpent, Tiamat, is overthrown by Merodach. (See COSMOGONY, p. 505.) If the third Creation Tablet were not so extremely difficult to decipher as it is reported to be (partly in consequence of its fragmentary condition), it is probable that we should be able to trace in the story which it records even more striking similarities to the Scripture narrative. But Oriental scholars are not as yet entirely in agreement as to the translation of some of the more interesting portions of it; and the inferences that may be derived from the passage now to be cited must therefore be regarded as somewhat uncertain. The following is the rendering of Boscawen ‡:—

'In sin one with the other in compact joins,
The command was established in the garden of the God,
The Asnan (fruit) they ate, they broke in two;
Its stalk they destroyed;
The sweet juice which injures the body.
Great is their sin. Themselves they exalted;
To Merodach their Redeemer he appointed their fate.'

If this translation be trustworthy, we have here something very like the biblical story of the forbidden fruit; but the rendering given by Pinches differs in some significant particulars. We recall, for our warning, that an inscription interpreted by Geo. Smith as a Bab. version of the story of the Fall turned out, when closely examined by Oppert, to be a hymn to the Creator.§ Making all due allowances, however, for uncertainty of translation, it seems probable, when we bear in mind the affinity of the earlier Creation Tablets to Gn 1, as well as the other points of contact with * Compare Lenormant, Histoire Ancienne de l'Orient, I. 30 ff.

† There is a photograph of this in Boscawen's Bible and the Monuments, p. 89. It is to be borne in mind that there is nothing to suggest that the figures are not both males. And, as Schrader (*KAT*² p. 37) points out, a specific feature of the Bible narrative, viz. that the woman gave the fruit to the man, is not indicated.

‡ Babylonian and Oriental Record, IV. 251. Another translation by Pinches is given at p. 32. See also Sayce, Ancient Monuments, 65, 104; and Davis, Genesis and Semitic Tradition, p. 65, who questions the accuracy of Boscawen's rendering, and urges that we have here no true parallel to the Genesis narrative. § See, for original, Delitzsch, *Assyrische Lesestücke*², p. 91.

* See Baring Gould's Legends of OT Characters, I. 26-39, and the references there given.

the story of Eden to which we have adverted, that a legend of the fall of man, resembling in external features the account of Gn 3, was widely spread in Mesopotamia. Indeed, in another passage cited by Boscawen we are inevitably reminded of the victory over the serpent of Gn 3<sup>15</sup>—

'Tiamat, whom he had bound, then turned backward :
So Bel trampled on the belly of Tiamat ;
With his club unsling he smote her brain,
He broke it, and caused her blood to flow ;
The north wind bore it away to secret places.'*

There is nothing to surprise reason or to embarrass faith in the fact—if it be a fact—that traditional beliefs about the origins of human history should have been utilized in a purified form by the compiler of the Pent. or taken up into the Prophetic Code. It must be remembered that the period with which we are dealing is strictly prehistoric, and also that legendary history is not necessarily false or misleading. The truly remarkable circumstance is, that the early narratives in Gn are free from the extravagant and grotesque mythological accretions which generally gather round ancient beliefs among primitive peoples ; and that every touch in these narratives as we have them conveys a deep religious truth. The 'inspiration of selection' is a phenomenon which every candid student of Scripture must recognize ; and nowhere is its presence more instructive than in the first pages of OT, which present the early history of man in a form that can be understood by the simplest, and yet may be studied with spiritual benefit by the wisest of mankind.

We believe, then, that we have in the biblical record of the Fall a purified form of legendary narrative concerning man's early history which had wide currency among Semitic peoples. In an uncritical age it was interpreted literally, and it has been counted historical for many generations by the majority of those, whether Jews or Christians, who accept the authority of the OT. But another method of interpretation, viz. the allegorical, has had many adherents. Thus, of the account of the Fall, Philo asserts : ἔστι δὲ ταῦτα οὐ πλάσματα μύθων, οἷς τὸ ποιητικὸν καὶ σοφιστικὸν χαίρει γένος, ἀλλὰ δειγμάτων τύπων ἐπ' ἀλληγορίαν παρακαλοῦντων κατὰ τὰς δι' ὑπονοίων ἀποδόσεις (De mundi opificio, § 56), i.e. 'These things are not mere fabulous myths, but rather types shadowing forth some allegorical truth.' And, accordingly, he explains that Adam represents the rational and Eve the sensuous part of man, the serpent being the symbol of pleasure. The Christian teachers of Alexandria, Clement and Origen, favoured this allegorical mode of interpretation ; but Tertullian and Irenæus defended the literal truth of the narrative, as also did Augustine, who did not, however, reject the typical significance of OT history ; and through the scholastic philosophy it passed into the dogmatic theology of the Reformation. But the opinion that, however the story was intended to be taken by the compiler of the Bk. of Genesis, it might be interpreted as a parable of spiritual truth, has been defended by great names in every age of the Church.†

There are, then, these several methods of interpretation—(1) that the narrative of the Fall is literal history ; (2) that it is a legend, which conveys truth under mythological disguise ; (3) that it is, and was only intended to be, an allegory. The first and third can hardly be adopted in the present condition of exegesis, and it is probable that the second view of the narrative is that which is now most generally accepted by those who have studied the subject. That the biblical form of the legend should represent the facts as they actually took place more closely than the parallel stories which have been collected from the literature of the ancient world, is not surprising to any believer in the unique character of Scripture ; but it is not to be forgotten that it is the great religious truths which underlie the narrative that are of real importance, and these are brought out in the Bk. of Genesis in a quite unique fashion.

ii. The allusions in OT to the story of Gn 3 are few and uncertain. If the rendering of the RV may be pressed, there are indeed two undoubted references to the Fall, viz., 'If like Adam I covered my transgressions' (Job 31<sup>33</sup>), and, 'But they like Adam have transgressed the covenant' (Hos 6<sup>7</sup>). But it seems that, at least in the former passage, עָרַב should be rendered 'after the manner of men,' and this rendering would also be admissible in Hos 6<sup>7</sup> ; so that we have to look elsewhere for allusions to the Paradise narrative on which stress may be laid. The 'garden of Eden' is mentioned several times by the prophets of the Captivity (Ezk 23<sup>13</sup> 31<sup>9</sup>, Is 51<sup>3</sup>, cf. Jl 2<sup>9</sup>) ; and the Bk. of Proverbs occasionally mentions a 'tree of life' (see esp. Pr 3<sup>18</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>). Ps 90<sup>3</sup> and Ec 12<sup>7</sup> have been supposed to take up the language of Gn 3<sup>19</sup>. It is possible also that we have a reminiscence of the curse upon the serpent (Gn 3<sup>14</sup>) in Mic 7<sup>17</sup> 'They shall lick the dust like a serpent,' and in Is 65<sup>25</sup> 'Dust shall be the serpent's meat,' though the latter passage may be derived from Micah. The conception of a personal tempter of mankind appears in the story of Job and also in 1 Ch 21<sup>1</sup> (see also Zec 3<sup>1</sup>) ; but it is not until a later period that we come upon any explicit identification of 'Satan' or the 'Adversary' with the 'serpent,' the first trace of such being Wis 2<sup>24</sup>. Cf. also Rev 12<sup>9</sup> and Ro 16<sup>20</sup> 'The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly,' which manifestly has reference to Gn 3<sup>15</sup>.*

So far, then, as the language of OT is concerned, we have not convincing evidence that the story of the Fall as given in Gn 3 was much in the thoughts of the sacred writers. But were we to conclude, therefore, that the doctrine of a Fall formed no part of their religious beliefs, we should be seriously mistaken. If there is one idea which is throughout conspicuous in OT, it is the idea of sin. No other nation of antiquity was possessed with so intense a consciousness of the wickedness of mankind, and of the sin of man as an offence against God. 'Behold, I was shapen in iniquity ; and in sin did my mother conceive me' (Ps 51<sup>5</sup>). 'There is none that doeth good, no, not one' (Ps 14<sup>3</sup>). These and many similar passages express the abiding sense of the Hebrew race, that man, as he is, is not in the condition which his Creator purposed for him. The contrast between such a conception of man and that, e.g., present to the mind of a Greek, who viewed man as in his normal, healthy state, is only to be accounted for by a belief such as that which is presupposed and taught in the story of the Fall.

That this belief was, as a matter of fact, definitely, if not consistently, connected with the Paradise narrative in the later ages of Hebrew national life, is proved by the testimony of the books called Apocrypha and the literature of the Roman period. This testimony is so important that it will be well to present it in some detail.

(a) It is unnecessary to multiply passages which speak of the depravity of human nature ; but 2 Es 4<sup>11</sup> 'How can he that is already worn out with the corrupted world understand incorruption?' is significant. Cf. also 2 Es 7<sup>68</sup>.

(b) This depravity was traced to Adam's fall. The classical passage is 2 Es 3<sup>21, 22</sup>. The seer has been speaking of the creation of Adam, his dwelling in Paradise, the one commandment which he transgressed, and the consequent entrance of death into the world. He goes on: 'For the first Adam, bearing a wicked heart, transgressed, and was overcome; and not he only, but all they also that are born of him. Thus disease was made permanent; and the law was in the heart of the people along with the wickedness of the root; so the good departed away, and that which was wicked abode still.' Again: 'A grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much wickedness hath it brought forth unto this time!' (2 Es 4<sup>30</sup>). And once more: 'O thou Adam, what hast thou done? for though it was thou that sinned, the evil is not fallen on thee alone, but upon all of us that come of thee' (2 Es 7<sup>118</sup>). In this late book are recognized the moral consequences of Adam's sin; in the much earlier work of Ben-Sira there is an allusion to the curse of Gn 3<sup>19</sup> 'Great travail is created for every man, and a heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam' (Sir 40<sup>1</sup>).

* Bible and the Monuments, p. 90.

† See an interesting note in Coleridge's Aids to Reflection, p. 171 (ed. Bohn).

* It may be observed that the temptation of the Second Adam by the devil (Mt 4, Lk 4) explains beyond doubt who was understood by the serpent which tempted the first Adam.

(c) That sin came through the woman is explicitly stated in Sir 25<sup>24</sup> 'From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her we all die.'

(d) That man's seduction was due to the serpent, now for the first time in Jewish literature identified with Satan, is alluded to in Wis 2<sup>24</sup> 'By the envy of the devil death entered into the world.'

(e) The connexion between death and sin is not so clearly conceived, and there was, apparently, no consistent doctrine on the subject;* but the generally prevailing view seems to have been that of 2 Es 3<sup>7</sup> 'Unto him thou gavest thy one commandment: which he transgressed, and immediately thou appointedst death for him and in his generations.' Cf. also Wis 2<sup>24</sup>, Sir 25<sup>24</sup>. The same view is found in the Apocalypse of Baruch (xvii. 3, xxiii. 4) and in the Book of Enoch (xviii. 4).

(f) Side by side with passages such as these we have others not less significant, which assert the personal responsibility of the sinner. E.g. 'They that inhabited the city did evil, in all things doing as Adam and all his generations had done: for they also bare a wicked heart' (2 Es 3<sup>25</sup>). Cf. also 2 Es 8<sup>59</sup> and 9<sup>11</sup>, and, above all, Apoc. Baruch liv. 19: 'Non est ergo Adam causa, nisi animæ suæ tantum; nos vero unusquisque fuit animæ suæ Adam.'

It might be urged that 2 Es is a very late book, perhaps belonging to Christian times; but, at all events, that the author of the chapters from which our quotations are drawn was a non-Christian Jew is tolerably certain. And thus we may use the book in support of our conclusion that the Jews, at least from the Captivity onward, conceived of the sin of Adam as having left a permanent trace from the effects of which all mankind were suffering and to suffer.

iii. When we come to the NT, and especially to the Pauline Epistles, we find that this doctrine of the effects of Adam's fall receives at once explanation and relief in the facts of the Incarnation and the Atonement. If we take the points in the order followed in the last section, we see (a) that the universal depravity of mankind is everywhere presupposed, and is the basis of the argument of the Ep. to the Romans. 'To (b) we shall return again, and only cite here 1 Co 15<sup>22</sup> 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive.' (c) finds illustration in two passages: 'the serpent beguiled Eve in his craftiness' (2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>), and 'Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression' (1 Ti 2<sup>14</sup>). (d) St. Paul refers to the 'bruising of Satan' in Ro 16<sup>20</sup>; and the devil is spoken of as 'a murderer from the beginning' in Jn 8<sup>44</sup>. Cf. also 1 Jn 3<sup>8-12</sup>. We then come to (e), as to which the classical passage in NT is Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>. A commentary on these difficult verses cannot be written here; but certain broad principles laid down by St. Paul, who is undoubtedly following and interpreting the narrative in Gn 3, can hardly be mistaken.* That through one man sin entered into the world is his starting-point. Death came through sin (cf. Ro 6<sup>23</sup> and Ja 1<sup>13</sup>); and hence death is the common lot of man, first, because of his own personal sin; and, secondly, because it is part of the inheritance which Adam has transmitted to his descendants. At the same time, St. Paul is careful to insist (f) that man's personal responsibility for his own acts, and for his own acts alone, remains unimpaired. He does not supply any theory by which the two complementary truths of man's inherited tendency to evil and man's free will may be reconciled; but he leaves them side by side as equally parts of the doctrine which it has been given him to teach. And he goes on to show that the distinctive feature of the gospel is that 'if by the trespass of the one the many died, much more did the grace of God, and the gift by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound unto the many.' Thus the theology of St. Paul is inextricably bound up with the doctrine of the Fall. The whole point of the comparison and contrast of the first and second Adam is lost, if the destinies of the human race were not deeply affected by a backward step at the beginnings of human history, if it be not true that man's growth in holiness may be described as a recovery effected through grace.

iv. The interpretations of St. Paul's language which have from time to time been accepted by Christians are various; and they depend in part on the view that is taken as to the state of un-fallen man, and the divine intention for him. It would be agreed by most theologians that, to use the language of the Church, the 'original righteousness' of which Adam was deprived, was, although in part natural, yet in part supernatural. That is to say, he is represented as divinely endowed with a virtuous character, without any such bias towards evil as we experience in ourselves. This is what constituted the unique perversity and heinousness of the first sin, and it is because of this that his sin is counted a 'fall' from a higher spiritual condition. His sin had a disturbing influence on the whole future development of the race, but the character of the disturbance has been differently estimated in different schools of thought. Speaking broadly, the Greek view was simply that the 'original righteousness' of the race was lost; the effect of Adam's sin was a privatio, an impoverishment of human nature which yet left the power of the will unimpaired. But the Latin writers who followed Augustine took a darker view of the consequences of the Fall. It is, for them, a depravatio nature; the human will is disabled; there is left a bias towards evil which can be conquered only by grace. And this is, undoubtedly, nearer to the language of Scripture than the former mode of representing the facts; but it was not always remembered, e contra, in Augustinian theology that the 'image of God' remained in man even after the Fall (Gn 9<sup>6</sup>). It is therefore contrary to Scripture to represent man as wholly corrupt. And a deep and serious question arises here as to the relation between the Fall and the Incarnation. It may well be, as the Scotists taught, that it is unjustifiable to represent the high destiny which man may find in Christ as an after-thought in the divine counsels. The Incarnation may have been, for anything we can tell, the predestined climax of humanity, independently of human sin. Bearing these considerations in mind we return to Ro 5<sup>12-21</sup>, and the various theories which have been proposed in explanation. They may be classified thus—*

* See Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 165 ff.

* For St. Paul's argument, as also for the witness of the Apocrypha to the doctrine of man's corruption, see Sanday-Headlam, Romans (ch. v.).

(a) It is urged that St. Paul's language requires us to conceive of the human race as in Adam potentially, in the same sense as the oak is in the acorn. Hence, for what he did, we may be counted responsible. The race, not the individual, is the true unit; it is with this unit that God deals. Thus, e.g., David sinned in numbering Israel, but his people were the sufferers from the divine punishment. The words of our Lord in Lk 13<sup>2-4</sup> suggest to us that there is such a thing as national responsibility, apart from the guilt of individuals. Most apposite of all, Levi is said to have paid tithes 'through Abraham' (He 7<sup>9, 10</sup>). And in this conception of the solidarity of mankind there is, beyond question, a profound truth which is becoming more intelligently and sincerely accepted as the social teaching of the Incarnation is being opened out. 'As in Adam all die, so also in Christ shall all be made alive' (1 Co 15<sup>22</sup>), are words which point to the unity of the human race as the root of the universality both of sin and of redemption. But we must be careful not to state this so as to do violence to our God-given sense of justice. This is the fault, e.g., of teaching like that of Jonathan Edwards, who spoke of a psychological no less than a physical unity between Adam and his posterity. Ultimately based, as in Augustine, on a mistranslation of Ro 5<sup>12</sup> (in quo as the rendering of ἐφ' ᾧ) and on the adoption in the Vulg. of the word imputare, familiar from its use in the courts of Roman law, this teaching may readily become either ultra-mystical or ultra-rationalistic. It becomes ultra-mystical, if the unity of the human race be so spoken of as to conceal the all-important fact that it is only for a person that morality has any intelligible meaning. It becomes ultra-rationalistic, when the phrases 'imputation of sin' and the correlative 'imputation of righteousness' are used as if sin and righteousness were transferable from one person to another. Sin is predicable only of a person, not of human nature; and the warning of Ezekiel, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die,' needs to be ever kept in view. St. Paul does not teach that we are accomplices in Adam's sin or partakers of his guilt without a co-operation of our own will, although it be at the same time awfully true that we inherit from him a degraded nature. The abiding truth in the interpretation given by Augustine of St. Paul's teaching as to the Fall, is the truth of the unity of mankind. In this Adam is τῦπος τοῦ μέλλοντος.

(b) Again, the effect of Adam's fall upon his posterity has been explained by speaking of Adam as representative of the race. 'The covenant was made with Adam as a public person, not with himself only, but for his posterity.' But the question arises, How could Adam, in justice, bind his posterity to a covenant of which they were not cognizant? A federal compact of this sort could only bind us, if we had empowered Adam to act on our behalf. And if it be urged that in Adam's case we should have done the same as he, and therefore may justly be punished for what he did, it may be replied that this is a gratuitous assumption, which goes perilously near to depriving the original transgression of moral blame by representing it as inevitable. Here is an important consideration which must not be overlooked. All profitable speculation on the subject of the Fall must recognize frankly its voluntary character. Adam was not necessitated to act as he did; otherwise his action would not involve moral responsibility.

(c) We come, then, to the view which is at once most widely accepted and most consonant to all the facts. It is, substantially, the view expounded by John of Damascus. We inherit from our first parents a degraded nature, so degraded that it is for us much harder to overcome sin than it was for Adam. For this inherited depravity of nature we are not responsible; we have inherited it in spite of ourselves. Hence the world is in a 'state of ruin,' and can be remedied only through grace. But we are not, therefore, guilty; guilt is incurred only when the evil is voluntarily embraced, when we take up Adam's sin by repeating it, as it were, in our own persons. The rule of Augustine, Peccatum poena peccati, continually receives verification. Coleridge has pressed this view somewhat further. 'It belongs,' he says, 'to the very essence of the doctrine that in respect of original sin every man is the adequate representative of all men' (Aids to Reflection, p. 194). And he holds that Adam's fall is a typical experience repeated afresh in every son of Adam. Mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur. The corruption, he urges, 'must be self-originated.' There is an important sense in which this is true; but it is not the whole truth. It is deficient in recognition of the far-reaching character of the first sin. We are not at all in the same spiritual condition as that of the first man; we do not enter on the conflict with evil on the same terms. Our whole attitude to God is different from that of Adam, although we be still 'sons of God.' As the schoolmen put it, in the case of Adam the person corrupted the nature; with us it is the nature which corrupts the person. Man is still free, but man is sick with a sickness which is displeasing to the All-pure; and for healing of this sickness only a supernatural remedy will suffice. As our Lord taught in the Sermon on the Mount (cf. also Mt 15<sup>19</sup>), the real seat of sin is within, the heart is the seat of the moral life (cf. Ps 78<sup>37</sup>, Pr 4<sup>23</sup>), although the translation of thought into act involves a fresh and distinct step in responsibility.* The advocates of the more rigorous Augustinian doctrine have been accustomed to designate this view as semi-Pelagianism; but it is free from the essential fault of the teaching of Pelagius, on which we say a final word.

(d) Pelagius is represented as having held that the infant enters on life crippled in no appreciable degree by any inherited infirmity or waywardness of the will. He begins the world with powers sufficient to cope with the machinations of the evil one. And thus, in so far as he does wrong, it is his own fault; in so far as he does right, he is deserving of approbation. It would seem that Pelagius and his disciples seriously underestimated the influence of Adam's fall on human nature at large. That this nature as corrupt and the seat of sin must be of itself and when unregenerate displeasing to the All-holy, they did not perceive with clearness. And though men, happily, do not always push their opinions to their logical conclusions, the result of such teaching as this would be the denial of any need of grace or of redemption.†

v. We pass on to the question, How far is the doctrine of the Fall affected by modern theories as to the evolution of the human species from lower and less developed types? It has been too often hastily assumed that the belief in the continuity of animal forms is inconsistent with belief in any special prerogative of man, and is still more incompatible with a doctrine which represents his history as having been retrogressive at one point. But neither of these positions can be established.

* See for a fuller classification, Schaff in Lange's Romans (Eng. tr. p. 191).

* See Hort's Life and Letters, ii. 330 f.; see also i. 78.

† See Neander's Church History, iv. 331 ff.

The doctrine of the evolution of species is not yet to be counted as more than an extremely probable hypothesis, by which the phenomena of life and growth become intelligible. Many details are, as yet, very obscure, and the laws of inheritance have not by any means been clearly and fully expounded. See HEREDITY. And the application of this doctrine to the descent of man is beset with peculiar difficulties, which cannot be said, as yet, to have been solved. But we are, nevertheless, content in this article to treat of the subject of man's early history in the light of this wonderful law. Evolution may not be the final word of science as to the laws of growth; but it expresses well the results to which investigation has so far attained. We conceive, then, of primeval man as a creature descended from brute ancestors, some of whom he closely resembled in instinct and habit as well as in structure. But there was one marked difference. In him there was present the faculty of self-consciousness; he was conscious of a reason which can make provision for a foreseen future, and of a will which is not necessarily determined by the strongest physical desire. Man is made in the image of God, although his bodily lineage be that of the ape-like creatures whom he sees round him. If we may illustrate the facts of his growth by a mathematical illustration, we shall say that the curve of his progress is a continuous curve, upon which he has come to a critical point. At this critical point the curvature seems to change its character; in other words, the man finds himself possessed of faculties which are not, so far as he can judge, the direct product of his former history. They are, to use at once the simplest and the truest words, the gift of God. There may be, perhaps, absolute and visible continuity between the bodily form of the man and of the higher apes; but continuity cannot be so exactly traced in his mental development. There has been a μετάβασις εἰς ἄλλο γένος, however it has come about. Henceforth he is not only an animal, but a man. If it be said that it is not scientific to postulate a saltus of this kind, it may be asked, Why not? The law of continuity is not a fetish before which we are called to prostrate ourselves; it is nothing more than a convenient working hypothesis, which we find it necessary to desert in this instance, as in others where it will not serve our purpose. And, indeed, it is by no means certain that to the Supreme Mind there is here apparent any breach of continuity whatever. The law may be obeyed, in fact, though the sequence may not be within our observation.

A creature thus emerging from a lower animal condition, even though endowed with the divine gifts of self-conscious reason and free will, would not, indeed, be perfect. He would be, at the earliest stage of a new period of growth, already raised above the ape, but still far removed from the civilized European of modern life. But then we remark that the narrative of Genesis nowhere describes the first man as perfect. When South said that 'Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise,'* he was not drawing his picture from Scripture. Neither OT nor NT speak of Adam as perfect, though they speak of him as innocent and pure (cf. Ec 7<sup>29</sup>). And this was perceived by early Christian commentators. Theophilus of Antioch says that God placed Adam in Paradise διδούς αὐτῷ ἀφορμὴν προκοπῆς ὅπως αὐξάνων καὶ τέλειος γενόμενος, κ.τ.λ. (Ad Autol. ii. 24); and Clement of Alexandria states (Strom. vi. 12. 96) that Adam 'was not made perfect in respect of his constitution, but in a fit condition to receive virtue.'* This relation to God has been well described as not a state of perfection or a mere disposition, but 'a living commencement which contained within itself the possibility of a progressive development and a fulfilment of the vocation of man.'†

Such a state of things is so far removed from anything of which we have experience that we find ourselves continually at fault in the effort to imagine or to describe it. But we must, at least, suppose it to have been a condition in which man obeyed freely the law of that nature to which he had attained; the ideas 'right' and 'wrong' hardly presented themselves to his mind with full meaning, for 'the knowledge of good and evil' was not yet his. It may well have been that the image of God was a gift only germinally bestowed and gradually realized. Man did not come all at once into his splendid inheritance. In the Paradise narrative he is depicted as still at an early stage in his history. He is represented as living a life of communion with God, conscious, as it would seem, that he 'ought' to obey the laws of God, which, as yet, were presented in the simplest and most elementary form; but the consciousness of moral obligation could only be half realized where the knowledge of evil was not present. So far there is nothing in the story which would conflict with the teaching of science, whether physical or mental. In his primitive condition, man would have been able to recognize only the simplest moral commands. He was forbidden to taste of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil': for so perilous an experience he was not prepared. And, in the absence of temptation from without, it was perhaps possible that this state of purity should have continued. The man's nature, though not developed to perfection, though not strong with the discipline which time and experience bring, was perfectly balanced; and in obeying its dictates he would obey the dictates of his Creator.

How into such a world could evil enter? That is the question which has vexed philosophy from generation to generation. It is a question to which no final or complete answer has been given. But the record of revelation at least puts the difficulty one step further back; it points to the region where the solution is to be sought. In the Bible the fall of the angels precedes the fall of man (Jude<sup>6</sup>). Temptation came into human life through the machination of a spirit of evil distinct from man. The invitation to sin came from the serpent in the garden, and it took the form of a suggested violation of the command known to be divine. Sin is not an indigenous product, but is brought in ab extra, somewhat as it has been suggested that life was first brought to the earth in a meteoric stone. According to the Bible, the origin of evil is to be sought outside human nature.

We are not now in a region where science has anything to tell us. We have only the brief phrases of Scripture as our guide. And it will be observed that we cannot say positively that the temptation would not have been self-suggested, as the man grew in faculty and in strength, had there been no malign influence external to himself.

* See Gibson, Thirty-Nine Articles, p. 366.

† Martensen, Christian Dogmatics, § 78.

* Sermon on Gn 12<sup>7</sup>.

We do not know, and cannot know. What is told is this. The man was in a state of innocence and purity, and the suggestion to sin came, as a matter of fact, in the first instance from a personal agency of evil outside the domain of his own will.

Here, then, is ignorance of evil dispelled, whichever course the man adopted. For the conscious refusal of evil, no less than its acceptance, would in a measure involve a knowledge of evil. An apostolic writer speaks of the τέλειος, or perfect man, as one 'who by reason of use has his senses exercised to discern good and evil' (He 5<sup>14</sup>). True, there would be no personal realization of evil were it not consciously embraced. But its existence must henceforward be definitely conceived. And we may notice that whether man yielded to the temptation or overcame it, in any case he would have advanced a step in knowledge. To yield was a spiritual fall; to resist would have been a spiritual rise. But in any case the new experience would be an intellectual rise. This is a principle which has formed the starting-point of some remarkable speculations as to the Fall both in mediæval and modern times. The philosopher Erigena seems to have had a confused perception of this truth when he taught that sin was relatively necessary for the development of human nature. Schiller, again, interpreted the Fall as the necessary transition of reason from the state of nature to that of culture. The necessity of evil is a prominent feature in the Hegelian philosophy, according to which the life of the world is conceived as inevitably developing itself through antagonism and conflict. This is the Divina Commedia of human history, the perpetual tragedy of life. And theologians have pointed out that in Scripture itself the origin of the arts of civilization and of peace is traced to fallen and not to unfallen man. Tubal-cain, 'the forger of every cutting instrument in brass and iron,' and Jubal the father of musicians, are the descendants of Cain (Gn 4<sup>21, 22</sup>). The truth which seems to underlie speculations such as these is that man would not begin to progress rapidly, in an intellectual point of view, until he became conscious of the resistance to his energies which evil presents. But this consciousness would not have been less intense had he overcome the temptation which assailed him instead of yielding to it. It is only the man who has successfully battled with evil that is conscious of its full strength, for upon him alone has it spent all its powers. And thus to assert that sin was relatively necessary for the development of human nature, is to confuse the yielding to temptation with the experience of it. Had primeval man been strong when evil presented itself, we know not to what heights of intellectual, as of spiritual excellence, the race might not have now attained. In this view only is it true that the first temptation marks the 'beginning and the foundation of the development of mind, the birth of man's intellectual nature.*

We find, then, that the doctrine of the Fall, when subjected to examination, is in no way inconsistent with the theory of the evolution of man from lower types, and his growth 'from strength to strength' as the centuries have gone by. There has been a continuous intellectual development. When the pre-Adamite ancestor of the human family was fitted to receive the divine gift of reason, it was granted to him. Like Christ, Adam came in the fullness of time, when all things were ready. Up to this point the evolution had been unconscious; henceforward it was to be conscious, and partly assisted by voluntary effort.

* See Matheson, Can the Old Faith Live with the New, p. 219 ff., where the argument of this paragraph is developed at length.

And the first experience of evil, explicitly recognized as evil, would afford a fresh starting-point for his growth. For such experience of evil, as has been said, would in any event—whether it was conquered or the conqueror—involve a rise in the intellectual scale. Had it been overcome, as it might have been overcome (for the act of Adam is represented as one of free choice), there would have been a rise in the spiritual scale as well. But in the event there was intellectual growth, accompanied by a descent to a lower spiritual level, from which it would be impossible for man to rise without the aid of divine grace. And so the Incarnation and the Atonement mark in the history of mankind a crisis as real, and introduce a force as potent, as when God created man in His own image.

Such a view of man's progress is in the strictest harmony alike with the Bible and with the teaching of modern science. For it is to be remembered that what science teaches us is that the history of man has been a history of development, but it does not and could not teach that this development has proceeded along the best conceivable lines.* It is no postulate of modern philosophy that this is the best of all possible worlds. And the Christian doctrine, that man as he presents himself to us in history and in life, though his education through the centuries has been divinely ordered, is not in the condition which was the divine intention for him, is a doctrine which receives verification from daily observation. The divine will has been thwarted, so to speak, by the perversity of the human will. And this has been recognized as the key to the problem of evil by men of all races and creeds. For what is the spectacle which the world of men presents? Newman has described it well in a splendid passage of his Apologia (ch. v.): 'To consider the world in its length and its breadth, its various history, the many races of man, their starts, their fortunes, their mutual alienation, their conflicts; and then their ways, habits, governments, forms of worship; their enterprises, their aimless courses, their random achievements and acquirements, the impotent conclusion of long-standing facts, the tokens so faint and broken of a superintending design, the blind evolution of what turn out to be great powers or truths, the progress of things, as if from unreasoning elements, not towards final causes, the greatness and littleness of man, his far-reaching aims, his short duration, the curtain hung over his futurity, the disappointments of life, the defeat of good, the success of evil, physical pain, mental anguish, the prevalence and intensity of sin, the pervading idolatries, the corruptions, the dreary, hopeless irreligion, that condition of the whole race, so fearfully yet exactly described in the apostle's words, "having no hope and without God in the world,"—all this is a vision to dizzy and appal; and inflicts upon the mind the sense of a profound mystery, which is absolutely beyond human solution. What shall be said to this heart-piercing, reason-bewildering fact? I can only answer, that either there is no Creator, or this living society of men is in a true sense discarded from His presence.' The 'outcast man' is, in short, the Great Exception. While every other living thing is striving for its good, man alone is found choosing what he knows to be for his hurt. And so to the believer in God his own experience confirms the eternal truth of the doctrine of the Fall. As Pascal says, 'De sorte que l'homme est plus inconcevable sans ce mystère, que ce mystère n'est inconcevable à l'homme.' That doctrine is indeed a datum of revelation; but it harmonizes well with what we know of ourselves and of others. There has been somewhere a backward step in the history of man, who was at the first created 'very good.' And the teaching of St. Paul about sin, stated in terms of the story of Gn 3, but based on the broad ground of observation and experience, gives, as we have seen, the rationale of this fact, and brings it into line with the revelation of the gospel. There are two points on which it is necessary to add a few concluding remarks.

* See Gore, Lux Mundi, pp. 535, 536, and the passage there cited from Aubrey Moore's Evolution and Christianity: 'the change which took place at the Fall was a change in the moral region; but it could not be without its effect elsewhere. Even the knowledge of nature becomes confused without the governing truth of the relation of man to God.'

(1) St. Paul, following Gn 2<sup>17</sup> and 3<sup>19</sup>, states that death came through sin (Ro 5<sup>12-14</sup>). It is tolerably plain that by 'death' he means physical death, although it has been interpreted of the death of the soul (see Sanday, in loc.). And he here seems to come into collision with natural science, which teaches that death must have been known upon the earth long before the human species appeared. For ages before the creation or evolution of man, death in the case of the lower animals must have been a necessary concomitant and condition of life. It is not apparent, however, that this touches St. Paul's argument; for he is speaking of the death of man. And in the case of man it may well be that had he remained faithful to the law of his being, as communicated to him by his Creator, death would have had no dominion over him. As has been said already, of the condition of primeval man we have little information; it was so utterly unlike anything of which we have experience that confident statements would be out of place. But, at all events, the death of a being made in the image of God is a phenomenon of an order entirely different from the death of a beast. Death is the portion of the latter; it is part of the divine intention for him. Not so, for man. For him there is a further destiny in store. And his sin, as it involves alienation from God, involves the withdrawal of that higher life which has been the assurance of immortality. We do not assert of Adam the non posse mori, but the posse non mori, as long as his fellowship with God, the source of life, was unbroken. But sin reduced him to the state of a lower animal, and thus man became the prey of death. It may well be that, as has been surmised by many of the profoundest of Christian philosophers, there is some intimate connexion between moral evil and physical decay for a composite being such as Scripture represents man to be. And in the Fall of Adam his whole race were thus involved; death passed upon them, not indeed as a punishment for something which a remote ancestor had done, but as the inevitable consequence of the sin of the head of the race. They inherit a degraded nature, which is subject to the laws of physical dissolution as is the nature of a beast. But man's normal condition, according to the OT, is not mortality, with the possibility of attaining immortality by a later gift; but life in God's fellowship, with the possibility of losing it and falling into a condition of an existence which is not life.* It is not by any means clear that it is within the power of natural science to negative this view.

(2) What may prove a more serious difficulty arises in connexion with the origin of the human race from a single pair, which seems to be presupposed in St. Paul's exposition of the parallelism between Adam and Christ. True, the unity of the race is not disproved by science; and it is believed by many on purely scientific grounds to be more probable than the hypothesis that mankind are descended from several pairs. But if the latter doctrine should command at any time the assent of the scientific world, it would be necessary to modify in some degree what has been said. This article has been written on the assumption that there is nothing contradictory to science in the doctrine of the unity of the human race as descended from common parents. This is certainly the doctrine expounded by St. Paul. But it is a matter which comes within the province of science; and should it ever be disproved, it would be necessary to admit that the apostle was using an illustration not scientifically apt in all respects. It must be observed, however, that in essentials nothing would have to be changed. The great truths, that sin began with the beginning of our race, that its baneful influence has been transmitted from generation to generation, that it is as widespread as mankind itself, that it cannot be eradicated without a gift of grace, are unaffected whether 'Adam' be taken as the name of a single individual, or as a term descriptive of the forefathers of the human species. The universality of sin is a sufficient indication that human nature has been corrupted at its base, whether by the fall of one or of several; and it would still remain true that 'as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive.' So much it has been deemed necessary to say, although at present the balance of evidence seems distinctly to favour the doctrine that mankind are descended from one common stock, and so to confirm the analogy drawn out by St. Paul. See also ADAM, ATONEMENT, JUSTIFICATION, HEREDITY, PARADISE, SACRIFICE, SIN.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the books already mentioned, the following may be consulted with profit: Ryle, Early Narratives of Genesis; Orr, Christian View of God and the World; Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man; Müller, Christian Doctrine of Sin. The subject is discussed in all treatises on Systematic Theology.

J. H. BERNARD.

FALLOW-DEER.—This word occurs in the AV among the clean animals (Dt 14<sup>5</sup>), and in the list of game furnished for Solomon's daily table (1 K 4<sup>23</sup>). In each list ayyāl, zēbī, and yāḥmūr occur in the same order. The first is correctly translated, both in AV and RV, hart (see HART). The second is incorrectly tr. in AV roebeek, and correctly in RV gazelle (see GAZELLE). The third is incorrectly tr. in AV fallow-deer, and, we think, correctly in RV roebeek (see ROEBECK).

G. E. POST.

FALSE WITNESS.—See LYING, OATH.

FAME.—The Gr. word φῆμη (from φημί, to declare, say) was used for a divine voice, oracle, and then for a report or common saying. The Lat. word fama, beginning, where φημη left off, with rumour or report, added to that the meaning of reputation or renown. The Eng. word 'fame,' though it once had all the meaning of Lat. fama, now retains only the sense of renown or celebrity. Thus in modern Eng. 'fame' is never a fair equivalent for φῆμη.

That in 1611 'fame' had the meaning (1) of report, and (2) also of renown, is certain. Thus: (1) Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, 1531 (Croft's ed. ii. 291), says, 'all Greece was in great fear for the fame that was sprad of the commynge of the Persians with an infinite armye.' So Tindale's tr. of Mt 24<sup>6</sup> (ed. of 1534) is, 'Ye shall heare of warres, and of the fame of warres' (Gr. ἀκούς; Wye. 'openyouns'; Tind. 1526 'noyse'; Cran. 'tidings'; Rhem. 'bruites'; Gen., Bish., AV, RV 'rumours'). And Bacon (Adv. of Learning, ii. xxi. 19) says, 'General fame is light, and the opinions conceived by superiors or equals are deceitful; for to such men are more masked; verior fama e domesticis emanat.' Again (2) in Shaks. (Troilus and Cressida, iii. iii. 228), Achilles says—

'I see my reputation is at stake;
My fame is shrewdly gored';

* Salmond, Christian Doctrine of Immortality, p. 220.

and in Henry V. III. ii. 13, Pistol sings, 'And sword and shield, In bloody day, Doth win immortal fame'; to which the Boy replies, 'Would I were in an ale-house in London! I would give all my fame for a pot of ale and safety.'

In AV both meanings appear, but the former most frequently. The only manifest examples of the meaning 'renown' are 1 K 4<sup>31</sup>, 1 Ch 14<sup>17</sup> 22<sup>5</sup>, Zeph 3<sup>19</sup>, where the Heb. is shēm 'a name.' When the Heb. is shēma' (Nu 14<sup>25</sup>, 1 K 10<sup>1</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>1</sup>, Job 28<sup>22</sup>, Is 66<sup>19</sup>), shēma' (Jos 6<sup>27</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>, Est 9<sup>1</sup>, Jer 6<sup>24</sup>), or shēmū'ah (1 K 10<sup>7</sup>, 2 Ch 9<sup>6</sup>), the meaning is not very distinctly marked, but the Heb. words are properly report, tidings (lit. 'hearing'); and in Job 28<sup>22</sup> (RV 'rumour') as well as in Jer 6<sup>24</sup> that is manifestly the sense. It is evident also that in the only remaining OT passage, Gn 45<sup>16</sup> (where the Heb. is kōl, lit. 'voice'), the sense is report. In NT that sense is probably the only one that occurs. The Gr. words are (1) φήμη, Mt 9<sup>36</sup>, Lk 4<sup>14</sup>, the only examples of the word, which is nearly as rare in LXX (Pr 16<sup>2</sup> [for shēmū'ah], 2 Mac 4<sup>30</sup>, 3 Mac 3<sup>2</sup>, 4 Mac 4<sup>22</sup>), with the verb διαφημίζω, Mt 9<sup>31</sup> (διαφημίσαν αὐτόν, 'they . . . spread abroad his fame'; Wyc. 1380 'thei . . . defameden hym,' 1388 'thei . . . diffameden hym,' from Vulg. diffamaverunt eum). (2) ἀκοή, lit. 'hearing,' Mt 4<sup>24</sup> 14<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>23</sup> (RV always 'report'). (3) ἠχος, 'echo,' Lk 4<sup>37</sup> the only occurrence of this meaning (RV 'rumour'). (4) λόγος, 'word,' Lk 5<sup>15</sup> (RV 'report'), which has this meaning also in Mt 28<sup>15</sup>, Jn 21<sup>23</sup> (EV 'saying'). In Apoc., on the other hand, we find only 1 Mac 3<sup>26</sup> 4<sup>1</sup>, both with the mod. sense of renown (Gr. δομα, 'name').

RV adds Jer 50<sup>43</sup> (Heb. shēma') for AV 'report.' 'Fame' is the Wyclifite tr<sup>n</sup> of 1388 here, 'report' having come from the Geneva Bible of 1560.

J. HASTINGS.

FAMILIAR.—'Familiar spirit' is the tr. in EV of Heb. ʾōbh wherever it occurs (except Job 32<sup>19</sup> where in plu. it means 'skin-bottles,' EV 'bottles,' RVm 'wine skins'), on which see Driver on Dt 18<sup>11</sup> and art. DEMON; also Van Hoonacker, 'Divination by 'Ob,' in Expos. Times, Jan. 1898. 'Familiar' has in this phrase the sense of the Lat. familiaris, belonging to one's family, and so to oneself, ready to serve one as a famulus or servant. The oldest example in Oxf. Eng. Dict. is Stow, Chron. (1565) 107, 'A familiar spirit which hee had . . . in likeness of a Catte.' But it is found in Geneva Bible of 1560, 1 S 28<sup>7</sup> bis etc., whence it passed into AV. Similar phrases seem to be older, as Prose Legends in Anglia, viii. 146 (14—), 'Hir caplyer aungel thet hadde hir in keypyng'; and Capgrave, Chron. 25 (1460), 'That same familiar devel.'

In Jer 20<sup>10</sup> we find the subst. 'familiaris' (Lat. familiaries), 'All my familiars watched for my halting,' for which RV gives 'familiar friends' as the same Heb. is tr. in Ps 41<sup>9</sup> AV and RV.

The Heb. is lit. 'man (or men) of my peace.' It occurs also Jer 38<sup>22</sup>, Ob 7. The most instructive occurrence is no doubt Ps 41<sup>9</sup>, and the meaning is there at least not simply 'acquaintances, those to whom I should give the ordinary salutation, Peace be with you' (Streane); but rather, as Cheyne, those who are specially attached to me by a covenant.

Illustrations of the subst. 'familiaris' are Knox, Hist. 38, 'they would chop their familiars on the cheek with it [the New Testament]'; and Hos 10<sup>14</sup> Cov. 'All thy stronge cities shalbe layed waist, euen as Salmana was destroyed with his familiars.'

J. HASTINGS.

FAMILY.—i. SCOPE, TERMS, AND DATA.—The term family is used in many different senses: (a) For larger or smaller groups of persons connected by blood or marriage, from the family in the narrowest sense—a man with his wives and children, and sometimes his mother—to the widest aggregate of kinsfolk between whom relationship is traced—the clan, tribe, nation, or even the human race. (b) In a looser sense for communities living in close and permanent intercourse, from the household—including dependants as well as kinsfolk—to the clan, etc., including persons not of the main stock. (c) In various fig. senses with which we are not concerned here. OT recognizes and connects the groups denoted by family in (a) and (b), but has no single term for them; still less has it any term corresponding to the Eng. family. בֵּית house, approaches most closely to the range of meaning of family in (a) and (b); in Gn 7<sup>1</sup> Noah with his wife and sons and daughters-in-law are called his house; we have also the house of David 2 S 3<sup>1</sup>, of Levi (i.e. tribe) Nu 17<sup>8</sup>, of Israel (i.e. the nation) Ex 16<sup>31</sup>. In P and Ch אָבִים, RV fathers' house, is a technical term for a subdivision of a tribe. The origin of these terms in the concrete dwelling connects them with (b), cf. similar use of אֹהֶל tent, in Ps 78<sup>57</sup> 83<sup>5</sup>. So also מִשְׁכָּנָה, EV family, is explained (Ges., Fuerst) as etymologically a union, obsolete אָוַן to join, but Buhl connects with Arab. saphaha, to pour out, and with שָׁפַח. 'It is strictly a clan, and is used in P and late writings (Nu 2, etc.) for the largest division of a tribe; but its meanings also range from the clan to the tribe (Jg 13<sup>3</sup>) and the nation (Jer 33<sup>24</sup>). Other terms are derived from the physical tie between kinsfolk, and connect with (a), זֶרַע seed (Gn 12<sup>7</sup>), עֶצֶם bone (Gn 29<sup>14</sup>), בָּשָׂר flesh (Gn 29<sup>14</sup>), בָּשָׂר flesh (Lv 18<sup>12</sup>), with its derivative שָׂרָא (Lv 18<sup>17</sup>), in the sense of blood-relation; the compounds of יָלַד bear, beget, offspring (Gn 48<sup>6</sup>), kinsfolk (Gn 31<sup>3</sup>), חֵילִית clans (Nu 1<sup>20</sup>). Also, young children collectively are בָּנֵי, אֶתְנָח take quick short steps. אֶתְנָח (Ezk 11<sup>15</sup>) is a misreading (Cornill, etc. i.l.).

This brief statement as to terms shows how the family was bound up with all the social and political arrangements of Israel. Hence it is difficult to draw any natural line of division between the family and other social and political groups, whose institutions are expressed in terms of the family, and derived in fact or theory from it. Moreover, it is often maintained that the idea of the family originated in a social group larger than and different from that consisting of a single man with his dependent women and children. If this is in any measure true, the relations between the family (in the narrower modern sense) and the larger social groups will be still more complicated. This article will be confined, as far as possible, to the family proper, and the larger social groups will be dealt with in the art. TRIBE; but it will be necessary to make some allusion to the relations of the family to the clan, etc.

The data for our subject are the narratives of the family life, esp. of the patriarchs, of Ruth, of David, and of Tobit; the laws dealing with the family; and the various allusions to the subject. OT narratives are, of course, valid authorities for the manners of the times in which they originated, whatever view may be held as to their historicity. Unfortunately, however, both narratives and—in a less degree—laws mostly treat of royal, noble, or wealthy families and their slaves, and we have little direct information as to the poorer free Israelites. Doubtless, the same general principles governed family life amongst all classes, and the wealthy families and their dependants constituted a large proportion of the population; but we have always to bear in mind that the familiar OT pictures are concerned chiefly with certain classes, and that for other cases we must allow for the effect of inferior rank and smaller means.

ii. MEMBERS.—The members of a Heb. family or household included some or all of the following:

the man, as supreme head of the household; his mother, if residing with him after the death of his father; his wives; his concubines; the wives' children; the concubines' children; children of other women, e.g. Jephthah (Jg 11<sup>4</sup>); daughters-in-law; sons-in-law, for example, Jacob with Laban; other free Isr. relatives, friends, or dependants; gerim or resident foreigners, EV 'the stranger that is within thy gates' (see GER); male and female slaves, Isr. and foreign, home-born and purchased. Thus the ancient Heb. was larger than the modern family; polygamy increased the number of women and children dependent on a single man; married sons and their families often remained in their father's household; the insecurity of primitive life led individual resident aliens, etc., to attach themselves to households.

(a) Husband's Mother.—חַמּוֹת hāmōth, AV and RV mother-in-law. In Mic 7<sup>8</sup> (quoted Mt 10<sup>35</sup>, Lk 12<sup>53</sup>) the hāmōth is perhaps the wife of the living head of the household; in Ru, Naomi, herself a widow, is the hāmōth of widows. But the hāmōth attained special importance and dignity when, after the death of her husband, her son became the head of the family. She was then the most important and influential woman in the household; a man had many wives, only one mother; he had been trained in deference and obedience to his mother; his wives were his property, and absolutely subject to his authority. They had often been selected by his mother, e.g. Ishmael's wife by Hagar (Gn 21<sup>21</sup>, cf. 2 Es 9<sup>47</sup>). In the history of the families best known to us—the royal houses of Isr. and Judah—there are numerous indications of the exalted position of the mother of the reigning king. She bears the title נָקִירָה mistress. Her name is regularly given in the paragraph describing an accession, while nothing is said about the wives. Maacah, Jezebel, Athaliah, and Nehushta (2 K 24<sup>8, 12, 14</sup>, cf. Jer 22<sup>26</sup>) appear as exercising great influence in the reigns of their sons. The analogy of modern Eastern life fully warrants us in taking the position of the queen-mother as representing that of the mother of the head of any ordinary family. Sometimes a widow herself appears as head of a household, e.g. Micah's mother (Jg 17<sup>10f</sup>), Naomi in Ru, the Shunammite (2 K 8<sup>1-9</sup>), Tobit's grandmother (To 1<sup>9</sup>); cf. also the position of the mother of our Lord during His ministry.

(b) Husband, Wives and Concubines.—The generic terms אִישׁ man, אִשָּׁה woman, are commonly used for husband and wife, as in most languages. This usage recognizes the fundamental nature of sexual characteristics. In spite of the similarity of the two words, Oxf. Heb. Lex. speaks of 'the impossibility of deriving אִשָּׁה and אִישׁ from the same root'; consequently, all deductions based on the reference of the two words to the same root are without any true foundation. The husband is אֲדָמָה master, as supreme over his wives, who are slaves acquired by capture in war (Dt 21<sup>10-14</sup>), or by purchase (Gn 34<sup>10</sup>, Ex 22<sup>16</sup>, Dt 22<sup>28</sup>, Ru 4<sup>10</sup>). It would be misleading to apply the term 'freewoman' to any Israelitess, except perhaps to a widow. Even in the Mishna, 'women, slaves, and children' are constantly grouped together, e.g. Berachoth, iii. 3, and 'a woman is always under the authority of her father until she is placed under the authority of her husband,' Ketuboth, iv. 3. The wife as in subjection to the ba'al is be'alāh (Is 54<sup>1</sup>). The rights of a husband over his wives were limited by affection and custom, by the terms of the marriage covenant or contract (Gn 31<sup>49, 50</sup>, To 7<sup>14</sup>), by the influence of the wife's family, also by certain specific laws. The marital supremacy involved the right of divorce at the husband's discretion. This is laid down in Dt 24<sup>1</sup>, which, however, imposes certain vague and obscure conditions, probably intended to discourage capricious divorce (Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 346). Is 50<sup>1</sup>, Jer 3<sup>8</sup> show that it was usual to give the divorced woman נָקִירָה 'a bill of divorce,' doubtless that she might be able to resist any attempt on his part to reclaim his rights over her, a divorced woman being in a sense an emancipated slave. Dt forbids a man to divorce his wife, if he has falsely charged her with unchastity before marriage (22<sup>13, 19</sup>), or if he himself seduced her and had been compelled to marry her in consequence (22<sup>28, 29</sup>). These enactments and the protest in Mal 2<sup>16</sup> point to a frequency of divorce. A wife could not divorce her husband (Benzinger, 341). Other limitations of the husband's rights were that he might not marry a sister of one of his living wives (Lv 18<sup>18</sup>); if a man hears his wife make a vow and does not disallow it at once, he may not do so afterwards (Nu 30<sup>11</sup>). Even if a woman has been purchased from her parents as a concubine (אִשָּׁה) and he does not wish to retain her, he may not sell her to strangers; he must either let her kinsfolk buy her back, or betroth her to one of his sons. If he takes another wife or concubine, he must either maintain the first in her full rights, or let her go free without payment (Ex 21<sup>7-11</sup>). Even a captive who has been taken to wife may not be sold as a slave, but if sent away must be dismissed free of payment (Dt 21<sup>10ff</sup>). Similarly, in modern Arabia it is held disgraceful to sell a concubine. The rights of a wife would necessarily include those of a concubine.

No very clear information is given as to the relative status of wives and concubines. אִשָּׁה woman, is sometimes used as a general term for a wife or concubine (Gn 30<sup>4</sup>); sometimes for wife as distinguished from concubine (1 K 11<sup>3</sup>). The words אִשָּׁה (in Hex., chiefly ED), אִשָּׁה (in Hex., chiefly JP), and אִשָּׁה, seem to be practically synonymous when used of concubines. In households where the person of every female slave was—with few exceptions—at the disposal of the master (Benzinger, 162), and where the relative status of the women depended chiefly on his favour, definite and nicely graduated distinctions were impossible. Amongst modern Mohammedans, a man may cohabit with any of his female slaves who is a Mohammedan, a Christian, or a Jewess; and, conversely, he cannot have as a slave a woman whom he acknowledges to be within the prohibited degrees of marriage (Lane, Arabian Nights, i. 55, 56). The only definite advantage claimed by wives over concubines is that their children should inherit a larger share, or even the whole, of their father's property, e.g. Sarah's claim for Isaac (Gn 21<sup>10</sup>). Nevertheless the wife, because her position was the result of her husband's favour, and was often guaranteed by powerful relatives, would often enjoy superior consideration, and exercise a greater influence. Sarah, Rachel, and Leah had slave-girls, שִׁפְפָּחוֹת (shēphāhōth), who were their own property; and when these became concubines, they were still under the authority of their mistresses. Polygamy is both recognized by the law and described in the history; nearly all the kings and judges of whom we have particulars have a large harem. Acc. to Justin (Trypho, 134), even in his time Jewish teachers permitted each man to have four or five wives (cf. Jos. Ant. xvii. i. 2; Mishna, Kedushin, ii. 7, etc.). But considerations of expense and the approximately equal numbers of the two sexes place narrow limits on polygamy. Nowack (Heb. Arch. i. 159) points out that Abraham and Elkanah have two wives, that אִשָּׁה 'adversary' is a technical term for one of two wives, and that Dt 21<sup>16ff</sup> speaks of two wives, one beloved, the other hated. He thinks that such bigamy would be very common. In the nature of the case, a large proportion of the population must have been monogamous; cf. the cases of Adam (Gn 2<sup>22-24</sup>), Noah and his sons (6<sup>18</sup> 7<sup>13</sup> 8<sup>18</sup>), Lot (19<sup>15</sup>), Isaac, and Joseph. Probably, the monogamy of these patriarchs is narrated as an example. The family quarrels arising out of polygamy are sufficiently illustrated from the familiar examples of Sarah and Hagar, Rachel and Leah, Hannah and Peninnah, and the family history of David (cf. Sir 37<sup>11</sup> 26<sup>7</sup> where ἀντιζήλον = πῆγ). On the other hand, Heb. family life must be judged from the point of view of the ancient East, and not from that of the modern West. From the former, there was nothing immoral in polygamy, and the status of wives and concubines was neither regarded by others nor felt by themselves to be humiliating. The acrostic on the Capable Woman, ʿisheth hayil (Pr 31<sup>10-31</sup>), testifies to the honourable position of the faithful wife.

We have little information as to the marriages of slaves; apparently, the tie between them was not very binding. A couple who had come into a master's possession as a married couple were to be released together at the end of six years; but if, after a man became a slave, his master married him to another slave, and children were born, the man either went away alone, or remained a slave for the sake of his family (cf. MARRIAGE, WOMAN).

(c) Parents and Children.—The etymologies of אב father, אם mother, are quite uncertain; they are common to most Sem. languages, are apparently connected with the terms for father and mother in the Aryan and other families of languages, and are probably older than the triliteral roots. בן son and its fem. בת have been somewhat improbably connected with בנה to build; they too, also, are probably older than the triliteral roots. The father was supreme over the children; he could dispose of the daughter in marriage (Gn 29), [but (Lv 19<sup>29</sup>) he might not make her a prostitute], and arrange his son's marriage (Gn 24), or sell his children as slaves (Ex 21<sup>7</sup>)—where, however, the father is forbidden to sell his daughter to a stranger (Neh 5<sup>5</sup>). The power of life and death is attested by the proposed sacrifice of Isaac, the case of Jephthah's daughter, and the practice of sacrificing children to Molech (Lv 18<sup>21</sup> 20<sup>2-5</sup>, 2 K 23<sup>10</sup>, Jer 32<sup>35</sup>). The utmost respect and obedience to both father and mother are insisted on in Ex 20<sup>12</sup>, Lv 19<sup>3</sup>, Dt 5<sup>16</sup>, Pr 1<sup>8</sup> 6<sup>20</sup> 19<sup>26</sup> 20<sup>30</sup> 23<sup>22</sup> 23<sup>24</sup> 30<sup>11,17</sup>, cf. Ezk 22<sup>7</sup>, Mic 7<sup>9</sup>. Similarly, Ex 21<sup>15,17</sup>, Lv 20<sup>9</sup> direct that any one smiting or cursing father or mother shall be put to death; Dt 27<sup>16</sup> invokes a curse upon any one who is disrespectful to father or mother. Pr 13<sup>24</sup> etc. insist on the duty of strict domestic discipline, though doubtless the 'rod' may be understood as including other chastisement besides corporal punishment (cf. Pr 17<sup>10</sup>). Dt 21<sup>18-21</sup> directs that a stubborn and rebellious son, a glutton and a drunkard, is to be stoned to death by his fellow-citizens, on the testimony of his father and mother given before the elders. Such laws really imposed limits on the authority of the father; he must not himself put his son to death, but must procure his punishment by a public legal process. The constant co-ordination of father and mother in such passages practically places the mother on the same level with the father with regard to the children. Indeed, polygamy makes each mother much more important to her own children than their father is. In a polygamous family, each mother and her children form a sub-family,—Jacob's wives and concubines have separate tents (Gn 31<sup>20</sup>),—the management of which is in the hands of the mother. Hence the early education and training of children was mostly given by the mother. Children were named by the mother, e.g. Jacob's sons (Gn 29, 30); sometimes also by the father, e.g. Ishmael (Gn 16<sup>15</sup>), Isaac (Gn 21<sup>3</sup>). The long period of suckling—infants were not weaned till the second or third year—must have constituted an added bond between mother and children. The religious instruction appointed in Ex 12<sup>21-27</sup> 13<sup>5-9</sup>, Dt 4<sup>9</sup> 6<sup>7, 20-25</sup> 11<sup>19</sup> would probably be given by the mother. The sayings of king Lemuel (Pr 31<sup>1-9</sup>) were taught him by his mother. On the other hand, Pr constantly refers to the māsār (RV 'instruction') of the father, as well as to the tôrāh (RVm 'teaching') of the mother (1<sup>8</sup>). Acc. to the rank and wealth of the family, the care of the children would devolve in whole or in part on female slaves. Rebekah (Gn 24<sup>59</sup>) and Joash ben-Ahaziah (2 K 11<sup>2</sup>) had each a foster-mother mēneketh (RV 'nurse'), though Rebekah, at any rate, had a mother living. Mephibosheth ben-Jonathan had au ʿomeneth (RV 'nurse,' 2 S 4<sup>5</sup>). The grandmother, on either side, would, by all analogy, have much to say about the training of the children; Naomi became the ʿomeneth of Ruth's baby (Ru 4<sup>16</sup>). We also have the masculine ʿōmēn (RV 'nursing father,' Nu 11<sup>12</sup>, Is 49<sup>23</sup>). From the analogy of the guardians of the sons of Ahab (2 K 10<sup>1-5</sup>), and of Nathan (2 S 12<sup>25</sup>), this would appear to have been a kind of tutor or παιδαγωγός. Schools for children are first mentioned in Josephus (Ant. xv. x. 5) and Mishna (Shab. i. 3). Acc. to Talm. Jerus. (Kethub. viii. 11) the first school for children was established by Simeon ben-Shetach, a century before Christ (Stapfer, 141); acc. to Talm. Bab. Baba Bathra (Nowack, i. 172), a system of schools in every town was established by Jesus ben-Gamla, who became high priest in A.D. 64. In such schools reading and writing would be taught; any other instruction would mainly consist of committing Scripture, etc., to memory, by repeating passages after the teacher.

(d) Brothers and Sisters.—The circumstances of Israelite life—the need of labour to till the soil, and of warriors to defend the homestead from the raids of neighbouring tribes, rendered a large family a great blessing (Ps 127<sup>4-5</sup>). The natural checks—war, famine, and pestilence—prevented all danger of over-population. The labour of girls in the household, the price that might be obtained for them as wives or concubines, and the alliances with powerful neighbours that might result from their marriages, gave a certain value to daughters; but the Isr. father's chief desire was for sons; it was the first-born sons who were sacred to J<sup>h</sup> (Ex 22<sup>29</sup>). The physical token—circumcision—of the national covenant with J<sup>h</sup> is such as can be borne only by males; a mother is unclean for 14 days after bearing a daughter, but only for 7 after the birth of a son. Daughters are very rarely mentioned by name.

Each sub-family of full brothers and sisters, the children of one mother, had interests of its own, which clashed with those of the other sub-families. Domestic friction was specially strong in the numerous smaller households where there were two wives, e.g. Hannah and Peninnah [cf. the term אָרָה (Dt 21<sup>15-17</sup>), and for two wives in a large household, Sarah and Hagar]. The relative status of the sub-families depended on the family relationships of the mother, the favour shown her by her husband, and in some measure on her being wife or concubine. We have already seen that claims were sometimes made that the children of a wife should oust those of a concubine from all or part of their share of the family inheritance. But these claims are not sustained by any legal ordinance or even by any general custom. The sons of Jacob's concubines rank as ancestors of tribes. It is true that they are reckoned in a sense as children of their mothers' mistresses, but the same was true of Ishmael, who was excluded from the seed of the promise. There was no difference of legitimacy in our sense between the sons of wives and concubines; even Jephthah, the son of a zônâh or prostitute, is brought up in his father's house, and his expulsion is evidently regarded as an act of unjust violence (Jg 11<sup>1-7</sup>) (Benzinger, 148, 135). Apparently, all a man's acknowledged children were legitimate, without regard to the status of their mother. The bastard, mamzêr (Dt 23<sup>3</sup> [EV<sup>2</sup>], Zec 9<sup>6</sup>), is generally regarded as the offspring of incest or adultery (Dillm. and Driver on Dt 23<sup>2</sup>). Possibly, however, mamzêr may include children of prostitutes, whose fathers were unknown or did not acknowledge them.

In earlier times polygamous sub-families were so distinct that brothers married half-sisters, e.g. Abraham and Sarah (Gn 20<sup>12</sup>). In 2 S 13<sup>13</sup> Tamar thinks that David would certainly sanction her marriage with her half-brother. Such unions are, however, forbidden by Lv 18<sup>3</sup>.

The same causes which rendered the mother more important to her children than the father, often rendered the brothers the special guardians of their full sisters, e.g. Laban of Rebekah, Simeon and Levi of Dinah (Gn 34), Absalom of Tamar. So, children often maintained a close connexion with their mother's family, Jacob (Gn 27<sup>43</sup>), Abimelech ben-Gideon (Jg 9<sup>1</sup>), Absalom (2 S 3<sup>3</sup>, 13<sup>37</sup>).

The sons were the heirs, but in the absence of sons the daughters might inherit, and after the daughters other male relatives in order of kinship (Nu 27<sup>1-11</sup>). A special birthright and a larger share of the inheritance were given to the first-born, both in the history (Gn 49<sup>3</sup>) and the law (Ex 22<sup>29</sup>); but the bēkhôrâh, or right of the first-born, was not purely a matter of priority of birth, it might be sold, e.g. by Esau to Jacob, or bestowed on a younger son by a partial father, Dt 21<sup>17</sup>—which forbids such a practice. Side by side, however, with the first-born, the youngest son constantly appears as the object of special favour, both from God and his parents, e.g. Abraham, Isaac, Bethuel, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim, Moses, David, Solomon (cf. HEIR).

(e) Married Children, Daughters-in-law, Sons-in-law.—A married son would remain part of the father's family, though not necessarily of his household, while the father lived. He would still be in some measure subject to his authority. The patriarchs were married men with families when Isr. went down into Egypt, but Jacob was still the head of the family (cf. Job 1). So the daughter-in-law joined her husband's family and came under the authority of her father-in-law (To 10<sup>12</sup>), to whom she was subject even after her husband's death, e.g. Judah and Tamar (Gn 38). If her father-in-law was dead, she belonged to her brother-in-law or husband's next-of-kin (Dt 25<sup>2</sup>, Ru 3<sup>13</sup>), or might remain with her mother-in-law (Ru 1<sup>9</sup>). Sometimes, however, a man joined his wife's family, at any rate for a time, and fell under the authority of his father-in-law, e.g. Jacob (Gn 29-31), Moses (Ex 22<sup>20-22</sup> 4<sup>18</sup>, cf. Gn 24<sup>2</sup>; see § v.).

(f) Other free Dependents.—Doubtless, more distant relatives, cousins, etc., friends and free servants, would sometimes form part of the family in the narrower sense; but we have hardly any information on the subject. Little is said as to hired servants; probably they were hired only for short periods, and did not form part of the employer's family. Micah's Levite, indeed, was hired to be a priest permanently at a regular stipend, 'and the young man was unto him as one of his sons' (Jg 17<sup>14</sup>). The resident alien, gēr (R<sup>V</sup> 'stranger'), tôshabh (R<sup>V</sup> 'stranger' or 'sojourner'), is constantly referred to, and is commended to the good offices of the Israelites. The gēr is mentioned in close connexion with the other dependent members of the household (Ex 20<sup>10</sup>, Lv 25<sup>9</sup>). He seems to have placed himself under the protection of the family rather than the clan; he probably rendered some services in return for protection and sustenance, and may often have been a hired servant; he was evidently a familiar figure in Isr. society. The gēr was united to his hosts by close ties. His legal status and personal safety depended upon their protection, and they were bound by the sacred obligations of Eastern hospitality to care for him as for one of their own kin. He was entitled to the Sabbath rest (Ex 20<sup>10</sup>), and to eat the passover if he became circumcised (Ex 12<sup>18</sup>). See GER, HIRED SERVANT, STRANGER.

(g) Slaves.—The slave was substantially one of the family. The master's authority over him did not differ essentially from that over wives and children, and the wife was purchased like the slave. Conversely, a female slave might become a concubine, and a male might marry his master's daughter (1 Ch 23<sup>4, 35</sup>), or become his heir (Gn 15<sup>9</sup>). Slaves were circumcised and ate the passover. The yēlidh bayith, or home-born slave, would have the closest, and the purchased Isr. slave, who had to be released at the end of six years, the loosest ties to his master's family. We gather, however, from Jer 34<sup>14</sup> that the custom of releasing Isr. slaves was not strictly observed. See SLAVE.

iii. MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITY.—In primitive times the family, in a narrower or wider sense, was the efficient social organization; and such functions of modern government as were discharged at all were represented by the mutual claims and duties of kinsfolk. Many laws and customs of Isr. are a legacy from this primitive system. In ancient times the only protection for life or property lay in men's willingness to defend and avenge their kinsmen. This right and duty is still recognized in OT; the next-of-kin, gō'el, must punish his kinsman's murderer, marry his widow if the deceased was childless, and may inherit his property. See GOEL, and section on Levirate Marriage under MARRIAGE. One would suppose that this strong sense of family duty would have led kinsfolk to provide for destitute relatives. But men were often obliged to sell themselves or their children for slaves, and widows and orphans are constantly spoken of as poor, helpless, and oppressed. Doubtless, the ordinary calamities—drought, dearth, famine, pestilence, invasion—would often ruin whole clans at the same time; but it is also clear that family feeling was no adequate substitute for legal provision for the poor.

iv. FAMILY RELIGION.—As the nation had its religious symbol of circumcision, its sanctuaries, sacrifices, priests, and festivals, so the family had its special sacra. According to Benzing, 137, and Nowack, 154, following Stade, etc., the Israelite family was essentially a society bound together by common religious observances, Cultgenossenschaft. Thus, in the patriarchal narratives, the patriarchs, as head of the family, erect altars and offer sacrifices; similarly, the passover was a family rite, observed in the home, often, of course, temporary. In 1 S 20<sup>29</sup> we read of clan-sacrifice, zebah mish-pāhāh, at Bethlehem. The family burying-place is sacred (Gn 23). Benzing and Nowack see in the cutting off of the hair and the self-mutilation forbidden in Dt 14<sup>16</sup>, Lv 19<sup>27, 28</sup>, remains of ancient ancestor worship; cf. the practice of necromancy (1 S 28). Teraphim are usually understood to have been images or symbols of ancestors. In later times the instruction directed to be given in Dt 6 would be matter for the family; and the regulations as to ceremonial cleanness tended to make the whole personal and family life a continuous series of religious observances. The later system, however, differed from the former in that in primitive times each family had rites peculiar to itself, in later times all families practised the same rites.

v. EARLY HISTORY OF THE FAMILY.—Under the monarchy, the family was constituted under the headship of the father, who was supreme over wives and children, and primogeniture was recognized in the transmission of authority (royal, priestly, etc.) and property. The Hex. traces these institutions back to the origin of the human race in Adam and Eve; at the same time it preserves many incidents which have been held to point to an altogether different state of affairs in early times. It is maintained by W. R. Smith and others that the head of the family was originally the mother (mother-right, matriarchate), and that descent was traced only through the mother. Marriage was then polyandrous (of which the levirate marriage is supposed to be a relic), and be'ena marriage, in which the man becomes one of the wife's family, and goes into her tent (cf. § 7 and Gn 24), as opposed to ba'al marriage, where the wife enters her husband's family. This view is based partly on parallels amongst other primitive peoples, and esp. amongst the Arabs; and partly on various traces in OT, some of which have been already mentioned. In connexion with this theory, it has also been maintained that exogamous totem-clans existed in ancient Israel. Such clans are united by the use of a common badge, connected with some animal or plant after which the clan was named; inter-marriage between members of the clan is regarded as incest, and the totem may not be eaten. One example cited is the clan Caleb (dog), the dog being unclean (Dt 14<sup>6</sup>), and its flesh forbidden food. Even if it should ultimately be proved that such theories are partly true, it is clear that be'ena marriages and totemism were obsolete and forgotten in historic Israel, and that they can be traced only in customs whose original significance was no longer understood.

vi. THE FAMILY IN APOCR. AND NT.—Throughout the Bible, but esp. in the later books of OT, in Apocr., and in NT, the sacred history refers incidentally to the family institutions of numerous Gentile nations; but any general treatment of these would be beyond the scope of biblical archaeology. Various subjects raise special questions of this nature, and these are dealt with in the articles on those subjects.

Our data do not point to any regular development in the later history of the Jewish family. Its character and principles were as permanent as social institutions mostly are in the East. Features of OT family life reappear in Apocr., NT, and Talm., and still persist amongst modern Arabs and Syrians. The family history of the Herods is very similar to that of David.

The Pent.—some of whose laws embody the most primitive customs of Israel—remained to the last the authoritative code of Judaism. Probably, however, much of the Pent. legislation was always a mere counsel of perfection, and other portions were obsolete in NT times. Often discussions in the Talm. are purely academic arguments on regulations which had no bearing on actual life. But if there was no continuous development of Jewish life, it would still vary with varying circumstances. For instance, under a strong, well-organized government, like that of some of the Jewish kings, of the Herods and the Romans, the jurisdiction of the head of the family and private blood-revenge would be controlled and limited. The settlement of a large Gentile population in Pal., and the dispersion of the Jews throughout the ancient world, would sometimes modify, sometimes also accentuate, the observance of Jewish customs. Probably, Western influences reinforced the tendency to monogamy, which we have already noticed in OT. It is doubtful whether 1 Ti 3<sup>2-12</sup>, Tit 1<sup>9</sup> inculcate monogamy, cf. 1 Ti 5<sup>9</sup>. Our Lord's limitation of divorce (Mt 5<sup>31-32</sup>) followed the teaching of Shammai.

LITERATURE.—For the early history of the family, W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, and 'Animal Worship and Animal Tribes among the Arabs and in OT' in Journ. of Philology, vol. ix.; J. F. McLennan, Primitive Marriage, and the essay on 'Totem-Clans in OT' in Joseph Jacobs' Studies in Bibl. Archaeology; Bertholet, Die Stellung d. Isr. u. Jud. z. d. Fremden, esp. pp. 1-80. For the Bible history, the sections on the Family, and the laws of Marriage, Divorce, Parents and Children, etc., in Ewald, Altenthümer<sup>3</sup> (Eng. tr. The Ant. of Isr. from 1st ed. 1844); Keil, Handb. der Bibl. Arch.<sup>2</sup> 1875; Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 1894; Nowack, Lehrb. der Heb. Arch. 1894; J. F. McCurdy, Hist. Proph. and the Monuments, ii. 36-77; Dillmann and Driver on the passages from Pent., for OT; Schürer, HJP, for NT; also art. in Herzog's RE; Schenkel's Bibellez.; Riehm's IWB.

W. H. BENNETT.

FAMINE (צָרָה, lamós) in Syria and Egypt in past times may be attributed to four causes—

- i. Want of water, i.e. rainfall or inundations, in due season.
- ii. Destruction of corn and fruit by hail and rain out of season.
- iii. " of all growing crops by locusts and caterpillars.
- iv. " of food supplies by the hand of man.

i. Owing to the want of water in due season the famine might be widespread in extent, but in other cases it would be only partial and local. In the train of famine always comes sickness, which develops into pestilence and other scourges according to the intensity of the want and privation to which the people and flocks and herds are subjected. In prehistoric times famines may have been due to a failure of rain at any time of the year, as the people were dependent upon the spontaneous vegetation for the sustenance of themselves, their herds, and their flocks; but, after agriculture was introduced, the severity of famines could be much mitigated by storing up reserves of corn, thus enabling the bulk of the people to live independently of their herds and flocks; and famines would result more from the failure of rain in due season, that is to say, at the time when it was required for the early growth of the corn. For the plenteous years cf. Lv 26<sup>44</sup>. 'Then I will give your rains in their season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time; and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely.' The opposite condition of things is described in Lv 26<sup>19f.</sup>. 'And I will make your heaven as iron and your earth as brass; and your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruit.' In countries which depend upon the natural rainfall for the growth of cereals, and not upon irrigation and inundations, recurrence of rain in due season is a matter of the utmost importance; and scarcity of wheat and barley may be due, not to any want of rain, but to its fall at a wrong season—for example, in summer time, instead of during the winter and spring.

The Wilderness of the Wanderings or Desert of Arabia Petraea, in common with those east of Pal., differs greatly from Syria and Egypt in its food supplies; but it is only in comparison with the extraordinary fertility of Syria and Egypt that it can be considered as a desert. It has, from the earliest time, consisted of arid tablelands, mountainous districts, and sandy dunes, intersected by fertile valleys and plains and cultivable tablelands, and its present parched and barren condition is due in a great measure to the action of the Turkish Government in drawing a revenue from the destruction of trees. There are in all directions ruins of vineyards and terraces on the slopes of hills, indicating former cultivation; and there are yet tablelands where corn is cultivated, and plains where there are thousands of date trees. The nomadic tribes do not exist solely on the produce of their herds and flocks, but from the earliest historic times have used corn for food, and have cultivated corn for themselves, either in conjunction with neighbouring villages or by means of slave labour. There is a scanty herbage at all times over a great portion of this wilderness, and in January and February water and grasses are found everywhere, and the flocks can roam about at will. During November, December, and March there are dense mists and fogs and heavy dews, which saturate the shrubs and even deposit moisture on the rocks, so that flocks do not require to go to water. These mists depend upon the direction of the wind, and alternate with intense droughts. As the summer advances the pasture is confined principally to the broad water-courses, which give good herbage for many weeks: as the drought increases the inhabitants are reduced to great straits, having to live with their flocks on pastures many miles (sometimes twenty miles) from water. The flocks are driven over to the water once or twice a week, and a small quantity is brought back for the use of the encampment. These nomads and their flocks are of the most hardy nature, and can go without water for many hours or even for days; but they live for a portion of each year on the borderland of famine, and a very little extra scarcity brings on such want and privations that they, with their flocks, either move on to more favoured localities or die.

Egypt has always been remarkable for its extreme fertility, and is well watered everywhere (Gn 13<sup>10</sup>). It is not directly dependent on rainfall, the annual flooding of the river Nile inundating nearly the whole land and making the cultivation of the soil, as a general rule, a yearly certainty: a land where 'thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs' (Dt 11<sup>10</sup>). These inundations are caused by the rainfall over the districts where the Nile rises, and they fail at rare intervals. This exposes the land to drought, and famine ensues from want of corn, and in a minor degree the pasturage also fails.

The extraordinary fertility of the Promised Land is constantly alluded to in the Bible: 'a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven' (Dt 11<sup>11</sup>). 'I will give the rain of your land in its season, the former rain, and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil' (v. 14). Its soil is of a very rich description, and formerly clothed the hillsides in terraces, though now, for the most part, it lies at the bottom of the valleys. Although Pal. has been dependent mainly on its rainfall, its streams have been utilized largely for irrigation purposes in the plains and in the Jordan Valley, and on the banks of the Jordan itself the rich soil is subject to inundations in the spring (Jos 3<sup>15</sup>).

The first famines mentioned in the Bible are those which occurred in the times of Abraham and Isaac (Gn 12<sup>10</sup> 26<sup>1</sup>). In the first case, Abraham went down into Egypt to sojourn there; in the second case, Isaac was about to do the same, but, being warned by God, went to Gerar to reside with Abimelech, king of the Philistines. It may be assumed that these famines were only partial in their extent.

The famine which took place in the time of Jacob was one of great extent, as it included Syria, Egypt, and the sources of the Nile, and was one of great severity and long duration; it is recorded that 'there was famine in all lands' (Gn 41<sup>54</sup>). It lasted seven years, and was remarkable as having been preceded by seven years of plenty, which being foretold by Joseph, the Egypt. Government was enabled to gather up sufficient corn, not only to buy up all the lands and cattle of the Egyptians and to supply the people, but also to sell corn to foreigners. 'And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because the famine was sore in all the earth' (Gn 41<sup>57</sup>). It is to be noted, however, that this is a famine restricted to want of corn, and that there is no indication that there was great want of pasturage. The sons of Jacob were able to take their asses to and from Egypt without difficulty. Waggoners were sent to bring up Jacob and his households. 'And their father Israel said unto them, If it be so now, do this; take of the choice fruits of the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spicery, and myrrh, nuts and almonds' (Gn 43<sup>11</sup>). 'And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt' (Gn 46<sup>6</sup>).

Famines are mentioned in the time of the judges (Ru 1<sup>1</sup>), and in the time of king David (2 S 21<sup>1</sup>), but it is not until the time of Elijah that any account is given of the failure of the pasturage and springs. 'There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word' (1 K 17<sup>1</sup>). 'And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go through the land, unto all the fountains of water, and unto all the brooks: peradventure we may find grass and save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts' (18<sup>8</sup>). Amongst the signs of the end in Jesus' eschatological discourse are 'famines in divers places' (Mt 24<sup>7</sup>, Mk 13<sup>8</sup>, Lk 21<sup>11</sup>). For the famine referred to in Ac 11<sup>28</sup>, see CLAUDIUS.

ii. A graphic description of destruction of crops by hail is given Ex 9<sup>23</sup>. 31. 32. 'The LORD sent thunder and hail, and fire ran down unto the earth; and the LORD rained hail upon the land of Egypt.' 'And the flax and the barley were smitten, for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was balled. But the wheat and the spelt were not smitten; for they were not grown up.' The unusual occurrence of thunder and rain in the time of wheat harvest is accentuated in 1 S 12<sup>16</sup>.

iii. The effect of the destruction of crops by plagues of locusts is depicted Ex 10<sup>15</sup>. 'For they covered the face of the whole earth, so that the land was darkened; and they did eat every herb of the land, and all the fruit of the trees which the hail had left; and there remained not any green thing, either tree or herb of the field, through all the land of Egypt.' Again, Jl 1<sup>4</sup>. 'That which the palmer-worm hath left hath the locust eaten; and that which the locust hath left hath the canker-worm eaten; and that which the canker-worm hath left hath the caterpillar eaten.' (See Driver, ad loc.)

iv. The most terrible results of famine related in the Bible are due to the hand of man; and this was well recognized by king David. 'And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait; let us fall now into the hand of the LORD; for his mercies are great: and let me not fall into the hand of man' (2 S 24<sup>14</sup>). 'And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy ground, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee corn, wine, or oil, the increase of thy kine, or the young of thy flock, until he have caused thee to perish' (Dt 28<sup>21</sup>). 'And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons, and of thy daughters, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall straiten thee' (v. 23). 'And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver' (2 K 6<sup>28</sup>). 'And she answered, This woman said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow' (v. 28).

Josephus, in his Antiquities and Wars of the Jews, gives several accounts of the horrible atrocities which took place during the famines in besieged cities, but in no account does he give such distressing details as in the story of the last siege of Jerus. by Titus, in which he sums up that 'neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries' (Wars, v. x. 5). This account of Josephus is considered to be a description of the fulfilment of the prophecy by our Lord (Mt 24<sup>21</sup>), 'For then shall be great tribulation, such as hath not been since the beginning of the world until now, no, nor ever shall be,' and is the history of the last famine connected with the Bible.

In the Bible there is no allusion to horrors and privations due to famine such as occur periodically in the world at the present time in the overcrowded portions of China and India.

C. WARREN.

FAMISH.—Occurring but four times in all, 'famish' is thrice used transitively. Zeph 2<sup>11</sup> 'he will famish all the gods of the earth' (רָקַה, lit. as AVm 'will make lean'); Gn 41<sup>55</sup> 'And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread' (תַּרְעָק); Is 5<sup>13</sup> 'their honourable men are famished' (בָּבוּלוֹ קָטִי רָקַה, lit. as AVm and RVm, 'their glory are men of famine,' but the reading is doubtful, see esp. Driver on Dt 32<sup>24</sup>). This transitive use of 'famish' may be illustrated by Coverdale's tr. of Jl 1<sup>20</sup> 'the shepe are famished away,' and Shaks. Tam. of Shrew, IV. iii. 3—

'What, did he marry me to famish me?'

Tit. Andron. v. iii. 179—

'Set him breast-deep in earth, and famish him';

and Milton, PL xii. 78—

'Thin air
Above the clouds will pine his entrails gross,
And famish him of breath, if not of bread.'

The intrans. occurrence is Pr 10<sup>3</sup> 'The Lord will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish.' The Heb., translated 'suffer to famish,' is the same (though in Hiphil) as in Gn 41<sup>55</sup>, and scarcely means more than 'cause to hunger'; so that the statement loses some of its comfort under the Eng. translation, if it does not even lose all its point.

J. HASTINGS.

FAN, FANNER.—Fan is used both as verb and as substantive. 1. As verb (Heb. נָחַר in Qal) Is 41<sup>16</sup> 'Thou shalt fan them [the mountains and hills], and the wind shall carry them away'; Jer 4<sup>11</sup> for purifying; 15<sup>7</sup> for chastisement; and (same Heb. in Piel) Jer 51<sup>2</sup>. Amer. RV has 'winnow' throughout. 2. As subst. 'a winnowing-machine,' Is 30<sup>24</sup>, Jer 15<sup>7</sup> (נִיחָרָה); Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 3<sup>17</sup> (πύλος). Fanner occurs only in Jer 51<sup>2</sup> 'I will send unto Babylon fanners, that shall fan her, and shall empty her land.' The Heb. of the Massoretic pointing (נָחַרִים) means 'strangers,' and so RV after Ewald and others. But the VSS (LXX. Pesh. Targ. Vulg.) point the Heb. differently (נָחַרִים), and gain the word-play. Cheyne thinks the prophet possibly intended to suggest both meanings. The Eng. tr. may be traced from the Vulg. ventilatores, through Cov. 'fanners,' whom Geneva, Bishops', Douay, and AV all follow. So also Luther (Worfler), and Rothstein in Kautsch; and the French translators Ostervald and Segond (van-neurs). See AGRICULTURE.

J. HASTINGS.

FANCY is used as a verb absolutely in Sir 34<sup>5</sup> 'And the heart fancieth, as a woman's heart in travail' (φαντάζεται; a verb which occurs elsewhere in LXX only Wis 6<sup>16</sup>, 'showeth herself,' and in NT only He 12<sup>21</sup> τὸ φανταζόμενον, AV 'the sight,' RV 'the appearance'). The previous Eng. Versions from Wyc. have 'fantasie' as a subst. (Douay 'phantasy'), AV is the first to use the verb, and to spell 'fancy.*' The Oxf. Eng. Dict. gives only one example of 'fancy' used absolutely, Locke (1698) 'we rather fancie than know.'

J. HASTINGS.

FAR.—1. 'Far' is often used in AV as an adj. qualifying 'country,' as Is 8<sup>9</sup> 'all ye of far countries' (בְּלִי קָרְתֵּי-אֶרֶץ); Zec 10<sup>9</sup> 'they shall remember me in far countries' (בְּקִרְתֵּי-אֶרֶץ). Twice it

* On the spelling Trench (Study of Words, 301) may be quoted: 'When "fancy" was spelt "phantasy," as by Sylvester, in his translation of Du Bartas, and other scholarly writers of the 17th cent., no one could doubt of its identity with "phantasy," as no Greek scholar could miss its relation with φαντασία.'

qualifies other substantives, Dt 29<sup>22</sup> 'a far land' (אֶרֶץ רְחוֹקָה); Mk 13<sup>34</sup> 'a man taking a far journey' (ἀνθρώπος ἀποδύμενος, RV 'sojourning in another country'). Modern usage would probably require 'distant,' as Aldis Wright suggests. Certainly as an adj. 'far' was once used more freely than it is now: thus, Bp. Barlowe, Dialogue (1531), ed. of 1897, p. 35, 'Now to compare these fruites unto the actes of these Lutheran factyons, ye shall fynde a farre difference.' In Mt 21<sup>33</sup> 25<sup>14</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1</sup>, Lk 20<sup>9</sup>, where the Greek is ἀποδημεῖω and AV has 'go into a far country,' RV more accurately translates 'go into another country.' But the same Greek is rendered by AV 'took his journey' in Mt 25<sup>15</sup>, by RV 'went on his journey'; and in Lk 15<sup>13</sup>, where the Greek is more fully ἀπεδήμησεν εἰς χώραν μακράν, AV renders 'took his journey unto a far country,' and RV retains.

2. Notice the phrases: (a) thus far, Jer 48<sup>47</sup> 'Thus far is the judgment of Moab,' 51<sup>64</sup> 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah' (both עַד-הֵנָּה), and Lk 22<sup>51</sup> 'Suffer ye thus far' (ὥς τούτων). (b) So far forth='to such an extent,' 1 Es 1<sup>52</sup> (ὥς οὗ). (c) Be it far from or far be it from. This phrase, which comes from Wyclif (esp. ed. 1388) after Vulg. absit hoc, occurs eight times in AV of OT as the translation of hātūlāh, a substantive formed from hālal, to profane, with locative suffix, therefore lit. ad profanum! to the unholy! The passages are Gn 18<sup>25 bis</sup>, 1 S 23<sup>20</sup> 20<sup>25</sup>, 2 S 20<sup>20 bis</sup> 23<sup>17</sup>, Job 34<sup>10</sup>. [Elsewhere the same Heb. expression occurs Gn 44<sup>7, 17</sup>, Jos 22<sup>29</sup> 24<sup>16</sup>, 1 S 12<sup>23</sup> 14<sup>45</sup> 20<sup>2</sup>, Job 27<sup>5</sup>, where it is tr. 'God forbid' (AV and RV); also (combined with amar) 1 S 24<sup>6</sup> 26<sup>11</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>3</sup> 'the LORD forbid'; and (combined with al) 1 Ch 11<sup>19</sup> 'My God forbid.'] In Apocr. the same Eng. phrase is found, 1 Mac 13<sup>9</sup> 'be it far from me' (μή μοι γένοιτο); and in NT Mt 16<sup>22</sup> 'Be it far from thee, Lord' ('Δεὴς σοι, where εὐδὲς γένοιτο is understood, as RVm 'God have mercy on thee'). The Lord is 'far from the wicked' (Pr 15<sup>29</sup>), but He is 'nigh unto all them that call upon him' (Ps 145<sup>18</sup>); so the Psalmists frequently cry, 'Be not far from me' (22<sup>1, 11, 19</sup> 27<sup>9</sup> 35<sup>22</sup> 38<sup>21</sup> 71<sup>12</sup>), for in His presence is fulness of joy (Ps 16<sup>11</sup>). St. Paul taught the Athenians that He is 'not far from every one of us' (Ac 17<sup>27</sup>), yet it is by the blood of Christ that we are 'made nigh' (Eph 2<sup>13</sup>), so that we are encouraged and enabled to 'draw near with a true heart in fulness of faith' (He 10<sup>22</sup>).

J. HASTINGS.

FARE, FAREWELL.—To 'fare,' from Anglo-Saxon faran (Ger. fahren, Gr. πορ-εῖν), is to 'travel,' to 'go,' as Spenser, FQ I. x. 63—

'But let me here for aye in peace remaine,
Or streight way on that last long voyage fare.'

Then comes the meaning 'get on' well or ill, as 1 S 17<sup>18</sup> 'look how thy brethren fare' (עֵינֶיךָ בְּרֵעֶיךָ, lit. 'visit thy brethren [and inquire] as to their wellbeing' [cf. Gn 37<sup>14</sup>, 2 S 11<sup>7</sup>]; Cov. 'loke how thy brethren do,' Wyc. 'thi britheren thou shalt visite, if thei right doon'); Sir 32<sup>38</sup> 'A stubborn heart shall fare evil at the last' (κακωθήσεται, RV 'fare ill'); 32<sup>24</sup> 'he that trusteth in him shall fare never the worse' (οὐκ ἐλαττωθήσεται, RV 'shall suffer no loss'); 2 Mac 9<sup>20</sup> 'If ye and your children fare well'; 11<sup>28</sup> 'If ye fare well' (both ἔρρωσθε). The perf. pass. of the Greek verb found in the two last-quoted passages (ῥώννυμι) was used in the imperative sing. (ἔρρωσο) or plu. (ἔρρωσθε) as a formula for closing a letter, lit. 'be strong, prosper.' This formula is accordingly expressed by the word farewell in English. In Ac 15<sup>29</sup>, where the verb is plu., the older form is retained in AV and RV 'fare ye well'; but in 23<sup>30</sup>, where the verb is sing., AV has 'Farewell' (RV with most edd. omits). Once 'farewell' is the tr. of χαλπει, 2 Co 13<sup>11</sup> 'Finally, brethren, farewell' (RVm 'rejoice' or 'be perfected'). 'Fare ye well' is the tr. of most previous VSS from Tind., but Wyc. 'ioie ye,' Cov. 'reioyse,' Rheims 'reioyce' (after Vulg. gaudete), and it is probable that the Gr. χαίρετε is inadequately represented by the Eng. 'farewell,' since it never lost the sense of 'rejoice,' by slipping into a mere formality of speech, as the Eng. word has done. See Lightfoot on Ph 4<sup>1</sup>.

In Lk 16<sup>19</sup> ('fared sumptuously every day') the Eng. word 'fared' is probably to be taken in a sense that is still common, 'feed,' 'be entertained with food.' Wyclif's tr. is 'eete every dai schynnyngli' (after Vulg. epulabatur quotidie splendide), Coverdale's 'fared deliciously every daye.' Cov. was repeated by Cranmer and the Geneva of 1557; but the Gen. of 1560 gives 'fared wel and delicately,' the Bishops' 'fared very deliciously,' the Rhemish 'fared magnifically.' Now it is true that neither 'fared' nor 'sumptuously' is restricted to taking food. In More's Utopia (ii. 8, Lupton's ed. p. 264) we read, 'Thither they sende furth some of their citezeins as Lieutenantes, to lyue theire sumptuously lyke men of honour and renouwe'; and Sir T. Elyot (The Governour, 1531, ii. 192, Croft's ed.) says, 'Many mo princes and noble men of the Romanes . . . made solempne and sumptuose playes in honour of their goddesses.' But it is possible that it was a passage in the last-named work that suggested the tr. of AV, and in that passage the sense of feed or feast is unmistakable: (ii. 336) 'The noble emperour Augustus . . . fared sumptuously and delicately, the cite of Rome at that tyme being vexed with skaritie of grayne.' If that is the meaning of AV, it is inadequate to express the original (ὡφραν ἡμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἡμέραν λαμπρῶς), where the verb means to 'make merry' (Lk 12<sup>19</sup> 152b. 24. 29. 32 and elsewhere), and the adverb (of which this is the only occurrence in biblical Greek) means 'brilliantly' (the adj. is often applied to dress, Lk 23<sup>11</sup>, Ac 10<sup>30</sup>, Ja 22. 3, Rev 19<sup>18</sup>), so that the tr. is literally 'making merry every day brilliantly.' Luther's tr. is lebte alle Tage herrlich und in Freuden; Weizsäcker, genoss sein Leben alle Tage im Glanze; Ostervald, se traitoit bien et magnifiquement; Oltramare, faisait brillante chère; Segond, menait joyeuse et brillante vie; RVm 'living in mirth and splendour every day,' RV has given 'sumptuous fare' for AV 'delicate fare' in Sir 29<sup>22</sup> (Gr. ἰδίσματα λαμπρά). J. HASTINGS.

FARTHING.—See MONEY.

FASHION (facère, to make, faction-em, a making, It. fazione, Old Fr. façon, Old Eng. facioun). There are some old uses in AV, and they are all retained in RV.

1. The make or shape of a thing: Ex 26<sup>30</sup> 'thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was showed thee in the mount.' The Heb. (מִשְׁפָּט mishpāt) is the ordinary word for the decision of a judge, hence due or right measure, even in cases not decided by judging, right proportion (1 K 4<sup>28</sup> [Heb. 5<sup>1</sup>] 'charge'; Jer 30<sup>15b</sup> of a city, 'manner,' rather weak; Is 40<sup>14</sup>, in creation—giving each part its due place and function). In Ex 26<sup>30</sup> it seems to be used as synonymous with מִבְּנֵי (from בָּנָה to build, so 'building,' 'make'), which is employed in the parallel passages Ex 25<sup>30. 40</sup>, and is there tr. 'pattern.' This Heb. word mishpāt developed much as the Eng. word 'fashion' has done. In Gn 40<sup>13</sup> and elsewhere it signifies manner or custom, and in 2 K 1<sup>7</sup> outward appearance. It is tr. 'fashion' also in 1 K 6<sup>38</sup>, Ezk 42<sup>11</sup> (in both of parts of a building). Wyclif's word in Ex 26<sup>30</sup> is 'saumpler.'

In 2 K 16<sup>10</sup> 'king Ahaz sent to Urijah the priest the fashion of the altar,' the Heb. is דְּמוּת dēmūth (from נָתַן to be like), a common word in Ezk for the external appearance. Here it is probably a drawing or model. Cf. 2 Ch 4<sup>3</sup> 'the similitude (i.e. images) of oxen.'

The remaining Heb. word is תְּכָנִיחַ tēkhānāh (from נָתַן to set up), Ezk 43<sup>11</sup> 'show them the form of the house and the fashion thereof.' The Heb. is probably here the arrangement or fittings. Wyclif has 'the figure of the hous, and makynge (1388 'bilydng') thereof.' 'Forme and fashion' come from Coverdale.

In Wis 16<sup>25</sup> 'even then was it altered into all fashions,' the meaning seems to be (as Deane), that the manna changed its taste according to the palate of the eater, and fire modified its nature according to its Maker's will (Gr. εἰς πάντα, RV 'into all forms').

In NT we find 'fashion' with this meaning only Ac 7<sup>4</sup> 'Our fathers had the tabernacle of witness in the wilderness, as he had appointed, speaking unto Moses, that he should make it according to the fashion that he had seen' (τύπος, as LXX in Ex 25<sup>40</sup>, RV 'figure').*

2. The appearance of a thing, as Ja 1<sup>24</sup> Tind. 'For assone as he hath looked on him silfe, he goeth his waye, and forgetteth immediatlie what his fassion was.' So in AV, Lk 9<sup>29</sup> 'as he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered' (Gr. τὸ εἶδος τοῦ προσώπου αὐτοῦ). Especially outward visible appearance in contrast with inner reality, as Shaks. Merch. of Venice, iv. i. 18—

'Shylock, the world thinks, and I think so too,
That thou but leadst this fashion of thy malice
To the last hour of act; and then 'tis thought
Thou'lt show thy mercy and remorse more strange
Than is thy strange apparent cruelty.'

1 Co 7<sup>31</sup> 'the fashion of this world passeth away,' and Ph 2<sup>9</sup> 'being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself.' The Gr. is σχῆμα, whose meaning is fully discussed in the Commentaries. See also Trench, NT Syn. pp. 252-258; Gifford, Incarnation, p. 22 ff.; Expos. Times, viii. 391 f. The English is perhaps more emphatic (in expressing mere outward appearance) than the Greek. In 1 Co 7<sup>31</sup> Wyc. and the Rhemish have 'figure' after Vulg. figura; Tind. introduced 'fashion' ('fassion'), and the other VSS followed him. In Ph 2<sup>9</sup> 'fashion' is not found before AV. Wyc. translates Vulg. (habitus) literally, 'habyt' (1386 'abite'); Tind. Cov. and Cran. give 'apparel'; Gen. 1557 'appearance,' 1560 'shape,' as Tomson and Rhem. NT; Bish. 'figure.'

3. In Ja 1<sup>11</sup> AV has retained from Tind. 'the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth,' where the Gr. is πρόσωπον, 'face.' So in Old Eng. 'fashion' was used literally for the face, as Pilgr. Lyf Manhode (1430), III. xxxviii. 155, 'She shadwde hire visage and hire facioun vnder hire hood.' Cf. Lk 12<sup>36</sup> Tind. 'Ypocrites ye can skylly of the fassion of the erth, and of the skye' (πρόσωπον; Wyc., Rhem., AV, RV, 'face').

4. Manner: 2 Es 4<sup>38</sup> 'How long shall I hope on this fashion?' (sic, RV after the Syriac, 'How long are we here?'); 5<sup>33</sup> 'They that be born in the strength of youth are of one fashion' (alii sunt); Wis 2<sup>15</sup> 'his ways are of another fashion' (ἐξήλλαγμέναι, RV 'of strange fashion'); 14<sup>19</sup> 'he . . . forced all his skill to make the resemblance of the best fashion' (ἐπὶ τὸ κάλλιον, RV 'toward a greater beauty'); Mk 2<sup>12</sup> 'We never saw it on this fashion' (οὕτως). So in Pref. to AV 'they did not cast the streets, nor proportion the houses in such comely fashion, as had been most sightly and convenient'; and Shaks. Hamlet, i. iii. 111—

'My lord, he hath importuned me with love,
In honourable fashion.
Ay, fashion you may call it; go to, go to.'

5. Manners and customs: 2 Mac 4<sup>9</sup> 'a place for exercise, and for the training up of youth in the fashions of the heathen' (the Gr. is simply ἐφήβια, i.e. youth, hence RV 'and form a body of youths to be trained therein'); 4<sup>13</sup> 'the height of Greek fashions' (ἀκμή τοῦ Ἑλληνισμοῦ, RV 'an extreme of Greek fashions'); 6<sup>8</sup> 'that they should observe the same fashions' (ἀγωγήν, RV 'conduct').

The verb to fashion is of frequent occurrence. In OT and Apoc. it has always the sense of give shape to, form. But the word was formerly used in the sense of 'transform,' i.e. change the form or fashion into something else. Thus Tindale, Obedience of a Christian Man, 97b, 'When a man fealeth . . . him selfe . . . altered and fascioned lyke vnto

* In He 8<sup>5</sup> the same quotation is made, and adheres still more closely to the LXX of Ex 25<sup>40</sup>, but the Eng. (AV and RV) is 'pattern,' as it has been since Tindale.

Christe'; H. Smith, Sermons (1592), 'Fashion thyself to Paul.' In NT there are two examples of this meaning: Ph 3<sup>21</sup> 'Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body' (σύμμορφος; RV 'that it may be conformed to the body of his glory'); 1 P 1<sup>14</sup> 'not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts' (συσχηματίζόμενα). J. HASTINGS.

FAST.—1. Fast is frequently used in AV both as adj. and adv. in the sense of firm, secure, as Ps 38<sup>2</sup> 'thine arrows stick fast in me'; Ps 65<sup>6</sup> 'Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains'; Pr 4<sup>13</sup> 'Take fast hold of instruction'; 2 Es 2<sup>15</sup> 'Mother, embrace thy children, and bring them up with gladness, make their feet as fast as a pillar' (confirma pedes eorum, RV 'stablish their feet'); Ae 16<sup>24</sup> 'Who . . . thrust them down into the inner prison, and made their feet fast in the stocks' (ῥοφαιλόσσο). Cf. Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite (Skeat's Student's ed. p. 117)—

'Almighty God, of trouthe sovereyn,
Wher is the trouthe of man? who hath hit sleyn?
Who that hem loveth shal hem fynde as fast
As in a tempest is a roten mast.'

2. In reference to sleep, sound, as Jg 4<sup>21</sup> 'he was fast asleep and weary' (RV 'in a deep sleep'; see RVM and Moore, in loc.). 3. Close, near, only Ru 2<sup>21, 23</sup>, as 2<sup>8</sup> 'abide here fast by my maidens.' Cf. Milton, PL ii. 725—

'the snaky sorceress that sat
Fast by Hell-gate, and kept the fatal key.'

In every case 'fast' is used to bring out the force of the verb or adj. used in the original; there is never a separate word for it in the Hebrew or the Greek.

J. HASTINGS.

FASTING.—Often described in OT (esp. in P, where it is practically a technical term) by phrase 'to afflict the soul,' נָסַח נַפְשׁוֹ (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup> 23<sup>27, 32</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7</sup> 30<sup>13</sup>; Ps 35<sup>13</sup>; Is 58<sup>3, 5, 10</sup>), tr. by LXX in the passages in Nu by κακοῦν τὴν ψυχὴν, in the others by ταπεινῶν τὴν ψυχὴν, for which see also Jth 4<sup>9</sup>, and which may be assumed to have this precise reference, and not a more general one at Sir 2<sup>17</sup> 7<sup>17</sup>. The phrase does not denote primarily spiritual humiliation, even as the proper accompaniment of fasting. It has a physical meaning. This will be perceived if the material sense in which 'soul' was in early times used be remembered (cf. for a similar expression Ps 69<sup>11</sup>). The more literal terms נָסַח 'to fast,' נָסַח 'fasting,' are also common in OT. In NT the words are νηστεύειν and νηστεία.

(A) IN THE OT.—1. The practice of fasting (a) in the times before the Captivity.—The one regular fast, the institution of which is ascribed to this period, is that of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup> 23<sup>27-32</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7</sup>; Jer 36<sup>8</sup>).* But there are many examples of fasts on special occasions, dictated by the sense of having transgressed, or of calamity, present or impending. Such a fast is inspired by Samuel (1 S 7<sup>9</sup>); enjoined by Jehoiakim and the princes (Jer 36<sup>9</sup>); hypocritically by Jezebel (1 K 21<sup>9, 12</sup>). In like manner individuals are moved to fast—David when his child is smitten with sickness (2 S 12<sup>16, 21-23</sup>), Ahab on hearing his doom (1 K 21<sup>27</sup>).

The abstinence from food or drink for forty days by Moses on the Mount (Ex 34<sup>28</sup>), and by Elijah (1 K 19<sup>8</sup>), seem to be recorded rather as extraordinary or miraculous occurrences than as fasts purposely undertaken.

(b) After the Captivity.—Additional regular fasts now appear, the memorials of the times of bitter shame and calamity through which the nation had passed. Four are enumerated in Zec 8<sup>19</sup>, cf. 7<sup>3, 5</sup>. (a) 'The fast of the fourth month' (Tammuz). On the 9th of this month, the Chaldæans broke into the city (Jer 39<sup>2</sup> and 52<sup>6, 7</sup>). According, however, to Talm. tradition the fast in this month was observed on the 17th, on which day the breaking of the tables of the law by Moses is said to have occurred, and also the cessation of the daily offering in consequence of the famine during the siege by the Chaldæans. It was held also that later the day was further desecrated through the burning of the law by Antiochus Epiphanes (in Talm. called Apostemus), and his introduction of an idol into the Holy Place. (β) 'The fast of the fifth month' (Ab). The destruction of the temple took place according to 2 K 25<sup>3</sup> on the 7th, according to Jer 52<sup>12</sup> on the 10th of this month. The 9th was, however, the day which was observed, at all events according to the Talmud. The destruction of the second temple is said to have taken place on the same day; and the announcement was believed to have been made on this day also to the generation of Isr. who came out of Egypt that they should not enter Canaan. (γ) 'The fast of the seventh month' (Tisri), possibly held in commemoration of Atonement; the extinction of the government left in Jerusalem under Gedaliah took place in this month through his assassination (2 K 25<sup>26</sup>). This, acc. to tradition, happened on the 3rd of Tisri. (δ) 'The fast of the tenth month' (Tebet). On the 10th of this month the siege by Nebuch. began (2 K 25<sup>1</sup>, Jer 52<sup>4</sup>). The reference in Ezk 24<sup>1, 2</sup> shows how the habit of marking it by a fast might arise.

From the Talm. we learn that, in the times for which it can be taken as evidence of the practice to which the prophet refers, the 9th of Ab was regarded as by far the most important, and that its observance was then universally binding. We should infer from Zec 7 and 8 that it always held this position of pre-eminence. The people ask only (7<sup>9</sup>) whether they need continue to observe this fast. In the answer of God through the prophet, first one other fast is coupled with it (7<sup>9</sup>), then all four of the fasts that had been instituted in consequence of their calamities are mentioned (8<sup>19</sup>). It is probable that the three not referred to in the people's question were not regarded as of such strict obligation, and therefore not felt to be onerous. The prophet, on the other hand, names them all, because the principles on which he insisted applied to all equally. According to the Talmud those three were, after they had ceased to be kept, reintroduced subsequently to the destruction of the second temple; and it was taught that they need be observed only at times when the Jews were oppressed or were suffering calamities (cf. Brück, Pharisäische Volksitten und Ritualien, p. 45 ff.). Jewish interpreters seem to have understood Zec.'s words (8<sup>19</sup>) as giving a dispensation from the observance of the fasts in the interval between the restoration and the destruction of the second temple (Brück, ib.).

We may perhaps find a trace of the institution of one other regular fast in OT—in the Bk. of Esther. That book explains the origin of the Feast of Purim, and in Rabbinic times the celebration of that feast was accompanied by a fast in commemoration of the fasting of Esther, Mordecai, and the people (4<sup>1-3</sup>, 15-17). There may be an allusion to this part of the commemoration in 9<sup>31</sup> end.

Naturally, there is no lack in the period from the Captivity onwards of instances of fasts on special occasions. Of such as the whole people joined in we have, in addition to the one in Est just referred to, Ezr 8<sup>21-23</sup>, Neh 9<sup>1</sup>; and as examples of fasts by individuals, Neh 14, Dn 9<sup>3</sup>. The references to fasting in the Apocr. are not so numerous as might have been expected, and do not throw much additional light upon the history of the practice (To 12<sup>8</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>47</sup>, 2 Mac 13<sup>12</sup>).

2. The manner of observing fasts.—There can be little doubt that, in accordance with usual Oriental practice, fasting involved complete abstinence from food. The period for the Day of Atonement was 'from even till even' (Lv 23<sup>32</sup>). No work was to be done (Lv 16<sup>29, 31</sup> 23<sup>32</sup>; Nu 29<sup>7</sup>). There are allusions also to the use of sackcloth and ashes (Dn 9<sup>3</sup>, Jon 3<sup>6</sup> etc.). Abstinence of another kind was also required, referred to in 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup> (TR): various passages of OT might be quoted in confirmation, though none very distinctly connected with fasts. It is spoken of plainly in the Talmud.

* For the question whether the observance of the Day of Atonement was known in pre-exilic times, see p. 199<sup>b</sup> of this vol.

3. The purpose of fasting.—W. R. Smith observes (RS<sup>2</sup>, p. 434), 'The usage of religious fasting is commonly taken as a sign of sorrow, the worshippers being so distressed at the alienation of their god that they cannot eat; but there are very strong reasons for believing that in the strict Oriental form, in which total abstinence from meat and drink is prescribed, fasting is primarily nothing more than a preparation for the sacramental eating of holy flesh.' It is difficult, however, to discover traces of this view in OT. There we find fasting employed simply as a sign of mourning (1 S 31<sup>13</sup>), or with the evident object of deprecating divine wrath, or winning divine compassion. Its suitability cannot well be explained in either of these connexions, except on the ground that it is often a natural effect of grief, and may therefore be purposely employed as a sign of it. In its religious use such a mute expression of sorrow would be an act of contrition for sin, or appeal for heavenly aid in distress. A superstitious idea of its efficacy was, no doubt, often entertained; but the particular form of error which the prophets found it necessary to condemn was the ordinary one of the formalist, who fails to perceive that his external observances can have no value when dis severed from purity and righteousness of life (Is 58<sup>3-7</sup>, Jer 14<sup>10-12</sup>, Zec 7, 8).

(B) IN THE NT.—1. The Jewish practice.—There is an allusion in Ac 27<sup>9</sup> to 'the Fast,' which was so par excellence, i.e. the Day of Atonement. But the chief point which we learn from NT is that by this time frequent additional fasts had become customary with those in Judaism who desired to lead a specially religious life, e.g. Anna (Lk 2<sup>37</sup>). Again, the Pharisee in the parable says, 'I fast twice in the week' (Lk 18<sup>12</sup>). The allusion is to the two weekly fast-days, Thursday and Monday, on the former of which days Moses was said to have gone up into the Mount, and on the latter to have come down from it. Mention is made of them frequently in the Talmud. There is also an interesting reference to them in the Didache 8<sup>1</sup>, where Christians are bidden not to fast with the hypocrites on the second and fifth days of the week, but on the fourth and on Friday. Further, the question asked of Jesus by the disciples of John and of the Pharisees (Mt 9<sup>14</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33</sup>), reveals the interesting fact that teachers who had gathered about them bands of scholars, used to give to their disciples special rules on the subject.

2. The teaching of Jesus.—There are two passages only, but those significant ones. (a) That in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 6<sup>16-18</sup>). Our Lord's whole aim here appears to be to secure perfect purity and simplicity of intention, a 'fasting unto God' (cf. Zec 7<sup>6</sup>) in the fullest and deepest sense. This would be the most effectual cure for every error, practical or even intellectual (comp. His teaching on almsgiving and prayer, Mt 6<sup>1-15</sup>, and see art. on former).

(b) His answer to the question of the disciples of John and of the Pharisees (Mt 9<sup>14-17</sup>, Mk 2<sup>18-22</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33-39</sup>). This answer throws light on His whole method and aim. To understand it we must bear in mind the question which called it forth. There is no reason to believe that either our Lord or His disciples failed to keep any day of fasting which was generally observed by religious members of the class of artisans and small tradesmen in Galilee, such as the Day of Atonement. But He had imposed upon them no frequent additional fasts. He defends them from the stricture passed on them, and in so doing replies to the criticism of His own teaching, which was implied, by setting forth the principles on which He acted. He refrained from prescribing forms, not that He condemned them as mischievous or useless, but because it would have been the wrong end at which to begin. The course which He adopted was alone fitting, in view of the far-reaching change of character and thought which He designed to effect.

The precise force of the distinction which Jesus drew between the days while the bridegroom was present and those when he should be removed, deserves to be marked. The time of His presence on earth was a Messianic time, a foretaste of the restitution of all things. The thought that fasting would be discontinued in Messiah's days was already familiar to the Jewish mind. The language of Zec suggested it (8<sup>19</sup>), and thus, as it is interesting to note, Jesus added emphasis to the claim to be the Messiah, which He virtually made in referring to Himself as the bridegroom, by what He said as to the unsuitability of requiring fasts from His disciples then. We may believe also that He wished them afterwards to look back to the time that they companied with Him as one of joy. But His clear prevision that the perfect fulfilment of the promise was not yet at hand, and that a period of sadness and trial would intervene before it, is not less remarkable, and His words unquestionably imply that there would be a place for fasting in the coming dispensation. Further, the inference which has frequently been drawn from them by Protestant commentators, that in the Christian Church fasting was to be practised only when dictated by special feelings of sorrow, and hence that it was to be a matter of individual choice, confined to occasions of widespread and exceptional calamity, hardly seems to be justified; for He characterizes broadly the difference between two whole periods.

On the other hand, in the parables which follow, and in His line of conduct, to which attention had been directed, He plainly shows that He intended questions of outward observance to be judged with reference to new principles which He inculcated, and that He left them to be decided by His Church under the guidance of the Spirit Who should come in His name (but see Hort, Jud. Chr. p. 24).

This intention was shown alike by what He did and did not conform to in the religious usages around Him. We have noticed that the keeping of the law of Moses was not in question on the occasion under consideration. But in point of fact His attitude to that law, the respect for it which He encouraged by word and example, His silence as to its approaching abrogation, were based on the same principle as the non-imposition of new forms. He intended the rites of the Mosaic law to be set aside or changed only as the result of a new spiritual growth.

3. The practice of the early Church.—The chief instances are before solemn appointments (Ac 13<sup>2-3</sup> 14<sup>23</sup>). St Paul alludes to his fasts (2 Co 6<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>27</sup>). It is somewhat difficult, however, to decide whether he is speaking of voluntary or involuntary ones. Perhaps both are included. The connexion of words seems rather to suggest voluntary fasts in the former passage, and involuntary ones in the latter. In places TR has an allusion to fasting where it is wanting according to the best evidence (Mt 17<sup>21</sup>, Mk 9<sup>29</sup>, Ac 10<sup>30</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>5</sup>). This corruption of the text may have been due to the increasing value which was set on fasting in the Christian Church with the lapse of time. See further, FEASTS AND FASTS.

In the Oxyrhynchus fragment discovered by Grenfell and Hunt, the 2nd Logion contains the words ὡς μὴ νεκροῦσθαι τὸν σώματι, οὐ μὴ εὐφρανέτω τὸν θεόν. The construction and the meaning of the saying are both difficult; Harnack (Die jüngst entdeckten Sprüche Jesu, 8 ff.) contends for a metaphorical sense of the word 'fast.' Amongst other discussions of the sense of this Logion we may refer to Grenfell and Hunt's editio princeps of the ACOPIA HESOT (10 ff.), Redpath (Expositor, Sept. 1897, p. 225), Heinrici in ThL (21st Aug. 1897), Swete (Expos. Times, Sept. 1897, p. 546 f.).

V. H. STANTON.

FAT.—See FOOD and SACRIFICE.

FAT.—As a verb 'fat' is now nearly displaced by 'fatten.' It occurs in Sir 26<sup>13</sup> 'The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fat his bones' (παραεί, RV 'fatten'); and the ptep. 'fatted' in 1 K 4<sup>23</sup> ('fatted fowl', Heb. כְּרִיָּים, see FOWLS), Jer 46<sup>21</sup> ('fatted bullocks', RV 'calves of the stall'), Lk 15<sup>23, 27, 30</sup>; to which RV adds 1 S 28<sup>24</sup> 'a fatted calf' (AV 'a fat calf').

J. HASTINGS.

FAT.—Fat, meaning a large vessel for holding liquids, has been displaced by 'vat' in literary English. The difference between the spellings, says Skeat (Etymol. Dict. s.v.) is one of dialect only, 'fat' being northern and 'vat' southern. Fat occurs in AV, J1 2<sup>24</sup> 'the fats shall overflow with wine and oil,' and 3<sup>13</sup> (both פֶּתִי); in the compound 'winefat' in Is 63<sup>2</sup> (נֶחֱם), Mk 12<sup>1</sup> (ἐποδήμιον, AV 1611 'wine fat' as two words); and 'pressfat' (1611 'presse-fat') Hag 2<sup>16</sup> (נֶחֱם).

RV gives 'vats' in J1 (see Driver's note, ad loc.), though in Pr 3<sup>10</sup> it changes 'presses' of AV into 'fats' (נֶחֱם). 'Winefat' of Mk 12<sup>1</sup> is made 'winepress,' and 'pressfat' of Hag 2<sup>16</sup> 'winefat' (not by Amer. RV). Amer. RV prefers 'winevat' to winefat in Is 63<sup>2</sup>. See WINE. J. HASTINGS.

FATE.—See WILL.

FATHER.—See FAMILY and GOD.

FATHOM.—See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FATLING.—A fatling is an animal, especially a young animal, fattened for slaughter. It is the tr<sup>a</sup> of three Heb. and one Greek word. (1) Mēri', plu. mēri'im, 2 S 6<sup>13</sup>, Is 11<sup>6</sup>, Ezk 39<sup>18</sup>; which is elsewhere tr<sup>d</sup> 'fat cattle' (RV 'fatlings'), 1 K 1<sup>9, 19, 25</sup>; 'fed beasts' (so RV), Is 1<sup>11</sup>; 'fat beasts' (so RV), Am 5<sup>22</sup>. (2) Mēhim, Ps 66<sup>13</sup>; which elsewhere occurs only Is 5<sup>17</sup> tr<sup>d</sup> 'fat ones,' AV and RV. (3) Mishnim, 1 S 15<sup>9</sup>, which means 'seconds,' of a second, inferior sort (as AVm). But that is plainly not the meaning here. Hence the text is generally amended into mashmannim (מַשְׁמָנִים), which is found in Neh 8<sup>10</sup>, and means 'fat things,' 'delicacies' (EV 'the fat'). This is the reading followed by EV, and it has the support of Targ. Syr. and Arab. VSS. But Driver (Notes on Sam., p. 94) prefers to read hassēmēnim, which occurs (in the sing.) in Ezk 34<sup>16</sup> (and elsewhere), and is tr<sup>d</sup> 'the fat.' He then renders 'the best of the flocks and the herds, even the fat ones and the lambs' (הַטֹּבִים וְהַזֵּמִים). (4) σισταά (lit. 'fed with grain'), Mt 22<sup>4</sup> 'my oxen and my fatlings are killed' (Tindale's tr<sup>d</sup>; Wyc. 'my bolis [bulls] and my volatilis [fowls],' after Vulg. tauri mei et abilia). To those RV adds (5) bēv'āh, Ezk 34<sup>3</sup> 'the fatlings' for AV 'them that are fed': the word is an adj., and is tr<sup>d</sup> 'fat' in v. 20 ('fat cattle' AV and RV), it is the 'fat' kine of Pharaoh's dream (Gn 41). J. HASTINGS.

FAUCHION.—Jth 13<sup>6</sup> 'she . . . took down his fauchion from thence,' and 16<sup>9</sup> 'the fauchion passed through his neck' (AV 1611 'fauchin,' RV 'scimitar'). The Greek is ἀκινάκης (in 16<sup>9</sup> A has ἀκινάκις, to which Hatch and Redpath give a sep. entry in their Concord to the Sept., but with a query), found only here. The ἀκ., a word of Persian origin, is often used in Herodotus to describe a short sword. See SWORD. The Eng. word was originally the name of 'a broad sword more or less curved on the convex side'; but in later use and in poetry signified a sword of any kind.

J. HASTINGS.

FAULT.—A fault is properly a defect or shortcoming (fallitus, late Lat. ptep. of fallere, to fail, come short, Old Fr. faute*) either of material things, as Ld. Berners, Froissart, I. clix. 193, 'They had gret faut in their hoost of vitayle'; or from a recognized standard of physical beauty, workmanship, or moral rectitude. The defect expressed by 'fault' is in AV almost always moral, but the larger meaning, shortcoming in any sense, is * Faute is the more accurate spelling, the l being inserted from the influence of It. falla and Lat. fallere, although the u stands, of course, for the l. In the Psalter of 1539 the spelling is always faute, though modern editions of the Pr. Bk. spell fault. In AV of 1611 it is fault always.

seen in Rev 14<sup>5</sup> 'they are without fault before the throne of God' (ἀμωμοί, RV 'without blemish'); cf. Jude 21 'faultless' (ἀμώμους, RV 'without blemish'). In 1 Co 6<sup>7</sup> the least degree of moral blame is expressed (Gr. ἡττημα, RV 'defect,' RVm 'loss').

Craik (Eng. of Shaks. p. 124) says, 'The word fault formerly, though often signifying no more than it now does, carried sometimes a much greater weight of meaning than we now attach to it.' And he gives as an example Jul. Cæs. I. iii. 5—

'Who ever knew the heavens menace so?
Those that have known the earth so full of faults.'

To which may be added Tit. Andron. v. ii. 173—

'You killed her husband, and for that vile fault
Two of her brothers were condemned to death.'

See also Rom. and Jul. III. iii. 25—

'O deadly sin! O rude unthankfulness!
Thy fault our law calls death.'

And Milton, PL xii. 337—

'Whose foul idolatries, and other faults
Heapt to the popular sum, will so incense
God, as to leave them.'

This greater freedom in the use of 'fault' enabled AV to retain Coverdale's tr<sup>a</sup> of Gn 41<sup>9</sup> 'This daye do I remembre my fawte,' though Wyc. had 'I knowleche my synne,' and the Heb. (נֶחֱם) is some thirty times translated 'sin.' Other words usually tr<sup>d</sup> 'sin' are occasionally rendered fault, as נֶחֱם (vñ) Ex 5<sup>16</sup>; * נֶחֱם 2 S 3<sup>3</sup>, Ps 59<sup>4</sup>. Again, in Dt 25<sup>2</sup> נֶחֱם, which is everywhere else tr<sup>d</sup> 'wickedness,' is tr<sup>d</sup> 'fault,' although all previous VSS had either 'sin' (Wyc. Douay) or 'trespass' (Cov. Gen. Bish.); RV gives 'wickedness.' And παράπτωμα tr<sup>d</sup> 'trespass' Mt 6<sup>14, 15</sup>, Mk 11<sup>25, 26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>, Eph 2<sup>1</sup>, Col 2<sup>13</sup>; 'offence' Ro 4<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>15, 16, 17, 18, 20</sup>; 'fall' Ro 11<sup>11, 12</sup>; and 'sin' Eph 17<sup>25</sup>, Col 2<sup>13</sup>, is tr<sup>d</sup> 'fault' 2 Co 5<sup>19</sup>, Ja 5<sup>16</sup>: RV gives 'trespass' always, except Ro 11<sup>11</sup> 'fall,' marg. 'trespass.'

'Make no fault,' a very rare expression, is found Sir 9<sup>13</sup> (μὴ πλημμελήσης, RV 'commit no fault').

In the trial before Pilate, St. John thrice uses aitia (18<sup>38</sup> 19<sup>4, 6</sup>), and St. Luke thrice aition (23<sup>4, 14, 22</sup>). Except in Lk 23<sup>22</sup> ('cause') AV renders in each case by 'fault'; but the meaning of both words is 'ground for committal,' 'legal cause for prosecution.' RV gives 'crime' in Jn, leaving Lk as in AV.

Faulty is now nearly confined to the expression of physical defects. In 2 S 14<sup>13</sup> (פֶּשַׁע adj.), Hos 10<sup>2</sup> (פֶּשַׁע vb. = be held guilty) it is used as the expression of moral wrong, RV 'guilty.' J. HASTINGS.

FAVOUR.—Favour is of frequent occurrence in Shakespeare and elsewhere in the sense of personal appearance, and then as simply meaning the face (cf. COUNTERNANCE and CHEER). Thus Spenser, FQ v. vii. 39—

'She knew not his favour's likeliness,
For many scarres and many howry beares,
But stood long staring on him amongst uncertain fears.'

More, Utopia (Robinson's tr<sup>a</sup>, Lumby's ed. p. 19), 'whom by his fawoure and apparell furthwith I judged to be a mariner.' Shaks. As You Like It, IV. iii. 87—

'The boy is fair,
Of female favour.'

Bacon, Essays, 'Of Beauty' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 176, l. 17), 'In Beauty, that of Favour, is more then that of Colour.'

It is sometimes said that Ps 45<sup>12</sup> 119<sup>58</sup>, Pr 19<sup>6, 29<sup>26</sup></sup> are examples of this meaning. But, though the Heb. (פָּנִים) there tr<sup>d</sup> 'favour' is literally 'face,' favour or goodwill is clearly the meaning. In the adjectives 'well-favoured' and 'ill-favoured,' however, we find this meaning, as Gn 29<sup>17</sup> 'Rachel was beautiful and well favoured' (כִּפְּיָהּ, lit. 'fair to be seen.' So evilfavouredness, Dt 17<sup>1</sup> (כִּדְּרִי, lit. 'evil thing').

* The correct tr. of פֶּשַׁע נֶחֱם is doubtful. If the vb. be taken as 3rd sing. fem. (Oxf. Heb. Lex.) the meaning will be 'thy people is at fault' (but פֶּשַׁע is nowhere else fem., not even in Jg 187, see Moore, ad loc.); if as 2nd sing. masc., 'thou wilt wrong thy people' (so Pesh. LXX, ἀδικήσεις τὸν λαόν σου). This is accepted by Siegfried-Stade, who punctuate נֶחֱם. Socin (in Kautzsch's AT) pronounces the MT unintelligible.

In Jos 11<sup>20</sup> favour means scarcely more than mercy, 'for it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, and that he might destroy them utterly, and they might have no favour' (חֶסֶד; in Ezr 9<sup>8</sup> the meaning is the same, but EV give 'grace'; everywhere else the Heb. word means 'intreaty'). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 293, 'And they, which by that lawe were condemned, were put to dethe without any favour.' J. HASTINGS.

FAVOUR.—The interest of the biblical use of this word resides chiefly in its relation to the term grace. It has not, like that term, obtained any doctrinal significance. While χάρις in the LXX (Vulg. gratia) is its prevailing equivalent, it is used only six times in NT to tr. that word (see also Lk 1<sup>28</sup> κεχαριτωμένη, 'highly favoured'; marg. 'graciously accepted' or 'much graced'). Grace, in fact, while including favour, implies much more. And it comes as a free gift ('Gratia, nisi gratis sit, non est gratia'), while favour may be won or deserved. To obtain favour is to please, to show favour is to be pleased.

In OT the distinction is, however, hardly perceptible. The instinct of the translators led them, it is true, to avoid the adjective 'favourable' as a rendering of חֶסֶד ('gracious') used only of God (with the one possible exception of Ps 112<sup>4</sup>. See Cheyne, The Book of Psalms, in loc.), but the verb חָסַד and its other derivatives are often represented by 'favour.' Thus חָסַד, 38 times rendered 'grace,' is 26 times tr<sup>d</sup> 'favour.' Nor is the sense of strengthening help, so prominent in the former word, altogether absent from the latter. (See Ps 51<sup>2</sup> 'with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.')

Eight other Heb. roots, implying kindness, goodwill, pity, are represented in the AV by 'favour.' The most frequent of these is רָצוֹן=acceptance, rendered 15 times 'favour.' For רָצוֹן loving-kindness, 'favour' is employed only 3 times.

The LXX vary much more than the Eng. tr., the idea of pity pronouncing itself in ἔλεος, while that of goodwill comes out in εὐδοκία, θέλημα, πρόσωπον (φῆμι). So in the Vulg. we find miseriordia, voluntas, vultus. A. S. AGLEN.

FEAR.—For the theology of Fear see next article. Some obsolete or archaic uses deserve notice.

1. Following the Heb. idiom, 'my fear,' 'thy fear,' etc., stands for the 'fear of me,' 'of thee,' etc.: Ex 23<sup>27</sup> 'I will send my fear before thee' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ, RV 'my terror'); Job 9<sup>34</sup> 'let not his fear terrify me' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ, RV 'his terror'); Jer 21<sup>9</sup> 'my fear is not in thee' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ). Similarly Ps 90<sup>11</sup> 'even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ, RV 'according to the fear that is due unto thee,' so Perowne; Del.* Cheyne, 'the fear of thee,' with the same meaning; De Witt, 'But who has yet learned the power of Thine anger, And Thy wrath as measured by the reverence due Thee?'); Is 63<sup>17</sup> 'O LORD, why hast thou made us to err from thy ways, and hardened our heart from thy fear?' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ, so RV; Del. 'so that we fear thee not,' evidently the genitive of the object; Orelli, 'that it fears not thee'); Mal 1<sup>6</sup> 'if I be a master, where is my fear?' (אֲפַחֶנּוּ). Earlier VSS contained this idiom yet oftener, as Gn 9<sup>2</sup> Wyc. (1382) 'youre fear and youre trembling be upon alle the beestis of erthe' (1388 'youre drede and trembling,' AV 'the fear of you and the dread of you'). 2. After another Heb. idiom

'fear' is used for the object of fear, that which is feared: Gn 31<sup>42</sup> 'the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac' (פֶּחַי, RV 'Fear,' as a proper name: but to personify is to miss the idiom, of which Spurrell (Notes on the Text of Gen.) gives examples from Pesh. Targ. etc.), so v. 53, Ps 31<sup>11</sup> 'I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighbours, and a fear to mine acquaintance' (פֶּחַי); Is 24<sup>18</sup> 'he who fleeth from the noise of the fear shall fall into the pit' (פֶּחַי); Ps 53<sup>3</sup> 'There were they in great fear, where no fear* was' (פֶּחַי); Pr 1<sup>26</sup> 'I will mock when your fear cometh' (פֶּחַי); Is 8<sup>12, 13</sup> 'neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of Hosts himself; and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread' (פֶּחַי . . . פֶּחַי); Ps 34<sup>4</sup> 'I sought the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears' (פֶּחַי); Pr 10<sup>24</sup> 'The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him' (פֶּחַי); Is 66<sup>4</sup> 'I also will choose their delusions, and bring their fears upon them' (פֶּחַי). Cf. Pr 10<sup>29</sup> Cov. 'The waye of the LORDE geueth a corage vnto ye godly, but it is a feare for wicked doers'; Herbert, The Temple, 120, l. 29—

'Call in thy death's-head there, tie up thy fears.'

3. There are two kinds of fear, a 'slavish feare, and a sonlike feare' (Hieron, Works, i. 130). The latter is now used only of our relation to God. But it was formerly applied to the reverence due to any superior, as Ro 13<sup>7</sup> 'Render to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear.' Cf. Knox, Hist. 194, 'we deny neither Toll, Tribute, nor fear, to her [the Queen Regent] nor her officers.' Ascham (Toxophilus, B. fol. 35, ed. 1545) says that a priest should have 'a bodye ful of manlye authoritie to fear ill men.' 4. The article being formerly used freely with abstract nouns, we find 'a fear,' Ezk 30<sup>13</sup> 'I will put a fear in the land of Egypt' (אֵי, RV retains); Ad. Est 15<sup>3</sup> 'in a fear' (αἰσχυνιδας, RV 'in an agony').

In the quotation from Ascham above, the verb to fear is used in the active sense of put fear into, terrify. This meaning, though it occurs but once in AV, is common in the earlier VSS and in Eng. writers of the time.

Thus Lv 26<sup>36</sup> Wyc. 'the sown of a fleyng leaf shal fere hem'; Dn 4<sup>11</sup> Cov. 'O Balthasar, let neither the dreame ner the interpretation thereof feare thee'; 2 Co 10<sup>9</sup> Gen. 1560, 'This I say that I may not seme as it were to feare you with letters' (so Wyc.). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, i. 247, 'the good husbände, whan he hath sowed his grounde, setteth up cloughtes or thredes, which some call shalles, some blenchars, or other like shoves, to feare away birdes, which he foreseth redy to deuoure and hurte his corne.' So Foxe, Actes and Mon. i. 436 (ed. 1583), 'A wonderfull and terrible earthquake fell through out al England: wherupon diuers of the suffraganes being feared by the strange and wonderfull demonstration, doubting what it should meane, thought it good to leaue of from their determinate purpose'; Spenser, FQ ii. xii. 25—

'For all that here on earth we dreadfull hold,
Be but as bugs to fearen babes withall,
Compared to the creatures in the seas enthrall.'

More, Utopia (Rob. tra, Lumby's ed. p. 145, l. 25), expresses his ideal of toleration in the words, 'They also which do not agree to Christes religion, feare no man from it, nor speake against any man that hath received it.' Tindale, Works, i. 7, says Scripture is 'a comfort in adversity that we despair not, and feareth us in prosperity, that we sin not'; and Expositions, 143, 'fearing you with the bug of excommunication.' From Shaks. take Tam. of Shrew, i. ii. 205—

'Have I not in a pitched battle heard
Loud larums, neighing steeds, and trumpet's clang?
And do you tell me of a woman's tongue,
That gives not half so great a blow to hear
As will a chestnut in a farmer's fire?
Tush! tush! I fear boys with bugs.'

* The suffix, says Delitzsch, is either the genitive of the subject, i.e. according to Thy fearfulness (אֵי), as in Ezk 11<sup>8</sup>; or of the object, 'acc. to the fear that is due unto thee.' The latter way of taking it is more natural in itself (cf. v. 8, Ex 20<sup>20</sup>, Dt 22<sup>5</sup>), and here characterizes the knowledge that is so rarely found as a knowledge that is determined by the fear of God and truly religious.

* Earle (Psalter of 1539, p. 291) says that in this example 'fear' is used in the ancient sense of FER, sudden alarm, shock of danger. But that sense seems to have been dropped very early, long before the days of Coverdale, who first uses 'fear' here (Wyclif as usual having 'dread'), and the Heb. is the same as in the other passages quoted above.

Davies quotes from Bp. Andrewes (v. 8), 'Knowing that we fear honour and power, though it last but for a small time, He feareth us with One whose honour and power lasteth for ever,' where the neuter and active senses of the word are found together.

The example in AV is Wis 17<sup>9</sup> 'For though no terrible thing did fear them; yet being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear' (ἐφάβη, RV 'affrighted'). A Heb. idiom is expressed in the phrase 'fear before,' which occurs 1 Ch 16<sup>30</sup>, Ps 96<sup>9</sup>, Ec 8<sup>12, 13</sup>, Hag 1<sup>12</sup>. Thus Ps 96<sup>9</sup> 'O worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness: fear before him, all the earth' (יִרְאוּ, RV 'tremble before him'). The verb is used in a grammatical misconstruction in Is 57<sup>11</sup> 'And of whom hast thou been afraid or feared,' which is rectified in RV 'And of whom hast thou been afraid and in fear?'

Fearful in older Eng. meant 'greatly fearing' as well as 'greatly to be feared.' Both senses are used in AV and retained in RV. 1. Dt 20<sup>8</sup> 'What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted?' (יָרֵאָה); Jg 7<sup>3</sup> 'fearful and afraid' (יָרֵאָה); Is 35<sup>4</sup> 'Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not' (יִרְאוּ, lit. 'hasty of heart,' as RVm); Mt 8<sup>26</sup> 'Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?' (δεδούλος; so Mk 4<sup>40</sup>, Rev 21<sup>8</sup> [all]); Sir 21<sup>2</sup> 22<sup>18</sup>, 1 Mae 3<sup>56</sup>, 2 Mac 8<sup>13</sup>. Cf. Adams, II Peter, 55, 'If thou lovest God, thou wilt be fearful to offend him, careful to please him'; and Chapman, Homer's Iliads, xxiii. 740—

'On the shore, far-off, he caus'd to raise

A ship-mast; to whose top they tied a fearful dove by th' foot,
At which all shot.'

2. Ex 15<sup>11</sup> 'Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?' (יָרֵאָה, lit. 'feared [in] praises'; usually understood 'to be feared even when praised'; Kalisch, 'awful in praises,—the qualities which are mentioned in praising Him fill the mind with awe and reverence'; in Kautzsch, Du furchtbarer in Ruhmes-thaten, 'fearful in deeds of praise'; the last, or Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'terrible in attributes that call for praise,' being best); Dt 28<sup>58</sup> 'that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD' (יָרֵאָה); Lk 21<sup>11</sup> 'fearful sights' (TR φόβητρα, edd. φόβητρα, RV 'terrors'); He 10<sup>27</sup> 'a certain fearful looking for of judgment' (φοβερός; so v.<sup>31</sup>, but in 12<sup>21</sup> 'terrible,' RV 'fearful': φ. is always used of that which inspires fear); 2 Es 8<sup>22</sup> 12<sup>8</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, 2 Mac 1<sup>24</sup>. Cf. Melvill, Diary (Wod. p. 271), 'The ministerie of Mr. Robert Bruce was verie steadable and mightie that yeir, and divers yeirs following, maist comfortable to the guid and godly, and maist feirfull to the enemies.' 'Awful' and 'dreadful' have both meanings also.

Fearfully is found only in Ps 139<sup>14</sup> 'I am fearfully and wonderfully made' (יִרְאוּ, *Del. "I am wonderfully come into being under fearful circumstances," i.e. circumstances that excite a shudder, sc. of astonishment'; Cheyne, 'graced so fearfully and gloriously').†

Fearfulness has in the earlier VSS both the meanings of fearful, as Ezk 30<sup>13</sup> Cov. 'a fearfulness will I sende into the Egipcians londe'; 2 Mae 15<sup>23</sup> Cov. 'sende now also thy good angell before us (o LORDE of heavens) in the fearfulness and drede of thy mightie arme.' But in AV 'fearfulness' means always the feeling of fear, apprehension, timidity: Ps 55<sup>5</sup>, Is 33<sup>14</sup> 21<sup>4</sup>, 2 Es 5<sup>14</sup> 11<sup>40</sup> 15<sup>37</sup>.

* See Davidson, Syntax, § 71, Rem. 2.

† See Cheyne's whole note (Book of Psalms, p. 352); it is particularly good. He says, 'Hitzig considers such a burst of admiration inappropriate to the case of human birth. But why? Take the production of a human hand. Why should not a sensitive poet thrill, like Browning's heroine (James Lee's Wife, viii.), at—

"The beauty in this—how free, how fine
To fear almost?"'

RV adds Wis 17<sup>8</sup> 'These were themselves sick with a ludicrous fearfulness' (καταγέλαστον εὐλάβειαν, AV 'fear worthy to be laughed at').

J. HASTINGS.

FEAR.—As in Eng., so in Heb. and in Gr. the same words are used to express emotions of fear which differ widely in their ethical character. At one end of the scale we have the fear of the LORD, which is the beginning of wisdom (Ps 111<sup>10</sup>) and the whole duty of man (Ec 12<sup>13</sup>); at the other end that fear of pain, shame, or death, which is craven, servile, and selfish, and which is often rebuked in Scripture. But it is impossible to draw any sharp line between the two kinds of fear, for in the imperfection of human character one motive shades off into another. Once even, by a bold anthropomorphism, God Himself is said to fear in the lower sense of the word (Dt 32<sup>27</sup>, see Driver's note).

The fear which is merely self-regarding ought not to exist in a rational being who knows that God is his Father and understands enough to trust Him. Perfect love casteth out fear (1 Jn 4<sup>18</sup>). But man, as he is, fears the forces of nature, which he does not understand or cannot control, because he does not trust God's providence. And he fears his fellow-man, because he is aware that brotherly instincts have grown weak with the sense of the loss of God's Fatherhood. 'Thus conscience doth make cowards of us all.' When Adam fell, he was afraid because he was naked (Gn 3<sup>10</sup>), and he felt he could no longer face God: thus fear of God took its rise in the violation of peaceful fellowship with Him. Similarly, Cain violates human fellowship, and fears man because he is an outlaw and God's curse is upon him (Gn 4<sup>12-14</sup>). Fear is thus the natural consequence of misdoing (Pr 28<sup>1</sup>), and, accordingly, is sometimes expressly said to be inflicted as a punishment (Lv 26<sup>17</sup>, Dt 28<sup>25, 66</sup>). The effect of selfish fear is to unman the coward, he loses spirit (Jos 2<sup>11</sup>; for the same phrase used in a higher sense, see 1 K 10<sup>5</sup>): such men are to be rejected from active service in the army, lest the infection of their timidity spread (Dt 20<sup>8</sup>, Jg 7<sup>3</sup>). Courage is especially needed in a prophet (Jer 1<sup>8</sup>, Ezk 3<sup>9</sup>). Fear is to be overcome by faith in God (Ps 112<sup>7-8</sup>). In Rev 21<sup>8</sup> the fearful are numbered with the unbelieving among the most grievous sinners.

The nobler fear has no thought of danger to self, so that the fear of God is the very opposite to the fear of man (Is 8<sup>12, 13</sup>, Mt 10<sup>28</sup>); but it arises from the sense of the nearness of some higher and holier being. Thus the beasts fear man (Gn 9<sup>2</sup>), and man fears angels and spirits, and, above all, God. To fear the LORD (the phrase occurs far more often with J' than with Elohim) means rather to feel awe of what He is, than fear of what He might do. It is fear of a Person (J' is God's personal name), of His character, dignity, and holiness, rather than of His power or works. The fear of the LORD is to hate evil (Pr 8<sup>13</sup>). Fear in the better sense of the word is the mainspring of religion, and 'to fear' is constantly used as signifying 'to worship,' whether the object be the true God or the gods of the heathen (e.g. 2 K 17<sup>35, 36</sup>). Thus, too, Jacob, when dealing with Laban, calls J' the Fear of his father Isaae (Gn 31<sup>42, 53</sup>), that is, the object of his worship and religious awe. This kind of fear is so far removed from the lower sort, that it is one of the distinguishing qualities given by God's Spirit to the Messianic King (Is 11<sup>2, 3</sup>, the spirit of the fear of the LORD), and the prayers of the Incarnate Son were heard because of His godly fear (He 5<sup>7</sup>).

But men are only gradually trained to the level of this holy and disinterested fear. They often have to be taught to fear God at all, even in the lower sense; and this lesson is enforced by divine punishments (1 S 12<sup>18</sup>), just as civil punishments teach men the authority of the law through fear (Dt 13<sup>14</sup>). It is possible to trace progress in the conception of fear taught in the Bible. Thus at Sinai the people fear the fire (Ex 20<sup>18-20</sup>); but at Horeb the prophet is taught to look for God in the still small voice rather than in the fire and tempest (1 K 19<sup>12</sup>); and Ezekiel is told not to crouch before God, but to stand upon his feet when God speaks to him (Ezk 2<sup>1</sup>). So in the NT boldness towards God is inculcated as much as fear, Christ having opened up the way of access for all who are united to Him: see Eph 3<sup>12</sup>, He 4<sup>16</sup> 10<sup>19</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>28</sup> 3<sup>21</sup> 4<sup>17</sup> (cf. Ro 8<sup>15</sup> contrast bet. spirit of bondage and of adoption). But Christ does not encourage the idea that it is as yet possible to supersede the motive even of selfish fear; He gives grave warnings of the consequences that will follow sin hereafter, and, while He tells His 'friends' not to fear men, He bids them emphatically to fear Him who hath power to cast into hell (Lk 12<sup>4-5</sup>).

In Ac 'one that feareth God' is often used technically to mean a proselyte, even though uncircumcised (Ac 10<sup>2</sup>). This is also the meaning of the word σεβεινος, one that worshippeth God, also translated 'devout.' See COURAGE, REVERENCE.

W. O. BURROWS.

FEASTS AND FASTS.—It will be convenient to divide this article * into four parts—

- I. Feasts connected with the institution of the Sabbath.
- II. The great Historical Festivals, Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles.
- III. The Minor Festivals.
- IV. The Fast of the Day of Atonement and the Minor Fasts.

I. FEASTS CONNECTED WITH THE INSTITUTION OF THE SABBATH.

(1) The Sabbath. (2) The New Moon. (3) The Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day of the Sabbatical month. (4) The Sabbatical year. (5) The Jubilee year.

The sacred number 7 dominates the cycle of religious observances. Every 7th day was a Sabbath. Every 7th month was a sacred month. Every 7th year was a Sabbatical year. After 7 times 7 was the year of Jubilee. The Feast of the Passover, with the Feast of Unleavened Bread, began 14 days (2×7) after the beginning of the month, and lasted 7 days. The Feast of Pentecost was 7 times 7 days after the Feast of the Passover. The Feast of Tabernacles began 14 days (2×7) after the beginning of the month and lasted 7 days. The 7th month was marked by (1) Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day. (2) Fast of Atonement on the 10th day. (3) Feast of Tabernacles from the 15th day to the 21st. The days of 'Holy Convocation' were 7 in number—2 at the Passover, 1 at Pentecost, 1 at the Feast of Trumpets, 1 at the Day of Atonement, 1 at the Feast of Tabernacles, and 1 on the day following, the 8th day. (Willis, Worship of the Old Covenant, pp. 190, 191).

(1) The Sabbath, שַׁבָּת, שַׁבְּתוֹן, σάββατον.—In Am 8<sup>5</sup>, 2 K 4<sup>23-25</sup>, Is 1<sup>13</sup>, Hos 2<sup>11</sup> it is connected with the New moon. Probably, the Sabbath was originally regulated by the phases of the moon, and thus occurred on the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th days of the month, the new moon being reckoned as the first Sabbath. 'Among the Assyrians the first twenty-eight days of every month were divided into four weeks of seven days each, the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days respectively being Sabbaths, and there was a general prohibition of work on these days' (George Smith, Assyrian Eponym Canon, 19 f., quoted by Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 112, and Schultz, OT Theol. i. 204, who also mentions the primitive Delphic custom of giving oracles on the 7th day as the day dedicated to Apollo). Schultz also points out that it is a mistake to derive the name Sabbath from the planet Saturn, which the Rabbis call 'Shabbti,' and thus to bring the Sabbath holiday into connexion with the Chaldee worship of the planets. 'The naming of the days after certain planet-gods can hardly be so old as the Sabbath holiday.'

For the Sabbath law see Ex 16<sup>23-30</sup> (P and J), 20<sup>8</sup> (E), 23<sup>12</sup> (J), 31<sup>13-16</sup> (P), 34<sup>21</sup> (JE), 35<sup>2</sup> (P), Lv 19<sup>3</sup> (H), 23<sup>3</sup> (P), 26<sup>2</sup> (H), Nu 15<sup>32-36</sup> (P), 28<sup>9-10</sup> (P), Dt 5<sup>12-15</sup>. In Ex 20<sup>8</sup> (E) it is to commemorate God's seventh day of rest at the creation. In Dt 5<sup>12-15</sup> it commemorates the redemption of Israel from Egypt. On the Sabbath the daily morning and evening sacrifice—the 'continual sacrifice'—of a lamb as a burnt-offering was doubled. There is no evidence of Sabbath observance in the days of the Patriarchs. There is little evidence of Sabbath observance before the time of the Exile (Jer 17<sup>20-27</sup>, Ezk 20<sup>12</sup>, 13, 16, 20, Is 56<sup>2-6</sup> 58<sup>13</sup>). Greater strictness marks the post-exilic period (Neh 8<sup>9-12</sup> 10<sup>31</sup> 13<sup>15-22</sup>). For the 39 kinds of work prohibited by the Rabbis on the Sabbath, and for many other actions and employments which cannot be summed up under any of them which were also forbidden, see Schürer, HJP II. ii. 96-105, cf. 1 Mac 2<sup>34-38</sup>, 3<sup>39-42</sup>, 2 Mac 5<sup>25</sup> 8<sup>36-28</sup> 12<sup>38</sup> 15<sup>36</sup>, Mt 12<sup>9-13</sup>, Mk 3<sup>1-5</sup>, Lk 6<sup>6-10</sup> 13<sup>10-17</sup> 14<sup>1-6</sup>, Jn 5<sup>1-18</sup> 9<sup>14-16</sup>. Sabbath-breaking was punishable with death (Nu 15<sup>22<sup>a</sup></sup> (P), Ex 31<sup>14<sup>a</sup></sup> (J)), cf. Ex 16<sup>5</sup> (J), where the Manna ceases on the Sabbath, and Ex 35<sup>3</sup> (P), where no fire is to be lighted. According to the testimony of Josephus, the high priest, although legally bound to officiate only on the Day of Atonement, yet actually officiated, as a rule, every Sabbath day, and on the occasion of the New Moons or other festivals in the course of the year (Jos. BJ v. 7).

(2) The New Moon, חַדָּשׁ הַיָּרֵךְ, (2) חַדָּשׁ הַיָּרֵךְ, (3) רֵאשִׁית חַדָּשׁ הַיָּרֵךְ, (4) רֵאשִׁית חַדָּשׁ הַיָּרֵךְ, vousnyia, veounyia.—Closely associated with the Sabbath (see above). 'When under the influence of the Chaldee method of dividing time, the course of the moon with its four phases was adopted as the unit of time measurement, the new moon and the 7th day were naturally regarded as the chief divisions of time, and therefore as holy days' (Schultz, OT Theol. i. 204). From 2 K 4<sup>23</sup> it would appear that the prophets were in the habit of gathering the people around them, and perhaps of granting inquirers and suppliants an audience at new moons and on Sabbaths. At every new moon the number of burnt-offerings was largely increased; and in addition a kid of the goats was to be offered for a sin-offering (Ex 40<sup>2-17</sup> (P), Nu 10<sup>10</sup> (P) 28<sup>11-15</sup> (P) 29<sup>6</sup> (P), 1 S 20<sup>5-6</sup>, 29, 1 Ch 23<sup>31</sup>, 2 Ch 2<sup>4</sup>, 2 Ch 29<sup>17</sup>, Ps 81<sup>3-4</sup>, Is 1<sup>13-14</sup>, Hos 2<sup>11</sup>, 1 Es 52<sup>2</sup>, 53, 57, 86 9<sup>16</sup>, 17, 37, 1 Mac 10<sup>34</sup>, Col 2<sup>16</sup>).

(3) The Feast of Trumpets on the 1st day of the Sabbatical month, זְכֵרֶן תְּרִיבָה, זְכֵרֶן תְּרִיבָה, αγγελόφωνον σαλπίγγων.—The 7th month—Tisri—was the sacred month. On the new moon of the 7th month—the Feast of Trumpets—additional burnt-offerings were sacrificed (Nu 29<sup>1-6</sup> (P), Lv 23<sup>24-25</sup> (P)).

(4) The Sabbatical Year, שְׁמִטָּה שְׁמִטָּה, σάββατα ἀνάπαυσις τῆς γῆς (Ex 23<sup>10-11</sup> (J), Lv 25<sup>1-7</sup>, 20, 22 (H), Lv 26<sup>32-35</sup> (H), Dt 15<sup>1-11</sup> 31<sup>13-15</sup>).—The Sabbatical year represented a still further consecration of time to God. The land was to keep a Sabbath. The fields were neither to be tilled nor reaped. 'Nature is to be set free, as it were, from the service which mankind exacts from her, and to be left entirely to herself. Only what she voluntarily offers is to be taken, and that not for any selfish purpose' (Schultz, OT Theol. i. 363). Hebrew slaves were to be set free unless they wished to remain in service (Ex 21<sup>2-6</sup> (J)). A harvest was to be given gratis to the poor of the people (Ex 23<sup>10, 11</sup> (J)). Release from debt is prescribed (Dt 15<sup>1-6</sup>). In Ex 23 (J) the arrangement is made for man; it is a limitation for the common good of private rights of property in land,—in fact, for the benefit of the landless, who in the 7th year are to have the usufruct of the soil; in Lv 25 (H) the arrangement is for the sake of the land,—that it may rest, if not on the 7th day, at least on the 7th year; and for the sake of the Sabbath,—that it may extend its supremacy over nature also (Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 118). At the F. of Tabernacles at the commencement of the Sabbatical year, the whole law was read in the hearing of the people (Neh 8<sup>13-18</sup>). The 70 years' captivity and the land's desolation were regarded as making up for the unobserved Sabbaths of the land (Camb. Comp. to the Bible, p. 412) (2 Ch 36<sup>21</sup>, Jer 34<sup>14-22</sup>). After the return from exile Nehemiah bound the Jews by a covenant to keep them (Neh 10<sup>3</sup>).

* The article is general. Fuller details will be found under the articles on the separate Feasts and Fasts. See also the article FASTING.

(5) The Year of Jubilee יובל, ἀφέσις, יוֹבֵל, ἐνιαυτός ἀφέσις σκηνασία (Lv 25<sup>3-55</sup> 27<sup>17-24</sup>).—Peculiar to P. As the Sabbatical year corresponded with the 7th day, so the year of Jubilee corresponded with the 50th, i.e. Pentecost. 'As the fiftieth day after the seven Sabbath days is celebrated as a closing festival of the forty-nine days' period, so is the fiftieth year after the seven Sabbatic years, as rounding off the larger interval; the seven Sabbaths falling on harvest time, which are usually reckoned specially (Lk 6<sup>4</sup>), have, in the circumstance of their interrupting harvest work, a particular resemblance to the Sabbatic years which interrupt agriculture altogether. Jubilee is thus an artificial institution superimposed upon the years of fallow, regarded as harvest Sabbaths after the analogy of Pentecost' (Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 119). There were two main elements in the Jubilee—the emancipation of the Hebrew slave, and the return of mortgaged property to its hereditary owner. Cf. 2 Ch 36<sup>21</sup>, Jer 34<sup>8, 14, 15, 17</sup>, Ezk 46<sup>17</sup>, Is 61<sup>1-2</sup> 63<sup>4</sup>, Lk 4<sup>18-21</sup>. But in Jer the term יוֹבֵל used in Lv 25<sup>10</sup> is applied only to the 7th year. The year of Jubilee was proclaimed by the sound of a trumpet on the Day of Atonement (Lv 25<sup>9</sup>).

II. THE GREAT HISTORICAL FESTIVALS.†—As the new moon and the Sabbath were lunar feasts, the Passover (with the Feast of Unleavened Bread), Pentecost, and Tabernacles were solar festivals, i.e. festivals which followed the seasons of the year. 'Three times in the year shalt thou hold pilgrimage unto me, three times in the year shall all thy men appear before J', the God of Israel' (Ex 23<sup>14, 17</sup> (J), 34<sup>23</sup> (JE), Dt 16<sup>16</sup>).

(1) The Passover פֶּסַח, πάσχα. The Feast of Unleavened Bread חַמֵּץ, ἐσθλή τῶν ἀζύμων.—The Passover, though followed by the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Mazzôth), was distinct from it both in its origin and in its observance. In Ex 12 and 13 two narratives are combined. Ex 12<sup>1-13</sup> (P) refer to the Passover, 12<sup>14-20</sup> (P) refer to the seven days' F. of Mazzôth, 12<sup>21-27</sup> (JE) refer to the Passover, 12<sup>33-50</sup> (P) refer to the Passover, 13<sup>3-10</sup> (JE) refer to Mazzôth (Driver, LOT, 25). Josephus distinguishes the Passover from the F. of Mazzôth (Ant. III. x. 5), 'The F. of Unleavened Bread succeeds that of the Passover, and falls on the fifteenth day of the month, and continues seven days' (cf. Lv 23<sup>5, 6</sup> (P), Nu 28<sup>16-17</sup> (P)). But in Mk 14<sup>1-12</sup>, Lk 22<sup>1</sup> they are practically identified. 'The Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread form a double festival, just as the Day of Atonement and the Feast of Tabernacles do. It is undoubtedly as a direct preparation for the F. of Unleavened Bread that the Passover is celebrated on the evening before the latter feast begins' (Schultz, OT Theol. vol. i. p. 364) [Lv 23<sup>5-8</sup> (P) 10<sup>-14</sup> (H), Nu 9<sup>2-14</sup> (P) 28<sup>16-25</sup> (P) 33<sup>3</sup> (P), Dt 16<sup>1-8, 16</sup>]. The parallelism between the feast of the first month and the feast of the seventh month should be noticed. The tenth day of the first month, for choosing the Lamb, is parallel to the tenth day of the seventh month, the Day of Atonement. The Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month and the seven days' F. of Mazzôth are parallel to the eight days of the F. of Tabernacles. The Passover, which was a sacrificial feast (Ex 12<sup>27</sup>), was observed on the fourteenth day of the first month, Abib (the month of ears, because in it the ears of wheat first appear), later Nisan (Est 3<sup>7</sup>, Neh 2<sup>1</sup>). The Feast of Unleavened Bread was the opening as Pentecost was the closing festivity of the seven weeks' 'joy of harvest' (Dt 16<sup>9</sup>, Lv 23<sup>10</sup> (H)). Passover and Mazzôth must be distinguished. Wellhausen (Prolegomena, 87 ff.) has shown how the Passover פֶּסַח points back to the sacrifice of the firstlings (Ex 34<sup>18</sup> (JE) 13<sup>12</sup> (JE), Dt 15<sup>19</sup> 16<sup>10</sup>). It is because J' smote the firstborn of Egypt and spared those of Israel that the latter thenceforward are held sacred to Him. Because Pharaoh refuses to allow the Hebrews to offer to their God the firstlings of cattle that are His due, J' seizes from him the firstborn of men. On the origin of the Paschal ritual and its connexion with Arabian and other customs, see W. R. Smith, RS, 227, 280, 344, 345, 406, 431, 464, 465; Schultz, OT Theol. i. p. 364; Cobb, Origines Judaicae, 138. 'In the three great festivals we can plainly discern relics of the customs which preceded their legal institution. In the first (the Passover) we can distinguish the earlier belief, out of which the offering of the firstlings of the flock sprang, from the enactments which are proper to the institution of the Passover.' Cf. also for the feasts generally W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, new ed. pp. 56, 384 ff., where he clearly, after Wellhausen, * proves that the chief occasions of worship in Israel (Mazzôth, Pentecost, and Tabernacles) were the agricultural feasts, just as among the Canaanites and other ancient nations. The real starting-point for a study of Jewish sacred feasts is Gn 4<sup>26</sup> (J), 'Abel was a shepherd, and Cain was a husbandman. And in process of time it came to pass that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD; and Abel also brought an offering of the firstlings of his sheep.' 'It is,' says Wellhausen (Proleg. p. 89), 'out of the simplest, most natural, and most widespread offerings, those of the first-fruits of the flock, herd, and field, the occasions for which recur regularly with the seasons of the year, that the annual festivals took their rise. The Passover corresponds with the firstlings of Abel the shepherd, the other three (Mazzôth, Pentecost, and Tabernacles) with the fruits presented by Cain the husbandman; apart from this difference, in essence and foundation they are all precisely alike.' Thus the Passover in its origin must be distinguished from the three agricultural feasts. It was a sacrificial feast, and had nothing to do with agriculture or harvest. The name 'sacrifice' (זֶבֶח) is distinctly applied to it (Ex 12<sup>27</sup> (JE) 34<sup>25</sup> (JE), cf. 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>). In Nu 9<sup>7-13</sup> (P) it is a korban or offering (זֶבֶח). Like the peace-offerings, the chief part of it was eaten by the worshippers;

* יוֹבֵל in Lv 25<sup>10</sup> refers to the 'liberty' of Sabbatical year, in Jer 34<sup>15, 17</sup> to the liberty of slaves in 7th year of service, in Ezk 46<sup>17</sup> prob. to Jubilee. In Is 61<sup>1</sup> its use is figurative.

† The distinctive feature of these זֶבֶח is that they are not merely religious festivals like those of the 'sacred seasons' (מִצְוֹת), but imply, like the Arab. hajj (same word), a pilgrimage to a sanctuary (see Driver, Deut. 188 ff.).

* 'Not only in the Jahwistic but also in the Deuteronomistic legislation the festivals rest upon agriculture, the basis at once of life and of religion' (Proleg. p. 91).

like the sin-offerings, there was an element of atonement in it (2 Ch 30<sup>16</sup> 35<sup>11</sup> refer to the sprinkling of the blood of the Passover); like the burnt-offerings, it was whole—no bone of it was broken; it was roast with fire—anything left was burnt with fire. In the two accounts of the Passover in Ex 12, several points of importance are omitted in the first, e.g. the character of the lamb, and the manner in which it was to be eaten; fresh points are added in the second, e.g. the hyssop, the basin, and that none were to leave their houses till the morning.

On each of the seven days of the F. of Mazzôth, which followed the Passover, 2 young bullocks and 1 ram and 7 lambs of the first year were offered as burnt-offerings, with their meal and drink-offerings, together with a goat for a sin-offering and the continual, i.e. daily burnt-offering (Nu 28<sup>19-25</sup> (P)). On the second day of Mazzôth—Abib (Nisan) 16th—a sheaf of the new corn was offered as a wave-offering, together with a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering (Lv 23<sup>10-14</sup> (H)). The first and last days of the feast—the 15th and 21st days of the month—were days of 'holy convocation,' in which no servile work might be done (Lv 23<sup>7</sup> (P)).

There are few references to the Passover in OT (Nu 9 (P), Jos 5<sup>10-12</sup> (P), 2 Ch 30. 35, Ezr 6<sup>19</sup>, 1 Es 1<sup>6</sup>, 8. 9. 12. 17. 19. 20. 21. 22<sup>710. 12</sup>). In NT see Mt 26<sup>2. 17. 18. 19</sup>, Mk 14<sup>1. 12. 14. 16</sup>, Lk 22<sup>1. 7. 8. 11. 13. 15</sup>, Jn 2<sup>13. 23</sup>, 6<sup>4</sup>, 11<sup>55</sup>, 12<sup>1</sup>, 13<sup>1</sup>, 18<sup>28. 39</sup>, 19<sup>14</sup>, Ac 12<sup>4</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup>, He 11<sup>28</sup>. Later Jewish ordinances distinguish between the so-called 'Egyptian Passover,' that is, as it was enjoined for the first night of its celebration, and the 'permanent Passover,' as it was to be observed by Israel after their possession of the land of promise (Edersheim, Bible History, vol. ii.). On the later additions to the Paschal ceremonial, e.g. the recitation of the history of redemption, the four cups, the Hallel (Ps 113-118), the Chagigáh, etc., see Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services at the Time of Jesus Christ, chs. xi. xii.; and for the Feast of Unleavened Bread, see ch. xiii. of the same.

(2) The Feast of Pentecost.—(i.) חַג הַשִּׁבְעָה, éorh ébdomáda, the Feast of Weeks (Ex 34<sup>22</sup> (JE), Dt 16<sup>10</sup>); (ii.) חַג הַקִּצְרִי, éorh therisoud, the Feast of Harvest (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> (J)); (iii.) חַג הַבְּרִיּוֹת, éorh hēbrîyot, the Day of Firstfruits (Nu 28<sup>26</sup> (P); cf. Ex 22<sup>29</sup> (J) 23<sup>19</sup> (J) 34<sup>26</sup> (JE)). Fifty days after the offering of the Paschal wave-sheaf, the Feast of Pentecost, or Weeks, or Harvest, was kept on or about the 8th of Sivan, the third month. It lasted a single day (Dt 16<sup>9-12</sup>). The day was a day of 'holy convocation' (Lv 23<sup>21</sup> (P)). The feast marked the completion of the corn harvest, and according to the later Jews it commemorated the giving of the law (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xiii. p. 225). It closed the New Year holiday season. The sacrifices were similar to those offered on the seven days of the F. of Mazzôth (Nu 28<sup>26-31</sup> (P)). The characteristic ritual of this feast was the offering and waving of two leavened loaves of wheat flour, together with a sin-offering, burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings (Lv 23<sup>15-20</sup> (H)). As a wave-sheaf was offered at Mazzôth, which marked the commencement of harvest, as the consecration of the first-fruits, so two wave-loaves were offered at Pentecost, which marked the completion of the corn harvest. The feast is not referred to in OT, but see 2 Mac 12<sup>32</sup>, Ac 2<sup>1</sup> 20<sup>16</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>8</sup> (cf. Edersheim, The Temple, pp. 225-231).

(3) The Feast of Tabernacles.—חַג הַסֻּכּוֹת, éorh skhōwōt, F. of Tabernacles or Booths (Lv 23<sup>34</sup>, Dt 16<sup>13</sup>); חַג הַמִּצֵּה, éorh mizē, the F. of Ingathering. This feast was observed from the 15th to the 22nd of Tisri (the seventh month), following closely upon the Fast on the 10th day of the month—the Day of Atonement. It marked the completion of the harvest of fruit, oil, and wine, and historically it commemorated the wanderings in the wilderness. It was the harvest-home at the close of the year, when people came 'from the villages and towns to the fruit gardens to live in booths, and enjoy a happy autumn holiday' (Ex 23<sup>16</sup> (J) 34<sup>22</sup> (JE), Lv 23<sup>34-36. 39-44</sup> (PH), Nu 29<sup>12-40</sup> (P), Dt 16<sup>13-15</sup> 31<sup>10-13</sup>). The sacrifices at this feast were far more numerous than at any other. On each of the seven days 1 kid of the goats was offered as a sin-offering, and 2 rams and 14 lambs as a burnt-offering. Also 70 bullocks were offered on the seven days, beginning with 13 on the first day and diminishing by one each day until on the 7th day 7 were offered (Nu 29<sup>12-34</sup>). After the seven days a solemn day of 'holy convocation' was observed ('the last day, that great day of the feast,' Jn 7<sup>37</sup>), which marked the conclusion, not only of the Feast of Tabernacles, but of the whole cycle of the festal year. On this day 1 bullock, 1 ram, and 7 lambs were offered as a burnt-offering, and 1 goat for a sin-offering (Nu 29<sup>35-38</sup>). The feast is alluded to in 1 K 8<sup>2</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>, 2 Ch 5<sup>3</sup> 7<sup>8a</sup>, Ezr 3<sup>7</sup>, Neh 8<sup>14-18</sup>, Zec 14<sup>16-19</sup>, Jn 7<sup>1-10</sup>. On the later ceremonies connected with the feast, e.g. the procession to Siloam to fetch water and its solemn libation at the altar (Jn 7<sup>37</sup>), the singing of the Hallel (Pss 113-118), the daily processions round the altar, and the sevenfold repetition on the seventh day (Ps 118<sup>25</sup>), the lighting of the four great golden candelabra in the court of the women (Jn 8<sup>12</sup>), the singing of Pss 105. 29. 50. 94. 81. 82, and the public reading of the law on the first day of the week in the Sabbatical year, see Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xiv. pp. 232-249; Westcott on St. John, notes on ch. 7<sup>37</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>. [On the daily service, which formed the substratum of the entire worship of the Temple, the morning and evening sacrifices which were offered on every Sabbath and every festival day, see Schürer, HJP ii. 273-299.]

III. THE MINOR FESTIVALS.—(1) The Feast of Purim (חַג פּוּרִים, phōupāl).—In 2 Mac 15<sup>36</sup> it is called ἡ Μαρδοχαϊκὴ ἡμέρα, 'Mordecai's Day.' It is said to have been instituted by Mordecai to commemorate the overthrow of Haman and the failure of his plots against the Jews (Est 3<sup>7</sup> 9<sup>15-32</sup>). It was held on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (the twelfth month). The 13th of Adar—the day of Nicanor—originally a feast to commemorate his death (1 Mac 7<sup>49</sup>, 2 Mac 15<sup>36</sup>), at a later time became a fast—'the Fast of Esther'—in preparation for the Feast of Purim, which was of a very joyous character. De Lagarde (followed by Schultz, OT Theol. p. 431, and Encycl. Brit. 9th ed. vol. xx. p. 115) thinks that the feast which dates from the Persian period is itself of Persian origin, Purim being derived from the Persian Furdigan (Pōrdigān, Pārdiyān) the φουρμάλ and φουρδάλ of one of the Greek recensions of Esther pointing to a form φουρδάλ instead of Purim.

Edersheim identifies the F. of Purim with the unnamed feast in Jn 5<sup>1</sup>, 'for no other feast could have intervened between December (Jn 4<sup>36</sup>) and the Passover (Jn 6<sup>4</sup>), except that of the "Dedication of the Temple," and that is specially designated as such (Jn 10<sup>22</sup>) and not simply as a Feast of the Jews' (The Temple, etc., p. 291). On the evening of the 13th of Adar the whole Book (Megillah or Roll) of Esther was read at the synagogue service, to keep the memory of the great deliverance by Esther alive, 'the children raising their loudest and angriest cries at every mention of the name of Haman, the congregation stamping on the floor, with Eastern demonstrativeness, and imprecating from every voice the curse, "Let his name be blotted out, the name of the wicked shall rot." Year by year in the Nazareth synagogue Jesus must have seen and heard all this, and how the reader tried to read in one breath the verses in which Haman and his sons are jointly mentioned, to show that they were hanged together' (Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ, i. 226). Edersheim (The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 229) speaks of the 'good cheer and boisterous enjoyments' of the Feast of Purim, some of its customs 'almost reminding us of our fifth of November.'

(2) The Feast of the Dedication of the Temple (הֵחָדָשׁ, הֵחָדָשׁ, échaïnâ, 1 Mac 4<sup>56, 59</sup>, 2 Mac 10<sup>6ff.</sup>; φῶτα, Jos. Ant. xii. vii. 7).—It was instituted by Judas Maccabæus in B.C. 164, when the temple which had been desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes was once more purified and re-dedicated to the service of J". It commenced on the 25th of Chislew (the ninth month), and lasted for eight days. 'All through the land the people assembled in their synagogues, carrying branches of palm and other trees in their hands, and held jubilant services. No fast or mourning could commence during the feast, and a blaze of lamps, lanterns, and torches illuminated every house, within and without, each evening. In Jerusalem the temple itself was thus lighted up. The young of every household heard the stirring deeds of the Maccabees, to rouse them to noble emulation, and with these were linked the story of the heroic Judith and the Assyrian Holofernes' (Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ, vol. i. p. 225). It will be noticed that in four particulars the Feast of the Dedication resembled the Feast of Tabernacles, (1) in its duration of eight days; (2) in the chanting of the Hallel (Pss 113-118); (3) in the practice of carrying palm branches; (4) in the illumination of the temple. Edersheim, in The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 227 f., thinks that the first three particulars were derived from the Feast of the Tabernacles, and that the last (the temple illumination) passed from the Feast of the Dedication into the observances of the Feast of Tabernacles. The date of the Feast of the Dedication, the 25th of Chislew, some hold to have been adopted by the ancient Church as that of the birth of our blessed Lord—Christmas—the dedication of the true temple, which was the body of Jesus (Jn 2<sup>19</sup>) (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., p. 293, and 'Christmas a Festival of Jewish Origin' in The Leisure Hour for Dec. 1873). The F. of the Dedication is mentioned in Jn 10<sup>22</sup>.

(3) The Feast of Wood Offering or of the Wood-carriers, ξυλοφορίων (Jos. B.J. II. xvii. 6), on the 15th of Abib—being the last of the nine occasions on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple (cf. Neh 10<sup>34</sup> 13<sup>31</sup>).

The Feast of the Reading of the Law (1 Es 9<sup>50</sup>, Neh 8<sup>9</sup>); The Feast of Nicnora on the 13th of Adar (1 Mac 7<sup>49</sup>); The Feast of the Captured Fortress on the 23rd of Iyyar (the second month) (1 Mac 13<sup>50-52</sup>); and The Feast of Baskets, evidently 'never attained to any real religious significance' (see Schultz, OT Theol. i. 431, and Edersheim, The Temple, etc., 295 f., on the Feast of Wood Offering).

IV. FASTS. —(1) The Day of Atonement. —כִּי יוֹמֵי קָדְשׁ, יוֹמֵי קָדְשׁ לְעֹלָה, lit. Day of the Coverings or Atonements (Lv 16 (P) and 23<sup>27-32</sup> (H), Ex 30<sup>10</sup> (P), Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup> (P)). It was the only fast day prescribed by the law (Lv 23<sup>27</sup> (H)). In the Talmud it is called 'The Day' (אָדָם); in the NT it is called 'the fast,' ἡ νηστεία (Ac 27<sup>9</sup>). The sacrifices were threefold: (1) the ordinary daily sacrifices; (2) the special expiatory sacrifices of the day; (3) the festive sacrifices (Nu 29<sup>7-11</sup>). The characteristic feature of the day was the offering of the sin-offering of atonement by the high priest alone (Lv 16<sup>33</sup>)—not in his gorgeous official dress, but in the simple white linen robes of purity and consecration (Lv 16<sup>4, 29, 31</sup> 23<sup>27, 32</sup>, Nu 29<sup>7</sup>).

The order of proceedings is given in Lv 16. In vv. 3-10 we have the general outline, in vv. 11-28 the details, which were as follows: (1) The killing of the bullock by the high priest as a sin-offering for himself and his house; (2) the burning of incense in the Holy of Holies by the high priest; (3) the sprinkling of the mercy-seat (ἱλαστήριον ἐπίθεμα) with the blood of the priest's sin-offering; (4) the casting lots upon the goats of the people's sin-offering, one goat for J", one for Azazel (אִזָּזֵל, Philo, 'The one goat is given to "the fugitive creature," and the lot which it received is named in the prophecy "sent away" [referring to ἀποσπομαῖον by which the LXX tr. אִזָּזֵל], because it is persecuted, expelled, and driven far away by wisdom.' Willis, 'Azazel, the name of a personal being, in opposition to J", the personal name of God.' Schultz, 'Some powerful being to whom the animal is assigned, and to whom it is sent with the now forgiven guilt of the reconciled people. . . . This being must be conceived of as strange and unholy. . . . An Aramaic name for an unclean and ungodlike power, which has its abode in the wilderness, in the accursed land outside the sacred bounds of the camp.' Watson in Camb. Comp. to the Bible, 'Azazel, the completely separate one, the evil spirit regarded as dwelling in the desert'). See AZAZEL. (5) The killing of the goat of the people's sin-offering by the high priest; (6) the sprinkling of the mercy-seat with the blood of the people's sin-offering; (7) the sprinkling of the blood of each sin-offering on the golden altar of incense and before it seven times; (8) atonement for the court and altar of burnt-offering; (9) confession of sin over the live goat, and his dismissal into the wilderness to Azazel; (10) resumption by the high priest of the gorgeous robes of his office; (11) the offering of burnt-offerings and burning the fat of the sin-offerings; (12) the burning of the sin-offerings without the camp (He 13<sup>10-12</sup>). The chief purpose of the Day of Atonement was to preserve the holiness of the sanctuary as a fit place of meeting between God and man. There were five subjects of atonement: (1) The Holy Sanctuary (i.e. the Holy of Holies); (2) the Tent of Meeting (i.e. the Holy Place); (3) the altar (i.e. of burnt-offering); (4) the priest; (5) all the congregation.

It is significant that there is no mention of the Day of Atonement until Sir 50<sup>56</sup>. Zec 3<sup>9</sup> is doubtful. In Neh 8 it might have been expected. Neh 7<sup>73-93</sup> records (1) the observance of the Feast of Trumpets on the first day of the seventh month of the year B.C. 444; (2) the celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, including the reading of the books of the law day by day, from the 15th to the 22nd of the same month; (3) the observance of a day of general fasting and prayer on the 24th day of the same month. Either the 24th day was observed in place of the Day of Atonement on the 10th day, or the latter had not yet been appointed. It is difficult to avoid the latter alternative. 'This testimonium e silentio is enough; down to that date (B.C. 444) the great day of the Priestly code (now introduced for the first time) had not existed' (Wellhausen, Prolegomena, p. 111). For the references in the NT see Ro 3<sup>25</sup> (ἱλαστήριον, ἡμέρα), He 9<sup>18</sup> 4<sup>14-18</sup> 5<sup>1-10</sup> 6<sup>19</sup>, 20 7<sup>22-28</sup> 8<sup>1-6</sup> 9<sup>11-15</sup> 13<sup>10-12</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>4</sup> 4<sup>10</sup> (ἱλασμός) (Willis, Worship of the Old Covenant, pp. 201-214; Edersheim, The Temple, etc., ch. xvi. pp. 263-288). See further, ATONEMENT (DAY OF).

(2) Other Fasts.—The Day of Atonement was the only fast day prescribed by the law. But we read of individual and national fasts in Jg 20<sup>26</sup>, 1 S 7<sup>6</sup> 31<sup>13</sup>, 2 S 12<sup>16</sup>, 1 K 21<sup>9, 12, 27</sup>, Jon 3<sup>7, 7, 8</sup>, Jer 14<sup>12</sup> 36<sup>6, 9</sup>, La 2<sup>10</sup>, Jl 1<sup>14</sup> 2<sup>12, 15</sup>, Is 58<sup>3-7</sup>, Neh 9<sup>14</sup>, Est 4<sup>6</sup>, Dn 10<sup>3</sup>, 1 Mac 3<sup>47</sup>. Two passages in Zec call for comment,

SYNOPSIS OF FEASTS AND FASTS.

| Group.                                               | Feast or Fast.                            | Exodus.                                                                                                         | Leviticus.                                                 | Numbers.                                                     | Deuteronomy.                           | References outside Pentateuch.                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | References in New Test.                                                                                                                    |
|------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| I.Connected with the Institution of the Sabbath. | 1. Sabbath . . .                          | 16 <sup>23-30</sup> 20 <sup>8</sup>23 <sup>12</sup> 31 <sup>13-16</sup>34 <sup>21</sup> 35 <sup>2</sup> | 19 <sup>8</sup> 23 <sup>3</sup> 26 <sup>2</sup>            | 15 <sup>32-36</sup> 25 <sup>9,10</sup>                       | 51 <sup>2-15</sup>                     | 1 S 20 <sup>5</sup> , 6, 2 K 4 <sup>23</sup> 11 <sup>5-7</sup> ,Neh 8 <sup>9-13</sup> 10 <sup>31</sup> 13 <sup>15-22</sup> ,Is 56 <sup>2-6</sup> 58 <sup>12</sup> , Jer17 <sup>20-27</sup> , Ezk 20 <sup>12-16</sup> ,Hos 2 <sup>13</sup> , Am 8 <sup>5</sup> | Mt 12 <sup>9-13</sup> , Mk 31 <sup>5</sup> , Lk6 <sup>6-10</sup> 13 <sup>10-17</sup> , Jn 51 <sup>16</sup> ,914 <sup>16</sup>      |
|                                                      | 2. New Moon . . .                         | 40 <sup>2</sup> , 17                                                                                            | ..                                                         | 10 <sup>10</sup> 25 <sup>11-14</sup> ,31 29 <sup>6</sup> | ..                                     | 1 S 20 <sup>5</sup> , Ps 81 <sup>3</sup> , 4, Is11 <sup>3,14</sup> , Am 8 <sup>5</sup> , 1 Mac10 <sup>34</sup>                                                                                                                                                        | Col 2 <sup>16</sup> .                                                                                                                      |
|                                                      | 3. Sabbatical Month,Feast of Trumpets | ..                                                                                                              | 23 <sup>24</sup> , 25                                      | 291 <sup>6</sup>                                             | ..                                     | Neh 8 <sup>9</sup> , 10                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | ..                                                                                                                                         |
|                                                      | 4. Sabbatical Year . .                    | 2310 <sup>11</sup>                                                                                              | 251 <sup>7</sup> , 29 <sup>22</sup>26 <sup>32-35</sup> | ..                                                           | 151 <sup>11</sup>319 <sup>13</sup> | 2 Ch 36 <sup>21</sup> , Neh 10 <sup>31</sup> ,Jer 34 <sup>14</sup> , 1 Mac 6 <sup>53</sup>                                                                                                                                                                                | ..                                                                                                                                         |
|                                                      | 5. Jubilee Year . . .                     | ..                                                                                                              | 25 <sup>8-55</sup> 27 <sup>17-24</sup>                     | ..                                                           | ..                                     | Is 611 <sup>2</sup> 63 <sup>4</sup> , Jer 34 <sup>8</sup> ,14.15.17 (?), Ezk 46 <sup>17</sup>                                                                                                                                                                             | Lk 418 <sup>21</sup> , Rev 211 <sup>5</sup> .                                                                                              |
| II.Three Historical Feasts.                      | 1. Passover andMazzôth         | 12. 131-102314 <sup>17</sup>3418. 25                                                                    | 23 <sup>3</sup> -14                                        | 9214 2516-2533 <sup>3</sup>                              | 161 <sup>8</sup> , 16                  | Jos 59.10, 2 K 23 <sup>21</sup> , 23,2 Ch 30. 35, Ezr 61 <sup>9</sup> ,Ezk 45 <sup>21</sup>                                                                                                                                                                           | Mt 261.2, Mk 141.12,14.16, Lk 241.221.7.8.11.13.15, Jn 213 641155 121 131 1828.391914, Acts 121, 1 Co56 <sup>8</sup> . |
|                                                      | 2. Pentecost . . .                        | 2229 2316.193422. 26                                                                                        | 2310-21                                                    | 2826-31                                                      | 169-12                                 | 2 Mac 123 <sup>2</sup>                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | Ac 21 2016, 1 Co 16 <sup>8</sup> .                                                                                                         |
|                                                      | 3. Tabernacles . . .                      | 2316 3422                                                                                                       | 2334-36. 39-44                                             | 2912-40                                                      | 1613-153110-13                     | 1 K 8 <sup>2</sup> 123 <sup>2</sup> , 2 Ch 5 <sup>3</sup> 7 <sup>8</sup> ,Ezr 34 814 <sup>17</sup> , Zec1416-19                                                                                                                                                       | Jn 71-1021.                                                                                                                                |
| III.Minor Feasts.                                | 1. Purim . . .                            | ..                                                                                                              | ..                                                         | ..                                                           | ..                                     | Est. 915-32, 1 Mac 74 <sup>9</sup> ,2 Mac 153 <sup>6</sup>                                                                                                                                                                                                                | Jn 51 (?).                                                                                                                                 |
|                                                      | 2. Dedication or Lights                   | ..                                                                                                              | ..                                                         | ..                                                           | ..                                     | 1 Mac 452 <sup>59</sup> , 2 Mac106. 7                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | Jn 1022.                                                                                                                                   |
| IV.Fast.                                         | Day of Atonement .                        | 3010                                                                                                            | 16. 2327-32                                                | 297-11                                                       | ..                                     | Zec 3 <sup>9</sup> (?), Sir 505 <sup>11</sup> .                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | Ac 27 <sup>9</sup> , 11e 218 414-1651-10 619. 20 722-23 81-5911-13.                                                                |

7<sup>3-5</sup> and 8<sup>19</sup>. In 7<sup>3-5</sup> Zechariah, in answer to an inquiry put to him by the men of Bethel about fasting, declares that J<sup>n</sup> demands no fasts, but only observance of His moral commands. Two fasts had been in observance in the 5th and 7th months for seventy years,—the fast of the 5th month (9th Abib), in memory of the destruction of the city and temple by fire (2 K 25<sup>3</sup>); and the fast of the 7th month (2nd Tisri), in memory of the murder of Gedaliah and the annihilation of all that remained of the Jewish state (Jer 41). In ch. 8 he pictures the Messianic future, when the fast days will become seasons of gladness and cheerful feasts. He adds to 7<sup>3-5</sup> two other fasts: the fast of the 4th month (17th Tammuz), in memory of the capture of Jerusalem (Jer 39<sup>2</sup>), and the fast of the 10th month (10th Tebeth), in memory of the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25<sup>3</sup>). Zechariah knows nothing of 'the Fast'—the Day of Atonement. Later fasts 'came into a position co-ordinate with the feasts, and became a stated and very important element of the ordinary worship' (Wellhausen, Prolego-

mena, 112). Fasting degenerated into formalism and self-righteousness. In the NT cf. Mt 6<sup>16ff</sup>, 914, Mk 2<sup>18ff</sup>, Lk 5<sup>33ff</sup>, 181<sup>2</sup>, Ac 27<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>5</sup> 11<sup>27</sup>. After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, the system of fasts received such an impulse that it was necessary to draw up a list of the days on which fasting was forbidden. The present Jewish calendar contains twenty-two fast-days, besides the Day of Atonement, the Fast of Esther, and the four fasts of Zec 8<sup>19</sup> (Edersheim, The Temple, etc., pp. 297-301).

LITERATURE.—Edersheim, The Temple: its Ministry and Services, 144-300, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah; Geikie, The Life and Words of Christ; Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 83-120; Schultz, OT Theology, i. 189, 196, 202, 359-369, 372, 402. On p. 359 will be found an exhaustive list of German literature on the 'Sacred Seasons.' Vol. ii. 87-100; Willis, The Worship of the Old Covenant, 190-214; W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel, new ed. with introd. and notes by Prof. Cheyne, 38, 56, 384, OTJC 2, 240, 260, RS 2, 221, 227, 245, 280, 344 f., 396, 403 f., 416, 434, 452, 464; Cobb, Origines Judaice, 137-139; Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 363, 372, 378, 385, 397, 401, criticism of Wellhausen; Schürer, HJP (passim); Watson, Cambridge Companion to the Bible, 411-417; Driver, Deuteronomy (passim), Joel and Amos, 16, 43 f., 55; Trumbull, Threshold Covenant, 209 f., 266. E. ELMER HARDING.

The following important articles, among others, may be expected in the Second Volume:—

|                 |                                                          |                 |                                           |
|-----------------|----------------------------------------------------------|-----------------|-------------------------------------------|
| FIRST-FRUIT     | Professor A. S. Peake.                                   | HOLY SPIRIT     | Professor H. B. Swete.                    |
| FLOOD . . . .   | Mr. F. H. Woods.                                         | HOSEA . . . .   | Professor A. B. Davidson.                 |
| FOOD . . . .    | Professor A. Macalister.                                 | HOUSE . . . .   | Sir Charles Warren.                       |
| FOOL . . . .    | Professor Geerhardus Vos.                                | HYMN . . . .    | Professor Walter Lock.                    |
| FOREIGNER . .   | Mr. John A. Selbie.                                      | IDOLATRY . .    | Professor W. P. Paterson.                 |
| FORGIVENESS .   | Mr. J. F. Bethune-Baker.                                 | INCARNATION .   | Principal R. L. Ottley.                   |
| FRINGES . . .   | Professor A. R. S. Kennedy.                              | ISALIAH . . .   | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GABBATHA . .    | Professor Eb. Nestle.                                    | ISRAEL . . . .  | Professor H. E. Ryle.                     |
| GAD . . . . .   | Professor W. H. Bennett.                                 | ITURÆA . . .    | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GADARA . . .    | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JACOB . . . .   | Professor H. E. Ryle.                     |
| GALATIA . . .   | Professor W. M. Ramsay.                                  | JAMES . . . .   | Professor J. B. Mayor.                    |
| GALATIANS (EP.) | Professor Marcus Dods.                                   | JEHU . . . .    | Principal Owen C. Whitehouse              |
| GALILEE . . .   | Dr. Selah Merrill.                                       | JEREMIAH . .    | Professor A. B. Davidson.                 |
| GAMES . . . .   | Dr. Thomas Nicol.                                        | JERICOH . . .   | Dr. F. J. Bliss.                          |
| GATE . . . . .  | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JERUSALEM . .   | Lient.-Col. Conder.                       |
| GENEALOGY . .   | Professor Ed. L. Curtis andProfessor B. W. Bacon.    | JESUS CHRIST .  | Professor W. Sanday.                      |
| GENESIS . . .   | Professor H. E. Ryle.                                    | JEW . . . . .   | Mr. A. Lukyn Williams.                    |
| GEOLOGY . . .   | Professor Edward Hull.                                   | JOB . . . . .   | Professor W. T. Davison.                  |
| GETHSEMANE .    | Lient.-Col. Conder.                                      | JOEL . . . . .  | Professor G. G. Cameron.                  |
| GIANT . . . .   | Professor Willis J. Beecher.                             | JOHN (BAPTIST)  | Mr. Bebb.                                 |
| GILEAD . . . .  | Professor Driver, Dr. Merrill,and Professor Bennett. | JOHN . . . . .  | The late Principal Reynolds.              |
| GILGAL . . . .  | Dr. F. J. Bliss.                                         | JOHN (EPP.) . . | Professor Salmon.                         |
| GLORY . . . .   | Mr. G. Buchanan Gray andProfessor Massie.            | JONAH . . . .   | Professor Ed. König.                      |
| GOD . . . . .   | Professor A. B. Davidson andProfessor W. Sanday.     | JORDAN . . . .  | Sir Charles Warren.                       |
| GOLGOTHA . .    | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | JOSHUA . . . .  | Professor G. A. Smith.                    |
| GOSPELS . . .   | Professor V. H. Stanton.                                 | JUBILEE . . . . | Mr G. Harford-Battersby.                  |
| GRACE . . . .   | Principal A. Stewart.                                    | JUBILEES (BK.)  | Mr. A. C. Headlam.                        |
| HABAKKUK . .    | Professor S. R. Driver.                                  | JUDÆA . . . .   | Sir Charles Wilson.                       |
| HADES . . . .   | Professor S. D. F. Salmond.                              | JUDAS ISCARIOT  | Dr. A. Plummer.                           |
| HAGGAI . . . .  | Mr. G. A. Cooke.                                         | JUDGES . . . .  | Mr. G. A. Cooke.                          |
| HAMATH . . . .  | Professor W. Max Müller.                                 | JUSTIFICATION . | Principal D. W. Simon.                    |
| HEBREWS (EP.)   | Professor A. B. Bruce.                                   | KINGDOM OF GOD  | Professor J. Orr.                         |
| HEROD . . . .   | Mr. A. C. Headlam.                                       | KINGS . . . . . | Mr. C. F. Burney.                         |
| HEXATEUCH . .   | Mr. F. H. Woods.                                         | LAMENTATIONS .  | Mr. J. A. Selbie.                         |
| HINNOM . . . .  | Sir Charles Warren.                                      | LANGUAGE OF     |                                           |
| HITTITES . . .  | Professor A. H. Sayce.                                   | THE OLD TEST.   | Professor D. S. Margoliouth.              |
| HOLINESS . . .  | Professor John Skinner andProfessor G. B. Stevens.   | LANGUAGE OF     |                                           |
|                 |                                                          | THE NEW TEST.   | Professor J. H. Thayer.                   |
|                 |                                                          | LATIN VERSIONS  | Dr. H. A. A. Kennedy.                     |
|                 |                                                          | LAW . . . . .   | Professor Driver and ProfessorDenney. |
|                 |                                                          | LEPROSY . . . . | Professor Macalister.                     |