LORD BROUGHAM'S EDUCATION BILL.

THERE can be no disgrace in private individuals being ignorant of the nature and provisions of Lord Brougham's EDUCATION BILL, since it appears that neither the Bishop of London, nor yet the Marquis of Lansdowne—who, as President of the Council, is, by the Bill, to be at the head of the projected Board—knew one iota of the matter when, upon the 1st of last month, Lord Brougham again revived his measure. Every Member of the House of Peers was in the same state of darkness. This might be somewhat mortifying to Lord Brougham, had he not so long been accustomed to operate upon blocks with a razor. We plead equal ignorance with the Peers, whose duty it was to make themselves acquainted with a measure sent to them individually, with a key to make it easy and familiar to “the meanest capacity” among the embodied hereditary wisdom—or, in other words, a digest of its contents, drawn up by the framer. That no measure could proceed from him in harmony with some of the views promulgated by Mr Wyse, and the body taking the name of the Central Society of Education, we were confident; nor yet with the opinions of a few persons, whom we must consider more zealous in the cause of education than foreseeing as to the results of the system they recommend. It was impossible that, of all men, Lord Brougham could advocate a system of compulsory education, framed after the model of despotic Prussia, and adopted by the government of Louis Philippe. We could not for a moment believe that the doctrines sent abroad by Mr Duppa, the Secretary of the Society, and countenanced by Mr Wyse and his friends, were approved by Lord Brougham. Of the good which Mr Wyse had effected to education in his own country, and in rousing the public mind of England, we had a high appreciation, though we considered it but the more necessary to direct attention to certain objectionable schemes which he appeared to contemplate. It is enough to have to ward off the parsons, without being embarrassed in this important subject by the Doctrinaires. We need only refer to the extracts from Mr Wyse's writings, given in the article on National Education, in Tait's Magazine for November last—a paper which we have reason to believe has done some good, were it only by giving pause to the vivacity of the popular admiration of ill-matured and dangerous plans.

Nothing whatever—not a shred of an opinion, not the vestige of a prejudice, not the shadow of a desire—to countenance the things which we deemed it a duty to reprobate, is to be found in Lord Brougham's speech. He intends to leave education free as air, in everything important to its vitality. In speaking of the knot of respectable individuals whose opinions, propagated with great zeal and activity, began to alarm us, he remarked, in the admirable and noble speech, delivered in bringing forward the Bill—“I am aware, my Lords, that some most respectable persons differ from me on this subject; they are not a numerous body, but they are of great weight, because they have paid much attention to the subject, and because almost all of them possess great general information; but still I cannot help feeling assured, that they are led away by looking at the circumstances peculiar to the countries in which such a system exists”—the system, namely, of compulsory education, with State interference at every turn; State-bred teachers, compulsorily appointed; State-directed modes of tuition; and State-framed books.—Lord Brougham entertains greater dread than ourselves, if that be possible, of the system approved by the active members of the Central Society; by Mrs Austin, or the individuals whose views are expressed in the preface to her translation of Cousin's Report on the Prussian system; by Mr Wyse, and the other persons constituting that small but indefatigable body who have lately come so prominently forward in the question of Education. Mr Wyse—and we name him here merely as the representative of that body—states broadly that the Government, as possessing the most knowledge, and standing to the People in the parental relation, should assume power to direct or control their education. What says Lord Brougham?—

If I wished to demonstrate thoroughly that a compulsory system ought not to be introduced, I would put it to any person of common reflection, whether it were safe and right—whatever might be the temptation arising from the deficiencies in the existing state of education, from the risk to be incurred from ignorance, from the duty of the parents, from the mischief which may arise, haunt, and infect us from the neglect of their duty—to usurp the duty of the parent to the offspring, and to place in its stead the public authority of the State, to treat the direction of the child's studies as a civil office, and to take away the parental care of the offspring from the person to whom nature has committed the charge? Another answer to such a suggestion is, that it is a violation of individual liberty—that by this means a tyranny would be established, and thus, in order to educate, we shall enslave the People; in order to diffuse instruction we contract liberty, and we shall introduce a system which is alike novel, horrid, and unbearable to the citizens of a free state; and this we shall do, because, under a foreign Government and a despotic rule, the system had not rendered the previous slavery absolutely unbearable. This is my decided opinion. The next general rule which I would lay down as fit to govern the supporters of any measure of compulsion, is, that not only should there be no compulsion, but there should be no interference by the Government as to who shall or shall not be educated; and that their power should not be extended beyond what is absolutely necessary, but, also, that there should be no strict rule as to the course which the education of the People shall take. I shall look with a very jealous eye on any interference by the Government as to the line of instruction which shall be pursued; for it would be neither more nor less than a tyranny, that the Government shall have power to say what course of education the scholars shall go through. They should not interfere with the kind of instruction to be pursued, the method which may be taken for imparting that instruction, or the books which ought to be read. In all this there should be no interference; it should be entirely uncontrolled, and left to the choice of the individuals themselves. I would allow no board of law to control it; and I would permit neither the Executive Government nor the Legislature to interfere and prescribe any general and fixed plan, for the determining of which the Legislature and the Government are equally unqualified.

Here we find the principle which we ventured to stigmatize, openly denounced, and, in like manner, State-appointed schoolmasters, and State-selected books; of both which, in direct contradiction to the party of Mr Wyse, Lord Brougham asserts—

I think that no Government ought to have the power of appointing the persons who are to educate the People; they ought not to be intrusted with the power of saying who are to be the parties from whom the public are to receive the benefit of secular instruction; for if any one were to give me the power of naming the teacher, without superintendence or control as to the fitness of the person appointed, I should not much trouble myself to obtain the power of prescribing the course of instruction; for, were any fixed upon, I should be as confident that it would be as much violated as if any act of Parliament, or a Board, were to say what course shall be taken; both the one and the other are unfit for the task, and, even if fit, would be the most improper parties to say what books shall be read, what subjects shall be taught, and what shall be the order or plan of education. Although I am stating my opinion, that no compulsory authority ought to exist on these matters, and though I consider that this is the corner-stone of any plan to be adopted, yet I am disposed to add that I would adopt, not any modifications, not any exceptions, but concurrent principles, by which we remove all difficulties, without exposing ourselves to the evils of interference. Thus, though decidedly against any compulsion, I am disposed to hold out inducements to parents to perform their duty; for all of us are aware that it is a duty strictly devolving upon the parent to take care of his offspring's education, and though the breach of this duty be a great sin, and a moral offence, yet it is not such an offence as can be reached by law; and from this very circumstance it becomes the more necessary, without any violation of principle, and without any breach of the liberty of the People, to hold out incentives, encouragements, and excitement to individuals to discharge their duty, and you will thus gain your object without risk; and it may be effected by mixing good and cheap education, and rendering it easily attainable.

This we consider the just limit of interference, and its only safe and legitimate object.

The details of Lord Brougham's Bill will be best understood from his speech, which ought to be cheaply circulated among the People by the friends of education. On the Bill itself we propose making a few observations, as some of its clauses are not quite so satisfactory. We confess an exceeding jealousy on the subject of National Education, which is one of more momentous consequence to the country than any single measure ever proposed; and we are anxious that as many intelligent minds as the nation possesses may be brought to bear upon it, while it is yet time.

It is almost superfluous for Tait's Magazine to profess the most unbounded confidence in Lord Brougham's attachment to the People and to the cause of human improvement. His life has been one long and uninterrupted proof of religious devotion to the best interests of his race. His powerful intellect, his unconquerable energy and indomitable moral courage, are, at this most trying and momentous crisis, next to the aid of Heaven and our own good spirits, the best stay of the cause of Reform, now in the furnace. We would not impugn the motives, nor in any way disparage many respectable members of the aristocratic body who formerly acted and seemed to think with Lord Brougham. But they have gone out from among us, because they were not of us; and, in this day of final trial, he alone remains faithful among the faithless; a Whig no longer, and, in his august solitary position, among those proud and apparently foredoomed Peers, occupying a station and a supremacy such as no statesman of any country ever held before. How poor in aspect—how impotent in influence, in the eyes of a philosophic bystander, is the courtly, effete Premier of the day, compared with the man whose impulsive moral power is already felt in the stirrings of every young aspiring breast, and around every family hearth in these islands. Lord Brougham's future influence on the destinies of mankind, the moral power he is setting in motion, transcend calculation. This much might be said, although his education measure should be baffled, as it assuredly will be delayed. Among the many public blessings for which we desire to thank an overruling Providence, are the declaration of the Duke of Wellington in 1830 against all Reform, and the candid avowal—yes, we have seen that piece of cool effrontery termed candid!—of Lord John Russell to the same effect, after seven years of Whig paltering and juggling, and every species of disingenuousness not short of perfidy. But far above these opportune confessions, we would place the thrice-happy determination of the Whig Cabinet, meanly to compromise and sacrifice their colleague, from the mingled motives of envy and jealousy of his acknowledged superiority, and dastardly subservi-into the Court. We own that, while we despised the motive, we rejoiced in that betrayal. The leaven of Lord Brougham's liberal sentiments could not have leavened that cold, inert lump; it would only have served to sour the whole aristocratic batch. Now he fills his true place—that for which his master-mind was created. He has nailed the colours to the mast. Doubt of him has vanished—if that existed as doubt, which was rather the impatience and disappointment of those who, rightly discerning what Lord Brougham desired, took for granted that his actual power in the Government was measured by his natural superiority—that he was the genius of the Cabinet, and that he had only to say—and it should be done. To the Tory party all the disgrace and mortification, consequent upon the insulting coup d'état of November 1834, has been fully made up, by that which they very probably foresaw, and certainly wished, the expulsion, upon its reconstruction, of the only formidable man in the Melbourne Government. This is, however, somewhat irrelevant.

The details of the Education Bill are, as we have mentioned, most satisfactorily unfolded in Lord Brougham's introductory speech. It leaves us nothing to complain of, and not much to suggest. The speech is, however, the living spirit—the Bill the dead letter; and the spirit—such unhappily is the constitution of human affairs—might pass away with the enlightened and liberal projector of the measure, while, under the letter, things might spring up to defeat or render nugatory whatever was best in its tendency. But the other day, Lord John Russell barefacedly told the representatives of the People, that the Reform Bill—concocted by Lord Durham, the son-in-law of Lord Grey; himself, the son of the Duke of Bedford; and Lord Duncannon, the business-man of another noble Whig connexion—was actually intended to give ascendancy to the landed interest; while the People were simple enough to believe, on the solemn assurance of the framers and their party, that it was meant solely to give them a fairer, fuller, and more equal representation in Parliament; or, in other words, something to say in the disposal of their own money, and in the management of their own affairs. That any sinister design is couched under the Education Bill of Lord Brougham is entirely out of the question. He had no aristocratic aid in framing it, no latent objects to serve. Nay, more: we do not give the learned framers of the Reform Bill credit for seeing so far before their noses, even in a bad direction, as Lord John Russell now claims. He has forgotten. They meant to keep the Tories out for ever, and to hold their places—and that was all. A powerful lever was required; and they were advised to try the potency of the Bill. Their purpose of rousing the nation once accomplished, they would have damaged it in its vital principle—the enlarged constituency—even were it had passed into law. Have we forgotten the plebeian impertinence with which such persons as Mr Place, the tailor, and his friends, ventured to obtrude themselves, at untimely hours, into the lordly presence of Earl Grey, and to say, "We will have the franchise as at first proposed—the £10 franchise, and as much lower as may be; but from that clause we will not abate one jot?"—The arrears-of-rate clause was another darling object of the Whigs, though they might not foresee all the immediate inconveniences to their party, either in registration obstruction, or the delay of the Ballot. Then, Ballot was delayed; now, it is flatly refused. The Chandos clause—that sheet-anchor, in the meanwhile, of the landed interest, (strangely, and with remarkable short-sightedness, upheld by a few liberal men!)—was certainly most welcome to the bulk of the Whigs. Then, indeed, the Reform Bill, licked into proper shape, by Tory aid, did become a measure to give continued ascendancy to the class whose exclusive privileges began to be shaken.—But it is profitless and absolutely sickening to look back upon the way in which that Bill was vitiated—which, in spite of Lord John's assurance to the contrary, is not quite so bad as he coolly intimates it was intended to be—and wrong to intermingle those bitter reminiscences with a measure so pure in aim, and generally so well adapted to its high and far-reaching purpose, as Lord Brougham's Education Bill. In it we have faith, but not implicit faith; and our remarks shall rather be thrown out in the mode of questions, requests for explanation, and respectful doubts, than objections. The question is not what the Bill is—for it seems unobjectionable in purpose and character; but how will it work? How, by perverted ingenuity, may it be diverted from the purpose contemplated by the framer, and converted, in any degree, into an instrument of evil?

And, first—No Minister of Public Instruction is proposed; but, instead, a Board of Education—to consist of five Commissioners, three appointed for life, and two to be members of the Government—viz., the President of the Council, and one of the Secretaries of State; and which of them ought to be specified. Now, the two ex-officio commissioners, changing with every change of the administration, and whose duties are mainly financial, do not, morally, reckon for much; for the substantial power of the Board will be exercised by the three permanent members. One of these must be a serjeant-at-law, or a barrister of at least seven years' standing. Their salaries, like all the rest, are, of course, left blank in the meanwhile; and the amount, and also the salaries of the secretaries, &c., are to be fixed, not by Parliament, but by the Treasury. It is not said whether the persons forming the permanent members of the Board, are competent to hold other offices at the same time or not. They are, though appointed for life, removable at the pleasure of Parliament. This of course. Every official is removable at the pleasure of Parliament, from the King downwards, including those Irish judges whose advent so frightens Mr O'Connell, because he knows that responsibility to Parliament means, in life-appointments, very little, or just no responsibility at all. The Education Board will, however, be as responsible as any other Board which has not stanch friends in the House to defend its malversations. The main function of this Board of Commissioners, is to—"Manage and distribute the funds vested in them from time to time by Parliament, for establishing schools, or maintaining, extending, or improving those already established, whether Infant Schools, Ordinary Schools, Model Schools, or Schools for Training Teachers." They are also to manage and distribute any other funds intrusted to them by individuals for Educational purposes; and, six weeks after the meeting of Parliament, they are to render an account of their management of the public funds; but whether to Parliament also, of the sums intrusted to them by individuals, is not specified. Other functions arise from applications that may be made to the Board, which we understand to be optional to the governors and trustees of schools, but, if made, imperative on the Commissioners—but neither is this (contained in clauses 4th and 5th) clear to us. It refers, we presume, to schools and educational foundations already existing, or to such as may be endowed hereafter, without the assistance of the Board, and without consulting it.

The main thing is, how a municipality, or rural parish or township, wanting to organize a new school of any sort, is to proceed, in order to command the assistance and co-operation of the Commissioners; and clause 10th provides, that—"In all municipal corporations, already or hereafter incorporated, the town-councils may lay before the Commissioners, plans and estimates for the establishment of new schools, [we presume Infant, Ordinary, Model, or Normal.] and for the support of schools already existing, with the proposed rules and regulations for the conduct of those schools; and the Commissioners may approve of the same in the whole, or in part, or with variations, and authorize the town-councils to levy a rate for carrying into effect the scheme as approved by the Commissioners; and, after the rules for the conduct of any school, have been approved or fixed by the Commissioners, they are not to be altered without their consent." We pause on this binding clause, without at once rejecting it, though preliminary approbation of rules and regulations is the likeliest thing in the world to interference; or to saying, "If you do not adopt our method, you shall have none of the public money, nor be allowed to levy a rate for education." The amount of rate is not to be under sixpence, nor to exceed a shilling in the pound, and is to be collected along with the poor-rate, and paid over to the County Treasurer, and by him to the Town Councils, or rural School Committees, to be employed for the specified uses for which the school rate was levied. To enable the Commissioners to fulfil their functions, the three permanent members, with the concurrence of one of the State Officers, are to appoint not more than ten Inspectors, whose remuneration and travelling allowance, are to be settled by the Treasury. We shall have something to say by and by, of these Inspectors; but, in the meanwhile, according to the abstract before us, they are to "have power, under the authority of the Commissioners, to examine the state and conducting of all endowed schools which come within the late acts for inquiring into charities; of all schools which have been or shall be assisted by any grant of public money; of all schools to be established or assisted under this act; and of all schools and seminaries which shall have been enrolled under this act. They may also, but with the consent of those having the care and superintendence of them, examine the state and conducting of all other schools. In both cases, they are to furnish a copy of their report to the schoolmaster, with the address of the Commissioners." In short, care is taken to prevent the undue exercise of Inquisitorial power, by permitted secrecy in reporting. Schoolmasters refusing to admit the Inspectors—as sturdy dominies in this country have done occasionally in the case of the visitations of presbyteries—are to be fined not more than twenty pounds for their contumacy. There is, however, this important distinction—that, where Presbyterial visits have been declined, the school was generally private, and received nothing for its support from the public or parochial funds. To us, the mode of appointment, and the functions of the Inspectors, present a stumbling-block in many ways; yet Inspectors there must be, if there is a Board at all; and we own it easier to see faults than to suggest remedies.

But, first, we would inquire, whether it is necessary that three of the members constituting the Board, should, of necessity, be appointed for life?—and, if so, as one of them must by the act be a lawyer, from what class or profession are the remaining two to be taken? We choose bishops from the inferior orders of the clergy, judges from the bar, generals from staff-officers—but whence are Commissioners for education to come? If their sole office were the proper administration of the funds intrusted to them by Parliament, there would be no difficulty; but if not themselves actual Inspectors of the progress of education, they are to determine where schools shall be established, (on the preliminary application being made by town-councils and school committees,) and they have the appointment and the removal at discretion, of the Inspectors of all schools connected with their Board, or craving its countenance.

And, now, of those Inspectors. Their duties are neither particularly defined nor limited. If they were confined to seeing that the public money, given in aid of the schools by the Board, were properly expended, and for the specified objects, that is a matter easily understood. But, although, according to the speech, there is to be no interference with the modes or amount of instruction, and none with the class-books employed, the Inspectors are to report to the Board, as it appears to us, about the whole business and management of the schools; being bound, however, to furnish the master with a copy of their report; and, farther, we do not see that either the town-councils, or the rural school committees, have any co-ordinate power of inspection, or any control over the Inspectors appointed and set aside at the pleasure of the Board. There is so strong a predisposition for everything to run into jobs in this ill-governed country—a country systematically governed for the benefit of the rich at the expense of the poor—that we must look closer even to the small piece of patronage vested in the Treasury by the payment of ten School Inspectors, and although the Board has their appointment. In England we have just two descriptions of men occupying every place of emolument, from the smallest to the most lucrative. The scions and allies of aristocratic families get all the places which conjoin good pay with little work, or no work at all; while the jobbers of the existing government obtain every office where, with something to do, or the appearance of it, there is more slender pay. Lord Edward Such-a-one is made governor of a castle or island which he never saw; while Mr So-and-so, the attorney, and very clever canvasser and manager for the Ministerial candidates at the last three elections for his county or borough, is first appointed a commissioner on a tithe inquiry, or about the wants of the Irish poor, or the Scottish Kirk; and, these important avocations ended, starts for a School Inspector. Two Ministers of State sit with the Board, and the other three members being of necessity on the best footing with the Treasury, from the necessity of keeping friends in Court while subjected to the yearly scrutiny of the Humes and Grotes, must, at all times, be inclined to listen to a hint from the proper quarter; and so our clever attorney, nothing better casting up, or, as likely his son, or his son-in-law, or the sub-editor of a most useful Treasury print, is transformed by the Board into a School Inspector, and handsomely paid by the Treasury. This is no improbable conclusion, and still less the close relationship that must exist between the Treasury and the Board. Appointments for life are no doubt meant to ensure personal independence; but, as the House of Commons is now constituted, every Board responsible yearly must look to strengthening its interest in that House, by courting one faction or the other.

But, if life appointments cannot ensure independence, what have they to recommend them above those that are for a more limited period, and renewable? The remedy might be, to assign to Parliament the sole appointment of the Education Commissioners, and to exclude the Crown—but of that we fear there is little hope. Lord Brougham has not thought of it; and, perhaps, would disapprove; though a Board for life, in a matter still untried, and which, with all human care and foresight, may not work—is subject for reflection. Ill as we like increasing the preponderance of the Crown, and though every one would object to the superintendents of National Education changing with every change of Ministry, there is surely a medium between this, and at once placing these novel, and, so to speak, experimental functionaries upon a footing with the Judges. If Lord Brougham himself were intrusted by Parliament with the sole power of setting in motion his own machinery, constituting the whole Board, in his own person, for life, and appointing his own Inspectors, there would be every cause of exaltation and confidence, and none of doubt. But legislators must look to the ordinary course of human events, and not to “lucky accidents,” like a Lord Brougham. This brings us to another point of doubt: From what class are the Inspectors to be chosen?—to protect us, not alone against ignorance and incapacity, but against the underling intriguers and hirelings of either of the factions, or of the Government. Again, we inquire from what profession is it a safe rule to choose the individuals who are to watch that those of the same profession, undertaking a special business, do their duty? We choose Generals and Admirals from the military and naval professions:—Napoleon said from the ranks—and he said what was wise as true. Lawyers alone become judges, clergymen alone bishops; while surgeons and apothecaries grow into physicians. There are, however, a few offices of which it seems to be believed that men acquire knowledge by intuition or instinct; such as Cabinet Ministers—for which the younger sons of Peers, and a few great Commoners, are especially born; legislators—who are chiefly, but not wholly, limited to the same circumstance of birth, as they besides require a money or land qualification; and, for aught that Lord Brougham's Bill provides, School Inspectors—whom the Board may endow and qualify by its proper grace, without more ado. Why should it not be provided that these Inspectors—the men doing the work, as the Board in London can only act upon their Reports—should, besides being otherwise proper persons, be practical schoolmasters, men trained in and acquainted with the theory and the business of tuition. Even in the Excise—a department requiring not much more intellect, one would imagine—all the superior officers have risen, step by step, from being gaugers. There is another consideration. Hope is the aliment of life, and the stimulus to exertion. These ten places are to be regarded as objects of honest ambition to the teachers of Normal, and Model, and other schools; as something to contend for, and that from no sordid motive.

These remarks we throw out for consideration, after a somewhat hasty, if anxious perusal of the Bill. And now is the time for reflection. So much do we admire its scope and spirit, and reverence its mighty object, that we should dread to see its intentions either frustrated or perverted.

With penalties for abuse of the education franchise, and other offences against the act, we shall not concern ourselves. Some of them are severe, and especially the purposed punishment of seven years' transportation, or three years' imprisonment, for forging the certificate conferring what is termed the Knowledge Franchise. Lord Brougham seems to feel greater apprehension and difficulties to his measure from this popular or popularity clause, than any other. Perhaps he may have thrown it out as partly a tub to amuse the whale in the Upper House, and to save his Bill—as a milkmaid throw down her red cloak to a mad bull, to save her person. All rate-payers are to enjoy the Education Franchise; but, in towns, if we understand aright, when the electors choose their town-council, they by the same operation elect their school managers. Now, unless this new function is to be added to the duties of the council, at a different election, how are the persons possessing the Knowledge Franchise to vote?

The new educational machinery to be constructed for parishes and townships, we consider simpler and better adapted for the object, than that which Lord Brougham finds existing in municipalities, and proposes to adopt. In these localities, a more direct influence over the schools is given to the People. There are no intervening bodies. The rate-payers at once elect the school-committee for a single special object; whereas the councils of towns must manage the schools in connexion with many other duties, though they can certainly choose a school-committee from the body of the council, if they find it expedient. The rural school-committee consists of five members, of whom one only goes out every year. This is at least not too many. We, indeed, consider it objectionable, although the quinquennial period is a favourite number at present. Clause 11th states, "And be it farther enacted, that the commissioners acting under the authority of this act, shall and may receive from any Scientific or Literary Institution or Society, or any Mechanics' Institution or Association, or from any Society whatever, whether corporate or incorporate, the purpose of which is the promotion of inquiry or information in Science, Letters, or Arts, a copy of its rules and regulations, with a list of the members, singled out by themselves, such a list to be countersigned by the treasurer or secretary of such institution," &c. &c. Now, is this optional to the society, but compulsory on the Commissioners? We presume so; for the object seems to be facilitating the granting of such certificates as may give the educational franchise to the members. Yet we can conceive that this clause might, in time coming, be so construed as to give the Commissioners summary power over all Literary Societies, Book Clubs, and Scientific Associations. We must be pardoned for a little unnecessary apprehension upon such subjects. The present alarming discontent with the new Poor Law arises from nothing expressed in the Act, but from things perpetrated under its alleged authority. The Poor Law itself, for example, does not enjoin, nor in any way directly sanction, the separation of children and parents, and husbands and wives; but yet, in consequence of the undefined, arbitrary, or discretionary power of the Commissioners, those severities are practised under it, which have nearly thrown one part of the country into insurrection.

The Knowledge Qualification, introduced by Lord Brougham, with so just and eloquent a eulogium upon the industrious classes, need neither alarm the Upper nor the Lower House. It will, at no time, be very extensive in operation. The individuals claiming the franchise from it, will be few in number at any time; and always rapidly passing into rate-payers. This, their intelligence and good conduct must ensure.

The last vital clause of the Bill provides for the reading of the Scriptures in all schools connected with the Board, or receiving any grant of the public money from it. This we conceive an indispensable rule; and we find it recognised to the fullest extent. We confess ourselves unable to comprehend the fine-spun theories of those ultra-purists, or ultra-religionists, who would drive the Bible out of the school, to be kept for some holier season; nor can we conceive their grounds of apprehension. The mind of the country is against them; common sense and right reason is against them. We are the more astonished to find natives of Scotland entertaining this visionary opinion of the danger, in any circumstances, of the Bible. Without the Bible as a little child's book, and as a school-book, what a starveling people, at least in mind, would the Scotch have been! Cavilling on this subject is, we trust, at an end, and opposition annihilated. The antagonist party ought to take example by the manliness and candour of Lord Winchelsea; and we doubt not that they will do so, as theirs is, we believe, a conscientious, not factious opposition.

One provision of the bill, objected to by the Earl of Winchelsea, is certainly startling at first sight. If communities cannot concur, in the first instance, about the school they require, the Board is to give them no aid whatever. There will be no school. A majority of Churchmen shall not be assisted in coercing or overruling a minority of Dissenters, and vice versa. This is, however, a just and wise rule; and it will help greatly to ensure mutual forbearance and unanimity of sentiment; but we must distinguish between a conscientious and a factious minority.

Lord Brougham has appealed, not only to the House of Lords, but to the country, and to the Liberal friends of education, for support for his great measure—"a measure," he says, "for the purpose of doing all that is wanted for the Education of the People, without doing more; for interfering, on the part of the government and legislature, as far as is necessary, and no farther." This appeal to the country will not be made in vain; and, even if his measure should be delayed by the apparently total indifference of the Whig Government to everything connected with the prospective improvement of the People, it cannot ultimately be lost.

Let us now recapitulate our queries and doubts; for a very good Act may be perverted—and this bill certainly leaves excessive discretionary power to the Board.

- I. Should the members of a Board to carry into effect a vast, but still untried measure, be at once appointed for life?
- II. What are the precise functions of the Commissioners? And, if the Government—i. e. the Board—be in no respect to interfere with the modes of teaching, the course of study, the class books, the character, fitness, or appointment of the teachers, as Lord Brougham asserts, what are the precise duties of the Inspectors? What is to form the subject of their official Reports? Are they to be confined merely to matters of finance and economy?

III. What are the general or special qualifications required in the Inspector? And are these to be wholly left to the discretion of the Board?

IV. Are Normal Schools (schools, namely, for training Teachers) and Model Schools, to be first demanded by communities, (as would appear from the Bill,) or are they to be established at the discretion of the Board, in whatever locality they approve? There is much danger to be apprehended, in endowing Normal Schools to too great an extent, or in any permanent manner; danger of creating a sort of small Government Schoolmaster Universities, little Oxfords and Lilliputian Cambridges. If the character and condition of a schoolmaster shall ever be as effective as they ought to become, parents will as readily educate their sons at their own expense for teachers, as for any other profession. We perceive great utility in assisting Normal Schools in the first instance, but should entertain a wholesome distrust of permanent establishments of this kind, endowed and managed by the Government, i. e., by the Board.

V. Ought the Board and its staff of Inspectors not to be tied up, from either sending forth class-books, or recommending them, or in any way interfering to influence the course of study? Would it be right that the whole mind of the country should be cast in one mould, cut to one pattern-card, furnished by the Board? And books would go far to produce this effect. Fashion, imitation, the desire of pleasing and flattering the Inspectors, would be powerful enough among the schoolmasters, without permitting any direct interference in such matters. In the first few years, all private schools would be nearly swept away by the influence of fashion; schools in connection with, or under the patronage of the Board alone, would, for a time, be frequented, and the useful principle of competition, (save for a favourable report from the Inspector,)* would be suspended; but this would right itself, and the best teacher be the most successful, whether independent, or under the superintendence of the Board.

VI. Why should not rural school-committees be under the same rule as to continuance in office as town-councils? Surely the present municipal period is long enough. It is three years before the electors have the power of making a total change in the councils. In the villages it would be five.

In making these observations, we are conscious of feelings the very reverse of captious. To a certain extent we had been misled by the representation of Lord Brougham's opinions, made by some of the compulsory educationists. It was impossible to believe that he favoured their extreme schemes; and his plan, now that it is before the world, equals whatever could have been expected from the enlightened and ardent friend of man. Still there is often an immense difference between the letter of an Act and its practical operation. We instanced above the new Poor-Law. It is under no definite or repealable clause that severities have been committed which fill the People with indignation; but under the arbitrary or discretionary powers of the Commissioners. Lord Brougham's Bill, admirable as it is, comes not before the country to be carried by acclamation, as "The Bill, and the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill!" but to be sifted, weighed, purified, and made to approximate as far as possible to that wise, considerate, and perfect measure which its noble framer intended. Finally, with unqualified admiration of Lord Brougham's sentiments, as developed in his speech, our doubts increase in looking to the probable operation of his life-appointed Board, endowed with large, undefined, discretionary powers, holding the sinews of war. For the distribution of the sums placed at their disposal, the Commissioners are accountable to Parliament; but we hear of no responsibility for an abuse of power in other respects. Many of these points will doubtless be elucidated when the Bill comes to be discussed.

* It has been humorously suggested to us, that, in the periodical visitations of the School Inspector, there should be the same law against treating as in elections; and that their route should be changed as frequently as the stations of excisemen.

THE LONDON PERIPATETIC; OR, SKETCHES ABOUT TOWN.

THE sagacious reader must not imagine, by the title of these random papers, that I am about to philosophize, or discuss the merits of Aristotelian doctrines; for he may be assured I am guiltless of any such intention, and the ghost of the school-man may rest in a state of perfect quiescence, so far as regards any disturbance I shall offer his dignity. My object is far less abstruse. I have assumed the title of Peripatetic, because I like the word—it is a noble word, and preserves well the stamp of its Greek original; and, moreover, because it expresses my meaning better than any other, and tells in a breath my habit of pedestrian speculation. "Humph!" say you—"the habit is no uncommon one."

I know that. The Spectator was a Peripatetic—so was Pope—so was Dr Johnson. Coleridge and Charles Lamb were first-rate Peripatetics—But softly—I am getting into a dilemma, by putting it in the power of an ill-natured reader to ask me, with a very meaning sneer, if I have the sublime impudence to class myself with the names, all, save one,* illustrious, just mentioned.

Not at all ; for I have read the fable of the frog, and profited thereby—therefore, do not twit me so impatiently. I will state in a sentence what I am, and my own estimation of myself. I am a respectable individual, of staid habits, with some small share of observation, and, at times, addicted to the cacoethes scribendi. It is my "custom in the afternoon," to call for my short nanking gaiters—in winter and wet weather, ditto of black cloth—settle my spectacles firmly on my nose, don my broad-brimmed hat, and sally forth, to make observations. I am a good walker, albeit now mourning the departure of my fifty-seventh birth-day, and the approaches of gout and rotundity ; and frequently make a circuit of several miles before my six o'clock dinner. In these, my rambles, I am generally alone ; for I like both the motions of mind and body to be unembarrassed by the presence of a companion, and the respect one is necessitated to pay to his inclination and convenience. I like to spell over a beautiful engraving in a shop window, or contemplate a sweet, laughing child, or gaze upon a stately building, until I feel poetry stealing from the object upon my soul, and flooding it with the beautiful ; or I may like to talk for an hour with some stranger, casually met with, and extract from his discourse food for observation upon human nature ; or, perchance, to dive into obscure crooked lanes and alleys, in search of something—I know not precisely what—but something that shall read me a lesson in man ; or, I may desire (and here do not misunderstand or misrepresent my intentions) to chat with a pretty nursery-maid, and toy with the rosy, joyous little cherubs she is surrounded by, until I laugh loudly, and fancy myself young again ; or, perhaps, to look upon a group of ragged boys, playing at something in imitation of cricket, on a miserable patch of green in the suburbs, with a pile of crownless hats and tattered caps for a wicket, a rough misshapen piece of wood for a bat, and a half-burst ball.

Now, in such odd, peripatetic strolls, whilst disposed to "chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancies," a companion is mostly an incumbrance. You cannot give the rein to speculation, and allow it to proceed in its own discursive or eccentric course. A different train of thinking, in all probability, occupies the mind of your friend ; and he interrupts the ideas filling your own, by some remark altogether foreign to their purport. Not that I am misanthropic. I love the society of my fellow-beings ; I love the holy communion of friendship. There are times when the souls of men pour forth sentiments in sympathy, an unison as delightful as it is infrequent. There are times when the bustle of life is forgotten, the glare gone by for a space ; when a benignant angel is abroad, pervading the vast universe with calm, and man's heart with that glow of universal love which is God's worship ; when passions are hushed, asperities smoothed, and the spirit seeks some sister with whom to confer in the blessed stillness, and whisper sacred things.

Yet there are also times when we would stand aloof from sympathy, and observe mankind in silence ; when we would wander amidst crowds, converse with many strangers, and dive into the arcana of the human heart ; contemplate actions, and conjecture upon motives, without seeking to communicate our remarks, or to receive those of another ; but rather courting the solitude of the closet, there to admire the greatness of man, and wonder at his infirmities. And what place more replete with the means of such observation than London ? There is a moral in the smoke that envelopes it, and knowledge to be picked up in the names of the streets. In London you will find subjects for your admiration and your disgust—for your praise and execration ; and miscellanea without number for speculation and study. No place presents to you in a greater degree the extremes of guilt and virtue, or of squalid misery and princely grandeur ; no place annoys and delights you more. In a word, no spot on the globe is more full of antitheses than London, where you are continually making the step which leads you from the sublime to the ridiculous. Eccè !—You stop at a shop window, to contemplate Martin's engraving of Satan bestriding a dusky globe in terrible grandeur. It calls up associations to your mind ; you think on Milton's stupendous descriptions of the arch-fiend, who,

In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
Stood like a tower."

You are full of Milton. Hades is before your mind's eye, with its fiery surge, that, from the precipice of heaven, received the falling angels, with "Its dreary plain, forlorn and wild,

The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of the livid flames
Cast pale and dreadful."

An unearthly awe is upon you. Your body, it is true, is mechanically threading its way through the countless throng of passengers, in a busy street, yclept the Strand ; the ceaseless and stunning rattle of carts, carriages, and omnibuses, is resounding in your ears—but you are unconscious of it. The soul has forgotten her connexion with clay, and is away in far-off worlds—when, lo ! you are reminded of your mortality by an imp of a Jew boy running before you, treading on your toes to enable him the better to stare in your face—peering, with his black, eager, cunning-looking eyes, up to yours—pointing full at you his long, hawked, reddish nose—and screaming, in his diabolic gibberish, "Lucifer matches, a penny a-box !—only a penny each for Lucifers !" You vote the imp the lowest demon in the Morning Star's nether establishment, and, venting an execration, you internally resolve never to sign the petition for Jewish emancipation, and hurry on ; but the dream of the spirit is broken.

Or, peradventure, you had been at the festival in Westminster Abbey, and, returning home, wards, reapt, entranced with sounds that lifted you towards empyreum, you encounter a ragged, sottish-looking object, croaking forth—

"I'd be a butterfly."

Horror-struck by the wretch who has run amuck against your inspirations, you rush round the corner, when a deformed boy, with elf-locks, and eyes a-squint, thrusts into your hand a printed card, decorated with thumb-marks. You are fixed by his fascinating face, and, by a strange impulse that your desultory reader too well knows, cannot let any printed paper pass unperused. The card is thus formed and worded—

SONS OF HARMONY.

SIR,—The honour of Your company is requested at the sons of Harmony, Mr Swizzle's Cock and Bottle, Seven Dials—Mr Splayfoot in the Chair.

*. Ladies Is admitted.

You had heard, at the Abbey, "the seven plagues of Egypt." Here was an eighth! Why had that demoniacal boy, with his certain-to-be-hanged look, selected you? You dwell upon this problem, though you know its solution is impossible; you read the cartel, as if you could make something else of it by reperusal; and all this while you feel the presence of the "boy with the back." He relentlessly drives you onwards—away, away, five miles per hour; it is no use, you are instinctively walking towards that veritable "Cock and Bottle." There you are, opposite the very door. It is a double one, and the paint rubbed off at the edges, about four feet from the ground, by the manual exercises of in and outgoers. In the window are diverse intimations of the fluids sold within—"Dantia Spruce," "Champagne Ale," and "Pine Apple Ram," amid others; and an announcement, no doubt veritable in one sense—i. e., "The British Traveller taken in here." Vials of coloured liquids, resembling what old women emphatically call doctor's stuff, are shelved along the upper panes, above the half shutter. Squalid children, with little black bottles, glide in and out; and three or four ragged women meet ever and anon at the different corners of the street, whisper mysteriously, nudge each other, give a sort of inward chuckle, indicative of an impropriety having been detected in some dear friend of each, and then march off en masse to the attractive Cock and Bottle. Instinctively you remain gazing on the sign. The policeman has passed you once or twice, and looked full in your face, then at the shutters opposite, and again at you, as if he could discover whether your intentions were or were not burlesques, by your features. The last time, he turns the bull's eye full upon you, and you become conscious of your situation. You "move on"; when you behold a young man, in a very bright brown coat, with large metal buttons; a crimson velvet waistcoat; a sky-blue neckerchief, with a break as large as an oyster; enormously-stuffed shepherd's-plaid trowsers; and a white hat, cocked so far on one side that it is a marvel and a mystery how he retains it on his head. He has gloves, tinted berline, in his hands, and carries a painted cane, à la ebony, with a tremendous tassel. Upon his arm is a lady, young and "beautiful exceedingly," but of that kind of beauty that may be termed London particular, and which generally characterises damsels who are anything but particular themselves. She has a light blue silk dress, the length of which is calculated upon the same principle as Duvernay's petticoats; her stockings are ruddy as Aurora's fingers; her shoes are of patent leather'd "glossy sheen"—sandalae are they even to the calf, the swell of which peeps coquettishly forth as the lady sails (for she can't walk) along. She wears a yellow band, with a buckle, which I would describe; but, as they are to be seen in all the toy bazaars, "from 1s. 9d. upwards," let the reader fancy it. Her bonnet is of the cab head size, of a bright pink, with gay streamers flying; beneath it, is the frill of a cap, with flowers of every hue, and green stalks like young saplings; and, on the exterior of the aforesaid bonnet, are three feathers, placed like the Prince of Wales' plume, and of white tipped with blue. In her breast is something purporting to be a diamond set round with "regard" stones, the intended diamond exceeding in size the Pigot; her wrists are encircled by metal bands, with amethyst clasps, the jewels as large as eggs; her gloves are of a bright tan colour. For a moment your mind reverts to the Abbey, and the elegance of the simply-attired loveliness there; but the pair advance, with that freshening eagerness of pace that intimates the pursuit of anticipated pleasure. There they pass! They have taken the wall, though it was yours by right of way; but who would wish to dispute the point with the proprietor of the mysteriously-cooked beaver? They go on. What!—do your eyes deceive you? No: they enter The Cock and Bottle! Back again you go, though the suspicious policeman is standing at the corner, with his sergeant and two others, evidently pointing you out, and inquiring if they know the face. You are opposite the temple of Bacchus and Apollo once more; a tinkle of a piano with a harpsichord tone is heard; other couples, variously attired, pass through the portals; merriment breathes out from the first-floor window. Hark! a woman's voice!—she sings! your heart is softened, your mind is assailed through your ears, as the mummy-makers were wont to make their way to the brains of their subjects. The policeman is gathering himself up for mischief; Wisdom says, Take shelter. You never met the Sons (and daughters) of Harmony—never witnessed the assemblage entitled a Free and Easy. Has not some ancient said, speaking of these sorts of things, or of something else, Nōne hæc omnia, sedes est?—Certainly. You put your hand upon the oft-bemaused doorway—it opens easily, you are at the bar, and on the way to

"Thruppence, if you please, sir," says a ruddy-faced lady, standing behind the bar. You comply without asking any questions—the wisest way, by the by; and receive in return a square card, abominably filthy, with some letters upon it, that have long since been thumbed and fingered into obscurity. "Staircase to the right," (cries the aforesaid lady;) "John, shew the gentleman." John is a lad about sixteen, son of the proprietress, and acting as waiter. His shirt and apron are white as snow, and his hair, oiled and scented to excess, is parted in the middle like a girl's, or like those pretty-visaged wax effigies of gentlemen, represented in perfumers' shops. You come to the door of the room. There stands a dirty-faced man, in a braided military surtout, which, at the time of the battle of Waterloo, had, no doubt, belonged to an officer of the line; since that, had been sported as part of the stage wardrobe of a light comedian; and, having grown out of fashion, been bought for general wear by a country actor; and now, in its older years, enveloped the person of that nondescript, a "professional." His dirtinessship holds a plate in which you deposit your check; the door is opened; and, with the feeling of one detected, flagranti delicto, you slide into the room. Every one, male or female, turn their heads, and take a "good stare" at you. This having, of course, increased your self-possession, you sit down upon a bench which is fastened to the wall, and draw a long breath in an atmosphere curiously compounded of the steam of gin, rum, brandy, human breath, tobacco smoke, and a small admixture of air, which your entrance gave admission to at the doorway. The apartment is of a tolerable size, two rooms having been thrown into one. As their sizes differed, the second one forms a seat of retreat, at the end of which sits "the Vice," whilst in the front room, (we speak of the rooms as they were, for distinction's sake,) the President is placed aloft in awful state. "Gentlemen, give your horders—the waitus in the room"—comes rom the recess, as uttered by the invisible Vice; and the young gentleman who conducted you upstairs, stands in front of the table before your seat, and "speaks, though he says nothing;" for his eye wears a what-do-you-please-to-take sort of expression. The order is given and obeyed with marvellous celerity; the fact being, that a depot of ready-mixed liquors is kept on the stair-head. "Mr Spificate will oblige," saith the President; a tornado of applause follows, by which you gather that Mr S. is a professional, and, moreover, a favourite. He steps forward with a peculiar motion, (oh! call it roll, not swagger,) and approaches the piano; then, and not till then, he takes off his hat, and, placing it on the instrument, pokes his fingers through his recently and lightly curled hair, and whispers the musician. During their colloquy, one or two young men tap him with their canes, to gain his attention. They all offer him liquor or beer; and he, with amiable condescension, avoids, what they call, in the insolvent court, an undue preference, by drinking heartily with each. One of the tappers asks for a peculiar song, another names a different ballad, and a third begs his nomination may be attended to, as "it's being haaked for by a lady." The great man smiles, wriggles his entire frame, pulls up his collar, again rants through the labyrinth of his curls, and, placing the last asker's brandy and water on the piano before him, desires the Timotheus to "go along." The former proprietor looks wistfully at his glass; it is in transitu, from the instrument to the lips of the "professional;" he drinks deeply; and, in the abstraction of great minds, forgets to return, but replaces it on the piano. The musician's symphony draws to a close, and he looks up at the singer, and, finding him again imbibing, he prolongs the cadence. At length, the great creature essays. The song is comic, and contains allusions amatory enough to make the few not wholly corrupted girls in the room giggle, and the other ladies look grave. The song proceeds: it dilates upon Greenwich fair, is facetious as to down-hill frolics, minutely anatomical in its descriptions, and then prophetic. Lacina is alluded to in a very obvious, though not very classical manner; the singer feels his hold upon his auditors; he gets ferociously funny; between each verse a symphony is played, which differs in length, according to the onslaught the professional makes upon the requester's brandy and water, and the song concludes amid a clatter of glasses, a thumping of tables, a clapping of hands, knocking of sticks, and loud cries of "Brave Ho!" a musical deity always invoked on such occasions. Again the invisible Vice speaks; again are the glasses replenished, and the hammers of the President and his invisibility are heard; a dead pause; then a murmur: a no-meant-for-yes kind of dissent; a persuasive numble—all in the recess; and then—portentous announcement!—"Ladies and gentlemen, I'm happy to and ounce Miss Learem will oblige." All the women turn their heads towards the avenue, and, in one glance, criticise every article of Miss L's wardrobe. Then you hear mysterious words in small voices—"What ancles! what a waist! did you ever?" And if the Miss L. be undeniably pretty, then "Impudent humsey! horrid bold! well, I'm sure!" form the staple commodities of attack. Miss Learem is a young lady who thinks you cannot see too much of a good creature, and is, therefore, profuse in the exhibition of her shoulders; and, if her ancles be ponderous, she has given her enemies a capital chance of proving it. She has taken off her bonnet, her hair is plaited over her brow, and she has two tails, (I speak not in irreverence, but ignorance,) strongly resembling those displayed by the Tartar-Chinese, who go about town with children's toys. She carries her reticule in her hand, partly because it is a very showy one, and partly because it assists the voice. A little man, very shabby, but very frisky, emerges from the recess; he has washed his face, but, in his hurry, forgot to do as much for his hands, which he thrusts forth, and, snatching at the kid glove of Miss L., he leads her to the instrument. This gentleman is "Monsieur le Conducteur"—so called because he does not know how to conduct himself, or anything else. He has, in his off-hand, a roll of the professional lady's music ; cries come from all ends of the room—"Meet me by moonlight"—"Harab Steed"—"Dashen Vite Surgeon," &c. &c., on which, one gentleman in the recess, exclaims, in a Stentorian voice—"No Dick Taten." Silence is restored, and the lady sings. During the symphony, she exchanges glances with one or two happy fellows, who thereupon give a knowing shake of the head, and a smirk that indicates

The song concludes ; the applause is tremendous ; "Ann Core" echoes from right to left ; the women bite their lips and toss their heads, like hearse-horses at a funeral ; and the lady, having been requested to sing the song again, sings another instead, and is reconducted to her seat, having her hand caught ever and anon by some admirer as she passes.

A little man who has treated every professional, and offered his glass continually to the musician, now begins to display decided symptoms of song-a-mania—a disorder very prevalent indeed at such places, and peculiar to gentlemen who had rather be heard than hear. Name after name is announced, but none of these are his ; despair has worked him into boldness, and he whispers a "professional" that he would sing if called upon. That gentleman empties the little man's glass, and posts off to the President ; that great functionary hears the request with a stern look. He then glances aside at the intended vocalist ; perceives that he is well dressed, and weareth a watch. Visions of a benefit in futuro, and of tickets to be taken by the little fellow, expand his soul. With a tone of easy condescension, and a face beaming with benevolence, he exclaims—"He should be appy to ear the gentleman wot sits fourth from the pihanar, and next to the lady in the red bonnet." The little man, in a very high cravat and a very high fluster, pleads a cold ; but is at last taken by the professional to the instrument. The musician does not know the song he intends perpetrating, but undertakes to "follow him ;" and having heard him hum what he persists in calling the air, extemporizes a symphony. All the professionals and their friends (the President and the introducer excepted) quiz the little fellow unmercifully, and the ladies glance at him, and then at Mr Spificate, as Hamlet looked at the pictures of Claudius and his father. At last the little fellow strikes off in a key of his own ; the accompanist, no way discomposed, either shifts to that, or plays on in another key ; and the song concludes amid scraping of feet, coughing, and other parliamentary noises. The President and introducer frown and look big, call upon Brave Ho, again ; and the little man having found that singing and sudorific are synonymous, sits down ; his friend the professional squeezes in beside him, and it is a remarkable fact that, from that moment, the little man always calls for two glasses at once, and invariably drinks four times as fast as before. The President sits in dignified abstraction.

He curses his dignity. Like Lucifer, his ambition has been his ruin. The wily professional has the novice—spider had never fly more securely. The little man gets more excited. His friend knows that that company will never stand a second infliction ; but "there is a very nice room at The Great Turk's Head, and some prime gals." The little fellow's eyestwinkle ; there he can go under the wing of his professional adviser ; he starts, gives a look of proud disdain to the company, bows to and shakes hands with the President—for he is grateful for being "called on"—and goes down stairs. The great functionary marks him for a victim that "shall be hereafter ;" and the professional calls for two glasses "short," after coming out of the warm room ; again—for they are going into the cold air ; and then the little man orders two more, (paying for all,) because he wont be backward in coming forward—a joke he has just learned from his accomplished companion. Through devious ways do they go towards Drury Lane ; and ere three streets are passed, eternal friendship has been vowed between them. The professional hopes his friend is not drinking on a "empty stomach ;" the little fellow confesses the case ; (he has been drinking it too, for an hour and a-half, under the name of Sherry ;) in another instant their feet are under a deal table, at a restaurateurs, facetiously denominated a "Slap-Bang," by the witty professional. Supper dispatched, and paid for, the reader guesses by whom, the friend leads on to the new Temple of Cecilia. "Thruppence" is demanded ; but the professional nods and says—"This ere gentleman's a friend of mine." They pass. The little man now feels that his new acquaintance is no unimportant personage. He learns his name as they ascend ; Podge is his real, Fitzmundungus his professional appellation. They enter the room. Loud applause hails the appearance of the festive Fitz ; old frequenters nudge new ones, and whisper, loud enough to be heard a mile off—"There, that's Fitz—such a chap!" The little man (Peter Meek, for we will conceal him no longer, whose aunt, a widow, keeps a small tallow chandler's,) now feels what it is to be a great man, even in a free and easy. His garments are excellent, his Swiss flat gold watch unexceptionable. His friend Fitz boasts no such gewgaws ; moreover, his garments might, like Edgar's, be almost mistaken for "Persian," for they bear no resemblance to the present fashion. But what of all this ? His genius has blazed forth, and he is the star of the Great Turk's Head. They sit ; the landlord pops a full glass of rum and water before Mundungus, and never asks for the money. Peter, in all his experience, had never seen anything like that : the genius of his friend obtains him liquor gratis ! Whilst that glass lasts, the professional liberally insists on his little friend partaking—nay, leaves the liquor with him, whilst he prowls round the room, shaking hands with almost everybody in it. At last, finding a favourable location, he beckons Peter to join him. He does so. Two young ladies and another professional are at one table. Happy Peter ! he is invited, and sits beside one of the charmers. "A bowl of negus!" he exclaims, in the tone of one who is really beginning to be happy—and there for the present let us leave him, and retrace our steps to the Cock and Bottle.

The mirth has grown louder, the heat has grown greater, the ladies have grown merrier, and the gentlemen are about to be, like the fluids at the beer-shop, "drunk on the premises." Most of the professionals have gone to other rooms; and their seats are taken by others who have just left those very houses. The President announces that Miss Learem takes a benefit at the "Salmon and Snuffertray," and one or two young men expend more than their week's salary in tickets, to ingratiate themselves with the fair songstress. As the night runs deeper into morning, some ladies of wholly unquestionable character enter, attended by their favourites—members of the swell mob. Such of the company as have yet characters to lose, and places to retain, depart. Lads of eighteen, flushed with liquor, now go forth with ladies rising thirty beside them, the acquaintance of three hours' growth rapidly ripening into a "sentiment." But look there! A girl, scarce sixteen, who has obtained "leave to go to the play," is passing out; her arm locked in that of yon bloated fellow of forty. Her eyes look wild—for she has drank liquor for the first time; her cheek is crimsoned—for she fancies every eye reads what has passed in her own mind, and every ear has heard what hers alone drank in. Her companion, with half closed eyes, and head bowed down towards his breast, walks calmly beside her. He has made sure work of it: it is too late for her to return to her home. Her one glance of agony at the clock over the bar, is terrible. The man soothes her—she drinks again—Reader, you know the rest of her history.

Enough for the present of these night orgies. Let us go to bed. To-morrow is come, and we walk and speculate on men and things in the fair daylight.

Yonder walks a widow. She is poor, her garments are faded, but exquisitely neat. The snow-white border of the cap, which tells her bereavement, surrounds a countenance, not indeed beautiful, and somewhat wrinkled by years and sorrow, but placid and interesting. The expression, unmarked by prominent characteristics or high intellectual pretensions, yet attracts, from its mildness and benignity. She must have been a sweet girl—one of those fragile plants which must be shielded from the rude breeze, or they droop and die. Following this lorn being, is a mendicant whining forth his tale of distress. "My child is dead, and lying at home unburied," he says.

The widow pauses, and eagerly searches a little black silk bag she carries. Her own grief is recent, and she sympathises with human misery. She places in the man's hand the mite which Christ blessed, and, though she speaks not, her look eloquently expresses—"Would it were more!" The fellow looks first at the coin, then at the donor, and grumbles, as he turns away—

"What a large lot! I s'pose you calls yourself a lady, don't you!"

But the converse of the picture is likewise a true one. At the corner of a street in the Strand stood an emaciated creature, shivering in a keen north wind. She was famishing: there could be no doubt of the fact—her hollow eye, the rigidity of her fleshless features, told it; her bones, revealed as if starting from her shrunken form by the clinging of her scanty rags round her limbs, told it; her bloodless lips, moving, but without sound, as she looked for help in her destitution, told it. The passenger to whom her agonized appeal was made, was a tall stout man, well wrapped up in a drab great-coat, with a shawl rolled round his neck to defend his portly person from the cold. He stopped short, and eyed the sufferer. No doubt could be entertained that he was about to relieve her; for methought her voiceless misery must have reached the human heart, whether constitutionally pitiless, fenced with false stoicism, or hardened by depravity. But I was mistaken. The person proved to be a police constable in "private clothes."

"What the devil do you do here?" growled the man in authority. "We don't allow no beggars; so come, marm—I shall just walk you off to the station-house."

The poor being shrunk back, terrified; but the officer seized her; his large hand completely encircled the skeleton arm of his prisoner, and he led her away. I was about to offer some remonstrance, but the wretched creature spoke, and I held back to hear what she would say. "I have done no harm, sir; indeed not—pray do not take me. And yet," she continued, in husky accents, and her sunken eye glared feverishly in the socket—"and yet, perhaps, I shall get some food in prison: shall I, sir?"

I am a man of the world, and few, perhaps are less liable to be deceived by the practised cant of mendicancy. I saw this was a case of distress, was I about to write?—of agony—of the last stage of human misery. It was a case where a creature of God's handiwork was about to perish, for want of the meanest sustenance, in the very heart and centre of monopolized property, wealth, luxury, and extravagance! It was a case where the convenience of the occasional passenger, or the purse-proud householder, who delicately considered the sight of human misery, opposite his window, a nuisance and an eyesore—a case, I say, where the temporary, momentary, the most trifling insignificant convenience or pleasure of such persons was considered of more value than the LIFE of a sentient, intellectual being! The wretch was dying; but the law would stop her on the very brink of eternity, to pay the penalty of vagrancy, before she closed her eyes upon the world. As I looked upon the unhappy mendicant, I almost unceasingly muttered these affecting lines of Wordsworth:—

"But of the vagrant none took thought;
And where it liked her best she sought
Her shelter and her food;"

and—

"Homeless near a thousand homes she stood,
And near a thousand tables pined and wanted food."

Such cases are common—ay, common in England, in boastful proud England, where the national ear is tickled with every sound, and in every note that can be acceptable to the inflated vanity which is the national characteristic. In England, the land of charity and poor-laws—in London, the mart of public hospitals, of benevolent and mendicity institutions, and of private beneficence—the famished pauper hath yielded up his breath on the steps of a workhouse door, because he belonged to another parish, and, I suppose, consequently to another God; and the woman in travail, sternly refused admittance into the wretched receptacle for the unfortunate, hath brought forth her offspring in the kennel by the poorhouse wall, in the midst of a mob whose threats and execrations alone compelled the wretches in authority to admit under the roof the miserable mother and her naked infant, after the efficacy of the withheld assistance had become more than doubtful. Yet England is a land where the stripes upon the hide of a donkey are regulated by act of Parliament, and a cat's tail is under legislative protection. So much for cant!

One word more of the poor creature whose case induced these reflections. She did not die.

A benevolent lady of my acquaintance interested herself on behalf of the sufferer; and to that lady the quondam mendicant now ministers in the capacity of an active, grateful, and intelligent servant.

Your writers of directories divide London into streets, and publish another volume in which each "trade" and its "followers" stands "en masse." But it is with the haunts of these traders we have to do. In London, there is a butcher-haunted, and a lawyer-haunted, and a thousand other trade-haunted regions. Reader, do ye ever wander towards the once Bond Street of the Metropolis? It stands near the market for

"Chairmen, coffee-rooms, piazzas, dollies, Cabbages, and comedians fam'd in story;"

and is entitled "The Street of Bow." It contains the head police-office and a police-station, four gin palaces, one tavern, and one theatre. It is with the latter we have to do. Whether it be attributable to the attraction of that Leviathanic temple of the drama, we know not; but certainly all the small and large fry of theatricals, from Mrs Plaise, (late Mrs Chatterly,) to the cock-salmon, as the actors call Mr W. Farren, do continually "lurk and wander" up and down the street aforesaid, and gather together at KENNETH'S CORNER.

THE DEVIL IN ERNEST.

In his cabinet chair, King Ernest sat,
Doing the statesman, and all that;
O'er Ernest's shoulder, with earnest gaze,
Peered his old Mephistopheles;
By his "hoof and horn," you might see full quick
'Twas only Schule's mask disguised Old Nick;
And, glancing from face to face, you'd swear
That h—l never mated a likelier pair!

"Ho, ho!" quoth Satan, "and so it appears You'll summon the States just once in three years."

"But only for three months at time."

"Ho, ho!" quoth Satan, "a law sublime!"

"And with the three months I'll soon dispense."

"Ha! ha!" quoth Satan, "that's d—d good sense!"

"And, to shew," rejoined Ernest, "I mean to be civil, I'll blow the whole beggarly crew to the devil!"

Amazement erected Lucifer's horn;
His eyes of their light for a space were shorn;
And the goose-quill blazed in Ernest's hand,
As though 'twere a genuine hell-fire brand!
O'er "CONSTITUTION," one stroke he drew,
And cried, "'Tis extinct! Le Roi le veut!"
Then, with his sublime excitement pale,
He nodded; and t'other fiend wagged his tail!

"Extinct!" roared Lucifer; "now, by this hoof!—

And that is a curse would rend h—l's roof—

Mock-modesty's not your fault, I see;

For this bangs Bannagher; that bangs me!

My heart warms towards you; so does h—l—

I'm clearly in Ernest now—farewell!"

Then, paw upon shoulder, and tongue in cheek,

He muttered, "Old cock, you'll be mine next week!"

H.

EUSTACHIO MANFREDI TO PHYLLIS.

"Il primo alber non appariva ancora."

Not yet appeared the morning's earliest ray
When I with Phyllis, 'neath an elm-tree's shade, Among her soft words listed, anon prayed
That my fond looks might be revealed by day.
"Then shalt thou see, my Phyllis," would I say,
"From ocean rising, gorgeously arrayed,
Astræa bid the thousand planets fade,
That o'er the mountains now their fires display."

Then shalt thou see the sun, amidst whose light
Both she and they must vanish from the skies—
So glorious of his radiance the might:
Yet shalt not see what I shall—thy fair eyes
Open on day, thine eyes that are so bright
The conquering sunshine in their flashes dies.

NEW ISSUE OF BENTHAM.—STATE AND PROSPECTS OF THE COUNTRY.

THERE was something very equivocal in the attempt of the Ministerialists, during the recent elections, to substitute fine flummery about the Queen's name, on all occasions, for any definite statement of reforms contemplated by Ministers. The temporizing and meaningless language of the government press, too, was very suspicious. Besides, we know of at least one most influential member of that section of the aristocracy which is friendly to Ministers—a man not in office, it is true, but more immersed in the intrigues by which their noble supporters are kept together, than many who are—who repeatedly, during the elections, boasted of having letters from Conservatives, to the effect, that, having thrown out some of the Ultra-Radicals, they would be satisfied with such a demonstration in behalf of their principles, and would lend a general support to Government. The declaration of Lord John Russell against any further Reform, must be received in connection with these facts. The declaration was no hasty ebullition of temper. It was a distinct enunciation of opinion and resolve, made one evening, and repeated the next, with the addition that it was made because Lord John, expecting to be called upon for an expression of opinion regarding the questions mooted by Mr Wakley, had maturely reflected upon them. Lord John Russell's declaration is another item of proof, added to the care taken by Ministers to commit themselves, by no additional promises of Reform, to the zealous repudiation of Radicals and Radicalism by the Government press. All these are but visible emanations of one principle, one sentiment, working at bottom. Mr Spring Rice's disingenuous shuffle in his Civil List Committee, is another of these indications. The man is still trying to make friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness. Lord John's statements with regard to Canada are another. The Whigs are not prepared to defend "sound Revolution principles of government" (to use one of their own slang phrases) against Tory cant about "ships, colonies, and commerce." We are told that, notwithstanding all these symptoms, no coalition is contemplated; and, in the sense in which the phrase is uttered, we believe it. There is equivocation in the words. There will be no coalition between Peel and Melbourne: the men hate each other too cordially. There will be no coalition between the Whig and Tory sections of the haute noblesse: the old feudal grudge between the houses is too inveterate. But there will be a coalition between the milk-and-water Conservatives and milk-and-water Reformers, to support a Ministry which will consent to draw the salaries of office, and allow things to remain as they are. The conduct, the hints, the declarations of the present Cabinet, are expressions of hope, on the principle that "possession is nine points of the law," that this coalition will give them the first offer, seeing that the mere turning of them out would be a kind of "movement," and likely to set other things in motion. Ministers have, for some time back, if there be any trusting to appearances, been doing what in them lay to bring about this coalition, and to make friends of the parties to it.

It will not do. Admitting even, for the sake of argument, that the whole of the ten-pound constituency was willing to acquiesce in such a euthanasia of the Reform Act—in such a dispersion and drying up of the broad, deep stream of public opinion, which rolled so resistlessly along during the Reform struggle—there are elements in society at work which will prevent the consummation. An immense majority of the population is still beyond the pale of the franchise. The great mass of this majority is in a state of severe and permanent suffering—suffering demonstrably referable, in a great measure, to bad legislation and bad government. This unhappy mass of human beings will not remain quiet, because those who have the power are comparatively comfortable. A Ministry resting on such a coalition as we have indicated—a House of Commons returned by it—must uphold the very laws, perpetuate the very misconduct, from which by far the greater part of its sufferings proceeds. Pensions and sinecures, direct and indirect, must be continued, in order that partisans may be rewarded. The oppressive and incompetent engine of our unpaid magistracy must be kept up, to flatter the vanity of some; the unequal distribution of emoluments in the State Church, to gratify the avarice rapacity of others. The bread-tax—starving our operatives, impoverishing and cramping our capitalists, draining the coffers even of our agriculturalists—must be kept up, to soothe the squirearchy. And, to gloss over all these derelictions of duty, the laxity of moral principle, and confusion of ideas, promoted by a vague and improper phraseology, and system of conventional falsehoods, must be perpetuated—acted upon by eminent statesmen, inculcated by reverend divines. Already the fruits of such a system are beginning to shew themselves. Even in Leith and Edinburgh—which are not manufacturing districts, with a few wealthy capitalists floating, disjecta membra, amid a sea of operatives—the bad blood existing between electors and non-electors has begun to shew itself. But look to the manufacturing districts of England. The struggles about time-bills, and against the new poor-laws, are mere expressions of suffering and discontent, existing to a fearful amount. The many feel their wretched situation; they feel that something must be done; they feel that nothing will be done, unless they stir for themselves; and so, without well knowing how to set about it, they strike blindly around them. Already the masses have found leaders. Oastler and Stephens can move them as they will. Beaumont, with his Northern Liberator, and O'Connor, with his Northern Star, furnish them with rallying points. The form may be new, but the spirit is old. These men and their doctrines are the legitimate successors—the necessary development of the old “Pioneers,” and “strikes,” and attempts to organise the “productive labourers.” They may be as evanescent as their predecessors; but so long as the sufferings, from which their power springs, endure, so long will their line of successors last, each stronger than his predecessor. Even in non-manufacturing districts, we have seen that materials are piled up, which one spark from this fire would set in a blaze. The use which has been made of the circumstances connected with the arrest and trial of the Glasgow cotton-spinners, accused of murder, is a proof that the same spirit is active in the Scottish manufacturing districts. And if wild and reprehensible language has at times been employed in the progress of the agitation to which we have been adverting, we have only to turn to Colonel Verner's speech in the House of Commons, on the evening of Tuesday, the 5th of December, for an equally shameless avowal of sentiments equally atrocious. We repeat:—It will not do. A truce patched up between the influential champions of Reform and Conservatism, on the ground of allowing matters to rest in statu quo, cannot be kept. The seeds of anarchy are rife in the land. We need men at the helm who can act, and who know what they wish to accomplish, and how to set about it.

In such a state of affairs—when an urgent necessity for action is coupled with an ostentatious profession on the part of those whose duty it is to be active for us, that they will not act—we naturally cast our eyes about for men to whom the country may look for aid. Here and there in every district, we see or hear the voices of such men. Nay, we have indications that they are drawing nigh to each other, and beginning to co-operate. One of the most cheering manifestations of this sort, is the Working Men's Association in London. The great meeting in Westminster on the 4th of December is another; and, if rightly followed up, it will be the source of incalculable benefit to the country. It was right that such a meeting should be held in Westminster. The scene of the life and labours of Jeremy Bentham is consecrated to liberty and the happiness of man. And this consideration leads us to the second topic indicated by the title of our paper—the first issue of the first complete edition of Bentham's works, and the importance of its appearance at a crisis like the present.

The first serious agitation of Parliamentary Reform in this country, is nearly contemporaneous with the close of the American War of independence. The Revolution of 1688 was brought about, in a great measure, by an appeal to the sectarian prejudices of men. That some of the leaders in that Revolution saw clearly the danger of a “king above the law,” and struck at that nuisance, there can be no doubt; but with the mass of the people it was otherwise. James might have gone on stretching his prerogative to almost any conceivable extent, without touching to the quick the apathy of Englishmen, or kindling a community of sentiment in the bosoms of the factions into which they were split, had he not taken it into his silly head to become a martyr for the Pope. Vague dreams of the Inquisition haunted the citizens; dread to see the fat benefices of England restored to the Romanists, paralysed for once the loyally voluble tongues of the clergy; and, amid this universal consternation, the enlightened patriots of the age obtained the national sanction to the decree, that kings were responsible. But the public mind was not sufficiently enlightened to see the necessity of applying the doctrine of responsibility to the other branches of British institutions; nor were the allies who aided in the dethronement of James, inclined to promote such an application. The Peers were left entirely irresponsible; the elective system for the House of Commons was allowed to remain a continually deteriorating system of sham representation. The passing of the Septennial Act by the Whigs accelerated the progress. The diminished power of the King had rendered the prize contended for by the aristocracy more worthy of a bold ambition—it was more worth while to corrupt electors; and the increased length of Parliaments rendered it less expensive. Out of such favourable circumstances arose the borough-mongering system. So long as one of the exiled dynasty continued alive, he was used as a bugbear to frighten men into obedience, by the Revolution government; exactly as the Whigs, since the passing of the Reform Bill, have tried to use the Tories. “The Pretender is coming!” cried the Old Whigs. “The Tories are coming!” cry the New. Not long after the death of Cardinal York had dispossessed the ruling powers of this convenient scarecrow, the assertion of the principle that “Taxation without representation is tyranny,” by the North American colonies, set men's minds in the mother country to inquire whether the representative system in Great Britain were real, or, like many other things, a mere “legal fiction.” The irritation excited by the detection of the cheat, was fanned from time to time, by Ministers ejected from power, or kept out of it; who saw, in the insubordination of the House of Commons, a sufficient demonstration of its need of reform. The reforming zeal of this class of patriots, however, rarely outlived their return to power: they kissed and made friends with their unfaithful mistress; and all her weaknesses were forgotten. Not so the People: they remembered the lessons taught them by patriots out of place, when these patriots had forgotten them in the Armida garden of the Treasury.

The first cure for any evil that suggests itself is generally a radical one; it requires time and talent to invent a plan for only half-accomplishing your object. Thus the plans of Parliamentary Reform at first suggested, went direct to the point. Almost without any exception, they recognised the indispensability of Annual Parliaments, Universal Suffrage, and a Re-distribution of the Electoral Districts. The arguments with which these recommendations were supported were not so sound as the measures they were advanced to support. It has been remarked of women, that their tact universally finds out the most advisable course to pursue in any emergency, but that, if driven to argue in defence of their advice, they are sure to weaken its weight. This holds true of more than women. It was weak enough in the friends of these measures, to admit the sophism, that the establishment of any institution was a sufficient reason for its continuance; it was worse when they gravely went back to the heptarchy, in search of the real British constitution. By adopting this trivial strain of argument, they laid themselves bare to two species of attack, both equally impossible to parry. In the first place, they were convicted of having advanced what was contrary to fact, in attributing their own views of representation to so rude a period; in the second place, they were proved to entertain an opinion contrary to reason, when they maintained that the organization which suited the most simple state of society, would be adequate to the wants of the most complex. While men were puzzling on this cold scent, the French Revolution broke out, and the confusion of alarm was added to the confusion of inaccurate thought. The prejudices of the wealthy were appealed to: "These fellows have a design on your pockets." The prejudices of the poor were appealed to: "These fellows are for engrafting frivolous French devices on the solid sense of John Bull." Having been held up as knaves, their own erroneous arguments furnished the materials for proving them fools—and thus was Reform crushed. Loud and fierce raged the controversy; for men felt that they were ill at ease, though they could not prove it, and every uneasy man was, is, and must be a Reformer. But the indistinct notions entertained by Reformers of their own objects perplexed and weakened their efforts; while, with their adversaries, to put aside attacks was sufficient for their purpose. In political cases of disputed right, the legal maxim is pre-eminently true—melior est conditio possidentis.

Comparatively with many others, the name of Jeremy Bentham has been little heard, during the course of this tedious struggle, by the general public; and yet, of these more prominent names, not one has contributed the tithe of what he has done towards its satisfactory termination. He was a man when it commenced in earnest; and he survived to witness the first substantial victory gained by the Reformers. His life, for the whole of this long period, was a succession of almost unintermitted intellectual labour. He was indifferent to that ephemeral éclat which to so many minds is all in all. If he had any desire for fame, he had the magnanimity to aim at that well-deserved and slowly-maturing reputation which is enduring in proportion as it is long of ripening. He had projected a work great beyond the power of conception of inferior minds; and to its completion he devoted his life. He cared not that the meteors of an hour engrossed the attention of his contemporaries: he knew that his pile, when completed, would arrest the admiring gaze of centuries. He fed upon the prophetic consciousness of his coming fame. He survived to accomplish as much as could leave no doubt of the extent and excellence of his design. Nor, while he was thus labouring in seclusion for posterity, was he inattentive to what was going on in the world. Every philanthropic undertaking was sure of his attention and sympathy. Its advocates were sure to apply to him for advice and co-operation—and never unsuccessfully. But the simple statement of a few facts will serve better to put the reader in possession of what Bentham was, and what he has accomplished, than the most laboured eulogium.

Jeremy Bentham was born on the 15th of February 1747–8, and died on the 6th of June 1832. Out of the more than fourscore years allotted to him by Providence, at least sixty were spent in the discharge of a great self-imposed task.

His father was an eminent solicitor in London. Young Bentham was entered at Westminster School in his eighth year, and at Queen's College, Oxford, in his thirteenth. He took his degree of B.A. at sixteen; of M.A. at twenty. He was then entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1772.

His talents would have fitted him for turning his profession to a lucrative account, had not his disposition interfered to prevent this. His draughts of bills in equity, were distinguished for their excellence. But his natural sincerity of mind had been rendered almost morbidly sensitive, by an event which occurred during his college life. We refer to his subscription of the thirty-nine articles; and shall allow him to tell his tale in his own words:—"Understanding that of such signature the effect and sole object was, the declaring, after reflection, with solemnity and upon record, that the propositions therein contained were, in my opinion, every one of them true—what seemed to me a matter of duty was, to examine them in that view, in order to see whether that were really the case. The examination was unfortunate. In some of them no meaning at all could I find—in others, no meaning but one which, in my eyes, was but too plainly irreconcilable either to reason or to Scripture. Communicating my distress to some of my fellow collegiates, I found them sharers in it. Upon inquiry, it was found that, among the fellows of the college, there was one to whose office it belonged, among other things, to remove all such scruples. We repaired to him with fear and trembling. His answer was cold, and the substance of it was—that it was not for uninformed youths, such as us, to presume to set up our private judgments against a public one, formed by some of the holiest as well as best and wisest men that ever lived. . . . I signed ; but, by the view I found myself forced to take of the whole business, such an impression was made as will never depart from me but with life."

The deep impression left upon his mind by this incident, was deepened by what happened to him soon after he was called to the bar:—"By the command of a father, I entered into the profession; and, in the year 1772 or thereabouts, was called to the bar. Not long after, having drawn a bill in equity, I had to defend it against exceptions before a Master in Chancery. 'We shall have to attend on such a day,' said the solicitor to me, naming a day a week or so distant; 'warrants for our attendance will be taken out for two intervening days; but it is not customary to attend before the third.' What I learned afterwards was—that, though no attendance more than one was ever bestowed, three were, on every occasion, regularly charged for; for each of the two false and pretended attendances, the client being by the solicitor charged with a fee for himself, as also with a fee of 6s. 8d. paid to the Master. The consequence was—that, for every attendance, the Master, instead of 6s. 8d., received £1; and that, even if inclined, no solicitor durst omit taking out the three warrants instead of one, for fear of the not-to-be-hazarded displeasure of the inferior judge and his superiors. True it is, the solicitor is not under under any obligation thus to charge his client for work not done. He is, however, sure of indemnity in doing so; and it is accordingly done of course. . . . These things, and others of the same complexion, in such immense abundance, determined me to quit the profession; and, as soon as I could obtain my father's permission, I did so. I found it was more to my taste to endeavour, as I have been doing ever since, to put an end to them than to profit by them."

His was not, however, an effeminate mind, that could rest contented with abandoning itself to the indolence of despair. His mind had been strengthened by exercise in the field of scientific inquiry:—"I had come warm to it [the study of the law] from the study of physical science. I had there seen the human mind advancing with uninterrupted and continually-accelerated progress towards the pinnacle of perfection; facts wanting, but, by the unmolested and even publicly-assisted industry of individuals, the deficiency continually lessened, the demand continually supplied; the faculty, the organ of invention, sound, and, by wholesome exercise, increasing in vigour every day; errors still abundant enough, but continually and easily corrected—being the result, not so much of prejudice as of ignorance; every eye open to instruction, every ear eager to imbibe it. When I turned to the field of law, the contrast was equally impressive and afflicting." Rendered hardy by exercise, stimulated by the violence offered to his two strongest propensities—the craving for truth, and the desire of doing good to his fellow beings—he devoted himself to the Herculean task of reforming those enormities which had driven him, in disgust, from the profession of the law.

It would be an inadequate expression to say, that he had to lay the foundation of the science of jurisprudence. He had to collect out of the legal chaos, and knead together, the materials of a firm resting-place for the bridge wherewith he sought to span it. In a note to his "Fragment on Government," he has given an interesting account of "the wanderings of a raw but well-intentioned mind, in its researches after moral truth." He describes the impression made upon his young mind by the imposing monastic character of the university in which he was educated; aided and confirmed by a sedulous study of the congenial writings of Clarendon. The contradictions, however, in this his first set of opinions, over which he stumbled at every step, disquieted him; and the self-controversy, before and after the signing of the Thirty-nine Articles, (although he does not allude to it in the passage to which we are now referring,) must have finally roused him. Turned thus rudely out of his Eden, he looked round for a guide, but found none. The lawyers told him of "the original compact;" but confessed, when pressed home, that it was nowhere recorded in history—that, in fact, it was an assumption, "a fiction." "This, methought, looked ill; it seemed to me the acknowledgment of a bad cause, the bringing of a fiction to support it." At last a light dawned upon him from the pages of Hume:—"Thus continued I, unsatisfying and unsatisfied, till I learnt to see that utility was the test and measure of all virtue, of loyalty as much as any; and that the obligation to minister to general happiness was an obligation paramount to and inclusive of every other. Having thus got the instruction I stood in need of, I sat down to make my profit of it. I bade adieu to the original contract, and I left it to those to amuse themselves with this rattle who could think they needed it."

It may not be unnecessary to interpose a caveat here, against certain misapprehensions of the sense in which utility is said to be the test and measure of virtue, upon which much eloquent vituperative declamation has been thrown away. Laws are authoritative declarations of what man in society shall or shall not be allowed to do. Moral precepts are unauthoritative declarations of what man ought or ought not to do. The question proposed to himself by Bentham in his capacity of legislative philosopher was—Is there any one test by the application of which we may know with certainty whether any law or any moral precept is sound and right? Some have proposed a certain innate sense or consciousness of right and wrong: experience tells us that this sense, if it exist, is fallible. Others put forward the will of Deity: but how are we to know the will of Deity? Amid the variety of religious belief which prevails, and will prevail, this is at the least an inapplicable test. The only test which stands experiment is—Are the laws or precepts in question useful? Do they tend to promote the greatest possible happiness of the greatest possible number? This test has been long and repeatedly applied, and has never yet been found to fail. If the psychologist tell us that there is a certain essential frame of mind which may be called virtuous, and another which may be called vicious, we do not deny the fact; but, even though we admit it, we shall be none the wiser—we are as much in want of a practical compass whereby to steer our course as ever. The utility of actions is such a compass; and it is equally true, equally applicable, whether the position of the psychologist be true or not. If the divine tell us that actions are virtuous or vicious because God has willed it so, our answer is—Possibly; but how are we to know what he has willed? or how, amid the infinite diversity of religious opinions, are we to find one universally admitted opinion regarding his will? If such a one be found, you will find men coming to it by some such induction as this:—"An action is good, or it is honourable, or it is useful—therefore, it must be the will of God that we should do it." The test proposed by the divine must first be tested by the test which we propose; for, good, honourable, useful—all these phrases come to the same thing. The admission of the principle neither admits nor denies the conclusions of speculative inquirers into the nature of our being, or into the divine nature. The sentimentalist may receive and act upon it without (to use his own fine language) tarnishing the bloom of one beautiful emotion. These emotions exist—they exist spontaneously—the essence of their beauty is in their spontaneity. The stoic, on the other hand, need not fear that an enervated character will be the result of admitting the greatest happiness principle. The utilitarian proceeds upon calculation: he therefore relinquishes a present inferior and transient pleasure, if incompatible with a future enduring one. To acquire the habit of doing this, he must exercise himself in self-denial. The stoic does no more. The stoic exercises self-denial, he tells us, for its own sake, but in reality to flatter his vanity by brooding complacently over the consciousness of his own strength: the utilitarian practises self-denial for the attainment of more important ends. "Cold," "heartless," "selfish"—such are the phrases lavished on the utilitarian. What! he heartless, he selfish, who teaches that in all our actions we should keep in view the promotion of the happiness of all!—he who inculcates the cultivation of the benevolent emotions, as one of the grand elements of virtue! These vituperative epithets are unworthy of refutation. We proceed:—

Bentham having found in the greatest happiness principle, a standard for trying the value of actions, proceeded to invent classes, under which laws of all kinds might be arranged, with a view to promote more accurate conceptions of their individual nature, and of their bearings upon each other. The scheme of distribution with which he has furnished us in the preface to his "Introduction to the Science of Morals and Legislation," is perfectly exhaustive; it embraces all the details that can come within the legitimate sphere of the legislator's activity. The object of the legislator is to prescribe a system of rules, the observance of which shall be conducive to the maximum of happiness on the part of the maximum of numbers, and to make arrangements for ensuring the most exact observance of them that is possible. He has to define what belongs to a man, and what does not; what one man may insist upon another performing for him, and what he may not. This is what Bentham terms Distributive Law, and relates to the doctrines of property and obligations. The legislator has further to secure a man's personal security, and for this end to prescribe certain punishments for aggression, by way of deterring. He has also, with a view to enforce his regulations of distributive law, to prescribe punishments for their contravention. From these two sources springs the Penal Law, which is accessory to the distributive. Further, the legislator must provide for the enforcement of his laws in their real sense, by devising set forms calculated to ensure that end: this is the third branch of legislative science—the doctrine of Procedure. Next in order comes the application of stimuli to those whose business it shall be to carry into execution what is prescribed, in conformity to the principles of these three sections: this gives rise to a fourth branch of topics, which may be classed as the principles of legislation in matters of reward. The necessity of providing matter of Reward—the concomitant necessity of doing so with the least possible inconvenience or annoyance to the general body—renders necessary a fifth class of investigations—those relating to Finance. At this stage of our progress, we are brought to the most important question of all—To whom is to be entrusted the legislative and tax-imposing authority? The answer to this inquiry is furnished by the principle of Constitutional Law. The conclusions which Bentham arrived at on this head, rendered necessary the establishment of a seventh set of principles, bearing the same relation to Constitutional which Procedure does to Distributive or Penal Law; and to which he has given the name of Political Tactics. Lastly, as mankind are split up into a great number of independent societies, the mutual relations of these different bodies rendered necessary a code of regulations for their conduct to each other: this forms what is now called pretty generally International Law.

These constitute the first eight heads of the scheme of distribution to which we have referred above. That list, it may be remarked, is both excessive and defective. In addition to the eight heads of what ought to be constructed or enacted, it contains two heads of theoretical inquiry—preliminary investigations necessary for the recommendation and defence of the codes of practical principles. These belong evidently to a different class of works, and ought not to have been included in the same list with the others. In themselves, they are defective; for they do not exhaust those necessary preliminary inquiries. They are—the principles of political economy, and the principles of universal jurisprudence. The principles of morals are omitted—strangely enough, in the preface to a treatise on them. The theory of judicial evidence is also a work belonging to this class. With this remark, we submit Bentham's own list of the great heads under which he distributed his body of legislative science.

"Part 1st—Principles of legislation in matters of civil, more distinctively termed, private distributive, or, for shortness, distributive law.

"Part 2d—Principles of legislation in matters of penal law.

"Part 3d—Principles of legislation in matters of procedure; uniting, in one view, the criminal and civil branches; between which no line can be drawn, but a very indistinct one, and that liable to continual variation.

"Part 4th—Principles of legislation in matters of reward.

"Part 5th—Principles of legislation in matters of public distribution—more concisely as well as familiarly termed constitutional law.

"Part 6th—Principles of legislation in matters of political tactics, or the art of maintaining order in the proceedings of political assemblies, so as to direct them to the end of their institution—viz., by a system of rules, which are to the constitutional branch, in some respects, what the law of procedure is to the civil and the penal.

"Part 7th—Principles of legislation in matters betwixt nation and nation; or, to use a new, though not inexpressive appellation, in matters of international law.

"Part 8th—Principles of legislation in matters of finance."

The works published by Bentham, or extracted by others from his manuscripts during his life, and the materials he has left behind him, completely exhaust these topics—the practical part of his system. In like manner, the materials he had accumulated in his cabinet—larger or less fragments of which were promulgated during his life—exhaust pretty completely the theoretical part upon which the practical rests. A third and numerous class of his works may be regarded as applications of his principles to ephemeral events and discussions, serving at once to give sound advice, and to illustrate the advantages which are to be derived from systematic habits of thought in matters of politics and morals.

Perhaps the best way of illustrating the practical soundness and nature of Bentham's principles, will be to apply them to the most urgent question of the day. This will justify a remark we hazarded at the outset, that the minds of men, feeling rather than seeing what was wanted, were beating about in search of guiding principles; and that the works of Bentham furnished those principles which, to all human appearance, were to give form to society for the greater part of the next century. The most urgent question at present agitated, is the constitution of the representative legislature. Lord John Russell tells us that it is formed by a section of the community; and, consequently, we must infer that it legislates in the interests, and according to the views of that section—we will not shock his Lordship's politeness by saying prejudices. From a body so constituted, no good can be expected. When we find it cheering a declaration that reform shall go no further; when we find it in ecstasies with a juggling pretence of investigation into a few pensions; when we find it ready to trample on the liberties of Canada—the creature but acts after its kind. What good can come out of Nazareth?—what pure stream can flow from a troubled source? The Reformed Parliament—as in mockery it is termed—must be reformed. But how? Let us consult the principles of Bentham, and see what answer they furnish to the question.

Bentham's first principle is, that the sole recognisable end of all institutions is the promotion of the greatest possible happiness of the greatest possible number. A representative legislature—call it a House of Commons, or what you will—must be constructed in such a manner as to conduce to this end, or it is indefensible. From this it follows, that, having to promote the greatest possible good of the greatest possible number, it must consult the feelings and opinions of all. This establishes three conditions necessary to a sound House of Commons:—First, Every citizen must have a voice in the election of its members; second, Every citizen must have an equal voice in the election of its members; third, Every citizen must have a free voice in the election of its members. These are the three conditions which determine the nature, distribution, and mode of action of the constitutional or electing body; and the popular expression of them is:—Universal Suffrage; Electoral Districts, based upon population, of equal extent, (i. e., containing equal numbers;) Secret Voting, or Vote by Ballot. The conditions which determine who are to be eligible, and how they are to be kept to their duty, are likewise three in number:—Free choice of the most competent person, whatever his circumstances may be; the provision of motives to stimulate those who are elected to act right; the provision of checks to prevent those who are elected from acting wrong. The popular expression of these three conditions is:—No Property Qualification; Short, or, with more precision, Annual Parliaments; and paid Members of Parliaments. In short, the creed of Bentham concerning Parliamentary Reform is, when expressed in the popular phraseology of the day:—Annual Parliaments; Universal Suffrage; Vote by Ballot; Electoral Districts, of equal extent, based on population; No Property Qualification; and Wages to Members of Parliament. We shall go over each of these points in succession, annexing to it a brief illustrative explanation.

Annual Parliaments.—The object of Short Parliaments is to keep the representative in the interest of his constituents, by his need of a frequent renewal of his lease of office. If he require to renew it often, the preponderating motive with him, will be, by acting for their good, to secure a continuance of their good will. If, by lengthening his tenure of office, the sense of depending upon their good will is rendered less continually and vividly present to his mind, other motives become active—inclination to use his power to procure some desirable end or object for himself, inclination to use it for the advantage of an intimate friend, and such like. All these motives tend to divert him from the prosecution of the public good. Every addition made to the length of his tenure of office, renders him more accessible to their influence. Yearly renewals of office have been suggested: first, because some definite term must be fixed upon; second, because any longer term is unsafe—as even this may be; third, because shorter terms would expose to trouble and inconvenience, outweighing the advantage of additional security conveyed by them. It may be said that even annual parliaments will, by their frequency, occasion undue trouble and disquiet. Answer:—The regularity of their brief periodical recurrence, will prevent this; it is the rare event of elections which mainly contributes to the keenness of the contest. The extension of the suffrage, and the secrecy of voting, will also diminish (as will be shewn) the turmoil and disquiet.

Universal Suffrage.—The object being the greatest possible happiness of the greatest possible number, every person ought to have a vote. Every person feels when he is comfortable or the reverse; every person forms an opinion (such as it is) on the cause. The election of a representative is the demonstration that the real majority believe themselves benefited by his line of policy. The only method of altering their belief, if erroneous, is to let them feel the contrary. The minds superiorly gifted are so few—the means of distinguishing between real superiority and quackish pretensions to it so inadequate—that to talk of placing the government of society in the hands of the wise, is nonsense. What is called education or knowledge, is so imperfect and partial, that no claim to superior privileges can be based upon its possession. With many, it is merely the acquirement of a parrot-like facility of repeating words by rote; with the best, it is the strengthening of one or two faculties—the obtaining of a glimpse through an opening in the mist which envelopes us all. In selecting his legislator and tax-imposer, every man must act for himself; if he defer to the opinion of wiser heads, it must be his own free act, not the result of legislative coercion. No exclusion is necessary. Women are excluded, in consequence of a social prejudice, resting on no better basis than the veiling and locking up of the same class in Turkey. Children are excluded because their parents, by law, act for them in other matters. As children are mere imitative beings, their admission to vote would not produce a different result from their exclusion. Weak-minded persons, if allowed to go free and act for themselves in other matters, why not in this? The class is too few in numbers to be dangerous. Habitually and systematically dishonest persons have sense enough to see the advantages of social order in the mass, although they live by contravening some of its principles in detail. Besides, they are an imperceptible minority. Finally, the main argument with the opponents of universal suffrage is, that it would unsettle society and produce turbulence. On the contrary, it is the only thing to settle society, and prevent turbulence. All violent struggles in society, spring from one or both of two causes: the discomfort of the masses; their jealousy that they are oppressed and cheated, because they have no voice in the government. If all had a voice in the election of legislators, the well-being of all would be cared for. If all had a voice in the election of legislators, there would be less distrust of their proceedings. Trade-unions, poor-law riots, illegal associations, election squabbles—all are the effects of the jealousy of the masses, because they have no voice potential in elections; and of the habitual inattention to them, occasioned by their having no voice.

Electoral Districts of Equal Extent based on Population.—This is a subsidiary means of giving effect to universal suffrage: its object is to ensure its due weight to every vote. It is immaterial whether a man obtain a greater share in legislative authority by one means or another: it is prejudicial every way. When 300 men elect two members, and as many thousands only one, the 300 are an aristocracy, members of a privileged class, having powers and interests apart from the community. Small constituencies, moreover, are favourable to bribery, by rendering the practice of it cheaper: they are favourable to bribery and intimidation, by rendering secret voting difficult or impossible.

Vote by Ballot.—This is the expression generally used, although secret voting would be preferable, inasmuch as it would put an end to the cavilling of sophists, who try to demonstrate the inefficiency of a mode of ballot-voting, and then, under the cloak of the conventional phrase for secret voting, assume that it is unattainable. The object of secret voting is to prevent undue influence. There are only two kinds of allowable influence—influence exercised by argument upon a man's convictions, influence exercised by continuous benevolence upon a man's kindly feelings. The power of these, the ballot-box cannot and ought not to destroy. If you really convince a man, by the necessity of his nature he will act in private as in public, upon that conviction—more surely in the former, for there is nothing to prevent him. If you win a man by past kindness, the surrendering of his convictions to feeling is an expression that, in existing society, he is happy—it is a fact, the true expression of which is a necessary ingredient in our calculations, and ought to be uttered. What secret voting interferes to prevent, is—first, the obtaining a false expression of a man's sense of his present and past condition, by promises of future contingent benefit; second, the obtaining of a similar false expression, by means of threats of present or future pain. These are undue influences, by whatever name, and from whatever source they proceed—from the many or from the few. Secret voting leaves untouched due influence, and prevents undue influence. A secret vote is a true vote—it is what the voter really wishes and intends to give.

No Property Qualification, and Wages to Members of Parliament.—A property qualification is a direct exclusion of all who belong to a certain class, from being eligible to the legislature. The refusal of remuneration to Members of Parliament, is an indirect method of excluding a much more numerous class. It is for the interest of the community, that no talents possessed by any of its members, should be rendered unavailable. The direct or indirect exclusion of any class of men from the legislature, must necessarily place a portion of ability beyond the public use. The denial of remuneration forces the electors to choose from a class so limited in number, that, in the first place, the chances against finding a sufficient supply of ability in it are infinite; in the second place, the individuals selected, are almost all of them inevitably touched with an esprit de corps, alien to and incompatible with the general interest. We are told, that to give wages to Members of Parliament, would lower the legislature in public estimation. Are military commanders, eminent pleaders, judges, ministers of state, clergymen, less honoured, because they are remunerated for their labour? We are told, that to remunerate Members of Parliament, would introduce "political adventurers" into the House of Commons. Well, and what then? The term "political adventurers," is supposed to mean something very bad: let us see what is its real meaning? A "political adventurer" is one who, knowing or believing that he possesses aptitude for serving the state, and that an adequate remuneration is to be obtained by thus employing his time and talents, devotes himself to this line of business. False pretenders, dishonest men, may choose this path; but from them, what path in life is free? In the idea of "political adventurer" itself, quackery or dishonesty is no necessary ingredient. Is the present system free from "political adventurers?" What was Canning? What was Huskisson? To descend infinitely in the scale of respectability and talent, what are Peter Borthwick and Benjamin D'Israeli? The present system affords no security against political adventurers; but its natural and necessary tendency is to make them dishonest. They see wealth and property alone regarded as honourable, and are led to attribute an undue importance to it. They hear direct legitimate payment called mean and discreditable; and are driven to procure it by indirect means, and under false pretences. They see nothing to be gained by promoting the happiness of the greatest number, and, therefore, they sell themselves to do the dirty work of the few. Under a reformed system, the services of "political adventurers" would be as available as under the existing one they are indispensable; and they themselves would be kept pure, rendered sensible to "clearer spurs" of ambition than now; taught to identify their own interest with that of all; accustomed to stand erect in conscious power, instead of crouching as court sycophants. We have named among political adventurers, Canning and Huskisson; we may add Burke and the younger Pitt. Why, the "political adventurers" are precisely those whose eminence lends an adventitious lustre to the old rotten system.

These are the views advocated by Bentham. Each is a whole, defensible in itself. All are parts of solid structure, mutually lending and giving strength. The age may not be ripe for them; it may be that men must yet blunder on for a while, picking here, tapping there—discerning by painful experience that they are going wrong, and groping for the right road. In this period of confusion and blundering, he who has patience, by following out a train of systematic argument, to adopt comprehensive and rational views, will be best off. He will have before him an ultimate object, towards which all his labours tend; he will have means for working out that end. He will see clearly when others turn aside into devious ways; and, seeing that there is "no thoroughfare," he will be able to wait with patience until they return at his call, or of their own accord. While others are busying themselves fretfully, and to little purpose, he will be at his ease; knowing what ought to come, and what must come. He will know when he can be useful, by lending a helping hand; and when he can be useful, if men will not listen to him, by sitting quietly by until they work out experimentally the demonstration of their error. He will never refuse to make a point, because he cannot sweep the board at once; he will never, in childish triumph over any partial advantage, lose sight of the great end towards which it is a step in advance. Above all, even at the risk of being called "dogmatical," he will lose no opportunity of avowing and enforcing his opinions. The worst taint of existing society is an all-pervading system of conventional falsehood. Men neither dare to speak their own sentiments, nor to hear those of others. "God-sake! what will people say?—think of the consequences of using such language!" Why, what harm can a word do? If true, it must benefit—if false, then whistle it down the wind. If Bentham had done nothing else than in his works advocated, and by his example inculcated invariable and unrestricted sincerity in word and deed, he would have done infinite service. But he has done this and more.

We have preferred selecting and dwelling upon one chapter of Bentham's system, which seemed applicable to immediate exigencies, to giving a long, dry catalogue of his works and writings. Our object has been this:—Look at the country—you see suffering and jealousy at work to drive the masses mad. Look at their demands—look at the recommendations of public men—how rarely do you hear a sensible word spoken in season? Turn to Bentham's recipe for the construction of a representative body, and you have at once an instrument of amelioration put into your hands. You are provided with a body to legislate; you are furnished with securities for the industry, honesty, and ability of its members; you are furnished with securities that their labours shall tend to promote the happiness of all. The note of preparation is already heard throughout the land; the day of battle cannot be far off. To use, with a slight adaptation, the words of Steele—words more worthy of this occasion than of the trivial one on which he uttered them—"The banner under which we are to enter this conflict, whenever we may be called to it, are the laws mentioned in this discourse. When we lose sight of them we have no standard to fly to, no discipline to preserve us, but are devoted, and have given ourselves up to slaughter and confusion. [The principles of Radical Reform] are the ark of God to Great Britain, which, like that of old, carries death to the profane hand that shall dare to touch it."

To revert to what furnished occasion for these remarks—the new issue of Bentham—we shall embrace the frequent opportunities afforded by its periodical appearance, to press upon the minds of our readers the results of his investigations in the matter of Church, Law, Financial, and other reforms. We shall furnish them, from time to time, with such résumés of his moral and logical disquisitions as may tempt a further study. Above all, we shall seek to disabuse the public mind of certain silly misapprehensions relative to alleged peculiarities of his style. His works are a manual for every man who would form just notions of government and its ends—furnish himself with principles to insure the honourable and useful discharge of his duties as a citizen. We do not say that men ought to adopt all opinions of Bentham—the great labour of Bentham's life was to put down the "fallacy of authority"—but, by a study of his writings, they ought to exercise themselves in fearless candour, close, logical reasoning, and the formation of accurate and comprehensive opinions.

Something we would have wished to say of the personal habits of Bentham. They form a tempting theme—the purity of his private pleasures, the incessant activity of his benevolence, the majesty of repose in all his thoughts, words, and actions. Even those peculiarities which have furnished matter of mockery to the unthinking, are valuable in our eyes, as expressions of the child-like sincerity and ingenuousness which breathed beneath the snowy locks of fourscore years, as in the blush of infancy. On the south side of St James's Park stands a modest, but elegant mansion, the simplicity and lightness of the appearance of which impresses pleasurably even the unheeding stranger. A small patch of smooth green lawn, with a few venerable trees in front, harmonizes with the house. The spirit of its venerated master seems still to breathe from every lineament of the mansion. The earthly abode of the purest benevolence ever incarnated in mere human form is hallowed by his memory. But our limits forbid us to diverge into the tempting field of his domestic character. Is not the task in the hands of Bowring?—of him whom we would term, with a feeling the very reverse of irreverend levity, the beloved disciple! The work will be accomplished ere long, and in a right spirit.

STANZAS,

WRITTEN ON THE TOWER OF RAI TH, NEAR THE SEAT OF ROBERT FERGUSON, ESQ.*

As a lone prisoner from his loophole feels
That earth, indeed, is beautiful and fair,
Rapt in ecstatic thought that o'er me steals,
I hear the skylark's joyance make the air
Melodious with the love that urged him there;
And gaze upon far ocean's mirrored sheen—
The lake—the shady plains that dim the glare
With clustering trees—and fields of richest green—
And, deep below, the shadows of the wild ravine.
Afar, where hills seem crouching in their lair,
The new Athena's classic towers aspire,
Dim, 'mid the noontide's sultry gossamer,
And vapours as from a volcano's fire.
She seems, in lonely splendour, to admire
The silent ocean, slumbering at her feet—
But, oh, what joys, what griefs, and toils, inspire
The thousands now that wander on her street!
How many longing for the country's calm retreat!
Our spirits there, piercing their primal goal
With burning ken, unto their fountain soar,
The quickener of the universe—the soul
That wakes the beauty panting in the core
Of boundless nature, till it radiate o'er
The heart in love and rapture; and the face
Of Earth seems as with us it would adore
The spirit that had clothed her in such grace,
Breathing from all her pores intensest happiness.

* The extensive and romantic grounds of this gentleman are thrown open to the public.

Lo! where the horizon cleaves the depths of blue,
In wavy lines of mountain peaks sublime,
Peaks where the Roman eagles never flew,
But Freedom hovered from remotest time!
Sons of the mist! dark as when tempests climb
Your summits, where the wild bird screameth shrill,
When lowering Vengeance lurketh for her time;
But, oh! when kindness prompts the ready will,
Mild as the last ray of sunset flashing on the hill!
In fancy oft I wander in the glen,
'Neath pine-clad rocks, and precipices hoar,
And soothing cascades—poetry's wild domain,
Breathing romantic of the days of yore.
I view the lake whose ripple's gentle roar
Smote on the soul of Scotland's fairest Queen;
Again sad Mary flies Lochleven's shore—
I see the love that breathes on Douglas' mein,
And the pale moon that pours her beauty o'er the scene.
The smile of sunset on the verdant plain,
Is solemnized amid the stillness here:
Oh! could the heart its ecstasy retain,
And pour its freshness on the coming year!
But, as the Autumn, with her yellow bier,
Comes up, with Winter lowering from afar,
So will great Mammon scorch the starting tear.
With thoughts of nature thus, and want, and war,
I slowly left the tower, much wondering why we are.

THE NEW NOVELS.

NO. II.—ERNEST MALTRAVERS, &c. &c.

HAVING last month taken first in order the new novel which the most forcibly appealed to our feelings, we pass transiently to that which has most touched and elevated our organ of surprise—Mrs Trollope's "fearless" exposure—we borrow part of our definition from Lord Byron's account of Lady Morgan's characteristics—of cant, and of the vile hypocrisy of the black sheep among the best order of Churchmen. Yes! Churchmen; for Mrs Trollope has had the magnanimity to seek her examples of the weakness of devotees, and the utter villany and sordid baseness of the sanctimonious ruffian who converts his sacred vocation and character into the instrument of his wickedness—not from the Meeting-house, but from the Church. She has acted courageously, if not wisely. A Dissenter, in her suspicious hands, would not have answered any earnest or honest purpose of instruction. For such purpose, we conclude, her novel was intended; for no one, surely, could seek either pleasure or entertainment in those repulsive, bitter, and satirical delineations of the "unco guid."

Mr Bulwer has also given us a picture of one of those "rigidly righteous," in a pious banker; but it is far more exquisite in discrimination and finish than the outrageous caricature of Mrs Trollope. The banker is, indeed, portraiture well worthy of Crabbe, in depth, breadth, and precision, and without Crabbe's hardness of outline. Mr Bulwer's novel is a fragment, or rather a Part First. How it is to be filled up and finished, will be a Christmas enigma to many a circle, and probably to the author among other individuals. It is impossible to foresee what he is evidently at a loss about himself; for Mr Bulwer's book-moralities are far from being immutable principles. He can tamper and sport with a few of the more glaring English conventionalities; but to shew us a hero who is by birth and education a gentleman, marrying a poor though very charming girl, whom he has seduced, and with whom he is what is called in love, is a flight, we fear, beyond his daring. He may laugh or sneer at the great world's hypocrisies, but he dare scarce offend its taste. While still in the dark, we conjecture that the moral regeneration of Mr Ernest Maltravers, like that of the reformed ruffian Anastasius, is to be the work of his awakening paternal affections. But Ernest is not a ruffian. He is, on the contrary, a young man of healthy feelings and generous dispositions; possessed of fine original genius, accomplished by education; a second son, but enjoying an independent fortune; handsome and ingratiating; and, finally, just as much of a Tom Jones as the ladies will now tolerate. In the last century, Ernest would have been "a very devil among the women;" but, in the march of refinement, instead of being the roué or fine gentleman of Farquhar's or Congreve's plays, he is the irresistible hero of Mr Bulwer's and the younger D'Israeli's novels—the fortunate youth before whose fine genius, fine person, and beaux yeux, every woman bends, a proud and willing slave, provided she possess any quality that can aggrandize his universal empire over female hearts, and add a grace to his triumph. The principle of chivalry in all that relates to the sex, is turned quite topsyturvy in the modern love romances, and in the poetry of the Byron school, from which they arose; but it is only vainglorious masculine pens which have contributed directly to the portentous revolution. Female writers have not yet taken the all-devoted dark pages, and the new race of crouching, clinging, spaniel-like, madly-enamoured damsels, under their patronage; though we fear these heroines already excite not a little tender sympathy in female bosoms. The first of this species of heroine may perhaps be found in "The Bravo's Bride" of Matthew Lewis; and Byron has not the merit, such as it may be, of the original invention. The character has since been presented in fifty melo-dramas and vulgar romances, as eminently that of—WOMAN. With more delicate lineaments, and more decently draped, it now figures in the most popular French and English novels—in "The Danseuse" of D'Israeli, in the Esmeralda of Victor Hugo, and now in Bulwer's—But no. We shall leave his fair readers to be the judges in this. Of one thing, they are certain—Milton and these old-fashioned folks might be starched, but Shakspeare knew something of love, and of the true nature and character of women; and so, we think, did Scott. They have produced heroines of all ranks and degrees, and in every situation, as lovers; from the high-souled Rebecca down to little Mysie Happer, the miller's daughter; from her "who never told her love," to the passionately-enamoured Juliet; but all true to their nature—to the instinctive dignity and modesty of their sex—to the dearest interests of society, inseparably knit up with the developement of their affections. And if, while we revere these great writers for their wise elevation of female character—for upholding a noble and bracing morality—we may tacitly condemn those who slide into the opposite insidious course, with themselves be the blame! Juliet, when it was at the very worst with her, could still firmly say—

"If that thy bent of love be honourable, Thy purpose marriage, send me word withal."

And if the gentle Romeo had sentimentally whispered that, loving and worshipping her, his purpose was no such thing, we may fairly presume that his mistress had sufficient spirit and self-respect to have either boxed his ears, or made her servants turn him down stairs; and have given her misplaced love to the winds, though her loving heart had broken in the effort.

The case of Mysie Happer is still more in point at present; but the reader must remember it, and also the honourable character of the coxcomb lady-killer who had gained her light heart. But it may be said that the female creations of Hugo, and D'Israeli, and Bulwer are truer to nature than those more tightly-laced damsels. We think they are not: but, if it should be so, is it not the first duty, the noblest privilege, of genius, of poetry, of invention, of all that is best in literature and art, to raise and purify society, to widen the sphere of our sympathies with the pure and lofty, as well as with the tender and beautiful; to plant high and firmly the standard of virtue, whatever of toil, and pain, and self-denial, is to be encountered in pressing upward and onward towards the mark? Mr Bulwer frequently assures his readers that the character of by far the most interesting and original of his heroines, Alice Darvil, is taken from nature. Nor do we doubt it; but it is nature seen through his spectacles, and delineated by the graces and artifices of his pen. The seduction of Alice will be the most attractive part of the work to young hearts; and, for that reason, it is the most insidious—if we may not say, the most pernicious. In real life, the contact of a character like Alice, with such individuals as her patroness, the benevolent Mrs Leslie, and the self-sufficient banker, may often be replete with whatever is tender, humanizing, and instructive; but the character of Alice, sketched in an engaging romance, comes to the young fraught with unimaginable mischief. Its extreme beauty and tenderness constitute its danger.

But we must make ourselves intelligible. Alice Darvil is an English Haidee—the spotless, innocent Miranda of a moral wilderness—a beautiful soul asleep for fifteen years, whose dormant faculties and affections are in an instant touched, awakened, and rapidly developed by the spell of love. The wielder of the talisman is, of course, Ernest Maltravers. At the age of eighteen, in consequence of some frolic or political scrape, this youth abruptly quits the University of Göttingen, and, unknown to his family, returns to England. He is benighted, in a dark wintry night, on a wide desolate common, in some dreary manufacturing district of the county adjoining the shire in which his Norman ancestors had flourished, and where his father, at all points an old English gentleman, still dwelt. He finds refuge in a lonely, miserable cottage, of which the sole inmates are Luke Darvil—a ruffian, long hardened in the worst of crimes, and whose physiognomy the brand of the hangman could not have stamped more plainly with the characters of brutality and villany—and his beautiful daughter, Alice, whose guardian and companion this man had been all her life long, as her mother died while Alice was an infant. Luke had been counting the coins, the gains of crime, remaining to him; and, finding them so few, he cried—

“I had two pounds in the drawer but Monday, and now—Alice, you must have stolen some of the money—curse you!”

The person thus addressed sat at the opposite side of the smouldering and sullen fire: she now looked quietly up, and her face singularly contrasted that of the man.

She seemed about fifteen years of age, and her complexion was remarkably pure and delicate, even despite the sunburnt tinge which her habits of toil had brought it. Her auburn hair hung in loose and natural curls over her forehead, and its luxuriance was remarkable even in one so young. Her countenance was beautiful, nay, even faultless, in its small and childlike features, but the expression pained you—it was so vacant. In repose it was almost the expression of an idiot—but when she spoke, or smiled, or even moved a muscle, the eyes, colour, lips, kindled into a life which proved that the intellect was still there, though but imperfectly awakened.

“I did not steal any, father,” she said, in a quiet voice; “but I should like to have taken some, only I knew you would beat me if I did.”

“And what do you want money for?”

The girl paused—“Why don't you let me,” she said, after awhile, “why don't you let me go and work with the other girls at the factory? I should make money there for you and me both.”

The man smiled—such a smile!—it seemed to bring into sudden play all the revolting characteristics of his countenance. “Child,” he said, “you are just fifteen, and a sad fool you are: perhaps, if you went to the factory, you would get away from me: and what should I do without you? No; I think, as you are so pretty, you might get more money another way.”

The girl did not seem to understand this allusion; but repeated, vacantly, “I should like to go to the factory.”

“Stuff!” said the man, angrily; “I have three minds to—”

Here he was interrupted by a loud knock at the door of the hovel.

It was Ernest that knocked.—Such was the rank soil from which this fair flower had sprung: such “the moral training” of Alice Darvil. The plan of the father to murder and rob the young man who sought the hospitality of his hearth until day dawned, is frustrated by the presence of mind and kindness of Alice; whose understanding kindles in an hour under the influence of a new affection. The situation is one of interest. Maltravers, by the good offices of the girl, escapes from the den of murder, and, after wandering all night on the moor, at dawn finds himself near a market town, unharmed; and breathes deep gratitude to Heaven for all its mercies of the night. And now comes a leading passage—

He passed a slow waggon—he passed a group of mechanics—he passed a drove of sheep, and now he saw walking leisurely before him a single figure. It was a girl in a worn and humble dress; who seemed to seek her weary way with pain and languor. He was about also to pass her, when he heard a low cry. He turned, and beheld in the wayfarer his preserver of the previous night.

“Heavens! is it indeed you? can I believe my eyes?”

“I was coming to seek you, sir,” said the girl, faintly.

“I too have escaped; I shall never go back to father—I have no roof to cover my head now.”

“Poor child! but how is this? Did they ill-use you for releasing me?”

“Father knocked me down, and beat me again when he came back; but that is not all,” she added, in a very low tone.

“What else?”

The girl grew red and white by turns. She set her teeth rigidly, stopped short, and then, walking on quicker than before, replied—“It don't matter; I will never go back—I'm alone now. What, what shall I do?” and she wrung her hands.

The traveller's pity was deeply moved. “My good girl," said he, earnestly, "you have saved my life, and I am not ungrateful. Here," (and he placed some gold in her hand,) "get yourself a lodging, food, and rest; you look as if you wanted them; and see me again this evening when it is dark, and we can talk unobserved."

The girl took the money passively, and looked up in his face while he spoke; the look was so unsuspecting, and the whole countenance was so beautifully modest and virgin-like, that, had any evil passion prompted the traveller's last words, it must have fled scared and abashed as he met the gaze.

"My poor girl," said he, embarrassed, and after a short pause—"you are very young, and very, very pretty. In this town you will be exposed to many temptations; take care where you lodge. You have, no doubt, friends here?"

"Friends—what are friends?" answered Alice.

"Have you no relations?—no mother's kin?"

"None."

"Do you know where to ask shelter?"

"No, sir; for I can't go where father goes, lest he should find me out."

"Well, then, seek some quiet inn, and meet me this evening, just here, half-a-mile from the town, at seven. I will try and think of something for you in the meanwhile; but you seem tired, you walk with pain; perhaps it will fatigue you to come—I mean, you had rather, perhaps, rest another day."

"Oh! no, no! it will do me good to see you again, sir."

The young man's eyes met hers, and hers were not withdrawn; their soft blue was suffused with tears—they penetrated his soul.

Alice kept true tryst.

She came up to him timidly and gently. His heart beat more quickly; he felt that he was young, and alone with beauty. "Sweet girl," he said, with involuntary and mechanical compliment, "how well this light becomes you! How shall I thank you for not forgetting me?"—Alice surrendered her hand to his without a struggle—"What is your name?" said he, bending his face down to hers,—"Alice Darvil."—"And your terrible father, is he, in truth, your father?"—"Indeed he is father and mother too!"—"What made you suspect his intention to murder me? Has he ever attempted the like crime?"—"No; but lately he has often talked of robbery. He is very poor, sir. And, when I saw his eye, and when afterwards, while your back was turned, he took the key from the door, I felt that—that you were in danger."—"Good girl—go on."

The story is prolonged. It unfolds ignorance and innocence, stupidity and intelligence, which we take leave to think quite incompatible, incredible, and out of nature, in a girl brought up by a profligate father, near the factories, and somehow endowed with a mysterious "intuitive notion of right and wrong." She had no idea of religion, or the being of a God. When asked, if she had never thought of who made the stars and the earth, she answered, "Why should I? What has that to do with being cold and hungry?" So acute a logician, living in sight of churches, ought to have been a better theologian. Alice, further questioned, knew nothing of church or school. "Good Heaven!" exclaimed the young philosopher, "what shall I do with this unhappy child?"

"Yes, sir, I am very unhappy," said Alice, catching at the last words; and the tears rolled silently down her cheeks.

Maltravers never was more touched in his life. Whatever thoughts of gallantry might have entered his young head, had he found Alice such as he might reasonably have expected, he now felt there was a kind of necessity in her ignorance; and his gratitude and kindly sentiment towards her took almost a brotherly aspect.

And being a wild, enthusiastic, odd being, this Ernest Maltravers, as the girl, in her artless innocence, protested against going to school, he inquired what could make her comfortable in her own way. She replies, "I should like to live with you, sir." But it was honest service the poor girl meant; for she had always wished, she said, to go to service, and she was sure Maltravers would be a kind master. He was half disenchanted by this tame explanation; but the Miranda of the black moor and the burglar father, fascinated him again.

"No very flattering preference," thought he: "so much the safer for us. Well, Alice, it shall be as you wish. Are you comfortable where you are, in your new lodging?"

"No."

"Why? they do not insult you."

"No; but they make a noise, and I like to be quiet, to think of you."

The young philosopher was reconciled again to his scheme.

"Well, Alice—go back—I will take a cottage to-morrow, and you shall be my servant, and I will teach you to read and write, and say your prayers, and know that you have a Father above, who loves you better than he below. Meet me again at the same hour to-morrow. Why do you cry, Alice? why do you cry?"

"Because—because," sobbed the girl, "I am so happy, and I shall live with you and see you."

"Go, child—go, child," said Maltravers, hastily—and he walked away with a quicker pulse than became his new character of master and preceptor.

This hopeful scheme was put into immediate execution, and we have charmingly pictured, not the cave and island haunts of Juan and Haidee, but an English thatched cottage, embowered in jasmine and roses, with its small lawn, verandas, and conservatory; a virtuous young philosopher, assuming the name of Butler, and not yet far gone in love; and Alice, a nominal servant, learning to read and write from an old Mr Simcox, her patron having tired of the drudgery of teaching these elements. And now her pretty little hands and complexion are becoming more delicate; her hair and her dress are better arranged, and her manners and personal charms improving every day. We leave to Mr Bulwer, the description of his own Maltravers, given immediately after he had left the tuition of his protégée, of which he had tired, to

The very oldest and ugliest writing-master that the neighbouring town could afford. It is astonishing what care Maltravers took of her morals. The poor girl at first wept much at the exchange; but the grave remonstrances and solemn exhortations of Maltravers reconciled her at last, and she promised to work hard and pay every attention to her lessons. I am not sure, however, that it was the tedium of the work that deterred the idealist—perhaps he felt its danger—and at the bottom of his sparkling dreams and brilliant follies, lay a sound, generous, and noble heart. He was fond of pleasure, and had been already the darling of the sentimental German ladies. But he was too young, and too vivid, and too romantic to be that which is called a sensualist. He could not look upon a fair face, and a guileless smile, and all the ineffable symmetry of a woman's shape, with the eye of a man buying cattle for base uses. . . . He very easily fell in love, or fancied he did, it is true—but then he could not separate desire from fancy, or calculate the game of passion without bringing the heart or the imagination into the matter. And, though Alice was very pretty and very engaging, he was not yet in love with her, and he had no intention of becoming so.

The evenings hung long with the young poet, although Shakspeare and Schiller lay on his table, and his inseparable meerschaum enlivened his solitude. He read and smoked until he was inspired, and then he wrote poetry adapted to music; and next he would try the melody of his yrics with his voice—

For he had all the passion of a German for song and music—that wild Maltravers!—and his voice was sweet, his taste consummate, his science profound. As the sun puts out a star, so the full blaze of his imagination, fairly kindled, extinguished for the time his fairy fancy for his beautiful pupil.

It was late that night when Maltravers went to bed—and, as he passed through the narrow corridor that led to his chamber, he heard a light step flying before him, and caught the glimpse of a female figure escaping through a distant door.—“The silly child!” thought he, at once divining the cause—“she has been listening to my singing. I shall scold her.” But he forgot that resolution.

Much beautiful writing leads to the catastrophe of the most objectionable portion of these volumes. The young patron discovers that his pupil has a fine ear and a beautiful voice. He sagely reflects that this natural talent may be the means of enabling her to earn an honest subsistence; and accordingly he becomes her master in music.

And now every evening, when the windows were closed, and the hearth burnt clear, while the winds stormed, and the rain beat without, a lithe and lovely shape hovered about the student's chamber; and his wild songs were sung by a voice which nature had made even sweeter than his own.

Alice's talent for music was indeed surprising; enthusiastic and quick as he himself was in all he undertook, Maltravers was amazed at her rapid progress. He soon taught her to play by ear; and Maltravers could not but notice that her hand, always delicate in shape, had lost the rude colour and roughness of labour. He thought of that pretty hand more often than he ought to have done, and guided it over the keys when it could have found its way very well without him.

In the course of his musical and vocal lessons, Maltravers gently took the occasion to correct poor Alice's frequent offences against grammar and accent; and her memory was prodigiously quick and retentive. The very tones of her voice seemed altered in the ear of Maltravers; and, somehow or other, the time came when he was no longer sensible of the difference in their rank.

The old woman-servant, when she had seen how it would be from the first, and taken a pride in her own prophecy, as she ordered Alice's new dresses, was a much better philosopher than Maltravers.

And so we leave the old woman-servant's sagacity to explain the story, which is, however, given rather circumstantially, leaving just as much in the dark as may stimulate imagination, and suffering results only to be alluringly perceptible. “Maltravers was only eighteen,” and

Alice knew no remorse, though she felt agitated and ashamed; she did not comprehend that she had lost caste for ever in the eyes of her sex. In fact, she never thought of herself. Her whole soul was with him; she gave him back in love the spirit she had caught from him in knowledge... And they strolled together through the garden all that day, and Maltravers grew reconciled to himself. He had done wrong, it is true; but then perhaps Alice had already suffered as much as she could in the world's opinion, by living with him alone, though innocent, so long. And now she had an everlasting claim to his protection—she should never know shame or want. And the love that had led to the wrong, should, by fidelity and devotion, take from it the character of sin.

“Natural and commonplace sophistries!” L'homme se pique!” as old Montaigne said, man is his own sharper! The conscience is the most elastic material in the world. To-day you cannot stretch it over a mole-hill, to-morrow it hides a mountain.

O how happy they were now—that young pair! How the days flew like dreams! No doubt we blame them, and women very properly; but men, at least, cannot blame them very justly. For all of us male animals have either been as happy once in our lives, or wished we were so. Time went on, winter passed away, and the early spring, with its flowers and sunshine, was like a mirror to their own youth. Alice never accompanied Maltravers in his walks abroad, partly because she feared to meet her father, and partly because Maltravers himself was fastidiously averse to all publicity. But then they had all that little world of three acres.

The reader may guess all the rest. Alice should never know shame, though soon overwhelmed with shame; nor want, when on the verge of poverty and misery. Her poverty is, however, we presume, not to be regarded as the fault of her lover. It came by accident, from which his wife and legitimate child could never have suffered, but to which his mistress was unavoidably exposed, in spite of the often-vowed everlasting protection of that honourable Maltravers. Far be it from us to condemn him, or yet his example. That the second son of a family of old gentry, scions of “Norman knight-hood,” should degrade the entire caste, by alliance with an Alice Darvil, is out of all rule, either in the world of fashion, or that faithful image of itself which it has moulded in novels. We offer no objection. But, oh! thou much calumniated Mr Thomas Inkle of London! when we think of thee, in the true genius of thy mercantile craft, merely selling thy sable love for a handful of dollars or a puncheon of rum, even-handed justice compels us honourably to acquit thee. You sold your fond and trusting Yarico to exile and slave-labour—to sorrow and suffering; but hers was still a high and an enviable lot, when compared with that of the seduced and abandoned mistress of an English gentleman, and the life-long degradation of her branded offspring. On the whole, we would have womankind, although “male-animals” have no right to condemn, pause before they give their suffrage to these parts of Mr Bulwer's best novel. Yet, “If a jury of cherubim had tried Alice's offence, they would hardly have allowed the heart to bear witness against the soul!”

We scarce venture to dissent from the verdict of so pure a tribunal, but demur to the case being tried save by Alice's peers.

The Elysian dream continues for a while; and the home of love wants only honour, integrity, justice, and security, to render it a terrestrial paradise. Alice—an admirable lover—already prattles the metaphysics of the passion charmingly “to her entranced and silent lover.” But a sudden change comes; and Maltravers, on learning accidentally from his weekly newspaper that his father is dying, hurries away, devoured by remorse. And before Alice

Were the flowers, and the star-lit lawn, and the playful fountain, and the bench where they had sat in such heartfelt and serene delight. He was gone; and often—oh, how often!—did Alice remember that his last words had been uttered in estranged tones—that his last embrace had been without love.

Old Maltravers dies. The father of Alice, and one of his wicked accomplices, meanwhile, commit a burglary at the cottage, unconscious of who are the inmates; and the accomplice being recognised by Alice, who, in her alarm, exclaims his name, she is carried off in a state of insensibility in a cart along with the other plunder. Maltravers finds her flown, and is in despair. He had written to her; and, recollecting that he had left her no money, he sent some; but he did not ask her to write him—"he felt such a repugnance to disclose his real name, and receive the letters of clandestine love in the house in which his father lay dying." He was full of honour and sentiment, and also a nice casuist, that young Maltravers; and poor Alice—

She thought it singular he did not wish to hear from her; but Alice was humble. What could she say worth troubling him with, and at such an hour? But how kind in him to write! how precious those letters! and yet they disappointed her, and cost her floods of tears: they were so short—so full of sorrow—there was so little of love in them; and "dear," or even "dearest Alice," that, uttered by the voice, was so tender, looked cold upon the lifeless paper. If she but knew the exact spot where he was, it would be some comfort; but she only knew that he was away, and in grief.

She was now away herself, and Maltravers' time for sorrow was come. He made every effort to trace her; and gives the first proof of true and manly generosity which we discover in him, in indignantly refusing to credit that Alice had played booty with the thieves, and carried off his spoons and forks.

We are now introduced to Mr Cleveland, the guardian of our youth, a polished old English gentleman and classic scholar; mediocre in genius, but with good talents and highly-cultivated tastes; fond of dabbling in literature; foni, too, of the fine arts; and exceedingly indulgent and amiable. His classic villa, his picture-gallery and library, are all very fine and unimpeachable. He is, moreover, quite the friend our youth requires, as he has sunk into a state of morbid melancholy upon the death of his father, and the loss of his mistress—of Alice, "the watchful, the humble, the loving, lost Alice." He wanted an object in life, and was near becoming a fanatic, and almost mad, when Lumley Ferrers crosses his path—a character admirably commenced, and for a time well-sustained, although he descends at last into the vulgar lingo of hackneyed romance. Mr Bulwer states that many of his characters are taken from real life. Ferrers, in his general outline, must be one of those realities drawn from the Well of Truth.

Lumley Ferrers, his age about twenty-six—his fortune about eight hundred a-year—he followed no profession. Lumley Ferrers had not what is usually called genius; that is, he had no enthusiasm; and, if the word talent be properly interpreted as meaning the talent of doing something better than others, Ferrers had not much to boast of on that score. He had no talent for writing, nor for public speaking, nor for music nor painting, nor the ordinary round of accomplishments; neither at present had he displayed much of the hard and useful talent for action and business. But Ferrers had what is often better than either genius or talent: he had a powerful and most acute mind. He had, moreover, great animation of manner, high physical spirits, a witty, odd, racy vein of conversation, determined assurance, and profound confidence in his own resources. He was fond of schemes, stratagems, and plots—they amused and excited him—his power of sarcasm and of argument, too, was great, and he usually obtained an astonishing influence over those with whom he was brought in contact. His high spirits and a most happy frankness of bearing carried off and disguised his leading vices of character, which were an extraordinary callousness of affection, and an insensibility to moral principles. Though less learned than Maltravers, he was on the whole a very instructed man. He mastered the surface of many sciences, became satisfied of their general principles, and threw the study aside, never to be forgotten, (for his memory was like a vice,) but never to be prosecuted any farther. To this he added a general acquaintance with whatever is most generally acknowledged as standard in extant or modern literature. What is admired only by a few, Lumley never took the trouble to read. Living amongst trifles, he made them interesting and novel by his mode of viewing and treating them. And here indeed was a talent—it was the talent of social life—the talent of enjoyment to the utmost, with the least degree of trouble to himself. Lumley Ferrers was thus exactly one of those men whom everybody calls exceedingly clever, and yet it would puzzle one to say in what he was so clever.

It only remains to be said of this singular young man, whose character as yet was but half developed, that he had seen a great deal of the world, and could live at ease and in content with all tempers and ranks; fox-hunters or scholars, lawyers or poets, patricians or parvenus, it was all one to Lumley Ferrers.

As we have little taste for Ferrers, after he becomes the regular villain of the piece, we shall now take him up again, five or six years afterwards, when he had returned from travelling in Greece, Turkey, and Italy, along with Maltravers—of whom and his fortune he made ample use, while waiting the opportunity of turning him and the rest of the world, to still better account:—

Lumley Ferrers was one of the few men in the world who act upon a profound, deliberate, and organized system—he had done so even from a boy. When he was twenty-one, he had said to himself, "Youth is the season for enjoyment: the triumphs of manhood, the wealth of age, do not compensate for a youth wasted in unpleasurable toils." Agreeably to this maxim, he had resolved not to adopt any profession; and, being fond of travel, and of a restless temper, he had indulged abroad in all the gratifications that his moderate income could afford him: that income went farther on the Continent than at home, which was another reason for the prolongation of his travels.

Looking round the English world, Ferrers saw that, at his age, and with an equivocal position and no chances to throw away, it was necessary that he should cast off all attributes of the character of the wanderer and the garçon.

"There is nothing respectable in lodgings and a cab," said Ferrers to himself—(that "self" was his grand confidant!) "nothing stationary. Such are the appliances of a here-to-day-gone-to-morrow kind of life. One never looks substantial till one pays rates and taxes, and has a bill with one's butcher!"

Accordingly, without saying a word to anybody, Ferrers took a long lease of a large house, in one of those quiet streets that proclaim the owners do not wish to be made by fashionable situations—streets in which, if you have a large house, it is supposed to be because you can afford one. He was very particular in its being a respectable street—Great George Street, Westminster, was the one he selected.

No frippery or baubles, common to the mansions of young bachelors—no buhl, and marquetry, and Sevres china, and cabinet pictures, distinguished the large dingy drawing-rooms of Lumley Ferrers. He bought all the old furniture a bargain of the late tenant—ten-coloured chintz curtains, and chairs and sofas that were venerable and solemn with the accumulated dust of twenty-five years. The only things about which he was particular, were a very long dining-table that would hold forty, and a new mahogany side-board. Somebody asked him why he cared about such articles. "I don't know," said he; "but I observe all respectable family men do—there must be something in it—I shall discover the secret by-and-by. In this house did Mr Ferrers ensconce himself, with two middle-aged maid-servants, and a man out of livery, whom he chose from a multitude of candidates, because the man looked especially well-fed.

And here Ferrers gave a great many dinners—not fine, foolish dinners: he knew better. He made people that were likely to be useful to him, feel free and easy over his "respectable fare," his cod-head and shoulders, "with plenty of flour in the oyster sauce;" and, because they felt easy, they came again; and by degrees—

The large dingy drawing-rooms became a frequent resort for public men to talk over those thousand underplots by which a party is served or attacked. Thus, though not in Parliament himself, Ferrers became insensibly associated with parliamentary men and things; and the ministerial party, whose politics he espoused, praised him highly, made use of him, and meant, some day or other, to do something for him.

This is clever portraiture, though that of the banker, of whom we have spoken above, is better by many degrees. We shall see him in his connexion with Alice. Poor Alice!—she had been carried as far as Cork by her miscreant father, where she escapes from him and the horrible bondage to which he would have subjected her, and lives on, we know not how, until we find her back in England, and, with her child, repulsed from the garden-gate of "the dear cottage," now enlarged, and occupied by a Mr Hobbs and his progeny.

The second stage of Alice's trial is more pathetic than the beginning, and not liable to the same grave objections. She could find no trace of Maltravers, who had been long on the Continent; and now—

Alice felt that she was on the wide world alone, with her child—no longer to be protected, but to protect; and, after the first few days of agony, a new spirit, not indeed of hope, but of endurance, passed within her. Her solitary wanderings, with God her only guide, had tended greatly to elevate and confirm her character. She felt a strong reliance on His mysterious mercy—she felt, too, the responsibility of a mother. . . . Her humble manner, and sweet, well-tuned voice, so free from the professional whine of mendicancy, had usually its charm for the sternest. So she generally obtained enough to buy bread and a night's lodging; and if sometimes she failed—she could bear hunger, and was not afraid of creeping into some shed, or, when by the seashore, even into some sheltering cavern. Her child thrived too—for God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb!—But now, so far as physical privation went, the worst was over.

It so happened that, as Alice was drawing herself wearily along to the entrance of the village which was to bound her day's journey, she was met by a lady past middle age, in whose countenance compassion was so visible that Alice would not beg; for she had a strange delicacy or pride, or whatever it may be called, and rather begged of the stern than of those who looked kindly at her—she did not like to lower herself in the eyes of the last.

The lady stopped.

"My poor girl, where are you going?"

"Where God pleases, madam," said Alice.

"Humph. And is that your own child?—you are almost a child yourself!"

"It is mine, madam," said Alice, gazing fondly at the infant—"it is all I have."

The lady's voice faltered. "Are you married?" she asked.

"Married!—oh, no, madam!" replied Alice, innocently, yet without blushing, for she never knew that she had done wrong in loving Maltravers.

The lady drew gently back, but not in horror—no, in still deeper compassion.

Alice, simply and candidly, related all her story, and the lady's interest was fairly warmed in her behalf. The kind-hearted matron would make her musical talents subservient to her support; she would befriend her; there was less to forgive than she had anticipated—

Still she deemed it necessary to enlighten Alice as to the criminality of the connexion she had formed. But here Alice was singularly dull—she listened in meek patience to Mrs Leslie's lecture; but it evidently made but slight impression on her. She had not yet seen enough of the social state, to correct the first impressions of the natural; and all she could say in answer to Mrs Leslie, was—"It may be all very true, madam, but I have been so much better since I knew him!"

She would not hear one syllable insinuated against Maltravers; and Mrs Leslie was just enough, to love her the better for this true womanly delicacy and generosity. That lady was aware, however, that, unless Alice's misfortune was concealed, all her benevolent schemes would prove abortive, and sorely perplexed between the propriety of candour and its cruelty in the ruin of Alice's prospects. In this dilemma, and to have the case of conscience properly resolved, she determined

To confide her scruples to one who, of all whom she knew, possessed the highest character for moral worth and religious sanctity. This gentleman, lately a widower, lived at the outskirts of the town selected for Alice's future residence, and at that time happened to be on a visit in Mrs Leslie's neighbourhood. He was an opulent man, a banker; he had once represented the town in Parliament, and, retiring, from disinclination for the late hours and onerous fatigues even of an unreformed House of Commons, he still possessed an influence to return one, if not both the members for the city of C—. And that influence was always exerted so as best to secure his own interest with the powers that be, and advance certain objects of ambition, (for he was both an ostentatious and ambitious man in his own way,) which he felt he might more easily obtain by proxy than by his own votes and voice in Parliament—an atmosphere in which his light did not shine. And it was with a wonderful address that the banker contrived at once to support the Government, and yet, by the frequent expression of liberal opinions, to conciliate the Whigs and the Dissenters of his neighbourhood. Parties, political and sectarian, were not then so irreconcilable as they are now. In the whole county there was not a man so respected as this eminent person; and yet he possessed no shining talents, though a laborious and energetic man of business. It was solely and wholly the force of moral character which gave him his position in society. He felt this; he was sensitively proud of it; he was painfully anxious not to lose an atom of a distinction that required to be vigilantly secured. He was a very remarkable, yet not perhaps (could we penetrate all hearts) a very uncommon character—this banker! He had risen from, comparatively speaking, a low origin and humble fortunes, and entirely by the scrupulous and sedate propriety of his outward conduct. With such a propriety he, therefore, inseparably connected every notion of worldly prosperity and honour. Thus, though far from a bad man, he was forced into being something of a hypocrite. Every year he had grown more starch and more saintly. He was conscience-keeper to the whole town; and it is astonishing how many persons hardly dared to make a will or subscribe to a charity without his advice. As he was a shrewd man of this world, as well as an accredited guide to the next, his advice was precisely of a nature to reconcile the Conscience and the Interest; and he was a kind of negotiator in the reciprocal diplomacy of earth and heaven. But our banker was really a charitable man, and a benevolent man, and a sincere believer. How, then, was he a hypocrite? Simply, because he professed to be far more charitable, more benevolent, and more pious than he really was. His reputation had now arrived to that degree of immaculate polish that the smallest breath, which would not have tarnished the character of another man, would have fixed an indelible stain upon his.

From nature, this gentleman had received an inordinate share of animal propensities; he had strong passions, he was by temperament a sensualist. He loved good eating and good wine—he loved women. The two former blessings of the carnal life, are not incompatible with canonization; but St. Anthony has shewn that women, however angelic, are not precisely that order of angels that saints may safely commune with. If, therefore, he ever yielded to temptations of a sexual nature, it was with profound secrecy and caution; nor did his right-hand know what his left-hand did.

Does Mr Bulwer not perceive one indefeasible reason why the vices of excessive eating and drinking are not, and ought not, to be visited with the same severity, in the penal code of "the saints," as the third of his specified carnal indulgences? By drunkenness and gluttony a man vitiates and degrades his own nature—he sins against himself; but the luxurious viands and the generous wine which perish in the use, are not guilty participants, but the unscathed ministers to his sensual appetites. They have neither bodies to be polluted, nor souls to be saved or lost; while, in the third case supposed—but it is idle to pursue the illustration. "The saints" are emphatically in the right. So long, however, as women, whether wedded or kept, are in reality tacitly regarded, by many of their masters—rich or aristocratic—in much the same light as other purchaseable luxuries—as wines or horses, for example—this point of morals must remain obscure to the fashionable world, and to all who, with the recognition of woman's equality on their lips, make no distinction among the vices specified by our author, save, perhaps, to regard that which, he states, makes canonization impossible, as the least gross and heinous of the three.

This gentleman had married a woman much older than himself; but her fortune had been one of the necessary stepping-stones in his career. His exemplary conduct towards this lady, ugly as well as old, had done much towards increasing the odour of his sanctity. She died of an ague, and the widower did not shock probabilities by affecting too severe a grief.

"The Lord's will be done!" said he; "she was a good woman, but we should not set our affections too much upon His perishable creatures!"

This was all he was ever heard to say on the matter.

He took an elderly gentlewoman, distantly related to him, to manage his house, and sit at the head of the table; and it was thought not impossible, though the widower was past fifty, that he might marry again.

Alice is comfortably settled with her child in the town of C——, under the name of Mrs Butler, a young person, separated for the present from her husband; for the banker, though a man of severe truth, after conversing about the lovely Alice, discovers that there may be some few exceptions to the strict rule of veracity—

Some exceptions. The world is a bad world; we are born in sin, and the children of wrath. We do not tell infants all the truth, when they ask us questions, the proper answers of which would mislead, not enlighten, them. In some things the whole world are infants. The very science of government is the science of concealing truth—so is the system of trade. We could not blame the tradesman for not telling the public that, if all his debts were called in, he would be a bankrupt.

Is the following remark judicious? Does Mr Bulwer soberly denounce the necessity to which Maltravers and his fellow-sinners condemn society, its benevolent Mrs Leslies, and its relenting, though saintly bankers?

Now, as Alice Darvil, this young person would have been just as good, as pure, as modest—and yet more honest—but, as Alice Darvil, she would have died on a dunghill.

The banker observed her conduct with silent vigilance. He met her often. He visited her often. He was intimate at houses where she attended to teach or perform. He lent her good books—he advised her—he preached to her. Alice began to look up to him—to like him—to consider him as a village girl in Catholic countries may consider a benevolent and kindly priest. And he—what was his object?—at that time it is impossible to guess;—he became thoughtful and abstracted.

The banker soon afterwards released Alice from the persecution of her brutal father, who again discovered her retreat, and, after a powerfully-painted scene, in which the man of mixed virtue and great pretensions to holiness, is placed in bold contrast with the reckless, godless ruffian, Luke Darvil meets the reward of his crimes in a violent death; and, to the great contentment of the banker, is not recognised by any one, save himself, as the parent of pretty Mrs Butler.

While abroad, the all-conquering Maltravers, with whom, as we said, every woman falls in love, whose love is worth having, forms a sort of half-liaison with a beautiful married French-woman, upon whom Mr Bulwer takes great pains. That Madame de St Ventadour will interest the reader in the same degree, is very doubtful—perfect specimen, as she is, of her class. He talked to her of the classic life of old Greece and Rome, of a life more elegant than that of Paris; while, from the accomplished Valerie, he receives that last polish which only such a woman can give. Was he in love with her? He was on the fair way to it; and "he was not so good a man as when he left England." He had been dissipating his affections. He had no high aims, nor fixed pursuit—

He had lost much of his chivalrous veneration for women, whom he had begun to consider rather as play-things than idols; he found that they deceive us as often as we deceive them. He found, also, that their feelings are frequently less deep than they appear, and that they fall in love, and fall out of it, without breaking their hearts.

In his present intercourse with Madame de St Ventadour, he formed no plan. He was interested and excited; and Valerie's manners, which to-day flattered and to-morrow piqued him, enlisted his vanity and pride on the side of his fancy.

Madame is sage and high-spirited, though tender and sensible. She magnanimously proclaims her love, and dismisses her lover, who parts and flies. There is now a charming domestic episode. We have a perfect French gentleman, who realizes all our ideas of the honour, integrity, and good sense of the character, married to a sweet, little, virtuous Italian girl, whom he had taken from the opera, and with whom he lives in happiness, on the Lake of Como. Teresa, happily married, and in the midst of her children, luckily escapes the fate of all Maltravers' female acquaintances; and the reader lingers with delight in the midst of this charming group; and in a wholesome atmosphere, where the manly intellect of De Montaigne braces the virtues of the friend for whom he foretells the highest destinies.

Maltravers, an enthusiastic scholar, and a man of high genius, was already an author. In his literary revelations, and the progress of his mental development, the reader who imagines that he reads the real Confessions of Mr Bulwer, will probably not be very far wrong, however far the same thing may hold of certain incidents, which are also said to be true history, though he disclaims the imputation. But those matters, with all that is essay or criticism, we prudently leave to the reader.

His affectionate late guardian wishes Maltravers to return, to go into Parliament, and to settle in life, and summons him to England. Soon after he returns home, an accident throws him again in the way of the elegant, the witty, the wise Madame de St. Ventadour. It is all over with this poor lady now.

Ernest was no longer in love with her—he had outgrown that youthful fancy. She had exercised an influence over him—the new influences that he had created had chased away her image. Such is life. Long absences extinguish all the false lights, though not the true ones. The lamps are dead in the banquet-room of yesterday; but a thousand years hence and the stars we look on to-night will burn as brightly. Maltravers was no longer in love with Valerie—Ah! perhaps hers had been true love!

The travelling party, of which Valerie made one, were one day driven by a storm into an old country inn.

Bells rang—dogs barked—hostlers ran. A plain, dark, travelling post-chariot was before the inn-door; and, roused perhaps by the noise below, a lady in the "first floor front, No. 2," came to the window. This lady owned the travelling-carriage, and was at this time alone in that apartment. As she looked carelessly at the party, her eyes rested on one form—she turned pale, uttered a faint cry, and fell senseless on the floor.

While Maltravers is ministering to the comfort of Valerie,

The lady who occupied the adjoining chamber, had recovered slowly from her swoon. She put both hands to her temples, as if trying to recollect her thoughts. Hers was a fair, innocent, almost childish face; and now, as a smile shot across it, there was something so sweet and touching in the gladness it shed over that countenance, that you could not have seen it without strong and almost painful interest. It was the gladness of a person who has known sorrow! Suddenly she started up, and said—"No—then! I do not dream. He is come back—he is here—all will be well again! Ha! it is his voice. Oh, bless him, it is his voice!" She paused, her finger on her lip, her face bent down. A low and indistinct sound of voices reached her straining ear through the thin door that divided her from Maltravers. She listened intently, but she could not overhear the import. Her heart beat violently. "He is not alone!" she murmured mournfully. "I will wait till the sound ceases, and then I will venture in!"

It is impossible, we presume, for novellists to dispense with the machinery of extraordinary meetings, surprises, accidents, and cross-purposes, since even the best of them require such helps. The conversation between Valerie and the man who had outlived "his fancy" for her, had brought the gallant and merciful Ernest, in the burst of her bitter feelings, to the necessity of attempting to soothe her; so he fell on his knee by her side, "pressing on her hand kisses as pure as ever cavalier impressed on the hand of his queen," when, as the deuce would have it, and as it always happens in novels, and nowhere else, in glided "a fair form—a form fairer and younger" than that of the French lady—and poor Alice saw him, herself unseen! "He did not look up: and Alice Darvil turned away—and her fate for life was fixed."

This gives us had hopes for the coming volumes, if ever the romance shall be finished, which we consider not very probable. And now, with the eloquent farewell letter of the accomplished Valerie, is tied up a lock of Alice's hair; and Ernest goes forth into the world, to gather more trophies among the fair and young, the noble and gifted; and, in particular, to engage the secret admiration of the high-born, brilliant, beautiful, wealthy, and proud Lady Florence Lascelles who, adoring him in secret, and with a noble enthusiasm, becomes his unknown correspondent, his monitor, his guardian angel, the inspirer of every noble thought and act for his country and mankind. It looks like poverty of resource to find so many women condemned to the same destiny—hopeless love; for Florence is not beloved. But we have nothing to say to the noble-minded Lady Florence or her story. The plot hinges there, on the black villany of her cousin Ferrers. Let us stick by Alice. One day Ernest chanced to visit the chapel of a celebrated mountebank preacher, accompanied by an Italian poet—another character very ably drawn, but a secondary personage, at this time, in the drama. While the discourse was drawing to a close—

The dim outline of a female form, in the distance, rivetted the eyes and absorbed the thoughts of Maltravers. The chapel was darkened, though it was broad daylight; and the face of the person that attracted Ernest's attention was concealed by her head-dress and veil. But that bend of the neck, so simply graceful, so humbly modest, recalled to his heart but one image. . . The more intently he gazed, the more firmly Ernest was persuaded that he saw before him the long-lost, the never-to-be-forgotten mistress of his boyish days, and his first love. On one side of the lady in question sat an elderly gentleman, whose eyes were fixed upon the preacher;—on the other, a beautiful little girl, with long fair ringlets, and that cast of features which, from its exquisite delicacy and expressive mildness, painters and poets call the "angelic." These persons appeared to belong to the same party. Maltravers literally trembled, so great were his impatience and agitation.

It was Alice. She was lost in the crowd. For many succeeding Sundays he returned; but she appeared no more. But at last consolation came. "He saw her in reputable, nay, opulent circumstances." "He would sleep in peace." "She was not a wanderer upon the face of the earth who had slept in his bosom."

Was she married to that staid and sober-looking personage whom he had beheld with her? was that child the offspring of their union? He hoped so—for he loved her now as a brother. Poor Alice! could she have dreamed, when she lay at his feet gazing up into his eyes, that a time would come when Maltravers would thank God for the belief that she was happy with another!

Ernest Maltravers now felt a new man: the relief of conscience operated on his literary compositions. A more buoyant and elastic spirit entered into them—they seemed to breathe as with a second youth.

Alice was the wife of Mr Templeton, the rich banker, and the same plebeian uncle from whom Lumley Ferrers expected a great fortune, until he had somewhere picked up this mysterious young widow and her lovely child. But Lumley was not a man to be easily disconcerted or driven from his point. His machinations to separate Lady Florence from Maltravers, to cajole his vulgarly ambitious uncle, and forward his selfish and villanous schemes, are often improbable, and break in upon the identity of the character. Another puzzle for the reader is, What is to become of Ferrers in the future volumes? Poetic justice must be satisfied; and the author, at the close, leaves himself a clear stage. Lady Florence, rather tedious on her death-bed, is killed off; and Lord Vargrave, the sanctified banker, having gained one grand object of his worldly ambition, a peerage, is also sent abruptly home, having made a will, bequeathing his step-daughter at eighteen, and an immense fortune, to Lumley. Even the base nature of Ferrers—now Lord Vargrave, in Parliament, and a flaming orator—feels the moral beauty of the ever-pensive, subdued, and retiring wife and widow of his late uncle. On a lovely May morning, some months after the death of Lady Florence and the banker, and when Ernest, sickening at life and all its interests—annoyed, too, by malignant and petulant criticism of those writings whose beauty she had felt so deeply and admired so much—had abandoned his Parliamentary duties, and gone abroad, Ferrers sate alone,

By the window in his late uncle's villa, in his late uncle's easy chair—his eyes were resting musingly on the green lawn on which the windows opened, or rather on two forms that were seated upon a rustic bench in the middle of the sward. One was the widow in her weeds, the other was that fair and lovely child destined to be the bride of the new lord. . . . Lumley gazed on them both, and on the child more earnestly. "She is very lovely," he said; "she will be very rich. After all, I am not to be pitted. I am a peer, and I have enough to live upon at present. I am a rising man—our party want peers; and, though I could not have had more than a subaltern's seat at the Treasury Board six months ago, when I was an active, zealous, able commoner, now that I am a lord, with what they call a stake in the country,

I may open my mouth and—bless me!—I know not how many windfalls may drop in! My uncle was wiser than I thought, in wrestling for this peerage, which he won and I wear!—Then, by-and-by, just at the age when I want to marry and have an heir, (and a pretty wife saves one a vast deal of trouble,) 200,000*l.* and a young beauty! Come, come, I have strong cards in my hands, if I play them tolerably. I must take care that she falls desperately in love with me. Leave me alone for that—I know the sex, and have never failed except in—Ah, that poor Florence! Well, it is no use regretting!"

Thus ends the first portion of the work, "with what, though rare in novels, is common in human life—the affliction of the good, the triumph of the unprincipled."

Come we now to our third romance, "Concealment"—ill-omened name, and most effective in concealing a carefully-finished and very meritorious fiction. "Concealment" is a novel of the Edgeworth school, with a pleasant dash of Madame D'Arblay and Miss Austin. Its moral object is to inculcate sincerity and truthfulness, or rather those habits and principles and that strength of mind upon which truth depends. By no direct failure in truth, not even by the lie acted—but by the want of the moral courage requisite in a great emergency, a lovely, and amiable, and passionately-beloved young woman, involves a whole family in the deepest distress, and her husband in disgrace and misery. She expiates the crime of bigamy by remorse, penitence, and death. We do not mean to enter upon the story; and, to say truth, there is nothing more in it than a thread upon which to hang the variety of well-sustained characters who carry forward the business to the catastrophe, and secure the purpose of revealing the author's opinion on men and women, morals, manners, politics, poetry, and literature. In the character of Lady Darcy, the author has developed the idea of a woman coming as near perfection as humanity permits: self-sustained—how different from self-sufficing!—and self-denying; dignified, nobly-principled, affectionate, earnest, devoted to those she loved, and continually doing good—a Christian heroine, in short; and emphatically a gentlewoman as distinguished from a mere lady. We must, however, leave this beautiful character, and the no less engaging younger heroine, Clara, to the reader's study. The minor personages are less in danger of suffering from our partial representations. There is, first, Mrs Winifred Loraine, an ancient maiden gentlewoman, the kinswoman and hereditary appendage of an aristocratic family, who is the type of thousands of a class that would be amusing were they not really more mischievous than the feebleness of their intellect and the absurdity of their prejudices render probable. The hold this lady has over her proud relation—himself a capital moral portrait—is thus accounted for:—

It was one of Sir Edward's "blessed inconsistencies," that, with all his contempt for weakness in general, he always exacted from others, and paid himself, the most punctilious respect to Mrs Winifred. This arose partly from feeling annoyed that one of his name should be so low in the scale of intellect, and he supposed this to be the only way of counteracting the insignificance into which she would otherwise have fallen; and partly because she was dependant, and he was too gentlemanlike in feeling to allow others to discover this from his manner towards her. She had two especial points of violence, almost of delirium—her religion and her politics—or, as she herself expressed it, “her King and her God.” These were so identified in her mind, that the terms “Atheist” and “Republican” were with her almost synonymous, and were indiscriminately bestowed on all who differed from her in opinion. Yet, with all this, there was such an absence of malice, the mind was so perfectly clear of guile, even the guile of concealing its own defects, that those who were most the objects of her dislike could not be persuaded to return it. It seemed strange that one so destitute of the reasoning faculties should have perplexed her small apprehensions with those subjects on which even the strongest heads are apt to go astray; and it could only be explained by her having spent her youth with a grandmother, whose grandmother had, when a child, sat on the knee of Charles I.; and having herself been betrothed to a gallant captain who was killed by the monsters of the American revolution.

This old lady, one day, hears that the heir, the representative of the family, is to be married to a foreigner:—

“So, ladies, you have come at last;—that I have lived to see this day—this dreadful day! the heir of Sir Edward Lorraine married to an Indian—a black heathen!” “An Indian! my dear Mrs Winifred—an Italian you mean—a beautiful Italian,” said Clare, eagerly, glad to have the power of alleviating the blow.

“He told me it was an Indian; but it is all the same—these Italians are as bad as heathens; and almost as black. The Pope is an Italian; I know all about it—my great-grandmother married an Italian, and she ran away, and left her with five children. O Lord! have mercy upon us!”

“Oh! Baroness Darcy, if you had but allowed him to be disinherited, I might have died in peace. I always thought he would bring disgrace on the family. But what’s her name? Am I to hear nothing about it, but what that old painting man told me? Sir Edward would have told me first; that he would—but times are changed now.”

“A noble family—the name of a fish—I remember ’em at Bath—the John Dorys—I always hated ’em. She’s a nun, too, I suppose; they’re all nuns in Italy. Is she a nun?”

But Mr O’Connell is the awful bug-a-boo of this ancient spinster and her compeers. We are not sure but that the “Liberator” has a piece of Mrs Winifred’s death to answer for. She has a congenial, or rather an appropriate gossip in Miss Catt, an individual of the Pratt genus. Those inferior personages, some of whom must be from the life, with the family group of the Mactavishes of Castle Avish, for whose identity we pledge ourselves, might make the fortune of a novel altogether, independently of its higher characters and main interest. The five or six young ladies of Castle Avish, hearing that their new neighbour, Clare Lorraine, the protégée of Lady Darcy, was a beauty and an heiress, made up their minds that she might, by a small degree of condescension on the part of the family, be a match for their brother, the heir. The scene is very clever and admirably truthful.

Spring is said to be the season of hope, and hope the prototype of spring—therefore August may safely be said to be the spring of the Highlands, for it is then the lairds begin to live, the moor-game to die—the heath to bloom, and the ladies to dress. As it was now approaching this season of mighty import, the family of the Laird of Mactavish, of Castle Avish, presented the usual appearance of “big and busy enterprise.” The young ladies, four in number, were seen presiding from dawn to twilight over the labours of their sewing handmaidens—taking sleeves of moderate dimensions from the gowns of last year, and cutting up webs of muslin and tulle into gigantic gignots, and overpowering pelerines. The mamma of the family was equally occupied with forward-looking thoughts in her own department, and delighted to see her girls so usefully and properly employed. She had arranged, in her mind’s eye, the deserts of the first week after the 12th—which was the important week—and had thrown herself into an arm-chair after this great mental effort, to enjoy the sweets of repose, and to admire her daughters, who were that day in the agonies of composing a cape, to make a dinner gown act the part of a morning one, if necessary. Do not let it be supposed we think lightly of such efforts; we have too often suffered from the want of such prevoyance to feel anything but admiration, which word sometimes means wonder. The young laird of the family was by no means idle during this universal activity of mind and finger. His vocation was to exercise and whip his dogs, preparatory to the important day, and occasionally to stride in amongst his family, to be admired in his new shooting dress, and to report to them the news of the country. The old laird was still in existence, but was kept much in the background; and to him the month of August brought nothing but neglect.

Mr Fergus M’Tavish—or, as he was called in the district, Captain Fergus, being a lieutenant on half-pay—was a tall, slim man, with a small skull, and a bushy crop of good dark hair. His whiskers were much cultivated, his head much elongated from his neck, by a black stiff stock, his nose hooked, his colour good, and he was altogether what is called a very handsome young man; he had of course the military air, and was, besides, the heir of Castle Avish, and the chief of that ancient clan. He was an only son, had been brought up at home, and had joined the army at a time when no battles were to be fought, except at balls, and no sieges to be attempted, but ladies’ hearts. On the day we have mentioned, Mr Fergus M’Tavish made his appearance in a new shooting dress, and, striding up to the drawing-room mirror, exclaimed, in a voice as good-natured as its harshness would allow—

“I thought you would all like it—it certainly does set off my figure; I think I told you before what the honourable Miss Montjoy, at Cheltenham, once said to me.”

“What did she say, Fergus, darling?” said Mrs M’Tavish; “I like to know about such good company.”

“Yes, she certainly is a devilish fine woman; why, she said, in her impressée manner, ‘Mr M’Tavish, your figure is so fine that your tailor has no merit; you would become any coat.’ Well, but girls, I have famous news for you; some of you must be off this year. Who do you think has taken Leven Farm?”

“I hope it is an officer,” said Miss Lilly M’Tavish, who was yet innocent enough to think that all officers were heroes.

“Faith, Lilly, it’s much better than an officer; they are often poor enough, but this is a man of great fortune, heir to a title too. His name is Arundel; he is to have a large party after the 12th, and he is coming to-morrow to look about him. Now, I think if we strike in at first!”

Mrs M’Tavish looked alarmed at this unexpected overturn of her domestic arrangements.

“I think that would look pushing, Fergus darling; but, on the 12th, I would certainly invite him, and as often after as you like. And, Fergus dear, I’ll tell you what I have been thinking about for you—I hear there is a Miss Lorraine coming with Lady Darcy, and that she is likely to get Glenleven, and a great deal more:

now, don't you think that would be a nice catch for you?"

"Faith, mother, that's a good idea; that is to say, if the girl's presentable. I could not do with an ugly one; the officers would quiz me to death, for they called me a great beauty-fancier; and, to tell the truth, some beauties have fancied me. Is she young, mother?"

"Mrs Becky M'Intyre told my Lizzy she was quite young, and very comely; she has a brother a baronet, and she's a cousin of Lady Darcy."

"That all sounds well—the sister of a baronet; it would do, and Glenleven would be a nice addition to us. I've a good mind to walk down, and ask when they are expected. So, good bye, girls, and make haste with your gowns. Eh, do you think Miss Lorraine will have me?" taking a last look at the mirror.

"Have you?" said the admiring group, while a loud laugh and five giggles succeeded this modest interrogation.

We finish the sketch with the first visit of the Mactavishes of Castle Tavish.

The story was scarcely concluded before the clan Tavish made their appearance in great force; all the young ladies being too impatient to see their future sister-in-law at the same moment to consent to separate. The family coach had therefore been filled outside and in, and the young laird, his portly mother, and four blooming sisters poured in upon the unconscious trio. Mr Fergus made the opening speeches, in his most striking manner; his entrées was a remarkable contrast to the polished tranquillity of their late visitors. He was in a military undress, and contrived to turn and twist himself round for the purpose of exhibiting the fit of his coat behind, which was evidently the idol of his imagination.

"Hope your Ladyship has quite recovered from the fatigues of your voyage. I consider myself most fortunate in having this day, before our important business commences, to wait upon your Ladyship and Miss Lorraine, particularly after our romantic meeting in the wood. I told my sisters, and advised them to do the same. Ha! ha! ha!" "Don't you find it takes your hair sadly out of curl, so early in the day, too?" said Miss Maria M'Tavish, in a confidential tone, to Clare who sat near her. "Walking in the woods, do you mean? No, it makes no difference to me; and if it did, I believe I should still do it." "No difference! how very strange now! Do tell me if you have been out this morning, that I may judge; but, perhaps, your hair has a natural curl, and that makes such a difference. I am sure it has, by the way it falls. Fergus's does, and I think that's the reason he always looks so handsome; many gentlemen look better at one time than another; but he always looks the same." "Indeed!" said Clare, "that is unusual." "Oh! how I wish my hair curled as yours does! Do you know of anything new that makes the hair look as if it curled naturally? I should so like it—there is nothing in the world I think so important as fine hair." Clare was saved from a reply by an appeal from Miss Lilly M'Tavish, a younger sister, whose desideratum was next to be attended to. "Miss Lorraine, can you allow me to copy any new military airs you may have brought with you from the south? We are expecting Captain Twistlemere of the Hussars, and he is so fond of military music. He says it always puts him in mind of battles. I should like so much to have some pretty airs to play to him." "I am sorry I am not musical; but some new music is mentioned here," taking up a journal from the table; "you may, perhaps, like to look over it." "Dear me, don't you play?" Fergus, Miss Lorraine can't play!—dear me!" Miss Lilly's simplicity called forth a frown from her brother, and she busied herself forthwith in her list of music. Clare liked her the best of the party, and was going to give her some further information when the solemn Miss Maria again assailed her. "Miss Lorraine, have you seen Mr Arundel?" "Yes, he was here this morning." "Did you ever see hair so beautifully kept? What a time it must take to brush it!" "I am not sure that I observed it particularly."

Captain Twistlemere's hair is a prettier colour; but then it does not look quite so well attended to." "What colour is Captain Twistlemere's hair?" "I think it is nearly the colour of yours; perhaps not quite so dark an auburn, but near it." While this wise discourse was going on at one sofa, Lady Darcy was the victim of something equally profound at the other. Mr Fergus talked—the sisters giggled at his wit, and the mother inwardly rejoiced at the impression he must be making. After a pressing invitation was given to dine and spend a few days at Castle Arish, the following week, the visit came to an end, Mr Fergus casting, as he departed, an irresistible look at Miss Lorraine, and hoping that they might enjoy another romantic walk together, as charming as the last.

The modest proposal of Captain Fergus to Clare, is as rich a "popping the question" as we have met with; but we leave it to the curiosity of young ladies. It is enough that

With a profound bow, which was intended by its elegance to plant daggers in Miss Lorraine's bosom, Captain Fergus strode off to his steed, whipping the innocent bushes as he went, while Clare, tired, disturbed, and disappointed, retreated to her own room, to ponder over what had passed, and to moralize on that strange animal man, and his various appearances. When she related the adventure to her cousin, which she did with much comic effect, Lady Darcy's remark was:—

"Well, I am sorry for what he has suffered; but you could not avoid saying what you did; it may perhaps do him good."

"No," replied Clare, "I fear it may do him harm; for hatred is worse than vanity, and he certainly can hate, although I entirely acquit him of all love."

Captain Twistlemere, the only son of a rich and fashionable Cheltenham widow—we say Cheltenham widow, holding it as equally characteristic with wife of Bath—is, meanwhile, during his grouse-shooting, captivated by the charms of Miss Lilly Mactavish. When Fergus, "nursing his wrath," reaches home, he sees a carriage, which is rather a phenomenon in the Highlands, and "posting and reeking horses," on the castle lawn.

"What can this be about?" said Fergus to himself, striding into the house, "some more English insolence, I suppose. But Lilly shan't be cheated—that she shan't!"

As he approached the drawing-room, he heard female voices in sharp and angry variety of discord, and occasionally a man's voice attempting to interpose between the disputing parties. He listened for a minute or two; but, curious to see as well as to hear, he opened the door, and walked in. He found the scene within equal to the sound without. Mrs Twistlemere, whose back was towards the door, was a tall, well-dressed, fashionable Irish widow of forty. The back and sleeves, skirt, collar, and bonnet, were evidently the work of able artistes, and the Hibernian block on which they were established gave an unction to the whole. She was standing in the middle of the room, pouring forth every irritating invective which the genius of her country and of her sex could supply, against poor Mrs M'Tavish, who, meek and helpless, wordless and stingsless, had sunk into her easy chair, quite exhausted with the defence she had made of the M'Tavish versus the Twistlemere pedigree.

The gentleman who stood meekly beside the widow was a little fat man, in a green coat and drab conclusions. He was her agent, and one of the guardians of young Twistlemere, who, seeing nothing in the general look of affairs so degrading to the house of Twistlemere, and, being aware of the extreme folly of his ward, and of his ward's mamma, was very desirous to make things verge towards an amicable arrangement.

The close is admirable. Fergus marries the dashing widow, and becomes father-in-law to his brother-in-law. In another vein, we give a random specimen or two of a work into which we should have liked to enter fully, had any opportunity offered, before, in these days of hot haste, twenty newer books had overlaid it for a time. With these specimens, we commit "Concealment" to the patient excavators of the library. Unhappily there are now no patient excavators of the periodical press, and a book destined to emerge is still as good as manuscript. Here, first, is the spirit of tolerance, or, better, of Christian charity.

Mr Delaney, the chaplain of the de Clifton family was a person who would have been an honour to any church, and his society proved a great pleasure to the circle into which he was thus accidentally introduced.

No one rejoiced more sincerely than Lady Darcy did, at finding goodness and piety anywhere, and it perhaps gave her the more pleasure to discover it amongst the Romish priesthood, because, from the unlimited power of the office in that church, she less expected to find that union of holiness and humility which a "steward of the mysteries" is so solemnly enjoined to possess.

In her own intercourse with Theresa, she avoided all controversy, being thoroughly persuaded that life is too short, and human reason too imperfect, to correct the speculative errors of others, and that all the good that can be effected by one human being towards another, must be by the silent influence of example, rather than by the force of argument and the strife of words.

Her indulgence to errors of faith arose, not from indifference to the spiritual condition of her fellow-creatures, but from a deep sense of human weakness, and an abiding sense of divine power and mercy. Where she saw a mind, darkened by ignorance, or misled by sin, she spared no pains, no prayers, to enlighten and to heal; but where others denounced, she was silent; where others feared, she hoped. She was, however, in no degree blind to the different shades of character or of creeds.

It happened one evening, about this time, when the Hall and Cottage inmates were assembled as usual, that the conversation turned on examples of elevated virtue, and Herbert called upon the party to name those personifications of excellence, real or fictitious, which had exercised most power over the minds of the assembled group.

"I am sure," he said, "you will all agree that 'la dame de mes pensées' is most unexceptionable, and she has the merit of being a real personage, although best known to us by her fictitious name; I mean 'Jeanie Deane.'—Young Stuart, who read the book to me with true spirit, said, his sister would have acted as she did in the same circumstances. Now, Willoughby, let us have your lady or ladies."

"If you allow of two," Willoughby said, "I think mine must be Madame Roland and Mrs Unwin—one the heroine of my youth, the other of my age. You may laugh, but I can defend my choice. Lady Darcy, we call upon you for your heroes."

"I am disposed to bear you company," she said, smiling, "and take Cowper and La Fayette. Now Theresa, it is your turn."

Theresa shook her head, and saying, "Clare, you must speak for me," she went on with her embroidery.

"I am afraid," said Clare, "I am not so moderate as any one of you; but am like a child when asked who it likes best. How many may I have?"

"Not more than three," said Herbert.

"Only three—and one for Theresa, as she has deputed me to choose. I say, in her name, Max Piccolomini; and in my own, at the risk of being thought even more wild than Mr Willoughby—Don Quixote, John Howard, and Hamlet."

Clare's trio were received with some merriment, and Willoughby said—

"As illustrations, I suppose you mean, of the purest heroism, the truest philanthropy, and the highest intellect."

"Exactly," said Clare, blushing. "Thank you for helping me out with my meaning; how do you justify your own choice of two such very opposite ladies? I conclude that you admire the one for her talents, and the other for her patient friendship?"

"Yes, and I love both for that self-devotion to what they felt to be right, for that steadfastness of virtue which enabled them to act and suffer up to their own principles. Mrs Unwin seems to me unequalled in the annals of enduring friendship, and Madame Roland still rises, amid those fearful days, as the one unsullied landmark of the cause she could not save."

"Yes," said Lady Darcy, "she has always seemed to me a marvellous creature. In her country and age, to be so faultless a wife, so tender a mother, so warm a friend, and, if I recollect right, so dutiful a daughter to a father she could not respect—all this, apart from her great ability, makes her character truly worthy of admiration."

"I am delighted to have you on my side," said Willoughby, "because it convinces me I am right. She was a beautiful illustration of what human philosophy, enriched by the affections of woman, can accomplish. Mrs Unwin's philosophy was divine—the highest and the holiest, and one cannot but feel that, so far as action is concerned, there might be many more Madame Rolands than Mrs Unwins; but in both, there was that preferring of others to themselves, which is of all qualities of our nature the most approaching to the divine."

"And which," said Herbert, "my heroine possessed in perfection, with, at the same time, the strictest sense of truth and justice. Many people can make great sacrifices for those they love; but few have the moral courage to love truth better than the object of their affection."

As Herbert said this, he rose and approached the fire. Lady Darcy and Willoughby turned towards him; but Clare's attention was arrested by Theresa's appearance, which betokened strong internal agitation, produced by what Herbert was saying.

Theresa, it may be noticed, is the unhappy wife, whose guilty concealment gives the name and the tragic interest to a work which we leave to make its own way. All that it requires is to be known.

THE WIND UNBOUND.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "TIM BOBBIN'S GRAVE."

GOD doth unbind the unchained wind;

He bids him go, and he straightway goeth.

The mighty one from the Lord is gone—

O'er ocean wide and o'er land he bloweth.

From mountain peak doth he terror shake;

'Mid caverned echoes he wildly crieth;

His wings descend where the pine woods bend;

Over desert plain in thick cloud he lieth.

On moonless night doth he take his flight;

Star-spangled regions he then exploreth;

Flings wide his pinions in heaven's dominions;

And to God's own palace-gate he seareth.

Then back he bends, and to earth descends;

Cloud-rending stormer! the world he shaketh;

Fale fear lies waiting, the brave are quailing;

The proud he humbles, the strong he breaketh.

On shoreless main when his path is ta'en,

Howling he calls on that 'whelming ocean;

The great deep cleaveth, the billow heaveth,

And wind and flood meet in dire commotion.

No ship may ride through that dreadful tide;

Stark horror yells, every hope denyng;

The fierce wind breaketh, the wave down taketh—

O God! have mercy upon the dying!

STRICTURES ON WILLIAM HOWITT'S OBSERVATIONS ON THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, AS IT WAS AND AS IT IS.

BY A MEMBER OF THAT SOCIETY.*

"Now for consistency, where is thy merit?
Thou sayest that thou a Quaker art in spirit.
Spirit must have a mode to manifest his latent essences, as trees are dressed
According to their kind; for trees and fruits Declare the nature of their hidden roots."—KNOWLES.

FRIEND TAYLOR,—In the two articles written by William Howitt, on "The Society of Friends, as it was and as it is," addressed to the public, as well as to the members of that body—as a member of the same, to whom he appeals for the truth and correctness of his picture, I am desirous of replying to a few of his observations, wherein I do not think he has correctly given our reasons for some of our peculiar practices, although, in the main, I admit that his portraiture of our religious society (for in no other light did we ever consider our associating together) is generally faithful and correct. But, although I admit the truth of his picture, and consider that, in describing our peculiarities, he may be well qualified for his undertaking, from his being brought up and educated amongst us, which has given him a knowledge he scarcely could otherwise have acquired; yet, perhaps, the unprejudiced reader in favour of any of our views, may scarcely believe that he has entirely acquitted himself of any other motive than the reasons which he adduces, for refusing to subscribe to those views wherein he, in common with others, dissents from us. If, therefore, the columns of the widely-circulated periodical which has admitted, I believe, three pretty long articles on our body from the same pen, remain open for any of its members to testify to the truth, or correct any misapprehension of our views that may be contained therein, I am anxious to step forward for the further elucidation of some points in which William Howitt does not hesitate publicly to join issue with the religious society of which I understand him to be an acknowledged member. And, in so doing, he appears, through the medium of a political periodical, in the character of a reformer ecclesiastical. I never heard of any suggestion from

* From principle and prudence we eschew religious controversy, especially where the difference lies rather in words than in essentials. But, as this amicable explanation affects not merely the opinions of an individual, but of a large religious society, and as the respectable quarter whence it emanates is known to us, we shall for once break through our rule. In our opinion, the entire subject of debate between Mr Howitt and our correspondents arises from the latter interpreting too narrowly the text—"The letter killeth, but the spirit maketh alive." We may observe that the address to the Queen, cited against Friend Howitt, in proof of the bad taste of his lax notions about the use of the plural pronoun, is scarcely fair; as, in a document so grave, the Quaker use of the pronoun is peculiarly emphatic. Neither Mr Howitt, nor any one, even among "the world's people," could, we apprehend, object to its use in this instance, where the effect is, to our feeling, impressive and solemn. —R. T. M.

his pen in doctrine or practice, or of his offering anything for our consideration, in the way of exhortation, through any of the usual mediums adopted by those in membership with us. But, presuming our principles were too little known, and charging us with hiding our light under a bushel, he proceeds at once to comment upon our rise as a distinct church, on the characters of those who were made instrumental in forming it, and holds up what he describes as our principles and practice, contradistinguishing them from others, and invites all to come to the light of truth.

So far as the principles we profess are found to be truth, I hope all will obey the call to an impartial investigation; and if, upon inquiry, we have been forced to produce the fruits in our practice that are awarded to us, let the tree be judged of by its fruits. If, with all our imperfections as individuals, and I acknowledge they are not a few, our peculiar views and principles continue to produce the honesty, the extended philanthropy and benevolence towards ourselves and others, which many of the censorious freely award us, I say, let our principles, and our peculiar practice also, be judged of by the fruits they produce; for, if we are in reality what our friend describes us to be, perhaps few will blame us for not being in haste to put the chief recommendations which he suggests for our further improvement, into immediate operation—viz., a few tunes on the piano, the violin, the guitar, or some other fashionable instrument; a greater cultivation of the fine arts, of painting and sculpture; a more extended and latitudinarian taste for literature—especially works of fancy—in which he considers too restricted, although he admits that "almost all kinds of books, that are strictly of a pure and laudable kind, they read and enjoy, especially history, natural history, and science, and that in science some of the Society are well known to the public." He admits, also, that "the Friends are now great admirers of nature; no people are more frequently seen among the visitors of our mountains and lakes than they;" and that "a considerable number extend their visits to the cities and scenery of the Continent." If this statement, then, be correct, it appears that we have hitherto preferred nature to art, both in investigation and contemplation. What the probable effect might be, by a more devoted attention to the latter, without any depreciation of the former, will be, perhaps, best answered by an inquiry respecting the characters of artists generally, and their patrons; the lovers and composers of music, and those gifted with and devoted to the development of musical talent. Is it found that the cultivation of these give dignity to the character, or have a tendency to call forth or adorn it with the graces and virtues of Christianity? If not, why does our friend endeavour to lead away his fellow-members from the useful pursuits which he describes them to be engaged in?

The style in which he details our mode of officially acknowledging those who appear as ministers amongst us, I think, sufficiently indicates that it does not meet with his entire approbation, although he does not expressly say so, or find fault with us on that account. But he says, that, in every meeting "there are two or more persons, of both sexes, who are supposed to live closely under the divine influence, under the name of elders, whose office it is to judge of the authenticity of such public effusions; in other words, to exercise the office of spiritual tasters." Now, it appears to me an omission not to state that these elders are elected or chosen for their office by the meeting at large, for their consistent life and conversation, and general virtue; and, on this supposition alone, practically exemplified, are they considered by the body "as living most closely under the divine influence;" their lives practically evincing that they are in measure "renewed in the spirit of their minds," again into the image of Him who created them, and, therefore, "most fit to exercise the office of spiritual tasters." Does the author of the "History of Priestcraft" find fault with the mode, or is he so much a lover of latitudinarianism in this respect, as entirely to set aside the judgment of his fellow-members, and allow of uncontrolled freedom?

Again, if William Howitt, when speaking of family visits, in sincerity can say "that I have felt on such occasions a sense of the beautiful purity and cementing spirit of Christian love, such as no other services have called forth," why does he endeavour to derogate from their usefulness, by saying—"he had more than once heard them predict strange things to different individuals," and then, by relating a prediction in his own case, that he says was not verified, practically say that he believed them to be all delusions? And then follows the observation—"I do not here, of course, concern myself with the propriety or impropriety of the practice." This is, I suppose, what he means by the language—"I have not hesitated to praise what I admire, and to speak frankly of things as they are."

Our ancient scriptural and grammatical language of thou to one person, and you to two or more, according to our friend, is not now grammatical, whatever it might be formerly, as grammar is established by custom, which is against us. I admit that, for the last two or three centuries, the plural pronoun has been in almost general use for the singular. But custom is ancient usage; and the practice of mankind in all nations, from the beginning of the world, is for us. Yet custom can no more change numbers than genders. If thou is to be discarded, let us have a distinguishing word in the room of you, to be used in speech to more than one. I know words are nothing, but as we give them a value or meaning by use. But thou, as singular, was used in the Hebrew, Assyrian, Chaldean, Grecian, and Latin speech; and now, in the modern tongues—amongst the Turks, Tartars, Muscovites, Indians, Persians, Italians, Spanish, French, Dutch, Germans, Polonians, Swedes, Danes, as well as English—there is a distinction preserved. Although some of these modern tongues have fallen into the same practice, yet, in some cases, they are obliged to use the singular pronoun. In law, our indictments still run in the singular number, which cannot be avoided without great circumlocution. Therefore, if this be admitted, I think our friend's assertion is not made out—that the use of thou is a "violation of modern grammar," though it may be of modern practice. William Penn, in speaking of the origin of this modern custom, says—"It seems the word thou looked like too lean and thin a respect; and, therefore, some bigger than they should be would have a style suitable to their own ambition." William Howitt asserts this cause is removed. I suppose he will argue that the prevalence of the practice has removed the cause. That must, I think, be matter of opinion. He does not say that the pride of humanity is removed. However, he appears to consider there is now no occasion for this "outward testimony." Yet, perhaps, he will allow me to place before him the reason which had most weight with William Penn, as he informs us in his "No Cross, no Crown:"—"Because it is a most extravagant piece of pride in a mortal man, to require or expect from his fellow-creature a more civil speech or grateful language than he is wont to give the immortal God, and his Creator, in all his worship to him. Art thou, O man, greater than he that made thee! Canst thou approach the God of thy breath, and great judge of thy life, with thou and thee, and, when thou risest off thy knees, scorn a Christian for giving to thee (poor mushroom of the earth) no better language than that thou hast given to God just before?" Is, then, our friend's assertion, that "the language has now firmly settled into the other form," a sufficient proof, so long as man cannot, yea, dare not approach his Maker with any other language than that which he knows to be right and grammatical?

The following address to the Queen, on her accession, is a specimen of our style and grammar, but apparently repudiated by the author of the "History of Priestcraft." It might, perhaps, be more popular and modern written in the usual style; but is it less manly and respectful?

TO VICTORIA, Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Dominions thereunto belonging:—

May it please the Queen,
We, thy dutiful and loyal subjects, Members of the Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, and representing that body in Great Britain and Ireland, are anxious to take the earliest opportunity of thus expressing our cordial and faithful attachment to our Queen.

We sensibly feel the loss of our late beloved Monarch, King William the Fourth. We look back upon his reign as a period of no common importance in the history of our country, marked as it has been by the extension of civil and religious liberty, by mercy and compassion to the guilty, and by the recognition of the rights of our enslaved fellow-subjects. We rejoice in these features of his government, as evidences of the increasing sway of Christian principle in the legislation of our country.

Under feelings of thankfulness to Almighty God, we offer to thee, our Queen, on thy accession to the Throne of these Realms, our sincere congratulations on the prevalence of peace abroad and tranquillity at home. May nothing be permitted to interrupt these blessings, and may the conviction more and more prevail, that war is alike anti-Christian and impolitic.

Convinced as we are, that the religion of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Redeemer, is the only foundation for the true happiness of man and the prosperity of a people, and that it is the surest bulwark to any government, our prayer to God is, that it may be the stability of thy throne, and may influence all the deliberations of thy council.

Be pleased, O Queen, to accept our earnest and heartfelt desire, that thou mayest seek for heavenly wisdom, to enable thee to fulfil the arduous duties which, in the ordering of Divine providence, thou art thus early called to perform. Mayest thou live in the fear of God, and may he incline thy heart to keep his law, and richly endow thee with the graces of his Holy Spirit. And at length, when the days of thy delegated trust on earth are ended, mayest thou, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, enter upon an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away.

Signed by us, members of a meeting appointed to represent the said religious Society in Great Britain and Ireland.

London, the 12th day of the 7th month, 1837.

With respect to dress, I have little to observe. This must, and has always been, left to individual taste and approval; and, if we do not adopt a "rational conformity to the genius of the national costume," I presume it is because it has been found that the best plan of preserving a simplicity amidst the variations of fashion, has been to adopt a particular mode. The Society never held out any form for its members to adopt. The query on this subject is simply this—"Do our members train up their children, servants, and those under their care, in a religious life and conversation, consistent with our Christian professions, and in plainness of speech, behaviour, and apparel?" What peculiarities in dress individuals may adopt inconsistent with plainness, have ever been repudiated. But if any member do not approve of another's dress, he is under no obligation to imitate it. Yet a plainness, and general uniformity, has still been preserved amongst those who abide by our "outward and visible testimonies," as our friend calls them, and by which peculiarities a Quaker is distinguished all over the world. And all those who profess unity with their views, and not in these particulars, are not deemed strictly consistent members of their profession, as they are not adopted from peculiarity but principle, and nothing short of principle ever has been able consistently to carry them out.

Much more might have been said on this subject; but I am not so anxious to extend my observations, as to place these things in their true light—namely, as the "mint, annise, and cummin" of the law; which ought not to be neglected, although the weightier matters of judgment, mercy, and truth, are the chief. If, like the Pharisees of old, we make our religion altogether in the former, and overlook the latter, we are justly condemned. But, from the flattering picture our friend has given of us in his last essay, we are far from that state, although the danger is predicted. Perhaps he may think we should be in less were we entirely to conform to the world around us, and allow an observance of the weightier matters alone to distinguish us; but nonconformity to prevailing fashions, in small things, where it arises from a purely conscientious motive, will always command the respect of good men.

In conclusion, I invite all to an investigation of our doctrines and practices, and to compare them with the written revelation of truth, and example of the true Church in all ages, as recorded in the Holy Scriptures. To this standard we appeal. We have no new doctrine or practice, as a body, that is not in accordance with this record. A new edition of "George Fox's Journal" is just published in two duodecimo volumes, and may be had through the medium of any bookseller, at a very moderate price. Let the unprejudiced reader, who is anxious for the inquiry, read an account of his labours and sufferings in the cause he advocated; of his intrepid courage upon all occasions, and under every circumstance, which nothing but an unshaken faith and confidence in the reality of that which he emphatically preached and styled "the Truth"—namely, the inward and spiritual work and operation of religion on the heart; and that which he considered to be his peculiar message, to use his own phraseology, to turn the minds of all to the "teaching of the grace of God in themselves." He, and his followers, in supporting, looking up to, and inquiring of a separate order of men, set apart by the State, for the substance of religion, found out their delusion, that they had spent their money for that which was not bread, and their labour for that which satisfied not.—Isaiah, lv. 2. To use the language of Dr Fothergill, one of their most exemplary and distinguished members, for piety as well as talents:—"They found themselves impoverished amidst the imaginary treasure of exterior profession, and famished amongst the multiplicity of forms. Their situation was like that of the poor woman mentioned in Mark, v. 26, who had suffered many things of many physicians, and had spent all that she had, and was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse. In this exercised condition, labouring and heavy laden, they remained without any prospect of relief from exterior rites and observations, having proved their inefficacy by long trial. They therefore turned towards God, and earnestly sought Him whom the Father had appointed, to give rest to the weary soul. The anxious concern of their minds was evident, and sometimes might occasion, upon divers of them, the literal accomplishment of that most necessary injunction, Phil. ii. 12—'Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.' Hence, the name of Quakers was given to them, at first in scorn, and by many continued from the same motive. The apprehension of imminent danger to the body hath often produced this effect without reproach to the parties affected; and why should it be thought to merit any epithet of contempt, to tremble at the sense of danger to that immortal part, which must inevitably abide the decisive sentence, of 'Come, ye blessed!' or, 'Go, ye cursed!' I freely and thus publicly acknowledge, that, notwithstanding the contempt poured upon the name of a Quaker, I would rather sustain it with propriety than any of the most dignified titles among the sons of men. But to proceed:—A degree of divine light arose in their minds to shew them wherein the essential light consisted, which was accompanied by faith in the name of Jesus Christ, by whom salvation and strength are only attainable. Through a fight of afflictions they followed him; cruel mockings, severe imprisonments, banishments, sequestration of their goods, and almost every species of oppression and cruelty were exercised upon them, and even death. Yet, as a collective body, no occasion was ever found against them, except concerning the law of their God.—Dan. vi. 5. This fervent cry of soul after substance was graciously regarded by a prayer-hearing God. He led them in the way to peace, and spoke comfortably to them; raised in many thousands the same religious hunger; and, by the baptism of the Holy Spirit, united them together as men of one heart. To this we owe our being as a people separate from others."

While, therefore, in the present day, the Established Church of Scotland is trying to procure a grant from Government off the national revenue, and denouncing the Catholic Church of Ireland, because it has applied, for the purpose of general education, for a part of the money granted to the law-established and supported Episcopal Protestant Church, I am glad to find such a general sense in the country against any further application of the national purse for the support of any particular party, whereof all are not partakers, though all are contributors; and that the time appears rapidly approaching when more will unite with the Quakers in refusing to believe that the ministers of the gospel are to be set apart as a separate order of men, and that they are not now, as formerly, appointed and ordained by the Minister of Ministers to go forth freely, and, "freely having received, freely give."—Matt. x. 8.

THE WEIRD OF THE DOUGLAS.

A METRICAL TALE.

Up sprung the warrior grim and old—
"And saddle me my coal-black steed;
For, long ere curfew-bell hath tolled,
His hoof shall tramp along the Tweed.
You haughty warden—wo to him!
My belted brand for lady's ring,
If of his beeves be left a limb!—
Sword, casque, and steed, haste, Barbour, bring."

His coal-black steed was at his side,
But groom nor warder lists his call—
"Ave Maria, shield!" he cried—
"Rank grass is growing in my hall!"

He little weened, that warrior bold,
That full five hundred years had rolled
Their suns o'er human hope and pain,
Since last his courser felt the rein;
Since last, when donning sword and plume,
He vowed the English warden's doom.

The bold moostrooper gazed with awe,
As if enchantment's power he saw;
His courser pawed the grassy ground,
And crumbling ruins shouldered round.
He deemed it could not be,
That one night's slumber, overspent,
Had crushed each massy battlement,
And made and veiled each yawning rent
With cobweb pageantry.

"Sure 'twas but yesternight when rung
The watchful warden's bugle-horn;
Nor note of worse its echoes sang,
Than fantasies for warrior's scorn.

It told of screaming phantoms near,
Of him, my bitter foe, I slew;
And licked his heart's-blood from my spear,
Jabbering as by the moat he flew.
It told how maiden's bloody form
Right o'er the donjon-keep was hovering:
I laughed at all—I knew the storm
With foam her billowy tomb was covering.
'Tis magic all!—kneel, Barnard, kneel!"
Knelt the black steed—up sprung the knight
To saddle-bow. His blade of steel
And bugle-horn were fitly dight.
He grasped the blade, and cried "Ha, ha!
And have they left thee, Border law?"
A blast he blew; and, ere the tone
Had filled the cave, he stood alone,
With steed, and sword, and bugle-horn,
Beneath the bresses of the morn;
Beneath the blue and bending sky,
Where the cold moonshine fadingly
Struggled amid the blaze of gold
That from the fount of radiance rolled;
And close beside him lay
A hoary ruin, weed-besprent,
Whose bulwarks Time's strong hand had rent,
And turret with foundation blent,
Through ages of decay.
Long gazed, in mute amazement profound,
Long strained his look, from hill to hill,
On cliff and cottage, tree and rill—
And felt a creeping awe.
"By heathery peak and verdant vale,
I cannot read the wondrous tale;

But, sure as magic's in the gale,
This is my own blue Liddesdale,
And yon is Dinleyshaw.
Each pinnacle I know full well,
Of rugged cairn, and crag, and fell;
But where is vassal, groom, and page?
And where is Castle Hermitage?
Vile sorcery!" Another blast
Upon the morning breeze he cast—
When, as in hour of battle's need,
With thundering hoof and frantic speed,
A hundred horsemen rushed around him,
And with their steel-bright phalanx bound him.
Right joyful was the knight to hail—
Their garb was that of Liddesdale;
And chiding, as he went to chide
When failed the rush of the battle's tide,
He poured his questions thick and fast,
Like sleet in Liddal's wintry blast.
But mute were all and motionless,
And vizarded each warrior's face;
Each stern and silent sat—his hand
Upon a shining Border brand;
Each fixed his keen glance steadily
Upon the chieftain's falcon eye.
"Know ye not me?" the Douglas said,
And fiercely grasped his glittering blade,
Then back recoiled—for well I ween
He ne'er met glance so strange and keen
As shot from eyes whose light seemed given,
Too bright for earth, too wild for heaven;
Then shouted, in a desperate mood,
"By Mary, mass, and Holyrood!
Whate'er ye be, come one, come all!
Shakes Dinley's base as soon as I—
Many have seen a Douglas fall,
But none has seen a Douglas fly;
Come devil, goblin, ghost, and fay,
This is the wizard's holiday."

Dread was the low, deep, thrilling tone,
A hollow laugh, a stifled groan,
Which seemed of fearful mirth to tell—
While from one brow the vizor fell.
The face wore famine's ghastliest hue,
And you might swear the deadly yew
Had waved above the wasted brow,
For many a day, its dismal bough.
A smile within his eye that played,
Like lightning's flash round battle-blade,
Set, as he said, with fearful glee,
"Proud Lord of Liddal, know'st thou me?"
Deep groaned the chieftain's labouring breast—
"Can thy dark spirit find me rest,
Dalhousie? Cannot dungeons deep,
And the strong earth, their secret keep?"

"Douglas, thy hour is come—the hour
When vengeance o'er thee claims its power—
For which I've longed through ages past,
To hear that bugle's wakening blast.
Centuries have crushed thy castle wall,
Since last in Liddal's courtly hall
Vassal and chieftain bent the knee,
And hailed thee 'flower of chivalry.'
Since, flinging down, with fiendish laugh,
Into my cell, some corn and chaff,
Thou saidst—'Be such thy princely fare!
Ramsay, thy hour is come—despair!'
Now fling thy bugle's echo shrill,
From Bilshe to the Gritmoor hill;
And summon all thy stumbling kerna,
For ages couched beneath the fern;
And bid them tell why lock of rust
And iron-bar forsook their trust—
Why, braving Douglas' stern decree,
The famished captive wanders free."

"Is there no hope?" the Douglas said,
And dropt on earth his horn and blade.

"Hail hath the eagle stooped so low?
Can Douglas quail before his foe?
Beseech a cheek with terror pale,
The haughty knight of Liddesdale?
Such lowliness might well atone
A dying rival's feeble moan.
Then, if thy felon ire is dead,
And vengeance from thy lip hath fled,
Ere the warm beam, by brake and fell,
Hath kissed the dew from heather-bell,
My hate to thee must bow to Heaven—
Part of thy weird shall be forgiven.
Fly, dogs of hell! and wait beside
The nether ocean's raging tide;
And watch where hopeless spirits groan
Beside the Douglas' burning throne,"
A rushing sound, an instant heard,
Like forest leaves or ocean stirred
By sudden gust, that dies away
Ere one might note its passing sway—
And Douglas and the Ramsay stood Alone, in Liddal's solitude.
"Now speed we forth," the Ramsay cried,
"And waste not here the morning tide;
There's nought to charm a Douglas here,
None trembles now for Liddal's spear.
That ruined pile, yon tombstones grey,
Faint traces of thy line afford,
Tell of a name long passed away,
And Liddal owns another Lord."

Like firegleam when the clouds are riven, Meteors the moveless stars among Gleaming across the fields of heaven,
Darted the coal-black barbs along.
And ne'er in frenzy's maddest mood,
With fevered strength and fiery will,
Could steed of mortal breed or blood,
So spurn the vale, so breast the hill,
As these two sable coursers, winging
The morning blast, behind them flinging
Gulf, pinnacle, and fragment clinging
By slenderest twig o'er yawning steep,
Where rushed the torrent wild and deep.
Horseman and horse no shadow cast
On hill and valley as they passed;
The soundless hoof, as on they flew,
Nor bent the stem, nor brushed the dew;
Nor marked their flight, by sudden spring,
The deer, nor bird by flap of wing;
Nor ceased his ballad tale to trill,
The early shepherd on the hill;
Nor earth nor sky gave note of fear,
To mark the demon-barbs' career.

Few minutes passed, and they had been
Where Gritmoor heaves her edge of blue;
Had glanced through Harden's groves of green,
By Todrig's links of oak and yew;
Paused not the fiery demon brood,
When Selkirk chime the strained ear pealed on;
The tones still echoed when they stood
Upon the heights of hoary Rildon.
"Douglas, farewell!" the Ramsay cried—
"I hear a call I must abide;
It comes from a land where sun nor star
Shines on the captive's prison bar.
But thou—'tis thine at will to roam
In quest of kindred, friends, and home;
O'er Scotland fair from sea to sea,
Thy will, thy words, and feelings free."
Briefspace did Douglas watch the form
Of knight and steed, as lessening dim,
Like cloudspeak heralding the storm,
They vanish o'er the blue sky's brim.

Then fierce emotions wildly blent—
Hate, rage, and dread, and wonderment—
In tumult rushed o'er soul and sense,
And centred in one look intense

Of baffled vengeance; but deep awe
O'er lip and word maintained its law.
His burning breast dread memories stung;
And o'er him strange forecastings hung.

By waning moon and morning light,
Mirrored in skies as cold and bright,
Slept the blue Tweed—the dying breeze
No longer stirred “the Abbot’s” trees;
And, wearing naught of melancholy,
Like virtue, beautiful and holy,
Stood, in its fair and faded grace—
The loveliest ruin of its race—
Time-honoured Melrose! tenanted
By dust of Scotland’s noblest dead; !
Shrine of a heart that beat to free
Its mountain land from slavery;
Tomb of a prince beneath whose smile
In solemn pomp arose the pile;
Temple whose arch, with cobwebs hung,
Hath oft to midnight Ave rung:
And heard the “Dies irae” roll,
When passed from earth a sinner’s soul.

An ancient man, with locks of snow,
His toil-worn body bending
O’er pilgrim staff—faint, feeble, slow,
Up the steep hill is wending.
Now by the coal-black steed he stands,
And grasps the mane with trembling hands:—
“From Liddal’s lord, a boon to pray,
I’ve track’d a long and weary way.
I know thee, Douglas, by the garb
Of old—and by thy demon barb;
And I have passed, since midnight moon,
Three zones, to crave thy knightly boon:
Which, granted, ample power is mine,
Thy wildest wish to render thine.”
“Pilgrim, small power hath Douglas now,
Fetters to break, or might to bow;
Avails not now bold Liddal’s brand,
Far gleaming in her chieftain’s hand.
A mouldering tower, a blasted name,
Are the sole relics of her fame;
And Douglas, weak, despised, forlorn,
Hath quailed beneath his rival’s scorn.
Then what the boon, so mean, so low,
This knightly arm can now bestow?”
“Douglas, to ride the lightning’s wing,
The fiery bolt of wrath to fling,
To shoot from glowing star to star,
The gates of death to burst or bar—
Such is the boon a weary wight
Craves from the power of Liddal’s knight.
Within yon walls, beneath a stone
That ne’er was stretched o’er mouldering bone,
Is hid a charm whose fearful spell
Unlocks the nether depths of hell.

On that black stone, with bended knee,
Name the dread name which ne’er must be,
By night or day, by wizard spoken,
And the strong seal of fate is broken.”

The pledge is given—the pilgrim springs
Upon the coal-black steed;
And, away, like the rushing of eagle wings,
Is the demon’s fiery speed.
Deep quiet hung over bank and brae,
Not a hum in the vale was heard;
Fair Melrose asleep in its greenwood lay,
And the Abbey gates were barred.
On its hinge the massy portal swung
At a blast of the wizard’s horn,
But no echo that arch or cavern flung
To the keeper’s ear was borne.
Dismounts the knight by the long black stone,
And the courser—where is he?
The knight and the wizard are there alone,
And the knight is on bended knee.
He named the dread mysterious name,
And a voice was heard “Beware!”
He named it again—and a hue of flame
The wall was seen to wear.
Again—and a fearful stillness fell;
On the graves was a ghastly light;
And the wizard cries—“I have found the spell:
Now crave thy wishes, knight.”
“Vengeance,” the Douglas cried, “be mine!
A spirit-piercing sword!
And before me the rival of my line,
Dalhousie’s hated lord!”
“Have, then, thy wish!—Dark spirits, hear!”
Where stands the Douglas now?
Strange shapes are around, and pain and fear
Are stamp on every brow.
Each one is placed on a burning throne,
And a vacant throne is there,
And a voice is heard, ‘mid the gathered groan,
“Thy hour is come—despair!”

Forced by a dread o’ermastering might,
To the vacant throne moves Liddal’s knight.
He feels, but he may not see, the power
That guides him in that awful hour.
On the burning summit he sits: his hand
Has the likeness of a fiery brand;
With a fillet of flame his brows are bound,
Shedding pale light on the gloom around.
The famished face is before the throne,
Stern mockery in its dark eye speaking;
From its lips wild laughter’s hideous tone
Is blent with the mingled moan and shrieking.
Dread sounds—“To the darker realms descend!”
With the waves of mirth and misery blend;
And the thrones of punishment sink from sight,
In the nether world of endless night.

THE PEACOCK.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

“It is a Hindoo prejudice, that the track over which a peacock has been observed to fly and alight, is that of a vein of gold.”—Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. No. XXXIII., p. 471.

THE Peacock, with its plumage rare,
Is a holy bird, and wise;
For he knoweth that gold is an evil thing,
From which foul thoughts and fancies spring,
To blind our mental eyes;
He knoweth it is the seed of sin,
Whose fruit may ripen the soul within:
For (if legends tell true) he will not tread
On the earth of the track that covers its bed!

Yea, the Peacock is a wise, wise bird,
To fly o’er the spot where the ore of gold
Is hid ‘midst the mould.
But man, with tool, and toil, and word,

And wanton spell, seeks out the mine;
And digs for himself a chain that shall bind
Each blessed impulse of the mind,
Till all shall peak and pine ‘Neath the festering fetters—the craving sin
That dwarfs the soul within!

Copy the Peacock, then, which flies
Over the path where temptation lies;
Tread not the track that glistens with gold,
Or thy fingers will bend the ore to hold,
Whilst instant round thy heart shall freeze
The milk of human charities!

THE SPECULAWTOR.

A TALE ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE MODERN PRINCIPLES OF COMMERCE.

BY JOHN GALT.

CHAPTER I.

THE minister of our parish was a long-headed man; and to the effect of a sermon which I heard him preach far on the other side of my teens, I can trace back the issues and kithings of my life. He said that, UNLESS A MAN HAS ANOTHER OBJECT TO ATTAIN, EVEN IN THIS WORLD, BEYOND THE MAKING OF MONEY, HE IS BUT A SORDID, VULGAR CHARACTER, BE HIS PROFESSION WHAT IT MAY. The words took infooftment of my spirit: I have ever since syne felt the admonish as a spur to endeavour, determined, as I then became, to be something better in the Maker's world than what the minister called a cumbering benweed, which even the douce cows reject.

Money, in short, has been with me but a means—the wherewithal to get something else; but what that should be, I could not say; certain, however, I was, that, when I got the money, a worthy way of using it would not be difficult to find.

Towards that airt have my ettlings been aye drifting; and it is anent the course of them, that I have to speak. But, first and foremost, I must give an inkling of what I was—the upshot will shew forth what I am; and will conclude with an admonishment that may be useful.

My mother, a widow, brought me, when a bairn, from St Mungo's to the house of her aunty, in our clachan; and, though then but a playrife wean, I mind that there was a doleful weeping when we met—I knew not then for what, though I may now guess; but I joined chorus in the spring; and it was well I did so, for my audible lamentation drew the attention of the women, and had the effect of making them restrain their sorrow.

We were not many days in that sojourn, till mother fall into the arms of a malady, which carried her, as I was told, into another and a better world. Soon after her departal, auld aunty took what the neighbours called a sore income, and made haste to follow her.

Thus it came to pass that I was cast on the hands of Providence, an orphan.

What would have become of me when aunty was blanketted aneath the haps of the kirkyard, the Lord only knows; but, on that very night, He sent the leddy of Broomlands to the inns, and she heard there of my desolation.

Being of a pityful nature, she sent for me, and said she would pay any decent woman that would undertake to bring me up; and for this gospel-mindedness, her memory is yet as a sweet odour in the parish.

Mrs Patrick was gotten, a very kind woman, for the turn; and she took me home with her, and was both mother and aunty to me.

I was not long removed till the calamity of the smallpox fell upon me, of which my face bears the vestiges; but it is no for that I make mention of it; but only for the motherliness that it brought out of the warm heart of Mrs Patrick. Often yet do I mind her tender care, and the thought of't renews, in a sense, the experience of my early days, making the remembrance of my orphanship like the taste, somehow, of a delicious orange in summer weather. Sure am I, therefrom, that the world, with all its faults, abounds in needful charity, if we ourselves be rightly directed to awaken it.

When I grew better, I spent two years and more as an idle runagate, before being sent to the school; but, although I did not overly join the rank-ringing enemies of the town, as Mrs Patrick called the other childer, I was not condumacious against playing. Only the loneliness of my condition made the sproutings of gladness within me often dowie; and I was, now and then, filled with a serious amaze, sitting often forlorn at a dike-side in the fields, musing of many things that were the workings of an elder understanding, insomuch that some douce Christians, who saw my habitudes, said I was surely ordained to be a minister of the gospel.

"I would not object to be a minister," said I, one day, to Mrs Patrick when she was telling me what the neighbours thought; "but how may it be brought to a bearing? Nobody can be a minister without a father or a friend—and I have none;" which saying caused compassion to flood her eyes; but she told me to be of good cheer, for Providence had wealth enough in the coffers of eternity to supply the needs and wants of all the world.

It was not long after this that my benefactor, the good leddy of the Broomlands, was seized with her dead-ail, and, after a sore time o't, was taken off the earth. A cousin came to be her inheritor, who was a man of most strict legalities, and, for anything I ever heard to the contrary, might have been honest likewise; only it was not surely a very comely thing of him, considering the stocking-foot he got by the leddy, to utterly refuse to bear the cess of me—so, had I not by this time been fastened to the heart of Mrs Patrick, by affection, I might have been a waif that knows not where to lay its head. But she, seeing that there was no longer trust to be put in man for me, put confidence in Providence, and had blithe hopes that I would be seen to.

The first thing she did, on learning how I was commended by needcessity to her affections, was to go to the schoolmaster, and see if he would take me for the poor scholar; the laddie who had the post having gone to be a cabin-boy. It was just in the nick of time, for the master was glad to get me; which caused Mrs Patrick to be thankful that, as one door steeks, the Lord is sure to open another.

After my education was finished—for all I got was as the poor scholar—I was bound a 'prentice to Mr Sheddles, a most methodical weaver, to learn the trade; and here I cannot but make a noty-beny, that it is a blessed contrivance of heaven, for the benefit of poor folk, that prenticeships have been invented; for the friendless and fatherless thereby get their pick, and learn a business whereby, in riper years, they may come to be topping characters.

CHAPTER II.

When my time was out, I went with another shop-lad intil St Mungo's; and we got work in the muslin line from Maister Webs—anent whom it behoves me to be very particular; for, after I had been with him about the space of a year, he said to me, when I met with him one Sabbath morning on the Green, where I used, every Lord's Day, to take a walk by myself—

"Peter," said he, "it's no to be expeckit, man, that a lad of a geny like you will stay longer at the looms than he can help it; and I have had a thought thereof running in my head for some time. In short, Peter, maybe ye have a friend, that ye little trow'd of, who is right willing to aerve you. To be sure, muckle is no in my power, but there is a something; and if ye're of a conformity to hearken to cannie counsel, I'll give you an advice that may whelp a provosty some day."

Thus did he, at one and the same time, give me an advice, and a reason to ettle to rise in the world.

"Deed, Mr Webs," quo' I, "I'll never lee: I didna think I was so well aff in the warld. However, if the thing ye would wise me to can be compassed with eidency, I'll no say but I have a wish within that ought not to be a talent tied in a napkin."

"Very discreetly spoken," replied Mr Webs; "and now that we are in a manner of secrecy, I'll unbutton my breast to you, and we can then lay our heads thegither, and discourse of an advantage and mutuality that may be a come-to-pass in time to us both; for, although I have more nicks in my horn than you, I'm no sae auld as not to have a to-look."

I thereupon told him, that I had long thought him a gash carle, and that he might be sure I would give good heed to his whys and becauses.

"Weel," said he, "mair cannot be expeckit—and noo I'll begin. Ye see, ever since this galloping on treddles, in the muslin line, had a right set-out, I have had a notion that there would be a great prosperity; and, day after day, I have seen a progression—verily, in so much that I have often said to myself, It will come. In short, Peter, I have thought that, as David was anointed to be a king when but a herd laddie, ye were surely anointed for a purpose in the manufacturing line—which is the cause of my noo upeking as ye hear me speak."

"But, Mr Webs," quo' I, "what may be that purpose?—for I'll no deny that I have had cleckings in my oun head to the same end."

"I thought so," replied he—"for I have an ee in my neck, and can spae some fortunes. However, no to mak a sprose about my sagacity, I'll come to the point. Seeing that there is an outcoming in this cotton-trade, I thought, if I happened to fall in with a lad willing to do weel, I might get a market for some of my notions; and now I have made a bit gathering, which maks me, I'll no say overly just crouse, to let you see the lining of my bosom. But, to make a short of a long tale, I have a nest-egg with Robin Carrick, the banker, and it may encourage laying, though we needna keckle about it. Se you see, Peter, having this nest-egg, what's to hinder us to be marrows in nesting? I have been thinking of taking a trig mansion in a creditable land, and, with the help of your hand, to put up the sign of 'Webs & Patterns, manufacturers;' and try how good luck is disposed to befriend us."

"Really, Mr Webs," quo' I, out of the bodle to hear him, "ye have opened to me a vista; and if ye think I can help, I am ready, heart and hand, to go all the righteous lengths ye would wish."

So, out of this confabble, we had in time a bearing, and by-and-by after it, there was, in natural-ity, a christening, and the bairn's name was "Webs & Patterns, manufacturers," on a sign fastened under the windows of the fourth story of Ettle's Land, in the Candlerigs.

CHAPTER III.

Having thus, as rehearsed in the foregoing chapter, gotten a degree with Mr Webs, and no longer aweaver—he sitting on a three-legged stool within a railed bunker, with a green durant curtain around, and book-muslins on shelves abint him in a warehouse, as a manufacturer—the wherewithal that was in me began to ope and kittle upsettings.

I looked after the men of the shop maybe a wee owre particular at first; but I soon learned to mind my hand, for I did not need a dominie to tell me, far less a professor of philosophy in the college, that to notice everything like a fault, is no the way to manage every sort of mankind, to the attainment of a satisfaction, either to yourself or for them. No doubt, weavers, and those of a sederencie, are often of the fashionable gender, being troubled with vapours that sometimes get the better of their parts when trade's guid; and the man who does not discern this, is liable to tura to the left when he means to take the right. If he has, however, a natural gumption, he soon finds the length of his tether, and contains himself within it. But this observe, I must say, is an after-thought, begotten of experience; for, in the sooking months of Webs & Patterns, I cannot hold forth of myself that I was in all things perfect, having naturally a brittle temper, as it kithed, and gleg een—qualities in an overseer that need guid cooking to make into wholesome kail.

But really Maister Webs was a cordial of a partner. He sat in the wareroom all day at his desk like an image; and was never to be sought for when a customer came in; nor did he ever miss going to the Tontine Coffee-room at newstime, by the which he earned a character for regularity, that did not make them any waur, when we had occasion to gang to Robin Carrick with bits of stampit papers.

The first year I cannot, however, say the advantage of this clockwork was very notour; but by-and-by the seed came to a braid that kithed into harvest. Before the back of the second year of our partnership was well turned, it was a plain visibility that Webs & Patterns had not only put on a new coat, but was as straught in the shoulders as ony sutor lad could be, that is ordained to perform King Crispianus at the fair.

At this time, as I am in a manner obligated to confess, seeing how things were on the thrive with us, my thoughts were not all on the concerns of our trade. I had my dreams, in the watches of the night, anent provostries and other big-balled adjuncts of corporate bodies, with now and then a flake of fancy between hands, concerning a wife that should be of a degree; for the auld-farrant counsel of Mr Webs was becoming every day more manifest, and it was clear to be seen, that, if our prosperity did not suffer a fallow, we were on the trontage to a topping way, there being a by-hand talk of taking Mr Webs into the town-council of the city, which is a way of testifying to the world that a man is well-doing in other things as well as the moralities.

However, I saw by the way of a squint that we were not yet far enough up the tree for me to make a cast for a wife among those that I wished. Nevertheless, I began to take pains with myself, and so, by little and little, to creep quietly in among the gentry and the like of families that keptit companies. I dressed no out of fashion, sechewed those who had only thriven in the forefront of their lives, and was, in short, a young man that looked to the blue lift when he walked the plain-stones and was meeting a divour fore-going acquaintances or a lad that he had been marrows with in the loom-shop.

But this conduct was no universally approved of; folk that had their doubts, if in the long run, the manufacturing would be found a good trade, shook their heads, and minted I was carried; and a man whom I knew well, said of me to a friend, who spoke to him of the alteration in my clothes, that Pride never left its maister without a fa'—thereby prognosticating that there was an uncomeliness about me that betokened a humiliation.

But when I was told this envious say, it did not fash me; for I had observed, from the time I left the loom, that ill-speaking was to be found in every rank of life, that saw or thought it not superior; and that it's no just confined to manufacturers. However, I was then a young man, with a heart as lightsome as a blown bladder, and no easily dunkled. Indeed, I had other to spin; for, in this blush and dawning of fortune, Mr Webs caught off his stool in the wareroom, and was a dead man before he fell to the floor—an unlookit for accident, that gave me sore trouble: no that in my heart I could make meikle mans at getting all the income to myself; but he was a lang-headed carle, and had a way with him in threading the walls of Troy in business, that made his bit and his drap no an ill bargain, even to his partner as I was, counting his life till then a durability.

CHAPTER IV.

Soon after Mr Webs was covered with the mools, Mr M'Shears came to me, on a Monday morning, and we had a very serious discourse.

Hewas a man well stricken in years, and keptit a cloth-shop in the Gallowgate—a most creditable man, though there were not wanting some that said he had a finger in the pie with Clippy Cabbage in the tailoring line, in a close off Bell's Wynd, as well as was hand and glove with auld Watty Clouts that lived at the foot of the Stockwell, making cleeding for the lower orders, and corduroy jackets for carriers. But, however this may be, Mr M'Shears himself was a bein man, and had many customers among the country gentry.

So, coming to me on that Monday, I'll no say but I was a thought surprised, for we were not overly acquaint, though on nodding terms when we passed. After the usual guid-days had been exchanged, he told me that he had been out on the Sabbath at the Moorlands, where the laird behaved to him in the most civilised manner.

"Ye know," quod he, "that it was not to be thought that a 'stated gentleman would make himself joke-fellow like wi' me that had but a lairdship ahint the counter; but yon's a purpose-like man, and has been in America, where they ken the sleights of making white siller of black bawbees; and, from less to mair, he invited me to take a chack of dinner with him, and, taking a chack of dinner, we somehow began to speak of the warning that had been given to us all, in the very sudden death of your worthy marrow in trade, Mr Webs. This led on to more confederacy; and he told me that the concern of Webs & Patterns, he had heard, was in a good way; at last, that his second son Robert was a clever creature, and, being near upon years of discretion, was anxious to be put in a way. Thus, out of this partly-voicing, he said to me that, if you were not extortionate, he was minded to make you an offer for the behoof of Robin, if I could learn how far it might sort with your views."

"Mr M'Shears," quod I, "I'll never deny that what ye have been telling me, is not without a sediment that deserves consideration; far, no doubt, since the sudden removal of Mr Webs from this world, there is a vacancy which it behoves me no to make an obstacle to fill up."

This I said in a dry manner, that he might not suppose I was overly keen to snap; but I saw, by the ee in my neck, that it would be an unspeakable advantage to me to have a connection with Mr Thistles of the Moorlands family; and I added, a thought more couthy, that he might assure the laird I was not a man of an extortionate breed ; but, being in a good way, it was not in course of nature to be expectit that I would cast my pearls afore swine.

"In short, Mr M'Shears," quo' I, "I canna but say that I have no manner of obstacle to covenant with Moorlands ; but, if he will provide for his get, he must come down with a solatium."

"Oh," quo' Mr M'Shears, "he hasna a scrupulosity about anything so reasonable ; but, being a man no well read in the outs and ins of business in this part of the world, he would be blithe to get an inkling of the amount of the contentation that ye might may be looking for."

"Mr M'Shears," was my weel-considered response, "as we're halfins on a matter of business the now, I'll be very plain—indeed, it's no my way to scog about the bush at any time ; so that, if Moorlands is mindit to make a connexion, I'll no be a balk wi' niggerality. Only ye ken that his son is a greenhorn, and has something to learn, which is an item to be reflected on ; for, wi' that defect, it will be some time before he can be a help."

In this way, I let Mr M'Shears ken that, although I was very ready to covenant with Moorlands, in order to wile him on, yet there were dubieties in the case, as the Principal said in his sermon, that called for quest and investigation. However, no to play at pitch and toss langer anent this matter, it came to some fruition soon after ; for, in the course of the same week, Mr M'Shears came to me in the wareroom again, and said that Moorlands was in the town, and would be shortly at his house ; "where," said he, "if ye have a mind to forgather with him, I would advise you to come and speak to himself anent his second son ; for really the man's hite for the connexion, and says the cotton trade will be gold in gowpens to the king's realm or all be done."

So, after a short taigling, that I might not be thought owre yawp, I took my hat down from the pin, and, throwing the key in the desk, went with Mr M'Shears to his house, to confabble with Moorlands. I did not, however, let wot to him that I could discern that there was a fainness in the Laird for the connexion, that was a kithing of an assurance that there would be a come-to-pass between us.

CHAPTER V.

It would not be savoury, in the perusal, to the courteous reader, to rehearse all that passed between me and the Laird of Moorlands that day, in the domicile of Mr M'Shears. Let it suffice, therefore, to say that the upshot was a paction by which he was to pay a sum in hand, for his son Robert to learn the business, and I was, at the end of the year, to take the lad or not, as suited myself, into partnership, on being paid another sum in ready money.

After this mutuality of understanding, I had my own meditations on the subject when I came back into the solitudes of the wareroom, as I may call them ; for they were certainly of that speeshy when without customers, and only myself sitting on the three-legged stool, in the conclave of the bunker heretofore described, within the durant curtain.

I saw that by Robin Thistles I would get an augmentation, and be hoisted a step towards the magistracy, which is the natural butt that all men of business aim at that's of a weel-doing habit of body. But, as for the lad himself, he was like the generality of lairds' gets—no catch. To be sure, at first, he was like other new besoms that soop clean ; but, by and by, I saw that he had no natural eidency, and would have been glad that all the work in the world for him to do, was to put his hands into his breech-pouches, and to take them out to his dinner. However, as he was, as I must say, an acquisition to the like of me, I was fain to put up with him ; but I would advise no lad, come of such an humble stock as me, to mess or mell with the aff-sets of lairds, if he can do better—thinking themselves no small drink, though it's a visibility that they are but burn water, like that which the images bock on the wells of Lithgow.

However, as everything was on the increase, I did not fash owre meikle at Robin Thistles, though he was a saft lad—and maybe had more paritch in his kite than harns in his head, after breakfast—but ettled that in me lay to thrive, thinking of the baillie's chain, and the cockit-hat of the provica. Just, however, as I had waled one for a wife, and was about to speak my mind to her, a blight fell upon our business, and not only on ours, but the general well-doing of the realm.

The French found out that they were a very ill-used people, and, from less to more, that their king was a malefactor whom it behoved them to shorten by the head. Out of the stramash a war was cleckit by William Pitt & Co., at London ; and the upshot fell dreadful among us. Trade gaed to pigs and whistles, treddles rusted, weavers listed, workshops grew as quiet as Relief kirks on a week day ; and the pestilence of the time entered our wareroom, insomuch that Robin Thistles spoke of the same to his father, who, by giving his vote for the member of Parliament, got him into the army, and sent him to Flanders with the Duke of York ; where, in time, he found, at Vallensheens, that a cannon-ball was pot-metal, and his haffit as frush before it as a fozy turnip.

The going away to the wars of Robin Thistles was not, in a sense, a calamity, and, to tell the plain truth, was not a come-to-pass that would have broken my heart ; but auld Moorlands was a sicker man ; and, when he saw that trade was on the go, and that his son was resolved to follow the trade of his ancestors, as he said soldiering was, he refused to pay the residue of the money he had covenanted to do, and I was obliged to perish the pack, like many others, before I could compel him, by course of law at Edinburgh.

It was a black time that in the west of Scotland ; and, indeed, ye might have seen that a judgment was on the land, by the divour-like way that window-brods hung from their hinges on the outside walls of what once had been canty workshops, blythely birring, as if they had a sensible pleasure in being helps to small families.

Seeing myself so overtaken by the spirit of the times, and driven from house and hauld, loom and wareroom, I wist not what to do. I went about like a ghaist, or a creature demented, wondering when the end of the world would be; for I could see no howf for one that had been in a way of business, and was cast, like a waif, on a moor, where only whin-bushes could be seen, or an auld gibbet, giving lonely admonishment to ill-doers. In short, I dwined and grew dowie; and was no more like the brisk, eident, ettling birkie I had been in the days when Mr Webs took me by the hand, than a toom shawp is like a cod that's prospering on the stalk. I began, in consequence, to see nights with new een. It might be that disaster had turned the milk of my nature, for all seemed then a vain show; and I pondered what it was that had made me covetous of many things. In sooth, I thought, like daft Jamie, that the stars were ugly things, and no worth the ettling for, because they glowered so high up and unreachable.

This melancholious course of meditation, no doubt, wrought a change in my inner heart, though I was at pains to hide it even from myself; which, however, only increased its bitterness, making me think my estate in this world lower than maybe it was, had I been less dwwaling. All the method of my bygone thoughts seemed to have been disorderly; and I discerned a glistening on much which I thought fine, no worth a staid man's contemplation. In short, I felt in a way that was not creditable to my discretion, putting a value on things by the difficulty of getting them; reckoning those of the best that were farthest ahoon my reach—a left-handed wisdom, in which the blighted are apt to indulge.

CHAPTER VI.

By and by, I got the better of my downfal; and, as I recovered my composity, seeing a new spring opening in trade, I made a settlement with my creditors, which was thought very liberal, paying them a composition which left me a residue to begin the world with.

With that residue, I bought some bags of cotton, cheap, wherewith I was minded to begin manufacturing again; but, before I got it distributed to be spun, there happened, Gude kens how, to come a sudden plumpness into the prices, which caused me, for ready money, to sell what I had bought, by which sleight I turned the penny to a satisfaction. I call it a sleight, because it was so said by others to be, and my sagacity, in consequence, was much commended; but really I had no more to do with the come-to-pass than the wild Scot of Galloway.

However, by this job, I got a preeing that there was a way of making money different from that by the sweat of the brows of labouring men; and, accordingly, I had a consider with myself, if it would not be mair to the purpose to try my hand as a speculawtor than as a manufacturer; and the outcome of that consider was my turning to be a merchant: no that in my own breast I thought myself just a merchant, but folk call speculawtors so, as in village towns they call them merchants that deal, like the shopkeepers of old in the Canongate of the literate town of Edinburgh, in—“Meal, barley, butter, and cheese;

Soap, starch, blue, and pease;
Train oil, tobacco, pipes, and teas;
Balls to clean leather breeches;
Herring and sugar, salt and blue;
Blackening fine, for boot and shoe;
Pins to prick, and needles to sew;
And whisky and loch leeches.”

So it came to pass that, seeing how money could be made with the scrape of a pen in a notandum book, without the fasherie of a ware-house, I bethought me of sticking to that line, as just as guid a way of getting to a provosty as by cotton-mills or handlooms—the Power kind were not then invented.

Thus, from less to more, instead of going to the Tontine, to hear the clishmaclavers about the war, I was most particular in reading the London Prices Current; by the which, and a bit touch-and-go bargain, now and then, in a canny corner, there is no saying how eruditical I became. In short, I could discern, with the tail of my e'e, that folk thought of me as they would have done of King Solomon, had he been a speculawtor in cotton bage, as well as in peacocks and hyssop.

But, though I thus lightly speak of the change in my way of life, I had often an inward grue, even when I had made a sappy profit; for I thought the trade of a speculawtor no unlike that of a gamester. Many, many a time has a seroon of indigo reminded me, blue as it was, of a pair of dice, and a wheel-spread out sample table, of a dambrod—saying to myself, verily the one is just as beneficial to the world as the other; but cards and dice are the least harmful; for surely to buy commodities, and hold them, that they may become scarce, to fetch a better price when sold, is not a right merchandizing.

Maybe, however, the thought of this did not kithe till I had what I thought was a nest-egg; certain it is, that it was not overly in my meditations till long after I was married to auld Dir-dumwhamle's granddochter, begetting sons and daughters, and was on the leet for a bailie. But I should first enlarge a little on the mysteries of that trade, whilk, with every new crop of ettling creatures who know not what they ettle for, beyond getting a crouse look and a fine waistcoat, will be a plague and pestilence to the king's realm, till it is put down by course of law, or what, maybe, is as powerful, the common sense of the people, turned to a right consideration.

It must be rightly understood, and well and clearly made known, what pestiferous black-legs speculawtors are, before it can be hoped that those who only buy and sell to make money, will get pans tied to their tails. No doubt, to cheat with cotton bags and rum puncheons is very abominable—just as bad as the cheating with cards, for which the divour Lord has been sent a garssing; but it's of the honest speculawtors I'm speaking—the fair-playing gambling that's just now setting so many weel-doing men with small families, with a rung and a meal-pock, to seek their meat.

CHAPTER VII.

No doubt the end of all trafficking is to make money; but, as the minister said, whereof I have made mention at the beginning of this, the outline and selvdge of my public life, the mere to-look to make money is in itself no great go. For now when I can afford it, I may say that, although my strive was to make money, it was not for the money I strove. My ettle was for something aboon that, the which sanctified the means whereby I struggled; and, therefore, surely there is no brag in saying, that, although my valise now is no found at every dike-side, it was not the God Gear of this world I served, but something of a 'sponsibility, like a provosty. In short, though I aye kept in mind the minister's paternoster anent commercing, I was just as those are that "bode of a gowden gown;" for, if I have not got a provosty, I have "gotten the sleeves of," and I want now no more. What douce man in his senses would, indeed, in thae times, fash his head about 'lections? Really I jealousy that they are no overly bien at home, who are seen, jokefellow-like, with the clanjamphry on the croun of the causeway. However.

Having rehearsed how I came, from needcessity, to fall into the speculawtor's way of trade, the which was a manifest intent of Providence, I might enlarge on the subject; but it is enough to say, as I have done, that I began the world as a weaver, was syne a manufacturer, and, having perished the pack because of the politics of William Pitt & Co., I took the speculawting in the natural way—I was not 'nuculated—as I have shewn forth. Therefore, what I have now to counsel is, that, although some, like me, may make a bawbee by buying and selling commodities, it's a line that's no orthodox; only I dinna think it may well be put down by the law; but it's a duty we all owe to our species, to laugh and guffaw at it when we can, till we make all sort of speculawtors gang by with their tails atween their legs, and as their noses were bleeding. It's for that I indite this.

Nothing can be more creditable than it is for a merchant, who has correspondents in foreign parts, to send to them to buy up, we'll say, the cotton that may be in their market, and bring it home in vesheles, and sell it to manufacturers. But tell me wherein is the commendable of going into the market at home, and giving a better price to the merchant (which the speculawtor does) than the manufacturer, all for no other end than to gar the poor doited manufacturer pay a higher price for the same thing there-after.

What, noo, would our guidwife say, in her me-conomey, if she was mindit to have a goose, or any other sort of a fool, to our dinner, the which we have very often, if, when she sent Leizy to the market, poor Leizy came back with her finger in her mouth, saying that Mrs Chuckies, the hen-wife, had forestalled all the geese and fools, and that one was not to be had for love nor money, but at two prices? Would not she say that Mrs Chuckies should be put to the ban of the empire? And is it not something in this way that the speculawtors in cotton-bags, coffee-beans, or puncheons of rum, implement, and the big wigs hold forth in the Parliament House of Edinburgh?

When I say this, let me no be misunderstood. Those, I think, are righteous merchants who bring home, from their correspondents in far lands, commodities to sell here; but I account them noughty speculawtors, though maybe I was one myself, that gang into the market and raise the price to the consumer—which the manufacturer, in a sence, surely is, seeing that he digests cotton, for example, into yarn, and maybe into mualin. It is, however, against the trafficking in raw materials that I am most hite—and for this reason: The outlay on manufactured articles is so great that, as yet, folk cannot afford to keep them long on hand; but raw materials are cheap, and everybody in credit kens that the renewal, now and then, of a bit bill for them, is no so ill as maybe to swallow a camel. For God's sake, folk, crunch the speculawtors under your heels, like yird toads. And I say this to you very disinterestedly, for I am now no longer a speculawtor—although ye were to feed them with honeycombs, little of the sweets would come my way.

CHAPTER VIII.

ALTHOUGH I may be casting pearls before swine, Mr. Thrift, who knows that I am inditing anent my experiences, has just come in, and said, that I shall not put my foot to the behind of the speculawtors with a proper admonishment, if I do not expound that mystery of the London bankers, the which is in the mouth of gentle and simple, concerning hundreds of thousands of pounds, in those intelligent oracles of veracity, the newspapers. I mean intelligent, as to commercial huggermuggering. So, to please him, for whom I have a very great respect, I set down what I defy any speculawtor of half my insight to deny.

It's a common way for your foxy merchants, as I think now speculawtors surely are, to speak of a man's wealth by the balance between his assets and his engagements, by which many are repated to be golden images that have but feet of clay. It, however, is a profitable glamour, that; for what is said of one, the rest very well know will be said of them all—and thereby profit may be made.

It's no to be doubted when a man is balancing his books for a division of profit with another—apartner—he makes count and reckoning of good and bad debts, and an allowance for the same. Nothing can be more just; but is that the way the speculawtor does, when he goes to the Bank of England, or other monied bodies, to borrow the needful? Does not he keep his thumb on good and bad debts, and just shews how rich he would be if all were come in, in this way?

Assets,	£350,000
Liabilities,	150,000

£200,000!!! his fortune.

By this statement, he makes it appear that he is worth, as the speculawtors say, a plum. But the Old Lady in Threadneedle Street is a pawkie carlin. When she gets such an account, she says to this effect, in her parlour, "counting o'er her money:"—"Ay, he's a rich man to be in straits, that Mr Galore that wants the loan. He's worth a plum; and what sort of plum is't? An Orleans plum. Well! let me see't.

His plum's rotten in the side; he will not cut up for more than £36,000; and I'll no be safe to lend him above £20,000, and with that he must get me unexceptionable personal security, besides give me what is no to be spoken of to the public, a lien over his good debts, for the amount of the loan. I may then safely lend—to help worthy Mr Galore, and his partner Mr Bray, to go on—£20,000."

So says Mrs Flimsy, the old leddy; but, when she's undressed, she tells her maid Jenny, in the sanctum of her bedroom, that Messrs Galore, Bray, & Co., may, with her help, stand a while; but, when she is paid back her advance, let that soft-headed fat man, John Bull, look to himself.

When, indeed, was it ever heard of, that a speculawtor who needed the help of a banker, to enable him to keep up the price of the commodity he had forestalled, prospered in the end? He must either begin, when he gets a loan, to wind up, or prepare himself to go to pigs and whistles by and by. No doubt, there are out-of-the-way instances of speculawtors getting round the corner of an obstacle; but it's no a good line—and chiefly for this reason, it depends more on good luck than good guiding, which no right trade does. In all trades, craft and skill is of some account; but when a waft of wind may disperse the brightest castles in a cloud, what's the use of eydencie? No doubt, in thir times, to mak money, as the world goes, is the chief end of man; but, like me with my provostry, it should only be as a means. And wiselike folk will ne'er forget that it's next to a cheatry of the world, though it may be honest according to law, to make money as a file makes scrapings—merely by garring a commodity go through hands. Speculawtors are just industrious files—they scrape something off of all they touch; and the thing they work upon is no the heavier of substance for it, nor the thing itself made in any sort for the use of man.

MACGILLIVRAY'S HISTORY OF BRITISH BIRDS.*

THE naturalists, or as many of their number as are only amateurs, slightly tinged with science, and unobtrusive in its display, are the most delightful of all book twaddlers—the novelists, who treat of lady-birds and unfeathered bipeds, hardly excepted. But then it is a special condition that they shall be non-scientific, or shew no more knowledge than Izaak Walton, White of Selborne, or Mr Jesse. The sylvan Squire Waterton himself, who resents as an affront, being styled an amateur, would sometimes be by far too learned for popular readers, unless the fire of his fancy, and the piquancy of his style, carried off the weight of his matter. We own to grave fears when first opening this formidable-sized volume, and glancing at so many anatomical engravings of subjects much more agreeable when presented on plates of porcelain, as livered wings or stewed giblets. But a little courage to surmount the first shock is all that is required, even by the most delicate lady; who, according to Mr Macgillivray, thinks nothing of spitting insects, but is utterly horrified at cruel ornithologists untrussing and dissecting birds.

After turning over a few pages of very learned matter, it will be discovered that the work of our scientific ornithologist fully equals, even in their peculiar vein, the works of the most entertaining, eloquent, and fanciful of his congeners. If not so far-travelled as some of them, his range of observation at home has been wider; and he has contrived, after all that has been written about birds, to impart not only freshness but originality to many of his sketches. Without going beyond the boundaries of Scotland and its islands, he has led us into a new region.

"There is a freshness of heart," says our author, "manifest in every real lover of nature—a delightful feeling, gratifying not to one's self alone, but to his companions." They are, indeed, the most enlivening of out-door companions; generally open-hearted and kindly; often amiable egotists, and most entertaining in those sparring matches for which they are as remarkable as artists or churchmen—or the cockney sparrows, at those seasons when the males instinctively indulge in sham-desperate Whig-and-Tory combats ending in nothing. Mr Macgillivray is too sensible of the inherent pugnacity of the ornithologist, to have given way to it. He at most indulges in one or two sly hits, and deprecates that disputatious spirit, the attempt to eradicate which is, we fear, hopeless. "Some person," he says—

Proposes a general meeting of British ornithologists at London, York, or Edinburgh, for the purpose of determining the English nomenclature of our native birds; but such a meeting, were it to take place, would disperse without accomplishing the object in view, unless, indeed, its members were placed on the Bass Rock, and interdicted fire and food until they had settled all their differences, and sworn perpetual friendship. Even then, some malicious Celt, capable of subsisting a month on dulse and tangles, with an occasional raw limpet or mussel, might hold out until, rather than be starved, the philosophers should leave the birds to him to do with them as he pleased.

In another place, when comparing wandering naturalists with the vagatores or crow tribes, he remarks—

A friend of mine, for example, who writes to me from Charleston, that he is about setting out to explore the shores of the Mexican Gulf and the south-western limits of the United States, and return to Edinburgh by the end of autumn, is typical of this family. Hunting by sight, not by scent, now sweeping along the Alleghanies, anon searching the mud-flats of the Mississippi, feasting to-day on an old gobbler on the banks of the Red River, to-morrow picking up a water-hen from among the reeds of the St John's, he represents, as Le Vaillant formerly represented, the dark-winged raven, corvus corax. The carrion crow, corvus corone, has its analogue in some other wanderer, who is fond of kicking alligators' ribs, and strangling rattle-snakes. The hooded crow, corvus cornix, clamorous before rain, feeding on small fry, keeping a good look-out when pilfering, but, being pied, easily recognised, represents another; while a fourth resembles the industrious rook, corvus frugilegus, that gleams in the fields, on the hills, and by the shores, finding, in common and neglected objects, much that is not less nutritious than savoury. The jackdaw, pert, and fond of perching on pinnacles, has many representatives; and the chattering, thievish, and handsome magpie, is not without some admirers and imitators.

We leave the vagatores to fit themselves with hoods.

Though the non-scientific portion of Mr Macgillivray's volume is that which will find most favour with the general student, as well as with readers for mere amusement, it would be unfair, even in a publication of the popular nature of this Magazine, to omit all notice of what is original in the views or peculiar in the classification of the author of so elaborate an undertaking. The volume before us embraces only the first part of a scientific "History of British Birds;" but in it the original views of the author are, we presume, completely unfolded.

It comprehends the four Orders, with their families, the best known in this country, and most endeared to the affections of the human family. These are—1st, The Scrapers, or Gallinaceous Birds, including fowls, pheasants, and all the varieties of grouse, partridges, and quails; 2d, The Cooers, or Pigeons, in their lovely varieties; 3d, The Huskers, or Hard-billed Birds, comprehending the endless varieties of song birds, finches, linnets, sparrows, and buntings; and, 4th, the Vagatores, or Wanderers—that is, crows and the allied genera, under the families of which we find the starling and the rare rose-coloured cow-bird. These, it may be imagined, afford abundant scope for description: and faithful and spirited description of the haunts and habits of birds, sketches of the mountain wildernesses of the interior Highlands, and of the loneliest shores of the Hebrides, and many engaging rural and sylvan scenes in the more cultivated midland districts of Scotland, form the charm of this work. Before we arrive at these, it may be briefly remarked that the chief difference in classification between Mr Macgillivray and preceding ornithologists is, as we understand him, that, instead of tracing and establishing relations by the wing, feet, and bill alone, he rests also, and, indeed, mainly, upon the digestive organs and the parts connected with them; concluding that their structure corresponding with the nature of the food instinctively sought, determines the habits and haunts of the bird. Lest we misapprehend this matter, Mr Macgillivray shall himself explain what is so essential and original in his views:—

I have thought it prudent, in the present unsettled state of opinion on the subject, and under the conviction that all existing systems are defective, to adopt the opinions of no systematist, but to group the species according to their obvious relations. After much consideration, however, and after examining the digestive organs in a great number of birds belonging to nearly all the families, I have resolved to adopt the intestinal canal as a central point of reference. Instead, then, of describing merely the bill, I attend to the mandibles, the mouth, the tongue, the throat, the œsophagus, the crop, the proventriculus, the stomach, the intestine, and the cœcal appendages; the modifications of which seem to me to throw more light upon the affinities of the larger groups than those of any other organ.

He illustrates his theory—which we presume to be original, though we pretend to no scientific knowledge of the subject whatever—by a comparative view of the organization of the Peregrine Falcon. The most essential characters of the four Orders treated of in the volume are formally stated to be those derived from the digestive organs. These organs are figured by accurate engravings; and it is affirmed (page 99) that, "By simply inspecting the intestinal canal of a bird belonging to any of those species, one can invariably refer it to its proper Order." Mr Macgillivray, who appears to have been a zealous and indefatigable dissector, omits, however, none of the characteristics usually recognised by the most scientific ornithologists in his descriptions of form and structure. These are minute and clear; and, we doubt not, accurate. To unscientific readers, his amplifications and superstitiously scrupulous accuracy may even seem, if not a fault, a drawback. He, however, repudiates the pedantry and mysterious gravity of the formal instructor, affirming a truth in which we very heartily concur, that a pompous ornithologist is, of all characters, one of the most absurd. And, again, that "The man who would effectually learn from nature, must approach with affection, and receive her instructions with a humility that would ill accord with any subsequent vain display of the knowledge acquired." This is hopeful.

In nomenclature, Mr Macgillivray is certainly not superstitious. He shakes off the trammels of the whole host of systematic ornithologists, which—after what he had intimated of the probable consequences of a congress even at the Bass Rock—is but ordinary prudence. His unfettered nomenclature—which we do not find quite so jaw-breaking as that of many of his learned congeners—descends to the familiar and pretty, yea, poetical names, which the common people, Lowland and Highland, give to birds; and as we love a primrose, a gowan, a daisy, a violet, or harebell, far better when called by these homely and antique names, redolent of thousands of delightful associations, than by fine botanic appellations, so do we like the gor-cock, the corby, and the cushat, picturesque terms which Mr Macgillivray has had the good taste to adopt.

But having attempted to do an act of justice to our author's science, we take glad leave of his classification and new theory of the digestive organs, which some may fancy a favourite hobby, and others hail as a new era in the history of ornithology; and turn to matters more attractive.

So far as the boundaries of braid Scotland extend, Mr Macgillivray's range of study, as we have stated, has been extensive and diversified. He has watched the ptarmigan in the wildest mountain glens of the central Highlands; and the rock dove, the raven, and starling, in the midst of which he seems to have been reared, in the caverns of the dreariest shores of the outer Hebrides. There he is ever completely at home, and fresh and animated. With the habits of the song-birds, the Conirostral Order, other British naturalists have, we think, been as familiar. Mr Macgillivray's personal experience appears to have been chiefly confined to the extremities of society—the wilderness, or the city. He talks with better knowledge of grey ptarmigan and sparrows, than of linnets and finches, save, indeed, of the chaffinch, which is a suburban bird. His book he states to be the result of twenty years' observation and experiment. With the scientific details and descriptive sketches, there are interspersed what he calls "Lessons on Practical Ornithology," which, in spite of the unpromising name, are not the least attractive portion of the volume. They are, in fact, the narrative of tours and short excursions undertaken by a man of poetic taste, who brings that ardour and enthusiasm to his favourite pursuit, without which the ornithologist is naught—"a dry skin." Instead of following our author in the beaten and civilized tracks around Edinburgh and the shores of the Frith of Forth, or in the vale of the Tweed, we shall at once place the practical ornithologist, wishing to receive a "lesson," upon one of the most dismal and distant of the Hebrides.

Having, in October 1817, as I find by one of my note-books, left Borne in Harris, in company with the Rev. Mr Alexander Macleod, minister of the Forest district, I crested the sandford and hills of Luskentir, to the little Bay of Kindibig, where we lodged with a farmer, who next day ferried us over Loch Tarbert, to a place called Ura. We remained there for a night, and then continued our journey, proceeding up a long, craggy, and bleak valley, in which is a very dark-coloured lake, famous for a goblin-beast which is seen upon it in summer in the form of a black mass having three humps. The wind was exceedingly keen, the hail came in great showers, and the summits of the mountains were covered with snow. I left the parson a little above Marig, a creek on Loch Seaforth, in which was his dreary-looking habitation; and, having resolved to ascend the highest hill, in order to witness a Hebridian snow storm in all its glory, I proceeded toward Clisheim, the height of which is estimated at somewhat more than three thousand feet. In despite of hail and snow, and the furious whirlwinds or eddying blasts that swept the mountain at intervals, I made my way, though not without labour, to the summit; and well was I recompensed; for there I enjoyed a very sublime spectacle. I was on the highest pinnacle of that range of islands denominated the Outer Hebrides, or Long Island, perched, like a ptarmigan, on a craggy and precipitous ridge. The islands of Uist, Harris, and Lewis, lay, as it were, at my feet. Toward the east and south, in the extreme distance, appeared the mountains of the counties of Ross and Inverness, with the pointed hills, and craggy capes, and sloping plains of Skye. Westward, a long series of summits, commencing with that on which I stood, and forming a broad ridge, intersected transversely by deep valleys, extended for several miles. They appeared to be much lower than the mountain on which I was, and resembled heaps of sand formed by pouring it from a vessel. The snow lay rather deep on them all, and the whirlwinds that swept along their ridges, scattering it in spiral flakes, presented an indescribably beautiful and sublime appearance. I was enveloped in one; but it did not prove very boisterous. The Atlantic was covered with huge clouds, that advanced in disorderly groups, nearly on a level with my position; but the waving streams of snow and hail that poured from them, left no trace on the stormy waters. Toward the north, lay the dreary flats of Lewis, covered with lakes, and flanked with the Park and Uig mountains. Having gazed upon the splendid scene until nearly frozen, I descended with considerable difficulty into a deep valley, where I encountered a fall of snow so dense as to render me apprehensive of being smothered by it. I felt, too, for the first time, perhaps, the benumbing effects of cold, my feet and fingers having become almost senseless, and a feeling of faintness having crept over me. However, by walking and running, I soon recovered heat enough; and, after passing the deep glen of Langadale, ascended an eminence in a kind of pass between two mountains, whence I discovered tokens of cultivation at the distance of three or four miles, so that I was assured of being in the proper direction toward the house of a friend whom I had not seen for many years. By a stream in a desolate valley, I fell in with a herd of seven deer, which, however, I did not attempt to molest; and, in the evening, was welcomed to the cottage of Ewen Macdiarmid, at the head of Loch Roost, one of the dreary inlets of this dismal-looking coast.

Here there is small variety of birds of any kind to be seen, and none are described. Those beheld fall under other Orders; and we anticipate much pleasure from seeing Mr Macgillivray handle them on some future day. Among the sea-fowl he must be quite at home. It is from knowledge of the central Highlands, and especially of the Hebrides, of which Mr Macgillivray appears to be a native, that his work derives its prevailing character. Many ornithologists, scientific and amateur, may be, as we have intimated, as much or better acquainted with the black-bird, the robin, and the goldfinch. He has not, like the lord of Walton-Hall, who lives in the midst of birds, in a sort of great open Austin cage, succeeded in getting the horn owl, the brown owl, the heron, the jackdaw, the magpie, the common crow, the mallard, the pheasant, the starling, the woodpecker, the ox-eye titmouse, the water-hen, the thrush, and the blackbird, to build their nests and take away their young in safety at a stone-throw from each other. He has not attempted this; yet the Hebridian naturalist had opportunities, which to the Southron or the "closet ornithologist" are rare if not unattainable. In a description of the habits of the red and the black grouse, we have this poetical passage:—

It is pleasant to hear the bold challenge of the gormcock at early dawn on the wild moor, remote from human habitation, where, however, few ornithologists have ever listened to it. I remember, with delight, the cheering influence of its cry on a cold morning in September, when, wet to the knees, and with a sprained ankle, I had passed the night in a peat bog, in the midst of the Grampians, between the sources of the Tummel and the Dee. Many years ago, when I was of opinion, as I still am, that there is little pleasure in passing through life dry-shod and ever-comfortable, I was returning to Aberdeen from a botanical excursion through the Hebrides and the south of Scotland. At Blair-Atholl, I was directed to a road that leads over the hill, and which, I was informed, was much shorter than the highway. By it I proceeded until I reached Blair Lodge, where I obtained some refreshment, of which I stood greatly in need. The goodwoman very benevolently exerted herself to persuade me to remain all night, the hills being, as she said, bleak and dreary, entirely destitute of everything that could afford pleasure to a traveller, and even without human habitation—the nearest house being fifteen miles north. It was now six o'clock, and I was certain of being benighted; but I had promised to be at the source of the Dee by noon of next day, and all the dragons of darkness could not have prevented me from at least striving to fulfil my engagement. They had never heard of the spring in question, nor even of the river; no Cairngorum could be seen; and a woman, just returned from the Spey, informed me that I should be under the necessity of going through Badenoch before I could get to it. I placed more confidence in my travelling map.

We need not chill the reader with the sufferings of a cold night spent on the hill-side on a couch of heather.

Morning actually came at last, and I started up to renew my journey. It was now that I got a view of my lodging, which was an amphitheatre formed of bare craggy hills, covered with fragments of stone and white moss, and separated by patches of peat bog. Not a house was to be seen, nor a sheep, nor even a tree, nor so much as a blade of green grass. Not a vestige of life can be found here, thought I; but I was reproved by a cry that startled me. The scarlet crest and bright eye of a moorcock were suddenly protruded from a tuft of heather, and I heard with delight the well-known kok, kok, of the "blessed bird," as the Highlanders call him. It was a good omen; the night and dulness had fled, and I limped along as cheerily as I could. My half-frozen blood soon regained its proper temperature; ere long, I reached the base of the rocky ridge, and, after passing some hills, traversing a long valley, and ascending a mountain of considerable height, I took out my map, and, looking eastward below me, saw, to my great satisfaction, a rivulet running for several miles directly in the course marked. I was assured that this stream, whether the source or not, ran into the Dee, as it proceeded eastward; and, therefore, I directed my steps towards it. But here, too, a scene occurred which gave me great pleasure. Some low croaking sounds came from among the stones around me, and presently after a splendid flock of grey ptarmigan, about fifty in number, rose into the air, and whirled past me, on their way to the opposite eminence. On the brow of the hill I found two large fountains, the sources of the stream below, of each of which I drank a mouthful, and proceeded.

The habits of the grouse, a tribe now so interesting to the sportsman, are farther detailed, both from the author's personal observations in the north, and those of a remarkably far-seeing correspondent in the heights of Peebles-shire, bearing the same name as the Ettrick Shepherd, and probably one of his cousins. The author states:—

When disturbed while feeding, the male often boldly starts up, and utters a loud cackle, which may be imitated by quickly repeating the syllable kot with a deep voice. In spring and summer, they are often heard uttering the same sound without being disturbed, whether as a call of defiance to their fellows, or of warning or protection to their mates or young. Early in the morning, as well as late in the evening, but also occasionally through the day, you may hear on the moors a loud cry, which is easily syllabled into go, go, go, go, go-back, go-back, although the Celts, naturally imagining the moorcock to speak Gaelic, interpret it as signifying co, co, co, co, mo-chlaidh, mo-chlaidh—that is, who, who, (goes there?) my sword, my sword!

Are not these contrasted interpretations characteristic of the genius of Highlanders and Lowlanders? What follows is for our modern battue gentry. What would the old lovers of gentle woodcraft have said to those wholesale slaughters which convert a gentleman's preserves into a market poultryman's killing yard?

In my opinion, it is a pitiful and barbarous sport, as pursued by a regularly equipped and legally qualified slaughterer, who, even without the labour of charging his gun, still less of carrying home the produce of his idle industry, destroys as much game in one day as might serve for a dozen. But, in a district where the birds are not very numerous, and where, to procure half-a-dozen braces, one is obliged to traverse a large extent of ground, he cannot fail to find enjoyment, who, starting early with his dog, accompanied by a friend, travels over mountain and moor, inhaling the balmy air of the heathery hills, and renovating his spirits by vigorous exercise, until the declining sun warns him to retrace his course, and he returns to his home, where the comforts of social enjoyment are prepared for him. The pleasure experienced by the young sportsman, who, after much blundering perhaps, returns from a day's long excursion, with two or three braces of ptarmigan, and as many plovers, is scarcely attainable by the experienced wholesale slaughterer. . . .

The nest of the brown ptarmigan is found in the midst of the heath, in a shallow cavity, and formed of bits of twigs, grass, and sometimes a few of its own feathers, irregularly put together. The eggs are from eight to twelve, or even more, generally an inch and seven-twelfths in length, an inch and three-twelfths across, of a regular oval form, yellowish-white, pale yellowish-grey, or brownish-yellow, thickly clouded, blotched, and dotted with blackish and amber-brown. The young leave the nest soon after they are freed from the shell.

The red grouse, "the blessed bird," is considered by the Highlanders a bird of good omen. By its crowing at daybreak, the wandering spirits of evil are put to flight—

"They vanish at the crowing of the cock."

The grey ptarmigan or grouse, a bird much less known than the red grouse, Mr Macgillivray had often met with in the Hebrides; but those who would more easily attain the pleasure of seeing it, he advises to start from the Castleton of Braemar at dawn, or soon after it. He does not disapprove of a good breakfast, nor even a thimbleful of whisky on a cold day. It was after ascending the valley of the Dee for some distance, and also after this preliminary adventure, that Mr Macgillivray met the grey ptarmigan.

Started a small covey of black grouse, which, at the time being a novice, I mistook for the capercaillie, and, proceeding northward, came to a deep ravine or "den," in which were some native trees of Pyrus aucuparia, Populus tremula, and Betula alba. Following this stream for several miles up a heathy valley, I entered a decayed forest of white birch. Few objects present a more melancholy picture of the ruin of a primeval world than those blasted trunks, some prostrate and crumbling into fragments, others scattered along the hills like an army of giants, suddenly scathed by the wrath of heaven.

Crossing a small stream, by which grew in abundance Gnaphalium supinum, Galium saxatile, and the beautiful though very common digitalis purpurea, I sat down to consider what might be the best route, and reconnoitre the face of the huge, rounded mass, which I divided into three portions:—first, a plain or platform, rising gently at the farther end, and forming a pretty steep acclivity, terminating about a third up; secondly, the middle part, consisting of fragments of rock, stones, and gravel, intermixed with a little vegetation; thirdly, the remaining part, three or four hundred feet high, similar to the last, but more sterile. If one traces his proposed route in this manner, he finds it in general easy enough to ascend a hill without a guide; whereas, if he proceeds at random, he is very liable to become involved among difficulties. Hitherto the sky had been clear; but now clouds began to gather around the summits of the mountains, although that before me was still unshrouded. As I ascended, I saw, to the west, the remains of a natural forest of pine, scattered along the sides of a valley, and, on entering the second region, found the heath and other plants greatly diminished in size, while various species occurred that indicated an approach to what in botany is called an Alpine station. Near the summit of a projecting mass of rock, in this region, I sat down among the crumbling blocks of granite, to compare the Aira flexuosa, which grew in tufts, with its characters in Smith's "Compendium;" and, when I rose, a large covey of ptarmigans sprung from among the stones, about a hundred and fifty yards beneath me.

These beautiful birds, while feeding, run and walk among the weather-beaten and lichen-crustured fragments of rock, from which it is very difficult to distinguish them when they remain motionless, as they invariably do should a person be in sight. Indeed, unless you are directed to a particular spot by their strange low croaking cry, which has been compared to the harsh scream of the misel-thrush, but which seems to me much more like the cry of a frog, you may pass through a flock of ptarmigans without observing a single individual, although some of them may not be ten yards distant. When squatted, however, they utter no sound, their object being to conceal themselves; and, if you discover the one from which the cry has proceeded, you generally find him on the top of a stone, ready to spring off the moment you shew an indication of hostility. If you throw a stone at him, he rises, utters his call, and is immediately joined by all the individuals around, which, to your surprise, if it be your first rencontre, you see spring up one by one from the bare ground. They generally fly off in a loose body, with a direct and moderately rapid flight, resembling, but lighter than that of the brown ptarmigan, and settle on a distant part of the mountain, or betake themselves to one of the neighbouring summits, perhaps more than a mile distant.

We regret to dismiss a fine and characteristic description of the wildly sublime scenery of the mountains which

"Guard the rills of infant Dee."

Many more coveys were seen before the ramble reached the village of Kingussie in Badenoch. Mr Macgillivray seems a genuine mountaineer; with much of the grave and stately enthusiasm of the character. At the termination of this exciting solitary expedition, he says—

It is delightful to wander far away from the haunts, and even the solitary huts of men, and, ascending the steep mountains, seat one's self on the ruinous cairn that crowns its summit, where, amid the grey stones, the ptarmigan gleams its Alpine food. There, communing with his own heart, in the wilderness, the lover of nature cannot fail to look up to nature's God. I believe it, in fact, impossible, in such a situation, on the height of Ben-na-muic-dui, or Ben Nevis, for example, not to be sensible, not merely of the existence, but also of the presence of a Divinity. In that sacred temple, of which the everlasting hills are the pillars, and the blue vault of heaven the dome, he must be a fiend indeed who could harbour an unholy thought. But, to know himself, one must go there alone. Accompanied by his fellows, he may see all of external nature that he could see in solitude, but the hidden things of his own heart will not be brought to light. To me, the ascent of a lofty mountain has always induced a frame of mind similar to that inspired by entering a temple; and I cannot but look upon it as a gross profanation to enact, in the midst of the sublimities of creation, a convivial scene, such as is usually got up by parties from our large towns, who seem to have no higher aim in climbing to the top of Benlomond or Benledi than to feast there upon cold chicken and "mountain dew," and toss as many stones as they can find over the precipices.

An autumn walk, on a cheerful day, in the rich environs of Edinburgh, makes a good contrast to the above Alpine ramble, and introduces the reader to the many gratifying sights in birds, plants, fossil remains, and fine scenery, to be met with in the picturesque neighbourhood of the northern metropolis.

Another section—that which makes us acquainted with the ring dove or cushat, and the rock dove, with whose history and habits our ornithologist is delightfully familiar—possesses more attraction, we think, and, at all events, more novelty. We must, therefore, indulge in a pretty long extract, as we know not where to look for so minute and beautiful a relation of the habits of this charming bird of the wilderness—the true stock dove, according to Mr Macgillivray, although the name has been given to the intermediate well-known species.

The rock dove, which is the original of our domestic pigeons, is a very beautiful bird, although its style of colouring is less gaudy than that of many exotic species. It is of a compact form, the body being rather full, the neck rather short, the head small, the feet short and strong, the wings rather long, the tail of moderate length.

The general colour of the plumage is light greyish-blue, the lower parts being as deeply coloured as the upper. The middle of the neck all round is splendid with green, its lower part with purplish-red. The back and the upper part of the sides, from near the shoulders to near the tail, are pure white, as are the lower wing-coverts and auxillaries.

At the western extremity of Ben Capral, a promontory of one of the remote Hebrides, is a vast mass of rock, broken by gaps and fissures into projecting crags and sloping shelves, and looking as if originally produced by the separation of a portion of the mountain which had sunk into the depths of the ocean that heaves its billows against the rugged shores. At the summit is an aggregation of angular fragments, the termination of an elevated ridge, and midway down is a green slope, horizontally traversed by several paths formed by the sheep, which, at all seasons, but especially in spring, are fond of rambling among the crags, in search of fresh pasturage. The declivity terminates on the sinuous and angular edge of precipices several hundred feet in height, near the upper part of which, a pair of White-tailed Eagles have fixed their abode, while the crevices are here and there peopled by starlings. The shelves of these rocks are totally inaccessible by ordinary means, although an adventurous shepherd or farmer sometimes descends on a rope held by half a dozen people above, to destroy an eagle's nest, or rescue a sheep which has leaped upon some grassy spot, and is unable to reascend; but on one side, by a steep and slippery descent in a fissure, one may penetrate to the base, where he discovers a hole in the rock, barely large enough to admit him on his hands and knees. This hole is the entrance of a narrow passage in a crevice, roofed with fallen blocks. On one hand is a recess, in which a person might recline at full length, and which was actually employed as a bed by Mr Macleod of Berneray, after the battle of Culloden; and a few yards farther, the crevice opens into an irregular cave, communicating seaward with the open air, and formed by a rent in the rock, filled above with large blocks that seem ready to fall. The heavy surges of the Atlantic continually dash against a heap of stones, which partially block up the mouth of the cave. On this heap, the crested cormorants nightly repose, and, in summer, rear their young. The little shelves and angular recesses of the roof and upper parts of the cavern are tenanted by pigeons, the light blue of whose plumage has a beautiful appearance, relieved as they are by the dark ground of the moist rocks, and the soft murmur of whose notes comes upon the ear with a pleasing though melancholy effect. There, and in other places of a similar nature, have I watched these beautiful birds, until I rendered myself in some measure familiar with their habits; and, amid such wild and desolate scenes, have I loved to wander, and indulge in the not less wild imaginings of a spirit that desired to hold converse with the unseen but ever present Spirit of the universe. At early dawn, the pigeons may be seen issuing from these retreats in straggling parties, which soon take a determinate direction, and, meeting with others by the way, proceed in a loose body along the shores, until they reach the cultivated parts of the country, where they settle in large flocks, diligently seeking for grains of barley and oats, pods of the charlock, seeds of the wild mustard, polygons, and other plants, together with several species of small shell-snails, especially Helix ericetorum and Bulimus acutus, which abound in the sandy pastures. When startled, they rise suddenly, and, by striking the ground with their wings, produce a crackling noise. When at full speed, they fly with great celerity, the air whistling against their pinions. Their flight is very similar to that of the ringed and golden plovers, birds which, in form, approach very nearly to the pigeons, as may be seen more especially on comparing their skeletons; and, as this affinity has not been observed by any other person, I would direct the attention of ornithologists to it.

The notes of the rock dove resemble the syllables ooo-roo-ooo quickly repeated, the last prolonged. It is monogamous, as I apprehend all wild birds, even the gallinaceous, are, and its nuptials are celebrated with much cooing and circumambulation on the part of the male. A love scene among the rocks is really an interesting sight. Concealed in a crevice, or behind a projecting cliff, you see a pigeon alight beside you, and stand quietly for some time, when the whistling of pinions is heard, and the male bird shoots past like an arrow, and is already beside his mate. Scarcely has he made a rapid survey of the place, when, directing his attention to the only beautiful object which he sees, he approaches her, erecting his head, swelling out his breast by inflating his crop, and spreading his tail, at the same time uttering the well known ooo-roo-ooo, the soft and somewhat mournful sounds of which echo among the cliffs. The female, shy and timorous, sits close to the rock, shifting her position a little as the male advances, and sometimes stretching out her neck, as if to repel him by blows. The male continues his strutting and cooing, until the female, inadvertently coming upon the edge of the shelf, flies off to the dark recesses of the neighbouring cave, where she has scarcely alighted when her lover is again by her side. Matters go on in this manner; and, in the meantime, a nest is gradually formed, which consists of withered stalks and blades of grass, or other plants, not very neatly arranged, but disposed so as to answer the intended purpose. Two beautiful white eggs, of an elliptical form, one an inch and four-twelfths in length, an inch and one-twelfth in breadth, the other a little shorter, are then deposited; and, in due time, the young make their appearance. During incubation, the male supplies his mate with food, which she picks from his throat as he forces it up from the crop. Even at other times, the female often goes up to the male, introduces her bill on one side into his mouth, and obtains a grain of barley, or a morsel of other food. In about three weeks, the young come abroad; and, after being fed and instructed by their parents for some days, are left to shift for themselves.

The rock dove is found in nearly all the rocky shores of Scotland and its islands; though it seems to have deserted the more frequented coasts. These birds are numerous in Shetland; and, if we are to believe that every pigeon is as voracious as a couple dissected by Mr Macgillivray's correspondent, we may well pity the Shetland farmers. In the crop of the male, above 1000 oat seeds were found, and 510 in that of the female! The bushels that may be devoured in six months by 5000 of these gentle doves, are appalling to think of. But, probably, as in many other cases, matters are not quite so bad as they seem.

Among other birds, starlings are found in great numbers in the Orkney and Shetland Isles, and in the Hebrides, where they remain all the year round, breeding in caverns and crevices on the rocky coast. Mr Macgillivray has taken great pains to get acquainted with the habits of this beautiful bird. The scene in which he found them, is singularly wild and interesting:—

Having, with much labour and some danger, descended from the summit of a maritime cliff on the west coast of one of the bare Hebrides, we are now standing in a low and ragged cavern, of which the upper part is formed of great blocks of gneiss, jammed into a rent of the solid rock, while the heavy waves of the Atlantic come rushing up its mouth, and alternately recede, leaving exposed, at intervals, a beautiful bed of polished pebbles. The melancholy tones of the rock dove's cooing issue from one of the recesses; and, as we look for the bird, we observe a starling perched on a projecting angle above, and screaming forth its low harsh note of alarm or anger. Presently, several individuals of the same species issue from various holes and fissures, and fly out of the cavern, followed by a few pigeons, the sound of whose wings echoes from the walls. A shot is fired, and, in the midst of the deafening noise that follows, a whole crowd of starlings hurry over head, to regain the open air, and escape the threatened danger. We have, in fact, strolled into one of their breeding places; and it being the month of June, we may here, at leisure, observe their domestic habits; but the tide is advancing, and, therefore, it may be best to regain the summit of the rock, purposing to return some other time. Early in the morning, accompanied, perhaps, at first by pigeons and cormorants, you may see them issue from their secure retreats, and hurry along the coast, or over the rocky ground, to the pastures and fields. The places to which, above all, they most frequently resort in summer and autumn, are the cowfolds where the farm stock is enclosed at night, and there, before the cattle are let out, or at milking time, you may find large flocks busily employed in searching among the old and dried dung, for larvae and worms, keeping up an incessant low chatter, frequently perching for a while on the cattle, and when satisfied reposing on the low walls of the fold, where you may often shoot them by half dozens—I do not say whole dozens, for, although that might happen, I never obtained more than six or seven at a single discharge. They also follow the cattle in the pastures and meadows, often perching on the backs of cows, horses, and sheep; but, although very frequently seen in this society, they do not always accompany these animals. In winter, they frequent the corn-yards, along with linnets, buntings, larks, and wild pigeons, to obtain a few grains of oats, search the stubble grounds for seeds, pick up small testaceous molluscs from the pastures, and occasionally visit the shores to feed on marine worms. In spring, they find a supply of food in the newly turned fields or patches of ground; in summer and autumn, they are furnished with abundance of larvae and worms, found chiefly under the dung of domestic animals; and they attack the corn in the same manner as the sparrow, although this kind of food is apparently less agreeable to them than their more usual kind. Starlings always keep in flocks, and generally fly in a compact body, which frequently appears to undergo a kind of rotatory motion, as the individuals shift their position. When in haste, however, they fly in a direct manner, without undulations, and with great speed, employing regularly-timed beats of their wings. . .

In winter, the flocks are often very large, but, even in the breeding season, the individuals that come abroad to search for food for their young, keep in parties. In the Outer Hebrides, they associate with no other birds, excepting occasionally pigeons; but in other parts they are frequently seen intermingled with jackdaws, rooks, and thrushes of different species. In sunny weather, even in winter, starlings congregated on a rock, the top of a wall, or other eminence, enact a very pleasant concert or medley, each singing in a low rather sweet voice, and the united effect being very similar to that of the winter song of a flock of redwings. Individually, the starling's ditty is certainly not equal to that of the thrush; but yet it is by no means despicable. . . . The flock of the starling is not much inferior to that of a thrush, although tougher; and, as a considerable number may be occasionally obtained at a single shot, this bird is not unworthy of the attention of the animal designated by the name of sportsman. . . .

In the Hebrides, the starlings begin to form their nests in the end of April or the beginning of May, selecting suitable spots in the crevices of rocks, in caverns, or under large blocks, in situations as inaccessible as possible. I have found them also in large winding holes in grassy banks, on an unfrequented islet, which I conjectured to have been originally formed by rats, and afterwards enlarged by the starlings. It appears, however, that they also dig holes of themselves on the grassy shelves of the rocks. The nest is bulky, composed of grass and portions of plants of various species, with a rude lining of feathers and hair. The eggs, which are from four to six, are of a somewhat elongated or regular oval form, glossy, and of a delicate very pale greenish-blue. They vary in length from an inch and a quarter to an inch and two twelfths or a little less, and in their greatest breadth from three-fourths to ten-twelfths of an inch. These birds occur in many other parts of Scotland, but are generally rare in the middle and southern divisions, where their colonies breed in maritime rocks, in old buildings, and sometimes in holes in decayed trees. In winter, they usually scatter over the country, appearing in flocks of greater or less extent in parts where they do not habitually reside.

Starlings are said to be getting more plentiful in the places specified, and to have become scarcer in England. This bird, as is well known, is easily tamed, and may be taught to speak and whistle tunes. Mr Macgillivray gives, at second hand, an account of one or two highly accomplished or college-bred individuals of the family. We have ourselves the pleasure of a long and intimate acquaintance with the Ayrshire shoemaker's pupil, whose name is Richard, not Charlie. Though now fallen somewhat into the sere and yellow leaf, he has not forgotten his early acquirements, and we can vouch for the truth of his powers in a monologue. Another pupil of the shoemaker was, perhaps, even more eloquent. "Come in, lads and lasses," was his opening; "take a' chairs, and sit down and hear Richard whistle the 'Laird of Cockpen.'" And here the air was whistled; after which the starling resumed, "Is not that pretty well for a small bird like me?" Our friend, Richard I., whistles "Over the water to Charlie;" but, probably from neglect, he is now at a loss to complete the air. He chatters much more than is set down for him by Mr Macgillivray; and, when informed, the other day, that he was become a distinguished historical bird, he seemed to fancy the compliment no more than was due to his talents. Since Richard has waxed in years, he has become more familiar, and rather fond of good living. At the breakfast hour, he regularly calls for his buttered toast; and, upon the cage-door being opened, he darts out, perches upon his master's hand, and devours his morsel with great relish. He also calls lustily for cream to his porridge, when the breakfast table is about to be cleared; and scolds for an hour, if his call is not attended to. There is, however, not much enjoyment to thinking bipeds, in the mere talk of starlings. One is tempted to say, as of other parrot-talkers, "Could you only learn to hold your tongue, you pretty creature, it might never be found out what a fool you are." Esteem for the intellect of birds is certainly not increased by their taught jargon.

To rooks, a long and amusing section of the work is devoted. They are plentiful, it seems, about Edinburgh, for reasons which may probably be easily explained by the philosophers of what wont to be called "the Stove School." We remember a paper upon the return of the lawyers of Modern Athens—most high-piled of cities!—from the assizes or the country, to the winter session, having for its motto,

"To their high-built airy nests,
See the Rooks returning home."

The hooded or Royston crow, so rare in the South—where the people, however, call the carrion crow the "hoodie crow"—and so frequent in the Highlands and the Islands of Scotland, is accurately described, and made out to be rather a respectable, well-conducted bird, which, without encroaching on the rights of others, knows how to keep its own place. Mr Macgillivray has no faith in crow-courts or crow-convocations of any kind, whether for justice or match-making; which last he conceives unnecessary, as the handfasting lasts all the year round. We are told that, when the hooded crow has found small crabs, and other shell-fish, it soars high in the air, and drops them on the ground to open them. We can easily believe this, as blackbirds—which are very plentiful in our neighbourhood, and as tame as the robin, picking out of the house-dog's dish along with the sparrows, and, in severe weather, scolding if the customary food is not set out for them—drop the snails they pick up in spring in the fields and garden, not on the walks, but, more effectually, upon the entrance steps, in order to break them. This fact, which was at first doubted, when asserted by the maid whose duty it was to keep the steps neat, was confirmed by observation. If it was found inconvenient to approach the steps, the flat coping of a wall was employed, on which to drop the snail-shells. The ox-eye titmouse is an equally familiar winter visiter with us. Numerous small perforations, not much bigger than pin points, made in the surface of hanging joints of meat, excited some surprise, and were found to be made by those courageous and clever birds, who made an hourly practice of entering the larder, and dabbling, on the wing, hovering round rather than settling on the joint, like humming-birds about a flower. In the same keeping-place, a robin, last year, made its nest in a small basket hanging against the wall, and safely brought out its young, unheeding who passed in or out. To preserve the robins from cats, and for the convenience of locking the door at night, a small hole was drilled in the door, the use of which Robin understood at once, and by it the parent birds made their ingress and egress until their parental duties were happily terminated. Chaffinches, robins, hedge-sparrows, and also the cockney species, abound in the same sheltered nook; and, in its season, the martlet, the loveliest of migratory birds, whether from the brilliancy of its plumage or the pathetic sweetness of its musical twitter, keeps us shy neighbourhood, though evidently annoyed by impudent hoats of Mr Macgillivray's passer domesticus. With us these well-remembered beggars are not merely familiar, but obtrusive, and difficult to be rebuffed; keeping watch opposite back-doors, to snatch any opportunity of entering, and reaching the accustomed dish.

With the raven Mr Macgillivray is well acquainted, as that bird exists in the Hebrides, where its habits, like those of the starling, are modified by situation. He describes it as a Remarkably grave and sedate bird; and, unlike many men who assume an aspect of dignity, it is equally noted for sagacity and prudence. It is crafty, vigilant, and shy, so as to be with great difficulty approached, unless in the breeding season, when its affectionate concern for its young, in a great measure overcomes its habitual dislike to the proximity of man—a dislike which is the result of prudence more than of mere timidity; for, under particular circumstances, it will not hesitate to make advances which a timorous bird would, no doubt, deem extremely hazardous. Either from natural instinct, or from observation and reflection, it appears to know, in some measure, the power of its arch enemy; and, finding that its own faculties are insufficient to enable it to counteract his destructive propensities, carefully avoids coming within his reach. On the other hand, it eats from off the same carcase as a dog, and takes its station close to an otter devouring its prey, doubtless because its vigilance and activity suffice to enable it to elude their efforts to inflict injury upon it; and, while it yields to the eagle, it drives away the hooded crow and the gull. It knows the distance, too, at which it is safe from a man armed with a gun, and allows the shepherd and his dogs to come much nearer than the sportsman. . . .

The raven never ventures to attack a man plundering its nest, and rarely pretends to be crippled in order to draw him away from it; but stands at a distance, looking extremely dejected, or flies over and around him, uttering, now and then, a stifled croak, indicative of grief or anxiety. I have, however, on such an occasion, seen a raven fly off to a considerable distance, and, alighting in a conspicuous place, tumble about as if mortally wounded.

Having enjoyed ample opportunities of cultivating an acquaintance with this species in the Outer Hebrides, I shall describe its manners as observed by me in these dreary, but to the naturalist, highly interesting islands. There, the raven, in search of food, may be seen, either singly or in pairs, in all sorts of situations, along the rocky shores, on the sand fords, the sides of the hills, the inland moors, and the mountain tops. It flies at a moderate height, proceeding rather slowly, deviating to either side, sailing at intervals, and seldom uttering any sound.

When it has discovered a dead sheep, it alights on a stone, a peat bank, or other eminence, folds up its wings, looks around, and croaks. It then advances nearer, eyes its prey with attention, leaps upon it, and, in a half-crouching attitude, examines it. Finding matters as it wished, it croaks aloud, picks out an eye, devours part of the tongue if that organ be protruded, and, lastly, attacks the subcaudal region.

Although the raven is omnivorous, its chief food is carrion, by which is here meant the carcases of sheep, horses, cattle, deer, and other quadrupeds, dolphins, and cetaceous animals in general, as well as fishes that have been cast ashore. In autumn, it sometimes commits great havoc among the barley; and, in spring, it occasionally destroys young lambs. It has also been accused of killing diseased sheep by picking out their eyes; but of this I have obtained no satisfactory evidence. It annoys the housewives by sometimes flying off with young poultry, and especially by breaking and sucking eggs which the ducks or hens may have deposited, as they frequently do, among the herbage.

In these islands, should a horse or a cow die, as in my younger days was very frequently the case in the beginning of summer, after a severe winter or spring, or should a grampus, or other large cetaceous animal, be cast on the shore, the ravens speedily assemble, and remain in the neighbourhood until they have devoured it. A large herd of grampuses, dolphins, orca, having been driven by the inhabitants of Fabbay on the sand beach of that island, which is one of those in the Sound of Harris, an amazing number of ravens soon collected from all quarters, and continued for several weeks to feast upon the carcases. By the time when this supply of food was exhausted, autumn was advancing, and the inhabitants became alarmed lest, should the ravens prolong their stay, they should attack their barley, which was their main stay, as they depended chiefly upon it for the means of paying their rents; a regular system of illicit distillation having, for reasons not difficult to be guessed, been permitted for many years. Various expedients were tried in vain, until at length a scheme was devised by one Finlay Morison, which produced the desired effect. The ravens retired at night to a low cliff on the east side of the island, where they slept crowded together on the shelves. Finlay and a few chosen companions, intimately acquainted with the principal fissures and projections of the rock, made their way after midnight to the roosts of the ravens, caught a considerable number of them, and carried them off alive. They then plucked off all their feathers, excepting those of the wings and tail; and, in the morning, when their companions were leaving their places of repose, let loose among them these live scarecrows. The ravens, terrified by the appearance of these strange-looking creatures, which, it seems, they failed to recognise as their own kinsfolk, betook themselves to flight in a body, and did not return to the island. It was in this numerous congregation of ravens that the white individual, of which I have already made mention, occurred, and which the people, considering it as the royal bird, regarded with a kind of superstitious reverence.

The ravens are social, and almost convivial, in their ravening. They are imagined to have some occult means of sending telegraphic despatches, or speeding the Fiery Cross along the coast, when an opportunity occurs of banqueting on a dead cow or stranded whale. Mr Macgillivray, however, does not give them full credit for disinterestedly spreading information for the benefit of their distant neighbours. He makes the whole the result of observation, sagacity, or rather the inductive process of reasoning :—

It has seemed to me strange that, in a country where, under ordinary circumstances, few ravens are seen, so many as from twenty to two hundred or more, should collect in a few days. In perambulating these islands, one scarcely meets with more than a pair in the space of a mile or so; and in Harris, where their breeding places were pretty generally known to me, I could not count a dozen pairs along a coast-line of as many miles. In Pabbay, as mentioned above, several hundreds had come together, so that the people naturally marvelled whence they had arrived. If along a coast-line of ten miles there are ten pairs of ravens, with five young birds to each, or seventy in all, on one of a hundred and forty, there might be nearly a thousand. Pabbay is two miles distant from Berneray, and six from Harris. Even should the wind blow in the latter direction, it is not likely that a raven should smell carrion six miles distant; and in Berneray, which the effluvia might reach, there are not usually more than three or four resident pairs. The birds of the west coast of Lewis, South Uist, and Barra, could not be guided a distance of fifty miles or more by the smell. How then did they arrive in Pabbay? It seems to me that the phenomenon may be explained thus.

The two pairs of ravens residing in Pabbay itself, would, with their broods, first perceive the carcasses. Those of Berneray might stroll over, as they often do, or they might see the prey, as might those on the Harris coast. Ravens have character in their flight, as men have in their walk. A poetsauntering by a river, a conchologist or fish-woman looking for shells along the shore, a sportsman searching the fields, a footman going on a message, a lady running home from a shower, or a gentleman retreating from a mad bull, move each in a different manner, suiting the action to the occasion. Ravens do the same, as well as other birds; and so, those at the next station, perhaps a mile distant, judging by the flight of their neighbours that they had a prize in view, might naturally follow. In this manner, the intelligence might be communicated over a large extent of country, and, in a single day, a great number might assemble. We know from observation, that ravens can perceive an object at a great distance; but that they can smell food a quarter of a mile off, we have no proof whatever.

If our author does not believe that ravens can smell carrion at any great distance, still less, though a Highlander, does he believe that they can discover disease and death in a house by smell—a common superstition in the Highlands, where ravens are regarded as unlucky or ill-boding birds.

This that follows is beautifully said, though more melancholy in tone than might have been expected from a native of the dreary region depicted. We have enjoyed many days, many tracts of weather, not merely cheerful, but brilliant, in those islands.

The character of the raven accords well with the desolate aspect of the rugged glens of the Hebridian moors. He and the eagle are the fit inhabitants of those grim rocks; the red grouse, the plover, and its page, of those brown and scarred heaths; the ptarmigan of those craggy and tempest-beaten summits. The red-throated diver and the merganser, beautiful as they are, fail to give beauty to those pools of dark-brown water, edged with peat banks, and unadorned with sylvan verdure. Even the water-lily, with its splendid white flowers, floating on the deep-bog, reflects no glory on the surrounding scenery, but selfishly draws all your regards to itself. There, on the rifted crag, let the dark raven croak to his mate, while we search for the species in distant parts of the land.

And Mr Macgillivray falls back upon his correspondent in the South, who describes the habits of the raven in the wilds of Dumfries, Roxburgh, and Selkirk shires. Here he wages fierce war with the goshawk or peregrine falcon, and the fox. He also Plunders the nests of moorfowls, (red grouse,) and carries away the contents, whether eggs or young chicks; and, as he is strong, as well as sly and sagacious, he no doubt kills many of the moorfowls themselves after they are full grown. But the raven is a magnanimous bird, compared with the hoodie or carrion crow, which descends to the most despicable shifts, and employs the most cruel methods to support itself that can well be imagined.

It is more than time that we were drawing to a close with a work which we presume to be a great acquisition to ornithological science; and one which we know to possess the higher merit of popularizing knowledge, by combining its results with the affections, with natural piety, and elegant, refining literary recreation. This is to make science bear its appropriate fruits; and, for want of this, the bulk of scientific works have hitherto been treated by the mass of mankind, and the whole of womankind, with deserved neglect.

ADELE.*

In spite of all that sages say,
I fain with store of gold would meet;
Then eagerly I'd fly to lay
The treasure at my true love's feet.
Adèle, I'd gratify thee
The slightest wish thou mightst express:
There is no avarice in me—
But, oh, my love is measureless.

Or might it to my lays belong,
To make immortal Adèle's name,
I'd sing of Adèle till the song
Immortal memory should claim.
Our names in verse together twined,
So may futurity possess!
No love of fame is in my mind—
But, oh, my love is measureless.

* Berneray. "Beaucoup d'Amour."

Would Providence for me ordain
A sovereign's rank, and dazzling throne,
Adèle should grace the fancied reign,
And all my power should be her own.
More sure of pleasing her to be,
I'd fain see courtiers round me press:
Ambition finds no place in me—
But, oh, my love is measureless.

Song, why with vain desires art fraught?
Adèle my every wish employs;
Wealth, glory, empire, ye are naught—
'Tis love, true love, that gives true joys.
From fortune's wheel I fear no blank,
I live secure of happiness:
I have not riches, fame, nor rank—
But oh, my love is measureless.

DIVES AND LAZARUS.

A TALE OF IRELAND.

CASTLE CARROL is one of the noblest spots on the Shannon. The old tower stands forth on a rocky eminence, as if the champion of the wild, rough country in its rear, against the smooth, smiling, civil-spoken plain confronting it, on the opposite shore. With all its braggartry, however, the Carrol country has the worst of it—being a barren, ill-regulated district; while the meadow-lands which it overlooks, are fine, fat, flourishing pastures, flowing with milk and honey.

Castle Carrol had not gazed upon this land of Canaan, for so many centuries, without experiencing certain sensations of ungodly coveting; and, accordingly, when, at the commencement of the present century, the thriving estate of Vale Banatha devolved upon a female heir, Castle Carrol lost no time in becoming a suitor; and, after the usual forms of courtship, Miss Florence O'Banatha became Countess of O'Carrol. The old hall rang with the gay doings of the wedding; and, soon after the close of the year, the church bells rang again, in honour of the birth of an heir to hill and valley; and as, within no great distance of time, they tolled out dolefully for the burial of the heiress-countess, no second offspring came to divide the inheritance of the young peer.

It was much about the same time that one of Lord O'Carrol's cottars (who, bearing the same name, would in Scotland have announced himself to be of the castle-clan) married, and begat a son. The bride, in this instance, inherited nothing but a pair of strong arms and strong frame of mind; and, consequently, no church bells announced to the surrounding country the birth of little Jem. The bantling struggled unheeded into life, his course through which was predestined to be a continuous struggle.

"See to him, the darlint!" cried his father, holding the roaring babe up to the sunshine, rolled in one of his own ragged shirts. "Hasn't he got the eye iv him winking up at the cruiskun already, as if he'd got a taste iv it? Och! he'll be the broth of a boy!"

And so he was!—From six years upwards, wherever mischief was to be done or danger confronted, Jem Carrol was foremost. Light-limbed, light-hearted, light-headed, accustomed to hard fare at bed and board, no danger of Jem Carrol's eating or sleeping away his faculties! He was sharp, as he was sharp-set. All his pleasures were boons of Nature's granting—exercise and free air—

"A savage wildness o'er him hung,
As of a dweller out of doors."

His face was tanned brown, his hair white; and when, with one hand holding up his tattered vestments, he skimmed the plain, or climbed the cliffs, the little animal had more the untamed aspect of one of the feræ naturæ, than of a Christian soul encased in a human body. Christian, however, is a term almost gratuitous, as applied to little Jem; for, though his parents had paid their fee to the priest for bestowing upon him the name of James, which they considered the upshot of the operation that was to keep his infant soul out of purgatory, neither father nor son gave a second thought to the subject. Jem, senior, was too hard-working and hard-drinking a creature to take much account of things spiritual; and Jem, junior's, sins were at present stationary on the shoulders of his sponsors. He had been occasionally licked for "staling" apples, or "thaving" the chicken's meat, when his allowance of murphies proved too small for his appetite and virtue. But his knowledge of the iniquity of "staling" was expected to be instinctive. His sire and dam were too busy to teach—they had only time to cuff; and Castle Carrol being rigidly Protestant, and no priest resident in the district, he was brought up a heathen in all but name.

Not so, young Lord Julius, heir to the noble house of Carrol. His cradle was overhung with silks, his infancy beset with nurses. At six years old, he had scarcely the free use of his limbs, and, while Jem Carrol was clambering up the cliffs for life and death, could scarcely climb, without assistance, into an arm-chair. If "thaving" and "staling" were not more interdicted to him than poor Jem, everything else was forbidden. It was "Julius, don't do that," from morning till night; till, reared with a notion of being always in the wrong, the boy grew up in a sort of vague want of self-reliance, which gave him the air of a fool, and taught him the mean acts of cunning and lying. At ten years old, the young lord, in his velvet jacket and trowsers of spotless white, was a very dirty little fellow.

At that precise period, however, he ceased to be visible at Castle Carrol. The red velvet and white jean were exchanged for a suit of sables, while the church-bells tolled more dolorously than before, in token that the noble Earl was about to sleep his last sleep beside the noble Countess; and, lo! the chubby-faced, flaxen-headed boy, in whose person were united the honours of Castle Carrol and the wealth of Vale Banatha, reigned in their stead, and was forthwith carried off to England by his guardian, Sir Bernard Moonshine, to be made a man of.

"Long life to the lad, and God's luck ever-mor' be wid him!" exclaimed James Carrol, sen., as the carriage and four, containing the heir and executors, bowled out of sight. "A better Lard nor his Lardship's right honourable fader niver was seen at Castle Carrol—bringing a big heiress into the family, all as one as a bridge over the blessed river 'tween Vale Banatha and the Carrol country—and may his son live to walk in his shoes!"

This adjuration was shortly changed into—

"God send the young Lard's time was come for walking in his noble fader's shoes!" For, instead of the resident Earl, the tenants had now a non-resident agent to look to for justice and protection. The executors had other matter in hand. The Irish estates were allowed to go as it pleased Providence—and Providence seems rarely pleased with anything that occurs on Irish estates. The guardians took care of the young Lord, and trusted the property to the agents; the agents took care of themselves, and trusted the property to chance. The castle was allowed to go to rack and ruin: the rain rained in; the sunshine alone was shut out; floors and furniture mouldered away; the rats kept holiday in the old hall; and mildew overspread the surface of the place.

It was not till the agent, five years after the Earl's decease, sent in a demand of six thousand three hundred and seventy-two pounds, four shillings, and eightpence, for the article of repairs, that the executors appeared to recollect the fact, that, on the Irish estates, stood a castle, in which castle the Right Hon. minor had seen the light. But it did not much signify. Lord O'Carrol, who was now in the fifth form at Eton, already announced that he never intended to reside in Ireland; and money being just then highly advantageous in calling in an English mortgage, the executors decided against further reparation, and let the old house shift for itself. Next spring, there was a promising crop of grass in the western wing, unroofed by the storms of the preceding winter; and even the bats, domiciliated in the blue damask drawing-room, seemed to feel that the place was growing too damp and dismal for them. But what mattered all this to Lord O'Carrol? He was now entered at Cambridge; had a suit of rooms at Mivart's, and a bill at Adams' the coach-maker, the manifold sheets of which might have served to repaper the blue damask drawing-room.

Jem Carrol, meanwhile, had, like his noble contemporary, survived his sainted sire; but, by way of compensation for the loss, he had his mother and an infirm brother to maintain. Himself and the pig were all they had to look to; yet such was the hilarity of his nature, that, so long as the "praties thruv," and the agent who monopolized the preserves of the game and fishery, resided thirty miles off along the river, Jem Carrol continued to keep a good face upon it. No one could say the lad was out at elbows, for small sleeve it was that Jem had to his jacket; and if his comely features were more begrimed than was advantageous to the beauty of his complexion, what wonder? There was nothing about the place but the greenest of ditch water—so green that the family were "forced to quench their thirst (so they were) with buttermilk or sper'ts," and dispense altogether with personal ablution.

Dirt is the parent of disease. The green ditch water brought the fever; "and so, being laid up, kilt with typhus, at sade time," the Carrols' acre was left to the mercy of their neighbours; and their neighbours proved too poor and too busy to be merciful. The crop failed which was to supply both rent and food. The guardian's agent's sub-agent, who inhabited the tumbledown offices of the old castle, grew turbulent and threatened; upon which poor Jem, with a sanguine trust in better times, sold off their few movables, and brought on a relapse of the fever, by sleeping on the damp floor, saturated by the oozings of the memorable green ditch.

It was not probable that the pauper Papist family should obtain much favour in the sight of the Protestant minister of the parish; but, as the present incumbent, the Honourable and Reverend Marmaduke Carrol, uncle of the late Lord, seldom visited the place, except for a fortnight's shooting, and during his residence, fifty miles off, at his deanery at Kilfisant, intrusted the cure of the souls and bodies committed to his parochial charge, to the hands of a curate having sixteen children of his own to monopolize his attention, and assist him to starve upon eighty-five pounds per annum—the case of the cottars was altogether hopeless. They might have been unconscious, indeed, that the parish boasted a dean for its rector, and the dean a pauper for his curate, but for the half-yearly visits of the tithe-proctor; and it almost reconciled Jem and the family to the one-piggedness of their farm, that no tithe-pig ever curled its tail over their threshold, on its way to the Decanatorial sty.

Judy Carrol, as we have already remarked, was a strong-minded, able-bodied woman. But her physical force had now given way under the depression of disease; and it was almost too much for her moral courage to find the utmost efforts of her noble-hearted lad scarcely sufficient to provide a bite and sup for herself and poor Maurice.

"Sure, isn't it a hard thing, now," murmured she, as she sat shivering in a corner of the damp cabin, "to fale the want of a turf, when my Lard's stacks are rotting up yon, undher the viry eyes iv us, and the agent too lazy to so much as make his market on 'em? And isn't it a hard thing, now, to see poor Jim kilt out iv the life iv him, slaving for me and Maurice, who's more helpless nor a baby this day, jist because the agent wont lind a hand to mind the drain, what's been wanting repair these tin year, and makes the cabin like a mill-pond, and brings the faver, and the faver murder and ruin? Plass God, if 'twas in the grave that Maurice and I was lying, little it is the loss iv us would be felt; and thin Jem might hauld up his young hid again, and none the warse."

It was owing to the suggestions of this maternal monologue, that poor Maurice Carrol, the hunchback, took a sudden and desperate resolution to minister, for the future, to his own maintenance. It was not much he could do. He could not dig, and, though to beg he was by no means ashamed, there was not a soul in the country, now the mansions at Castle Carrol and Vale Banatha were shut up, to encourage beggars. A few handfuls of meal or a stale loaf were the utmost he was likely to procure from the wives of the neighbouring farmers. One only alternative presented itself. Maurice had been in his childhood too infirm to be banded into an abhorrence of "thaving and staling;" while the six miles intervening between Castle Carrol and the nearest station of his Reverence, were too long a step for the lame child to be dragged so often as his spiritual education might be supposed to require. His notions of meum and tuum, therefore, or rather of the degree of turpitude arising from the transfer of other people's property to one's self, were exceedingly vague. He knew for instance, that, in a rushy bottom of the river, in a bend about a quarter of a mile from Banatha manor-house, was the favourite breeding ground of the plovers, abounding in the district. For eleven months of the year, the spot was deserted save by himself—the desolate boy having a liking to the desolateness of the place, and a predilection for the melancholy cry of the birds frequenting the neighbouring moors. But the eggs formed a valuable object of speculation. The chief agent's wife was fond of having them for her ball suppers in Meriton Square; and the sub-agent, accordingly, made it his duty to have the nests watched in laying time. It unluckily happened at this juncture that the keeper appointed for the purpose having made it annually apparent to his employers, that the produce of the place was on the decrease, was apprised that, unless during the present season it proved as abundant as of old, his occupation would be gone. Pat Flanagan had, accordingly, no alternative but rigour or dismissal.

"Well! justice is justice!" cried he, when, gun in hand, he took up his solitary position on a misty April morning, just as daylight was breaking on the river. "How I'm to make them bastes of burds giv a bigger complement, is more than my own gumption can guess, ony way; and as to giving up my gun to the kaper, and laving my place about the Castle—Well—Hiven help a poor boy! I'll jist see the inding on't."

He had assumed his accustomed post an hour or two earlier than usual; and, having assumed his seat on the stump of an old alder-bush, around which springing suckers, already shooting into leaf, afforded him some degree of shelter, he sat musing with his pipe in his mouth, and his eyes fixed upon the stream.

It was a pleasant sight to observe the heavy overhanging mists, rendered gradually transparent by the rising sun, wreathing and circling away, till not only the ripple of the current, but the outline of the opposite cliffs became discernible. At that untimely hour no craft was moving on the river; no stragglers were discernible on the cliffs above or shores below—not so much as a truant urchin sauntering along the green strip of grassy soil at the base of the rocks, forming a depository for things washed down by the stream from the higher country. All was solitary, all still, all silent—save that the plovers were already on the wing; shrieking and circling over the rushes, or dotting the green grass as they stood pluming themselves for the day. But, lo! Pat Flanagan's eyes were soon directed from the mists, and his spirit from its meditations, by the sight of one of the leather-covered wicker punts belonging to the Castle salmon fishery, pushing its way clumsily along the shallows of the opposite shore. The hour, the season, and the solitariness of the boat, forbade all notion that it could be occupied by one of those to whose calling it was apportioned; nor could Pat, for the life of him, discern, through the misty morning air, by whose hand it was so feebly punted along. By the stature of the boatman, it might be supposed a child—by its reckless pilotage along that perilous shore, a woman. At length, as the little barque slanted its course hazardingly across the current, Pat, who sat watching from his post, exclaimed, in consternation,—"The Lard's mercy be good to me, this day, if it ben't Widdy Carrol's lame Maurice!" At first his sole anxiety was excited by the peril incurred by the urchin in crossing the stream. But he next began to wonder what could be the urchin's object in braving such a peril. There was nothing to tempt him towards that uninhabited moor, but the plovers' nests; and in a moment it rushed into Pat's head, that the appearance of Maurice Carrol on the spot, had some connexion with the disappearance of the eggs. Instead of hailing the boy, therefore, as he had half unclosed his mouth to do, he cowered cunningly among the alder bushes, and "bided his time."

Ten minutes afterwards, when Maurice, after tethering his cockle-shell of a boat to a stump, and, half wading, half walking, proceeded to fill to the brim, with dark-spotted plovers' eggs, the moss-lined basket with which he came provided, he was suddenly felled to the ground, and deprived of consciousness. It was not till he found himself lying in the heat of the noon-day sun under the cliffs on the opposite shore, his tattered clothes covered with the half-dried mire through which he had been dragged by Pat Flanagan, and his bones and head aching with the bruises bestowed on him with the butt of the keeper's gun, that he understood the detection and chastisement which had befallen him. It was by Pat's sense of justice that the marauder was steered over the river, and left half dead upon the beach; and perhaps by his sense of compassion that not a syllable was uttered on his part concerning the transaction. "The boy's had bating enough to kape him from pickin and stealin for some time to come," was Flanagan's commentary on the business, when he resumed his place among the alder bushes; "it would be only shaming the child of honest folk, was I to make his reck'nin for'm wid the agent. But let me catch him at's thricks agin, the spalpeen, and I'll make an everlastin' warnin' on him."

That night Maurice Carrol lay moving on the slay door of the cabin; and a sore thought it was to his mother and brother that the "fever" had again seized him, and that they were unable to pay for doctor, or doctor's stuff, to free him from the pain against which he seemed to be struggling. But the next night, he moaned no more; and the night following, unnatural lights burned in the cabin, unnatural sounds of festivity issued from its open threshold, from which the door had been unhinged to form a dead-deal to straighten the corpse of the murdered boy. The lads of Castle Carrol were waking poor hunch-back Maurice!

He had died without disclosing a word. He was too proud to own that he had been beaten for a thief; though satisfied, according to the conscience of the poor, that poaching is no thieving in the sight of God, and that the wild creatures of nature's breeding are vouchsafed as much for the food of the hungry as for the recreation of the rich. But when the wasted, deformed body of Maurice came to be prepared for the grave, his bruises and contusions became manifest; and it was clear that one of these blows, dealt by some vindictive man, whose hand was stronger than his judgment, had caused an inward injury, and ended the wants and miseries of the widow's son. The neighbours cried shame—the agent was required to appeal to the nearest magistrate for redress. But having ascertained that there existed no evidence to throw light upon the business, (the whole having been privately disclosed to his employer by poor Pat, the day of the affray, when the sub-agent sent off Flanagan with a basket of plovers' eggs, along the river, to the agent in chief, requesting that work might be found for him on another part of the estate,) he informed the Carrol family that it was useless to entail the trouble and expense of legal investigation upon the parish; that it was clear the boy had fallen from the cliffs in some wanton expedition of bird's nesting, and been afraid to acquaint them with the accident.

The pauper is easily answered—easily buried. The earth once heaped over the injuries of poor Maurice, there was nothing further to be said. Most people thought the starving family in luck, to be delivered from their burthen; and if the village did not yield implicit credit to the sub-agent's explanations, it considered the matter not worth inquiring into.

Not so, however, Jem. Young Carrol was now nineteen years of age, embittered in soul by adversity, and worn down in frame by premature labour. It was just as he was becoming conscious of the hardness of his mortal lot, as a perpetual hewer of other people's wood, and drawer of other people's water—the hewing and drawing of which, from July to eternity, would never yield him a decent maintenance—that his brother's mysterious death superadded the consciousness of injury to that of wretchedness. Hitherto, when he found the world too strong for him, he had redoubled his trust in Providence; he now began to fancy the world too strong for Providence itself. His poor, harmless, afflicted brother, Maurice, whose hand was never raised against living mortal, had been murdered in cold blood—and there was no redress! Jem Carrol could not work for thinking of this by day; could not rest for dreaming of it by night! The cabin seemed haunted by the body of Maurice, extended upon the old door—discoloured with bruises—the countenance distorted with its death pang—the long dark hair clotted with blood! Wherever he turned, he beheld that ghastly spectacle. His dying father had committed the helpless lame boy to his charge, to be unto him as a child of his own; and now, his father's voice seemed to sound anew in his ears, bidding him arise and avenge the death of his son! In the midst of some household occupation or labour of husbandry, he would pause suddenly; and, with compressed lips, and big beads of moisture standing out upon his brow, fold his arms across his breast, and give himself up to the agonizing consideration of his brother's martyrdom.

"Niver will I hare that swate voice agin; niver will them blessed eyes, so mild and good, look out from the cabin-door, to wilcome me home," muttered the excited young man. "By God's will, my blood runs no longer in the veins of living man; yet not by God's will, (the blessed saints forgive me this day!) but by the will of the masterful and cru'l, to whose hands I seem evermore committed."

Then followed darker and more discontented thoughts; and an oath, registered in heaven, that, if ever he should discover the originator of his brother's death, a life should be taken to repay the life of Maurice. For Maurice was no brawler. His voice was soft, his arm feeble, his heart gentle as a woman's. The injury must have been dealt unprovoked. As Jem Carrol constantly repeated to himself, "The lad had been kilt and murdered in cold blood."

A year actually elapsed before a surmise of the truth occurred to the mind of the young man. It was not till the April following, (when—having dropped down the stream towards the moorlands, on his own account, for the provision of eggs he had long been in the habit of securing annually for his mother—he found the place guarded by an armed keeper,) that threats were uttered against himself, which brought to mind the fate of him of whose death the morrow was the anniversary!

"Murdering villin!—'twas yerself then, as shure as a blessed sky's above me, that made away with Maurice Carrol!" cried Jem, with sudden conviction, recoiling from the advancing keeper.

"I'll make small account, plase God, of making an ind iv yerself that says that same," retorted the man, flourishing his musket more like a shillelah than a fire-arm; while Jem, excited beyond all self-control, (as a thousand concurrent circumstances rushed into his mind, of a boat's having been found drifting along the current on the day of his brother's death, and the garments of poor Maurice being stained with mire resembling that of the rushy moor,) burst like a mad-man upon the keeper, wrested the weapon from his hands, and, whether accidentally in the scuffle, or by deliberate aim, lodged the charge of the piece in the body of the offender.

It was now decreed for Jem Carrol to pursue the course previously taken by poor Flanagan. After lying concealed a day in the adjacent moor, he fled the country. The cry of blood was at his heels; and, with terror in his steps and famine in his face, he at length reached the sea-coast; and, having earned, by a few weeks' labour at some neighbouring marl-pits, the price of a passage, quitted old Ireland for ever. He was now a desperate man. He knew that his mother was penniless and helpless; with shame, and sorrow, and want to abide with her in her desolate habitation. He gave himself up to his anguish—he gave himself up to his infamy; for having accidentally learned, on his escape from the moors of Vale Banatha, that the murdered man was a stranger in the place, newly engaged as keeper by the sub-agent of the absentee Earl of O'Carrol, he found the weight of blood upon his soul, yet his vengeance still unsatiated.

The young Earl, meanwhile, was enjoying his purple and fine linen, and luxuriating in the good things of this life. All he had done to obtain the houses and lands, the hangings and plate, the horses and chariots, ministering to his daily enjoyment, was—to be born; and he appeared resolved to add very little exertion to that original effort. Though a representative Peer, he had not yet taken his seat in Parliament. Clubs, spongers, dice, and claret, engrossed his days and nights. He knew no more of his Irish estates and tenants, than the "per Messrs Latouche & Co., so many thousands" half-yearly entered into his London banker's book. He had fought a duel at Cambridge on being taxed with the brogue; and would have dismissed old Ireland wholly and entirely from his recollection, but for the excellent whisky and beautiful colts annually forwarded to his Lordship's hunting seat in Leicestershire, as a token of respect from his agent in Merriam Square. Yet O'Carrol was not a bad-hearted young man. He was weak rather than wicked; and, had his better qualities been cultivated by conscientious and loving parents, instead of a careless guardian, he might have turned out a useful member of society. As it was, he contented himself with being a man of ton, a member of the best clubs, an occasional visitor to the West End police offices. Sir Bernard Moonshine had every reason to be satisfied with his ward.

It happened that, one summer, a few years after his attainment of his majority, Lord O'Carrol, on his way from town to Southampton, to embark in his yacht for a cruise, with a set of his Crockfordite associates, arrived at Winchester just as the bells were ringing and trumpets braying, to announce the arrival of the judges, and the opening of the assizes. The dandy crew in the britchs and four immediately took their cigars from their mouths, to inquire what fun was going on. They were informed that the calendar was a heavy one; that there were eleven capital cases; that the Court would be crowded with all the rank and fashion of the place; and that not a bed was to be had in the city. This was almost motive enough to determine them to stay. But Sir George Gormandize, who was of the party, having reminded the young Earl that his chef had been four days at Southampton, preparing for their arrival, and another hero suggesting that their valets and dressing-boxes had preceded them in another carriage, so that they had not so much as a toothbrush at command, they gave up the project, damned the assizes, and started anew for the Dolphin.

That night was a stormy night. The same winds that howled round the cells of Winchester gaol, lashed the Southampton river into a turmoil. The waves broke upon the banks, the old stone walls appeared to yield. The noble yachtsmen, over their claret, cursed the weather; the criminals awaiting judgment recommended their souls to God! Lord O'Carrol called for deviled biccuits and burnt champagne; Jem Carrol murmured, amid the watches of the night, "I have taken thy vengeance into my hands—take thou mercy, O Lord, into thine."

For Jem had now a double stain of homicide upon his hands. Jem was about to give up his life to the justice of his country, in return for the lives of his fellow-creatures. An outcast, an alien; ignorant, untamed; the better instincts of his nature unfortified by the dictates of laws divine or human; seared in soul by the remembrance of an act, the criminality of which he limited to the substitution of persons which had sacrificed an innocent man for a guilty—Jem, on his arrival in England, though relieved from want by employment in the west country, had been unable to settle himself to decent occupation. The wild habits of lawless Castle Carrol clung to him. He became a poacher, a smuggler, an habitual drunkard. Convicted on one occasion of infraction of the game laws, he expiated his offence by a year's imprisonment in Bristol gaol, and quitted it a hardened and desperate offender.

There were moments, indeed, when better impulses recurred to him; moments when, in the prosperity following a busy harvest, his renewed purse suggested recollections of home—of his early misery, his necessitous family; and but that he knew from an encounter in prison with one of the Vale Banatha men, that his mother was no more, he would almost have braved the perils of the law, and returned for her sake to the fatherland which dealt so penuriously with its children. But old Judith was gone! There was no longer a motive for regretting the tremendous barrier excluding him for evermore from his native village. He was a banished wretch—a proscribed wretch; with every man's hand against him, and his own hand embroiled in blood! Such was the state of Jem Carrol's mind.

when accident threw him into the way of a motley band, frequenting the New Forest, smugglers or poachers, according to season and occasion, and including more than one of his ill-fated countrymen. During several months, they managed to evade the detection of justice: but, the dead body of a man, unknown, having been discovered in the recesses of the Forest, precautions and inquiries were redoubled, which ended with the capture of three of the notorious gang. In course of examination, it appeared that the deceased was not only one of their victims, but one of their confederates; and, to the amazement, no less of his companions than of the examining magistrate, Jem Carrol avowed himself the assassin. Though repeatedly admonished against committing himself, he persisted in the declaration; and, on his trial, again and again reiterated the confession of his crime.

"I pursave your Lordship's good marcy in bidding me kape quite," said the prisoner, addressing himself to the learned judge—"but, if it's all the same to yer Lordship, I'd be glad ye'd shew any lanieny ye have to spare, to the boys wot was had up wid me, (though innocent of the thing as the babby unborn,) on account of ony little fault they may have committed in pint o' wagraney or sich. But for me, my Lord, (worse loock to me!) I'm a-weary o' life—long afore I fell in at Portdown Fair wid the murderin' thafe, Pat Flanagan, and heerd him tell the tale o' the Castle Carrol hunchback, as he'd stove in tin year ago, and been obliged to flee the country for that same—littile dramin', the blackguard, who was eated beside him, but the brother o' Maurice Carrol, a-takin' note of the words in his lips—long afore I up and dilt the law o' justice upon him in the Forest, as he deserved, and more—long afore that, my Lord, I'd made up my mind that this life was ill worth living, for the likes o' me. Sorrow the comfort I've had iv my born days!—kicked through the world like a skittle ball; cuffed here, starved there; widout a friend to say, God save me; widout a bed to lie on; often widout a bit to put betwixt my lips—except it was, maybe, afther a drap of dhrink, what comfort was there for me in life? All the land I looked on was my Lord O'Carrol's—all the little I could scrape by tilling it, wint to my Lord O'Carrol. Rint and tithes ate up all. The poor ould mother iv me was kilt wi' could and hunger—my young brother murdered outright, for birds-nesting—and myself hunted out iv the counthry, for doing a bit o' justice on my Lord O'Carrol's agent, jist as yer Lordship's about to do this day on me. So what for, I'd like to know, my Lard, would I wish to live? Yer Lordship may up and hang me to the fore; for it's no more than I've often intinded to do to myself, and the throuble 'll be spared. Only, before ye put on yer thunderin' assize-cap, as I've heerd till of, jist be pleased to take it from a poor lad like me, that thim as should ha' been in their place yondhir, in Vale Banatha, a-doing justice for their people, and seeing 'em rared in the knullidge iv right and wrong, and to fare God and honour the king, ha' more to answer for this day than I, being forced, as I was, to take the law into my hands. As shure as God's above all, my Lard, they'll have to answer at his judgment-sate for my life, and thim lives as my hands have made away. And so, I pray God to forgive my Lard O'Carrol, for deserting his counthry, and sitting the likes of em over us, from this day forth, for evermore!—Amin!"

"O'Carrol, my fine fellow, here's something that concerns you!" said Sir George Gormandize, as they were taking their ease in the Southampton Inn, trying to while away a blustering afternoon, with newspapers and ecarté.

"The king!" interposed the noble Lord against whom Lord O'Carrol was playing.

"The devil!" rejoined his Lordship, giving less attention to Sir George's apostrophe, than to his cards.

"Here's an Irish tenant of yours going to be hanged at Winchester to-morrow morning. We've no chance of getting on board to night. I never saw an execution—supposing we drive over to Winchester after dinner?"

"For what?" demanded Lord O'Carrol, who had not been listening to a syllable; but who, having now lost a fourteenth game, threw the cards petulantly on the table.

"To witness an execution."

"Faith, I've had enough of executions: two this season at my house in Chapel Street, and three last," cried another of the party.

"Psha! I mean a criminal execution. They're going to hang a namesake of O'Carrol's, for unjustifiable homicide."

"The deuce they are!" said his Lordship. "I wish they'd let us have dinner. I ordered it at seven—'tis ten minutes past—and the Dories will be overdone. When did you say the fellow was to be scragged!"

Sir George replied by placing the Hampshire Telegraph in his Lordship's hands, while he proceeded up stairs to wash his own, previous to dinner. Extending himself listlessly on the sofa, the Irish peer began to yawn over the trial of Jem Carrol.

"The impudent rascal!" cried he, when he reached the affecting apostrophe with which the poor fellow had concluded his defence. "A poacher, a thief, a murderer, a convicted felon, and lay the blame upon me! How could I help having such a blackguard born on my estate? Heaven be praised! here's dinner at last."

After the first course, and second round of Champagne, his Lordship began to coincide in Sir George's scheme of amusement for the morrow. The wind was still too high for the sea; they must content themselves with an execution on land. Apprehensive of not obtaining beds at Winchester, they agreed to start at five in the morning. The bells were tolling as they drove past the cathedral of William of Wykeham. But they were too late: the last huzza of the crowd had died away; the mob was dispersing.

"At all events we'll have a look at the gallows," cried Lord O'Carrol, vexed to have lost his morning's entertainment.

"Not I! I don't want to spoil my breakfast," said Sir George Gormandize. "Postboy! to the hotel."

It was only a passing glance, therefore, that Lord O'Carrol was enabled to take of the miserable body still vibrating in the air, for which a parish shell was waiting at the gallows foot. As a Papist, (born, if not bred,) Jem had declined the spiritual comfort of the Ordinary by Government provided; and his disfigured remains were about to be consigned to the earth like those of the beasts that perish, to which the darkness of his mind had caused him to liken himself by deeds of cruelty and blood.

But there will come a time for those two sons of a common soil to "meet at compts," when the secrets of all hearts will be open, and an Almighty and All-seeing tribunal judge between Dives and Lazarus.

Portraits of the Children of the Nobility.

WE give the projector of this elegant new annual credit. He has made a hit in every sense. The work appeals to the purest affections of the human heart; and while it engages the finer sensibilities, it also enlists the taste and the harmless vanities of the public in its favour. The charm of beautiful childhood never loses its power. Children, like flowers, are universal favourites, whether the "curled darlings" of the rich parterre, or blooming wildings exhaling sweetness by a cottage door. And groups of children, quite as beautiful, and as full of life and innocent enjoyment as those before us, might, no doubt, be found in every county and neighbourhood; but the patrician specimens on which we look possess an interest, and a kind of reflected reality, from knowledge of their stock, and from historical and national associations. From these considerations, this must prove an exceedingly attractive work; and, although its artistical merits had been far inferior, it must have made its way to general favour. It is, however, eminently beautiful as a book of art. Chalon is the principal designer; but MacIse and Bostock have also contributed portraits. Though our hearts are irresistibly drawn towards the more infantine groups depicted in the series, we shall notice, first in order, Mary Frances Elisabeth, Baroness le Despenser. This is one of Chalon's portraits, and no jeweller subject ever fell under an English artist's pencil. The youthful baroness—we need not say, a peeress in her own right—is seen as if returned from a walk, and fondling a squirrel. Nothing can surpass the tender and beautiful expression of her sweet, guileless, and ingenuous countenance; which is that which painters seek to give to cherubs, or something more lovely and winning,—the earthly cherubic. The verses to this charming portrait are written by the editress, Mrs Fairlie. We may give them as a specimen of the literary contents of the volume, which are, in general, abundantly flimsy:—

"It needeth not the Sybil's art,
Thou fair and noble maid,
To read thy young and guileless heart;
For on thy brow portrayed
Is every pure and gentle thought,
By nature's pencil finely wrought.

"Oh, taught in early youth to know
What duties rank should grace,
What bright examples here below
The nobly-born should trace—
Be ever thine the pure delight
Which springs from actions good and right.

'So may those joyous smiles ne'er fade,
Symbols of happiness—
Meet attributes, fair youthful maid,
Thy artless face to dress!
And may'st thou, like thy noble race,
Through life incline to nothing base."

A group of three girls, the daughters of Lord Lyndhurst, seated in a garden alcove, is from the pencil of MacIse. We have seen him happier. Two of the young ladies are beyond the age of children, and look as if occupied about their expected debut. The third, a girl from eight to ten, has a face of remarkable intelligence. The dedicatory verses are from the courtly pen of the younger D'Israeli, who offers the widowed father, her "stately sire," as his Lordship is termed, consolation for the loss of one of these fair girls; which the world must presume he found right speedily, in the smiles of a bride. The lament comes awkwardly, and rather jars with honeymoon gratulation.

A comely, plump, and pleasing little maiden, from the pencil of Chalon, bears the name of a daughter of Lord Frederic Fitzclarence. She, however, though younger than the Honourable Misses Copely, is also beyond the age which shews to most advantage in the volume—that of either babyhood, budding into playful intelligent childhood, or, best stage of all, delightful, artless, unconscious childhood, lovely in its innocent fascinations, as beheld in the group of the Earl of Wilton's children, in the daughter of Sir William Somerville, or the two younger daughters of the Duke of Somerset, at their mimic tea-drinking. The Lady Mary Howard, the youngest daughter of the Earl of Carlisle, is beyond the age of childish attraction; and Bostock's portrait of a pretty girl shews a consciousness of being sitting for its picture. The verses, which are by Captain Marryat, in imitation of Herrick, shew unexpected power and facility in the author of "Snarley Yow" and "Peter Simple." From this poetical tribute, we select a stanza or two:—

"From air, I could but bring thee,
A captive bird, to sing thee,
All the day long,
A plaintive song;
But his notes of grief would sting thee.

"Rare brilliants had I brought her;
Not those of brightest water
Could match the blaze
Of the joyous gaze
Of Carlisle's youngest daughter.

"Pearls from the sea's recesses,
In thy bright liken tresses—
What need of them,
Coral or gem?
Than thine, their beauty less is.

"Now pour I forth a blessing,
My soul's warm wish expressing,
That ne'er may aught
Of deed or thought,
Be to thy heart distressing."

Among the best effusions of the volume, which rests on picture, not literature, are the classic verses addressed by Mr Henry Bulwer, to his early friend, Sir William Somerville, on the sweet design of the Baronet's little daughter. She has laid aside her doll, and, by stretching on tip-toe, reached the keys of the piano-forte, on which she half-stealthily performs, evidently to her own satisfaction. This charming picture is designed by MacIac. It is full of nature, and the most captivating expression. Here are the verses of the grave bachelor who has espoused the Commonwealth, addressed to the retired gentleman, the cultivator of young oaks and of the domestic virtues and affections. An inattentive, if not positively unfaithful husband, Mr H. Bulwer has of late been, by the way.

"How many days of good and ill
Have passed, my old friend SOMERVILLE,
Since you and I, as truant boys,
Shared the same follies, fears, and joys!
Our sternest thoughts to bound the ball,
With crafty hand against the wall;
Or, careless of its groans, to glide
Across the scarcely frozen tide;
With gun and bound, by sun-rise seen,
Squidding across the dowy green;
Or creeping forth by soft twilight,
To drink milk-punch with Goody White!
Well skilled to merit or escape
The classic stroke which scores the scrape,
We did, amidst that gallant crew,
And did unscathed, what few could do.
Vain boast! They're gone!—those days of fun,
Of floggings missed, and prize-books won.
They're done! they're gone! and here are we,
As grave as wiser men should be!
I with petitions in my hand,
And, "Sir," as on my legs I stand;
You, with the most paternal air,
And, "Nurse, pray take the greatest care."
You pity me, I pity you—
That's what two friends are bound to do;
But still, I own, if this dear child
Had only once as gaily smiled
On me, as now she gaily smiles,
I might have loved her infant wiles,
And half recalled the vows I've vowed Against that little squalling crowd,
Which, now with doll, and now with drum,
Proclaim that HYMEN's reign is come."

Heath's Book of Beauty for 1838.

There is to be no end to pictured beauty in the season of 1837-8. No sooner have we laid one splendid volume aside than another and another follows after; and, like the guidwife's daughters of the Scottish proverb, "The last is aye the bonniest." "The Book of Beauty" is in every minor respect a well-appointed volume, whether in its rich brocaded cover, its beautiful letterpress, symmetry of form, or delicacy of finish. We speak not of the engraving nor literature; for to us its dearest charm is the real representations of English female beauty, intelligence, sweetness, and simple refinement. Were any one to ask us in what consists the superiority of English beauty to classic models, in whatever is most perfect in the human face and figure, that Grecian and Roman art have handed down to posterity, we should point with confidence to one portrait in this volume. Miss Landon seems to have been as earnest an admirer as ourselves of female beauty of the highest order—that of intelligence—of "sweet austere composure"—the beauty of mind-breathing expression. This portrait, which we receive as a personation of Wordsworth's "Phantom of Delight," is painted by Richard; it is, like all the rest, exquisitely engraved. The portrait of the Countess of Chesterfield, by Landseer, is another beautiful subject, natural and simple, and with that air of which at once places the real woman above the ideal, though one and the other may be alike unknown to the spectator. Lord Byron would have been shocked at the vigour of her ladyship's hand. Mrs Lane Fox is another beauty, with something higher than mere beauty; and we admire the bearing of the lady under the name of Katrina, so much as to wish her a real existence, which, we are pretty certain, she must be, and not a painter's figure. Rhoda is another lovely young female. Among the best of the literary sketches, are "The Story of the Back-Room Window," by BARRY CORNWALL; an apologue by Bulwer, which, however, is deficient in clearness; and a good moral tale by Miss Louisa Sheridan. As an illustration of the degraded condition of woman in the east, Aisha, by the Honourable Colonel Caradoc, also deserves to be called a moral tale. Rhoda Tracy, by Mr Bernal, is a lively story, developing what some men are pleased to call, the caprices of the sex, but which ought to be called the sensible fits of the womankind. We have also a few romantic love-tales, not in any way striking, and many copies of pretty or elegant verses; the finest of them Miss Landon has addressed to the beautiful portrait we have mentioned.

The Book of the Cartoons. By the Rev. R. Cattermole.

Everybody has heard of Raphael's Cartoons; many have seen what are preserved of them, and nearly as many have affected to admire, and to be in ecstasy and rapture over their recondite as well as visible beauties. It is not, however, to vulgar or unpractised eyes that those beauties are all at once apparent; nor can those who, seeing for the first time, a Holy Family by the same immortal painter, at once feel its ineffable grace and loveliness thrill their hearts, perceive the beauties of the Cartoons. They, in truth, require a critic and expositor. They are not pictures, much less finished pictures, but patterns from which tapestry was to be worked; and Mr Cattermole must forgive the uninstructed if they leave them to students or prodigents in art. Of the twenty-five original Cartoons, seven of the smaller size were purchased by Charles I., and are those which still remain, after various mishaps, at Hampton Court. They have been often copied, and several times engraved. Copies of them, and also tapestry woven from them, have been exhibited in London and other places. To the engravings by Warren, done on a scale far too small, we think, to give any true idea of the originals, Mr Cattermole attaches a volume of criticism and description. His description, however, refers to the originals, which is proper; but then the distant reader, turning to his stunted plates, is at a loss how to apply many of the finest remarks. The book is, however, an elegant and tasteful one of its kind.

Morals from the Churchyard.

We have been struck with the tenderness, beauty, and originality of this small quarto for young persons. It is an allegory, and somewhat in the style of the German "Story without an End;" but less mystical, and possessing far more human interest. The graves utter their voices; they hold a solemn dispute. Yet these cheerful fables are so managed, that nothing revolting, nor even improbable, is heard. We listen to the lofty, vaunting speech of the "Proud Man's Grave," and the tender tale of the "Little Child's Grave," and the "Mother's;" and we have "Sabbath among the Graves," and "The Graves beseeching the Angels to bring them some Rain," and the "Angel of the Little Spring," which are all finely poetical, as, indeed, many of the brief chapters are. We have a sort of consciousness, though no remorse whatever, that, being very good-natured, we may, at some rare times, say more for little innocent books, whether of juvenile or senile entertainment, than they, perhaps, deserve, were all the pros and cons weighed in the nice scales of criticism. Now, we should be sorry if this "amiable weakness" tended to impair the effect of our serious judgment pronounced on any little work, like the "Morals from the Church-yard." But why call we it "little?" It is great in every sense, save size. It may help our readers to understand its nature, if, by a short-hand process, we say, in one word, "Here is a book for the young, in the spirit in which Charles Lamb would have delighted! though, at the Suicide's Grave he would have been more gentle." It is steeped in natural pathos and delicate imagination, and in the spirit of that religion whose first principle is love. One specimen we shall give, in proof of the good grounds on which we rest our admiration of this delightful little book.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

And the Old Grave perceived how winter was passing away; yet the graves had not settled which was the worthiest. So he spoke and said, "My friends, I have contrived a way whereby ye shall discover the most worthy. I will speak to the Archangel who comes hither this eve, and he shall decide for us; for, behold! is not this eve Christmas Eve, the eve of all eves, which angels and men keep together?" So the graves agreed to what the Old Grave said, and sang thus in honour of Christmas Eve:—"Sacred is the Eve of Christmas; sacred to the angels and to man. Already hath the holly been out; the church is green with it. Wherefore hath the holly been out? Wherefore is the church green? Because it is the eve of Christ's birth, when the world grew green again; for it was old with years and crime. But when Christ came, the evergreens sprang up before him. Glory to the holly which grew up on that day! It is the same through all seasons: its leaves are not scared by the winter winds. They are prickly and bright. The beasts of the field touch them not. It grows in stony places: its berries are round and red. Thick they cluster, that they may do honour to Christmas. They are revered by angels." When the graves had sung thus, they waited for the Archangel to come with his host: nor long did they wait, for presently, in the soft rays of the moon, with low melodies hovering about them, there came down angels in multitudes infinite, with their Archangel in the midst. Bright was their presence, though men saw it not: they filled the church-yard with peace.

We must omit the figurative dialogue between the Old Grave and the Archangel, who was called upon to settle the dispute, by pronouncing which was the most worthy grave.

"Behold where the first snow-drop shall spring up in the new year: that is the most worthy grave." For three days they looked, and saw naught; but on the fourth day, behold! there was a snow-drop on a lowly despised grave which lay in a corner, and was neglected by the other graves. No tombstone it had, and no tree by its sides. So the graves were astonished among themselves, and said, "Why is the lowly grave exalted above us all? What hath it done that it should be so honoured? Let us speak to it." So they asked of the despised grave; who answered, and said "My friends, I cannot tell you this thing. Ask of the Angel of the Sabbath who lives among us all!"

The Angel of the Sabbath answered, "Have ye forgotten the Beggar's Grave which was crowned by angels when man had not crowned it? This is the Beggar's Grave. Much sorrow was in his life time, but he did not complain. He was deserted by the friends of his young days, but remembered that he had a Friend who knew no change. His faith held fast in adversity. He knelt to say his prayers on the cold stone: silent in his affliction, silent before his Saviour. Therefore when he died, he was taken whither Lazarus went before him; and this his grave is honoured with a snow-drop rather than the other graves." Thus spoke the Angel of the Sabbath; whom the other graves answered, and said, "It is a just judgment. Let the Beggar's Grave be honoured from this time. The grave of wealth shall hide his head: the grave of glory shall boast no more. Our dispute is ended. Welcome, thou young snow-drop! White thou art as the virgin snow. Thou bringest pleasant tidings of the spring." So the graves gave honour to the Beggar's Grave, and it was exalted above all the graves from that time. And when the graves had given honour to the Beggar's Grave, they spoke to it and said, "Tell us what grave we must honour next to thee; and, for thy sake, we will honour it." And the beggar's grave answered, "No kin have I. I am a solitary grave. Let the Mother's Grave—the mother of the little maiden—be honoured next to me. Also when the grandfather and granddaughter die, let their graves be honoured along with the Mother's Grave. What is so pleasant as a Christian family joined together in one hope under the same turf?" So the dispute of the graves was ended. And the little maid got well; and her brother came back from sea; and Spring came again, with its angels; and flowers sprang up anew in the churchyard. But of all graves there, no grave was so fair as the Beggar's Grave; for with the sweetest of wild-flowers, the angels planted it about. They guarded it by day and night, and moistened it with early dew.

Such is a small specimen of this sweet little book. We hail it as an omen that, though the minds of children are crammed with "Useful Knowledge," the imagination-starving system is about to give place to one permitting more generous nurture. This juvenile volume, we ought to say, is very prettily embellished.

The Juvenile Budget,

Is a collection of lively stories by Mrs Hall, superior, we think, to some of her more ambitious performances. "The English Farm-yard" inculcates an admirable lesson, and very pleasantly. So does "The Irish Cabin." This also is a nice, pretty Christmas book, with good engravings.

Southey's Works, Vol. II.,

Consists of his Juvenile Poems and Minor Pieces. It is the volume for Republicans, Democrats, and Radicals. It contains some of Southey's best poetry, and some of his worst. Save in Ebenezer Elliott's works, or the poetry of this Magazine, (to speak modestly,) we know not where to look for so much generous Radicalism in the form of poetry, nor such fervent aspirations after a higher and purer social order than is likely we fear ever to be realized by our unreformed "Glorious Institutions in Church and State." Among other things, the volume contains "Wat Tyler," un mutilated; the dedication of "The Triumph of Woman," to Mary Wolstoncroft; the "Botany Bay Eclogues," the Radical Lyrics, "The Pauper's Funeral," the "Verses to Emmet," and other pieces that harmonize but ill with later strains, which their author does not affect to consider as more honest, though more true and considerate than the opinions of his early manhood. We still miss the "Battle of Blenheim;" but we shall have it by and by. The Society of Friends ought to send this poem out annually, along with their addresses condemnatory of war. In this volume, independently of debatable effusions, there is much of Southey's most enduring poetry—such as "The Holly-tree," the beautiful verses on a "Landscape of Pousin," and the truly English lines on "Christmas Day." We expected that Southey could have helped himself over slippery ground, by the aid of a few explanatory notes. None are given. He has nothing to repent, nothing to be ashamed of in his early writings. Far are we from comparing the two men; yet, on one point, Dr Southey is singularly like the ex-Reforming Baronet, the pupil of John Herne Tooke. He, too, has "outgrown democratical opinions, and learned to appreciate the institutions of his country." Dr Southey affirms, that "He is no more ashamed of having been a Democrat, than of having been a boy." He was a Democrat considerably after the age of boyhood, and his conversion was critically timed. We have nothing to complain of in those who, on conscientious conviction, change their political opinions, save intolerance and dogmatism.

The Gospel History of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. By Lucy Barton; with a Preface by Bernard Barton.

This neat little volume is addressed to children and young persons. The narrative is clear and simple, and well adapted to juvenile capacities. We consider it best, in every view, to study this all-important history at the fountain-head, in the gospels, without note or comment; but that such is not the universal nor even general opinion, we must infer from the multiplicity of scripture histories that are extant. This is one of the most lucid and well-connected among them; and, we would suggest, might suitably be read in connexion with the gospels, as a test of the understanding of the juvenile student. Several very pretty engravings adorn the volume. The frontispiece is a Virgin and infant Jesus, from a painting of Murillo. Holy families and scriptural pieces form admirable subjects for the painter; yet, although we are not Quakers, and admire the art of design, we cannot help thinking, that pictures representing Jesus Christ are, if not irreverent, yet injudicious. The outward and visible form of "The Man of Sorrows," of the crucified Saviour, should be left to the imagination of juvenile Protestants.

The Curiosities of Literature. Illustrated by Bolton Corney, Esq., Honorary Professor of Criticism. Unpublished.

The name assumed by the author may, for aught known in the north, be as fictitious as the office into which he has inducted himself. He is one of those troublesomely veracious and accurately learned persons, dwelling in the past, and among books, who delight in marring a good story, by some petty point of chronology or matter of fact. He sets himself in downright earnest to pick holes in the coat armour of Mr D'Israeli, until he makes out the antiquarian and literary humours claimed by that gentleman, to be little more than a "scutcheon of pretence." Mr D'Israeli has, at all events, made a most amusing book, and the world does not care to be disturbed in its enjoyment of it, whatever of inaccuracy, assumption, or partisanship, the learned may have discovered. The prefaces of Sir Walter Scott, for example, are nearly as pure fictions as his novels; yet who would gravely sit down to disenchant the reader of them, with the representation of naked, barren truth. Yet we thank the Honorary Professor for his generous vindication of Raleigh, Shenstone, and even old Stow.

In the meanwhile, Moxon has put forth a new edition of THE CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE; being a tenth. The work is nearly half a century old! the honorary professor is consequently forty-five years too late with his criticism; for, as Mr D'Israeli remarks, "The writer of half a century has outlived his critics. . . . Praise cannot any longer extend his celebrity, and censure cannot condemn what has won the reward of public favour." The new edition is in what we call the Radical form—that size of which the modern example was set by this Magazine—the cheap or People's size, which Mr Murray has adopted for Byron's whole poems, and now for his Life and Letters, and in which we expect to see many more works. No books are more handy or portable.

Winter. By Robert Mudie.

Mr Mudie has "rounded the revolving year," by the publication of the last of the seasons. This, volume, as befits the subject, seems to us graver in character, and more didactic, than those on Spring and Summer. The series, as a whole, is instructive, and the fruit of a highly cultivated and matured mind.

Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

A new edition of our old favourite has just appeared, with an original memoir by Mr St John, whose devotion to standard and homely national works—those drawn from the undefiled well—is worthy of all praise. A key is given to the Scriptural doctrines and texts of Scripture allegorized by that

"Ingenious dreamer, in whose well-told tale Sweet fiction and sweet truth alike prevail."

Colloquies on Religion and Religious Education; being a Supplement to "Hampden in the Nineteenth Century."

This Supplement is, in one important respect, different from the preceding work. Subsequent investigation, or rather intuitive feeling and conviction, has converted Fitzcarrine from a sceptic into a believer, after the fashion of the German Mystics or Transcendentalists; though, to own the truth, we do not pretend to understand either the ground-work or exact nature of his new belief. The speculations upon morals, religion, education, and social interests, are distinguished by the same philanthropic spirit that marked the previous lucubrations of the author. He does not like the modern Political Economists, nor yet those Educators or legislators who recognise competition and emulation as the animating springs of action, any better than he did before. He admires the London University no more than Oxford; and he fancies Dissenters fully as intolerant and uncharitable as Churchmen. Of the Radicals he speaks almost as an alarmist. They are Destructives at the best; and his principal hero considers it fortunate that there are Lords to oppose the reckless enterprises of some of them. It is not among the Reformers that the Transcendental is to be found. Owen and Chateaubriand are greater men in his eyes than Malthus and Paley; and the Bishop of Exeter, in at least one instance, than the Bishop of London. That which is given is curious enough. In a debate on the Poor-Law, the latter Prelate said—"The Right Rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) had said, that the laws of a Christian country ought to be a transcript of the laws of God. He (the Bishop of London) wished they were so; but it was quite clear that, so long as human nature and human society were constituted as they were, it was impossible that should be the case." [Debate on the Poor-Law, July 29th 1834.] A strange admission this for a Christian Bishop. If the constitution of human nature is not in the power of man, there is religion to correct it; while the constitution of human society is surely entirely in the hands of that society, and whatever is evil must proceed wholly from disregard of those heavenly laws which the Bishop tells us it is visionary to think of imitating upon earth. One of the chief merits of this visionary author's writings, arises from the copious and apt quotations supplied by an extensive and peculiar line of reading.

The Heart's Ease; or, a Remedy against all Troubles.

This is a neat reprint of a popular religious work, by Dr Symon Patrick, the pious Bishop of Ely, and the well-known author of a Paraphrase on the Books of Job and the Psalms. He was in the church throughout the reigns of Charles II. and James II., and died, at the age of eighty, in the reign of good Queen Anne. He refused to become a convert to Popery, when James himself took pains for his conversion—saying, "I cannot give up a religion so well proved as that of the Protestants." After the Revolution, Patrick was appointed one of the commissioners for reviewing the Litany, and drew up new collects. At an early part of his career, he was appointed to the Rectory of St Paul's, Covent Garden. The plague broke out; but he refused to quit his post, when the Court, and all who could get away, deserted London. "Somebody must be here," he said to an expostulating correspondent; "and is it fit I should set such a value upon myself as my going away and leaving another will signify?—for it will be to say that I am too good to be lost, but it is no matter if another be." He avowed that he had a great passion for his friends, and to live to embrace them once again; "but I must not take any undue courses to satisfy this passion, which is but too strong in me. I must let reason prevail, and stay with my charge, which I take to be my duty, whatever come." The Church of England requires, at this time, to muster her worthies; and Bishop Patrick, if not of the foremost rank, well merits a place on the roll. Yet, what were his labours or sacrifices, or those of ten such dignitaries, to those of one poor curate in Wales, or a single priest in Connaught, or the wild parts of Munster?

Smiles on the Physical Education, Nurture, and Management of Children.

We have here a practical and sensible little treatise upon a subject so common that those interested are apt to lose sight of its paramount importance. Mr Smiles has been a diligent student of the works of the great recent lights and authorities of his profession—such as Combe and Paris, Copland, Caldwell, and Brigham; and he has methodized much useful information, in a simple and clear manner, and without any tincture of professional pedantry. Children should like his work, because it so happens that, in telling what is good for them, he also permits them nearly everything they like best. Little medicine or none, is one of his rules; and another is, a plentiful allowance of fruit, with play, ad libitum, out of doors; or, in other words, abundant exercise. Sleep in large doses, and lessons as few as possible, is another excellent doctrine. The children are also allowed or encouraged to shout and roar as much as they please; so that Surgeon Smiles, however it may be with the profession, may be certain of becoming very popular among little patients. The most valuable part of his work, in our estimation, is that which treats of the effects of cold on the infant system. There are more fatal errors committed in the mistaken process of bracing and hardening infants and very young children, in our chill, uncertain climate, than in diet, clothing, or all the other departments of nursery economy taken together. The medical profession were here the first in fault. Common-sense and the natural instincts of mothers and nurses shrank from their foolhardy experiments; and they naturally went occasionally into the opposite of the extreme recommended. Now the profession condemns the barbarous process of exposure to cold, and rests in the just medium.

Oliver and Boyd's New Edinburgh Almanac.

It may seem odd to review an Almanac; but this, we are assured, is the paragon of Almanacs; the WONDERFUL WONDER among Almanacs; a something new under the sun; and as great an advance upon the fourpenny article of Ruddiman, first published about a century or so ago, as the spinning-jenny is upon the primitive distaff. However this may be, "The Scottish Repository" is a very useful volume, full of the sort of information that is required every day and hour, accurately and clearly arranged. We notice one obvious improvement in the head-lines. Last year they were ornamental; this year they are useful in pointing out the contents of each well-filled page. In short, in Almanacs, perfection can no farther go.

FINE ARTS.

Le Keux having completed the voluminous "Memorials of Oxford," has commenced MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE in the same style, but upon a smaller scale. The two numbers of the series which we have seen, promise well, especially for the letterpress and woodcuts.

The Churches of London,

Is a new serial work, in which several eminent artists and architects are engaged. It is executed in the same style as the Memorials of Oxford; and, though by no means a remarkably cheap work, is one of interest, especially to Londoners.

Finden's Ports and Harbours of Great Britain.

The first volume of this interesting work is just completed. It contains fifty engravings, all of views on the English coast, and many of them either picturesque or exceedingly beautiful. Among the latest are the views of Brighton, Plymouth, Mount Edgcumbe, Southampton, and Dover. Among the most exquisite, are Folkstone—a lovely vignette, from a drawing by T. Boyes—Yarmouth, and Cowes. This is the most interesting work of its kind which has appeared since Daniell's Coast Views, now about twenty years old we should think.

THE SHAKESPEARE GALLERY is closed, we cannot say very satisfactorily. Joan of Arc, we have as a soft and very beautiful young lady, masquerading in steel armour, and in the midst of the heady fight looking perfectly undisturbed, as she bids defiance to Talbot. Portia, the wife of Brutus, is a lady with a Roman profile in a classic costume. The Princess Katherine in Henry V., is the most natural-looking personage of the last three, and shews some character. But the series contains many better imaginary portraits than those, and the volume will form, altogether, a handsome book of Shakspearian illustrations.

Medal of Queen Victoria.

That memorable event, the visit of Queen Victoria to the city of London, has been commemorated by the issue of a bronze medal, from the house of Griffin & Hyman. It forms, in its Morocco case, a handsome and substantial memorial of the mighty event, and is well executed. The resemblance of the countenance to that of her Majesty's excellent royal grandfather, in some of the leading features, is striking. The reverse exhibits the Lord Mayor presenting the keys of the city to the Queen, with a variety of emblematic figures.

A FAC-SIMILE of the Poem of the JOLLY BEGGARS as Burns originally wrote it out, has just been published in Glasgow. It is a great curiosity in its way; and even an object of interest to the admirers of Burns. No one who has ever seen his hand-writing, can doubt of its authenticity, although the name of the publisher were not a sufficient guarantee. A preface, written in a genial vein, and a frontispiece, by William Allan, are prefixed to the engraved writing, which fills a good many quarto pages.

Among the new works which we cannot overtake in the present month, we especially regret FISHER'S HIMALAYA TOURIST, a splendid pictorial book, illustrated by Miss Emma Roberts, from the journals and tours of gentlemen who have penetrated into the sublime fastnesses of the Himalaya. This work, as elegant as any of the first-class Annuals, is got up at great expense, and is well calculated for a gift-book of abiding value.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE events of the month have been important, only in as far as they indicate the future policy of the Government and the state of parties. It is now impossible to doubt that the aristocracy, Whig as well as Tory, have come to the resolution to resist all farther Reform in our institutions, and that they in future will unite, if not openly, by a coalition, at least virtually, by advocating or opposing the same measures, in the endeavour to make head against the democracy. It is in vain to represent Lord John Russell's declaration of Conservative principles, and his doctrine that to concede the question of the Ballot, the Extension of the Suffrage, and Triennial Parliaments, would be to repeal the Reform Act, as an outbreak of passion; for he repeated his declaration, in equally decided terms, the following evening. That, in expressing his own opinions, he also expressed those of the Ministry, may be inferred from the speech of Lord Ebrington, that great patron of Whiggery, about the finality of the Reform Bill, some weeks before the meeting of Parliament; and from none of the Members of the Cabinet having taken an opportunity of declaring what were their real sentiments—a course they would unquestionably have taken, had Lord John Russell's declaration been unauthorized. Considering, indeed, the injury which the declaration has caused to the popularity of the Ministry, Lord John Russell must ere now have resigned, had the common opinion of his colleagues differed materially from his own. Much credit is, we think, due to Mr. Wakley, for not losing a single day in forcing the Whigs to demonstrate their real intentions, and thus putting the country on its guard; for, otherwise, half the session might have passed over before the real situation of matters had been discovered. We think the sooner the Whigs and Tories are driven into a coalition, the better. We shall then have the truth demonstrated, that the aristocracy have an interest adverse to that of the People; and the latter will be taught to rely on themselves, and not on any section of the aristocracy, for the attainment of good government. Already have several lists of a Radical Cabinet been published; and we defy any one to deny, that the members are at least equal in talents and integrity, if not in rank and fortune, to any Cabinet we have ever had. It is needless now to fear that opposition to the Whigs will restore the Tories to power. The Whigs in office, backed by the Tories in opposition, are much more efficient for evil, than the Tories in power opposed by the Whigs. The Tories in office, could never have carried the Irish or Canadian Coercion Bills; and we doubt if they would have attempted to increase the Duchess of Kent's annuity, or defend the continuance of the allowance to the King of Hanover—two acts which, we regret, our limits do not permit us to expose and characterise in the terms of reprobation they deserve. The only plausible excuse for longer supporting the Whigs, is the state of Ireland; but we doubt much whether the Tories would attempt towards that country anything so despotic as the Whig Coercion Bill. Had the Whigs really the interest of Ireland at heart, they would, long ere now, have repealed the atrocious statutes which had, during centuries of Tory rule, been enacted to oppress the People of that country; but all these acts stand on the statute book un repealed, ready to be put in force whenever any tyrannical ministry thinks proper to resort to them. And not only are the oppressive regulations regarding Ireland kept in full force by the Whigs, but even Castlereagh's Six Acts—the Coercion Code of Britain—remain un repealed, though nothing could exceed the pertinacity and zeal with which their enactment was opposed by the Whigs, then seated on the opposition benches. Instead of giving to Ireland good laws, which would protect the People against rulers, however despotic, they have allowed tyrannical laws to continue, and have only sent good administrators of them, whom an accident may remove in a single day, leaving the Irish as much exposed to oppression as ever. While all changes in the representative system are to be opposed, and not even protection for the safe exercise of the franchise given to the voter, we do not see any measure of real utility likely to be obtained. The repeal of the Corn Laws will, no doubt, as heretofore, be strenuously opposed; for it is only by such a demonstration as that which carried the Reform Act, that the free importation of food will ever be permitted. The Whigs refuse what the Tories would, we firmly believe, give us—a reduction of all postages to a penny—a measure, the value of which can hardly be exaggerated in its direct and indirect effects.

In the impending struggle between the privileged orders and the People—between the tax-fed and the tax-starved—it is gratifying to know that, if we have lost Lord Durham, we have gained Lord Brougham—a more effective ally. He has at last, though reluctantly, declared for the Ballot, Extension of the Suffrage, and shortening the duration of Parliaments; and his recent skirmish with the Premier, which it would be affectation in us to say we regret, will tend to confirm him in his newly adopted opinions. We rejoice to think that he has no chance of admission to office so long as either mere Whigs or Tories are predominant. It is only as forming part of a really Reforming, or Radical Administration that he has any chance of the resumption of power.

ENGLAND.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL's declaration regarding the finality of the Reform Bill, and that it was intended to give a preponderance to the landed interest in Parliament, has roused the country from end to end, and has greatly advanced Radical opinions. If it has not made converts to the Ballot, it has at least forced many to declare themselves favourable to it who thought it might be delayed for an indefinite period; and meetings, either for the Ballot alone, or for the Ballot in conjunction with Extension of the Suffrage, or the Repeal of the Corn Laws, have been held, and are still holding, throughout the country. The Birmingham Political Union has published an address, containing a resolution "that the necessary steps be immediately taken to procure the co-operation of the Radical Reformers of England, Scotland, and Ireland, for the purpose of removing from the councils of the Queen an Administration who have avowed their hostility to the only improvements in the Reform Bill which could give satisfaction to the country, and which it has an unquestionable right to demand." The Liberals of the Metropolis met without delay to denounce the declaration, and no one but Mr O'Connell attempted to defend Ministers.

MIDDLE-CLASS GOVERNMENT.—This phrase, if not invented by the Tories, will soon be adopted by them, for the purpose of dividing the Liberals; and, by opposing the working [to the middle classes, enable the aristocracy, as they have hitherto done, to trample on both. The policy of tyranny—that is, Toryism—has been, in all ages, to divide and govern; and this is so obvious, that we must confess we have great doubts of the political honesty of any one who attempts to sow dissension among those who are really Liberals. If they are not Tories, they are serving Toryism in the most efficient manner that it is possible to conceive. What renders the cry of danger from "Middle-Class Government," the more suspicious is, that it is raised by precisely the same persons who have been labouring to convince the working classes that the Repeal of the Corn Laws and Free Trade would be injurious to them, until Universal Suffrage be obtained. Cheap food would raise profits; and higher profits would cause more demand for labour, and that, of course, would raise wages. It should never be forgotten that wages are not to be estimated by the number of pieces of silver which is required to pay them, but by the quantity of food and raiment it is possible to purchase with them, whatever may be their nominal amount in current coin. In a letter from the Working Men's Association of London to the chairman of the meeting held there to consider Lord John Russell's declaration, we find the following passage:—"Our objection to the Ballot, unaccompanied with an Extension of the Suffrage, originates in a conviction that the present constituency only seek to legislate for their class, and not for the multitude; that they seek to monopolize within their own circle the power of sending Members to Parliament, and to selfishly benefit, by selecting the rich rather than the honest and the competent." In our opinion, the attempt to contradistinguish the working class from the middle class is perfectly absurd. It is easy to distinguish the landed interest from the other classes; but which of the middle class is it that does not work? Many of them work much harder than the majority of mechanics. Take, for example, a clerk who copies papers for twelve or fourteen hours a-day, and compare him with an artisan. How has the one any interest in bad government more than the other? But to take the whole middle class—professional men of all kinds, shopkeepers, artists—have they not the same interest as the poorest man in the country, to have cheap food, few taxes, high profits, high wages, for what but wages are the fees or emoluments of the advocate, medical man, or artist?—and free trade, that they may buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. The stockholder and the capitalist living upon the annual proceeds of their capitals, have the same interest as the working man, that profits may be high, without which wages cannot be high; for, unless profits are high, the interest of money of which the income of the stockholder and capitalist consists, must be low. There is only one class in this country which has an interest adverse to that of the masses—the landed interest; for the lower the general rate of profit in the kingdom is, the higher will be the rent of land, of which the income of that class consists. We have demonstrated this position in former numbers of this Magazine, and have not space here to resume the demonstration; but a little reflection will convince any one of its truth—and a most important truth it is.

False teachers have been abroad. The notion that capital and labour, the middle and the lower classes, are natural enemies, has been zealously propagated. The moneyocracy and the shopocracy have been denounced as the worst of all aristocracies; until many of the working men have believed that these abominations are undeniable truths. And the middle classes do not allow the working classes to enjoy a monopoly of prejudice and absurdity. They, too, have their prejudices. Many of them think that there really is a great difference between party Whigs and Tories; that the working classes, if enfranchised, would sell their votes, &c. &c. Of the ability and good intentions of the Working Men's Association of London, we have a high opinion. In their admirable Addresses to their brethren throughout the country, with much truth, there is mixed up some error. But the truth will remain; while the error, we are confident, will, ere long, be seen; and, when seen, instantly abandoned.

SCOTLAND.

THE BALLOT.—On the 6th December, a numerous and highly respectable meeting was held in the Waterloo Hotel, Edinburgh, for the purpose of petitioning the House of Commons for the Ballot. The Lord Provost was in the chair, supported by some of the oldest and most respectable of the Whig party in Edinburgh, and also by the Radical electors. Some confusion arose towards the end of the meeting, by the Lord Provost refusing to hear a deputation from a meeting of the working classes, held the preceding evening, who appear to be hostile to the Ballot unless united with an Extension of the Suffrage—a notion which, we observe, has led to confusion in other meetings, and which, in our opinion, will operate to prevent either the Ballot or Extension of the Suffrage being obtained. It is only by means of the present constituency, and the House of Commons, as now constituted, that any Extension of the Suffrage can take place; and the first step appears to be to render the representation of the people as liberal as possible, by protecting the electors in the exercise of the franchise. That this will be the effect of the Ballot, we wonder that any one can doubt. Let those who doubt consider why the Tories, to a man, are opposed to secret voting. We are glad to observe that the best-informed organs of the working classes are opposed to the doctrine, that the Ballot, without Extension of the Suffrage, would be pernicious. The True Sun, after remarking that the monarchy of the middle classes would be a bad thing, proceeds—“At the same time, we allow that it would be a better thing than the present plan of government, through the nominal representation of the middle classes, but really by the influence over them of aristocratical corruption and intimidation. The real opinions of the present electors are better than their biased votes. Avowedly vested with the suffrage, they have a just claim for the freedom of its exercise. We therefore say, let us get the ballot alone, if we cannot at present obtain anything else.” The Leeds Times, a paper with a weekly circulation of 3400, chiefly among the operatives of the West of England, remarks, “It is a great mistake, though an honest one, to tell the working classes that the Ballot will do them harm. We, who have had pretty extensive opportunities of estimating the character of the bulk of the constituency, which even the ballot alone would realize, tell the working men, that the Ballot, even of itself, will return such a Parliament as shall render the adoption of extended franchise irresistible in the very first session of its existence.”

SHORT PARLIAMENTS.—With regard to shortening the duration of Parliaments, we think the constituencies have an effectual remedy in their own hands—viz., not to return any candidate who will not pledge himself to accept the Chiltern Hundreds, when required by a majority of his constituency. At all events, the electors should insist, not only for Short Parliaments, but for the power of dismissing their Members at pleasure.

CORN-LAW ASSOCIATIONS.—We are glad to observe that associations have been formed in the west of Scotland, for the repeal of the Corn-Law. We have been favoured with a well drawn-up “Address of the Central Anti-Corn-Law Association for the West of Scotland,” over which Mr Weir, the able editor of the Glasgow Argus, presides. We beg to direct the attention of these societies, not only to the Corn-Laws properly so called, but to the other laws restricting the importation of other sorts of food, and, in particular, to the laws prohibiting the importation of oxen, cows, sheep, lambs, and fresh meat of all sorts. The injury inflicted on the People by these prohibitions is a great addition to that sustained by the Corn-Laws; for while grain is from 50 to 60 per cent. cheaper on the Continent than in Britain, butcher meat is from 80 to 100 per cent. cheaper. We have often heard it remarked that butchers were much seldomer attacked with fever than any other class of men; and this remark has been confirmed, by Dr Hannay, who, in his lectures on physic in Anderson's University, has shown that the prevalence of the epidemic typhus fever of our great towns is entirely owing to the want of a regular supply of fresh animal food, as an article of regular diet. He has adduced numerous facts and arguments in support of this opinion, which we regret our limits do not enable us to give. We hope that this fact will not be overlooked. Nothing can better shew the selfishness, we may say the atrocity of the landed interest, than these starvation laws; and it is a remarkable circumstance that, although societies having for their object the improvement of cattle and sheep exist in almost every county, and though many of the members must be well aware that most valuable breeds exist on the Continent, no attempt has ever been made to introduce any of them into this country. We hope the Highland Society, which affects so high a character for patriotism, will take up this matter.

LAW.—The Lord Advocate has again introduced his Bill for regulating the business of the Court of Session; but so few of his Lordship's Bills pass, that they have ceased to excite interest. The greatest improvement which could be made in the Court of Session, would be to abolish the Second Division, and to make the judges sit nine or ten months, instead of 114 days in the year. Unless some reform take place speedily in this Court, it will be found necessary to abolish it altogether; for its business is decreasing every year, and at present the salaries drawn by the Judges and Clerks, and the fees of the other officials, nearly equal the whole value of the same in litigation before it. Were the salaries and emoluments of the clerks and other officers reduced one half, the printing of masses of useless rubbish or mere formal applications abolished, and counsel employed only when the agents found themselves inadequate for the management of a case, the business of the Court would revive, and the singular spectacle would not be presented of the Supreme Court of Scotland—although the jurisdiction of two other courts, the Admiralty and Consistorial, have been united with it—having only two-thirds of the business it possessed forty years ago. Not above two thousand cases are brought annually into Court: one thousand of which pass in absence, the Judges never looking at the proceedings; and to decide the other thousand, costs the country, for judges and clerks alone, to say nothing of the continual additions to and alterations on the Parliament House itself, about £50,000 per annum, or £150 for each case. But no alterations, on the mere forms of proceeding can remedy the evil. The law itself must be remodelled, and a new code enacted, fitted for the necessities of a civilized age; the barbarism of the feudal forms must be swept off, and common sense introduced. The complexity of the law, and the impossibility of even lawyers having a complete knowledge of it, may be inferred from the circumstance, that “A Manual of the periods of time established by Statute and Usage in the Law of Scotland,” has just been published by Mr James Scott, solicitor; and, though it is in the tabular form, and most concisely expressed, it extends to 52 pages 8vo. It is a compilation much needed, and which we can confidently recommend, not only to every practitioner of the law, but to mercantile men and others engaged in business of any kind.

CANADA.—POLITICAL JUGGLING.

HERE mechanical sleight of hand, even that of the immortal Ramee Samee, is little wonderful in our estimation. The juggler only cheats others—that is a trifle. Commend us to the man who can cheat himself. And, in the political world, just fix upon the first man you meet, and it is ninety-nine chances to a hundred but he is up to this trick. The best way of shewing how people accomplish this, is to describe a few examples.

In 1815, the Polish nation was assigned to the Emperor of Russia; he pledging himself to preserve their nationality, and respect their peculiar laws and customs. Many years earlier, the Canadians were assigned to Great Britain; and, in addition to sundry and divers royal edicts, an act of Parliament, passed in the year 1791, pledges the governing country to preserve the nationality, and respect the peculiar laws and customs of the governed. By both the Emperor of Russia and the government of Great Britain, these solemn pledges have been violated. By both the Poles and the Canadians of French extraction, recourse has been had to arms, when it was plain that nothing else could avail them. The Poles have been subdued and punished as felons. According to the latest accounts, the Canadians are on the eve of being subdued, and are about to be punished as felons. The nationality of the Poles has been abrogated—they have been forced to adopt the laws and institutions of Russia. The constitution of the Canadians is abolished, (or, to use the Jack-Ketch-like phraseology of diplomacy, suspended,) and the laws of England are to be forced upon them. No two cases can be conceived more exactly parallel. Yet the identical "prim praters," who have been making every town and village ring again with well-mouthed denunciations of the Emperor of Russia, and glowing eulogiums of Polish heroism, are encouraging Ministers in the crusade against Canadian liberty. "And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." Lord Durham is not the only British statesman who has been taking lessons in the school of the Emperor of Russia.

Again, some years back, a political adventurer (we use the word in its dyslogistic sense) was clever enough to gull the electors of Westminster, for two years, into the belief that he could represent them in Parliament, and at the same time play at soldiers in Spain. It is not, however, to him, but to his ministerial eulogists, that we wish to direct attention. The Globe, and all its tribe, were in ecstasies at the heroism of the man who allowed himself to be shot at, for the interests of humanity—and a large sum of money. They indignantly repelled the epithet "mercenary," when applied to him. But no sooner is a hint given that American riflemen may take a part in the disturbances of Canada, than a volley of abuse is opened upon these adventurers in posse, by the eulogists of Evans. And yet the parallel between the cases is tolerably exact. In Spain, one portion of the community is for a Constitution, another for Don Carlos: in Canada, one party is for a Constitution, another for British supremacy. In Spain, the Carlists are upheld by the Legitimists of Europe: in Canada, the faction which arrogates to itself the title of the British party, is upheld by the forces of Great Britain. In Spain, the Constitutionals accepted the services of a foreign legion, and the legionaries were vouched to us as being "all honourable men:" why should not the Canadian Constitutionals accept, in like manner, the services of an American legion? or why should the circumstance of serving in such a legion, be accounted dishonourable by those who defended and lauded Evans? We admit that the cases are not exactly parallel. There is no necessary community of interest between Great Britain and Spain: on the other hand, it is the interest of every native American, that no spot of that great continent shall be a servile dependency of any European State. The American volunteers in Canada, will be men each acting on his own impulse—lovers of democracy, who come to aid in rearing a new democratic government, and to settle under its protection—"to win a country, or to lose themselves." The legionaries of Evans were men of a very inferior description ; allured by the prospect of pay and plunder, to fight for a time on a foreign soil, for the glory and emolument of an individual, rather than from devotion to a sacred principle. If there be any difference between the be-praised Spanish Legion and the reviled contingent American Volunteers in Canada, that difference is favourable to the latter.

Yet, again :—" The cause for which Hampden bled on the field, and Sydney on the scaffold," is a standing toast with those very Whigs who are denouncing scaffolds and gibbets to the Canadian patriots, and justifying the burning of their stores and houses. Yet John Hampden refused payment of a tax illegally imposed ; and the Canadians declared their resolution to resist the unconstitutional transference of the power of taxing them from their own Territorial to the Imperial Parliament. John Hampden called out the militia of Bucks ; and Papineau organized the Six Counties. And as to the bugbear of republicanism, what were the political tenets of Algernon Sydney ?

It is melancholy to see men playing such tricks with themselves, and loving or hating the same thing, not according to its own merits, but according to the name which they arbitrarily choose to apply to it for the time being. There is but one remedy for it—let in more light upon them. The juggler plays his tricks with most effect in an uncertain light ; the self-deluder bewilders himself most effectually in the dim twilight of half knowledge. A few days' study of the " Principles of Morals and Legislation" might serve to steady these waverers between right and wrong, whose feelings are at the mercy of names, and whose election of the just or unjust side of a question depends upon accident. We have thrown out these hints, in the hope that they may excite some to reflection ; and we now proceed to a more serious question, connected with the troubles in Canada.

In the month of March last, certain resolutions relative to Canada were submitted to the House of Commons by Lord John Russell, and, after protracted and vehement debates, approved of by an overwhelming majority of that independent and enlightened body. The third of these resolutions affirmed that the House of Assembly of Lower Canada had declined to vote the supplies necessary to carry on the civil government ; and the eighth provided—" That, for defraying the arrears due on account of the established and customary charges of the administration of justice, and of the civil government of the said province, it is expedient that, after applying for that purpose such balance as shall, on the said 10th day of April 1837, be in the hands of the Receiver-General of the said province, arising from his Majesty's hereditary, territorial, and casual revenue, the Governor of the said province be empowered to issue from and out of any other part of his Majesty's revenues, in the hands of the Receiver-General of the said province, such farther sums as shall be necessary to effect the payment of the before-mentioned sum of £142,160:14:6." By the constitution of Canada and our own, the only safeguard provided against the assumption of arbitrary power by the Executive, is the power of stopping the supplies. The money necessary to defray the expenses of civil government, is voted from year to year, in order that the representatives of the people may be able to arrest the career of any Executive which uses the power with which it is entrusted to subdue, not to protect the People. The eighth resolution of Lord John Russell deprives the representatives of the people of Canada of this, their only safeguard against despotism. Ministers were aware of this : we have it under the hand of Lord Glenelg. His Lordship writes to Lord Gosford, on the 22d May 1837 :—" To avoid the necessity of violating one of the great principles of the Canadian constitution, we have been willing to make every sacrifice, excepting that of the honour of the Crown, and the integrity of the empire." " The honour of the Crown," means the Crown's having its own way in the dispute with the Canadians, instead of yielding to them ; and, to ensure this subjection of the Canadians to the will of the Crown, Ministers declare themselves prepared to " violate one of the great principles of the Canadian Constitution." What is this but despotism ?

Ministers were, from the very first, aware of the indignation felt by the Canadians at this arbitrary stretch of power. On the 25th of May 1837, Lord Gosford writes to Lord Glenelg :—" I must, however, here observe, that the feeling against the Imperial Parliament authorizing the taking of the money out of the chest, is very strong ; and even those who reprobate the withholding of the supplies by the Assembly, cannot refrain from an expression of disapprobation of this part of Lord John Russell's resolutions." In the course of the month of August, Lord Gosford received ample corroboration of this opinion. The House of Assembly, a body elected by almost universal suffrage, met on the 18th of that month. Attempts had previously been made to tamper with the more moderate members. The names of some of them had been forwarded to Great Britain, with a recommendation that they should be nominated members, some of the Executive and some of the Legislative Council. The bait did not take with all. On the 26th of June, Lord Gosford writes :—" With reference to the list of those whom, in my despatch of the 26th April 1836, I recommended for seats in the Legislative Council, recent events have led me to doubt the propriety of placing some of them in that branch of the Legislature." Notwithstanding this and other insidious attempts to " divide and govern"—the tyrant's never-failing refuge—an overwhelming majority of the House of Assembly resolved :—" We have not been able to derive from your Excellency's speech, or from any other source, any motive for departing, even momentarily, from our determination to withhold the supplies until the grievances of the country are redressed."

That, in coming to this resolution, the House expressed the sentiment of an immense majority of the Canadians, a sentiment rooted and enduring, is clear from a despatch of Lord Gosford, dated 12th October 1837:—"A dissolution offers no prospect of a more reasonable House of Assembly, nor any hope that the new House, which would be composed of a majority of the old members, would recede in any particular from the demands so pertinaciously insisted on by the present body."

In all these proceedings, the deportment of the House of Assembly was alike within the letter and the spirit of the constitution. But Ministers had, from the first, resolved to carry their point, "by violating one of the great principles of the Canadian constitution." They were, from the first, prepared to effect that violation by military force. On the 6th of March, Lord Glenelg writes:—"I trust there is no danger of any public commotion, still less of any armed resistance. But, as a measure of precaution, we shall probably strengthen the military force very shortly, by the temporary addition of two regiments; and the 'Inconstant' frigate will appear in the St Lawrence as soon as the navigation is open." On the 22d of the same month, Lord Glenelg writes again, authorising Lord Gosford to draw troops from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. On the 8th of September, Lord Gosford writes:—"Had the executive the power of suspending the Habeas Corpus, it would be in a better position to meet the difficulty." On the 12th of October, he writes:—"The law fails to afford its support; the civil authorities become therefore impotent; the Habeas Corpus Act cannot be suspended." Then, after announcing that a new House of Assembly would be as unmanageable as the old, he proceeds:—"In such circumstances, and seeing that the Imperial Parliament has solemnly and unequivocally stated that it will not accede to the Assembly's demands, I am forced, however reluctantly, to come to the conclusion, that the only practical course now open for conducting the affairs of this province with any benefit to the inhabitants generally, is at once formally to suspend the present constitution, which both parties unite in confessing cannot now be worked, and which has, in fact, for the last twelve months, been virtually suspended; to increase the military force, and to strengthen the hands of the executive, now almost impotent for any good or useful purpose." Nine days later, his Lordship, in order to strengthen himself by "a multitude of counsellors," takes the advice of the Executive Council on this point; who unanimously declare themselves of opinion—"That there is no hope, under existing circumstances, to re-establish the equilibrium of the component parts of the constitution, without the intervention of Parliament." The chain of evidence is clear and unbroken. From the very first, Ministers had resolved, not only to evade the right of the House of Assembly to stop the supplies, but to have themselves future trouble, by depriving it of the power of stopping them. They had resolved to suspend and remodel the Canadian constitution, and put down all remonstrances of the Canadians, by an array of military force. This plan is announced by Lord Glenelg on the 6th of March; this plan is urged by Lord Gosford and his tail on the 19th of October; and every despatch, from either side, during the interim, bears evidence that this plan was unceasingly, coolly, and resolutely kept in view.

The attempt has been made, and will be persisted in, to divert attention from this unjustifiable and pertinacious resolve, to put down the constitution of Lower Canada, by pointing to cotemporary disturbances. Even though these disturbances had been unconnected with the unconstitutional projects of the British Government, and unprovoked, they would afford no palliation for a crime projected previous to their occurrence, and carried into execution without reference to them. But these disturbances were all of them the necessary consequence of the unconstitutional proceedings of Ministers; and those of them which are made the pretext for calling out the military, were deliberately and intentionally provoked by that faction to which are delegated, by our precious rulers, the functions of government in Canada.

The People of Canada felt that their well-grounded complaints had, for a long series of years, been in vain urged upon the home government; they felt that the stoppage of the supplies was the only means they had of enforcing attention, and that they were entitled to use it; they saw that the British Government was resolved not to grant any real redress; and they naturally feared that means would be employed to wrench their constitutional weapon from their hand. It was natural, under such circumstances—the House of Assembly being incompetent to oppose any other than a passive resistance to the Government—that public meetings should be held, and that pretty strong language should be used at these meetings. These constitutional meetings drew forth a proclamation from Lord Gosford, on the 15th of June. In this document his Lordship modestly tells the aggrieved and complaining parties, that their complaints are "untrue and mischievous representations," and "solemnly exhorts" them "to discontinue all writings of an exciting and seditious tendency, and to eschew all meetings of a dangerous or equivocal character." He also calls upon all magistrates, and military officers throughout the province, to be on the alert. This insolent address naturally excited a strong and general feeling of indignation. Many magistrates and officers of militia refused to read it. All who did this were deprived of their commissions. In the beginning of September, legal prosecutions were commenced, with a view to intimidate the Canadians. The Attorney-General, by direction of the Governor, preferred bills of indictment in the Court of King's Bench at Montreal—one against a Dr Duchesnois, for publicly tearing and treating with contempt the proclamation issued on the 15th of June. Subsequent events have proved that Montreal is a stronghold of the misgoverning faction—that there (as at Birmingham in the days of Priestley) the wealthy and the mob make common cause against the independent of the middle class; but even in Montreal a grand jury could not be found base and servile enough to pervert a court of justice into an instrument of tyranny. The Attorney-General's bills were ignored. In defiance of every dictate of common decency, that functionary immediately filed ex officio informations against his victims. The public meetings now began to assume another form. The prorogation of the House of Assembly; the concentration of military force in the province; the dismissal of every popular justice of peace and militia officer; the attempt to stretch legal forms, with a view to attach disproportionate punishments to trifling offences—all contributed to warn the Canadians what they had to expect at the hands of Government. It is not very likely, either, that the recommendations of the Governor and his Council, to "suspend" the constitution, had been kept altogether so secret as such a nefarious project required. On the 1st of October, the Permanent Committee of the County of Two Mountains met, to concert measures of protection and self-defence. On the 4th, the "Sons of Liberty" in Montreal issued an address to the young men in the British American Colonies. On the 22d, delegates from the Six Counties in the district of Montreal, south of the St Lawrence, met, to concert a plan of co-operation; and on the 31st, this confederation issued an address to the People of Canada. These measures were forced upon the Canadians by the Government. Mutual distrust, mutual hostility, was now unequivocally declared. It mattered little, save as a theme of declamation, which party struck the first blow. Even that was done by the Government; it had not even the decency to wait a pretext for aggression. On the 27th of November, Lord Glenelg wrote to Lord Gosford, intimating his recall, and the appointment of Sir John Colborne, as Coercer-general of the colony. It was not till the 5th of November that any hostile collision took place between the Patriots and the retainers of Government. Ministers could not have heard of that collision, when they handed over the colony to the tender mercies of military law. Nay, more than this: the Government mob, screened by the force of Government, was the aggressor in that collision. A procession of the "Sons of Liberty," in Montreal, was prohibited by proclamation. The members of the club obeyed, and held, instead, on the 5th of November, a private meeting in an inclosed inn-yard. The following is the narrative of Michael O'Sullivan, Solicitor-General:—"The Patriots met, to the number of about 350, in a large yard, opening in Great James' Street, near the American Presbyterian Church. They had their speeches, and their huzzas, and their treason, in private, the gate of the yard being shut. A number of Constitutionalists were outside. Stones were thrown into the yard; and, towards the close of the meeting, grown-up boys were seen pushing sticks under the gate. An English flag was also carried about. The Patriots broke out, and drove the Constitutionalists towards the Bank." This is the narrative of the second law officer of the Crown, in the colony: let its temper speak for that of the Government he serves. The Constitutionalists rallied, and in turn drove back the Patriots. The military were called out to assist the Constitutionalists in dispersing the latter, and then sent to their barracks; and their allies were left unmolested, while they were destroying and gutting the Vindicator office. We charge the official authorities of Montreal with being art and part in the perpetration of these outrages. It was the Constitutionalists who began the affray; it was the Constitutionalists who, under military protection, effected the destruction of property; but it was the Patriot leaders who were arrested—and the pretext was high treason. The arrests in Montreal were easily effected; not so those in the country. At Longueuil, the peasants ran to arms, and rescued the prisoners. Shots were interchanged between the habitans and the soldiers—and the civil war began.

It was begun under great disadvantages on the part of the Canadians. The government party succeeded in goading them to acts of insurrection before the province was thoroughly organized; before they had provided themselves with the means or sinews of war; at a time when the Assembly was prorogued, and incapable of supplying a central authority. The soldiers who command the troops of Britain at present, are of a very different kind from those who commanded them in the year 1775. The troops themselves are infinitely superior, both in their individual morale, and in their organization. This has been shewn by the promptitude and (as far as we yet know) the success with which the authority of Britain has been enforced in Lower Canada, since these rude events shoved the imbecile Gosford aside, and placed a man, Sir John Colborne, at the head of affairs. The Canadians in arms seem to have been unprovided with supplies, and totally destitute of officers. The suddenness of the affray, startled for a moment, and made them stand irresolute. The advantage was skilfully seized upon by Sir John Colborne, who seems to have succeeded in paralysing the insurgents. It is easy, however, to say, that this circumstance proves the insurrection to have been rash, and therefore unjustifiable. The Canadians had seen their wrongs undressed; their constitutional means of defending their rights evaded; their best patriots deprived of their commissions as justices of the peace and militia officers; the verdicts of grand juries set at naught by the officers of the crown; preparations made for suppressing their legislative representatives; houses in Montreal plundered by rioters under military protection; and now they saw the arm of power stretched out to in-carcerate the very men upon whom they depended for the assertion of their rights. Who is there among us who can say that he would have stood tamely by under similar circumstances, and, coldly calculating every contingency, allowed such an infamous act to be perpetrated under his very eyes? The prudence or imprudence of the Canadians, (and, in some cases, imprudence is a virtue) does not alter the merits of the question at issue—the right arrogated by the British Government to put down the House of Representatives in Canada, for the exercise of an undoubted constitutional right. And, if it did, the criminality of the insurgents was nothing compared with that of the abusers of power, who premeditatedly and unrelentingly goaded them to insurrection.

The progress of the drama's dénouement now carries us to the House of Commons. On the evening of Tuesday, the 16th ultimo, Lord John Russell announced his intention to introduce a bill, suspending the House of Assembly of Lower Canada from the exercise of its functions. The wretched sophism by which Lord John sought to palliate this violation of all constitutional law, was to this effect:—"In a constitutional government it is quite impossible, if the supplies be refused year after year, that the machinery of Government can go on. Well, then, what was to be done on the refusal of the supplies by a provincial Parliament? There could be, in such a case, but one of two courses to adopt—either to accede to all demands, or to take some means by which the mischief might be remedied. I stated to the House that it was impossible to adopt the former alternative. . . . And, as the demands of the Assembly were declared repeatedly to be the only conditions on which they would consent to carry on the ordinary business of the Constitution, I say, by their own act, and without any interference of the superior power, the Government was, ipso facto, suspended by themselves." Can there be a more unblushing avowal of barefaced tyranny? Suppose the case our own—suppose that the British House of Commons should refuse the supplies; according to this new constitutional doctrine, the minister of the day will, upon that event, only need to say:—"Executive government cannot be carried on without supplies; the House of Commons, by refusing the supplies, renders it impossible to carry on the executive government: ergo, the House of Commons has committed felix de se, and we may go on as if no such body existed." Yet, whatever faction may be in power when this happens, they can now cite the precedent furnished by a Whig Minister—by "a son of the illustrious house of Russell"—by the little gentleman upon whom devolved formerly the somewhat incongruous duty of carrying the Reform Bill through the House of Commons. And a reformed House of Commons listened patiently, and, to all seeming, approvingly, to this degrading doctrine! The debate on the servile address to the Queen, regarding Canada, was abruptly terminated; only twenty-eight voting for further discussion, and time for reflection. Next night, leave was given to introduce the unconstitutional bill—only seven Members voting against its introduction. The petitions from Westminster, Mary-le-Bone, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and other places, deprecating the coercion of Canada, were received with "hear and a laugh," or "hear and laughter." The minds of Members were sufficiently at ease, to waste their time in laughing at the ponderous wit which Sir Robert Peel substituted for a discussion of the question before the House. The strangling of a constitution, purchased on the part of the Canadians by the cession of broad and fertile lands, guaranteed by the honour of the legislature and executive of Britain, was voted in an indolent, chatting, laughing mood, as a mere matter of routine. The scene in the House of Lords would have been exactly the same, but for the indignant eloquence and cutting sarcasm of Lord Brougham, the sole defender of Canadian liberty in that House.

And Lord Durham has accepted the office of autocrat of Lower Canada! We are told that the selection of his Lordship for this office, is a proof of the good intentions of Ministers. We, on the contrary, hold that his Lordship's acceptance of power erected on the ruins of a constitution, is a proof that he himself is not to be trusted. Had his Lordship really entertained the Liberal sentiments he once professed, he would not have undertaken an office, the first act of which is, to overturn a representative constitution. No honest man will do evil that good may come. Ministers and Lord Durham may say that they only suspend the Canadian constitution for a time. They have the power to suspend it: how do they know that they shall possess that power long enough to restore it? They begin the work: what guarantee can they offer, that the Duke of Wellington will not conclude it? They put down the Canadian House of Assembly, either as an accomplice of the insurrection, or not. If the insurgents are (as Ministers pretend to believe) merely a small body, why suppress one of the constituted authorities for their fault? If the insurgents and the House of Assembly are identified, then do Ministers and Lord Durham, by suppressing them, place themselves in the identical position occupied by Charles I., when he displayed his banner, and levied war against the Parliament. Strafford and Charles were brought to the block, for less direct and tangible infringements of the constitution than their modern imitators are now perpetrating.

With those men, however, and their servile abettors in either House of Parliament, it is in vain to remonstrate. They have passed the Rubicon. We appeal to the country. If this crime is allowed by the British People to be perpetrated in their name, the shame and guilt, and the retribution too, will rest on their heads. What the King is to us and our House of Commons, the nation at large is to the Canadians and their House of Assembly. The colonies belong to the incorporated nation—not to the Crown.

We, by our representatives, must concur, before the Canadian constitution can be suspended; we and our representatives must concur before the supplies can be obtained for paying the red-coated ministers of the behests of despotism. Ministers cannot stir one step in their crusade against constitutional liberty, without the assent of the House of Commons; and its Members will not dare to give that assent, if their constituents raise their voices to forbid. Not a man among us but will share the guilt, if Lord John Russell's infamous bill be ever carried into execution. The retribution, too, will fall upon us. Who can count, beforehand, the costs of the war into which we are plunging? Lord Gosford confesses that all classes were indignant at Lord John Russell's resolutions of last year: how will they brook the bill of the present? That bill will make of the Canadians a united People. That bill will render it impossible for any American government to keep back its young and ardent spirits from Canada. That bill will be a spell-word to conjure to the banks of the St Lawrence every adventurous spirit from the Continent of Europe. We have, in addition to the blood-guiltiness we are meaning, to look forward to the alternative of war-taxes, or an increase of our national debt. Do our fundholders think that the security of their dividends will be increased by such an augmentation? Is there one man in the country who complains of being too lightly taxed? Will the Society of Friends allow a new war to be begun, without remonstrance? Will not the peace societies bestir themselves? Will not the religious professors of our land shew that the peaceful spirit of Christianity really animates them? Is there sympathy for black slaves alone? Are military executions less revolting than hangings at the Old Bailey? If there be, indeed, prudence, philanthropy, and religion in the land, and not a mere parade, now is the time to shew it. Let the nation protest, as one man, against the unjust and forcible suppression of Canadian liberty.

THE LONDON PERIPATETIC; OR, SKETCHES ABOUT TOWN.

No. II.—KENNETH'S CORNER.

"The place where" actors "most do congregat."

It is no matter whether a performer exercises his energies under the "ursa major" of Drury or the potentate of the Pavilion; he is sure to take his daily walk of contemplation at the region aforesaid. It is two by the clock of St Paul's, Covent Garden; the rehearsals are over. There—in a dark blue suit, and a rather broad-brimmed hat, with a yellow cane, and, if it be cold, a dark bottle-green great-coat, exceedingly long—sidles Macready, bending inwards to the wall; his complexion bearing evidence of illness, and betokening the gloomy habit of his mind. You seldom see him otherwise than solus. He glances hurriedly at the prints, and proceeds. In a surtout, and under a white hat, saunters a little, pale man, whose visage is disproportioned to his frame; his eyes are very light, and have a strange stare, for he labours under defective vision. He wears a ribbon round his neck instead of a stock, and ever and anon raises his eye-glass. He is Jerrold, the most original story-teller of the time. That scholar-like man in a blue coat and bright buttons, who carries an umbrella, though the sun is high in heaven, and the day is bright, is Settle. His smile almost amounts to a laugh. He jerks his arm forward, and catches his brother dramatist by the hand. There!—I knew it—they have stopped at the corner. He who bows as he passes them, is Bartley. Attired in mourning, and evidently in thought, he trudges on; you would take him for the holder of a small living, if you did not know him to be a comedian. He has passed the authors; but he is stopped at his button. Their heads come in contact. Something of import is on the tapis at Drury, for that gentleman is Drinkwater Meadows. Down Bow Street, dropping in at Harris the bookseller's, comes a pale-faced gentleman, who ambles rather than walks; whose pace evidently would be a run if it could. He nods to everybody—actor, author, critic, call-boy. There he crosses; now he nods to the cab at the coach-stand—they are acquaintances from two-and-twenty years' promenading, on the part of the performer, in this vicinity. He gives one look at Drury, as much as to say, "How are you?—I'm a St James' boy, now," and ambles on: that is Harley. With his head thrust forward at the top of his spare form, comes Farren; his face wearing a raw and scraped look; his figure that of a man of five-and-twenty, but his snowy brow, pointing at full fifty. He has stopped to speak to that lady with a presence. She laughs and heaves convulsively. That little boy that has walked round her, looks fatigued. She proceeds—"Earth does not bear alive a stouter" lady, or a better comic actress: that is Mrs Glover. Walking as if the bearer of an express, see that little man, who stands about five feet five. He has small quick eyes, close together; he lifts his hat to Mrs G. He is bald. His blue surtout is faced with velvet, and the cuffs are of the same material. He darts towards Drury, nodding at his mandarin, on each side, as he goes: it is Planche. That tall and powerfully-built man, to whom Kenneth is speaking, and who looks like a captain of a trader, is Forrest; and the equally tall gentleman, with a severe countenance of the Kemble school, but with very small and jet-black eyes, is Hamblin, whom the New-Yorkites call the Anglo-American. The strange-looking individual in the white hat, immediately behind them, is Allan, secretary to Mr Forrest, and his warm adulator. That four-wheeled vehicle that has stopped, contains two gentlemen in black. One who, though a play-man, is not a performer, remains there. The other steps out; he encounters nods, right and left. Jerrold does not notice him;—hum! thereby hangs a tale. He talks eagerly to Kenneth. He is a Somersetshire man, for a hundred. Hark! hew his words come out—you can just catch “second heavy”—“some star”—“after the Adelphi people.” It is Davidge of the Surrey theatre; he is looking out for fresh attractions. That lady, in a black silk cloak, with a beautiful complexion and exquisite profile, but who looks as if sorrow, rather than time, had marked her brow, is Mrs W. West. That fine boy is her son. They are met by a lady, tall and of a certain age, yet with fair hair and a smiling brow—Mrs Orger, for a thousand. They talk a moment over the then and now state of the drama, and part. That showily-dressed person with a strange expression of eye, and a hirsute countenance, is Pritchard. He rolls a brigand. He is stopped by a rather stout man, in a green Mackintosh. Who can the old fellow be? He walks like a pantaloon. Old!—why he is but little over thirty: ’tis Mr Dennett Tilbury. On the crown of the road is a chestnut horse, nearly seventeen hands high; and on the summit of the quadruped’s back, sits a little, plump, rosy, red-haired individual; if you can see at such a height, you will perceive the marks of gunpowder in his face—it is little Keesley. That young man, in the very short surtout, who nods to him, is William Wood, (not the singer,) late of Drury, who, by accident, shot K. in the face, whilst acting in a farce at the Victoria. In a long-haired, olive-coloured, fear-nought coat, comes briskly forward a very pale-faced, dark-eyed, and remarkably short-necked man; his limbs bear little proportion to his square and massive shoulders. How nervously he jerks his way forward, saluted on all sides! Hail to the Manager of the Adelphi!—for ’tis Yates. Look at yonder couple—a little man in an olive surtout, French-grey trousers, a hat curled at the sides, and shoes and pumps of exquisite neatness; his steps betray the dancer. The lady beside him is taller than he is; she is stricken in years, but bears them well; time has not yet reduced her amplitude of figure. They are the father and mother of Oscar Byrne. There goes the man who has danced an hundred times before the British Roscius. Old Seythe and Hour-glass, you have laid your hand lightly upon the father of Terpsichoreans. In a suit of black, covered by a very small white great-coat, with a cape, comes Bayle Bernard, stalling, and whirling his stick as he goes, to the endangerment of diverse wayfarers. That sturdy-looking old man, in a brown coat, plaid-trowsers, thick-soled shoes, a very broad-brimmed hat, and a brown George wig, who walks as if he indented the pavement at each step, is Downton; and yon Macintosh-caped, over-dressed, spectacled gentleman is Perkin, whom the Age, by a wilful misprint, called the largest Gherkin ever grown. The lady that steps out of that green, old-fashioned vehicle, and springs to the ground, is Mrs B——; she is dark almost as a gipsy, and wears a crop: she bounds into Kenneth’s. A lady, rather en bon point, remains in the questionable carriage; she is attired in rose-coloured silk, wears a white satin hat, and dove-coloured boots; the door of the carriage is open, and you see her entire figure: she is delicately fair, with indifferent features, and a strange expression of eye; but the ensemble is that of a fine woman: that is the best ballad singer of the day, Mrs Waylett. A dark, flat-faced man stops at the carriage door; he has a blue surtout, buttoned to the neck, and very much padded over the breast, (d la cavalry undress;) he carries an ashen stick, and walks rapidly; his face is half Jewish, and he is always alone: it is Harry Philips. As you get nearer to him, you observe his complexion, though dark, is like enamel, and every particular hair of his beard and moustache stands out in relief, as in a wax-work figure. He is joined by a taller and thinner man, whose nasal organ is largely developed. They leave the carriage-door. Mrs W. kisses the tips of her gloves, and Messrs Philips and Seguin wend towards the Haymarket. In dark garments, and with a sort of stealthy pace, goes a middle-sized, bilious-looking gentleman, whose face appears as if it had been tanned first and freckled afterwards. He turns into Broad Court, and from thence to the Wrekin: it is Warde. In light trousers, shoes, an ill-made brown surtout, and with an eye-glass swinging loosely from his neck, comes a man evidently bowed by years, and stooping so much as to appear shorter than he really is. His shoulders are expansive; his face is large, uncommonly so, and his features massive. He drops forward upon his feet as he goes. Can that be the gay, chivalrous Charles Kemble? Even so. To this complexion has he come at last.

Two persons approach from Charles Street; the first is about five feet ten. He wears large-checked shepherd’s-plaid trousers, a ditto waistcoat, and a merino shawl, (crimson,) folded d la under-vest. He has a pilot-cloth surtout and a stick. His hat is curled at each side, and he has a “shaunty swing” as he goes: it is Wrench. Beside him is a pale, dark-haired man, about five feet six, in a bear’s-skin black coat, talking earnestly to the comedian. Actor and author are probably discussing the points of a new farce; for the second individual is Leman Rede. In a close green carriage you can just see a fair face, with lustrous eyes, dark ringlets, and borrowed roses; it peeps from out a small, drawn, silk green bonnet, with a profusion of cheek-adorning lace. Beside her is a slight, small-headed, light-haired, and remarkably thin young man. The carriage turns down Hart Street, to the stage-door of Covent Garden, and Mademoiselle Vestris and

But who is this, dressed in a blue surtout, a black waistcoat redolent of sauff, stone-coloured trousers, and Blucher shoes, with grey locks hanging over his brow and over the collar of his coat? He totters by aid of a stick, and the arm of a guide. His eyes, once remarkably brilliant, glare vacantly. He lifts his eye-glass continually, and by his manner you perceive he is nearly sightless: 'tis Monciéff, once the merriest of our farce writers. He speaks to Serle, to Wrench, Leman Rede, to all; but, as he approaches each individual, places his glass to his eye, and inspects every one within six inches of their faces, ere he can recognise an acquaintance. That large-boned man in black, with the sea-worthy face and rolling gait, is the heavy man of Covent Garden, who, from his peripatetic propensities, has acquired the cognomen of Omnipresent Thompson.

That little creature, (with a face like wax-work,) enveloped in an ermine tippet and black satin dress, is Miss Vincent; and that large featured, dark-complexioned, black-eyed, stout lady, is Miss Betts. That slight, girlish-looking creature, with a laughing Bacchante countenance, is the pretty Miss Fitzwalter. In a purple velvet dress, and a very flat (shell-shaped) bonnet, see Mrs Honey, accompanied by her mother; and in a coloured muslin gown, a party-coloured straw bonnet, and a small shawl, with the ribbons of her bonnet untied, comes Mrs Fitzwilliam. Beside her is her liege lord, in a black surtout, with a ribbon round his neck, and looking like a broad copy of Douglas Jerrold.

But see, coming yonder from the Garrick Club, through the piazzas, towards the corner, a stoutly built man of about five feet six in height. His years may be fifty. He looks like one who has "gone down to the sea in ships." He wears a blue checkered shirt, a bright brown coat with metal buttons, and blue trousers. His face is embrowned. His eyes, though sunk, are expressive. He is unshaven, and wears no gloves. His gait is slowly, and few would suppose him to be either actor or dramatist; yet that man is Sheridan Knowles. He is stopped by a tall, dressy man, in a blue coat with club buttons, and a white overcoat; it is Charles Dance, author of a farce or two. That person-looking personage, in a pilot-cloth great-coat, and a broad-brimmed hat, is B. . . . a dramatic critic in the leading journal; and that small-eyed, reddish young man, that speaks to him, does the theatricals for the Evening Journal. The tall and rather robust man, in a black surtout, and shepherd's-plaid trousers and waistcoat, with a ruddy complexion, but very grey hair, is Charles Baker; and the diminutive creature, with large eyes, and his head turned upwards, to enable him to see the faces of his fellow-creatures, is the notorious and celebrated Phil. Stone, the property man. The portly man, with but one leg, is Wilmet, the prompter of Drury; and the pallid young man, with but one eye, is Parsloe, the prompter of Covent Garden.

But why linger? We might end our days, and never turn the corner; for, even as the billows come booming to the sands, do the anti-Prynnytes gather about the post at the end of Bow Street. Harlequin and Heavy Man, Singer and Soubrette, Comedian and Call-boy, are "jumbled antithetically;" and we desert our post in pure despair of enumerating one-fourth of those who daily congregate around it.

There is another class of persons frequently—too frequently—to be met about London streets, that never fails powerfully to interest my feelings, as, indeed, it must those of every man who can boast of feeling. I mean the poor, pale, worn-out milliners' fags, that you will see plodding their way, heart-weary and foot-sore, laden with their wicker baskets, lined with black leather. Early and late, but more particularly in the dusk of evening, during the fashionable season—in all parts of town, but especially westward—will you see these girls; and, if you think for a moment on their situation, you will find it, indeed, a pitiable one. Their ages generally average from thirteen to sixteen—precisely the period of life most critical, in a moral sense; yet they are thrust unprotected, uneducated, unadvised, into the very jaws of temptation, and the heart and centre of a corrupt and populous metropolis—the most perilous, in a physical sense; they are exposed to the damp, the wind, the cold, the rains, of our variable and harsh climate, in all hours and in all seasons. Scantly clad, and oftentimes scantily fed, they must brave the storm which makes the hardy and robust man shiver and wince, even under all the defences which art can devise, or money purchase, for his protection from its severity. Nor is it these poor creatures alone that engage my attention; for, even while I look upon them, my thoughts proceed, by a very natural transition, to others of the same class—the crowds of young women who are imprisoned in unwholesome work-rooms, for sixteen, eighteen, ay, twenty hours at a stretch, with scanty snatches for their joyless meals; whose routine of slavery commences at six, or seven, or eight, in the morning, and terminates at eleven, twelve, or at one or two; or is continued through the live-long night, as the caprice or business of the mistress may dictate. Oh! we have legislated for the black slaves in the West Indies; we have partly legislated, and must still more, for the white slaves in our factories at home. But here, also, is an evil and an oppression which loudly calls for the strong arm of power to interfere and crush it: a system of feminine tyranny as odious as the lash of the planter, or the despotism of a factory overseer. The health of young women must not be sacrificed, their comforts must not be wholly immolated, nor their minds left barren wastes; their liberty given up, nor their chastity held as dust in the balance—all to gratify the rage for fashion and finery which possesses the daughters of aristocracy and affluence, and the avarice of those whose profit it is to supply the demands of extravagance and luxury.

Yes; I repeat my words, and advisedly—"their chastity held as dust in the balance." Are we to be reminded that the ranks of these unhappy females who crowd our streets, are fearfully swelled by recruits from the work-rooms of the milliner and the dressmaker? And miraculous, indeed, would it be, were the case not so.

But I have lightly, and almost unconsciously, touched upon two subjects of overmuch importance to be considered in a paper—rambling, too, and desultory, like the present. It is, moreover, time that we begin to arrange our London scenes and sketches into something like form and system. With your permission, therefore, gracious reader, the next paper shall be an attempt to provide you with a pleasant residence in the capital: though I should premise that it will be addressed to one section only of society; a section, however, which I considerably esteem, and have the honour to belong to—

SINGLE GENTLEMEN RENTING CHAMBERS.

THE BOOK OF BRITISH FIELD SPORTS.*

RIGHT worthy of the noble theme is the stately volume spread on our table. It combines the literary contributions of the best contemporary sylvan sketchers and sporting writers, with numerous engravings from original paintings, by the most eminent artists that have devoted their talents to illustrating Field Sports. The forms and habits of animals of the chase, of gamekeepers, huntsmen, horses, asses, "mongrel, puppy, hound, and cur," of "the doe and the roe, and the hart and the hind;" with hunting and coursing, from rat-hunting to deer-stalking; races of every kind; and, in brief, all the shifting scenes of rural or out-door life, connected with field sports—are found here. Among the artists are LANDSEER, COOPER, CHARLES HANCOCK, and BARBAUD; and there is one engraving from Gainsborough's Ass Race, of which Hood tells the story in his richest style, and to which his comic pencil supplies the tail-piece. The author of "Tilney Hall" ought to know something of hunting.

The introduction is written by NIMROD, and abounds in those illustrative anecdotes which give so much reality and relief to all his sketches. In speaking of dogs, he expatiates upon their capacity of understanding what is said either to themselves or in their presence, and especially on any matter important to their own interests and feelings. He might, with entire propriety, have claimed much more for man's companion, at least if the dog be one which has had its kindly education by the fire-side, as well as in the field. Dogs not only knew our language—of which we, who have lived upon very familiar terms with a long-lived succession of them, have had many convincing proofs—but they can adroitly read signs; and, on particular occasions, almost divine one's thoughts. We have never known a well-conditioned dog—and the temper of the dog almost always depends on his master's treatment of him—who was not feelingly alive to the sense of honour and shame; and amenable to reason, when his master's opinion respecting his conduct was stated in a few distinct words, and an appeal made to his sense of fitness and propriety. How often have we seen the slowly wagging tail speak gentle acquiescence and resignation to the master's wishes, when temptation set in strongly in the opposite direction, and when no stronger argument was used than a few affectionate words and kind demonstrative gestures.

Particular attention is paid to dogs in a work devoted to those pleasures in which they are indispensable—if the greyhound in coursing, and the pack in a fox-hunt, do not, indeed, constitute the principal feature of the pastime. The dogs portrayed in Nimrod's volume are no fancy figures. The pug, which forms the vignette to the Introductory Chapter, and which we at first glance mistook for the celebrated toothless mastiff of Coleridge's Sir Lionel, Landseer must have met with somewhere in nature. She is as true after her kind, as the deer-hound and cocker of Glenfeshie, as the portrait of Lord Middleton's bloodhound, or the uncouth and wiry Russian setter, in the picture of the Scottish gamekeeper's fireside. Bravo, an English setter, the property of a gentleman of Berkshire, is a beautiful animal, happily delineated by Cooper. He is just on the point, and the grouse shily shewing their necks above the heath.

An article on Deer-stalking is contributed by the author of "The Shooter's Companion." The scene is Glengarry, or as probably some of the smaller glens opening upon that beautiful valley. The engraving of the Deer-stalker at Rest, under a rock, and his hound slumbering on his knee, with the fallen hart at his feet, is a good composition, by Cooper, but without any character to mark the local genius of the scene. A Spaniel and Pheasant, which is illustrated by, or illustrates Nimrod's pleasant short paper on pheasant shooting, is, on the contrary, full of character. The dog, a springing spaniel, is all but alive after the noble bird which is just flushed. In this paper, an anecdote is told of a John Bull of the true old breed, an innkeeper, and the holder of a large farm on the estate of an anonymous sporting Earl in one of the midland counties. At the time the farm was taken, there were six or eight coveys of partridges upon it, and a few hares, but not one pheasant; and his Lordship, who was probably one of those battus men whom Nimrod denounces, gave orders that it should be stocked with this species of game. At the end of three years, the farm so abounded with pheasants and hares that the tenant threw up his lease, and challenged his landlord to come into court. He had the grace rather to put up with the loss of his tenant, who, had he gone into court, would, we fear, have been cast.

What aggravated the tenant (says Nimrod) beyond the mere loss of his own crops, was the fact of being forbidden to shoot over his farm himself, although it was one which neither his landlord nor his friends ever set a foot on for that purpose. I entertained a great respect for this noble Lord, one of our leading sportsmen; every one who knows the tenant respects him; and all who were acquainted with the circumstances, applauded his independent conduct on the occasion. "Had his Lordship shot himself over the farm," said he to me, "I should not have minded the damage; but I shall not preserve game for any man's keepers, who forbids me to carry a gun on the land I am paying rent for."

The modern game-laws—and the game usages, as strong, with a struggling and dependent tenantry, as laws—are more tyrannical, and, in their caprice and insolence, far more galling than the ancient forest laws of our Norman conquerors. Nimrod gives here some remarkable anecdotes of the daring and skill of poachers. From the pen of the author of that right pleasant book, the "Oakleigh Shooting Code," there is a sketch, entitled "Andrew Gunthorpe, the Hermit of the Hills," which shews that the writer knows much more of shooting than of Celts. Woodcock shooting is undertaken by Nimrod himself, who pretends to no acquaintance with Highland grouse-shooting, though he has pursued the pastime in the North of England, and in Wales. He therefore consigns this important department to the author of the "Sportsman's Cyclopaedia," who has handled his tackle like a true shot. There is no finer engraving in this splendid volume, than the Warrener, by Hancock; for the Rabbit is not disdained by Nimrod, though his whole strength is reserved for "Fox-hunting," which is the best article in the book. The whole business of the day is gone deliberately over, with a glance backwards to the previous day, when the horses are thought about, and the pack is "drawn" and fed. In these degenerate days, few packs meet before half-past ten or eleven o'clock, and after the modern fox-hunter—most unlike the jolly squires, his ancestors!—has breakfasted with his family on tea or coffee slops, instead of attacking a huge pasty and cool tankard, at five in the morning.

The equipments and habits of a thoroughbred Meltonian, are thus described by a very competent authority:—

The Meltonian never takes the field without having sent two hunters to the place of meeting; one of which he rides the first burst, whilst his post-groom, on the other, contrived to select him at some point, should the course of the chase admit of his doing so; or to follow in his wake so judiciously as to bring him a comparatively fresh horse to mount, at the first or second check. This it is chiefly in his power to do, by having the fences broken down for him by the crowd which has preceded him, as well as his quiet style of riding. . . . The stud of the Meltonian averages twelve hunters, and two hacks, (although in the stables of a few, double the number of the former may be found,) the average annual expenses of which amount to about £1000 per annum. All those gentlemen, however, whose weight, with their saddles, exceed twelve stones, cannot be said to be well horsed, unless they have fourteen or sixteen seasoned hunters in their stables. . . . The style of living of the Meltonian varies with his situation in life, more than with his means, because, without ample means, he cannot long enjoy that distinguished appellation. If a single man, he is either a member of one of the clubs, or keeps house himself. In the first case, his in-door establishment consists of merely an accomplished valet; in the next, of a first-rate man-cook. Should he be married, and, as in many instances at Melton Mowbray, be accompanied by his lady, there is no lack of good society in the town of Melton and its neighbourhood; or of houses equal to the accommodation of families of the first-rate rank and distinction. There is no error more common than the association of dissipation with fox-hunting, although it cannot be denied that, in part of the last century, they were too closely allied, but chiefly as related to hospitality and the bottle. In fact, the fox-hunter was little more than a brute in the morning and a sot in the evening; and, after a certain hour, utterly unfit to be introduced into good female society. A most beneficial change, however, has been wrought in the manner and habits of this class of persons, and in some measure effected by the very permit itself. A Meltonian cannot be a very dissipated man, for any length of time at least, if he were disposed to be so; for his severe exercise obliges him to be temperate and take his natural share of rest. Let any one visit Melton Mowbray at midnight, and he will find the streets as quiet, and as many houses shut up for the night, as he would find in the most obscure town of Great Britain. Let him also, if he should be so fortunate as to have the entré, observe the generally elegant and always correct deportment of the parties assembled at the various dinner parties of the day.

Nimrod carries this complimentary strain the length of praising the after-dinner conversation, which embraces many topics remote from fox-hunting, dogs, horses, and huntsmen. Whist and ecart form part of the evening's amusement at Melton, and occasionally for rather high stakes; but "the detestable vice of gambling is far from being the characteristic of the Melton Mowbray community."

Nimrod's admiration of the fox, is only secondary to his admiration of the fox-hunter, the hound, and the horse. The fox lives like a sage, and dies like a hero.

The cries of the hare, (he says,) when in the power of man or dog, are pitiable, resembling those of an infant child in distress; but the fox dies in silence, like the boxers of old; and like the sheep, a circumstance noticed by Homer at the funeral of Patroclus. In the numerous deaths of these animals which I have witnessed in my time, I have never heard the sound of their voice, or a complaint, although, as may be supposed, they defend themselves with their teeth in their struggles, and, when at bay, open their mouths wide, making a faint noise, resembling a child breathing on a plate of glass, to enable it to write its name in the steam.

Continental sporting finds a place in Nimrod's treatise, and Chantilly as the head-quarters of horse-racing and of French sporting gentlemen. The French employ English jockeys, or as many of la grande nation do so as can afford the luxury; and their racers are often of English blood. The English nobility, who make Paris and its vicinity their principal residence, are the leading men of the turf in France, though the amusement is warmly patronized by the Duke of Orleans. Races are also frequent at Brussels, Boulogne, and St Omer. At all these places the English figure; and, indeed, English industry, and its rich accumulations, support half the extravagance and dissipation of the Continent. Nimrod displays true knowledge of the principle which regulates supply and demand, when he scouts the idea of horses either degenerating in England, or of injury to the breeds from the continental demand.

One of the most remarkable of the late continental Nimrods was a lady, or Nimrodesse, Madame Drack, who resided in "a rich well-timbered country," about sixteen miles from Calais, and in which Henti Quatre once had a hunting seat. This lady died in 1823, very aged, and a widow. Though her fortune would seem trifling to a Meltonian, she pursued the chase constantly, and was kind and hospitable. To Nimrod, "her old servant spoke of her in the highest terms of praise, not only as to her accomplishments of field and flood, but of her kindness to her servants, and great care of the poor." He continues—

Of her person, I am unable to say much. She had rather a masculine appearance; and her face was distinguished by a large wart. The domain—including the house, stables, and offices, a small flower-garden, a kitchen-garden of five acres, in which there were some peculiarly fine orange trees, and a paddock in front of the house—was enclosed by a high wall, and entered by a double set of large-panelled gates, the whole together not covering an extent beyond ten acres of ground. As for the house, it has no pretensions to architectural ornaments; but its means of affording accommodation may be imagined from the fact of my having stepped thirty paces on end, a good yard to a step, through the rooms and passages of the first floor. I must, however, be a little more minute in my description of the interior of this chateau. On the left of the entrance-hall, is the dinner-room; in which, amongst others, is a figure of Madame with the hounds. She is mounted on a grey gelding, said to have been her favourite hunter, and is thus equipped:—a green coat, with a gold band round the waist, hat with high crown and a gold band, her hair appearing behind in rather large curls, leather breeches, and boots, and seated, of course, à la Nimrod. In addition to all this, she has the couteau de chasse by her side, and the figure of the wolf on the buttons of her clothes, denoting the chef d'œuvre of her pursuit. Her best hunting dress, richly ornamented, cost 1200 francs.

Her drawing-room was ornamented with paintings of hunting the wolf, the boar, the fox, and the stag; in all which Madame was conspicuous. She was also fond of fishing, and her favourite pocheur and huntsman figured in the paintings. The kitchen of Madame la Baronne was worthy of feudal times. In it, besides a large fire-place and ovens, there were six large hot hearths; and, even in her widowhood, she had three dinner parties every week, but always after the chase was over. This she followed on alternate days. The head of a gigantic stag adorns this hospitable kitchen. The antlers were three feet and a half in height. Madame shot the animal before her hounds, when he was nine years old. This must have been one of her most memorable fields. This lady hunted all the year round, and in all weathers; for, when the boar and stag were not in season, the wolf and fox might be found. She also hunted badgers with a pack of beagles trained to this novel sport. She was a cock-fighter, and had an apartment for the purpose.

It was the custom of Madame Drack to go occasionally to a distant part of the country, when game in her own neighbourhood was short. Her return from one of these excursions was thus described by the gardener:—She passed through St Omer with some wolves' heads about her carriage, exposed to public view; blowing the horn herself, and thus attracting notice. So rich was her hunting dress, on the occasion, the chasseur's belt being ornamented with gold tassels—that the soldiers at the gates presented arms to her, mistaking her for a general officer. . . . Perhaps, (says Nimrod, in closing his account of this modern Camilla,) a more universal follower of, and adept in field sports, than this celebrated woman, is not even at this time to be found; and it is to be lamented that she died without perpetuating her breed. Of the total amount of her prowess, I have not the means of being informed; but she is known to have been at the death of six hundred and seventy-three wolves in her time, besides stags, and other inferior quarry; and it is singular, that the first wolf she killed, her hounds ran into a village where there was a wake, and she shot him in the midst of the people.

This lady eclipses Squire Osbaldtston; and a Miss Burgany, who, for many years, hunted in Cheshire, appears but as a foil to the French female Nimrod. Miss Burgany was rather reserved or prudish in her fields, and generally, after riding to cover, kept aloof from the crowd until the critical moment, and, after that, her admirable horsemanship, and skill, and courage in clearing a fence, left the crowd far behind. We hear of another lady, a Miss Richards, of Compton Beauchamp, who seems to have been a volunteer member of the Ashdown Coursing Meeting, and in whose kennel the best greyhounds of the County of Berkshire were bred. This lady possessed a good estate, and was well connected. She chose celibacy and coursing, and wilfully preferred greyhounds to those animals reckoned nobler, who hunt with them. On hiring a cook, her first question was, "Young woman, do you love dogs?" The qualified answer would be, "Yes, please your Ladyship, in their proper places." Then, quoth Miss Richards, gravely, "If you are disposed to stay with me, their place in my house is wherever they choose to go." The dogs accordingly had their appropriate bed, or ottoman, in every sitting room of the house; and, at their mistress's death, they were left, together with the estate of the eccentric lady, to an adopted child. Miss Richards wrote her own epitaph, in the following lines, which are not much worse, we should imagine, than the compositions of the majority of her brother sportsmen, bred at either of the Universities:—

"Reader, if ever sport to thee was dear,
Drop on Ann Richard's tomb a tear;
Who, when alive, with piercing eye
Did many a timid hare decry.
Well skilled and practised in the art,
Sometimes to find, and sometimes start;
All arts and sciences beside,
This hair-brained heroine did decide.

An utter foe to wadlock's noose,
Where poaching men had stooped the mouse,
Tattle and tea, she was above it,
And but for form appeared to love it."

This lady would course on foot twenty or twenty-five miles in a morning. She managed her affairs well, and exercised a substantial old-fashioned hospitality, of which man and horse, rich and poor, partook at all times. No one came to the mansion-house without receiving the refreshment of a meal, and a tankard of home-brewed ale. She drove her coach and six; and her venerable servants, fixtures for life, were stiff with the lace garnitures of the menials of the olden time. At Compton, there is still an avenue called the Wig Avenue, where her dinner-guests and admirers, the gentry of the Vale of the White Horse, laid aside their riding-wigs, and donned the flowing perukes, brought hither in band-boxes by their attendants, to be set at the eccentric but sensible heiress.

Two superb heads of Fox-hounds, in the pack of J. C. Bulteel, Esq., M.P., sketched and engraved by Lewis; and Red-deer Shooting in the Irish Highlands, painted by Cooper, are admirable engravings; to which are wedded, clever illustrative sketches in prose and verse. The hounds makes as good a figure here as the dog. We have the noble animal in its best state, and of all varieties, from the high-mettled racer to the shaggy-coated sheltie. In the exquisite picture of The Warrener, the pony, full of untamed spirit, and wildly luxuriant in its shaggy beauty, is the principal object. We have, besides, portraits of Thorngrove and Sir Hercules, both celebrated racers; of a beautiful brood-mare and her foal, by Laporte, and several more horses of distinction; while animals of the more picturesque kind, both of the horse and dog species, often form picturesque tail-pieces.

Bay Middleton, whose portrait we have from the pencil of Cooper, is considered by Nimrod, if not the best-bred, as one of the best horses in England; and, in some, more brilliant than the famous Plenipotentiary, since "he has never been beaten, either by fair means or foul." His career has been one of continuous victory. This fine animal was lately purchased from the Earl of Jersey, by Lord George Bentinck, for £4000; but, in one season, he won £10,000. Plenipotentiary himself figures among the engravings; and both portraits have been recently taken by Cooper for this work. For the latter horse, £7000 have been refused.

We must now take abrupt leave of Nimrod, whom we have seldom found more entertaining, and never before half so well appointed.

THE TRIAL OF THE GLASGOW COTTON-SPINNERS.

We have no ambition to emulate the eloquent invectives against the proceedings of the Glasgow Cotton-Spinners' Union, in which a large portion of the press has been indulging. Their proceedings have been bad enough, to be sure; but we cannot exactly see the parallel between them and the crimes of Burke. Neither can we see in them any trace of national demoralisation. Comparatively speaking, there are few, even of the working-classes, implicated in these transactions; and, as to their enormity, "let him who is without sin throw the first stone." When "their betters" cease to set the working classes the example of seeking to monopolise a good thing—after the fashion of "the landed interest," with their corn-laws, or the "colonial interest," with their monopoly in favour of colonial produce—"their betters" may, without incurring the charge of hypocrisy, turn up their eyes in horror at the idea of a monopoly of cotton-spinning; and when "their betters" abandon the brutal and insensate appeal to the duello, or grow ashamed of putting down the Canadian House of Assembly, by red-coats, for asserting its constitutional rights, we will not hint a word about taking the mote out of their brother's eye before they take the beam out of their own, when they denounce the maiming and murdering of "nobs."

Let us not, however, be misunderstood. It is neither our intention nor our wish to say one word in palliation of the crimes brought home to certain members of the Glasgow Cotton-

Spinners' Association. We reprobate them, both on account of their direct and immediate mischievousness, and because of the difficulties they interpose in the way of that thorough and searching regeneration of our institutions which is necessary to the comfort and the safety of all. But in reprobating them, we wish at the same time to protest against the abuse of the proof of these crimes, to whitewash their real originators. We wish to call attention to the true root of the evil—to point out its wide and vital ramifications—to rebuke crime in purple as well as in rags.

There are two topics suggested by the result of the Cotton-Spinners' trial:—The distorted feelings and opinions out of which the outrages which occasioned it sprang; and the use to which it has been sought to be turned. The Leeds Times has wisely and timeously reminded the working-classes what sort of persons they were who, on former occasions, advocated recourse to violence under suffering. We do not mean to insinuate that Richmonds, Castles, and Olivers, are now abroad. But we do unhesitatingly say, that doctrines as mischievous as those which were preached by the worthies we have named have of late been industriously disseminated by men who combine natural fluency and practice in public speaking, with shallow intellect, limited information, and excitable temperaments. These men may, under certain circumstances, possess the power of goading to destroy; but they are not able to point out to any man a way of really and permanently bettering his condition. They lack knowledge to see what ought to be removed and what established. They lack fixedness and continuity of purpose to organize for a great undertaking—to work perseveringly without as with the stimulus of the sympathizing plaudits of admiring crowds. They lead men into scrapes, and then get out of them themselves as best they may. While young, and with their passions sensitive and excitable, they are as much the dupes of their own emotions as those that listen to them; but, when the rich sap of youth dries in their veins, having no substance, they shrivel up. They cease to be anything, or they become the heartless stuff out of which spies and informers are made.

We think it unnecessary to do more than warn the public at large, and the working-classes in particular, to beware of false prophets; for such are abroad. Their own good sense will teach them to recognise the symptoms, and detect individual instances. The exhibitions of such persons as we have been alluding to, have been productive hitherto of nothing beyond local and evanescent excitement. The great mass of the working-classes are healthy at the core, in as far as any evil flowing from such a source is concerned. If it be true—and we have heard it confidently asserted—that pre cognitions have been instituted, and warrants issued for certain itinerant orators, we regret it. They have done no harm as yet; but we will not pledge ourselves that they shall continue equally impotent, if elevated into factitious importance, by being made the objects of an unwise and uncalled for persecution, which some of them court.

We dismise, therefore, this topic, as demanding no more lengthened or serious notice. Of these mistaken views and reprehensible feelings, however, which gave birth to the outrages that led to the late trial, we would speak a little more at length. We would speak of them as a theme which interests all classes—the rich, who fancy themselves wise, as well as the poor, who are acknowledgedly imperfectly instructed. The moral (let not the proud and wealthy wince) needs to be laid to heart by all. We would speak as sincere and affectionate friends of the working-classes; as believing that the greater number of them are innocent of all participation in or approbation of such outrages; as feeling, even with regard to the deluded perpetrators and approvers of these outrages, that there is much in the existing circumstances of society to palliate and extenuate their guilt.

It has been proved, on the trial, that the members of the Glasgow Cotton-Spinners' Association were bound by an oath, or obligation, to keep its secrets, and obey the mandates of a majority. The witnesses for the Crown swore to this fact, and some of the witnesses for the declaration had a convenient memory on this subject, while one of the panel refused to declare. In addition to this evidence, the report of a Committee on a plan of "Home and Foreign Emigration," which two of the witnesses for the defence proved to have been acted upon, and which was found in the safe of the Association, establishes the fact that an oath, or obligation of some kind, was imposed upon members:—"We propose to embody this law in the obligation." The great object of this Association, as appears from its regulations, and the Report to which we have referred, was to keep up the wages of cotton-spinning in and around Glasgow, by producing, artificially, a short supply of that class of labourers. No cotton-spinner, even, was admissible into the Association who did not belong to the district in and immediately around Glasgow, with the sole exception of members of the Renfrewshire Association. The Association "binds and obliges every one of its members to refrain from instructing any individual in the art of spinning, except such as are sons or brothers of a spinner, who may have been, or is a member of the Association." And when, notwithstanding these precautions, their numbers were still deemed excessive, they sought to diminish them by "Home and Foreign Emigration;" that is, they gave £10 to every individual member of their body who was willing to emigrate, or remove to another district, or merely to give up the employment of cotton-spinning. They took measures for enforcing the obedience of members, as well as of non-members, to their injunctions. Members were obliged, on various pretexts, to grant bills, or to allow a decree to be obtained against them for certain sums. These bills or decrees were held by the Association, and diligence obtained, as occasion required, against refractory members, in order to enforce obedience. New members were slandered out of employment, or intimidated, by acts of violence against themselves, or others in the same situation, into a relinquishment of employment. It has been proved that an individual convicted of an assault tending to promote the objects of the Association, was pardoned, upon the office-bearers pledging themselves to withdraw their "Guards" from a mill; and it has been proved that other individuals guilty of assaults under cloud of night, were sent out of the way of justice by the office-bearers, with recommendatory certificates.

The existence of this Association, the objects it contemplated, the practices it resorted to, in order to enforce these objects, have been proved, beyond a shadow of doubt, in a court of justice. Glimpses of similar organisation, among various bodies of workmen, have been obtained, from time to time, in the progress of strikes, or in the proceedings of courts of justice. The objects of these associations (as we shall proceed to shew immediately) are an encroachment upon the just rights of the industrious classes; and the power of punishing such as refuse obedience to the laws of these self-constituted Associations, arrogated by their office-bearers, is incompatible with the existence of civil society. That these Associations are too numerous to be overlooked—that the erroneous opinions and bad feelings they foster and give effect to, are of a nature which must be eradicated—these certain we believe, however, that it is only a comparatively small portion of the working-classes that are implicated in them—those only who belong to the more favoured class of skilled artisans. We believe that, even among this class, there are many who feel themselves embarrassed by the ill-judged regulations of the Associations, and revolted at the measures to which their more reckless members have had recourse. The strength of these Associations lies in two misapprehensions—First, on the part of their members, that they can be benefited by them; second, on the part of the great mass of unskilled labourers, that they have an interest in upholding these close corporations. We believe that correct views on these points would disarm these unions of their power to do mischief, and would unite the People in support of measures that can benefit them. It is with a view to diffuse such views, that we now offer a few observations to the working-classes, in a spirit of earnest friendship, alike to those who have had no participation in the unions, and even to the most deluded mis-guiders of the energies of these Associations.

We see the motive which led at first to the formation of these associations—it is one of which their members have no reason to be ashamed. There exists a fearful amount of want and privation among the unskilled labourers, and even among that class which can scarcely be called unskilled, but whose individual efforts are vain in competition with the gigantic efforts of machinery. But there is nothing to prevent the unskilled to learn the trade of the remunerated artisan, and, by inundating his province with their hungry shoals, to drag him down to their own level. To prevent this consummation was the original object of the associations. We shall shew presently that the means they adopted—admitting, for argument's sake, that they were justifiable—were inadequate to their object: we proceed to trace the career of the associations. They found, as they might have anticipated, that, as mere self-constituted bodies, destitute of civil authority, they could not enforce the obedience even of their own members longer than suited their interest and convenience, and that they had no hold whatever upon those who were beyond their pale. They had no alternative but to relinquish their object, or have recourse to intimidation. It is most probable that their sense of what was fair and just to others, would have prevented them from having recourse to the latter alternative, for their own individual purposes; but they reconciled themselves to it, by the sophistical palliation, that it was for the general body, not for their own selfish ends. But indirect practices and violence, become, by habit, as demoralising when undertaken under the delusive belief that they are public-spirited, as when undertaken for mere selfish purposes. In either case, the habitual practice of violence degrades the man to the tyrant and the ruffian. Unwise legislation lent its aid to increase the evil: not only acts of violence were forbidden, but the mere act of combining, which might be innocent or praiseworthy, and which, even when mis-directed, was harmless, so long as terrorism was restrained, was prohibited under penalties. The inevitable consequence was—secret associations; the further perversion of the moral sense, by the abuse of the religious sanction; the hardening in error, by enabling men to gild their worst outrages by the conscious pride of martyrdom; the more thorough enthralment of the good men of the associations to the bold bad spirits among them. This was the mixed frame of mind produced among members of these associations, by the dread of destitution and the combination laws. The mischief done by a bad law long survives its repeal, as may be seen in the present instance. The Cotton-Spinners' Association of Glasgow dates from before the repeal of the combination laws, and much of what is bad in its practices is attributable to them.

We have endeavoured thus to analyse the feelings of the associators, for two reasons:—First, we wish to let the active members of these associations see that, if our eyes are open to their faults, they are not shut to their virtues. We see that their motives and intentions are like those of all mankind—a mingled yarn. We would have them to look as we do at their minds; to recognise their errors, and to weed them from their more generous principles of action, of which we acknowledge the existence, and of which they are justly proud. In the second place, we would request those who are naturally alarmed at the proceedings of these associations, to recognise what is good in their members as well as what is bad. Let them beware, in their legitimate anxiety to disarm them of evil, of trampling down that living spirit of man within them which may be purged to good. In the proceedings of these associations, we see disregard of truth, reckless infliction of suffering on others; but we also see fidelity to their associates, energy and business talent, a sense of honour, (however misdirected,) and self-reliance. There is something there that good may come of, if rightly dealt with. The evil must be repressed; but let us try to preserve the good.

Our remonstrance with such of the working classes as are deluded enough to believe that associations, organized like that of the Glasgow cotton-spinners, and adopting similar means to attain their ends, can help them—is as follows:—The greatest success which these associations might meet with, could not remove the cause of the evil. There would still be, as before, a deficiency of employment and remuneration for the masses. The wild and blind struggles of such associations, are like the angry contests of men in a beleaguered town, for the last morsel of food. They may succeed in snatching the miserable pittance from the mouths of these more destitute and weaker than themselves; but even this melancholy triumph will only enable them to protract their own sufferings. The real cause of the misery of the working classes, is a short supply of food and employment, occasioned by artificial means, and an unjust appropriation of a portion even of what exists, by the privileged classes. The corn-laws and other restrictions on commerce, diminish the supply of food, diminish the demand for labour, diminish the remuneration for what labour is required. The irrational and unpractical nature of our civil institutions, forces what benefits we do derive from social organisation to be purchased at an exorbitant price, and facilitates a swindling conveyance of a large amount of the produce of honest industry to state paupers. These are the causes why there is not enough of employment, and food, and clothing, in the land, for every man willing to work, and for those dependent upon him. Not only do the selfish struggles of the few associated trades leave these evils undressed—by diverting public attention from them, they strengthen and perpetuate them. The associations of the skilled artisans do not work harmoniously even with each other. They do not, they cannot, form a nucleus for an enduring combination of all the working-classes struggling for one definite end, of common utility. They dissipate the strength of the working-classes; enfeeble them, as well as misdirect their efforts. They further weaken them by forcing the industrious capitalist, whose interest, rightly viewed, is the same as theirs, to stand aloof. We do not claim for the capitalist any imaginary benevolence; we do not say that he wishes to give higher wages than he can help; but we say that the fixing of the rate of wages is no more in his power than it is in that of the workmen. When profits are high, there is competition in his line; more workmen are required, more is bid for their service. When profits are low, capital is withdrawn, fewer workmen are employed, and the necessities of the employer, as well as the competition of the employed, beat down the rate of wages. The true way to increase employment, to increase the rate of wages, is for all classes of hand labourers, and for the capitalists, (the head labourers;) to combine in one united effort—firstly, for the abolition of all laws which, by artificially narrowing the field of industry, diminish at once the supply of food and other comforts, to be distributed among the whole, and that industry by means of which the distribution is effected; secondly, the abolition of all those institutions which take the bread out of the mouths of the honest and industrious, to feed luxurious and dishonest indolence. But such a combination is impossible, until all associations, having for their object the interests of a few, are abandoned, and until violent and fraudulent means of effecting any purpose, which, by engendering mutual ill-will and distrust, unloose the bundle of rods, and enable the oppressor to break them one by one, are relinquished for ever.

We have addressed the working-classes; but they are not alone, nor are they so much to blame as the wealthier. That they distrust the already enfranchised classes, is a melancholy fact; but have they no cause for that distrust? Have these classes, by the use they have made of the franchise, shewn that they have at heart the general interest?—that they possess sufficient wisdom and fortitude to use the power they have obtained for the common good? Have they deputed themselves towards the unenfranchised classes with that frank urbanity which proves the inward consciousness of good intentions? Have they, in virtue of the superior knowledge they arrogate to themselves, acted so as to disabuse the blind confidence reposed by the working-classes in special unions of particular trades? Truth forces us to answer each and all of these questions in the negative. The enfranchised classes, instead of returning a House of Commons which would set to work to effect substantial reforms, have sunk into the miserable contest of two great aristocratic factions; they have most deservedly incurred the distrust of the non-electors. The enfranchised classes have borne themselves with repulsive superciliousness towards the non-electors. They have availed themselves of the assistance of the non-electors; but whenever a difference of opinion arose, instead of calmly arguing it, they have drawn back and vituperated them. The enfranchised classes, by upholding corporations, by tolerating Corn-Laws, and by allowing colonial and shipping monopolies to endure, have naturally led the working classes to believe that there is virtue in exclusive privileges. The principle of corporations and agricultural or trading monopolies is the principle of Trades' Unions. With what face can Lord John Russell blame trades' unions, when he declares that the House of Commons is nothing but a great landowners' union? With what face can he and his colleagues talk (as they are doing) of legislative measures to prevent violence and intimidation by trades' unions, when this, their own landowners' union, is preparing violence and intimidation for the Canadian "nobs" who dare to disobey its mandates?

The truth is, that there are folly and faults—grievous faults—on both sides. Neither side can gain by sullenly holding out. The idle and dissipated, or the avaricious and jobbing, who benefit by bad government, will avail themselves of the continuance of the feud, to plunder and oppress both. A thorough revision of our laws and institutions is necessary; and this can only be obtained by a thorough reform of our representative system. We repeat Bentham's prescription:—Universal Suffrage; Equal Electoral Districts, on the Basis of Population; Vote by Ballot; Annual Parliaments; No Property Qualification; Paid Members of Parliament.

Gentlemen of the educated and enfranchised classes, will you make the first overture for union? No? You shew little of that superior wisdom you boast of. Gentlemen of the unenfranchised and unwashed classes, will you? No? Upon our words, we are ashamed of you; you are almost as bad as "your betters." Well, the misgovernment of your rulers will whip both parties into a wiser temper in time.

WOULD I HAD BEEN A GRECIAN YOUTH !—AN ODE.

BY T. MACMAHON HUGHES.

WOULD I had been a Grecian youth,
 Born in the days of yore,
 When men were bold to speak the truth,
 Not Falsehood to adore—
 That harlot of this modern time,
 Worshipped by men of every clime,
 Whose tongues are shaded o'er,
 As various as the peacock's wing,
 For lying's a familiar thing !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 With unrestrained limb,
 To tread the fairest soil on earth,
 And tune to Freedom's hymn
 The golden lyre, 'mid marble shrine,
 Altar, and column, all divine ;
 Then sound its praise to Him
 Whom Greece, alas ! but faintly knew—
 The living God—the just—the true !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 To steep the crimson sword
 In blood of tyrants to the hilt,
 And own no human lord ;
 Strike magisterial villains dead,
 Enthroned fair Justice in their stead ;
 And, if a foreign horde
 Dared to invade my father land,
 Thermopylæ, to swell thy band !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 Of the three hundred one,
 Whose dripping swords clove thousands down,
 Or ere the fight was done ;
 Who closed their ranks fair Greece to save,
 (A living bulwark of the brave !)
 The Persian host to stun,
 And scare with godlike valour back
 Whole millions lashed to the attack.

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 Trained to the blood-red fight ;
 With every muscle lion-strung,
 And every limb aright !
 A breast of symmetry like those Thy friezes, Parthenon ! disclose ;
 Beins as the greyhound's light ;
 And sinewy knee, and stalwart arm,
 And heart for the stern conflict warm !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 What time the Persian hordes,
 Upon the plain of Marathon,
 Claimed Hellas as its lords !—
 Then gore had o'er my pathway gushed,
 As with a bridegroom's fire I rushed
 In transport on their swords !
 My brand had been my blushing bride ;
 Torrents of blood its sheen had dyed !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 When war's alarm was o'er,
 To shine in the peace-loving arts
 That graced the Attic shore ;
 To sculpture beneath Phidias' eye
 Those classic forms that ne'er shall die,
 Catch all his matchless lore,
 And mark how, when the work was done,
 He eagle-eyed his Parthenon.

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 To daunt the Olympic crowd
 With feats of godlike power, and hear
 Their " Ios ! " swelling loud !
 To wrestle, or the chariot guide,
 Or o'er the Athenian stadium glide,
 Proclaimed the victor proud ;
 And on my head receive in showers,
 Ilyssian bank, thy waving flowers !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 The honeyed store to sip,
 In Academus' palmy groves,
 Distilled from Plato's lip ;
 Or, seated in the Porch, to hear
 The words of Zeno, sage austere ;
 Or, from each sophism strip
 Its tinsel, taught to reason right
 By the commanding Stagyræ !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 To hear the Theban lyre
 Struck by a Pindar's dashing hand,
 Tuned to his tongue of fire ;
 Or, 'neath some myrtle's tender shade,
 To hear the glowing Lesbian maid
 Breathe o'er the golden wire
 Her burning spirit, thrilled with love,
 Keen as the fire of mighty Jove !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 With awe-suspended breath,
 To see Melpomene diffuse
 Destruction, horror, death !
 To mark the Titan, thunder-riven,
 Send his defiance up to Heaven,
 And dare the Thunderer's wrath ;
 Then, deeply worshipping, regard
 Old Æschylus, the warrior-bard.

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 To mark when Jason's bride,
 Pregnant with vengeance, brooded o'er
 Her stern infanticide !
 Would I had watched, with eye dismayed,
 Beneath the parricidal blade
 When Clytemnestra died ;
 And when the Furies, screaming wild,
 Pursued her horror-tortured child !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 To mark the speaking frown
 Of Pericles, when, lightning-eyed,
 He awed oppressors down !
 Or when the might of Æschines,
 With torrent-tongued Demosthenes,
 Contended for the crown—
 To hear from one those words of wonder,
 That in the other waked the thunder !

Would I had been a Grecian youth,
 When Greece her might put forth ;
 Her sons the bold, the sage, the free,
 Her daughters first on earth !
 Were I a Grecian in these days,
 My prostrate countrymen I'd raise,
 And new-sprung Freedom's birth
 Hallow with yearnings of the brave,
 Or seek and find an early grave !

EXTRACTS FROM THE MEMORANDUM BOOK OF THE LATE PASTOR OF ST LEONARD'S.

NO. I.—THE SOMNAMBULIST.

28th March 18—.

Ex die.—HAVING been informed, by George Anderson, the clerk, that Walter B—, the proprietor of the estate called Dowielee, had been sorely tried—that, like Habakkuk, his lips quivered, that rottenness had entered into his bones, that he trembled and prayed to be at rest in the day of trouble, and wished to see me—I resolved to visit him. After all my labours, how little good, alas! do I do, unless I am aided by the powerful mean of Heaven-sent affliction! Yesterday I did no service to heaven, for the individuals I attempted to benefit were steeped in the drunkenness of worldly prosperity. These are strange times in which we live. They are like those mentioned by Esdras—"When men hope, but nothing obtain; and labour, but their ways do not prosper." It is necessary, however, that our energies in the good cause of salvation be doubled. I hope this day may not be like yesterday—a barren field in God's kingdom on earth.

I called at Dowielee. Though in the neighbourhood, I had never even seen the house, which lies deep in the birchwood that surrounds it, and conceals it from the eye of the passer by. The proprietor never before solicited either my friendship or my professional aid—preferring to struggle single-handed with his sorrows and misfortunes; but it is not good that we should stand by and wait till we are called; for, while we wait, the soul perisheth; therefore do I blame myself for not having waited on him before. Walter B—, to whom the servant introduced me by name, received me kindly. He is about seventy years of age; has been a good-looking, and is still an intelligent, though grief-worn and miserable individual—bent, broken down, and carrying on his aged shoulders a dreadful load of disease and sorrow. As the proprietor of so fair an estate, he must have "enjoyed" in his day; but he is receiving now in this time "an hundredfold." He could not rise to receive me—being bound, by his innumerable infirmities, to an old high-backed chair, elaborately carved and stuffed with cushions, but a faint smile, which struggled with difficulty through wrinkles, deep furrowed by age and sorrow, made ample amends for the want of the accustomed forms of reception he had been necessitated to renounce.

Having sat down, I told him I had called in consequence of his own request, communicated to me through the session-clerk.

"And I am glad," he replied, "that you have so quickly complied with my wish; for, though I have suffered as no man hath suffered, my affliction hath wrung from my heart, along with my pain, but too little of a balm that is said to be secreted there, and which, if brought forth and properly applied, is capable of not only assuaging our sorrow, but making us love it. Nor have I inquired for good means to produce this effect."

"It is not too late," said I, "for the final good, though it may be for the temporal benefit, of your mind and body, which, I daresay, you acknowledge to be of no great importance, when compared with that which awaits us; for none of us are long in this world of trial till we are compelled to pray, as Tobit prayed, that we may be 'dissolved and become earth.' Experience, common sense, poetry, and revelation, all agree in the conclusion, that the portion of man in this world, is suffering."

"Ay, but it is not even in the power of poetry," said he, smiling painfully, "to shadow forth suffering like mine. What I have borne, I have concealed; but I have latterly thought that, if I were to unburden my mind of the secret of my misery, I might, from such a person as you, receive the aid of a sympathy which would not stop to assuage my temporal sorrow, but lead and accompany my mind in an endeavour to turn that sorrow to account in the place where it may be of proper avail."

I expressed myself well pleased with his intention, and described to him many advantages that I had known to result from unburdening the mind of secret causes of grief, besides that of enabling a person in my situation to enter into the same train of thinking and feeling, and thence to lead the mind from thoughts already ascertained, to others, in the gradation and progress of a proper regeneration. He accordingly proceeded with his narrative.

"I have said that my sufferings are beyond the descriptive powers of the poet; but, indeed, no invention of man in weaving together the incidents of life, by the powers of a fertile imagination, ever can accomplish a work combining so many ingenious modes of misery as may be found in actual operation in the mind and body of a man engaged in the ordinary pursuits of life. The dramatic poet has, especially in Greece and in our own England, done perhaps all that can be done, to shew how far the invention of man can go, in making the ideal elevated and intensive; yet, on a comparison of these grand and immortal efforts of inspired genius, with one single hour of the life of any man that has lived long enough 'to know what it is to live,'—occupied, as that brief span may be, with ten thousand successive ideas and emotions, following and crowding on each other with a celerity equalled by nothing that is palpable to man's senses, and yet, every one of them loaded with its appointed portion of human suffering too fine and too acute for being expressed by the clumsy apparatus of language—how far short do they fall of a portrayal of pure moral truth! Your own individual sufferings—for all men consider their griefs to be great, each indeed conceiving his own to be the most acute and unmerited—will secure for me an admission of the correctness of what I now advance. In the expression of the real suffering of life—at least of what I have felt of it, and I think I excel all in my experience of misery—a man can scarcely stumble on the province of paradox; and, taking refuge under that sentiment, I could say, in sober earnestness, that I have experienced more pain in one minute of time than all the splendid and magnificent language of Æschylus in his ninety plays, or of Shakspeare in all he wrote, is capable of conveying to the mind of man. But, in this impotency of language, we may discover the traces of the merciful finger of God; for, if it were possible for man to communicate to his brethren the real felt nature of his sufferings, the misery of our condition would be multiplied a thousand millions of times, and the heavens would be filled with the lamentations of mortals.

"Were it not for the reason I have already mentioned, you may be well assured that I would not, I could not, have prevailed upon myself to lay open, so far as our gift of language, inadequate as it is, might enable me, those dark recesses of my mind, where Sorrow, in her long dreary residence, has generated forms which I cannot contemplate without terror, and from which I can get no refuge. It might, indeed, have been well for me if I could have, long ere this, communicated, partially at least, my knowledge and sentiments to sympathizing friends. My sorrow might have been alleviated; but Nature hath said to man, 'Whilst thou sufferest, thou shalt not have the power of communicating thy woes, till time hath taken that sting from them which would poison the happiness of thy neighbours; doubtless a good final cause, which, in our voiceless grief, we dare not impugn.

"You know, I believe, my parentage, from your having been brought up in the neighbourhood. This property of Dowielee, which I got from my father, was a gift to one of my ancestors by King James VI., in consideration of services done to the State. It is, as you must have observed, one of the most beautiful and romantic estates in Scotland; for it is ornamented by thick umbrageous woods, through which a noble river rolls its majestic stream—roaring, in some places, with the voice of the dashing cataract—in others, singing like a blythe maiden on her way to be married—and, in some, sleeping with the placidity and the latent power of the infant Hercules. This house, called Dowielee House, was built by my great-grandfather. It is old, but on that account the more romantic and interesting; for it is associated in my mind with a host of historical family occurrences, which exhibit, in a strong light, the virtues of my ancestors—though sometimes I am forced to confess their crimes, and, I may add, mournfully, their misfortunes, which, alas! are all shamed by my own. In this last respect, I have been fated to contribute to the old mansion an interest which, in after times, when my griefs shall have darkened the page of our family annals, may raise an unavailing tear to the eye of a remote descendant, as he lifts it to those moss-covered walls which have witnessed scenes that lend, says holy writ, an eloquence to stones.

"I came by far too soon to my property and power; for I was scarcely twenty when my father died intestate, whereby, being put under no salutary restraining fetters of testamentary guardianship, and no legal curators being deemed necessary for a nine months' non-age, I became possessed of a power of which I did not know the value, and a forward status in society, without experience to guide me in the affairs of life. But power and opportunity are divested of their danger, when the heart is happily free from a propensity to evil. Yet weaknesses, which are often fostered by riches, may generate misfortunes as gigantic as the consequences of vice; and we get little consolation from our own consciences, in the midst of self-caused suffering, from any fine-spun distinction between blind error and voluntary crime. While I have God to thank for keeping me free from the contamination of serious evil, I have myself to blame for the consequences of faults and follies as pregnant as crime itself of unhappiness to man.

"Inheriting, from weak and nervous parents, feelings of extreme sensibility—ready, on the slightest touch of an exciting cause, to burn into love or shame, or to thrill with disappointments, fancied slights, and imaginary insults—I soon found myself unsuited for general society. I sometimes fancied that this itself was an imagination, and, for a period, struggled against the irresistible constitution of my nature, only to be made more certain that my happiness lay among my own beautiful woods of Dowielee; though, alas! my certainty was only that human confidence which, like the mists that conceal the shelving rock of a lee-shore, prevent us from seeing the dangers that almost infringe upon our very organ of vision. As it is easy to argue ourselves into a belief of the truth of our wishes, especially when they seem pointed by original constitution and natural bias, I arrived early at the conclusion that the best life for a man of morbid sensibility was a rural one. The woods, and bosky dells, and green schaws, and running streams of my paternal inheritance, had an eloquent language of their own, which went to the heart of the worshipper of nature, without carrying with it personalities to wound his pride, or excite his fevered emulation. They possessed inhabitants too corporeal to satisfy the inquiries and engage the attention of the scientific and the unlettered naturalist; and incorporeal, to respond to the inspired invocations of the poet. What more did I require? Yet more was to be found in these sweet retreats, and that, too, I was fated to discover; for who is so ready to meet with misfortune as he whom nature has made incapable of bearing it—the man whom sensibility makes a lover of pleasure, and forces to seek it in the state in which it comes from the womb of Nature.

"There are few in these parts whose ears have not been often saluted by the perhaps exaggerated—though that was scarcely possible—description of the rare, almost angelic beauty of the young female who, for a long period, bore the charmed name of the Beauty of Dowielee—an appellation by which she was far better known among the people than that of Lucy Oliver, given to her by her father, David Oliver, the humble cottar of Broomhaugh, part of my property. This simple girl had, for a number of years, been residing with an uncle at a place in the western parts of Scotland, and had returned to Broomhaugh, bringing with her those improved and now perfect charms, which afterwards rendered her so famous in parts much more distant than a cottager's beauty is generally carried. I had heard generally that David Oliver had a pretty and an interesting daughter; but her residence at a distance had prevented me from seeing her; and I felt no interest in a matter which apparently concerned me so little as the alleged and unseen beauty of a cottager's daughter. My fancies, fortunately, did not run in that direction. I was then merely an ardent lover of nature, whom I courted in places the farthest removed from the haunts of disagreeable man or beautiful woman—creatures whom, in the refined society I had left in disgust, I had found embued with qualities repugnant to those sensibilities which shrunk at the touch of the familiar badinage of fashion.

"Not long after the arrival of David Oliver's daughter, I one day sauntered down to Holy Well, the limpid medicinal spring that bubbles up from the moss-covered ground of the retreat that goes under the name of the Fox's Glen. My grandfather erected there a pretty little figure of Niobe, executed with some classical taste; and my father, with that love of refined sentiment by which he was distinguished, planted at her back a willow tree, which, growing more rapidly than his son, had now arrived at an extreme height, sending down over the face of the figure, long weeping tendrils, that, in the winds, moaned in suppliance of the expression of sorrow of the bereaved mother, and, in summer showers, sent drops simulating the tears that are feigned to flow incessantly from the stony eyes of the mournful victim of maternal grief. I sat down under the tree, and was meditating on the character and virtues of these ancestors, who were, by their time-extended acts, exciting in me, their descendant, those sentiments and feelings with which they were themselves, in the very spot I now occupied, inspired. I looked up in the face of the statue, to realize the idea which that same countenance had produced in their minds. There were two faces there—one beside that of the figure, of flesh and blood, so beautiful, that I had never seen anything on earth, or imagined anything in heaven, more fair. I felt, in some degree, alarmed. I had never seen mortal in that spot. I had heard no noise of one approaching. There could be no person with so heavenly a countenance in these parts unknown to me. My nervous sensibility received in an instant the impression of a mysterious awe; and Fancy, lifting up her magic wand, was on the eve of realizing some immaterial creation, when Perception, vindicating its truer and more natural authority, detected the figure of a female softly yet quickly retiring behind the trunk of the willow. I followed her; and, as she had only tried to secret herself by the cover of the tree, I discovered a young woman, simply, but gracefully attired, standing, overcome with shame, and endeavouring to conceal the beautiful face I had already been so much struck with, by holding up her two hands, through the half-opened fingers of which her dark-blue eyes shone with the lustre of excitement. I stood before her silent, indulging the fanciful humour of testing her fortitude and her patience, by ascertaining how long she would keep her position and attitude, in which I thought she looked more interesting than if the full beauty of her countenance had been entirely exposed to my impassioned gaze. When she saw me in this playful humour, her confidence enabled her to take down her hands; but the blush remained, colouring her temples with a vermilion tint, as beautiful as that which Diana exhibited, as she returned from the stream in which she bathed.

"Who are you, and whence came you, fair maiden?" said I. "These retreats have heretofore been sacred to me, and to those songsters whose voices fill the air with their music. If such as you frequent our solitudes, I fear they will soon become thoroughfares."

"I am the dochter o' David Oliver o' Broomhaugh," said she, simply. "He is ane o' yer Honour's cottars."

"Then you know me?" said I.

"My faither pointed ye oot to me ae day as ye passed oor cottage," replied she. "But I didna ken that ye was at the Holy Well when I looked owre the back o' the stane leddie. My faither drinks the water o' the spring for his health—and my pitcher is yet empty."

"She accompanied these words with a deep curtsey, and a motion to seize a pitcher that lay at her feet. With a quick step she hastened down to the spring, and, taking a supply of water, turned to proceed homewards. I said I would accompany her; but the proposition startled her, and, like the frightened roe, she bounded away over the greensward, with as much quickness as her burden, bearing lightly on the springs of youth and health, would permit. I stood and looked after her. It was the first time I had seen in perfection that wonderful combination, so irresistible to all sensitive hearts—and, to those who are sick of the painted faces and conventional forms of refined society, so fraught with a mysterious power—the most complete beauty and the most natural manners. The effect produced upon me was intense and instant, proportioned to my sensibility to the charms of pure nature, and my disgust of the artifices of factitious society, that, like an olio of foreign and heterogeneous ingredients, requires strong spices and nauseous stimulants to bring the competing flavours to the just mean of the gourmand's depraved taste. From that moment my feelings took on a new character, and pointed to a new object. A few minutes—I speak not paradoxically—deprived the living scenes around me of one half of their life and charms. My burning fancy deified unconsciously the most beautiful of the forms of God's fair works. I became a worshipper at first sight, and, with downcast eyes, sauntered slowly home to Dowielee, a changed man, stricken by a power that was busy bringing out of the electric effects of its first access the intoxicating feelings of Nature's strongest and most elevated instinct.

"I do not require to tell you the progress of love, or how the mysterious power of imagination weaves round the object of affection the thousands of indescribable charms which the very judgment of the lover impresses with the seal of the sacred reality of truth. All this has been described by every inspired pen, and by the inspired lips of those who lived before the art of writing was known. I followed the steps of stronger and better men, and resigned myself to the power I could neither resist nor understand. I found myself often walking on the banks of the river which flowed past the cottage of Broomhaugh. For a time, a single look of the simple cottage maiden satisfied a week's longings of the master of Dowielee. Her bashfulness and modesty, which made her fly my approach, almost as timid as her flight, riveted my passion; but her timidity did not prevent her from ministering to the wants of her parent; and I feasted my eyes on her, unobserved, as she daily filled her pitcher at the Holy Well, which she accomplished in the manner of the frightened and fluttering bird that, after a flight, wets its little parched throat in the mountain stream. I do not know how long my peculiar nervous temperament forced me to this timid mode of satisfying a passion that increased every hour; but, one day, with a courage unusual to me, I left hurriedly my hiding-place, and fairly seized in my arms the flying object of an affection that could brook no longer delay. She struggled to get free from my embrace; but I overcame her with my entreaties and my tears, and, acquiring some confidence, she renounced her efforts to escape. Next day I saw her again; her confidence in me was increased; and thus, from small beginnings, and an almost imperceptible progress, an intimacy grew up between us which became stronger and less reserved at every subsequent meeting.

"The second happiness of a lover soon awaited me—the consciousness of being beloved by the woman he holds dearest on earth. I am afraid of falling into the hackneyed, and now almost distasteful language of truth, when applied to an affair of the heart; and I acknowledge it true that, when nature far transcends description, the effort to portray is ineffectual and unpleasant.

Lucy Oliver was clearly all my own. I had awakened the first interest of affection in her virgin heart. She exhibited all the strongest symptoms of love: her eyes sought mine as if they acknowledged a secret charm; her thoughts followed the train of my ideas; her feelings were gratified only by a sympathy which she drew from my thoughts, words, looks, and sighs; her emotions burst the bonds of a natural bashfulness; and her trembling arms hung round my neck, while the gushing tears of gratified rapture fell warm on my cheek. This absolute satisfaction, in so far as respected a consciousness of being beloved, was, however, a resting-place; it was a termination of one—the first vista of the view of the inspired heart; arrived there, the mind, framed by God to be ever on the movement forward, required to look to the next stage of the heart's progression. It was here that I felt the first whisper of prudence; and the question, What am I to do with this doating, resigned, conquered, love-distracted girl, the daughter of my own cottar? rose upon me, and demanded an answer. In the very midst of our chaste dalliance, when I kissed away with my burning lips the tear that flowed down her cheek, as she lay yielded up and nestled in my bosom, with her angelic countenance, beaming love's unutterable thoughts, turned up into my face, a sickness came over me when I contemplated the conquered being whose fate was in my hands. The torturing question agonized me; and the tears of sorrow were mixed with those of 'love's sweet dream.'

"But it was at home that this train of thought produced in my mind the most startling array of difficulties. It kept sleep from my eyes. I could arrive at no conclusion. My love was pure and impassioned; my pity was choked with tears; my prudence, strengthened by the necessity of keeping up the honour of the house of Dowielee, would not yield. In the midst of this painful conflict, my mother's brother, Frederick Gordon, of Kelpieford, returned from France, bringing with him his only daughter, Amelia, a lovely young woman of eighteen years of age, highly educated, with refined sentiments—which had passed, with safety and even improvement, the fiery furnace of the example of Continental licentiousness—and a noble pride of the honour of her family. Her mother, a noble-minded woman, had the merit of the training of her elegant and virtuous daughter. I was necessarily a frequent visiter at Kelpieford; and my uncle and aunt, as my nearest relations, conceived they were executing the work of duty and affection in mixing the kindness of friends with the admonitions and advice of relations. I will not absolve them from the charge of an excusable selfishness. I do believe they wished me to wed Amelia; they wished me to seek my good where it was proper I should seek it; they wished me to be happy, as they wished their daughter, who was courted by richer men, to be happy. I do not, and never did suspect that they knew of my affection for Lucy Oliver; but their conduct was the same as if they had. They were prudential people, and saw that my exquisite sensitiveness might make me an easy prey of a low affection. By praising the honour of my house, and drawing high-tinted pictures of the effects of unsuitable marriages, they fortified the prudence I had already, in some degree, opposed to my passion. Meanwhile, Amelia's beauty—of a different style from that of Lucy Oliver—set off by accomplishments of the highest order, and rendered irresistible by manners as sweet as they were refined, and free from the taint of affectation or artifice, began to make upon me an impression which, I confess, I favoured, to aid the resolves of a prudence that yet shook at the dreadful prospect of the application of its energies, in the separation of two hearts so firmly united as mine and the poor victim of a virgin passion. Sensitive people are often wonderfully strong in their moral resolves, as nervous hands have sometimes the greater power of grasp. I resolved on renouncing for ever Lucy Oliver; but my resolution was accompanied by the manly determination of justifying to her face, if that, alas! were possible, the step I had been forced to take.

"The regularity of my visits to the Holy Well had suffered some interruption during the continuance of my irresolution. I now sought it with a step which owed its firmness to a high-wrought resolve. She was there, waiting for me in anxiety, and, as I approached her, searched my countenance with the eye of suspicious affection. My first look, which was only less kind than it was wont to be, struck her to the heart, and tears, anticipative of a coming evil, nearly unmanned me. My safety lay in a quick and immediate execution of a purpose that would have broken down amidst the wails of the misery it produced. I told her, at full length, my sentiments and resolution. She fainted. I awaited her recovery. She spoke; and my surprise at what she said equalled the love I had borne to her, and the sorrow she had caused me.

"'It is owre—it is owre,' she cried, as she rubbed her eyes, and looked calmly in my face. 'What I hae lang looked for, is owre and past. You will hear nae complaint, nae blame frae me. I kept my heart frae you as lang as the strength o' a weak maiden wad enable me. I guarded it wi' fear, and parted wi' it wi' a' the misgiving o' a suspicion that's now fulfilled. Nae doubt ye sought me first, but I sought ye last; and, if I hae noo to regret a partin' where there should hae been nae meetin', I canna say that honour has been broken where nae promise was ever given. It's better, it's better—God mend my broken heart!—that you should wed Amelia Gordon than Lucy Oliver. Leave, leave me, wha has equals, but nae lovers in thae glens, and hasten to her wha is your equal as well as your lover; but let me tell you, afore ye depart, that it will gie me mair pleasure to hear, after ye are married to Amelia Gordon, that ye hae forgotten Lucy Oliver, as she will try to forget you, than that you should mak' yoursel' and a gaid wife miserable, by thinkin' o' her ye hae nae right to think o' as she has nane to think mair o' you. Ay, even if this puir heart should break in the struggle that waits for it, ye shall not shed a tear for Lucy Oliver. Farewell! farewell!'

"There was no anger observable in the conduct of the extraordinary girl. I kissed her as she departed, and she met my embrace with an appearance of sorrowful reconciliation. If I was surprised when I first saw her, I was more astonished at our separation. I was also pleased; for her calmness satisfied me that she would forget me. 'Good, kind creature!' ejaculated I, 'what a sacrifice have I made to feelings generated by those factitious forms I once despised! What a contradiction is man! How steadily faithful, noble, and forgiving is woman!—and what heroine hath ever acted as this humble cottage maiden!' I walked home, and forgot the admiration of conduct I did not think was to be found in fallen human nature, in my new love for Amelia Gordon, whom I married within a month after the extraordinary scene I have now inadequately described.

"If I had reason to admire woman, in the matchless beauty, grace, and noble-minded generosity of the humble cottager of Broomhaugh—who had, in exchange for the greatest insult and injury that could be offered to her sex, awarded forgiveness, along with even a fervent wish for the happiness of her rival and the destroyer of her peace—I did not want good grounds for an equal admiration in the qualities of my beloved wife. I had happily secured her affection before our marriage; and she was capable of reproducing in me that fervour of elevated passion which had burned so brightly to the trimming care of a meaner hand. Our mutual confidence was unbounded. We resigned ourselves, heart and soul, to the enjoyment of each other; and so selfish were we in our loves, that we could hardly bear that temporary suspension of our heartfelt intercourse and communion of sentiment, which the forms of society, and the obligations of hospitality, imperiously demanded. We were each to each alone, and all the world to each; and so luxurious were we in the gratification of our tastes and perceptions of matrimonial bliss, that we not only enjoyed as no mortals ever enjoyed it, but we discoursed of it, and contemplated its characters, and compared it with all the other modes of earthly enjoyment. We were idolaters—worshippers—even the interests of heaven were in danger of being sacrificed or overlooked, in this harvest-home of our earthly happiness.

"Within a year my wife bore a son, who was named after me. I would have become altogether oblivious of Lucy Oliver, had I not, on several occasions, met her in places where I would have been as well pleased not to have seen her. I noticed that she sometimes frequented Dowielee House—a circumstance which appeared to me somewhat extraordinary. Will it be believed that it hurt my pride, to think that the first object of my affections could have so far overcome her feelings, and the very recollection of her feelings, as to frequent my house, and to meet me with apparent indifference? But the accompanying sensation of satisfaction, that she had mastered her passion, survived her injury, and rejoiced in the continuation of her forgiveness, reconciled me to the extraordinary apparition, who thus, without pain, haunted the mausoleum of her incorporated happiness. I discovered from Amelia, that, as she said, a beautiful and interesting creature, called Lucy Oliver, the daughter of one of my tenants, had introduced herself to her, and seemed anxious, in any way that lay in her humble power, to contribute to her comfort and that of the family of Dowilee.

"Have you known this beautiful cottager long, Amelia?" said I.

"For six months," replied she; "and the longer I know her I love her the more. Her beauty, her simplicity, her kindness, her conversation, delight me. She is mistress of all the fairy legends of the neighbourhood, which her romantic imagination weaves into new forms; yet so gentle, so bashful, so modest, that you would think she could not speak beyond the sound of a whisper, or tell more than a child. In imagination, she has carried me where my feet have not yet wandered; by the Fox's Glen, the Holy Well, and the Weeping Mother, where strange doings are done in the light of the harvest moon."

"I looked at Amelia, but not suspiciously. She had heard nothing of my intimacy with Lucy. She was beyond my suspicion. Her open and generous soul despised secrecy.

"What is her object in calling, Amelia?" continued I.

"Kindness, pure kindness, beloved soul," replied my wife. "She is not happy at home, and I think she would be well pleased to be my lady's maid, a situation for which her kindness and obliging disposition, as well as her little self-taught accomplishments eminently qualify her. I have a strong desire to comply with her wishes, and then," (embracing me, playfully) "my servant and my lord will be equally delightful to me."

"This arrangement did not please me; but I had already committed myself. I had wronged my dear confiding Amelia in not opening my bosom to her at the beginning. I could not now unburden myself: my confession would be merely the result of necessity and compulsion. I must now contrive to keep my secret at the expense of my peace. Thus does secrecy degenerate into deceit. I had never interfered hitherto in the choice or direction of female servants; and, if I wished to keep consistent, and preserve my secret, I behaved to leave the matter of Lucy's engagement to the free will and judgment of my wife. In a short time I saw my former love—her for whom once I could have died, who first lighted up the flame of passion in my bosom, whom I had renounced, who by her generosity had obtained over me and her own heart a victory beyond the conquests of kings—going through the servile details of the waiting woman of my wedded wife. Beyond all, I was struck with the coolness and propriety of her deportment. She never, not even when together alone, recognised me as her lover of the Holy Well. She treated me simply as the husband of the mistress she was bound and willing to serve—as her master, whose commands she waited, with the servility of an ordinary servant, to receive and to execute. I gradually became reconciled to her; and gratitude for the persevering constancy of her faith, in keeping our secret, lent its acclaim to this additional feature in her extraordinary character.

"In a short time my beloved Amelia gave me another pledge of an affection which increased with the time of our fortunate union. It was at this period that the attentions of Lucy to her mistress were most marked and unremitting. Amelia expressed her gratitude towards her as her benefactor—as one sent from heaven to administer to her all the comforts which her situation demanded. In two days after the birth of the child—a female—the mother fevered. The medical man detected by the eye of professional experience the nature of the complaint—a puerperal fever; and pronounced a prognosis of a dubious character. I became alarmed, but not unfitted for acting as my wife's nurse—an occupation in which I took delight. I watched at her bedside. My assistant was Lucy Oliver; she seconded all my efforts with an assiduity and kindness even transcending my own. The fever proceeded to a crisis. As it advanced, my situation was indescribable. I slept almost none—my vigils, my solicitude, my anxiety preyed on my weak nerves, and produced tremors, morbid terrors, and, during the moments I slept, night mares. My time was spent at her bedside, in attentions, watchings, and secret prayers; yet, in the midst of all this devotion, I could not but observe, admire, and be grateful for the extraordinary conduct of my fellow comforter. Lucy Oliver vied with the man who had courted and deserted her in the extent of her sacrifice of time, health, and happiness, for the recovery of her successful rival. Good God! when I look back to that awful scene—my wife in the grasp of one of the most dangerous diseases incident to mortal; her nurse, my former lover, watching her every motion, anticipating her every whispered want; and I, with racked nerves, and my sympathies wound up till my heart-strings seemed on the eve of cracking—the witness of all that, and distracted with hopes, fears, gratitude, love, I wonder how my feeble frame could have withstood such a fearful combination of torturing causes. Many days and nights were thus spent. The crisis approached; my wife passed the dreadful ordeal. On the announcement of the happy tidings, I fell on my knees; Lucy Oliver followed my example. We offered up thanks to Heaven for the awarded mercy.

"Alas! alas! our thanks were a vain offering. Overcome with watching, I retired to a couch, to seek a few hours' repose. My dear wife relapsed during night. Lucy approached me, with trembling steps and timid voice, to announce to me what the doctor had not fortitude to do. I rose, and hastened to the scene of suffering. The lovely victim was in the firm grasp of the grim Destroyer. Her bosom heaved with the weight of death ; her mouth was open as she gasped for breath ; her eyes were fixed ; her consciousness gone ; she knew not her husband—her miserable, distracted husband—who bent over her stiffening body, and clutched her in the agonies of despair. She expired in my arms.

"I cannot continue these details. My wife was buried in the family vault of Dowieles. Who should have taken charge of my pretty pledges, but she who had attended and watched their dying mother with such unparalleled devotion ? Time passed on, and partially alleviated sufferings that brought me to the brink of the grave ; where, indeed, I often, in my agony, wished myself quietly deposited, by the side of her who taught me happiness, transcending all other modes of pleasure, as much as my misery exceeded all other kinds of pain. During this period of trial, my good angel was Lucy Oliver. She it was who administered to me the only relief that remained for me on earth. She tended, with a mother's care, my children, and, with a wife's devotion, their father. My wants were supplied, my wishes anticipated, my whispers, my looks, my signs watched with the solicitude of one whose own happiness depended on my recovery. Yet was there never an allusion to our former intimacy ; it seemed to be erased from the tablets of her memory—to be obliterated from Time's records ; so effectually did she avoid every allusion to it, and conceal every thought or feeling connected with it.

"Time, aided by the unremitting endeavours of my benefactress, performed his usual wonders. I slowly recovered my health. My establishment had been under the charge of her who had exhibited so much fidelity. My dear children looked upon her as their mother : she had become necessary to them. Was she not also necessary to their father ? As time softened the recollections of my wife, my old feelings towards my first love revived. I need not describe the rise of a passion, whose progress to the greatest height of human emotion I have already detailed. What use is there for more ? The prudence that opposed that passion before, would now have been imprudence. The situation of matters was changed. I married Lucy Oliver at the end of the second year after the death of my Amelia.

"I again experienced human happiness greater than mortals generally are destined to enjoy in this world. My Lucy seemed all to me that my Amelia had been ; and the love which the two bore to each other sanctified my affection for my second wife, while it embalmed in my recollection the feelings I entertained for my first. The bereavement to which I had been subjected by death, made me tremble for the health of her who was now my last, as she had been my first love. In a short time, she was to give me a pledge of affection—a pleasure which the recollection of a former experience turned into a terror and a pain. If it had been a legitimate subject for an address to the Almighty, I would have prayed for barrenness to the wife of my affection, and sacrificed the all-powerful feelings of a father, to the certainty of an avoidance of a repetition of that dreadful calamity that had bowed down my head to the earth, and stretched my heart-strings to breaking. But these things are not in the hands of man, and I checked my impious aspirations, by enforcing resignation to the will of Heaven. My Lucy bore to me a son. She escaped the dangers incident to her situation ; but she recovered tardily, in spite of my devotion to the supplianee of her wants, and of everything that could contribute to her safety and restoration to health. A general weakness hung about her long after she was able to walk. An atrophy reduced her body ; and neuralgic pains shot through her, forcing her often to cry aloud. At night, she was visited by troubled dreams, in which nightmares and all the hags generated by morbid fancies, followed her, and jabbered, and louted, and hugged her, terrifying her, and forcing herself to nestle closely in my arms for protection, and often wakening her with a loud scream of horror, which, in its turn, roused me from my own troubled sleep, in fright and anxiety. This state of mind and body continued for a considerable time ; and the recollection of the noctuary of these horrors carries with it to this hour an insufferable pain.

"A change now came over my dear Lucy, whose sufferings increased, if that was possible, my love and tenderness. The horrors of nightmare, in some degree, left her, and she slept with apparently more composure, drawing, however, at short intervals, long sighs, accompanied with mutterings and broken unintelligible speech. I wakened one night about the hour of twelve, and was surprised and alarmed to find her place by my side empty. The weakness she had laboured under for a time rendered it difficult for her, even in the day time, to rise and walk ; and I could not conceive how she was able to have risen and left the bed. I called out, and received no answer. All was dark and silent. I perceived, by the dim light reflected by her white night-dress, my sick wife walking softly and silently along the room, headless, because unconscious of my presence, and deaf to my sympathetic inquiries for explanation of her extraordinary conduct. I flew and seized her in my arms. She uttered a loud piercing scream, and, escaping from my grasp, fell senseless on the floor. I called the servants, and procured light. She had partially recovered, and, on being put to bed, I asked her why she had left the bed, and why she had screamed when I approached her. She seemed to feel uneasy under my questions ; and I did not press her farther on a subject which gave her pain.

"On the following night I took the precaution of having a taper in the room, in case of a repetition of the scene which had produced in me so much alarm ; for I was inclined to think that she had become a somnambulist. I slept little, for my fancy was busy with my misfortunes, and my heart occupied with sympathy for the sufferings of my wife. At the same hour she rose and left the bed, walking erectly and firmly, as if her weakness had suddenly left her, and she had been restored to health. She went to a small rosewood cupboard that stood in the end of the room, and opened it, taking from it a small bottle, which she folded in her hands and pressed to her bosom. She then held it up to the light of the taper, and sighed deeply as she looked through it. She turned her face to the bed, and stared at me with open lack-lustre eyes for several minutes. Keeping this frightful attitude, with the bottle held up in her hand, she spoke:—

“‘She is past danger now, and will recover.’ (A pause; and listening.) ‘That breathin is lighter—no sae like death—her mains and grains are gane—the struggle’s past, and, when she recovers, I maun continue to dress her for his eye and undress her for his embrace. Shall that be guid help?’ (Looking through the vial.) ‘Na, na, she has had her time, and mine waits me. A revivin’ patient needs a cordial. Hark! he comes from the couch in the next room.’ (Listening again.) ‘It is the winds o’ the woods o’ Dowielee. Quick—quick!—his twa hours are oot, and he’ll hae a brow wakenin; she canna refuse a cordial frae the hands o’ Lucy Oliver.’

“She now approached the bed where I lay in a state of horripilation. My mind denied me thought. I could not think; a general sensation of indescribable horror, which ran through my veins, was the only symptom of consciousness I felt in my mind or frame. I lay, bound to the bed, without power to move, to think, to speak. She approached silently and fearfully, looking back to the door at intervals, and listening; then progressing a step, then pausing and listening again—motions and attitudes she repeated till she arrived at the bedside. She now seemed to recollect herself, turned suddenly, and flew quickly, hurriedly, and tremblingly, for the taper, which, taking up, she held in her left-hand, while her right grasped the vial. She then approached the bed by four or five long rapid steps—her white gown flowing behind her, and her hair, which had come down, streaming over her shoulders. She stood for a moment at the bedside, looking, with staring orbs, into my face, and holding, before my eyes, the taper, which she moved backwards and forwards as if to perceive whether my gaze followed it. She then laid down the taper on a chair at the bedside, and applied her left-hand to my brow. She spoke again:—

“‘You are warm, dear leddie; but there’s a dew on your forehead—a good sign. Your breathin’ is freer, and the weight is gane frae your breast. ‘When thae signs come,’ said the doctor to me, ‘gie her this.’ (Holding up the vial in my face.) ‘It is a cordial I hae tasted wi’ my ain lips, and what is sweet to Lucy, canna be sour to her she luves abune a’ mortals. Drink, my dear leddie—health is the queen o’ blessings, and wha wadna wish to be weel wha has Dowielee for a husband? Quick, dear leddie—ay, ay—

there, there—a drap still remains, it’s awa’ precious to be lost. There—you will asleep now; and, when ye waken, Dowielee will kiss ye in joy o’ your recovery.’

“She now took up the taper, and with a rapid hurried step hastened to the cupboard, opened it, put in the vial, closed it, locked it, placed the taper on the table, blew it out, and came to bed. When she lay down, she sighed deeply, and shook so that the bed moved. I tried to calm my mind, and think of the strange scene I had witnessed, of the strange things I had heard. I had never known of any draught given to my wife on the morning of her death; but she might have got a cordial administered to her. Was there anything in Lucy’s words that indicated more. I could not answer my own question; my mind reverted back to Lucy’s extraordinary conduct and character. She was not like other women. She had acted as no other woman could act; but had she not acted nobly and generously?—Why, then, draw evil from good. But to what did my doubts point? I could not mention it. The thought was not recognised by me as an act of my conscious mind. It was a rebel. I quelled it, and tried to sleep; yet I could not. I lay awake during the whole night; my mind turned against itself; my fancy bounded by my judgment; confidence warring with suspicion; doubts struggling in the grasp of a determined but generous dogmatism. During the following day, I observed the same conduct to Lucy; for I had, to a great extent, banished from my mind every reflection suggested by the scene of the previous night, except the conclusion—that somnambulists do strange things in their nocturnal vocations.

“Two nights afterwards, my wife rose again. I watched her motions. She repaired to the cupboard, in the same way as formerly, took out the vial, lifted up the taper, and approached the bed. Her manner was more confused on this occasion; for she approached and receded from the bed; walked along the room with a rapid step; repeated these motions eight or ten times; and, at last, stood still in the middle of the apartment, pronouncing this monologue in a distinct and impressive manner:—

“‘Lang, lang hae I suffered. By the Holy Well I suffered; in my father’s cottage I suffered; beneath the window of this bedroom, on his marriage night, as I sat shiverin’ in the cauld winter blast, I suffered; as I undressed his wife for his bed, and retired to my ain, to think o’ their happiness, and greet myself asleep, I suffered. Yet, a’ this time, he thought I had forgotten him. I loved him still the mair; and my love and my sufferin’ hae come to a height. I can wait nae langer. This chance has failed. Her bairn’s born, and the fever has passed its dangerous hour. Now or never! Lucy Oliver or Amelia Gordon maun dee. She or I maun drink this black death, to the health o’ Apothecary Watson, wha, silly man, refused at first to gie me’t. Come, come, my time is short; he will be here anon.’

"She rose, and again approached the bed, holding up before my eyes the light, laying it down, passing her hand along my brow, and going through the same series of movements, and using nearly the same words, as on the previous occasion. She at last came to bed, and lay down, sighing and uttering deep groans.

"My mind was again in a state of confusion ; but my horror was, if possible, increased. Her tale was now more connected, and filled with an import more dreadful. It bore a character of waking reality—borrowing, from the daily occurrences of life, facts—undeniable, melancholy truths—turning them to a rational account, and explaining even those very parts of her conduct which never, in my estimation, quadrated with human nature. My mind tried to escape from the fearful, connected, rational sense of her monologue. Its truth horrified me. I scrutinized the nature of my own dreams, which, I acknowledge, were wild and fanciful, having seldom any verisimilitude to the rationale of life. But I was forced to distinguish between mere dreaming and somnambulism ; a state of the mind in which certain of its faculties are even improved, and vested with powers sometimes considered nearly supernatural. Was I bound or entitled to disbelieve a rational tale of personal experience, merely because some of the faculties of the mind, not necessary to the reminiscence or the narration, were in a state of inactivity ? My inability to answer this in the affirmative, increased my difficulty, and added to my horror. Yet, was I bound or entitled to believe the connected, rational tale of a somnambulist ? Neither could I answer this. I was on the eve, I thought, of becoming a madman—an opinion which a strong inborn sense of total inability to bear the force of a discovery which I conceived awaited me, confirmed. I sickened and sunk, as the necessity of an investigation rose upon me. The prospect of being compelled to search for proof that my wife—the creature on whom I leant for support, to whom I looked for consolation, in whose love lay my only happiness on earth—was guilty of a crime sufficient to call down the vengeance of heaven, made me almost delirious. Yet the prospect of remaining wilfully in doubt ; of being placed on the rack of suspicion ; of having all my confidence, all my love, all my converse, all my intercourse with her who slept on my bosom, and nestled in my arms, mixed, qualified, tainted, and poisoned by the thought that she might have, that it was doubtful whether she had not, murdered Amelia Gordon—was that a better one—was it preferable to the killing certainty itself—the last, kind, unqualified, finishing horror, that would admit of no lingering, no torturing, but finish at one stroke, grief, and doubt, and life together ?

"This night was also restless. I slept none. For three nights I had not closed an eye. My brow for all that time had been burning. My constitution felt the stroke. I was seized with a fever, and removed to another apartment. I can say little of this period of my suffering ; but I saw often, at my bedside, Lucy Oliver, my wife, who administered to me medicine—cordials—restoratives. O God ! what were the thoughts which, suggested by her image, changed and coloured by a maniac fancy, mixed with the recollections of Amelia Gordon ! Suspicions, hatreds, love, and pity, careered through my fevered, maddened brain ! Yet I weathered this pitiless storm of fate. I recovered from the fever ; but I convalesced with poison on my mind. Oh, had I then died !

"I left, at last, my sick chamber ; but my suspicions accompanied me. All my efforts were not able to conceal a change. For a time I struggled on, endeavouring to master my feelings, to look with a steady eye on Lucy, to embrace her without trembling. It would not do. The pain was unbearable. I started up in the midst of an accession of my agony ; I walked out ; and, scarcely knowing whither I was wandering, found myself in the shop of Nicholas Watson, the village apothecary. I put the question to him whether any of my domestics had bought poison from him for a length of time back.

"‘Yes,’ said he, ‘I sold, with reluctance, and after much questioning as to the use to which it was to be applied, an ounce of oxalid acid to Lucy Oliver, then your lady’s waiting-woman, now your wife.’

"‘What more did I require ? Yet I got more. My wife was unable to stand the change that had come over me. She had suspected the cause—for I noticed that she never would speak of her dreams or night-walking. Our eyes became eloquent of mutual suspicions, sometimes of mutual horror, though our mouths were dumb. The disease that already lurked in her system—and all hope of its removal was now gone—would have been sufficient of itself to dissolve her frame ; but the accession of a new mental agony, transcending all bodily diseases and pains, accelerated what, though inevitable, might have been long kept off by remedial means. She was soon confined entirely to bed, and reduced to the extremity of life. Her struggles were too painful for me to witness, and I left her to the charge of her attendants. One evening I was called by an urgent express. I approached her bed. She waved her hand to the attendants, to retire. She looked up in my face with a placidity which surprised me. As I gazed on her, her eyes filled with tears.

"‘It is true—it is true !’ she said, and expired.

"‘What I have experienced since would take years to tell. Have I not suffered as no mortal ever suffered ?’

"‘Your story, Mr B——,’ said I, ‘is a remarkable one. I will meditate upon it, and, when we shall have more time, endeavour to extract from it the evidences of the touch of the finger of the Almighty, which, be assured, may be traced, by an eye anxious to find it, in all the sorrows of mortals.’

Having prayed with this heir of sorrow, I left him, to return next day. Nothing else must be allowed to interfere with this duty.

LOCKHART'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—VOLS. V. & VI.

THE Sixth Volume of the Scott Miscellany is the most interesting of the series to the feelings of the reader, with, perhaps, the exception of the first. Mr Lockhart is a knowing artificer of books. Either he has been a laggard in his task, or he had entered upon it without proper preparation; and now, in announcing a seventh volume, (which will, in all probability, stretch to an eighth, by way of an appendix,) he dexterously appeases impatience and muttered wrath, by bringing forward, as a bonne bouche, a portion of a diary kept by Sir Walter, during the most trying and painful period of his life, the winter of 1825-6. The happy accident which prompted the best portion of Scott's private writings—and we do not except either the truest and most confidential of his letters, or the early autobiography—was accidentally reading Byron's Ravenna Journal, which, as far as the different characters of the men permitted, has been the model of Scott's Journal. To his wellum-bound confidant, secured by a good lock, he almost daily entrusted his inmost spontaneous thoughts and feelings, on the good and ill of his troubled life; together with anecdotes, criticisms, and freer opinions than so cautious a man was in the habit of expressing, in the most intimate social intercourse, and in his most unbending moments. The Gurnal, as he humorously calls it, was also the safety-valve of his excited mind; and it cannot have failed to minister that soothing relief which Scott, it is plain, could neither seek nor accept from wife, child, or friend. Every page of these memoirs shews how entirely, throughout the whole of life, he felt and suffered alone; in its most important affairs, admitting sympathy with indifference, and, in the time of trial, with impatience, and something like jealous scorn of those who poured condolence upon him, and, as he says, "poor-manned" him. It is with his prosperity that he almost uniformly, and, at times, in a tone approaching mock humility, calls upon his correspondents to sympathize. At no period of life did Scott "wear his heart upon his sleeve," and, latterly, he shrank altogether into himself. His correspondence became less extensive and free, and he betook himself to the Journal, and sought relief in confessing there as much as he chose to confess. It contains the truth, and nothing but the truth; but no more the whole truth than the similar self-revelations of great authors of sound mind, not devoured by egotism. One use of the Journal was, undoubtedly, to set himself right with posterity, and to exhibit his character and feelings, at a most important crisis, in what he considered the true light—and which was the true light. The Journal was a happy relief to his solitary ruminating mind; and, at the same time, a picture of that over-tasked and mortified mind, such as he did not shrink from giving to the world. Nothing is more prominent in his Journal, than how justly Scott could estimate the real good and true happiness of life, miserably as with open eyes, he had allowed himself to be allured and cheated by their counterfeits. But, as we have a goodly couple of volumes to traverse, and as the Journal occupies less than a fourth of this space, and its vital confidings not a tenth part, it may be as well to take matters a little in order.

Volume Fifth opens in the summer of 1820, when Lockhart, not long married, went to Abbotsford on a visit of some weeks, and first became familiar with the routine of Scott's daily life in the country. With considerable parade, Mr Lockhart marshals, before the reader, the principalities and powers, dignities and dominions, that repaired to Abbotsford as to a shrine. These amounted, it is stated, to one individual in every six in "Lodge's Compendium of the Peerage." One half of all the foreigners that crossed the Channel at this time, were brought over by the attraction of Scott's writings, which is a large estimate; and a fourth part, in the hope "of beholding him under his own roof." Abbotsford was also the head-quarters of the head Edinburgh lawyers—"their villa, whenever they pleased to resort to it;" and they were neither merciful nor considerate, as "few of them were ever absent from it long." Besides these inroads of Philistines, from the peerage and the Court of Session, all the provincial gentry, cater-cousins, and Dandie Dinmonts, were to be entertained, together with artists, and poets, and all manner of comers and goers, continually crowding the Sheriff's caravansary on the banks of the Tweed. Without adopting Mr Lockhart's round estimates, there can be no reasonable doubt that Scott's patience, and fortune, and quiet of mind, and precious time, were often sadly taxed; and that he endured with fortitude the self-incurred infliction, which would have done honour to a better cause than this ostentatious and promiscuous commerce. That he grumbled in his gizzard, and sometimes broke away in impatience and displeasure is not wonderful; nor are we disposed to rate these sacrifices to second-hand popularity very highly. The courage and merit would have been, instead of entertaining these successive hordes with smiling patience and under-boiling spleen, to have done what misfortune, luckily, and to his great comfort, did for him, for a season—shut his doors against them. Mr Lockhart lauds his good-humour, his tact, his indulgence of all manner of bores, and his easy and happy adaptation to the varying tastes and characters of his guests; yet in other places he confesses that Sir Walter, being merely mortal, was, after all, vulnerable to the gnat-like annoyances which indiscriminate hospitality entailed upon his family. This persecution, or rather weak submission, was the more tormenting as he really loved solitude and self-communion. In one place he says:—

"From the earliest time I can remember, I preferred the pleasure of being alone to wishing for visitors, and have often taken a bannock and a bit of cheese to the wood or hill, to avoid dining with company. As I grew from boyhood to manhood, I saw this would not do; and that to gain a place in men's esteem I must mix and baste with them. Pride, and an exaltation of spirits, often supplied the real pleasure which others seem to feel in society; yet mine certainly upon many occasions was real. Still, if the question was, eternal company, without the power of rething within myself, or solitary confinement for life, I should say, 'Turnkey, lock the cell!'"

And in another:—

"The love of solitude was with me a passion of early youth; when in my teens, I used to fly from company to indulge in visions and airy castles of my own, the disposal of ideal wealth, and the exercise of imaginary power. This feeling prevailed even till I was eighteen, when love and ambition, awakening with other passions, threw me more into society, from which I have, however, at times withdrawn myself, and have been always even glad to do so. I have risen from a feast satiated; and unless it be one or two persons of very strong intellect, or whose spirits and good-humour amuse me, I wish neither to see the high, the low, nor the middling class of society."

In the following summer, Mr Lockhart occupied the cottage of Chiefswood. He says:—

We were near enough Abbotsford to partake as often as we liked of its brilliant and constantly varying society; yet could do so without being exposed to the worry and exhaustion of spirit which the daily reception of new comers entailed upon all the family, except Sir Walter himself. But, in truth, even he was not always proof against the annoyances connected with such a style of open house-keeping. Even his temper sank sometimes under the solemn appliances of learned dulness, the rapid raptures of painted and periwigged dowagers, the horse-leech avidity with which underbred foreigners urged their questions, and the pompous simpers of condescending magnates. When sore beset at home in this way, he would every now and then discover that he had some very particular business to attend to on an outlying part of his estate, and, craving the indulgence of his guest overnight, appear at the cabin in the glen before its inhabitants were astir in the morning. The clatter of Sybil Grey's hoofs, the yelping of Mustard and Spice, and his own joyous shout of revêillée under our windows, were the signal that he had burst his toils and meant for that day to "take his ease in his inn." On descending, he was to be found seated with all his dogs and ours about him, under a spreading ash that overshadowed half the bank between the cottage and the brook, pointing the edge of his woodman's axe for himself, and listening to Tom Purdie's lecture touching the plantation that most needed thinning. After breakfast, he would take possession of a dressing-room up stairs, and write a chapter of "The Pirate;" and then, having made up and despatched his packet for Mr Ballantyne, away to join Purdie wherever the foresters were at work—and sometimes to labour among them as strenuously as John Swanston himself—until it was time either to rejoin his own party at Abbotsford, or the quiet circle of the cottage.

Of a grand entertainment and ball at Abbotsford upon a New-Year's eve, Captain Basil Hall has given an account, which shews that even Sir Walter possessed not the power vainly desired by the King of Ethiopia, and by every rich man who, commanding pleasure, inevitably fails, and, by a just retribution, becomes the victim of his own despotism.

"As my heart was light and unloaded with any care, I exerted myself to carry through the ponderous evening—ponderous only because it was one set apart to be light and gay. I danced reels like a wild man, snapped my fingers, and hallooed with the best of them—flirted with the young ladies at all hazards—and with the elder ones, of which there was a store, I talked and laughed finely. As a suite of rooms was open, various little knots were formed, and nothing would have been nicer had we been left alone; but we must needs be dancing, singing, playing, jesting, or something or other different from that which we might be naturally disposed to be doing. Wherever the Great Unknown went, indeed, there was a sort of halo of fun and intelligence around him; but his plan of letting all things bide was not caught up somehow, and we were shoved about more than enough.

"Still, still it was ponderous. Not all the humour and miraculous vivacity and readiness of our host could save it—long blank pauses occurred—and then a feeble whisper—but little more, and the roar of a jolly toast subside into a hollow calm. I dwell upon all this merely to make people consider how useless it is to get up such things nowadays—for if Walter Scott, with all appliances and means to boot—in his noble house—surrounded by his own choice friends—full of health and all he can wish, is unable to exempt a Hogmanay party from the soporific effect proverbially attendant upon manufactured happiness, who else need venture on the experiment! At about one we broke up, and every one seemed rejoiced to be allowed to go about at pleasure: while the horses were putting to, to carry off our numerous company, and shawls were hunting for, people became bright again, and not being called upon to act any part, fell instantly into good-humour! and we had more laughing and true hilarity in the last half hour than in all the evening before. The Author of 'Waverley' himself seemed to feel the reviving influence of freedom, and cruised about from group to group, firing in a shot occasionally to give spirit to what was going on, and then hauling off to engage with some other—to shew his stores of old armour—his numerous old carved oak cabinets, filled with the strangest things—adder-stones of magical power—fairies' rings—pearls of price—and, amongst the rest, a mourning ring of poor Lord Byron's, securely stowed away in one of the inmost drawers!"

The morning of the same day had been better. In the journal of the indefatigable Captain Hall, it is set down—"In the morning, yesterday, I observed crowds of boys and girls coming to the back door, where each one got a penny and an oaten-cake. No less than 70 pennies were thus distributed—and very happy the little bodies looked, with their well stored bags."

This seems a niggardly Christmas dole, compared with the roast beef, plum pudding, and flannel petticoats of the Southron Squires and Baronets, and their dames; but we question if one-third of either the Laird Nippies or Laird Spendthrifts of Scotland do half as much. Since we are at Captain Hall's journal, we may notice this national and amiable trait—and all that was natural in Scott's feelings was most amiable. They were walking in those woods which he loved so much, because they were, in Scotch law phrase, his own conquest, and the creation of his energies and taste. He observed—

"Nothing on earth would induce me to put up boards threatening prosecution, or cautioning one's fellow-creatures to beware of man-traps and spring-guns. I hold that all such things are not only in the highest degree offensive and hurtful to the feelings of people whom it is every way important to conciliate, but that they are also quite inefficient—and I will venture to say, that not one of my young trees has ever been cut, nor a fence trodden down, or any kind of damage done in consequence of the free access which all the world has to my place. Round the house, of course, there is a set of walks set apart and kept private for the ladies—but over all the rest of my land any one may rave as he likes. I please myself with the reflection, that many people of taste may be indulging their fancies in these grounds; and I often recollect how much of Burns' inspiration was probably due to his having near him the woods of Ballochmyle, to ramble through at his will when he was a ragged cadient."

This, among a hundred other matters, we select, as similar in spirit:—

"Some one talked of the pains taken to provide the poor with receipts for making good dishes out of their ordinary messes. 'I dislike all such interferences,' he said—'all your domiciliary, kind, impertinent visits—they are all pretty much felt like insults, and do no manner of good; let people go on in their own way, in God's name. How would you like to have a nobleman coming to you to teach you how to dish up your beefsteak into a French kickshaw? And who is there so miserably put to his wits and means that will endure to have another coming to teach him how to economize and keep his accounts? Let the poor alone in their domestic habits, I pray you; protect them and treat them kindly, of course, and trust them; but let them enjoy in quiet their dish of porridge, and their potatoes and herrings, or whatever it may be—but for any sake don't torment them with your fashionable soups.'"

Captain Hall adds his quota to the vulgar marvels propagated about the Great Unknown, when he states—"He never corrects the press, or, if he does so at all, it is very slightly, and, in general, his works come before the public just as they are written." James Ballantyne could have told a more reasonable and creditable story.

The arrival of guests, such as any man could cordially welcome and be proud to receive, occasionally indemnified Sir Walter for the inroads of interlopers. Mr Lockhart commemorates a day spent in the open air, a white-stone day; upon which Sir Humphry Davy; Dr. Wollaston; Henry Mackenzie, the Man of Feeling, then an octogenarian; and Mr Rose—were his guests. They made a pilgrimage to Yarrow, and lunched upon the mossy rocks bordering Yarrow's stream. Mr Lockhart, who apparently possesses the love of humour, without an atom of natural comic power, and who is continually spoiling his narrative, by straining after the ludicrous, concludes the gleesome mishaps of the Yarrow chase, with a joint eulogium upon Scott and Davy, who, it seems, talked better to Scott about science, of which Scott knew nothing, than at any of the brilliant dinner parties which that philosopher frequented "in town," until he, too, found the profitless life, as much "labour dire and weary wo," as did his friend open house-keeping at Abbotsford. As a specimen of Mr Lockhart's unhappy attempts at humour, we quote this closing anecdote of the effect of the colloquies of Scott and Davy:—"I remember William Laidlaw whispering to me, one night, when their 'rapt talk' had kept the circle round the fire until long after the usual bedtime of Abbotsford—'Gude preserve us! this is a very superior occasion! Eh, sirs!' he added, cocking his eye like a bird, 'I wonder if Shakespeare and Bacon ever met to screw ilk other up?'"

The Abbotsford Hunt, commemorated yearly upon the birth-day of the future representative of the family, is a good rough-and-round description of an old-fashioned Scottish Laird's entertainment; which agreeably exercises Mr Lockhart's powers of the picturesque.

"The Abbot" was published in this year, and affords an occasion to apologize for the failure of "The Monastery," of which Mr. Lockhart thinks better than the public were disposed to do—and deservedly. At least, for our own parts, we would not exchange the beautiful pastoral scenery, and sterling, if homely Scottish characters of this romance, for all the upholstery, home-millinery, and lady-mercery descriptions, and all the stage characters and stage properties, that cumber so much of some of the English novels. In "The Monastery," we hear the squeak of the real pig—and the fastidious cannot admire it.

When some future writer shall recast these Memoirs, adding something, and paring a good deal of twaddle, either written by or about Sir Walter's old friends, there may be subtracted, with manifest improvement, much, among other things, of the memoranda of the Blair-Adam Club, which, of vast magnitude in the eyes of the parties concerned, are marvellously indifferent to the public; and, moreover, do not throw a single new light upon the character or literary history of Scott. His most trivial story or letter to his children, is appropriate and welcome, but truly the republished opinions of Mr Adolphus upon his works, and sundry other matters of the make-bulk sort, savour too much of bestowing upon the world a very fair share of the tediousness which may have attended the arrangement of Scott's papers.

There are no kinder or pleasanter letters in these two volumes than those to Allan Cunningham; none at times so offensive to liberal feelings as those addressed to Lord Montague. The biographer talks with approbation of the happy adaptation of Scott's manner and style to his various correspondents, "according to their character and situation." To Lord Montague, we find the former chivalrous admirer of "the enchanting Princess," of the reign of George III., writing in this unhappy and decidedly anti-monarchical strain:—

"Truly, I congratulate the country on the issue; for, since the days of Queen Dollabella, and the Rumt-tiddy chorus in Tom Thumb, never was there so jolly a representative of royalty."

We had the Marquis of Bute and Francis Jeffrey very brilliant in George Street, and I think one grocer besides. I was hard threatened by letter, but I caused my servant to say in the quarter where I thought the threatening came from, that I should suffer my windows to be broken like a Christian, but if anything else was attempted, I should become as great a heathen as the Dey of Algiers. We were passed over, but many houses were terribly Cossaqué, as was the phrase in Paris in 1814 and 1815.

"P.S.—In the illumination row, young Bomilly was knocked down and robbed by the mob, just while he was in the act of declaiming on the impropriety of having constables and volunteers to interfere with the harmless mirth of the people."

Yet in this correspondence, pleasantly, if not obsequiously acquiescent, as it generally is, we find one profound remark, which might have prevented the writer much, when the revolt of the Galashiels weavers and the sutors of Selkirk from their ancient Tory banners overcame him like a summer's cloud, because the symptoms of revolt—the progress of opinion—had never been observed.

“Have you read Lord Orford's History of his own time? It is acid and lively, but serves, I think, to show how little those who live in public business, and of course in constant agitation and intrigue, know about the real and deep progress of opinions and events. The “Memoirs” of our Scots Sir George Mackenzie are of the same class. Both immersed in little political detail, and the struggling skirmish of party, seem to have lost sight of the great progressive movements of human affairs. They put me somewhat in mind of a miller, who is so busy with the clatter of his own wheels, grindstones, and machinery, and so much employed in regulating his own artificial mill-dam, that he is incapable of noticing the gradual swell of the river from which he derives his little stream, until it comes down in such force as to carry his whole manufactory away before it.”

Sir Walter's opinion of the principle of a soldier's duties and obedience will not increase the general admiration of standing armies. We rarely find the matter so plainly and truly put as in this letter to his son:—“A democrat in any situation is but a silly sort of fellow; but a democratical soldier is worse than an ordinary traitor by ten thousand degrees, as he forgets his military honour, and is faithless to the master whose bread he eats.”

The following opinion, expressed in the same epistle, would better have become the pen of Chesterfield, than of a writer whose moral tone is always high and pure:—“Gentlemen maintain their characters even in following their most licentious pleasures, otherwise they resemble the very scavengers in the streets.”

The death of John Ballantyne is recorded in Volume V., and in the order of its occurrence in 1821. Sir Walter had been writing prefaces to the “Novelists' Library,” for the benefit of his favourite and factotum; and Ballantyne, in requital of his patron's kindness, bequeathed to the Baronet £2000 by his will: the gifts were about equally productive on both sides.

Scott, like all persons of the poetical cast, indulged in presentiments, auguries, and other fanciful superstitions. On the day of Jocund Johnny's funeral, “While they were smoothing the turf over John's remains in the Canongate Churchyard, the heavens, which had been dark and slaty, cleared up suddenly, and the mid-summer sun shone forth in his strength. Scott, ever awake to the ‘skiey influences,’ cast his eye along the overhanging line of the Calton Hill, with its gleaming walls and towers, and then turning to the grave again, ‘I feel,’ he whispered in my ear, ‘I feel as if there would be less sunshine for me from this day forth.’”

From a summary of John Ballantyne's life, sketched down by himself, Mr Lockhart, probably touched by the late remonstrances of Ballantyne's widow, and of the other relatives of the man whom Scott both knew and liked so well, that his biographer might have dealt more gently with him, has transcribed several entries which really do not fairly support the contradictory statements of the thoughtlessness, deceit, and profligate expenditure of the gay bookseller. For three years he had been a clerk in the printing-house with his brother James, whom he had joined penniless, having just enough to pay his debts when he left Kelso; where, he candidly owns, he had hunted, shot, and neglected his business. In 1808, he states—

“The scheme of a bookselling concern in Hanover Street was adopted, which I was to manage; it was £300 a-year, and one-fourth of the profits besides.

“1809. 35: Already the business in Hanover Street getting into difficulty, from our ignorance of its nature, and most extravagant and foolish advances from its funds to the printing concern. I ought to have resisted this, but I was thoughtless, although not young, or rather reckless, and lived on as long as I could make ends meet.

“1810. 36: Bills increasing—the destructive system of accommodations adopted.

“1811. 37: Bills increased to a most fearful degree. Sir Wm. Forbes and Co. shut their account. No bank would discount with us, and everything leading to irretrievable failure.

“1812. 38: The first partner stepped in, at a crisis so tremendous that it yet shakes my soul to think of it. By the most consummate wisdom, and resolution, and unheard of exertions, he put things in a train that finally (so early as 1817) paid even himself (who ultimately became the sole creditor of the house) in full, with a balance of a thousand pounds.

“1813. 39: In business as a literary auctioneer in Prince's Street; from which period to the present I have got gradually forward, both in that line and as third of a partner of the works of the Author of Waverley; so that I am now, at 45, worth about (I owe £2000) £5000, with, however, alas! many changes.”

What becomes of the ruin which John Ballantyne had entailed upon Sir Walter, if, after all the wild publishing speculations in which Scott had involved the young and starved concern, he was paid in full, and a thousand pounds more, independently of the legacy?—of which unsubstantial gift Sir Walter writes his son:—

“I have had a very great loss in poor John Ballantyne, who is gone, after a long illness. He persisted to the very last in endeavouring to take exercise, in which he was often imprudent, and was up and dressed the very morning before his death. In his will the grateful creature has left me a legacy of £2000, life-rented, however, by his wife; and the rest of his little fortune goes betwixt his two brothers. I shall miss him very much, both in business, and as an easy and lively companion, who was eternally active and obliging in whatever I had to do.”

Scott, no doubt, struggled manfully to avert the ruin of the bookselling concern in 1812; but it is equally clear that he commenced it in spleen, and, so far as depended on himself, conducted it with the extravagant folly of a very raw speculator in the perilous trade of publishing. There is a lack of sound policy, as well as a total want of magnanimity, in the perpetual attempt at making the Ballantynes, now John, and now James, the scape goats for all Sir Walter Scott's sins against prudence and commercial sense.

The coronation of George IV. took place in the summer of 1821, and Sir Walter, repairing to the pageant, would have carried up Hogg, to play a sort of Sancho Panza to his own Don Quixote. The Shepherd was prudent for once; and the emolument would assuredly not have repaid the ridicule, although the letters that Sir Walter proposed he should compose, had been written.

Failing Hogg's 'description' of the royal pageant, he transmitted an account of it himself to his own and Ballantyne's newspaper. This account, by an "Eye-Witness," Mr Lockhart has obligingly reprinted. The Quarterly Review, we think, would advise that much of this sort of material should be thrown into an appendix. Of Hogg, at this time, he writes to Lord Montague—

"There will be risk of his being lost in London, or kidnapped by some of those ladies who open literary menageries for the reception of Hons. I should like to see him at a rout of blue-stockings. I intend to recommend him to the protection of John Murray the bookseller; and I hope he will come equipped with plaid, kent, and colley."

The Shepherd, who felt admiration and lively gratitude to Sir Walter, had sometimes a jealous suspicion that he was not always treated by his patron with the delicacy and respect due to a man of genius—or to "huz poets," as Scott has it. The temptation to break a joke at Hogg's expense was irresistible. Upon one occasion, after the Shepherd had assumed that absurd costume in which, to the amusement of the spectators, he figured at the St Ronan's Games, he was invited to come to Abbotsford, where there was English company, and to be sure to come in his grand gala or St Ronan's dress. The Shepherd felt that he was wanted to make sport for the Philistines in his "motley," and he finished his relation of the affair by saying, "I gaed down the water to see Mrs Hughes, but it was i' ma maud," his shepherd's grey plaid, namely, which of all garbs became him best. This might probably be in the summer of 1825, when Dr Hughes and his lady, it would appear, were at Abbotsford, and when Scott, on her friendly prompting, renewed his long-suspended correspondence with Southey. If ever Scott's head was fairly touched by the pomps and vanities of life, it was in this year; his brightest and last of mere worldly prosperity, and when he tottered, unconsciously, on the brink of the dizzy precipice. This temper is manifest in his epistles to Terry, and something like it breaks out even to Southey.

"I take my pen to assure my dear Southey, that I love him as well as if our correspondence had been weekly or daily. The years which have gone by have found me dallying with the time, and you improving it as usual—I tossing my ball and driving my hoop, a greyheaded schoolboy, and you plying your task unremittingly for the instruction of our own and future ages. Yet I have not been wholly idle or useless—witness five hundred acres of moor and moss, now converted into hopeful woodland of various sizes, to the great refreshment, even already, of the eyes of the pilgrims who still journey to Melrose. I wish you could take a step over the Border this season, with Mrs Southey, and let us have the pleasure of shewing you what I have been doing.

"The rogue Radicals had nearly set me on horseback again, but I would have had a good following to help out my own deficiencies, as all my poor neighbours were willing to fight for Kirk and King."

Contrast this with the following extract, written a few months later, when Scott must have seen ruin impending. His abrupt closing reference to the journal, and to future opinions of it, and that slant look towards effect with posterity, betrayed in many parts of this singular composition, all indicate its purpose.

"If things go badly in London, the magic wand of the Unknown will be shivered in his grasp. He must then, faith, be termed the Too-well-known. The feast of fancy will be over, with the feeling of independence. He shall no longer have the delight of waking in the morning with bright ideas in his mind, hasten to commit them to paper, and count them monthly, as the means of planting such scums, and purchasing such wastes; replacing dreams of fiction by other prospective visions of walks by

'Fountain heads and pathless groves;
'Places which pale passion loves!'

This cannot be; but I may work substantial husbandry, &c. write history, and such concerns. They will not be received with the same enthusiasm; at least I much doubt, the general knowledge that an author must write for his bread, at least for improving his pittance, degrades him and his productions in the public eye. He falls into the second-rate rank of estimation.

'While the harness sore galls, and the spurs his side goad,
'The half-mettled racer's a hack on the road.'

It is a bitter thought; but, if tears start at it, let them flow. My heart clings to the place I have created. There is scarce a tree on it that does not owe its being to me.

'What a life mine has been!—half educated, almost wholly neglected, or left to myself; stuffing my head with most nonsensical trash, and undervalued by most of my companions for a time; getting forward, and held a bold and clever fellow, contrary to the opinion of all who thought me a mere dreamer; broken-hearted for two years; my heart handsomely pieced again; but the crack will remain till my dying day. Rich and poor four or five times; once on the verge of ruin, yet opened a new source of wealth almost overflowing. Now to be broken in my pitch of pride, and nearly winged, (unless good news should come,) because London chooses to be in an uproar; and in the tumult of bulls and bears, a poor inoffensive lion like myself is pushed to the wall. But what is to be the end of it? God knows; and so ends the catechism.

"Nobody in the end can lose a penny by me—that is one comfort. Men will think pride has had a fall. Let them indulge their own pride in thinking that my fall will make them higher, or seem so at least. I have the satisfaction to recollect that my prosperity has been of advantage to many, and to hope that some at least will forgive my transient wealth on account of the innocence of my intentions, and my real wish to do good to the poor. Sad hearts, too, at Darnick, and in the cottages of Abbotsford. I have half resolved never to see the place again. How could I tread my hall with such a diminished crest! How live a poor indebted man, where I was once the wealthy—the honoured? I was to have gone there on Saturday in joy and prosperity, to receive my friends. My dogs will wait for me in vain. It is foolish—but the thoughts of parting from these dumb creatures have moved me more than any of the painful reflections I have put down. Poor things, I must get them kind masters! There may be yet those who, loving me, may love my dog, because it has been mine. I must end these gloomy forebodings, or I shall lose the tone of mind with which men should meet distress. I feel my dogs' feet on my knees. I hear them whining and seeking me everywhere. This is nonsense, but it is what they would do could they know how things may be. An odd thought strikes me—When I die, will the journal of these days be taken out of the ebony cabinet at Abbotsford, and read with wonder, that the wall-scumming Baronet should ever have experienced the risk of such a hitch? Or will it be found in some obscure lodging-house, where the decayed son of Chivalry had hung up his scutcheon, and where one or two old friends will look grave, and whisper to each other, 'Poor gentleman!—a well-meaning man!—nobody's enemy but his own!—thought his parts would never wear out!—family poorly left!—pity he took that foolish title.' Who can answer this question?

'Poor Will Laidlaw—poor Tom Purdie—such news will wring your hearts, and many a poor fellow besides, to whom my prosperity was daily bread.

"Ballantyne behaves like himself, and sinks the prospect of his own ruin in contemplating mine. I tried to enrich him indeed, and now all, all is in the balance.

. . . I wonder how Anne will bear such an affliction. She is passionate, but stout-hearted and courageous in important matters, though irritable in trifles. I am glad Lockhart and his wife are gone. Why I cannot tell—but I am pleased to be left to my own regrets, without being melted by condolences, though of the most sincere and affectionate kind. . . . Cadell came at eight, to communicate a letter from Hurst & Robinson, intimating they had stood the storm. I shall always think the better of Cadell for this."

This is anticipating the memoir. We must hastily pass the publication of some of, if not the best, yet assuredly of the second-best of Scott's novels. Among the first-rate, we would, however, place "The Pirate." By "Ivanhoe," "The Monastery," "The Abbot," and "Kenilworth," he had gained £10,000, and he afterwards received five thousand guineas for the copyrights, with the usual pitiable, mystifying stipulation of a penalty of £2000 for revealing an author's name which everybody knew as well as if it had been on the title-page of each novel. Mr Lockhart, indeed, states that the people of Edinburgh were "electrified" when the insolvency revealed the authorship; but this must be a mistake. Such pecuniary success was enough to turn any man's head; yet, in money matters, one might have fancied Sir Walter's was neither unsound nor muddy. Some original defect of business education, some want of proper balance, must have existed; for, with woful ignorance of his own affairs and resources, or what Ballantyne calls want of courage to look to danger, Sir Walter conjoined the most rigid exactness in keeping the smallest accounts; and never, in thirty years, his biographer states, omitted to set down a single sixpence paid at a turnpike gate.

Mr Lockhart makes an elaborate apology for his infatuation:—

Messrs Constable had such faith in the prospective fertility of his imagination, that they were by this time quite ready to sign bargains, and grant bills for novels and romances to be produced hereafter, but of which the subjects and the names were alike unknown to them, and to the man from whose pen they were to proceed. A forgotten satirist well says—

"The active principle within

but in his case, every external influence combined to stir the flame, and swell the intoxication of restless exuberant energy. His allies knew, indeed, what he did not, that the sale of his novels was rather less than it had been in the days of Ivanhoe; and hints had sometimes been dropped to him that it might be well to try the effects of a pause. But he always thought—and James Ballantyne had decidedly the same opinion—that his best things were those which he threw off the most easily and swiftly; and it was no wonder that his bookellers, seeing how immeasurably even his worst excelled in popularity, as in merit, any other person's best, should have shrunk from the experiment of a decisive damper. On the contrary, they might be excused for from time to time flattering themselves, that, if the books sold at a less rate, this might be counterpoised by still greater rapidity of production. They could not make up their minds to cast the poorless vessel adrift; and, in short, after every little burden of prudential misgiving, echoed the unfailing burden of Ballantyne's song—to push on, hoisting more and more sail as the wind lulled.

He was as eager to do as they could be to suggest—and this I well knew at the time. I had however no notion, until all his correspondence lay before me, of the extent to which he had permitted himself thus early to build on the chances of life, health, and continued popularity. Before "The Fortunes of Nigel" issued from the press, Scott had exchanged instruments, and received his bookseller's bills, for no less than four "works of fiction"—not one of them otherwise described in the deeds of agreement—to be produced in unbroken succession, each of them to fill at least three volumes, but with proper saving clauses as to increase of copy money, in case any of them should run to four. And within two years all this anticipation had been wiped off by "Peveril of the Peak," "Quentin Durward," "St Ronan's Well," and "Redgauntlet;" and the new castle was by that time complete, and overflowing with all its splendour; but by that time the end also was approaching!

It is stated, in other places, that hints were, from time to time, given him about the danger of "over-cropping;" and he was already troubled with misgivings of failure and falling-off. Still, if Constable was mad enough to offer £1000 for such productions as "Halidon Hill," it never seems to have occurred to the author that a prudent man, and, far more, an honest man, ought to have paused upon such reckless offers. These, however, are not the current notions of trafficking speculators. Such risk was, in their language, "Constable's look-out." The history of the above little unsuccessful drama, may serve as a specimen of Sir Walter's transactions with the Czar. Of that illustrious bibliopole, Mr Lockhart, by the way, has altogether changed his opinion in these new volumes; and his latest is, we think, by far the truest portraiture of that personage. Scott had been induced to depart from the rigid rule, which so provoked Hogg, and had attempted something for a pic-nic volume, which Joanna Baillie was "getting up" for the benefit of a reduced family. It is thus told:—

Before the end of the vacation, he had finished the M.S. of his "Nigel." Nor had he lost sight of his promise to Joanna Baillie. He produced, and that, as I well remember, in the course of two rainy mornings, the dramatic sketch of "Halidon Hill;" but, on concluding it, he found that he had given it an extent quite incompatible with his friend's arrangements for her charitable pic-nic. He therefore cast about for another subject likely to be embraced in smaller compass; and the Blair-Adam meeting of the next June supplied him with one in Macduff's Cross. Meantime, on hearing a whisper about "Halidon Hill," Messrs Constable, without seeing the M.S., forthwith tendered £1000 for the copyright—the same sum that had appeared almost irrationally munificent when offered in 1807 for the embryo "Marmion." It was accepted, and a letter from Constable himself, about to be introduced, will shew how well the head of the firm was pleased with this wild bargain. At the moment when his head was giddy with the popular applauses of the new-launched "Nigel"—and although he had been informed that "Peveril of the Peak" was already on the stocks—he suggested that a little pinnacle, of the Halidon class, might easily be rigged out once a-quarter, by way of diversion, and thus add another £4000 per annum to the £10 or £15,000, on which all parties counted as the sure yearly profit of three-deckers in fore.

Constable became indisposed about this time, and retired to England, for the recovery, it was said, of his mental health. As soon as he recovered, the ruling passion of the mad speculator broke out as strongly as ever; and the "Waverley Novels" were, by this time, to him not merely a pecuniary speculation. His vanity was engaged. There was glory as well as gain. He conceived himself the inspirer of Scott's genius. For example, he suggested that the title of "Cumnor-hall," which Sir Walter had chosen for a new novel, should be changed to "Kenilworth:"—

John Ballantyne objected to this title, and told Constable the result would be "something worthy of the kennel;" but Constable had all reason to be satisfied with the child of his christening. His partner, Mr Cadell, says—"His vanity boiled over so much at this time, on having his suggestion gone into, that, when in his high moods, he used to stalk up and down his room, and exclaim, 'By G—, I am all but the author of the Waverley Novels!'"

That Constable understood the weaknesses of Scott, and could dexterously flatter them, is, we think, apparent in the following letter, part of which, substituting necklaces and tiaras for slabs and antique chairs, might have been addressed by a knowing manager to a capricious, spoiled Prima Donna, whom he wished to keep in good humour. The work referred to, is "Nigel," in the preface to which, Sir Walter had referred to John Ballantyne's death and Constable's illness.

"Castlebeare Park, 31st May, 1822.

"DEAR SIR WALTER,—I have received the highest gratification from the perusal of a certain new work. I may indeed say new work, for it is entirely so, and will, if that be possible, eclipse in popularity all that has gone before it.

"I am now so well as to find it compatible to pay my respects to some of my old haunts in the metropolis where I go occasionally. I was in town yesterday, and so keenly were the people devouring my friend Jingling Geordie, that I actually saw them reading it in the streets as they passed along. I assure you there is no exaggeration in this. A new novel from the author of "Waverley" puts aside, in other words puts down for the time, every other literary performance. The Smack Ocean, by which the new work was shipped, arrived at the wharf on Sunday; the sales were got out by one on Monday morning, and, before half-past ten o'clock, 7000 copies had been dispersed from 90, Cheapside. I sent my secretary on purpose to witness the activity with which such things are conducted, and to bring me the account, gratifying certainly, which I now give you.

"I went yesterday to the shop of a curious person—Mr Swaby, in Warden Street—to look at an old portrait, which my son, when lately here, mentioned to me. It is, I think, a portrait of James the Fourth, and, if not an original, is doubtless a picture as early as his reign. Our friend Mr Thomson has seen it, and is of the same opinion; but I purposed that you should be called upon to decide this nice point, and I have ordered it to be forwarded to you, trusting that ere long I may see it in the armoury at Abbotsford.

"I found at the same place two large elbow chairs, elaborately carved, in boxwood—with figures, foliage, &c., perfectly entire. Mr Swaby, from whom I purchased them, assured me they came from the Borgheese Palace at Rome; he possessed originally ten such chairs, and had sold six of them to the Duke of Rutland, for Belvoir Castle, where they will be appropriate furniture; the two which I have obtained would, I think, not be less so in the Library of Abbotsford.

"I have been so fortunate as to secure a still more curious article—a slab of mosaic pavement, quite entire, and large enough to make an outer hearth-stone, which I also destine for Abbotsford. It occurred to me that these three articles might prove suitable to your taste, and, under that impression, I am now induced to take the liberty of requesting you to accept them as a small but sincere pledge of grateful feeling. Our literary connexion is too important to make it necessary for your publishers to trouble you about the pounds, shillings, and pence of such things; and I therefore trust you will receive them on the footing I have thus taken the liberty to name. I have been on the outlook for antique carvings, and if I knew the purposes for which you would want such, I might probably be able to send you some."

We must wait the conclusion of the work, for Scott's ultimate opinion of his partners in the game of beggar-my-neighbour; for no softer name can be given to the wild commercial transactions between them; and truth compels us to say, that, if infinitely the better and more honourable man, Scott, both from skill and power, was also the more adept bargain maker. Mr Lockhart continues—

Constable, during his residence in England at this time, was in the habit of writing every week or two to Sir Walter; and his letters now before me are all of the same complexion as the preceding specimen. The ardent bookseller's brain seems to have been well-nigh unsettled at this period; and I have often thought that the fox-glove which he then swallowed (his complaint being a threatening of water in the chest) might have had a share in the extravagant excitement of his mind. Occasionally, however, he enters on details as to which, or, at least, as to Sir Walter's share in them, there could not have been any mistake; and these were, it must be owned, of a nature well calculated to nourish and sustain in the author's fancy a degree of almost mad exhilaration, near akin to his publisher's own predominant mood.

The history of The Beacon is introduced; a rancorous party newspaper, begun in Edinburgh about the time of the Queen's trial, and countenanced by Scott, because James Ballantyne, his partner in the Weekly Journal, manfully and conscientiously resented his patron's violent and servile politics.

"James Ballantyne had swerved from his banner, and, by so doing, given not a little offence to Scott," says Lockhart. Now, James Ballantyne was an exceedingly moderate Whig, if a Whig at all, and ultra-cautious in public affairs. But he was also an honest and high-minded man; and now, and also upon the fearful emergency of the Manchester Massacre, he had the courage to prefer truth and patriotism to the good pleasure of his patron. At the crisis of the Queen's trial, James Ballantyne took the same manly course. We shall have more to say on this topic; in the meanwhile, it is gratifying to find that, in the Sixth Volume, Mr Lockhart has felt himself constrained to do tardy, and still, it would seem, reluctant justice to Ballantyne.

The Beacon, the John Bull of Scotland, leads to the unhappy duel in which Sir Alexander Boswell, for a fool-born jest—more foolishly vindicated—fell by the hand of a "pilloried" gentleman, who had never before drawn a trigger. There was another tragedy, another duel, and another and nobler victim, whom posterity will equally regret, and whose fate, about the same time, must have deeply interested Sir Walter Scott. Since Mr Lockhart has properly left this lamentable affair in oblivion, he might, with equal grace, have passed the unfortunate and miserable quarrel which cost the blood of a high-spirited gentleman: Scott, like all imaginative persons, indulged in omens and presentiments. When his affairs went to ruin, we find him planting three young oaks, that from them he might draw auguries of his future fortunes; and in his Journal he remarks, of Mathews the player—

“The last time I saw him before yesterday evening, he dined with me in company with poor Sir Alexander Boswell, who was killed within a week. I never saw Sir Alexander more. The time before was in 1816, when John Scott of Gala and I were returning from France, and passed through London, when we brought Mathews down as far as Leamington. Poor Byron lunched, or rather made an early dinner with us at Long’s, and a most brilliant day we had of it. I never saw Byron so full of fun, frolic, wit, and whim; he was as playful as a kitten. Well, I never saw him again. So this man of mirth, with his merry meetings, has brought me no luck.”

Scott did not relish the face-making and mimicry of this actor, whom it was a fashion to admire: “A very clever man,” he says, “my friend Mathews, but it is tiresome to be funny for a whole evening of his recitations. They are good certainly, excellent; but then you must laugh, and that is severe to me.” Many of his incidental notices of fine society, literary society, and famous people are in the same stripping style.

The King’s visit to Scotland was a mighty affair to Sir Walter Scott, and one pregnant with vanity and vexation of spirit. If the King had not been previously more enthusiastically received by his Irish subjects—by those whom, as Prince of Wales, he had flattered to betray when the time came—we might believe that, in Edinburgh, his Majesty owed all to Scott that Mr Lockhart claims for him.

I believe it will now be granted, by all who can recall the particulars as they occurred, that his Majesty mainly owed to Scott’s personal influence, authority, and zeal, the more than full realization of the highest hopes he could have indulged on the occasion of this northern progress.

We wish we could believe that all the fudge loyalty expressed to the most unpopular Prince of the last two centuries, had really been the effect of Scott’s zeal and enthusiasm, and not the spontaneous, idiotic impulse of the unreflecting mob, whether sans culottes or sprucely gentee. The whole was a demonstration of which the thinking part of Scotland as of Ireland has been, we are persuaded, long since heartily ashamed. It was an experiment upon popular ignorance; and it seemed to succeed, for the experimenters forgot the effect of novelty. The monarch so enthusiastically received in Dublin and Edinburgh, was slighted and hooted in London, where his funeral made one of the gayest and most jolly holidays which the metropolis had enjoyed since the battle of Waterloo.

It was hinted—nay, it was openly said and fully believed—that the sexagenarian dandy and voluntary felt the ardour, the empressment, of honest Scott, who thrust himself into all his affairs, as somewhat over officious; and, so to say, assuming, or impudent. Sir Walter, in short, was too much excited, hurried, and worn, to be able to play throughout the dexterous, observant courtier; and his Majesty was equally worn out with the public part which he had to play, and which suited ill with his tastes and habits. The self-love of the fastidious monarch could not easily forgive that absurd exhibition, in kilt and full tartans, into which he had been seduced by his Scottish counsellors; which, in an evil hour, Sir William Curtis rather over-trumped than parodied. His Majesty got into very bad humour in short, and “silly or malicious persons” said with Scott; though it could only have been with Scott among others. Mr Lockhart cites one letter from Mr Peel, and another from Mr Croker, to prove that he coolness, no rising or disgust of the royal stomach with Sir Walter existed. He has, in the copious narrative of these busy and important days, given a great deal of extraneous stuff, which ought to be thrown into the jaw-hole of the appendix; but, with all this, Mr Lockhart has totally forgotten one fact which gave strong colour to all that was known and surmised of the royal displeasure with Sir Walter. His Majesty, who accepted lodgings at the residence of the minor Duke of Buccleugh, had not crossed the threshold of any other private dwelling in Scotland, but one day, and that a memorable day. THE KING WAS COMING TO DINE AT 39, CASTLE STREET! George IV., the most haughty and fastidious of princes, was to honour the humble dwelling of the nation’s poet, and his own knight. The exultation of Sir Walter—by nature, training, and interest, the worshipper of rank—may be imagined. His party was arranged, his cards were issued, and no pains or exertion of influence, personal and collateral, were spared to give the entertainment to Majesty all the eclat with which the beauty, birth, or talent of the northern capital could illustrate so “superior an occasion.” His Majesty either repented of his condescension; or Sir Walter had trusted to the strength of his own wishes in imagining so great an honour ever intended for him; or the Scottish nobility, crown officers, and ancient gentry, might be imagined jealous of the unwonted favour shewn to the attorney’s son, the new knight of the new Abbotsford. However it was, the anticipated visit of royalty ended in smoke, and these in the secret, and not to be of the party, laughed maliciously at the ungratefully-requited labourer in the cause of itinerating Majesty. Mr Lockhart, we must conclude, has forgotten this circumstance, that gave colour to those reports of the King’s coldness which he laboriously contradicts. Had the King deigned to come to Castle Street, the honour would have made “eternal blazon” in the annals of Abbotsford and the Memoirs; but, as Majesty tipped the cold shoulder, the affair, which accounts for the rumours of the time, is gracefully slurred over. We do not object to this; but why occupy about twenty-eight pages of the Memoir with Sir Walter Scott’s connexion with the Royal Visit, and blame “silly and malicious persons” for noticing the coolness of the King, while so decided a mark of estrangement exists, as breaking off an engagement, in consequence of which, a highly-honoured poet had plunged himself into a sea of trouble? In short, Sir Walter was too old for a courtier in actual contact; and it is not in the least to his discredit that George IV. should have felt him a bore. Even the sort of influence ascribed to him by Mr Lockhart at this period, paltry as is the ambition which could prize it, has been overrated.

On the day of the King's arrival, Scott's early, and affectionate, and most useful friend and critic, William Erskine, by this time a Scottish Judge, died of a crushed spirit. There can be no doubt that Scott deeply felt the loss of one who had been his friend from boyhood; but his voluntary courtly duties were overwhelming and imperative.

According to Mr Lockhart, Scotland and the world owes, among a hundred of what we consider better things, three blessings and honours to Sir Walter Scott—perhaps we should say four:—Firstly, the restoration of the forfeited peerages; secondly, the knighthood of Sir Henry Raeburn and Sir Adam Ferguson; thirdly, the return of Mons Meg to her native country; and, lastly, the founding of the Bannatyne Club. We cannot say as to another gentleman, who, by the kindness of friends, was baited with knighthood for a special purpose; but there is no doubt that, whatever was the measure of his success, Sir Walter laboured with love for the accomplishment of all these objects. And the restoration of Mons Meg was indeed a national triumph! She ought to be placed near his monument. Pass we to graver matters. “Peveril of the Peak” was coldly received; nor are we surprised—it is of the “Woodstock” family; but “Quentin Durward” deserved, and soon obtained higher fortune.

Mr Lockhart, not contented with claiming for his father-in-law, the mighty fame which he has inherited, and will ever enjoy as a novelist, has asserted, or insinuated, that he might have been the greatest of generals and the ablest of statesmen; not in these degenerate days of Wellington and Peel, but of the times of Cecil or Gondomar. He also enumerates all the honours he received—from Galashiels processions, to Parisian theatres; and, among others, that he was chosen chairman of the Oil-Gas Company. Alas for the dividends of an Oil-Gas Company, having so magnificent and romantic a chairman! The company was of course blown to the wind as soon as the capital subscribed had been wasted; but not without leaving a monument to the magnificent taste, if not to the practical business sagacity of its immortal chief. Upon the banks of the Water of Leith, and near the Canonmills, the traveller towards the sea beholds a desolate and perplexing set of round towers—or what shall they be called?—built, under favour of the Graces, upon the model of the Alhambra, and for the manufacture of oil-gas! The Company, in the maddest period of joint-stock companies, must have been delighted with the novel design of their chairman, whose unfortunate genius for architecture was already beginning to develop itself at Abbotsford. If Mr Lockhart can find no better foundation upon which to rest his extraordinary opinions of Scott's statesmanship and generalship, and commercial and publishing enterprise, than the management of the Beacon affair, the Galashiels and Darnick arming to put down the Radicals, and the oil-gas, and other concerns, he would do wisely, we venture to think, to rest Scott's fame upon its own true, noble, and solid foundation. Why will he provoke remark by absurd laudation, strangely mixed with candid admissions, and thus really lessen the merited and high reputation of the first novelist of his own, or of any age; and, moreover, of “a thorough good fellow” as Moore, when the opportunity was afforded him of joining the universal acclaim of praise, naturally and happily describes a very great author, and an excellent and amiable man; constituted with many of the original elements of moral greatness, but who, knowing the world chiefly in its conventional sections, chose to give up to it more than it can ever repay to any man, and much less to a Scott? To return to the Gas Companies. Some good came out of their Alhambra towers. After standing for years in monumental irony against joint-stock companies and wild speculation, one of the chambers was splendidly rigged out and illuminated, in the autumn of 1835, for the celebration of the O'Connell Festival; when Mr Tait, and a few Edinburgh Radicals, first instigated the Liberator to his British mission.

“To such base uses may we come at last!”

Could Sir Walter have foreseen this, he might have been tempted to wish the Alhambra tower a second Siloam.

Let us return to our duty, deprecating the farther provocations which the narrative may offer to such irrelevant commentaries. To the bustling season of the King's visit, Scott owed the first attack of the illness which ultimately cut him prematurely off. On the 10th November 1832, when instructing Terry, as usual, about his upholstery wants, silken fringes, and antique mirrors and sofas, he adds—

“I have not been very well—a whoreson thickness of blood, and a depression of spirits, arising from the loss of friends, (to whom I am now to add poor Wedderburne,) have annoyed me much; and “Peveril” will, I fear, smell of the apoplexy.”

This letter contains the first allusion to the species of malady that ultimately proved fatal to Sir Walter Scott. He, as far as I know, never mentioned to any one of his family the symptoms which he here speaks of; but, long before any serious apoplectic seizure occurred, it had been suspected by myself, and by others of his friends, that he had sustained slight attacks of that nature, and concealed them.

And he concealed many things, and suffered his over-worked mind to run out more wildly in this and the two following years, than in the heyday of health and solid prosperity. Melancholy and instructive, what a contrast do those letters about the carnival equipments of his castle make with the painful memoranda of Mrs Brown's solitary hard-tasked lodger, only a year or two later!

“The muffled drum is approaching,” says Mr.

Lockhart, in closing the fifth volume. The sixth, however, opens gaily, with the marriage of Lieutenant Scott, the representative of the rising family of Abbotsford, to Miss Jobson, a pretty and amiable young woman, who, if she added few new quarterings to the family-arms, brought a handsome fortune to their support and lustre, and many engaging personal qualities.

The Founder of a Family, and consequent admirer of the rights of primogeniture, settled so liberally upon the young couple, that when, in the course of the same year, his affairs became deranged, the reduction of their marriage-settlement, which placed all his heritable property beyond the reach of his creditors, seems at one time, to have been threatened, in order to the sale of the estate of Abbotsford. There can be no doubt whatever, that, on Scott's part, the settlement was made in entire, though unpardonable ignorance of the real state of his affairs, and under the ordinary fallacious calculations and hopes which laid the ground-work of his insolvency. The marriage, enhanced by the lady's "good gifts," appears to have been peculiarly acceptable to Sir Walter, and his first letter to the young wife, who accompanied her husband to Ireland, is not merely kind, but, if we may thus apply the phrase, motherly and considerate. His territorial pride and antiquarian tastes, expand over the lands of this new daughter-in-law, as proudly as on his own Border regions, and as if Lochore, a very recent acquisition, had been her ancestors' for centuries. The "Yeard-hunger,"* was still strong in him; and he writes his son:—

"Nicol is certainly going to sell Faldonside. The Nabal asks £40,000—at least £5000 too much. Yet, in the present low rate of money, and general thirst for land, there is no saying but he may get a fool to offer him his price, or near it. I should like to know your views about this matter, as it is more your concern than mine, since you will, I hope, have a much longer date of it. I think I could work it all off during my life, and also improve the estate highly; but then it is always a heavy burden, and I would not like to undertake it, unless I was sure that Jane and you desired such an augmentation of territory. I do not mean to do anything hasty, but, as an opportunity may cast up suddenly, I should like to know your mind."

About this time, after excellent advice bestowed on Terry, and such as would have saved himself, he pledged his credit for this obliging and devoted friend, who was setting up as a theatrical manager, to the extent of £1,200, and had it all to pay; and also, it is stated, £500, for which James Ballantyne had undertaken, though we do not pretend to know how such of Ballantyne's debts as were not contracted by the Printing Company could fall upon Scott. This seems the only pecuniary loss that Scott ever sustained, that was not incurred by his own commercial speculations as a publisher, a printer, an oil-gas share-holder, &c. &c.

* Yeard-hunger, the phrase used by Sir Walter to Lord Montague, describing his insatiable craving for more acres. Mr Lockhart, who is not much of a Scott, renders it tamely. The Scottish phrase signifies a Kirk-yard hunger—Féird-hunger, i. e., the sudden, consuming desire for food often felt by persons in the very agonies of death.

About this time, that grand revolution in the book trade, which we find so often attributed to Constable, and in which he certainly made an advancing step, dawned upon the northern wizard. Cheap publication of standard works, in numbers or volumes, had been followed, to a very great extent, prior to this time, but it was only by the more obscure publishers; and now Constable chose to strike in, and, instead of attending "only to the wax-lights as hitherto, resolved to have his hand upon the tallow." The example has been beneficially followed by other publishers, and the secret is now as well understood in the town as in the country, that the grand principle of consumption, as of strength, lies among the masses. Sir Walter approved the bold design of the Crafty, which ended in "Constable's Miscellany," a promising concern, but of very limited prosperity. The cheap reprints of the Waverley Novels, were a happier result of this alleged revolution.

Scott's next production was the "Tales of the Crusaders;" and his "Life of Napoleon," was projected, which was to make three or four volumes only, and to be published on Constable's new plan. In the meanwhile, in the summer of 1825, he visited his son in Ireland, and made a tour of that country, where he was for some days the guest of the Edgeworth family. So enthusiastically was Scott received in Dublin and Cork, that he justly describes the whole Irish journey, as "an ovation." No one was inhospitable, save a Catholic gentleman at Killarney, named O'Connell, and who, we suspect, "if not Bran, is Bran's brother." He imagined Sir Walter an enemy to the Catholic claims, which, in a certain sense, he was not, but also a Tory, which he was, even to the folly of pitiful partisanship. Mr Lockhart ascribes to him the holding one opinion of which, we hope, he was incapable, as it is equally discreditable to his understanding and his heart:—

He on all occasions expressed manfully his belief, that the best thing for Ireland would have been never to relax the strictly political enactments of the penal laws, however harsh these might appear. Had they been kept in vigour for another half century, it was his conviction that Popery would have been all but extinguished in Ireland. But he thought that, after admitting Romanists to the elective franchise, it was a vain notion that they could be permanently or advantageously debarred from using that franchise in favour of those of their own persuasion.

Mr Lockhart draws largely upon his own recollections and correspondence in writing the narrative of the Irish tour. It is unfortunate that he considers it necessary that a biography should partake of the nature of a jest-book—that, having been bit with the love of telling "good stories" in the easy, jocular, Scottish style of Sir Walter, his natural humour should be as dry as "the remainder biscuit after a voyage." His real Glasgow baillie is anything but a Nicol Jarvie; and his Protestant Squireen scarcely a picture of de Morgan. Of the Catholic question, Scott, before he had ever seen Ireland, says to his son—

"I hope, though I doubt it a little, that Ireland will be the quieter, and the people more happy. I suspect, however, that it is laying a plaster to the foot while the head aches, and that the fault is in the landlords' extreme exactions, not in the disabilities of the Catholics, or any more remote cause."

No one will question the truth of much of this, though we believe that Mr O'Connell, in now opposing poor-laws for Ireland, affirms that the evils of his native country are wholly political. In a letter to Mr Morrit, written from Edgeworth's Town, Scott avers that—

"In sober sadness, to talk of the misery of Ireland at this time, is to speak of the illness of a malade imaginaire. Well she is not, but she is rapidly becoming so. There are all the outward and visible tokens of convalescence. Everything is mending; the houses that arise are better a hundred-fold than the cabins which are falling; the peasants of the younger class are dressed a great deal better than with the rags which clothe the persons of the more ancient Teagues, which realize the wardrobe of Jenny Sutton, of whom Morris sweetly sings—

'One single pin at night let loose
The robes which veiled her beauty.'

I am sure I have seen, with apprehension, a single button perform the same feat, and when this mad scare-crow hath girded up his loins to run hastily by the side of the chaise, I have feared it would give way, and that there, as King Lear's fool says, we should be all shamed. But this, which seems once to have generally been the attire of the fair of the Green Isle, probably since the time of King Malachi and the collar of gold, is now fast disappearing, and the habit of the more youthful Pats and Patesses is decent and comely. Here they all look well coloured, and well fed, and well contented. And as I see in most places great exertions making to reclaim bogs upon a large scale, and generally to improve ground, I must needs hold that they are in constant employment.

"With all this there is much that remains to be amended, and which time and increase of capital only can amend. The price of labour is far too low, and this naturally reduces the labouring poor beyond their just level in society. The behaviour of the gentry in general to the labourers is systematically harsh, and this arrogance is received with a servile deference which argues anything excepting affection. This, however, is also in the course of amending. I have heard a great deal of the far-famed Catholic Question from both sides, and I think I see its bearings better than I did; but these are for your ear when we meet."

In another letter, he remarks to the same gentleman:—

"The Protestants of the old school, the determined Orangemen, are a very fine race, but dangerous to the quiet of a country; they reminded me of the Spaniard in Mexico, and seemed still to walk among the Catholics with all the pride of the conquerors of the Boyne and the captors of Limerick. Their own belief is completely fixed, that there are enough of men in Down and Antrim to conquer all Ireland again; and when one considers the habitual authority they have exercised, their energetic and military character, and the singular way in which they are banded and united together, they may be right enough for what I know, for they have all one mind, and one way of pursuing it."

Mr Lockhart has omitted to publish a very liberal and enlightened letter from Sir Walter to Mr Laidlaw upon the state of Ireland, written upon that tour, which appeared some years ago in the newspapers; but he has made ample atonement in his own remarks:—

But, ever and anon, as we moved deeper into the country, there was a melancholy in his countenance, and, despite himself, in the tone of his voice, which I for one could not mistake. The constant passings and repassings of bands of mounted policemen, armed to the teeth, and having quite the air of highly disciplined soldiers on sharp service; the wretched squalid poverty that crawled by every wayside, and blocked up every village where we had to change horses, with exhibitions of human suffering and degradation, such as it had never entered into our heads to conceive; and, above all, the contrast between these naked clamorous beggars, who seemed to spring out of the ground at every turn, like swarms of vermin, and the boundless luxury and merriment surrounding the thinly scattered magnates who condescended to inhabit their ancestral seats, would have been sufficient to poison those landscapes, had Nature dressed them out in the verdure of Arcadia, and art embellished them with all the temples and palaces of Old Rome and Athens. It is painful enough even to remember such things; but twelve years can have made but a trifling change in the appearance of a country which, so richly endowed by Providence with every element of wealth and happiness, could, at so advanced a period of European civilisation, sicken the heart of the stranger by such wide-spread manifestations of the wanton and reckless prodigality of human mismanagement, the withering curse of feuds and factions, and the tyrannous selfishness of absenteeism; and I fear it is not likely that any contemporary critic will venture to call my melancholy picture overcharged. A few blessed exceptions—such an aspect of ease and decency, for example, as we met everywhere on the vast domain of the Duke of Devonshire—served only to make the sad reality of the rule more flagrant and appalling.

Thank you for this, Mr Lockhart! Von Raumer has not said it better; save, indeed, about "the vast domain of the Duke of Devonshire," with which you are but partially acquainted. One curse of this confiscated country is those vast English ducal and lordly domains being there at all.

Sir Walter kissed the Blarney Stone, and returned by the usual route to the English Lakes, waylaid by the celebrated Ladies of Llangollen, as famous in their day as lionesses, as ever was the Great Unknown as a tamed lord of the forest, though lionism itself could not make him ridiculous. Their establishment, their ways, and harmless absurdities, are freely caricatured by their satirical voluntary guest, Mr Lockhart, in a style which The Quarterly Review would rebuke in Willis or Cooper—but with little injury now, we dare say, to any human feeling:—

"Imagine two women, one apparently seventy, the other sixty-five, dressed in heavy blue riding habits, enormous shoes and men's hats, with their petticoats so tucked up that, at the first glance of them, fussing and tottering about their porch in the agony of expectation, we took them for a couple of hazy or crazy old sailors. On nearer inspection, they both wear a world of brooches, rings, &c., and Lady Eleanor positively orders—several stars, and crosses, and a red ribbon, exactly like a K.C.B. To crown all, they have crop heads, shaggy, rough, bushy, and as white as snow, the one with age alone, the other assisted by a sprinkling of powder. The elder lady is almost blind, and every way much decayed; the other, the ci-devant groom, in good preservation. But who could paint the priates, the dogs, the cats, the miniatures, the cram of cabinets, clocks, glass-cases, books, bijouterie, dragon-chins, nodding mandarins, and whirligigs of every shape and hue—the whole house outside and in (for we must see everything, to the dressing closets) covered with carved oak, very rich and fine some of it—and the illustrated copies of Sir W.'s poems, and the joking, simpering compliments about "Waverley," and the anxiety to know who MacIvor really was, and the absolute devouring of the poor Unknown, who had to carry off, besides all the rest, one small bit of literal butter dug up in a Miledian stone jar lately from the bottom of some Irish bog. Great romance—in absurd innocence of character—one must have looked for; but it was confounding to find this mixed up with such eager curiosity, and enormous knowledge of the tattle and scandal of the world they had so long left. Their tables were piled with newspapers from every corner of the kingdom, and they seemed to have the deaths and marriages of the antipodes at their fingers' ends. Their albums and autographs, from Louis XVIII. and George IV., down to magazine-poets and quack-doctors, are a museum. I shall never see the spirit of blue-stockingism again in such perfect incarnation. Peveril won't get over their final kissing-match for a week."

Sir Walter joined Mr Canning, Wordsworth, and Southey, for a few days at the seat of Mr Bolton, on the banks of Windermere. It was at that time that this fastidious 'statesman and courtly wit found Peveril's homely Scottish anecdotes, stories, and pithy illustrations, "vulgar twaddle," if we may believe contemporary report. There can be little doubt that they were caviare to himself. This illustrious meeting, and the good things which dropped at a Feast of the Poets, are passed in terms of general but high laudation. In the course of this autumn, Mr Moore, and, afterwards, the magnificent Mrs Coutts, visited Abbotsford. In Moore, Scott met a congenial spirit. The morning after his arrival, he laid his hand upon the breast of his brother bard, with a cordial earnestness, saying, "Now, my dear Moore, we are friends for life." There is nothing else remarkable in the account of this visit; for Mr Moore's journal is not half so laudatory as those of other visitors. They walked together, saw the usual sights of the place, and talked sensibly, rather than poetically, of poetry and Byron. The story at page 94 looks exceedingly like a piece of mystification, of which Scott was not incapable in grave moods, as well as in gayer humours. In short, his imagination struck out a pathetic scene, and he became, for the moment, the ideal actor in it. No one can be at a loss to make out the lady, as Scotland had but one in the unhappy circumstances described, nor yet the persons referred to in the journal, such as T. S., whom all the world that care a rush about the matter can read as plainly as if the name were given at full length, while no one else would be a bit wiser or more interested if it were so. These initial, petty mysteries, and small affectations of delicacy, ought to be whipped by the stern Quarterly critics.

Shortly after Moore's departure, arrived Mrs Coutts, with her tail, borne in three of her seven travelling carriages; a tail, ducal, professional, and toadying. Since Scott had invited this grande dame to his chateau, it was but right and due to himself to treat her as a gentleman ought to treat his invited guests. He, accordingly, rebuked the aristocratic insolence of some nameless "lovely marchioness," also his guest, and secured fitting observance for the lady of millions from the insolent exclusives. Mr Lockhart makes an elaborate apology for Scott's alleged worship of wealth, as well as of the finer essence of rank, which at all times intoxicated him; but in this place it would be superfluous, if it could once be established that "he had a kindness towards Mrs Coutts, because he knew that, vain and pompous as her displays of equipage and attendance might be, she mainly valued wealth, like himself, as the instrument of doing good." Mr Lockhart goes rather far, and would, perhaps, have done wisely to have dropped the matter, when he avers, that the narrative and correspondence, subsequent to the autobiography, "must have satisfied every candid reader that his (Scott's) appetite for wealth was, after all, essentially a vivid yearning for the means of large beneficence." Now, though not pleading guilty to the charge of being uncandid readers, we fear the immense majority of all reflecting readers must be forced, by these Memoirs, upon a very different conclusion. In the latter part of his life, the feelings of an essentially honourable and proud mind led Scott to make every exertion to discharge claims in which the love of acquiring money—not altogether, nor in any considerable degree, for the purposes of "a large beneficence"—had involved him. Scott himself never affected this character; and surely such invitations as those to Mrs Coutts and her train, may scarcely be included in acts of beneficence. His fault was falling in with the spirit of the age, when he ought to have opposed or soared far above it—that base spirit, rapacious on the one side to the verge of commercial treachery, and, upon the other, ostentatiously profuse beyond the boundary of pardonable folly.

To waive these melancholy topics, and make all the good we can of Mrs Coutts, here is a shrewd entry from Scott's journal, when the lady, some time later in the season, was elevating and surprising the worthy citizens of Edinburgh, upon her return from her northern progress:—

"Mrs Coutts, with the Duke of St Albans and Lady Charlotte Beauclerk, called to take leave of us. When at Abbotsford, his suit threw but coldly. She made me, I believe, her confidant in sincerity. She had refused him twice, and decidedly; he was merely on the footing of friendship. I urged it was akin to love. She allowed she might marry the Duke; only she had at present not the least intention that way. Is this frank admission more favourable for the Duke than an absolute protestation against the possibility of such a marriage? I think not. It is the fashion to attend Mrs Coutts' parties, and to abuse her. I have always found her a kind, friendly woman, without either affectation or insolence in the display of her wealth; most willing to do good, if the means be shewn to her. She can be very entertaining, too, as she speaks without scruple of her stage life. So much wealth can hardly be enjoyed without some ostentation. But what then? If the Duke marries her, he ensures an immense fortune; if she marries him, she has the first rank. If he marries a woman older than himself by twenty years, she marries a man younger in wit by twenty degrees. I do not think he will dilapidate her fortune—he seems good and gentle. I do not think that she will abuse his softness—of disposition, shall I say, or of head? The disparity of ages concerns no one but themselves; so they have my consent to marry, if they can get each other's. Just as this is written, enter my Lord of St Albans and Lady Charlotte, to beg I would recommend a book of sermons to Mrs Coutts. Much obliged for her good opinion; recommended Logan's—one poet should always speak for another. The mission, I suppose, was a little display on the part of good Mrs Coutts of authority over her high, aristocratic suitor. I did not suspect her of turning devoes, and retract my consent as given above, unless she remains 'burly, briak, and jolly.' Dined quiet with wife and daughter."

* Peveril was Scott's sobriquet in his own family.

There was some good in Mrs. Coutts' favour. We find her procuring a cadetship for a son of Scott's friend, Sheriff Shortreed. That incarnation of the mildest spirit of Mammon, the future Duchess, had been the ominous harbinger of commercial distress at Abbotsford. It travelled immediately in her train, and was first announced there by Mr Lockhart, though no man can say exactly what Scott himself knew or surmised at this or any other period, or how far he was the dupe of his own credulity. Though five years his son-in-law and constant neighbour, Lockhart had never surmised the nature of the connexion between Scott, Ballantyne, and Constable.

Mr Lockhart, who was at this time negotiating about the editorship of the Quarterly Review, had just returned from London, where he had heard mysterious and unpleasant hints about a commercial crisis and a panic; but especially of the precarious or tottering condition of some persons in the trade; and, among others, the agents of Constable's house. Next, the credit of the Czar himself came in question; a man who, it was known to some of the trade, had been wading and struggling in the quagmires of fictitious credit for ten, or, as probably, twenty years, and who still gave extravagant prices to the Author of Waverley. This was written to Scott, in confidence, by Lockhart; and his reply was, that his friend in Edinburgh was "rooted and branched like an oak." Mr Lockhart, after his return, received farther intelligence affecting Constable's credit; and, alarmed for the copy-money of Sir Walter's last novel—for he suspected no greater risk—he went from his cottage to Abbotsford.

I found Sir Walter alone over his glass of whisky-and-water and cigar—at this time, whenever there was no company, "his custom always in the afternoon." I gave him Mr Wright's letter to read. He did so; and, returning it, said, quite with his usual, tranquil, good-humour of look and voice, "I am much obliged to you for coming over; but, you may rely upon it, Wright has been hoaxed. I promise you, were the Crafts' book thrown up, there would be a pretty decent scramble among the bankers for the keeping of it. There may have been some little dispute or misunderstanding, which malice and envy have exaggerated in this absurd style; but I shan't allow such nonsense to disturb my siesta. . . . The Crafts and James Ballantyne have been so much connected in business, that Fatman would be sure to hear of anything so important; and I like the notion of his hearing it, and not sending me one of his malagrous billets-doux. He could as soon keep his eyebrows in their place if you told him there was a fire in his nursery."

"Seeing how coolly he treated my news, I went home, relieved and gratified. Next morning, as I was rising, behold Peter Mathieson at my door, his horses evidently off a journey, and the Sheriff rubbing his eyes as if the halt had shaken him out of a sound sleep. I made what haste I could to descend, and found him by the side of the brook, looking somewhat worn, but with a serene and satisfied countenance, busied already in helping his little grandson to feed a fleet of ducklings. "You are surprised," he said, "to see me here. The truth is, I was more taken aback with Wright's epistle than I cared to let on; and so, as soon as you left me, I ordered the carriages to the door, and never stopped till I got to Polton, where I found Constable putting on his nightcap. I staid an hour with him, and I have now the pleasure to tell you that all is right. There was not a word of truth in the story. He is not as Ben Lomond."

The night journey revealed serious alarm. My wife suggested, as we talked things over, that this alarm had been, not on his own account, but Ballantyne's, who, in case evil came on the great employer of his types, might possibly lose a year's profit on them, which neither she nor I doubted must amount to a large sum—any more than that a misfortune of Ballantyne's would grieve her father as much as one personal to himself. His warm regard for his printer could be no secret; we well knew that James was his confidential critic—his trusted and trustworthy friend from boyhood. Nor was I ignorant that Scott had a share in the property of Ballantyne's Edinburgh Weekly Journal. . . . That Sir Walter was, and had all along been, James' partner in the great printing concern, neither I, nor, I believe, any member of his family, had entertained the slightest suspicion, prior to the coming calamities which were now "casting their shadows before."

It was exactly at this time that Sir Walter, who must have been troubled with many things, found the safety-valve of the Gurnal—the safe bosom-confidant, which he anticipated might one day be found in his repositories, yet to which he did not give his entire mind.

We have spoken of this Diary elsewhere. The first entries are reminiscences and anecdotes of the Irish tour, and portraits of friends. The rapid gradations of his ruin follow hard upon these. But first let us notice, that Mr Lockhart, having been forced on making a sort of amende honorable to the memory of James Ballantyne, as to one from "first to last a perfectly upright man, with principles of a lofty stamp, and feelings pure, even to simplicity," sets himself to prove that the man who had created and superintended the greatest and most profitable printing trade that ever existed in Scotland, was a very bad man of business: "the most negligent, and inefficient of master printers;" busy, indeed, "though naturally indolent," but altogether mis-employed.

He was busy, indeed; and inestimably serviceable to Scott was his labour; but it consisted simply and solely in the correction and revival of proof-sheets. It is most true, that Sir Walter's hurried and careless method of composition, rendered it absolutely necessary that whatever he wrote should be subjected to far more than the usual amount of inspection required at the hands of the printer; and it is equally so, that it would have been extremely difficult to find another man willing and able to bestow such time and care on his proof-sheets as they uniformly received from James. But this was, in fact, not the proper occupation of the man who was at the head of the establishment—who had undertaken the pecuniary management of the concern. . . . Whoever visited him there, found him at the same eternal business, that of a literator, not that of a printer. He was either editing his newspaper—and he considered that matter as fondly and proudly as Mr Pott in "Plekwick" does his Gazette of Etnaswill—or correcting proof-sheets, or writing critical notes and letters to the Author of Waverley.

The business was not profitable. It ought to have yielded an income of from £2000 to £3000 a year, Mr Lockhart asserts; but what it did yield before the bankruptcy, he does not state, while he insinuates that it was less than nothing. After that, in years not good, it cleared in profit £1500 a-year; with, if we are not misinformed, the handsome salary of £800 a-year, allowed by the trustees to the individual whom Mr Lockhart considers so incapable of the duties of superintending a business which he had created and which he conducted, with the approbation of the said trustees, to the day of his death.

The printing business of Scott & Company must have been always profitable; the bookselling and publishing business, while it lasted, always bad; and for this good reason, that a very great author may be an exceedingly bad and injudicious publisher. The embarrassments of the bookselling concern, and the capital improperly withdrawn from trade to be sunk in land, gave rise to the fatal system of accommodation bills, by which James Ballantyne was as much a sufferer as Sir Walter Scott; with this difference, that the one was the self-seeking, and the other the involuntary victim of foolish speculation and blind avidity.

Constable, shorn of his lustre, follows James Ballantyne on Mr Lockhart's canvass, and he is willing to give the Crafty credit for kindly feelings in his desire to support the credit of John Ballantyne in 1812, from which time the Ballantyne firm became the bond-slave to the wheels of his car, whatever precipices lay under its mad course. He says—

He, (Constable,) with pitiable foibles enough, and grievous faults, and I fear even some black stains of vice in his character, was a man of warm, and therefore I hardly doubt, of sympathizing temperament. Vain to excess, proud at the same time, haughty, arrogant, presumptuous, despotic—he had still perhaps a heart. Persons who knew him longer and better than I did, assure me of their conviction that, in spite of many direct professional hindrances and thwartings, the offspring (as I have viewed matters) partly of Tory jealousy, and partly of poetical caprice—he had, even at an early period of his life, formed a genuine affection for Scott's person, as well as a most profound veneration for his genius. I think it very possible that he began his assistance of the Ballantyne companies mainly under this generous influence—and I also believe that he had, in different ways, a friendly leaning in favour of both James and John themselves. But when he, in his overweening self-sufficiency, thought it involved no mighty hazard to indulge his better feelings, as well as his lordly vanity, in shielding these friends from commercial dishonour, he had estimated but loosely the demands of the career of speculation on which he was himself entering. And by and by, when, advancing by one mighty plunge after another in that vast field, he felt in his own person the threatenings of more signal ruin than could have befallen them, this “Napoleon of the press”—still as of old buoyed up as to the ultimate result of his grand operations, by the most fulsome flatteries of imagination—appears to have tossed aside very summarily all scruples about the extent to which he might be entitled to tax their sustaining credit in requital. The Ballantynes, if they had comprehended all the bearings of the case, were not the men to consider grudgingly demands of this nature, founded on service so important; and who can doubt that Scott viewed them from a chivalrous altitude?

The “chivalrous altitude” from which Scott viewed matters of profit and commerce, may well tempt a smile from those who have read his bargaining letters. Has Mr Lockhart ever read his own book since it was printed? Scott's neglect of these affairs has always appeared to his biographer “the enigma of his personal history;” especially as he prided himself on his acumen in much smaller concerns of profit and loss. We could help Mr Lockhart to a solution of the enigma. Scott, as is a quite common case, was hoodwinked by the immense nominal sums he was receiving from Constable, and must have had a latent suspicion of the fallacious system by which he reaped an excessive immediate profit. How much of all that Scott ever paid from his own funds to the joint creditors, ought he in justice to have given back in restitution of the sums obtained from the vanity, the delusion, the rashness, and absolute madness of Constable—for the waste stock, and the losing volumes, and all the other bad speculations? In a conversation with Captain Basil Hall, one day, Scott said that the author's share of a book ought to be one sixth of the retail price. Apply this text to his transactions with Constable, and let Cocker determine how much more or less Scott had obtained than any fair publishers could honestly have afforded.

In brief, the wrong which Scott and Constable did each other, was a mutual wrong. Each was alike willing to be flatteringly deceived, and Scott, in the first instance, had the pecuniary advantage, and used it.

Though completely negligent, it is insinuated, of his affairs, “as a printer in the Canongate,” he visited the office every forenoon on leaving the court. But did he ever examine the ledger?

I certainly much question it. I think it very likely that he now and then cast a rapid glance over the details of a week's or a month's operations; but no man who has followed him throughout can dream that he ever grappled with the sum total.

The reason was obvious; yet the books, for all this, might have been examined, and probably were so, but the concern was working smoothly in the meanwhile, and he might work himself clear before the evil day came upon Constable. We must quote this mouthful of moralizing:—

How shrewdly Scott lectures Terry in May 1835:—“The best business is ruined when it becomes pinched for money, and gets into the circle of discounting bills.” “It is easy to make it feasible on paper, but the times of payment arrive to a certainty.” “I should not like to see you take flight like the ingenious mechanist in Rasselas, only to flutter a few yards, and fall into the lake; this would be a heart-breaking business.” “You must be careful that a check shall not throw you on the breakers, and for this there is no remedy but a handsome provision of the blunt,” &c. &c. Who can read these words—and consider that, at the very hour when they fell from Scott's pen, he was meditating a new purchase of land to the extent of £40,000—and that nevertheless the “certainty of the arrival of times of payment for discounted bills” was within a few months of being realized to his own ruin—who can read such words, under such a date, and not sigh the only comment, sic vos non vobis?

Constable, Mr Lockhart is innocent enough to suppose, might have weathered the storm, had not the house of Hurst, Robinson, & Co. played the same game of bills and counter-bills back upon him, which he was doing upon the Canongate Company.

Mr Lockhart winds up this knotty part of his subject, which he would have done wisely to let alone, by concluding, that no man could have lived so long in the world of imagination—“in Fairyland,”—and have preserved his worldly faculties acute and entire; as if Sir Walter Scott had been some dreamer and visionary, whose fancy was wandering in the clouds, while every worldling jostled, duped, and robbed him. From all this we turn for relief and enjoyment to the "Gurnal." This of music:—

"My little nicoes (ex officio) gave us some pretty music. I do not know and cannot utter a note of music; and complicated harmonies seem to me a babble of confused though pleasing sounds. Yet simple melodies, especially if connected with words and ideas, have as much effect on me as on most people. But then I hate to hear a young person sing without feeling and expression suited to the song. I cannot bear a voice that has no more life in it than a piano-forte or a bugle-horn. There is about all the fine arts a something of soul and spirit, which, like the vital principle in man, defies the research of the most critical anatomist. You feel where it is not, yet you cannot describe what it is you want. Sir Joshua, or some other great painter, was looking at a picture on which much pains had been bestowed: 'Why, yes,' he said, in a hesitating manner, 'it is very clever—very well done—can't find fault; but it wants something; it wants—it wants—d—n me—it wants THAT'—throwing his hand over his head, and snapping his fingers. Tom Moore's is the most exquisite warbling I ever heard. Next to him, David Macculloch for Scotch songs. The last, when a boy at Dumfries, was much admired by Burns, who used to get him to try over the words which he composed to new melodies."

Of all music, he seemed most to have enjoyed Mrs Lockhart's Scottish songs; they were either his own compositions, or the ballads of his youth, and of his beloved country; and moreover—and the reason is natural and excellent—

"This is my eldest daughter."

Here is Moore, and we shall follow him with another of Scott's contemporary portraits:—

"November 22.—Moore.—There is a manly frankness, with perfect ease and good-breeding, about him which is delightful. Not the least touch of the poet or the pedant. A little—very little man. Less, I think, than Lewis, and somewhat like him in person; God knows, not in conversation, for Matt, though a clever fellow, was a bore of the first description. Moreover, he looked always like a schoolboy. Now, Moore has none of this insignificance. His countenance is plain, but the expression so very animated, especially in speaking or singing, that it is far more interesting than the finest features could have rendered it.

"I was aware that Byron had often spoken, both in private society and in his Journal, of Moore and myself, in the same breath, and with the same sort of regard; so I was curious to see what there could be in common betwixt us, Moore having lived so much in the gay world, I in the country, and with people of business, and sometimes with politicians; Moore, a scholar, I none; he a musician and artist, I without knowledge of a note; he a democrat, I an aristocrat—with many other points of difference; besides his being an Irishman, I a Scotchman, and both tolerably national. Yet there is a point of resemblance, and a strong one. We are both good-humoured fellows, who rather seek to enjoy what is going forward, than to maintain our dignity as Lions."

"Which enables us the better to keep our places as Lions," he might have added. Next he writes of Byron:—

"On comparing notes with Moore, I was confirmed in one or two points which I had always laid down in considering poor Byron. One was, that, like Rousseau, he was apt to be very suspicious, and a plain downright steadiness of manner was the true mode to maintain his good opinion. Will Rose told me that once, while sitting with Byron, he fixed insensibly his eyes on his feet, one of which, it must be remembered, was deformed. Looking up suddenly, he saw Byron regarding him with a look of concentrated and deep displeasure, which wore off when he observed no consciousness or embarrassment in the countenance of Rose. Murray afterwards explained this, by telling Rose that Lord Byron was very jealous of having this personal imperfection noticed or attended to. In another point, Moore confirmed my previous opinion, namely, that Byron loved mischief-making. Moore had written to him, cautioning him against the project of establishing the paper called The Liberal, in communion with men on whom he said the world had set its mark. Byron shewed this to the parson. Shelley wrote a modest and rather affecting expostulation to Moore. These two peculiarities of extreme suspicion and love of mischief are both shades of the malady which certainly fractured some part of the character of this mighty genius; and, without some tendency towards which, genius perhaps cannot exist to great extent. The wheels of a machine, to play rapidly, must not fit with the utmost exactness, else the attrition diminishes the impetus.

"Another of Byron's peculiarities was the love of mystifying, which, indeed, may be referred to that of mischief. There was no knowing how much or how little to believe of his narratives. Instance:—William Bankes, expostulating with him upon a dedication which he had written in extravagant terms of praise to Cam Hobhouse, Byron told him that Cam had bored him about this dedication till he had said, 'Well, it shall be so, provided you will write it yourself;' and affirmed that Hobhouse did write the high-coloured dedication accordingly. I mentioned this to Murray, having the report from Will Rose, to whom Bankes had mentioned it. Murray, in reply, assured me that the dedication was written by Lord Byron himself, and shewed it me in his own hand. I wrote to Rose to mention the thing to Bankes, as it might have made mischief had the story got into the circle. Byron was disposed to think all men of imagination were addicted to mix fiction (or poetry) in their prose. He used to say he dared believe the celebrated courtesan of Venice, about whom Rousseau makes so piquante a story, was, if one could see her, a druggle-tailed wench enough. I believe that he embellished his own amours considerably, and that he was, in many respects, le faufarou de vices qu'il n'avait pas. He loved to be thought woful, mysterious, and gloomy, and sometimes hinted at strange causes. I believe the whole to have been the creation and sport of a wild and powerful fancy. In the same manner he crammed people, as it is termed, about duels and the like, which never existed, or were much exaggerated.

"What I liked about Byron, besides his boundless genius, was his generosity of spirit as well as purse, and his utter contempt of all the affectations of literature.

Talking of Abbotsford, it begins to be haunted by too much company of every kind, but especially foreigners. I do not like them. I hate fine waistcoats, and breastpins upon dirty shirts. I detest the impudence that pays a stranger compliments, and harangues about an author's works in his own house, which is surely ill-breeding."

There is more truth in this than in all Sir Walter's other Byronic estimates put together—and what a character! Suspicious, malicious, and capable of being a liar and a braggart! What a concentration of rascally qualities in one Peer! His contempt of "the affectations of literature," was merely contempt of such affectations as he did not adopt himself. His "generosity of purse" consisted in a few ostentatious, and it may be also in a few real charities; while his high spirit permitted him to spend abroad upon his pleasures the income obtained through the wife whom he libelled and maligned. Coming himself, by a succession of fortunate deaths, into the estate of the ancestors of whom he was so vain, his generosity of spirit permitted him to deprive the next heir—the next of the blood of the Byrons—of every inch of the ancestral inheritance.

Let us turn to something better. Scott saw a Lord Byron, and he might have seen him earlier in the true light which broke on him at last.

On the 22d of November, and some weeks after the midnight journey to Constable, we find him gently letting his fears ebb out :—

"Here is matter for a May morning, but much fitter for a November one. The general distress in the city has affected H. and R., Constable's great agents. Should they go, it is not likely that Constable can stand, and such an event would lead to great distress and perplexity on the part of J. B. and myself. Thank God, I have enough to pay more than 20s. in the pound, taking matters at the very worst.

"I here register my purpose to practise economy. I have little temptation to do otherwise. Abbotsford is all that I can make it, and too large for the property ; so I resolve—

"No more building ;

"No purchases of land, till times are quite safe ;

"No buying books or expensive trifles.—I mean to any extent ;—and

"Clearing off encumbrances, with the returns of this year's labour ;

"Which resolutions, with my health and my habits of industry, will make me 'sleep in spite of thunder.'

"After all, it is hard that the vagabond stock-jobbing Jews should, for their own purposes, make such a shake of credit as now exists in London, and menace the credit of men trading on sure funds like Hurst & Robinson.

"Dined quiet with Lady S—— and Anne. Anne is practising Scots songs, which I take as a kind compliment to my own taste, as here leads her chiefly to foreign music. I think the good girl sees that I want and must value her sister's peculiar talent in singing the airs of our native country, which, imperfect as my musical ear is, make, and always have made the most pleasing impression on me. And so, if she puts a constraint on herself for my sake, I can only say, in requital, God bless her ! I have much to comfort me in the present aspect of my family.

"December 12.—Dined at home, and spent the evening in writing—Anne and Lady Scott at the theatre, to see Mathews—a very clever man my friend Mathews ; but it is tiresome to be funny for a whole evening, so I was content and stupid at home."

The catastrophe was rapidly approaching ; but we have previously noticed Scott's painful forebodings, and many touches of true unmediated pathos. Sometimes a favourable letter from London raised his hopes ; thus :—

"December 19.—Ballantyne here before breakfast. He looks on last night's news with confidence. Constable came in and sat an hour. The old gentleman is firm as a rock. He talks of going to London next week. But I must go to work."

He was then hard at "Woodstock." On this visit to London, Mr Lockhart saw the Czar. The meeting is characteristic :—

Having deferred his journey imprudently, he had performed it very rapidly ; and this exertion, with mental excitement, had brought on a sharp access of gout, which confined him for a couple of days to his hotel in the Adelphi—reluctantem draconem. A more impatient spirit never boiled in a feverish frame. It was then that I for the first time, saw full swing given to the tyrannical temper of the Czar. He looked, spoke, and gesticulated like some heavy despot, accustomed to nothing but the complete indulgence of every wish and whim, against whose sovereign authority his most trusted satraps and tributaries had suddenly revolted—open rebellion in twenty provinces—confusion in the capital—treason in the palace. I will not repeat his haughty ravings of scorn and wrath. I listened to these with wonder and commiseration ; nor were such feelings mitigated when, having exhausted his violence of vituperation against many persons of whom I had never before heard him speak but as able and useful friends, he cooled down sufficiently to answer my question as to the practical business on which the announcing his arrival in town had signified his urgent desire to take my advice. Constable told me that he had already seen one of the Hurst & Robinson firm, and that the storm which had seemed to be "blown over" had, he was satisfied, only been lulled for a moment to burst out with redoubled fury. If they went, however, he must follow. He had determined to support them through the coming gale as he had done through the last ; and he had the means to do so effectually, provided Sir Walter Scott would stand by him heartily and boldly. The first and most obvious step was to make large sales of copyrights ; and it was not surprising that Constable should have formed most extravagant notions of the marketable value of the property of this nature in his possession.

The copyrights were not so marketable as Constable had imagined, and,

To be brief, he requested me to accompany him, as soon as he could get into his carriage, to the Bank of England, and support him (as a confidential friend of the Author of Waverley) in his application for a loan of from L.100,000 or L.200,000 on the security of the copyrights in his possession. It is needless to say that, without distinct instructions from Sir Walter, I could not take it upon me to interfere in such a business as this. Constable, when I refused, became livid with rage. After a long silence, he stamped on the ground, and swore that he could and would do alone. I left him in stern indignation. There was another scene of the same kind a day or two afterwards, when his object was to get me to back his application to Sir Walter to borrow L.20,000 in Edinburgh, and transmit it to him in London. I promised nothing but to acquaint Scott immediately with his request, and him with Scott's answer.

Against this, Scott was warned by Constable's partner, Mr Cadell, to whom he felt grateful for the friendly advice. "Constable lingered on, fluctuating between wild hope and savage despair, until, I seriously believe, he at last hovered on the brink of insanity. When he returned to Edinburgh, it was to confront creditors whom he knew he could not pay."

We recommend those who admire the Scottish system of banking to read the following extract from the memoranda written by James Ballantyne on his death-bed, for the use of the compiler of these memoirs, and which their author justly extols for candour :—

"I need not here enlarge upon the unfortunate facility which, at the period of universal confidence and indulgence, our and other houses received from the banks. Suffice it to say, that all our appearances of prosperity, as well as those of Constable, and Hurst & Robinson, were merely shadows, and that, from the moment the bankers exhibited symptoms of doubt, it might have been easy to discover what must be the ultimate result. During weeks, and even months, however, our house was kept in a state of very painful suspense."

Scott spent the Christmas vacation of the Court, as usual, at Abbotsford, and in very indifferent spirits. As he returned, the crash came :—

"January 17.—James Ballantyne this morning, good honest fellow, with a visage as black as the crook. He hopes no salvation ; has indeed taken measures to stop. It is hard, after having fought such a battle. Have apologized for not attending the Royal Society Club, who have a gaudemus on this day, and seemed to count much on my being the presser. My old acquaintance, Miss Elizabeth Clerk, sister of Wilkie, died suddenly. I cannot choose but wish it had been Sir W. S., and yet the feeling is unmanly. I have Anne, my wife, and Charter to look after. I felt rather smacking as I came home from the Parliament-House—felt as if I were like monstrum digitum in no very pleasant way.

"January 18.—During yesterday I received formal visits from my friends Skene and Colin Mackenzie, (who, I am glad to see, looks well,) with every offer of service. The Royal Bank also sent Sir John Hope and Sir Henry Jardine, to offer to comply with my wishes. The Advocate came on the same errand. But I gave all the same answer—that my intention was to put the whole into the hands of a trustee, and to be contented with the event, and that all I had to ask was time to do so, and to extricate my affairs. I was assured of every accommodation in this way. From all quarters I have had the same kindness.—Letters from Constable and Robinson have arrived. The last persist in saying they will pay all and everybody. They say, moreover, in a postscript, that, had Constable been in town ten days sooner, all would have been well. I feel quite composed and determined to labour. There is no remedy. I guess (as Mathews makes his Yankees say) that we shall not be troubled with visitors, and I calculate that I will not go out at all; so what can I do better than labour? Even yesterday I went about making notes on “Waverley,” according to Constable’s plan. It will do good one day. To-day, when I lock this volume, I go to “Woodstock.” Heigho! A painful scene after dinner, and another after supper, endeavouring to convince these poor dear creatures that they must not look for miracles, but consider the misfortune as certain, and only to be lessened by patience and labour.

“January 20.—Indifferent night—very bilious, which may be want of exercise. Maïs, pourtant, cultivatez notre jardin. The public favour is my only lottery. I have long enjoyed the foremost prize, and something in my breast tells me my evil genius will not overwhelm me if I stand by myself. Why should I not? I have no enemies—many attached friends. The popular ascendancy which I have maintained is of the kind which is rather improved by frequent appearances. In fact, critics may say what they will, but “hain your reputation, and tyme your reputation,” is a true proverb.

“Sir William Forbes called, the same kind, honest friend as ever, with all offers of assistance, &c. &c. &c. All anxious to serve me, and careless about their own risk of loss. And these are the cold, hard, money-making men whose questions and control I apprehend! Lord Chief Commissioner Adam also came to see me, and the meeting, though pleasing, was melancholy.”

Those were soothing and grateful visits; but where many thousands pounds are concerned, condolences do not amount to much, and Scott appears to have soon got impatient and restive under commiseration. Next day he writes:—

“Poor Mr Pole, the harper, sent to offer me £500 or £600, probably his all. There is much good in the world after all. But I will involve no friend, either rich or poor. My own right hand shall do it—else will I be done in the slang language, and undone in common parlance. I am glad that, beyond my own family, who are, excepting Lady S., young and able to bear sorrow, of which this is the first taste to some of them, most of the hearts are past aching which would have once been inconsolable on this occasion. I do not mean that many will not seriously regret, and some, perhaps, lament my misfortunes. But my dear mother, my almost sister, Christy Rutherford, poor Will Erskine; those would have been mourners indeed.

“January 23.—Slept ill, not having been abroad these eight days—splendida bilis. Then a dead sleep in the morning, and when the awakening comes, a strong feeling how well I could dispense with it for once and for ever. . . . Wrote till twelve A.M., finishing half of what I call a good day’s work—ten pages of print, or rather twelve. Then walked in the Prince’s Street pleasure-grounds with good Samaritan James Skene, the only one among my numerous friends, who can properly be termed amicus curarum mearum, others being too busy or too gay, and several being estranged by habit.

My wife’s and girls’ tongues are chatting in a lively manner in the drawing-room. It does me good to hear them.

“If I am hard pressed, and measures used against me,

I must use all means of legal defence, and subscribe myself bankrupt in a petition for sequestration. It is the course one should, at any rate, have advised a client to take. But for this I would, in a court of honour, deserve to lose my spurs. No, if they permit me, I will be their vassal for life, and dig in the mine of my imagination to find diamonds (or what may sell for such) to make good my engagements, not to enrich myself. And this from no reluctance to be called the insolvent, which I probably am, but because I will not put out of the power of my creditors the resources, mental or literary, which yet remain to me.”

In a day or two afterwards, the creditors unanimously agreed to a private trust, and Sir Walter hoped to sleep better that night. A few days afterwards, he writes—“Constable’s business seems unintelligible. No man thought the house worth less than £150,000. Constable told me, when he was making his will, that he was worth £80,000. Great profits on almost all the adventures. No bad speculations—yet neither stock nor debt to shew. Constable might have eaten up his share; but Cadell was very frugal.” Cordial drops were mingled in his cup of bitterness. “February 1.—A most generous letter (though not more so than I expected) from Walter and Jane, offering to interpose with their fortune, &c. God Almighty forbid!—that were too unnatural to accept, though dutiful and affectionate in them to offer.”

There was a touch, the smallest possible, of the Archbishop of Granada about Scott, and he could not have been a mortal author with less. He spoke slightly, or thought lightly of his own productions, only until some one else adopted or broached the same opinion; thus, though James Ballantyne thought poorly of “The Doom of Devorgoil,” “poor Erskine liked it much;” and, again—“James Ballantyne is severely critical on what he calls imitation of Mrs Radcliffe in ‘Woodstock.’ Many will think with him—yet I am of opinion he is quite wrong, or, as friend J. F. says, wrong.”

Perhaps the following sentence lets us more truly into the secret of Scott’s fallacious expectations, and his sanguine calculations, than a volume written by another could do:—

“From the 19th January to the 2d February inclusive, is exactly fifteen days, during which time, with the intervention of some days’ idleness, to let imagination brood on the task a little, I have written a volume. I think, for a bet, I could have done it in ten days. Then I must have had no Court of Session to take me up hours every morning, and dissipate my attention and powers of working for the rest of the day. A volume, at cheapest, is worth £1000. This is working at the rate of £24,000 a-year; but then we must not bake buns faster than people have appetite to eat them. They are not essential to the market, like potatoes.”

Here, too, he leaves out copyright, which would prospectively double or quadruple his £24,000. One might believe, from passages in his diary, that his mind speedily recovered its natural elasticity; yet it is to be feared he had frequent relapses. For despondency he gave himself no leisure. Thus—

“February 5.—Rose after a sound sleep, and here am I without bile or anything to perturb my inward man. It is just about three weeks since so great a change took place in my relations in society, and already I am indifferent to it. But I have been always told my feelings of joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, enjoyment and privation, are much colder than those of other people.

"Mr Laidlaw came in from Abbotsford, and dined with us. We spent the evening in laying down plans for the farm, and deciding whom we should keep and whom dismiss among the people. This we did on the true negro-driving principle of self-interest—the only principle I know which never swerves from its objects. We chose all the active, young, and powerful men, turning old age and infirmity adrift. I cannot help this, for a guinea cannot do the work of five; but I will contrive to make it easier to the sufferers.

"Mr Laidlaw dined with us. Says Mr Gibson told him he would dispose [despair?] of my affairs, were it any but Sir W. S. No doubt, so should I. I am well-nigh doing so, at any rate. But fortuna juvante, much may be achieved. At worst the prospect is not very discouraging to one who wants little. Methinks I have been, like Burns' poor labourer—

'So constantly in Ruin's sight,
The view o't gives me little fright.'

There may be the least touch of bravado in this; but there is a stout heart also.

In a letter to Mr Lockhart, written three days after the insolvency was publicly known at Edinburgh, he makes, as it were, his own defences, and quenches many of his correspondent's subsequent insinuations and charges against his friend James Ballantyne, of whom he says only what we have been saying all along. The letter is important, and most honourable to Scott's feelings, but not more than might have been expected from him. And that "intelligent and liberal establishment," also, which gave such sums at least to one author, will now provoke a melancholy smile.

"MY DEAR LOCKHART,—I have your kind letter. Whenever I heard that Constable had made a cessio forei, I thought it became me to make public how far I was concerned in these matters, and to offer my fortune so far as it was prestable, and the completion of my literary engagements—the better thing almost of the two—to make good all claims on Ballantyne and Co.; and even supposing that neither Hurst & Co. nor Constable & Co. ever pay a penny they owe me, my old age will be far from destitute—even if my right hand should lose its cunning. This is the very worst that can befall me; but I have little doubt that, with ordinary management, the affairs of those houses will turn out favourably. It is needless to add that I will not engage myself, as Constable desires, for £20,000 more—or £2000—or £200. I have advanced enough already to pay other people's debts, and must now pay my own. If our friend C. had set out a fortnight earlier, nothing of all this would have happened; but he let the hour of distress precede the hour of provision, and he and others must pay for it. Yet don't hint this to him, poor fellow—it is an infirmity of nature.

"I have made my matters public, and have had splendid offers of assistance, all which I have declined, for I would rather bear my own burden than subject myself to obligation. There is but one way in such cases.

"It is easy, no doubt, for any friend to blame me for entering into connexion with commercial matters at all. But I wish to know what I could have done better; excluded from the bar, and then from all profits for six years, by my colleague's prolonged life. Literature was not in those days what poor Constable has made it; and, with my little capital, I was too glad to make commercially the means of supporting my family. I got but £600 for the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel,' and—it was a price that made men's hair stand on end—£1000 for 'Marmion.' I have been far from suffering by James Ballantyne. I owe it to him to say, that his difficulties, as well as his advantages, are owing to me. I trusted too much to Constable's assurances of his own and his correspondents' stability, but yet I believe he was only genuine. The upshot is just what Hurst & Co. and Constable may be able to pay me; if 15s. in the pound, I shall not complain of my loss, for I have gained many thousands in my day. But while I live I shall regret the downfall of Constable's house, for never did there exist so intelligent and so liberal an establishment. They went too far when money was plenty, that is certain; yet, if every author in Britain had taxed himself half a year's income, he should have kept up the house which first broke in upon the monopoly of the London trade, and made letters what they now are.

"I have had visits from all the monied people, offering their purses—and those who are creditors, sending their managers and treasurers to assure me of their joining in and adopting any measures I may propose. I am glad of this for their sake, and for my own—for although I shall not desire to steer, yet I am the only person that can cann, as Lieutenant Hatchway says, to any good purpose. A very odd anonymous offer I had of £30,000, which I rejected, as I did every other. Unless I die, I shall beat up against this foul weather. A penny I will not borrow from any one. Since my creditors are content to be patient, I have the means of righting them perfectly, and the confidence to employ them. I would have given a good deal to have avoided the coup d'éclat; but that having taken place, I would not give sixpence for any other results. I fear you will think I am writing in the heat of excited resistance to bad fortune. My dear Lockhart, I am as calm and temperate as you ever saw me, and working at 'Woodstock' like a very tiger. I am grieved for Lady Scott and Anne, who cannot conceive adversity can have the better of them, even for a moment. If it teaches a little of the frugality which I never had the heart to enforce when money was plenty—and it seemed cruel to interrupt the enjoyment of it in the way they liked best—it will be well.

"Kindest love to Sophia, and tell her to study the song and keep her spirits up. Tyne heart, tyne all; and it is making more of money than it is worth to grieve about it. Kiss Johnnie for me. How glad I am fortune carried you to London before these reverses happened, as they would have embittered parting, and made it resemble the boat leaving the sinking ship!"

Mr Lockhart shews that, if Scott had chosen to take the full advantage of the bankrupt laws, he might have got off easily by surrendering all the literary and other property of the printing company. We own we do not see it. Not only would his life-rent of Abbotsford have been attached, with his salaries of office, copyrights, library, &c. &c., but the marriage-contract of his son might have been set aside, and his estate claimed by the creditors, as at one period seems to have been threatened by the bank. His manful resolution was not only more honest and honourable, but ultimately more wise. We cull a few more entries:—

February 14.—"Saw Cadell as I returned from the Court. He seemed dejected, and gloomy about the extent of stock of novels, &c. on hand. He infected me with his want of spirits, and I almost wish my wife had not asked Mr Scrope and Charles K. Sharpe for this day. But the former sent such loads of game that Lady Scott's gratitude became ungovernable. I have not seen a creature at dinner since the direful 17th of January, except my own family and Mr Laidlaw. The love of solitude increases by indulgence; I hope it will not diverge into misanthropy. It does not mend the matter that this is the first day that a ticket for sale is on my house, poor No. 39.

"February 15.—Yesterday I did not write a line of 'Woodstock.' Partly I was a little out of spirits, though that would not have hindered. Partly, I wanted to wait for some new ideas—a sort of collecting of straw to make bricks of. . . . Poor James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, came to advise with me about his affairs—he is sinking under the times; having no assistance to give him, my advice I fear will be of little service. I am sorry for him if that would help him, especially as, by his own account, a couple of hundred pounds would carry him on."

His Castle Street house was now disposed of, the furniture sold; and Scott afterwards lived, when attending the Court, in furnished lodgings. The composition of the letters of Malachi Malagrouther gave his spirits a fillip at this trying time, and probably did him some good with those magnates of the banks, who, by one means or other, had come to exercise something like the old power of pit and gallows in Scotland, and now felt, in the threatened suppression of their one-pound notes, their jurisdiction at stake.

Under the ample veil of Themis, Scott, at all times, wrote many of his letters to friends, and probably some chapters of his novels; and there is no doubt that he was then often much more usefully employed than in the business he was ostensibly paid to execute; yet this is a strange confession:—

"February 21.—One person talking for a long time, whether in pulpit or at the bar, or anywhere else, unless the interest be great, and the eloquence of the highest character, sets me to sleep. I impudently lean my head on my hand in the Court, and take my nap without shame. The Lords may keep awake and mind their own affairs. Quod supra nos nihil ad nos. These clerks' stools are certainly as easy seats as are in Scotland, those of the Barons of Exchequer always excepted.

"February 24.—Whimsical enough, that, when I was trying to animate Scotland against the currency bill, John Gibson brought me the deed of trust, assigning my whole estate, to be subscribed by me; so that I am turning patriot, and taking charge of the affairs of the country, on the very day I proclaim myself incapable of managing my own.

"March 1.—Malachi is in the Edinburgh Journal to-day, and reads like the work of an uncompromising right-forward Scot of the old school."

Malachi made a wonderful sensation, and the writer says gallantly:—

"March 3.—On the whole, I am glad of this bruillie, as far as I am concerned; people will not dare talk of me as an object of pity—no more 'poor-manning.' Who asks how many pounds Scots the old champion had in his pocket when

' He set a bugle to his mouth,
And blew so loud and shrill,
The trees in greenwood shook thereat,
Sae loud rang every hill!'

"March 8.—From what I hear, the poor man Constable is not sensible of the nature of his own situation; for myself, I have succeeded in putting the matter perfectly out of my mind since I cannot help it, and have arrived at a flocci-pauci-nihili-pili-fication of misery, and I thank whoever invented that long word."

This is the brave side. At other times, we find the Stoic expressing himself thus:—

"March 13.—I have hinted in these notes that I am not entirely free from a sort of gloomy fit, with a fluttering of the heart and depression of spirits, just as if I knew not what was going to befall me. I can sometimes resist this successfully, but it is better to evade than to combat it. The hang-dog spirit may have originated in the confusion and chucking about of our old furniture, the stripping of walls of pictures, and rooms of ornaments; the leaving of a house we have so long called our home, is altogether melancholy enough. I am glad Lady S. does not mind it, and yet I wonder, too. She insists on my remaining till Wednesday, not knowing what I suffer. Meanwhile, to make my recumbent spirit do penance, I have set to work to clear away papers and pack them for my journey. What a strange medley of thoughts such a task produces! There lie letters which made the heart to throb when received, now lifeless and uninteresting—as are perhaps their writers. Riddles which have been read—schemes which time has destroyed or brought to maturity—memorials of friendships and enemies which are now alike faded. Thus does the ring of Saturn consume itself. To-day annihilates yesterday, as the old tyrant swallowed his children, and the snake its tail. But I must say to my Journal as poor Byron did to Moore—'D—n it, Tom, don't be poetical!'"

What a strange jumble of opinions Scott held upon public questions! In a letter to Sir Robert Dundas, the largest actual sinecurist in Scotland, he says:—

"I remember the late Lord Melville defending, in a manner that defied refutation, the Scots laws against sedition; and I have lived to see these repealed, by what our friend Baron Hume calls 'A bill for the better encouragement of sedition and treason.' It will last my day probably; at least I shall be too old to be shot, and have only the honourable chance of being hanged for incivisme. The whole burgher class of Scotland are gradually preparing for radical reform—I mean the middling and respectable classes; and when a burgh reform comes, which perhaps cannot long be delayed, Ministers will not return a member for Scotland from the towns. The gentry will abide longer by sound principles; for they are needy, and desire advancement for their sons, and appointments, and so on. But this is a very hollow dependence, and those who sincerely hold ancient opinions are waxing old."

And so need and desire of place are the pure motives which hold men to sound Tory principles; and Scott can deliberately regret the abolition of those barbarous and tyrannical India-rubber statutes—stretching any way in the hands of power—under which Muir, Skirving, Gerrald, and Palmer, were, in his youth, condemned to the punishment of the vilest of felons! We are glad to understand this foul blot is removed from the Scottish law-books, and only wish we were sure of it. Here is another pithy bit of sagacious Toryism, dictated by malice prepense:—

"Scotland, completely liberalized, as she is in a fair way of being, will be the most dangerous neighbour to England that she has had since 1639. There is yet time to make a stand, for there is yet a great deal of good and genuine feeling left in the country. But if you unscootch us, you will find us damned mischievous Englishmen. The restless and yet laborious and constantly watchful character of the people, their desire for speculation in politics or anything else, only restrained by some proud feelings about their own country, now become antiquated, and which late measures will tend much to destroy, will make them, under a wrong direction, the most formidable revolutionists who ever took the field of innovation. The late Lord Melville knew them well, and managed them accordingly. Our friend, the present Lord Melville, with the same sagacity, has not the same advantages. His high office has kept him much in the south."

And, in the South, affairs were managed so differently. There was always something like public feeling there, and freer vent for its healthy ebullition. The paltry allusions to Mr Hume might as well have been omitted. If Sir Walter Scott was not interested "in keeping up the taxes," and that to a handsome amount, we know not who was. He wishes "he had anything else to do with them save to pay them;" but the system which so long gave him his nearly sinecure offices put it handsomely in his power to pay them.

Some months after the ruin of Sir Walter's affairs, Lady Scott, who had been for some time in precarious health, died at Abbotsford, while he was attending the Court in Edinburgh. He had neither been a very ardent lover, nor an anxious husband; but the affection of habit, the inevitable tenderness of a long intercourse, was powerful in his steadfast nature; and many of his little incidental notices about his wife, in her last illness, are, without affectation, exceedingly touching. Thus—"My servant cut my hair, which used to be poor Charlotte's personal task; I hope she won't observe it."—"May 6.—The same scene of hopeless (almost) and unavailing anxiety. Still welcoming me with a smile, and asserting she is better. . . . Still labouring at this review, without heart or spirits to finish it."

"Charlotte was unable to take leave of me, being in a sound sleep, after a very indifferent night. Perhaps it was as well. Emotion might have hurt her; and nothing I could have expressed would have been worth the risk. I have foreseen, for two years and more, that this momentous event could not be far distant. I have seen plainly, within the last two months, that recovery was hopeless. And yet, to part with the companion of twenty-nine years when so very ill—that I did not, could not foresee."

"Edinburgh—Mrs Brown's Lodgings, North St David Street—May 12.—I passed a pleasant day with kind J. B., [James Ballantyne,] which was a great relief from the black dog, which would have worried me at home. He was quite alone."

"Well, here I am in Arden. And I may say with Touchstone, 'When I was at home, I was in a better place;' I must, when there is occasion, draw to my own Baillie Nicol Jarvie's consolation—"One cannot carry the comforts of the Saut-Market about with one."

In three days he received intelligence of his wife's death, and returned to Abbotsford, where he found his daughter, Miss Anne Scott, worn out with suffering, watching, and grief. He says:—

"Abbotsford, May 16.—For myself, I scarce know how I feel—sometimes as firm as the Bass Rock, sometimes as weak as the water that breaks on it. I am as alert at thinking and deciding as I ever was in my life. Yet, when I contrast what this place now is, with what it has been not long since, I think my heart will break. Lonely, aged, deprived of my family—all but poor Anne; an impoverished, an embarrassed man, deprived of the sharer of my thoughts and counsels, who could always talk down my sense of the calamitous apprehensions which break the heart that must bear them alone. Even her foibles were of service to me, by giving me things to think of beyond my weary self-reflections."

There can be no doubt of the affection of a husband, when he has come to find his wife's foibles of service to him. His manly cure for sorrow was hard writing. He returned to Edinburgh, and grappled to the "Life of Napoleon," which was relieved, at intervals, by "The Chronicles of the Canongate." In the Journal there is certainly some writing for effect—something like the journals of Julia de Roubigne, and other heroines—but mingling with inimitable natural strokes, as this:—

"June 8.—A dog howled all night, and left me little sleep—poor cur! I dare say he had his distresses, as I have mine."

"April 24.—Constable is sorely broken down."

"Poor fool and knave, I have one part in my heart That's sorry yet for thee."

His conduct had not been what I deserved at his hand, but I believe that, walking blindfold himself, he misled me without malice prepense.

No. L.—VOL. V.

"July 14.—I have a secret pride—I fancy it will be so most truly termed—which impels me to mix with my mistresses strange snatches of mirth 'which have no mirth in them.'"

Here is another strain:—

"July 8.—Wrote a good task this morning. I may be mistaken; but I do think the tale of Elspat M'Tavish in my bettermost manner—but J. B. roars for chivalry. He does not quite understand that everything may be overdone in this world, or sufficiently estimate the necessity of novelty. The Highlanders have been off the field now for some time."

"July 28.—Read through and corrected 'Saint Ronan's Well.' I am no judge, but I think the language of this piece rather good. Then I must allow the fashionable portraits are not the true thing. I am too much out of the way."

"September 6.—I had a letter from Jem Ballantyne, plague on him! full of remonstrance deep and solemn, upon the carelessness of Buonaparte. The rogue is right, too. But, as to correcting my style, to the Jemmy jemmy linkum feedle tune of what is called fine writing, I'll be d—d if I do. Drew £12 in favour of Charles, for his Irish jaunt; same time exhorted him to make himself as expensive to Walter, in the way of eating and drinking, as he could."

He wished to go to London, to examine materials for the "Life of Napoleon," and, strange to say, was apprehensive of arrest, by certain bill-brokers, who, at last, graciously assured his trustees that he should not be molested for four or five weeks. His remark on this indulgence is a shrewd commentary on the barbarous principle of imprisonment for debt:—

"And so I am permitted to spend my money and my time, to improve the means of paying them their debts, for that is the only use of this journey. They are Jews; I suppose the devil baits for Jews with a pork griskin. Were I not to exert myself, I wonder where their money is to come from."

His journey extended to Paris, where he was received and caressed, and fêted as no Scotsman had been, since the ladies of Paris—philosophers at that time, as they now were romanticists—had flirted with David Hume and Gibbon. This journey did his spirits much good; and the racy humour of the Gurnal is no longer dashed with bursts of sorrow, or of desperate resolution.

In London, besides the cordial of meeting his daughter and her family, he saw the King, Wellington, Moore, and Rogers; Lawrence, and Croker, and Hook, and other lions; and, better still, Allan Cunningham, and his friend "Dan Terry." This article has already drawn out to such a length, and the domestic notices are so much more attractive than the morsels of wit, mirth, criticism, or adventure, that, skipping Paris—yea, La Belle France altogether—we take him up on his return to London.

"November 13.—Lockhart and I dined at an official person's, where there was a little too much of that sort of flippant wit, or rather smartness, which becomes the parochial Joe Miller of boards and offices. . . . Went to poor Lydia White's, and found her extended on a couch, frightfully awelled, unable to stir, rouged, jesting, and dying. She has a good heart, and is really a clever creature, but, unhappily, or rather happily, she has set up the whole staff of her rest in keeping literary society about her. The world has not neglected her. It is not always so bad as it is called. She can always make up her circle, and generally has some people of real talent and distinction. She is wealthy, to be sure, and gives petit dinners, but not in a style to carry the point a furor d'argent. In her case the world is good-natured, and, perhaps it is more frequently so than is generally supposed.

"November 14.—We breakfasted at honest Allan Cunningham's—honest Allan—a leal and true Scotsman of the old cast. A man of genius, besides, who only requires the tact of knowing when and where to stop, to attain the universal praise which ought to follow it. I look upon the alteration of 'It's hame and it's hame,' and 'A wet sheet and a flowing sea,' as among the best songs going. . . . Dined at Croker's, at Kensington, with his family, the Speaker, and the facetious Theodore Hook. We came away rather early, that Anne and I might visit Mrs Arbuthnot, to meet the Duke of Wellington. In all my life I never saw him better. He has a dozen of campaigns in his body—and tough ones. Anne was delighted with the frank manners of this unequalled pride of British war, and me he received with his usual kindness. He talked away about Buonaparte, Russia, and France.

"November 15.—I begin to tire of my gaieties; and the late hours and constant feasting disagree with me. I wish for a sheep's-head and whisky-toddy against all the French cookery and champagne in the world. Well, I suppose I might have been a Judge of Session by this time—attained, in short, the grand goal proposed to the ambition of a Scottish lawyer. It is better, however, as it is, while, at least, I can maintain my literary reputation."

On this visit, Scott engaged the interest of the King for his youngest son, whom he wished to become a diplomatist. He applied to Sir William Knighton, rightly considering a friend who had easy access by the back-stairs, more useful than one or more in the Cabinet. With the King's promise obtained for Charles, his name and person revived among all the "magnificoes and potent seigniors," his spirits high, and his Toryism confirmed, he returned to Scotland. Thus he leaves off:—

"November 20.—The Duke of York seems still mending, and spoke of state affairs as a High Tory. Were his health good, his spirit is as strong as ever. H. R. H. has a devout horror of the Liberals. Having the Duke of Wellington, the Chancellor, and (perhaps) a still greater person on his side, he might make a great fight when they split, as split they will. But Canning, Huskisson, and a mitigated party of Liberaux will probably beat them. Canning's wit and eloquence are almost invincible. But then the Church, justly alarmed for their property, which is plainly struck at, and the bulk of the landed interest, will scarce brook even a mild infusion of Whiggery into the Administration. Well, time will shew."

During the following Session of the Court, Sir Walter and his daughter occupied a furnished house in Walker Street. And there Mr Lockhart leaves him for the present, in nearly uninterrupted solitude, and giving his nights as well as mornings to his desk. We are not told how much of the Journal remains; but it is evident that, with this valuable volume, the interest of the "Life" is nearly exhausted, though six years were still to intervene before its melancholy close.

DECLINE OF THE DRAMA.

No person who gives the slightest attention to the progress of theatrical affairs, but must have noted the cry with which we are stunned at the commencement of every theatrical campaign, that the drama is about to be restored and rendered triumphant; and, at the close of the same, that the drama has sunk a step lower in degradation, while the names of one or more managers have appeared in the Gazette. Throughout the season, we learn, by the daily playbills, that the houses are nightly overflowing, and the pieces and performances produced, beyond precedent, successful; but, at the end, we are annually informed that, in spite of nine months' puffery and lying, the chief difficulty has been, not to close the doors of the over-crammed house, but to keep them open.

Articles in the newspapers and periodicals next appear, bewailing the fact, and attributing the fall of the drama to the rise of actors' salaries; being so far borne out in the assertion, that, since the public has insisted on a diminution of the price of entrance to the playhouses, the chief actors have trebled their demands, until performers who, in John Kemble's days, would have been requited with £10 a week, are receiving £20 per night. But what has this to do with the deficiency of theatrical attraction? It is the effect, and not the cause, of the disorganization of the dramatic world. The origin of the evil is to be sought for elsewhere.

The naked truth is, that England has outlived the epoch of dramatic infatuation. By referring to the pages of Cibber's Memoirs, Garrick's Life, and other chronicles of dramatic memorabilia, it will be perceived that the cry to which we allude, was raised so long ago as the reign of Charles II., and that at no subsequent moment has it been admitted by managers that theatricals were actually flourishing. They are fond of attributing their disasters to the modern decline of dramatic authorship. But what did the past century achieve for the drama? "Cato" and "Douglas," its only legitimate original tragedies, were neither more successful nor more meritorious than "Virginius" or "Ion;" while, as to comedy, Congreve, the first classic comic dramatist of his time, was driven from the stage by the public preference accorded to the rattletrap of Mrs Centlivre. At the period, in short, which we wilfully persist in describing as the golden age of theatricals, the managers were in perpetual apprehension of bankruptcy; actors were receiving half salaries; the public was entertained with feeble translations from Moliere, Racine, Corneille, and Voltaire, by Aaron Hill, Ambrose Phillips, and Colley Cibber—Shakespeare being out of fashion, and Massinger a dead letter. The complaints of Dryden concerning the degeneracy of the stage, the sneers of Pope and his contemporaries, the biting sarcasms of Horace Walpole, as recorded in their letters, prologues, and criticisms—may serve to convince the most obstinate, that, for the last 150 years, the stage has been pronounced, by the literary world, to be in a state of decadence.

As when a royal bulletin announces some illustrious patient to be daily "better," he is surely at the worst, we might almost infer, from these declarations of the insolvency of the theatres, that they are to end in a state of glorious prospects. But, instead of coming to such a conclusion, we deny the premises. Instead of declining and falling, we believe English theatricals to have been in a stationary state of average attraction for a century past. According to Monck Mason's theory, that a balloon elevated above the atmospheric currents may remain poised above, while the earth below performs its gyrations, we believe that the world has been progressing, and the drama standing still.

It is a mistake to describe the drama as an art of civilized life. It is the diversion of a people in process of civilization—and England has consequently outgrown its attractions. London in the time of Elizabeth, Paris in that of Louis XIV., New York in that of President Jackson, or any other capital enjoying the dawn or restoration of letters, eager for excitement, and deficient in the means and appliances of social enjoyment, afford vantage ground for the triumph of the dramatic art. Not so the London of railroad committees, clubs, and Nassau balloons, which has the power and will to choose its own time and place for being amused. The London of to-day lounges over its breakfast table in a patent reclining chair, or sips its claret or coffee of an evening in a gorgeous club, with its foot on a velvet stool, skimming the new works provided by the circulating library, and turning over the page, or changing the volume, when too wise or too rapid for its purpose. For those who delight in fiction, and who, a century ago, must have resorted to the theatres for the gratification of their taste, the historical novel supplies the place of tragedy; the fashionable novel, of comedy; and "Pickwick" and the periodicals, of farce. All these the idler can now enjoy, secure from the uneasy accommodations, foul air, and unsatisfactory neighbourhoods of a public theatre—without travelling through the Seven Dials after hurrying through an untimely dinner, or paying the costs of a seat to be made uncomfortable. Theatrical amusements form a tie and an incubance to a state of society whose private diversions are so varied, whose colloquial resources so increased, as that of modern London, when newspapers, magazines, reviews, annuals, the whole machinery of light literature, provide recreation for those picktooth hours which had formerly no alternative but the playhouse.

But it is not amusement only which we find promoted by the enormous diffusion of the press. The multiplication of newspapers and periodicals has generalized the study of politics. The rich and idle—nay, even the poor and occupied—busy themselves fifty times more than aforesaid with the study of state affairs. Politics distract our attention from romantic interests, or the drolleries of the stage. In these times, a mime must hit plaguy hard who means to be attended to. And what is the result? Exaggeration in the serious drama—buffoonery in the comic. Were Mossop, Barry, Wilks, and the popular comedians of that day to appear again on the stage, they would now be termed "respectable." Kean, the most successful player of our own, was a monstrous exaggeration—a man of unquestionable genius, who occasionally but whose acting was as untrue to nature as the majestic designs of Fuseli. His subtlety was too subtle; his passion too impassioned. The public felt this. On his first appearance in London, it was discerned, by the able men who presided at Drury Lane, that the new actor was rather beyond than below the standard of public appreciation; and two thousand pounds were accordingly expended by the committee in puffing him into favour. We appeal, in support of this assertion, to the accounts of Drury Lane treasury; we appeal, with equal powers of proof, to the late editor of the "leading journal of Europe."

"Snatched a grace beyond the reach of art ;"

From all that tradition has revealed to us, (and, unfortunately, the actor's is and must remain a traditional art,) we are convinced that there are performers now upon the stage, (we do not say actresses), equal in power to any who have figured there in former years. If rendered careless by the inattentiveness of a preoccupied public, or seduced into exaggeration by the coldness of an unexcitable one, we must blame the times we live in, but without looking forward to a favourable change. The next generation of spectators will be more preoccupied—less amusable. Libraries of Entertaining Knowledge will have been multiplied. There will be more Scotch novels—new Bozzes; and the lounge who visits Covent-Garden one night, will have railroaded his way to Munich on the morrow. There is no remedy for all this, but submission to a state of things dependent on the march of society. Heaven forbid that we should retrogress to the epoch when the unlettered cit was content to sit out his afternoon in the Globe, to see his Juliet in a lubberly boy, and to accept his impressions of the Capitol or the heath at Forres from the same dingy canvass.

Colley Cibber, be it observed, attributes the desertion of the theatres, at the commencement of the eighteenth century, to the late hours of the nobility and gentry, who were beginning to dine at four o'clock. We, of the middle of the nineteenth, have deferred the meal four hours later, and the same complaint is renewed. The fact is, that the hour of representation has kept pace with that of our convivial entertainments; and the auditors of Shakspeare's day had finished their second sleep, at the moment when the audiences of the Queen's Theatre are applauding the conclusion of the ballet. Even the frequenters of the winter theatres

"Hear the chimes at midnight,"

as they proceed homeward to their habitations. It is not the hour at which the great meal of the day is appointed which interferes with the playhouses. It is that dinner is now a brilliant and colloquial entertainment, instead of a mere satisfying of the appetite; and, when two or three intelligent men meet to dine together, previous to repairing to the theatre, not one of them but feels disappointed when the carriage is announced which is to convey them thither, and fix their attention upon the stage. They have survived the charm of dramatic illusion which entranced the senses of their barbarous forefathers. They know more and better of Rome and Greece, fervid Italy, or fashionable London, than is shewn them by the players. Nay, the daily business of life is more amusing, the hourly history of nations more astounding. The morning papers have probably afforded deeper excitement for their pity, terror, or mirth, than they are likely to find on a stage, where some familiar historical character is embodied by a vulgar fellow in red calico and rabbit skin, who drops his h's, and sports false calves. And the finest of Shakspeare's plays, though supported by a Garrick, a Kemble, a Kean, or a Macready, is not proof against such accessories as these.

In a new country, such as the England of yesterday or the America of to-day, such discrepancies pass unobserved; and the drama maintains its ascendancy. Look at the sums bestowed in the United States upon actors whom we repulse with contempt. Consult these very actors as to the nature of the audiences before whom they have enjoyed the opportunity of playing. Instead of the "rolling pit" of London, wherein each man is whispering to his neighbour, cracking nuts and drinking ginger-beer, every eye is fixed upon the stage—every ear is on the stretch to catch the words of the actor. Instead of the dispiriting influence exercised by our blasé private boxes—the inmates of which repair to the theatres to enjoy their flirtations or chit-chat, or pay their devoirs to some pretty actress—a wholesome sympathy subsists between the audience and the stage. Nor have the people of Baltimore or Cincinnati any experience in the pomps of courts, to deteriorate the tinsel of the property-man. No Lord Mayor's coach has outshone in their eyes the gilding of the car of Julius Cæsar. All is real to their unexhausted imaginations. The grand sentiments of the poet have not been worn down to commonplace in their ears. The dramatized legends and histories of England are as romantic to their conception as those of Rome, Greece, or Italy, to our own. Their sympathy is extensive in proportion as their experience is circumscribed; their imagination warm in proportion as their physical nature is cold. Consult the vivid sketch of a dramatic representation on the South Western frontier, contained in Tyrone Power's "Impressions of America," and compare the impressionable public he describes, with the chattering side-boxes of Bath or Brighton, or the yawning public of the winter theatres!

Admitting all this, however, the interests of dramatic literature in this country are to be cared for, and amusement is to be provided for the play-going public. For, though far more limited than theatrical speculators choose to admit, such a public really exists. A certain sum is annually apportioned out of its income by the London public, as amusement money; and it is only surprising how little its amount is increased or diminished by the amount of attraction provided. The vogue of one theatre serves only to empty the others, not to increase the expenditure of society; and it is only by concentration that there is any possibility of forming theatrical establishments likely to prosper, and consequently to uphold themselves in the respect of the public. The little private speculations, set up in this or that neighbourhood, in order to turn to account the popularity of this or that actor or actress, too self-sufficient to submit to the dictation of managers, form the ruin of the grand national establishments. It is absurd to assert that these pet playhouses are sanctioned only because certain localities demand a specific class of theatrical entertainment. Do the purlieus of Wych Street, for instance, exclusively require the light, elegant, superficial vaudevilles of the Olympic Theatre, copied from the pieces called into existence by the gilded trifling of the Parisian Gymnase? Certainly not! The insight of Madame Vestris into the tastes and frivolities of the fashionable world, enabled her to make a better market for her talents, by catering independently for its pleasures; and the best actors were accordingly bought off from the winter theatres, to assist in her lucrative speculation, and further the deterioration of the drama.

We conscientiously believe, after devoting years of consideration and examination to the interests of the drama, that (exclusive of suburban playhouses) London can only maintain two permanent theatres; one devoted by patent to the representation of tragedy, comedy, and farce; the other, to operas, melo-dramas, ballets, and pieces of pageant and parade.

We would have these houses midway in size between the present patent theatres and English Opera-house, the stage retaining its present depth and bearing. We would have them engage permanent companies, and remain open all the year round, like those of Paris. We would have half-price abolished, except in the pit and dress-boxes. We would have a basement circle formed into private boxes; but the whole dress and second circles left open to the public. The theatre apportioned to the representation of the legitimate drama, would comprehend the whole really drama-loving public, and employ the elite of the existing London companies, to the great advantage of the country theatres, which we now gratuitously strip of their second and third-rate actors, to make our various complements complete. Allowing for the defalcations annually produced by the engagement of first-rate performers in America, we have never more than enough to form a single full and efficient metropolitan company; but were such a company organized, and maintained in the degree of subordination spontaneously arising from the knowledge that they have no outlets for their vanity and ill-humour, the best dramatists of the day—Knowles, Sheil, Proctor, Mitford, Talfourd, Jerrold, Morton, Poole, Flaëchie—would devote their talents to its support; and the best writers in other departments of fiction hasten to become dramatists.

For the second or operatic theatre, the native talent of the country would afford a sufficient vocal company; and operas might be produced, diversified by exhibitions of pageantry and scenic effect, such as the unaided imagination cannot attain. This department of scenic exhibition is still far from exhausted. Scenery and decorations—effects of grouping, and light and shade—the picturesque in its interminable variety of aspects, if adopted in enhancement of well got-up operas and ballets, would prove an irresistible attraction.

Some advance towards these improvements has been already made. Though the strength of the metropolitan dramatic company is split and broken by half-a-dozen enterprising minor theatres, the two patents are now ranged under the banners of the individuals best calculated to do them justice—Macready for the legitimate drama; Bunn for the illegitimate. The only thing we have to regret, is—the unwillingness of each to confine himself to a specific object; and the consequence is, that each has entailed on himself the expense of a threefold company. Bunn, who is unequalled in the art of getting up a pageant, and who improves his taste in such matters by constant excursions to Paris, ought not to have meddled with tragedy and comedy; while Macready, who is great in marshalling the heavy forces of the five-act-dramas, ought to have known better than hazard the additional expense of opera. Each will fail in attempting to rival the other on his own ground; and Macready's operas and Bunn's tragedies will afford grounds for criticism, spleen, and disparagement, discrediting both undertakings. Let us trust that, on this point at least, we may prove mistaken. We heartily wish success to these managers, for their sakes, and our own; believing that the present moment is more than commonly auspicious to the regeneration of the drama. The formation of the Dramatic Authors' Society has done much for the protection of writers for the stage; the appointment of Charles Kemble as deputy licenser, has given them a new pledge of security; and the Lord Chamberlain now in office, is known to be favourably disposed towards the interests of the national theatres. The young Queen, moreover, who is fond of theatrical entertainments, has expressed an intention to bestow her patronage on the winter theatres; at each of which she has engaged a box. We shall see. If the opening of 1838 does nothing for the drama, the Duke of Bedford and the renters have no alternative but to turn the winter houses into porter breweries; leaving the sons of Thespis to make their way through the world in their original vehicle; and the pages of Shakspeare, Massinger, Otway, Congreve, Farquhar, and Sheridan to become classed with the dead languages.

WHITE'S VIEWS AND TOURS AMONG THE HIMALAYA.*

In noticing this splendid volume, one is at a loss whether to give predominance to the engravings or the illustrative descriptions. It is only because we are on a ground nearly untrodden by travellers by the fire-side, that we give preference to the latter, and first advert to the magnificent region to which the Views refer. To a certain extent, it may happen of mountains as of birds, of which it is proverbially said, "Far away fowls have feathers fair;" yet we are compelled to believe that the Himalaya range, while it greatly exceeds the Pyrenees, the mountains of Norway, the Swiss Alps, and even the Andes, in altitude, equals them in grandeur of scenery. Travellers who have seen both, yield the palm to this chain, which divides the plains of Hindostan from those of Thibet, and in which the Ganges and the Jumna, and many smaller rivers have their rise. These, however, are but isolated features of this sublime barrier of our eastern empire.

Since the termination of the Goorka war in 1815, this interesting scenery has been opened to English travellers, who, until then, knew comparatively little of the Himalaya, and who have not yet been able to penetrate the regions of perpetual snow. Some of these mountains rise to the immense height of 27,000 feet above the level of the sea; and from 18,000 to 20,000 feet appears a common altitude. The passes which European travellers have already explored, as those of Shastool and Rol, are from 15,000 to 16,000 feet above the level of the sea; and, therefore, higher than the summit of Mont Blanc. The Shastool pass is flanked by an inaccessible icy peak, 2,000 feet higher than itself.

There is very little level ground to be found in these mountainous districts, though cultivation is attempted upon the southward slopes, at the incredible height of 10,000 feet, and in some places even higher. There the crops are out before they are ripe. Few human habitations are found above 9,500 in height, and at 11,800 the forest ceases, though dwarf birches and bushes creep up to 13,000. Pasture ranges seem to ascend to 14,000 feet. On the northern sides of some of the valleys, having, of course, a southern exposure, both dwellings and fields are found somewhat higher, and furze bushes are found at the immense height of 17,000 feet above the level of the sea. Since the Goorkas, a brave and hardy race of mountaineers, were finally subdued by Sir David Ochterlony, they have been taken under the protection of the British government, and now occupy military stations in the hills, proving faithful mercenaries to their conquerors, who depend upon them alone for maintaining the peace of the country. The conquered districts are now visited every year by the English, whose summer journeys to the hills, or the inferior range of the Himalaya, form delightful episodes in the lives of the sweltering European residents of the plains. They seek at once health in a bracing climate, and pleasure in contemplating the most sublime and picturesque scenery in the world. The number of visitors in search of health, change of air and amusement, and of scientific travellers and sportsmen, increases every year. Their journeys have been facilitated by the formation of an excellent road, and there are now several hill-stations, in which the residents in the plains have villas, to which they repair during the hot seasons. The description given of these new mountain retreats, remind us of the watering-places in the Pyrenees. Mussooree, one of the principal hill-settlements, and a great resort of visitors from the plains, is 7,500 feet above the level of the sea. The neighbourhood commands the most extensive and splendid views of the rich plains of Hindostan, with the Ganges and Jumna winding through them, for forty miles, out of the 1,200 miles of their prolonged course.

The private journals of many of the late Himalaya tourists, and of the enterprising explorers of the mountain fastnesses, far beyond the hill settlements, have been placed at the disposal of Miss Roberts in compiling interesting illustrations of the views; and her valuable descriptions contain much original information concerning the Alpine regions of the East, their scenery, inhabitants, and natural productions, and the manners of the Indian Highlanders. How much of this comes direct from the pen of Lieutenant White we are at a loss to know. To the spirit and fidelity of his pencil we have heard testimony borne by those who have visited the scenes depicted. His original sketches are retouched—or embellished, shall we say?—by Turner, Stanfield, Harvey, and other eminent artists; and the engraving alone, of twenty-nine views, has cost, it is stated, £2,400. This may give one an idea of the scale of the undertaking. They are beautifully executed, and the work, in every department, is finished in that style which reflects so much honour upon our modern enterprising publishers, and indirectly upon the country to which they belong. There are no truer indications of the rapid progress of high civilization than those splendid specimens of the diffusive productions of art, which now adorn the tables of persons of refined taste even in the middle ranks of life, and which, like this elegant volume, become enhanced in value from being purchasable by that most important class of society.

The vignette, by Lieut. White, possesses a purely Oriental character. It represents the encampment of the chief of Lahore, Runjeet Singh, on the banks of the Sutlej, the Hyphasis of Alexander the Great, and the boundary of his eastern conquests. It was here that Lord William Bentinck, during a truce, met the great chief and conqueror. The scene of the plate, and another, is thus described;—"Roopur is beautifully situated among the lower skirts of the Himalaya, where the Sutlej first enters the plains; and the splendid encampment shewed to great advantage, amid the low ranges of hills and woody valleys of the landscape. Runjeet Singh's army occupied the right bank, and probably equalled in magnificence any display ever made by the gorgeous satraps of the East. The spot chosen for the temporary palace of the chieftain exhibited, to great advantage, the peculiar ingenuity of native talent, which is never so favourably occupied as in the conversion of some desert waste into a scene which looks like the work of the fabled genii of the soil. A space, about eight acres of land, had been marked out, and the interstices, between the intended erections, were sowed with a quick-growing herb, and kept constantly watered, so that the pavilions and tents appeared to be surrounded by parterres of the brightest green. Nothing could equal the splendour of these tents, which gleamed with the richest draperies of crimson, purple, scarlet, and gold, supported on gilt pillars, and having awnings, embroidered, and fringed, and tasselled in the most costly manner. Each thing was in the same style, and the river, running in front, reflected the whole of this barbaric pomp upon its polished surface. Above a ledge of rock, the highly gorgeous scene was crowned by a pavilion, formed of panels of wood plated with silver, and all around were splendid groups of caparisoned elephants, war-horses, and camels. In the distance, the Maha-raja's army occupied picturesque positions among the hills, which opened to a view of the snowy range bounding the view. The British camp, on the other side of the river, looked poor in comparison with the barbaric magnificence of the Chief of Lahore and his train. Among the other appendages, were 200 camels, each decorated with housings of crimson and gold, and carrying a swivel, and his principal officers, sumptuously arrayed, and mounted upon elephants." This splendid warlike pageant is well described; yet we turn with pleasure from it to the solitary tours in the Himalaya, which occupy so much of the work. The frontispiece to the "Views in India" is the Rocks at Colgong on the Ganges, a scene of exquisite loveliness. These rocks are esteemed holy by the Hindoos; and a fakier is occasionally found there, and a few religious mendicants. These beautiful crags are luxuriantly garlanded with creepers, and are the haunts of numerous birds. Pigeons nestle in the trees; and, on the smallest alarm, myriads of waterfowl rush out in snowy flocks. The view is exquisite. Over these translucent waters, Turner displays as much mastery as in the fields of sunny air. But these subjects, and the magnificent Oriental shews of Runjeet-Singh, possess less distinctive and original character than the Views as we approach the Himalaya. The first of these is The Ganges entering the plains near Hurdwar, at a hundred and fifty miles from its sacred birth-place in the bosom of the mountains, and where it has still to flow on, for twelve hundred more, before it reach the sea. A view of part of the

Ghent, at the holy city of Hurdwar, introduces a lengthened and animated description of the celebrated fairs of that place—a striking feature in native Indian life, and one strongly marking a particular stage in civilization. These fairs—or convocations for traffic, for religious and secular purposes, as well as for amusement—have, however, been described by former writers, and this volume contains much fresh matter. Hurdwar is almost at the portal of the Himalaya chain, and of the new settlements frequented by the British; and from it we shall start with a travelling party. Upon leaving Hurdwar, they ascended the valley of the Dhooon to the village of Rajpore. Part of the way led through a thick forest of lofty trees, among which the rhododendron, here a tall tree, was seen covered with its rich crimson flowers. The cultivated flowers of English gardens, and nearly all the European fruits, are found wild and abundant in the Himalaya. In the Dhooon, the turf is adorned with the amaranth and the ranunculus, in variety. The ascent from Rajpore to the town of Deyrah, the station of the Goorka battalion of hill-rangers, is so gradual as scarcely to be perceptible; but thence it becomes so steep that hill-ponies are used, a rough but sure-footed species of small horses, well adapted to the country. The road now leads up the side of precipices of the most romantic character—craggy with rocks, and richly clothed with trees, descending to the bottom of deep and almost unfathomable ravines. From the summit of this ridge, a glorious burst of view is obtained over the plains; but the mountain-scenery, as seen from all the hill settlements, is yet more striking. These villages themselves are romantic or picturesque in a high degree. At Simlah, the most fashionable of them, the scattered dwellings have been compared to gulls' nests, perched on the side of a cliff. There is no table-land, the level places being chiefly cut out of the rock; and there is scarcely a road or enclosed piece of ground round any dwelling. The roads scooped out of the sides of the precipices look fearful to strangers; yet ladies soon learn to gallop along them without apprehension. The pear, the cherry, and barberry, abound in this neighbourhood; but while the beautiful rhododendron clothes the southward slopes, the northern sides of the hills show only the gloomy pine, and a stunted and withered vegetation.

The hill-settlements already possess all the necessaries and the western luxuries of life known in the plains. Though delightful as summer residences, they can never become permanent abodes to the English, from the severe and tempestuous weather which prevails in the mountains for a great part of the year. A dwelling at Mussooree, termed the Abbey, commands, from its elevated and isolated position, the noblest prospects; but, in the rainy season, is scarcely habitable, and completely enveloped in mists. The entrance of fog into a house is sufficiently disagreeable; but in those altitudes, the clouds take the same liberty; and suddenly, if sitting in an apartment with the door or window open, the inmates may find themselves drenched through. Terrific storms often rage below the sublime or dizzy peak, upon which the European may have fixed his dwelling; while, as frequently, thunder and lightning, a snow-storm and a hurricane, assail it all at once. The loss of animal and of human life is often sustained in these terrific tempests.

Sunrise is described by nearly all the tourists as being attended with extraordinary splendour in these alpine regions, when the mountain brows and the snowy peaks are tinted with hues of gold, or glowing in rosy light; and the settlement of Mussooree must be exceedingly picturesque at night, with the lights twinkling from the numerous scattered dwellings, so fancifully placed on heights, and the gleaming fires which the native servants always kindle on the ground, marking the site of each homestead. Our tourists tired at length of Mussooree, and determined to penetrate into the snowy ranges; and, indeed, all adventurous persons residing at the hill-stations for a season, make the attempt of going farther into the mountain wilds. The tourists, consisting of three gentlemen, with the host of native servants and coolies which attend all Indian expeditions, mustered to the number of eighty persons, equipped with everything required in this difficult and even perilous journey; for they contemplated nothing less than reaching the source of the Jumna. The first view taken upon the ascent, is of The snowy range from Tyne or Marma. We leave the reader to judge if the scene is not wildly sublime. The place stands at an elevation of ten thousand feet.

The foreground was composed of a rich ridge, covered with timber, the growth of ages; and, contrasting by its dark foliage with the bare eminences, which, rising in all directions, appeared as if the tumultuous waves of a stormy ocean had suddenly been converted into earth; while the forest, standing forth in the midst, looked like a peninsula, stretching far into the billows. Beyond this wild and confused sea, arose, in calmer majesty, those towering piles of unchanging snow, which, from whatever point they may be viewed, can never fail to inspire sentiments of awe and admiration. The higher cluster of white peaks, near the centre, are those of Banderpooch, above Jumnotree, the source of the Jumna. To the right are the Rudra, Himala, near Gongootree, whence springs the Ganges; and, still farther to the east, the loftiest of the peaks, the Dwawalagiri, may sometimes be discovered, although at the distance of two hundred and fifty miles, rearing its snowy coronet, and looking down at the height of 27,000 feet, upon the pigmy world below; while, far to the east and west, extend the hoary tributaries of the giant, until their snowy summits melt into air, and are lost to the straining sight.

Several enterprising explorers have made their way to the more northward of these hills; but their peaks remain, and probably ever must, untrodden by human feet. This snowy ridge divides India from the plains of Thibet and Chinese Tartary; and, at the narrowest part, is penetrated, by tedious and troublesome journeys, through long tracks of rock and snow. The descent upon the other side to Thibet is comparatively easy, as Thibet stands at an elevation of 15,000 feet above the level of the sea.

The journal of the tourists, in this wild and almost untrodden region, is exceedingly interesting, both from the savage grandeur of the magnificent scenery, and their personal adventures. One day's march may serve us as a specimen of many :—

The first part conducted us through a narrow gorge, walled on either side by fantastic rocks, and crowded with fine alders, the stream rolling beneath our feet; while the path was overhung by dreadful precipices, toppling crags, now and then threatening to follow some of the huge fragments which had already fallen; then the scene widened a little, and a natural terrace, shaded by some splendid mulberry trees, offered rest and repose; the rocks scattering themselves around, traversed, at one place, by a foaming cataract. Ascending a steep and rugged eminence, we toiled on our weary way up rock and crag, until we came to another halting-place of table-land, adorned with fine chestnut-trees, and commanding an extensive view, backed by the snowy ranges; while we looked down upon a splendid confusion of waterfalls, wild precipices, and luxuriant forests. The air was delightfully cool and bracing; and, it may be supposed, we enjoyed the meal that awaited us in this glorious resting-place. In addition to the articles of foreign luxury which we had brought with us, we regaled ourselves with mountain mutton, a hill-pheasant, some of the delicious honey for which the place is famed, and peaches of no despicable size and flavour. Our appetites, sharpened by exercise and the invigorating breeze, enabled us to do full justice to the meal; while we were at no loss for subjects of conversation—the surrounding country being sufficient to inspire the most prosaic mind with poetical ideas.

The absence of lakes, or any large bodies of water in these mountains, is regretted by travellers, as the one thing wanting to complete the beauty of the scenery; but the rolling mists often seen below, as in all mountainous regions, take the form of lakes and seas, and cheat the tourist with an agreeable illusion. The Himalayas are rich in vegetable productions. Nearly all the cultivated fruits of Europe grow spontaneously, and the ground is carpeted with strawberries. Flocks of wild sheep are seen; and deer, and a great variety of game, abound; so that these regions afford the exiles of Great Britain their favourite sports. The musk-deer and the hawk are regarded as a sort of royal game—the property of the state, or of the chieftains of the district; but these are the only rights of forestry which appear to exist in India. Musk-bags bear a high value in the hills and plains; and the drug would seem to be greatly adulterated before it reaches Europe.

The native mode of hunting the musk-deer, reminds us of the ancient royal huntings in Scotland, so often described; and of the chamois hunts in the Pyrenees. When a musk-deer is espied, the whole population of the neighbouring villages turn out—the information being spread through the hills with extraordinary celerity. The country being up, a cordon is formed round the destined victim, and he seldom fails to be hemmed in; pelted with stones from the surrounding cliffs, on which the natives are perched like eagles, wounded, scared, and finally surrounded and taken. Ten pounds is sometimes paid for a Hye hawk, taken in the mountains, and carried down to the plains for sale, for the purpose of being trained for the chivalrous sport of hawking. This is a favourite amusement with Ranjeet-Singh and his train. The Himalaya are inhabited, as we have said, to a great height; and the castles of the petty native chiefs, and the scattered hamlets, perched upon some cliff, often form a picturesque feature of the scene. The natives are a harmless race, contented with their few enjoyments, and knowing nothing better. They are easily managed by kindness, but occasionally restive under the scornful treatment of their new European employers. The women, since they have conquered their first fears of the white strangers, have been found particularly obliging to travellers, and as hospitable as their slender means permit. "In passing through a village," says the tourist, "the women will frequently bring out, unasked, milk and fruits for the refreshment of the travellers; and although, according to the custom of all semi-barbarous countries, they are looked upon with great contempt by the other sex, we found them generally more intelligent, as well as more communicative, than the men; and they are certainly quite as industrious." Female degradation is so horrible in one respect, that we would fain hope that the travellers may have been misinformed as to the tenure of Himalaya marriages. A love of flowers seemed to be the most elegant taste manifested by the mountaineers, who are quite insensible to the grandeur and beauty of the scenery which attracts strangers to their country. All tourists appear to be enchanted with the changeful and beautiful skies, and remarkable atmospheric effects seen in the Himalaya, particularly at dawn.

The following random extracts may serve as a specimen of the sylvan delight experienced by the Himalaya tourist and sportsman—for sport seems to have been generally conjoined with the other objects of these excursions :—

We met with some delightful halting-places on the line of march—grassy terraces, carpeted with strawberry and wild flowers, where the cowslip, the primrose, and the butter-cup, brought the pranked-out fields of our native country strongly to the mind. Many of the travellers in the Himalayas are moved even to rapture at the sight of the first daisy which springs spontaneously in their path. As an exotic in some gardens of the plains, it excites deep emotion; but growing wild, spangling the meadow-grass with its silvery stars, it becomes infinitely more interesting, and the home-sick, pining exile will often gather its earliest-encountered blossoms, weeping. Leaving this luxuriant vegetation, we arrived at a wild spot, the summit of a ridge of peaks, covered with snow; and though the prospect was more circumscribed and of greater sameness, we enjoyed it amazingly. We seemed to be hemmed in on all sides by thick ribbed ice, transported to antarctic snows, imprisoned amid ice-bergs, ever-freezing and impassable. Presently, however, we emerged, and, descending through the snow, reached the boundary line between the districts of the Jumna and the Ganges. The extreme limits of these river territories, are marked in the manner usually employed in rude and desolate places, by heaps of stone—many raised by Europeans, who thus commemorate their pilgrimages.

Those cairns are all nameless. The next point of great interest in this excursion, is the summit of a ridge, whence the first view of the Ganges is obtained; a sight that never fails to raise the drooping spirits of the Hindoo followers; and which generally excites no small degree of enthusiasm in the breast of the Christian travellers. This holy place is very difficult of approach. It lies in a deep glen, and considerable distances, covered with loose flinty stones, must be traversed at no small peril. Sometimes the face of the rock must be climbed from cliff to cliff, which offered no resting-place for foot or hand, and one scaled by ladders. These difficulties surmounted, behold our travellers near the desired goal.

The grandeur of the scene which opened upon us as we at length stood upon the threshold of Gungootree, cannot be described by words. Rocks were piled upon rocks in awful majesty, all shivered into points, which rise one upon another, in splendid confusion, enclosing a glen of the wildest nature, where the Ganges, beautiful in every haunt, from its infancy to its final junction with the ocean, pours its shallow waters over a bed of shingle, diversified by jutting rocks, and even here shadowed by the splendid foliage of some fine old trees. The devotee, who undoubtedly believes that every step that he takes towards the source of that holy river, which from his infancy he has been taught to look upon as a deity, will lead him into brattitude, is content to seek its origin at Gungootree; but the true source of the sacred stream lies still higher, in still more inaccessible solitudes; and it was reserved for the ardour of those who measured the altitudes of the highest peaks, and penetrated to the utmost limits of man's dominion, to trace the exact birth-place of the holy river. Captains Hodgson and Herbert in 1818, found, at the height of thirteen thousand eight hundred feet above the sea-level, the Bhagarati, or true Ganges, issuing from beneath a low arch, at the base of a vast mass of frozen snow, nearly three hundred feet in height, and composed of different layers, each several feet in thickness, and, in all probability, the accumulation of ages. Neither here nor at Gungootree, is there anything resembling a cow's mouth to support the popular fable.

A pilgrimage to Gungootree is, to the Hindoo, like one to Mecca, performed by the Mahomedan. In commemoration of an act of piety, which comparatively few have the good fortune to perform, a Goorka chief has here erected a small pagoda, in honour of the goddess, on a platform of rock twenty feet above the bed of the river. A few Brahmins live in the vicinity of this temple, to whom the pilgrims make their oblations. Europeans, though not reaping the benefit of the prayers and ceremonies, also pay voluntary toll to the priests of the goddess. Holy water is carried from this place to all parts of India, and is highly prized by Hindoo devotees, and pious frauds are often practised in this traffic, though the portion of water borne away, is carefully sealed up by the presiding Brahmins.

European tourists seem to enjoy these excursions even more than the devout pilgrims. They travel with those appliances and means which leave just as much of danger and hardship as may give zest to their rambling forest life. Their Mahomedan attendants are intelligent and zealous, and an exception to the nearly universal adage about the quarter from whence cooks are sent. No sooner do the party reach the encamping ground pitched upon for the time, than the servants set to work, while the masters use their guns, sketch, or enjoy the scenery. A fire is kindled in a hole in the earth; and if there be no charcoal for roasting their jungle-birds, or mountain mutton, as it may be, they are delicately braised. Spices and materials for a fry are carried along with the party; and whenever eggs can be found, forth comes an omelette. Rain is the greatest drawback upon this sylvan life; it falls in torrents, and for successive days, besides the regular season of rain in July and August. Nor are falls of snow unfrequent at seasons when they are not naturally looked for. To servants from the plain, snow is a marvel and a horror.

Our attention has been riveted upon the descriptive parts of the work; but we must not forget to apprise the reader that this is not considered its strength. It is a book of Views of a fresh and lovely world, remote from our European imagination—the sublime and luxuriant highlands of a tropical country. One or two of the engravings were noticed above; but we shall not attempt to describe them, which is the office of the tours we have been quoting, much less to criticise. They must be seen, to be understood or felt. Those we leave unnoticed are full of character. Those mountain passes, and dreary and forlorn primeval solitudes—those dizzying aerial bridges, spanning chasms and ravines—the animals of the Himalaya, and its peculiar vegetable productions—are all silent historians of this novel region. Sometimes we have an alpine hamlet, with its rude primitive temple, and groups of native inhabitants; and special justice has been done to the new hill settlements, which are all charmingly picturesque; native pictures mingling finely with those adjuncts of European civilization which the English raise amidst them, as if by magic. Their incursions, the money they scatter, and their usages, may be expected to have a happy, if not a rapid effect among the natives, who are not so strongly fettered by caste as the Hindoos of the plains.

The enlightened benevolence which Miss Roberts displayed in her former work on India does not slumber here. Her reflections upon the sort of influence which the white strangers ought to seek over those "black fellows" whom they are too apt to despise, or forget altogether, save as carriers and serfs—are worthy of the profound consideration of young Anglo-Indians. We could expatiate upon the fool-hardy, undisguised contempt with which the prejudices of the natives, and their most sacred opinions, are too often treated by thoughtless, arrogant young men; but this is not the place; and, moreover, a better and wiser feeling is arising. Let us, therefore, close the book in good-humour. It is one which must be particularly prized by Anglo-Indians and their connexions, and one which adds another splendid trophy to the treasures of diffusive art. Paintings are like the rare illuminated manuscripts of the middle ages, which few could possess; engravings come to us like the same manuscripts having undergone the magic transformation of the printing-press, and ready to fly abroad, carrying enlightenment and blessing over the whole earth. THE AFFAIR OF THE VIXEN.—CIRCASSIA AND ENGLAND.

"THE affair of the Vixen," as it has been popularly termed, being about to occupy the attention of Parliament, (Mr M'Lean having, we perceive, given notice of a motion upon the subject for the early part of the present month,) we are induced to lay before our readers some facts, derived from peculiar and authentic sources, that will probably tend to throw a little light upon this hitherto mysterious transaction. But it will be necessary, in order to supply something like causality for the singular incidents which we are about to narrate, to premise, that, for several years, appeals have been very industriously made to the pugnacious qualities of John Bull, with the design, which appeared at one time upon the point of being realized, of inciting him to a hostile movement against a certain northern power, more distinguished by the magnitude of its territory, than its wealth, commerce, population, or the other characteristics of a civilized nation. The motives by which we have been invited to make war upon Russia, are as various as the parties by whom they have been urged: One day we have been called upon to defend the Turks; the next to protect the Persians; then to guard the East Indies; and, lastly, to maintain the independence of the Circassians. Our eastern coast has been menaced with a descent from a Muscovite fleet: our commerce has been declared to be in danger from the same quarter; and the balance of power in Europe has been pronounced to be destroyed by the power of Russia! All these reasons for entering upon a war with a country which possesses less attraction than any other for an aggressor, and which once proved itself so inhospitable to an invading army, have been urged by a very heterogeneous party of agitators, the majority of whom are enthusiasts, the honest dupes of their fears; but also comprising in their ranks, political adventurers, speculating pamphleteers, trading journalists, the aristocracy of Poland, adventurous diplomatists, with a numerous band of followers, including monomaniacs of Tory, Whig, and Radical politics. If so much agitation has failed of its object, it is not, we fear, owing to any indisposition on the part of our aristocratic rulers, or even of a rather numerous portion of the rash and unthinking People, to enter upon a fresh career of bloodshed, but from the financial impossibility of the step. The debt—and every Christian may, in return for such a service, exclaim, with Cobbet, "the blessed debt!"—interposed between the nation, and the manifold evils and miseries of a war. There was, however, another obstacle in the way of the attempts to embroil our foreign affairs, in the circumstance of the public attention having been more intensely directed to domestic politics—especially during great part of the last year—which produced great apathy upon the subject of our external policy. It was with a view to rouse the country from this supineness, and to precipitate the long desired catastrophe, that the affair of the Vixen was planned. It was got up in Constantinople: but, before we introduce our readers to the dramatis personæ, it may be as well to describe the scene where the tragedy was, after due preparation, to have been performed.

Circassia, or Abassia, as the country is, in most of the foreign maps, called, is situated at the eastern and remotest extremity of the Black Sea, and comprises a length of about one hundred and forty miles of the coast, with a depth, towards the interior, of from forty to fifty miles; forming a slope from the Caucasian range, cut up into a very irregular surface of hills and valleys, by the spurs of that vast mountain ridge. The population, which has been guessed to amount to about 200,000 souls, is divided into clans, governed by innumerable chiefs; family being often subjected to no other authority than its patriarchal head. Besides the Circassians, these mountainous regions, which, by the ancients, went under the appropriate name of inhospitable Caucasus, afford shelter to the Kabardians, Tchetchenes, Lezhis, Ossetes, and other tribes, whose names are less familiar to our ears, and whose countries are much less known to the traveller, than those of the Cherokees, the Pottawotam's and the Seminoles; and, like those savages of North America, these wild tribes of Asia exist in a state of nature, dwelling in caves or rude wig-wams, and subsisting upon the produce of the chase, or the millet raised by the labour of their women—war being the only trade or profession known to the men. Those tribes nearest the sea-coast have generally adopted the use of fire-arms; but the inhabitants of the interior still use, in their incessant conflicts with each other, and in their predatory descents upon the more peaceable natives of the plains, no better weapons than the bow and arrow. The religion of these mountaineers partakes of the character of their successive masters. Having been partially subdued by the Byzantines, the Christian faith was planted amongst them; but, when the Eastern empire fell beneath the arms of the Turks, and the Circassians became nominally subjects of the Porte, Mahomedanism supplanted the religion of the Cross. But, although the Musselman creed and habits generally prevail, still the religious and social character of the people is of the most barbarous and degraded order. Recent travellers describe them to be in the practice of gross idolatry, and some of the tribes scarcely exhibit traces of either Christianity or Mahomedanism in their religion.

By the 4th article of the treaty of Adrianople, the country just described, extending along the coast of the Black Sea, from the mouth of the river Kuban to the harbour of St Nicholas, came in 1829 under the dominion of Russia. Notice was formally given to the different powers of Europe, in 1831, by the Russian Government, that custom-house and quarantine establishments had been established in the harbours of Anapa and Redout-Kalé, which places were declared open to the regular trade of the world; whilst all intercourse with the other ports, bays, and harbours, upon the coast of Circassia, in which there were no custom-houses or quarantine establishments, was interdicted. The British Government, however, from some cause, to be sought for in the mysteries of diplomacy, abstained from making this communication officially public through the Gazette. From this, it would appear, that, although Turkey had formally ceded possession of that territory to her successful enemy at the close of a disastrous war, and notwithstanding that the forts on the coast built and named by the Turks, and being the only works of civilized art in the country, had been surrendered up to Russian garrisons, still the Court of St James demurred to the right of Russia to occupy the coast of Circassia. No resistance was, however, offered to the actual possession of the territory; and, from the circumstance that no intercourse existed between this country and the disputed district—for no British vessel had ever left our shores, or was likely to do so, to traffic with the barbarous and fierce tribes of the Caucasus—no inconvenience was felt, either by our navigators, or Russian interests, during the five following years that the question lay in abeyance. The Russian Government, however, reiterated its formal notification of the above-named regulations, affecting the trade with the coast of Circassia, by an official communication, dated 13th September 1836, addressed to our ambassador at Constantinople, with a request that it might be communicated, through our consul there, to all masters of British vessels who might apply for firmans to pass through the Bosphorus into the Black Sea. This second communication—which, although it became a matter of notoriety to our merchants at Constantinople, was never formally announced to them through the consulate—originated in the transactions which we are now going to narrate.

As we before hinted, the public mind in England having begun to tire of the rather highly-seasoned appeals that had been made to it, for several years, in behalf of Turkish interests, and something like reaction having manifested itself, particularly from the trading and manufacturing bodies, who had declared in favour of peace and non-intervention, and against the principle of armed protection of commerce; the leading parties to the agitation upon the Russo-Turkish question—those who inflamed the public press, influenced public speakers, and, in fine, gave to the whole machinery of agitation, a moving power, and who were now to be found at Constantinople—finding that appeals from the pen and tongue had begun to lose some of their efficacy, determined to resort to other and more warlike weapons. The unacknowledged possession of the coast of Circassia would, it was thought, if cleverly handled, furnish good materials for a quarrel. The half-subdued inhabitants of the Caucasus were in revolt against the authority of Russia, whose troops were fighting under manifold disadvantages, at the moment when, in the autumn of 1836, the secret was suffered to transpire in Constantinople; and the rumour did not want its hundred tongues, in that region of gossip and intrigue, the diplomatic circles of Pera—that some ships were about to be sent from England, freighted with munitions of war, for the Circassians. More than one of the newspaper correspondents* at the Turkish capital were parties to the proceedings; and we find, accordingly, in the Morning Chronicle of October 1836, a letter, dated Constantinople, October 5, in which the writer says—"I have positive information that two ships, laden with arms and ammunition, are now on their way for the Circassian coast. The Russian ambassador has got word of this, and has made a second formal notification of the blockade of the coast of Abasia and Mingrelia; which it alleges to have been established for the purpose of quarantine. Lord Pousonby has forwarded this document to his government, without declaring it here, as the Russian ambassador wished him to do, which would at once have rendered it official." And, again, in the same journal, of December 20, a letter dated Constantinople, November 23, informs the reader, that "the brig Vixen, owners Messrs Bell, sailed from Constantinople, for the coast of Circassia, with an insurance from Lloyd's; that spirited body having treated with contempt the frivolous blockade. The cargo of the ship consisted chiefly of gunpowder, an article prohibited in the Russian tariff, but the more calculated, on that account, from the uncompromising nature of the experiment, to bring the question of the blockade to a test. . . . And, in thus compelling her to throw off the mask, a great political object will be gained."

The writer of these letters had a twofold object in view. In the first place, he increased the vigilance of the Russian cruisers off the coast of Circassia. He very well knew that, within twelve days of publication, the London journals are received at St Petersburg; and it was equally certain that, as nothing of interest escapes the attention of that wary government, the copy of the Morning Chronicle, containing the above intelligence, would, in less than twenty days after its appearance, be placed in the hands of Count Woronzow, the governor of the Black Sea provinces, at Odessa, or Sebastopol. How accurately the incidents in this drama were timed will presently be seen. Not to anticipate our narrative, it need only be here remarked, that the official account of the affair of the Vixen, published afterwards in the St Petersburg Gazette, refers expressly to the Morning Chronicle of the 29th October, as the authority upon which the Russian Government had taken its proceedings. But the writer had a second object in view. It was intended, by thus publishing to the world, in a menacing tone, the designs of the expedition of the Vixen, to place the Russian Government in such a situation as to compel it to assert its right to the sovereignty over the coast of Circassia, or else virtually to resign, in the face of the whole civilized world, all claims to that territory.

In apparent fulfilment of the above threatenings, the Vixen sailed from London, loaded with some iron guns, and an assorted cargo, insured at Lloyd's—not, however, for the destination mentioned so triumphantly by the correspondent of the Chronicle, but, in the technical terms of the policy, "insured for time." The vessel was consigned to the house of — at Constantinople. On her arrival in that port, her cargo, which had been ostentatiously trumpeted to all Europe as destined for Circassia, was, with the utmost possible despatch, landed; and the Vixen was, with equal expedition, freighted with an hundred tons of salt; and, within an almost incredibly short space from the time of her arrival, she was under sail for the coast of the Black Sea. The motive for this precipitation was to conceal from the Russian agents in Constantinople the real nature of the cargo, which it was designed should appear to be powder, &c.; and to prevent them from having the opportunity of giving notice to the Russian Admiral, in the Black Sea, of the trick that was in the meantime preparing for him. Probably the ingenious projectors of the expedition were aware that, if the Russians had been informed of the real nature of the cargo, they would have cautiously abstained from all interference with the vessel, and suffered her to have landed the salt, trusting to the profitless, and, indeed, very costly result of the voyage, as an ample protection against a repetition of the experiment. This, however, as we shall presently see, by the statement of the principal party concerned, was contrary to the policy of the contrivers of the "affair of the Vixen."

We must now refer to the journal* of Mr James Stanislaus Bell, for farther particulars of his voyage and adventures. After stating that he was engaged to undertake the situation of merchant and supercargo on board the vessel, by his brother, Mr George Bell of London, he proceeds to say, that he had had communications upon the subject of the expedition with Lord Pousonby, our ambassador at Constantinople, who furnished him with the necessary firmen and passport, "accompanied with every kind expression of interest in the success of the undertaking." He entered the Bosphorus on the 18th November 1836, in the schooner Vixen, Captain Childs, loaded with a hundred tons of salt, and carrying, besides the crew, the master, and himself, another individual, Mr Charles Morton, who is styled part owner. Our mercantile readers will smile at the economy of captain, supercargo, and owner, accompanying, in a schooner, a cargo of salt, value, probably, £100 sterling! Four days after her departure, the Vixen touched at the Turkish port of Samsoun, for a pilot, to whom, the journal tells us, Mr Bell explained, on getting under weigh again, that it was no part of his plan to escape the Russian cruisers. Upon approaching the coast of Circassia, it was at first determined to steer for the port of Djoug; but the wind not being afterwards thought favourable, they ran for a place called Soujak-kalé; when, from some cause not very well explained, their course was next directed for Pehiat; but the helm once more proved fickle, and the vessel was again, and finally, put about for Soujak-kalé. From some passages in the journal, and from subsequent disclosures, there are reasons for supposing that the Vixen was sailed to and fro, off the coast of Circassia, for the purpose of attracting the notice of the Russian cruisers,† one of which was seen manifesting every disposition, by flight, to avoid overhauling the British schooner.

Immediately on casting anchor in the bay of Soujak-kalé, Mr Bell sent Islam the pilot, and Luca his servant,

* It may be proper to state that the proprietors and conductors of the "Morning Chronicle" were not cognizant of this abuse of the columns of their paper. Indeed, it is very well known, to those who have visited foreign capitals, and taken any interest in their politics, that the correspondence carried on with the London papers has, generally, the tinge of some party or personal bias, on the side of the writer. One will be found puffing an ambassador, another a consul; a third is retained by the clique of some aspirant for place. At one place may be found a correspondent writing up a Pasha, and another writing him down; whilst, probably, a year afterwards, they might be found to have changed sides. The conductors of journals may put an end to this system, by requiring from their paid correspondents facts instead of opinions.

* See Portfolio, No. 45.

† In the Morning Chronicle, February 6, 1837, the correspondent from Constantinople, before quoted, says—"Mr Bell paraded the Vixen along the whole coast of Circassia, and almost brought her under the guns of the Russian man-of-war, that she might not be thought to have engaged in any contraband trade; whilst, on the other hand, the Russians appear to have been almost as solicitous to shut their eyes to her presence, till no excuse was left them for so doing."

a native of the country, on shore, in quest of the Bey; and "to have the whole people of the neighbourhood apprised, that an English vessel, with salt, had arrived." The next day, he went on shore, to inquire for the chief; when he was introduced to "Hadgi Oglou, Mehmet Emir Effendi, High Priest and Chief Justice of all the hills around," to whom he delivered his credentials: the writer of which document had, however, "forgotten or omitted" to sign his name, an omission which is pointedly and mysteriously referred to several times, in terms which lead one to surmise that it was the production of a well-known hand—for which we could without difficulty supply a signature. Guns were now fired, which brought from the interior several other chiefs, who, after a consultation upon the subject of traffic, having nothing ready to offer in exchange, agreed to assist in landing and housing the salt. But a difficulty now arose, owing to the hard terms which the "High Priest of all the hills around," (who appears to have proved true to his order in his respect for temporalities,) attempted to exact for their services. At first, 7½ per cent. was demanded, but, after some haggling with the Hadgi, the bargain was settled at six per cent.

The next day, being Sunday, Mr Bell went on shore, accompanied by a couple of the natives, to see a little of the country:—"With these two, we proceeded along the side of the valley, where we discovered numerous cots among the trees and fields, which appeared, by the stubble, to have yielded a good harvest last year; in several places, also, heaps of ashes attested the burnings occasioned by the late invasion. At length, we struck into a little wood, entangled with wild vines and other creepers; and had scarcely done so, when one of our attendants set forth, at full gallop, to give notice, as we were told, of our approach; and, accordingly, when we came to a little opening beside a stream, we saw a number of scattered cottages, each of which immediately poured forth more men than it seemed capable of containing. We had crossed the stream, had dismounted, and were being shewn to a new cot, when Hadgi-Oglou, his son, relative, and others of our former friends, came forward, and gave us the most cordial greeting. We entered the cot, and it was immediately crammed to the door. Furniture it could scarcely be said to have any; unless a clean mat on each side of the blazing wood fire, (the day was cold,) a few cutty-stools here and there, and guns, swords, and pistols, hung all round the walls, can be called such. I was placed in the innermost nook, Childs beside me, and Mr Morton opposite; and immediately two or three set to work, with civil force, to pull off our boots, in spite of Mr M.'s declaration that he should never get them on again. An adjustment of the auditors now showed that a debate was projected; the younger men in front making way for Hadgi Oglou, and other grey-bearded senators, who ranged themselves upon stools across the floor, while all the back-ground was a dense mass of chiefs, dependants, and some boys. Oh! how I wished at that moment (as did Childs too) for the pencil of a Wilkie, or any other equally able, if there be such, that I might convey to others the impression of a scene which I can never forget while memory remains to me."

At this interview, Mr Bell, throwing aside the assumed garb of a dealer in salt, and putting on the real character of a political envoy, says—"I recommended them to prepare another address to the King and People of England, in which they should refer to the one before sent, and get it as numerously signed as possible, and I would see that it was safely forwarded to England; that the British Government had now given Mr Urquhart a high post at Constantinople; which circumstance, while it should be a proof to them of the favourable disposition of the British Government, accounted for their not hearing from him; that, as to my letter, I could not tell how the signature or seal had been omitted," &c. Alluding to a Russian brig of war, which had now made its appearance in the offing, and was apparently watching the proceedings of the Vixen, he says—"I judged it expedient to tell them that I thought it not improbable that she might interfere, and might even carry us away by force; but that, instead of regretting such an incident, they should look upon it as the best thing for them that could happen, as it might be the means of immediately putting an end to the right Russia pretended to blockade their coast."

The "debate" occupied about two hours, during which the dealer in salt, like some hero of the Arabian Nights' Tales, who is suddenly metamorphosed from a slipper-merchant into a Grand Vizier, and surprises us with his intuitive statesmanship, imparted much sage advice to the assembly, discoursing eloquently about war, diplomacy, and every other matter—save salt! At length, this picturesque session was brought to a close, by an abrupt appeal from the English stomachs of his two companions:—"Everything material seeming to have been so far discussed, and as Childs and Morton, who had sat with the greatest patience, indeed, in deep interest, began to talk about getting back in time for our Sunday's dinner, I made a motion of adjournment, and the assembly, or rather the elders, rose, the rest making their way out." On returning to the beach, they found that the brig of war Ajax, Captain Woulfe, had dropped anchor, close to the Vixen, and claimed her as a prize, for breaking the custom-house and sanitary regulations of that coast. Mr Bell received an invitation to go on board the Russian ship, and when there found himself a prisoner; upon which he consoles himself with the remark, that "it will make my case the stronger." Whilst on board the Ajax, he had the best berth in the captain's cabin assigned to him, and enjoyed a monopoly of the only pipe with a Turkish mouth-piece on board. The following description of the quality of the Russian naval service, furnished by one who is deeply imbued with Russo-Phobia, we offer for the consolation of Mr Thomas Attwood of Birmingham, and all the other inhabitants of the midland counties, who, like him, may be afflicted with the dread of a visit from the Russian marine. "The brig is well found in all that concerns herself; but her one hundred and fifty human beings they call seamen and marines, are a congregation of the most dwarfish, ugly, pitiful-looking wretches, that I have thought it possible to collect without a good deal of trouble. They give little short tugs at the ropes like boys, and sneak about the decks like dogs not at home. Between eleven and twelve, they are called over by the muster-roll for a large tin measure of dirty weak spirits, called Warki; after which, they have their first meal of broth and peas-porridge, a small morsel of salt meat, and plenty of black bread. At sunset, they have a similar meal, and that is all; and yet I am told they are fed like aldermen, in comparison with the soldiers. I have seen a boatswain whisking one of the sailors with a birch rod, and himself lugged about the deck by the ear by one of the lieutenants. It would be a shame for Englishmen ever to attack these people with more than half their number. Perhaps, I have humoured my spleen in thus pulling to pieces people who are really kind to me. But are they not the deadly enemies of those noble Circassians?"

The man-of-war and her prize proceeded to the Bay of Ghelendjik, where Mr Bell and Captain Childs were subjected to separate examinations, by the naval officer commanding on the station, Admiral Esment; who, amongst other inquiries, asked Mr Bell whether he had conversed with Lord Ponsonby, at Constantinople, about his intended voyage; and he remarks, in the journal, that "they smiled one to another, when I refused to answer this question." On the vessel's arrival at Sevastopol, to which place his case was referred by the Admiral, for the decision of his superiors, the salt was removed, in the vain expectation of finding the much vaunted cargo of gunpowder, &c. The Vixen was confiscated, and declared good prize, for having violated the custom-house and municipal laws of the Russian empire; but the captain, crew, and passengers, were set at liberty, and conveyed, at the expense of Count Woronzow, the Governor of New Russia, to Constantinople. So far, then, the performance of "the affair of the Vixen," had gone off to the satisfaction of those who got up the piece. To be sure, if the Russians had displayed less courtesy to the principal actors in the drama—had they, for instance, discharged a broadside into the British merchantman, and killed, or even wounded, a British subject or two, or even had the crew been sent to Siberia—the catastrophe would have been more in unison with the designs of the concoctors of the affair; but still the quarrel was a very pretty one as it stood, and nothing remained for the O'Triggers concerned, but to make the most of it.

Accordingly, the very same post that conveyed the tidings of the capture of the Vixen to western Europe, carried also to the newspapers of London, Paris, &c., letters from their correspondents at Constantinople, containing exciting appeals, addressed to the whole civilized world, against the lawless act of aggression, perpetrated by Russia, "upon the persons and property of British subjects, engaged in the legitimate pursuit of commerce." The pride, cupidity, and the pugnacious propensities of John Bull, were roused, simultaneously, by editors and public orators; and even Parliamentary speakers denounced the seizure of the Vixen, as an insolent attack upon our national dignity; and menaced the "Muscovite barbarians" with a war in defence of "our valuable trade with the Circassians." The French journals, true to their character, rung a warlike peal; and the Allgemeine Zeitung gravely informed its readers that, "among the questions which now excite the attention of the nations of Europe, that of the seizure of the Vixen stands in the first rank."* The Portfolio,† a periodical since deceased, which devoted its short life to the labour of exposing and denouncing Russian politics, in an article upon the subject of the Vixen, exulted that "the affair is as notorious by this time throughout Central Asia, on the banks of the Indus, along the shores of the Caspian, the Euxine, the Persian and Arabian Gulfs, the Red Sea, and the Mediterranean, as in every port in the Baltic, every court in Europe, and every village in the British islands;" and the writer, in alluding to the war between Russia and her Caucasian provinces, declared, that upon the issue of that struggle depended "the downfall of her power, and thereby the emancipation of Europe, or her conquest of the world, and the ruin of England's greatness." The St Petersburg government journal also appealed to public opinion, by publishing a narrative of the affair; agreeing in the chief incidents with the account given in Mr Bell's journal. After saying that Captain Childs had stated in his examination that he was originally a stranger to the objects of the voyage, it proceeds to award all the disgrace and responsibility of the transaction to the English shipowners, and others who had conceived "the criminal views of the enterprise;" and who, "disregarding the respect which they owed to their national flag, did not hesitate to employ it for the purpose of protecting a shameful traffic, or of covering traitorous intentions, which the impartial judgment of all well-disposed persons must condemn and stigmatise." In this state-paper, we find threefold allusion made to those false alarms and perverted statements, respecting the cargo of the Vixen, published in the Morning Chronicle, of October 29, 1836.

In consequence of the imputations thus cast upon the motives of the projectors of this "affair," a letter written by Mr George Bell, and dated 157, Fenchurch Street, February 2, 1837, appeared in the Times newspaper, bearing the titles of—Facts relative to the Capture of the Vixen, complaining of the conduct of the Russian Government, in publishing through their official gazette, and the Frankfort Journal, statements relative to the voyage of the Vixen to the Coast of Circassia—"which they must know to be grossly false, and which are intended to hold up the British Government to the eyes of all the world, as instigators and co-operators in an attempt to aid and supply with munitions of war, what they call, rebellious subjects of Russia, and to stamp my brother and me as agents of our government for that purpose, as smuggling contrabandists, and not as merchants prosecuting legitimate trade."

The writer, then, with a view to put an end to such misrepresentations in future, proceeds to "make public the real facts of the simple case;" and describes how his attention was first directed to the subject of the trade with Circassia, in consequence of his house in Bucharest having been applied to by the Turkish Governor of Wallachia, to aid in the sale of the produce of the salt mines of that principality; that, conceiving Circassia to offer a good market, he applied to the British government, to learn whether that country was in possession of Russia—"and I received such a reply from the Foreign Office, referring me to the Gazette, as convinced me that, if Russia made such a claim, it was not recognised by our government." He then states that the Vixen was originally ordered by him to proceed to the Danube, to take in a cargo of salt at Ibrail; but, "in consequence of her having arrived a month later than was expected at Constantinople, and, as the Circassians had, according to our previous arrangements with them, got ready near the coast a quantity of goods for barter, which could not be left over the winter, my brother, with my knowledge and concurrence, loaded a cargo of salt at Constantinople."

We shall have occasion presently to call the reader's attention to the first of the above passages printed in Italics, for the purpose of confronting the statement, that the British Government were not "instigators or co-operators," with an allegation of a contradictory character, in a subsequent letter, published by the same writer. With respect to the second passage, similarly printed, alleging that the Circassians had entered into an agreement to provide a stock of goods to exchange for the salt, we must refer the reader to the journal of the voyage, as published by Mr James Stanislaus Bell, in which, so far from hinting at any such appointment, he does not even appear to have determined at what particular point of a coast, extending nearly 160 miles in length, he should make an attempt to trade with the natives; at first, fixing upon Djoug—then hesitating about steering for Soujak-kalé—afterwards running for Pehiat—and finally putting into the bay of Soujak-kalé; and where, after firing guns, and sending in search of customers, he tells us that the natives who came down to the beach had nothing to offer in exchange for the salt.

A very cursory glance at the successive incidents, must suffice to bring the review of the affair down to the present day.

Our readers will recollect that the affair of the Vixen was, during the last session, brought, with much solemnity, before Parliament by Mr Roebuck; that Mr Ewart, the then member for Liverpool, aided him in denouncing "the encroachment upon our commerce;" and that he was ably supported by Mr O'Connell's splendid invectives against the Russian Government. "The affair" continued to be the subject of serious discussion with our politicians; we were, from time to time, assured by the government journals, that Lord Durham, who had been sent on a special mission to St Petersburg, was incessantly labouring to bring the "affair of the Vixen" to an amicable settlement; and, at length, when that nobleman returned to England, we were consoled with the solemn intelligence that he was to be rewarded with a ribbon—we have forgotten the important fact whether red, blue, or some other hue—for his diplomatic services at the Court of the Autocrat. A change now took place in the composition of our embassy at Constantinople. It had been publicly announced that Sir Charles Vaughan was appointed to succeed Lord Ponsonby as ambassador to the Porte; and, in the month of March, he set out with the usual state equipage for the capital of Turkey. On his arrival at Malta, however, he was delayed; and afterwards deterred from proceeding on his voyage by advices from Constantinople. These proceedings were of course involved in mystery—the only points of diplomatic intrigue which the people learn, know, and feel, are the expenses, which, in this case, gave rise to a little unavailing grumbling from Mr Home. We were not informed that Lord Ponsonby had resumed his functions; as also that Mr Urquhart was no longer chief secretary. Lord Pon-

* The singularly appropriate name of the vessel afforded matter for remark to those who were in the secret of the plot. The editor of the Smyrna newspaper, a clever Frenchman, referring to his English dictionary, and finding the word vixen to mean a female fox, a quarrelsome woman, he indulged in some harmless pleasantry, for the amusement of his readers, upon the affair.

sonby, who is described by Mr J. S. Bell, in his journal, to have taken leave of him with expressions of kind interest in the success of his voyage, now took every opportunity, in his circle at Therapia, of disavowing all participation in the designs of the concoctors of "the affair of the Vixen."

The subject seemed almost forgotten, when Mr Thomas Attwood—to whom the opponents of state intervention in foreign politics, and of depreciated paper money, are deeply indebted for the ridicule which he contrives to throw upon the advocacy of those pernicious principles—brought the matter again before Parliament a few weeks ago. In reply to his speech, Lord Palmerston intimated that it was not the intention of Government to claim redress for the capture of the Vixen, which, he said, had occurred in consequence of the violation of the custom-house and municipal regulations of "a country undoubtedly in the possession of Russia." This declaration of the Foreign Secretary brought the individuals who owned and chartered the Vixen again before the public; and their letter, which we publish entire, places them in a novel and very singular position.

"THE CAPTURE OF THE VIXEN.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE STANDARD.

"Fenchurch Street, Dec. 18, 1837.

SIR,—As the speech of Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, last Thursday, contains statements at variance with the facts of the case of the capture of the Vixen, and imputations on us as the parties concerned in that affair, which we could hardly have believed the Russian Government could have got his Lordship to echo; it now becomes necessary for us to state, that, independent of proceedings which are now in progress, in a court of law, we intend to make an application to Parliament, soon after the approaching holidays, for that redress in this case which her Majesty's Government has refused either to obtain or to grant; and since, notwithstanding our patient forbearance, during the extraordinarily tardy course of the Government's proceedings, these calumnies now issue publicly from the mouth of a minister, we shall be under the necessity of publishing, before that time, a series of correspondence and documents, and a statement of facts, capable of proof, which will shew that the Foreign-Office, and their agents abroad, were collusive abettors of the origin and progress of the voyage of the Vixen, and that our interests have been treacherously betrayed in this case, in consequence of a change of Lord Palmerston's policy.

(Signed) "GEORGE BELL, } Owners of the
"POLDEN & MORTON, } Vixen."

The reader will not fail, at a glance, to perceive the contrast between the contents of the above letter, and the extract before given from a previous one, in which the same writer who now menaces the minister with "a statement of facts," proving the government to have been "collusive abettors" of the affair, published that which he then termed "the real facts of the simple case," assuring the public that the same government were not "instigators and co-operators" in what he solemnly asserted was a regular commercial undertaking, entered upon, after due inquiry and consideration, by "merchants prosecuting legitimate trade." The above threat of exposure, after the very tender expressions of regard for the fair fame of the Ministry, expressed in the former letter, by the same writer, reminds one of a quarrel between lovers, in which one of the parties, possessing the smaller sense of shame or decency of the two, threatens to publish the private and confidential correspondence of the other, with a view to the exacting of certain compliances. What the terms extorted may turn out to be in the present case, we shall not pretend to divine. Should the threat of exposure not be carried into effect, we presume the pries of secrecy may be estimated according to the pliancy of the consciences of Cabinet Ministers, and the extent of means at the disposal of the dispensers of secret service money.

We have now, so far as a narrative of the incidents goes, completed the history of the affair of the Vixen. Hitherto we have confined ourselves to a statement of facts, which fall under our observation, or which we have had the opportunity of verifying by personal inquiries, both in England and Turkey; and, although we have, out of courtesy to those who might, whether justly or not, consider themselves entitled to privacy, abstained from mentioning the names of the principal actors, and, notwithstanding that, from similar motives, we have avoided allusions to some points which, if stated, would have evinced still more clearly our peculiar intimacy with the particulars of this singular transaction; yet enough has probably been stated to shew that the voyage of the Vixen, instead of having been a regular expedition, undertaken and planned in the legitimate pursuit of trade, originated in a mean conspiracy, concocted amidst artifices and misrepresentations, and that the conspirators, whoever they were, sought only to accomplish their own fantastic views of foreign policy, at the sacrifice of the peace and the best interests of the country. We shall not pretend to speculate as to the extent to which our Foreign Secretary, or the British Legation at Constantinople, were accessories or instigators to the paltry and undignified proceedings just described. Unhappily for British interests, our diplomatists and statesmen are actuated by an incessant love of intervention in the affairs of other states. Russia being, in our day, the movement-power, it is with her clever but unscrupulous agents, that the comparatively simple spirits who guide our foreign relations, are most frequently brought into contact; and no sooner do they find their negotiations conducting them to the usual results of defeat and mortification, than they instinctively fall back for support upon the material resources of the British empire—thus reminding one of the country-clown who, although ignorant of the game, risks his stake at the table of the sharper, trusting, as a last resource, to his stout oak cudgel, if his lucky stars should fall him.

Probably no event in our history has tended to display in such glaring relief, the strong propensity of both the government and British people—for the people of the middling class have become imbued with the aristocratic spirit of their rulers—to embroil themselves with the affairs of other countries, as the attempt to involve this country in a contest with Russia in behalf of the Circassians. The affair of the Falkland Islands, which the pens of Junius and Johnson have rendered famous, naturally occurs to us. But the advocates of a war with Spain, for those uninhabited islands, did not want arguments to prove that they had very strong grounds of right and interest on their side.

They had been visited and named, if not discovered, by our earliest circumnavigators, and had afforded refuge for their ships, and restored the health of their crews; whilst they possessed the still more substantial temptation, from being placed on the verge of that vast continent whose trade and mineral treasures were sealed against British enterprise, of offering a point of attack in case of war with Spain, or a convenient station for smuggling, in time of peace. But, in the case of Circassia, we do not lay claim to the disputed territory—we do not pretend to have first discovered it, or named its ports or bays. No British vessel had ever reached its coast, until the Vixen, ostensibly a trader, but in reality an incendiary, sought it, in the vain hope of lighting up the flames of war between two great nations. We have been appealed to in behalf of our commerce with the inhabitants of Circassia; but it may be worth while, before entering upon hostilities in its defence, to inquire what the nature of the trade is, that can be carried on with the savage clans of the Caucasus? It is pretty generally known, that their staple export, hitherto, has consisted of slaves of both sexes; the harems of Turkey, Egypt, and the Barbary Coast, having been for ages peopled from Circassia and the adjoining countries. We are told, indeed, that the mountains are clothed with timber, and impregnated with mineral treasures. These are, however, but meagre gifts, to compensate for the absence of a broad expanse of cultivable soil, deep and slow rivers, facilities of transmission by land, and the other advantages of a plain country. The Alps and the Pyrenees of Europe, and the Alleghanies of America, are clothed with the richest woods, but being inaccessible from the sea, they are valueless to the trader. The countries of the Caucasus, resembling the mountains of Switzerland, must ever be the abode of a poor but hardy race. Being denied the luxuries that are derived from commercial and manufacturing pursuits, by the very character of their territory, they will, in return, enjoy that freedom which has rarely been found long to accompany wealth. Had the Circassians, however, in lieu of a rugged territory and an inclement sky, possessed, like the United States or the Brasils, a fertile soil and a genial climate, still, in their present state—without laws, government, or even a uniform religion; possessing no towns, or trades, or professions; destitute of even the first elements of civilisation; constituting, in short, not a nation, but an unclaimed race of barbarians, amongst whom industry and accumulation are unknown—they could not yield us the advantages of a profitable commercial connexion.

There is a very prevalent delusion, which has indeed seized hold of some minds that ought to be embued with sounder views—that our commerce admits of valuable extension amongst savage or uncivilized communities,

A moment's reflection must demonstrate that the products of our looms are little calculated for the clothing of roving tribes of hunters, or fierce bands of banditti, amongst whom the decencies of life have scarcely established their claims, and where the wants of taste, comfort, and refinement in costume are unknown. The skins of the wild animals killed in the chase, afford, in every respect, the fittest covering for men who lead a life scarcely less savage than that of the beasts of prey. What has been the amount of our commerce with all the barbarous races of Africa since the suppression of the slave trade? What is the amount of our manufactures consumed by the hordes of central Asia—by the millions of fierce islanders of the eastern Archipelago—by the tribes of Indians roving over the prairies of America—or the untamed wanderers of the Arabian deserts? Probably, to all these uncivilized countries, though more populous than the Christian world, our exports are less in amount than to one of the smallest of the civilized nations—Holland!

LITERARY REGISTER.

Private Correspondence of Sarah Duchess of Marlborough. 2 vols. 8vo, with Portraits.

THE commencement of a female reign, is opportune for the appearance of a work, illustrative both of the public and secret history of the reign of the last female sovereign of England, and one remarkable for the struggles of domestic parties, as well as for foreign transactions. The work contains the select correspondence of the Duke, when commanding the army on the Continent, with his high-spirited dame; who, the bosom-friend of the Princess Anne, in the early part of the reign of Queen Anne became rather the Vice-Queen than the favourite. How glad the enthralled "good Queen Anne" must have been to cast off the yoke of the imperious Duchess, and to find a more complacent female minister and easy and congenial friend in Mrs Masham! Some of the letters in this correspondence bear the romantic names of Mrs Morley and Mrs Freeman, the appellations adopted by the Queen and the Duchess during the early ardours of their friendship; though it was far in its decline before their date. And what a picture of the mortifications of ambition, the humiliations of pride, does the correspondence unfold!

The opinions of the Duchess of Marlborough, her sketches of the leading characters of her age, those statesmen and courtiers with whom she came in so close contact, is the most interesting feature of the work. Few of her letters written while she was a daily actor and prime mover in all public affairs, have been preserved; and thus these sketches embody all that can now be known of the opinions of a woman of great acuteness, who piqued herself upon sincerity; and who latterly never scrupled to tell truths, however unpalatable. The applicability of many of the opinions and remarks, contained in these volumes, to modern affairs and to our times, must strike the most careless reader; nor is it wonderful that Whigs and Tories should, after the lapse of a century, be found the self-same animals with whom this lady acted. We talk of the Movement, when a snail's pace would distance it. The following observations we find in an epistle from Dr Hare, afterwards a bishop, who had been the tutor of the Duke's eldest son, the Marquis of Blandford, and much in the confidence of the Marlborough family. The epistle is a kind of dissertation on party, and was written about the time that the Tories triumphed and the Duchess lost her place, long after having lost her personal influence with the Queen. The extracts we give goes to prove what the political writers in this Magazine have often asserted—that any liberal measure to be expected for the country, will come neither from Whigs nor Tories, as such, but from a vigorous Opposition:—

Your Habeas Corpus, Treason, and Triennial acts are owing to the Tories; chiefly because, it may be said, they did not press their point as Tories, but as malcontents. But this I may say, that the good things the Whigs have done, they did likewise out of play, and either not used or laid aside. . . . As long as men are men, self-interest will have a mighty influence; and if the Whigs have escaped the faults the Tories are blemished with, I suspect it is their good fortune more than their superior virtue, or the power of better principles. 'Twas their happiness to be out of play in those reigns when the princes had such corrupt purposes to serve; for, as soon as they came into play, they were as devout courtiers as their predecessors. . . . They always, when in, took the side of the Court; and every bill gained in the last reign was owing, as it commonly is, to the side that at that time was out. . . I say nothing of their voluntary associations, and other contrivances, made use of for no other end but to ensnare honest men, and secure a faction for themselves. I don't add to this their endeavours for a standing army. . . . I think there is great reason to suspect that the good laws that were obtained were not so much owing to men's being Whigs and Tories, as to their being in or out. When men are out, they have nothing to do but to act the patriot; to spy faults in them that are in; to make themselves popular by invectives against the Ministry, or by self-denying motions, in order to be taken off by the Prince, or to ingratiate themselves with the People, in order, by a majority in Parliament to force themselves upon the Prince, and to get into the administration.

The forebodings of the Duchess in 1739, have a remarkable coincidence with the forebodings of some gloomy-minded capitalists ninety-nine years later, and when, if there ever was any good cause for such apprehensions, it must be augmented tenfold. The party in Parliament neither Whig nor Tory, and which was soon afterwards absorbed in these rival factions, was then called the Patriots. It is in some sort represented by the Radicals of our day. The Duchess had a great deal of funded property, which quickened her fears; and "the sponge" was as familiar in her mouth as in that of Cobbett. She commences—

Miserable condition of the country! some accident may, perhaps, put some little stop to the ruin of it; but nobody can foresee when it will happen, or whether we shall be much the better for it. . . . I really question whether, if a king and a minister designed to do every thing that was right, a parliament could be got that would let them; for they could say that they must be paid as they used to be, [must now have pensions, places, and sinecures,] whatever consequence that produced; and, like people that live upon drama, they will have money as long as any is left for them. . . . I think in all ages there have been as bad men, and some worse, than Sir Robert, [not Peel, but Walpole.] 'Tis true he has impoverished and ruined this country, for power and gain; but he could have done no mischief if men of greater fortune had not assisted him; which will certainly end in the ruin of themselves and their posterity.

. I find some people who are so sanguine as to think still that England will be saved; I cannot, for my life, see which way, since Sir Robert has all the money and power, and there are such numbers of fools and knaves to support whatever he has done or shall do. Had a great deal of discourse last night with one who calls himself a Patriot; but I don't find that he or any of the rest of them can give anything like a reason for any hope; and when I press them upon the subject, all I can get is, that some accident may bring things about to the better. An accident is a very uncertain, remote comfort; and what accident can do it? For my part I cannot yet see into it, nor what great good it would produce if Sir Robert should die. The public is more in debt than ever. [Debt in 1740! Oh, short-sighted female politician, what would you have said to our eight hundred millions!] There is a vast army already in England, which is to be farther increased; and much greater taxes must be raised to pay that expense, as well as a great fleet; neither of which have done anything, or are intended for any service, except the soldiers to awe the People of England, if they ever be provoked to oppose arbitrary power; in which case I am apt to believe that people would reflect how many had been hanged, and lost their estates for doing it.

The vast army which frightened the good Duchess, does not amount to one-third of the troops now required to overawe the Irish alone.

1737—8. Have made a great purchase, thinking one may have a little from land for some time, whatever happens. For fear of a sponge, I have sold my stocks low, and bought land dear, which I did because I thought that would hold longest.

The Duchess was not aware of the financial resources of a heaven-born minister. The Duchess is seen at times in a nobler temper than that produced by fears for the loss of any part of her enormous wealth. She had considerable experience of courts and princes, and her opinions of them are certainly not more favourable than those of persons totally ignorant of their ways. She says—

As princes are not the best judges of right and wrong, from the flattery they are used to, not to say worse of them, I think the best thing for them, and the whole nation, is not to let them have power to hurt themselves or anybody else. I am of opinion, from woful experience, that, from flattery, or want of understanding, most princes are alike; and therefore it is to no purpose to argue against their possessions, but to defend ourselves at all events, against them. This makes me think of the Castile oath—"We that are as good as yourself, and more powerful, choose you to be our king upon such conditions;" and concludes with what is just and proper. I don't find that anybody thinks it is possible for any good to be done this session. Everybody that should act don't mean the same thing. Some are influenced wholly by bribes; others have views which they cover: and, upon the whole, I think that Sir Robert will die in power.

Some of those people who call themselves Patriots, [Radicals,] are certainly very good men, but I am sure the whole party don't mean the same thing. They don't all go in a straight line to pursue steadily the right points; but they act coolly, [coldly,] sometimes one way, sometimes another, as they think it will turn most to what they secretly have in view; some to keep places they are in possession of, and others to get into them.

The Duchess had been reading the Memoirs of De Retz, and thus pithily concludes her criticism:—

By the description De Retz makes of the nobles—their taking bribes, being very simple, [i. e. foolish,] and wholly bent on private interest—they resemble very much our House of Lords.

We might multiply such quotations ad infinitum, but the sample proves the stock.

Among other characters of contemporaries sketched by the Duchess of Marlborough, we find that glory of the Tory priesthood of her day, Dr Sacheverel; the genuine prototype of the O'Sullivan and M'Creas of our time. The excitement of "Church in Danger," caused by Sacheverel, and those who used him as a tool, exactly prefigures the commotion emanating from Exeter Hall, and from the provincial pulpits and rostrums. Sacheverel himself is described by the Duchess, who was none of his admirers, as an ignorant, shallow, and pompous man.

He had a haughty, insolent air, which his friends found occasion often to complain of; but it made his presence more graceful in public. His person was framed well for the purpose, and he dressed well. A good assurance, clean gloves, white handkerchief, well managed, with other suitable accomplishments, moved the hearts of many at his appearance, and the solemnity of a trial added much to a pity and concern which had nothing in reason or justice to support them. The weaker part of the ladies were more like maidens bewitched than like persons in their senses. At length, by the help of proper officers and tools, great mobs were raised, to whose outrages and violence nothing more conduced than a prevailing opinion, artfully spread amongst them, that one above [the Queen] was herself on the side of those disorders. There was a machine for the great projectors to move!—and it was so dexterously moved, that the whole nation was moved with it. Several eminent clergymen, who despised the man in their hearts, were engaged to stand publicly by him, in the face of the world; as if the poor Church of England was now tried in him. Everybody knows that he was afterwards [after his trial and mock punishments] sent about several counties, where, with his usual grace, he received, as his due, the homage and adoration of multitudes; never thinking that respect enough was paid to his great merit; using some of his friends insolently, and raising mobs against his enemies, and giving ample proof of how great meanness the bulk of mankind is capable; putting on the air of a saint upon a lewd and pampered man, dispensing his blessing to all his worshippers, and his kisses to some; taking their good money as fast as it could be brought in, drinking their best wines, eating of their best provisions, without reserve and without temperance; and, what completed the farce, complaining, in the midst of this scene of luxury and triumph, as the old fat monk did, over a hot vension party, in his barbarous Latin, "Heu! quanta patimur pro Ecclesia."

Oh, what dreadful things do we undergo for the sake of the Church! This engine proving so fortunate, and the nation being now roused to a violent heat of mad passion for the Church and Crown, there was no longer any doubt of giving the finishing stroke to the designs which had been busy in agitation.

This design was the farther triumph of the Tory party, and directing the succession to the Crown past the House of Hanover. But how exact the parallel between Sacheverel and the uses made of him, and the leading agitators among the Tory parsons of the present period! All the work is not of equal value with these extracts; but the student of the political movements of England will find in it much to interest and entertain him, independently of the history of the great personages to whom the book relates.

The Scents Annual.

This beautiful table-book is made up of a selection of views in Scotland, Switzerland, and the United States. It possesses a peculiar national interest to Scottish people, both from the scenes and the editor, who is no less distinguished a personage in letters than Campbell. Thus the Annuals, instead of falling off, as was predicted, are drawing into their vortex some of the most eminent modern authors. Mr Campbell was late, he says, of engaging in the duty, but he will buckle earlier to the work, and do far better next year. We do not see much that requires to be amended, but would be loath to baulk his generous vow in favour of the public. He has had an anonymous coadjutor, whose verses flow as sweetly as those of the greater artist. The same energy and nobility of sentiment, which ever inspires Campbell when liberty is the theme, breaks out bravely in this work, in notices which are appended to views, in which the old Scottish Covenanters, and the Waldenses, are the heroic actors. To a bold view of the old West Bow—now alas! no more—this emphatic notice is attached:—

The Scotch Covenanters have a right to a high niche in history, for having illustrated a twofold truth:—In the first place, the impotence of persecution to put down opinions; and, secondly, the value of determined men maintaining their conscientious belief. An age of persecution affected Calvinism only as the wind makes the corn grow. It is not necessary to be a Calvinist to admire, with one's whole heart, the courage of men who bled and died for what, to their feeling, was truth: nor is it necessary to subscribe to all the dogmas of the Scottish Church to appreciate the beautiful results that sprang up from the graves of its martyrs—results unforeseen by the Presbyterian martyrs themselves. The courage of Scotland preserved her national religion; and that religion, with its asperities softened, and its pulpit eloquence refined, by a Robertson, a Blair, and a Chalmers, has produced a clerical body that yields to none in the world for respectability.

Campbell's illustrations of the engraving, representing the wild mountain passes and rocky fastnesses, so long defended by the brave and devoted Christians of the Vaudois, is equally admirable.

Leonidas and his Spartans were not more self-devoted than the Vaudois were, for many centuries, under sufferings and persecutions; nor were the former braver in battle, or more attached to their native soil. The Vaudois, or Waldenses, to whom Milton alludes in his sonnet—were at one period nearly exterminated by their Popish enemies; but a remnant of them found refuge in other countries, and thence they might have existed, and melted into a foreign population, if they could have forgotten their native valleys, or tolerated life under the home-sickness of exiles. But they could not forget their native hearths and hills, the caves that had hid their forefathers from their persecutors, the fastnesses where they had secured themselves; and the very expatriated men refused even grants of land in foreign Protestant countries, over which they were scattered; and, though not a thousand in number, they resolved to regain their native valleys. They collected themselves together—they rendezvoused in Switzerland—crossed the Lake of Geneva, disembarked on the Savoy side, and, by a series of unparalleled efforts, succeeded—made a way with their swords through opposing myriads, in narrow defiles, and on giddy precipices, to their sacred homes. A more interesting scene than the return of the Vaudois is not to be found in human history. The retreat of Xenophon's Ten Thousand has an humble resemblance to it. The Vaudois were the Covenanters of Italy; but they surpass even our Scotch Covenanters in traits of heroism. And yet how unequal are the results of virtue! The descendants of the brave Vaudois are still a people depressed beneath their natural rights by the Sardinian government, while the Scottish nation owes to its Covenanters their equality with England.

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones

It would only fill the mind with tedious horrors to recount minutely the earlier sufferings of this people. Their historians take pains to prove that they were original and Apostolic Christians, whose orthodoxy of faith can be traced back to the eighth century. But what has orthodoxy, or heterodoxy, or antiquity of faith, to do with the lawfulness of persecution? Whether their faith was new or old, or false or true, there was the same atrocity in attempting to extirpate it by violence.

To a view of Cora Linn, which is not among the finest in the collection, Mr Campbell has devoted the following sweet lines:—

"The time I saw thee, Cora, last,
'Twas with congenial friends;
And calmer hours of pleasure past
My memory seldom sends,

"It was as sweet an autumn day
As ever shone on Clyde;
And Lanark's orchards, all the way,
Put forth their golden pride.

"E'en hedges, busked in bravery,
Looked rich that sunny morn;
The scarlet hip and blackberry
So pranked September's thorn.

"In Cora's glen the calm how deep!—
Its trees, on loftiest hill,
Like statues stood, or things asleep—
All motionless and still.

"The torrent spoke as if his noise
Made earth be quiet round,
And gave his loud and lonely voice
A more commanding sound,

"His foam, beneath the yellow light
Of noon, came down like one
Continuous sheet of fountains bright,
Emblazoned by the sun.

"Dear Linn!—let loftier falling floods
Have prouder names than thine;
And, king of all, enthroned in woods,
Let Niagara shine.

"Barbarian, let him shake his coasts
With rooking thunders far,
Extended as the army of hosts
In broad embattled war.

"His voice appals the wilderness:
Approaching thine we feel
A solemn, deep melodiousness,
That needs no louder peal.

"More fury would but disenchant
Thy dream-inspiring din;
Be thou the Scottish muse's haunt,
Romantic Cora Linn!"

The assistant-editor has contributed many copies of pleasing and elegant verses. We gather one flower from his chaplet—

"Brothers!—the day declines;
And red through Hündwyl's pines
The vesper-halo lightens.
From hamlet, rock, and chalet,
Your grateful song be poured,
Till mountain, lake, and valley,
Re-echo—Praise the Lord!

"The sun sleeps in the west;
And stars gleam bright and cold,
And bring the hour of rest
To the shepherd and his fold.
Now swell the mountain chorus
To him our sirens adored,
Whose glorious works before us
Still whisper—Praise the Lord!

"And, hark!—below, aloft,
From cliffs that pierce the cloud—
From blue lake, calm and soft,
Lulled in its twilight shroud—
Fresh strength our anthem gathers;
From Alp to Alp 'tis poured—
The song that soothed our fathers—
Ye shepherds, praise the Lord!

"Now, from forest, flood, and fell,
Let the voice of old and young—
All the strength of Appenzell,
True of heart, and sweet of tongue—
The grateful hymn prolong,
And tune the spirit's chord,
Till yon stars take up our song—
'Hallelujah to the Lord!'"

This Annual has been tardy in its appearance, but it possesses beauties and merit to ensure its success.

Hood's Comic Annual for 1838.

With the usual quantity of drolleries, quips, cranks, and clinches, whether printed or pictured, Mr Hood, in his ninth appearance, has played the good-humoured satirist more directly than in any former year. In the "Carnaby Correspondence," he has successfully exposed and ridiculed the present system of education at those suburban or country seminaries, where boys are dieted and drugged, whipped into Latin and Greek, and drilled into religion and morals, in the cheapest and most expeditious manner. The disappointment of Mr Carnaby, senior, who had laid out "such mints of munny for Bob's skulking," and found Bob not only "famished in his vittels," but "famishin in his Latin and Greek," is great; as he had "set his art upon to hav woen claudie skollard bransh in the famely." Mr Carnaby, a worthy London tradesman, is somewhat caricatured, but Master Bob is true boarding-school-boy nature, especially as he comes forth in the epistle sent clandestinely from Dr Darby's Academy, to his papa:—

"What I want to tell you is, as the holidays is so nigh, I wish you would make up your mind for me to be took away for good and all. I don't like the vittuals for one thing; and, besides, I am allmost sure we are not well taught. The table-beer always gives me the stomach-ache, if I don't tie a string round it; and I only wish you see some of Mr Murphy's ruling when he smells so of gin. Another thing is the batter-puddings, which the fellows call it putty, because it sticks pains in our insides; and sometimes we have stinking beef.

I am certain sure we should have a barring out in our school-room long and long ago, only the Doctor hardly ever wants to come in. That's the way the ushers do, just as they like in school hours; and Mr Hucking's does a leather-seller's bookkeeping; and Mr Snitch makes poetry for the newspapers. It's not my fault, then, if I am backward in my Greek and Latin, though I have got a prize for spelling and grammar; but we all have prizes for something, to please our parents when we go home. . . . Philip Frank says there's a capital school at Richmond, where the master permits fishing, and boating, and cigars, and gunpowder, and pony chaises, for only sixty guineas a-year. I often think that's the sort of genteel school my poor dear late mother, if she was alive, would like me finished off at. But that's as you prefer; and if you will only promise upon your honour to remove me, I won't run away."

Dr Darby's seminary is, we fear, too true a picture of many modern boarding schools; and Mr Hood's burlesque of their systems and charlatanerie, cannot fail to do some good. "Dr Darby of SOCRATES HOUSE," turns out to be one Darby, a bankrupt ship-chandler of Wapping; and some of the masters of such academies as his, may probably have even a more illiterate and vicious origin. We would seriously recommend the study of the Carnaby correspondence to all honest, wealthy, and unlearned parents, ambitious of giving their children a polite or classic education.

"Patronage" is another clever squib, though running rather too much into burlesque. It would not, however, be easy to exaggerate the impudent and barefaced system of aristocratic patronage, so happily ridiculed in Mrs D.'s application to Lord Viscount —, for a change of place for her nervous husband—"an unfortunate gentleman of birth and breeding;" who, after waiting forty years for a place, had been appointed inspector of powder mills, where he lives in a continual agony of apprehension for an explosion. The lady says—

"To favour with particulars, my husband has the honour to be related very distantly to the Poerage; and, as your Lordship knows, it is the privilege of Aristocracy to provide for all connexions by comfortable public situations, which are sometimes enjoyed very early in life. To such Mr D— had a hereditary right from his cradle; for his noble relative, the Duke of —, was so condescending as to stand sponsor by proxy; and, instead of the usual spoons, or a silver mug, made a promise to the infant of some office suited to its tender age—for instance, a superannuation or the like, where there is nothing to do but the salary to receive. In point of fact, the making the baby a retired King's Messenger, was undertaken at the font; but, before the child could come into office, his Grace unfortunately went out of power, by dying of apoplexy, leaving nothing but a promise, which a new Ministry was unjust and ungrateful enough not to make good. In this shocking manner, your Lordship, was my husband thrown upon the world, without proper provision, according to his station and prospects; and was degraded to the necessity of his own exertions for his support, until the new Duke thought proper to stir in his behalf."

We leave the remainder of Mrs D—'s grievances to the reader. Her letter is quite as good as many a long and laboured article against pensions and sinecures.

Animal Magnetism, which is not losing ground in Great Britain, is the next subject upon which Mr Hood has chosen to exercise his powers of ridicule.

Of all the sirs of the times, (he says,) considering them merely as signs, and the public literally as 'a public,' there are none more remarkable than the Hahnemann's Head—the Crown and Compasses, devoted to Gall and Spurzheim's entire—and the Cock and Bull, that hangs out at the House of Call for An mal Magnetizers. The last concern especially—a daring, glar n, flaring, gin-palace-like establishment, is a moral phenomenon.

Mr Hood calls upon the temperance philanthropists to set their faces against "Measmer's particular," which he considers a much more deleterious mixture than Old Tom.

Seriously, (he says,) might not the temperance socities extend the sphere of their operations, by a whole hemisphere, and perhaps with equal advantage to mankind, by attacking mental dram-drinking, as well as the bodily tipping of ardent spirits? Take the wildest freaks of the most fuddled, muddled, bepuddled soaker, such as "trying to light his pipe at a pump"—attempting to wind up a plug with his watch-key—or requesting, from a damp bed in the gutter, to be tucked in,—and are they a bit, or a whit, or a jot, or a what-not more absurd, more extravagant, or more indicative of imbecility of reason, than the vagaries of a somnambulist, gravely going through the back-gammon of reading Back's Journal, or a back-number of the Retrospective Review, through the back of his head?

The correspondence touching Animal Magnetism, is carried on betwixt Mr Reuben Oxenham, (an honest Lincolnshire grazier, who fancies it some new plan of fattening cattle, patronized by the Duke of Bedford, at his show, or by that benefactor of the bestial, Lord Spencer—"Althorpe as was,") and his nephew, Mr Robert Holland, linen-draper in Tottenham Court Road. From him, the worthy grazier requests to be informed whether the magnetism is likely to supersede oil-cake and mangel-wurzel in fattening stock, considering it a main thing in these times to be put up to such secrets at the first start. To satisfy his uncle's rational curiosity, Mr Robert went to make inquiry and observation in person; or, "to examine a sample of animal magnetism," which turned out to have no connexion with such animals as Mr Oxenham was in the habit of handling, nor yet with magnets. He discovered it to be—

"All of a piece with juggling, quack-salving, and mountebanking, such as universal physic, spitting Coventry ribbons, tumbling and posturing, thimble-rig, and the like fabrics. One of the principal tricks is, sending people off to sleep against their wills; not so new a trick though, but it has been heard of, years and years ago, at Bow Street; and easy enough to perform any day with a pint of porter, provided one was rogue enough to want to hocus-pocus the money out of other people's pockets into one's own. To come to the point, there's an outlandish Count set up at the west end; and, no doubt, will realize a fortune. He has his carriage-people for customers, as well as Howel & James; indeed, I have heard of the Somebodies as well as Nobodies, running after common fortune-tellers' tales, and not too high to be above going up into their back garrets. Some say he is a Frenchman; others a German; but the last for choice, for he smokes enough to drive all the rats out of the neighbourhood. Besides, the Germans, I am told, will believe anything, provided it is impossible; which is some excuse for their wanting other people to give them the same long credits. . . . I determined to go wide awake, and to keep my eyes open too, by not taking bite or sup in the house, if offered ever so politely. It surely is shewing no disrespect to object to hocussed victuals and drinks. I might have spared my fears, however; for there was nothing provided but the legerdemain, &c., and that was charged a guinea for, which you can repay at convenience. I preferred to see somebody taken before me, and another patient was taken first. She was a fine strapping young woman enough, dressed between a fine lady and a servant-maid; but as sly-looking a baggage as you could select from an assortment of gipsies; and, unless her face belied her, quite capable of scratching a Cock Lane ghost. . . . Something came across me that I had seen her before; and, if memory don't deceive, it was at some private theatricals, contrary to law. For certain, she could keep her countenance; for, if the outlandish figure of a doctor, with his queer face, had postured, and pawed, and poked towards me with his fingers, for all the world like the old game of 'My grandmother sends you a staff, and you're neither to smile nor to laugh,' as he did to her, I should have bursted to a certainty, instead of going off, as she did, into an easy sleep."

"As soon as she was sound, the Count turned round to me and the company with his broken English—"Ladies and Gentlemen," says he, 'look at this young Maidens, Mizz Charlot Ann Elizabet Martin,' for that is his way of talking. 'Wid my magnetismuses I tro her into von state of somnambolzeism,' or something to that effect. 'Mizz Charlot Ann, dou art a slip.'

"As fast as a church, Mister Count," says she, talking and hearing every word as easy as broad awake. 'Ferry goot,' says he. 'Now, I take dis boka, Mizziss Glasse, Cokery, and I shall make do maidens read som leittle of him wid her back. Dere he is between her sholders. Mizs Charlot Ann, what you see now wit your eyes torned de wrong way for to look?" "Why, then," says she, "Mister Count, I see quite plain a T and an O; then comes R, and O, and S, and T; and the next word is H, and A, and I, and R."

"Ferry goot," cried the Count, over again, "dat is to rost de hair. Ladies and gentlemens, you all hear? As Gott is my shudge, so is here in de boke. Now, den, Mizs Charlot Ann, vons more. Vot you teste in your mouse?" "Why, then, master," says Charlotte Anne, "as sure as fate, I taste sweet herba, chopped up small!" "Ferry goot, indeed; but vat more bysides de sweet herrubs?" "Why," says she, "it's a relish of salt and pepper, and mace; and, let me see—there's a flavour of currant-jelly." "Besser and besser!" cried the Count. "Ladies and gentlemens, are not dese wonderfools? You shall see efery wort of it in de print. Mizs Charlot Ann, vot you feel now?" "Lawk-a-mercy, Mister Count!" says she, "there's a sort of stuffy feel, so there is, in my inside!" "Yaw! like von fool belly! ferry goot. Now, you feel vot?" "Feel! Mister Count!" says she; "why, I don't feel nothing at all; all the stuffing is gone clean away!" "Yaw! my child!" says he, "dat is bycause I take away de cookery boke from your two sholder. Ladies and gentlemens, dese is de grand powers of Magnetismus! Ach himmel! as Hamlet says, dere is more in our philosophies dan dere is de heafen r de cart! Our mutter nature is so fond to hide her face! Bot von adsept, so as me, can lift up her whale!" To shorten a long story, the somnambulism lasted for two hours; while Miss Charlotte Anne told fortunes in her sleep, and named people's inward complaints, and prescribed for them with her eyes shut. Mine was dropsy. . . . For my own part, I mean to suspend myself till I feel more symptoms; and, in the meantime, I have experimented on myself, so far as to try, behind my back, to read the "Ready Reckoner." But I could not even see the book, much less make out a figure. To be sure, I was broad awake; but it stands to reason that the circumstance only gave the better chance in its favour; at least, it has always been so with a book held the proper, natural way. To my mind, it is all Sham Abraham; or else the little boys, that ge every day with whole etchels full of books at their backs, would know more about them than they generally do at leaving off school."

Mr Holland thus leaves off in a postscript, and, after having discussed the subject with a neighbour, "a veteran surgeon," who told him animal magnetism "was all very well for the old men and women physicians; but it won't go down with the horse doctors." If Mr Hood's pasquinade do not shame the admirers of the exhibiting magnetizers, we despair of grave argument convincing them. Even from these indications, our readers may understand that, in fun, broad humour, and comic spirit, ever enlisted in the service of good sense and cheerful virtue, the ninth volume of this unique annual shews no abatement of original talent and vivacity.

The Comic Almanac

Is more than comical—it is satirical and moral; it conveys instruction under the guise of broad fun. But it is impossible to give any idea of its vein, without the cuts. In the chronology of the month of January we have the colonization of Botany Bay, upon the 26th of the month 1788, and these verses to Lord John Russell's "most profligate society on the face of the earth,"

"Rejoice and praise, in merry lays,
The wisdom of the wigs,
Which kindly found, on classic ground,
A paradise for prigs.

"Assembled there, in talent rare,
Each knave salutes a brother,
And friendly yet, their wit they whet,
By practice on each other."

31. Young Pretender d. 1788. N.B. Race not extinct.
April 3. Low Sunday. "Facile est descensus"——

8. Sir R. Peel resigned, 1835.

"To all the virtues of exalted station,
He adds the greater one of resignation."

This is for the anniversary of Charity Children's Jubilee, merrily termed "The Martyrdom of St Paul,"

"O Charity! celestial dame!—I cannot call thee maid, While ev'ry year thy children dear make such a grand parade.—"

Ah! 'tis a glorious sight to see thy little pauper brats
Parade the streets of Babylon, like demi-drowned rats.
Before the sun's begun to run, they're startled from their nest,

And by their anxious mothers in the parish finery drest;
And how those mothers' hearts must leap with gratitude to see

Their offering all so nicely clothed in that smart livery!
The girls all clad in worsted gowns, mob caps, and aprons white,

Like Lilliputian grandmothers—a venerable sight:
The boys in pretty blanket coats of green or brick-dust red,

With tawny leather breeches, and a thrum cap on their head;

And then that splendid pewter badge, worth all the rest beside;

No medal worn by hero could inspire more honest pride.
While to the neighbours they're a mark of pleasant observation,

How must their happy mothers bless a parish education!
It is so very handy, too, when in a crowd they're bawling,
To pick them out so easily, and save a world of bawling.

"Oh! merry day of jubilee to every little sinner,
When ev'ry one receives a bun and goes without a dinner.
Ah, happy England! thou'rt indeed a charitable nation!
Thy charities thou dost without the slightest ostentation!
How proud it makes a Briton feel to view this glorious sight,

Though some there are too dull to share the exquisite delight.

I heard a surly cynic once thus vent his angry spleen,
As he with jaundic'd eye beheld the animated scene."

We omit the splenetic effusion.

Among the sketches in prose or verse, there is a clever paper entitled, "Manners made Easy," written in ridicule of the absurdities in the numerous Codes of Etiquette that have lately come abroad. Here are a few of those guiding maxims, teaching how to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear:—

Never introduce your friends to strangers without their consent, nor permit such a liberty towards yourself, especially about November. Many have been entrapped into the hands of John Doe and Richard Roe thereby, unawares.

Choose rainy days to pay your visits on. You will thus shew your sincerity, and be less likely to miss callers at home. Take your cloak and hat into the drawing-room—to leave them below would be like one of the family; but, above all, carry in your umbrella,—you have no right to leave it streaming in another person's hall.

When you visit your maiden aunt, as you value your legacy expectant, preserve an amiable face, and keep your hands and feet to yourself, while her favourite tom cat reposes in you the height of his friendship by looking you full in the face, and vigorously stretching himself by the aid of his ten talons, hooked through your tight and tender kerseymeres.

Never marry a widow, (unless her first husband was hanged,) or she will be always drawing unpleasant comparisons.

When a lady sits down to the piano-forte, always volunteer to turn over the leaves. To be able to read music is of no consequence, as you will know that she is at the bottom of a page when she stops short. If you turn over two leaves at once, you will probably have the secret thanks of most of the company.

When your friend enters the room, instantly rise, and, though there may be half a dozen unoccupied chairs at hand, draw him with gentle force into your own. You will thus shew the warmth of your friendship; for a damp seat may be as bad as a damp bed.

Never hesitate to take a friend with you, when you go out to dinner. Disappointments are so frequent that the lady of the house may perhaps be glad of a spare gentleman, to fill up a gap.

In carving, remember that "twere well it were done quickly." He must be, therefore, the best carver who soonest fills the greatest number of plates. Waste no time in asking if people like a wing or a leg, this bit or that—many do not know their minds on any subject. Besides, as they cannot all have the prime cuts, nothing but discontent can ensue from giving them the choice.

As too much of a good thing is morally impossible, fill the plates well—the delicate can leave half, and the modest are saved the unpleasantness of a second application; besides making the hostess your eternal friend, if, through your management in the outset, some of the dishes go away uncut for another day.

Instead of waiting for the dessert, let your children come in with the first course—they cannot be used to good society too soon.

Help the darlings first—they are dearer to you than mere visitors, to whom you might, otherwise, inadvertently transfer some delicate bits on which the little cherubs had set their minds.

Do not detain the toothpick long after dinner, it's unpleasant to be kept waiting for it.

Always wipe the brim of a pot of porter with your sleeve, if you are about to hand it to a lady.

There are several copies of lively and clever verses; but perhaps the heroics on the Queen's visit to the city come most pat at the present time. We give the end of them:—

"Now the best of the fun is just begun; for, prancing, may be seen

The handsome Common Council men, in their gowns of mazarine,

And the sheriffs bell, in their chains of gold, and not disposed to quarrel, Though one the song of Moses sings, and the other a Christmas Carol.

And each Alderman fat, in his three-cock'd hat—so comely, one by one,

They stately ride, with their grooms beside—no doubt to hold them on.

'Tis the Mayor of course, outside a horse, with the sword of state before him,

He looks in his pride, from side to side—How the prentice boys adore him!

Hurrah! Hurrah! she comes this way—stand firm to see her pass!

Well, what have you seen? Why, not the Queen, but the glare of the window glass,

Oh, I'm going wild! have you seen my child? from above I let him fall—

Yes, there he rolls on the people's polls, and he'll soon be at Guildhall.

That little crowd, they scream so loud, it pierces through and through you;

It's all the charity girls and boys a-singing 'Hallelujah.' And 'Live the Queen!'—'tis a lovely scene—did you hear that cracking note?—

'Tis a little lass, in the second class, she's burst her little throat.

And now the bells ring round again, and the cannon loudly thunder,

But, before we go, do any know which was the Queen, I wonder?

I saw the Queen, she was dressed in green, and a gold tiara crown'd her—

No, I rather think that was her in pink, with the silver all around her.—

In pink or green she never was seen, but she wore a robe of red,

And she rode a horse, as a thing of course, with a fur cap on her head.—

I think it's plain we shall know her again, so now we'll quit our station,

And will take a turn, when the gas-lights burn, to see the illumination.

See crowns and stars, and bright V.R.'s, and wreaths and garlands pretty,

And laurels green all round the Queen, and mottoes quaint and witty.

Here's 'Wax and Wicktorias' (Cowan, in gloria.) 'May she long wear her crown' (Alderman Brown.) 'Ourselves and the Queen' (Pellatt and Green.) 'She'll ne'er have her match, if she reads the Dispatch,' (says that jolly farmer, Alderman Harmer.) 'Success to Regina and Essence of Bina' (inscription good, by Matthew Wood.) 'Long live the Queen, to drink Black and Green,' (Mr Twining, in bright lamps shining.) 'None shall dare to affront her' (Sir Claudius Hunter.) 'In a lot we'll knock down all the foes of the crown,' (a desperate go, by Fairbrother and Co.)

But none of the sight gave such delight as the Aldermen and the Queen,
And throughout the land, such spectacles grand will never again be seen."

The Rural Life of England. By William Howitt.

This long-promised work, composed upon, perhaps, the only subject that never waxes stale, has just come forth in two handsome and prettily-embellished volumes; and these by no means slim or sparse. Much of the world lying at our door is absolutely unknown to us. "Life in the Dales of Lancashire and Yorkshire," introduces us to manners, and usages, and a dialect, as primitive as those of the days of Chaucer. It does one good to learn that so much of rustic, Merry England, still exists in integral simplicity; and that so many stately ancient halls and sequestered hamlets, and bits of forestry, adorn those "nooks" which slumber beautifully on, unheeded by nine-tenths of mail-coach and railway travellers, and unheeding the march of improvement. The headings of a few of the chapters will indicate their pleasant contents:—"Life of the Gentry in the Country;" "Country Sports;" "Gardens;" "The English Farmer;" "The English Farm Servant;" "The Forests of England"—(a charming series of chapters); "Cottage Life;" ditto, and "Popular Festivals"—best of all; and also giving place to many chapters. We cannot imagine whence the sober-minded Friends derive so much poetical fancy and graceful devotion to the beautiful. The work will delight the reader by its freshness and amenity, and as a record of the fast perishing usages and enjoyments of THE RURAL LIFE OF ENGLAND.

Dr George Redford's Lectures on the Holy Scriptures.

These Lectures were delivered at the Congregational Library, London, where a Course of Annual Lectures was established at the commencement of the Institution. The Lectures are afterwards published by the committee of management; and those before us are, we suppose, among the first fruits of a scheme by which the Congregationalists intend to rival in usefulness those worthies who established the Warburton and the Dampton Lectures; and all the others which have emanated from the zeal of Churchmen. The subject of this course is the Authenticity and Divine Authority of the Bible, which are established by proofs drawn from the whole circle of human knowledge.—Dr Wardlaw's "Christian Ethics," and Dr Vaughan's "Causes of the Corruption of Christianity," have previously appeared as fruits of this Lectureship; and its publication well deserves the support, not only of Congregationalists, but of all Disenters.

The Church in Ephraim; or, Expository Remarks upon the Prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah.

Our chief inducement to notice the publication of this book is, its being the production of a female pen, and that it has some affinity to the subject of Redford's Lectures. Farther, in the face of so many periodical publications wholly devoted to works upon religious subjects, we shall not presume to go.

Conversation's Lexicon. Parts XLI., XLII.

This work is hastening to a conclusion. It has reached the letter S. The present part, among other articles, contains "Rome" and "Russia"—the latter a useful paper, though undue prominence is given to the Russian-German war, which occupies space that would have been as well bestowed upon the manners and customs of the various tribes now included in the unwieldy empire of the Czar, and fuller geographical and topographical descriptions. Part XLII. contains the important article, "Scotland."

Outlines of Naval Routine. By Lieutenant Alexander Dingwall Fordyce, R.N.

This work is intended as a manual, or work of reference for seamen. We are not qualified to pronounce upon its fitness to supply or acknowledge merit; but great pains appear to have been bestowed upon it by an intelligent practical seaman. Sailors dislike publishing. They have an idea, that those only write upon nautical subjects who know least about them. Hence, according to our author, "every old admiral or officer who dies, carries with him to the grave a fund of professional information, which, if communicated to the public, might have been of great importance to the service." Lieutenant Fordyce, late of his Majesty's ship Algerine, resolved to keep and collect the notes which are now arranged in order. He modestly disclaims the name of "S;stem" for his work : but states that his "Outlines" are of a nature to indicate a system, in which, if he is encouraged, he may, assisted by the experience of friends and brother officers, proceed to complete. The work is appropriately inscribed to the Earl of Minto. If it merit encouragement, which we have every reason to believe, it will certainly receive it from the proper quarter, which is the Admiralty.

Dr Dick's Celestial Scenery.

The well-known popular author of the Christian Philosopher and other works, in which science is blended with religion and morals, has devoted a thick volume to the Astronomy of the Planetary System; the system we call our Solar System, that of our sun, his planets, and their satellites. The title, probably meant to be catching, is partial and incomplete, as Celestial Scenery is but one feature of this elaborate and instructive work.

Mary Raymond and other Tales. By Mrs Gore.

The tragic story which occupies the greater part of the first of these three volumes is original, and of the shorter Tales, it is said—"a few have appeared anonymously in popular Miscellanies." This Magazine, as its diligent readers will perceive, has been illustrated by many of these stories. We are glad to meet them in a collected form, and nothing that Mrs Gore has written, excels several of these tales, over which touching pathos and the playful graces alternately flit, in tears and smiles. A more cheerful tone, a shade more of the couleur de rose, is all that we have to desire in her sketches. We do not object to being steeped and dissolved in sorrow in the course of a story, but to being left in this heart-aching, disconsolate, and hopeless condition.

Memoirs of John Rattenbury, a West-of-England Smuggler, commonly termed "The Rob Roy of the West."

Age is stealing on this hardy tar, and poverty has preceded it. From his Diary and Journals, a Memoir has been compiled, with a view of benefiting the veteran, by the profits of publication. The preface states, that the name of Rattenbury has long been familiar to the public, and his exploits a theme of conversation from the little fishing cove of Beer (where he was born) to the rocky shores of Vesta; from the islands surrounding the coast of Normandy and Brittany, to the Land's End. In the sixty years of his pilgrimage, Rattenbury has seen enough of vicissitude, and suffered sufficient hardship. His Autobiography is a better illustration of the contraband trade, and the inutilty of the preventive service, than Miss Martineau's tale of "The Loom and the Lugger." It proves that restrictions on industry and trade, are thrice cursed, the smuggler not being the least sufferer. Rattenbury was a skilful pilot, as well as a bold, daring, adventurous smuggler. This gives variety to his history.

A Manual of Conduct; or, Christian Principle exemplified in Daily Practice. By the Author of "The Morning and Evening Sacrifice," "Farewell to Time," &c. &c. Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black. Pp. 453.

This volume is the essence of a much larger and very elaborate work by the same author, published some years ago, and entitled "The True Plan of a Living Temple." Without making any comparison between the relative merits of the bulkier work and the present compendium, it may be safely surmised that the book has gained by the absence of much speculation, and that the abstract is likely to be more popular and extensively useful. Of the shorter work, we can affirm what the North American Review says of an abstract of the "Living Temple," published in the United States—"That for those who are seeking in earnest their moral and religious improvement, who desire a book which shall help them as a friend helps a friend, and who, in their hours of serious reflection, prefer the still small voice to that of passionate appeal, this will be a welcome publication." The author is, we believe, a minister of the Church of Scotland.

A Letter, by Dr Ayre of Hull, to Lord John Russell, upon Asiatic Cholera, Repudiates the notion of that dreadful disease being infectious; objects to quarantine regulations; and, best of all, instead of so much cleaning, and fumigating, and drugging in hospitals, recommends generous meat diet, as the surest preventive of the disease. It is not without feasibility that its spread is attributed to the innutritious, unwholesome, or insufficient food of the poorer classes.

A Letter

Has been addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury by the Curate of Swalecliffe, in consequence of his being publicly cited to answer for alleged heretical doctrines before the ecclesiastical authorities of Canterbury. The Letter is worthy of attention from those who prefer the investigation of truth to unquestioning submission to authority.

The Miseries and Beauties of Ireland. By Jonathan Binns. London: Longman & Co. 2 vols.

No right-hearted, intelligent man, ever yet set foot on the emerald sod, be he Whig, Tory, or Radical, without loving "Ireland and the Irish" the better, the more nearly he looked into their character and condition. Mr Binns, who went to Ireland as an Assistant Poor-Law Commissioner, is no exception to this rule. His book, dictated by a kind and liberal spirit, abounds in important, if homely details; and is full of the sort of information which we should delight to see made familiar to the whole people of Great Britain. Mr Binns enjoyed excellent opportunities of acquiring information, and he has made good use of them. He is, besides, a practical agriculturist.

Some Account of the Life and Writings of the Celebrated Rabbi Maimonides, the celebrated "Egyptian Moses."

This is the first of a set of curious Tracts, of which those published are upon the Laws of the Jews relating to "The Poor and the Stranger;" "The Judaic Law as Opposed to the English Military;" "The English Pauper-Law, and Factory-Slave Law;" and "Testimonies to the Fertility of Ancient Palestine." The whole of these Tracts are the pleadings of an advocate of justice and mercy, who has devised this ingenious mode of making the voice of humanity be heard. The Pamphlets display considerable erudition; and, to render them more generally attractive, as well as to illustrate the text, they are embellished with numerous wood engravings. Some of the Tracts are exact translations from Maimonides; others are original compositions. The Author is a decided enemy to the Factory System, so far as over-working and beating children are concerned; to the Flogging of Soldiers, and to the New Poor Laws.

Yarrel's British Birds.

A few more parts are published—the letterpress shows the opinions and the newest facts collected by the leading naturalists. The engravings of birds are beautiful, lively, and true.

Burke's Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland.

Two more Parts of this amusing and curious work, the XIV. and XV., have appeared. Independently of its main purpose, we consider it exceedingly interesting, from the antiquarian details, and also as a domestic history. In this respect the notes are peculiarly valuable.

Rowbotham's new Derivative and Etymological Dictionary of Words, having their origin from the Greek and Latin Languages.

A useful school-book. A perfect work of this kind would supply to such children as have neither fortune nor time for classical education, one main use of classical attainments, in being able to recognise the origin, and, hence, the full force and meaning of all English derivatives.

Duties of the Young.

The alleged object of this little treatise is to form the moral character of youth upon the basis of good sense and practical piety. With somewhat of formality, and ultra-precision in small matters, it appears a plain useful code of instruction and self-discipline.

Temple's Christian's Daily Treasury. Second Edition.

In it, a brief religious Exercise or Meditation is given for every day of the year. To each section a suitable text of Scripture is prefixed.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

ATTENTION during the month has been absorbed by Canadian affairs, and intelligence from North America has been looked for with the greatest anxiety. We have not yet received any account from the insurgents, of the immediate causes of the revolt, or why they took up arms, when—as far as has yet been seen—they were so ill prepared to enter into a contest with the power of Britain. All the intelligence yet arrived is from the Tories, or rather the Orangemen of Canada, of whom their brethren on this side of the Atlantic boast that there are not fewer than 16,000 in the Upper Province alone. We, therefore, believe that very little reliance is to be placed on the statements we find daily reiterated of the revolt being entirely quashed; for we have seen enough to convince us, that the Whig and Tory press are willing to resort to any device, to delude the People as to the real state of matters in this most important colony. A week or two ago, we were told by the London daily press, that the insurgents were completely dispersed, tranquillity restored, and all possibility of hostile collision at an end; but, a very few days afterwards, we found that, amidst all this tranquillity, Sir John Colborne had found himself under the necessity of putting himself at the head of three regiments, six pieces of artillery, a large body of volunteers—in short, the whole disposable force of the province—to attack a body of insurgents who had taken up a strong position within twenty-five miles of Montreal. Sir Francis Head also was so confident of the loyalty of the Upper Province, that he sent all his troops from Toronto to the assistance of Lord Gosford; and, no sooner had they departed, than he found himself besieged in his own seat of government, obliged, for safety, to embark his wife and family in a steam-boat, and indebted for his own personal safety to the gross mismanagement of his antagonist, who, instead of making an immediate attack on Toronto, and seizing the Governor and the 6000 stand of arms which had been left there under the charge of the magistrates and constables—many of the inhabitants being favourable to the insurgents—allowed himself to be amused with negotiations, while a force was collecting to oppose him.

Meanwhile, matters are going on in the same course with the Canadians as with their southern neighbours sixty years ago. One measure of coercion follows another in rapid succession. The first was to plunder the Canadian exchequer, which may be compared to the Stamp Duty Act of the old provinces. The next, which it needed not have required three weeks nor three days to concoct, is to abolish their constitution. Suspension is what is held out; but abolition is, in reality, what is intended. This is of a piece with the suspension of the trade of Boston, to punish the inhabitants of the province. During the recess of Parliament, it was whispered that the suspension of the sittings of the Legislative Assembly was to be only for one year. The bill actually suspends them to 1st November 1840. The winter of 1840 is, in prospect, somewhat stormy, and, therefore, no longer suspension is at present ventured on. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof! It is impossible to think of suspensions without recollecting that of cash payments by the Bank of England. On Sunday, the 26th February 1797, was the meeting of the Cabinet Council, requiring the Bank not to pay their notes in cash for three weeks.—They ceased to pay for twenty years! On Sunday, the 14th January 1838, Ministers were so busy in suspending the constitution of Lower Canada, that the Queen could not attend "divine service in St George's Chapel, and did not leave the Castle; but was engaged the greater part of the morning in state affairs." We hope that we are not again to have a reign parallel in events to that of George III.; but we have similar elements to commence with—a young Sovereign, an imbecile Ministry, discontented colonies, and foreign enemies, under the mask of friends, ready to pounce upon us in the first moment of distress. We see the same ignorance, and the same confidence, that preceded the loss of the older States; the same apathy among the People; similar misrepresentations on the part of the aristocratic press; the same contempt of the power and influence of the colonies; the same eagerness to enter into an unjust and unholy war, in which no honour nor advantage can by possibility be gained; and in which victory will be ruinous and defeat disgraceful.

Assuming, what appears to be the universal opinion, that the insurrection in the Canadas will be completely put down before the end of this year, what is the situation of matters? We will then be in possession of a territory 1400 miles from east to west, and from 200 to 400 miles from north to south, comprising nearly 600,000 square miles, with a population so much discontented as to have in both provinces out-voted, in their Legislative Assemblies, by immense majorities, the governing power, and subsequently risen in arms. How many soldiers will it require, and what will be the expense of keeping up the authority of Britain in this vast and hostile country? We may judge from this circumstance. Ireland, with a much larger proportion of its population than the Canadas, favourable to British rule, with all its representatives supporting British connexion, and not containing above 35,000 square miles, not one-tenth part of the superficies of Canada, requires from 20,000 to 30,000 British troops to maintain tranquillity; and, although in a more peaceful state at this moment, than at any former period, not a soldier can be spared. Where are troops to be got for this service? Can Irish soldiers be employed to put down men like themselves, aliens in language and religion, and suffering under grievances similar to their own? Lower Canada is lost to Britain. In disputes between a mother country and her colonies, there are vestigia nulla retrorsum. The attempt to conciliate will utterly fail; and in the attempt, the Earl of Durham will lose the remainder of the popularity he still possesses. The inhabitants of Lower Canada will spurn a commission, by the constitution of which the Upper Province is put on an equality with themselves, and used to trample them under foot, and in which commission all their grievances are sure to be voted frivolous. But we have exceeded our limits, and have only room to protest against the further continuance of a most absurd, a most unjust, and, however it may end, to this country a most ruinous quarrel.

ENGLAND.

OPEN VOTING, OR THE BALLOT.—We observe that the names of the voters at Stockport, and how they voted at last election, have been published. This is as it ought to be. If we are not to have secret voting, let us have open voting in reality. At present neither the non-electors nor the great body of the voters, know how votes have truly been given, and have no readily-accessible means of ascertaining the fact. If open voting is really useful, it can only be under a system of publication; and we recommend that, in future elections, lists of the voters should be published. We particularly direct the notice of such of the non-electors to this, as consider the electors hold a trust for their behoof. The expense of publishing the lists in most constituencies would not be considerable; and we doubt not that the sale would go far to reimburse the expense. We shall revert to this subject at the proper opportunity.

SCOTLAND.

THE ANNUITY TAX.—As this is the month in which the compulsory collection of this tax begins, we consider it our duty, as the newspaper press has allowed the matter to pass over in silence, to explain how things at present really stand. By a unanimous decision of the Court of Session, acquiesced in by all parties, it has been found that the whole money collected under name of Annuity Tax for eighteen years, from 1818 to 1836, has been illegally exacted, owing to the Stent-Masters not having been appointed in terms of law. This is a settled point. The results of this decision are—1st, That the arrears prior to 1836, amounting to £8000, cannot be collected; 2d, That all persons, who, during that long period have been imprisoned, or who have had their goods distrained and sold, including, of course, the whole body of Quakers, have good actions of damages against the Chamberlain, as well as all other persons concerned in such proceedings; 3d, That all persons who paid Annuity Tax, during the eighteen years specified, have claims for repetition against the City, and are entitled to rank and draw dividends, with the other creditors of the city; 4th, That every person now assessed for the Annuity Tax, and who paid any part of the illegal exactions in the years between 1818 and 1836, is entitled to withhold the tax for this year, and for every subsequent year, until the sums illegally exacted from them, with interest, are repaid. It is clear that this issue of the cases in which compensation can be effectually pleaded. From what we have stated, it is perfectly plain that, if the inhabitants of Edinburgh act on this occasion with ordinary firmness, they have it in their power, before this year is expired, to put an end, in unquestionably the most legal manner, to this obnoxious tax. If, on the other hand, they do not use the legal weapons with which the Court of Session has armed them, the inference that will be naturally drawn is, that the agitators for the repeal of the Annuity Tax are not serious in their opposition, and that, therefore, they no longer deserve the support of the citizens.

JUDGES' SALARIES.—We understand that another attempt is to be immediately made to obtain an increase of the salaries of the judges of the Court of Session; and we have great reason to fear, from what took place when the subject was last before Parliament, that the attempt will be successful. A Bill is now before Parliament for making some new arrangements and reductions in the inferior offices of the Court; and although full compensation is proposed to be given to those whose emoluments may be curtailed, or whose offices are abolished, so that no saving from the reduction will accrue to the public for twenty or thirty years, yet this contemplated reduction is to be made in Parliament the ground for an augmentation of salary to the judges. The Lord President at present receives L.4,300 for 114 days' attendance in Court, averaging two hours' sitting a-day; so that he is paid at the rate of L.17 : 10s. each hour he is in Court! Suppose he were to work, like other people, 300 days in the year, for eight hours a-day, and to be paid at his present rate, his salary would be L.42,000 per annum! The Lord Justice-Clerk has L.4000 a-year; five of the other judges, in addition to L.2000 of salary for the Court of Session, have L.600 more, as Commissioners of Justiciary, and several of them have other L.600 a-year as Commissioners of the Jury Court. In addition to all this, they are entitled, after fifteen years' service, or when "afflicted with some permanent infirmity," to a retired allowance of three-fourths of their salary during life—and this regulation is not allowed to remain a dead letter. The present salaries were fixed in 1810 during the heat of the war, when the expense of living was much higher than at present, and the business of the Court much more extensive; and, as we are confident that there are not thirteen men in Edinburgh who have a joint income equal to the aggregate salaries of the judges, we have no hesitation in saying, that an increase of their salaries is totally indefensible, and a downright plundering of the public. Is it upon this service that Lord Meadowbank has been so long in London, not only neglecting his duties in the Court of Session, but leaving a bare quorum of the Commissioners of Justiciary during the last three days of the cotton-spinners' trial? If any of the three Judges left had been indisposed for a single day, this case could not have been properly tried, solely owing to his Lordship's absence; for they could not have been convicted after the last day to which the trial extended—the 13th; and the two other justiciary judges were necessarily in Glasgow!

THE LAW PROFESSION.—Although law business of all kinds continues to diminish yearly, the numbers of the profession rapidly increase. The society of Writers to the Signet now consists of 703 members, 24 of whom have entered last year; and, if we add to these, 240 solicitors entitled to practise in the Court of Session, and look at the number of cases before that Court, we shall find that more than one lawsuit cannot annually fail to be conducted by each practitioner. To entitle him to practice, he must annually pay a license of L.12 to the Stamp-Office, under the severest penalties. But, what is still worse, it appears that the whole conveyancing of Scotland has fallen off one-half during the last twenty years; yet this is the time chosen for the Judges asking an increase of salaries, and for expending, without the slightest necessity, £40,000 or £50,000, on two new Court rooms, which, we believe, are unequalled in Europe in point of commodiousness and elegance!

PUBLIC MEETINGS.—We have had two public meetings in Edinburgh during the month. The first, on the 3d January, Mr Fraser in the chair, on the subjects of the English Poor-Law Act, the grievances of the Canadians, and the Cotton-Spinners' trial—was addressed by the Rev. Mr Stephens, Mr Feargus O'Connor, Mr Beaumont, and Dr Taylor. An attempt was made to hear both sides on the Canadian question, and the result was the most extraordinary scene of noise, uproar, and confusion, probably ever witnessed at a public meeting. Although the supporter of the Government measures against the Canadians spoke, or rather read a newspaper, for upwards of twenty minutes, only a word now and then, which he screamed out at the utmost pitch of his voice, was heard. Mr Stephens, who was stated in the placards to be "the most eloquent man in England," naturally excited some expectation; but, as soon as it was discovered that his topic was the New English Poor-Law, his voice was drowned with yells; and cries of "Canada," "Canada," "Canada," were vociferated at the end of each sentence. It was quite plain that the agitators of the Repeal of the New Poor-Law met with no sympathy from the working classes of Edinburgh. These persons should know that the workmen and labourers of Scotland, so far from looking to poor-laws as a resource for living in idleness, when they have dissipated their wages in debauchery and extravagance, or even as a resource in times of destitution or sickness, regard it as disgraceful that even their aged parents should be supported by any other means than the labour of their children's hands. A man or woman able to work, has, with us, not even legal claim to relief, however destitute; and, over the greater part of Scotland, no such things as poor-rates exist. We are advocates of a Poor-Law; but this state of matters, so far from being considered a grievance, has always been the proud boast of our workmen and peasantry; and nothing is felt so humiliating as to accept parish relief, which is never received but under the compulsion of absolute necessity. Great as the complaint is about the diet given in the English poor-houses, it is better than that of a great part of even our middle classes; and it is vain to come here to agitate Poor-Law Repeal, the more especially when that agitation is combined with support of the Corn Laws, and of the prohibition of the importation of foreign beef and mutton, oxen, or sheep. We, in this end of the island, are still so ignorant as to imagine that, if provisions of all sorts were at half their present price, the condition of the working-classes would be improved; that cheap food, by enabling us more effectually to compete with foreigners, would extend the market for British manufactures; that such extension would increase the demand for labour, and raise the real value of wages, because the rate of wages depends on nothing else than the demand for labour. Mr Beaumont's anathemas against what he calls "Middle Class Government," met with still less attention. We wish we were the length of Middle Class Government. Without the Ballot, the middle class only seem to elect the House of Commons: the real electors are their employers, customers, and landlords. The consequence is, that we are governed by an aristocracy, under the name and pretence of a monarchy, dictating to the throne and oppressing the People. Nothing, in fact, tends more to maintain in power that aristocracy, than setting up the ignorance of the working classes against the middle, opposing every practicable and attainable reform, supporting the exclusive privileges and grinding monopolies of the landed interest, and opposing the Ballot, and other essential reforms, till universal suffrage be obtained.

The other meeting was held on the 11th January, in the Cowgate Chapel. Mr Gillon, M.P., was in the chair, and the resolutions were moved by the Rev. Mr Turnbull, (a Dissenting clergyman,) Messrs Cruickshanks and Howison, (of the Society of Friends,) Mr Burton, Advocate, Mr Tait, and others. It is highly discreditable that the Established Clergy of Scotland, the ministers, as they ought to be, of peace, have not raised their voices against the unholy Canadian War. The object of the meeting being confined to Canada, and the resolutions against the Whig and Tory treatment of the Canadians, and the addresses of the speakers, being both moderate, the utmost quietness, order, and unanimity prevailed, though the number of persons present at this meeting was treble those at the former. Among the working classes of Edinburgh there is but one opinion in regard to the atrocity of the proceedings of the Ministry towards Canada, and very few of them, indeed, approve of aiding the Tories, by placing the working men in opposition to the middle classes, by whose co-operation alone any measure can be carried through Parliament.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the last crop, now that farther opportunity has been obtained to judge of it, are less favourable than we anticipated: as will be seen from the following excerpts from the county reports. Perthshire.—With respect to the quality of last crop, we have, in some measure, been disappointed. The farmers, in general, complain of the wheat, and, in particular, of the barley, exhibiting a coarser and lighter sample than was expected. Fife.—The yield is much complained of, both as to quantity and quality; much, or rather most of the barley samples being under 50 lbs. per bushel, and wheat under 60, which is fully two lbs. per bushel lighter than last year's crop; so that, unless a very material improvement in the price takes place, this must prove the least profitable crop to the Fife farmer that he has experienced during the present century. Roxburghshire.—The wheat is inferior in quality. Turnips have also turned out a rather deficient crop. In East Lothian, they have brought from £8 to £9 per acre when consumed on the ground, and from £12 to £16 when carried away. Markets continue dull for home grain; for it is an article no one will speculate on, under the present Corn-Laws. On the other hand, the price of foreign wheat in bond has risen 2s. a-quarter; the accounts from the United States of America of the last crop being unfavourable, and by purchasing foreign grain there is the chance of gain not only in the rise of price, but in the fall of the duty. When will our farmers come to the conviction, that to them—as to all the other productive classes—dear corn is injurious, and that fair profits for capital and industry can exist only in conjunction with cheap food? Was there ever a period in the history of any branch of industry, so disastrous as that of agriculture, since the laws against the importation of foreign corn came fully into operation, in the year 1815?

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

The effects of the derangement of the currency in America last year still operate on our manufactures: for it will require the whole of this year at least to pay off the debts already contracted, so that few new orders for goods can be expected. Although, however, no great briskness exists in any branch of trade, except the iron manufacture, tradesmen, generally speaking, obtain employment, though at wages, in many instances, lower than they have of late years been accustomed to receive. But there is in reality no great ground of complaint. Fluctuations in the supply and demand of manufactured commodities are probably unavoidable, though they are rendered both more violent and of more frequent occurrence from the artificial system of commerce presently existing among civilized nations. The great principle which has actuated statesmen for the last two centuries, is to create a balance of trade in favour of their own country—that is to say, to endeavour, by all means, to export goods to a greater amount than they import, on the assumption that the balance would be received in bullion; our wisemen thinking that gold and silver alone constitute wealth, for no better reason probably than that these metals have been generally coined into current money. It has never occurred to those who are at the head of nations, that the only true policy is to leave trade free; for by this means alone, will every nation betake itself to the production of those commodities for which the climate, soil, nature and habits of the people, and geographical situation of the country adapt it. They have never, for example, been able to see, that, by employing a hundred men in Britain, on the manufacture of iron or cottons, and a hundred men in Prussia growing wheat, a greatly larger quantity both of iron and wheat will be produced, than if the employments of the men in Scotland and in Prussia were reversed. Till this small degree of illumination not only reaches, but is acted upon by "the powers that be," throughout the civilized world, the great body of the People must content themselves with being periodically starved, whenever they have, either by too much industry, created an oversupply, and consequent glut in the markets to which the disposal of their labour is confined, or whenever operations on the currency, or retaliatory acts—such as the Custom-House league of Germany—are resorted to by one state, because another conducts itself with greater folly than itself. The behaviour of nations towards each other, is precisely similar to that of spoiled children. The Germans, for example, can buy better cottons, and the French better cutlery from us, than they can, at the same cost, either make themselves or procure elsewhere; and we can purchase better wines, corn, cattle, sheep, from them, than we can either buy elsewhere or raise; but, because it has been found impossible to arrange among the statesmen of the different countries, a system of reciprocity as it is called, all the three nations, in revenge, not perceiving that in punishing their rivals, as such each is pleased to consider the other, they are, at the same time, punishing themselves—continue, generation after generation, to produce, each within its own territory, commodities which they could get much more cheaply from abroad; while branches of industry, peculiarly fitted for each country, are neglected or despised. Well might Oxeinestern exclaim—"Quam parva sapientia gubernatur mundus!"

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

MARCH, 1838.

ABOLITION OF NEGRO APPRENTICESHIPS.—STURGE AND HARVEY'S TOUR IN THE WEST INDIES IN 1837.

"How delightful," said Mr O'Connell, in a private party, soon after the passing of the Slave Emancipation Act, "for a black lady of seventy to go to bed some night an old slave, and rise next morning an apprentice!" The members of the Society of Friends, without indulging in the wild play of humour upon so grave a subject which is apt to beset an Irishman, appear to have come to the same practical conclusion as to the worth of the Twenty-Million Act; and, indeed, some of them, and of every body of Abolitionists, disapproved from the first of apprenticeships; and, in principle, protested against a law which, affecting to abolish slavery, re-established it, for a term of years, upon a new footing. Those who, in thankfulness that a measure, struggled for during half a century, was finally obtained, though at an enormous price, were contented to accept abolition, even with the clog of the apprenticeships, have now practically seen their error, and are, at this moment, the most zealous for the immediate abolition of the modified slavery. The "old ladies"—condemned to a transformation which might have been as amusing as that of a Christmas pantomime, had it not cost so much money—are found, with their posterity, to be in a worse condition than when actually slaves. Those who received from the struggling people of Great Britain, partly as a boon—for their property in the flesh and blood of their fellow-creatures never was recognised in this Christian land—and partly as a premium for training their apprentices to the trade of free citizens, twenty millions sterling, principal and interest, have violated a compact sacredly entered into, and by which they were gainers. The bill had scarcely passed, and the measure been received by the negroes with thankfulness and tempered exultation, instead of the outbreak of lawless violence which their conscience-stricken oppressors anticipated, when intelligence reached England that the planters were obstructing its beneficial operation, and evading or openly setting at naught its most important clauses. These murmurs came across the Atlantic, louder and louder; and, shortly, specific complaints were made, and facts of injustice and cruelty condescended upon, which could not be denied. The condition of the apprentices in Jamaica, in Barbadoes, and British Guiana, was described as equally bad, and, in some respects, worse than that of slavery, from which, at so immense a sacrifice, they had been emancipated by the British people. The apprenticeship system fell into suspicion and disrepute, especially when the example of Antigua was pointed to. In that island, apprenticeship had never been adopted. The legislature, scorning the fears, real or pretended, of the other colonists, had at once proclaimed universal freedom; and the population, in a single day, passed quietly into the natural condition of free labourers and free masters. On the triumphant success of total emancipation in Antigua and the Bermudas, where, and also in several estates in other places, it has been fully tried, those who now call for the immediate abolition of apprenticeship, rest the wisdom of their demand; while its justice is grounded upon the bad faith of the planters, who, having pocketed the compensation, refuse to hold to the conditions of the bargain. The British people complain that they have been defrauded; that apprentices are neither treated with justice and humanity in their present condition, nor prepared for that into which they are about to pass: and the only redress they ask is, that an end shall be at once put to a system not only abortive but mischievous to all classes. They demand that universal freedom shall be proclaimed from August 1838, instead of the stipulated period of 1840. This demand is even more reasonable than at first sight may appear. The whole of the apprentices comprehended under the class non-predials—such as domestic servants, artisans, and every description of negro apprentice that is not an actual field-labourer—are entitled to freedom in August 1838, or two years sooner than the predials were presumed to be fit for the enjoyment of man's birth-right. The case of Antigua has proved how mistaken was the opinion which declared any class of the negroes unfit for freedom; but, as neither individuals nor governments like to be convicted of errors of judgment, that may be passed. But will Government, will Parliament, now that the evils of the apprentice system are proved beyond a doubt, and the safety of immediate emancipation established to the satisfaction of every reasonable man—will they now lend an ear to the voice of the country, speaking with greater unanimity and energy than upon any former occasion, save perhaps the Reform Bill? In one day, Lord Brougham presented fourteen petitions for the immediate abolition of negro apprenticeship; one of them from Leeds, signed by 16,000 individuals. Large meetings have been and are being held in London and other towns, which shew the most determined resolution; and the subject will soon be brought before the Upper House of Parliament, by the indefatigable champion of the oppressed of every clime and colour—Henry Lord Brougham. The ladies of Great Britain have not looked on with indifference, in a matter peculiarly interesting to female sympathies. The negro mothers, the young free children, and the infants born free, have been and must continue the especial victims of the apprentice system. Above a half million of the women of this country have, it is estimated, taken an active part in the national movement for immediate abolition; and we see, by the newspapers of the day, that a petition for it, signed by above 4,500 ladies, had just been presented to the young Queen.

In the midst of this agitation—and we have only referred to the ruffling surface, not to the deep-heaving ground-swell—the volume of Mr Sturge appears very opportunely. This gentleman is a Quaker. The inconsistent and contradictory accounts received from the West Indies, touching the results of the dear-bought Abolition Act, and the ambiguous character of the Report of the Parliamentary Committee, induced him, in company with three other gentlemen—Mr Harvey, Dr Lloyd, and Mr Scoble—to embark for the West Indies, to examine on the spot, judge for themselves, and faithfully report to the public what they had seen and heard. With the exception of Mr Scoble, all the party were Friends. They went out wholly unfettered, and unconnected with any society—“private persons, yet engaged in what was properly a public work.”

Dr Lloyd and Mr Scoble sailed from Barbadoes for Demerara. Of Mr Scoble's report, although part of it is, we believe, printed since he returned to England, we are unable to speak; but the details in his speech at the late London meeting, are appalling, and—we would fain hope, from the evident warmth and irritation of his feelings, when speaking of certain individuals in the colony of Demerara—rather over-coloured. But this may not be the case; and, at all events, we are on sure ground in the journal of Messrs Sturge and Harvey. At the very outset, the writer of the journal remarks—“It may surprise many to be assured, that the subsequent details are stated with moderation; and that a vast mass of facts is yet in reserve, capable, not only of confirming what is here narrated, but of deepening the shades of their darkest representations.”

The inquirers sailed from Falmouth to Barbadoes, which they reached on the 12th November 1836, and at once commenced the objects of their mission. There is no literary surplussage in this grave and earnest volume; and it is so choke-full of important facts, that we shall, we think, better consult our duty, in arranging plainly such of them as bear the most directly upon the question which now so deeply agitates the public mind, than in following the route of the tourists through their different stages. In short, we have adopted an arrangement of our own, which first brings under view the actual benefit which the colonies had derived, more than a year since, from the Emancipation Act, and especially those in which it was not clogged with the apprenticeships against which humanity and justice are lifting up their voices in Britain.

It is not easy to determine whether, in some respects, emancipation, with compensation and other concomitant advantages, has not benefited the planters as much as the slaves. We have abundant evidence that many of the slave proprietors were upon the verge of ruin when that noble and munificent arrangement was made between them and the British People, the conditions of which they have so ill kept. A person from Demerara, who was the fellow-passenger of the English party from Barbadoes to Antigua, spoke highly of the liberality of the government. “You may depend on it,” he said, “though few like to acknowledge it, it has been the salvation of nine-tenths of us.” He knew thirty or forty planters, whose mortgages would have been foreclosed before this period, had not the question been settled at the time and in the way it was. Property has increased in value, from the date of the free system, in every one of the colonies. A grazing estate in Antigua, of 196 acres, of which the half had been some time ago offered for £400, has recently been sold for £2,600. A planter near Wiloughby Bay gave a most encouraging account of the free system. Before emancipation, out of 110 slaves on the estate, he could sometimes scarcely muster seventeen or twenty in the field. The expense of their maintenance was £27 a-week; now he has fifty-seven free labourers, (for our readers will recollect that apprenticeship was at once abolished in Antigua,) and these are paid only £15 weekly. This gentleman complained bitterly of the small thanks this step had obtained from the home government; and the general feeling is that Antigua is in disgrace at the Colonial office for rejecting apprenticeships. Yet the measure has worked well; and there is nothing more satisfactory in the course of the tour than the report of the improved condition of Antigua. Before emancipation, several properties were on the point of being abandoned; nothing save the legislative measure could have saved them. One is instanced, possessing 400 of the finest slaves on the island, which was so inextricably involved, that the proprietor in England had turned his back upon it, and would neither receive nor answer his agent's letters, who had thus no means of carrying on the cultivation, and was also embarrassed by prosecutions for the legal maintenance of the negroes. Abolition emancipated the planters, one of whom compared the connexion between the slave and his owner to the ligament which bound together the Siamese twins—one of mutual inconvenience. Superfluous hands, or rather mouths, were dismissed, and cultivation was resumed with a fair prospect of success. Some estates had already thrown off their load of debt, and others had passed into the hand of capitalists, who can effectively cultivate them. The Governor of Antigua, Colonel Light, spoke very favourably of the working of the new system. The labourers were more industrious, and the expense of cultivating estates less. A gentleman, long resident in the island, remarked, that the people had improved much in dress and appearance. Sham sickness has disappeared since the labourers were their own masters; and the planters save considerably, among other things, in medical attendance. They have no fear of not obtaining labourers. "Give me a supply of cash," said the manager of an estate, "and I will take off the largest crop it may please Providence to send." His people, he said, worked more regularly; and they willingly undertake task-work when the reward is for themselves. Their wages have become higher every year, from increased industry:—"Some had been stimulated to more industrious habits. One of the most worthless women on the property, once always pretending sickness and inability to work, had become as industrious a labourer as any on the estate. He asked her, on one occasion, the reason of the change in her habits. She replied, significantly, 'Me got no money then, massa.'"

On one estate, before emancipation, three coopers could not supply the requisite number of sugar hogsheads; and extra hands were hired on Saturdays—the slave's own day—at four shillings a-head. Now, two coopers are found sufficient, at two shillings a-day each, to make the hogsheads, and also the rum puncheons, which were formerly purchased ready made. Dr Nugent, an intelligent gentleman in Antigua, is of opinion, that, under the free system, the saving is great to those planters who depended on imported supplies for their slaves, but less where they were fed on rations of ground provisions grown upon the estate. On the average of the whole island, he believes the saving considerable. The credit of the planters is improved; and English firms, formerly seeking to reduce their securities, are now willing to extend them. There is much more bustle and appearance of prosperity in the town and harbour of St John's. Still there are important exceptions; and much remains for time, care, and enlightened and humane principles, to effect. The condition of the labourers—of slaves who have, at one leap, risen to the dignity of freemen—is unequivocally improved; yet the matured fruits of religion and morality are not the growth of a day, nor yet of one or two generations. The aged and infirm, no longer entitled to a legal provision from the masters, are suffering in some instances; and, though morals are improving, and schools in operation, one reads with pain such anecdotes as this which follows, of the Moravian School at St John's:—

A number of the scholars recited some passages of scripture, and the whole school sung a hymn before breaking up—exercises which they performed very well. Dreadful evils are occasioned to some of these scholars, from the lax morals of a part of the white inhabitants of the colony. Within the last three months, three girls have left the school in consequence of having formed improper connexions with white men. The last instance was one of their most promising scholars, a girl about seventeen, who, it is believed, was sacrificed by her mother for gain.

These things are considered trifles in the West Indies. At the Metropolitan Girl's School, in Spanish Town, Jamaica, we are informed:—

There were at one time four or five children of a late Governor, the Duke of Manchester; and one of its present teachers is the daughter of the Duke's celebrated secretary, Bullock. Her freedom was purchased, some years ago, by the English patronesses of the school. The dreadful state of social disorganization in Jamaica, is legibly written even on the surface of society. Its "bad eminence" is doubtless to be attributed, in part, to the corrupting influence of the long administration of the above-mentioned Governor. The matron of the school shewed us some nice specimens of plain and ornamental needle-work. We also heard several classes read, and examined them in spelling and arithmetic. The children were neatly dressed, and very clean. Many of them are apprentices; of whom fourteen coloured girls are sent by their attorney from a single estate in the neighbourhood. They are intended to become teachers of estates' schools.

In Antigua, one planter, who is a clergyman of the Established Church, believed that, on the whole, there was an improvement in the moral condition of the people. There were now no frightful outbreaks of the furious and vengeful passions of the slaves. Yet the negroes of Antigua had passed through no preparatory or transition state. Christmas 1834 was the first Christmas-day on which martial law had not, as a matter of course, been proclaimed. The Moravians alone venture to observe the 1st of August, the day of abolition, as a solemn occasion of thanks and jubilee, though the planters discountenance the observance; and some of our readers will remember that, in Jamaica, the day of abolition, to which the planters looked forward with trembling, dreading the retributive vengeance of the negroes, was spent in devotional exercises.

Even those labourers who find their wages inadequate to the comfortable maintenance of their families and aged relatives, and who suffer from many other causes, still value their newly-acquired freedom. A negro with whom the tourists conversed, and who was recommended to them as a man of strict veracity, complained of many hardships; yet he emphatically blessed his deliverance from the lash and the dungeon, at the pleasure of his owners, as, "Thank God, a great deliverance from bondage!" On their way back one day to St. John's, the Friends inquired of several negroes whom they casually met, about their change of condition. They acknowledged that it was much improved—"Thank God," said one, "we are a hundred times better than before!" Yet they complained of low wages. These men were all members of churches, and we will afterwards see the useful nature of the discipline of the religious communities to which they belong.

The comparative improvements in the condition of the rural population are not to be enumerated. They are not flogged, or locked up. They are their own masters, free to go or stay. They receive money wages, whilst they retain all their old privileges, except their allowances of food and clothing. A common source of dissatisfaction formerly was their food. They became tired of yams and Indian corn. Eddoes (another farinaceous root) would almost create mutiny. The law, too, did not prescribe how their rations should be distributed; so that corn was sometimes given them in the ear; and, thereby, a vast increase of their labour occasioned, perhaps in crop, by their having to parch and pound it. Now, they provide themselves with what they like; and are, therefore, better, if less abundantly fed. They are also much better dressed. Many make themselves ridiculously fine on Sundays. It is not uncommon, on that day, to see ladies, who toil under a burning sun during six days of the week, attired, on the seventh, in silk stockings and straw bonnet, with parasol and gloves; and the gentlemen in black coats and fancy waistcoats. . . . If they cultivate their grounds less than before, it is to be attributed to the drought, which has rendered it unprofitable to expend labour upon them. They do not work so well on the estates, except when they are on task-work; but, though task-work has not yet been extensively introduced, the cane cultivation is well adapted to it. Drunkenness is not a vice of the negro. His temptations are stealing and lying. Dances are a great source of demoralization. They sometimes aspire to suppers and even champagne, so called; and most absurdly give sums of four or five dollars for the honour of opening the ball, besides money to their partners. This tempts to robbery. If any change for the worse has taken place in their morals, it is in the case of domestic servants.

The people are much more easily and pleasantly governed than during slavery. The proprietor has less "care" and care, less bodily and mental fatigue, and infinitely less annoyance of all descriptions. Every difficulty used to be referred to him; constant disputes were to be settled, as to the work to be done by females, &c.; now, he has no need to interfere. The disputes are carried to the magistrate.

Would those slaves of slaves, the planters of the Southern United States, and their over-tasked helpmates, but take a lesson here! One entry is peculiarly indicative of a happy change:—

26th.—We went this morning through the market, which was largely attended. Almost every sort of eatable commodity was exposed for sale; fruit, fish, meal, besides bundles of sticks and grass, cotton prints, &c. &c. The scene was a highly animated one, but the proceedings were conducted with great order. Previously to the abolition of slavery, the market was principally supplied by the agricultural peasantry, with articles of their own raising; but now this class are more generally buyers than sellers; and a large proportion of the merchandise is of foreign growth or manufacture. The increase of trade thus created, is one consequence of the payment of labour in wages.

Two gentlemen from the United States (we presume abolitionists) arrived at Antigua, on a tour of inquiry, just as the English party were leaving the island. Their report cannot fail to be favourable as to the results of Emancipation. They were afterwards met in Jamaica. Many of the negro dwellings have been rebuilt since the year of deliverance, and now consist of one or two apartments of tolerable size, kept very clean, and furnished with a four-post bed, and other articles. The kitchen is always a detached shed. On some estates, the negro cottages have been enclosed since 1834, by neat fences, by the labourers themselves, and their whole conduct shews that they have no intention to remove from their original habitations.

Where the outlay has been greater than in the years of slavery, the returns of the estates have been proportionably increased, while improvement advances. A small chapel, in which a school is kept, is frequent on the best managed estates. On one estate, the proprietor is erecting new works, and thirty new houses, at an expense of several thousand pounds. The labourers' cottages are built on three sides of a square, in the centre of which a school-house is to be erected—an excellent social arrangement. In fact, schools, it would seem, are established almost universally; and we meet with very frequent notices of them. Upon the whole, when the American inquirers, Messrs Thome and Kemball, go home, their report of the state of Antigua, and of the effects of immediate and total abolition, must be favourable. Our countrymen, Messrs Sturge and Harvey, sum up the result of their patient inquiry with judgment and impartiality. They were a month in the island. They were well received, and had every opportunity, public and private, of satisfying themselves. They had free and full communication with all conditions of men, from the Governor of the colony to the negro returning from his daily labour—clergymen, schoolmasters, medical men, judges, barristers, planters, managers, persons of colour, and, above all, the emancipated slaves themselves. With considerable discrepancy of opinion on different subjects, all agreed on one—"The great experiment of abolition had succeeded beyond the expectation of its most sanguine advocates."

Some, indeed, affect to regard the future with apprehension; but none will deny that the new system has hitherto worked well; or will hazard a declaration of preference for slavery. Many speak in emphatic terms, of the annoyances they have escaped by the change, and of the comparative comfort with which they now manage their estates. The measure has been felt to be one of emancipation of masters, as well as slaves, from a most oppressive bondage.

The annual cost of cultivation is believed, by the most intelligent resident planters, to be, on the average, one-fifth or one-sixth less than formerly; so that free labour is manifestly advantageous, taking even the narrowest view of the subject. The general advantages, however, of the change, imperfect as they have been yet developed, would have more than compensated for a considerably increased expenditure. There has been an augmentation of the import trade of the island. Houses and land have risen in value. Estates are now worth as much as they were, with the slaves attached to them, before the alleged depreciation of their value, in consequence of the agitation of the abolition question. The cultivation of one estate, which had been thrown up for twenty years, and of others which were on the point of being abandoned, has been resumed. The few sold since 1834 have been eagerly bought up at very high prices. . . . The negroes buy considerable quantities of provisions from the plantation stores, and occasionally other agricultural produce.

But miracles are not to be looked for; and when these gentlemen were in the colony, it should be recollected that only two years had elapsed from the date of emancipation. The prospective advantages must be incalculably greater than those yet realized. Among these, the following are enumerated as likely to accrue to the proprietors:—

The embarrassed planter will no longer have the opportunity of purchasing his annual supplies of food and clothing for his negroes at exorbitant prices. His estates will pass in time into other hands, which can carry on the cultivation efficiently. It is anticipated that the present expensive and absurd system of agency and management will be gradually changed, by absentee proprietors leasing their estates to tenants or other representatives, who will thus acquire, as a resident proprietor, a direct interest in the improvement of the island. The planters will gradually release themselves from their servile dependence on the merchants. Under the present system, with a few exceptions, they are obliged to consign their produce to one mercantile house, instead of being able to choose the best market. Freedom is "an ever-generating principle;" its gradual and progressive operation rather than the amount of good, considerable as it is, which has hitherto been effected, marks the contrast in Antigua between the present and the past.

On the blessings which must attend emancipation to the negroes themselves, it would be superfluous to expatiate. We already see some of them realized, in their improved domestic circumstances and habits; and in the germ of civilization rooted in pure Christianity. The American gentlemen will have to report no incredible tales of a Negro Utopia. They will have to tell of a people not yet "elevated above the stage of moral and intellectual childhood," but in a rapid state of improvement. It is stated, that there is probably,

At the present moment, a larger proportion of persons under the pastoral care of ministers of religion, and also of children receiving education in the schools, than in any part of the parent country. The children in the schools are very docile, and give abundant proofs of natural quickness and capacity. They easily acquire the more mechanical parts of learning, as reciting, singing, reading, and writing. Opportunity is rarely afforded them of advancing beyond a certain point, as they enjoy only the benefits of the routine of the English infant and Lancastrian systems.

Combinations are in every one's mouth at present. When the slaves were emancipated, without passing through the intermediate state of apprentices, the masters in Antigua combined to give them a very low, uniform rate of wages—a shilling currency (fivepence halfpenny sterling) per diem. They could not, however, wanting the cart-whip, compel the labourers to give more work than the shilling's worth. The agreement was evaded in many ways; and now labour is generally unshackled. They either undertake task-work, or work by the job, or they bargain for their Saturdays with their employers, and work for wages on their privileged day.

Montserrat was the next field of observation. In that island, it had been proposed to imitate Antigua by the abolition of apprenticeships; but the bill was lost in the Assembly by one vote. Here

The planters had made an agreement with their negroes, to allow them provision grounds and two entire days, besides the Sabbath, in lieu of all allowances; the latter performing the legal amount of forty hours' labour per week; in four days, of ten hours each. This arrangement is, under ordinary circumstances, as compared with what Antigua, a very advantageous one for the apprentices; but, about a year ago, a hurricane, followed by a severe drought, so completely destroyed their grounds, that the planters feared they would be obliged to support them by rations, according to the provisions of the Leeward Islands' Amelioration Act. They, therefore, proposed to surrender the apprenticeship. Five estates, on which the apprentices were liberated, are quite as efficiently cultivated by free labour as they were before.

The negroes of Antigua are ready to become tee-totalers; those of Montserrat are addicted to rum. The stipendiary magistrate said—and many of his brethren in other islands repeated the same thing—that his duties were becoming less onerous, by the decrease of offences; everywhere their increase is more apparent than real, as appeals must now be made to the magistrates in hundreds of petty cases which the overseer formerly judged and punished at his own good pleasure. A majority of the Assembly at Montserrat are persons of colour. Dr Dyett, the Speaker, is a man of colour; and, when the tourists re-embarked, he refused any compensation for their entertainment, because they were the associates of those in England who had always shewn sympathy with his class, as well as with the slaves.

At Dominica, they met William Lynch, Esq., one of the stipendiary magistrates, a man of colour, and highly esteemed, both in England and the West Indies, for his intelligence and piety. In company with this gentleman, they visited several estates, and found, upon the whole, the condition of the negroes, and their character and intelligence, inferior to those of Antigua. Instances of fraud and oppression, of cruelty, and a disposition to take advantage of the ignorance of the blacks, were found here, as in every island. In Dominica, originally a French colony, nearly the whole population are Roman Catholics, and speak the French language. Yet they are anxious to learn English; though there is a lamentable deficiency of the means of education. In the schools seen, the children shewed no want of quickness and docility. This romantic and beautiful island is not without its moral cases; and, to sweeten so much dry matter, we must treat our reader to this delightful sketch of its natural charms.

The near view, from the sea, of the hills and ravines is extremely grand. They are covered with luxuriant tropical verdure, and trees loaded with fruit and flowering shrubs, to the water's edge; except where the cliff, sometimes for considerable distances, presents a perpendicular face of rock. Dominica is truly a highland country, a land of mist, and rainbows, and mountain torrents. The beds of the valleys are the sites of the principal estates, and the light green of the cane fields is in beautiful contrast with the deep, rich verdure of the hills which enclose them on either side. We arrived in about two hours at our destination—a free village at the mouth of a considerable stream. We proceeded to the cottage of a respectable old negro woman, who keeps a shop for the sale of bread and provisions, the only one, we believe, in the island, except in the towns. The Stipendiary has taken a room in her own house, which has been fitted up for his accommodation, when unavoidably compelled to be more than a day from home. His landlady has been ten years free. She is now upwards of eighty years of age, has never been married, but has always borne an irreproachable character. She appears to be a person of very cheerful piety, and exercises, we are told, the happiest influence over her neighbours. She is a class leader among the Wesleyans, who have a chapel in the village, where service is usually performed every Sabbath, by one of the missionaries or a local preacher. She is a bright example of usefulness and true respectability in a very humble sphere. Her house was in nice order, and very clean, and the adjoining gardens neatly fenced.

The scenery of the islands often calls forth the warm admiration of the tourists. The Hillsborough estate in this island, makes a perfect tropical picture.

It occupies a perfectly level plain of considerable extent, limited on one side by the line of bamboo which marks the course of the river, and shut in on the other, in the form of a half circle, by a hill, apparently almost perpendicular, except on one sloping side, which is occupied by the negro gardens and huts. On the height above them, is the manager's house, which is again overtopped by mountains, but which is still lofty enough to command a view of the works and cane fields, spread out like a map, with the sea front in the distance. A large stone vault, at some distance from the house, is used as the burying place of the white residents: and near the same spot also is a handsome tomb erected over the remains of a former attorney of the estate, at each end of which is a magnificent palmetto, or cabbage-tree, with trunks as straight and columnar as if chiselled out of marble. This is a much more beautiful palm than the cocoa-nut tree, though at first sight they would usually be confounded by an European. The manager kindly provided us with horses and mules, to make a little excursion up the valley. Our path was just wide enough for the animals to pass, with the river below us on one side, and a wall of rock many hundred feet high on the other, sometimes so absolutely perpendicular as to be free from vegetation, but usually covered with shrubs and creepers.

This bright picture has its shades; though we are told that here a change of system, from cruelty to enlightened humanity, has now been adopted. The opinion here was in favour of total emancipation. One negro said, he found little difference between the condition of slavery and apprenticeship. As a slave, he had never been flogged; but a magistrate had ordered him thirty-nine stripes for being tipsy and riotous. The manager agreed that the apprentices were no better off, and that total emancipation would be best for all parties. A new mode of indulgence was adopted on one part of this estate: the negroes, who are continually stealing canes, were allowed to raise a quantity for themselves, and received the produce in sugar, with the deduction of one-third for the use of the mill. It is thought the meteyer system may yet extend to some of the colonies. Much of Dominica is in coffee plantations, though a great deal of the island has never yet been even explored, save probably by the Maroons. Antigua, an arid region, receives all its water from the heavens; while Dominica, a mountain country, is watered by delicious streams. The tourists visited a proprietor, believed to be the oldest white man on the island.

His estate is situated immediately above the sea, and there is a parapet wall, to prevent children and animals from falling down a precipice of several hundred feet into the water. This, like the two preceding, was a coffee plantation, in a state of transition into a sugar estate. He is eighty-five years old, and of most venerable appearance; his long, white hair flowing down upon his shoulders. He is very infirm, but retains his mental powers, and much of his French vivacity. His wife is slightly coloured, and still older than himself. He seemed delighted to see and to converse with us. His reminiscences extended over nearly three quarters of a century. Forty years ago, he remembered expressing to an Irish Catholic priest, his conviction that the negroes would some time or other be emancipated. He mentioned also some great lady having told him, that the nineteenth century would be distinguished by great earthquakes and commotions, which he considered to be a metaphor prophetic of Abolition. He was very much amused by one of us telling him, when asked to take wine, that he had drunk only water for the last eight years. He said "the frogs drink water—you are a frog," &c. Though, however, the idea of total abstinence from distilled and fermented drinks, appeared both to amuse and astonish him, yet he acknowledged he owed his advanced age to his temperance. He drank a glass of wine himself, "to the success of our good cause." This benevolent old gentleman seemed to live in patriarchal style in the midst of his people. Some of the young children almost lived in his house, and served to amuse him with their play; one who was present, received his supper from the table. The negroes on this property, we were told, have doubled their numbers within the last twenty years. Nothing can be a greater contrast than the condition, appearance, and manners, of the people on some of these properties of the old French residents, and of those on even the well-managed English estates. On the former, there has generally been an increase, and on the latter a striking decrease of numbers.

Both in Guadaloupe and Martinique, the question of emancipation naturally excites great interest. The coloured proprietors in the latter island have petitioned for immediate and total abolition; and, were the other proprietors satisfied that the example of the British Government, in granting liberal, if not enormous compensation, would be followed by Louis Philippe, all would probably join in the petition. Messrs Sturge and Harvey touched at Martinique. They found the planters labouring under great ignorance of facts, and the natural prejudices of slave-owners. Slaves have fallen in value; and the colony is suffering in its trade, while a large military force is necessary to maintain subordination. The general opinion was, that emancipation is at hand; and one person had bought a dozen slaves cheap, speculating on compensation. The government appeared to be fitting the people for change, by encouraging education; and, exactly as we write, 15th February, a bill has been brought into the French Chambers, by M. Passy, which, however, recognises no term of apprenticeship, and appears a very bad modification of the English Abolition Act, with a few improvements, suggested by the experience of its working. Husbands and wives are not to be separated; and stipulations are made for the better care of children, and consequently of mothers, which is quite as necessary to the planters as to the negroes. In the British colonies, the severity shewn to pregnant women and nursing mothers, and the neglect of infants, since 1834, is diminishing the negro population. Under this bill, which is likely to pass, the total abolition of slavery in the French colonies cannot take place for probably fourscore years; as only children born after its passing will be free. The slaves are to have the same right of redemption which apprentices in the British colonies have—namely, that of purchasing their freedom. The French bill will be viewed with great dissatisfaction by sincere abolitionists, whether in France or Great Britain. Already the slaves of Martinique were occupying to the British colonies of Dominica and St Lucia, crossing the intermediate channels on rafts; and the intelligence that, for the living race, there is no hope of freedom, will make more runaways. There are already 600 of these settled and usefully employed in St Lucia.

At St Lucia, the governor, Sir Dudley Hill, gave a very favourable account of the condition of the negro population; but it was not confirmed by others to the same extent. Dr Robinson, a member of council, did not think the condition of the blacks in any respect improved under the new system, or that they would be better prepared for receiving freedom in 1840 than when the Abolition Bill passed. The mortality among the free children had been great. A considerable disparity between the numbers of the sexes is observed here, and in other islands. The same number of each is born; but half the males die before twenty, while only a third of the females die within the same period. This gentleman imagines the cause of this remarkable difference to be, that severe labour is more injurious to growing youths than to negro girls, who attain earlier maturity. The negroes here revere the memory of Jeremie. A tune, called "President Jeremie," composed by them, was played on Christmas Day, by the military band who paraded the streets. The two sugar estates of Mr Muter, in this island, are well managed. He is an enlightened and liberal man, who has successfully adopted those new modes of cultivating the cane which have been tried in Mexico; and which admit, to a considerable extent, the substitution of animal for human labour, in weeding and hoeing the plants. The original language and religion of the colonists still place difficulties in the way of education. The resident proprietors are chiefly French, who, in the humane treatment of their slaves might, at all times, we imagine, have been advantageously compared with the British. Of one planter we hear, who gave two of his head negroes a piece of ground on his coffee-estate, to cultivate canes; and lent them money to erect a small mill. In the first year, they made a profit of sixty pounds; and he reasonably concludes that, if free, they would be well content to become his tenants. The discoloured state of morals among a part of the whites in this, and over all the West Indies, is such that it cannot be described in a work intended for general circulation. To counterbalance this painful statement, we learn that marriages are increasing in all the islands, among the apprentices, and that a visible improvement is perceived in their morals, and in those of the coloured people.

In Barbadoes, the tourists received much contradictory information, and saw very much to lament and disapprove. The former governor, Sir Lionel Smith, now governor of Jamaica, is not, apparently, a favourite with the Friends. While in Barbadoes, he did much good, but he also tolerated or sanctioned many questionable measures. In Jamaica, his policy has not become more liberal; and his recent weak assent to the most obnoxious clauses of the Planters' Police

Bill, upon its renewal, never, we are persuaded, can obtain the sanction of the Home Government. Lord Stanley and Lord Aberdeen are morally as much bound to repress this iniquity as the present Colonial Minister.

Shortly after their arrival, the tourists relate—

We called to-day upon several persons, intimately acquainted with the state of the colony, and regret to state that all the information we received, is of an unsatisfactory nature; with the single exception, that the proprietors are prosperous, and that the island was never in a higher state of cultivation. One gentleman, who is in the interests of the planters, informs us that the small estates are worth double what they were five years ago; and that estates then valued at twenty thousand pounds, would now fetch thirty-five thousand. Our informant said, he came out to Barbadoes with English feelings on the subject of slavery; but his residence in the colonies, and the acquisition of slaves, appeared to have given him a most unfavourable impression of the negro character. He complained particularly of his domestics. Though most anxious to be rid of them, he said they were such wretches that, for the sake of society, he could not conscientiously emancipate them. He was obliged to have three grooms to look after one horse, &c. Without at all concurring in a general extension of these sentiments to the non-predials, it is generally allowed in the colonies, that the apprenticeship has had a more unfavourable effect on their character than on that of the field labourers. Other disinterested persons speak unfavourably of the condition of the apprentices. The stipendiaries are, perhaps, with a single exception, accustomed to share the hospitalities of the planters. . . . The free children are much neglected. After 1834, many of the planters turned them off the estates, provoked by the disappointment of their expectation, that the parents would consent to apprentice them; an expectation which was baffled by the perseverance of the mothers, acting under the advice of the governor, Sir Lionel Smith. This extreme measure against the free children, was happily not persevered in; but cases have recently occurred where it has again been resorted to.

The mothers are universally apprehensive and suspicious, lest the freedom of their children be invaded. In some cases, they refuse to let them receive medical attendance, or any assistance from the planters, lest a claim should be established on their liberty by the masters—lest they should, in some way, be made thralls. One must respect this honourable maternal feeling, even when it is the result of ignorance. "The child is free, and I will do nothing to bind him," say the black mothers. Their distrust of seeming kindness, is the same feeling which frightens the mother of an English peasant, at a Sergeant Kite offering a shilling to her son. Distrust is one of the inevitable vices of a slave, and of all men suffering under forms of injustice much short of slavery. It finds a lurking-place in the bosom of the Irish peasant; and is becoming strong among the labourers of Great Britain. Magistrates, ministers, and schoolmasters, who associate with planters and overseers, instantly forfeit the confidence of the negroes. They look for nothing but injustice from the stipendiary or special magistrate "who dines with Masses," and distrust the schoolmaster who associates with the overseer of the plantation. A Wesleyan minister, in Barbadoes, a good preacher and an excellent man, at once lost the confidence of his sable flock, and his usefulness, by marrying into a planter's family. The negroes said—"He eat with manager, and he drink with manager, and manager tell him what to say to we." There is but too much cause for distrust of the magistrates; as is seen in very many cases, which fell under the immediate observation of the English inquirers, in their attendance at the courts. At Bridgetown, Barbadoes, the stipendiary magistrate informed a female—a domestic, or non-predial apprentice—who was willing to pay her hire, of a half dollar a-week, to her master, but claimed the right of choosing her own employers—

"You are the property of your master, and he can do what he likes with you. You must not think you can go and work where you please. You are his property; he can make you stay at home to do his work, or he can hire you out to any person he thinks proper." Such is the position of the nominally emancipated negro, and such are the doctrines maintained by a functionary, appointed to carry into effect an act for "The Abolition of Slavery." The magistrate told us, that the non-predials were fast buying out their time; he sometimes registered thirty manumissions in a month.

In Jamaica, one day, when a man wished to be valued before a special magistrate, in order to buy up his time—cases in which the grossest frauds are practised by the holders of apprentices—

The special magistrate, who is supposed to be especially intrusted, in valuations, with the interests of the apprentice, said to the two local magistrates associated with him, "Whatever you say, gentlemen, I shall be satisfied with." One of them appraised the man at seventy pounds, the other at forty-four pounds. The stipendiary wrote the two sums on paper, and added sixty pounds as his own estimate; the average of which amounts fixed the value of the apprentice at fifty-eight pounds. . . . The business of this court was conducted in a manner and spirit than which it is difficult to conceive anything more objectionable.

In Barbadoes, as in all the other islands, property has risen in value since the Emancipation Act passed; and the price given for estates proves that there are no serious apprehensions that they will not, after 1840, be profitably cultivated by free labourers. Barbadoes is stated to have received an undue share of the general compensation, so that the planters have hitherto benefited far more than the apprentices. The Barbadoes Legislature was the last to pass an act for the Abolition of Slavery, as required by the Home Government; and we learn with regret, that the planters have succeeded in moulding apprenticeship into a perfect resemblance to the slave system, which they so unwillingly relinquished.

An equal, if not a greater amount, of uncompensated labour, is now extorted from the negroes; while, as their owners have no longer the same interest in their health and lives, their condition, and particularly that of mothers and young children, is, in many respects, worse than during slavery. . . . The little that was wanting to make the apprenticeship the heavy burden that it now is to the negroes, has been supplied by Sir Lionel Smith's "scale of labour." The prejudice against colour is stronger in Barbadoes than in any other colony, although the coloured class of its population is numerous, wealthy, and respectable, and comprises some of the first merchants of the island. No coloured student has yet been admitted within the walls of Codrington College. The public opinion of the colony is powerful, and exercises an unfavourable influence.

Many, who have a deep sense of wrong in the existing belief of the natural inferiority of the blacks, and in the prejudice of caste and colour, are not endowed with the moral courage requisite to justice. Barbadoes is called Little England; but, in this shameful thrudom of opinion, it as well deserves to be called Little America. Though the pre-slavery faction is louder and more turbulent in Jamaica, it is not so tyrannical as in Barbadoes. In Jamaica, the minority of whites assert a freedom of thought and independence of action, which the same class in Barbadoes dare not venture.

The remainder of the time devoted to inquiry by the tourists, was spent in Jamaica, to which they went by a steam-vessel, about the middle of January 1837, and quitted for New York on the 14th April. Their first visits were generally to churches and schools—we mean to the preaching stations of the Baptists, Methodists, and Moravians, and the schools for the instruction of negroes and coloured children. They went to established churches also; for, in the West Indies, a few clergymen who, in colonial language, "are worse than Baptists," may be found. On the evening after their arrival, they attended the anniversary of the Jamaica Bible Society. Five or six hundred persons, mostly black or coloured, were present; and contributions from children were given, earned by them as the teachers of grown-up or old persons among their neighbours and relations. The tourists shew some indulgence to the impatience of European slave-holders, with their troublesome and provoking black domestics; and yet justly convert the indolence and bad qualities of the negro servants into an argument for freedom. A gentleman in Kingston remarked, that the heart and temper were often put to a severe trial; and that, in Jamaica, a man could learn more of his true character in a few months, than in England, (where all domestic affairs go on smoothly,) in as many years.

Shortly after their arrival in Jamaica, the Friends became acquainted with Mr S. Bourne, a special magistrate, whom the negroes like to have as a judge of their complaints, while their masters say that "his interference occasions more punishment than the misconduct of all the apprentices in the neighbourhood." His interference consists in listening to their complaints, and recommending them to the proper quarter for redress of grievances. We doubt not that some of the complaints of these poor ignorant people may often be sufficiently "frivolous and vexatious;" but Mr Bourne, if he errs at all, errs on the right side. His influence, unlike that of the majority of the magistrates, is thrown into the scale of the weak and the oppressed.

The tourists remained for some time at the Botanic Garden, near the residence of Mr Bourne, that they might have an opportunity of attending his courts. This gentleman—like popular and trust-worthy judges all over the world, and even, for instance, in the Supreme Courts of Scotland—has many more cases brought before him than falls to the share of his brethren. The apprentices believe him impartial and their friend, and accordingly prefer him to that fluctuating character "the nearest magistrate." The complaints brought before Mr Bourne, by the overseers on estates, were sometimes as frivolous, and often more unreasonable, than the most capricious complaints made by the apprentices. An entry like the following, affords much more satisfaction than the proceedings of petty courts, which, we fear, even in cooler latitudes than the West Indies, where the poor and the rich come into collision, are often too much of the same character.

4th.—Yesterday and to-day, we have had striking proofs, from our own observation, of the industry of the negroes, when working under a proper stimulus. As we went to our lodgings, which are nine miles from town, late in the evening, we met several parties of two or three men, women, and even children, coming down from the mountains with heavy loads of produce on their heads, from their own grounds, for the Kingston market. Some of them had mules loaded, besides the burdens they carried themselves. We could hear other distant parties, in the mountain passes and defiles, singing cheerful songs, to beguile the tediousness of the way. Many come a distance of twenty, or even thirty miles, and pass the night in the open air on the road. English carrots, cabbages, and artichokes, besides yams, and other roots and fruits of the country, were among their supplies.

The negroes construct their own houses, make their own clothes, cultivate their provisions with their own hands; they use oil of their own pressing for their lamps, and wicks prepared from cotton growing at their own doors. We inquired of two apprentices in one of the huts, if they were married. They were not, though they had lived three years together, and appeared sensible that they ought to be. This large and extensive parish, though it is one of the longest settled in the island, is nearly destitute of opportunities of religious improvement. S. Bourne, who resides near the Botanic Garden, has a Sunday school at his house, which we visited; it was attended by ten men, who were learning to read and write, and several boys in an alphabet class. One of the former was the head man on a neighbouring large estate. He was asked why so few children now attended the Sabbath school from that property, and replied, that the attorney disturbed and unsettled the people, or, to use his own phrase, "made their minds chatter."

In speaking of the unwholesome exhalations from the immense swamp lying between Kingston and Spanish Town, it is remarked:—"In any other than a slave country, it would have been drained, and would now be teeming with exhaustless supplies of agricultural wealth." The bogs of Ireland are, we presume, no exception.

Alexander Bravo—the Friends Mister no man—is one of the most remarkable persons whom they met in Jamaica; liberal and humane, and, moreover, a sound political economist. He has no fears that the free negroes will not work for wages, and that continuously.

He finds no difficulty in purchasing all the labour that his own people have to sell, besides the spare time of many from adjoining estates. He considers slave labour, of all others, the most uneconomical and expensive; and is persuaded that twenty free men are equal to one hundred slaves.

They visited two of this gentleman's estates, which afford a very favourable picture of West India management.

On the first estate which we visited, our host is erecting one of the most handsome and substantial mansions in the island. It is beautifully situated on a gentle acclivity, commanding a view of the sea, from which it is distant three or four miles. It is built by the labour of his own apprentices, with materials supplied from his different estates. The work would do credit to English artificers. We could not but regard it as a monument of the confidence of a liberal and enlightened proprietor in the permanent prosperity of the country under a free system. On these estates, the most judicious means have been adopted, to habituate the people to work cheerfully for wages, and we are assured with complete success. The proprietor has introduced task-work and remuneration, and has recently substituted money payments on a liberal scale, in lieu of all allowances of clothing, salt-fish, sugar, rum, &c.; and, in order to accustom his people to spend money, as well as earn it, he has established a shop on one or more of his estates. Many of his principal negroes receive salaries, varying from five to sixteen pounds per annum, besides liberal wages for their extra time, their house and ground rent free, and the pasturage of a few hogs, cattle, or horses. We were requested to make our own inquiries of the negroes, and accordingly entered into conversation with a number of them. One complained of the discontinuance of their allowances of salt-fish, &c., since Christmas. He was reckoning up, in the most perspicuous way, the value of each, according to the quantity allowed, when his master came in, and listened very patiently to his charges, and then replied by shewing that the money which he gave them was a full equivalent for these indulgences. A discussion of several other minor points followed, which terminated in the same manner. The principal orator, on the part of the negroes, certainly exhibited an ingenious display of special pleading; but it was really pleasant to see the independent and free spirit of the negroes, and the good feeling subsisting between them and their master; which, so far as our observation extends, is a rare exception to the general rule.

Upon a Sabbath Day, after attending at the station of the Baptist mission at Spanish Town, the tourists were introduced to the negro elders and leaders of the church, some of them free men, others apprentices from the estates, and "many of them fully equal in intelligence and information to English peasantry in some of the agricultural districts." They had many complaints to make of oppression from overseers.

The apprentices now receive none of their former allowances of salt-fish, and only half their former quantity of clothing. It was very hard for them to subsist, as their grounds were often burned up by drought; and that the overseer took their own time from them whenever he wanted it, and it was often a hard thing to get him to repay it. On our asking whether the people would be willing to work after 1840, he said, "nothing was sweeter than for a man to labour for his own bread"—a sentiment to which all present responded. They told us that many had been flogged or sent to the treadmill, who had never been punished during slavery. Two of the individuals present had been sent to the treadmill, and sustained severe injury from its effects. The offences were merely nominal, and we were assured their characters were without reproach. Another poor woman present, who was the mother of eight children, and in declining years and health, had been sent to the treadmill because she could not work in the first gang, after having lived, during the last years of slavery, a life of comparative ease and indulgence. The overseer had also pulled down her house, which was the best on the estate. All the apprentices complained that the magistrates did not give them a fair opportunity of speaking in their own behalf.

All the negroes of this district spoke very affectionately of Dr Palmer, a magistrate appointed by Lord Sligo, whose case is well-known in England. Dr Palmer was dismissed from office by the present Governor, because, as is alleged, the planters thought him inimical to their interests, and too favourable to the negroes. They said, when met by the tourists at Jericho, that he was the best magistrate that ever came into the parish of St Thomas-in-the-Vale, which parish he was accused of having thrown into a state of insurrection. Before his time, the apprentices stated that they—

Never obtained their half Fridays, according to the law; and, since he was removed, they have again been deprived of them. He encouraged them to clear and cultivate new provision grounds, and now they have "plenty of victual in them," while, before, they were so unsettled and afraid, that they neglected their grounds. One of the apprentices suggested, as an effectual remedy for one of the greatest abuses to which they are exposed, that a cannon should be placed at Rodney Hall Workhouse, with a soldier to fire it at the proper hours of shell-blow. It would be heard on every estate in the Vale. They said they should be perfectly satisfied, if the law were but fairly administered; but that "the white people never dealt fairly by them, though they were always the first to cry out." Before we took leave of them, one of them was requested by the missionary to offer up a prayer, which he did, in appropriate and affecting terms, for the general extension of religion, for a blessing on the church, on their minister and his family, and on the friends of the negroes in England, and, lastly, that their minister might have given to him a "voice like a mighty shell, to make the word of life known."

The reader will understand that the cannon was to announce the hour of release from labour, as the slaves are often cheated of their time. The complaints of the Jericho gathering were repeated in many other places. Even those best satisfied complained of Compulsory and unrequited labour during crop; frauds of time out of crop; being deprived of their old allowances; inattention to the sick; insufficiency of time allowed to pregnant women and nursing mothers; general ill-treatment by their overseers; and partiality, injustice, and drunkenness of the Special Magistrate. They said, that all who were sent to the treadmill, returned sick and injured, some having to stay in the hospital afterwards for two, three, or even four months. They were not only daily defrauded of their time, but were frequently mulcted of their Saturdays.

Nor can these things cease until labour is entirely free. That period may be near; and this consideration induces us to pass the more lightly over the record of ill-treatment, cruelty, and oppression of the apprentices, that finds a place in the journal of Messrs Sturge and Harvey, and especially in appendix, which is an exact report of examinations made on the spot. The state of the jail at Bridgetown, in Barbadoes, they rightly consider a reproach to Sir Lionel Smith's government. The West India treadmill, with the cat which urges its movements, is found in every locality, and is a disgrace to humanity. This report of the state of the Bridgetown jail was made by Dr Lloyd and Mr John Scoble, before they went from thence to Demerara. They say:—

From the council chamber we proceeded into the jail yard, where were collected a large number of negroes employed in breaking stones. The male negroes are required to break thirty baskets a-day—the women twenty-five baskets a-day. The stones are very hard, and the hammers very soft; the consequence is, that it is a most laborious operation. In failure of their appointed tasks, they are flogged, both male and female! This I learned on the spot. Among the women thus employed, was one very far advanced in pregnancy. I was very much pleased to learn, that some of the more powerful negroes would break a few more baskets than their required amount, and give their surplus to the weaker, to save them a flogging. From this part of the yard we proceeded to the back of the prison, to inspect the treadmill. It was going when we reached it. Fifteen male negroes, of different ages, from boys to men, were on it, and the cat was in constant requisition on their sides, shoulders, and legs, to keep them up to their work; and, even when the miserable creatures kept step properly, if they did not tread down, they were flogged. On the top of the treadmill were a number of negroes, who secured the arms of those that were too weak to hold on by the rail. The usual time for them to be on the treadmill is ten minutes. From the mill we proceeded to the jail. The first room we entered was about thirty by thirty-five feet, in which one hundred and ten negroes are obliged to herd together, from four in the afternoon until next morning. How they can live in such an atmosphere as must be created by so large a number of persons being congregated together in a tropical climate, I cannot tell.—The next apartment visited was about half the size. There were confined in it thirty-five males, committed for various felonies. The jailor informed me, that sometimes negroes were incarcerated there twelve months previous to trial, and are then discharged without it. Often, when it is inconvenient for the prosecutor to appear, or he does not choose to appear, cases are adjourned to the next Sessions, a period of six months. How iniquitous a system is this! We returned back to the treadmill. The women were then on; such a sight I never saw before; they were dressed in coarse dowlas, descending from the hips like trowsers, below the knees, and upwards to the bosom, leaving the neck exposed, fitting close round the body. The arms from below the shoulders bare, the legs bare also. The heads shaved quite close, with a handkerchief tied round them. They were up for ten minutes, and had been up during the morning four times before, and were to be put up twice after we left. No difference whatever was made between them as to the amount of punishment. When we arrived, they had been up about three minutes, and the brutal driver was flogging them with the cat, with as much severity as he had previously flogged the men; he cut them wherever he listed, and as often as he pleased. We were dreadfully shocked, but determined to witness the whole proceeding. On the mill there was a mulatto woman, perhaps about thirty, dreadfully exhausted—indeed, she could not step any more, although she had been on only a few minutes.

The driver flogged her repeatedly, and she as often made the attempt to tread the mill, but nature was worn out. She was literally suspended by the bend of the elbow of one arm, a negro holding down the wrist at the top of the mill for some minutes; and her poor legs knocking against the revolving steps of the mill until her blood marked them. There she hung groaning, and anon receiving a cut from the driver, to which she appeared almost indifferent. When the ten minutes were up, the negro above released her arm, and she fell on the floor, utterly unable to support herself, and at last managed to stagger out of the place. Her sufferings must have been terrible. But she was not the only one who suffered. A black girl, apparently about eighteen, was equally exhausted. When we arrived, she was moaning piteously. Her moans were answered by the cut of the whip. She endeavoured again and again to tread the mill, but was utterly unable. She had lost all power, and hung, in the same helpless way, with the mulatto woman, suspended by the left arm, held on by the wrist by a negro above. The bend of the arm passed over the rail, and the wrist was held down tightly, so that she could not alter her position, or get the least ease by moving. It was most affecting to hear her appeals to the driver—"Sweet massa, do pity me—do, sweet massa, pity me—my arm is broke." Her entreaties to be relieved were answered by cuts from the whip, and threats that, did she not cease to make a noise, he would have her down and flog her. The fear that he would carry this threat into execution, led her to suppress her feelings as well as she could. . . . During the whole time these scenes were transacting, the Barbadoes Legislature were holding their Sessions within thirty yards of the treadmill.

It is proper to add, that Sir Ewan Macgregor has since rectified some of the worst of these abuses, and forbidden the superintendent to carry the cat, and likewise the punishment of the treadmill for pregnant women. But to the music of the cat the apprentices still, in many places, in negro phrase, "dance the treadmill," for a week or more, and for the most frivolous causes. Sir Lionel Smith was a rigid disciplinarian, it would seem, and not very delicately discriminative in his scale of punishments. The treadmill, with the cat, and shaving the head, was the general remedy for all classes of crime—whether stealing, washing linen ill, or not doing enough of hoeing. The Half-way Tree Workhouse, or House of Correction, in Jamaica, is a second edition of the Bridgetown jail. Men and women were found there, heavily chained, and many prisoners were nearly naked :—

We spoke to a negro, who was sick from the effects of a severe flogging; his back was a white mass of suppuration. Another pitiable object was lying about, whose body and limbs were swollen and ulcerated. He seemed a mass of disease, and was apparently of weak intellect. He was a watchman on Chester Vale estate, and had been sent there for suffering the cattle to trespass. So far from possessing activity enough to be a watchman, we do not think he could have walked across the yard. Even the supervisor said he ought not to have been sent. We next went to see the treadmill. There were two gangs of men and women, who, we were told, worked alternate spells of fifteen minutes each; an almost incredible amount of punishment. The men were put upon it during our stay; they were in the same state of exposure as before noticed. The women were standing near them, waiting their turn. No regard was paid to decency in providing the latter with a suitable dress to work on the mill.

White-skinned prisoners are kept apart, and never chained. Since Lord Sligo left the island, the gallows has become a permanent erection in Spanish Town—in terrorem. At a workhouse jail, in St Ann's Bay, two females were found in the solitary cells, one condemned "to dance the treadmill" twice a-day, for deficiency in her work. Some of the prisoners were suffering from injuries received in the treadmill, which, in Jamaica and Barbadoes, is a formidable instrument of torture :—

Every step is stained with blood both recent and old; the former being that of the poor old woman whom the deputy mentioned to us. It had been shed so profusely that even the sand on the floor was thickly sprinkled with it. We asked him whether the prisoners on the treadmill were flogged. He replied that it was necessary "to touch them up"—women as well as men. The latter, he said, were struck on the back, but the women on their feet. The whip, which we asked to see, is a cat composed of nine lashes of knotted small cords.

The valuation of the time of apprentices is a source of perpetual fraud, vexation, and oppression. The tourists were present at several of these appraisements. They describe the mode of valuing "as a premium on worthlessness," and the honesty and faithfulness of a negro apprentice as his greatest misfortune, as these qualities enhance his value beyond his means of purchasing freedom. As the apprentice time draws shorter, his price is heightened; and an apprentice, valued a year before at five or six doubloons, will rise to nine or ten. At a Special Court held at Machinael, at which the Quaker gentlemen attended—after many cases of complaints, brought both by apprentices and overseers, had been dismissed—an apprentice came forward to be valued :—

His master said that he was one of his most valuable men; that he was a mason and carpenter, and occasionally worked in the field. His bookkeeper deposed, that, during a two years' residence on the estate, he had never known him employed except in the field, but that he was a very active, valuable man. Another bookkeeper deposed, that he had once seen him some years ago plastering a cottage. The next witness was a coloured man, who had been a slave, and had been manumitted by the father of his present proprietor, for his valuable services, and is still employed on the estate. He swore that the negro in question could handle both a trowel and a saw, but was not a good workman with either. The apprentice himself said he had only been sent to learn to be a mason for a short period, several years ago, and that he had bad health. His brother confirmed this statement. An overseer, who was standing by, rated his services at £1.40 per annum nett. A dispute next arose about the class to which he belonged, as he had been employed as a domestic servant some time previous to August 1833. Two important features of the system were disclosed to our observation during these proceedings. The Special Magistrate reminded the proprietor of the fact which had been elicited in the previous case, that he paid his negroes only 1s. 8d. for their Saturdays; and he remonstrated with him on his placing an exorbitant price on their services when they came to be valued. The latter replied, that, whatever the time of his apprentices was worth, it was nothing to anybody if they chose to sell it to him for 1s. 8d. a-day. The animus of the whole proceedings on the part of the planters was odious; and this single day's experience convinced us, that, for general and systematic violations of the Apprenticeship Act, this is not behind any district in the island.

Apprentices, it would seem, become predials or non-predials exactly as it suits their masters; and thus it is often rendered impossible for them to redeem themselves; while, to benevolent persons, who are either desirous to purchase their freedom or lend them money for that purpose, great difficulties are presented. Before the 1st of August next, we may expect a sudden and immense increase of predials. The masters having first pocketed compensation, given at the public expense, would now derive an unfairly enhanced price for their "property" in apprentice labour. One man, the head carpenter on the Wallen estate, was twice valued—first at £352, and, after appealing to the Governor, at £230; but this valuation was set aside by his master, who brought, the man said, a great number of persons to swear against his character, who put trades upon him he knew nothing about, and made out there was nothing he could not do. Now he despairs of ever being free. He cannot pay his price: he is nearly sixty, and freedom without price will come too late for him. It must be recollected, that the non-predials are entitled to emancipation in 1838; so that this man's remaining time must have been enormously over-valued. Among the hardships of the apprentices, we find the arbitrary mulcting of whole gangs of field-labourers, for the delinquency or idleness of one of their number, and compelling them to repay time which has been lost by their being sent to the estate dungeon or the treadmill, on, probably, some frivolous complaint of the overseers. The frauds practised by the cunning strong upon the ignorant and weak we do not pretend to enumerate. The negroes are also subjected to a variety of wanton and malicious aggressions from the overseers, who shoot their goats, hogs, and poultry, or seize the latter for their own use. They either wilfully allow the cattle and horses of the plantations to trespass upon the little gardens and provision grounds of the labourers, or, if the trespass should be accidental, in both cases refuse all redress. Pounding "Massa's cattle" is not to be thought of. These tricks of spite, and acts of petty persecution, are in revenge for the negroes complaining to the magistrates, and "taking the law" of their masters. Sometimes the negro huts are pulled down, and the threat or actual withdrawing of the customary allowances of salt fish and other things, places the poor creatures greatly in the power of their task-masters. Many more little spiteful ways of annoyance are fallen upon; for, though the masters have had the lash torn from their hands, and been well paid for laying it down, their power to wrong and oppress has been little abridged, where there is inclination to use it.

The amount of suffering and punishment inflicted in these modes, is placed on no record, reported to no authority, but it is not therefore less oppressively and keenly felt. It affords us little satisfaction to turn from illegal to legal oppression. A limited and imperfect idea of the amount of punishment inflicted by the Special Magistrates, may be learned from the fact, that, during the first two years of their administration in the colony, sixty thousand apprentices were punished, to an extent, in the aggregate, of a quarter of a million of lashes, and fifty thousand other punishments, by the treadmill, chain gang, solitary confinement, and mulcts of time.

The state of religious instruction and of schools, attracted the especial attention of the Friends; and the accounts of the Baptist mission in Jamaica, that of the Moravians in different islands, the Wesleyan Methodists, and those of other religious bodies in Great Britain, whose Christian and brotherly love has extended to the West Indies, are extremely gratifying. The tourists state that they are unable to render justice to the missionary efforts in Jamaica. They speak with affectionate warmth.

Representation cannot picture the happy results of these efforts; description can convey no idea of their excellence and magnitude. A few years ago, the negroes were heathen and benighted; now, they are, to a great extent, enlightened and Christian. . . . The success of missionary labours among the servile population, has been general and striking; much has been done, yet much remains to be done. The work requires to be deepened, strengthened, and extended; and we earnestly commend those benefactors of the human race, the missionaries, to the more earnest prayers, to the deeper sympathies, and to the yet more liberal support of British Christians.

The church discipline exercised in Antigua, appears well adapted to the present condition of the people. A vigilant oversight is maintained over the members, which might be improper, and indeed insufferable, in a more enlightened community of Christians, though productive of great benefit among the negroes. In certain evenings of every week, the members come to have "a speaking" with the minister; and the arrangements are such that the whole pass before him once in every six or eight weeks. A religious negro on each estate is appointed "a helper;" and his duty is to watch over the members, and bring all delinquencies before the minister. The cases of discipline which the Friends saw brought before a minister belonging to the United Brethren, were those of two men accused of living with women to whom they were not married: their sentence was to be put out of the church. A man who had beat his wife was suspended. The members have an appeal from those decisions to the Monthly Conference of Missionaries. The negroes are more afraid of church discipline than of legal punishment; and sometimes the planters call in the aid of the minister, to subdue the refractory, and enforce obedience. The tourists were also witnesses, in Jamaica, of the examination of candidates for baptism. A good old woman was put back for a time, until her knowledge should be more ripened; a young man was received.

In Jamaica, and some of the other islands, the Mico Institution has now numerous branch schools; and schools and chapels, twin-stars of dawning civilization, appear in many a locality. Many of the proprietors support or aid education and religious instruction on their estates. The schools are now, in a great majority of instances, taught by free blacks or coloured people. To some of these schools, the children travel five miles, backwards and forwards, every day. To others of the Mico schools, the little children bring yams and roots, to be cooked for them. At one of them, when cooked, their meal was laid on a cloth in the middle of the floor. One of the elder boys portioned it out with a knife, the children bringing their tins or little baskets, one by one, till all were served. Above 4000 children are already taught in these schools.

Individuals among the coloured people, who, in spite of prejudice and various obstacles, have risen to distinction, by the mere force of good conduct, talent, and energy of character, greatly interested the tourists. They were seen in all the islands, and of both sexes. The Wesleyan minister at Parkham in Antigua, is a man of colour, and was born a slave in Bermuda. It is said—

His history is remarkable. He is not, we believe, inferior, either in education, qualifications, or usefulness, to any of his brethren in the ministry. The school under his care is in good order, and very numerous attended. The children are all emancipated but two; a circumstance which is employed to instil into their breasts sentiments of fervent loyalty. They were told we came from England; and asked "Who lives in England?"—"The King." "What has the King done for you?"—"He make us free," was responded by upwards of one hundred little voices, with the greatest enthusiasm.

At Wolmer's free school at Kingston, which is pronounced the best school seen in the West Indies, the master asserted that the children of colour attending, are equal, both in conduct and ability, to the white scholars. They have always carried off more than their proportion of prizes. This master had taught the school for thirty-eight years.

In the present state of the West Indies, much, if not everything, depends upon the character of the managers and attorneys who superintend the estates. If the individual administering be a humane man, and mild and considerate in the exercise of his despotic power, the labourers are comparatively comfortable and contented. They make few or no appeals to the special or stipendiary magistrate, and endure no chains, mulcts, or "dancing the tread-mill." And such mild and enlightened despots are, happily, often found both among resident proprietors and managers. Absentee properties, as is fairly to be presumed, are often very ill-managed. The apprentices on Lord Holland's estate get no allowance of salt fish, contrary to agreement; "and the people turn out to work, the very same as during slavery." Their own time is cruelly trenched upon. They were, in brief, full of complaints, and hoped for no satisfaction from the magistrate of the parish. The overseer complains, and the magistrate writes out the punishment. "Missis [Lady Holland] has," they say, "been kind to we. We know that, whether we get the gifts she sends or not, we should remain on the estate as long as we live." But they did not meanwhile wish to enter into rash bargains with the attorney; they were anxious, as many of the best, the most foreseeing of the apprentices must be, about what was to be done respecting their houses and grounds, which they said uncertainty prevented them from repairing and improving:—

They said, that former times were bad enough; the apprenticeship was better, as they could not be flogged by the driver, but they wished they might be free immediately. One of their complaints was, that they had never seen their master, pointing, at the same time, to a very old negro, and intimating he had never seen his owner. They wished Lord Holland would send out "his piccaninny or his cousin," with whom they might talk about the terms upon which they should remain when free. As we were leaving, they preferred a request to their attorney, to exchange their half Friday for every alternate Friday, as their grounds were six miles distant. From Sweet River we proceeded to Friendship, a sugar estate belonging to Lord Holland. Here, also, we saw and conversed with at least fifty or sixty of the people, in the presence of their attorney and overseer. We did not find them very communicative. They said, however, that they had a kind master and mistress (Lord and Lady Holland;) and, when free, which they wished might be to-morrow, they should be glad to remain on the estate, and work for wages, rather than leave their houses and grounds to begin the world again. We asked them whether the Special Magistrate heard both sides fairly, when they were brought before him. They replied he would not let them speak; in confirmation of which, the Custos strongly condemned the conduct of some of the stipendiaries.

The estate of Mr Wallace of Kelly does not seem to be in the best hands. Mr Ewing of Glasgow's estate is also mentioned, as one of the absentee properties on which the people are ill-cared for. One of the Caymanas (the name of several estates) belongs to Lord Carrington, and is in a good condition:—

The hospital is a large, well-ventilated building. The negro village of the farm is, probably, one of the best in the island. The houses are scattered over a considerable extent of ground, in groups of two or three, in separate neat inclosures. It is embosomed in a grove of cocoa nut trees, on which the negroes are, in part, dependent for the means of support. Many of the cottages consist of two or three good rooms, in which are a little furniture, and, in a few instances, glasses and earthenware. They were remarkably clean, and the courts carefully swept. We were introduced to Whitehall Ellis, the head negro, an intelligent man, who is still as active and as lively as a boy, though nearly seventy years of age. He has a numerous family of descendants, and is a man of considerable property, being possessed of a light tax cart and a number of cattle and sheep. He owned, before the 1st of August, nine slaves, twenty head of cattle, and seventy sheep; but, like other prosperous men, he has experienced occasional reverses. His speculations in slaves did not turn out well; he gave us a most amusing account of one of them, who stole some of his cattle, and sold them for himself in Kingston market, and then, pretending they were lost, almost killed his master, by leading him a wild goose chase in search of them, among the swamps and woods. As he, being himself a slave, could not hold slaves in his own right, he was likely also to lose the compensation, through the faithlessness of the friend in whose name they had been registered. Ellis invited us to his house, which is a large, comfortable, and furnished cottage, with jalousies in the casements. He produced a bottle of Madeira, and wine glasses; and, by so doing, according to West India notions, refuted the thousand and one statements of the Anti-Slavery Society of the physical sufferings of slaves. Among the negro houses, there is a small chapel, in which one of the apprentices occasionally preaches. The attorney asked the people whether they would send their children to school if he provided a teacher. They professed great anxiety to avail themselves of his offer. As we were leaving, a woman came forward to petition for assistance towards rebuilding or repairing her cottage. She manifested much distress. Old Ellis rebuked her sharply:—"Did she wish to bring massa's property into disgrace before the gentlemen? Where were her manners?" &c. The negroes on this estate are a fine muscular race of people, and both their appearance and that of their dwellings was one of comfort.

The estate of Montpelier, belonging to Lord Seaford, presents a painful contrast to this. The negroes are discontented, the overseers tyrannical and cruel. In Belvidere, a neighbouring estate, which is said to have been cruelly managed before the "rebellion," a better system has lately been introduced by a Scotch ploughman, who came out to introduce a new system of culture, and was promoted to be overseer of the estate by a judicious attorney.

He is not only greatly improving the cultivation, but adding to the comfort of the negroes. We have met with no one who has introduced the plough so extensively. We conversed with several of the negroes in the boiling-house. They all said they were satisfied with their Busha, and would be glad, when free, to remain as labourers on the estate. If the same question had been asked them a year before, they should have given a very different answer. They receive twopence per hour for extra labour during crop, which is the most liberal arrangement we have yet heard of.

So these negroes are easily rendered contented, and even grateful, though probably they as easily become litigious and troublesome. The tourists met with several of the emigrants taken out in consequence of that dread of negro indolence, which so grievously afflicted the proprietors. One family, seen on Hyde Hall estate, were from Sussex; but they had only newly landed, and were still delighted with their new country. The emigrant settlement at Altamont, in the heart of the Portland mountains, was reached through a succession of exquisitely beautiful scenery.

The location is delightfully chosen in an irregular valley about one mile and a half in length, through which flows the Rio Grande. The climate is very fine, and the only obvious disadvantage is the difficulty of transporting produce to a port or market. The sides of the mountains being crown land, afford ample scope for the extension of the settlement. The soil is virgin land of the most fertile description, well suited to the cultivation of coffee and ginger. The attention of the Superintendent is turned to the introduction of indigo, tobacco, the mulberry, and various other descriptions of profitable cultivation. The colony consists, at present, of only six families, who have been about two months in the island. The commissioners anticipated their arrival, by building some neat little white cottages, which the people themselves have since further improved, and inclosed in little plots of ground, by neat fences of young rose trees. They are all married persons with young families, from the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, selected by a minister, who is the brother of a member of Assembly in this island, one of the chief promoters of the colonization of Europeans. They have hitherto enjoyed good health, with the exception of one family, who were detained on a sugar estate, near the coast, where the husband found employment as a cooper. There his wife and children were attacked by intermittent fever, from which they have not yet recovered. Each family, besides being permitted for the present to occupy a house rent free, cultivates any quantity of land they think proper. They have also a cow and certain allowances of food till they are able to support themselves. An account is kept against them for the two latter items, which they will be expected to repay. They are offered twenty acres of land in fee, as soon as they can erect a house upon it, so as to leave their present dwellings for new occupants. About twenty houses are either built or in progress, and an additional number of families are shortly expected. The superintendent appeared delighted with the industry of the emigrants, and, indeed, shewed us sufficient proofs of it, in the quantity of land they have already brought into cultivation. The men are fine, athletic peasants. They seemed cheerful, and expressed themselves satisfied with their new country: they were employed in making a piece of road, towards the expense of which the island has granted a sum of money. Their children looked happy, and their blue eyes, laughing faces, and bare feet, reminded us of their native mountaineers. Their wives, however, generally appeared home-sick.

It is intended to form more white colonies.

The Friends consider the Jamaica colonization system founded on false principles; and to us their objections appear just. The Maroon colony in this mountainous region is an interesting feature of the country. It is as beautifully situated as Altamont, and already consists of about a hundred houses, larger and better furnished than the negro huts on estates, and prettily scattered over the hill side. The house of the superintendent, and that of the clergyman, stand on adjoining eminences, overlooking the town.

The Maroons are a fine race of people, tall and elegant in person, with features more European than the negroes generally possess, and with the independent bearing of men who have been for generations free. Some of the women are decidedly handsome, and, except their complexion, more like gipsies than negroes. The inhabitants of this settlement, the largest Maroon town in the island, have lately acquired a reputation for industry. We saw a number of women employed at Altamont, in carrying lime on their heads a considerable distance, to the top of a hill, on which a building was in progress. A troop of the men sometimes turn out, with their negro captain at their head, to clear the pastures of such of the neighbouring planters as are willing to employ them; they work with their cutlasses, having a sort of disdain for the implements degraded by slavery. They also cultivate their own grounds industriously, and surround themselves with many domestic comforts; and bid fair, in short, to become industrious citizens. Their improved condition and habits do great credit to their present superintendent. It is to be desired, when their blood-bound occupation of hunting out runaway negroes shall have ceased by the abolition of slavery, that their exclusive character and privileges may be abolished, their land divided among them in fee, and themselves left to merge into the general community of free persons.

The condition of the apprentices of Trinidad and Demerara is considered by Mr Sturge as equally bad if not worse than that of their brethren in Jamaica. A new branch of traffic has sprung up in some of the islands, and may probably extend. In the "Demerara slave-trade," as it is termed, agents and speculators induce the free labourers in Antigua to indent with them. Of their service, for the number of years agreed on, they dispose in British Guiana, where there is a great demand for negro labour. The fellow-passenger of the Friends from Barbadoes to Antigua, mentioned above, was engaged in this traffic. At Antigua he had at this time induced thirty-two negroes of both sexes to indent with him; and it is calculated that £100 sterling will be realized upon each of those slaves held by a new tenure.

We have endeavoured to give a fair notion of the spirit of this volume, and of the sort of information with which it literally teems, regarding the practical operation of the Abolition Bill. The opinion of the authors is decidedly unfavourable as to the immediate results of that Bill; but not more so than might have been presumed from what they witnessed, and the bias to the right side with which they must have left England. They went prepared, by what they had heard, to find great iniquity existing; and their worst fears were confirmed. They went avowedly to "spy out the nakedness of the land;" to probe the festering, ill-concealed sore, to search with keen eyes for cruelty and injustice in their lurking places, and to drag them into light. The object of their humane mission was not to discover the social virtues and engaging qualities of planters and magistrates; and, keeping this in view, we are inclined to believe that they have in their report done impartial justice between the judges, the masters, and the labourers, so far as the whole truth regarding the higher classes was made known to them. If their ear was more readily and willingly given to the complaints of the helpless, who shall condemn the generous error?

In hope and patience, the country now waits the result of the resolutions which, before this number of Tait's Magazine is published, Lord Brougham will have brought before Parliament. We write in ignorance of the precise nature of the proposed resolutions; but their general tenor may easily be conjectured. Their main object will be the IMMEDIATE ABOLITION of Slavery in every part of the British West Indies; but, prospectively, they must look to the protection of the negroes, and the maintenance of their rights as British subjects.

OLD AUNT ANNE; OR, THE PENSION LIST.

SURELY the Dean is sadly out of spirits?" quoth I, to my worthy friend, Mrs Drainham, the other night. "Long Christmas bills are apt to engender long Christmas faces; but my very reverend friend is known to be a ready-money man. What is the matter? Tithes looking down? Surely his Isle of Sheppy living is not in default?—or his rectory in Suffolk behind-hand?—or his mastership of — College danger of cutting down?"

"No—oh, dear, no! Thank goodness, all is safe with us! The Dean's proctor keeps a strict hand over such matters. Seldom a week or a guinea in arrear. Even the Irish living, which is held till my youngest son is old enough for ordination, improves every quarter. With four thousand seven hundred a-year church preferment in the family, we have no great reason to complain if occasionally a hundred pounds deficit."

"You admit, however, that the Dean is somewhat low just now? I suppose, poor fellow, his digestion is not quite the thing. I saw him refuse lobster sauce, yesterday, with his turbot, as if a little afraid of it; and he ate his wild duck with cayenne. Take my word for it, my dear madam, at the Dean's age, a bottle of claret a-day is too cold without a good foundation of Madeira or sherry, and a topping up of liqueur. The Dean should never take his coffee without a chasse of noyau or curaçoa, or something warm of that description, to keep up the circulation."

"I don't think his digestion much amiss," replied Mrs Drainham. "At least, I know he can dispatch half-a-dozen oyster patties for his luncheon, or a basin of turtle soup, and eat a good dinner afterwards—a thing I was never able to do in my life. But the fact is, my husband is desperately put out just now about his old Aunt Anne."

"What old Aunt Anne? I was not aware that the Dean had any such relation?"

"Nor any one else, except the editors of 'The Peerage.' The old lady ought to have been dead these fifteen years: Miss Drainham was eighty-five last March."

"The Dean is in mourning, then, not for her decease but for her survival—eh! my dear madam? But, compose your feelings—no mortal is immortal, nowadays, except Talleyrand and Lady Cork, who, I am assured, were very near getting up a match last season. Depend upon it, Aunt Anne will drop before long."

"That makes the case the more provoking. As the old lady has one foot in the grave, 'tis very hard that her pension should drop first."

"Her pension?"

"Miss Drainham has been on the pension list ever since the year 1773—before the Deluge! Yet they say she will certainly be struck off. Conceive the infamy of Ministers in sacrificing a poor, helpless, old woman, who has been receiving for the last sixty years the bounty of the country!"

"And what had Aunt Anne done for the country, to merit this benefaction of £12,000?" quoth I.

"Done for the country?—who does anything for his country in modern times? To do the country is now the grand object; and the mode in which Aunt Anne obtained her pension was curious enough. Her father, Lord Drainham, who was Master of the Buckhounds, and constantly about the Court, applied to get her appointed Maid of Honour; and nothing is so difficult as to refuse a trifling favour to a person with whom one is in habits of daily intercourse. But it happened that Anne Drainham was precisely the sort of young person to be insupportable at the Queen's Lodge—a prying, sarcastic girl, with all her eyes and all her tongue about her; and the Queen, literally, would not hear of her. So, by way of pacifying the old Lord, Aunt Anne was put on the civil list for two hundred a-year; and, soon afterwards, the Lord Chamberlain was requested to give her an apartment at Hampton Court. By these means, Lord Drainham got rid of his daughter, and Queen Charlotte of her maid of honour; and there she has been vegetating to her heart's content for the last sixty years."

"And will probably continue to vegetate for the remainder of her days."

"Not she!—tiresome old woman! It will be impossible for her to live there, you know, on a pittance of three hundred a-year; and, in consideration of her pension, such was the miserable income assigned her by her father. His other daughters had five; but Aunt Anne's pension was brought into hotch-pot to make up her fortune."

"Hard enough upon her."

"Upon her? And what is it upon us? She will certainly require the Dean to do something for her if the pension-list should go to the wall. People of her age are so unreasonable! The Dean, the present Lord Drainham, and the Governor of —, are her only nephews; the rest of the family are females."

"But her claim is surely greatest on Lord Drainham, as the eldest son of her only brother."

"To what claims was Lord Drainham ever known to attend, except those of Newmarket and White's? If shirking his old aunt would get him turned out of the Jockey Club, Aunt Anne would be safe enough. But when poor old Miss Drainham applied to him on the subject, the only notice he took of her letter was to enclose it to his brother, and bid the Dean put it in his pipe and smoke it."

"Most unfeeling conduct, I admit! But the Governor, Sir Richard Drainham's salary must amount to many thousands a-year."

"If it were ten, it would not half suffice his own wants. His income is desperately dipped. They only gave him that government to get him out of the way of his creditors. He could no longer afford a seat in Parliament after Lord Drainham sold the two family boroughs—(after getting the deanery and the mastership for one brother, and a regiment for the other, he wanted nothing further of Government, and it was useless keeping them!) But, so soon as Sir Richard was out of the House, the Bench stared him in the face; and the Regent, the best-hearted man alive, could not bear to see an old acquaintance (the son of his royal father's favourite's favourite) disgraced. Such was the motive of his being sent out to —."

"But, being there, and with such princely emoluments, it is surely Sir Richard's duty to do something for his poor relations?"

"Not so long as Government will do it for him! Consider how hard the Drainhams have always worked for their country! The old Lord was Master of the Stag-hounds and Lord of the Bedchamber; and the late Lord, Master of the Mint and Groom of the Stole. There is my poor husband, toiling through the duties of his Deanery, and three livings besides; and the General labouring away in exile at his Government House! The least Ministers can do for the infirm relative of men who stand so high in the estimation of the world, is to continue her pension. For my part, I consider that, after fifty years' enjoyment, a pension ought to be doubled. Aunt Anne's would probably have been so, had George IV. survived. He had such an esteem for her! Miss Drainham is one of the few surviving relicts of those amusing Kew and Frogmore times. She has a thousand abominable anecdotes of Lord North, and Wilkes, and Foote, and Barrington, and all sorts of eminent people. If the pension-list should be thrown over, I shall advise her to write her memoirs. She could call them 'Recollections of an Ex-Maid of Honour;' and, if she got the ghost of George Hanger, or one of the royal family, to edit the book, Colburn would give her, at least, a thousand guineas."

"Meanwhile, she retains, at least, the enjoyment of her snuggerly at Hampton Court."

"Yes, a pretty snuggerly!—up two hundred and four steep steps of a winding stone staircase. Lord Alvanley once advised Aunt Anne to be drawn up by a crane, as the housemaids and sacks of coals are swung at York House. The good apartments in the Quality Workhouse (as it is called in the neighbourhood) are given to rich dowagers: the Duchess of M., with a jointure of four thousand a-year; the Dowager Countess of S., ditto, ditto; the Countess of M., three thousand—and so forth. The attic floor alone is given to noble families in distress, or starving spinsters, who are forced to accept what they can get."

"Poor creatures! To be compelled to burrow in such a tabby-warren! I am told they get up the most amusing feuds about their rights to half a scullery, or bottle-rack, or coal-shed; and that the Honourable Miss A. sends a lawyer's letter to the Right Honourable Lady Charlotte B., because her Ladyship's footboy hangs his dusters to dry over the Honourable Miss A.'s meat-safe."

"Yes!—I recollect hearing that Aunt Anne had got into a lawsuit with some Dowager Viscountess, because her canary bird scattered his seed-husks over her ladyship's mignonette vases on the story below. And now we are likely to have both her and the canary bird at the Deanery!"

"I don't see the absolute necessity for such a remove."

"Why, you see, we could keep the old lady here cheaper than by allowing her two hundred a-year to stay at the palace. Remember she has three hundred of her own; and the horrid newspapers would be at us, if the Dean were to let his old aunt come to want."

"These Sunday newspapers are a perfect inquisition upon the higher classes," quoth I.

"And, after all, though many of their statements are founded on fact, it is impossible for them to judge the real state of every case. They are always at poor Lord Drainham, for instance, about his patent place; as if he were actually receiving fees to the amount of eight thousand a-year. Why, every creature in society knows that he sold the reversion of the place long before his father's death—that he does not finger a guinea from it—that he is only the nominal occupant. Then the Dean, whom they tax with the amount of his preferment—just consider what the Dean has to do with his money! Seven thousand pounds last month for a troop in the Life-Guards for John; and an allowance of a thousand a-year, to enable him to keep it with decency. Edward, you know, is attaché at Vienna; he cannot get on with less than five hundred. My youngest son costs us nearly as much at Oxford; and, as to the girls—what with two guineas a-lesson to Herz, and a guinea and a half a-lesson to Madam Michan—the expense of their education is enormous! Now, I just ask you, after that, whether the Dean is likely to have any money to throw away upon Aunt Anne! Do, pray, my dear Mr Allsby, write to London, to your friend the young Sec., (whose pert letters sometimes figure in the newspapers,) and inquire what chance we have about the pension list, now that that wretch Harvey is out of the Committee; and whether (for you perceive that the Dean is getting desperately out of spirits about the matter) there is likely to be a vacancy in the house-keeperahips of any of the palaces or public offices. To be appointed laundress, or to any other of those odd sinecures about the Court, would be the very thing for old AUNT ANNE!"

POLITIC TACTICS.

It is a startling study, on the eve of a general election, to consider the motives and causes which impel divers sorts and conditions of men towards Parliament, and a painful result to discover how small the minority of those who are actuated by a desire to devote their time and faculties to the legislation of their country and amelioration of their kind. We hear wondrous Jeremiades over the venality of electors, the degradation of votes, the bad spirit of certain districts, and the partiality of certain returning officers; but far less than enough of the views and objects of candidates. They are, occasionally, twitted on the hustings, with the baseness of their origin, the unsoundness of their political principles, or even with the blemishes on their moral conduct. But we are told, and they are told, little or nothing respecting their ulterior objects in aspiring to membership of the House.

There have been published, especially of late, divers lists and catalogues of the new Parliament; in some of which, Whigs and Tories are distinguished, by black ink and red; the rouge et noir being farther illustrated by the Roman capitals, C. and R., to denote Conservatives and Radicals. All this is vastly instructive. It is right and meet for the silly sheep to be marked with the initials of their master's flock, lest, on any occasion, not having the fear of the press before their eyes, they presume to give an independent vote, or to be influenced by facts unfolded in debate. But we should be glad to see one list more. We should be glad to know, not only what they are going to do, but why they have acquired the privilege of doing it. We live in retirement, we know little of the tactics of the political word; and, finding no solution in the published speeches of nine in ten candidates at the late general election, for their pretence to coadhere with the legislative wisdom of the kingdom, would fain learn by what latent impulses their ambition was suggested.

Having stumbled, the other evening, into the company of an ex-member, intimately versed in the state of political parties, we hazarded a few impertinent questions on this head, to which we had the satisfaction of obtaining the following pertinent answers.

Our first inquiry regarded Jack Jowlie, the honourable member for *, an individual who, if Wordsworth's theory be correct, that "the boy is father of the man," must be one of the most eminently stupid asses of the new Parliament. We remember him, first, a breechless little blockhead—next, the universal fag of Harrow—and, thirdly, the patient butt of Oxford.

"What made such a fellow as Jack Jowlie dream of getting into Parliament?" was our first query.

"His wife. Jack Jowlie's ten thousand a-year are married to the daughter of an Earl.

Lady Mary (a pretty, lively, little woman, who saw no other method of weaning him from his kennel, and transferring him for six months of the twelve to London) negotiated for him with one of the leading attorneys of *. Jack was written to; solicited to come forward; humbugged to the hustings, humbugged on them, humbugged off; and Lady Mary's house in Grosvenor Street, next season, will necessitate a fall of timber at Jowlie Hall."

"And to what has the numskull pledged himself?"

"He will be obliged to look in one of the black and red lists to ascertain. Jack knows no more of politics than one of his own pointers; but, having noticed that the late squire, his father, appeared, in his portrait by Opie, in a suit of blue and buff, took himself to be an hereditary Whig, and takes his seat accordingly."

"Discerning patriot!—But what could be the object of my friend, Sir Marmaduke Moggs?"

"Finding himself a solitary knight, in one of the most baronetiferous counties in England, he determined to redeem his insignificance by substituting M.P. for Knt."

"And what are his politics?"

"They used to be Conservative—for it was by the Tories he was knighted. They are now Whig—for it is to the present Administration he looks for a baronetcy."

"And young Lord Laxmore, the idlest and weakest of Crockford's loungers—what induced him to stand for Hawkswell?"

"He was told it was a knowing thing, and his maiden aunt promised to frank him."

"And Lord Harry Ross?"

"Did not choose to be outdone by his chum Laxmore."

"And Sir William Berry?"

"Wanted a pretext for leave of absence from his regiment, during the London season."

"And young Martingale?"

"Wanted security from the sheriff's officers, all the year round."

"All this may be true," cried we, with dolorous looks of conviction; "for these are boobies and dunces. But let us look higher. There are certain even of the better brothers, whom we should scarcely have guessed to be desirous of devoting their lives to Parliament—men of small fortunes and great abilities, whose line of politics renders the pursuit of loaves and fishes through a Parliamentary channel altogether hopeless. What put it into poor Pica's head, for instance, to get into the House?"

"To raise the price of his books, which were going down in the market. M.P. after the name of Timothy Pica, is thirty per cent. added to his copyright."

"And Wirewove, who is too well off to submit to such considerations?"

"Wirewove became an amateur author out of love for the eclat of authorship. Finding it tarnished and worn threadbare, he is now ambitious of figuring in the oratorical line. Wire-wove will now speak trash, instead of writing it; he means to astonish the world by his sallies."

"On which side?"

"I doubt whether he is at present decided. He will, perhaps, take alternate weeks for Whig and Tory, as he would engage an opera box."

"And Bawlington—what does his purpose by obtaining a seat?"

"To extend the circulation of his paper."

"And Flimsy, the country banker?"

"To extend the circulation of his notes."

"And young Adamson?"

"To obtain notes for circulation from his old uncle, the nabob, who chooses that one of his name should be in Parliament, and is too gouty to take the trouble."

Uncertain whether to be more surprised or shocked by these aspersions, we had scarcely courage to pursue the inquiry. But our friend saved us the trouble of deliberation.

"Then there is that poor old spent ball, Sir Thomas —," said he—"almost drivelling, and scarcely able to toddle into the House. Having sat for five-and forty years, he did not choose it to be said that he gave in and died ex-senatorial. There is old Choldhurst—he was obliged to keep his place. With five sons unprovided for, he could not afford to give up his seat. He got in for three thousand, so it was well worth his while. Robson stood because he wants to push his Irish railroad business; and Barnardston means to remain in Parliament till his son-in-law's peerage claim is settled. Ward was put up without his knowledge, by the Drakes, who have always kept one of the seats for Crumhurst, and thought it a fine opportunity to entangle him to marry their daughter. Then there was Offley wanted his to be made a maid of honour; but he was disappointed."

"In short," said I, "there is not a conscientious member in the new Parliament?"

"Come, come, come; not so bad as that!" cried my friend. "We have picked out a few flagrant examples. If you wish me to go over the catalogue of eminent statesmen, useful debaters, valuable committeemen, you must attack me another time. At present, I have only had a moment to bring down folly as it flies; at present, I have only had leisure to give you a bird's-eye peep into our Politic tactics."

SKETCHES OF LIFE AND MANNERS, FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

THE reader whomay have accompanied me in these wandering memorials of my own life and casual experiences, will be aware that I have brought them forward with little regard to their exact order of succession. In reference to that particular object which governed me in bringing them forward at all—an object which I shall, perhaps, explain pointedly in my closing paper—it was of very little importance to consult the chronologies of the case, except in so far as sometimes it may have happened that the precise dates of a transaction were of some negative* value towards its verification. Consequently, I have wandered backwards and forwards, obeying any momentary impulse, as accident or sometimes even as purely verbal suggestions might arise to guide me. But, in many cases, this neglect of chronological order is not merely permitted—it is in fact to some degree inevitable; for there are cases which, as a whole, connect themselves with my own life, at so many different eras, that, upon any chronological principle of position, it would have been difficult to assign them a proper place—backwards or forwards they must have leaped, in whatever place they had been introduced; and in their entire compass, from first to last, never could have been represented as properly belonging to any one present time, whensoever that had been selected. In reality, as a man must be aware beforehand, that, amongst the incidents of any life connected with each other by no logical connexion, there can be no logical transitions from one to the other, so also, upon examining any particular life, one of those admirable lives, for instance, by Dr Johnson, he will find that, in fact, the mere incidents are not connected, nor could be, any more than the items in an auctioneer's catalogue. How, then, is it that any seeming connexion is effected? How is it, at the least, that they read with a sense of unbroken continuous fluency? Simply thus—and here lies the main secret of good biography: a moral is drawn, a philosophic inference, from some particular incident; this inference, for the very reason that it is philosophic, will be large and general; it may therefore be so framed as to include, by anticipation, some kindred thought, that will apply as an introducing moral to the succeeding incident; or it may be itself so large and comprehensive an idea, so ambidexter in its sense, as to bear a Janus-like application, one aspect pointing backwards to

* "Negative!—why negative value?" I hear some young readers exclaim. As it is always of importance to cultivate accuracy of thinking, and as I never wish to use words (wrong or right otherwise) without a distinct meaning, I reply that the chronology has a negative value in this sense: being false, it would have upset the story—although, being true, it did not establish that story.

No. 1, one forwards to No. 2. Thus, to take a coarse, obvious illustration: a story, we will suppose, is told of riotous profusion; and next—without any imaginable natural connexion or sequence, so that, left to themselves, they would read like parts of a technical advertisement—there comes a story of some private brawl in a tavern, ending in murder. But these detached notices are fused into unity, by a philosophic regret that the subject of memoir should have been led into aspirations after a kind of society which had tempted him equally (looking backwards to No. 1) into disproportionate expenses, and (looking forward to No. 2) amongst pretensions in point of rank, issuing naturally into insults unendurable by a generous nature. Such a remark, interposed between the two incidents, Nos. 1 and 2, connects them—brings them into relation to a common principle, and makes into parts of one whole, incidents that would else have been utterly disjointed. And thus it is, by the setting, and not by the jewels set, that the whole course of a life is woven into one texture.* In fact, the connexions of a life, when they are not of the vulgar order—in this year he did thus, in the next year he did thus—must resolve themselves into intellectual abstractions—into those meditative reflections upon the whirling motions of life which rise from them like a perpetual spray or atmosphere, such as is thrown off from a cataract, and which invests all surrounding objects. Thus, and it is noticeable, the reflections which arise may be made, and, in the hands of a great poet like Shakspeare, are made, to anticipate and mould the course of what is to follow. The reflections, or reflex thoughts, pure reverberations, as it were, of what has passed, are so treated as to become anticipations and pregnant sources of what is to follow. They seem to be mere passive results or products from the narration; but, properly managed, they assume the very opposite relation, and predetermine the course of that narration. Now, if chronology is thus incapable of furnishing that principle of connexion amongst the facts of a life, which, on some principle or other, must be had, in order to give any unity to its parts, and to take away the distraction of a mere catalogue; if, at any rate, something more than chronology must be resorted to, then it follows that chronology may be safely neglected in general; and, a fortiori, may be neglected with respect to those cases which, belonging to every place alike, therefore belong, according to the proverb, to no place at all, or, (reversing this proverb,) belonging to no place by preferable right, do, in fact, belong to every place.

The incidents I am now going to relate come under this rule; for they form part of a story which fell in with my own life at many different points. It is a story taken from the life of my own brother—and I dwell on it with the more willingness, because it furnishes an indirect lesson upon a great principle of social life, now and for many years back sub judice, and struggling for its just supremacy—the principle that all corporal punishments whatsoever, and upon whomsoever inflicted, are hateful, and an indignity to our common nature—enshrined in the person of the sufferer. I will not here add one word upon the general thesis, but go on to the facts of this case, which, if all its incidents could be now recovered, was perhaps as romantic as any that ever has been told. But its moral interest depends upon this—that, simply out of one brutal chastisement, arose naturally the entire series of events which so very nearly made shipwreck of all hope for one individual, and did in fact poison the tranquillity of a whole family for seven years. My next brother, younger by about four years than myself, was a boy of exquisite and delicate beauty—delicate, that is, in respect to its feminine elegance and bloom; for else, (as regards constitution) he turned out remarkably robust. In such excess did his beauty flourish during childhood, that those, who remember him and myself at the public school of Bath, will also remember the ludicrous molestation in the streets, (for to him it was molestation,) which it entailed upon him—ladies stopping continually to kiss him. The relation with whom we came to Bath from a remote quarter of the kingdom, occupied at first the very apartments on the North Parade, just quitted by Edmund Burke at the point of death. That circumstance, or the expectation of finding Burke still there, brought for some weeks crowds of inquirers, many of whom saw the childish Adonis, then scarcely seven years old, and inflicted upon him what he viewed as the martyrdom of their caresses. Thus began a persecution which continued as long as his years allowed it. The most brilliant complexion that could be imagined, the features of an Antinous, and perfect symmetry of figure at that period of his life (afterwards he lost it) made him the subject of never-ending admiration to the whole female population, gentle and simple, who passed him in the streets. In after days, he had the grace to regret his own perverse and scornful coyness—what Roman poets would have called his protervitas. But, at that time, so foolishly insensible was he to the honour, that he used to kick and struggle with all his might to liberate himself from the gentle violence which was continually offered and he renewed the scene so elaborately painted by Shakspeare, of the conflicts between Venus and Adonis. For two years, this continued a subject of irritation the keenest on the one side, and of laughter on the other, between my brother and his uglier schoolfellows, myself being

* There is an essay by Mr Coleridge, in his revised edition [of "The Friend," which contains elements of a deep philosophy, and which he himself (I believe) regarded as the profoundest effort of thought he had published to the world, illustrating principles pretty similar to those, but with a reference not to the art of biography so much (not at all, perhaps) as to the art of narration; and most admirably it is illustrated, in particular from the narration of Hamlet to Horatio, with respect to his sea adventures with Rosin-crantz and Guildenstern. I speak from a recollection of nineteen years.

amongst them. Not that we had the slightest jealousy on the subject—far from it: it struck us all (as it generally does strike boys) in the light of an attainment upon the dignity of a male, that he should be subjected to the caresses of women, without leave asked: this was felt to be a badge of childhood, and a proof that the object of such fondling tenderness, so public and avowed, must be regarded in the light of a baby—not to mention that the very foundation of all this distinction, a beautiful face, is as a male distinction regarded in a very questionable light by multitudes, and often by those most who are the possessors of that distinction. Certainly that was the fact in my brother's case. Not one of us could feel so pointedly as himself the ridicule of his situation; nor did he cease, when increasing years had liberated him from that practical expression of homage to his beauty, to regard the beauty itself as a degradation; nor could he bear to be flattered upon it, though, in reality, it did him service in after distresses, when no other endowment whatsoever would have been availing. Often, in fact, do men's natures sternly contradict the promise of their features; for no person would have believed that, under the blooming loveliness of a Narcissus, lay shrouded, as I firmly believe there did, the soul of a hero; as much courage as a man could have, with a capacity of patient submission to hardship, and of wrestling with calamity, that is rarely found amongst the endowments of youth. I have reason, also, to think that the state of degradation in which he believed himself to have passed his childish years, from the sort of public petting which I have described, and his strong recoil from it as an insult, went much deeper than was supposed, and had much to do in his subsequent conduct, and in nerving him to the strong resolutions he adopted. He seemed to resent as an original insult of Nature, the having given him a false index of character in his feminine beauty, and to take a pleasure in contradicting it. Had it been in his power, I am sure he would have spoiled it. Certain it is, that from the time he reached his eleventh birthday, he had begun already to withdraw himself from the society of all other boys—to fall into long fits of abstraction—and to throw himself upon his own resources in a way neither usual nor necessary. Schoolfellows of his own age and standing—those even who were the most amiable—he shunned; and, many years after his disappearance, I found, in his handwriting, a collection of fragments, couched in a sort of wild lyrical verses, presenting, unquestionably, the most extraordinary evidences of a proud, self-sustained mind, consciously concentrating his own hopes in himself and abjuring the rest of the world, that can ever have emanated from so young a person; since, upon the largest concession, and supposing them to have been written on the eve of his quitting England, which, however, was hardly compatible with the situation where they were found—even in that case, they must have been written at the age of thirteen. I have often speculated on the subject of these mysterious compositions; they were of a nature to have proceeded rather from some mystical quietist, such as Madame Guyon, if one can suppose the union with this rapt devotion of a rebellious spirit of worldly aspiration: passionate apostrophes there were, to nature and the powers of nature; and what seemed strangest of all was—that, in style, not only were they free from all tumor and inflation which might have been looked for in so young a writer, but were even wilfully childish and colloquial in a pathetic degree—in fact, in point of tone, allowing for the difference between a narrative poem and a lyrical, they somewhat resembled that very beautiful and little-known * poem of George Herbert, in which he describes symbolically to a friend, under the form of treacherous ill usage he had suspected, the religious processes by which a soul is weaned from the world. Taken as a whole, they most reminded me of "Lewti," a joint poem by Coleridge and Wordsworth. The most obvious solution of the mystery would be, to suppose these fragments to have been copied from some obscure author: but, besides that no author could have remained obscure in this age of elaborate research, who had been capable of sighs, (for such I may call them,) drawn up from such well-like recesses of feeling, and expressed with such dithyrambic fervour and exquisite simplicity of language—there was another testimony to their being the productions of him who owned the penmanship; which was, that some of the papers exhibited the whole process of creation and growth, such as erasures, substitutions, doubts expressed as to this and that form of expression, together with references backwards and forwards. Now, that the handwriting was my brother's, admitted of no doubt whatsoever. I now go on with his story.—In 1800, my visit to Ireland, and visits to other places subsequently, separated me from him for above a year. In 1801, we were at very different schools: I in the highest class of a great public school—he at a very sequestered parsonage in a northern county. This situation, probably, fed and cherished his melancholy habits; for he had no society except that of a younger brother, who would give him no disturbance at all. The development of our national resources had not yet gone so far as absolutely to exterminate from the map of England everything like a heath, a breezy down, (such as gave so peculiar a character to the counties of Wilts, Somerset, Dorset, &c.,) or even a village common. Heaths were yet to be found in England, not so spacious, indeed, as the landes of France, but as wild and romantic. In such a situation my brother lived, and under the tuition of a clergyman, retired in his habits, and even ascetic, but gentle in his manners. (To that I can speak myself; for, in the winter of 1801, I dined with him, and I found that his yoke was, indeed, a mild one; since, even to my youngest brother, a headstrong child of seven,

* This poem, from great admiration of its mother English, and to illustrate some ideas upon style, Mr Coleridge republished in his Biographia Literaria.

he used no stronger remonstrance in urging him to some essential point of duty, than "Do be persuaded, sir." Here, therefore, was the best of all possible situations for my brother's wayward and haughty nature. The clergyman was learned, quiet, absorbed in his studies; humble and modest beyond the proprieties of his situation; and treating my brother in all points as a companion: whilst, on the other hand, my brother was not the person to forget the respect due, by a triple title, to a clergyman, a scholar, and his own preceptor—one, besides, who so little thought of exacting it. How happy might all parties have been—what suffering, what danger, what years of miserable anxiety might have been spared to all who were interested—had the guardians and executors of my father's will thought fit to "let well alone!" But, "per star meglio,"* they chose to remove my brother from this gentle recluse to an active, bustling man of the world, the very anti-pole in character. What might be the pretensions of this gentleman to scholarship, I never had any means of judging; and, considering that he must now, (if living at all,) at a distance of thirty-six years, be grey-headed, I shall respect his age so far as to suppress his name. He was of a class now annually declining (and, I hope, rapidly) to extinction. Thanks be to God, in that point, at least, for the dignity of human nature, that, amongst the many, many cases of reform held by some of us, or destined, however in defiance of all opinions, eventually to turn out chimerical, this one, at least, never can be defeated, injured, or eclipsed. As man grows more intellectual, the power of managing him by his intellect and his moral nature, in utter contempt of all appeals to his mere animal instincts of pain, must go on pari passu. And, if a "Te Deum," or an "O Jubilate!" were to be celebrated by all nations and languages for any one advance and absolute conquest over wrong and error won by human nature in our times—yes, not excepting

"The bloody writing by all nations torn"—the abolition of the commerce in slaves—to my thinking, that festival should be for the mighty progress made towards the suppression of brutal, bestial modes of punishment. Nay, I may call them worse than bestial; for a man of any goodness of nature does not willingly or needlessly resort to the spur or the lash with his horse or with his hound. But, with respect to man, if he will not be moved or won over by conciliatory means, by means that presuppose him a reasonable creature, then let him die, confounded in his own vileness: but let not me, let not the man (that is to say) who has him in his power, dishonour himself by inflicting punishments, violating that image of human nature which, not in any vague rhetorical sense, but upon a religious principle of duty, (the human person is expressly exalted in Scripture, under the notion that it is "the temple of the Holy Ghost,") ought to be a consecrated thing in the eyes of all good men; and of this, we may be assured—this, which I am now going to say, is more sure than day or night—that, in proportion as man, as man, is honoured, raised, exalted, trusted, in that proportion will he become more worthy of honour, of exaltation, of trust.

Well, this schoolmaster had very different views of man and his nature. He not only thought that physical coercion was the one sole engine by which man could be managed, but—on the principle of that common maxim which declares that, when two schoolboys meet with powers at all near to a balance, no peace can be expected between them until it is fairly put to the trial, and settled who is the master—on that same principle, he fancied that no pupil could adequately or proportionably reverence his master until he had settled the precise proportion of superiority in animal powers by which his master was in advance of himself. Strength of blows only could ascertain that: and, as he was not very nice about creating his opportunities, as he plunged at once "in medias res," and more especially when he saw or suspected any rebellious tendencies, he soon picked a quarrel with my unfortunate brother. Not, he it observed, that he much cared for a well-looking or respectable quarrel. No. I have been assured that, even when the most fawning obsequiousness had appealed to his clemency, in the person of some timorous new-comer, appalled by the reports he had heard—even in such cases, (deeming it wise to impress, from the beginning, a salutary awe of his Jovian thunders,) he made a practice of doing thus:—He would speak loud, utter some order, not very clearly, perhaps, as respected the sound, but with perfect perplexity as regarded the sense, to the timid, sensitive boy upon whom he intended to fix a charge of disobedience. "Sir, if you please, what was it that you said?"—"What was it that I said? What! playing upon my words? Chopping logic? Strip, sir; strip this instant." Thenceforward this timid boy became a serviceable instrument in his equipage. Not only was he a proof, even without co-operation on the master's part, that extreme cases of submission could not ensure mercy, but also he, this boy, in his own person, breathed forth, at intervals, a dim sense of awe and worship—the religion of fear—towards the grim Moloch of the scene. Hence, as by electrical conductors, was conveyed throughout every region of the establishment a tremulous sensibility that vibrated towards the centre. Different, O Rowland Hill! are the laws of thy establishment; far other are the echoes heard amid the ancient halls of Bruce. There it is possible for the timid child to be happy—for the child destined to an early grave to reap his brief harvest in peace. Wherefore were there no such asylums in those days? Man flourished then, as now, in beauty and in power. Wherefore did he not put forth his power upon establishments that might cultivate happiness as well as knowledge? Wherefore did no man cry aloud—

"Give to the morn of youth its natural blessedness?"

Well; why or wherefore it will never be made clear, but—so it was—these things were not; or, if they were at all, in small local institutions, scarcely heard of beyond a few individuals, and comprehending, perhaps, no more aliens than that quiet family in which my two brothers were living—viz., exactly those two. Meantime, the elder of these two, in an evil hour, having quitted that most quiet of human sanctuaries, having forfeited that peace which possibly he was never to retrieve, fell (as I have said) into the power of this Moloch. And this Moloch upon him illustrated the laws of his establishment: him also, the gentle, the beautiful, but also the proud, the arrogant, he beat—beat brutally—kicked, trampled on!

In two hours from that time, my brother was on the road to Liverpool. Painfully he made out his way to Liverpool, having not much money, and with a sense of total abandonment which made him feel that all he might have would prove little enough for his purposes. Not many weeks before this time, we had travelled together, we three brothers, over part of this very road, in a post-chaise from Chester to the point at which our roads diverged. Reaching the inn, we (that is, this brother and myself) sat down and wept: we were now to part. We wept; and the youngest, who understood not our grief, wept also; but we understood it well. We had no superiors who could or would enter into our wishes. Had we learned to feel sensibly the shortness of time, we might have cared little for this. Five years and a half to me, nine and a half to the elder of my two brothers, would bring us to the brink of our inheritance; and then we might be happy, according to the mode of our choice. But to us these intervals were so long that we should have regarded them as sensible expressions of the infinite; and, therefore, we did not think of them at all. We wept, because we feared impending changes which might justify our tears, and because, at our ages, we were helpless against injuries that might be meditated. We parted—it was about sunset; each party entered a post-chaise at the same moment—my two brothers into one, I alone into the other. There we set off together: waved our hands to each other, as our roads diverged from the little town of Altrincham; and never again did either party see the other, till ten long years were past.

My brother went to an inn, after his long, long journey to Liverpool, foot-sore—(for he had walked through many days, and, from ignorance, of the world, combined with excessive shyness—oh! how shy do people become from pride!—had not profited by those well-known incidents upon English high-roads—return post-chaises, stage-coaches, led horses, or waggons)—foot-sore and eager for sleep. Sleep, supper, breakfast in the morning—all these he had; so far his slender finances reached; and for these he paid the treacherous landlord; who then proposed to him that they should take a walk out together, by way of looking at the public buildings and the docks. It seems the man had noticed my brother's beauty, some circumstances about his dress inconsistent with his mode of travelling, and also his style of conversation. Accordingly, he wiled him along from street to street, until they reached the Town Hall. "Here seems to be a fine building," said this Jesuitical knave, as if it had been some recent discovery—a sort of Luxor or Palmyra, that he had unexpectedly lit upon amongst the undiscovered parts of Liverpool—"Here seems to be a fine building: shall we go in and ask leave to look at it?" My brother, thinking less of the spectacle than the spectator, whom, in a wilderness of man, naturally he wished to make his friend, consented readily. In they went; and, by the merest accident, Mr Mayor and the town-council were then sitting. The treacherous landlord communicated privately an account of his suspicions to his Worship. He himself conducted my brother, under pretence of discovering the best station for picturesque purposes, to the particular box for prisoners at the bar. This was not suspected by the poor boy, not even when Mr Mayor began to question him. He still thought it an accident, though doubtless he blushed excessively on being questioned, and questioned so impertinently, in public. The object of the Mayor and of other Liverpool gentlemen then present [this happened in 1802] was, to ascertain my brother's real rank and family: for he persisted in representing himself as a poor wandering boy. Various means were vainly tried to elicit this information; until at length—like the wily Ulysses, who mixed with his pedlar's budget of female ornaments and attire, a few arms, by way of tempting Achilles to a self-detection in the court of Lycomedes—one gentleman counselled the Mayor to send for a Greek Testament. This was done; the Testament was presented open at St John's Gospel to my brother, and he was requested to say whether he knew in what language that book was written; or whether perhaps he could furnish them with a translation from the page before him. Human vanity in this situation was hardly proof against such an appeal. The poor boy fell into the snare: he construed a few verses; and immediately he was consigned to the care of a gentleman who won from him by kindness what he had refused to importunities or menaces. His family he confessed at once, but not his school. An express was therefore forwarded from Liverpool to our nearest male relation—a military man, then by accident on leave of absence from a remote colony. He came over, took my brother back, (looking upon the whole as a boyish frolic of no permanent importance,) made some stipulations in his behalf for indemnity from punishment, and immediately returned home. Left to himself, the grim tyrant of the school easily evaded the stipulations, and repeated his brutalities more fiercely than before—now acting in the double spirit of tyranny and revenge.

In a few hours, my brother was again on the road to Liverpool. But not on this occasion did he resort to any inn, or visit any treacherous hunter of the picturesque. He offered himself to no temptations now, nor to any risks. He went right onwards to the docks, addressed himself to a grave elder master of a trading vessel, bound upon a distant voyage, and instantly procured an engagement. The skipper was a good and sensible man, and (as it turned out) a sailor accomplished in all parts of his profession. The ship which he commanded was a South Sea whaler belonging to Lord Grenville, whether lying at Liverpool or in the Thames at that moment, I am not sure. However, they soon afterwards sailed.

For somewhat more than two years, my brother continued under the care of this good man, who was won by his appearance, and by some resemblance which he fancied in his features to a son whom he had lost. Fortunate, indeed, for the poor boy, was this interval of fatherly superintendence; for, under him, he was not only preserved from the perils which afterwards besieged him, until his years had made him more capable of confronting them; but also he had thus an opportunity, which he improved to the utmost, of making himself acquainted with the two separate branches of his profession—navigation and seamanship, qualifications which are not very often united.

After the death of this captain, my brother ran through many wild adventures; until at length, after a severe action fought off the coast of Peru, the armed merchantman in which he then served was captured by pirates. Most of the crew were massacred. My brother, on account of the important services he could render, was spared; and with these pirates, cruising under a black flag, and perpetrating unnumbered atrocities, he was obliged to sail for the next two years and a half; nor could he in all that period find any opportunity for effecting his escape.

During this long expatriation, let any thoughtful reader imagine the perils of every sort which besieged one so young, so inexperienced, so sensitive, and so haughty; perils to his life, (but these it was the very expression of his unhappy situation, were those least to be mourned for;) perils to his good name, going the length of absolute infamy—since, if the piratical ship had been captured by a British man-of-war, he might have found it impossible to clear himself of a voluntary participation in the bloody actions of his shipmates; and, on the other hand, (a case equally probable in the regions which they frequented,) supposing him to have been captured by a Spanish guarda costa, he would scarcely have been able, from his ignorance of the Spanish language, to draw even a momentary attention to the special circumstances of his own situation; he would have been involved in the general presumptions of the case, and would have been executed in a summary way, upon the prima facie evidence against him, that he did not appear to be in the condition of a prisoner; and, if his name had ever again reached his country, it would have been in some sad list of ruffians, murderers, traitors to their country; and even these titles, as if not enough in themselves, aggravated by the name of pirate, which at once includes them all, and surpasses them all. These were perils sufficiently distressing at any rate; but, last of all, came others even more appalling—the perils of moral contamination, in that excess which might be looked for from such associates: not, be it recollected, a few wild notions or lawless principles adopted into his creed of practical ethics, but that brutal transfiguration of the entire character, which occurs, for instance, in the case of the young gipsy son of Effie Deans; a change, making it impossible to rely upon the very holiest instincts of the moral nature, and consigning its victim to hopeless reprobation. Murder itself might have lost its horrors to one who must have been but too familiar with the spectacle, if not forced into the perpetration with his own youthful hands, of massacre by wholesale upon unresisting crews, upon passengers enfeebled by sickness, or upon sequestered villagers, roused from their slumbers by the glare of conflagration reflected from gleaming cutlasses, and from the faces of demons. This fear it was—a fear like this, as, I have often thought—which must, amidst her others woes, have been the Aaron who that swallowed up all the rest to the unhappy Marie Antoinette. This must have been the sting of death to her maternal heart, the grief paramount, the “crowning” grief—the prospect, namely, that her royal boy would not be dismissed from the horrors of royalty, to peace and humble innocence; but that his fair cheek would be ravaged by vice as well as sorrow; that he would be tempted into cursing, drinking, and every mode of moral pollution; until, like poor Constance with her young Arthur, but for a sadder reason, even if it were possible that the royal mother should see her son in “the courts of heaven,” she would not know again one so fearfully transfigured. This prospect for the royal Constance of revolutionary France, was but too painfully fulfilled; as we are taught to guess, even from the faithful records of the Duchesse D’Angoulême. The young Dauphin, to the everlasting infamy of his keepers, was so trained as to become loathsome for coarse and vulgar brutality, as well as for habits of uncleanliness, to all who approached him—one purpose of his guilty tutors being to render royalty and august descent contemptible in his person. And, in fact, they were so far likely to succeed in this purpose, for the moment, and to the extent of an individual case, that, upon that account alone, but still more for the sake of the poor child, the most welcome news with respect to him—him whose birth* had drawn anthems of

* To those who are open to the impression of omens, there is a most striking one on record with respect to the birth of this ill-fated Prince, not less so than the falling off of the head from the cane of Charles I. at his trial, or the same King’s striking a medal, bearing the image of an oak-tree, with this prophetic inscription, “Seris nepotibus umbram.” At the very moment when, according to immemorial usage) the birth of a child was in the act of annunciation to the great officers of State assembled in the Queen’s bed-chamber, and when a private signal from a lady had made known the glad tidings that it was a Dauphin, (the first child having been exultation from twenty-five millions of men—was the news of his death. And what else can well be expected for children suddenly withdrawn from parental tenderness, and thrown upon their own guardianship at such an age as from ten to fourteen, an age combining the separate perils of childhood and raw manhood. But, in my brother's case, all the adverse chances, overwhelming as they seemed, were turned aside by some good angel ; all had failed to harm him ; and he came out unscathed from the fiery furnace.

I have said that he would not have appeared to any capturing ship as standing in the situation of prisoner amongst the pirates, nor was he such in the sense of being confined. He moved about, when on board ship, in freedom ; but he was watched, never trusted on shore, unless under very peculiar circumstances ; and tolerated at all only because one accomplishment made him indispensable to the prosperity of the ship. Amongst the various parts of nautical skill communicated to my brother by his first fatherly captain, was the management of chronometers. Several had been captured, some of the highest value, in the many prizes, European or American. My brother happened to be perfect in the skill of managing them ; and, fortunately for him, no other person amongst them had that skill even its lowest degree. To this one qualification, therefore, (and ultimately to this only,) he was indebted for both safety and freedom ; since, though he might have been spared, in the first moments of carnage, from other considerations, there is little doubt that, in some one of the innumerable brawls which followed through the years of his captivity, he would have fallen a sacrifice to hasty impulses of anger or wantonness, had not his safety been made an object of interest and vigilance to those in command, and to all who assumed any care for the general welfare. Much, therefore, it was that he owed to this accomplishment. Still, there is no good thing without its alloy ; and this great blessing brought along with it something worse than a dull duty—the necessity, in fact, of facing fears and trials to which the sailor's heart is pre-eminently sensible. All sailors, it is notorious, are superstitious ; partly, I suppose, from looking out so much upon the wilderness of waves, empty of all human life ; for mighty solitudes are generally fear-haunted and fear-peopled ; such, for instance, as the solitudes of forests, where, in the absence of human forms and ordinary human sounds, are discerned forms more dusky and vague, not referred by the eye to any known type, a princess, to the signal disappointment of the nation) the whole frame of carved wood-work at the back of the Queen's bed, representing the crown and other regalia of France, with the Bourbon lilies, came rattling down in ruins. There is another and more direct ill-omen, connected, perhaps, with the birth of this prince ; in fact, a distinct prophecy of his ruin—a prophecy that he should survive his father, and yet not reign—which seems so overlaid with mystery, that one is perplexed in what light to view it ; and the more so that the King (Louis XVIII.) who records it, obviously confounds the first Dauphin with the second, and sounds imperfectly intelligible. And, therefore, are all German coal-burners, wood-cutters, &c., superstitious. Now the sea is often peopled, amidst its ravings, with what seem innumerable human voices—such voices, or as ominous, as what were heard by Kubla Khan—"ancestral voices prophesying war ;" oftentimes laughter mixes, from a distance, (seeming to come also from distant times, as well as distant places,) with the uproar of waters ; and doubtless shapes of fear, or shapes of beauty not less awful, are at times seen upon the waves by the diseased eye of the sailor, in other cases besides the somewhat rare one of calenture. This vast solitude of the sea being taken, therefore, as one condition of the superstitious fear found so commonly among sailors, a second may be the perilous insecurity of their own lives—or (if the lives of sailors, after all, by means of large immunities from danger in other shapes, are not so insecure as is supposed, though, by the way, it is enough for this result that, to themselves, they seem so,) yet at all events the insecurity of the ships in which they sail. In such a case, in the case of battle, and in others where the empire of chance seems absolute, there the temptation is greatest to dally with supernatural oracles and supernatural means of consulting them. Finally, the interruption habitually of all ordinary avenues to information about the fate of their dearest relatives ; the consequent agitation which must often possess those who are re-entering upon home waters ; and the sudden burst, upon stepping ashore, of heart-shaking news in long accumulated arrears—these are circumstances which dispose the mind to look out for relief towards signs and omens as one way of breaking the shock by dim anticipations. Rats leaving a vessel destined to sink, although the political application of it as a name of reproach is purely modern, must be ranked among the oldest of omens ; and perhaps the most sober-minded of men might have leave to be moved with any augury of an ancient traditional order, such as had won faith for centuries, applied to a fate so interesting as that of the ship to which he was on the point of committing himself. Other causes might be assigned, causative of nautical superstition, and tending to feed it. But enough. It is well known that the whole family of sailors is superstitious. My brother, poor Pink, (this was an old household name, which he retained amongst us from an incident of his childhood,) was so in an immoderate degree. Being a great reader, (in fact, he had read everything in his mother tongue that was of general interest,) he was pretty well aware how general was the ridicule attached in our times to the subject of ghosts. But this—nor the reverence he yielded otherwise to some of those writers who had joined in that ridicule—any more had unsettled his faith in their existence, than the submission of a sailor in a religious sense to his spiritual counsellor upon the false and fraudulent pleasures of luxury, can ever disturb his remembrance of the virtues lodged in rum or tobacco. His own unconquerable, unanswerable experience, the blank realities of pleasure and pain, put to flight all arguments whatsoever that anchored only in his understanding. Pink used, in arguing the case with me, to admit that ghosts might be questionable realities in our hemisphere; but "it's a different thing to the sulhard of the line." And then he would go on to tell me of his own fearful experience; in particular of one many times renewed, and investigated to no purpose by parties of men communicating from a distance upon a system of concerted signals, in one of the Gallapagos Islands. These islands, which were visited, and I think described, by Dampier—and therefore must have been a haunt of the Buccaniers and Flibustiers in the latter part of the 17th century—were so still of their more desperate successors, the Pirates, at the beginning of the 19th; and for the same reason—the facilities they offer (rare in those seas) for procuring wood and water. Hither, then, the black flag often resorted; and here, amidst these romantic solitudes—islands untenanted by man—oftentimes it lay furled up for weeks together; rapine and murder had rest for a season; and the bloody cutlass slept within its scabbard. When this happened, and when it became known beforehand that it would happen, a tent was pitched on shore for my brother, and the chronometers were transported thither for the period of their stay. The island selected for this purpose, amongst the many equally open to their choice, might, according to circumstances, be that which offered the best anchorage, or that from which the re-embarkation was easiest, or that which allowed the readiest access to wood and water. But for some, or all of these advantages, the particular island most generally honoured by the piratical custom and "good-will," was one, known to American navigators as "The Wood-cutter's Island." There was some old tradition—and I know not but it was a tradition dating from the times of Dampier—that a Spaniard or an Indian settler in this island, (relying, perhaps, too entirely upon the protection of perfect solitude,) had been murdered in pure wantonness by some of the lawless rovers who frequented this solitary archipelago. Whether it were from some peculiar atrocity of bad faith in the act, or from the sanctity of the man, or the deep solitude of the island, or with a view to the peculiar edification of mariners in these semi-Christian seas—so however it was, and attested by generations of sea-vagabonds, (for most of the armed roamers in these ocean Zaaras at one time were of a suspicious order,) that every night, duly as the sun went down, and the twilight began to prevail, a sound arose—audible to other islands, and to every ship lying quietly at anchor in that neighbourhood—of a wood-cutter's axe. Sturdy were the blows, and steady the succession in which they followed: some even fancied they could hear that sort of groaning respiration which is made by men who use an axe, or by those who in towns ply the "three-man beetle" of Falstaff, as pavours; echoes they certainly heard of every sound, from the profound woods and the sylvan precipices on the margin of the shores; which, however, should rather indicate that the sounds were not supernatural, since, if a visual object, falling under hyper-physical or cata-physical laws, loses its shadow—by parity of argument, an audible object, in the same circumstances, should lose its echo. But this was the story: and amongst sailors there is as little variety of versions in telling any true sea-story, as there is in a log-book, or in "The Flying Dutchman." literatim fidelity is, with a sailor, a point at once of religious faith and worldly honour. The close of the story was—that, after, suppose, ten or twelve minutes of hacking and hewing, a horrid crash was heard, announcing that the tree, if tree it were, that never yet was made visible to daylight search, had yielded to the old woodman's persecution. It was exactly the crash, so familiar to many ears on board the neighbouring vessels, which expresses the harsh tearing asunder of the fibres, caused by the weight of the trunk in falling; beginning slowly, increasing rapidly, and terminating in one rush of rending. This over—one tree felled "towards his winter store"—there was an interval: man must have rest; and the old woodman, after working for more than a century, must want repose. Time enough to begin again after a quarter-of-an-hour's relaxation. Sure enough, in that space of time, again began, in the words of Comus, "the wonted roar amid the woods." Again the blows become quicker, as the catastrophe drew nearer; again the final crash resounded; and again the mighty echoes travelled through the solitary forests, and were taken up by all the islands near and far, like Joanna's laugh amongst the Westmoreland hills, to the astonishment of the silent ocean. Yet, wherefore should the ocean be astonished—he that had heard this nightly tumult, by all accounts, for more than a century? My brother, however, poor Pink, was astonished, in good earnest, being, in that respect, of the genus atlantiterum; and as often as the gentlemen pirates steered their course for the Gallapagos, he would sink in spirit before the trials he might be summoned to face. No second person was ever put on shore with Pink, lest poor Pink and he might become jovial over the liquor, and the chronometers be broken or neglected; for a considerable quantity of spirits was necessarily landed, as well as of provisions, because sometimes a sudden change of weather, or the sudden appearance of a suspicious sail, might draw the ship off the island for a fortnight. My brother could have pleaded his fears without shame; but he had a character to maintain with the sailors: he was respected equally for his seamanship* and his shipmanship.

* "Seamanship and shipmanship." These are two functions of a sailor seldom separated in the mind of a landsman. The conducting a ship (causing her to choose a right path) through the ocean—that is one thing. Then there is the management of the ship within herself, the trimming of her sails, &c., (causing her to keep the line chosen,) that is another thing. The first is called seamanship; the second might be called shipmanship; but is (I believe) called navigation. They are perfectly dis-

By the way, when it is considered, that one-half of a sailor's professional science refers him to the stars, (though it is true the other half refers him to the sails and shrouds of a ship,) just as in geodesical operations, one part is referred to heaven, and one to earth—When this is considered, another argument arises for the superstition of sailors, so far as it is astrological. They who know (but know the or without knowing the δια τι) that the stars have much to do in guiding their own movements, which are yet so far from the stars, and, to all appearance, so little connected with them, may be excused for supposing that the stars are connected astrologically with human destinies. But this by the way. The sailors, looking to Pink's double skill, and to his experience on shore, (more astonishing than all beside, being experience gathered amongst ghosts,) expressed an admiration which, to one who was also a sailor, had too genial a sound to be sacrificed, if it could be maintained at any price. Therefore it was, that Pink still clung, in spite of his terrors, to his shore appointment. But hard was his trial; and many a time has he described to me one effect of it, when too long continued, or combined with darkness too intense. The wood-cutter would begin his operations soon after the sun had set; but, uniformly, at that time, his noise was less. Three hours after sunset, it had increased; and, generally, at midnight it was greatest, but not always. Sometimes the case varied thus far: that it greatly increased towards three or four o'clock in the morning; and, as the sound grew louder, and thereby seemed to draw nearer, poor Pink's ghostly panic grew insupportable; and he absolutely crept from his pavilion, and its luxurious comforts, to a point of rock—a promontory—about half-a-mile off, from which he could see the ship. The mere sight of a human abode, though an abode of ruffians, comforted his panic. With the approach of daylight, the mysterious sounds ceased. Cock-crow there happened to be none, in those islands of the Gallapagos, or none in that particular island; though many cocks are heard crowing in the woods of America, and these, perhaps might be caught by spiritual senses; or the wood-cutter may be supposed, upon Hamlet's principle, either scenting the morning air, or catching the sounds of Christian matin-bells, from some dim convent, in the depth of American forests. However, so it was: the wood-cutter's axe began to intermit about the earliest approach of dawn; and, as "light thickened" it ceased entirely. At nine, ten, or eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the whole appeared to have been a delusion; but towards sunset, it revived in credit; during twilight it tinct: one man rarely has both in perfection. Both may be illustrated from the rudder. The question is, suppose, at the Cape of Good Hope, to steer for India: trust the rudder to him, as a seaman, who knows the passage whether within or without Madagascar. The question is to avoid a sunk rock: trust the rudder to him, as a navigator, who understands the art of steering to a nicety.

strengthened; and very soon afterwards, superstitious panic was again seated on her throne. Such were the fluctuations of the case. Meantime, Pink, sitting on his promontory in early dawn, and consoling his terrors, by looking away from the mighty woods to the tranquil ship, on board of which (in spite of her secret black flag) the whole crew, murderers and all, were sleeping peacefully—he, a beautiful English boy, chased away to the Antipodes from one early home by his sense of wounded honour, and from his immediate home by superstitious fear, recalled to my mind an image and a situation that had been beautifully sketched by Miss Bannerman in "Basil," one of the striking (though, to rapid readers, somewhat unintelligible) metrical tales published about the beginning of this century, under the name of Tales of Superstition and Chivalry. Basil is a "rude sea-boy," desolate and neglected from infancy, but with feelings profound from nature and fed by solitude. He dwells alone in a rocky cave; but, in consequence of some supernatural terrors connected with a murder, arising in some way, (not very clearly made out,) to trouble the repose of his home, he leaves it in horror, and rushes in the grey dawn to the sea-side rocks; seated on which he draws a sort of consolation for his terrors, or of sympathy with his wounded heart, from that mimicry of life which goes on for ever amongst the raving waves.

From the Gallapagos, Pink went often to Juan, (or, as he chose to call it, after Dampier and others, John) Fernandez. Very lately (December 1837) the newspapers of Europe informed us, and the story was current for full nine days, that this fair island had been swallowed up by an earthquake; or, at least, that, in some way or other, it had disappeared. Had that story proved true, one pleasant bower would have perished—raised by Pink as a memorial expression of his youthful feelings either towards De Foe, or his visionary creature Robinson Crusoe—but rather, perhaps, towards the substantial Alexander Selkirk; for it was raised on some spot known or reputed by tradition to have been one of those most occupied as a home by Selkirk. I say "rather towards Alexander Selkirk;" for there is a difficulty to the judgment in associating Robinson Crusoe with this lovely island of the Pacific, and a difficulty even to the fancy. Why, it is hard to guess, or through what perverse contradiction to the facts, De Foe chose to place the shipwreck of Robinson Crusoe upon the eastern side of the American Continent. Now, not only was this in direct opposition to the realities of the case upon which he built, as first reported (I believe) by Woodes Rogers, from the log-book of the Duke and Duchess—(a privateer fitted out, to the best of my remembrance, by the Bristol merchants, two or three years before the Peace of Utrecht;) and so far the mind of any man acquainted with these circumstances was staggered, in attempting to associate this eastern wreck with this western island; but a worse obstacle than this, because a moral one, (and what, by analogy, to an error against time, which we call an anachronism, and, if against the spirit of time, a moral anachronism, we might here term a moral anatomism,) is this—that, by thus perversely transferring the scene from the Pacific to the Atlantic, De Foe has transferred it from a quiet and sequestered to a populous and troubled sea—the Fleet Street or Cheapside of the navigating world, the great thoroughfare of nations—and thus has prejudiced the moral sense and the fancy against his fiction still more inevitably than his judgment, and in a way that was perfectly needless; for the change brought along with it no shadow of compensation.

My brother's wild adventures amongst these desperate sea-rovers were afterwards communicated in long letters to a female relative; and, even as letters, apart from the fearful burthen of their contents, I can bear witness that they had very extraordinary merit. This, in fact, was the happy result of writing from his heart; feeling profoundly what he communicated, and anticipating the profoundest sympathy with all that he uttered from her whom he addressed. A man of business, who opened some of these letters, in his character of agent for my brother's five guardians, and who had not any special interest in the affair, assured me that, throughout the whole course of his life, he had never read anything so affecting, from the facts they contained, and from the sentiments which they expressed—above all, the yearning for that England which he remembered as the land of his youthful pleasures, but also of his youthful degradations. Three of the guardians were present at the reading of these letters, and were all affected to tears, notwithstanding they had been irritated to the uttermost by the course which both myself and my brother had pursued—a course which seemed to argue some defect of judgment, or of reasonable kindness, in themselves. These letters, I hope, are still preserved; though they have been long removed from my control. Thinking of them, and their extraordinary merit, I have often been led to believe that every post-town, and many times in the course of a month, carries out numbers of beautifully written letters; and more from women than from men; not that men are to be supposed less capable of writing good letters—and, in fact, amongst all the celebrated letter-writers of past or present times, a large overbalance happens to have been men—but that more frequently women write from their hearts; and the very same cause operates to make female letters good, which operated at one period to make the diction of Roman ladies more pure than that of orators or professional cultivators of the Roman language—and which, at another period, in the Byzantine Court, operated to preserve the purity of the mother idiom within the nurseries and the female drawing-rooms of the palace, whilst it was corrupted in the forensic standards, and the academic—in the standards of the pulpit and the throne. With respect to Pink's yearning for England, that had been partially gratified in some part of his long exile: twice, as we learned long afterwards, he had landed in England: but such was his haughty adherence to his purpose, and such his consequent terror of being discovered and reclaimed by his guardians, that he never attempted to communicate with any of his brothers or sisters. There he was wrong—me they should have cut to pieces before I would have betrayed him. I, like him, had been an obstinate recusant to what I viewed as unjust pretensions of authority; and, having been the first to raise* the standard of revolt, had been taxed by my guardians with having seduced Pink by my example. But that was untrue: Pink acted for himself. However, he could know little of all this; and he traversed England twice, without making an overture towards any communication with his friends. Two circumstances of these journeys he used to mention: both were from the port of London (for he never contemplated London but as a port) to Liverpool: or, thus far I may be wrong—that one of the two might be (in the return order) from Liverpool to London. On the first of these journeys his route lay through Coventry; on the other, through Oxford and Birmingham. In neither case, had he started with much money; and he was going to have retired from the coach at the place of supping on the first night, (the journey then occupying two entire days and two entire nights,) when the passengers insisted on paying for him: that was a tribute to his beauty—not yet extinct. He mentioned this part of his adventures somewhat shily, whilst going over them with a sailor's literal accuracy; though, as a record belonging to what he viewed as childish years, he had ceased to care about it. On the other journey his experience was different, but equally testified to the spirit of kindness that is everywhere abroad. He had no money, on this occasion, that could purchase even a momentary lift by a stage-coach: as a pedestrian, he had travelled down to Oxford, occupying two days in the fifty-four or fifty-six miles which then measured the road from London, and sleeping in a farmer's barn without leave asked. Wearied and depressed in spirits, he had reached Oxford, hopeless of any aid, and with a deadly shame at the thought of asking it. But, somewhere in the High Street, and according to his very accurate sailor's description of that noble street, it must have been about the entrance of All Souls' College, he met a gentleman—a gownsman, who (at the very moment of turning into the college gate) looked at Pink earnestly, and then gave him a guinea; saying at the time—"I know what it is to be in your situation. You are a schoolboy, and you have run away from your school. Well, I was once in your situation, and I pity you." The kind gownsman, who wore a velvet cap with a silk gown, and must therefore have been what in Oxford is called a gentleman commoner, gave him an address at some college or other—Magdalen, he fancied, in after years—where he instructed him to call before he quitted Oxford. Had Pink done this, and had he frankly communicated his whole story, very probably he would have received—not assistance merely—but the best advice for guiding his future motions. His reason for not keeping the appointment, was simply, that he was nervously shy; and, above all things, jealous of being entrapped by insidious kindness into revelations that might prove dangerously circumstantial. Oxford had a mayor—Oxford had a corporation—Oxford had Greek Testaments past all counting; and so, remembering past experiences, Pink held it to be the wisest counsel that he should pursue his route on foot to Liverpool. That guinea, however, he used to say, saved him from despair. One circumstance affected me in this part of Pink's story. I was a student in Oxford at that time. By comparing dates, there was no doubt whatever that I, who held my guardians in abhorrence, and above all things admired my brother for his conduct, might have rescued him at this point of his youthful trials, four years before the fortunate catastrophe of his case, from the calamities which awaited him. This is felt generally to be the most distressing form of human blindness—the case when accident brings two fraternal hearts, or any two persons whatsoever, deeply interested in effecting a reunion of hearts yearning for reunion, into almost touching neighbourhood, and then, in a moment after, by the difference, perhaps, of three inches in space, or three seconds in time, will separate them again, unconscious of their brief neighbourhood, for many a year, or, it may be, for ever. Amongst the monstrosities and the frantic extravagances of Goethe, which have excluded, and for ever will exclude him from taking root in our literature, there is one drama, dull in its conduct and development beyond all precedent, but heart-rending in its plot, where this principle of pathos forms the hinge of the whole fable—the "Eugenia" I mean—a drama in which (and apparently the fable has been suggested by some real case amongst the mercurial or left-handed marriages of Germany) a prince loving better than light and day one heavenly girl, a grown-up daughter, Eugenia, is suddenly persuaded to believe, for some purpose of intrigue, that she is dead. Well; the reader is led to feel that the man is happy, and thrice happy, who has no daughter; because, for him, neither fear nor grief of this kind is possible. Meantime, the daughter, thus mourned for, and whom the prince would have redeemed with his own life a thousand times over, what becomes of her? She, with a wretched governess, bribed doubly, by money in the first place, and by a hollow promise of marriage in the second—is turned adrift; believing herself to have been rejected by her father. She travels, unknown for what she is, to a sea-port town; everywhere treated with respect for her personal merits; everywhere viewed as a poor wretched outcast, under the ban of government; and not seldom standing a chance of being, in that character, thrown back upon her father's adoring eyes. All chances, however, are thrown away upon her who had been born to misfortune. Her father she sees no more; and the drama (finished only to the end of the first part) closes with the prospect of her embarking for some distant land.* How this drama would have been terminated, had Goethe chosen to terminate it, I do not know or guess. It ought not to have had a prosperous ending; and yet, for the relief of the heart, there should have been some αναγνώρισις, even when too late for a happy reunion. In the present case, however, it may be doubted whether this unconscious rencontre and unconscious parting in Oxford ought to be viewed as a misfortune. Pink, it is true, endured years of suffering, four at least, that might have been saved by this seasonable rencontre; but, on the other hand, by travelling through his misfortunes with unabated spirit, and to their natural end, he won experience and distinctions that else he would have missed. His further history was briefly this:—

* And here may be a fit place for mentioning a case of equal obstinacy, more worthy to be admired than mine, because without a shadow of self-interest to support it. When I quitted school in the manner recorded in the "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," I left a large trunk behind me. This, knowing that I had not time to send it off before me, I confided to the care of a boy one class below me; but, by thoughtfulness and premature dignity of manner, on a level with any class. Immediately after my elopement was made known, this trunk was reclaimed by my guardians. They were men of weight even in that large town. The carrier was alarmed; resisted at first; but soon afterwards, suspecting that all the energy and the purse would be on one side, he shewed symptoms of wavering; and, doubtless, would have declared against my poor claims. But—and to this hour, thirty-six years distant, I feel gratitude—at that critical moment, stepped forward this boy—this G—b—t, not perhaps much (if anything) above sixteen years old. In the face of all the menaces, planted with the carrier, lodged there, and registered, this boy held the carrier to his duty—challenged, defied him to swerve from it. And the issue was—that the carrier knocked under—the boy triumphed—the trunk was sent—I was saved from despair. This boy has since been Vice-chancellor of Oxford.

Somewhere in the river of Plate, he had effected his escape from the pirates; and, a long time after, in 1807 I believe, (I write without books to consult,) he joined the storming party of the English at Monte Video. Here he happened fortunately to fall under the eye of Sir Home Popham; and Sir Home forthwith rated my brother as a midshipman on board his own ship, which was at that time, I think, a fifty gun ship—the Diadem. Thus, by merits of the most appropriate kind, and without one particle of interest, my brother passed into the royal navy. His nautical accomplishments were now of the utmost importance to him; and, as often as he shifted his ship, which (to say the truth) was far too often—for his temper was fickle and delighting in change—so often these accomplishments were made the basis of very earnest eulogy. I have read a vast heap of certificates "vouching for Pink's qualifications as a sailor, in the highest terms, and from several of the most distinguished officers in the service. Early in his career as a midshipman, he suffered a mortifying interruption of the active life which had now become essential to his comfort. He had contrived to get appointed on board a fire-ship, the Prometheus, (chiefly with a wish to enlarge his experience by this variety of naval warfare,) at the time of the last Copenhagen expedition; and he obtained his wish; for the Prometheus had a very distinguished station assigned her on the great night of bombardment; and from her decks, I believe, was made almost the first effectual trial of the Congreve rockets. Soon after the Danish capital had fallen, and whilst the Prometheus was still cruising in the Baltic, Pink, in company with the purser of his ship, landed on the coast of Jutland, for the purpose of a morning's sporting. It seems strange that this should have been allowed upon a hostile shore; and, perhaps, it was not allowed, but might have been a thoughtless abuse of some other mission shorewards. So it was, unfortunately; and one at least of the two sailors had leisure to rue the sporting of that day for eighteen long months of captivity. They were perfectly unacquainted with the localities, but conceived themselves able at any time to make good their retreat to the boat, by means of fleet heels, and arms sufficient to deal with any opposition of the sort they apprehended. Venturing, however, too far into the country, they became suddenly aware of certain sentinels, posted expressly for the benefit of chance English visitors. These men did not pursue, but they did worse, for they fired signal shots; and, by the time our two thoughtless Jack tars had reached the shore, they saw a detachment of Danish cavalry trotting their horses pretty coolly down in a direction for the boat. Feeling confident of their power to keep a-head of the pursuit, the sailors amused themselves with various sallies of nautical wit; and Pink, in particular, was just telling them to present his dutiful respects to the Crown Prince, and assure him that, but for this lubberly interruption, he trusted to have improved his royal dinner by a brace of birds—when, oh, sight of blank confusion!—all at once, they became aware that between themselves and their boat lay a perfect net-work of streams, deep watery holes, requiring both time and local knowledge to unravel. The pursuer hit upon a course which enabled him to regain the boat; but I am not sure whether he also was not captured. Poor Pink was at all events: and, through seventeen or eighteen months, he bewailed this boyish imprudence. At the end of that time there was an exchange of prisoners; and he was again serving on board various and splendid frigates. Wyborg in Jutland was the seat of his Danish captivity; and such was the amiableness of the Danish character, that, except for the loss of his time, to one who was aspiring to distinction and professional honour, none of the prisoners who were on parole could have had much reason for complaint. The street mob, excusably irritated with England at that time—for without entering on the question of right, or of expedience, as regarded that war, it is notorious that such arguments as we had for our unannounced hostilities, could not be pleaded openly by the English Cabinet, for fear of compromising our private friend and informant, the King of Sweden)—the mob, therefore, were rough in their treatment of the British prisoners; at night, they would pelt them with stones; and here and there some honest burgher, who might have suffered grievously in his property, or in the person of his nearest friends, by the ruin inflicted upon the Danish commercial shipping, or by the dreadful havoc made in Zealand, would shew something of the same bitter spirit. But the great body of the richer and more educated inhabitants, shewed the most hospitable attention to all who justified that sort of notice by their conduct. And their remembrance of these English friendships was not fugitive; for, through long years after my brother's death, I used to receive letters, written in the Danish, (a language which I had attained in the course of my studies, and which I have since endeavoured to turn to account in a public journal for some useful purposes of research, both in philology and in history,) from young men as well as women in Jutland; letters couched in the most friendly terms, and recalling to his remembrance scenes and incidents which sufficiently proved the terms of intimacy, and and even of fraternal affection, upon which he had lived amongst these public enemies; and some of them I have preserved to this day, as memorials that do honour, on different considerations, to both parties alike.

* In this slight abstract of the Eugenia, I must warn the reader that I speak from a very hasty glance of it, which I took several years ago, and at the time slang pole in who.

DEFAMATION OF THE FAMOUS INFAMOUS.

"Who steals my purse steals trash;
But he who slobes from me my good name

And of what does not he defraud me who robs me of the illusions of life? Of what does not he defraud me who precipitates my household gods from their shrines, and tells me I have been worshipping graven images? Of what does not he defraud me who shews me the reverse of the tapestry whose rich devices have long adorned the sacred chambers of my home? Is it not enough that, one by one, we are called upon, in this arid age, to resign the enchantments of life?—that philosophy reveals the rainbow to us as

Robs me of that which neught enriches him,
And makes me poor indeed."

primatively co-existent with the laws of nature, instead of the glorious seal of a covenant hung up specifically in the sky, to appease the terrors of mankind?—that echo must no longer enchant our ears as to the mysterious voice of solitude? Philosophy—prying, peddling, analysing philosophy—hath spread out, in short, a cold, matter-of-fact, material wilderness before our eyes.

That book of Piers! Who shall abide it!
Ow Goldsmith!—our own dear Goldy!—our "Vicar of Wakefield!"—our "Deserted Village!"

our "Traveller!"—our gentle essayist! Were we not familiar with all that required to be known of his faults and frailties, his weaknesses, his wants, his anxious days, his imprisonings, his duns, his debts? We knew all—we forgave all. Pity was an irresistible advocate. We loved him as we loved Burns, almost the better for weaknesses interwoven with such bright impulses and holy inspirations. Summing up his history with a sigh, we decided that his miseries had atoned for his indiscretions. Our last ejaculation over his grave was—

"Forbear to judge, for we are sinners all."

And, after all this, to have the pitiful record of his tailor's bills raked up, with all their mendings, and darnings, and turnings, and piecings! To have the bloom-coloured coat thrust into our face, not only in its old character as an emblem of vanity, but almost as a token of dishonesty! To have poor Oliver's heart turned inside out by the publication of every private outpouring of its wounded feelings—every wound scarified under our eyes!—The biographer who performs his task while the ashes of the illustrious are scarcely cold, and the love of surviving friends affectionately warm, hesitates to perform such cruel acts of justice; the indignation of a man's family—nay, the sympathy of the public—would be too strong for him. It is only the tardy biographer, who, wanting to write himself into notoriety, disinters the relics of the dead, and plants his standard upon a grave on which the thistles of oblivion are beginning to spring, by whom these savage exposures are ever perpetrated. Who is there to take the defence of Goldsmith against the circumstantialities of Mr Prior? Who, among all those who have sat on a summer's day, basking in the sunshine, listening to the blackbirds—their inward man revived in the bright creation of the "Vicar of Wakefield"—will be at the trouble of telling this gatherer-together of old rage and broken flint-glass, that the life of poor Noll should have been written in a warmer and more genial spirit.

It is useless to assure us that such harsh publications are requisite to unbandage the eyes of the rising generation; that, in eminent instances, the truth—the whole truth—is to be spoken; that the career of the man of genius is to be developed with the most painful particularity, lest it prove dangerously attractive to the ambitious boy. We maintain that the publicity of the fearful destinies of Otway and Chatterton, or the humiliations of Goldsmith and Sheridan, will never make a poet the less, or the less ragged. Goldsmith knew by rote, as well as Mr Prior, the distich of Pope—

"Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow;
The rest is all but leather and prunella."

And what was his commentary on the text? No, not over the frailties of the necessitous man of genius, labouring for his daily bread, elated by temporary prosperity, and sinking into an untimely and misery-worn grave, while he bequeaths to posterity the glorious and imperishable offspring of his ill-requited labour, a man of genius should hasten to draw the curtain. We look upon it as an act of malice prepense—of slow-poisoning—of deliberate murder, to have unripped the budget of poor Goldsmith's faults and afflictions, and hung them up in ragged array, like tattered clothes exposed to the contempt of the vulgar, at a stall in Monmouth Street.

But we have just now a sterner quarrel on our hands than this assault upon Prior the pitiful. What right had the luminous mind of Macaulay to concentrate its refulgence upon the one dark spot deteriorating the mighty name of Bacon?—what right to resuscitate forgotten grievances, and set up a gibbet as a monument to one of our national demigods of fame? Are we so rich in philosophers that we can afford to part with a boast such as the name of Bacon? If we have writ our annals true, 'tis there historically recorded that Bacon became a fingerer of bribes. Which of us did not know it, previous to the recapitulation of the Edinburgh Review?—which of us was not willing to forget it? If the memory of his fault have, in some degree, fallen into decay, it was because men chose that it should not be had in remembrance. It evinces a noble spirit indeed in posterity, that it has continued to revere the inspired works of the prophet whose personal backslidings are inscribed in the inscrutable tablets of the judgment-seat of God.

We would, with all our soul, that Macaulay had never dispatched his recent criticism across the main. The errors of Basil Montague's biography of Bacon, were amiable errors. He had put the shoes from off his feet, because the spot on which he stood was holy ground; and if his steps were less steady in consequence, we revered their stumbling. Macaulay's treatise is undeniably a master-piece of composition; but, after writing it, a man of his expansiveness of mind ought to have committed it to the flames. He should have scorned to give the least of the little such notable occasion to triumph over a son of Anak. The faults of the virtuous, the follies of the wise, should remain sacred in the eyes of the wise and virtuous. There are dunces and pettifoggers enough to denounce them. The pious man shrinketh from laying his hand upon the vail of the temple!

We do hereby forewarn and admonish Thomas Babington Macaulay, that, in case of survivorship, we will become his fiercely impartial biographer. Concerning Mr James Prior, we conceive that the public knows and cares not whether he be a dead dog or a living lion. But Thomas Babington hath his future place in the annals of fame; and, our pen upon it, he shall win it hardly! We do not suspect him of lawless appropriation of the rupees of dusky Ind. But he is a law-giver. He holdeth the scales of justice; and "let them turn but in the estimation of a hair," and posterity shall hear of it! His misdeeds shall be writ on brass, his virtues in water. Be it his task, therefore, to redouble the light of his already brilliant reputation, to outshine the records of our reprimative justice.

MARION CAMPBELL.—A HIGHLAND STORY.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITTFORD.

"This jealousy
Is for a precious creature."—SHAKESPEARE.

A more inquisitive race of dogs than the greyhound, breathes not upon this earth. Wanting the sense of smell which usually leads astray those four-footed people, who, like the best of the two-footed generation, have certain small and genial frailties mingled amongst their many virtues—lacking that temptation to step aside from the straight and beaten path, they indulge their wandering propensities by poking their pretty noses into every crevice and cranny they can spy out, and following every indication of life or motion which their quick sense of seeing and hearing can detect on every side. Many a dance has my lamented Mayflower led me, by her vagaries in this way; and, as greyhound nature will be greyhound nature under all varieties of coat or feature, I suspect that the fair Marion Campbell found her pet Luath—rough, wiry, bony, though he was, and of the sturdier and stronger sex—quite as unmanageable as I my fair, sleek, delicate canine companion; although, in addition to all other points of difference, the good greyhound Mayflower happened to be a lady, and we all know that "the men-folk," as a country friend of mine is pleased disparagingly to designate that important part of the creation, are pleased to arrogate to themselves a total deficiency in the great quality called curiosity. I do not see that we "women-folk" have any business to quarrel with this assertion. If they who go clad in doublet and hose choose to make over to the wearers of boddice and petticoat the exclusive possession of the great faculty which may be called the very key to knowledge, I can find no reason why we should disclaim a distinction so honourable; except, indeed, the trifling consideration called truth, may count for anything in the argument; in which case, I should feel myself bound to declare, that, according to my limited observation, the quality in question is about as equally divided between the sexes, as freely and bountifully scattered amongst all animals with any pretensions to intelligence, whether biped or quadruped, as any—what shall we call it?—any questionable virtue well can be.

That this same organ of inquisitiveness was as strongly developed in Marion Campbell's rough and faithful attendant, as in my delicate pet, was made unpleasantly conscious to his fair mistress during a ramble which she, accompanied only by Luath and her dameel Janet, (whose functions about the daughter of the old Highland chief much resembled those of a modern lady's maid,) was taking through her native glens, one fine morning in August.

Marion passed along in silence; wrapt, sooth to say—as, in the heyday of her bloom, woman, from the princess to the peasant, is wont to be wrapt—in "maiden meditation," which, in the present instance at least, and, as I suspect, in a good many others, was, with all submission to the great poet, anything but "fancy free."

Marion Campbell's meditations glanced over her mind, mingling and crossing, now bright and now gloomy, like the tartan of her house, to which, indeed, that checkered and many-coloured web, a young lady's musings, may not inaptly belikened. First she thought of a new sacque and petticoat of pale lilac damask, flowered with alternate bouquets of roses and carnations, the most magnificent habiliment that had ever penetrated north of Inverary; and of a Mecklin head and ruffles, brought her in a present by her kinsman Archibald—Cousin Archie, as she used to call him, when they were children together—now a captain in Kingeton's dragoons; then she repeated to herself certain rhymes of the ingenious Mr Moore, (upon that thin diet did the lovers of poetry banquet in those days,) whose "Fables for the Female Sex," published a year or two before, had just found their way into the Highlands; then the form of a heather sprig suggested an apron that she was flowering to wear with the above-mentioned damask suit; then she thought of her poor friend Helen Cameron, sister of the chief of Dungallan, whose proficiency in the mysteries of the needle had been acquired in a French convent, and who had taken so much pains to accomplish her in the gentle science of tent-stitch and cross-stitch; then the horrors of civil war, the much that she had heard, and the little that she had seen, of the last year's miseries, (for the ramble of which we are speaking occurred in the '46,) came shudderingly over her mind, as a cloud passes across the sun. "Poor, poor Helen!" thought Marion, sighingly; "Archibald used to be jealous of Dungallan. He had little cause, Heaven knows. I never thought of him, except as the brother of my friend, whatever might be his wishes with regard to me; and now, if, indeed, he be still alive, he is chased like the hill fox or the hare, and has nowhere to lay his head. Poor Dungallan! poor, poor Helen! Oh, the sickening horror of such a war as this has been!—kinsman with kinsman, friend with friend. And now this fearful search after a vanquished enemy!—this hunting down an old acquaintance, or, it may be, an honourable rival, like a beast of the field! Oh, to a brave spirit, it must be misery!" sighed Marion to herself, imputing, as a tender woman so often does impute, her own feelings to the man whom she loves. "Archibald must feel it so, in spite of his devotion to General Campbell (who has been as a father to him,) and his loyalty to King George. And now these fearful sentences—that poor young girl who died of a broken heart at the execution of her lover! They wring one's very soul. But Archibald has leave of absence now, for the cure of that old wound at Calloden, and will remain with us during the whole autumn; and no fugitive would be mad enough to come into the Campbell's country. Then, in the winter, my father talks of taking me to Edinburgh." And the lilac damask, with alternate bouquets of roses and carnations, flitted before the eyes of the fair wearer. "No one knows what may happen in the winter!" thought she; and visions of snow-white satin night-gowns, and white and silver brocades, the bridal paraphernalia of the time, gleamed, for an instant, in her mind's eye, calling forth a blush and a smile, a look and a feeling of innocent hope, that banished, for the moment, the recollection that such things as war and misery had ever existed in this world of sunshine and shadow.

These were the musings which the pranks and vagaries of Luath had interrupted. First, he was aware of the motion of a moor-fowl among the heather, and he darted up the hill side with the speed of an arrow, giving to his fair lady, and still more to his serving maiden—who exerted her lungs most womanfully for his recovery, screaming at the top of a naturally high voice until the rocks echoed back the sound as if it had been the shriek of a mountain eagle—giving to his fair pursuers the exceedingly tormenting and provoking spectacle of moving away the faster the more he was called back. Then a deer shewed himself in the valley, and off he darted through the glen, with a rush that threatened to run down the whole herd; while Janet's shrill pipe resounded through the uttermost depths of the glen, as it had before climbed the topmost ridge of the crags. Then he contented himself with slighter deviations from the straight path, skipping from right to left, and from left to right, poking his nose into that nook and this cranny, until, at last, just as the bridal apparition had crossed Marion's fancy, he disappeared behind a small clump of brushwood—two or three young birch trees, and a plant or two of yellow broom and Scotch brier that grew on the ledge of a cliff, down which, in winter, a mountain torrent made its way, and vanished bodily, or seemed to vanish, into the face of the rock.

The extraordinary disappearance of her favourite—followed, as it was, first by a low sound from Luath, something between a bark and a growl, then by one or two muttered words, the speaker continuing invisible, and a slight noise of struggling—effectually roused his fair mistress, who, naturally high-spirited, free-born, and vigorous in mind and body, as becomes a mountain maid, plunged, without hesitation, into the stony bed of the torrent, now completely dried up by the summer sun, and, scrambling with considerable difficulty (for the loose stones gave way even under her light tread, and she was forced to grasp every instant at the tufts of grass and heather that grew in the fissures of the cliff, and hung over its sides, to keep herself from falling,) succeeded, after some minutes' hard climbing, in gaining the position which her pet had reached at half a dozen bounds, and found herself perched upon a narrow ledge of rock overhanging the water-course, at about twenty feet from the bottom of the precipice; hardly wide enough to afford room to the little tuft of brushwood above which the cliff rose in a smooth, sheer ascent, until it seemed mingling with the clouds. Behind this small clump of birch, and broom, and brier, and now quite concealed by the summer foliage, was a small fissure, penetrating the natural mound, through which it was clear that Luath had disappeared, and into which she also passed, regardless alike of the dangers that she might encounter there, and of the warnings of Janet, who, climbing and remonstrating with equal good will, followed her lady as rapidly as a hearty tumble, which had unluckily befallen her at the commencement of her ascent, would permit.

A similar misadventure had very nearly occurred to her fair mistress, not aware, at the moment of her entrance, of the rapid shelving of the narrow passage into the cave in which it terminated. She recovered herself, however, and found, by the light which penetrated through the fissure, (the only light which the place afforded,) that she was in a natural cavern, of considerable extent, and immediately confronted by a young man, who stood directly opposite to her, with an air and attitude of calm determination, one hand vigorously planted upon Luath's neck, and the other grasping a pistol which he had drawn from his belt.

Both were instantly released as he perceived the sex of the intruder.

"A woman!" exclaimed he, replacing the pistol in his girdle, whilst Luath, in a transport of pleasure, sprang upon Marion's shoulder, and nestled his rough head against her cheek. "A lady! then I have nothing to fear." And, with a courtesy which seemed habitual, he dragged a block of smooth stone, the only thing resembling a seat which the cave afforded, to a level spot near his fair visiter, and entreated her to take possession of it, in an accent whose gentle cheerfulness contrasted singularly with his rude and squalid aspect.

Marion, complying with his request, gazed upon him, as he stood before her, with a mixture of wonder and compassion. He was a tall young man, of a fair complexion; or rather a complexion which, before a long exposure to sun, and wind, and weather, had been fair; and a countenance which, in spite of a tremendous length of beard, had something at once singular and agreeable. He wore an old dark tartan coat, a plaid, and a philibeg, with a pistol and a dirk at his side. His garments were torn and dirty, his feet all but bare, and his whole appearance indicated the extremity of human privation.

"One of those unhappy sufferers!" thought Marion, as her bright eyes filled with tears. "So

"might my father and my poor cousin Archibald!"—even in her silent thoughts, she did not call him by a tenderer name—"so might they have wandered in their enemy's country, and have hidden in caves and rocks, had the day of Cul-loden ended differently."

"It is only my maid, sir—one for whose discretion I can answer," said Marion, aloud, as the entrance of Janet, and her exclamation of alarm and astonishment at sight of the stranger, produced a less emphatic expression of surprise on his part. "I will answer for her as for myself," said Marion, warmly.

"Heaven forbid that I should doubt of either!" responded the stranger. "Wherever, during my wanderings, I have met a woman, there I have been sure to find a friend. Pity and fidelity are synonymous with her name."

"How can we serve you?" said Marion, glancing towards the interior of the cave, where some heather, arranged with the blossoms upwards, the hardy couch of the Highlander, and the remains of a wood fire, gave token of a residence of some duration. "You seem to want"——

"Almost everything, madam!" interrupted he, gaily. "For my wardrobe, you see its condition: witness my two feet, with half a brogue between them. Never was barefooted friar in sinner's order for a pilgrimage. And as to my larder, that is reduced to a still lower ebb, as these few crumbs may bear testimony. I doubt if the leanest begging brother of St Francis was ever so sparsely furnished. I have been thinking, indeed, of making an onslaught upon your venison. I must have attempted it to-night, from sheer starvation, though the report of fire-arms"——

"Would bring upon you twenty armed men," rejoined Marion—"would produce instant discovery, perhaps instant death! Heaven be praised you refrained, and that Luath's curiosity led us here to supply your wants. If it had been my father!"

"Or if Captain Archibald had happened to gang along wi' Miss Marion the now, instead of me," interposed Janet—"whilk wasna unlikely, ye ken!"

"Hush, Janet!" resumed her mistress, blushing. "We have no time to waste in talk. They may miss us at home, and"——

"Eh! Miss Marion, but ye are richt!" exclaimed the incorrigible lady's maid. "The captain 'ill miss ye sure enoo, sae sune as he has dune thae weary letters. We hae nae time for clavers. He'll be seeking ye up the brae and doun the brae; and the loun Donald, the captain's man"——

"He'll be seeking after somebody else—will he not?" inquired the stranger, who had listened with an air of suppressed amusement, and aly, quiet intelligence, not a little provoking to the fair Marion, to the revelations of her waiting women.

"He'll be following his master's good example, and seeking up the brae and doun the brae for ye? Wadn't he, Mistress Janet?"

"Janet! hold your peace, I entreat ye!" cried her lady, interrupting something that the chattering dame was about to say. "Tell me, sir, and quickly, for the very moments are precious, how we can best serve you. With provisions, we can, I hope, supply you after dark."

"The tea-half of a red deer pasty, sin' the gentleman fancies the meat, and a tase of whisky, gin the loun Donald has left me mickle in the castle, for he's aye fou frae morn till nicht," quoth Janet.

"Unless our prolonged absence should excite suspicion, there is little doubt but we shall be able to supply you with food. Linen and shoes also can be procured from my father's wardrobe. But I ought to tell you, inhospitable as it seems, that your continuance here is attended with danger the most imminent. I feel that I am speaking to one of the unfortunate followers of the Pre— of Charles Edward," continued she, checking herself, as her listener drew himself up proudly; "and it is right to inform him that he is in the very midst of Argyle's country, surrounded by enemies on all sides, parties of soldiers in every direction, and an officer in the service of the King—nay, this is no time to quarrel for a word with one who is risking much to preserve you—an officer in King George's service actually in the castle. What madness brought you hither? You must not, cannot remain here. The same accident that discovered your retreat to us, may make it known to others. And then"——

The horrors of the executions at Kennington—an account of which, transmitted to her cousin from a friend in London, she had that morning overheard him reading to her father—struck at once upon her mind. She thought of the young man before her, evidently well-born and delicately nurtured, who, for a wrong cause it might be, but still for one which he thought right, was enduring so cheerfully the extremity of human privation—she thought of him, to-day talking with her, full of life and spirit, to-morrow undergoing the fearful sentence at which her flesh had crept as she heard it; and, unable to bear the image which her fancy had conjured up, she burst suddenly into a passion of tears.

Much affected by her sensibility, the object of her generous interest laid aside his levity and his haughtiness, and explained to her, simply and gravely, that, having been closely and unrelentingly pursued for many weeks, he had taken a sudden resolution to baffle, if possible, the sagacity of his enemies, by leaving the friendly country in which he had hitherto taken refuge, and planting himself in the very stronghold of his foes. The actual spot in which he was concealed had been suggested, he said, by the local knowledge of a companion, who had left him on the double errand of obtaining important intelligence and recruiting their stock of provisions; but whose return, unless he himself prevented his arrival by meeting him at a rendezvous some twenty miles distant, he expected to take place two days after. This companion was, he added, no stranger to Miss Marion Campbell, whose he believed himself to have the honour of addressing, and to whom the house of Dungallan was certainly not unknown.

"Eh, puir Dungallan!" exclaimed Janet, whose sympathy extended to all her mistress's lovers. "We ken him weel, guid man! He gied me the vera brooch that ye see i' my plaidie, in return for an auld glove that he stealt of my leddy's, forbye ither tokens. Puir Dungallan!—sae it was he that fand the cove! He kent the place langsyne, did Dungallan; frae the time that he was a bairn, nae higher than the hound Luath. An' ye look for him the morn's morrow! Eh, sirs, but we maun pit a ewe-milk cheese an' a wheen bannocks, to the pasty—he'll be just famished—to sae naething of anither tass of the whisky."

"Let him not come, I beseech you," said Marion, earnestly. "His danger would be tenfold greater than yours. He is known. He is one of the chiefs of the Camerons—one of the principal planners of this unhappy insurrection; and said, also, to be a personal favourite of its unfortunate leader. I have known Dungallan all my life long. His sister was my early companion and instructress. Let me not have the misery of fearing that an old friend of my father's house should be dragged from his lands to a dreadful death. If he were taken, nothing could save him. My interest in him would be misconstrued. It would be thought—Heaven knows how falsely!—but it would be thought"—proceeded Marion, in a low tone, and blushing deeply—"I know that it would be suspected. Only this very morning, when I spoke of poor Helen, the feeling burst forth. His presence, whilst my hot-headed kinsman is at the castle, would, indeed, be dangerous to us all."

"As fire to tow," corroborated Janet. "Guid sirs! I had clean forgot the captain. He's ganging gyte upon that score. He garred the soldier lads tak auld Alison—who's as deaf as the stanes in the linn—to Inverary, to be examined, because the auld wife had a wee bit mutch of Cameron tartan, that the guidman had picked up at Falkirk, to cover her puir withered craig. No! no!—Dungallan maunna come hither. The captain was jalouse that he was hereabout, by instinct, ye ken, just as Luath was jalouse a brock or a tod by the mere effect of natural antepathy."

At this moment, the stranger—observing that Luath, who had hitherto stood quietly, and apparently half asleep, by the side of his mistress, pricked up his ears, and held his head slightly on one side, in the attitude of listening—laid his right hand firmly on his neck; and, in another instant, a quick step was heard in the glen below, succeeded by a loud, lively whistle, and a bold, manly voice calling, "Luath! Where are you, Luath, my man?" at short intervals. It was with considerable difficulty that the caresses of his lady, and the strong grasp of her companion, could restrain Luath from obeying the call. The footsteps were heard dashing through the loose, dry, gravelly bed of the wintry torrent; pausing a moment, as if the passer-by were observing the marks made by the girls in their recent ascent, or as if his attention were attracted by the suppressed growls of Luath, or his repeated plunges, as he struggled with all his strength to escape from his holders; and in that moment—a moment that seemed an age—both Marion and Janet fancied that he might have heard the quick beating of their throbbing hearts. At length the sound of the footsteps died away; and the voice and the whistle grew fainter and fainter, and were gradually lost in the distance. For the present, at least, the danger was past.

After a long pause, Janet ventured a whisper. "Yon's Captain Archibald, calling Luath, puir fallow—be quiet, Luath, can't ye?—just to find whereabout Miss Marion may be. Eh, sirs!—there'd be wild wark, I trow, gin he and Dungallan should forgether!"

Their new acquaintance appeared to feel the full force of this observation.

"Well," said he, "I must, if possible, be off to-night. Heaven forbid that I should lead my faithful friend, or you, my kind protectress, into unnecessary danger! Supply me—if, without peril to yourselves, you can do so—with so much of the commonest food as may give me strength for the journey, and a pair of shoes to guard my feet from the rocks and briars, and the tass of whisky which Mistress Janet spoke of, to drink your health and happiness—and I will set forth this very night."

"Ye ken the road?" inquired Janet.

"I have passed it once; and have learnt, in my wanderings, almost with the skill of a wild Indian, to fix in my memory the great landmarks of nature—the outlines of the mountains, the course of the streams, and the positions of the stars in the heavens; nay, even to follow upon the trail of a companion, by the aid of almost imperceptible signs—a transverse cut upon the smooth bark of the mountain ash, a birch twig broken, a sprig of heather dropped upon the path—tokens which, even now that I have indicated them to you, none but an eye quickened by keen necessity and present danger could clearly apprehend. Oh, this necessity is the schoolmistress over all others, to sharpen observation, and teach a man the use of his wits! We may dwell in a palace all our lives, and not know for what purpose our senses were given us; but turn us, bare-foot and hungry, amongst these Scottish wildernesses, and we soon find that the chief aim and object of our faculties is to enable us to make a shift—in which grand art of existence I'll challenge any canny Scot, Lowlander or Highlander, from John o' Groat's House to the Tweed. It will be moonlight to-night," added he, more seriously, "and I have little doubt of finding my way to the place where I have appointed to join my friend. So now, my fair benefactress, I will detain you no longer."

And he took her hand, and bent his lips to it with an habitual grace and dignity; the effect of which was not at all diminished by his rude and squalid exterior, so independent of mere extrincircumstances are those qualities of mind and manner—that union of suavity and nobleness—which constitute a gentleman. Marion lingered.

"The night is, of all seasons, the most dangerous to a traveller, in these troubled times. Even the fact of being out in the dark exposes the wanderer to suspicion. Could no disguise be thought of that should enable you to elude suspicion by day?—a female garb, for instance?"

"The gentleman shall be welcome to my best kirtle and boddice, and a hood and screen to the wale of it," quoth Janet. "Eh, and he'll mak a braw strappin lassie!"

"A woman!" replied the fugitive, quickly. "There you must excuse me. Anything but that. Braggart that I was, I forgot my failure in that line. I'll play the woman no more."

"No more!" And Marion gazed fixedly on his face, whilst a fresh suspicion crossed her mind, and the colour mounted even to her temples. "No more!"

"But he maunna leave the cave, by daylight, in a plaid and phillibeg of the Cameron set. Gin he does, the captain, or the loun Donald, 'ill hoist him ahint a dragoon, and carry him awa to Inverary, like puir doited Alison. There's walth o' auld tartans about the town, belonging to ae laddie or anither; and I can lift him a suit as cannily as ever my forebears lifted a drove o' black cattle," said Janet, laughing. "And then, when he has trimmed that beard o' his, whilk wad be as kenspeckle in a kilt as in a kirtle, he may pass for as douce a Campbell, honest man, as Locheden himsel'."

"My father went this morning to a small hunting-lodge, and, having accidentally left Luath behind, one of the lads who attended him ran back to desire that, unless my cousin should follow him to-morrow—which it must be my care to prevent—the dog might be sent after him in the morning. Luckily, the messenger met Janet before arriving at the castle, and, after delivering his message to her, returned immediately to his master; so that, if your route, sir, should lie in that direction, or in whatsoever direction your route may lie—for it will be better for both of us that I should remain in my present ignorance—your safety will be best assured by taking Luath, who is known to the whole country; and a note from myself to my father, which would be your warrant with any parties of the soldiery whom you might chance to meet. So soon as you shall be clear of present danger, set Luath free. He will speedily run home; and his appearance will be a token—a most welcome token—of your safety. Should you be taken, I rely upon your honour to declare my dear father's ignorance of this transaction. My own share in it I am ready to abide."

Once again, and with deep emotion, he for whose sake she was risking so much, and who felt that she was herself fully conscious of the peril which she incurred, lifted her hand to his lips, as she stood on the ledge of rock at the entrance of the cave, ready to attempt the precipitous descent.

"A poor and homeless fugitive thanks you, madam. The result of a more fortunate attempt may one day enable him to return, in his own behalf, or in that of him whom he represents, some part of this obligation. When that time shall arrive, send but a leaf of this flower"—And he plucked a lingering blossom of the wild brier that straggled into the cave, and presented it to her.

Marion turned towards him with gentle dignity.

"God forbid that any wild and idle words should lessen the readiness and satisfaction with which I tender my poor assistance to an enemy in distress! But if any circumstance could diminish those feelings, it would be the finding him—even in this moment of extremest wretchedness, when the blood of his bravest friends is flowing like water, and the lives of weak and suffering women are perilled, by the endeavour to save him from a similar fate—looking forward, with exulting hope, to a renewal of these scenes of agony. Oh, sir! if you be, as your words import, of high and legitimate influence with him in whose name this expedition has been carried on, represent to him the utter desolation which it has brought upon this unhappy land! Warn him against incurring, for that thorny wreath, a crown, the tremendous responsibility of another such convulsion. Whatever be the abstract justice of his claim, the truest titles to a throne—the blessing of God, and the love of the people—rest with the House of Brunswick; and he and his gallant son will find a nobler greatness, a sweeter peace, in a patient acquiescence in the will of Providence and the voice of the nation, than in efforts which can but end in the slaughter of their bravest and their most faithful followers, and in rending asunder the ties of friendship and of kindred, from the castle to the hut. Save this devoted country from the recurrence of scenes heart-rending alike to friend and to foe, and take with you my prayers and my blessings." Blushing at her own earnestness, she stopped suddenly. "I accept your flower," added she, in calmer tone, "not as an emblem—yet, see, the leaves are already falling!—but as a memorial. Janet and Luath shall be with you as soon as they can steal away after nightfall. Farewell!"

And, attended by her faithful adherents, she stepped into the narrow bed formed by the waters, and slowly and cautiously gained the path beneath.

"Strange, yet noble creature!" muttered the fugitive to himself, as he stood at the entrance of the cavern, watching her descent. "She has not made any promise of secrecy; but one feels that a woman like that might be trusted with more than life. I faith! one might envy the Elector of Hanover and Captain Archibald Campbell such a subject and such a mistress. The reese was dropping, did she say? Flowers are but foolish emblems. There is an eagle, one of the same sort that hovered above the vessel as we approached the Scottish shore. Tullibar-dine pointed it out to me at the time. That were a fitter symbol; and that sails on." And, catching, as, ambition is wont to catch, at such anguries, he watched the flight of the kingly bird, soaring upward until it was lost in the distance; and then, cheered by the omen, retired into his place of refuge, with his usual sang froid, where, excellent, as he had himself boasted, at making a shift, he speedily kindled some dry sticks, by snapping the lock of his pistol, and setting light, by that means, to the stump of a tobacco pipe, lengthened sufficiently for use by the insertion of a tube of oaten straw, applied himself vigorously to the task of stifling the sense of present anxiety and future danger, and the still more pressing claims of a keen appetite, in the fumes of the "fragrant weed."

Marion, on her part, flushed and agitated, contrived to reach home, unsuspected. She walked straight into the small room that she was accustomed to call her parlour, which contained what little property a Highland lady of that day could call her own; and Miss Marion Campbell's possessions in that way were the admiration of Argyleshire. She boasted, besides the ordinary complement of high-backed chairs, narrow settees, and diminutive tea-tables, a harpsichord, a scrutoire surmounted with glass doors, serving at once for writing-desk and book-case, and furnished with the usual limited female library; a japan cabinet, well stuffed with choice china, mixed with divers curiosities, natural and artificial, of questionable beauty, and not remarkable for preservation; a glass case of gorgeous humming birds; and a gilt cage, containing a recent gift of her cousin—a bullfinch of great tameness, and such extraordinary accomplishments, that he not only drew his own water in an ingenious bucket constructed for the purpose, but attested his loyalty by piping very successfully the whole of the national anthem, from the first bar to the last, and had completely won the old piper's affections, by making certain indistinct and far-off efforts to catch the notes of the "Gathering of the Clan," as performed by him for a full hour every morning, walking up and down in front of the hall door. Dutch tiles decorated the chimney, India paper covered the walls, and the little apartment had a look of snugness and comfort, hardly to have been expected amongst the wild hills of the north. The starry white jessamine, the everlasting pea, and the hardy purple clematis—

"The favoured flower

That bears the name of virgin's bower"— were trained round the windows; and a half glass door opened upon a sheltered flower-plot, bordered with thrift, and gay with pinks, larkspurs, sweet-williams, and garden-lilies, intermixed with tall rose trees and carefully-trained bushes of Dutch honeysuckle, each almost as short, and quite as round, as a Dutch cheese; whilst another door, on the opposite side of the room, led, by a narrow winding staircase, to her sleeping chamber above. It was a very complete lady's apartment; although most of the advantage of its insulation, and its power of access from the castle without the knowledge of the other inhabitants, had hitherto been thrown away upon its fair possessor. She now decided that Janet and Luath should pass through the glass door when setting forth on their moonlight expedition. There was, to be sure, a wall round one side of the little flower garden into which it opened; whilst, on the other, it sank abruptly to the lake from which her father derived his territorial title; but that wall was in so precarious a state, and Janet so strong and active, that there was little doubt of her surmounting the difficulty. As to Luath, he would clear it at a bound.

Sunny and cheerful was Marion's little parlour, with its in-door comforts and luxuries, and its out-door prettiesses, its pleasant garden, and its sidelong peep of the calm clear waters, shut in by sheltering hills; and cheerful and sunny had been the temper with which the young Scottish maiden—high-born, healthful, and fair, the beloved and only daughter of a kind and indulgent father, the betrothed bride of the man whom she loved best in the world—had been wont to return to it, to pursue her ordinary avocations, after her daily ramble among the mountains, or by the lake side. Now her mood was changed. Anxious, uneasy, unquiet, the secret with which she had become acquainted—a secret which she felt must be imparted to no one, save her faithful Janet—must be held sacred at every risk—weighed upon her like a sin. She sat down to her scrutoire, with the double purpose of depositing in one of its little recesses, the half-fallen rose, (for, with the softened feeling so natural to a woman, when rendering, at a great risk, a great service, she had already relented towards him by whom it had been presented,) and of writing the important billet, which, with Luath, was to form his passport; but, harassed with doubts whether, in following the impulse of the moment, she had done right or wrong, and weighed down by the horrible responsibility belonging to her situation, she had no sooner folded the flower carefully in silver paper, and cleared one of the pigeon-holes for its reception, than, with an irresistible movement of self-pity, mingled, it may be, with a shade of self-distrust, she laid her head upon her hand, and burst into tears.

Her heart, somewhat relieved by that great female comfort and privilege, a hearty fit of crying, she lifted up her head, with the intention of writing her letter forthwith, and chasing the subject, as much as might be, from her mind, when her attention was arrested by a packet, which she had dislodged from its place in depositing the token-flower, and which had unrolled itself in falling, and now lay open before her eyes.

It was a water-colour drawing, of great finish and beauty, executed by Helen, and representing the two friends in a glen near the castle. Marion, richly dressed, was seated in the foreground; one little hand thrown round the neck of the faithful Luath, whose honest countenance, always animated and intelligent, was awakened into double life by the report of Dungallan's gun, whose figure was seen farther down the glen, firing at a red deer, bounding by. Helen had drawn herself in profile, standing behind her companion, accoutred in plaid and bodice, as a Highland lassie, and setting off, by her darker complexion and simpler garb, the delicate and swanlike loveliness of the young beauty of Loch-eden. Even in this picture, the unselfish and amiable character of the artist might be traced. Herself eminently handsome, she had cast into the shade her own graceful figure and noble features, and had given all her care to heighten the charms of her friend.

Marion's spirits, already weakened, could not resist the flood of recollection that burst upon her at sight of this drawing, and of some stanzas which had served it for an envelope; slight, but graceful verses, in which the poet had mingled, with fond praises of his sister's skill as a portrait painter, very intelligent hints of his own devotion to the fair original.

"Poor Helen!" sighed she; "poor, poor Dungallan!"

The sigh was echoed from behind her, and, turning round, with a shock of nervous trepidation, she saw her Cousin Archibald, leaning upon her chair.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Campbell, for daring to look over you," said he, somewhat stiffly; "but having, after despatching answers to communications of some consequence, sought you in vain in your usual walks, and receiving, upon my return to the castle, the most contradictory answers to my questions as to your 'whereabout,' I was tempted, by the open door, and the sight of my friend Luath, to use my old privilege of the courré, and make my appearance in your withdrawing room. Old Angus informed me that you were walking, and well; Mistress Janet, on the contrary, said that you were at home, and indisposed; and, without intending, believe me, to intrude upon meditations which were clearly not intended to meet the general eye, I could not resist the temptation to inquire personally, which of the two reports was correct."

"Both were right, to a certain point," said Marion, with some effort. "I walked out, as I generally do, after breakfast, and returned, not ill, indeed, but less well than usual."

"It pleased Mistress Janet to deny that you had been out at all," persisted Archibald, drily; eyeing, with no good will, the waiting damsel, who had, by this time, made her way into the apartment, and was busying herself in collecting her lady's bonnet and shawl. "However, to let that matter rest, I wished to warn you against rambling about unattended, at this particular time. Intelligence has been received that one of the prime leaders in this rebellion, the very chief over whose portrait, conjoined with your own, I find you weeping, has been traced to this neighbourhood."

"Ah, ah! Dungallan! Guidness save him, puir chiel, free thae bloody redcoats!" was the ejaculation of Janet.

"Whether there be more truth in the exploded doctrine of sympathies than it suits the philosophers of this enlightened age to admit," continued Archibald, doggedly, "or whether the interest which you and Mistress Janet there, are pleased to testify in his fate, together with this mysterious walk, may serve to solve the enigma of his lurking about a place so remote from his own country, and apparently surrounded by enemies, remains to be determined. At all events, the coincidence is curious."

"My grateful affection for his sister, the daughter of my poor mother's dearest friend, the friend and instructress of my own childhood, might well account for any interest that I might take in Dungallan's fate," said Marion, rousing herself as she perceived the effect which her passive dejection and silent acquiescence in his suspicions, was producing upon the jealous temper of her lover. "If he fell a victim to these cruel, cruel laws, poor Helen's happiness would be ruined for ever."

"Sisters are convenient persons," observed Captain Campbell. "I am unfortunate in not possessing one; although, even if I were happy enough to boast a relation as accomplished as Miss Helen Cameron, I should lack the skill to set off her presents with a garnish of love verses. I am none of those same metre ballad-singers, thank Heaven!" added he, with increasing bitterness. "I am of Hotspur's mind, and

'Had rather hear a brazen candlestick turned,
Or a dry wheel grate on the axle-tree;
And that would nothing set my teeth on edge,
Nothing so much as mincing poetry.'"

"As for my walk, this morning," began Marion, desirous of turning the conversation, "that"—Fettered by the recollection of all that had passed in that morning's walk, and heart-struck by the sternness of his gaze, her voice faltered, and she suddenly stopped.

"What have I done, Archibald, that you should look at me and speak to me so unkindly?" said she, after a short pause, turning to him, with the tears streaming down her cheeks, and a sweetness and earnestness of manner that won its way instantly to the lover's heart. He soothed and apologized, and, before they parted to dress for dinner, a perfect reconciliation had taken place, and he had vowed, for the fiftieth time, never again to suffer a shade of jealousy to pass across his mind.

Such vows are easily made; but to keep them requires a cooler temperament than that of Archibald Campbell: twenty times, that very afternoon, was the stifled passion upon the brink of bursting forth.

We must all have felt, even although we may have been fortunate enough not to have a secret of life and death in our charge, like poor Marion. how difficult it is, when the mind is filled with one subject, to keep up an easy and unembarrassed conversation upon any other; the more especially when our companion is one to whom we have been accustomed to consider every thought as it happened to arise. In such a situation, not only is our behaviour embarrassed and constrained, but there is a sort of spell over our faculties, so that, in steering clear of the one great danger, we run foul of all sorts of minor perils, and say and do, we hardly know what, in a vain endeavour to cover the awkwardness of our real position.

In the present case, for instance, Marion affected an exuberance of animal spirits, depressing, rather than exhilarating, to the listener; and as different from her general easy cheerfulness, as the rouge of a haggard court beauty, from the natural colouring of youth and health. She rattled on the harpsichord, with a rapidity which put melody quite out of the question, the liveliest tunes that she could recollect; sang, in a voice from which her usual arch sweetness was banished by agitation, the gayest of her national songs; choosing, quite unconsciously to herself, but in a manner which her auditor did not fail to remark, such airs as she had been accustomed to sing with Helen, and those which had been the particular favourites of her brother; and when, at last, she had quite exhausted herself with the exertion, she rose from the harpsichord, and, taking up the apron that she was flowering, requested that he would read to her while she worked, as Dungallan used to do to Helen.

It was now the Captain's turn to shew that a l'été-d'été between two lovers is not always so saccharine a matter as is erroneously supposed.

Turning over the newest books that he could find amongst her collection, he lighted upon Richardson's great novel, then in course of publication, the unknown catastrophe of which excited so much curiosity and interest, not merely amidst the flower-bed of young ladies by whom the author was surrounded, but amongst some score of persons of quality, who dispatched letter after letter, (one of them—Lady Bradshaigh—even writing upon her knees,) to ask for the reformation of the hero, and a happy conclusion to the story, with as earnest supplications, and as strong reasons to back their petition, as if they had been pleading for the real, actual, life-long felicity of two real, actual, living and existing human beings—the strongest tribute, by the way, to the power of the book, to its extraordinary verisimilitude and truthfulness, ever received by any author.

One of Lovelace's most characteristic letters did Captain Campbell address himself to read, avoiding, with the instinct of a high-bred gentleman, all that could be painful to female delicacy, and giving to the racy wit, the eloquent sophistry of that remarkable creation of Richardson's genius, all the advantage of the most intelligent and animated elocution; so that Marion's attention was excited in spite of herself.

"What a wretch!" exclaimed she, as he finished the account of one of his most teasing interviews with poor Clarissa. "What a cruel, unfeeling, cold-hearted wretch!"

"I don't know that," replied Archibald. (He it remembered, in vindication of my hero, that only four volumes out of the eight had yet been published, and that Lovelace's conduct was still in suspense.) "I don't know that. The lady seems to me to have been quite as cold-hearted as the gentleman; or, rather, hearts on both sides seem to have been pretty much out of the question. She, justly as you will say, distrusted his honour; and he, with at least as much justice, doubted of her affection. The whole affair seems to me a game of chess, at which—barring false moves, which it is the author's business to guard against—the most skillful player will be sure to prove victorious. All you ladies exclaim, 'Poor Clarissa!' and, if she had loved him, I should be as ready as the best of you to echo the cry. But love is synonymous with confidence, and this paragon of her sex does not know what the word means. If she had relied upon him!—if she had trusted him! One wonders that Richardson did not see how much his book would have gained in interest by representing Clarissa as enamoured of Lovelace; but he lives amongst ladies, and piques himself, it is said, upon his knowledge of the female heart; and, therefore, it is not wonderful that he should shew them as he sees them, and as they are," added he bitterly, "delighting in tormenting those that love them best. Poor Clarissa, indeed! rather, poor Lovelace!"

At this moment, it was some relief to Marion, whose apron had certainly not improved by her afternoon's labours, that the weather, which had been loaring all the afternoon, now assumed the appearance of one of the terrific storms of those mountain regions. The evening closed in prematurely, the clouds gathered dark and heavy, the wind moaned in gusts through the dark firs, and swept across the lake, whilst quick flashes of sharp, rapid lightning gleamed at the edge of the horizon, and the growl of distant thunder, proclaimed, in nature's awfulest voice, the gathering of the coming tempest. The momentary passions of man were hushed before it. The lover sat, contemplating, by the fitful glare of the lightning, the fair face of his beloved, pallid and sad from anxiety and sorrow; and once again his heart smote him for his unkindness.

"Marion, dearest Marion, do not you play the distrustful maiden with me, who, Heaven knows, have no wish upon this earth but for your happiness and honour! Be frank with me, confide in me, I conjure you! I see, I know, that there is a secret that weighs upon your mind at this moment. Trust it to me, and you shall not repent your reliance. Shew me but what you wish, and it shall be done. My power in this district is greater than you know of; my intelligence more accurate than you suspect. Say only, 'Dungallan is my friend's brother, and therefore I wish to save him;' say even, 'Dungallan is my own early friend'—and he shall be saved. Only prove that you think me worthy of your confidence, and see how I will deserve it. Nay, even—although the thought be fatal to my every hope of happiness—even if his danger have revealed to you feelings hitherto unsuspected, and if, in aiding his escape, I give assistance to a favoured rival—yet, for your dear sake, to spare you the misery you would feel if he were taken, I swear to befriend him, at whatever peril it may be. I am not now on service, and there is only one of those unfortunate fugitives whom it would be eternal dishonour for a soldier to preserve. For Dungallan, since your happiness seems bound up in his safety, I will not hesitate to risk rank, fortune, life itself. Only trust me, only confide in me, if not as your devoted lover, yet as your nearest kinsman, your truest friend! Speak to me, I conjure you, Marion! I beseech you, speak!”

He hung over her affectionately, as he delivered, with an earnest truthfulness that could not be mistaken, this outburst of fond and disinterested love, gazing in her face as he spoke, and grasping, with all the fervour of passion, her cold and trembling hands.

“Will you not answer me? Do you disdain even to reply to my offer of service—my most sincere and honest offer? You do! I see plainly that you do! I see and feel, too plainly, that you desire my absence; and I will no longer intrude upon your privacy. Farewell, madam! May you find a truer and a more devoted heart than that which you have spurned from you!” And, lingering a moment on the threshold, in the hope, it may be, of being recalled, he left the room.

Marion wrung her hands in bitterness of vexation. Never had her heart so yearned towards the kinsman, the friend, the betrothed bridegroom, whom she had suffered to leave her, probably for ever.

“Oh, that I dared to undeceive him! But, for his own sake, I dare not, I must not. I have pledged myself to this adventure, and I must abide the trial. May the God of Mercy—who has willed that we should assist a fellow-creature in distress, who has gifted woman with a strength of sympathy which almost counterbalances her feebleness of body—may He grant that I bear it with firmness! It is a fearful night. Janet,” continued she, addressing the faithful soubrette, who just now entered the apartment, “Janet, do you fear to encounter the storm? If you do, say so honestly, and I will go myself. I have no right to impose upon your kindness and fidelity a danger from which I should shrink. There is little left, Heaven knows, that should make me cling to life. Speak frankly, my good girl. If your heart fails you, say so at once.”

Janet’s answer was bold and confident. And, somewhat soothed by the fearless readiness of her confidante, her predilections that they should succeed in their enterprise, and that all jealousies and suspicions would be ultimately cleared up, (for her acuteness did not fail to detect the chief source of her lady’s despondency,) Marion sat down to write, with more firmness than she had expected to be able to command, the important billet to her father, which, in case of the fugitive being intercepted by the soldiers, would, she believed, from the respect paid to the name of one of the most loyal and most powerful chiefs of the powerful and loyal house of Campbell, prove an effectual and unquestioned passpost.

Her letter was short and simple; stating only that, as Captain Archibald Campbell had resolved not to join Locheden in his hunting expedition, she had sent Luath by the bearer; that all was well at the Castle; and that, wishing good sport to her dear father, she hoped to see him return in a few days.

Armed with this document, and laden with the promised provisions, the venison pasty and the whisky, (“lifted,” to use Janet’s own phrase,) together with a certain pair of “shoon,” belonging to her lover, Donald, plaid garments of the Campbell set, and a collar and chain for Luath, the faithful waiting damsel, followed by the no less faithful hound, took the opportunity of a lull in the storm to set forth upon their expedition.

Marion accompanied them as far as the garden wall, which Janet and her four-footed attendant cleared with somewhat more of difficulty than she had anticipated, and then returned alone to her solitary apartment, to start at every sound, and feel each moment, as it passed, marked by the beatings of her own anxious heart.

Sadly and wearily the hours dragged along. The tempest had returned with tenfold violence; and Marion, as she found the noises in the castle subsiding, one by one, giving token that the inhabitants had retired to rest, and that she remained the only watcher within its walls—whilst over the pelting rain and moaning wind without, burst ever and anon peals of thunder, reverberating in awful grandeur amongst the mountains, preceded by lightning that glared with livid and horrible lustre through the room—began to feel the pressure of a close-clinging fear, a down-weighting responsibility, as the possible fate of her attached dependent flashed across her mind. If her courage should give way as she returned alone, and she should fall in the darkness from the ledge of the rock! If the springs on the hill-top should rise suddenly, and, joining the gatherings from the pouring rain, gush down the channel of the winter water course! If she should be struck by the lightning! Either of these thoughts was too terrible to dwell upon.

The distant clap of a door within the mansion, followed, as she thought, (for the dizzying boundings of her own pulses, the throbbings of her heart and brain, were such as to confuse all outward sounds,) by the rapid footsteps of a man along the galleries, and through the vaulted passages of the old building, harbingered yet another fear. If Janet should be pursued! If she should be intercepted! If the stranger should be discovered! She heard, or thought she heard, the castle gates unfastened; and, the feeling of suspense becoming unsupportable, she ventured to open gently the door of her little parlour, when a rush of wind, as if from an outer door left open, extinguished her taper, and left her in all the horror that a darkness as of midnight, interrupted only by the now less frequent flashes of the lightning, could add to her former terror.

The storm was at length abating. She found her way to the glass door, and opened it; and, after an interval, that seemed to be of hours rather than of minutes, she was aware of Luath, as he came bounding up the path, followed—could it be the footsteps of two persons that she heard, advancing with stealthy rapidity? A moment decided the question. Janet rushed fearfully in, dragging after her, her, as it seemed, unwilling companion; and, first carefully locking and bolting the door, and barring the shutters, an operation which, in spite of the darkness, she performed with singular dexterity, she then contrived to thrust the stranger (for it was no other) up the staircase leading to Marion's sleeping apartment, and, having locked that door also, and deposited the key in her pocket, began relating to her lady, in cautious whispers, but with her usual volubility, the causes that had induced her to resolve upon the bold measure of bringing him to the castle.

They had been pursued. The rain had rendered the descent from the cave so dangerous, and had so flooded the path below, that the fugitive, forgetting his own danger in the manly duty of protecting a female, had insisted, in spite of Janet's earnest remonstrances, on escorting her as far at least as the wall over which she had effected her exit from the castle gardens. The light, shielded from the action of the wind by an ingeniously-contrived lanthorn of oiled paper, by the aid of which he had contrived to obtain for her a safe footing down the face of the precipice, had, she imagined, been observed from the upper windows of the castle. Certain it was, that, before they reached the spot to which the fugitive had insisted upon accompanying her, they had heard footsteps at some distance behind them, and had, as the clouds partially cleared away, and the moon emerged for a few moments, been enabled to perceive that their pursuer was a soldier. Janet declared her conviction that it must be either "Captain Archie himself", or the loun Donald," come to reclaim "plaidie and shoon," which she had boasted, with so much glee, of having "lifted" from her military admirer, a few hours before. Some one from the house it certainly was; for Luath had recognised him, and, giving a sudden jerk to the chain by which he was held, had succeeded in freeing himself, and bounding towards the intruder, although he had returned to them upon hearing her voice. Under these circumstances, the active waiting-maid had, with great presence of mind, availed herself of a stunted pollard oak which concealed and facilitated the passage over the wall to the garden, and (first dashing away the tall-tale light) had literally hauled up, after her, both her companions, each of whom had, for a wonder, as she observed, been gifted with sufficient sense to submit to her guidance.

"All hafe that weary lanthron!" quoth Janet. "I tell the gentlemen, gin he wad stay quiet

i' the cave, I'd nae fear o' getting safe to the foot o' the rock. Wi' my plaidie rowed round me, and nane to look on, I should hae slid down the path, ye ken, like a snaw wreath at Yule. But he wadna be guidit. I'm minded that he's ane that has ta'en his singate owre lang. Weel, but ye maun hae a licht!" And off she ran, finding her way through the darkness with the security and ease which seems one of the many privileges of the light-hearted and the fearless.

During her absence, a fresh perplexity occurred to her mistress. Horses were heard galloping into the court, and a violent knocking at the gate was succeeded by a parley between Captain Archibald and the visitors. The voice of one of them was, she thought, familiar to her; and, to her unspeakable consternation, she found that he was advancing with Janet towards the apartment; Janet talking at the top of her voice, to give notice of his approach to her lady.

"Oot the night, General! Na, indeed, hae we not, except indeed to ca' Luath, poor hound, who's aye ganging forth in the rain. Sae my leddy and I we got a wee wet, and the wind put out the taper, and sae"—

Whilst Janet thus followed her instinct as a lady's maid, and lied," her companion, General Campbell, closely followed by Archibald, stepped forward into the room, where Marion sat trembling with anxiety and apprehension.

"I intrude upon you only for an instant, my fair cousin, late as is the hour and indisposed as I regret to see you are, merely to announce to you that I shall to-morrow, early, be obliged to steal away your visiter, whose presence is required in Edinburgh, to meet his brother, and Lord and Lady Bellasis, and their pretty daughter Lady Betty. Give my compliments to Locheden, and tell him that we have accounts of one of the rebel chiefs, Dungallan, one of the ring-leaders, having ventured into Argyle's country. Tell him that we have taken care of the land-passes, and that we shall borrow the castle boat in the morning, to dispatch a messenger across the loch. And now, good night. Go to bed, my dear, and refresh your roses. I don't like those pale cheeks." And, with a kind pressure of the hand, the good General quitted the apartment. Archibald lingered behind.

"You hear that Dungallan, that this favoured friend, I presume you call him, has been traced into this neighbourhood, that he is even supposed to be upon this estate. Why do I speak of reports and suppositions when I know that he is here?" added Captain Campbell, impressively.

"You are mistaken! Indeed you are mistaken!" rejoined his cousin.

"Mistaken!—when I saw him enter the garden this very night!—when I can track his footsteps across this room!—when here is his glove dropped upon the floor! dropped at the very door which leads to your bedchamber, and to your bedchamber only." cried he, bitterly, flinging from him with violence the glove which he had picked up. "The rebel is here, and I know not what weakness hinders me from doing my duty as an officer in the King's service, and delivering him up at once to the General."

"Do as seems best to you, Captain Campbell," said Marion, faintly. "My life, and far more than my life, my reputation, are in your power. Deal with me as you will."

"Nay, madam, your safety, and the honour of my kinsman's house, must ever be sacred in my eyes. Unkindly, cruelly as you have treated me, I cannot forget what we once were to each other. I warn you, however, that escape is impossible. You will live to repent this night's work. Farewell for ever!" And, without even a parting glance, he hurried out of the room.

"Ye are mair like to repent this nicht's wark yersel, captain," observed Janet, quietly, as she bolted the door after him, and addressed herself to the double task of comforting her lady and releasing the prisoner. "Gin the land-passes be waylaid, we maun try the loch. I'll gie a gay guess that the castle boatie 'll be missin the morn."

And so it was managed. In less than two hours, the stranger, accompanied by Luath, was rowing across the loch; whilst, at daybreak the next morning, General Campbell and Archibald took their departure for Edinburgh.

Time dragged heavily on. Luath had returned, weary and travel-stained, without either his absence or his arrival having excited any suspicion in the castle. Nothing had been heard of the letter; and Marion had the satisfaction of believing that the sacrifice of her happiness had not been made in vain, that she had at least succeeded in rescuing the object of her compassion.

Locheden had, upon his return, found his daughter sick and drooping; and, as days lengthened into weeks, and weeks into months, and left the prolonged absence of her lover unexplained, the old chief began to chafe with anger and impatience. He had heartily approved of a match which would unite his only child to the heir-male to whom, in default of a son, his own estate would descend, and who, besides his personal good gifts, and his high reputation for gallantry and military skill, inherited, in right of his English mother, a property which might be reckoned enormous for a Highlander in those days; but this neglect of one whom he regarded as the very apple of his eye, awakened all the irritability of his nature; and his fierce displeasure added tenfold, as that particular way of proving affection commonly does add, to the distress of her by whose injuries, real or supposed, his previous wrath had been originally excited.

Affairs were in this position, when, one fine morning in October, dispatches arrived from General Campbell, calculated to increase, if that were possible, the previous exasperation. After announcing his intention to visit Locheden, almost as soon as his letter could reach them, accompanied by their young kinsmen, (Captain Archibald's next brother, John, being an officer in his own regiment,) he proceeded to say:—

"You will have heard, I am sure, with great pleasure, (for I take for granted that the bridegroom elect has apprised you of his good fortune,) of our gallant cousin's intended marriage with Lady Betty Bellasis, the English heiress and beauty, who has made so great a sensation in Edinburgh this summer. There have been difficulties, of course, upon the score of fortune and country with the Earl and Countess, but love has conquered them all; and the chief object of our journey to Locheden is to consult you, the kinsman, guardian, and friend, to whom both these young men are so deeply indebted, and upon the arrangements as to residence, &c., which this happy event will render necessary. The bridegroom elect is, in every way, a lucky fellow. In addition to her fortune and her beauty, la future is as charming a creature as one shall see on a summer's day—a fit companion for your sweet Marion, my pet and favourite. Heaven send them happy together!"

"A Lowlander! an Englishwoman! an heiress!—fortune-hunter! rascal! scoundrel, that he is!" exclaimed the old chieftain, throwing from him the unlucky letter, and striding up and down the hall, in breathless wrath. "And the doited idiot of a General, to even her with my Marion—the Sassenach dell! Let them take care how they speak of my daughter! Old as I am, the blood of M'Callamore runs as red in my veins as in theirs. Only let them dare to lightly her! And the very excess and fierceness of his anger took away the power of expression."

Marion listened tremblingly, delaying till calmer moments any attempts to soothe and expostulate.

"Coming, are they?" burst forth the enraged father. "Coming!—ay, by Heaven!" continued he, catching a glimpse of a party of horsemen approaching the castle—"here they come! And they think to find entrance, do they?" added he, bitterly. "They come to take account of our accommodations, that they may bring their braw young bride to insult over the old man and his daughter! Let them wait until I be dead. Not a foot shall that villain set in Locheden, until he walks over my corpse. Angus! Duncan! Where are the louns loitering! See that the gates be barred! Let none enter!"

"Stay, I implore you, I conjure you, my dearest father! For my peace and happiness, for the honour and dignity of your daughter and your house, refrain from this violence! Give entrance to them all. Receive them as usual. I ask you, in the name of maiden pride, of maiden modesty, to restrain all demonstrations of anger. Let him not imagine, let him not suspect—God knows how sincerely I wish him happy," cried Marion. "Give them admittance, I exhort you, I conjure you! Let them see no difference! Surely you will not vex and grieve your poor child. Yield to me in this, I implore you, dearest father!" And she threw her arms round his neck, leaned her head on his shoulder, and wept.

He kissed her with the fondest affection. "You are an angel, my darling, and shall have your own way in everything." Compare an English moppet with my noble Marion! The scoundrel will be miserable—that's my comfort. His father married a Lowlander for the sake of the siller, a peevish Southron dame, that worried the life fairly out of him—and so will this great loddie. We are weel rid o' the leun. 'Dungallan, pair laddie, 's worth twenty of him. He's won safe to France, ye ken, to his sister; and, gin we can save the estate from the clutches of these Englishers," said the old chieftain, losing his English as he lost his temper, and checking himself as he perceived the effect his hint produced upon his daughter. "Weel! weel! We'll no talk of that the now. You shall see how civil I'll be to the villain. I'll no condescend to be angry. I'll take a lesson out of his ain book, and be as fause and fair as himsel. Here the rascal comes. You shall see how duncely I'll behave. Eh, now, that sic a perjured traitor should look so like an honest man!"

That Locheden fully intended his behaviour to be as false and fair as he believed his kinsman, there is no manner of doubt. But the inveterate truthfulness of threescore years was too much for his new resolution. He did not, it is true, bar his gates against his visitors, nor kick them out of doors, being entered. But he drew back haughtily from their proffered hands, with a look as fierce and wild as one of his own mountain eagles, and eyed Archibald, in particular, as if he had a mind to knock him down. General Campbell, a kind and acute person, and a man of the world, saw, at a glance, that something was amiss, and, determining not to enter upon family matters until the aspect of affairs should be somewhat cleared, began, after an affectionate expression of regret at Marion's pale cheeks, to talk over the news of the day.

"You have heard the grand piece of intelligence, I presume, Locheden, that this foolish young man, the Pretender, who has occasioned us so much trouble in chasing him up and down the country, has given us the slip at last, and got clear off to France? The thing is really so. Besides the accounts in the public papers, which are sufficiently precise and particular, I have a letter myself from a French friend, le Comte de Clermont, who actually saw him land.—Why, hey-day, my pretty Marion!" queth the good General, observing the involuntary clasping of her hands, and the sudden rush of blood that coloured her fair face to the brow, as she listened to his words with breathless interest—"what should there be in this news to make you brighten up on a sudden? You are no damsel of the White Rose, I hope? No Flora McDonald exploits here? Eh, Locheden?" And he turned to relate to the chief all that was then known of the escape of Charles Edward; whilst Archibald, to whom her emotion was as a flash of light that shewed him the whole thing at a glance, advanced to his fair cousin.

"He, then, and not Dungallan, was the stranger at the cave? Charles Edward, the Pretender, the Chevalier, the Prince?"

"Nay, give him what title you will. I am no damsel of the White Rose, as the General calls it; although I risked much—ay, and would risk much again—to preserve a fugitive, in peril of his life, thrown, under such extraordinary circumstances, upon my poor resources for protection and assistance."

"But why not intrust me with the secret? Why occasion so much unnecessary pain—certainly to me—may I not say to both of us?"

"To have trusted you, Captain Campbell, an officer in the service of the King of England, with such a secret as that, however the confidence might have relieved and comforted myself, would have been to endanger your professional reputation, your honour, perhaps even your life. No, I cannot think that I was wrong! The more especially," added she, in a lower voice, and with peculiar sweetness and gentleness of manner—"the more especially as the transient pain must have been long forgotten in your late and present happiness. Heaven knows, I congratulate you most sincerely."

"Happiness!—congratulate!" echoed Captain Campbell, in unfeigned astonishment.

"Marion, my dow!" said her father, striding rapidly across the room—"I have done a great injustice. It's no our friend here, but Johnay, his brother, that's about to marry Lady Betty, who seems to be a fine spunky lassie, for all she has the ill luck to be an Englishier. Archie, my lad, I crave your pardon for thinking you could be such a villain!" And the old chief and the young soldier shook hands, with hearty affection and goodwill.

"There has been a small mistake on both sides, as it seems," observed General Campbell, joining the little group; "but matters are clearing up now, to judge from the gentleman's smiles and the lady's blushes; and, if I be permitted to advise, the best way to prevent a recurrence of doubts and misgivings, would be to have both the weddings on the same day. What say you, Mistress Janet?" For that faithful dependent, very anxious upon her lady's account, and it may be a little inquisitive upon her own, had contrived, on some pretence or other, to edge herself into the room. "What say you?"

"I gie my consent," responded Janet; "barring jealousy and a' sic nonsense, for the time to come. The captain and the loun Donald baith ken that I forewarned them what ye nicht's wark would come to. But ye men folk are aye rash and headstrong—ye canna help yourselves—it's born wi' ye; and we women are saft and complying—that's our nature; see, an' ye hae repentit, we mun j'e'en færgie ye," quoth Janet, "an' tak ye for better for worse."

And so it was settled.

DIARY ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE TIMES OF GEORGE IV., &c. &c.

How an ill-natured admirer of a republican form of government must exult in this ILLUSTRATION OF THE GENIUS AND TENDENCIES OF HEREDITARY MONARCHISM, a title as apt as the original one, for a work which has thrown a certain class of society into a greater ferment than any publication that we can remember! The general, and still more the secret history of the immoral, vindictive, and utterly degrading conduct of George IV. to his consort, from the day of their ill-starred union, until the hour that saw the grave close over her sorrows and her frailties, would be one of the shrewdest commentaries upon the corrupting tendencies of monarchy that history affords. Well may the Democrat inquire, Can the tree be good which bears such corrupt and poisonous fruits? Deeper traces of venality, time-serving, moral cowardice, falsehood, fraud, circumvention, espionage, and treachery, but, above all, of dastardly pandering, by those in high places, to the envenomed and, as it seems to us, frenzied hatred of the reigning prince, cannot be found in the annals of monarchies. It is not enough that the mere courtiers and minions of the Regent of England were as vile as those of the more brutal, but not more vindictive, Henry VIII.; the ministers of the former were equally supple and subservient. That the will of the Regent, in this matter, was not law, or above all law, arose from no want of sycophancy and unprincipled acquiescence on their parts. The statesmen of those days not only prostituted themselves to the malignant pleasure of the would-be despot, but peers, and peeresses, and courtiers of all degrees, the noble and honoured of the land, sought, with greediness, to minister to the Regent's basest passions—those of hate and vengeance. This book has revived the memory of those degrading and infamous transactions—the history of that fiendish persecution of a life;—and the periodical press of the metropolis has been seized with one of its periodical fits of moral indignation at “the most scandalous publication” (so styled by The Quarterly Review) “that ever disgraced English, or any other European literature, not excepting the works of Mrs Manly, George Anne Bellamy, and Harriette Wilson.” It cannot be because the authoress, in betraying her royal mistress and benefactress, has not spared George IV. and his supple ministers, that this storm of wrath bursts on her devoted head? Up to the present hour, what Quarterly Reviewer, what writer of the Tory press, ever lifted a pen to shield the Princess of Wales from the calumny, falsehood, and treachery that dogged her path through life? We are far from volunteering as champions of Lady Charlotte Campbell, (alias, Bury)—and it were a piece of idle affectation not at once to recognise her as the author and editor of the work—but we look with some suspicion upon the quarter from whence the first stone is cast, and with disgust upon the attempt of the Reviewer to convert this denounced book into an instrument for heaping fresh obloquy upon the unfortunate Queen. In the meanwhile, the great world may say, with a letter-writer in this work, of a scandalous book then expected, “We shall break our necks to buy it, of course crying ‘shameful!’ all the while.”

Of the works of Mrs Manly and Harriette Wilson—scandal and indecency of antiquated or of modern date—we confess ourselves entirely ignorant, though not altogether innocent of fashionable reading; so, after the first burst of virtuous indignation is expended, we would humbly inquire, if the denounced work of the Lady-in-waiting is one iota more scandalous, and slanderous, false, malicious, and satirical, than the letters of “De Grammont,” “Walpole’s Epistles,” “Sir Nathaniel Wraxall’s Memoirs,” or “The Correspondence of Lady Mary Wortley,” lately published by her great-grandson? With the vivid recollection of all those worthy and admired productions, we must pause before giving Lady Charlotte “the bad eminence” The Quarterly claims for her. That the book is nearly all hers, we consider established beyond question; nor do we pretend either to vindicate the character of the publication, or its motive; though we do not comprehend why it should call forth such bitter and unqualified reprobation, while the writings of the other noble gossip and treacherous scandal-mongers, have obtained an exalted place in the standard national literature. They may be more brilliant, but they are equally low-minded. From whom, after all, save valets, chambermaids, confessors, confidants, and lords and ladies-in-waiting, are we to expect memoirs of royal personages? And are journals of their lives and conversation to be only panegyrics? It is not because Lady Charlotte Campbell has, like hundreds before her, published her Diary, and the result of her observations upon her confiding mistress and benefactress, that we should complain, if she has said no more than is true, and presented the truth, without the distortion or false colouring attending a partial medium. Happily, in the case of the unfortunate Princess of Wales, the blackest tales which envenomed malice could now dictate, are but “tarts and cheese-cakes” to the foul and brutal calumnies with which the industry of the minions and spies of her royal husband long filled the post-horns of all Europe;—purity itself to that deluge of filth which they and their press poured over this indignant community. We defy the utmost ingenuity of woman’s malice, or man’s hatred, to heap any new calumny upon the unhappy Princess of Wales; and the Lady-in-waiting might have said twenty times more, without adding another shade of black to the picture. This, however, and even the fact that, in the lapse of years, every one has faded away to whom these anecdotes of the friendless woman could have given much pain, are but a slender vindication of their author, in the circumstances in which she had been placed; though the virtuous indignation of the press is excessive in this instance, because it is partial. Had the author of this singular literary and scandalous hash-up, of which moral and religious cant is the most revolting feature, boldly put her name to her production, and seemed as unconscious of wrong as many a former treacherous detractor of the Princess of Wales, we are inclined to think that very little would have been said about that matter. It is the evident consciousness of guilt, and the dread of detection, which has opened the cry against her, and given false importance to a work that otherwise would soon have sunk into oblivion. Or if Queen Caroline alone had been the mark of her shafts, there might in many quarters have been room for forgiveness; but the Diarist, to give piquancy to her narrative, has revived, not originated, those "Tales of other times," which glance upon Holland House, and Devonshire House, and fair or frail Abercorns, and Oxfords, and Murrays, and L * * * s, and many more stars of nobility and fashion—and in this has sinned against her order. Yet most of her stories are stale, and not more wicked or malicious than those of Walpole or the Lady Mary, only differing from them by being from fifty to two score years more recent. We look in vain to the book for any piece of scandal that has not been bruited in trials, in newspapers, and a hundred hackneyed publications; or that has not been the table-talk of the second tables of May Fair, for a time immemorial to the younger race of chamber-maids and valets. If the scandal-loving public have anything to complain of on this score, it is that her Ladyship has not administered a fresher and stronger dose. Lady Charlotte Bury sold her work for a considerable sum, which, too probably, not being upon the pension-list, she, in spite of her many noble connexions, urgently required. The motive is neither high nor pure; and she yielded to a temptation which a high-minded woman, in a far inferior rank, would have scorned, from a sense of honour and self-respect. She yielded, too, in a cowardly and mean way; but the malice of the Reviewer, who, in a few pages, has concentrated more double-distilled venom, directed against the Princess of Wales, than is contained in these two bulky volumes, while he pretends to convey a severe and dignified rebuke to Lady Charlotte, is at least equally reprehensible. The animus here cannot be mistaken. The motive is as single as the object. Those sleuth-hounds of the Carlton House cabal, who, in fresh packs, hunted the unhappy Princess from her bridal-bed to her tomb, though happily fangless now, must have a last gnawing, toothless mumble at her remains. It was too much to expect that the memory of Queen Caroline should be left to the tender mercies and good faith of her confidential Lady-in-waiting, if another opportunity offered to inflict a new stab. We confidently affirm that the perverted ingenuity displayed by the Reviewer, in distorting, misrepresenting, and mutilating the facts contained in this work, inflicts more grievous injury on the Princess of Wales than the original Diary. The Review may not be so sordid in motive, nor is it any breach of the implied but sacred confidence of domestic and social life, but it certainly shows deeper malignity, far more malice prepense than the inconsistent and self-contradicted calumnies of the work reviewed. Any one forming an opinion of it, from the Review alone, must say—"A very naughty lady this Lady Charlotte Bury; but what an atrocious creature the Princess of Wales must have been!" Everything that is worst is placed by the Reviewer in a still darker or more suspicious light; nor do we find a single sentence anywhere cited of those redundant apologies and explanations, and praises of the Princess, the result of the conscientious pangs and "compunctious visitings" of the writer. The critic has chosen to batten wholly on the garbage of the book. The carrion only has attraction for the vulture. The Quarterly critic, charitably and candidly, and with true Old-Bailey logic, concludes, that, "although, perhaps, no fact is related concerning the unhappy Princess of Wales which is not substantially true, a great many circumstances of the same class are left untold;" while those that are told, his wilful perversion and delicate insinuations turn to the blackest use. Such is the whole affair of the Sapio as treated by him. These were a family of those fascinating foreign musicians whom the aristocracy "delight to honour" and fête; with whom the Princess of Wales, in her weary solitude and more miserable society, became more intimate during one season, than was consistent with the etiquette of her station and the notions of some of her household, jealous of all favourites and of each other. Any one reading the account of this affair in the Quarterly Review, must rise with the firm belief that the Princess hired a cottage at Bayswater, for the purpose of carrying on a disgraceful and criminal intrigue with the younger Sapio, to which his father and mother, and other relations, were privy; while the book itself, with all its inconsistencies and license of assumption and remark, bears out no such conclusion. We must go back a little. Lady Charlotte Campbell, a widow, with a young family not very well provided for, must have been very thankful to obtain an appointment in the household of the Princess, who, by her own account, treated her with uniform kindness, confidence, and generosity. Her Ladyship may be excused if she often found the duties of her situation quite as irksome, as royal personages generally find the attendance of their lynx-eyed and cold-hearted dames of honour tiresome and annoying. The lady-in-waiting began to keep an irregular diary, a true barometer of her own humours. If the dinner-party was agreeable, and the evening passed pleasantly, with nothing occurring to mortify her self-love, or wear out her spirits, the "Diary" was written in sun-beams, and the conduct of the Princess was viewed with indulgence and an approach to truth. If, on the contrary, her Ladyship felt herself annoyed, bored, or uncomfortable, her black dog was freely laid on the shoulders of her royal mistress, whom, however, even in her most fretful moods, the noble Diarist ever avers to have been far more sinned against than sinning.

At the very commencement of the "Diary" we meet the following melancholy story:—

The Princess went to the play, a resource she always reserves to herself, to escape from a dull dinner. She was accompanied by Lord Fitz—, her lady-in-waiting, and myself. After the play, I was invited to sup with her Royal Highness—as usual, she talked of her own situation, and her previous life. "Judge," said she, "what it was to have a drunken husband on one's wedding-day, and one who passed the greatest part of his bridal night under the grate, where he fell, and where I lost him. If anybody say to me at this moment, Will you pass your life over again, or be killed? I would choose death, for you know, a little sooner or later, we must all die; but to live a life of wretchedness twice over—O mine God, no! Well, time went on, and de case was, I began to be wild child, and all de wise people said so; but it pilled down, for I ne more believed it dan anything for long time—at last, Charlotte was born. Well, after I lay in—je vous jure 'tis true; upon my honour, upon my soul, 'tis true—I received a message, through Lord Cholmondeley, to tell me I never was to have de great honours of inhabiting de same room wid my husband again. I said, Very well—but, as my memory was short, I begged to have dis polite message in writing from him. I had it—and was free—I left Carlton House, and went to Charlton. Oh, how happy I was!—everybody blamed me, but I never repented me of dis step. O mine God, what I have suffered!—luckily, I had a spirit, or I never should have outlived it." She said more, but I can never remember all she says. Poor Princess! she was an ill-treated woman, but a very wrong-headed one. Had she remained quietly at Carlton House, and conducted herself with silent dignity, how different might have been her lot! It is true, as her Privy Purse, Miss H—, once told a person of my acquaintance, she was so insulted whilst there, that every bit of furniture was taken out of the room she dined in, except two shabby chairs; and the pearl-bracelets, which had been given her by the Prince, were taken from her, to decorate the arms of Lady J—y. Still, had the Princess had the courage which arises from principle, and not that which is merely the offspring of a daring spirit, she would have sat out the storm, and weathered it.

Had this princess been otherwise nurtured and brought up—had she, when first she came to this country, found a husband at once strict and fond—how different a person she might have been! Her good qualities fostered, her evil ones restrained—her mind softened by cultivation, her manners regulated by decorum—what might she not have been? But she came from a court sufficiently base in its principles, to another, where the unfortunate state of the best of monarchs occupied all the thoughts and time of his devoted consort and the royal family, and left her an unprotected prey to the jargon who was the mistress of her husband!—To those who knew the Princess in the first days of her arrival in Britain, and the set by which she was surrounded, it must ever be apparent, that all her subsequent faults and follies admitted of great extenuation.

We find a not very meek-spirited letter, written by the Princess, reflecting upon the Queen—that venerable and proper personage, whom her dutiful son, the Duke of York, used to term, in his billets-doux to Mrs Clark, "Old Sally." But indulged sons may take liberties that become heinous crimes in neglected and ill-treated daughters-in-law. To that letter is appended the following note, after an equivocal expression of regret, that the Princess should have entertained such feelings; or, at any rate, that she should have betrayed them.

The reasons the Princess alleged, though probably groundless, and the mere devices of mischievous persons, were in themselves sufficient to have justified her Royal Highness's dislike, had they been true.

In the first place, the favourite of her husband was sent for, to escort her to this country, (some say by consent of the Q—) and it is further said she gave the Princess the most insidious advice. On a particular occasion, after the birth of Princess Charlotte, she contrived, by a most unfeminine manoeuvre, to render the Prince's first visit to his wife after her lying-in, most unpleasant and disrespectful to his feelings. At Brighton all sorts of tricks, it is alleged, were played off upon the Princess. Spirits were mingled with her beverage, and horses were given her to ride which were dangerous for her to manage, and made her appear ridiculous. Lastly, there was undoubtedly a letter of her Royal Highness's, addressed in confidence to her mother the Duchess of B—, which was opened surreptitiously and carried to the Q—, who read the same, and acted upon its contents. Many other stories are related of the same nature, and of a blacker dye. A belief in these, however devoid of truth in reality, it must be confessed, was quite sufficient to excite an inimical feeling between the royal mother-in-law and her son's wife.

In another place, the author inquires—

Who and what was the woman sent to escort her Royal Highness to England? Was there any attempt made on the part of the Prince to disguise of what nature his connexion was with Lady J—y? None. He took every opportunity of wounding the Princess, by shewing her that Lady J—y was her rival. The ornaments with which he had decked his wife's arms, he took from her and gave to his mistress, who wore them in her presence. He ridiculed her person, and ordered Lady J—y to do so in the most open and offensive manner. And, finally, he wrote to her Royal Highness that he intended never to consider her as his wife—not even though such a misfortune should befall him as the death of his only child.

When the "—" made known this declaration, it does not appear that he assigned any cause of accusation against his wife. He was the first to blame; and when her subsequent follies (for from my heart I believe they never were more than follies) gave him an excuse for his ill treatment of her, it should be remembered what an example of barefaced vice was set before the Princess when she was first married to the Prince. Unfortunately she had not been brought up with a strict sense of moral rectitude or religious principle, in her childhood; neither was the example set her by her father, the Duke of Brunswick, likely to give her just notions of right and wrong. She loved her father, and therefore excused his errors.

While opprobrium was heaped on the Princess of Wales, and the smallest offence against etiquette or propriety which she committed, was magnified into crimes, the Prince of W— ran a career of lawless pleasure, unrebuked, nay, even applauded! How true is the proverb—"One man may steal a horse, and another may not look over a hedge."

The perpetual petty persecutions to which this unfortunate, high-tempered, and perhaps rash woman was subjected, must have been more irritating than the greater injuries and insults often studiously heaped upon her, by every member of the royal family, male and female, with the exception of the King, her uncle, and the Dukes of Kent and Gloucester. Passionate and imprudent, and insensible to the true dignity of the feminine character, as natural disposition, courtly education, and the most trying position had made her, the Princess, with much goodness of heart, of which we find many little instances recorded, was capable of generosity of feeling, which might have shamed her mean-minded and vindictive husband.

While royal marriages remain what they are, the immoral bond of political expediency, it would be too much to blame either Prince or Princess for failing in conjugal affection. We do not therefore censure the Prince of Wales for not loving and cherishing the woman whom he married as the means of having his profligate debts once more paid by the nation—but because a rancorous, unmanly nature found no medium between indifference and brutality, and led him to hate and persecute the being he had injured and outraged. And why did the strict and decorous Queen Charlotte, that model of the domestic proprieties, submit to the gross and impudent outrage offered to public morals and decency, when the mistress of her son, a bold, intriguing, and abandoned woman, was not only sent to conduct her daughter-in-law into England, but appointed to a high place in her household? The insult offered by Charles II. to Catherine of Braganza, when he insisted that Lady Castlemain should be her principal lady, was trifling in comparison with this. And, indeed, the entire conduct of Charles to his wife, wicked as it was, brightens by comparison with that of George IV., who, to the vices of Charles, added the cold-blooded malignity towards his wife which we find justly imputed to him in this work. It is said, in one place—

It ought to be recorded to the honour of the Princess, that, until she was goaded to madness, she never felt any hatred against the Prince's friends, as such; only against persons who had been her adherents, and turned from her to bow the knee to Baal, did she shew any resentment.

Hypocrisy and dissimulation, the ordinary vices of princes, were not hers. She was even exasperated into the opposite extreme—of a wild and foolhardy defiance of opinion; and foolishly gloried in making people doubt and stare, with a recklessness not unusual in a situation like hers. Lord and Lady Essex dined with her one day, together with Lord Fitzwilliam, Lord Hardwicke, Mr Grattan, and others, shortly before she left England. The Lady-in-waiting, or Diarist, says—

I was sorry the Princess did not behave very graciously to the Essexes: she is always committing some fatal mistakes respecting whom she ought to shew favour to, and to whom she ought not; but she said, when they were gone, "I cannot like people who take me up only because they are displeased with the Regent."

A few brief anecdotes will enable the reader to comprehend perfectly one aspect of the mingled character of the Princess, which gave occasion to much misrepresentation.

Her Royal Highness enjoys making people stare, so she gave free vent to her tongue, and said a number of odd things, some of which she thinks and some she does not; but it amuses her to astonish an innocent-minded being, and really such did this old man appear to be. He won her heart upon the whole, however, by paying a compliment to her fine arm, and asking for her glove. Obtaining it, he placed it next his heart, and, declaring it should be found in his tomb, he swore he was of the old school in all things.

This chivalrous old gentleman was the chamberlain of the King of Prussia. After telling that the Princess had one day requested a gentleman to relate some amusing but indecent story, the author, with the air of inconsistency or mock candour which pervades the whole book, remarks:—

It may be said, in excuse for the Princess, that she certainly did not understand English thoroughly; and, in her quest after diversion, encouraged everything which created a laugh, without often knowing the real meaning which excited it.

In another place, we are told that "She had a childishly wicked pleasure in making people think worse of her than she deserved." And, again, "She was that sort of person likely to have resented the imputation of guilt, by acting in such a manner as to suggest notions that she must have been guilty."

This may be the true explanation of some of the very bad and coarse practical jokes in which, like many other royal personages, she indulged, and of some of those sayings which startled the ears of very decorous English people, and at which others hypocritically affected to be shocked. "There may have been a spicing of revenge in her conduct," we are told, "but assuredly, (that is, in my opinion,) there was much of frank jocularity in her indiscretion." She very probably, with less polish, possessed some of those amiable feminine qualities with which Scott has endowed Queen Mary, when her ingenuity was exercised to taunt, provoke, and humiliate her lady-keeper in Lochleven Castle; or of the equally natural recklessness and caprice which Miss Edgeworth has skilfully delineated in the character of the heroine of fashion in "Belinda," who perversely delighted in setting opinion at defiance, especially in her husband's family, and at passing for much worse than she was or could be. This unhappy wilfulness and perversion of character—the consequence of being misunderstood or ill-appreciated, though not, as in the case of the Princess of Wales, treated with injustice and cruelty—ever brings its own punishment to a mind of any feeling.

Any one reading merely the insidious extracts taken by the Quarterly Review, regarding the Queen's conduct prior to her marriage, might believe that the royal lady, whose German manners did not square with English ideas, instead of being merely described as a high-spirited hoyden, was represented as a dissolute woman. Now, what is the fact? The Duke of York had informed his chère amie, Mrs Clarke, that it was at one time proposed he should marry the Princess of Brunswick; and that he went to see how the land lay, but it seemed, from many things he saw and heard of her, that her ways were not likely to take in England. The conclusion, in the work before us, is, "that the Princess of Wales, before her marriage, was hoydenish, and addicted to practical jokes, and not at all 'adorable' in the eyes of the Duke, whom, by the way, she always spoke of (that is, Mrs Clarke said) as naturally subject to mauvais honte." The Princess was not well fitted to play the grand rôle, which a very inferior personage might have enacted with the utmost decorum. "Poor woman! she's endeavouring to be a lady," said an old gentleman to our author, in seeing the Princess pass to her carriage; and the author philosophically remarks—"Yet surely there is no moral crime in the manifestation of natural character." In princes and courts, it is ever deemed a crime, and, moreover, a danger of the greatest magnitude, to drop the mask. The Princess could assume dignity, but it was not her habitual demeanour. She loved amusement, wearied of the formality and dulness of "good society;" and, latterly, liked the company of those who could banish, though but momentarily, the bitter and ever-gnawing recollection of her humiliations and misery. Some one, one night, at a pleasant supper party at Kensington Palace, ventured to hint that morning was at hand. "Ah," said the Princess—"God, he knows when we may all meet again. To tell you God's truth, when I am happy and comfortable, I could sit on for ever!" There was heaviness in her mirth, and everybody seemed to feel it; so they sat on. Just as the party rose, a thunder-bolt burst near the house. The gentlemen returned, and said, that the sentinel on duty had been knocked down.

"Ah!" said the Princess, undismayed but solemnly—"this forbodes my downfall," and she shook her head; then rallying, she desired Sir H. Englefield to take especial notice of this meteoric phenomenon, and give an account of it in the "Philosophical Transactions;"—which he did.

The Princess of Wales had the merit of choosing her society well. Carlton House had its own set—courtiers, debauchees, and toadies, of all descriptions, and of both sexes; while at her table, we find—with a thin sprinkling of those of the nobility, too elevated in mind to become, in all things, sycophants to the Regent—many men illustrious in science, literature, or art. She even derived some reflected honour from the character of her imputed gallants and lovers, in her early days. They were, among others, Sir Sidney Smith, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Captain Manby, and Mr Canning—all of them men distinguished from the vulgar herd, by acquirements and accomplishments. When her reputation was cleared up, by what was divertingly called the Delicate Investigation, and her lovers, of course, acquitted with herself—her acquittal, we are here reminded, "to the disgrace of all parties concerned, as well as to the justice of the nation in general, was not made public at the time." She resolved, about this time, to publish her correspondence with the Prince, relative to Lady Jersey, and wished to employ the Diarist as her agent. The idea was afterwards abandoned. The Princess seems ever to have cherished too indignant a sense of injury, while she unwisely, like many proud and honourable persons, disdained to stoop to explanation.

A letter from Monk Lewis describes, to Lady Charlotte Campbell, the manner of life of her future royal mistress, just before she entered the service of the Princess. It is dated from Holland House, which house was, at one time, neither favourable to the Princess of Wales, nor much in her good graces. Lewis says—

I have lately seen a good deal of your future mistress, and I am persuaded of her possessing many estimable qualities. She is extremely good-humoured and obliging, and seems very much attached to the persons in whose favour she conceives a prepossession. She is by no means exigante; at the same time, no little attention is lost upon her. She seems grateful for the slightest indications of good-will towards her, (probably, poor soul! the ill treatment which she has at times received since her arrival in this country has made them doubly acceptable to her,) and she is generous, indeed I may say profuse, in her manner of returning it. She reads a great deal, and buys all new books; is very fond of music and the play; has boxes at the Opera and both the theatres, which her Royal Highness attends frequently. She has concerts often at the palace, with the best performers; is fond of having persons of distinction at her table, either for rank or for political and literary merits; and I need not tell, that her ladies are all most agreeable persons. Lady Glenbervie and Lady C. Lindsay are pâtissières d'esprit, and Lady — will please you infinitely.

He proceeds to congratulate Lady Charlotte on her appointment. See her own note:—

There was a time when there was a galaxy of distinguished persons who sat at the Princess's board, and when the nobles of the land flocked to her parties. What changed the whole scene? Was it any particular novel occurrence in the Princess's own conduct? I have been assured by an eye-witness it was not. The pivot of her fortunes turned upon the deposition of George III. from his regal power, and the consequent succession of the Prince of Wales. The very instant the King's malady was declared to be incurable—as if some sorcerer's wand had waved over the fate of the Princess, to cast her in this world into the blackness of darkness—she was cast down from her high estate, and deprived of all that could make life valuable. She struggled on for a time: but she was goaded to madness and despair, and her enemies prevailed.

So vindictive are all members of the R— F— in their feelings towards her, even to this day, that nothing would induce them to have any person in their households who had ever been about the Princess. No worldling ever served her Royal Highness; and even those who were personally attached to her, and felt her wrongs, were at last compelled, one by one, to leave her service.

We have our own opinion as to no worldling ever having served her Royal Highness. None, at least, continued to serve her. There is, in this book, considerable thinly-veiled jealousy betrayed of Lady Anne Hamilton. That lady did not always make herself so agreeable to the Princess as other more insinuating members of her household. "She wanted tact," and sometimes presumed to meddle, to find fault, and give her opinion openly—different from our author, who says, "as advice could do her [the Princess] no good, and only harm myself, I laid it down as a rule of conduct never to offer it." Besides, a "natural suavity of manners and temper" sometimes induces the Diarist "to gloss over sentiments to which a more bold frame of mind would express its dislike and abhorrence." Disapprobation was reserved, to be confided to the "Diary," and, in the fulness of time, to the public. Lady Anne Hamilton—whose heroic fidelity to her royal mistress, whatever might be the faults, frailties, or guilt of that unfortunate woman, will ever remain the theme of praise, while honour and good-faith have power over the human heart—is affectedly pitied, and grudgingly eulogized, in a style quite worthy of Mrs Candour.

Poor Lady A. H. has been very unjustly condemned—for she intended to do right, though she was always doing wrong. A spirit of intrigue and petty concealment, and a false idea of prudence, prevented that open uprightness of character, which walks erect through the world, and defies slander, because it has no little mean interests to serve. Nevertheless, it will be told of this lady hereafter, that she underwent all the contumely and all the opprobrium of the last public scenes of her unfortunate and misguided mistress, and never left her person in life, or her insulted remains, till they were deposited in the grave, where all things are forgotten. This moral courage on the part of Lady H., by which she could get little or nothing to compensate for the odium it entailed upon her, will be done justice to at last, and will cover a thousand little defects of meaner kind, the growth, it may be, of timidity, of a false idea of doing good—que scit-je ? of a littleness of conception, which, after all, was strangely contrasted in the same character with a greatness, during the last scenes of the historic tragedy in which she was a figurante, that will ultimately reverse the judgment which has been too hastily pronounced upon her:—mais tout ou tard tout se scit; and the public award is generally just at the last—though often too tardily so, to affect beneficially the happiness of the person on whom sentence is passed.

The Princess was wont, in pleasantry, to call Lady Anne, Jeanned'Arc, and she proved her title to the name. But who, save the Regent's minions, has ever blamed Lady Anne, whose opinion was worthy one moment's consideration? Surely our author cannot take into account the base creatures who originated that shameless, scurrilous, and impudently false journal, of which the avowed purpose was libelling and lampooning every respectable and modest woman who ventured to countenance the persecuted wife of the King. To Lady Anne Hamilton, Walter Scott dedicated one of his beautiful early poems. Alas! that, even of him—the courtly Troubadour, the poet of chivalry—the Lady-in-waiting should have too good cause to say—

Walter Scott!—There is a magic in the name, which arrests the pen, and almost makes it sacrilege to write one word which can disparage the chivalric character of his glorious memory! But truth must be told:—he behaved ill to a woman!—and that woman her who was to be his queen! From having literally sat at her feet—from having, in one of the most spirited of his songs, expressed devotion to her cause, he suddenly veered round to the Regent, and never after testified the slightest remembrance of his having once courted her favour.—Verily he had his reward.

The pitiful tricks and means, the despicable arts fallen upon, to torment and annoy the Princess of Wales, and give an evil and false appearance to her purest and to her simplest actions, may appear incredible to those unversed in the ways of courts and courtly creatures. We may select one or two specimens.

Saturday, 16th.—The Princess told me a strange circumstance, which has lately come to her knowledge—namely, that the editor of the Star, a Scotchman,* whose name she forgot, told Lord Perceval, that, when the paragraph announcing the publication of The Letters came out, Mr Macmahon went to the editor of the Star, and, giving him a scurrilous piece of abuse about the Princess, desired him to put it in his paper. The former refused, saying it was actionable; and then Mr Macmahon offered any sum to the man, to bribe him, which he equally spurned and rejected. What meanness! How these histories make one feel the littleness of human beings!

This was in the year 1812. We need not remind our readers of what palace Colonel or Mr Macmahon was an inmate. In one of the Princess's letters, in which she complains very naturally of the fatigue and ennui occasioned by dull company, she observes—“My usual resource, on this occasion, is to shew them the great apartments and the rarities they contain. At last, (everything, alas! ends,) we were obliged to take to another resource, which was walking in the great avenue.” The fiendish nature of her persecutors, is seen in the note appended to this extract:—

This was a circumstance which her Royal Highness's enemies laid hold of to turn to her disadvantage, and the newspapers of the day found great fault with the Princess for taking her guests into those apartments, and insinuated that they were the scenes of improper conduct, being but partially lighted; whereas, her Royal Highness only took her company there when she had no other means of entertaining them. Thus was she often falsely accused; and, unfortunately for her own welfare, (though I think, in many instances, it speaks well for her character,) the Princess of Wales did not heed what interpretation her enemies put on her actions.

At one time, her Royal Highness wished to purchase the lease of a house in London, which she thought would suit her for a winter residence, as she felt that season dismal at Blackheath. Clinging, poor creature, to every straw that promised relief to her misery, she wrote, in high spirits, probably to her Lady-in-waiting, about the conclusion of the bargain. Her letters, often faulty in their English, though wonderful, even in this respect, for a German Princess, are frequently remarkable for ease, pleasantry, and natural grace. She writes—

“I shall in future be called ‘Queen Margaret in her sequestered bower,’ my dear —, and you will be the fair Rosamond living with me in that bower. The short and the long of this is, blessed dear old Lady Reid be, for her good taste! I think her house perfection, and to-day, I believe, the contract will be signed. Some of the rooms which I have chosen for my own use are extremely dirty; but with soap and water and brushing, and a little painting, I shall make them look well. The two drawing-rooms and the dining-room are truly magnificent old rooms, which would do credit to any old manor-house in Scotland. I have taken it for seven years, as it was impossible to take it for less; but, in case my situation should change before that period, I can let it whenever I please. It is no more than eight hundred pounds a-year, which is extremely cheap: it is like a complete villa in the midst of town, as you know that Curzon Street, May Fair, is close to Stanhope Gate, and the other to Piccadilly, which will make it very easy for my friends to come. I hope in ten days I shall be able to live in it.”

Will it be believed, that measures were taken to prevent the executors of Lady Reid from giving her Royal Highness the lease of this residence, by those who were inimical to her coming to London. Upon the other hand, she was advised by Mr Brougham not to leave Kensington Palace, as a pretext was only wanted to turn her out of it altogether, and deprive her of the contingent advantages of inhabiting a royal residence. The Regent was now omnipotent; and the baseness of his courtiers, and of those who wished to pay court, and the subservience of his advisers, could scarcely have gone farther in the most despotie state.

The most heinous charge brought against her Royal Highness, in the Diary, is her connexion with the Sapios. It is a confused, contradictory, and unintelligible statement, and would scarcely be worth noticing, save for the malicious uses made of it in the Quarterly Review. At one time, the reader would imagine the connexion of the most disreputable and guilty kind; at another, that, in her musical intercourse with these accomplished and rapacious fiddling foreigners, the Princess only sought an unsafe relaxation from the cares and tedium of her life, in the agreeable exercise of her own musical talents; while the beggar-pride of some of her ladies disdained the low association. The last notice we have of this affair, is in a note appended to some letters, evidently written by the Lady-in-waiting herself, and describing the Princess' manner of life. The note states—

The foregoing letter reveals much of the Princess's life, and shews what annoyances her attendants had to submit to, in seeing her degrade herself by associating with such individuals as the S—s; yet, in this letter, which is evidently written in perfect confidence, (and the writer would, therefore, not have hesitated to tell, if there had been more to tell,) there is nothing which criminales the Princess. In this private communication, as in all others, she is only proved guilty of folly, of a partiality to low company, and of being totally incapable of putting any restraint on the whims which came into her head.

This being the final verdict of the Diarist, and it being evident that there was often a desperate and reckless affectation of gaiety in the conduct of the Princess, the wild mirth of despair, we may now look to the vague and varying charges on which so much is founded, or rather insinuated. The Sapios, then first fiddles, and the younger one an exquisite singer, appear to have been introduced to her Royal Highness, by Lady Perceval. They were also connected, as teachers, with a school at Lee, which had been established and was patronised by Lady Anne Hamilton. The Princess had always been in the habit of having eminent professional singers and musicians at her parties, though her Lady or Lord-in-waiting treats her musical taste in the most insolent and contemptuous way. "It is a custom to have musicians, in order that it may be said, She has had a concert. Cats would do just as well. Thursday, May 19.—In the evening, singing and playing—' Vivent les beaux Arts!' May 31.—There has been less music lately, and the musicants have been less with her. I am afraid, or rather I ought to rejoice, that she has not found that society quite congenial."

This society appears to have been continued only during the summer and autumn of 1813.

We now come to the head and front of this grave matter, which the Quarterly Reviewer, by the aid of judicious omissions, dashes, blanks, and capital, and Italic types, makes look formidable enough. It is necessary to keep in mind, that the Diarist, or Lady Charlotte Campbell, is the only authority for the facts ostensibly communicated as if by one individual, and narrated by another.

The poor Princess is going on headlong to her ruin. Every day she becomes more imprudent in her conduct, more heedless of propriety and the respect she owes to herself. The society she is now surrounded by, is disgraceful.

Yesterday, when I dined with her Royal Highness, the old ouran outang [old Sapio] was there, and they sung together for some time, and, after that, the Princess set off with Lady —, to go to the vile Maison de Plaisance, or rather de Nuisance. It consists of two damp holes, that have no other merit than being next to the S. Kennel. I was shewn all over, or half over, this abominable place, and then dismissed. Lady — told me to-day that she was left to chew the cud of her reflection for several hours. She said, that she tried "to spit them out, for that truly they were neither nutritive nor sweet." She read one of Madame de Stael's Petits Romans, which I had lent her, and which she told me had given her great pleasure. Madame de Stael's Essai sur les Fictions delights me particularly; for every word in it is a beautified echo of my own feelings. Lady — told me the Princess was not content with being next door to the Kennel, but she would go into it; and there she was introduced to a new brother and sister-in-law of the L—s. Alas! what company for her to associate with! Lady — said she felt very distressed at seeing her royal mistress there; and thought the mother of the Princess felt so too, for that the latter neither wants feeling nor sense. After two hours of music, i. e. charivari, the Princess returned back again to the other hole, and supped à-à-à-à with Lady —; this, at least, was an appearance kept up; but Lady — is terrified, for the Princess talked of sleeping at the "cottage." Her Royal Highness's servants are infuriated, and there is no saying how long their fidelity may hold out.

The Princess, in ignorance or defiance of propriety, had actually deigned to go into the musical people's house, and to enjoy two hours of music in their "kennel," in spite of her Lady-in-waiting's secret displeasure—for that lady never ventured remonstrance or advice, "which could only harm herself"—and in contempt of the etiquette which forms so much of the morality of princes. The Quarterly Reviewer, first quoting as much of the above as suits his sinister purpose, gives the first sentence in a page or two afterwards, and he adds, after the words, "the society she is now surrounded by is disgraceful," (putting the emphatic word in Italic characters,) "And then follows the account of one of the night visits to 'the abominable place;'" that visit being the identical, not night, but evening one, the account of which we have quoted, and which the reviewer also had quoted in the page immediately preceding! Can anything like this be paralleled, in a publication claiming the character of being fair or respectable? Lady Charlotte Campbell—with whom, by the way, "abominable" is a favourite epithet, applied now to the Steyne at Brighton, now to the proceedings of the House of Lords in relation to Queen Caroline—has done her part to draw suspicion upon her mistress, which she a hundred times disclaims feeling herself; but the reviewer has overtopped it. Thus, he says, "While she [the Princess] was spending her evenings in the Sapio 'kennel', her political advisers were penning letters to the Regent," &c. &c.; this charge being grounded on two hours of a single evening having been spent in what the individuals engaged called music performed in a cottage, but which

Lady Charlotte, who thought the whole business low and disgraceful to royalties, is pleased to term "charivari in a kennel." In another place, the Reviewer as wilfully and malignantly distorts the obvious meaning of the words of the Diarist, and out of her mouth draws a condemnation of Queen Caroline, on whose defence she has entered elaborately, and on the very ground of her defence. When, in April 1816, she joined her Royal Highness at Genoa, she observes, in a few days—

I have never been able to detect any impropriety of manner, or even familiarity, towards the Courier xv, but I live in fear every moment of having the harrid stories confirmed before my eyes. I should far rather go on doubting than be convinced of their truth. The rascal—for such I am sure he is in the way of cheating Her Royal Highness—is very handsome. I have never hitherto observed anything with regard to him, as I DID WITH THE SINGERS.

The emphatic capitals and Italics we borrow from the Reviewer. They do not belong to Lady Charlotte, though her calumnious entry is sufficiently offensive, and, coupled with her after vindication of the Queen on this particular charge, also ridiculous. She never says another word to vindicate the Reviewer's emphatic xv; but concludes, "I hope the whole is a lie," which hope it serves his purpose to omit.

We begin to repent of the little which we have said in extenuation of Lady Charlotte Campbell's treachery to her mistress, when we read such entries as this, preceding the paragraph of which the Reviewer has made so dishonest a use:—

Her Royal Highness received Lady Charlotte Campbell [the writer] with open arms, and evident pleasure, and without any flurry. She had no rouge on, wore tidy shoes, was grown rather thinner, and looked altogether uncommonly well.

She has heaped benefits on Lady C. —, and sent her a thousand ducats in hard cash as soon as she arrived. Lady C. — told me this, and spoke with gratitude and affection towards our poor mistress, though she confessed that it was painful to owe gratitude where esteem could not cancel the debt. "Yes," added Lady C. —, "I hope my services are of some use to her Royal Highness, and that the balance is pretty even on the score of obligation."

We cannot help turning from this with extreme disgust. If there ever was any gratitude and affection due, as this would intimate, Lady C. C. has strangely discharged the debt. One might fancy, from the way in which she talks of the Princess giving "shabby presents," and, perhaps—for it amounts to no more than conjecture—bestowing money on "the singers," that her Ladyship thought it wrong to let any solid gifts go out of the household. She is evidently jealous of, as well as furious at, these Sapios. Whether she really means to say that the Princess would have sold all her plate, &c. &c., to give the price to them—and we think her words do not bear out any such thing—the Reviewer charitably clutches at such a meaning, in citing this passage:—

He [Mr Gell] talked of a gentleman who sings divinely, and who is very handsome and agreeable, and wished to be allowed to be presented to her Royal Highness; at which I saw the Princess quite furious—a rival Squallini! mercy upon us—what should we do? how should we dare to listen to any other music than that of the one par excellence? In short, nobody is to come into the house but Squallinis. She told me she should sell all her plate, all her toilette ornaments given her by the King, everything, in short, which she could convert into money—for money she must have.

Money, like all Royal Highnesses, she sometimes wanted; perhaps she might even have made some shift to obtain the above thousand ducats; as we are told that, shortly before this, she had at Naples sold some of her diamonds to assist another false and dangerous friend, evidently Lady Oxford. The Reviewer, as usual, stops short in his quotation, before the suspicion awakened can be removed by simple explanation; for the Diarist goes on to state that her Royal Highness had been complaining of "money grievances." What follows, of the epithalamium to be written by Campbell, the murder of the Regent, and the Fiddler King, with Lady Charlotte Campbell and Lady Charlotte Lindsay as ladies of his Court, is evidently a jest—a bitter one, and not in the best taste, but impossible to be mistaken in its character:—

She is absolutely infatuated, she even talks of marrying again—but never till she has tried the favoured mortal, and made him pass five times through the fiery furnace of constancy and truth: there is an ordeal for you!—it is more truly an ordeal than Miss Adair's. To kill the Regent, then go abroad with a court of her own making, of which the fiddler is to be king, is her favourite plan; Campbell is to write the epithalamium, and Lady C. L. — and Lady C. C. —, the two favourites, are to be the ladies of the bedchamber—and

"Don't you think this will be delightful?" she asks me. Writing these notes, though they are never to meet any eye but my own—seems to me unamiable, for I am more than overwhelmed with kindness. Though the Princess was playing at chess with Lord Palmerston, she overheard every word I said, and that was not agreeable, though, in fact, I said nothing that was of any consequence. . . . She cannot now bear to be in good society: she calls it dull; and, true enough, good society is often dull. . . .

The Princess is always seeking amusement, and, unfortunately, often at the expense of prudence and propriety. —She cannot endure a dull person: she has often said to me, "I can forgive any fault but that; and the anathema she frequently pronounces upon such persons is—"Mine G—! dat is de dullest person G— Almighty ever did born!"

The Lady-in-waiting—who, feelingly, and not without cause, laments the miserable slavery of all persons attendant on royal personages, while the great ones are at least equally to be pitted—seems to have been in very bad humour about this time—suspicious and evil-minded. Everything at Kensington was "bad," and "dull," and "intolerable;" and there, for her salary's sake, she was constrained to be. Thus she gets on:—"The Princess made many complaints of La reine des Ostrogoths, and long histories about the Squallinis and the Grimas, that really disgusted me—if she likes busying herself with such objects, I do not. The old ouran outang came to dinner—think of him, pour tout bien, more free and easy and detestable than ever. Then her Royal Highness sang—squally—squally, why invite me?"

The ouran outang is the elder Sapio; the younger is usually named Chanticleer. She at last dares to explain the nature of the connexion, but not until the evil impression has been given:—

Her Royal Highness made a party to go to a small cottage which she had taken in the neighbourhood of Bayswater, where she could feel herself unshackled by all the restraints of royalty and etiquette; there she received a set of persons wholly unfit to be admitted to her society. It is true, that, since the days of Mary of Scotland, (when Rizzio sang in the Queen's closet,) and in the old time before her, all royal persons have delighted in some small retired place or apartment, where they conceived themselves at liberty to cast off the cares of their high station, and descend from the pedestal of power and place, to taste the sweets of private life. But, in all similar cases, this attempt to be what they were not, has only proved injurious to them—every station has its price—its penalty. Princes and Princesses must live for the public.

From whatever I do remember in tale or history, these princes have become despicable, and finally lost, who gave themselves up to favouritism and all its attendant unworthiness; and, by the Princess especially, a more unwise or foolish course could not have been pursued, than this imitation of her unfortunate Sister Queen, of France. All the follies, though not the eloquence and splendour of Trianon, were aped in the rural retreat of Bayswater!—and the Princess's foes were not backward at seizing upon this circumstance, and turning it (as well they might) to effect her downfall. As far as regards this world only, it is much more frequently imprudence than actual crime which finally hurls people to their destruction.

This leads to the one evening spent there, described above, and which is all we hear of. The Reviewer, in quoting this passage, leaves out all about Trianon. The follies of the sainted Marie Antoinette are sacred.—Caroline of Brunswick is common property. Who would imagine that, in a few days after such dark and woful doings at "the Kennel," we should find it resolved into the ordinary squabbles of petty courts:—

"Oh! my dear —," resumed the Princess, after a short pause, "there is all sort of tracasseries at Lee." Of that I had no doubt.—Such jealousies and quarrellings!—Lady Anne fighting with Lady Perceval—the one supporting the Sapios, the other, that is Lady Anne, wishing to turn them out of the seminary; then the young Miss Guin making love to the young captain; and the old man in a fury, and the young lover mighty cool.

The Princess of Wales, though she did "squall" occasionally "till one o'clock in the morning," was otherwise engaged at this time:—

Her Royal Highness shewed me Mr Brougham's letter, which she is copying, that it may go to the Prince. It is a most capital letter, setting forth her wrongs; and, providing the basis be solid upon which it is founded, her cause must be secure. No petulance, no anger, but dignity, tenderness, and propriety.

That letter produced a strong effect in the country. The Princess was at the height of her popularity; and the Regent never stirred abroad but to be neglected or hissed. She had, for the moment, triumphed over her enemies, whether in court, camp, or council. From the numerous congratulatory letters addressed to her ladies, a few extracts are given. The addresses of societies and of public bodies were a higher triumph. Yet, it is said, with true womanly spite—

May 10th, 1813.—After all these triumphs, we are only making a charivari upon an old tin tea kettle of a harpichord.

It was one o'clock in the morning before I was dismissed.—O ye gods and green geese! I wish I was one upon a goose green, instead of a court!

Friday 14th.—Yesterday came Sir J. Owen, with the Pembrokehire address. He is a well-looking young man. The Princess went through the ceremony with great dignity, and did the whole thing very well. Why does she not always so? I was present at a visit her Royal Highness paid the Duchess of Leinster, when she took a china cup to her, which her Royal Highness said had belonged to her mother, who was a friend of hers. What a magnificent old lady!

On Saturday, the 15th, came the Sheffield address. That night I dined at Blackheath, and sat up till two o'clock in the morning. The Princess read some of Mirabeau's letters of the private history of the Court of Berlin; but every now and then laid down the book, to talk of the personages mentioned therein, according to her own version of the story. This she did very well, and was extremely entertaining.

In a few weeks afterwards, the Diary bears that Chanticleer has been fairly driven off his dunghill. Lady — [herself] does not know how this has been effected; but that it has is certain, thank heaven! Only, I fear, that, if Chanticleer's wings are clipped, they will grow again; and if his neck is twisted, some other dunghill-bird will roost on the same perch—and it is not only disgraceful that the Princess should have lived in intimacy with such persons as the S—s, but they have extracted so much money from her, that, had their reign continued longer, she would have been greatly embarrassed. All Mr H— has said to me on this melancholy subject, starts up and stares me in the face with damning truth. Even were there the excuse, though a bad one, of supposing her heart interested in any one person, I could forgive—nay, feel sympathy with her Royal Highness: but, taking pleasure merely in the admiration of low persons, is beneath her dignity as a woman, not to mention her rank and station.

So, after all, "her heart was not interested," only her vanity. But the Lady-in-waiting is not yet quite sure, and, ever prone to suspect the worst, she has frequent relapses; as this:—

Wednesday.—The Princess drove to Lady Perceval's, and dined there yesterday. Chanticleer was there. It was curious to see how she thought she hid matters from Lady P—. The latter is a weak intriguing woman, who seems to me to be a mere convenience, but can see as far into a millstone as another, especially such a broad barefaced one.

To-day, I went to Blackheath, by command. Her Royal Highness was in a low, gentle humour. I walked round her melancholy garden with her, and she made me feel quite sorry for her when she cried, and said it was all her own creation—meaning the garden and shrubbery, &c., but that now she must leave it for ever, for that she had not money to keep a house at Blackheath and one in London also; and that the last winter she had passed there had been so very dreary, she could not endure the thought of keeping such a one again. I did not wonder at this. All the time I staid and walked with her Royal Highness, she cried, and spoke with a desolation of heart that really made me sorry for her, and yet, at the end of our conversation, poor soul, she smiled, and an expression of resignation, even of content, irradiated her countenance as she said, "I will go on hoping for happier days. Do you think I may?" she asked me.

And this poor creature could be blamed for sometimes trying to sing away her sense of misery! Her personal danger from her enemies seems to have reached an overweening height in the minds of some of her foreign friends. It is stated, of her mother's lady—

I saw Madame de H—e; I think she is a good and an upright woman. Heavens! what an opinion she has of the Princess! She told me she dreamt the other night, that her Royal Highness's carriage was fired at, going down a lane, and that she was shot in the back. Madame de H— and I agreed on the impropriety of her Royal Highness exposing her person as she does, without attendants, in lanes and by-ways near Kensington and at Blackheath.

Thursday.—Lady — was sent to the cottage, to fetch away books, &c., which had been left there. She heard that Chanticleer was ill—amiable distress, interesting denouement! I dined at Kensington. There was no one besides the Princess, except Lady —; we dined off mutton and onions, and I thought Lady — would have degobbled with the coarseness of the food, and the horror of seeing the Princess eat to satiety: afterwards, her Royal Highness walked about Paddington Fields, making Lady — and myself follow. These walks are very injudiciously chosen as to time and place, though perfectly innocent, and taken for no other purpose than for the pleasure of doing an extraordinary thing. It was almost dark when the Princess returned home in the evening.

How could a Royal Highness, so low in taste as to dine off plain mutton and onions, and take rural strolls, be either understood or pardoned by a high-born lady-in-waiting, who accordingly finds some wrong motive for the simplest action. Indeed, evil was ever uppermost in her mind:—"Sunday.—The Princess went to Lady Percival's, where Lady — says there is no amusement; it must be, therefore, that this intimacy is kept up for past reasons, not present pleasure—a sad consideration."

How could this woman, for her own sake, write thus maliciously and invidiously, and immediately afterwards—"I was for several days much alarmed by a change that I saw in the shape of the Princess' figure, and I could not help imparting the terrible fear I felt to Lady —. She also had noticed it; but I was much relieved by her telling me she knew for certain it was only caused by the Princess having left off stays, a custom which she is very fond of; and she ought to be warned not to indulge in this practice, for it might give rise to reports exceedingly injurious to her character."

Was a person in this frame of mind fitted to observe fairly, or to give impartial testimony?

The Allied Sovereigns about this time visited England, and the affronts and mortifications daily offered to the Princess became such as no woman of ordinary sensibility could have endured.

A pretext had, by this time, been found to separate her wholly from her daughter, who had previously been permitted occasionally to visit her. The ill-managed young Princess, in spite of the vigilance of governesses, and aunts, and grandmother, had found means to enter into a foolish, girlish correspondence with, it would seem, her cousin, Captain Fitzclarence, which it was impossible that her mother could either have known or sanctioned. When this affair was discovered, the Princess of Wales, however, naturally took part with her child, who had ever to her been affectionate and devoted. She, in brief, might attempt to palliate a past folly which she must have condemned. Her child was her last hope, and she repented, as we have seen in the case of Mr. Gravelle, injuries done to her unprotected daughter, which she despised when offered to herself. But, to return to the affair.

It is said—"The Princess of Wales, on the contrary, behaved very foolishly in this business; and it gave a handle to her enemies to represent to the Regent that she ought not to be allowed indiscriminate intercourse with her daughter. They took a fiendish pleasure in laying hold of this or any other plausible pretext to separate the Princess from her child."

The Quarterly Reviewer rests the complete vindication of the total separation of the unfortunate mother and her equally unfortunate child, upon this "behaving foolishly," as if the Princess had really approved or abetted an imprudence of which she must have been entirely ignorant. Princess Charlotte seems to have written, clandestinely no doubt, and to have sent messages to her mother; but, for many months, they had not met, when, in a fit of pride and anger, the young lady fled from her state-prison of Warwick House, and sought the protection of her mother. The Princess of Wales, acting, for once surely, with dignified submission to her husband, yielded up her daughter and her last hope in England. She had, by this time, made up her mind to leave that country, boasting of its free institutions and its high morality, which had, for twenty-three years, been to her the scene of unvarying injuries and humiliations, and in which she had encountered more baseness and treachery than had ever before, in peaceful times, fallen to the lot of princes, born as they are to generate moral depravity in those around them, and to suffer by it.

But, before entering upon the last of her injuries, previous to leaving this country, we may as well dismiss the Sapios. This is the last of them:—"Old Sapio dined at Connaught House. I was sorry to meet him there again, as I had hoped never to do so. The Princess treats him with a comical mixture of protection and scorn, which is very unlike what she ought to do in either way."

We may notice that the Diarist is still more uncharitable to the daughter than to the mother; but her curious account of the imperious temper and bold character of the Princess Charlotte, may be taken more effectually afterwards. The Allied Sovereigns were now in the country; London was a scene of gaiety, festivity, and triumph; while the proud, unhappy Princess secretly pined in neglect, longing for the slightest mark of attention from any one of those politic and mean-minded crowned persons. The age of chivalry, indeed! The Emperor of Russia had, at one time, intended to visit her; but, we are told, "It is publicly known the R—t sent over Sir Thomas Tyrwhitt with a private message to the Emperor of Russia, desiring him to take no notice of the Princess on his arrival in England. Whether or not the Emperor is weak enough, or politic enough, to choose to submit to this dictatorial order, will soon be known."

Again, it is said, that, when the Emperor was actually stepping into his carriage to visit her Royal Highness, a message, or mandate, brought by Liverpool or Castlereagh, implored him not to go; and the Autocrat yielded to the Regent, No wonder that it is said—

It is difficult to conceive any man's being so mean as to persecute a woman in every trivial circumstance, in the manner the R—t did the Princess, only that, in looking at the conduct of mankind, there is as much littleness to be observed in the male character as there is in the female. No man likes his wife to be considered as anything, when he chooses to consider her as nothing.

It is shameful how our Regent is kicking the dust in the poor Princess of Wales' face. There are moments when her wrongs make all her errors forgotten. There is that little vile Prince of Wirtemberg, her own nephew, who has never been to see her. White's club is to give a great ball and fête; and they have given tickets to the Regent, that he may invite the royal family, and this on purpose to avoid asking the Princess. Was there ever anything so shameful?

Several days, she, poor woman, had dressed herself, in sickening hope of the Emperor's visit, for which, she said, she would have given her "ears, ugly as they were." His diplomatic sister, the Duchess of Oldenburgh, who was much with the Princess Charlotte, gave the latter frequent hopes that she would visit her poor mother: and many messages to that effect were sent by the daughter. But the Duchess followed the universal example. Even the philosophic and soi-disante independent Madame de Stael, was mean enough to avoid the unfortunate woman, whose only crime, at this period, was her husband's hatred. She treated this slight with proper spirit, setting down Madame de Stael as a time-serving woman, which, in this instance, she certainly was. We are told—

Madame de Stael did go with the torrent. She would not know the Princess, and paid the most servile court to the Regent, after she had once prevailed on him to visit her first, in her lodgings in George Street: she insisted upon this unusual compliment being paid her, and she carried her point. The Prince did visit her in her lodgings; it is reported that she treated him cavalierly, and spoke in a strain of personal praise, which was too strong for his taste, particularly dwelling on the beauty of the form of his legs, but saying very little to him of the glories of his country, or the powers of his mind. The interview was not supposed to be pleasant to either party; nevertheless, Madame de Stael continued her adulatory conduct to the Prince.

And, in a letter written by the Princess, it is said—

"I understand that Madame De Stael has been much offended at the Regent not inviting her the evening Louis XVIII. was at Carlton House. She now laments much that she never came to pay me a visit, and sacrificed me entirely to pay her court to him. She is a very time-serving person. She is going to Paris immediately. A long letter of congratulation was written by her to Louis XVIII., and paying all possible compliments, after having abused them, and done the Bourbons all the mischief in her power. She is a very worldly person, and it is no loss whatever to me never to have made her acquaintance. I shall return to my little antebell next Saturday, the 30th, and shall feel myself much more comfortable, and not so damp, as in my present habitation, and to live like 'La dame de qualité qui s'est retirée du monde.'"

"I could be very well and very comfortable in a fine warm climate, and liberty into the bargain. I came to the royal manège on Tuesday, the 19th, not from idle want of variety, but from duty mixed with very little inclination to be civil to the very uncivilized society of the metropolis. The following day I had a great dinner of twenty people. The chief objects in the picture were the Duke of Gloucester and the Princess Sophia, and the Greys, Lansdownes, Cowpers, &c. In the evening every one who left their names at Connaught House, though many repeated of their civility, and sent shilly-shally excuses for not attending the party. Thank God, the dreadful here was over by twelve o'clock; the curtain dropped, and I retired in the green-room to my solitary den. The other three days I saw nobody except the Prince Condé, who was the only gentleman who shewed the least urbanity in taking leave of me.

"You may easily imagine I have not seen the Duchess of Oldenburgh, and I have also no curiosity to see a Kalmuck face. I shall have to-day Mr Canning's party to dinner, which will enable me to get a frank for all this random of mine."

Among those who strove to propitiate the Prince Regent, by affronting his wife, was Lady Elizabeth Foster, second Duchess of Devonshire, of whom that singular story of imposing an heir on a noble house, is again told, of which, we daresay, the world is, by this time, tired. With the question of her guilt or innocence in this matter, we do not interfere; but one might have presumed that pride of sex, if no nobler motive, would have saved at least one lady of high rank from that universal abjectness which, for a season, left the feelings of loyalty and generosity almost exclusively to the lower orders. This intriguing lady acted, it is said, as sort of Minister of England to the Pope; and we are told—

One of the occasions on which she exercised her sway over the Pope was, when the Queen Caroline (which she was then become) returned to Rome the last time, on her way back to England. The Duchess prevented his Holiness from shewing Her Majesty the smallest civility; and he refused her a guard of honour, or any of the honours due to her rank. It was a weak and servile trait of character in Pius VI. to allow himself to change his conduct toward the Queen, whom he had formerly received with so much courtesy; but Cardinal Gonzalvi it was who probably regulated him in this, as in most other points; and he was, as is well-known, subject to the Duchess of —, who was desperately in love with the Cardinal. Whenever she saw him approach, her whole frame was in trepidation; and no girl of fifteen ever betrayed a more romantic passion for her lover than did this distinguished, but then antiquated lady, for the Cardinal. It is to be doubted whether he returned the tender passion, but his idea of the Duchess' consequence at the English Court induced him to "se laisser aimer."

How entertaining these whims of the ancient Ladyships would be, were they not generally so heartless!

The conduct of the English Cabinet, at this period, was as disgraceful as that of the Regent was vindictive. Hatred seemed to have changed the little that ever was good or manly in his nature into a sort of diabolical frenzy; and this odious passion in him may be understood; but even this poor excuse was wanting to those statesmen who, in the eyes of posterity, debased themselves beyond all redemption, by becoming the panders to his malevolent and despotic will. In reference to their latter proceedings, the Diarist has the merit of not being bird-mouthed. In speaking of the Bill of Pains and Penalties, she says, or some one does, who writes what are called "Supplementary Letters:—

It subjects the King to the suspicion of driving at an object which will be a stink in the nostrils of all the civilised world that has any moral sense of what is odious; and it will be a flagrant and glaring demonstration that Liverpool & Co. are but the meanest hucksters in those scenes of politics which affect the principles of society—that they are, to use the most ignominious epithet possible, and advisedly, the filthiest panders to iniquity that ever lent themselves to a disgraceful purpose.

This iniquity the nation will not endure, or it is made up of different stuff from that which I have hitherto imagined, believed, and venerated.

I have no hesitation in saying that Lord Liverpool, by directing men's minds to the transactions of Henry the Eighth's time, manifested deplorable ignorance, or a disposition to find Queen Caroline guilty.

It either bespoke an opinion of the Queen's guilt, or implied that the King was such another as the unfeeling Henry. In whatever way the thing is considered, it was in bad taste, as affecting both the King and Queen.

Is it forgotten that her Majesty stands near the throne in her own right; that she is a stranger, as Katherine said of old, "In your realm;" that she had enough, first and last, as Captain M—— said, to drive her to death. There never was the case of any poor defenceless woman which called so much for civility, at least.

If she be innocent, God forgive those who afflict her; and if she be guilty, how much more is she already punished than any culprit in Bridewell!

What will posterity think of us, if it should turn out that the whole British ministry have lent themselves to an ignominious purpose of a King that cannot be much esteemed?

Did the King, and Liverpool & Co. forget that the people have sympathies, and that they could not but feel that their honour, the national honour, was tarnished by making the highest tribunal in the empire a tool to gratify individual malignity, and an aversion inspired by conscious neglect and ill usage?

These were not the only supple ministers. Many years before this, we find Monk Lewis writing, at the period when the condition of George III. made his immediate demise probable—"I have also been positively assured, that the Prince has announced, that the first exertion of his power will be to decide the fate of the Princess; and that Perceval, even though he demurred at endeavouring to bring about a divorce, gave it to be understood that he should have no objection to her being excluded from the coronation, and exiled to Holyrood House." No reign in England—not even that of Henry VIII., considering the difference of times—ever exhibited public men in a light so utterly despicable, as the persecution, first and last, of this unfortunate woman; to which, sooner or later, both Tories and Whigs—or "the Friends of the Prince," as they chose to be termed—lent themselves with equal willingness.

We can easily conceive why those flatterers of George IV., involved "art and part" in the baser details of those iniquitous and infamous transactions, should be furious at this publication. It may be treacherous to the Princess of Wales, but it spares not her persecutors and the time-servers of Carlton House, man nor woman. Many of the commentaries contained in the "Supplementary Letters," on the evidence brought forward at her trial, are extremely pertinent and acute. The frank admissions made by the writer, an individual evidently well acquainted with foreign manners, are vilely distorted by the Quarterly Reviewer; whose pen is, probably, not now for the first time set in motion on this subject. Again, we would protest, that those who take their impression of the work from him will be egregiously misled in their estimate of it, bad as it is. For example, the letters say—"For my part, I can discover nothing very heinous in her being attended in the bath by Bergami. It should be recollected that she would be in a bathing-dress"—and the every-day case of bathing at Bath is mentioned. But this will not do. The Reviewer at once strips the Princess naked; or rather, by a very ingenious process, he makes the Diarist perform this manly office for him. This is done by quoting the words of the Diarist in describing the costume—"en Venus"—in which her Royal Highness appeared at a ball in Geneva, when she waltzed with Sismondi! A ludicrous enough exhibition it may have been, and, probably, not much more decorous, in elderly royalty, than George IV. in a tartan kilt and short hose at Holyrood; but the logical Reviewer makes out, to his own satisfaction at least, that, if her Royal Highness, on the verdict of Lady Charlotte Campbell, wore her tucker too low at a ball, she must certainly have been totally naked in a bath. The reasoning is worthy of the cause. Queen Caroline, like many other "royalties," was not distinguished, it seems, for good taste in dress, or for a nice English feeling of propriety in manners; and her Lady-in-waiting—who may not always have been so orthodox on the ticklish subject of short petticoats and scanty tuckers as she has shewn herself in the case of the Princess Charlotte and her mother—might do well to reprove her errors of costume; but this was no new fault. The Princess—Hani soit qui mal y pense!—had been accustomed, like the continental ladies of her age, to dress in a style which alarmed even her guardian angel, Mr Whitbread, lest John Bull himself might take offence about her naked neck, and occasion be given to the adversary. His necessary remonstrance, most kindly meant, was but one of the many petty mortifications to which the friendless woman was subjected. Nobody, however, seems to have dressed so as to have satisfied the Lady-in-waiting. We hear of Lady Anne Hamilton, dressed "like a mad Chinese," and of the Princess, proper for once, because cased in crimson velvet to the throat. Gracious Heaven! that the peace, the happiness, the good name of any woman should be made to rest on trifles such as these! The end of the Reviewer is worthy of his beginning and his middle. He charitably concludes that "the unhappy Princess was really insane;" and it must be confessed that she had suffered what might have driven a thousand women mad. So he adds, in a most ingenious note, that William Austin, the boy whom she adopted, was lately in a mad-house; thus leaving it to be inferred that he may really have been her son after all, and the grand-nephew of George III., especially as "the mystery of his birth is far from being cleared up"—that is, by the new anecdotes of the Diarist, who states that "it never was any mystery," and although the Reviewer well knows that what was cunningly made a mystery, was cleared up to the satisfaction of every reasonable being, and was vouched to have been so, by the highest and most sacred authorities in the country, after an investigation such as no woman was ever before subjected to.

The "Supplementary Letters" were prepared for publication; and their author, who must be a native of Scotland, may not, perhaps, be the Lady-in-waiting, but a person of the other sex. He claims acquaintance with the Duke of York's clever and treacherous mistress, Mary Anne Clarke, and boasts of having wheedled her out of a sight of her papers, probably no very difficult feat. He says, of little Austin—

There never had been any mystery about him as a child, except in the conglomerated intellects of statesmen, and in the "filthy" imaginations of the detractors to whom they gave heed. The truth, at any time, might have been ascertained by a footman. My friend lived immediately as prior inhabitant in the house at Sydenham Common, which Lady Charlotte Campbell at one time possessed.

The Princess may have been not very fastidious, but all agree that she was a parental-hearted woman; that she had particular enjoyment in nursing children, and was denied the gratification of embracing her own. To be sure, tickling an innocent little one may not be so dignified as holding conclave with tailors about the cut of coats; but it is quite as important a duty in a Prince. In fact, the story about Billy Austin is of a piece with the whole of this wretched case.

As we mark this passage, another falls under our eye, which is exceedingly characteristic of the royal personage described; and, as in this case, many of her grossnesses must probably have arisen from a literal use of foreign idioms.

I don't doubt the Princess said many a strange thing in joke; for example, one day when she had a party dining with her at Kensington Palace, she noticed the eyes of some of her guests attracted to a bilious-looking picture of a child, and said, "If Rodjair, de poet, were to make a child, it would be like dat child." Now, would anybody have said such a thing in a mixed company, and while the servants were present?—and yet there was no immorality in it.

The "Supplementary Letters" are written with spirit and honesty of purpose; and who shall call such passages as the following too severe? The first is a commentary on the evidence of one of the suborned host of Italians—Gastans Paturzo:—

The first questions put to this witness filled me with indescribable amazement and indignation, to think there were men in the world, with wigs on their upper ends, who could display such ignorance. Was not the Princess of Wales in a vessel, and was it to be supposed that she could be otherwise accommodated than she was? Why insinuate (for the asking of the questions did insinuate as much) that she was indolently accommodated at her own request, and by an arrangement purposely made to gratify improper desires? "Angels and ministers of grace defend us!" The lewd imaginations of these lawyers seem not to be aware that guilt is always, yet always, diffident. They have assumed that it has set its nature with the Queen; and that it was part of its enjoyment with her, to be ostentatious of criminality. Smash the cranium of the Attorney-General, with a stone in a stocking, when you please. There are no human brains in it! O Lord! how little intellect is necessary to a lawyer!"

In the course of the voyage to the coast of Palestine, to Jaffa, nothing whatever was elicited from the witness that ought to have been construed unfavourably, and yet, I do assert, that there was a sinister attempt to do so. Why was this, if there had not been a desire to blacken the character of the Princess, and to produce a predisposition to find her guilty? [The Scottish peasantry, so celebrated by one of themselves, Burns, in the "Cotter's Saturday Night," are acknowledged to be the purest race on the face of the whole earth. Is there one circumstance respecting the situation of beds and berths, in the vessel which carried the Princess to Tania, and thence to Palestine, that the holy sanctuaries of their cottages can equal for propriety? Is it not the case, that these sanctified dwellings often serve for kitchen, hall, and bed-room—yea, a bed-room with several dormitories. I remember, that, when a boy, two years before I was sent to the grammar-school, a housemaid took me into the country, to her father's. The house had but one apartment, and there were three beds in it, with sliding doors. What ruffians would have dared to imagine that it was not sacred? I see yet the old white-headed man, with "the big ha' Bible" before him, presiding at the evening exercises. Almighty God! does the Scottish peasantry every night insult thee with such imaginations as lawyers dare to utter in the House of Lords!]

Many of the Peers were probably struck with horror at the indelicacy of Her Royal Highness receiving company in her bedroom; but, assuredly, those who have been in France or Italy, would not. The only thing to cause wonder about it was, that the servants, used to the custom, should have noticed it at all. I do think that their noticing it, God forgive me, was very like the effect of prompting; yet the character of the Commissioners sent to hunt for facts by which certain charges might be supported, precludes this idea.

The imagination has been allowed to swelter in foulness with respect to the Queen.

The conclusion of these letters rises to true eloquence—

I shall never forget what was my emotion when it was announced to me that the bill of pains and penalties was to be abandoned. I was walking towards the west end of the long corridor of the House of Lords, wrapt in reverie, when one of the door-keepers touched me on the shoulder and told me the news. I turned instantly to go back into the House, when I met the Queen coming out alone from her waiting room, preceded by an usher. She had been there unknown to me. I stopped involuntarily; I could not, indeed, proceed, for she had a "daisied" look, more tragical than consternation. She passed me; the usher pushed open the folding doors of the great staircase, she began to descend, and I followed, instinctively, two or three steps behind her.

She was evidently all shuddering, and she took hold of the bannister, pausing for a moment. Oh! that sudden clutch with which she caught the railing! it was as if her hand had been a skinless heart. Never say again to me that any actor can feel like a principal. It was a visible manifestation of unspeakable grief, an echoing of the voice of the soul.

The multitude began to cheer, but at first there was a kind of stupor: but the sympathy, however, soon became general, and, winged by the voice, soon spread up the street; every one instantly, between Charing Cross and Whitehall, turned and came rushing down, filling Old and New Palace Yards, as if a deluge was unloosed.

The generous exultation and hurry of the people were beyond all description. It was as a conflagration of hearts; but, before I had struggled to St Margaret's, I was seized with hoarseness and rage.

The Queen of the greatest of all the nations was allowed to escape from jeopardy, with no little public deference, save the voluntary huzzas of the people, as the vilest delinquent trull from a police office. Verily, verily, how little wisdom must, in truth, suffice for statement! She was virtually asseverated, and the ministers had no right to show that they were disappointed in their endeavours to pander to the anti-human passions of the King.

* We will do no such thing; we will give him promotion to the Bench, and his family title and pension, for this good service to his king and country.—H. T. M.

Will monarchy ever, in Great Britain, recover from the shock given to it by those unhallowed proceedings, which, by rudely destroying the old prestige for princes, first lowered them below mere frail mortality? The victimizing of this poor woman, so far as regards the interests of humanity, has not been altogether a vain sacrifice.

We have, perhaps, given too much attention to the evil spirit of this book. Notwithstanding all that is "set down in malice," it contains many traits of the Princess of Wales and her contemporaries, which will be instructive to the future historian and interesting to the student of human nature. Here is her portrait at different periods:—

I have often regretted that I never saw a tolerable likeness painted of her. Although, during the last years of her life, she was bleated and disfigured by sorrow and by the life she led, the Princess was in her early youth a pretty woman; fine light hair—very delicately formed features, and a fine complexion—quick, glancing, penetrating eyes, long cut and rather sunk in the head, which gave them much expression—and a remarkably delicately formed mouth; but her head was always too large for her body, and her neck too short; and, latterly, her whole figure was like a ball, and her countenance became hardened, and an expression of defiance and boldness took possession of it, that was very unpleasant. Nevertheless, when she chose to assume it, she had a very noble air; and I have seen her, on more than one occasion, put on a dignified carriage, which became her much more than the affectation of girlishness which she generally preferred.

Many traits are given of her good nature, which amounted to real goodness of heart, and a degree of consideration for the feelings of others, most opposite to the cold egotism and selfishness of princes. This German heartiness and simplicity is often naturally displayed in her letters. To her lady-in-waiting, she writes on one occasion:—"Yesterday, I received your amiable letter, and would have answered it sooner, but that I forgot to have a frank. After the hot and dull dinner at Spring Gardens, I went to the Opera House to see a play—one act of an opera, and the ballet of Psyche, for the benefit of Kelly: it was as full as it could hold, and I returned to my solitary supper. I am rather early this morning, as I expect the Marquis. I have not yet seen anybody that particularly interests you since you left this sphere. If I could be of any use to you, you know how glad I should be. I am always ready to do mon petit possible."

"She was," says the Diarist, "always inclined to do kind and noble things. She was decidedly liberal, and liked everything upon a grand scale. When she gave a shabby present, as she frequently did, it was from ignorance, not from parsimony. Sometimes, it might be, she had nothing better at the moment to give away; and she would take up anything which happened to lie about her room, (in which there was a sufficient quantity of trash,) and present it to a friend. The feeling which prompted the deed was genuine kindness; and she would as readily have given away an article of costly price as one of a trumpery kind, had it lain in the way."

Of how few royal personages could this be said:—

Since "trifles form the sum of human things," it may be remarked in the Princess's favour, that she was perpetually balked in all the minor occurrences of daily life; and those who had most constant access to her person knew that, generally speaking, she bore these teasing circumstances with great good temper. The perpetual recurrence of trivial contradictions is more difficult to endure with equanimity than any disappointment of more serious kind.

The poor Princess receives daily affronts: it is really admirable to witness her equanimity of temper under these trials. She is not without feeling, either. She deeply feels the indignities cast upon her; but she is always equally kind and good to those about her, and considerate to them, though she might well be absorbed by her own sorrows.

Baron Nicolai was sent by the Emperor with a letter to the Princess of Wales, which letter says, that he regretted extremely not having been able to wait upon her Royal Highness, but that, under existing circumstances, delicacy only allowed him thus to express his high consideration, &c. The Princess, Lady ——— told me, received Mr Nicolai with great dignity and kindness. She was perfectly calm; and Lady ——— says she could not have commanded herself as her Royal Highness did.

Her teasing mortifications from the interference and advice of well-meaning, but sometimes ill-judging and officious friends, were frequent, and patiently borne. Their counsels were often contradictory, and she was the sufferer in every case of disagreement. One day, she had wept during the whole time of her morning drive. The Diarist remarks—"Truly, I cannot wonder, for she is made to live a wretched life;" and that day at dinner the poor creature herself said—"I know not who plagues me most, my friends or my enemies." . . . "Sunday.—The poor Princess is sadly teased about going to St Paul's—her advisers insisting that she should go, and all the chamberlains and deans writing word that there is no place kept for her, and that it is not in their power to give her Royal Highness one. 'It is ridiculous,' she says, 'to make me always the means of making a disturbance, for no end whatever.'"

Shortly afterwards, a message was received from Lord Castlereagh, that it was proposed to increase her establishment to £50,000 a-year. She received this intelligence without any manifestation of joy or surprise, and only said, as she handed the letter to one of her ladies, "C'est mon droit." Mr Whitbread termed the offer "insidious and unhandsome."

Friday, July 1st.—To day, I was sent for by the Princess, in consequence of a letter which she had received from Mr Whitbread, saying that he begged to be allowed to come to her Royal Highness at two o'clock, and advise her upon the steps which were to be taken, relative to the offer of fifty thousand pounds in addition to her income. He terms the offer "insidious and unhandsome." The moment the Princess read this note, she said that Mr Whitbread and Mr Brougham were again going to make war, and to throw aside all overtures towards a peaceful termination of the business. She was considerably annoyed, and walked up and down the room several times. At last she said, addressing Lady ——— and myself—

"Croyez-moi, ma chère Lady — and —, there is only one thing to be done, and I will do it. It is not in me to suspect evil till I see it plainly, only to be guarded against it. If de Princess refuse, they will say, what de devil does the woman want? We cannot make her husband like her, or make de Queen receive her; but we can set de seal upon all our public doings of last year by settling upon her a sufficient sum to enable her to hold the rank of Princess of Wales—a rank of which we tink her worthy; and wid her rank she must hold all her privileges. I will, therefore, accept—I will; and I will do it myself."

She then wrote two excellent letters; one to Lord Castlereagh, the other to Mr Whitbread. The one to Lord Castlereagh she desired Lady — to "make English of"—no easy job; that to Mr Whitbread she allowed to go, as she said, "in its natural state and ridiculous language;" but the sense was good. She told him she exonerated him from all blame as to the issue of the event, and took the whole responsibility upon herself. Her answer to Lord Castlereagh was as follows:—"The Princess of Wales acknowledges the receipt of Lord Castlereagh's letter of yesterday evening; and, as the proposal contained in it has no conditions annexed to it which are derogatory to her rank, her rights, or her honour, she accepts it unquestionably, in order to prove that the Princess is never averse to any proposition coming from the Crown, nor wishes to throw any obstacle in the way, to obstruct the tranquillity or impair the peace of mind of the Prince Regent."

I think the Princess has acted rightly in this instance; especially as her enemies have always said that she threw herself into Mr Whitbread's protection entirely to make a disturbance, and did not wish to ameliorate her own condition, save at the expense of the Prince's honour. This letter will prove the contrary, while, at the same time, should they make conditions which are degrading to her, it will enable her to assert her own rights and dignities.

This looks not like the conduct of a violent or unreasonable woman. The sum accepted was thirty-five thousand pounds. For the very first time in the history of this, or probably any country, it was said by a Royal Highness—"I don't want so much of the people's money;" yet this was not the spontaneous, disinterested act of the Princess:—

Mr Whitbread told the Princess that, although the House had voted her fifty thousand a-year, he thought it would have a much better effect if she would write a letter to the Speaker, purporting that she did not wish to be a burthen upon the nation, and that she hoped they would reconsider the matter, and give her only thirty-five thousand. Lady —, who was present when Mr Whitbread gave the Princess this advice, told me she saw a gloom overspread her countenance whilst he was speaking. Her Royal Highness is not mercenary: far from it. I believe her to be very noble-minded in money transactions: but she conceived this proposal not kind from a friend, and the sum not more than her due. However, Lady — says, that, when Mr Whitbread explained to the Princess that fifty thousand pounds would oblige her to remain in this country, and spend it where she received it, but that a less one would afford her liberty, she fell into the trap, and entered into his view of the subject with alacrity.

She was now more than ever desirous to leave the scene of her life-long sorrows, and perpetual mortifications; the last tie had been severed, when she was prevented from having any sort of personal intercourse with her daughter. Before advertising farther to these events, we may slightly notice the opinion which the Diarist has expressed of the younger Princess. It is severe, inconsistent, and probably unjust; yet, in the imperious and head-strong will of Princess Charlotte, in her tender years, the germ of a much less amiable character than that of her mother is discernible. The position of the young Princess, her various matrimonial negotiations of that period, and what is said of that afflicted and ambiguous personage, a King-consort, give this portion of the Diary peculiar interest and piquancy at the present time, when similar events may be impending. As our space does not permit notice of this, we shall probably return to the Princess Charlotte, and the illustration of royal marriages.

At the very time the Princess of Wales was most popular with the nation, she was hated, with "an inveterate malice," by the Regent, his minions, and even some part of his family. The enthusiasm of the people, and the malice of the court and of the Prince's creatures, had reached the zenith exactly when the allied sovereigns came over:—

I hear that all ranks, except merely those who bank in the sunshine of the Regent's favour, have expressed themselves warmly for the Princess; and that the Prince cannot move out without hisses and groans. I am glad to think his bitterness and tyranny are mortified; but what good will it do her? None, I fear.

When I went to Connaught House yesterday, by appointment, I found the Princess dressed in a style as if she expected some visitors. She said that, if she did not look forward to going abroad, she should die of despair. I am really moved with indignation against the persecution offered to a princess and a woman. She read me a letter she was writing when I arrived: it was a letter to Lord Liverpool, demanding leave to quit this country, and retire whither she would; saying, that she did not, nor ever had, wished to render the Prince unpopular, and that she begged permission to go abroad. The matter was spirited, dignified, and clever, but was not clothed in English language, nor free from obscurity.

The Princess, after some time spent in general conversation, confessed to me that she had dressed herself in a half-dress, expecting the Emperor of Russia, and the King of Prussia, to call on her. But the moment I told her I heard those personages had refused to go to White's, or to any public place, she said, "Then the Prince has conquered, and they will not come to see me." I saw she was very much vexed; but she bore it with a command of temper which would have done any one honour.

It will be a shame if the King of Prussia does not visit her once at least, considering what obligations he was under to her father, who died in battle, fighting in his cause—but, perhaps, he has forgotten this circumstance.

The Princess received an anonymous letter yesterday, which she put in the fire—the fate all such communications deserve to meet with: for the writer of an anonymous letter would be almost capable of murder. This letter was to say, that the Prince would be killed shortly, he was such a tyrant. I do not suppose the information shocked her very much.

Friday 10th June.—I heard Mr Whitbread called on the Princess this morning; and Lady — said, she thinks he is really interested in the Princess, and feels compassion for her cruel situation, besides being urged by his political career to make a tool of her for his own ends.

Those were happy days, in which the ill-used wives of Princes could escape persecution, by retiring to nunneries, instead of embittering their lives by braving it. The Princess of Wales had been advised to appear at the Opera, upon a particular night, when the Kings and Emperors were to be there, and when the Regent unexpectedly appeared with his royal foreign brothers. At this time, it is stated, "The Prince Regent believes that he has reinstated Louis XVIII., and that Europe is at his command, because one or two of its potentates come to look at England." At this unlooked-for Opera trial, the Princess shewed far more good taste, and command of both mind and temper, than her consorciaries and pattern-ladies. Yet, she was blamed, even by her sincere friends, for having, in this instance, openly seemed to brave her tyrant.

Saturday 11th.—I was sent for by the Princess this morning to say that she was going to the Opera to-night, and wished me to attend her. Lady C. L. had just left her when I arrived; and the Princess complained that "her friends tormented her as much as her enemies." I found out afterwards, that this remark was occasioned by one of her friends having advised her Royal Highness not to take Wilkin to the Opera with her. The two Doctors Burney dined with the Princess; Lady —, Miss —, and myself were of the party. There came a note from Mr Whitbread, advising at what hour she should go to the Opera, and telling her that the Emperor was to be at eleven o'clock at the Institution, which was to be lighted up for him to see the pictures. All this advice tormented the Princess; and I do not wonder that she sometimes loses patience. No child was ever more thwarted and controlled than she is; and yet she often contrives to do herself mischief in spite of all the care that is taken of her. When we arrived at the Opera, to the Princess' and all her attendants' infinite surprise, we saw the Regent placed between the Emperor and the King of Prussia, and all the minor Princes in a box to the right. "God save the King" was performing when the Princess entered, and, consequently, she did not sit down. I was behind; so, of course, I could not see the house very distinctly; but I saw the Regent was at that time standing and applauding the Grassini. As soon as the air was over, the whole pit turned round to the Princess' box, and applauded her. We, who were in attendance on her Royal Highness, entreated her to rise and make a curtsy, but she sat immovable; and, at last, turning round, she said to Lady —, "My dear, Punch's wife is nobody when Punch is present." We all laughed, but still thought her wrong not to acknowledge the compliment paid her; but she was right, as the sequel will prove. "We shall be hissed," said Sir W. Gell. "No, no," again replied the Princess with infinite good humour, "I know my business better than to take the morsel out of my husband's mouth; I am not to seem to know that the applause is meant for me till they call my name." The Prince seemed to verify her words, for he got up and bowed to the audience. This was construed into a bow to the Princess, most unfortunately—I say most unfortunately, because she has been blamed for not returning it; but I, who was an eye-witness of the circumstance, know the Princess acted just as she ought to have done. The fact was, the Prince took the applause to himself; and his friends, or rather his toadies, (for they do not deserve the name of friends,) to save him from the imputation of this ridiculous vanity, chose to say, that he did the most beautiful and elegant thing in the world, and bowed to his wife!

When the Opera was finished, the Prince and his supporters were applauded, but not enthusiastically; and scarcely had his Royal Highness left the box, when the people called for the Princess, and gave her a very warm applause. She then went forward, and made three curtseys, and hastily withdrew.—I believe she acted perfectly right throughout the evening; but everybody tells a different story, and thinks differently.—How trivial all this seems! how much beneath the dignity of rational beings! But trifles make up the sum of earthly things—and, in this instance, this trivial circumstance affects the Princess of Wales' interests; therefore, it becomes of consequence for the true statement to be made known; and, as I was present, I can and will tell the truth. When the coachman attempted to drive home through Charles' Street, the crowd of carriages was so immense it was impossible to pass down that street, and with difficulty the Princess's carriage backed, and we returned past Carlton House, where the mob surrounded her carriage, and, having once found out that it was her Royal Highness, they applauded and huzzed her Royal Highness till she, and Lady —, and myself, who were with her, were completely stunned. The mob opened the carriage doors, and some of them insisted upon shaking hands with her, and asked if they should burn Carlton House. "No, my good people," she said, "be quite quiet—let me pass, and go home to your beds." They would not, however, leave off following her carriage for some way, and cried out, "Long live the Princess of Wales! Long live the innocent," &c. &c. She was pleased at this demonstration of feeling in her favour, and I never saw her look so well, or behave with so much dignity. Yet I hear since, all this has been misconstrued, and various lies told.

I dined at Connaught House—the party consisted of Mr and Lady Charlotte Greville, Lord Henry Fitzgerald, Mr Bennet, and Mr Hobhouse. After dinner, a few more persons came, and formed a dull stiff circle, but it was good company; therefore I was pleased to see there the Hardwicke, Pauleta, Lord and Lady Grey, Lord and Lady Dunmore, Lord Nugent, &c., to the amount of fifty or sixty persons. Many more really intended to come, after having been to Lady Salisbury's, where were the Emperor and King, and our mighty Prince R—t; but the crowd was so immense, they could not get their carriages till morning.

Next day, Monday, she was once more informed, and by Lady Charlotte Lindsay, that the Emperor would positively come.

She gradually gave way to the hope which charmed her, and said—poor soul—"my ears are very ugly, but I would give them both to persuade the Emperor to come to me, to a ball, a supper, any entertainment that he would choose." Well, she dressed, and waited till seven, but no Emperor came.

Tuesday, 14th.—Lady — told me, that in going slowly up a hill in the course of her drives to-day, a decently dressed and respectable looking countryman came close to the Princess's carriage, and said, "God bless you, we will make the Prince love you before we have done with him." Another of the same class of persons cried out, as she passed, "You will soon overcome all your enemies."—Such voluntary declarations prove that there is a strong feeling prevailing in her favour; still, it is not a few kind words uttered by a chance person as she passes in her carriage, that can be of real use or comfort to her, though gratifying at the moment.

On the Wednesday, she heard of an entertainment to be given by the city, and endured all this miserable humiliation:—

The Princess, Lady — informed me, received a note this morning from Mr Brandon, box-office, Covent Garden, telling her that no box could be kept for her Royal Highness at that theatre, as they were all engaged. What an answer to the Princess of Wales! Then arrived a note from Alderman Wood, informing her that, if she chose to go to see the monarchs pass in procession to the city, he would have a private house kept for her Royal Highness for that purpose. Alderman Wood did not mean to insult her; it was only his vulgarity that induced him to make her such a ludicrous offer. But, what was most vexatious of all these vexatious communications was, that the Duchess of Oldenburgh, and four other ladies, were to be present at the dinner; this was galling, and the Princess felt her own particular exclusion from this fête given by the city very hard to bear, as she had considered the city folks her friends. They, however, are not to blame, as these royal ladies are self-invited, or invited by the Regent; and the Princess' friends had not time to call a common council and discuss the matter. Immediately after this bitter pill, came another from Mr Whitbread, recommending her, upon no account, to go to Drury-Lane on Thursday evening, after having, a few days before, desired her to go. "You see, my dear," she said to Lady ———, "how I am plagued;" and, although she mastered her resentment, Lady ——— says she saw the tears were in her eyes. "It is not the loss of the amusement which I regret, but being treated like a child, and made the puppet of a party. What signify whether I come in before or after the Regent, or whether I am applauded in his hearing or not—that is all for the gratification of the party, not for my gratification; 'tis of no consequence to the Princess, but to Mr Whitbread—and that's the way things always go, and always will, till I can leave this vile country."

We have then an account of her going, in a fit of mad and desperate mirth, to a masquerade, incognito, with some of the ladies and gentlemen of her household. Mr Whitbread had, shortly before this, astounded the House of Commons, by announcing that another "secret investigation," was a-foot. How much colour such frolics as the masquerade, perfectly harmless as it was, and probably the impulse of tortured feelings, might have given to the new intrigue against her peace and honour! We have already exhausted our space, and cannot advert to many incidental sketches and portraits of the aristocracy, which are often true and graphic, and, as we have said above, not a whit more malicious than those things they have been accustomed to say of each other, ever since the example was first set by the books and letters of the courtiers of Charles II. There is, however, this to be said in favour of the Walpoles and Wortleys—they never once affect saintliness and a starched standard of morality; nor yet do they deal out moral reprobation, and visit divine retribution, upon the wicked among their dear friends. Like Queen Caroline, they were no hypocrites; and, if they left the worst parts of their lives to their friends to expose, they did not affect any sanctimonious reluctance to unveil the naked malevolence of their dispositions, and their love of backbiting, scandal, and satire; provided wit, and jest, and fashionable ribaldry lent point and brilliancy to malice. They did not, in short, live in the age of cant; and to the spirit of that age the author of the "Diary" has done profound obeisance.

POETRY.

AMONG a good many volumes of verses, we must content ourselves, for the present, with noticing PORTIA, A TALK, AND OTHER POEMS, by George Taylor, a bard of the Kingdom of Fife and the town of Maggy Lauder; and ENGLISH SONGS AND BALLADS, by Alexander Hume, whose first little volume, containing some sweet Scottish songs, we noticed three or four years since. There is nothing of very great mark or likelihood in Mr Taylor's bouquet of wildings; but it is always gratifying to meet with proofs of the diffusion of cultivated taste and refined feelings among the people; for, without those existing, such works as the present could find no acceptance. Several of the songs are worthy of being added to those choice treasures in which the Scottish people are already the richest nation on earth. What cottage maiden will not be the better and happier from being able to recite "The Jasmine," or "The Dew-Drops;" or to sing "Dight the Tear frae thy ee, Bonny Lassie?" A few sacred pieces, of considerable merit, harmonize well enough with the pure and sober-toned character of the collection.

—Whatever may be thought of the quality of the songs of Mr Hume—a man who has carried the spirit of his native land into the heart of London—he has evidently a living perception of what a song ought to be. In his dedication to W. J. Fox, Esq., he remarks:—"A true song is a hymn breathed out from the lowest depths of the heart, and, like electricity in the air, stirring all that comes within its influence. If the heart wills not, it is the pipe without the player—the spirit is not there. When the heart is full, it runs over, and finds relief in the dear joy of its own flowing." Our author, we think, realized his own idea of song fully better in his preceding volume than the present, which is altogether more polished and ambitious, and in a higher if not more genial and natural tone, than his rustic Scottish ditties. Some of the new verses are, however, free and noble in spirit. We would instance "King Midas," "A Song for a Drinker!" "Candour," and "A Feeling." We shall, however, select our specimen from the lowlier and kindlier order of these songs. The "Song to my Wife," was written on the day when the visit of the young Queen to the city, made a London holiday of the first magnitude.

"We'll not go nigh the 'sight' to-day,
For pomp or fashion's sake;

But have at home a holiday,

Which we ourselves shall make.

Thou'lt be a Queen of Love to me,

My heart shall be thy throne;

Lips, ears, and eyes thy subjects be,

And loyal every one.

"We'll gaze upon our blood and kind,

Which in the cradle lies,

And learn together from the mind

New-opened in her eyes;

We'll see our forms and features mixed

In less or more degree;

What earthly scene can come betwixt

That 'sight' to thee and me?

"Beside her couch we'll take our seat,

And hear her young breath play

Through her small lips, in sound so sweet

That silence keeps away,

For fear that, while it swallowed up

The sweet vibrations round,

'Twould lose itself within the cup,

And find its death in sound.

"The world from pomp can pleasure buy,

And for it dearly pay;

Yet it is only of the eye,

And fades with the day.

When life from mutual love is drawn,

Love knows no setting sun—

But, while we talk, behold the dawn!

Our holiday's begun!"

We will venture to affirm that not one of the huzzaing crowd spent their holiday more happily than Alexander Hume. We confess that we have had an object to serve in selecting the above elegant song. A kindred, though very rude effusion, has been for some time lying upon our table, which we could scarcely have ventured forth alone. It is, as we learn from the accompanying letter, (a greater curiosity in its way than the song itself,) the composition of a Glaswegian sturdy smiler upon the anvil, who informs us that he has the felicity of sometimes seeing a Scottish song in Tail's Magazine, at the Mechanics' Reading Room; and that these encounters have tempted him to put forth

THE BLACKSMITH'S HAMMER.

Oh, bonnie and sweet is my ain wife at hame;
Whatever bein's, she's ever the same;
And hard do I hammer the red bar o' airm
At the thoughts o' my winsome wee wife and my bairn.

Oh, fu' heit is my heart, and just loupin' wi' glee,
As, darker and darker, the sundy I see;
And, brighter and brighter, at every new heat,
The airm on the anvil sae steatly I beat.

When "six o'clock, six o'clock," the bells have loudly sang,

Flung down is the hammer, wi' quick, ringing bang;
My shirt sleeves unbuttoned, and, no to take lang,
My coat I tear down, and put on as I gang.

Fu' soon I'm at hame: no to file her clean free,
I wash myself clean, and put on ither claes;
Then I yield to the love my heart that makes warm,
So I kiss Mary's lips, and the bairn on her arm.
How pleasant is a' at my ain humble hame!
My wife's glossy hair is bound trig by its kaim;
Her gown, though but coarse, is as neat as is seen;
Clean scoppit's the floor, and the hearth-stane is clean.

The jams on the inside are white as can be,
They are black on the outside, and sparkling to see;
The parritch are toom'd, at the ingle sae bright,
Neither het, nor owre cauld, but just unco right.

The night fichters by, ere we think it begun,
In daffin', and laughin', and kleein' our son;
But whiles Mary sews, while some good book I read;
In summer, to walk in the fields we proceed.

Oh, bonnie and sweet is my ain wife at hame!
Whatever may happen, she's ever the same.
Ye drinkers o' whisky, nae langer ye'd tyne
Your hard-gotten gains, we want your fresside like mine.

Our anonymous friend, the blacksmith, is neither, as the reader will be too ready to perceive, a Moore, a Burns, nor even a Hume. The hammer, no doubt, comes more readily to his hand than the smaller implement; but we trust that the truth of the interior which he has sketched, will atone for some rudeness of execution. In the meanwhile, we would kindly intimate to him, that it may be as well to reserve his future lyrics for Mary's partial ear, until he has served a longer apprenticeship to the Muses than we would recommend—namely, seven years. Sorry should we be to anticipate a period when hard times, and three or four more "bairns," by somewhat dimming the brightness of that coatie fire-side, might tend to banish both the muse and the blacksmith from its now sunny and charmed circle. This lamentable revolution, so often witnessed at the poor man's hearth, as his family and cares increase, requires that forethought, industry, resolution, and self-command should be summoned up in time, to ward off a too frequent catastrophe. To this change, a man so affectionate in his feelings and rational in his tastes as the blacksmith, is much less exposed than thoughtless fellows who squander their hard-gotten gains in the way he describes; and, holding Burns, he tells us, as his "darling poet," he need not be reminded of the Bard's noble sentiment—

"What mak's fresside a happy clime
To weans and wife,
That's the true pathos and sublime
Of human life."

Colloquies between the Shade of Dugald Stewart and a Phrenologist. By J. Slade, M.D., F.G.S., M.P.S.L., lately Physician to two Infirmarys, and author of "Letters on Phrenology;" on the "Physiology of the Brain;" and a "Treatise on Ophthalmia."

This is a tolerable length of running title for a man of science; but by no means all the claims which Dr Slade has to distinction. As Dugald Stewart refused in his life-time to be considered of the truth of the thirty-three organs then discovered, Dr Slade has boldly unsphered the spirit of the philosopher, to convert him, if possible, to the faith, on the principle, we suppose, of better late than never. The attempt is made in sixteen colloquies, each of which, by the way, is formally dedicated to different ladies and gentlemen.

Stewart, who makes admissions in favour of phrenology in Colloquy II., is considerably staggered in Colloquy V., and almost convinced at the close. In return for so much information upon phrenology, the philosopher, though at first shy of the topic, makes some discoveries of the secrets of his prison-house, or of the philosophers' heaven, Anacreon, Hume, and Voltaire, and their poetry and doctrines, do not seem favourites in these Elysian fields; but neither do we hear of Gall and Spurzheim. There is, with all this, and many peculiarities of the same sort, much that is ingenious in a book in which the shade of Dugald Stewart serves as an anvil to hammer the truth into the ignorant or unbelieving. A strain of elevated and generous sentiment pervades many of the colloquies. The VII., of which the text is Acquisitiveness, is, indeed, an excellent moral essay. Some rather remarkable sudden conversions to phrenology are recorded in these colloquies. The author himself was fortunate enough to have been converted by a lady of noble birth and great personal beauty; nor should we desire a more powerful missionary of any new, fashionable science.

With the greatest respect for Mr Combe's intellect, Dr Slade differs from him in one most important test. He holds that the grace of God, the divine influence or energy, may affect the mind of man, without the medium of material organs, while Mr Combe, as he states, argues "that a man cannot become penetrated by the love of God, except through the aid of sound and sufficient material organs." Dr Slade's opinion will probably help to explain certain phenomena, which have hitherto baffled phrenologists, whose moral and religious character has been found in direct opposition to what might have been anticipated from cerebral development. The case he has cited of a colonel in the East India Company's service, and many of similar character, in, we apprehend, only to be explained by the new principle. This gentleman, he states, "sustained a high reputation, for his great benevolence and rigidly religious life. He presented himself to me one morning, anxious that I should examine his head. He said:—'I have a son in Edinburgh, whose vices and irregularities of life are great, and who pleads excuse for his habitual indulgences, on the ground of his being so organized as to render it impossible for him to abandon his pursuits. He has been to a phrenologist, who tells him that he has certain propensities powerfully developed—propensities exactly corresponding with those he has for many years been in the habit of indulging.'—And, to cut a long tale short, the Colonel 'of large benevolence and a rigidly religious life,' was determined to test phrenology by his own pate. Dr Slade, though at first reluctant, at last consented to do his best to solve the Colonel's doubts. He says, 'The intellectual region I found well developed; the moral region comparatively small; the region of the propensities unusually large. Those of Approbation, Destructiveness, Firmness, and Amativeness, were the fullest developed of the animal passions; and they were so large as to leave no question in my mind that he had been actuated all through life in particular by these feelings.'

But then the "great benevolence and rigidly religious life" were stumbling-blocks. Dr. Slade was naturally puzzled; but now comes the gist of the argument—the new and invaluable discovery. "My first observation," he says, "was to this effect:—'Sir, had I not been told you were a religious man, I would not have believed it from your conformation; but your head only confirms the truth of one position I have long maintained, and that is, that the organization has little to do with the influence of Divine Grace. I doubt not the sincerity of your heart; your many good actions, your religious zeal, prove you to be honest; and the war between your natural passions and your holier desires, which are, as it were, super-added to your nature, must have been a powerful contest. Your nature, through the all-conquering power of the Deity, has yielded; and whose pride triumphed, there is now humility; whose selfishness existed towards the distressed, there are now sympathy and compassion; envying and reviling have passed away, and the proud obduracy which masked your original character—that love of distinction which animated you in war, that enmity which you, without pain of conscience, committed, and that lust which you so inconsiderately indulged, have been brought into obedience to higher longings, and quelled in the vehemency of their tendencies." The Doctor spoke like an oracle; and the Colonel, "the deformed transformed," in spite of the ineradicable bumps which still bore testimony to his original villainess of nature, confessed that he had been a very pretty blackguard indeed, and a coward to boot; for his combattiveness was very small. But the blacker the sinner the brighter the saint:—he was now a chosen vessel. To fifteen different cases of seduction, if we understand aright, he confessed on the spot, though he had long since repented of the ostentation of his former bonnes fortunes and the pollution of his life; and "he left me," says our author, "fully persuaded of the truth of phrenology; nor was I the less inclined to think highly of the doctrine I advocated, so confirmative was the case before me of its validity. The Colonel asked for a pen and ink, and wrote down all I had said, to show it to one person who knew him almost as well as he knew himself." Upon this, the shade of Dugald Stewart sagely remarks—"This case certainly appears to be a corroboration of your science; and, backed by others equally so, would leave little room for any one to doubt its correctness."

The Colonel's case gives us a new view of Phrenology altogether; and, in time coming, many perplexing anomalies may be explained upon his principle; for wherever a man's development is in contradiction to his self-denied and pure life, the cause is ascertained. And why may not the converse hold, and a man with the noblest moral and intellectual development, and of small propensities, if divine influence is withheld, become sensual, cruel, false, and in every way profligate, in despite of his happily organized brain? These two positions ceded—and Dr Slade's of itself goes a great way—and Phrenology becomes a much less difficult science than it seems at present. To whatever the counteracting forces of the different organs, and of the temperaments, do not explain, we have obtained another key.

Dr Slade leaves off, combating the idea, that the doctrines of phrenology necessarily lead to fatalism, though such was the practical conclusion of the Colonel's prodigal son, who sheltered, or rather claimed immunity for his vices under favour of his unfortunate organs. We rejoice to learn, by Dr Slade's discovery, that, in spite of them, he may yet become quite as virtuous and religious a character as his father, the old Indian Colonel.

The Masterpieces of English Prose Literature.

VOL. IV.

We began to fear that, to the disgrace of the public taste, this excellent series had dropped. The appearance of Sir Thomas More's "Utopia," and "The New Atlantis" of Bacon—most imaginative of philosophers!—has agreeably undeceived us. This is a work which ought to succeed, and which will succeed. The preliminary discourses of the editor, Mr St John, develop the nature and structure of the rare compositions given in the new volume, with precision and felicity, and with the same liberal philosophy which distinguishes all his writings.

Southey's Poetical Works. VOL. IV.

Gives us "Thalaba," the "wild Thalaba," which is prefaced by the author's tender and affecting reminiscences of the olden time, and the endeared locality in which much of his poetry was composed. "Mader" was begun at Bath, in 1794, and finished at the village of Westbury, near Bristol, during the most fertile year of a most fertile literary life—a season of double crops. Mr Southey says:—"I was then in habits of the most frequent and intimate intercourse with Davy, then in the flower and freshness of his youth. We were within an easy walk of each other, over some of the most beautiful ground of that beautiful part of England. When I went to the Bournemouth Institution, he had to tell me of some new discovery or experiment, and of the views which it opened for him; and when he came to Westbury, there was a fresh portion of 'Mader' for his hearing. Davy encouraged me with his hearty approbation during its progress; and the bag of nitrous oxyde, with which he generally regaled me upon my visits to him, was not required for raising my spirits to the degree of settled-fair, and keeping them at that elevation. In November 1836, I walked to that village with my son, to show him a house endeared to me by so many recollections; but not a vestige of it remained, and local alterations rendered it impossible even to ascertain its site, which is now included within the grounds of a nursery! The bosom friends with whom I associated there have all departed before me; and of the domestic circle in which my happiness was then centred, I am the sole survivor." "Thalaba" was commenced while the author—ordered to the south of Europe for his health—remained wind-bound at Falmouth, walking on the beach, catching soldier-grabs, admiring the sea anemones, and reading Gebir. It was sent home from Portugal, and published while Southey was still abroad. He says that, deserving a better reception than "Joan of Arc," it received a worse; but the world will not allow a poet, any more than another man, to be judge in his own case.

Confessions of an Elderly Lady.

The Countess of Blessington has created a helpmate for her Elderly Gentleman. Could she not, in some future volume, bring the unhappy counterparts together, and shed one gleam of sunshine upon the evening of their days of single discontentedness? The fictionists have become too stern and rigid in their distribution of retributive justice. We would have them be merciful as they are powerful. The story of this novel is simple enough. A young lady of large fortune and great personal beauty is, like too many of the sex, similarly privileged, fastidious and unreasonable. She loses different sincere and worthy lovers to whom she is deeply attached—in Scottish phrase, "out-ats her market"—and is punished according to her deserts, as, one by one, her lovers drop off, and form suitable and happy alliances with beautiful and less exigant partners. There are some capital female strokes in the story, towards the close—as that where the old maidenly Arabella, still in excellent preservation, drops a couple of her quilted petticoats, that she may appear still slim and elegant in the eyes of an ancient admirer; who, bound to his gouty chair, and reflecting her lost years in her face, is no more ashamed of his chalk-stones than of his grandchildren. The old gentleman prattles of them, while his old love endeavours to astonish and mortify him by her youthful air, and the alertness of her movements as she proceeds to the dining-room, while he hobbles after her. Poor Arabella catches a dreadful cold, and is rendered lame, in consequence of the vanity of dropping her quilted petticoats; and her lame and aged lover is tacitly revenged. The Elderly Lady's Confessions are very handsomely got up, and adorned with portraits of the principal female characters, in the manner of very old editions of the English novelists, where were seen Clarissa, Pamela, and Amelia, in various aspects, and Sophia Western always with her muff.

Pascal Bruno.

How we must jumble things! A register of new publications is generally quite as miscellaneous in its contents as a stage-coach or an omnibus. "Pascal Bruno" is a translation from M. Alexander Dumas. It is a wild and extravagant fiction, written in a style which has not yet been, and which, we trust, never will be naturalized in the soil of England, though its rudiments may be traced in the compositions of "Monk Lewis," Maturin, and others. Many of the situations in "Pascal Bruno" are powerful and striking, and it is full of savage vigour—still we do not relish it. No matter; Mr Theodore Hook has thought it worthy of being introduced to the British public, and many of them will welcome it. In Prince Batsa we have one original character, which might redeem a romance, as it helps to redeem degenerated Sicilian chivalry.

Trifles for Leisure Hours.

Here we have a lively and pleasant mingling of Shakspeare, Remy, and Tales, in a variety of styles—the gay and happy predominating. We would not desire a more agreeable half-hour companion, for the once and every.

Chess Guide.

Mr Lewis, the Modern or English Philidor, has put forth yet another work upon the game he understands so well. This "Chess-Board Companion," though his smallest, is not his least meritorious work on chess. It is intended as an introduction or guide to beginners, and contains all that ninety-nine players in the hundred—or may we not say nine hundred and ninety-nine in the thousand?—can ever properly digest. We speak from some experience, when we say that, when beginners have mastered this small tome, they may repair to our Edinburgh Chess Club, without undue apprehensions; though we would certainly not advise them to try a fall with Baillie Donaldson.

Sketches of Young Gentlemen,

Come second to the clever "Sketches of Young Ladies," which we noticed last year with "great applause." They are, nevertheless, graphic and lively. The illustrations are sometimes outrageous caricatures.

More Hints on Etiquette

Have been published, illustrated by CRUIKSHANK. They are in the style of those we have quoted in the notice of the "Comic Almanac," though scarcely so terse or piquant. Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry.

By Alexander Bethune, a labourer.

These stories are written by a man who has spent his life among the sort of people and amidst the scenes he has described. They are faithful, if homely pictures of the loves, the joys, the trials, and sorrows of the humbler classes in Scotland—of sensible, manly working-men, village coquettes, and the gentle hearts that pine and die of unrequited affection in poor men's huts. The author is another of that host of self-taught men who have struggled into notice in the course of the present century. He has had the misfortune of being severely injured, and of losing an eye in the course of his labours as a quarrier; and, while unfit for work, his amusement was the composition of these tales and little poems, which he mentions in apology. They, however, require no apology. They are rustic but not rude, and will be popular, not only with the peasantry of Scotland, but with those who know and love their character and ways. The simple pathos of "The Fate of the Fairest," and the cheerful moral of "The Three Handsel Mondays," have our special commendation.

Selections from the Latin Anthology. Translated into English Verse, by John Dunlop, Esq. Edinburgh: Clark.

Mr Dunlop is already known favourably to the student by his elaborate "History of Roman Literature." In his present work, he has furnished a valuable addition to our stock of classical translations, and to the knowledge of many who, though well acquainted with the writings of Horace and Virgil, have hitherto never dreamed of the beauties of Pontadius and Avienus. He divides the selection into two classes, the first comprising reliques of the older Latin poets; the second, of the ingenious triflers in epigram, acrostic, and serpentine verses, who flourished between the reign of the Antonines and the end of the reign of Honorius. The versions are smooth and elegant, combining, in general, ease and harmony, with great accuracy and propriety of expression. He has prefixed the work with some interesting remarks on the literary character of the periods in which the anthologists lived.

The Satires and Epistles of Horace,

Have been "interpreted" by David Hunter, Esq., in a genial, gentlemanly, and Horatian spirit. We have been tempted to give specimens of these translations; but, without greater space than the monodies can afford to such ancient-fashioned gentlemen as Horace or his classical interpreters, we could not do any justice to a volume which is sure, in any event, to attract the notice of scholars.

WIELAND'S GAUDALIN; OR, LOVE FOR LOVE, has been translated by Francis Hope, Esq., and one or two small volumes of original poetry are before us, which must await their audit.

Hood's Own.

The Comic Annual is here reproduced, with its inimitable original illustrations, in one striking monthly number. It opens with the PUGSEY PAPERS. A great bargain may not be given, as the literary market goes, for the money; but then the article is compounded, as ladies like their tippie, "little and good."

Anglo-India, Social, Moral and Political.

We have here three volumes of gleanings, the cream, so to speak, of the Asiatic Journal, for a length of time. The lighter sketches are, in general, entertaining, and will form very pleasant half-hour's reading. The biographies are of greater merit.

British Power in India.

The Second volume of "Auber's History of the Rise and Progress of the British Power in India," has just appeared. It completes an accurate and pains-taking work, in which the author, who was secretary to the Board of Directors, has made diligent use of the opportunities of acquiring information afforded by the nature of his appointment.

Le Bijou Littéraire,

Is a collection of traits, stories, anecdotes, and literary extracts, gleaned by C. Victor Martin, "professeur de langue Française," for the use of students of that tongue. There is rather too much of Napoleon and la gloire in it for our taste in juvenile books, otherwise the Vingt-Part is well adapted to its purpose, and amusing withal; while the Second contains many excellent and unhackneyed extracts from classical French writers.

The Family Library, No. LXIV. A History of the Bastille and of the Principal Captives.

This is a very curious and interesting volume, which we heartily commend to all admirers of despotic governments. The history of this single State prison records more of human misery, the consequence of arbitrary power, than, we venture to predict, will be found in the public annals of the mighty United States of America, from their confederation onwards to the tenth century of their existence. The sufferings of Latude alone, would have justified the French Revolution.

Proverbial Philosophy; a Book of Thoughts and Arguments, &c. &c. By Martin Farquharson Tupper, Esq., M.A.

These proverbs, and pithy condensed sayings, treat of the duties and social relations of life, and are arranged in a quaint, antithetical, and Hebraic style. The mode is more original than the matter, which is often flat; or a sequence of commonplace and truisms in fine disguise.

A Visit to the British Museum.

This is a compendious and popular guide-book to the treasures contained in the different chambers of the national repository; and also a very amusing descriptive volume. It is in a series of dialogues between Mr Edwards, a London gentleman; his little son; and his nephew, Basil Montague, a young gentleman from the country.

Hazlitt's Characters of Shakspeare's Plays.

We sincerely rejoice in the re-appearance of a sterling work, now long out of print, and coming out in a form which places it within the reach of numerous purchasers. Still more do we rejoice in the prospect that this volume may be followed by others, until we have a complete cheap edition of the Miscellaneous Writings of this vigorous and original writer, and brilliant critic.

Conversations on Nature and Art. Second Series.

This pleasant melange for the juveniles is precisely the same in character and object as its predecessor, though it probably rises to more expanded capacities. The persons who carry on the dialogues are our former acquaintances, Mrs Fortescue, Mrs Clifford, and her children.

Popular Surgery. Translated from the French of M. Mayor, by Dr Thomas Cutler.

This book deserves to be known. Its object is original and its directions, we doubt not, are accurate and scientific. It professes to afford plain directions in cases of accident, contagions, diseases, poisoning, &c. &c., when no regular practitioners can be got. Something of the same kind we have seen foisted into the rag-end of popular medical books, and particularly the universal Buchan. But here is a complete treatise which, in emergencies, will be found particularly useful to country families, ship-captains, emigrants, and persons engaged in extensive mining and manufacturing operations, where accidents are so woefully frequent, and where ignorance and helplessness cause not only mischief, but not seldom the loss of life and limb. The work will also be useful in mechanics' reading clubs, as artisans are peculiarly liable to many of the casualties for which the ready remedy is described.

Murphy on Teeth.

No part of the human economy receives the tenth part of the attention paid to the teeth. Treatises on teeth appear at least once a-quarter, and dentistry, as we find it called, is growing into a profession which numbers nearly as many members as surgery. Great rogues many of them are, according to Mr Murphy, and we can well believe him; and therefore, in name of the deluded public, receive his warnings and experiences as good offices. His book is rather for dentists than general readers, though some of its recommendations are of the simple and popular nature calculated to make every lady and gentleman, if not their own dentist, yet their own teeth-preserver.

Hudson's Plain Directions for Making Wills.

A Second Edition of this plain useful Treatise has been published, with special reference to the late alteration of the law regarding wills and intestacy. Are our readers aware of the increased necessity and duty of making a will which arise from the provisions of this act? The book, of course, does not refer to Scotland, but may be useful there.

Illustrated Family Bible.

Smith & Elder have just issued Part I. of Brown of Haddington's "Self-Interpreting Family Bible." It is somewhat in the style of the illuminated volumes of the early ages of printing, and remarkably tasteful and elegant in its decorations. The size, a foolscap folio, is not unwieldily large; the letterpress is beautiful, and the paper of first-rate quality. The work, notwithstanding the many ornamented Bibles published, is worthy of high commendation, and the attention of those laying wisely the foundations of their family treasures and heir-looms. It is to be completed in twenty Parts. The original work is too well known to require any notice from us, of those notes, annotations, and concordance which have stamped its value and authority.

Pietas Privata, or the Book of Private Devotions. Is a neat, nice, very little book, of Prayers and Meditations, selected chiefly from the works of Hannah More.

Mr A. Bell, by his title page, Professor of Elocution, has published a portion of the New Testament, for the purpose of improving the public and private reading of the Scriptures. This is attempted to be effected by a peculiar, or what is called rhetorical punctuation, by printing the emphatic words in capital letters, and other signs. One would require, perhaps, to be a professor of elocution to understand all the merits of the design, which, we have no doubt, may be subservient to teaching both young and old to read with the understanding, as well as to improving their style of reading.

The Cabinet Lawyer.

It appears unnecessary for us to say anything in recommendation of a work on which the public have set their unequivocal seal of approbation, by the purchase of nine large editions in the course of as many years. As a popular exposition of English law, in all its branches, public, civil, and criminal, it is greatly superior to anything we have seen, and more information will be derived from its perusal of it, than from Blackstone or the other books to which unprofessional persons are in the practice of resorting. A very great proportion of this comprehensive and cheap volume is as applicable to Scotland as to England, and we have nowhere so complete an analysis of the numerous statutes, whereby the criminal law of England, and in part also that of Scotland, has, within the last half century, been so materially modified and changed. In perusing this volume, we have been struck with the great similarity, in many respects, between Scotch and English law; and, did our space permit, we think we could shew that the very desirable object of having one system of law for the whole united kingdom, is not a work so very difficult as is commonly imagined. A very slight view of the subject would shew that much may be taken from the law of either country beneficial to that of the other; and the time is surely now come, that, by means of a code or otherwise, the people generally should have some means of knowing authoritatively the system of law to which their lives, liberty, and property are subjected. It is fearful to think of the number of illegal acts of one sort or another one is yearly committing through ignorance of their illegality.

An Essay on the Coins of Rome, Greece, England, and Scotland, &c. &c. On Silver Pennies, Scottish Bodles, and Queen Anne's Farthings. By William Tall, Medallist, and Member of the Numismatic Society.

This is rather a curious piece of learned antiquarianism, into which our readers may look or not, as they are inclined. The public at large, we apprehend, are wonderfully indifferent to all coins, save those "current in this realm," except as bullion or old copper. In the long catalogue of coin and medal collectors, we notice but one in Scotland. The clergy, as a profession, appear the most remarkable coin collectors in England. In the present state of the coin market, we find that the best Queen Anne farthings are worth from £3 to £5—descending so low, for the inferior qualities, as ten or twelve shillings.—The essay will, we doubt not, be useful as a guide to collectors of coins and medals.

NEW PAMPHLETS.

A laboured and sophistical apology for just as much of the democratic principle as was requisite to the new system in France—to dethroning the elder branch of the Bourbons, and planting the Orleans family upon the throne of the Barricades, but stopping there—has been put forth by Guizot, in the Revue Francoise, and is translated, for the enlightenment or check of the Movement party in England, as it was written for the kindred party in France. The article, "Democracy in Modern Societies," attempts to prove that, its great object being now accomplished, the further progress of the democratic principle would be only destructive, and that Universal Suffrage would originate the worst of all tyrannies. "What," says M. Guizot, "do those very Governments do which call themselves founded upon that principle? [Such as the American Government, we presume.] They struggle hard against its consequences; they toll incessantly to restrain the power of the many, after having pompously proclaimed it. How much quackery and inconsistency, how much deceit and peril, in this pretended invention of the multitude! The majority in Universal Suffrage is neither the positive proof of the legitimacy of power, nor its best security. Experience proclaims it loudly. But I wish to go deeper into the question of the right of suffrage, and of the guarantees of liberty. Let us beware: we are becoming narrow and gross-minded." How does the reader think? Why, thus:—"Nice and complicated facts, indirect influences, scientific combinations, escape us. Wherever we do not see meetings, elections, balloting urns, votes, we consider absolute power and liberty as being without guarantee." The English are quite as apt to look for these outward signs and securities as the French. Guizot ridicules the principle of right in the suffrage; neither women nor minors enjoy or claim it. The denial of it cannot be an iniquity, or three-fourths of mankind could not permanently be subjected to it; for no one, save Condorcet and Godwin, have yet claimed political rights for women. The principles which ought to regulate the social system, according to M. Guizot, are, "Respect for public authorities; the legal subordination of the individual will; the division of rights according to capacity"—a principle which we do not pretend to understand, as enunciated here; "and everywhere security for liberty, at all steps of the social ladder; but power placed above, for the concerns of society are high, and cannot be managed from below." These principles kept in view, it matters not, we are told, whether the society be democratical or aristocratical, or its Government monarchical or republican—that is to say, in name; for, in essence, they are all the same, if these "conservative principles of social order" are maintained. Democracy, in the long strife, having completed its conquest, ought to have its further progress arrested, as it can only prove destructive to every rising society. It was useful in its day; but now, "Thanks to the victory of the good cause, and to God who gave it us, situations and interests are changed." And so they are, whether those of the dominant English Whigs, of the King of the Barricades, or M. Guizot. We are all changed; and how? "No more war from those below against those above," says the former Liberal. "No more motive for raising the standard of the many against the few. No more legitimate cause—no more specious pretext—for the maxims, the pretensions, the passions, so long placed under the standard of democracy. What was formerly democracy would now be anarchy; democratical spirit is now, and will long be, nothing but revolutionary spirit. . . . The relative situation of the little and the great, of the poor and the rich, is now regulated justly and liberally. Every one has his rights, his place, his prospects. . . . An old democratical routine is especially fatal to us, inasmuch as it lowers and narrows all persons as well as things." This brochure will be highly prized, by the Conservative Whigs especially. Let them not forget that their Gallican Burke calls a halt in the social movement, from a far more advanced position than they have attained. He looks to a society which is neither trammelled by hereditary legislation, nor cramped and corrupted by the law of primogeniture, insolent aristocratic privilege, or a grinding state church.

Remarks on the Evils of Primogeniture. By Henry Camplin.

A sensible small pamphlet, inscribed to Mr Ewart, exposing that crying iniquity of aristocratic institutions which is at once the cause and effect of many of its immoralities, and of all the national and social mischief which arise from the inordinate disproportion of fortunes.

FINE ARTS.

The Baptism of the Covenanters.

An engraving from HARVEY's Covenanters' Baptism, the companion picture to his Covenanters' Preaching, has just been published by Hodgson & Graves. The engraving is executed by Wagstaff, in a manner worthy of the painting. The Baptism, if not the most powerful of Harvey's series of national pictures, is certainly the sweetest, and that in which he has most felicitously combined the beautiful with the true. This artist, we believe, at once took a high place among his contemporaries, though we are tempted to think not exactly that to which public taste must yet elevate him; as, from admiration of graceful forms and brilliant colouring, it shall rise to that subtilty and delicacy of perception which penetrates the soul of Art, and sees in its choicest master-pieces the eloquent exponents of the invisible as well as of the visible beautiful. Much might be said on this topic, and on the distinction which ought to be made between historical painters and national painters, to which last small class of artists we would claim Mr Harvey—if he be not rather one of its founders. To return to the engraving of The Baptism, it is gratifying to national pride to reflect that this beautiful print will go abroad among other nations, and prove what a kindly-affectioned, manly, and even handsome race, those stalwart rebellious Covenanters were, of whom Scotland is so proud. The prevailing charm of this picture, is sweetness, gentleness, and purity of expression—we need not add truth; for, of all Harvey's paintings, "faithful and true" may be affirmed. The value of

The Baptism is enhanced by its stern predecessor, and its heroic successor, The Battle of Drumclog. Some of the earnest and resolute faces in The Covenanters' Preaching, re-appear in The Baptism, under the influence of the softer feelings; and in the countenances of the women in particular, a beaming expression of human interest and love has taken place of the grave concentration of feeling with which they listened to the Preacher. Of all Protestant religious ceremonies, infant baptism admits the freest mingling of the natural sympathies with devotional feelings; and here the scene and the period aggrandize the interest. The scene of the picture is of a softer character than that of The Preaching. A stupendous mountain range forms the back-ground, but the chosen recess where the persecuted remnant seek shelter from Claverhouse and the moss-troopers, is a lovely spot, rich in plants and herbage, and studded with craggy knolls and grassy slopes, over which the worshippers are charmingly grouped. From a sparkling cascade, a little inn, the pastor of the mountain-flock lifts the purifying waters of baptism. This natural font, and many other happy accessories, give the celebration of the rite a more poetic and impressive character than if it took place in the most gorgeous cathedral. The costume is, throughout, faithful to the country and the age, without that minute preciseness which, though often called clever, sometimes, we confess, strikes us as littleness, or mere trick. Indeed, it is as well to confess that every other artistic merit in this design is secondary to the expression and sentiment which pervades it. Save the younger children, and the admirable colliers, every living thing is wrapt in serene contemplation of the solemn yet sweet rite that is performing. Every feeling of the assembled worshippers is attuned to harmony, in witnessing those little ones received within the pale of the visible church, and made partakers of that glorious heritage, which has become more precious from the hot persecution then raging. But persecutors and tyrants are forgotten in that hour. How deep the brooding love of the youthful matron who receives back her Christian babe, while the father's looks of manly tenderness follow it to the sanctuary of her bosom! How bright the smiles of the happy maiden who restores it—the proud god-mother, so far as Presbytery permits such heterodox spiritual relationships! Still finer is the motherly gladness, the genial complacency, mantling the faces of the grand-dames and grandires, and the female gossips; while these again are exquisitely discriminated from the stern gentleness stealing visibly over the features of the steel-girt elders of the congregation, and the sympathetic looks of the younger armed men, as they look on their brother in faith and in righteous resistance, presenting his infant to the minister. The Baptism is of a size which fits it in form as in character to be the pendant of the Covenanters' Preaching. No two pictures that ever appeared in Great Britain display, with so much mastery in art, so much of a people's history.

Scenery in Mid-Lothian.

A first, we believe, and certainly a very creditable attempt has been made in Edinburgh to bring out engravings in that style of cheap elegance of which London has set the example. The subject chosen is the "Scenery of Edinburgh and Mid-Lothian." The designs are by W. B. Scott, the engraving by R. Scott. Ten plates, which, in execution, are highly honourable to Scottish art, are stored in a neat portfolio; which also contains a detached description of the scenery illustrated, and of Edinburgh in the olden time, written with considerable vivacity, and beautifully printed. And this elegant publication, with the engravings on India paper, and other embellishments, is sold for six shillings; and, in a humbler garb, for three and sixpence! It is far too low-priced; for, at the same rate, the publishers could not prosper in any field, and much less in the comparatively narrow one of Scotland. Among the finest and most characteristic subjects are, Craig-Miller Castle, The Hunter's Bog, and Edinburgh from the Cat Nick. But the plates are all really beautiful; and we can only wish that the reward of the publishers may be equal to their spirited attempt.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

CANADA continues to be the subject of paramount interest; and every report from that country is looked for with anxiety. The present year teems with great events. That tranquillity is restored on the western continent, or that matters can be brought back to the situation in which they were only a few months ago, no man who is in the slightest degree acquainted with history will assert. Britain has committed a great political crime, which not only the present generation, but men yet unborn, will rue. Her legislature has passed an act unequalled in the annals of despotism. The constitution of the most populous and most important colony of the British empire has been annihilated—suspended, it is called; but there is no certainty that it will soon or ever be restored. We, along with our more worthy coadjutors of the press, have now for many years been loud and incessant in the exposure of the atrocities of the Tories during their long reign of power; but when we were holding up the iniquities of the past, we never imagined that, in our own time, we should have been the witnesses of so barefaced, so atrocious, so unprincipled an exertion of might over right. Talk of the proceedings of 1794, 1799, of 1819, of Castlereagh's Gagging Bills, of the sanctified iniquity of Sidmouth, of Somerset's dolings at the Cape!—they are mere dust in the balance compared with the recent enactment of the British legislature. What is its justification? Why, that a political controversy having arisen in the colony, men of the most respectable character took different sides, and have, as universally happens, where the opinions are honestly and conscientiously entertained, expressed them with energy and vehemence, and have taken every legitimate means in their power to render what they conscientiously believed to be the just cause triumphant. The dominant party—which means those who have the command of the army—thought their opponents had gone beyond the proper limit of persons in the subordinate capacity of an opposition, and attempted to apprehend them; with the view, no doubt of their trial for one or other of the conveniently indefinite crimes of treason, misprison of treason, sedition, or what our Scotch law calls leasing-making—anything, in short, which displeases the “powers that be.” In the attempt to seize, by the uncalled for employment of an armed force, these men, for an imaginary offence, their neighbours and dependents turned out, and repelled force by force—judging that an affair which was set about in robber-like fashion could not be the act of a lawful Government. Before these “volunteer and yeomanry” attempts to enforce the law, there had not been a single attempt to resist the ordinary officers of the law in the execution of their duty.

That the peasantry were justified in giving the slightest impediment to any sort of person clothed with official authority, we are the last to assert; nor do we think that, had they been put down at St Denis, instead of defeating the soldiery, much notice would have been taken of the matter. But because an unnecessary resort to military force has had the general result of raising up resistance, and that only in a village or two, it has been considered a justification for placing the whole people of Lower Canada beyond the pale of the law. It is assumed, not only without the shadow of evidence, but in direct contradiction to the evidence, that the House of Assembly participated in the revolt, and that Papineau is at the head of it. But what single circumstance is there to induce such a belief? One only—that, after the office of the Frédérateur—the only liberal paper in Montreal—had been seized by a lawless Orange banditti—after the life of every man of liberal opinions had been threatened by armed volontaires—Papineau, as any other man of common sense would have done under similar circumstances, retired into the country. How can any one implicate him, the Legislative Assembly, or the people of Lower Canada generally with the late insurrection? And why, because two or three hundred of an easily excited population have taken arms, are half a million of men to be punished by the deprivation of their rights of freemen, and placed under a dictatorship?

But the first act of the drama has closed. The result is, that 8000 men have been added to our army—a force exceeding the number of the whole regular force of the United States. A British soldier, though he only receives a shilling a-day, costs the country, in barracks, moving from place to place, pensions, allowances, and by employing three times the number of officers to command him that is necessary—as nearly as may be, one hundred pounds a-year. Hence, the Canada insurrection has already entailed upon us a taxation something approaching to one million a-year. Then, war with the United States can hardly be avoided. We care nothing for the letters passing from the British embassy to the United States' Ministers of Foreign Relations—we look to facts. The Duke of Wellington is quite right. If you are to keep the Canadas, you must have a great war—by which we understand, that we must either conquer the States, or that they must conquer us. The tocin is again sounded. Delenda est Carthago, is the maxim. In a warfare between Britain and Canada, the United States will not be neutral. Can any one doubt which side they will take? Look at the necessity—for it is nothing else—of the Northern States of the Union having the navigation of the St Lawrence free from obstruction. Look at the necessity of the whole Union having their northern frontier protected from invasion. Look at the North-Eastern Boundary Question; at the necessity of the Northern States having the Canadas to meet the increasing preponderance in Congress of the slave-holding states, acquired by the annexation of Texas, and the other southern provinces. We hold at naught, we say, the documents which have passed between the British and American Governments. We look to facts. With the greatest difficulty have the American authorities, in the states of Vermont and New York, prevented a levée en masse for the purpose of marching into Upper Canada. The insurgents in Lower Canada, in the first instance, and on Navy Island afterwards, were armed entirely with American muskets and cannon. On their departure from Navy Island, the insurgents, as we learn from the best authority, re-delivered to officers of the United States' army, the cannon they had seized, because it was inconvenient, or rather impossible, to carry them along with them; and they were received as state property, without remark, and without any attempt to punish those who had taken the use of them. We believe there is no previous instance of the arsenals of any State having been so extensively plundered as those of America, on the Canada frontier, and so little complaint or defence made. Yet, with all their experience of the pilfering practices of the patriots, in as far as arms are concerned, on the very same day that the State cannon was delivered up at Grand Island, 400 muskets were seized at Munroe, being weapons more portable in Canadian warfare. The States are neutral—at least in writing, at present. Why? Because they want to see the full extent of the disaffection in the Canadas, and to allow the discontent to be increased, by the harsh measures resorted to by the British Legislature. Besides, they are not prepared for warfare. They have recently suffered the most extraordinary embarrassments from errors in relation to their currency, from which they are only beginning to recover; but these embarrassments will pass off shortly, and, before the expiry of the Presidency of Van Buren, the Canadas will either be surrendered by Britain, or we shall have war with the United States.

We hardly venture to speak of the proceedings in Upper Canada, in the terms they deserve. Can anything be more atrocious than Head's conduct? Chivalrous it has been called; but the real object of it was to drive his political opponents to rebellion, and then let loose upon them his armed Orangemen, and either massacre them or force them to leave the colony, leaving their lands and other property as the prey of his myrmidons. His policy has fully succeeded in its aim; for hundreds of families have already taken refuge in the United States. Surely some one will bring Head's conduct before Parliament.

MR BUCKINGHAM IN AMERICA.—By a paragraph in The New York Gazette, we observe that our eloquent countryman is delivering lectures in that city, with great success. We cannot wish him a better reception in the great towns of the United States, than he met with in this our Scottish metropolis. His lectures gave universal satisfaction.

SCOTLAND.

DESTITUTION IN THE HIGHLANDS.—The Committee appointed in the spring of last year for procuring subscriptions for alleviating the distress in the Highlands, have published their report. It appears that the total subscriptions received, amounted to L.16,563, and the sums expended to L.13,515, leaving in hand a balance of L.3,038. Of the expenditure, L.7,639 was sent to the West Highlands, and L.5,368 to the North Highlands, Shetland, and Orkney. It appears, from this report, as we anticipated, that the outcry about want of food was grossly exaggerated; for, of the L.7,639 sent to the west coast, only L.49 was for food, and L.7,589 for seed-corn; so that the Highland lairds have had their estates sown last year out of the money collected for charity! Have they discharged the rent of the year 1836, or does it hang over the heads of their tenantry in the shape of arrears? We have no doubt that the latter supposition is the fact; and thus, as we predicted at the time, if grain and not meal was sent, the lairds have pocketed the subscription raised for their poor oppressed tenants and cottars. But what we have to beg attention to, is the attempt that is now proposed to be made to procure public money to a large amount, to encourage emigration from the Highlands, under the pretence of appropriating the surplus of L.3,038. The Committee state their opinion to be, "that money may be most beneficially employed, not only in assisting some of the old people to accompany some of the younger members of the family to Australia, but also in aiding a very large emigration to Canada. With reference to the latter, the committee entertain a very confident hope that the Government may be induced to aid liberally." It will, no doubt, be exceedingly convenient for the Highland proprietors—who take care never to assess themselves for the support of the poor—to get rid of their worn-out labourers at the public expense; for, to suppose that the proprietors will give any material contribution for the purpose, is contradicted by all experience. But, as the late Lord Selkirk has shewn in his book on "Highland Emigration," the project of diminishing the population, and lessening distress in the Highlands by emigration, is utterly hopeless. For example, he shews that the population of Skye, in 1755, was 11,262, and in 1794, 14,470; though between 1772 and 1791, 4000 people had emigrated, and at least 8000 had left the island to settle in the low country. At present, though the emigration has continued ever since with little interruption, the population exceeds 20,000. Mr. Irvine, in his "Inquiry into the Causes and Effects of Emigration," relates, upon the testimony of a person of unquestionable veracity, who had personal knowledge of the fact, that, "in 1790, a place on the west coast contained 1900 inhabitants, of whom 600 emigrated the same year to America. In 1801, a census was taken, and the same spot contained 1,967, though it had furnished 87 men for the army and navy, and not a single stranger had settled in it."

We suspect that the committee have inadequate notions of the expense of removing great bodies of men to distant countries; but there are sufficient data for ascertaining the fact. In 1823 and in 1825, two bodies of emigrants were settled in Canada at the public expense. The emigration in 1823 consisted of 568 Irish emigrants, and cost about £22 for each; that in 1825 consisted of 2024 persons, the expense of settling them was £43,145, or £20 to each person. Suppose that it was resolved to furnish 25,000 persons with the means of emigrating, the expense would be half a million. How much of this sum would the Highland lairds advance? To talk of commencing a very large emigration to Canada, because the committee have £3000 in hand, is mere folly.

But we deny that there is any surplus population in the Highlands. Indeed, it is only a few years since the press resounded with lamentations that the introduction of sheep, and the increase of the size of farms, had caused their depopulation. Let the proprietors encourage the fisheries, which are in a great measure neglected; let them give inducements to farmers of skill and capital, from the south of Scotland, to take their farms, by giving them leases of a proper endurance, at a low rent; let them establish manufactures for which the country is adapted—for instance, the spinning and making into cloth the wool of their sheep. What is to prevent the establishment of woollen manufactures in the Highlands, as well as at Galashiels and Hawick? The project of saving the Highland proprietors from putting their hands into their pockets, by shipping off their old dependants at the public expense, ought to be resisted to the utmost, not only as a useless and uncalled for expenditure of the public money, but as tending to keep the Highlanders in their present state of ignorance and misery.

THE SCOTTISH CLERGY.—The outrageous conduct of the Edinburgh clergy, in preferring to seize and distrain the goods of their parishioners, and to imprison their persons, rather than accept the offer of £500 a-year, made them by the Town Council, renders the subject of the present mode of payment of the established clergy of Scotland one of interest. It appears to us, that, not only in Edinburgh, but throughout the whole kingdom, the mode of payment is extremely objectionable. The revenues of the clergy in Scotland before the Reformation, were very large. Sir George Mackenzie estimates the tithes paid to them at one-fourth part of the rents of lands, and their lands at another fourth—or, in other words, at one-half of the land rents of the kingdom. Forbes remarks, that the "clergy were most justly subjected to the payment of the half of the last roll in all public impositions." There can be no doubt that here, as elsewhere, the wealth of the Church, and the prospect of sharing in its spoil, was the great cause of the rapid adoption of Reformed opinions in religion. A scramble took place between the clergy and the nobility for the plunder, and, as might have been foreseen, the latter were the victorious party. Immediately after the Reformation, the ministers presented an application to the Convention of Estates, "praying that the patrimony of the Church should be employed to the sustentation of the ministry, the provision of schools, and entertainment of the poor." Had this application been granted, there would have been upwards of two millions a-year available for these purposes, instead of £300,000, as at present. But, as Spottiswoode remarks, "this proposal was not very pleasing to divers of the nobility; who, though they liked well enough to have the Pope, his authority and doctrine, condemned, had no will to quit the church patrimony, wherewith, in that stirring time, they had possessed themselves." In the "First Book of Discipline," the clergy again renewed their demands, stating, that "to our grief we hear that some gentlemen are now more rigorous in exacting the tithes and other duties paid before to the Church than ever the Papists were; and so the tyranny of priests is turned into the tyranny of lords or lairds; for this we require that the gentlemen, barons, lords, earls, and others be content to live upon their own rents, and suffer the Church to be restored to her right and liberty; that, by her restitution, the poor that have heretofore been oppressed, may now receive some comfort and relaxation." The cant here about the poor is amusing. For the Ministers go on to demand not only that the whole tithes, not forgetting those of lint, fish, and cheese, should be surrendered to them, "but also all things relative to hospitality in time past," with all the lands and houses belonging to priests, colleges, friars, and religious persons of all orders, "likewise the whole revenues of the temporalities of bishops, deans, and archdeacons, with all rents of land pertaining to cathedral churches." And, not content with all this, they conclude with this modest proposal:—"And, further, we think, that merchants and craftsmen, in free burghs, who have nothing to do with manuring the ground, ought to make some provision in their cities and towns, and dwelling-places, for the support of the church and necessities thereof." These demands of the reformed church were very justly pronounced to be exorbitant, the nobility not being able to see how the Protestant clergy were any better entitled than themselves to the plunder of the Catholic Church. The clergy, however, long entertained hopes of being able to recover what they affected to consider their just rights; and John Knox expressed to the Regent Merton his conviction, that these hopes would sooner or later be realized: to which the Regent, who had obtained a large share of church property, made the characteristic reply—"that it was nothing but a devout imagination." Such was the rapacity of the lords and lairds—"the landed interest"—that the clergy were reduced to the greatest distress, and many had to give up their livings. As late as 1617, the highest stipend was only 1000 merks Scots, about L.55 sterling; but most of them did not exceed from L.20 to L.30. By a statute in 1633, the minimum was raised to 800 merks; but no maximum having been fixed, the Lords of Session exercised a discretion of augmenting the stipends at their discretion, where there were tithes in the parish which could be allocated. The consequences thence arising were unexpected, and most pernicious to the land proprietors; but we have not space to trace them in the present Register.

INDUSTRY AND IDLENESS.—TRADE AND THE CORN LAWS.—The great argument against the repeal of the Corn-Laws, and in favour of the prohibition of the importation of foreign food of all sorts, is, that we ought not to be dependent for the means of subsistence on foreign nations—rivals sometimes, and, as our aristocracy have managed our affairs, generally our enemies. The welfare of the landed interest—that is, of the owners of land, (whose preponderance, as Lord John Russell had the extraordinary indiscretion to reveal, was the real object of the Reform Act)—is not a matter in which the great body of the people of any country, and especially of Britain, need take any peculiar interest; because their numbers are very inconsiderable, probably not a hundred thousand in the united kingdom; and because every one is aware that they have not only the leisure and inclination, but the power, by their possession of the Upper House of Parliament, and by the great majority they possess in the Lower, to do themselves, at least, justice. The notion, that paying more than we need or ought to do for our food, enables us the more easily to bear the burden of our taxes, was once a favourite argument—if it ever could be so called; but its absurdity has, of late years, become so palpable even to the advocates of the land-owners, that it would be superfluous farther to advert to it. We object to be dependent on foreigners for food—why do we not also object to depend on them for clothing? The dress of our working classes—that is, of at least seven-eighths of the community—is composed almost entirely, and that of the other eighth, is, in a great measure, of cotton. Yet of cotton-wool, the material for this dress, not one ounce is or can be produced in the United Kingdom. We are, with an exception so trifling as to be hardly worthy of notice, entirely dependent on foreigners for this staple article, not only of our home consumption and manufactures, but, as we shall shew immediately, of our foreign commerce. And, fortunate it is, that our climate is so cold and intemperate that the cultivation of cotton in Britain, whatever labour and expense may be bestowed on it, is utterly hopeless; otherwise our land-owners would have extended their restrictive or prohibitory system against the importation of cotton-wool. No matter although we could have imported cotton-wool at one-half of the expense we could have raised it: its importation, without a "countervailing duty," would have been reprobated within as well as without the walls of Parliament, by the pulpit and the press; and free trade in cotton would have been held up as a scheme devised by Jacobins and Radicals, by Republicans and Revolutionists, for the overthrow of the established constitution in Church and State, and for depriving Britain of the proud pre-eminence she has long enjoyed, of being "the wonder of surrounding nations, and the envy of the world." In truth, there is not one of the arguments constantly used against the free importation of corn, and in favour of the prohibition of foreign animal food, cattle, sheep, &c., which would not have applied with equal force to the importation of cotton-wool, the chief material of our clothing. It is indeed wonderful that the landed interest did not think we might have done very well with woollen clothing.

The manufacture of cotton is by far our most important branch of trade. Without taking into view the shipping employed in importing the raw material and exporting the manufactured article, the masons and other artisans who erect the factories and construct the machinery, one million and a half of persons are constantly employed within the United Kingdom in the spinning and weaving of cotton. Of the capital engaged in it we may form some conjecture, from the circumstance that the total value of the goods annually manufactured exceeds forty millions; and of its value as a branch of foreign trade, that it formed twenty-five out of forty-seven millions being the total declared value of our exports in 1836. The quantity of cotton-wool annually consumed by us, exceeds three hundred millions of pounds weight; and it is a singular circumstance that so enormous a quantity of an article the cultivation of which is necessarily confined to a few countries, is yearly procured, not only during peace, but during war, with so much regularity and certainty, that for ages the operations of our factories have never been suspended by the deficiency of the raw material. We are told that, if trade in corn were free, foreigners would combine to starve us. Why do they not combine to destroy our most important manufacture, a manufacture which they are using the utmost efforts to foster at home, and at the same time denude us of clothing?—for that would be the practical result. It would be much easier for the few countries which produce cotton to enter into combination, than for the whole habitable world, which produces corn, or food of some sort or other.

We are glad to see that, at Manchester, and in other manufacturing districts, public attention is at length awakened to the pernicious effects of the corn-laws, (including under this term the prohibition of, or restriction on the importation of food of all kinds,) and we can assure them that no time should be lost in using the most strenuous exertions for their repeal. Had one-half of the talent, perseverance, and money been expended on this object that has been used in organizing combinations of workmen to keep up wages, we should not now have to complain of a nuisance which is fast ruining the commercial prosperity of Britain; and, without commerce, how long would a national bankruptcy be averted? It is the fashion at present to deride the attempts of the Continental nations to retaliate on us our restrictive system of dealing, and to hold out the Prussian Custom-House League as inoperative. But have these attempts been so nugatory as have been represented? Let us see. We shall take, first, good Tory authority for our facts. First, then, it appears, that of the total quantity of raw cotton-wool imported into and worked up in this country, one half, at the very least, is consumed, not at home, but abroad. Thus—

"Of which exported in the shape of manufactured or piece goods, lbs. 111,644,310

"Yarn, . . . 85,136,762

"Thread, . . . 2,930,988

We see here the absurdity of affecting to despise the foreign demand for our manufactures, and to hold it out as inferior to the home consumption; for, were it not for the foreign demand for our cottons, the manufacture would instantly sink one-half, and nearly a million of people would be thrown out of employment. (D) appeals; from Burns' "Commercial Guide" for last year, that, comparing 1833 and 1836, the export of cotton cloth to Germany and Prussia has sunk, in four years only, four millions of yards, or one-fifth. On the other hand, such has been the increase of the German and Prussian cotton manufactures, that their demand for cotton yarns has increased, during the same period, from 34,871,680 lbs. to 45,928,153, eleven millions of pounds, or one-third, in four years. It is plain, that our export of cotton cloth to Germany will soon cease.

But, long previous to 1833, our export of manufactured cloths to the Continent had been in a sinking state, as appears from the following table, abridged from one given under the article, "Manufactures," in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana.

Printed and Dyed Cottons exported to the following countries in the years 1830 and 1831.

	1830.		1831.
	Yards.	Value.	Yards.	Value.
Switzerland . . .	8,440,361	4948,550	392,306	£14,735
Prussia . . .	4,519,976	175,943	508	40
Germany . . .	32,790,466	1,970,730	28,353,466	680,902
On Netherlands .	4,418,235	598,026	7,896,169	288,877
Denmark . . .	195,974	12,981	36,536	977
	46,767,772	£2,987,947	36,068,076	£234,631

It will thus be observed, that, in these eleven years, the exports of manufactured cottons sank one-third in quantity and two-thirds in value, and that the trade with Russia and Prussia was annihilated. Nor was this loss compensated by a greater demand from other quarters. On the other hand, the export of cotton twist has gone on, year after year, increasing. The woollen trade presents, when examined, precisely the same results—viz., a continually decreasing export of cloth, and a continually increasing demand for yarns.

We find, accordingly, that not only over the whole continent, but in America, the cotton, as well as other manufactures, are making the most rapid advance. Between 1812 and 1835, the consumption of raw cotton wool in France rose from six to thirty-eight millions of kilograms; the United States of America consumed in 1810, 10,000 bales of cotton; in 1830, 126,000; in 1836, 237,000; in Switzerland, Germany, Prussia, Austria, Italy, we find similar results.

There is an argument which is used for the purpose of deterring the working classes of the towns from agitating the Repeal of the Corn Laws, which is generally admitted, even by the advocates of Repeal, to be sound. It is said that their repeal would occasion a great fall in the price of corn, and that fall would cause much land to be thrown out of cultivation; the consequence of which would be, that a part of the rural population being thrown out of employment, would resort to the towns, and, competing with the working classes there for employment, reduce wages. Now, we do not believe that the repeal would cause any great fall in price; and it is not on that ground chiefly that we think it would be advantageous. It would raise prices on the Continent, and place our working classes in the same situation as those of the Continent. But, even though there were a very great fall in price, we know, from experience, that it would not throw any land out of cultivation. Between 1811 and 1831, prices of agricultural produce fell nearly one-half; yet, so far from any land being thrown out of cultivation, large tracts were, for the first time, brought under the plough. Many counties, both in England and Scotland, are wholly dependent on agriculture, having not a single manufacture situated within them; yet, in every one of these counties, did the population increase, and not only so, but the number of persons chiefly employed in agriculture was greater in 1831 than in 1811. Between these two years, wheat sunk from 125s. to 64s. a-quarter, or 61s.; at present, the price is 53s., yet there never was more spirit in agriculture, nor more labour employed in it than at this moment.

As long as the corn-laws exist, any material rejection of the hours of labour can take place, without the annihilation of the export of our manufactures. The Corn Laws are at the root of all the distress which exists in the country. They cause low wages, by shutting up branches of trade and commerce, which would otherwise be carried on—hence, a surplus population and competition in the present trades. They render long hours absolutely necessary, that the great capital expended in buildings and machinery may remain for the least possible period unproductive. In short, they produce the effect which any person of common sense, unsophisticated with the doctrine of the necessity of keeping up the preponderance of the landed interest, cannot, by any possibility, fail to see—they make food scarce; and, as there is too little for the support of all the people of the country, they render a desperate scramble for it inevitable; the existence of which scramble is clearly shewn, by working young children beyond their physical powers; by combinations of workmen, tending in violence, fire-raising, and murder; and by a severe struggle for maintenance—not from honest industry, for that is found impossible where people are prevented from working—but by the miserable expedient of Poor Laws. But matters are not yet at the worst. Let the present systematic circulation of foreign food be persisted in for ten years longer, and we will venture to predict, that there will not be one estate in England worth four years' purchase. There is a point beyond which human endurance cannot go, and there are many symptoms abroad, which show that that point has nearly been reached. We, therefore, advise every one, whatever may be his rank or station, to use whatever influence he may possess for the Repeal of the Corn Laws, and the vindication of his right to purchase his food where he chooses.

AFRICA.

The French are beginning to find that Algiers is likely to prove more burdensome than they expected; but their national pride will not only prevent them from relinquishing their conquest, but induce them to extend their territories. On the 13th October, they took Constantine by storm, after seven days' siege, but with serious loss. General Damremont, their commander, being killed, with 1000 men, and 2000 wounded; though there is little doubt that the loss was still greater than has been represented; and the proportion of the killed to the wounded is far under the ordinary proportion. The town was defended with the greatest bravery; and the loss on the part of the assailants greater in proportion to the number employed, than in the taking of any town by storm during the Peninsular war. The expense of maintaining in Algiers the French army alone, exceeds a million a-year, and the whole revenue they have hitherto been able to draw from all sources, legitimate and illegitimate, does not exceed £160,000; but then, the establishment is useful to Louis Philippe, from the patronage it affords, and as a place for keeping the turbulent spirits of the army from combining against him. There is, therefore, every probability of Constantine being retained and garrisoned. Its retention is said to be a direct violation of the treaties between France and Britain. But this country has no reason to oppose the French colonization of Algiers. The substitution of a French colony for a nest of pirates and barbarians, cannot fail to prove an advantage to Britain and to the world. We cordially wish the French may succeed, and benefit by their success.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

APRIL, 1838.

LORD BROUGHAM'S SPEECHES ON SLAVERY.

It is not for their matchless eloquence that we select these speeches as the text of a few observations on the important topic which they handle; nor yet for their masculine, compact reasoning, and consummate oratorical skill; not even for the stronger fascination of that fervid and holy tone of pleading and appeal—that which never before breathed so passionately from the lips of the same distinguished individual. It is solely the mighty object which they advocate which has won our attention to the noblest specimens of modern eloquence, sanctified by the noblest purpose. Lord Brougham has surpassed himself in the present session of Parliament. His moral nature has warmed and expanded in the divine office which he has latterly assumed—to him no new one—of breaking the chains of the African slave, tearing the scourge from the grasp of the oppressor, and now in endeavouring to preserve to another helpless race, the blessings, with the rights, of freemen.

We do not pretend to award the palm of eloquence, to one speech or the other of the three speeches before us. Lord Brougham cannot be the rival of himself. His powerful reasoning, his eloquent pleading for the IMMEDIATE EMANCIPATION OF THE NEGRO APPRENTICES, will, in the present excited state of the public mind—most generously and righteously excited—probably make the most lively impression. But the exposition of the new, the EASTERN SLAVE TRADE—delivered in denouncing that invidious Order in Council, of which it would be uncharitable to imagine that the authors were aware of half its incipient wickedness—we consider incomparably the more important. The public were tolerably well acquainted with the condition of the negro apprentices, and the injustice of their masters. Missionaries in the islands, and a host of benevolent and vigilant Abolitionists at home, were watching the course of events, fearlessly searching out oppression and cruelty in their secret places, and dragging them into light; but the Order in Council—laying deep the foundations of a new scheme of slavery as flagitious as that which, after so memorable a contest, is hardly yet extirpated, and more cruel, in the same proportion as the feeble and sensitive Hindoo is a more helpless creature than the African—was an invidious lurking serpent, the more dangerous that its envenomed nature was unsuspected.

We shall not here enter into the question of the justice or propriety of making the unfortunate Colonial Secretary the scape-goat for the delinquencies of the entire Cabinet. There might have been as great wisdom, as there unquestionably would have been more manliness, in grappling boldly with the whole body, instead of singling out one victim, because, though not considered the most culpable, he might be fancied the most helpless, and the least fortified by party alliance and collateral influences. We, therefore, altogether concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Brougham, when he denied the charge of having instigated the attempt to separate from his colleagues in the Government—to cut out, as it were—Lord Glenelg, for particular punishment or opprobrium. In relation to Canada, the Colonial Secretary is probably less worthy of blame than others of his colleagues. As Lord Brougham remarked at the Exeter Hall abolition meeting, when the Colonial Secretary was blamed exclusively for the permitted iniquity of the planters—“With him all his colleagues take a part, and nothing can be more rankly unjust than to bestow all the blame upon him. There is plenty to spare for all; and it ought to be divided between him and all his colleagues in just and rateable proportions.”

But this just and candid reasoning will hardly avail Lord Glenelg, in the case of the Order in Council. Besides his official duty and responsibility, he ought, individually, to have been more completely alive than any of his colleagues, to the incipient mischief with which this Order, extorted by the artifices and importunity of the planters of Guiana, was fraught. It was indefensible in principle, and obviously cruel in its immediate operation; while, in creating an Eastern slave trade, it again set open the flood-gates to human misery, exceeding all other shapes of misery which the world has ever known—that which kills the body by lingering tortures, while it brutalizes the soul. And this Order in Council, devised in culpable ignorance, or in more culpable knowledge, and passed in mystery, was defended by its authors; who were sheltered from the consequences of their error by the Duke of Wellington. Though the Duke could not help condemning their measure, he found it necessary to compromise the affair, and allow them to recede shabbily from the awkward dilemma. In moving the Previous Question, while he neither denied nor impugned the truth of Lord Brougham's resolutions, the Duke of Wellington, to shelter the helpless Government—doubtless not without kind nor yet sufficient motives—compromised himself, and brought in question that character for candour, fairness, and sagacity, with which the Whigs at present delight to invest him.

In January last, if not earlier, Lord Brougham gave notice of his intention to drag into light this half-smuggled Act of Council. It had been passed, on the 12th of July 1837, as an amendment most favourable to the planters, of another Order, passed in March of the same year, though until this day not the least intimation of its existence has appeared in the Gazette. The practice of publishing acts for the colonies is said to be unusual; but the omission of this one, ought to establish the practice of publication in all future time. Lord Brougham truly remarked—

When we consider that such orders framed in private by the Minister, make the law of the Crown Colonies as absolutely as the law of England is made by the enactments, the open and public enactments, of King, Lords, and Commons, surely it is not too much to desire that those resolutions of the executive Government, thus private in their adoption, and, it may be, little considered before made, should not be consigned at once to the Council books, where they can only be accessible to the clerks, but should be promulgated to the whole people whose interests they concern, whose conduct they govern. When I denounced this order, I stated, shortly, but distinctly, my reasons for condemning it; I shewed in some detail how it must work; I referred to the former history of slave-trading to illustrate my meaning; and, believing, or willing to believe, that it had been issued through inattention, or negligence, or indolence, or ignorance of the subject, I said, "Let it only be withdrawn, and I shall never again advert to the subject in anyway—nor comment upon the issuing it—nor in any manner make it the subject of observation." I have waited since then, anxiously looking for its recall; but I find my not unfriendly suggestion was thrown away, and that the measure is persisted in, maintained, defended, by its authors.

The nature of the Order in Council complained of, and which the Duke of Wellington has said that the Whigs shall amend, as the price of his protection, is specious enough. In name, and probably in the belief of Lord Glenelg, it is one to enable the planters of Guiana to bring labourers, or indentured apprentices, as they are pleased to call them—slaves, as they are in reality—from India, in the same manner as they have been brought to the Mauritius for several years, after the planters there had found that their contraband trade in men was become perilous. This hopeful scheme—a godsend, or rather an instigation of the Devil—had been adopted by the planters of the Mauritius, when the British People—the Parliament having, many years before, passed Mr Brougham's bill, making man-stealing a capital felony—insisted that the full penalty should be exacted from the speculators in human beings, and after 25,000 slaves had been illegally brought to the island—25,000 capital felonies perpetrated in the course of a few years, by sordid and greedy speculators. So early as 1811—when the planters, after the trade was abolished, were as much haunted by the alarm of the slave population decreasing, as they now are, that, though the negroes may work under terror of the cart-whip, the stimulus of wages will never render them industrious as free labourers—the introduction of free labourers from Asia was proposed, to counteract the anticipated bad effects of the decrease of the population, which might occasion overtaking of the slaves; as the same amount of labour must be performed, with fewer labourers. It was a scheme of pretended philanthropy. Lord Brougham remarks:—

The reception of this plan in Parliament was very remarkable. Mr Anthony Browne, then and now the respectable agent for Antigua, cautioned the House against being led astray by its feelings in behalf of the slaves, to sanction an impracticable and visionary scheme. But Mr Stephen gave it his decided opposition upon higher grounds. Now, than Mr Stephen's there can no higher authority be cited on slavery and slave-trading, and everything connected with these subjects. He had long made them his study; he had been at all times the zealous co-operator with his friend and brother-in-law, Mr Wilberforce, in the Abolition Committee; he had passed the best years of his life in a slave colony, St. Kitt's; and, since his return to Europe, he had never ceased to watch over every branch of the great questions connected with West India affairs. His resistance to the proposition of introducing free labourers into the colonies, as it was called then and is called now, was grounded upon the injuries thus certain to be inflicted upon the people whom it was proposed to transport from Asia; and Mr Huskisson, adopting the same views, opposed the project upon the same grounds. An accident prevented Mr Canning from attending this debate, as absence from town upon the circuit kept me also away from it. I felt exceedingly anxious when the subject was announced; and, when I saw that eminent person after the committee had been appointed, I found he viewed the subject in the same light with Mr Stephen and myself. No, no, said he—it is enough to have desolated Africa, without introducing this pest into Asia too.

The next circumstance to which we must look in pursuing this historical retrospect, is the traffic which for some years has been going on between India and the Mauritius; for it is to the alleged success of this experiment that we are desired to look by the patrons of the new scheme—the Government and the Guiana planters. I own that I regard whatever relates to the Mauritius with extreme jealousy in all slave questions. There is no quarter of the globe where more gross abuses have been practised—nay, more flagrant violations of the law, from the eager appetite for new hands which the fertile land excites in the uncleared districts of that island. . . . The position of the island is singularly adapted for carrying on this detested commerce. Near the continent, and near that part of it where we have no settlement and keep hardly ever any cruisers, no effective check upon such operations can ever be maintained, if the authorities in the island itself do not exercise the most vigilant attention; and there is but too much reason to suspect, from what came out in Mr Buxton's committee, that, instead of watching, they connived at one time, whilst some high in office encouraged the offenders and even partook in the fruits of their crimes. Doubtless, if the Guiana Order in Council is suffered to subsist, a like prothe trade will be extended to this island. But, in this case, the African coast is under the operation of this new traffic. That Order comprehends it in terms the most distinct. Nor does it only open the trade to “them that sail

Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past Moambique.”

It stretches along Sofala, and to Guardafui and Arabia—comprising all the Asian Islands

“Ceylon and Timor, Ternate and Cadora.”

It then includes the whole coast of India, and all the regions of that vast domain, stretching “O'er hills where flocks do feed, beyond the springs

Of Ganges and Hydaspes, Indian streams.”

All these plains and mountains—all those ports, and bays, and creeks—long lines of sea-beach without a fort or a wicket, a magistrate to control, or an eye to see what is done—from Madagascar to the Red Sea—from the Arabian Gulf along Malabar, to Travancore, thence from Comorine to the mouths of the Ganges, and of all the unknown and unnamed streams that water the peninsula and flow into the Indian Ocean. It is in such vast and such desolate regions, that we are to be told this Order will never be abused, and none be taken by force, nor any circumvented by fraud. When in the heart of Europe, with all men's eyes to watch him and his agents, the King of Prussia could drive his trade of a crimp, and fill his army with recruits spirited away from the banks of the Rhine, populous, civilized countries, enjoying the blessings of regular government, the protection of a vigilant police, and entertaining ambassadors at the court of Berlin—when that monarch could, in such countries, and in the face of day, carry off the priest at the altar, and the professor at his desk, from the countries on the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Oder, and these reverend and learned recruits were, for months afterwards, found carrying his firelocks, and serving in his ranks—how can the folly be sufficiently derided, which represents it as difficult to abuse this abominable regulation, and make it the cover of common slave-trading in the remote desolate countries watered by the Niger, and the yet more deserted shores of eastern Africa, through which nameless rivers flow into the sea? The order was passed without a single regulation being subjoined, either here or in the East Indies, to prevent such abuses or to limit their amount. But to speak of regulations in such circumstances, is too absurd. What regulations can the wit of man devise, which can have any effect at all? Nay, in the very places where the abuse is most likely to occur, you have not the shadow of authority to make rules. How can you legislate for the slave-dealers on the eastern coast, north of the Cape? Yet there the worst branches of the old slave-trade at this moment exist. I saw, only yesterday, a person who had been present at the capture of a Portuguese slave-ship, which had sailed from the coast of Zanzibar, with 900 negroes on board, and lost above 300 before she reached her port of destination in the Brazil. Let it not then be said, that regulations may be devised for preventing abuse. But none have been attempted or thought of. The wretched beings, apprentices you call them, are to be carried, without a word said, specifying the tonnage—regulating the space for accommodation between the decks—fixing the proportion of water to drink, or provision to sustain life—ordering medical attendance—directing the course of the voyage, or limiting its duration. The Order was issued here in July, before it could possibly be known that any law had been promulgated in Bengal—nor the date of the Bengal regulation was May 1, and it was sent over on the 7th of June. The regulation, too, was, and still is, confined to the presidency of Fort William. Nay, more, it is altogether silent on every one of the important particulars which I have mentioned, and merely prescribes, in vague and general terms, that the parties interested in disobeying it, and on whose conduct it sets no kind of watch, shall attend to the concerns of the crew and cargo.

We make no apology for the length of this extract from the speech, which, very imperfectly reported in the newspapers, is before us in an authentic form; nor do we select those passages for any reason save that they contain a plain statement of matters of fact, and cogent argument.

Lord Brougham contrasts, with the permitted facility of crimping, kidnapping, and deceiving the simple Asiatics, the extreme jealousy and vigilance with which our law protects those voluntary and well-informed British emigrants, who are so much more capable of taking care of themselves than the natives of India. He enumerates every preliminary regulation and safeguard, provided by statute, for the protection of British subjects; and continues—

With the additional penalty of no less than £500, for any passenger taken on board in any place where no Custom-house stands, and no officers are ready to perform the examination—lest, peradventure, a single Englishman may, by some improbable combination of accidents, be kidnapped and carried, innocently or ignorantly, into a foreign land. And then comes my noble friend, (Lord Glenelg,) with his Order in Council—the crown-made law—to encourage the shipment, not of enlightened Englishmen, but simple Hindoos and savage Africans, in distant, desert coasts, in remote creeks and bays of the sea, laid down in no charts, bearing no name, as the mouth of rivers which drain unknown regions far inland, and carry down their streams the barbarous natives to an ocean which they had never beheld. Knowing the watchful care, the scrupulous and suspicious jealousy of the English law made by Parliament on all that relates to the emigration of our own civilized people—knowing that the shipper would be ruined who should suffer an Englishman to embark, of his own free will, and more desirous to go than he to take him, where there was no custom-house officer to watch the operation—my noble friend makes his colonial law with the avowed purpose of enabling thousands and thousands of simple, ignorant, uncivilized men, to be taken in any speculating trader's vessel, in obscure, nameless places, where, instead of revenue establishments and public offices being stationed, the footstep of no European, save the slave-trader and the crimp, ever was known to have trodden since the creation. The law made by Parliament suspects all engaged in the trade of emigration, even from the city of London, and the law-givers have framed its enactments on the assumption that abuse and offence must come. The law of the Colonial Office suspects no one, even of those who navigate the Indian seas, and sweep the coasts of Southern Africa—it proceeds upon the assumption that neither abuse nor offence can ever come where the temptation is the strongest and the difficulty of prevention the most insurmountable.

After adverting to the injustice to the freed negro labourers, of pouring in a host of foreign labourers upon them, habituated, like the Coolies of India, to the lowest rate of hire and sustenance, and that, at the very moment the negro, long deprived of his rights by the injustice of his owner, is emancipated, he is to be defrauded of his hire by his owner's craft—his Lordship returns to the main point:—

But this is the very least part of the evil inflicted by the measure; this is taking the argument on the lowest ground. Look to the inevitable consequences of the system upon the eastern coast of Africa, and all our Indian dominions. The language used by its patrons and their abettors in Downing Street, is just what used to be heard in the days of open slave-trading. “We wish to bring over a number of labouring people from Asia,” says one planter. “We contemplate drawing a supply of labourers for our estates,” say others—respectable men, whom I personally know. It is “the engaging of labourers,” according to the President of the Board of Control, under whose protection India is placed; while the Colonial Secretary, under whose care all our other settlements repose, speaks of the "Emigration from India," and "East India Emigrants." The voyage which brings these poor creatures from the indolence of their native plains to the hard and unwholesome toils of Guiana, (as hardly yet to be described as proving an agreeable passage, for time has not yet been allowed to carry any over, but the experiment already made in the Mauritius furnishes the means of commendation, and that passage has been distinctly termed by the schemers one of no sufferings, but of sufficient ease and comfort to the cargoes. So they have described the change of the Coolie's situation as beneficial to him. "They are represented," it is said, "to be much pleased with their new situation, it being considered by them as more desirable and beneficial than that from which they have been removed"—in the very language, your Lordships observe, of the slave-traders and their defenders fifty years ago. The experience of the Mauritius planters is in these papers cited at large, and paraded through many a long page, to shew how happy is the lot of the transported labourer in the bondage of that blissful land. The queries sent to various proprietors are given at length, with the answers returned by them. The fourth question, as to the comforts and happiness of the imported apprentices, is answered alike by all but one—from whom the truth escapes. The others say, the men are quite contented and happy, exactly as Sir William Young found the African slaves in the Leeward Islands.

That one planter, however, gives a somewhat different account of the matter. "Has any feeling of uneasiness and discontent been observable among the Indian labourers on your estate, as arising out of separation from their families, or from any other similar cause?" The answer is signed Bickagee; and this name seems to indicate a Malabar origin; so that probably the reason why the account is so different from that of other proprietors may be, that Bickagee could converse with the poor Indians in their own language, as another witness who gives a similar account certainly could. The answer is "Yes; and for these reasons.—In their country they live happy and comfortable with their wives and families on three or four rupees a-month. They engage to leave their native country on a small increase of salary, say five rupees and rations, in the hope of receiving the same comfort here, but experience has proved the reverse. Uneasiness and discontent arise from these privations, besides their being deprived of the holidays their religion entitles them to." So Mr Scott, a gentleman resident in Bengal and acquainted with the people, their language, and habits, plainly says, that, "with very rare exceptions, he doubts if there are any who congratulate themselves on the bargain they have made." He makes an observation of much wisdom upon the inefficacy of all regulations respecting treatment, and of all conditions in contracts for apprenticeships. "The main result of my inquiry," says he, "leads me to the conclusion that the condition of the labourer practically depends on the individual character of his employer, and that the terms of the agreements are trifling compared with the spirit in which they are interpreted."

This must hold true; for what are these simple and deluded exiles but slaves?—and on what other foundation can their comfort rest but the individual character of their employer? Mr Scott has shewn more directly that these poor Hindoos were deceived by the crimps:—

"They all stated (says he) that they left Calcutta under the impression that they were going to the Company Bhatties (Company's village) the name by which the Mauritius is designated"—but by whom? In the vernacular tongue of India? By all men in common parlance? Oh, no, nothing of the kind! But "by the agents in India!"—By the slave-trader's agents—by his crimps—his intelligents—his kidnappers. Mr Scott adds, "How far the terms are complimentary or complimentary I cannot say," so that he has his suspicions of these poor ignorant people being made to believe that they might be compelled to go to the Mauritius as a part of the Company's territory. He adds this remarkable observation: "While I make no charge of misrepresentation, I am bound to acknowledge the difficulty of accurately and intelligibly describing an island in the Indian Ocean to a person who had never seen the sea, or knew what an island was." Some, there may doubtless be, who will say, that this representation of the Mauritius, where the powers of Leadenhall Street have not one servant, and possess not one yard of ground, being a village of the Company, was plausibly rather than justly made. For my part, I hold it to have been wickedly, deceitfully, fraudulently, crimpingly, kidnappingly done, and with the purpose of inveigling, and cheating, and carrying away the natives of Asia, after the most approved practices of slave traders, in their nefarious proceedings on the African coast.

But the probable suffering of the Hindoo slaves does not rest upon conjecture. Lord Brougham said he held in his hand—

The despatch from the Mauritius government, of April last, in which three vessels are said to have carried over, one of them 224, the other 200, and the third seventy-two labourers, as you are pleased to term what I plainly name slaves. Each had a full cargo of rice besides; so that the despatch says they could not have proper accommodation for the Indians, nor protection from the weather, nor had any one of the three a medical officer. The William Wilson, out of 224, lost thirty-one on the voyage—a sacrifice in the pestilential hold in which they were compelled to breathe. The Adelaide, still worse, lost twenty-six out of seventy-two—between a third and a half in five or six weeks. The statements I have given from the slave-trader's arguments in 1788 and 1787 were absurd enough when they represented the mortality of the middle passage as one in the hundred. But never did I hear it put higher than this of thirty or forty per cent. Only see once more how the record of your own statute-book rises up in judgment against your own conduct! While you not merely allow, but encourage and stimulate the carrying away of untutored Indians and savage Africans from the desolate shores of Malabar, and Ceylon, and Mosambique, giving free scope to all the practices of fraud and treachery, which the arts of wicked ingenuity can devise to entrap them, and bear them into bondage, that the sordid desires of a few grasping planters may be gratified—read the wise and humane words on the front of the British statute—read them, and blush for shame! "Whereas, in various parts"—of Hindostan! Of the Indian Archipelago! Of the Mosambique and Sofala coasts? No—but "of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, persons have been seduced to leave their native country under false representations, and have suffered great hardships for want of provisions and proper accommodation, and no security whatever being afforded that they shall be carried to the ports for which they have agreed—be it therefore enacted,"—Has the faintest attempt been made to afford such security to the Indians and the Africans, as this statute anxiously provides, for the free and enlightened native of our own island—any precaution against his being trepanned and seduced on board, under representations that he is only going to another village of his own country, where he will enjoy his own ease, work in his own way, and worship according to his own religion—any precautions against being hurried away by force, while others are decoyed by fraud—any precautions against being scantly provided and pestilentially lodged—any precaution against his being carried to one destination after bargaining for another? Nothing whatever of the kind.

The condition of the negro apprentices we consider immeasurably better than that of the expatriated Coolies. They are among their relatives, and in their own country. They understand its language; they have a perception of their rights; they have advisers, friends, and protectors, in their spiritual teachers; they appeal to the magistrate; and they travel to, the Governor. If justice is denied them. They are cruelly oppressed, and that under the forms of justice; but the apprenticed negro, even were complete emancipation not at hand, is in a far safer position than the forlorn Coolie. In granting this Order in Council, the Colonial Secretary has looked chiefly to latitude, while we think he overlooked more imminent dangers. When he received the Ordinance of the Court of Policy in Demerara, authorizing the importation of apprentices into the colony from India, he warned the planters against letting this license become a cover for slave-dealing, and for bringing apprentices from Africa; as if slaves could not be as effectually made of Hindoos as of negroes.

Another striking argument which Lord Brougham employs against the Order in Council, is the use which may be made of it by the Spanish and Portuguese governments, when they hear their continued nefarious traffic stigmatized by the English, who impatiently demand its abolition.

They will hold, and truly, that they have a just right to tax us with insincerity, and with fraud and dishonesty; while we affect to reprobate slave-trading in them under its own name, we continue to carry it on ourselves under false pretences, and by a false and borrowed title. As long as Africans are brought over under the vile 'Quilic' by the name of apprenticed labourers, it is still strange just then it is plausible to accuse us of insincerity and these frauds; and how does my noble friend (Lord Glenelg) escape the charge? By a regulation which he adds to the ordinance, and which I pledge myself instantly to demonstrate does nothing whatever to prevent the very thing here denounced. Nothing of the kind, absolutely nothing, has been done by the additional provision of my noble friend: For what is that provision? You will find it in page 21, and it only makes indentures of apprenticeship void if executed in Africa, or the adjacent islands inhabited wholly or in part by the negro race. Why, what signifies that? Who is prevented by such a silly folly as that article, from carrying over as many Africans as he pleases, and in whatever way he likes? To escape this most ridiculous check, the slave-trader (my noble friend himself calls him by this name) has only to take the negroes on board of his slave-ships, and there execute their indentures, or to Brazil, or to Cuba, or to Monte Video, or, indeed, to Guiana itself; and then he complies with the conditions of this inconceivable restriction, and imports as many negroes as he pleases, and can afford to buy. To be sure, there is added another provision of the same notable kind, requiring that all contracts be made and witnessed before two justices, or, it is added, magistrates. What then? The slave-trader has only to carry his prey, his human victims, to the Mauritius, where he will find two, or twenty, magistrates fully ready to help him, and to do anything for the encouragement of the business there most popular, the slave-trade; or if it be the western coast of Africa which he has been desolating with his traffic, under the encouragement of this Order in Council, he has only to touch at the Brazils, where all slave-traders are at home; or at Monte Video, where the governors such as bribe of £10,000 to allow, in the teeth of the Spanish law, 2000 slaves, which he termed, in the language of these papers and this Order in Council, la compra, to be introduced; or at Cuba, where the governor does not suffer the sailing of slave-ships to be interrupted; or the newspapers, for fear of our cruisers taking them by word and stopping them. In all these slave-trading ports, justices and magistrates, and governors, will give the ready to witness indentures for Guiana, and make this most ludicrous provision utterly void and of no effect.

How can this be gained? The experience of fifty years has sufficiently taught us the kind of protection which colonial magistrates afford to colonial labourers. One might now suppose that this plan of bringing over indentured labourers to the West Indies from Asia, had not a leg to stand upon; but, lest it should still hobble on, a case was brought forward, so apt, so directly to the point, that we are not surprised the Colonial Secretary gave it the go-by. Some few years ago, a person named Letord, seeing the Mauritius so much in want of labourers, graciously propounded to the Governor a plan for importing twenty thousand African—not Asiatic, labourers, which makes the only visible distinction between his scheme and that sanctioned by Lord Glenelg's Order in Council.

His plan was circumstantially and elaborately framed. . . . The ingenious projector, (who, I understand, was one of those most deeply concerned in the Mauritius slave-trading some time ago, and therefore well versed in the subject) gave his plan the name of "Projet d'Emancipation Africaine"—for he was, of course, to liberate all the slaves he bought of the chiefs, or kidnapped on his own account, and to convert them, as the plan of our Government proposes, into indentured apprentices. Your Lordships smile at the plan and its title, because you see through the trick at once: so did the worthy Governor, General Nicolay—whose answer was short, whose refusal was flat and unqualified, just such as the Government at home should have given to the Letords of Guiana. He said he had read the details of the plan "with much interest, and felt bound to give it his unqualified refusal, considering it, however speciously coloured, as neither more nor less than a renewal of the slave-trade, and, therefore, entirely inadmissible." And so to be sure it was. . . . But I now ask, if there is one single title of the plan thus instantly seen through, which differs from the present project for Guiana? I defy the most ingenious, subtle, and astute person who now hears me, to shew any one thing that could have been done under Letord's plan, denounced by Sir W. Nicolay, as common slave-trading—in other words, felony—which may not be done exactly in the same manner, if this Order in Council is suffered to continue in operation.

The nation, or that, we hope, fast-increasing portion of it, alive to the incipient evils wrapped up in this ill-advised Order in Council, wrung, we fully believe, from Lord Glenelg by the importunity and craft of the planters of Guiana, now wait for those corrective amendments, those regulations which were conceded by Ministers, as the price of the Duke of Wellington's protection on the night of the 6th March.

Like Lord Brougham, we entertain no fears for the emancipation of the negro apprentices—if not now, in 1838, when it is earnestly and right equally demanded, as a purchased right, by almost the unanimous voice of the nation—yet speedily; and, like him, we consider the insidious and gradual renewal of the traffic, under a new form, a far more pressing danger, though one less apprehended. The spirit and growing intelligence of the negro apprentices; the hope, and the sweet foretaste of liberty which they already enjoy; the millions of generous and watchful friends which they have in Britain—guarantee them against the chain and the cart-whip. But, against the renewal of the trade, there is, we fear, no security to be found in the most cunningly devised regulations which the Colonial Office can invent. Avarice and self-interest are powerful opponents to cope withal. "I know," said Lord Brougham, in his reply—

I know the Indian crimp and the African trader; the inexhaustible perfidies of the dealers in men, and the scope which those frauds have among hordes of uncivilized men, many of them in their own country slaves; the comfort and aid which those wretches may reckon upon receiving from accomplices ready made, such as the bribed governor on the Spanish Main, and the friendly authorities of Cuba.

And wise it is that he will not permit the hydra to rear its head, although there be a Press and a Parliament to watch its movements; and although another Clarkson might be found to grapple with and destroy in its strength, the monster Lord Brougham would strangle in its cradle.

The monster is down, and I prefer keeping him down to relying upon all our resources for gaining a second triumph. I will not suffer the Upas tree to be transplanted, on the chance of its not thriving in an ungenial soil, and in the hope that, after it shall be found to blight with death all beneath its shade, my arm may be found strong enough to wield the axe which shall lay it low. I thank you for the patience with which you have listened to me, and on which I have unwillingly trespassed so long. My bounden duty could not otherwise have been performed; and I had no choice but to act now as I have acted ever through the whole of my life—maintaining to the end the implacable enmity with which I have at all times pursued this infernal trade.

Such is the animated winding-up of this noble speech; spoken at the right moment, thrust home, direct to the heart of the lurking iniquity which, in exposing, it must annihilate. It cannot be for a moment believed that those who will not patiently tolerate another two years of mitigated slavery among the negroes, will sit quietly by while a more flagrant enormity is perpetrated, and the foundation silently laid for centuries of systematic crime.

This speech we consider—looking to its mighty object—as the most important that ever Lord Brougham delivered in Parliament. His pleading for immediate emancipation is, however, more brilliant and glowing, and more highly graced with the flights of the orator, and the skill of the rhetorician. Instead of the close and sober reasoning, and the solemn tones of the warning voice, prophetically denouncing the new-born Eastern slave-trade, we have graphic, soul-harrowing narrative, contrasted with such beautiful passages as the following, which we expect to see flourishing among the finest of the lessons which English mothers select as exercises for their sons—themes addressed to the heart, to the dawning intellect, and to the tender conscience of early youth. The day of Emancipation has arrived—that day when the star of freedom first rose, rejoicing over those sun-smitten, slave islands:—

The first of August came, the object of so much anxiety and so many predictions—that day so joyfully expected by the poor slaves, so sorely dreaded by their hard task-masters; and surely, if ever there was a picture interesting, even fascinating to look upon—if ever there was a passage in a people's history that redounded to their eternal honour—if ever triumphant answer was given to all the standstill accusations for ages heaped upon an oppressed race, as if to justify the wrongs done them—that picture, and that passage, and that answer, were exhibited in the untarnished history of that auspicious day off over the islands of the Western Sea. Instead of the horizon being lit up with the lurid fire of rebellion kindled by a sense of natural though lawless revenge, and the just resistance to insupportable oppression—the whole of that wide-spreading scene was mildly illuminated with joy, contentment, peace and good-will towards men. No civilized nation, no people of the most refined character, could have displayed, after gaining a sudden and signal victory, more forbearance, more delicacy, in the enjoyment of their triumph, than these poor untutored slaves did upon the great consummation of all their wishes, which they had just obtained. Not a gesture or a look was seen to smart the eye—not a sound or a breath from the negro's lips was heard to grate on the ear of the planter. All was joy, congratulation, and hope. Every where were to be seen groups of these harmless folks assembled to talk over their good fortunes; to communicate their mutual feelings of happiness; to speculate on their future prospects. Finding that they were now free in name, they hoped soon to taste the reality of liberty. Feeling their fetters loosened, they looked forward to the day which should see them fall off, and the degrading marks which they left be effaced from their limbs. But all this was accompanied with not a whisper that could give offence to the master by reminding him of the change. This delicate, calm, tranquil joy, was alone to be marked on that day, over all the chain of the Antilles.—Amusements there were none to be seen on that day—not even their simple pastimes by which they had been wont to beguile the hard hours of bondage, and which reminded that innocent people of the happy land of their forefathers, whence they had been torn by the hands of Christian and civilized men. The day was kept sacred as the festival of their liberation; for the negroes are an eminently pious race. They enjoy the advantages of much religious instruction, and partake in a large measure of spiritual consolation. These blessings they derive not from the ministrations of the Established Church—not that the aid of its priests is withheld from them, but the services of others, of zealous Missionaries, are found more acceptable and more effectual, because they are more suited to the capacity of the people. The meek and humble pastor, although perhaps more deficient in secular accomplishments, is far more abounding in zeal for the work of the vineyard, and, being less raised above his flock, is better fitted to guide them in the path of religious duty. Not made too fine for his work by pride of science, nor kept apart by any peculiar refinement of taste, but inspired with a fervent devotion to the interests of his flock, the Missionary pastor lives but for them; their companion on the week-day, as their instructor on the Sabbath; their friend and counsellor in temporal matters, as their guide in spiritual concerns. These are the causes of the influence he enjoys—this the source from whence the good he does them flows. Nor can I pass by this part of the West Indian picture without rendering the tribute of heartfelt admiration which I am proud to pay, when I contemplate the pious zeal, the indefatigable labours of these holy and disinterested men; and I know full well that, if I make my appeal to my noble friend (Lord Sligo) he will repeat the testimony he elsewhere bore to the same high merits, when he promulgated his honest opinion, that "for the origin of all religious feeling among the negroes, it is among the Missionaries and not the Clergy we must look." Therefore it was that, fourteen years ago, I felt all the deep anxiety to which I this night began by referring, when it was my lot to drag before the Commons of England the persecutions of one among the most useful, most devoted, and unsexedly, of that inestimable class of men, who, for his piety and his self-devotion, had been trampled down by wicked men conspiring with unjust judges, and made to die the death, for teaching to the poor negroes the gospel of peace. I am unspeakably proud of the part I then took; I glory mightily in reflecting that I then struck, aided and comforted by far abler men, the first of those blows, of which we saw now rising the last, at the chains that bind the hapless race of our Colonial peasantry. The 1st of August came—and the day was kept a sacred holiday, as it will ever be kept to the end of time throughout all the West-Indies. Every church was crowded, from early dawn, with devout and earnest worshippers. Five or six times in the course of that memorable Friday, were all those churches filled and emptied in succession by multitudes, who came, not coldly to comply with a formal ceremonial, not to give mouth-worship or eye-worship, but to render humble and hearty thanks to God for their freedom, at length bestowed.

One more passage we are tempted to transfer to pages which may claim, if no higher merit, that of being less costly than those of volumes—less perishable and more widely diffused than those of newspapers. It sends a voice across the Atlantic to the shores of America; it embodies another of those glorious lessons which the children of Britain—free, and the offspring of the free—should imbibed at the knees of their mothers:—

I regard the freedom of the negro as accomplished and sure. Why? Because it is his right—because he has shown himself fit for it—because a pretext or a shadow of a pretext can no longer be devised for withholding that right from its possessor. I know that all men at this day take a part in the question, and they will no longer bear to be imposed upon now they are well informed. My reliance is firm and unflinching upon the great change which I have witnessed—the education of the people unfettered by party or by sect—witnessed from the beginning of its progress, I may say from the hour of its birth. Yes! It was not for an humble man like me to assist at royal births with the illustrious Prince who condescended to grace the pageant of this opening season, or the Great Captain and Statesman in whose presence I am now proud to speak. But with that illustrous Prince, and with the father of the Queen, I assisted at that other birth, more conspicuous still. With them, and with the Head of the house of Russell, incomparably more illustrious in my eyes. I watched over its cradle—I marked its growth—I rejoiced in its strength—I witnessed its maturity—I have been spared to see it ascend the very height of supreme power; directing the councils of State; accelerating every great improvement; uniting itself with every good work; propping all useful institutions; extirpating abuses in all our institutions; passing the bounds of our European dominion, and in the New World, as in the Old, proclaiming that freedom is the birth-right of man—that distinction of colour gives no title to oppression—that the chains now loosed must be struck off, and even the marks they have left effaced—proclaiming this by the same eternal law of our nature which makes nations the masters of their own destiny, and which in Europe has caused every tyrant's throne to quake! But they need feel no alarm at the progress of light who defend a limited monarchy and support popular institutions—who place their chiefest pride, not in ruling over slaves, be they white or be they black, not in protecting the oppressor, but in wearing a constitutional crown, in holding the sword of justice with the hand of mercy, in being the first citizen of a country whose air is too pure for slavery to breathe, and on whose shores, if the captive's foot but touch, his fetters of themselves fall off. To the relentless progress of this great principle I look with a confidence which nothing can shake; it makes all improvement certain; it makes all change safe which it produces; for none can be brought about, unless all has been prepared in a cautious and salutary spirit. So now the fulness of time is come for at length discharging our duty to the African captive. I have demonstrated to you that everything is ordered—every previous step taken—all safe, by experienced men to be safe, for the long-desired consummation. (The time has come, the trial has been made, the hour is striking; you have no longer a pretext for hesitation, or faltering, or delay.

THE STORMING OF BADAJOZ.*

A BALLAD.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

* "Take a single captive."—SCOTT.

No star!—all was dark!—not a cloud could be seen!
Naught was heard, but the whisper'd command,
And the beating of hearts, where the bravest, I ween,
Held weapons that shook in the hand;
For strong was the fortress, and well knew the foe
Of our noiseless advancing array;
And night, in a moment, like lightning on snow,
Shone horribly brighter than day.

Ay—stare not her own, sent on missions of bale,
With arrow-like speed, climb'd the sky,
And, startling the bold, turn'd the number'd cheeks pale
Of men sworn to conquer or die.
Then, like a river of thunder, rush'd o'er
The warrior-watch'd line in our van;
And he who, untroubled, could hear his waves roar,
Were never the features of man.

One dropp'd out of six, at each rattle of balls;
We blacken'd, we rush'd—and were down;
On, up, to th' assault! we must walk o'er the walls
To their daughters and wives in the town.
And who that knows aught of our lords, and their lives,
And the paupers of state we maintain,
Would not kill our allies, and then ravish their wives,
For the Protestant cause in old Spain?

From the mouth of one of the heroes who, on that occasion, uttered a libel on the Pope and the bread-tax. Are we on the eve of another crusade for chains?

Still o'er us the glare of their fireballs they cast,
Their shot on our masses to throw:
"Up! up! scale the wall, boys!" We scaled it—and that Fell, spiked on our bayonets below.
But who that knows aught of our lords, and their laws,
And the Protestant cause they sustain,
Would not combat and die for the Protestant cause,
And its old Popish priesthood in Spain?

My God! how we're riddled! They flap us like flies!
Climb, devils! and fight hand to hand!
They burn up the gleam of our guns and our cries—
Damnation! what ladder can stand?
Our dead fill the ditch—but we tread where they stood:
Christ's death! will they flap us again?
Now! now!—or our gentry, who hate to shed blood,
Will despair of their church in old Spain.

"Don't falter! we're alive!"—bought in Britain with gold;
And what will the gentlemen say,
And what their sweet ladies and gossams, if told That the Hird-of-the-Spoil ran away?
"Hurrah! we are victorious!"—on waves of red foam
We ride over Frenchmen again,
That our lords may still feed on the people at home,
And the old Popish priesthood in Spain.

Hey, Spaniards! thank England for friendship and war—
 Take care, if you can, of your liver;
 And we'll make a hymn to the pale-throated star
 Of the shrieks of your daughters and wives.
 "In Freedom's wrong'd name, her purple robe we sustain,
 And sheath in her bosom our swords;
 Sink, Papist of Erin! swim, Papist of Spain!
 Sowder our squires and our lords."

Now, star'd he be useful—the honest bound down
 In the doorless and windowless jail!
 Ring out through all England, thorpe, city, and town,
 That the arms of the pious avail!
 Let anthems to Moloch be heard on the breeze,
 Wherever his name hath a fame!
 And kneel, pious ladies, give thanks on your knees,
 For the triumphs of hell in old Spain!

"Still, Thanks of the Isles! bet against my right-hand,
 Nor be warn'd," saith the Lord, "till ye've lost!
 When my fire-worm in France crept by night o'er the land,
 Did her nobles take note of the cost?
 No! nor then, when her peasantry rose like the sea,
 And her palaces sank in their art;
 Nor then, when arm'd Paris found vengeance in me,
 And the heart of a people took fire."

But, gamblers of nations! there cometh a day
 When the debt of the doom'd must be paid:
 Even now, while ye boast, saith the God of Dimmay,
 " 'Twas with Me that your wager ye laid:
 What stak'd ye? The future against my right-hand!
 The fortunes of all ye love most!
 The hopes of your children! your houses, your land!
 And how stands the game? Ye have lost!"

BULWER'S ALICE; OR, THE MYSTERIES.

THOSE ladies who talk of "the rights of woman," and the few of "the nobler sex," Quakers and others, who join in the outcry, are assuredly very unreasonable persons. What do they wish for? What would they be at? Do they know their own minds? The rights of women, though not recorded in the statute-book, are, by the sanctity of opinion, as broadly chartered as those of angels. They far transcend, in their immaculate purity, and strictness of definition, those which we claim for our frail human selves. To women, we generously give up the monopoly of all the graces, and the sole and unquestioned possession of many of the virtues. Save property and power, with the exercise of the varied rights flowing from their enjoyment, and that intellectual superiority which men hold by virtue of the nobility of sex, nothing is denied to women. They have the absolute possession of most of the spiritual virtues, and of all those which we may call the corporeal. Of the latter, we dispute the possession of none with the ladies, save active courage, which we consider one of our exclusive prerogatives; so far, at least, as boxing, quarrelling, fighting duels, and using fire-arms are concerned. Women are permitted to be as firm, truthful, loving, disinterested, generous, compassionate, and self-denied as ever they please; while they are required to be constant, faithful, forbearing, forgiving, submissive, peaceful, long-suffering, prudent, pious, patient, temperate, "enduring all things, hoping all things." And with this wide charter, women complain of their rights being denied! So do slaves: yet to slaves also great latitude is permitted. Like women, they may be as faithful, affectionate, and good-humoured as they choose; while they must be industrious, honest, and obedient, under pains and penalties; and, in lieu of the few striking rights and enjoyments denied here, Heaven is freely given up to them by their Christian masters. To women, the Christian world is equally indulgent.

To a certain very limited extent, Mr E. L. Bulwer seems inclined to advocate some new fangled notions about the rights of women, so far as pains and penalties are concerned. He has not, indeed, ventured very far on newly-broken slippery ground, and he has moved cautiously and gingerly; yet he is a bald man, and, as men go, a daring innovator; for he had to deal not alone with the rights of men as opposed to the wrongs of women, but with the equally sacred privileges of birth and rank, as well as with what are considered the great bulwarks of morality.

The moral tendency of the first portion of this romance, we considered enervating, and altogether very questionable. In the concluding volumes, Mr Bulwer has perhaps made all the atonement possible, he has made the best of bad things; and yet he seems to fear the severe judgment of society, upon points about which it is peculiarly tenacious, far more than when he came before its tribunal, laden with the burden of what we consider his weightier original offence. That was telling a beautiful and seductive tale, of what is conventionally called seduction—the equivocal phrase with which mercy often softens the unequal awards which men's justice deals to women. Now, he has had the hardihood to make his hero, Maltravers—gentleman by birth, and, by temperament and education, a fastidious and sensitive man of honour—at the close of the eighteenth year of her probation, marry his own mistress—that low-born girl, of pure and elevated nature—that beautiful and tender Alice, whom he had betrayed in early girlhood, and whose heart, during the long sad years of separation, "had never once swerved from its earliest worship." This faithful devotion to one being, one image, one memory—and to poor Alice, Maltravers had been no more than a memory—is one of those angelic immunities which men freely grant to women—one of the especial "rights of women," for which the nobler sex have neither taste nor calling. Mr Bulwer employs all his eloquence and all his invention, to reconcile society to the dénouement, which justice and the true morality of punishment and compensation, of error and atonement, demanded from him. In order to propitiate the worldly-minded, the straitlaced, and those whose conventional morality could easily have overlooked the seduction, but who will never pardon the "very improper marriage," he has had recourse to things improbable and things impossible; and yet he seems to have felt that all was insufficient, and direct apology necessary. True, Alice had long been the equal in rank, if not in birth, of her early lover. She was well endowed with wealth, lovely as in her first youth, the pattern of every amiable grace and feminine virtue, and her early error was unknown; but still the sacrifice of Maltravers, the precedent, must be reconciled to the world's law, and secured against the world's sneer, stronger than its law—and thus it is attempted:—

And Alice!—Will the world blame us if you are left happy at the last? We are daily banishing from our law books the statutes that disproportion punishment to crime. Daily we preach the doctrine that we demoralize, wherever we strain justice into cruelty. It is time that we should apply to the social code the wisdom we recognise in legislation; it is time that we should do away with the punishment of death for inadequate offences, even in books—it is time that we should allow the possibility of atonement, and permit to Error the right to hope, as the reward of submission to its sufferings. Nor let it be thought that the close to Alice's career can offer temptation to the offence of its commencement. Eighteen years of sadness—a youth consumed in silent sorrow over the grave of Joy—have images that throw over these pages a dark and warning shadow that will haunt the young long after they turn from the tale that is about to close!

The judgments pronounced upon the denouement which Mr Bulwer has had the courage to hazard, will be as various as the opinions of mankind upon the great questions which it involves—the relative position of men and women, and the privileges guaranteed to rank by opinion. The minority will say—"Having given your heroine wealth, title, the world's esteem, and an honourable station in society, you need not be so very much alarmed for allowing her lover to make her that tardy and slight atonement which, by the merest chance, it was still in his power to offer." While a very few, included in that minority, in whose judgment we are strongly disposed to concur, may close the book saying, "This weak, sophisticated, capricious Maltravers is unworthy of this noble and natural woman, Alice Darvil. It is a breach of poetic justice, to permit their union; and, on his part, it is made an act of high virtue, a sacrifice, forsooth! a breach of usage, for which the writer must deprecate the severity of society! He must ask pardon for having ventured so bold an innovation on the most solemn points of its code!"

We hold to the belief that, when Mr Bulwer had concluded the first three volumes of this fiction, he had no clear notion of how he was to hape out the remainder—

"Perhaps it might turn out a song,
"Perhaps turn out a sermon."

It is a song—a thing of amusement, with many clever metaphors interwoven, and a sermon tagged to the end of it. The connexion between the hero and heroine, Maltravers and Alice, is throughout the slightest possible. From the time that they are ruthlessly separated by fate, in the bloom of their early loves, they meet no more, and have no knowledge of each other's existence, until, at the close, Maltravers, who, in the interval, has been twenty times in and out of loves, and scrapes, and entanglements, besides two betrothments—is thrown back upon his early love, blighted in hope, wasted and chilled in affection.

The new volumes are not, in literary merit, equal to the first three; but they are the production of a man of mind and accomplishment; they bear in every page his individual stamp and impress; and are immeasurably superior to the common herd of romances. They introduce us to a new set of actors—and this might be necessary, as so many of the old were killed off; though we should have preferred cultivating a closer intimacy with our old friends, and obtaining a deeper insight into characters already vigorously outlined. This might be overtaking the rapid author. He has restored Lumley Ferrers, Lord Vargrave, to his English identity, which had been considerably destroyed by the part of the villain of a melodrama, which he was made to play. The author has also imparted a few heightening touches to his Byronic hero—for Maltravers is essentially Byronic; and he has produced some clever new groups. The Merton family is one. It is that of a worldly-minded, well-endowed clergyman, holding an excellent family-living, and in hopes of yet becoming, by dint of proper management, a bishop. The sketch of the father, the Rev. Charles Merton, Rector of Merton, and brother of Sir John Merton, is distinct though slight; that of his ambitious and world-trained elder daughter, is better, because it dives deeper into the causes which influence the formation of the character of women in fashionable society. Here is Rector Merton's portrait—that of his daughter is too elaborate for this slight notice. "The Mertons were a delightful family!"

In person, Mr Merton was of the middle height: fair, and inclined to stoutness—with small features, beautiful teeth, and great suavity of address. Mindful still of the time when he had been "about town," he was very particular in his dress: his black coat, neatly relieved in the evening by a white under-waistcoat, and a shirt-front admirably platted, with plain studs of dark enamel—his well-cut trousers, and elaborately-polished shoes—(he was good humouredly vain of his feet and hands)—won for him the common praise of the dandies, (who occasionally honoured him with a visit, to shoot his game, and flirt with his daughter,) "that old Merton was a most gentlemanlike fellow—so damned nice for a person!"

Into "this delightful family," Evelyn Cameron—now a lovely young woman, whom the reader has reason to believe the daughter of Alice and Maltravers, and who is known to the world as the step-child and rich heiress of the deceased banker, Templeton, afterwards Lord Vargrave, and the destined bride of his nephew, Lumley Ferrers, now Lord Vargrave—has just been received as a distinguished visitor. Mrs Merton is the daughter, though most unlike, that benevolent Mrs Leslie, who had rescued Alice and her infant from disgrace and poverty; and procured her the friendship of the banker, and who has faithfully preserved her secret. The Sequel opens some years after the death of the banker, and when Evelyn has nearly attained the age of eighteen, at which period she was, by the banker's will, either to give her hand to Lumley or forfeit a part of her fortune. Mother and daughter had spent the last few years in a cottage in Devonshire, a beautiful retirement, to which Alice Lady Vargrave was deeply attached, for mysterious reasons unknown to her daughter. Evelyn is the true heroine of the new volumes, and, until the consummation, the melancholy Alice, her alleged mother, is but slightly noticed. She is, from the first to last, a meek, passive character, acted upon by others, through the medium of her affections, and without moving impulse, save the illusion on which her heart had been concentrated, since the Miranda of the moor had first become conscious of any self-existent sentiment. She was now some years beyond thirty, "that critical boundary in the life of beauty." "Her form was slight and delicate in its proportion, nor was her countenance the less lovely, because, from its gentleness and repose, (not unmixed with a certain sadness,) the coarse and the gay might have thought it wanting in expression." With this lady, sat the venerable Mrs Lealie; once the consolator and the benefactress, now the warmly-approving friend, to whose affectionate compliments Alice replied:—

"You cannot make me vain," said she, with a sweet and melancholy smile. "I remember what I was when you first gave shelter to the poor desolate wanderer and her fatherless child; and I, who was then so poor and destitute, what should I be, if I was deaf to the poverty and sorrows of others—others, too, who are better than I am? But now, Evelyn, as you say, is growing up; the time approaches when she must decide on accepting or rejecting Lord Vargrave;—and yet in this village how can she compare him with others? how can she form a choice?"

And Evelyn was, accordingly, sent to learn the sciences of the world, in the rectory of Merton. It was a good school; but she was not an apt pupil. Her young grief at leaving, for the first time, her home, her mother, and her guardian genius, the venerable Aubrey, the curate of the parish, and a true Chaucer-priest, are all beautifully described; though, we confess, there is relief from the tedium of excessive affection and amiability in the worldly shrewdness of Lumley Ferrers, and in the frank, if commonplace, ambition of Caroline Merton. She is already old in the science of the world; but, if weak in principle, she is not wholly destitute of heart.

And Evelyn, the daughter of Alice Lady Vargrave—another beautiful combination of the sweet qualities and attributes of woman, as different from the low-born, devoted mistress of the English affection, as from the accomplished Madame de St. Vantadour, or the lofty Lady Florence Lascelles—how, when they meet, shall her unconscious father, the impassioned Malteser, the enthusiastic adorer of the good and the beautiful, help being deeply in love with her? It is a tantalizing mystery; but the reader need neither be grieved nor shocked. Mr Elwer has made the freest use of the license of romance, in outraging probability; and so all comes right at last. Wesley this week in Amica—that we may have the more confidence in presenting his youngest beauty, his most perfect specimen of the sex in every adorable and engaging attribute.

Evelyn Cameron was beautiful—a beauty that came from the heart and went to the heart—a beauty, the very spirit of which was love. Love smiled on her dimpled lips; it reposed on her open brow; it played in the profuse and careless ringlets of darkest yet sunniest auburn, that a breeze could lift from her delicate and virgin cheek. Love, in all its tenderness, murmured in her low, melodious voice; in all its kindness—its unsuspecting truth—love coloured every thought; in all its symmetry and glorious womanhood, love swelled the swan-like neck, and moulded the rounded limb.

She was just the kind of person that takes the judgment by storm—whether gay or grave—there was so charming and irresistible a grace about her. She seemed born not only to captivate the giddy, but to turn the heads of the sage. Roxalana was nothing to her. How, in the obscure hamlet of Brook Green, she had learned all the arts of pleasing, it is impossible to say. In her arch smile, the pretty toss of her head, the half-shyness, half-freedom of her winning ways, it was as if Nature had made her to delight one heart, and torment all others.

Without being learned, the mind of Evelyn was cultivated and well informed. Her heart, perhaps, helped to instruct her understanding; for, by a kind of intuition, she could appreciate all that was beautiful and elevated. Her unvitiated and guileless taste had a logic of its own: no schoolman had ever a quicker penetration into truth—no critic ever more readily detected the meretricious and the false. The book that Evelyn could admire, was sure to be stamped with the impress of the noble, the lovely, or the true.

But Evelyn had faults—the faults of her age—yes, rather, she had tendencies that might conduct to error. She was of so generous a nature, that the very thought of sacrificing herself for another had a charm. She ever acted from impulse—impulse pure and good, but often rash and imprudent. She was yielding to weakness—persuaded into anything—so sensitive that even a cold look from one moderately liked, cut her to the heart; and, by the sympathy that accompanies sensitiveness, no pain was so great as that of giving pain to another. Hence it was that Vargrave might form reasonable hopes of his ultimate success. It was a dangerous constitution for happiness. How many chances must combine to preserve to the mid-day of characters like this, the sunshine of their dawn!

Yet Evelyn escaped all these dangers. Her share of "The Mysteries," is neither perplexed nor painful.

The rector duly appreciated his young guest, the rich heiress, and future wife of Lord Vargrave, a man already in office, and a probable Cabinet Minister, whom, moreover, she might reject, for his own son, the astoré. He ordered her dresses more suitable to her fortune and rank than her simple Devonshire wardrobe; procured her a fashionable abigail; and, instead of the intended small chamber, with its French bed, installed her in the apartments usually occupied by the Dowager Countess of Chipperton, at her yearly Christmas visit to the rectory. The rectory was opportunely situated in the very vicinity of Burleigh—the fine old Elizabethan place of the ancient Maltesers, who had kept returned to England since grief for the death of his betrothed Lady Florence had driven him from public life, and into exile. It so chanced that, when the young ladies of the rectory went one day to explore the beauties and wonders of Barchin, the misanthropic owner had returned. To his great indignation, the strangers had made their way through an open window into his magnificent ancient library, and he was just ordering his steward, in a very haughty, Norman-like tone, to drive away the intruders, when "a voice of such heavenly sweetness was heard without, that it arrested his own step, and made the stern Maltravers start in his seat. He held up his hand to the steward, to delay his errand, and listened, charmed and spell-bound. His own words came on his ear—words long unfamiliar to him, and, at first, but imperfectly remembered—words connected with the early and virgin years of poetry and aspiration—words that were as the ghosts of thoughts now far too gentle for his altered soul. He bowed down his head, and the dark shade left his brow."

At the conclusion of her song, Evelyn was left alone by her companions, gazing, absorbed, on an interesting portrait of the mother of the owner of the Hall, who had expired in giving him birth:—

It was a beautiful vision, as she thus stood, with her delicate bloom, her luxuriant hair, (for the hat was not yet replaced,) her elastic form, so full of youth, and health, and hope—the living form beside the faded canvas of the dead—once youthful, tender, lovely as herself! Evelyn turned away with a sigh—the sigh was swooned yet more deeply. She started: the door that led to the study was opened, and, in the aperture, was the figure of a man in the prime of life. His hair, still luxuriant as in his earliest youth, though darkened by the suns of the East, curled over a forehead of majestic expanse. The high and proud features, that well became a stature above the ordinary standard; the pale but bronzed complexion; the large eyes, of deepest blue, shaded by dark brows and lashes; and, more than all, that expression at once of passion and repose which characterizes the old Italian portraits, and seems to denote the inscrutable power that experience imparts to intellect—constituted an ensemble which, if not faultlessly handsome, was eminently striking, and adapted at once to interest and command. It was a face, once seen, never to be forgotten; it was a face that had long, half unconsciously, haunted Evelyn's young dreams; it was a face she had seen before, though, then younger, and milder, and fairer; it wore a different aspect.

This is the reader's old friend, Maltravers, and, as the said reader has every reason to imagine, the father of Evelyn. Maltravers, who on former occasions, had repelled the polite advances of the rector, now gladly accepted his civilities, and became a daily guest at the rectory, the playmate of the children; the companion and admirer, in the fair way of becoming the ardent lover of Evelyn, the affianced bride of his perfidious friend, Lumley Ferrers—his own child, as the reader of "The Mysteries" trembles to remember. Meanwhile, how had time and experience dealt with him? Hitherto, we have seen but the exterior, and "The Man of Gentian" is now in another stage of being—clothed with civilization, and clothed with many of the triumphs which civilization brings, and still, and disquiet, the gloom of his nature, he had almost forgotten; his scarce redeemed from primal baseness. The adventures through which he had passed, and in which life itself could only be preserved by wary vigilance and ready energies, had forced him, for a while, from the indulgence of morbid contemplations. His heart, indeed, had been left inactive; but his intellect, and his physical powers, had been kept in hourly exercise. He returned to the world of his equals with a mind laden with the treasures of a various and vast experience, and with much of the same gloomy moral as that which, on emerging from the Catacombs, assailed the restless speculations of Rabelais, of the vanity of human life, and the folly of mortal aspirations.

Ernest Maltravers, never a faultless or completed character, falling short in practice of his own capacities; moral and intellectual, from his very desire to overpass the limits of the Great and Good, was seemingly as far as heretofore from the grand secret of life. It was not so in reality—his mind had acquired what before it wanted—hardness; and we are nearer to true virtue and true happiness, when we demand too little from men, than when we exact too much.

Nevertheless, partly from the strange life that had thrown him amongst men whom safety itself made it necessary to command despotically—partly from the habit of power, and disdain of the world—his nature was incrustated with a stern imperiousness of manner, often approaching to the harsh and morose, though beneath it lurked generosity and benevolence.

Many of his younger feelings, more amiable and complex, had settled into one predominant quality, which more or less had always characterized him—Pride! Self-esteem made inactive, and Ambition made discontented, usually engender haughtiness. In Maltravers this quality, which, properly controlled and duly softened, is the essence and life of honour, was carried to a vice. He was perfectly conscious of its excess, but he cherished it as a virtue. Pride had served to console him in sorrow, and, therefore, it was a friend—it had supported him when disgusted with fraud, or in resistance to violence; and, therefore, it was a champion and a fortress. It was a pride of a peculiar sort—it attached itself to no one point in especial—not to talent, knowledge, mental gifts—still less to the vulgar commonplaces of birth and fortune;—it rather resulted from a supreme and wholesale contempt of all other men, and all their objects—of ambition—of glory—of the hard business of life. His favourite virtue was fortitude—it was on this that he now mainly valued himself.

Enough of Maltravers—of the man actuated by "morbid and morose philosophy, begot by a proud spirit upon a lonely heart"—a philosophy fast disappearing before the smiles and fascinations of Evelyn. And now the proud man shared in childish sports, and claimed his prize in the baby lottery, of which the prizes were drawn by Evelyn, and "remained all day at the Rectory, and shared in the buff—yes, he danced with Evelyn—he—Maltravers—who had never been known to dance since he was twenty-two! The ice was fairly broken—Maltravers was at home with the Mertons."

And Evelyn combated his false philosophy, his misanthropic pride, his scepticism, his contempt of mankind, their needs and pursuits—combated them with the "fistiness of truth, powerful in her young and pure hands; she would convince him of his error, and restore him to his race." The task, perilous to herself, was not less dangerous to her pupil, her daughter.

By degrees she grew more and more familiar with her stern friend; and in that familiarity there was perhaps fascination to Maltravers. She could laugh him at any moment, but of his most touching and tender side, she a pretty willfulness, his most favourite woman may, even would have, with tolerating starting, if he was not always at the command of her wishes or caprice. At this time, it seemed certain that Maltravers would fall in love with Evelyn; but it rested on more doubtful probabilities whether Evelyn would fall in love with him.

One seems getting on ticklish ground; but we are quit for our fears. Lumley Ferrers, the gay, bold-faced, frank villain, comes upon the scene, and Maltravers retires for a time, to struggle against his dawning passion, and cherish "his peasantry," correct the abuses of the old poor-laws, and play the benevolent landlord, which, it seems, may best be done by curbing public charity, and exercising individual beneficence through the small allotment system. The portrait of Lumley Ferrers—transformed from the able, dexterous commoner, who gave easy, unpretending, bachelor dinners in his small house in Great George Street, with plenty of flour in the sauce for the personal od's head, into a member of the Upper House, and a rising man in the government—is, in many respects, both more real and not less profound than the more ambitious sketch of his rival.

Before a large table, covered with Parliamentary papers, sat Lumley Lord Vargrave. His complexion, though still healthy, had faded from the freshness of hue that distinguished him in youth. His features, always sharp, had grown yet more angular; his brow seemed to project more broodingly over his eyes, which, though of undiminished brightness, were sunk deep in their sockets, and had lost much of their quick restlessness. The character of his mind had begun to stamp itself on the physiognomy, especially on the mouth when in repose—it was a face striking for acute intelligence, for concentrated energy; but there was something written in it which said, "BEWARE!" It would have inspired any one who had mixed much amongst men, with a vague suspicion and distrust.

Lumley had been always careful, though plain in dress; but there was now a more evident attention bestowed on his person than he had ever manifested in youth, while there was something of the Roman's celebrated foppiness in the skill with which his hair was arranged on his high forehead, as either to conceal or relieve a partial baldness at the temples. Perhaps, too, from the possession of high station, or the habit of living only amongst the great, there was a certain dignity insensibly diffused over his whole person, that was not noticeable in his earlier years—when a certain ton de garcon was blended with his ease of manner; yet, even now, dignity was not his prevalent characteristic; and, in ordinary occasions, or mixed society, he still found a familiar frankness, a more useful species of simulation.

The political career of Lumley, his arts and intrigues, are sketched in a masterly style; but, to understand the merits of this delineation of a modern second-rate statesman, he must be seen at large. He was suspected by his own party, to whom he played false, and left out of the administration when it was reinstated, but afterwards terrified the government into taking him back, though he obtained no higher office, and was still excluded from the Cabinet, the grand object of his ambition:—

Lumley, burning with resentment, longed to decline the offer; but, still, he was poor, and what was worse, inferior to his poverty, but not his will, consented. He was grieved that, though passionately improved as a politician, he felt that he had not advanced as a public man. His ambition inflamed by his discontent, he had, and his means to time, strained every nerve to strengthen his position. He met the sarcasms on his poverty, he greatly increasing his expenditure; and by advertising everywhere his engagement to an heiress, whose fortune, great as it was, he easily contrived to magnify. As his old house in Great George Street—well fitted for the bustling commoner—was no longer suited to the official and fashionable peer, he had, on his accession to the title, exchanged that respectable residence for a large mansion in Hamilton Place; and his sober dinners were succeeded by splendid banquets. Naturally, he had no taste for such things; his mind was too nervous and his temper too hard to take pleasure in luxury or ostentation. But, now as ever, he acted upon a system. Living in a country governed by the mightiest and wealthiest aristocracy in the world, which, from the first class almost to the lowest, ostentation pervades—the very backbone and marrow of society—he felt that to fall far short of his rivals in display was to give them an advantage which he could not compensate, either by the power of his connexions, or the surpassing loftiness of his character and genius. Playing for a great game, and with his eyes open to all the consequences, he cared not for involving his private fortunes in a lottery, in which a great prize might be drawn. To do Vargrave justice, money which him had never been an object, but a means—he was grasping, but not avaricious.

He more than ever required Evelyn's fortune, and his arts had converted the ambitious Caroline Merton into his reluctant, though subervient instrument in this and other purposes of aggrandizement. In return for her love and her devotion, he helps her to a husband, of whom this is the portrait. It looks like an original.

Lord Doltimore—

Was a small, pale man, with a very limited share of understanding; supercilious in manner, elaborate in dress, not ill-natured au fond, and with much of the English gentleman in his disposition—that is, he was honourable in his ideas and actions, whenever his natural dulness and neglected education enabled him clearly to perceive (through the midst of prejudices, the delusions of others, and the false lights of the dissipated society in which he had lived) what was right and what wrong. But his leading characteristics were vanity and conceit. He had lived much with younger sons, cleverer than himself, who borrowed his money, sold him their horses, and won from him at cards. In return, they gave him all that species of flattery which young men can give with so hearty an appearance of cordial admiration. "You certainly have the best horses in Paris. You are really a devilish good fellow, Doltimore. Oh, do you know, Doltimore, what little Désiré says of you? You have certainly turned the girl's head."

We may add that, at twenty-two, with a proxy in the House of Peers, and a county and borough at command, Doltimore was worth cultivating. The cold, callous, deliberate villainy of Lumley, and the gradual acquiescence of Caroline Merton in his schemes, when she had played with the serpent till it coiled around her, and she could not longer escape its fascinations and folds, are ably depicted, and with a strong air of reality, in spite of the repulsive nature of their compact, and the improbability of communications unnaturally frank, upon subjects so humiliating to the pride and painful to the affection of the victim.

Meantime, Mr Cleveland, Maltravers' old and most paternal guardian, is as desirous as ever that his young friend—now no longer young—should mix again with the world—and give Bunleigh a mistress:—

showing interest of the theme, "that you should marry a mere ~~thing~~ but an amiable woman, who, like yourself, has seen something of life, and knows how to reckon on its cares, and to be contented with its enjoyments."

"You have said enough," said Maltravers, impatiently—"an experienced woman of the world, whose freshness of hope and heart is gone! What a picture! No; to me there is something inexpressively beautiful in innocence and youth. But you say justly, my years are not those that would make a union with youth desirable, or well suited."

"I do not say that," said Cleveland, taking a pinch of snuff; "but you should avoid great disparity of age—not for the sake of that disparity itself, but because, with it, is involved discord of temper, pursuits. A very young woman, new to the world, will not be contented with home alone; you are at once too gentle to curb her wishes, and a little too stern and reserved (pardon me for saying so) to be quite congenial to very early and sanguine youth."

Cleveland made a visit to the Rectory that night alone, and saw the new-arrived Lord Vargrave devoting himself to Evelyn Cameron, and she—

"What a sweet face!—so modest, yet so intelligent! I talked with her a good deal during the deals, in which I cut out. I almost lost my heart to her."

"So Lord Vargrave devoted himself to Miss Cameron?"

"To be sure; you know they are to be married soon. Merton told me so. She is very rich. He is the luckiest fellow imaginable, that Vargrave! But he is much too old for her: she seems to think so too. I can't explain why I think it; but, by her pretty, reserved manner, I saw that she tried to keep the gay minister at distance; but it would not do. Now, if you were ten years younger, or Miss Cameron ten years older, you might have had some chance of cutting out your old friend."

"So you think I also am too old for a lover?"

"For a lover of a girl of seventeen, certainly. You seem touchy on the score of age, Ernest."

"Not I," and Maltravers laughed.

"No! There was a young gentleman present, who, I think, Vargrave might really find a dangerous rival—Colonel Legard—one of the handsomest men I ever saw in my life; just the style to turn a romantic young lady's head; a mixture of the wild and the thoroughbred; black curls, superb eyes, and the softest manners in the world. But, to be sure, he has lived all his life in the best society."

"I can't help pitying her—married to one so careless and worldly as Lord Vargrave—thrown so young into the whirl of London. Poor thing! she had better have fallen in love with Legard; which, I dare say, she will do after all."

And so she did, and married him too, but not until she has suffered herself, and been the cause of great distraction and final despair to Maltravers, who, after her known rejection of Lumley, and a variety of incidents, is led to believe that he has made a deep impression upon her affections, and obtains the promise of her hand. This fair prospect is blighted by the interference of the rejected Lumley, now almost hating the girl who had stepped between him and his uncle's inheritance, and yet resolving that she should be his, as the only means of acquiring the fortune which his style of living had made so necessary. He was, by this time, drowned in debt.

By a string of lucky accidents, and his own wit, Lumley learns the early connexion between Alice Darvil, his uncle's wife, and Maltravers, and the birth of their child, whose existence was still unknown to its supposed father. The mocking fiend hurries to Paris, to dash the cup of felicity from the lip of his enraptured friend, so when paradise was opening, in the prospect of an immediate marriage with the charming Evelyn. A conversation held with her respecting her beloved mother's musical tastes and secluded habits, has, in some degree, prepared Maltravers for the agitating interview with Lumley. After he returned home—

He felt a vague, unaccountable curiosity respecting this secluded and solitary mother; all concerning her early fate seemed so wrapped in mystery. . . . He sleeps ill that night—dark and ill-boding dreams disturbed his slumber. He rose late, and dejected by presentiments he could not master; his morning meal was scarcely over—and he had already taken his hat to go to Evelyn's for comfort and sunshine—when the door opened, and he was surprised by the entrance of Lord Vargrave.

Lumley seated himself with a formal gravity very unusual to him; and, as if anxious to waive unnecessary explanations, began, as follows, with a serious and impressive voice and aspect:—

"Maltravers, of late years we have both estranged from each other; I do not presume to dictate to you your friendships or your dislikes. Why this estrangement has happened, you alone can determine. For my part, I am conscious of no offence; that which I was I am still. It is you who have changed. Whether it be the difference of our political opinions, or any other and more secret cause, I know not."

But we may pass these preliminary explanations and recriminations. Maltravers defended in frankly proclaiming, his love for Evelyn—

"Stay!" said Lord Vargrave (who, plunged in a gloomy reverie, had scarcely seemed to hear the last few sentences of his rival); "Stay, Maltravers. Speak not of love to Evelyn!—a horrible foreboding tells me that, a few hours hence, you would rather pluck out your tongue by the roots, than couple the words of love with the thought of that unfortunate girl. Oh, if I were vindictive, what awful triumph would await me now! What retaliation on your harsh judgment—your cold contempt—your momentary and wretched victory over me!—Heaven is my witness, that my only sentiment is that of terror and woe! Maltravers, in your earliest youth, did you form connexion with one whom they called Alice Darvil?"

"Alice!—merciful Heaven! what of her?"

"Did you never know that the Christian name of Evelyn's mother is Alice?"

"I never asked—I never knew—but it is a common name," faltered Maltravers.

"Listen to me," resumed Vargrave: "with Alice Darvil you lived in the neighbourhood of—, did you not?"

"Go on—go on!"

"You took the name of Butler—by that name Alice Darvil was afterwards known, in the town in which my uncle resided—(there are gaps in the history that I cannot, of my own knowledge fill up)—she taught music—my uncle became enamoured of her—but he was vain and worldly. She removed into Devonshire, and he married her there, under the name of Cameron; by which name he hoped to conceal from the world the lowliness of her origin, and the humble calling she had followed. Hold! do not interrupt me. Alice had one daughter, as was supposed, by a former marriage—that daughter was the offspring of him whose name she bore—yes, of the false Butler!—that daughter is Evelyn Cameron!"

"Liar—devil!" cried Maltravers, springing to his feet, as if a shot had pierced his heart. "Prove your proofs!"

These were produced to the satisfaction of the dupe—for Maltravers had been duped, and Lumley was now in possession of the key to the grand mystery. He was aware that Evelyn was the mysterious child of his uncle, and that, in consequence of the though Alice had adopted her as her own—as soon as her infant—the child of her lover—had been laid in the lonely churchyard, near the cottage in Devonshire. An affecting interview between Maltravers and his betrothed confirms his fears, and raises his despair to passionate horror. He returned to Lumley:—

“You have saved me from a dreadful crime—from an everlasting remorse—I thank you!”

Hardened and frigid as his nature was, Lumley was touched: the movement of Maltravers took him by surprise. “It has been a dreadful duty, Ernest,” said he, pressing the hand he held; “but to come, too, from me, your rival!”

“Proceed, proceed, I pray you; explain all this. Yet explanation—what do I want to know?—Evelyn is my daughter—Alice’s child! For God’s sake, give me hope—say it is not so—say that she is Alice’s child, but not mine! Father, father!—and they call it a holy name—it is a horrible one!”

“Compose yourself, my dear friend: recollect what you have escaped! You will recover this shock: time—travel!”

“Peace, man, peace. Now, then, I am calm! When Alice left me, she had no child. I knew not that she bore within her the pledge of our ill-omened and erring love. Verily, the sins of my youth have risen against me; and The Curse has come home to root!”

“I cannot explain to you all details.”

“But why not have told me of this? Why not have warned me?—why not have said to me, when my heart could have been satisfied by so sweet a tie—‘Thou hast a daughter—thou art not desolate?’ Why reserve the knowledge of the blessing until it has turned to poison? Fie! that you are!—you have waited this hour to gloat over the agony from which a word from you a year, nay, a month ago—a little month ago—might have saved me and her!” Maltravers, as he spoke, approached Vargrave, with eyes sparkling with fierce passion; his hands clenched, his form dilated, the veins on his forehead swelled like cords. It was a fearful spectacle; for the frame of Maltravers was one that, from its perfect symmetry, was endowed with extraordinary power and strength; and now the governing intellect seemed benumbed and laid asleep; and all the fierceness, and might, and wrath, of the animal man alone, were visibly aroused. Lumley, brave as he was, recoiled.

These are among the most powerful of the dramatic scenes in the new volumes. It was necessary to the success of the schemes of Lumley, that Maltravers and Alice should not meet; and he invents many plausible reasons to prevent an event fatal to his designs.

Maltravers fixed his piercing eyes on Lumley, while he thus spoke, and listened in deep attention.

“It matters not,” said he, after a long pause, “whether these be your real reasons for wishing to defer or prevent a meeting between Alice and myself. The affliction that has come upon me bursts with too clear and scorching a blaze of light, for me to see any chance of escape or mitigation. Even if she were the daughter of Alice by another, she would be for ever separated from me. The mother and the child!—pah! there is a kind of incest even in that thought! But such an alleviation of my anguish is forbidden to my reason. No, poor Alice, I will not disturb the repose thou hast won at last! Thou shalt never have the grief to know that our error has brought upon thy lover so black a doom! All is over!—the world never shall find me again. Nothing is left for me but the desert and the grave!”

“Speak not so, Ernest,” said Lord Vargrave, soothingly. “A little while and you will recover this blow: your control over passion has, even in youth, inspired me with magnification and surprise; and now, in calmer years, and with such incentives to self-mastery, your strength will come sooner than you think. Evelyn, too, is so young, she has not known you long; perhaps her love, after all, is thus caused by some anxiety, but cannot working of nature, and she would rejoice to call you ‘father.’ Happy years are yet in store for you!”

Maltravers did not listen to these vain and hollow consolations. With his head drooping on his bosom, his whole form unmoved, the large tears rolling unobscured down his cheeks, he seemed the very picture of the broken-hearted man, whom Fate never again could raise from despair.

Lord Vargrave’s plots succeed so far that Maltravers is driven from the scene, and the young Legard, the really beloved of Evelyn, is also absent, having ceded his pretensions to the higher claims of his benefactor, Maltravers. The young heiress has at last consented to reconcile all her duties, by becoming the wife of Lumley. In the meantime, a secret impulse, the spiriting of his good genius, leads the despairing Maltravers from his retreat in Switzerland back to England, where business besides demanded his presence; and, by a romantic accident, a poor wandering woman rode over by Lumley Ferrers, whom Ernest had benevolently relieved a year before, gives him on her death-bed, and unconscious of his deep interest in her strange tale, a key to the mystery of Evelyn’s birth. He forthwith hastens to the cottage of Alice, the ever true, the early beloved; and the ostensible, not the real wife of the banker. But we must borrow a snatch of explanatory retrospect, before the early lovers meet again. Before the marriage ceremony, Alice had made the banker take a strange oath.

For the first year or two, Templeton evinced some alarming disposition to escape from the oath he had imposed upon himself; but, on the slightest hint, there was a sternness in the wife, in all else so respectful, so submissive, that repressed and awed him. She even threatened—and at one time was with difficulty prevented carrying the threat into effect—to leave his roof for ever, if there were the slightest question of the sanctity of his vow. Templeton trembled; such a separation would excite gossip, curiosity, scandal, a noise in the world, public talk, possible discovery. Besides, Alice was necessary to Evelyn, necessary to his own comfort; something to soid in health, something to rely upon in illness. Gradually then, but sullenly, he reconciled himself to his lot, and, as years and infirmities grew upon him, he was contented, at least, to have secured a faithful friend and an anxious nurse. Still a marriage of this sort was not bliss: Templeton’s vanity was wounded; his temper, always harsh, was soured; he avenged his affront by a thousand petty tyrannies; and, without a murmur, Alice perhaps, in those years of rank and opulence, suffered more than in all her roofless wanderings, with love at her heart, and her infant in her arms.

While her husband—if husband he might be called—lived, Alice had seemed to bury in her bosom her regret—deep, mighty, passionate, as it was—for her lost child—the child of the forgotten lover, to whom, through such trials, and amid such new ties, she had been faithful from first to last. But, when each wave free, her heart flew back to the far and lowly grave. Hence, her yearly visits to Brook Green—hence, her purchase of the cottage, hallowed by memories of the dead. There, on that lawn, had she borne forth the fragile form, to breathe the soft nocturnal air;—there, in that chamber, had she watched, and hoped, and prayed, and despaired; there, in that quiet burial-ground, rested the beloved dead!

And now the image of the lover of her youth—which, during her marriage, she had sought, at least, to banish—returned to her, and, at times, inspired her with the only hopes that the grave had not yet extinguished.

Humboldt interrupted her with an exclamation, on an conversation with Mrs. Leslie—whose friendship she still maintained—she found that both concurred in thinking that this obscure and wandering Butler, so skilled in an art in which even himself in man is generally professional, must have had some great past; perhaps a humble station. Ah! now that she was free and rich, if she were to meet him again, and his love was not all gone, and he would believe in her strange and constant truth—now, his infidelity could be forgiven—forgotten, in the benefits it might be hers to bestow! And how, poor Alice, in that remote village, was chance to throw him in your way? She knew not; but something often whispered to her—“Again you shall meet those eyes—again you shall hear that voice; and you shall tell him, weeping on his breast, how you loved his child!” And would he not have forgotten her?—would he not have formed new ties?—could he read the loveliness of unchangeable affection in that pale and pensive face? Alas! when we love intensely, it is difficult to make us fancy that there is no love in return!

And they met again. It was in the little parlour of the curate Aubrey, which Alice entered, fancying all the while the stranger seated in the accustomed chair, her venerable friend.

“Do not let me interrupt you,” said that sweet, low voice whose music had been dumb for so many years to Maltravers—“but I have a letter from France, from a stranger—it alarms me so, it is about Evelyn!”—and, as if to imply that she meditated a longer visit than ordinary, Lady Vargrave removed her bonnet, and placed it on the table. Surprised that the curate had not answered, had not come forward to welcome her, she then approached: Maltravers rose, and they stood before each other face to face. And how lovely still was Alice! levelier he thought even than of old! And those eyes, so distinctly blue, so dewlike and soft, yet with some spiritual and unfathomable mystery in their clear depth, were once more fixed upon him. Alice seemed turned to stone; she moved not—she spoke not—she scarcely breathed; she gazed spell-bound, as if her senses—as if life itself—had deserted her.

“Alice!” murmured Maltravers—“Alice, we meet at last!”

His voice restored memory, consciousness, youth, at once to her! She uttered a loud cry of unspeakable joy, of rapture! She sprang forward—reserve, fear, time, change, all forgotten—she threw herself into his arms, she clasped him to her heart again and again!—the faithful dog that has found his master expresses not his transport more uncontrollably, more wildly. It was something fearful—the excess of her ecstasy!—she kissed his hands, his clothes; she laughed, she wept; and at last, as words came, she laid her head on his breast, and said, passionately—“I have been true to thee! I have been true to thee—or this hour would have killed me!” Then, as if alarmed by his silence, she looked up into his face, and, as his burning tears fell upon her cheek, she said again, and with a more hurried vehemence—“I have been faithful—do you not believe me?”

“I do—I do, noble, unequalled Alice! Why, why were you so long lost to me? Why now does your love so shame my own?”

At these words, Alice appeared to awaken from her first oblivion of all that had chanced since they met: she blushed deeply, and drew herself gently and bashfully from his embrace. “Ah!” she said, in altered and humbled accents, “you have loved another! perhaps you have no love left for me! Is it so? Is it? No, no—those eyes—you love me—you love me still!”

And again she clung to him, as if it were heaven to believe all things, and dash to dust. Then, after a pause, she drew him gently with both her hands, towards the light, and gazed upon him fondly, proudly, as if to trace, line by line, and feature by feature, the countenance which had been to her sweet thoughts as the sunlight to the flower—of silence, changed, she murmured—“but still the same—still beautiful, still divine!” She stopped; a sudden thought struck her, his garments were worn and called by travel, and that princely dress, fallen and rejected, no longer powered in proud defiance above the sons of men. “You are not rich,” she exclaimed, eagerly—“say you are not rich! I am rich enough for both; it is all yours—all yours—I did not betray you for it; there is no shame in it—oh, we shall be so happy. Thou art come back to thy poor Alice! thou knowest how she loved thee!” There was in Alice’s manner, her wild joy, something so different from her ordinary self, that none who could have seen her—quiet, pensive, subdued—could have fancied her the same being.

Suddenly her colour faded; the smile passed from the dimpled lips; a sad and solemn aspect succeeded to that expression of passionate joy—“Come,” she said, in a whisper, “come, follow”—and, still clasping his hand, she drew him to the door. Silent and wonderingly he followed her across the lawn, through the moss-grown gate, and into the lonely burial-ground. She moved on with a noiseless and gliding step—so pale, so hushed, so breathless, that, even in the noon-day, you might have half fancied the fair shape was not owned by earth. She paused where the yew tree cast its gloomy shadow; and the small and tombless mound, separated from the rest, was before them. She pointed to it, and, falling on her knees beside it, murmured—“Hush! it sleeps below—thy child!” She covered her face with both her hands, and her form shook convulsively.

Beside that form, and before that grave, knelt Maltravers. There, vanished the last remnant of his stoic pride; and there—Evelyn herself forgotten—there did he pray to Heaven for pardon to himself, and blessings on the heart he had betrayed. There, solemnly did he vow the remainder of his years to guard, from all future ill, the faithful and childless mother!

We have forbore to notice the De Montaignes and the poetic, half-mad Italian of the former volumes, now the inmate of a mad-house near Versailles. By his hand, retributive justice is dealt to Lumley, who is found dead in his bed, just when his villainous schemes, as they seemed fast ripening, were once more toppling upon his head. He had been suffocated by the powerful and cunning maniac, the deceived instrument of his former villany and treachery. The history and the fate of this Italian give rise to some powerful and poetical writing. The crime of the madman, who immediately commits suicide, passes undetected by the authorities; and his amiable relatives, the De Montaignes, escape the consequent disgrace.

Justice is also done upon the unhappy Caroline Merton, Lady Doltimore; and everything is satisfactorily explained to Evelyn, who is made aware of her real parentage, and in Maltravers sees Mr Butler, the early and long-lost lover of her supposed mother. Her fortune has been lost by the schemes of Lumley; gulled by a cunning rascal, whom he had tried to deceive. But it matters not—Legard loved Evelyn for herself; and her hand was, in due time, bestowed on him by Maltravers. As the carriage bore away the newly-married pair from the cottage of Alice, the spell was dissolved for ever.

There stood before the lonely man the idol of his early youth, the Alice, still perhaps as fair and once young and passionate, as Evelyn—pale, changed, but lovelier than of old, if heavenly patience and holy thought, and the trials that purify and exalt, can shed ever human features something more beautiful than bloom.

The good Curate alone was present, besides these two survivors of the error and the love that make the happiness and the misery of so many of our kind. And the old man, after contemplating them a moment, stood silent.

ceived away. . . . "And, ah," murmured Alice softly, as she looked up from his breast—"I ask not if you have loved others since we parted—man's faith is so different from ours—I ask only if you love me now?"

"More! oh, immeasurably more, than in our youngest days," cried Maltravers, with fervent passion. "More fondly—more reverently—more trustfully, than I ever loved living being!—even her in whose youth and innocence I adored the memory of thee! Here have I found that which shames the ideal. Here have I found a virtue that, coming at once from God and Nature, has been wiser than all my false philosophy, and firmer than all my pride!"

Such is a meagre outline of the sequel to "Maltravers"—a work remarkable for beauties, and abounding in defects even as a literary composition. To the incidental discussions on literature, philosophy, or politics—the embossed ornaments, which, though not essential to the work, harmonize well enough with its character and structure—we have not adverted. They are worthy of the author; and, in tone and sentiment, exactly what might be expected from him. The moral of his story is as good as one who "writes to please" durst make it; but, when a man of genius shall sit down to illustrate the true philosophy of error and atonement, compensation and reward, in a fiction, he must take higher ground than this. Fifty years later in time, fifty years equal to centuries of ordinary time, Mr Bulwer, on moral vantage ground, lags thousands of leagues behind Inchbald, Godwin, and even Kotzebue.

A HYMN FOR THE STUDENTS OF GOTTINGEN.

AWAKE, Allemaine!

From your slumber awake,
And shake off your chains,
For humanity's sake!
Shall the savage unlettered
E'er pant to be free,
While slavery's bondage
Dishonours e'en thee?

Shake off, Allemaine,
Your inglorious trance;
Besotted as Spain,
And derided by France!

New despots are forging
New fetters to gail thee—
Awake, Allemaine!

Or may ages enthral thee! ¶

Arise, Allemaine,
'Gainst your tyrants, in scorn!
Disperse them like mist
In the eye of the morn!

The shrines of your learning
They've dared to profane—
New GORAS are your rulers!—
Arise, Allemaine!

Awake, Allemaine!
For the last of your Lords
Your young blood hath spilt
With his satellite swords;
On the threshold, fair SCIENCE!
That leads to thy Fane,
His horsemen have charged them—
Awake, Allemaine!

Arise, Allemaine!
From the storm that hath lowered,
Let the lightning of vengeance
Spring forth on the coward;
Shall thy greyheaded sages
Invoke thee in vain?
They are mourning in exile!—
Arise, Allemaine!

DO KINGS OR NOBLES CARE FOR US?

WHEN you behold a king enthroned,
Or toiling to a foolish feast,
Or queens in luxury ensoned,
And treated like some heavenly guest—
Restrain yourself, keep on your hat,
Make not the least degrading fuss;
For, when the truth is spoken, what
Do kings or nobles care for us?

When you behold, with rakish lords,
A pompous bishop take his place,
And mark his empty, measured words,
And simpering nothingness of face—
Restrain yourself, keep on your hat,
Make not the least degrading fuss;
For, when the truth is spoken, what
Do lords or bishops care for us?

When you behold a reckless lord,
Great by his grandfather's deserts,
Walk boldly to the council board,
And frown as if a man of parts—
Restrain yourself, keep on your hat,
Make not the least degrading fuss;
For, if the truth were spoken, what Does any lordling care for us?

When at the hustings called to vote,
And having passed the taxman's shift,
You stand unshaved, in thread-bare coat,
To send a gentleman to thrift—

Restrain yourself, keep on your hat,
Your power is short, and think of this:
'Twere shame to cheer an empty flat,
Or help a scoundrel to a place.

When pensioned peers or dowagers,
With thousands by the month or year,
Pretend to open up their purse,
That they may in the prints appear—
Is't not as ocean should give back
A wave, while fifty thousand streams
Make barren many a beauteous track
To fill her?—whence, then, your acclaims?

The WORKING MAN should have one thought—
To be for ever free to toil;
And keep the wealth so dearly bought,
To make his own hearthstone to smile.
Some toil in this, and some in that;
But o'er the great make you no fuss;
Their toils may soon be told—and what Does any great man care for us?

The right divine to govern wrong
Is now an old insanity;
And lordly beggars will ere long
Be—what all beggars ought to be:
To such, all such, keep on your hat;
Despite their coldness or their fuss;
Despite them—were it even that
They should affect to care for us!

MISS MARTINEAU'S RETROSPECT OF AMERICAN TRAVEL

Two citizens of the young Republic of America have already realized, for themselves, wishes in effectually formed by two of the most powerful and benevolent of European sovereigns. Every child can read its Bible; and every working man has a pullet in the pot, if not something more substantial. It is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that those good wishes were expressed by Henri Quatre and George III., for the peasants of France and the children of Great Britain. The cause of the easy command over the comforts, and even the luxuries of life, which is enjoyed by every American citizen, of moderate industry, is the grand problem which has occupied the minds of the people of the Old World, since the democratic society of the United States took form, and began to display those splendid results, which the People of England now generally agree in resolving into the principle of self-government. "We are the happiest and the most prosperous nation on earth," say these proud Republicans, "precisely because we choose to manage our own interests ourselves, and that our system of government keeps us free of the evils under which the Old World groans; because we have no law of primogeniture, no state-church, no hereditary nobles, no standing army, no dead-weight, no national debt. Our democratic institutions act on our social prosperity, both as cause and effect. We have already put in action, as far as it has yet been done upon the face of the globe, the principle adopted as the basis of all government by the great English philosopher. Our rule is the happiness of the majority; and we press onward, to the higher social condition of "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," and, finally, of all. If the best means to promote this noblest condition of humanity have not always been taken, there is, at all events, no obstruction offered by our institutions to its triumphant progress." It is these considerations chiefly, which, since the suffering People of Europe have been aroused to thoughtfulness, have made every book be received with eagerness, which describes the condition of that democratic Republic, which has already, in prosperity and security, celebrated its first jubilee. Accounts of the poor man's land of promise, have become as fascinating as ancient legends, or the glorious tales of the old wars of fatherland. Real suffering—the actual lack of bread, or the equally distressing want of leisure, quiet, and ease of mind—has wrought mighty changes in opinion, since it has been discovered how, by energy and endeavour, these great wants may be supplied. This is especially the case in the country, parent and kindred to America, where, casting behind the dreams of the past, perhaps too recklessly, thought and hope are projected into the future. In travelling on a railway, some time since, we chanced to overhear a conversation between two individuals, or men of a similar rank, the one Whiggish, the other a Radical. The argument ended by the former declaring, with some heat—"Well, well, the like of you should all go to America!"—"We will do better than that," returned the astute democrat, in a tone of quiet determination—"we will bring America here." Along with many secondary reasons, the hope of bringing the attendant blessings of American institutions home to the bosom of a country which has no faults in the eyes of its sons, save those of its government—the England which, with all these faults, they love—was the report of every new traveller in the United States be perused with eager interest. Thus, every year has its new volumes, and all find readers. To gratify this appetite, Miss Martineau, in addition to her elaborate essay upon the mechanism and operation of the social order of America, has presented us with three new volumes, containing her "Random Recollections." These will probably be quite as welcome to the bulk of readers as their precursors. A good deal of the information and speculation found in the first work, might have been gained from other sources, and must have been familiar to all students of America, and to persons but moderately conversant with the history of the Republic, and the development of its institutions; whereas, the new work contains mainly the record or results of the author's personal adventures and observation, which could be obtained nowhere else.

After Miss Fanny Kemble's dash, and Mrs Trollope's "cuteness," one longed to see what a third lady, of equal accomplishment, but with more enlarged views, and, consequently, a better regulated temper, had to report of that great western world, which presents social phenomena of unceasing interest. Miss Martineau follows no strict rule of arrangement in her "Retrospect of Travel." After a rather minute account of her outward voyage, she selects her themes rather as they are related by character, than in the natural order of their occurrence. She seems to have borne the inconveniences and privations of the voyage with great good temper. Indeed, she acknowledges no hardship; and, on the contrary, regards a sea voyage as among the choice pastimes of life. Her remedies for unavoidable annoyances are admirable. For hard beds and seats, "patience—though, perhaps, air-cushions may be better still." Sour bread—remedy: to eat biscuit. Getting sunburnt—remedy: do not look in the glass. Scanty supply of water—remedy: drink cider at dinner; and, remedy second: if cider get low, take soda water, ale, hock, or claret. This might satisfy a cockney sworn at Highgate. One source of amusement on the outward voyage is noticed, which we feel bound to recommend to the particular attention of the post-office department of both the countries.

A regular piece of amusement on board the Packet ships is, emptying the letter-bags out on the decks.

A fine morning is chosen for this; and to a person who sits on the rail it affords a pretty picture. The ladies draw their chairs round the immense heap of letters; the gentlemen lie at length, and scarcely an epistle escapes comment. A shout of mirth bursts forth now and then, at some singular name, or mode of address; commonly at some Irish epistle, addressed to an emigrant in some out-of-the-way place, which there is scarcely room to insert, though the direction runs from corner to corner over the whole square.

A very pretty piece of amusement certainly; nor is it wonderful that, in consequence of it, many letters which are affectionately despatched to dear Judies or Paddies, never reach their destination.

The first impressions of a new country upon an intelligent foreigner, are always worthy of notice. Miss Martineau's were, upon the whole, exceedingly favourable—for she went to be pleased. Her party landed at New York on an evening. Broadway did not appear so magnificent nor picturesque as it does in the panorama which everybody has seen; but the same thing holds, we suspect, of every street so represented. In the boarding-house where apartments had been secured for the party, General Mason and his family were residing; a fortunate accident for the traveller. Perhaps the minute observation on domestic details may, to some, appear trivial; our complaint is, however, not of the number, but rather of the scantiness of the sketches à la Trollope. At the boarding-house, which must have been a very respectable place of its kind, the four-posted bed had no tester—an arrangement which physicians would approve, though it might seem awkward to English ladies; and the wash-stand "was without tumbler, glass, soap, or brush-tray." We are not, however, to conclude, that such superfluities are unknown in the American toilet, although they were not seen; any more than that snufflers are not used in the States, although "the candlesticks had no snufflers." At five next morning, Miss Martineau threw up her sash, and beheld nothing that one could have seen at home, except the grass in the court-yard, and the sky.

The houses were all neatly and brightly painted, had green outside blinds to every window, and an apparatus for drying linen on the roof. A young lady in black silk, with her hair neatly dressed, was mopping the steps of one house; and a similar young lady was dusting the parlour of another. A large locust-tree grew in the middle of the court-yard of the house I was in; and under it was a truly American wood-pile. Two negroes were at the pump, and a third was carrying musk-melons.

When the breakfast-bell rang, the long and cross tables in the eating-room were filled in five minutes. The cross table, at which our hostess presided, was occupied by General Mason's family, a party of Spaniards, and ourselves. The long one was filled up with families returning southwards from the Springs; married persons without children, who preferred boarding to housekeeping; and single gentlemen, chiefly merchants. I found this mode of living rather formidable the first day; and not all the good manners that I witnessed at public tables ever reconciled me to it.

The young lady mopping the steps in a black silk gown, will be held as a mark of the wealth and luxury of the people; but this is an equivocal sign. A daughter of the house was probably doing the work which would have been performed in England by a maid-servant in a cotton wrapper—though the balance of happiness may still be in favour of American domestic arrangements.

A voyage by steam up the Hudson, is one of the first excursions usually made by strangers landing at New York, and a common recreation of the inhabitants. Those who have not been up and down the Hudson, as often as we have been, with all manner of travellers, within the last ten years, will find the description of the scenery, and of the most remarkable objects, very agreeable reading. In Kosciusko's garden, Miss Martineau made acquaintance with one of the cadets of the military Academy at West Point, who volunteered as her cicerone, and with whom she conversed freely about the institution, and his course of study. Like every other military establishment, its tendencies are aristocratic; and its principle and administration are stated to be anti-republican, and yet, she thinks, useful, as securing a uniformity of military conduct, in case of war, with greater proficiency in science, and the checking of sectional prejudice, from all the young soldiers of the Union receiving a common education. The average of health is very high at West Point, which Miss Martineau considers remarkable, as the students indulge freely in the use of tobacco. Mrs Trollope bitterly scolds the use of tobacco, whether in Germany or America, as a rude, disgusting, and barbarous practice; while Miss Martineau attacks it on the more philosophic ground of unwholesomeness. Are the ladies sure they understand the philosophy of smoking? The cadets are allowed, under certain limitations, to mix, at balls and dinners, with the company frequenting the hotel at West Point, a place of fashionable resort; and this indulgence is rightly considered of advantage to their manners. One distinguishing trait of American manners, appears to be freedom of intercourse in these public summer resorts. Introductions and chaperons seem quite unnecessary.

Hackneyed as the scenery of the Hudson, and the descriptions of its endless describers, have become, Miss Martineau has contrived to interest us by a new region. She was more moved by the views from MOUNTAIN HOUSE than by the Falls of Niagara. The subject is certainly fresher. The scene burst on her, too, with the charm of unexpectedness. This Mountain House is a hotel, built for the accommodation of travellers who desire to have a more complete view of the Valley of the Hudson than can be obtained from any other point; and Miss Martineau thinks she would rather have missed the Prairies, the Hawk's Nest, (no great miss,) the Mississippi, and Niagara itself, than this. The ascent to the Mountain House was made upon the evening of a Saturday in July. The elevation is about 1800 feet; and the road winds through flourishing farms, and up the mountain's side, through woods and glades. Miss Martineau was, probably, new to mountain travel and mountain dwellings, and the picturesque hotel burst upon her vision with the dazzling effect of novelty:—

"After another level reach of road, and another scrambling ascent, I saw something on the rocky platform above our heads, like (to compare great things with small) an illumined fairy palace perched among clouds in open scenery;—a large building, whose numerous window-lights marked out its figure from amidst the thunder-clouds and black twilight which overshadowed it. It was now half-past eight o'clock, and a stormy evening. Everything was chill, and we were glad of lights and tea in the first place." The river, revealed by the sudden flashes of lightning, and as quickly swallowed up in darkness, was the charm of the night-view. The landscape of the morning, did our space permit, we should take at large, as we consider it a characteristic as well as a favourable specimen of the author's tone of feeling and style of composition. Sunrise is one of the lions at Mountain House. The raptures of the traveller were too deep and sacred for utterance. She had seen, probably for the first time from such an elevation, the ever grand phenomena of a wide landscape emerging from the mists of a summer's dawn, and gradually unfolding and brightening, until the chaos took form and rejoiced in light; and her chagrin with those natives who could neither understand her feelings nor sympathize with her enthusiasm, led to the following amusing dialogue:—

A gentleman and lady in the hotel intended to have left the place on Sunday. Having overslept that morning's sunrise, and arrived too late for that on Saturday, they were persuaded to stay till Monday noon; and I was pleased, on rising at four on Monday morning, to see that they were in the piazza below, with a telescope. We met at breakfast, all faint with hunger, of course.

"Well, Miss M.," said the gentleman, discontentedly, "I suppose you were disappointed in the sunrise?"—"No, I was not."—"Why, do you think the sun was any handsomer here than at New York?"

I made no answer; for what could one say? But he drove me by questions to tell what I expected to see in the sun.

"I did not expect to see the sun green or blue."

"What did you expect then?"

I was obliged to explain that it was the effect of the sun on the landscape that I had been looking for.

"Upon the landscape! Oh, but we saw that yesterday."

The gentleman was perfectly serious—quite earnest in all this. When we were departing, a foreign tourist was heard to complain of the high charges! High charges! As if we were to be supplied for nothing on a perch, where the wonder is, if any but the young ravens get fed. When I considered what a drawback it is in visiting mountain-tops, that one is driven down again almost immediately by one's bodily wants, I was ready to thank the people devoutly for harbouring us on any terms, so that we might think out our thoughts, and compose our emotions, and take our fill of that portion of our universal and eternal inheritance.

These are philosophic consolations under high bills—of which, indeed, travellers in America rarely have reason to complain. Miss Martineau, indeed, suspects that persons whose literary reputation is spread abroad before them, are rather undercharged than otherwise.

In all the late books of travel, we do not remember to have read of a wedding. Miss Martineau was present at four, in church or private dwellings. A Quaker wedding appears the exact ceremony familiar to us at home; but "the bride was most beautifully dressed"—and there will probably be applications from lady-readers to know how. There was, too, long waiting in a crowded church for "a communication," while the poor bride sat exposed to the public gaze, and the bridegroom, most unquaker-like, seemed ready to suffocate with suppressed laughter. The traveller had been invited to attend by one of her friends, a Quaker lady, a frequent preacher, who somehow guessed, or had some dim intimation that "there might be communications." Miss Martineau, accordingly, conceived hopes which were not disappointed. Five preachers of the Hickrites held forth in succession:—

One was an old gentleman whose discourse was an entire perplexity to me. For nearly an hour, he discoursed on Jacob's ladder; but in a style so rambling, and in a chant so singularly unmusical, as to set attention and remembrance at defiance. Some parenthetical observations alone stood a chance of being retained, from their singularity;—one, for instance, which he introduced in the course of his narrative about Jacob setting a stone for a pillow;—"a very different," cried the preacher, raising his chant to the highest pitch—"a very different pillow, by the way, from any that we—are—accommodated—with." What a contrast was the brief discourse of my Quaker friend which followed! Her noble countenance was radiant as the morning; her soft voice, though low, so firm that she was heard to the furthest corner, and her little sermon as philosophical as it was devout. "Send forth thy light and thy truth," was her text. She spoke gratefully of intellectual light as a guide to spiritual truth, and anticipated and prayed for an ultimate universal diffusion of both. The certificate of the marriage was read by Dr Parrish, an elderly physician of Philadelphia, the very realization of all my imaginings of the personal appearance of William Penn; with all the dignity and bonhomie that one fancies Penn invested with in his dealings with the Indians. Dr Parrish speaks with affection of the Indians, from the experience some ancestors of his had of the hospitality of these poor people, when they were in a condition to shew hospitality. His grandfather's family were shipwrecked; and the Indians took the poor lady and her children home to an inhabited cave, and fed them for many weeks or months. The tree stump round which they used to sit at meals is still standing; and Dr Parrish says that, let it stand as long as it will, the love of his family to the Indians shall outlast it.

The Hickrites, and the orthodox societies of Quakers, hate each other intensely, according to Miss Martineau. The ceremonies of a fashionable wedding in Boston, shew the height to which the external pomps and vulgarities, as well as the refinements of luxury, have reached in the principal cities of the Republic. The want of repose, of English high-bred composure and quiet of manner, if not of mind, seems to have been as much felt by Miss Martineau as by Mrs Butler, though she is rarely so frankly condemnatory.

The parties were opulent, and in the first rank of society. They were married in the drawing-room of the bride's house, at half-past eight in the evening, by Dr Channing. The moment the ceremony was over, crowds of company began to arrive; and the bride, young and delicate, and her maidens, were niched in a corner of one of the drawing-rooms, to curtsy to all comers. They were so formally placed, so richly and (as it then seemed) formally dressed—for the present revived antique style of dress was then quite new,—that, in the interval of their curtsies, they looked like an old picture brought from Windsor Castle. The bride's mother presided in the other drawing-room, and the bridegroom flitted about, universally attentive, and on the watch to introduce all visitors to his lady. The transition from the solemnity of Dr Channing's service to the noisy gaieties of a rout, was not at all to my taste. I imagined that it was not to Dr Channing's edify, for his talk with me was on matters very little resembling anything that we had before our eyes: and he soon went away. The noise became such as to silence all who were not inured to the gabble of an American party—the noisiest kind of assemblage, I imagine (not excepting a Jew's synagogue) on the face of the globe. I doubt whether any Pagans in their worship can raise any hubbub to equal it. I constantly found, in a large party, after trying in vain every kind of scream that I was capable of, that I must give up, and satisfy myself with nodding and shaking my head. If I was rightly understood, well and good: if not, I must let it pass. As the noise thickened, and the heat grew more oppressive, I glanced towards the poor bride in her corner, still standing, still curtsying; her pale face growing paler; her nonchalant manner (perhaps the best she could assume) more indifferent. I was afraid that, if all this went on much longer, she would faint or die upon the spot. It did not last much longer. By eleven, some of the company began to go away, and, by a quarter before twelve, all were gone but the comparatively small party (including ourselves) who were invited to stay to supper.

The chandelier and mantelpiece, I then saw, were dressed with flowers. There was a splendid supper; and, before we departed, we were carried up to a large, well-lighted apartment, where bride cake and the wedding presents were set out in bright array.

Five days afterwards, we went, in common with all her acquaintance, to pay our respects to the bride. The courtyard of her mother's house was thronged with carriages, though no one seemed to stay five minutes. The bridegroom received us at the head of the stairs, and led us to his lady, who curtsied as before. Cake, wine, and liqueurs were handed round, the visitors all standing. A few words on common subjects were exchanged, and we were gone, to make way for others.

Rocking-chairs are among the peculiar American modes of enjoyment which Miss Martineau, rather contemptuously, denounces, probably without sufficient consideration in one generally so indulgent to harmless though novel practices, and to individual tastes in luxuries or things indifferent. In small wayside inns, rocking in the chair is carried to excess, and may, perhaps, be found an indemnification to ladies for the privation of tobacco; an excellent sedative, if things should go cross, or dinner be long of appearing.

In travelling by the canal to Utica—a delightful mode of slow travelling by day, but by night deserving all the vituperation that is given to it, and to those attendant annoyances which are not peculiar to America—Miss Martineau relates a grievance new to us:—

We suffered under an additional annoyance, in the presence of sixteen Presbyterian clergymen—some of the most unprepossessing of their class. If there be a duty more obvious than another on board a canal-boat, it is to walk on the bank occasionally in fair weather, or, at least, to remain outside, in order to air the cabin, (close enough at best,) and get rid of the scents of the table, before the unhappy passengers are shut up to sleep there. These sixteen gentlemen, on their way to a convention at Utica, could not wait till they got there to begin their devotional observances, but obtruded them upon the passengers in a most unjustifiable manner. They were not satisfied with saying an almost interminable grace before and after each meal, but shut up the cabin for prayers before dinner, for missionary conversation in the afternoon, and for Scripture reading and prayers quite late into the night, keeping tired travellers from their rest, and every one from his fair allowance of fresh air.

The passengers were all invited to listen to, and to question a missionary from China, who was of the party. The gentleman did not seem to have profited much by his travels, however; for he declared himself unable to answer some very simple inquiries:—"Is the religion of the Christian missionaries tolerated by the Chinese government?"—"I am not prepared to answer that question."—"Are the Chinese cannibals?"—"I am not prepared to answer that question." One requested that any brother would offer a suggestion as to how Government might be awakened to the sinfulness of permitting Sunday mails; during the continuance of which practice, there was no hope of the Sabbath being duly sanctified. No one was ready with a suggestion; but one offered a story, which every head was bent to hear. The story was of two sheep-drovers, one of whom feared God, and the other did not. The profane drover set out with his sheep, for a particular destination, two hours earlier than the other, and did not rest on Sunday like his pious comrade. What was the catastrophe? The God-fearing drover, though he had stood still all Sunday, arrived at his destination two hours earlier than the other. "Ah!" "Ah!" resounded through the cabin in all conceivable tones of conviction, no one asking particulars of what had happened on the road—of how and where the profane drover had been delayed. Temperance was, of course, a great topic with these divines, and they fairly provoked ridicule upon it. One passenger told me that they were so strict that they would not drink water out of the Brandywine river; and another remarked that they partook with much reliâ of the strong wine sauce served with our puddings.

This is a dismal picture of so large a section of the Presbyterian Synod of Utica; and we should hope that it is not without a touch of perhaps unconscious exaggeration.

Miss Martineau sympathizes more deeply with the wronged aborigines of America than we should have anticipated from her known opinions on certain points of political economy, by which the wise in their generation, vindicate the crying injustice with which the Red race have been treated by the Whites. On viewing the Trenton Falls, of which the name, in the beautiful and sonorous language of the native tribes, is Cayohariv, she says, with true feeling—"How the poor banished Indians most mourn when the lights of their Cayoharic visit their senses again in the dreams of memory or of sleep! The recollection of these poor exiles was an ever-present saddening thought in the midst of all the most beautiful scenes of the New World."

By the way, Miss Martineau, in one place, describes certain squaws, whom they saw, as dressed in cloth trowsers. She must have mistaken the cloth leggings, worn by female Indians, when partially seen under their short full petticoat and blanket, for this part of male attire. The uncorrupted Indian women are remarkable for their sense of delicacy and propriety in dress and demeanour. A young Indian woman, of the Delaware nation, and the wife of a chief who visited this country with her husband shortly after the war of 1814, was inexpressibly shocked by the loud tones, the erected head, and, above all, the turned-out toes of the white ladies. The latter custom in particular, appeared to her the extreme of feminine indecorum—the dancing-master's first position, one of extreme impropriety.

The town of Buffalo has lately attracted con-considerable attention in this country, from the spirit evinced by the inhabitants in behalf of the insurgents of Upper Canada. Miss Martineau reports most unfavourably of its moral condition, and the character of the society found there. She considers that Buffalo is "as undesirable as a residence as any place in the free States." It would seem to be a large Cave of Adul-lam:—

It is the rendezvous of all manner of persons; the passage through which fugitives pass from the States to Canada, from Canada to the States, and from Europe and the Eastern States into the wild West. Runaway slaves come here, and their owners follow in hopes of recapturing them. Indian traders, land-speculators, and poor emigrants, come here; and the most debased Indians, the half-civilized, hang about the outskirts. No influence that the mass of respectable inhabitants can exert, can neutralize the bad effects of a floating population like this; and the place is unavoidably a very vicious one. A sufficient proof of this is, that ladies cannot walk beyond the streets without the protection of a gentleman. Some excellent English ladies opened a school in Buffalo, and, not being aware of the peculiarities of the place, followed, with their pupils, the English practice of taking country walks. They persevered for some time, hoping to obtain countenance for the wholesome practice, but were compelled, after a time, not only to give up walking, but to quit the place. It will be understood that I do not give this as any specimen of American towns. The corruption of Buffalo is owing chiefly to its frontier position, and consequent liability to a vicious, transient population.

One day, Miss Martineau crossed from Buffalo to the British side, with a female friend, a hardy pedestrian, who has a very romantic history. They were entertained by an American woman, settled on the British side, who amused them with stories of how eggs and butter were smuggled into Buffalo from her neighbourhood. The prohibition of a free trade in eggs and butter! "What a worthy subject of contention," she remarks, "between two great nations!—the one breaking the laws to provide Buffalo with butter and eggs, and the preventive force of the other exercised in opposition!" She seems to think that Canada would be better off in connexion with the United States than attached to Britain. "My eyes," she continues, "never rested on the Canada shore without my feeling how absurd it was that that poor country should belong to us; its poverty and hopeless inactivity contrasting, so much to our disgrace, with the prosperous activity of the opposite shore."

A good deal was said and done by Miss Martineau and her friends about these endless Falls of Niagara; and one day spent under them was devoted to giving a German friend, who had learned English to the last perfection in little more than two years, a practical idea of the word dawdle, which he could not comprehend. The travelling party lounged and sauntered about all day; but, when it was concluded, Dr F——, the German, could not, we opine, have anything like a true understanding of what it is to dawdle—a process impossible in the open air, and, in short, a spurious sort of lazy activity, which can only be put in operation by ladies in their apartments, when they tumble over and over the contents of drawers and cupboards, and dawdle away a whole morning, doing nothing; always seeming to be employed, but shewing no useful result.

A chapter is devoted to Priestley, of whom Miss Martineau is the enthusiastic admirer. Dr Channing—who, we suspect, she considers not to be named in the same day with the great modern apostle of the Unitarian faith—"speaks of him in a tone of patronage, admitting that he is under obligations to him for one or two detached sermons which breathe the true spirit." Miss Martineau, shortly after her arrival in the States, visited the persecuted philosopher's retreat on the Susquehanna, collected some traditions of his latter years, and, sentimentally, planted a rose on his grave, which grave, she anticipates, will yet be the resort of many pilgrims. We should doubt it. Imagination rules the world; and her favourite philosopher had no faculty in life, or beyond it, of stimulating imagination. Though Priestley had much to suffer in severe domestic bereavements after his exile, it is grateful to learn that his latter days were spent in serenity and competence.

Miss Martineau visited some of the prisons of America; but she adds little, we think, to the amount of information already obtained, save some original and delightful instances of the power of kindness and confidence in softening the most depraved and rugged natures. She considers the system of solitary confinement pursued at Philadelphia as the best that has been adopted in the States, and very much superior to that of the Auburn prison, which, though so highly extolled in this country, is considered faulty in the extreme. Captain Pillsbury of the Weatherfield prison has accomplished what looks like moral miracles; but, unfortunately, this gentleman can neither live for ever nor multiply himself. Still, it is something to have proved what may be done in reclaiming and ameliorating vitiated natures, by the simple means of treating men like beings made after God's image. Some of Miss Martineau's adventures, when she was locked up in the solitary cells of the criminals in the Penitentiary, required, we think, more courage than the worst perils of her journeys, or her braving the threats of Lynching as an abolitionist. She imagines that she gained the confidence of the prisoners, and, in some instances, this may have been so. Solitary imprisonment must dispose every victim to spontaneous confidence. Miss Martineau regards this mode of punishment, combined with labour, as the perfection of corrective discipline; and secrecy, or the absence of shame—of the humiliating sense of personal degradation—as essential to restoration to moral soundness. Men tried in a remote part of the country, and under feigned names—unbranded men—are always in a hopeful condition. The prisoners were accustomed to receive the visits of benevolent persons, and probably of well-meaning pious ladies, anxious to give them religious instruction. Prison-visiting has, indeed, become one of the many modes of religious excitement and dissipation, both in the Old and New World. Miss Martineau sometimes found it necessary to say, that she did not come for prayer, but for inquiring into the causes of crime. This she did to stay the flood of "shocking cant," too often, we fear, reckoned appropriate to prison interviews between sinners and the Pharisaical righteous. The cases which Miss Martineau encountered were not all hopeful. It is not even clear that the majority were so. She says—

Some of the convicts were so stupid as not to be relied upon, more or less. Others canted so detestably, and were (always in connexion with their cant) so certain that they should never sin more, that I have every expectation that they will find themselves in prison again some day. One fellow, a sailor, notorious for having taken more lives probably than any man in the United States, was quite confident that he should be perfectly virtuous henceforth. He should never touch anything stronger than tea, or lift his hand against money or life. I told him I thought he could not be sure of all this till he was within sight of money, and the smell of strong liquors; and that he was more confident than I should like to be. He shook his shock of red hair at me, and glared with his one ferocious eye, as he said he knew all about it, as he had been the worst of men, and Christ had had mercy on his poor soul. When I had got him away from his cant, and upon subjects on which he could talk with some simplicity, I found that even this man preferred this prison to others that he had been in. It so happened that no conviction for murder had ever been procurable against him; his imprisonments were all for theft. His account of the old Walnut Street prison was dreadful. He there daily heard stories of crimes, from four in the winter afternoons till daylight. "Poor boasting!—for the crimes they bragged of were never done." I asked him how he got into that prison. "For a couple o' larcenies, a grand and a little," said he, with the most business-like nonchalance. He was waylaid by two old burglars on his coming out, and on the spot agreed upon an enterprise for the next night. His mother died in his arms: he went and committed the burglary, was caught, and before midnight was in prison again. His accounts of his deeds were too scientific for my understanding; but I made out enough to be ready when he asked my advice what to do when he came out. I answered as if he were in earnest, advising him to leave Philadelphia and all towns, and settle in the woods, out of the way of grog-shops, bad company, and other people's property. But his keepers expect that he will end his days with them; and this is the hope of that part of society which fears his ferocity.

Under proper regulation, the practice of visiting prisons might be made one of the best means of improving the character of the prisoners; but the bold and hardy inmates, acute daring burglars, or adroit forgers and coiners, require to be brought under other influences than those sometimes employed for their amendment.—Miss Martineau had so much enjoyed her residence in New York that she was spoiled for Washington. In Philadelphia, she was an inmate in the family of a Unitarian clergyman, with whom she had made acquaintance at New York on the first Sunday after her landing; and who, with his wife, became her "American brother and sister." Of this gentleman's preaching, she speaks as the "most true, simple, and solemn" she had ever listened to.

Washington is represented as a dreary sojourn to those whose pursuits and affections are domestic. Our traveller spent five weeks there, which she accounts profitable, though by far the least agreeable of her sojourn in the United States.

She formed one of a party, which included a Senator, and a Member of the House of Representatives, with two female relations, having a drawing-room and table in common, in a boarding-house. The gentlemen were, of course, acquainted with many public characters, who were continually dropping in. The society of Washington is of an unique character, compounded of a large variety of elements. There were to be seen the foreign ambassadors;

The American government; members of Congress, from Clay and Webster down to Davy Crockett, Benton from Missouri, and Cuthbert, with the freshest Irish brogue, from Georgia; flippant young belles; "pious" wives, dutifully attending their husbands, and groaning over the frivolities of the place; grave judges, saucy travellers, pert newspaper reporters, melancholy Indian chiefs, and timid New-England ladies, trembling on the verge of the vortex: all this was wholly unlike anything that is to be seen in any other city in the world; for all these are mixed up together in daily intercourse, like the higher circle of a little village, and there is nothing else. You have this or nothing; you pass your days among these people, or you spend them alone. There the Southerners appear to the most advantage, and the New-Englanders to the least: the ease and frank courtesy of the gentry of the south, (with an occasional touch of arrogance, however,) contrasting favourably with the cautious, somewhat gauche, and too deferential air of the members from the north. One fancies one can tell a New-England member in the open air by his deferential walk. He seems to bear in mind perpetually that he cannot fight a duel, while other people can. The odd mortals that wander in from the western border cannot be described as a class; for no one is like anybody else. One has a neck like a crane, making an interval of inches between stock and chin. Another wears no cravat, apparently because there is no room for one. A third has his lank black hair parted accurately down the middle, and disposed in bands in front, so that he is taken for a woman when only the head is seen in a crowd. A fourth puts an arm round the neck of a neighbour on either side as he stands, seeming afraid of his tall, wire-hung frame, dropping to pieces if he tries to stand alone. A fifth makes something between a bow and a curtsy to everybody who comes near, and proceeds with a knowing air—all having shrewd faces, and being probably very fit for the business they come upon.

The domestic arrangements at Washington are strongly indicative of the frugal genius of the Republic. Conceive, in London or Paris, a member of the Upper, and one of the Lower House of Parliament—together with a wife and a sister-in-law, Miss Martineau, and her party—clubbing together for a common drawing-room and mess-table. This was a refinement on the common mode of living en masse in the boarding-house; and we can conceive the arrangement, where there are congenial minds and pursuits, exceedingly agreeable. She frequently praises the Americans for sweetness of temper; and their being able to live together in amity in that close association which would be intolerable even to the nearest relatives in England, is a strong evidence of it, and not improbably part of its cause. The difference between the capital of the Western Republic, and the capitals of any European state, with the exception perhaps of some petty German principality, is amusingly illustrated by the following anecdote:—

I remember that some of our party went one day to dine at Mr Secretary Cass's, and the rest of us at Mr Secretary Woodbury's. The next morning, a lady of the Cass party asked me whether we had candied oranges at the Woodburys'. "No." "Then," said she, "they had candied oranges at the Attorney-General's." "How do you know?" "Oh, as we were on the way, I saw a dish carried; and, as we had none at the Cass's, I knew they must be either for the Woodburys or the Attorney-General." There were candied oranges at the Attorney-General's.

Miss Martineau was frequently present at sittings of the Senate. We shall employ our limited space to better advantage in noticing her historical grouping and original portraits, than in adverting to her strictures upon the political opinions and conduct of the leading characters seen at Washington.

The American Senate (she says) is a most imposing assemblage. When I first entered it, I thought I never saw a finer set of heads than the forty-six before my eyes: two only being absent, and the Union then consisting of twenty-four States: Mr Calhoun's countenance first fixed my attention: the splendid eye, the straight forehead, surmounted by a load of stiff, upright, dark hair; the stern brow; the inflexible mouth—it is one of the most remarkable heads in the country. Next him, sat his colleague, Mr Preston, in singular contrast—stout in person, with a round, ruddy, good-humoured face, large blue eyes, and a wig, orange to-day, brown yesterday, and golden to-morrow. Near them, sat Colonel Benton, a temporary people's man, remarkable chiefly for his pomposity. He sat swelling amidst his piles of papers and books, looking like a being designed by nature to be a good-humoured barber or innkeeper, but forced by fate to make himself into a mock-heroic senator. Opposite, sat the transcendent Webster, with his square forehead and cavernous eyes; and behind him the homely Clay, with the face and figure of a farmer, but something of the air of a divine, from his hair being combed straight back from his temples. . . . Some were descended from Dutch farmers, some from French Huguenots, some from Scotch Puritans, some from English Cavaliers, some from Irish chieftains. They were brought together out of law-courts, sugar-fields, merchants' stores, mountain-farms, forests, and prairies. The stamp of originality was impressed on every one, and inspired a deep, involuntary respect. I have seen no assembly of chosen men, and no company of the high-born, invested with the antique dignities of an antique realm, half so imposing to the imagination as this collection of stout-souled, full-grown, original men, brought together, on the ground of their supposed efficiency, to work out the will of their diverse constituencies. In this splendid chamber, thus splendidly inhabited, we spent many hours of many weeks.

Ladies attend the Senate; but their behaviour there will hardly afford Mr Grantley Berkeley either an argument or a good precedent:—

They came in with waving plumes, and glittering in all the colours of the rainbow, causing no little bustle in the place—no little annoyance to the gentlemen spectators; and rarely sat still for any length of time. I know that these ladies are no fair specimens of the women who would attend parliamentary proceedings in any other metropolis. I know that they were the wives, daughters, and sisters of legislators, women thronging to Washington for purposes of convenience or pleasure, leaving their usual employments behind them, and seeking to pass away the time. I knew this, and made allowance accordingly; but I still wished that they could understand the gravity of such an assembly, and shew so much respect to it as to repay the privilege of admission by striving to excite as little attention as possible; and, by having the patience to sit still when they happened not to be amused, till some interruption gave them opportunity to depart quietly.

Then, certain members would stalk towards these fluttering dames, as an American quaintly said, "like cranes in search of fish." It was chiefly to see that the traveller went to the House of Representatives; for there she could not hear. Some of Miss Martineau's political portraits are painted en beau; while others are traced through the black medium of anti-abolition. The first of these pictures, that of the President, Van Buren, is not favourable. She saw him first at Albany, and afterwards at Washington.

He is small in person, with light hair and blue eyes. I was often asked whether I did not think his manners gentlemanly. There is much friendliness in his manners, for he is a kindhearted man; he is also rich in information, and lets it come out on subjects in which he cannot contrive to see any danger in speaking. But his manner wants the frankness and confidence which are essential to good breeding. He questions closely without giving anything in return. Moreover, he flatters to a degree which so cautious a man should long ago have found out to be disagreeable; and his flattery is not merely praise of the person he is speaking to, but a worse kind still—a scepticism and ridicule of objects and persons supposed to be distasteful to the one he is conversing with. I fully believe that he is an amiable and indulgent domestic man, and a reasonable political master, a good scholar, and a shrewd man of business; but he has the scepticism which marks the lower orders of politicians. His public career exhibits no one exercise of that faith in men, and preference of principle to petty expediency by which a statesman shews himself to be great. The consequence is, that, with all his opportunities, no great deeds have ever been put to his account, and his shrewdness has been at fault in some of the most trying crises of his career. The man who so little trusts others, and so intensely regards self as to make it the study of his life not to commit himself, is liable to a more than ordinary danger of judging wrong, when compelled, by the pressure of circumstances, to act a decided part. . . . Mr Calhoun is, I believe, Mr Van Buren's evil genius.

The great Nullifier is a more interesting moral study. The elements of which his character is compounded, seem of a less vulgar nature, and they are more subtly combined. We do not, however, pretend to understand perfectly the character which is presented to us as that of Calhoun.

It is at first extremely interesting to hear Mr Calhoun talk; and there is a never-failing evidence of power in all he says and does, which commands intellectual reverence; but the admiration is too soon turned into regret—into absolute melancholy. It is impossible to resist the conviction that all this force can be at best but useless, and is but too likely to be very mischievous. His mind has long lost all power of communicating with any other. I know no man who lives in such utter intellectual solitude. He meets men and harangues them by the fire-side, as in the Senate; he is wrought like a piece of machinery, set a-going vehemently by a weight, and stops while you answer: he either passes by what you say, or twists it into a suitability with what is in his head, and begins to lecture again. Of course, a mind like this can have little influence in the Senate, except by virtue, perpetually wearing out, of what it did in its less eccentric days; but its influence at home is to be dreaded.

Relaxation is no longer in the power of his will. I never saw any one who so completely gave me the idea of possession. Half an hour's conversation with him is enough to make a necessarian of anybody.

Webster, another celebrated member of the Senate, attracts notice, if not among our statesmen, yet from the lawyers of this country. In the portrait given of him, it is easier to recognise the likeness of a real man than in that of Calhoun. What a number of Lowland Scotch names, by the way, are to be found in the American Senate and House of Representatives. Calhoun, Webster, and Ewing, are decided. The pure Irish names are equally abundant.

Wigs and gowns are unknown in the pleadings of American barristers. Yet they contrive to make a tolerably imposing appearance without those antiquated helps of dignity and oratory, though they are not altogether superior to some other arts, as inimical to Republican severity and simplicity, as masses of powdered horse-hair or split whalebone, and flowing vestments.

There was no knowing, when Webster sauntered in, threw himself down, and leaned back against the table, his dreamy eyes seeming to see nothing about him, whether he would by-and-by take up his hat, and go away, or whether he would rouse himself suddenly, and stand up to address the judges. For the generality, there was no knowing; and to us, who were forewarned, it was amusing to see how the Court would fill after the entrance of Webster, and empty when he had gone back to the Senate Chamber. The chief interest to me in Webster's pleading, and also in his speaking in the Senate, was from seeing one so dreamy and nonchalant roused into strong excitement. It seemed like having a curtain lifted up, through which it was impossible to pry; like hearing autobiographical secrets. Webster is a lover of ease and pleasure, and has an air of the most unaffected indolence and careless self-sufficiency. It is something to see him moved with anxiety and the toll of intellectual conflict; to see his lips tremble, his nostrils expand, the perspiration start upon his brow; to hear his voice vary with emotion, and to watch the expression of laborious thought, while he pauses for minutes together, to consider his notes, and decide upon the arrangement of his argument. These are the moments when it becomes clear that this pleasure-loving man works for his honours and his gains. He seems to have the desire which other remarkable men have shewn, to conceal the extent of his toils; and his wish has been favoured by some accidents—some sudden, unexpected call upon him for a display of knowledge and power which has electrified the beholders. But, on such occasions, he has been able to bring into use acquisitions and exercises intended for other occasions, on which they may or may not have been wanted. No one will suppose that this is said in disparagement of Mr Webster. It is only saying that he owes to his own industry what he must otherwise owe to miracle.

This gentleman, so good an economist of reputation, is gay and jocular in company, and a clever talker.

General Jackson seems scarcely a favourite with Miss Martineau; and she relates some circumstances which certainly do not redound much either to his sagacity or his magnanimity of character. He is a man of strong prejudices, and they are not all on the right side.

General Jackson is extremely tall and thin, with a slight stoop, betokening more weakness than naturally belongs to his years. He has a profusion of stiff grey hair, which gives to his appearance whatever there is of formidable in it. His countenance bears commonly an expression of melancholy gravity; though, when roused, the fire of passion flashes from his eyes; and his whole person looks then formidable enough. His mode of speech is slow and quiet; and his phraseology sufficiently betokens that his time has not been passed among books.

A more remarkable man than the Ex-President is his friend, and alleged secret adviser, Amos Kendall. This singular personage appears to act the part in the American government of those old Jesuit confessors who moved the hidden springs of policy in despotic courts. He is, in some sort, the Talleyrand of America. In early life, Kendall had been rescued from disease and poverty, by Mr Clay, who entrusted him with the education of his sons, and heaped benefits upon him. His benefactor had not, however, been able to gain his good-will. Kendall deserted the political party of Clay, and went over to his rival, Jackson; and for this he may have had conscientious motives; but he has since never ceased to persecute Mr Clay through the newspapers, for which the motive is not clear. Miss Martineau relates—

I was fortunate enough once to catch a glimpse of the invisible Amos Kendall, one of the most remarkable men in America. He is supposed to be the moving spring of the whole administration; the thinker, planner, and doer—but it is all in the dark. Documents are issued of an excellence which prevents their being attributed to persons who take the responsibility of them; a correspondence is kept up all over the country for which no one seems to be answerable; work is done, of goblin extent and with goblin speed, which makes men look about them with a superstitious wonder; and the invisible Amos Kendall has the credit of it all. President Jackson's Letters to his Cabinet are said to be Kendall's; the Report on Sunday Mails is attributed to Kendall; the letters sent from Washington to appear in remote country newspapers, whence they are collected and published in The Globe, as demonstrations of public opinion, are pronounced to be written by Kendall. Every mysterious paragraph in opposition newspapers relates to Kendall; and it is some relief to the timid that his having now the office of Postmaster-General affords opportunity for open attacks upon this twilight personage; who is proved, by the faults in the Post-Office administration, not to be able to do quite everything well. But he is undoubtedly a great genius. He unites, with his "great talent for silence," a splendid audacity.

It is clear that he could not do the work he does (incredible enough in amount any way) if he went into society like other men. He did, however, one evening—I think it was at the Attorney-General's. The moment I went in, intimations reached me from all quarters, amidst nods and winks, "Kendall is here;" "That is he." I saw at once that his plea for seclusion—bad health—is no false one. The extreme sallowness of his complexion, and hair of such perfect whiteness as is rarely seen in a man of middle age, testified to disease. His countenance does not help the superstitious to throw off their dread of him. He probably does not desire this superstition to melt away; for there is no calculating how much influence was given to Jackson's administration by the universal belief that there was a concealed eye and hand behind the machinery of government, by which everything could be foreseen, and the hardest deeds done.

What description of the American people can be such ninnies? We should scarcely have expected to find the Americans borrowing the same method of vamping up a spurious public opinion that is practised by our great metropolitan Tory clubs, through the columns of the newspapers they have established throughout the country.

Mr Clay and the late Chief-Justice Marshall are great favourites with Miss Martineau; and it is extremely natural that the first should be so with any right-hearted woman. Of the venerable Chief-Justice she declares, that "he maintained through life, and carried to his grave, a reverence for woman as rare in its kind as in its degree." Mr Madison, the friend of the Chief-Justice, is next in Miss Martineau's good love.

Her visit to Mr Madison is one of the most agreeable passages of the "Retrospect." It took place in early spring, immediately after leaving Washington.

Mr Madison had suffered severely from rheumatism in the preceding season, but was now rather a comfortable invalid, though—

During this winter he confined himself to one room, rising after breakfast, before nine o'clock, and sitting in his easy chair till ten at night. He appeared perfectly well during my visit, and was a wonderful man of eighty-three. He complained of one ear being deaf, and that his sight, which had never been perfect, prevented his reading much, so that his studies "lay in a nutshell;" but he could hear Mrs Madison read; and I did not perceive that he lost any part of the conversation. He was in his chair, with a pillow behind him, when I first saw him; his little person wrapped in a black silk gown; a warm grey and white cap upon his head, which his lady took care should always sit becomingly; and grey worsted gloves, his hands having been rheumatic. His voice was clear and strong, and his manner of speaking particularly lively—often playful. Except that the face was smaller, and of course older, the likeness to the common engravings of him was perfect. He seemed not to have lost any teeth, and the form of the face was therefore preserved, without any striking marks of age. It was an uncommonly pleasant countenance.

His relish for conversation could never have been keener. I was in perpetual fear of his being exhausted; and, at the end of every few hours, I left my seat by the arm of his chair, and went to the sofa by Mrs Madison, on the other side of the room: but he was sure to follow, and sit down between us.

Madison, from his locality, was of course the holder of slaves, but he was the enemy of slavery. His faint hope—for he almost despaired of a remedy—was the illusive one of colonization. It is not surprising that parties deeply interested in the question should have been deceived by a fallacy which was, for a season, eagerly adopted by many intelligent persons in this country.

The household slaves of the Ex-President were continually coming and going to their lady for her huge bunch of keys, and lounging in every apartment. No degree, station, or fortune, gives immunity to ladies in the slave States from the veriest and most degrading drudgery of domestic life—that of guarding against the dishonesty, sloth, and stupidity of their slave servants.

From a long and minute record of Miss Martineau's conversations with Mr Madison during their three days of talk, we gather his opinions on many subjects. He asked by what influence our corn-laws were kept up, though truly he must have made a shrewd guess; he declared himself in favour of free trade, but also favourable to securing of literary property all over the world—a favourite scheme with the majority, if not with all authors, including Miss Martineau; and yet a very questionable one. The Ex-President considered the provision for pastors, and for the religious instruction of the people of the States, better secured than it could be by a religious establishment of any kind. Indeed, some of the American statesmen announced the not very original discovery, that our Established Church was entirely a state machine; nor need Miss Martineau have travelled so far to gather just opinions "on the idiotcy of forcibly maintaining the Church of England in Ireland."

"I do not understand this Lord John Russell of yours," said one of the most sagacious of American statesmen. "Is he serious in supposing that he can allow a penny of the revenues, a plait of the lawn-sleeves of that Irish Church to be touched, and keep the whole from coming down, in Ireland first, and in England afterwards?" We fully agreed in the difficulty of supposing Lord John Russell serious. The comparison of various, but I believe pretty extensive American opinions about the Church of England yields rather a curious result. No one dreams of the Establishment being necessary, or being designed for the maintenance of religion: it is seen, by Chief-Justice Marshall and a host of others, to be an institution turned to political purposes. Mr Van Buren, among many others, considers that the Church has supported the State for many years. Mr Clay, and a multitude with him, anticipate the speedy fall of the Establishment. The result yielded by all this is a persuasion not very favourable (to use the American phrase) "to the permanence of our institutions."

To return to Mr Madison's "notions." He thought, with Miss Martineau, that English authors should be protected from piracy in the United States. Surely, it is a strong, and moreover a lax use of this ugly word piracy, which Miss Martineau makes both here and in her former work. It will be time enough to talk of the "piracy" of American or English publishers, when the new international law regarding literary property shall have passed. And, if Mr Madison's opinion be correct, that, in America, "the utterance of the national mind will be through small literature, rather than large, enduring works," we should greatly doubt the wisdom of the legislature which entertained a project so little in accordance with the liberal views of its admirers on nearly every other question important to mankind. Literature might, perhaps, become a better-paying trade to British authors and publishers, though we do not see clearly even thus far; but how greatly must that advantage be overbalanced by the impediments placed in the way of the present free and cheap diffusion in the States of the best books. It resolves itself, in another view, into the prohibition of English books, for the benefit of American writers; and is thus equivalent to what Miss Martineau would impugn—a ransom duty on French silks, to encourage the looms of Spitalfields.

On some other subjects, Mr Madison entertained perfect coincidence of opinion with his guest.

He thought it of the utmost importance to the country, and to human beings everywhere, that the brain and the hands should be trained together; and that no distinction in this respect should be made between men and women. He remembered an interesting conversation on this subject with Mr Owen, from whom he learned with satisfaction, that well-educated women in his settlement turned, with ease and pleasure, from playing the harp to milking the cows.

Some of his opinions are of solemn meaning at this juncture; and, if we may not substitute Great Britain for France, there is surely nothing to forbid her association with the two movement countries and onward governments. The quarrel between the United States and France was, at that period, come to a crisis.

He said it would be an afflicting sight if the two representative governments, which are in the van of the world, should go to war; it would acquit towards a confirmation of what is said of the restlessness of popular governments. If the people, who pay for war, are eager for it, it is quite a different thing from potentates being so, who are at no cost. He mentioned that George the Fourth, as Prince Regent, was a large gainer in the last war, from his share of the Droits of the Admiralty, amounting to £1,000,000 per annum—a pretty premium, Mr Madison observed, to pay a king for going to war.

Any premium ought to be made to operate the other way; and, if war be found necessary, the Civil List should be handsomely mulcted for its support. A prince cannot grudge his quota, when all are making sacrifices for the commonwealth.

Miss Martineau made a visit to Jefferson's University at Charlottesville, which produced nothing very remarkable. On her arrival in America, she knew nothing of the party of Abolitionists, of which she afterwards became first a disciple and then an apostle; though, like at least nine-tenths of all Englishwomen, she was opposed, on principle, to slavery. Before leaving Philadelphia, or coming into contact with existing prejudices, she was seriously warned against personal danger from the planters of the Southern States. She was not much afraid—not even when, afterwards, the newspapers said she would be Lynched; and so she ventured south. In Philadelphia, a lady asked her, if she would not prevent the marriage of a white person with a black. Miss Martineau's reply was reasonable and Christian—still she would make some allowance for the anti-amalgamationists:—

I replied that I would never, under any circumstances, try to separate persons who really loved, believing such to be truly those whom God hath joined; but I observed that the case she put was one not likely to happen, as I believed the blacks were no more disposed to marry the whites than the whites to marry the blacks. "You are an amalgamationist!" cried she. I told her that the party term was new to me; but that she must give what name she pleased to the principle I had declared in answer to her question. This lady is an eminent religionist, and denunciations spread rapidly from her.

At Baltimore, a clergyman's wife threw a volume of Miss Edgeworth's "Belinda" to the opposite side of the room, because Juba, the faithful negro, was married at last to an English farmer's daughter. The lady was hasty and unreasonable; but would Miss Edgeworth have ventured to marry the fairest-skinned baker or carpenter to the daughter of an English peer—though "they had really loved"—or yet an African prince to a high-born English lady? Our national prejudices are mainly of caste—those of the Republicans of colour; both are the growth of circumstance. And which is the most rational?—Miss Martineau was extremely nervous on the subject of seeing a slave, and she had seen one before she was aware—a tall, handsome mulatto, who handed tea. She was glad the shock was over for once. At Washington, she was again warned, in various "stealthy ways," of perils awaiting her in the South. Some of these warning friends must surely have been hoaxing the stranger. Instead of being mobbed, or Lynched, or anything of the sort, she met in the South with kind and courteous treatment; and it was only in enlightened Boston, that insult was offered, when she was induced to take a prominent part at an abolition meeting. We are half inclined to agree with the American malecontents, that a foreigner, and a lady, might have rested content with publishing against the iniquity of slavery, and with never disguising her opinions when the subject came fairly into question; but Miss Martineau states that she felt herself bound, in conscience, to act the conspicuous part which she did. Those who cannot praise her wisdom, will, at least, admire her zeal; and we may form an idea of the extreme exasperation of those feelings, which, we fear, the lectures of foreign abolitionists neither tend to enlighten nor soften, from the senseless and unmannerly storm which burst over the stranger's head, when she had delivered her public testimony. "The hubbub," she says, "was so great, and the modes of insult were so various, as to justify distant observers in concluding that the whole nation had risen against me. I soon found how few can make a great noise, while the many are careless or ignorant of what is going on about a person or a party with whom they have nothing to do, and while not a few are rendered more hearty in their regard, and more generous in their hospitality, by the disgraces of the individual who is under the oppression of public censure."

This affair accounts for the severe and depreciating style in which Miss Martineau, in her former book, allowed herself to speak of the community of Boston. It is almost needless, in this country, either to expose or argue farther about the unavoidable evils of slavery; but those who wish to learn what it is in America, should read Mr Abdy's work, Mr Stuart's travels, and Miss Martineau's volumes, for illustrations of domestic life in the slave States. It is not, however, for a female pen to depict the worst aspects of slavery. Some of them we see softened, by reflection, in such pleasing sketches as the following:—

Our stationary rural life in the south was various and pleasant enough: all shaded with the presence of slavery; but without any other drawback. There is something in the make-shift, irregular mode of life which exists where there are slaves, that is amusing when the cause is forgotten.

The waking in the morning is accomplished by two or three black women staring at you from the bed-posts. Then it is five minutes' work to get them out of the room. Perhaps, before you are half dressed, you are summoned to breakfast. You look at your watch, and listen whether it has stopped; for it seems not to be seven o'clock yet. You hasten, however, and find your hostess making the coffee. The young people drop in when the meal is half done; and then it is discovered that breakfast has been served an hour too early, because the clock has stopped, and cook has ordered affairs according to her own conjectures. Everybody laughs, and nothing ensues. After breakfast, a farmer, in home-spun—blue trousers and an orange-brown coat—or all over grey—comes to speak with your host. A drunken white has shot one of his negroes, and he fears no punishment can be obtained, because there were no witnesses of the deed but blacks. A consultation is held whether the affair shall go into court; and, before the farmer departs, he is offered cake and liquor.

Your hostess, meantime, has given her orders, and is now engaged in a back room, or out in the piazza behind the house, cutting out clothes for her slaves—very laborious work in warm weather. There may be a pretence of lessons among the young people; and something more than pretence, if they happen to have a tutor or governess; but the probability is that their occupations are as various as their tempers. Rosa cannot be found; she is lying on the bed in her own room, reading a novel. Clara is weeping for her canary, which has flown away while she was playing with it. Alfred is trying to ascertain how soon we may all go out to ride; and the little ones are lounging about the court, with their arms round the necks of blacks, of their own size. You sit down to the piano, or to read; and one slave or another enters every half hour, to ask what is o'clock. Your hostess comes in, at length; and you sit down to work with her: she gratifies your curiosity about her "people;" telling you how soon they burn out their shoes at the toes, and wear out their winter woollens, and tear up their summer cottons; and how impossible it is to get black women to learn to cut out clothes without waste; and how she never inquires when and where the whipping is done, as it is the overseer's business, and not hers. She has not been seated many minutes when she is called away, and returns, saying how babyish these people are, that they will not take medicine unless she gives it to them; and how careless of each other, so that she has been obliged to stand by and see Diana put clean linen upon her infant, and to compel Bet to get her sick husband some breakfast. Morning visitors next arrive. It may be the clergyman, with some new book that you want to look at; and he inquires whether your host sees any prospect of getting the requisite number of professors for the new college; or whether the present head of the institution is to continue to fill all the chairs. It may be a hank judge from some raw district, with a quid in his cheek, a sword cane in his hand, and a legal doubt in his mind, which he wants your host to resolve. It may be a sensible woman, with courtesy in her countenance, and decision in her air, who is accustomed really to rule her household, and to make the most of such human material, and such a human lot as are pressing around and upon her. . . . Or it may be a lady of a different cast, who is delighted at the prospect of seeing you soon again. You look perplexed, and mention that you fear you shall be unable to return this way. Oh, but you will come and live here. You plead family, friends, and occupation in England—to say nothing of England being your home. Oh, but you can bring your family and friends with you. You laughingly ask why. She draws up, and replies, "for the honour and glory of living in a Republic."

Silly women, and men too, may be found in plenty in all parts of the world; but, in America, they have a peculiar mode of "utterance."

There is something inexpressibly disgusting in the sight of a slave woman in the field. I do not share in the horror of the Americans at the idea of women being employed in out-door labour. It did not particularly gratify me to see the cows always milked by men, (where there were no slaves;) and the hay and harvest fields would have looked brighter, in my eyes, if women had been there, to share the wholesome and cheerful toil. But a negro woman behind the plough, presents a very different object from the English mother with her children in the turnip field, or the Scotch lassie among the reapers. In her pre-eminently ugly costume, the long, scanty, dirty woollen garment, with the shabby large bonnet at the back of her head, the perspiration streaming down her dull face, the heavy tread of the splay foot, the slovenly air with which she guides her plough—a more hideous object cannot well be conceived; unless it be the same woman at home, in the negro quarter, as the cluster of slave dwellings are called.

Is Miss Martineau quite sure that some subtle, lurking idea of mere colour, does not enter into her feelings of disgust, besides the "splay-foot" which she acknowledges? Indeed, she repeatedly stumbles on the "long heel"—the form of the African, not the badge of the slave; at least, we do not suppose that slavery is the cause of splay-foot.

At Charleston, Miss Martineau had found the inhabitants still in the heat of Nullification, and the Nullifiers receiving back their champion, Calhoun, like a triumphant chief returning to the bosom of his clan. The annexation of Texas may give a new aspect to American politics; but, while Miss Martineau was in the States, Madison laughed at the idea of the separation of the South from the North—a subject which baffles European speculation. The description of the Nullifiers is edifying. Calhoun "stalked about like a monarch in his little domain," says the traveller; and

There was certainly an air of mysterious understanding between him and his followers; whether there was really any great secret under it or not. One lady who had contributed ample amounts of money to the Nullification funds, and a catechism to Nullification lore, amused, while she grieved me, by the strength of her political feelings. While calling on her, one morning, the conversation turned on prints, and I asked an explanation of a strange-looking one which hung opposite my eye—the portrait of a gentleman—the top of the head and the dress visible, but the face obliterated or covered over. She was only too ready to explain. It was a portrait of President Jackson, which she had hung up in days when he enjoyed her favour. Since Nullification, she had covered over the face, to shew how she hated him. A stranger hardly knows what to think of a cause whose leaders will flatter and cherish the perpetrators of a piece of petty spite like this; yet this lady is treated as if she were a main pillar of the Nullification party.

Another Charleston lady is still more amusing. She is a philosophic Liberal, it would seem. Standing looking at an auctioneer knocking down a human black lot, she turned to Miss Martineau with a cheerful air of complacency—"You know my theory, that one race must be subservient to the other. I do not care which: if the blacks should ever have the upper hand, I would not mind standing on that table, and being sold with two of my children." The contrast between the degradations of slavery and the refinements and luxury of polite society in Charleston, was painful to the traveller; though only what is to be witnessed in every city where slavery is known, and where a restless external gaiety is far from being the measure of heart-felt ease and pleasure. A fact of considerable importance at the present moment is mentioned in the travels; nor is Miss Martineau the sole authority for a statement which, as regards numbers, may seem exaggerated. "The refuge of runaway slaves is Canada; and, in the Upper Province alone, it is said there are 10,000 people of colour, chiefly fugitive slaves, who prosper in the country which they have chosen as a refuge. Scarcely an instance is known of their having received alms; and they are as respectable for their intelligence as for their morals. One peculiarity of them is the extravagance of their loyalty. They exert themselves vehemently in defence of all the acts of the executive, whatever they may be. The reason of this is obvious—they exceedingly dread the annexation of Canada to the United States.”

Among the anecdotes told to the honour of slaves, is one of a relative of Chief-Justice Marshall, who had attached his negroes by the un-failing means of judicious kindness. Circumstances compelled him to leave his plantation for another residence, and he could not endure the idea of selling his people. He therefore called them together, stated the case, and inquired if they could manage the estate for themselves, and remit him the surplus of the profits. The experiment has been completely successful, and was attended with many pleasing and grateful consequences. It should, however, have been told how long this system had been in operation. The slaves themselves freely elected an overseer.

The visit to New Orleans, though agreeably related, contains little that is of general interest, after all that has been heard within these seven years of that singular city. Texas, then a topic of discussion, is now past date; and the battle of New Orleans, with “the imbecility of the British leaders”—a theme never agreeable—has become tiresome to British ears.

A friend at Mobile lent Miss Martineau and her travelling companions his residence at New Orleans; and his slaves kept house for them, during the ten days of their stay, “intelligently and well.” Their master, however, had previously complained that he was unable to make good domestics of his slaves, though he had tried all ways to obtain efficient service.

Miss Martineau ascended the Mississippi in the Henry Clay, a first-rate steamer. She has given a circumstantial and sometimes picturesque account of her nine days’ voyage, which puts the reader completely at home as to the modes of travelling on the great western waters. They touched at many of the settlements on the banks of the mighty river, either to accommodate passengers, or obtain provisions and fuel. The voyage gives occasion to a good many episodes; and, indeed, the filling up of the three supplementary volumes has made a cast of the spinster’s craft occasionally necessary, and caused the drawing out of yarns, which would have been quite as suitably woven into any other tissue as into an account of America. This, however, does not apply to the sojourn in Cincinnati, which was reached by descending the Ohio, after leaving the Henry Clay. Cholera was then just breaking out, both in the south and the west, and the agremens on the way, and in the Ohio steamer, such as deserved to be celebrated by that public benefactress, Mrs Trollope. A very bad dinner in the boat; sour bread, dirty tumblers, and muddy water abounded; and, next morning, in the Broadway Hotel and boarding-house, things looked at first unfavourably, though they turned out well. The poor landlord, probably as much afraid of the traveller and the press, as if he had been a young M.P., representing for the first time a noisy Radical constituency, appeared at breakfast, Heated and confused, and looked as if he had a bad headache. He requested us to excuse any forgetfulness that we might observe, and mentioned that he had, by mistake, taken a dangerous dose of laudanum. We begged he would leave the table, and not trouble himself about us, and hoped he had immediately taken measures to relieve himself of the dose. He replied that he had had no time to attend to himself till a few minutes ago. We found that he had actually put off taking an emetic till he had gone to market, and sent home all the provisions for the day. He had not got over the consequences of the mistake the next morning. The ladies at the breakfast table looked somewhat vulgar; and it is undeniable that the mustard was spilled, and that the relics of the meal were left in some disorder by the gentlemen who were most in a hurry to be off to business. But every one was obliging; and I saw at that table a better thing than I saw at any other table in the United States—a lady of colour breakfasting in the midst of us!

As Miss M. looked out at the window, she saw a house travelling up a wide, well-built street. In a few hours, it had gone out of sight. Dr Drake, the first physician in the town, which means in point of date, we presume, as well as eminence, is described as a complete but favourable specimen of a Westerner.

He entered Ohio just forty-seven years before this time, when there were not above a hundred white persons in the State, and they all French, and when the shores were one expanse of cane-brake, infested by buffalo. He had seen the foundation of the great city laid; he had watched its growth till he was now able to point out to the stranger, not only the apparatus for the exportation of 6,000,000 dollars’ worth a-year of produce and manufactures, but things which he values far more—the ten or twelve edifices erected for the use of the common schools—the new church of St Paul—the two fine banking-houses—and the hundred and fifty handsome private dwellings—all the creations of the year 1835. He points to the periodicals—the respectable monthlies, and the four dailies, and six weekly papers of the city. He looks with a sort of paternal complacency on the 35,000 inhabitants, scarcely one of whom is without the comforts of life, the means of education, and a bright prospect for the future. Though a true Westerner, and devoutly believing the duckeyes (natives of Ohio) to be superior to all others of God’s creatures, he hails every accession of intelligent members to his darling society.

In a drive with the agreeable and intelligent Galen of Cincinnati, the traveller was shewn two handsome houses, with gardens, built by artisans from Birmingham; and he presently alighted to visit a Welsh patient. The scenery of the environs of the western city is romantic and fine; and, altogether, Cincinnati is a stirring, active, forward place. A museum is begun—the foundation of the collection laid in trumpery and rubbish, as in older towns; but Rome was not built in a day.

In Mrs Trollope’s Bazaar, Miss Martineau attended the first public concert ever given in Cincinnati. The particulars are interesting:—

One of the best performers was an elderly man, clothed from head to foot in grey homespun. He was absorbed in his enjoyment; so intent on his violin that one might watch the changes of his pleased countenance, the whole performance through, without fear of disconcerting him. There was a young girl, in a plain white frock, with a splendid voice, a good ear, and a love of warbling which carried her through very well indeed, though her own taste had obviously been her only teacher. If I remember right, there were about five-and-twenty instrumental performers, and six or seven vocalists, besides a long row for the closing chorus. It was a most promising beginning.

Mrs Trollope's Bazaar must be a curious piece of architecture. It is completely of the Composite Order: built of brick, with Gothic windows, Grecian pillars, a Turkish dome, and originally ornamented with Egyptian devices, which, however, the whitewasher has cruelly obliterated. Miss Martineau discovered here a young native artist, named Beard, for whom she predicts a European reputation. His pictures of children, and humorous infant groups, "almost worthy of Wilkie," are especially eulogized. He means to go to Italy when he can afford the undertaking. Meanwhile, in order to see a little of the world, he came to Boston, where Miss Martineau saw him "stalking along like a chief among inferiors, his broad white collar laid over his coat, his throat bare, and his hair parted in the middle of his forehead, and waving down the sides of his face. People turned to look after him. He staid only a fortnight, and went back to Ohio, expressing great contempt for cities." In his remote home, this artist had probably heard of the "fantastic tricks" of some English painters of celebrity, and so had fallen into the kindred mistake of those youngling rhymesters who at one time fancied a bare throat made a Byron. Mr Flash, who keeps a book-store in Cincinnati, gave good accounts of the improving literary taste of the town. He, together with his partner, agreed in the propriety of protecting foreign literary property as a matter of interest as well as principle. It is not easy to perceive how it can be anything else than a matter of interest, and of narrow exclusive interest. We must notice a Cincinnati party, since it reveals much of western manners, while it furnishes fresh proofs, were any needed, that men and women who can afford to dress well and give parties, are essentially the same everywhere. There were complaints of exclusiveness; and badges of distinction were rigidly maintained by the Easterners, who conceive themselves the élite of society, and turn up their noses at the buckeyes. The buckeyes retaliate with spirit. Here we have a party of Easterners followed by one of Westerners:—

At one evening party, the company sat round the drawing-room, occasionally changing places, or forming groups without much formality. They were chiefly Yankees, of various accomplishments, from the learned lawyer who talked with enthusiasm about Channing, and with strong sense about everything but politics, in which his aristocratic bias drew him aside into something like nonsense—to the sentimental young widow, who instantly began talking to me of her dear Mr —, and who would return to the subject as often as I led away from it. Every place was remarkable for her dear Mr — having been better or worse there; and every event was measured by its having happened so long before or after her dear Mr — was buried. The conversation of the society was most about books, and society and its leaders at home and abroad. The manners of the lady of the house were, though slightly impaired by timidity, such as would grace any society of any country.

At another party, there was a greater variety. An enormous buckeye bowl of lemonade, with a ladle of buckeye, stood on the hall table; and symbolical sprigs of the same adorned the walls. On entering the drawing-room, I was presented with a splendid bouquet, sent by a lady by the hands of her brother, from a garden and conservatory which are the pride of the city. My first introduction was to the Catholic bishop; my next to a lady whom I thought then and afterwards one of the cleverest women I met in the country. There was a slight touch of pedantry to be excused, and a degree of Tory prejudice against the bulk of the human race which could scarcely be exceeded even in England: but there was a charming good-humour in the midst of it all, and a power both of observation and reasoning which commanded high respect. One western gentleman sidled about in a sort of minuet step, unquestionably a gentleman as he was in all essential respects; and one young lady, who was, I fancy, taking her first peep at the world, kept her eyes earnestly fixed on the guests as they entered, bowing unconsciously in sympathy with every gentleman who bowed, and curtsying with every lady who curtsied. She must have been well practised in salutation before the evening was over, for the party was a large one. All the rest, with the exception of a forward Scotchman, were well-bred, and the evening passed off very pleasantly, amidst brisk conversation, mirth, and excellent refreshments.

The reader must now have a lively idea of Cincinnati parties, whether polished and somewhat pedantic; or of those equally aspiring, less polished, and as pedantic.

The "infant-reciting bore," an infliction prevalent everywhere, seems a positive pest in America, where all young citizens and probable future legislators, are trained to the tricks of oratory. Miss Martineau makes some excellent observations on the influence of popular oratory, and on that useful revolution in the public taste which is exalting the power of reason and dispassionate persuasion over frothy declamation and fustian spouting. The boys whom she had heard declaim at Cincinnati, upon a day of public exhibition, shewed "no false shame," and had no modest misgivings about the effect of the vehement action they had been taught to employ. The spectatress wondered how they would hereafter speak in Congress. Not the better, we dare venture to predict, for these juvenile rehearsals. Other educational peculiarities are of more promising character, though, indeed, we have enough of eloquence so called, at home, where it is the inveterate vice of quack schools. At the College of Amherst in Massachusetts—that State which, in spite of Miss Martineau's denunciations of Bostonian pride, assumption, and pedantry, foreigners must ever consider the Athens of America—young girls from a neighbouring school were found attending the lectures of the Professor of Natural History, along with the students. They were the daughters of the farmers and citizens of the village. The lecture at which Miss Martineau happened to be present was upon Geology. The admission of the girls was a practice of some years standing. The students sat in front, the girls ranged on each side of the lecturer. It is said, truly, "It was a gladdening sight, testifying both to the simplicity of manners and eagerness for education."

The changeableness, the rigour, and the excessive heat of the climate, in all parts of the Union, from the Bay of Massachusetts to the swamp of New Orleans, is a frequent complaint with the traveller, and indeed with all enlight-omed natives, and shews the magnitude of an inevitable evil, which should be duly weighed by intending emigrants, and also devoutly pondered by the discontented at home. The evils of climate are, no doubt, to a certain degree relative. Temperate England proves as fatal to the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands, as Java or Sierra Leone to the Englishman. Still there is much to be said for a civilized climate in enumerating the substantial blessings of life; and, in climate, taking the average of years, from frozen January round to dark December, "there is no place like home." The American ladies—like the ladies of every northern country, until one approaches the Pole—certainly aggravate the evils of climate by their manner of dressing, where the unavoidable suffering from cold might be thought sufficient probation, without wifful folly.

At Washington, in January, so changeable is the temperature, that Miss Martineau and her friends going abroad muffled in furs, would sometimes be compelled to return to put on light shawls; or the reverse. She was, in that city, compelled, for comfort, to stretch on a sofa drawn close up to the fire. The climate of New England, in particular, is described as "wretched," and as peculiarly fatal to children. The mortality among children is everywhere a dark feature—yet how population increases! "Never," says the traveller, "did I see so many wo-worn mothers as in America." The "lung-fever" is the complaint alike of infancy and adolescence. The English lady had no idea of what cold was until she walked out in Boston, with the thermometer seven degrees and a half below zero, with a cutting wind, and when her muff seemed to be made of ice. The following description may help to reconcile us to the prospect of another winter as severe as the past—or should we rather say the present?—

On a December morning, [in Boston,] you are awakened by the domestic scraping at your hearth. Your anthracite fire has been in all night; and now the ashes are carried away, more coal is put on, and the blower hides the kindly red from you for a time. In half an hour the fire is intense, though, at the other end of the room, everything you touch seems to blister your fingers with cold. If you happen to turn up a corner of the carpet with your foot, it gives out a flash; and your hair crackles as you brush it. Breakfast is always hot, be the weather what it may. The coffee is scalding, and the buck-wheat cakes steam when the cover is taken off. Your host's little boy asks whether he may go coasting to-day; and his sisters tell you what day the schools will all go sleighing. . . . To coast is to ride on a board down a frozen slope; [the hurley-hacket of Scotland in the olden times;] and this affords them more exercise than they are at all aware of taking.

As for the sleighing, I heard much more than I experienced of its charms. . . . I do not know the author of a description of sleighing which was quoted to me, but I admire it for its fidelity. "Do you want to know what sleighing is like? You can soon try. Set your chair on a spring board out in the porch on Christmas-day; put your feet in a pail full of powdered ice; have somebody to jingle a bell in one ear, and somebody else to blow into the other with the bellows—and you will have an exact idea of sleighing."

Miss Martineau has devoted an entire chapter to Originals. The very motto to the chapter is from an original, though not an American original. She found them in all locations, though they are principally either remotely-settled Yankees, or natives of the back States. Well-bred Virginia and Carolina afford few originals, and Kentucky and Tennessee a rich harvest. The Americans imagine that England is the country of humorists and oddities, unconscious of the amount of native oddity. The proof of their want of original character, found in their chameleon-like habit of assuming every passing hue of circumstance, is rebutted; though the general impressibility of the New-Englanders in particular is fully admitted. New England seems to be the best soil in the world for planting any novel science. The extraordinary impressibility of the people, about any new "systems of science, philosophy, and morals, which exceeds anything ever seen or heard of in the sober old country," is assumed to prove merely, that the nation, in its large divisions, is not original in character.

Meanwhile, America must be the very Elysium of itinerant lecturers; for

A conjuror's trip through the English counties, is very like the progress of a lecturer, or newly-imported philosopher, through the American cities. The wonder, the excitement, the unbounded credulity, are much alike in the two cases; but, in the English village, there may be old man under the elm, smiling good-naturedly at the show, without following after it; or a sage young man who could tell how the puppets are moved, as well as if he saw the wires. And so it is in the American cities. The crowd is large, but everybody is not in it—the believers are many—but there are some who foresee how soon the belief will take a new turn.

When Spurzheim was in America, the great mass of society became phrenologists in a day, wherever he appeared; and, ever since, itinerant lecturers have been reproducing the same sensation, in a milder way, by retailing Spurzheimism, much deteriorated, in places where the philosopher had not been. Meantime, the light is always going out behind, as fast as it blazes up round the steps of the lecturer. While the world of Richmond and Charleston is working at a multiplication of the fifteen casts (the same fifteen or so) which every lecturer carries about, and all caps and wigs are pulled off, and all fair tresses dishevelled, in the search after organization, Boston has gone completely round to the opposite philosophy, and is raving about spiritualism, to an excess which can scarcely be credited by any who have not heard the Unknown Tongues. If a phrenological lecturer from Paris, London, or Edinburgh, should go to Boston, the superficial, viable portion of the public would wheel round once more, so rapidly and with so clamorous a welcome on their tongues, that the transported lecturer would bless his stars, which had guided him over to a country whose inhabitants are so candid, so enlightened, so ravenous for truth. Before five years are out, however, the lecturer will find himself superseded by some professor of animal magnetism, some preacher of homeopathy, some teacher who will undertake to analyze children, prove to them that their spirits made their bodies, and elicit from them truths fresh from heaven.

We are inclined to think that the old country resembles the new in this respect, more than the traveller is aware. It is one decisive indication of a certain stage of popular mental advancement, and one in which our provincial towns are treading on the heels of the American cities, while following more slowly the self-same line of march. The rush to the lecture-room may not be so simultaneous—for our population are less alive to such pursuits, and have also less leisure and fewer spare dollars. Among the originals, was "a charming pair of professors, discovered in a remote State—able men," yet most blest in their opinions of themselves.

One speaking of the other says—"A. has been examining my cranium. He says I am the most concealed man in the States—except himself."

The exception was a fair one. When I saw B., I thought that I had seen the topmost wonder of the world for self-complacency; but upon this Alp another was to arise, as I found when I knew A. The only point of inferiority in A. is, that he is not quite immovably happy in himself. His feet are far from handsome; and ne boot-maker in the West End could make them look so. This is the bitter drop in A.'s cup. This is the vulnerable point in his peace. His pupils have found it out, and have obtained a hold over him by it. They have but to fix their eyes upon his feet to throw him into disturbance; but, if they have gone too far, and desire to grow into favour again, they need only compliment his head, and all is well again. He lectures to them on Phrenology; and when on the topic of Galen's skull, declares that there is but one head known, which can compare with Galen's in its most important characteristics. The students all raise their eyes to the professor's bald crown, and the professor bows. He exhibits a cast of Burke's head, mentioning that it combines in the most perfect manner conceivable, all grand intellectual and moral characteristics; and adding that only one head has been known perfectly to resemble it. Again the students fix their gaze on the summit of the professor, and he congratulates them on their scientific discernment.

Probably, these may be "college stories," or they may be literally true. Professor Leslie, and other savans, as eminent, have furnished mirth with innumerable stories equally ludicrous, of the personal vanity of grotesque-looking philosophers.

Miss Martineau's specimen, after an animated eulogium on Mrs Somerville, whom he had seen in London, finally declared—"In short, I actually find that Mrs Somerville knows more than I do." His auditor mechanically replied, "I have no doubt of it." A burst of laughter from the whole party shewed her the error of taking the professor at his own estimate. His look of mortification was pitiable. She relates—"One of the professor's most serious declarations to me was, that the time had long been past when he believed he might be mistaken. He had once thought that he might be in the wrong, like other people; but experience had taught him that he never erred"—a state of beatitude not peculiar to American professors. To one of two literary ladies, sisters, and stars of the first magnitude, Miss Martineau paid a visit one morning, and took three female friends, strangers to the lady, along with her—a freedom, by the way, at which English pride, or etiquette, or shyness, would have boggled, and justly. One of the three—

Was an avowed authoress; a second was a deep and thoroughly exercised scholar, and happened to have published; which the pedantic lady did not know. The third was also a stranger to her, but a very clever woman. We were treated with ludicrous precision, according to our supposed merits; the third-mentioned lady being just honoured with a passing notice, and the fourth totally neglected.

She would deign to look at nothing under a blue-socking. The other sister made Miss Martineau a visit, and—

She informed me that she lectured on mental and moral philosophy to young ladies. She talked with much admiration of Mr Brown as a metaphysician. I concluded this gentleman to be some American worthy, with whom I had to become acquainted; but it came out to be Dr Thomas Brown whom she was praising. She appeared not to know even the names of metaphysicians out of the Scotch school; and if the ghosts of the Scotch schoolmen were present, they might well question whether she understood much of them.

As we have as yet no female lecturers on "mental and moral philosophy," this lady is deservedly placed among American Originals, though, after all, her true place is with the host of half-instructed, shallow, and presumptuous persons that may be found in every country. Could Miss Martineau see but one tenth of the communications and requests made to the conductors of newspapers and magazines, and to persons of any poetical celebrity, by "ambitious girls" and "aspiring youths," she would no longer consider the "ambitious girl," who sent her verses, and laboured to attract her notice, as of a genus peculiar to the United States.

A friend had desired the traveller to bring her home something exclusively American; and we do believe that the western judge she longed to pack up and send per packet would have strictly fulfilled the conditions.

He was about six feet high, lank as a stall, and seeming to be held together only by the long-tailed drab great-coat into which he was put. He had a quid in his cheek whenever I saw him, and squirted tobacco-juice into the the fire-place or elsewhere, at intervals of about twenty seconds. His face was long and solemn, his voice monotonous, his manner dogmatical to a most amusing degree. He was a dogged Republican, with an uncompromising hatred of the blacks, and with an indifferent sort of pity for all foreigners. This last feeling probably induced him to instruct me on various matters. He fixed his eyes on the fire, and talked on for my edification, but without taking express notice of the presence of any one; so that his lecture had the droll appearance of being a formal soliloquy.

The matter was, we think, not quite so American as the manner. In England, there are judges, and many others of equal station, who would indulge the lower orders in exercising all wisdom and knowledge about the affairs of another world, and also to entitle themselves, by the probation of patient suffering, and toil, and privation here, to the enjoyment of Heaven hereafter.

American humour and drollery break out in puffing advertisements, in which the Republicans beat the Old World out of sight. At an optician's in Baltimore, were miniature busts of Franklin, Washington, &c. &c.; each ornamented with a pair of tiny spectacles, and looking remarkably sage. America has also its Curls and Lintots. But these are not original. Some of the best strokes in the early papers of Blackwood's "Nottes," turned upon the idea of the worthy publisher seeing everything that occurred, or was spoken about, only in the one aspect of its capabilities of being fabricated into "a capital magazine article." Miss Martineau is not sure that her American bookseller's originality extended farther than the frankness of his professional discourse—"but that was infinitely striking:"—

He told me that he wanted to publish for me, and would offer as good terms as anybody. I thanked him, but objected that I had nothing to publish. He was sure I must have a book written about America. I had not, and did not know that I ever should have. His answer, given with a patronising air of suggestion, was—"Why, surely, madam, you need not be at a loss about that. You must have got incident plenty by this time; and then you can Trollopeize a bit, and so make a readable book."

Sometimes we wish that the author to whom this sage advice was offered, had really Trollopeized a little more. She is evidently often struck with a sense of incongruity, or of the ludicrous, to which she does not heartily give way; while some odd things which she does relate as odd, seem to us not peculiar to America, though perhaps new to the traveller.

The founder of the Peace Societies in America, the venerable Noah Worcester, is one of those rare Originals of which there are far too few in every country. He submitted to voluntary poverty, from the conscientious love of truth, and long struggled with distress and poverty in his endeavours to reveal and enforce it. Among men at once remarkable and original, is a gentleman named Emerson, whose claims to intellectual superiority are supported by a long quotation from an eloquent and highly moral-toned discourse, delivered at the celebration of a literary anniversary. We must not forget that Miss Martineau frequently displays an amiable partiality for her personal intimates and literary friends. This discourse, however, contains noble passages, embodying exalted feelings and high aspirations.

Father Taylor, the seamen's apostle, is, we believe, tolerably well-known in England, through the medium of the "small literature" of Boston. He is one of the busiest and most cheerful of men. The Yankees, who are very sensitive on all points of national glory, call him a second homely Jeremy Taylor. Might not a George Whitefield content them?—a more useful character. Miss Martineau makes a polite compromise in doubting whether Jeremy Taylor himself could more absolutely sway the minds and hearts of the learned and pious of his day than the seamen's friend does those of his flock. He has a great advantage over other preachers, in being able to speak to his hearers from the ground of their common experience; in being able to appeal to his own sea-life. He can say, "You have lodged with me in the fore-castle: did you ever know me profane?" "You have seen me land from a long voyage: where did I betake myself? Am not I a proof that a sea-life need not be soiled with vice on land?" All this gives him some power; but it would be little without the prodigious force which he carries in his magnificent intellect and earnest heart.

Father Taylor presides over several most useful institutions for seamen in Boston; and it looks impossible that his place in them can ever again be filled up with the same zeal and energy. He is a liberal Presbyterian.

His chapel is filled, from year's end to year's end, with sailors. He has no salary, and will not hear of one. He takes charge of all the poor connected with his chapel. To many this must look like an act of insanity. No class is more exposed to casualties than that of seamen; and, when a life is lost, an entire helpless family comes upon the charity of society. Father Taylor speaks of his ten thousand children; and all the woes and faults of a multitude are accumulated upon his hands; and yet he retains the charge of all his poor, though he has no fixed income whatever. He does it by putting his charge in the way of helping each other and themselves. He encourages sobriety and economy in all their habits, and enforces them with a power which it would be vain to attempt to give an idea of.

Mr Taylor has a remarkable person. He is stoutly built, and looks more like a skipper than a preacher. His face is hard and weather-beaten, but with an expression of sensibility, as well as acuteness, which it is wonderful that features apparently so immoveable can convey. He uses a profusion of action. His wife told me that she thought his health was promoted by his taking so much exercise in the shape of action, in conversation as well as in the pulpit. He is very loud, and prodigiously rapid. His splendid thoughts come faster than he can speak them; and at times he would be totally overwhelmed by them, if, in the midst of his most rapid utterances of them, a burst of tears, of which he is wholly unconscious, did not aid in his relief. I have seen them streaming, bathing his face, when his words breathed the very spirit of joy, and every tone of his voice was full of exhilaration. His pathos, shed in thoughts and tones so fleeting as to be gone like lightning, is the most awful of his powers. I have seen a single clause of a short sentence call up an instantaneous flush on the hundreds of hard faces turned to the preacher; and it is no wonder to me that the widow and orphan are cherished by those who hear his prayers for them. The tone of his petitions is importunate—even passionate; and his sailor hearers may be forgiven for their faith, that Father Taylor's prayers cannot be refused.

With such petitions, urged with every beauty of expression, he mixes up whatever may have struck his fancy during the week, whether mythology, politics, housewifery, or anything else. He prayed one day, when dwelling on the moral perils of seamen, "that Bacchus and Venus might be driven to the end of the earth, and off of it." I heard him pray that Members of Congress might be preserved from buffoonery. Thence he passes to supplication, offered in a spirit of sympathy which may appear bold at another moment, but which is true to the emotion of the hour. "Father! look upon us! We are a widow." "Father! the mother's heart thou knowest: the mother's bleeding heart thou pitiest. Sanctify to us the removal of this lamb!"

Such preaching exerts prodigious power over an occasional hearer; and it is an exquisite pleasure to listen to it: but it does not, for a continuance, meet the religious wants of any but those to whom it is expressly addressed. The preacher shares the mental and moral characteristics, as well as the experience in life, of his nautical hearers; their imaginative cast of mind, their superstition, their strong capacity for friendship and love, their ease about the future—called recklessness in some, and faith in others. This is so unlike the common mind of landmen, that the same expression of worship will not suit them both. So Father Taylor will continue to be the seamen's apostle; and, however admired and beloved by the landsman, not his priest.

In short, Father Taylor is a great natural orator, an Original, a truly good man, and a brave Christian sailor. He tells the seamen that "they are the seed-carriers of the world—the winged seeds, from which good or evil must spring up on the wildest shores of God's earth."

Another original and zealous apostle of humanity is William Lloyd Garrison, not many years since a printer's boy; first, a colonizationist, but latterly a martyr of abolition, into which he was persecuted. He became a lecturer for the abolition cause, after suffering a short imprisonment for a libel, published in a newspaper, exposing a nefarious slave transaction. At Garrison's first lecture in Boston, he so impressed Mr May, a Unitarian clergyman, that, next Sunday, in praying for all distressed persons, he prayed for the slaves, and was asked if he was mad. This is but a recent affair.

Garrison, and his fellow-workman, both in the printing-office and the cause—his friend Knapp—set up the Liberator—in its first days a little sheet of shabby paper, printed with old types, and now a handsome and flourishing newspaper. These two heroes, in order to publish their paper, lived for a series of years in one room, on bread and water, "with sometimes," when the paper sold unusually well, "the luxury of a bowl of milk." In course of time, twelve men formed themselves into an abolition society at Boston, and the cause was fairly afoot. It was undergoing its worst persecutions just before I entered Boston for the winter.

Garrison came to see Miss Martineau. She says:—

His aspect put to flight in an instant what prejudices his slanderers had raised in me. I was wholly taken by surprise. It was a countenance glowing with health, and wholly expressive of purity, animation, and gentleness. I did not now wonder at the citizen who, seeing a print of Garrison at a shop window, without a name to it, went in and bought it, and framed it, as the most saint-like of countenances. The end of the story is, that, when the citizen found whose portrait he had been hanging up in his parlour, he took the print out of the frame and huddled it away.

He was agitated and abashed when he entered, and humbly thanked the lady for desiring to see one "so odious." If abashed in society, he seems bold enough with his pen. His fervent admirer cannot approve of the severe style of his censure; but she adds:—

It is only fair to mention that Garrison adopts it warily; and that I am persuaded that he is elevated above passion, and has no unrighteous anger to vent in harsh expressions. He considers his task to be the exposure of fallacy, the denunciation of hypocrisy, and the rebuke of selfish timidity. He is looked upon, by those who defend him in this particular, as holding the branding-iron: and it seems true enough that no one branded by Garrison ever recovers it.

Dr Channing, who has been partly goaded into abolitionism since Mr Abdy's visit, has been frequently subjected to this meek apostle's branding-iron; but has since shaken hands with him, and given him his affectionate respect. When asked why he could speak so severely of a man whom he esteemed, his remarkable reply was—

"The most difficult duty of an office like mine is to find fault with those whom I love and honour most. I have been obliged to do it about ———, who is one of my best friends. He is clearly wrong in a matter important to the cause; and I must expose it. In the same way, Dr Channing, while aiding our cause, has thought fit to say that the abolitionists are fanatical; in other words, that we set up our wayward wills in opposition to the will we profess to obey. I cannot suffer the cause to be injured by letting this pass: but I do not the less value Dr Channing for the things he has done."

We have purposely reserved the account of Dr Channing to the last, as, to say truth, Miss Martineau's utterance on this head is less intelligible and articulate than when she descants on other American magnates. In waiting, our difficulties have not cleared away. We fancy we can comprehend her idea of Father Taylor, and of Garrison, and Madison, all of whom she admired, and even of Calhoun; but that of Channing comes to us complex and perplexed, and wanting the oneness and simplicity which characterise the portraits of other remarkable men. The truth seems to be, that Miss Martineau, high though her opinion is, does not think Dr Channing quite so great a man as the majority of her English readers may have preconceived, and she is somewhat at a loss how to intimate as much. This is not, indeed, apparent in the formal eulogy of many pages contained in her last volume, though there is something even there to bear out our idea; but it breaks out incidentally through all the work, and by reflection in her references to Priestley, and to other American Unitarian clergymen, and morally heroic characters in private life, whom she met with in her travels. Channing was, besides, a tardy abolitionist, pricked on by the more fiery and zealous spirits around him; and, perhaps, unconsciously influenced by the public opinion of that distant nation, where his reputation is high; and Miss Martineau is still under the warm feelings of her Boston martyrdom. She visited Channing at a favourite country place in Rhode Island, where he spends the greater part of the year.

The stage set me down at the garden-gate at Oakland, whither my host came out to receive me. I knew it could be no other than Dr Channing; but his appearance surprised me. He looked younger and pleasanter than I had expected. The common engraving of him is undeniably very like; but it does not altogether do him justice. A bust of him was modelled by Persico, the next winter, which is an admirable likeness—favourable, but not flattering. Dr Channing is short, and very slightly made. His countenance varies more than its first aspect would lead the stranger to suppose it could. In mirth, it is perfectly changed, and very remarkable. The lower part of other faces is the most expressive of mirth: not so with Dr Channing's, whose muscles keep very composed, while his laughter pours out at his eyes. I have seen him laugh till it seemed doubtful where the matter would end. His voice is, however, the great charm. I do not mean in the pulpit: of what it is there I am not qualified to speak, for I could not hear a tone of his preaching; but in conversation his voice becomes delightful after one is familiarised with it. At first, his tones partake of the unfortunate dryness of his manner; but by use they grow, or seem to grow, more and more genial, till, at last, the ear waits and watches for them. Of the "repulsiveness" of his manners, on a first acquaintance, he is himself aware; though not, I think, of all the evil it causes, in compelling mere strangers to carry away a wrong idea of him, and in deterring even familiar acquaintances from opening their minds, and letting their speech run on as freely to him as he earnestly desires that it should. It might not be difficult to account for this manner; but this is not the place in which we have to do with any but the facts of the case. The natural, but erroneous conclusion of most strangers is, that the dryness proceeds from spiritual pride.

No man is, however, according to Miss Martineau's observation, more free from this fault, or from the dogmatism apparent in his writings. She remarks:—

I say this confidently, the tone of his writings notwithstanding: and I say it, not as a friend, but from such being the result of a very few hours' study of him. Whenever his conversation is not to be earnest—and it is not always earnest—it is for the sake of drawing out the person he is talking with, and getting at his views. This method of conversation is not to be defended—even on the ground of expediency—for a person's real views are not to be got at in this way—no one liking to be managed: but Dr Channing's own part in this kind of conversation is not played in the spirit of condescension, but of inquiry. One proof of this is the use he makes of the views of the persons with whom he converses. Nothing is lost upon him. He lays up what he obtains for meditation; and it reappears, sooner or later, amplified, enriched, and made perfectly his own. I believe that he is, to a singular degree, unconscious of both processes, and unaware of his part in them—both the drawing out of information, and the subsequent assimilation; but both are very evident to the observation of even strangers.

We had fancied Mr Abdy severe, if not capacious, in his reported conversation with Mr Channing; but the utility of frank though ungracious dealing was never more striking. Immediately after Mr Abdy's remonstrance and departure, Dr Channing "took measures to inform himself of the real state of the blacks, [strange that he should not have known a good deal about it before!] and within the next month published a thorough-going abolition sermon." This was followed by the publication of his book on slavery, and latterly by his Letter to Mr Clay on the Annexation of Texas; which Miss Martineau describes "as of all his works the one by which his most attached friends would have him judged and remembered." What severe condemnation does this convey of the American government! She gives Dr Channing credit for great moral courage in coming forward at last; and one can easily understand that it is far easier to be an abolitionist in England than in America or the West Indies. Channing had a high reputation to endanger, the esteem of many powerful friends to hazard or forfeit; and he is not indifferent to such considerations. It is alleged, strongly we would hope, "that he could not, after his testimony against slavery, have set foot within the boundaries of half the States, without danger to his life." But, as he and the surrounding society, at the same time, imagined Miss Martineau in a similar predicament, and as she met with undeviating kindness and civility, instead of the threatened Lynching, we should hope that Dr Channing would not have been in much greater peril. His habits of composition are described. They are quite compatible with those of an author whose beautiful writings are choice and ornate, but neither voluminous nor remarkably profound.

He never sits in his study for hours together, occupied with books and thoughts; but, even when most deeply engaged in composition, walks out into his garden so frequently that the wonder to persons who use different methods is how, amidst so many interruptions, he keeps up any continuity of thought, or accomplishes any amount of composition at all. He rarely has his pen in his hand for more than an hour at a time, and does not, therefore, enter into the enjoyments of writers who find the second hour twice as productive and pleasurable as the first, and the third as the second, and who grudge moving under five or six hours.

The noblest feature of character revealed to us in Channing is his "entire exemption from all professional narrowness—from all priestly prejudice," as he has been imagined more than ordinarily professional in his views, judgment, and conduct. "In this," his visitor says, "I do not agree."

No one sees more clearly than he the necessity of proving and exercising principles by hourly action in all kinds of worldly business. No one is more free from attachment to forms, or more practically convinced that rules and institutions are mere means to an end. He shewed this, in one instance out of a thousand, by proposing to his congregation, some time ago, that they should not always depend on their pastors for the guidance of their worship, but that any members who had anything to say should offer to do so. As might have been foreseen, every one shrank from being concerned in so new an administration of religion; but Dr Channing was disappointed that the effort was not made. No one, again is more free from all pride of virtue.

What is Channing's chief merit with the majority of his admirers does not recommend him to his English guest—his unretracted opinions of Priestley, and especially his attachment to the poetry of philosophy, and to mysticism in religion. His natural tendency is to an excess of caution; and in his case, as in many others, excessive caution has led to occasional rashness. But this is all over now, and Dr Channing has firmly taken his place in the vanguard of the abolitionists. We end this section as we began it, without having any definite notion of Miss Martineau's final estimate of the man, and especially of the intellectual stature of Channing; and the reason seems, that her own convictions were fluctuating; and the belief inevitable that, among the great men of the young Republic, he is not considered one of the greatest.

From the few specimens given—and we consider them among the choicest passages of the three volumes—the reader may have a clear idea of the nature of the supplementary work. It is far more entertaining than its predecessor; and, though less authoritative in tone, and in conveying information and instruction, than "Society in America," it is more original, and, what is all in all, more American. The British public would, we dare say, gladly have received a little more "Trollopizing;" but, even in this respect, the illustrative bite are either rich, or else dainty and piquant. There is one blemish in this lady's writing which we are bound to hint at, and which she has described in accounting for a fault, erroneously, she imagines, imputed to Channing—an appearance, not, as in him, of "spiritual pride," but of a certain complacent pride d'esprit, (if we may coin a phrase,) displayed in the shape of "rather formal declarations of ways of thinking as his own, and of accounts of his own views and states of mind, still as his own." For his read her, and our idea of Miss Martineau's tendency is admirably expressed. There is, too, the slightest possible taint, the faintest souppçon, not of sectarian prejudice, but of sectarian temper, apparent in her writings; of the bigotry of liberality, and the suppressed indignation unavoidably excited by the narrow views and petty persecutions of the orthodox. Though the traveller was fully tolerated herself, it is manifest both from the tone of the book and the facts recorded, that, in many localities, the Unitarians are still suffering, either under social proscription or from the tyranny of opinion, quite as much as in this country.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES LAMB.

AMONGST the earliest literary acquaintances I made was that with the inimitable Charles Lamb: inimitable, I say, but that word is too limited in its meaning; for, as is said of Milton in that well-known life of him attached to all common editions of the "Paradise Lost," (Fenton's, I think,) "in both senses he was above imitation." Yes; it was as impossible to the moral nature of Charles Lamb that he should imitate another, as, in an intellectual sense, it was impossible that any other should successfully imitate him. To write with patience even, not to say genially, for Charles Lamb it was a very necessity of his constitution that he should write from his own wayward nature; and that nature was so peculiar that no other man, the ablest at mimicry, could counterfeit its voice. But, let me not anticipate; for these were opinions about Lamb which I had not when I first knew him, nor could have had by any reasonable title. "Elia," he it observed, the exquisite "Elia," was then unborn; Lamb had as yet published nothing to the world which proclaimed him in his proper character of a most original man of genius;* at best, he could have been thought no more than a man of talent—and of talent moving in a narrow path, with a power rather of mimicking the quaint and the fantastic, than any large grasp over catholic beauty. And, therefore, it need not offend the most dotting admirer of Lamb as he is now known to us, a brilliant star for ever fixed in the firmament of English literature, that I acknowledge myself to have sought his acquaintance rather under the reflex honour he had enjoyed of being known as Coleridge's friend, than for any which he yet held directly and separately in his own person. My earliest advances towards this acquaintance had an inauspicious aspect; and it may be worth while reporting the circumstances, for they were characteristic of Charles Lamb; and the immediate result was—that we parted, not perhaps (as Lamb says of his philosophical friend R. and the Parisians) "with mutual contempt," but at least with coolness; and on my part, with something that might have even turned to disgust—founded, however, entirely on my utter misapprehension of Lamb's character and his manners—had it not been for the winning goodness of Miss Lamb, before which all resentment must have melted in a moment,

It was either late in 1804 or early in 1805, according to my present computations, that I had obtained from a literary friend a letter of introduction to Mr Lamb. All that I knew of his works was his play of "John Woodvil," which I had bought in Oxford, and perhaps I only had bought throughout that great University, at the time of my matriculation there, about the Christmas of 1803. Another book fell into my hands on that same morning, I recollect—the "Gebir" of Mr Walter Savage Landor—which astonished me by the splendour of its descriptions (for I had opened accidentally upon the sea-nymph's marriage with Tamor, the youthful brother of Gebir)—and I bought this also. Afterwards, when placing these two most unpopular of books on the same shelf with the other far holier idols of my heart, the joint poems of Wordsworth and Coleridge as then associated in the "Lyrical Ballads"—poems not equally unknown, perhaps a little better known, but only with the result of being more openly scorned and rejected—I could not but smile internally at the fair prospect I had of congregating a library which no man had read but myself. "John Woodvil" I had almost studied, and Miss Lamb's pretty "High-Born Helen," and the ingenious imitations of Burton; these I had read, and, to a certain degree, must have admired, for some parts of them had settled without effort in my memory! I had read also the Edinburgh notice of them; and with what contempt may be supposed from the fact, that my veneration for Wordsworth transcended all that I felt for any created being, past or present; inasmuch that, in the summer, or spring rather, of that same year, and full eight months before I first went to Oxford, I had ventured to address a letter to him, through his publishers, the Messrs Longman, (which letter, Miss Wordsworth in after years assured me they believed to be the production of some person much older than I represented myself,) and that in due time I had been honoured by a long answer from Wordsworth; an honour which, I well remember, kept me awake, from mere excess of pleasure, through a long night in June 1803. It was not to be supposed that the very feeblest of admirations could be shaken by mere scorn and contumely, unsupported by any shadow of a reason; Wordsworth, therefore, could not have suffered in any man's opinion, from the puny efforts of this new autocrat amongst reviews; but what was said of Lamb, though not containing one iota of criticism,

* "Man of genius"—"man of talent." I have, in a former number of this journal, laid down what I conceive to be the true ground of distinction between genius and talent; which lies mainly in this—that genius is intellectual power impregnated with the moral nature, and expresses a synthesis of the active in man with his original organic capacity of pleasure and pain. Hence the very word genius, because the genial nature in its whole organization is expressed and involved in it. Hence, also, arises the reason that genius is always peculiar and individual; one man's genius never exactly repeats another man's. But talent is the same in all men; and that which is effected by talent, can never serve to identify or indicate its author. Hence, too, that, although talent is the object of respect, it never conciliates love; you love a man of talent perhaps in concreto, but not talent; whereas genius, even for itself, is idolized. I am the more proud of this distinction, since I have seen the utter failure of Mr Coleridge, judging from his attempt in his "Table-Talk."

either good or bad, had certainly more point and cleverness. The supposition that "John Woodvil" might be a lost drama, recovered from the age of Thespis, and entitled to the hircus, &c., must, I should think, have won a smile from Lamb himself; or why say "Lamb himself," which means "even Lamb," when he would have been the very first to laugh, (as he was afterwards among the first to hoot at his own farce,) provided only he could detach his mind from the ill-nature and hard contempt which accompanied the wit. This wit had certainly not dazzled my eyes in the slightest degree. So far as I was left at leisure, by a more potent order of poetry, to think of the "John Woodvil" at all, I had felt and acknowledged a delicacy and tenderness in the situations as well as the sentiments, but disfigured, as I thought, by quaint, grotesque, and mimetic phraseology. The main defect, however, of which I complained, was defect of power. I thought Lamb had no right to take his station amongst the inspired writers who had just then arisen, to throw new blood into our literature, and to breathe a breath of life through the worn-out, or, at least, torpid organization of the national mind. He belonged, I thought, to the old literature; and, as a poet, he certainly does. There were in his verses minute scintillations of genius—now and then, even a subtle sense of beauty; and there were shy graces, lurking half-unseen, like violets in the shade. But there was no power on a colossal scale; no breadth; no choice of great subjects; no wrestling with difficulty; no creative energy. So I thought then; and so I should think now, if Lamb were viewed chiefly as a poet. Since those days, he has established his right to a seat in any company. But why? and in what character? As "Elia":—the essays of "Elia" are as exquisite a gem amongst the jewellery of literature, as any nation can shew. They do not, indeed, suggest to the typifying imagination, a Last Supper of Da Vinci, or a Group from the Sistine Chapel; but they suggest some exquisite cabinet painting; such, for instance, as that Carlo Dolce known to all who have visited Lord Exeter's place of Burleigh; (by the way, I bar the allusion to Charles Lamb, which a shameless punster suggests in the name Carlo Dolce;) and in this also resembling that famous picture—that many critics (Hazlitt amongst others) can see little or nothing in it. Quam nihil ad genium, Papiniane, tuum! Those, therefore, err, in my opinion, who present Lamb to our notice amongst the poets. Very pretty, very elegant, very tender, very beautiful verses he has written; nay, twice he has written verses of extraordinary force, almost demoniac force—viz., "The Three Graves," and "The Gipsy's Malison." But, speaking generally, he writes verses as one to whom that function was a secondary and occasional function; not his original and natural vocation; not an εργον, but a πάρεργον.

For the reasons, therefore, I have given, never thinking of Charles Lamb as a poet, and, at that time, having no means for judging of him in any other character, I had requested the letter of introduction to him, rather with a view to some further knowledge of Coleridge, (who was then absent from England,) than from any special interest about Lamb himself. However, I felt the extreme discourtesy of approaching a man, and asking for his time and civility under such an avowal: and the letter, therefore, as I believe, or as I requested, represented me in the light of an admirer. I hope it did; for that character might have some excuse for what followed, and heal the unpleasant impression likely to be left by a sort of fracas which occurred at my first meeting with Lamb. This was so characteristic of Lamb, that I have often laughed at it since I came to know what was characteristic of Lamb. But first let me describe my brief introductory call upon him at the India House. I had been told that he was never to be found at home except in the evenings; and to have called then would have been, in a manner, forcing myself upon his hospitalities, and at a moment when he might have confidential friends about him; besides that, he was sometimes tempted away to the theatres. I went, therefore, to the India House; made inquiries amongst the servants; and, after some trouble, (for that was early in his Leadenhall Street career, and, possibly, he was not much known,) I was shewn into a small room, or else a small section of a large one, (thirty-four years affect one's remembrance of some circumstances,) in which was a very lofty writing-desk, separated by a still higher railing from that part of the floor on which the profane—the laity, like myself—were allowed to approach the clerus, or clerically rulers of the room. Within the railing, sat, to the best of my remembrance, six quill-driving gentlemen; not gentlemen whose duty or profession it was merely to drive the quill, but who were then driving it—gens de plume, such in esse, as well as in posse—in act as well as habit; for, as if they supposed me a spy, sent by some superior power to report upon the situation of affairs as surprised by me, they were all too profoundly immersed in their oriental studies to have any sense of my presence. Consequently, I was reduced to a necessity of announcing myself and my errand. I walked, therefore, into one of the two open doorways of the railing, and stood closely by the high stool of him who occupied the first place within the little aisle. I touched his arm, by way of recalling him from his lofty Leadenhall speculations to this sublunary world; and, presenting my letter, asked if that gentleman (pointing to the address) were really a citizen of the present room; for I had been repeatedly misled, by the directions given me, into wrong rooms. The gentleman smiled; it was a smile not to be forgotten. This was Lamb. And here occurred a very, very little incident—one of those which pass so fugitively that they are gone and hurrying away into Lethe almost before your attention can have arrested them; but it was an incident which, to me, who happened to notice it, served to express the courtesy and delicate consideration of Lamb's manners. The seat upon which he sat, was a very high one; so absurdly high, by the way, that I can imagine no possible use or sense in such an altitude, unless it were to restrain the occupant from playing truant at the fire, by opposing Alpine difficulties to his descent. Whatever might be the original purpose of this aspiring seat, one serious dilemma arose from it, and this it was which gave the occasion to Lamb's act of courtesy. Somewhere there is an anecdote, meant to illustrate the ultra-obsequiousness of the man: either I have heard of it in connexion with some actual man known to myself, or it is told in a book of some historical coxcomb—that, being on horseback, and meeting some person or other whom it seemed advisable to flatter, he actually dismounted, in order to pay his court by a more ceremonious bow. In Russia, as we all know, this was, at one time, upon meeting any of the Imperial family, an act of legal necessity: and there, accordingly, but there only, it would have worn no ludicrous aspect. Now, in this situation of Lamb's, the act of descending from his throne, a very elaborate process, with steps and stages analogous to those on horseback—of slipping your right foot out of the stirrup, throwing your leg over the crupper, &c.—was, to all intents and purposes, the same thing as dismounting from a great elephant of a horse. Therefore it both was, and was felt to be by Lamb, supremely ludicrous. On the other hand, to have sat still and stately upon this aerial station, to have bowed condescendingly from this altitude, would have been—not ludicrous indeed; performed by a very superb person, and supported by a very superb bow, it might have been vastly fine, and even terrifying to many young gentlemen under sixteen: but it would have had an air of ungentlemanly assumption. Between these extremes, therefore, Lamb had to choose: between appearing ridiculous himself for a moment, by going through a ridiculous evolution, which no man could execute with grace; or, on the other hand, appearing lofty and assuming, in a degree which his truly humble nature (for he was the humblest of men in the pretensions which he put forward for himself) must have shrunk from with horror. Nobody who knew Lamb can doubt how the problem was solved: he began to dismount instantly; and, as it happened that the very first round of his descent obliged him to turn his back upon me as if for a sudden purpose of flight, he had an excuse for laughing; which he did heartily—saying, at the same time, something to this effect, that I must not judge from first appearances; that he should revolve upon me; that he was not going to fly; and other facetiæ, which challenged a general laugh from the clerical brotherhood. When he had reached the basis of terra firma on which I was standing, naturally, as a mode of thanking him for his courtesy, I presented my hand; which, in a general case, I should certainly not have done; for I cherished, in an ultra-English degree, the English custom (a wise custom) of bowing in frigid silence on a first introduction to a stranger; but, to a man of literary talent, and one who had just practised so much kindness in my favour at so probable a hazard to himself of being laughed at for his pains—I could not maintain that frosty reserve. Lamb took my hand; did not absolutely reject it; but rather repelled my advance by his manner. This, however, long afterwards I found, was only a habit derived from his too great sensitiveness to the variety of people's feelings, which run through a gamut so infinite of degrees and modes as to make it unsafe for any man who respects himself, to be too hasty in his allowances of familiarity. Lamb had, as he was entitled to have, a high self-respect; and me he probably suspected (as a young Oxonian) of some aristocratic tendencies. The letter of introduction, containing (I imagine) no matters of business, was speedily run through; and I instantly received an invitation to spend the evening with him. Lamb was not one of those who catch at the chance of escaping from a bore by fixing some distant day, when accidents (in duplicate proportion, perhaps, to the number of intervening days) may have carried you away from the place: he sought to benefit by no luck of that kind; for he was, with his limited income—and I say it deliberately—positively the most hospitable man I have known in this world. That night, the same night, I was to come and spend the evening with him. I had gone to the India House with the express purpose of accepting whatever invitation he should give me; and, therefore, I accepted this, took my leave, and left Lamb in the act of resuming his aerial position.

I was to come so early as to drink tea with Lamb; and the hour was seven. He lived in the Temple; and I, who was not then, as afterwards I became, a student and member of "the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple," did not know much of the localities. However, I found out his abode, not greatly beyond my time: nobody had been asked to meet me, which a little surprised me, but I was glad of it; for, besides Lamb, there was present, his sister, Miss Lamb, of whom, and whose talents and sweetness of disposition, I had heard. I turned the conversation, upon the first opening which offered, to the subject of Coleridge; and many of my questions were answered satisfactorily, because seriously, by Miss Lamb. But Lamb took a pleasure in baffling me, or in throwing ridicule upon the subject. Out of this grew the matter of our affray. We were speaking of "The Ancient Mariner." Now, to explain what followed, and a little to excuse myself, I must beg the reader to understand that I was under twenty years of age, and that my admiration for Coleridge (as in, perhaps, a still greater degree, for Wordsworth) was literally in no respect short of a religious feeling: it had, indeed, all the sanctity of religion, and all the tenderness of a human veneration. Then, also, to imagine the strength which it would derive from circumstances that do not exist now, but did then, let the reader further suppose a case—not such as he may have known since that era about Sir Walter Scotts and Lord Byrons, where every man you could possibly fall foul of, early or late, night or day, summer or winter, was in perfect readiness to feel and express his sympathy with the admirer—but when no man, beyond one or two in each ten thousand, had so much as heard of either Coleridge or Wordsworth; and that one, or those two, knew them only to scorn them—trample on them—spit upon them: men so abject in public estimation, I maintain, as that Coleridge and that Wordsworth, had not existed before—have not existed since—will not exist again. We have heard, in old times, of donkeys insulting effete or dying lions, by kicking them; but, in the case of Coleridge and Wordsworth, it was effete donkeys that kicked living lions. They, Coleridge and Wordsworth, were the Pariahs of literature in those days: as much scorned wherever they were known; but escaping that scorn only because they were as little known as Pariahs, and even more obscure.

Well, after this bravura, by way of conveying my sense of the real position then occupied by these two authors—a position which thirty and odd years have altered, by a revolution more astonishing and total than ever before happened in literature or in life—let the reader figure to himself the sensitive horror with which a young person, carrying his devotion about with him, of necessity, as the profoundest of secrets, like a primitive Christian amongst a nation of Pagans, or a Roman Catholic convert amongst the bloody idolaters of Japan—in Oxford, above all places, hoping for no sympathy, and feeling a daily grief, almost a shame, in harbouring this devotion to that which, nevertheless, had done more for the expansion and sustenance of his own inner mind than all literature besides—let the reader figure, I say, to himself, the shock with which such a person must recoil from hearing the very friend and associate of these authors utter what seemed at that time a burning ridicule of all which belonged to them—their books, their thoughts, their places, their persons. This had gone on for some time, before we came upon the ground of “The Ancient Mariner:” I had been grieved, perplexed, astonished; and how else could I have felt reasonably, knowing nothing of Lamb’s propensity to mystify a stranger; he, on the other hand, knowing nothing of the depth of my feelings on these subjects, and that they were not so much mere literary preferences as something that went deeper than life or household affections? At length, when he had given utterance to some ferocious canon of judgment, which seemed to question the entire value of the poem, I said, perspiring, (I dare say,) in this detestable crisis—“But, Mr Lamb, good heavens! how is it possible you can allow yourself in such opinions? What instance could you bring from the poem that would bear you out in these insinuations?” “Instances!” said Lamb: “oh, I’ll instance you, if you come to that. Instance, indeed! Pray, what do you say to this—

‘The many men so beautiful,
And they all dead did lie?’

So beautiful indeed! Beautiful! Just think of such a gang of Wapping vagabonds, all covered with pitch, and chewing tobacco; and the old gentleman himself—what do you call him?—the bright-eyed fellow?” What more might follow, I never heard; for, at this point, in a perfect rapture of horror, I raised my hands—both hands—to both ears; and, without stopping to think or to apologize, I endeavoured to restore equanimity to my disturbed sensibilities, by shutting out all further knowledge of Lamb’s impieties. At length he seemed to have finished; so I, on my part, thought I might venture to take off the embargo: and, in fact, he had ceased; but no sooner did he find me restored to my hearing than he said, with a most sarcastic smile—which he could assume upon occasion—“If you please, sir, we’ll say grace before we begin.” I know not whether Lamb were really piqued or not at the mode by which I had expressed my disturbance: Miss Lamb certainly was not; her goodness led her to pardon me, and to treat me—in whatever light she might really view my almost involuntary rudeness—as the party who had suffered wrong; and, for the rest of the evening, she was so pointedly kind and conciliatory in her manner, that I felt greatly ashamed of my boyish failure in self-command. Yet, after all, Lamb necessarily appeared so much worse, in my eyes, as a traitor: is worse than an open enemy.

Lamb, after this one visit—not knowing at that time any particular reason for continuing to seek his acquaintance—I did not trouble with my calls for some years. At length, however, about the year 1808, and for the six or seven following years, in my evening visits to Coleridge, I used to meet him again; not often, but sufficiently to correct altogether the very false impression I had received of his character and manners. I have elsewhere described him as a “Diogenes with the heart of a St John”—where, by the way, the reader must not, by laying the accent falsely on St John, convert it into the name of Lord Bolingbroke: I meant St John the evangelist. And by ascribing to Lamb any sort of resemblance to Diogenes, I had a view only to his plain speaking in the first place—his unequalled freedom from every mode of hypocrisy or affectation; and, secondly, to his talent for saying keen, pointed things, sudden flashes, or revelations of hidden truths, in a short condensed form of words. In fact, the very foundation of Lamb’s peculiar character was laid in his absolute abhorrence of all affectation. This shewed itself in self-disparagement of every kind; never the mock disparagement, which is self-praise in an indirect form, as when people accuse themselves of all the virtues, by professing an inability to pay proper attention to prudence or economy—or uncontrollable disposition to be rash and inconsiderate on behalf of a weaker party when suffering apparent wrong. But Lamb’s confessions of error, of infirmity, were never at any time acts of mock humility, meant to involve oblique compliment in the rebound. Thus, he honestly and frankly confessed his blank insensibility to music.

"King David's harp, that made the madness flee From Saul, had been but a Jew's harp to me," is his plain, unvarnished admission, in verses admirable for their wit and their elegance: nor did he attempt to break the force of this unfortunate truth, by claiming, which, perhaps, he might have claimed, a compensatory superiority in the endowments of his eye. It happened to him, as I believe it has often done to others—to Pope, perhaps, but certainly to Wordsworth—that the imperfect structure or imperfect development of the ear, denying any profound sensibility to the highest modes of impassioned music, has been balanced by a more than usual sensibility to some modes of visual beauty. With respect to Wordsworth, it has been doubted, by some of his friends, upon very good grounds, whether, as a connoisseur in painting, he has a very learned eye, or one that can be relied upon. I hold it to be very doubtful, also, whether Wordsworth's judgment in the human face—its features and its expression—be altogether sound, and in conformity to the highest standards of art. But it is undeniable—and must be most familiar to all who have associated upon intimate terms with Wordsworth and his sister—that they both derive a pleasure, originally and organically more profound than is often witnessed, both from the forms and the colouring of rural nature. The very same tests by which I recognise my own sensibility to music, as rising above the common standard—viz., by the indispensableness of it to my daily comfort; the readiness with which I make any sacrifices to obtain a "grand debauch" of this nature, &c. &c.—these, when applied to Wordsworth, manifest him to have an analogous craving, in a degree much transcending the general ratio for the luxuries of the eye. These luxuries Wordsworth seeks in their great original exemplar—in Nature as exhibiting herself amongst the bold forms and the rich but harmonious colouring of mountainous scenery; there especially where the hand of injudicious art, or of mercenary craft, has not much interfered, with monotonous repetition of unmeaning forms, with offensive outlines, or, still more, with harsh and glaring contrasts of colour. The offence which strikes upon Wordsworth's eye from such disfigurations of nature is, really and without affectation, as keen, as intense, and as inevitable as to other men the pain to the mere physical eye-sight from the glare of snow or the irritations of flying dust. Lamb, on the other hand, sought his pleasures of this class—not, as by this time all the world knows, in external nature, for which it was his pleasure to profess, not merely an indifference, but even a horror which it delighted him to exaggerate with a kind of playful malice to those whom he was hearing—but in the works of the great painters: and for these I have good reason to think that both he and his sister had a peculiarly deep sensibility, and, after long practice, a fine and matured taste. Here, then, was both a gift and an attainment which Lamb might have fairly pleaded in the way of a set-off to his acknowledged defects of ear. But Lamb was too really and sincerely humble ever to think of nursing and tending his own character in any man's estimation, or of attempting to blunt the effect of his own honest avowals of imperfection, by dexterously playing off before your eyes some counterbalancing accomplishment. He was, in fact, as I have said before, the most humble and unpretending of human beings, the most thoroughly sincere, the most impatient of either simulation or dissimulation, and the one who threw himself the most unreservedly for your good opinion upon the plain natural expression of his real qualities, as nature had formed them, without artifice, or design, or disguise, more than you find in the most child-like of children.

There was a notion prevalent about Lamb, which I can affirm to have been a most erroneous one: it was—that any flagrant act of wickedness formed a recommendation to his favour. "Ah!" said one man to me, when asking a letter of introduction from him—"ah! that I could but recommend you as a man that had robbed the mail, or the King's exchequer—which would be better. In that case, I need not add a word; you would take rank instantly amongst the privileged friends of Lamb, without a word from me." Now, as to "the King's Exchequer," I cannot say. A man who should have placed himself in relation with Falstaff, by obeying his commands* at a distance of four centuries, (like the traveller, who demanded of the turnpike-man—"How do you like your eggs dressed?" and, ten years after, on passing the same gate, received the monosyllabic reply—poached)—that man might have presented irresistible claims to Lamb's affection. Shakspeare, or anything connected with Shakspeare, might have proved too much for his Roman virtue. But, putting aside any case so impossible as this, I can affirm that—so far from this being the truth, or approaching the truth—a rule the very opposite governed Lamb's conduct: so far from welcoming wicked, profligate, or dissolute people by preference, if they happened to be clever—he bore with numerous dull people, stupid people, asinine people, for no other reason upon earth than because he knew them, or believed them to have been ill-used or oppressed by some clever but dissolute man. That was enough. Sufficient it was that they had been the objects of injustice, calumny, persecution, or wrong in any shape—and, without further question, they had "their place allowed" at Lamb's fireside. I knew some eminent instances of what I am now saying. And I used to think to myself, Were this feature of Lamb's character made known, and the natural results followed, what would he do? Refuse anybody, reject anybody, tell him to begone, he could not, no more than he could have danced upon his mother's grave. He would have received all who presented themselves with any rational pretensions; and would finally have gone to prison rather than reject anybody. I do not say this rhetorically. I knew Lamb; and I know certain cases in which he was concerned—cases which it is difficult to publish with any regard to the feelings of persons now living, but which (if published in all their circumstances) would shew him to be the very noblest of human beings. He was a man, in a sense more eminent than would be conceivable by many people, principely—nothing short of that in his beneficence. Many liberal people I have known in this world—many who were charitable in the widest sense—many munificent people; but never any one upon whom, for bounty, for indulgence and forgiveness, for charitable construction of doubtful or mixed actions, and for regal munificence, you might have thrown yourself with so absolute a reliance as upon this comparatively poor Charles Lamb. Considered as a man of genius, he was not in the very first rank, simply because his range was a contracted one: within that range, he was perfect; of the peculiar powers which he possessed, he has left to the world as exquisite a specimen as this planet is likely to exhibit. But, as a moral being, in the total compass of his relations to this world's duties, in the largeness and diffusiveness of his charity, in the graciousness of his condescension to inferior intellects, I am disposed, after a deliberate review of my own entire experience, to pronounce him the best man, the nearest in his approaches to an ideal standard of excellence, that I have known or read of. In the mingled purity—a child-like purity—and the benignity of his nature, I again express my own deep feeling of the truth, when I say that he recalled to my mind the image and character of St John the Evangelist—of him who was at once the beloved apostle, and also, more peculiarly, the apostle of love. Well and truly, therefore, did the poet say, in his beautiful lines upon this man's grave and memory—

"Oh, he was good, if e'er a good man lived!"*

* One feature there was in Lamb's charity, which is but too frequently found wanting amongst the most liberal and large-hearted of the charitable, and especially where the national temper is melancholy or desponding; one, moreover, which, beyond any other aspect of charity, wears a winning grace—one finally which is indistinctly pointed out as a duty in our scriptural code of ethics—the habit of hoping cheerfully and kindly on behalf of those who were otherwise objects of moral blame. Lamb, if anybody, plagued as he was by a constitutional taint of morbid melancholy, might have been privileged to fail in this duty; but he did not. His goodness, making it too painful to him to cherish as final conclusions any opinions with regard to any individual which seemed to shut him out from the sympathy or the brotherly feeling of the just and good, overpowered the acuteness of his discernment; and, where it was quite impossible to find matter of approbation in the past or the present conduct, he would turn to the future for encouraging views of amendment, and would insist upon regarding what was past, as the accidental irregularity, the anomaly, the exception, warranting no inferences with regard to what remained; and (whenever that was possible) would charge it all upon unfortunate circumstances. Everybody must have felt the profound pathos of that passage in scripture—"Let him that stole, steal no more;" a pathos which rests evidently upon the sudden substitution for a judicial sentence proportioned to the offence, (such as an ordinary lawgiver would have uttered, and such as the listener anticipates,) of a heavenly light opened upon the guilty heart, shewing to it a hope and an escape, and whispering that for itself also there may be final peace in reversion, where otherwise all had seemed blank despair and the darkness of coming vengeance. The poor benighted Pariah of social life—who durst not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven, and, by the angry tone of human laws, as well as of society in general, finds but too much that disposes him to despond, and perhaps makes no effort, merely because all efforts seem likely to be unavailing—will often, in the simple utterance of a cheerful hope on his behalf, see as it were a window opening in heaven, and faces radiant with promise looking out upon him. These words I mean to apply as the distinguishing description of Christian ethics, as contrasted with all other ethical theories. For it is a just inquiry with respect to any system of morals—not merely, What are your substantial doctrines, what is the corpus of your laws?—but also, What is your preparatory discipline?—what are the means at your disposal for winning over the reluctant disciple, the bold recusant, or the

Perhaps the foundation for the false notion I have mentioned about Lamb's predilections, was to be found in his carelessness for those social proscriptions which have sometimes occurred in our stormy times with respect to writers, male and female, who set the dominant notions, or the prevailing feelings of men—(feelings with regard to sexual proprieties, to social distinctions, to the sanctity of property, to the sanctity of religious formulæ, &c. &c.)—at open defiance. Take, for example, Thelwall, at one time, Holcroft, Godwin, Mrs Wolstonecraft, Dr Priestley, Hazlitt, all of whom were, more or less, in a backward or inverse sense, tabooed—that is, consecrated to public hatred and scorn:—with respect to all these persons, feeling that the public alienation had gone too far, or had begun originally upon false grounds, Lamb threw his heart and his doors wide open. Politics—what cared he for politics? Religion—in the sense of theological dogmas—what cared he for religion? For religion in its moral aspects, and its relations to the heart of man, no human being ever cared more. With respect to politics, some of his friends could have wished him to hate men when they grew anti-national, and in that case only; but he would not. He persisted in liking men who made an idol of Napoleon, who sighed over the dread name of Waterloo, and frowned upon Trafalgar. There I thought him wrong; but, in that, as one of my guardians used to say of me, he "followed his own devil;" though, after all, I believe he took a secret silent pleasure in the grandeur of his country, and would have suffered in her suffering—would have been humiliated in her humiliation—more than he altogether acknowledged to himself; in fact, his carelessness grew out of the depth of his security. He could well afford to be free of anxiety in a case like this; for the solicitudes of jealous affection, the tremulous and apprehensive love, as "of a mother or a child," (which painful mood of love Wordsworth professes for his country, but only in a wayward fit of passion,) could scarcely be thought applicable, even in the worst days of Napoleon, to a national gran-

dear and power which seem as little liable to chance or change, as essentially unapproachable by any serious impeachment, as the principle of gravitation or the composition of the air. Why, therefore, should he trouble himself more about the nice momentary oscillations of the national fortunes in war or council, more than about adjusting his balance, so as not to disturb the equilibrium of the earth?

There was another trait of character about Charles Lamb which might have countenanced the common notion that he looked indulgently upon dissolute men, or men notorious for some criminal escapade. This was his thorough hatred of all hypocrisy, and his practical display of that hatred on all possible occasions. Even in a point so foreign, as it might seem, from this subject as his style, though chiefly founded upon his intellectual differences and his peculiar taste, the prevailing tone of it was in part influenced (or at least sustained) by his disgust for all which transcended the naked simplicity of truth. This is a deep subject, with as many faces, or facets, (to speak the language of jewellers,) as a rose-cut diamond; and far be it from me to say one word in praise of those—people of how narrow a sensibility!—who imagine that a simple (that is, according to many tastes, an unelevated and unrhythmical) style—take, for instance, an Addisonian or a Swiftian style—is unconditionally good. Not so: all depends upon the subject; and there is a style, transcending these and all other modes of simplicity, by infinite degrees, and, in the same proportion, impossible to most men—the rhythmical—the continuous—what, in French, is called the soutenu, which, to humbler styles, stands in the relation of an organ to a shepherd's pipe. This also finds its justification in its subject; and the subject which can justify it must be of a corresponding quality—loftier—and, therefore, rare.

If, then, in style—so indirect an expression as that must be considered of his nature and moral feelings—how much more, in their direct and conscious expressions, was Lamb impatient of hypocrisy! Hypocrisy may be considered as the “heroic” form of affectation. Now, the very basis of Lamb's character was laid in downright horror of affectation. If he found himself by accident using a rather fine word, notwithstanding it might be the most forcible in that place, (the word arrest, suppose, in certain situations, for the word catch,) he would, if it were allowed to stand, make merry with his own grandiloquence at the moment; and, in after moments, he would continually ridicule that class of words, by others carried to an extreme of pedantry—the word “arride,” for instance, used in the sense of pleasing, or winning the approbation—just as Charles Fox, another patron of simplicity, or, at least, of humility in style, was accustomed to use the word “vilipend,” as a standing way of sarcastically recalling to the reader's mind the Latinizing writers of English. Hence—that is, from this intense sincerity and truth of character—Lamb would allow himself to say things that shocked the feelings of the company—shocked sometimes in the sense of startling or electrifying, as by something that was odd; but also sometimes shocked with the sense of what was revolting, as by a Swiftian laying bare of naked shivering human nature. Such exposures of masquerading vanity—such surgical probings and vexings of the secret feelings—I have seen almost truculently pursued by Lamb. He seemed angry and fierce in such cases only; but the anger was for the affectation and insincerity, which he could not endure, unless where they covered some shame or timidity, never where they were masks for attacking an individual. The case of insincerity, above all others, which moved his bile, was where, out of some pretended homage to public decorum, an individual was run down on account of any moral infirmities, such as we all have, or have had, or at least so easily and naturally may have had that nobody knows whether we have them or not. In such a case, and in this only almost, Lamb could be savage in his manner. I remember one instance, where many of the leading authors of our age were assembled—Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, &c. Lamb was amongst them; and, when — was denounced as a man careless in the education of his children, and generally reputed to lead a licentious life—“Pretty fellows we are,” said Lamb, “to abuse him on that last score, when every one of us, I suppose, on going out this night into the Strand, will make up to the first pretty girl he sees.” Some laughed—some looked grim—some looked grand—but timid doubter? And it is worthy of remark that, in this case of hoping on behalf of those who seem no just objects of hope—the very same absence of all compromise with human infirmity is found, which a distinguished German infidel described as the great distinction of Christianity, and one which raised it prima facie above all other codes of morality. There is indeed a descent—a condescension to humanity and its weakness; but no shadow of a compromise—a capitulation—or what in Roman law is called a “transaction” with it. For, said Immanuel Kant, here lies the point:—the Stoic maintains the moral principle in its ideal purity; he sacrifices nothing at all to human weakness; and so far he deserves praise. But then, for that same reason, he is useless: his standard is exalted beyond all human approach. On the other hand, the Epicurean relaxes so far as to make his method of “holiness” attainable. But how? It is by debasing and lowering the standard. Each, therefore, in a different sense, and for different reasons, is useless to human nature as it is. Now comes Christianity, and effects a synthesis of all which is good in each, whilst she purifies herself from all taint of what is evil. She presents a standard of holiness, a “maximum perfectionis,” (as the scholastic phrase is,) no less exalted, no less jealous of all earthly taint or soil, than Stoicism. This, however, she makes accessible to man: not by any compromise or adaptation of its demands to a lower nature; but by means peculiarly her own—by promise of supernatural aid. Thus she is celestial like the one, and terrestrial like the other, but by such a reconciliation as celestial means only could effect. This Kant allowed to constitute a philosophic character for Christianity, which offered itself at the very vestibule. And in this function of hope, as one which is foremost amongst the functions of charity, there is the very same harmony of rigour in the judge, and loyalty to the standard erected, with human condescension and consideration for the criminal.

Wordsworth, smiling, and yet with solemnity, said—"I hope, I trust, Mr Lamb, you are mistaken, or, at least, you do not include us all in this sweeping judgment?" "Oh, as to that," said Lamb, "who knows? There's no telling: said Josephs are some of us in this very room." Upon which everybody laughed, and Lamb amongst them; but he had been indignant and sincere in this rebuke of the hypocritical sacrifice to decorum. He manifested a fervor of feeling in such cases; not of anger primarily to the assailant—that was but a reaction—his fervor was a movement of intense and conscientious justice towards the person assailed, as in one who felt that he himself, if not by the very same trespasses, had erred and was liable to err; that he also was a brother in human infirmity, and a debtor to the frailty of all flesh, though not possibly by the same overt acts or habits.

In reviewing the life of Lamb, it is almost inevitable that, to a reader not specially acquainted with its events beyond what Serjeant Talfourd has judged it proper to communicate, many things will appear strange and unexplained. In a copy of the Serjeant's work, now lying before me, which had been borrowed for my use from a distinguished literary lady, I find a pencil mark of interrogation attached to the word "chequered," by which, at p. 334, Vol. II., Lamb's life is characterised. This is a natural expression of surprise, under the suppressions which have been here practised; suppressions dictated alike by delicacy for what is too closely personal, and by reverential pity for what is too afflicting. Still it will be asked by those who read attentively, In what sense was Lamb's life chequered? As Wordsworth has scattered repeated allusions to this subject in his fine memorial verses on Lamb, allusions which must, for the present, be almost unintelligible to the great majority of readers; and, as he has done this, notwithstanding he was perfectly aware at the time of the Serjeant's reserve, and aware also that this reserve was not accidental, professing himself, moreover, to be "Awed by the theme's peculiar sanctity,

Which words less free

(viz., the prose narrative of Lamb's biographer, which wanted, of necessity, the impassioned tenderness of a poetic memorial,)

"Presumed not even to touch;"—

Under these circumstances it may be right, whilst still persisting in not raising that veil which has been dropped over this subject by Serjeant Talfourd, out of profound feelings for the surviving lady of the family, that sister of Charles Lamb who presented so much of his own genius and his own disposition, through a softened or lunar reflexion, and who was the great consoler of his affliction—that sister,

"The meek,
The self-restraining, and the ever kind,
In whom his reason and intelligent heart
Found—for all interests, hopes, and tender cares,
All softening, humanising, hallowing powers,
Whether withheld or for her sake unsought—
More than sufficient recompense!"— still persisting, I say, out of veneration for this admirable lady, in refusing to raise the veil, it may yet be lawful so far to assist the reader in penetrating its folds as that he may apprehend the main features of the case, in a degree sufficient for the application of Wordsworth's else partly unintelligible verses; and the more so, for these two reasons:—1st, That several passages in these verses are calculated, at any rate, to pique the curiosity, although they do not satisfy it; 2dly, (which must especially be remembered,) A mere interest of curiosity, curiosity vulgar and disrespectful, cannot be imagined in this case. A curiosity which put the question suggested by the word chequered, and absolutely challenged by Wordsworth's verses, must be already one that has been hallowed and refined by a tender interest in the subject; since no interest short of that, could have attracted a reader to a life so poor in anecdote, or any other vulgar allurements, or, at least, no other could have detained him sufficiently upon its circumstantial parts, to allow of his raising the question. To approach this question, therefore, in the most proper way, perhaps the very same verses of Wordsworth, which are amongst the parts of the Serjeant's book most fitted to suggest the question, are most fitted to suggest the answer. Being read carefully, without which they will do neither the one nor the other, they indicate their own commentary. One of the most beautiful passages, and, at the same time, of the most significant, is this:—

"Thus, 'mid a shifting world,
Did they together testify of time
And season's difference—a double tree,
With two collateral stems sprung from one root;
Such were they—such through life they might have been,
In union, in partition only such:
Otherwise wrought the will of the Most High."

They might have exhibited the image of a double tree, in union, throughout their joint lives.* Disse aliter, visum est. And then the poet goes on to shadow forth their real course through this world, and to hint at the sad cause which occasionally separated them, under the image of two ships launched jointly, and for the same voyage of discovery—viewing each other, therefore, as partners pursuing common objects, under common hazards and difficulties—often divided by stress of weather, often rejoining each other at the fixed places of rendezvous, again to be separated, and again to be reunited:—

"Yet, through all visitation and all trials,
Still they were faithful—like two vessels launched
From the same beach, one ocean to explore,
With mutual help, and sailing to their league

* There is, however, an obscurity in the expression at this point of the verses; it lies partly in the word such. The only construction of the verses, in harmony with the words, seems the following: They might have appeared as a double tree, &c., whether viewed in those circumstances which united them—viz., in the features of resemblance—or viewed in those of difference, as sex and its moral results, which made the partition between them. Such they might have seemed; but calamity wrought a more perfect division between them, under which they seemed no longer one, but two distinct trees.

True, as immeasurable winds, or bars (Floating or fix'd) of Polar ice, allow."

But there is another passage still more distinctly pointing the reader's attention to the same recurring cause of separation:—

"Ye were taught
That the remembrance of foreign distress
And the worres fear of future ill, (which oft Doth hang around it, as a sickly child
Upon its mother,) may be both alike
Disarm'd of power to unsettle present good."

This mysterious affliction, therefore, of Lamb's life, making that a "chequered" one, which else had been of character too absolutely tranquil and monotonous—or ruffled, at least, only by internal irritations—was (as we learn from Wordsworth) of a nature to revolve upon him at intervals. One other passage—and this also from a poem of Wordsworth, but one written, at the very least, thirty-two years ago, and having no reference at all to the Lambs—may furnish all the additional light which can be needed. It is one of the poems published in 1807, and many of them suggested by personal or local recollections, from a tour then recently performed through Scotland. The poet is speaking of a woman on the Borders, whose appearance and peculiar situation, in relation to a disabled husband, had caught his attention; and the expression of her eye is thus noticed:—

"I look'd and scann'd her o'er and o'er—
The more I looked, I wonder'd more;
When suddenly I seem'd to spy
A trouble in her strong black eye—
A remnant of uneasy light—
A flash of something over-bright."

Now, if the reader will ask himself what cause, apt to recur, in some cases, would be likely to leave these morbid appearances in the eye, this uneasy light, and these flashes that were over-bright—he will then apprehend, in silence and reverential sympathy, what was that huge and steadfast affliction that besieged, through life, the heart of Charles Lamb.

If the reader will further understand that this affliction was not, as the heaviest afflictions often-times become, a mere remembrance echoing from past times—possibly "a long since cancelled wo;" but that it was a two-headed snake, looking behind and before, and gnawing at his heart by the double pang of memory, and of anxiety, gloomy and fearful, watching for the future; and, finally, that the object of this anxiety, who might at any moment be torn from his fireside, to return, after an interval of mutual suffering, (not to be measured, or even guessed at, but in the councils of God,) was that Madonna-like lady, who to him renewed the case described with such pathetic tenderness, by the Homeric Andromache—being, in fact, his "all-the-world;" fulfilling at once all offices of tenderness and duty;—and making up to him, in her single character of sister, all that he had lost of maternal kindness—all that for her sake he had forborne to seek of affections, conjugal or filial:—weighing these accumulated circumstances of calamity, the feeling reader will be ready to admit that

Lamb's cup of earthly sorrow was full enough, to excuse many more than he could be taxed with, of those half-crazy eccentricities in which a constant load of secret affliction (such, I mean, as must not be explained to the world) is apt to discharge itself. Hence, it might be, in part—but some have supposed from a similar, though weaker taint of the same constitutional malady—that Lamb himself discovered symptoms of irregular feeling or thinking, not such as could have been alarming in a general or neutral case, but in a subject known to be affected by these hereditary predispositions, were alarming, both to his friends, (those of them, at least, who had known the circumstances,) and, with far heavier reason, to himself. This also is therefore to be added to his afflictions—not merely the fear, constantly impending, that his fireside (as I said before) might be rendered desolate, and that by a sudden blow, as well as for an indefinite duration; but also the fear (not equally strong, but equally impending for ever) that he himself, and all his splendid faculties, might, as by a flash of lightning, be swallowed up "in darkness infinite."

Such was the condition of Charles Lamb, and such the temper that in part grew out of it—angelically benign, but also, in a morbid degree, melancholy—when I renewed my acquaintance with him in 1808–14; a period during which I learned to appreciate him better. Somewhere in this period it was, by the way, that I had an opportunity of introducing to his knowledge my brother, "poor Pink." Lamb liked him; and the more so, from an accident which occurred at the very second interview that he and Pink ever had. It was in Bond Street, at an exhibition of two large and splendid pictures, by Salvator Rosa—one representing a forest scene, and a forest recluse, (of what character, in Salvator's intention, may be doubted; but, in the little printed account of the paintings, he was described as Diogenes.) These pictures were, I should think, twelve feet high, at the least—consequently upon a large scale; and the tone of colouring was peculiarly sombre, or rather cold; and it tended even to the monotonous: one almost uniform cheerless tint of yellowish green, with some little perhaps of a warmish umber, overspread the distances; and the foreground shewed little else than a heavy, dull-toned black. Pink, who knew as little of painting as the bow'sons of his various ships, had, however, a profound sensibility to some of its effects; and, if he ever ran up hastily and fearfully to London from Portsmouth, it was sure to be at the time when the annual exhibition of the Academy was open. No exhibition was ever missed by him, whether of a public or comparatively private nature. In particular, he had attended, with infinite delight, the exhibition (in Newman Street, I think) of Mr West's pictures. Death and his Pale Horse prodigiously attracted him; and others, from the freshness and gorgeousness of their colouring, had absolutely fascinated his eye. It may be imagined, therefore, with what disgust he viewed two subjects, from which the vast names of the painter had led him to expect so much, but which from the low style of the colouring yielded him so little. There might be forty people in the room at the time my brother and I were there. We had stood for ten or fourteen minutes, examining the pictures, when at length I noticed Charles Lamb, and, at a little distance, his sister. If a creditor had wished to seize upon either, no surer place in London (no, not Drury Lane, or Covent Garden) for finding them than an exhibition from the works of the old masters. And, moreover, as amongst certain classes of birds, if you have one you are sure of the other, so with respect to the Lambs, (unless in those dreary seasons when the "dual unity"—as it is most affectingly termed by Wordsworth—had been for a time sundered into a widowed desolation, by the periodic affliction,) seeing or hearing the brother, you knew that the sister could not be far off. If she were, you sighed, knew what that meant, and asked no questions. Lamb, upon seeing us, advanced to shake hands; but he paused one moment to await the critical dogma which he perceived to be at that time issuing from Pink's lips. That it was vituperation in a high degree, anybody near us might hear; and some actually turned round in fright upon catching these profane words:—"D—the fellow! I could do better myself." Wherewith, perhaps unconsciously, but perhaps also by way of enforcing his thought, Pink (who had brought home from his long sea life a detestable practice of chewing tobacco,) ejaculated a quid of some coarse quality, that lighted upon the frame of the great master's picture, and, for aught I know, may be sticking there yet. Lamb could not have approved such a judgment—nor perhaps the immeasurable presumption that might seem to have accompanied such a judgment from most men, or from an artist; but he knew that Pink was a mere sailor, knowing nothing historically of art, nor much of the pretensions of the mighty artists. Or, had it been otherwise—at all events, he admired and loved, beyond all other qualities whatsoever, a hearty, cordial sincerity: honest homely obstinacy not to be enslaved by a great name—though that, again, may, by possibility, become in process of time itself an affectation—Lamb almost revered; and therefore it need not surprise anybody, that, in the midst of his loud, unrepressed laughter, he came up to my brother, and offered his hand, with an air of friendliness that flattered Pink, and a little misled him; for, that evening, on dining with Pink, he said to me—"That Lamb's a sensible fellow. You see how evidently he approved of what I remarked about that old humbugging rascal, Salvator Rosa." Lamb, in this point, had a feature of character in common with Sir Walter Scott, (at least I suppose it to have been a feature of Sir Walter's mind, upon the information of Professor Wilson,) that, if a man had, or, if he supposed him to have, a strongly marked combination or tendency of feelings, of opinions, of likings, or of dislikings—what, in fact, we call a character—no matter whether it were built upon prejudices the most extravagant, or ignorance the most profound, provided only it were sincere, and not mere lawless audacity, but were self-consistent, and had unity as respected itself—in that extent, he was sure to manifest liking and respect for the man. And hence it was, that Lamb liked Pink much more for this Gothic and outrageous sentence upon Salvator Rosa, than he would have liked him for the very best, profoundest, or most comprehensive critique upon that artist that could have been delivered. Pink, on the other hand, liked Lamb greatly; and used, in all his letters, to request that I would present his best regards to that Charles Lamb "who wouldn't be humbugged by the old rascal in Bond Street."

* "The angel ended his mysterious rite;
And the pure vision closed in darkness infinite."

Thus I had gradually unlearned my false opinions, or outworn my false impressions, about Lamb, by the year 1814. Indeed, by that time, I may say that I had learned to appreciate Lamb almost at his full value. And reason there was that I should. For, in that year, 1814, occurred a trial of Lamb's hold upon his friends' regard, which was a test case—a test for each side—since not every man could have mastered this offence; and far less could every man have merited that a man should master it. This was the year which closed the great war of wars, by its first frail close—the capture of Paris by the Allies. And of these Allies, all who had any personal weight or interest (the Austrian Emperor, who was, however, expected at one time, is no exception—for his weight was not personal but political)—all, I say, visited London and Oxford. I was at London during that glad tumultuous season. I witnessed the fervent joy—the triumph, too noble, too religious, to be boastful—the rapture of that great era. Coleridge, in the first edition of the "Friend," has described the tempestuous joy of a people, habitually cold in relation to public events, upon occasion of a visit from their Sovereign's wife—the ill-fated Queen of Prussia; and this he does by way of illustrating the proposition which then occupies him—viz., the natural tendency of men to go beyond the demands of any event, whether personal or national, their inevitable tendency to transcend it by the quality and the amount of their enthusiasm. Now, the scenes then acting in London were, in two weighty respects, different. In the first place, the people—the audience and spectators—concerned, were a people as widely opposed to the Prussians in sensibility of a profound nature as it is possible to imagine; the Prussians being really phlegmatic; and the British—as was many hundreds of times affirmed and (as far as the case admitted of proof) proved by the celebrated Walking Stewart, the profoundest of judges in this point—the British being, under the mask of a cold and reserved demeanour, the most impassioned of all nations: in fact, it requires but little philosophy to see, that, always, where the internal heat and power is greatest, there will the outside surface be the coldest; and the mere prima facie phenomenon of heat, spread over the external manner, (as in the French or Italian character, and somewhat in the Irish,) is at once an evidence that there is little concentration of it at the heart. The spectators, then, the audience, were different: and the spectacle—oh, Heavens!—how far it must have differed from any that can have been witnessed for many centuries! Victors, victories, mere martial talents—were these the subjects of interest? No man, not Lamb himself, could rate at a lower price such national vanities as these, fitted only, as I think, to win a schoolboy's sympathy. In fact, I have always entertained and avowed a theory upon the question of mere military talent, which goes far lower than anybody has yet gone, so far as I am aware; for I have gone so far as to maintain this doctrine—that, if we could detach from the contemplation of a battle the awful interests oftentimes depending upon its issue—if, in fact, we could liberate our minds from the Hartleian law of association, and insulate the mere talent there operating—we should hold the art of fighting a battle to be as far below the art of fighting a game at chess, as the skill applicable to the former case is less sure of its effect and less perfect than the skill applicable to the latter. It is true there are other functions of a commander-in-chief, involving large knowledge of human nature, great energy in action, great decision of character, supreme moral courage, and, above all, that rarest species, which faces, without shrinking, civil responsibility. These qualities, in any eminent degree, are rare. But, confining one's view to the mere art of fighting a battle, I hold and insist upon it, that the military art is (intellectually speaking) a vulgar art, a mechanic art, a very liminary art; neither liberal in its nature, nor elevated (as some mechanic arts are) by the extensive range of its details. With such opinions, I am not a person to be confounded with mere John-Bull exulters in national prowess. Not as victories won by English bayonets or artillery, but as victories in a sublime strife of the good principle with the bad, I entered with all my heart into the fulness of the popular feeling: I rejoiced with the universal nation then rejoicing. There was the "nation of London" (as I have before called it) to begin with; there was also another nation almost, collected within the walls of London at that time. I rejoiced, as I have said: Lamb did not. Then I was vexed.

THE LONDON PERIPATETIC; OR, SKETCHES ABOUT TOWN.

NO. III.—CHAMBERS.

(ADDRESSED TO BACHELORS.)

BRETHREN all—from you who have just donned the toga, and whom a stiffened beard entitles to write man, to you among whose locks the grey has slightly mingled, and whom crows' feet warn that time is not standing still—suffer me a while to engage your attention on a subject most important to your comfort.

Where do you live?

If you are located to your heart's content—if your den suits your idiosyncrasy—remain there by all means; I do not want to disturb you. But are you unsettled? Have you just come to London, with a view to a permanent, or at least a long residence there? Have you come up to eat your terms, or study at Bartholomew's? Or, are you a staid middle-aged gentleman, with a snug independency? In fine, are you at this time speculating where to pitch your tent in the Modern Babylon?

If this be your predicament, let me warn you against being persuaded to cross the threshold of any of the lodging-houses for "single gentlemen," which swarm about town; and, still more, against being cajoled into any of those special mansions of discomfort, those whitened sepulchres, yclept boarding-houses, unless you can afford those of first-rate order. If, indeed, you are philosophically indifferent as to all items of personal comfort—if you revel in smoky chimneys, or are enamoured of the little brown insects which Lord Brougham has immortalized by a certain simile—if you are reckless as to your boots being cleaned with wet soot and a hay-band instead of blacking—if you are impervious to ill smells, and deaf to impudence—if your constitution is proof against draughts from cracked panes and crazy doors—if your stomach does not rebel at the sight of a slatternly, slipshod servant girl, with a face Gorgon-like by nature, and rendered still more hideous by a never-removed coating of grime—if you don't know chopped birch broom from souchong, nor ground beans from Mocha—if your health does not suffer from damp sheets, nor your ears from scolding and other discords:—why, then, you are precisely the man who may venture with impunity into the dens of those old harridans who "take in single gentlemen, and do for them." Of course, it requires no profound sagacity to perceive that it is to the interest of those dreadful ogresses, to get large premises at a low rent, so that they may accommodate (!) as many victims as possible. To accomplish this, some advantage must be sacrificed, which is generally situation; so that you will frequently find these abodes pleasantly located between a tallow melter and a copper-smith, with the front windows looking upon a coach-stand, and those at the back into a slaughter-house.

Among the lures held out by advertisements to entrap the unwary, you will frequently see the privilege offered of "joining the family circle!" Priyilege, quotha! Now, what are the chances? In all probability, you will find yourself among a set of the slowest-going, oldest-fashioned, know-nothingest, fattest-brained Bæotians that ever drove a poor devil into the vapours. The head of the family is a small attorney, perchance, or a steady thirty-year-clerk in a public office; one who is learned in parish politics, and whose literature consists in a bit of the "Whole Duty of Man" on Sundays, and the most stupid of all published papers in the week-day evenings. He is a very respectable person, can produce undeniable references, and yet was never trusted with the management of a second idea in his life. The mistress is a notable; an adept in all the economy of the household, and in no one thing else; a martinet over her servant, a capital judge of meat, and an unexceptionable chronicler of small beer. Then there are two daughters, bread-and-butter girls, who occasionally giggle, but very seldom, because mamma says that levity does not become young people. They are eighteen and nineteen, neither ugly enough to hate or to caricature, nor handsome enough to be looked complacently upon, even for a moment. One of them is rather dark and the other rather fair, yet they are very much alike; they always sit close together at work, and whisper, and dress precisely in the same style. They are quite characterless; they seem mere respiratory machines, incapable of love, or hate, or anger, or admiration—destitute almost of curiosity. They are yes-and-no girls; have never an opinion on any the most simple subject, but ask mamma. They have no notion of the superlative, but exclaim, "Dear me, how pretty!" at a picture of Rembrandt or Fuseli, an effect of Handel, a passage of Milton, a statue by Michael Angelo, or a chef d'œuvre of Wren. If you ask them if they are fond of reading, they tell you, yes; but you seldom see a book in their hands. Their mornings are passed in needle-work, or going to see Miss Fubbs or Mrs Tibbs, and their evenings in manufacturing odd things out of millboard, or hammering discord out of a wiry-toned piano; except, about once a fortnight, when they go out with "ma" to tea. They think the evening lecturer at their church a very good preacher, and have an idea that murder is very shocking. They never laugh at genuine humour; but, at some miserable commonplace, they will titter, and say, "Lud, how funny!" They go with "pa" once every season to each of the great theatres, and have been three times to Madame Vestris'; and they think Mr Harley very droll, and Mr Macready rather dull. They have been through the usual routine of a school-girl's education: they draw a little, sing a little, play a little, have learned French a little, have read the histories of Rome, Greece, and England a little, and know—nothing. Nothing is essentially the single characteristic of these young ladies, whose very presence is soporific, and whose life is one long yawn. Yet the mamma has actually the audacity to say to you, when these nonentities are out of hearing, "Ah! I hope the poor dear girls will be happy. Heigho! God bless them! I hope they will marry steady, respectable characters." MARRY! Why, the artist who made the chess-playing automaton would construct a better wife for a man at three weeks' notice. In a domestic circle such as this, I need not point out how enchantingly your time will be passed. Lucky fellow if you don't come out a monomaniac, or an incurable hypochondriac!

But, perhaps, you may get into "a lively family," where the master is a twinkling-eyed, chuckling old fellow, who adores a bottle of good port, tells you where the choicest is to be procured, and helps you to drink it; where the wife is "a dear good-natured soul," but who, nevertheless, wants to get off her daughters; and where the said daughters are dotingly fond of fun and romps, with parentheses of sentiment, watery eyes, Lord Byron, and new novels. They are a little blue; and, after much unaffected struggling and screaming, will permit you to read aloud to the company a sonnet to the moon, by the youngest of them, which has been left on the table, quite inadvertently of course, while the fair authoress sits blushing in a corner, and is very careful not to interrupt you while reading; but, when you have done, and the auditors have duly expressed their ecstasies, exclaims, poutingly, that it is quite a shame to expose her so. She believes your "speech is sooth," when you declare she ought to publish; and, two hours afterwards, you are confidentially informed by mamma that darling little Mary is really and truly the incognita "Sophonisba" of The Penny Lady's Magazine, who has caused such a commotion in the literary world—some people declaring that the Fair Great Unknown extinguishes Mrs Hemans and L. E. L. altogether. "And consider," continues the elderly lady, appealingly, "she is only seventeen." Of course, both young ladies are musical, and disturb the ghosts of Mozart and Weber by extracting certain sounds from the piano, which, if you look at the notes placed before them, you discover to be intended for the music in "Don Giovanni," or "Der Frieschutz."

Now, O ye bachelors, especially you of limited incomes, need I point out the various ills to which you will be heirs if you join such a family as this? Unthinking men, know ye not that such ladies like boasting to Richmond, or a barouche for the day to Epping, and pic-nic in the Forest? (The three ladies and yourself just fill the inside, and the brother mounts the box. As for the old gentleman, he cannot leave business.) Do ye not surmise, rash individuals, that such ladies go to concerts, to masquerades, and plays, and have no objection to the Opera? And do ye not know that you will infallibly be expected to be their esquire in all these gay expeditions, and bear a very considerable portion of the very considerable expense attendant thereupon; or, failing so to do, you will have the eminent satisfaction of knowing that you are set down for a poor-spirited bore, and a very shabby fellow. Then you must, of course, lend the ladies your books; which, equally of course, share the orthodox fate of all lent volumes—seven to one against the return of them at all; but, if they should find their way back, it will be with loosened bindings and smudged leaves.

And do ye not likewise consider, reckless man, that the little attentions politeness obliges you to offer to the young ladies, and which you endeavour to divide with perfect impartiality between the two, will be tortured into a particular devotion to one. After a while, the old lady begins to look grave, and exhibits expectations of proposals; and, as you, being perfectly guiltless of the design to make any, remain stupidly silent, she takes a favourable opportunity of requesting an "express avowal of your intentions towards Angelina." (She has kindly selected the eldest and most ungettable-off for you.) You stare in utter astonishment, stammer out your sorrow that such a misunderstanding should have—— You are not suffered to proceed, but are loaded with invectives; told that you are an unfeeling individual; that you have gained the affections of the sweetest, most confiding creature; that you are a perfect monster, and will be the death of Angelina, &c. &c. Finding how the land lies, you go to your room, pack up your worldly goods, walk out of the house, sleep at an inn, and send for your trunks next day. Very soon afterwards, you are waited upon by an attorney, who talks about actions, damages, breach of promise, &c. You know it is all a dead swindle; but, as you do not want to be shewn up by Serjeant Wilde in a public court, as a disgrace to manhood, a destroyer of domestic peace, a vampire of virgins, with the sundry other agreeable epithets of which gentlemen of the long robe have a vocabulary ready-cut and dried for cases of this description—in fact, as you want to keep quiet, and neither be sent to Coventry by your relations, nor disinherited by a furiously-rigid aunt, who you know will not hear reason, and couldn't comprehend it if she did—you compound the affair for the amount of a quarter's income, and judiciously subside into Wales, to live economically for the three months, and evaporate your mortification. In a week or two, you read in the Morning Herald an advertisement, the precise copy of that which drew you into the snare. You groan in spirit, and, like a good Christian, wish you could put victims on their guard.

In avoiding the Scylla of lodging-houses, take care you tumble not into the Charybdis, more fatal still, of boarding-houses, where, if you be not fortified against the inroads of ennui, by a triple allowance of stupidity, and, if your habits have not been drilled into a monotonous uniformity of dulness, you will inevitably be fretted into a consumption within three months from the date of your entrance. Dismal dens! where yawning is the only excitement, three-penny long-whist the evening's amusement, and a rapid fourth-rate gentility the tone of manners—I hate ye, and may my malediction cleave to ye for ever! The hours observed at such places are unendurable, unless in first-rate establishments, of which, as I before said, I do not speak; but of those professing to be for "genteel people of small income." For example:—there is one dinner about two or three o'clock, another at five or six. You must per force submit to be fed at these times, or eschew aliment altogether. Then the cookery! I am not good-hater enough to wish my direct enemy doomed to undergo a course of the culinary slow poison of boarding-houses, in which frightful black pepper is termed high seasoning, and ponderous pie-crust dignified with the appellation of pastry. What a loss would be sustained by the world, were the great Louis Ustache Ude, by any extraordinary accident, to be brought within the precincts of a boarding-house cuisine, at a time when the diabolic incantations of the empirical hags, misnamed cooks, were in full work! Horror, at the desecration of his science, would infallibly throw that distinguished professor into convulsions, from which the chances of his recovery would be extremely slight; and, at the best, even if he escaped with life, it is certain that, in the fulness of his disgust, he would retire into seclusion, and never be persuaded to enunciate another direction or divulge another recipe. In a word, people in boarding-houses don't dine—they only eat victuals.

A country friend of mine, who had a tolerable income, came up, some time ago, to pass a few months in the great metropolis, and requested me, on his arrival, to accompany him in his search after a respectable boarding-house. I remonstrated, I warned, I advised him against the desperate resource; but he was deaf to my representations, and met all my arguments with this position:—"If I pay a fixed sum for board and lodging, I know my expense at once, and can calculate precisely what I may afford to spend in other ways." Well, it being useless to reason with a predetermined man, I resigned my friend to his martyrdom. The first house we entered was in—but I will not invidiously name the locality—where, to my intense amazement, my companion was satisfied with the aspect of the place, pleased with the people he saw, and closed with the terms at once. There is no accounting for tastes—you know the proverb. The mistress was a lady of immense height, who wore a huge edifice called a turban, garnished with ribbons of the reddest of all red hues, over a face of emulative colour; and, as to her size! I never saw it equalled: the eye could scarcely take in the stupendous circumference, nor the imagination conceive the possibility of a mass so vast being locomotive, except by steam. I afterwards heard that the proportions of this lady rendered her obnoxious to sundry inconveniences: omnibus cads turned a deaf ear to her hailings; no matter how drenching the rain, they looked fixedly another way; and her agonized shouting, and the frantic waving of the mainsail she called a pocket-handkerchief, had only the effect of causing the alarmed driver to increase his speed.

If she walked near a coach-stand, every horse upon it laid back his ears and eyed her askance ; whilst the jarvies either slunk dismayed into the neighbouring public-house, or, mounting their boxes, drove off furiously from the threatened infliction ; there was no need of the whip, for fear lent wings to the feet of the nags. If she descended the steps of a bridge towards the river—presto ! a dozen watermen who, the instant before, had been bawling themselves hoarse for hire, disappeared as if by enchantment, and not a boat was to be had at any price. The captains of steam-vessels would only receive the lady on the strict condition that she should keep immovable, in the exact centre of the vessel, during the passage ; and no underwriter would have insured a ship for a long voyage, knowing her to be a passenger, unless on the express agreement that, in the event of a storm rendering it necessary for the vessel to be lightened, she should be thrown overboard with the heavy weights. She once went to see the sights at St Paul's ; but the authorities having charge of the safety of the cathedral, positively refused allowing her to ascend.

After my friend, who, I should tell you, was a profound connoisseur in wines, especially claret, had been located some weeks, he came to me, one morning, with an awfully-long phiz, and entered upon a recapitulation which proved to me he had at length awakened to a sense of the misery of his situation—then irremediable, as he had entered into an agreement for the whole term of his stay in London. One, and not the least of his complaints, was as follows:—Disliking the unsocial appearance of each man keeping by his side his own particular bottle, he had asked the hostess, and others of the company, to drink wine with him, conceiving that the reciprocation of the courtesy would render the matter about equal to all parties in the end, as to expense, while sociality would be increased, and the interchange of sentiment and kindly feeling facilitated by the mingling of the decanters. But my poor friend was miserably mistaken: the company were quite ready to imbibe his wine, and to offer theirs occasionally in return, but the quality of the latter was such as to render it impossible that it should pass the ordeal of a veteran palate. But the custom which he had so imprudently begun, my good-natured indecisive friend felt it difficult to break ; for he was precisely the sort of man that cannot endure to do anything, however proper, that is marked. “ Really,” said he, “ the matter is a little serious ; for I am now obliged to draw two, and sometimes three bottles every day, before I can get my usual six or seven glasses, and, I do assure you, the lady of the house herself discusses no inconsiderable share.”

My advice was very concise. “ Get,” said I, “ a bottle or two of the sourest and cheapest caricature on claret that London affords—you won't have any difficulty—dispense it most liberally ; forcing yourself to swallow a glass or two for the sake of appearance. The people will drink your health with a civil grin, on the first, and perhaps the second day ; but they will eschew your bottle for the future. When you find the bait has taken, resume your old beverage, and you will have the chuckle all to yourself. They will laugh in their sleeves at the idea of your drinking vinegar for wine ; but, n'importe, say you, let those laugh that win.” The sufferer followed my counsel, and the scheme succeeded a merveille ; but it was only a single evil removed from the many he endured. For instance, he had the misfortune to break the leg from a confounded rheumatic old chair, that might reasonably be supposed to have been purchased at the sale of Noah's effects, and had to pay somewhere about the price of a whole set for “ damage.”

Some of the tabbies who take in single gentlemen, exult in the characters of “ good sort of women,” which, you know, is a synonymous expression with “ dead bores ;” and, positively, if your beard be not as stiff as a blacking brush, or your visage as deeply lined as if fifty winters had skaited over it, they will sometimes have the audacity to evince a matronly interest in your welfare, and, if you happen to have any inclination towards playing at fives, pistol-shooting, romping with young ladies, racing, driving, steeple-chasing, cricket-matches, bachelors' suppers, et hoc genus omne of a good fellow's life, they will read you a homily about “ bad goings on,” and croak out an interminable story about some weasel-faced nephew, or son, or brother, who was carried off the hooks by a consumption, caused by his erratic propensities. Often, when this is the case, you may observe that the old one is proprietress of a scraggy daughter, wanning past hope ; and then the policy of the “ matronly interest” is conspicuous enough to the dullest perception. Indeed, you may take it as a general rule throughout life, to be always suspicious of old ladies having virgin daughters, when they dose you with good advice, and offer to make gruel and flannel waistcoats for you when you are hoarse.

But enough of these “ regions of sorrow, doleful shades.” Suffer me to introduce you to a species of abode, deemed by many as peculiarly appropriated to gentlemen of the law, but offering advantages which I see no plausible reason against bachelors in general, availing themselves of. I mean chambers—yes, chambers. Ever while you live, my good fellow—if you have any regard for personal comfort, if you have any favourite hobby, which you would ride undisturbed—live in chambers. I cannot pretend to enumerate half the benefits to be derived by a residence in a tenement of this description, to individuals of almost every shade of character and habit ; but some of them I cannot resist trying to lay before you. Let it, however, be kept in view, that I am addressing myself to bachelors solely, and to those bachelors particularly whom inclination or necessity obliges to dwell at a distance, or at least apart from their families, or who have no families to reside with. I have nothing to say to married men, nor to those bachelors who are knit to the paternal hearth by the ties of domestic affection, whom a fond mother blesses, a venerable father leans upon in his decline, and smiling sisters welcome. In such a home you are happy. There lies the scene of part of your social duties; and few men, I apprehend, would voluntarily quit a spot endeared by domestic happiness, for the solitude of chambers. But, alas! all homes are not happy. There is also another genus of persons to whom my hints will not be of the slightest benefit—I mean those mother-bred and nurse-comforted, those physio-taking, slop-drinking, querulous, shivering, precise, valetudinarian coddlers, who cannot stir a step or live through a few hours without feminine offices. Therefore, gentle reader, if you are such an one, you may turn over these leaves, and pass on to the next article.

Choose your own locality, of course; but give me the Temples, with their fine associations, both modern and antique; the almost solemn stillness of their courts; the pleasant fountain; the broad terrace, where your brow, haply aching with study, or with vexation at ill-requited and uncongenial toil, is fanned by the refreshing water-breeze, sweeping across the neat, well-kept garden, and bringing with it a flowery incense that makes you forget, for the instant, that you are in the heart of populous, smoky London. By the way, that same garden is a very delightful lounge—id est, if you have the privilege of entrée at hours when the public is excluded.

The Temples form, in themselves, a complete little town; they have their especial privileges and immunities; and, as it is well known, are under the oligarchical government of certain wise and awful elderly gentlemen, who eat good things every day during term in their halls, and are called benchers. By the by, did you ever read Charles Lamb's reminiscences of the old benchers? If not, get the book and enjoy it; as you ought to do by everything he ever wrote. Talking of Charles Lamb, reminds me that he had chambers in Mitre Court, Inner Temple. From there were dated some of the emanations of his fine mind; and there he held those Wednesday night parties, so well known to many literary men, where congregated some of the choicest spirits of the age, to whose society it was, indeed, an exalted privilege to be admitted; amongst them, Godwin, Coleridge, Hazlitt, by whose deaths, alas! the world has been darkened.

The benchers are a body for whom I entertain a profound respect, on account of the admirable regulations by which all the regions under their jurisdiction are maintained in a state so conducive to the personal comfort of the inhabitants. Not the least excellent and important of the laws are those by which quiet is preserved sacred. No woman may clank across the pavements of the Temple in pattens: however flooded the pathways, however thin the slipper, however pretty and petite the foot, the grim-visaged Cerberus at the gate would relentlessly compel her to doff the iron appendages, ere he would grant the fair wearer ingress within the sacred portala. No "London cries," no ballad-singers, no cracked fiddles, no organs, no dustman's bells, no beggars, are permitted within the hallowed boundaries of the Temple. If an unfortunate Moses from Holywell Street were to raise but the faintest whisper of his designs upon cast-off toggery, the noble army of porters would, to a man, pounce upon the audacious culprit, and eject him summarily; and most fortunate might he deem himself if not pumped upon into the bargain. The almost perfect stillness of the Temples is delightful; yet you have but a few yards to go, and you are, as if by magic, in the heart of Fleet Street, close by St Dunstan's Church—where, alas! the interesting savages sojourn no longer—and in the midst of the din that so enraptured Johnson. The situation, too, is capital for its convenience—midway between the east and west ends of town, and between the northern suburbs and those disagreeable localities over the bridges.

But, wherever you fix your choice—whether your exchequer will afford a luxurious suite of rooms in Paper Buildings, or in the Albany, or you are forced to be contented to take a second floor in Clement's Inn—let your domicile be—chambers. There you are so completely independent—so entirely master of your actions—so untied to hours—so unshackled by family regulations, that you must be an exceedingly discontented animal indeed if you find anything to grumble at in your situation. You can commit all sorts of quiet enormities against conventional decorum—mind, I don't mean against morality, but mere conventionalisms. For instance, if you feel disposed to take a stroll in the soft moonlight, some time about 12 P.M., which all sensible people know is the luxurious time for walking in sultry weather, there is nobody to exclaim, in a tone of as much dismay as if you were going to perpetrate murder or suicide—"What! going out at this time of night! Well, I'm sure you must be mad." Or you can undress on a bitter winter's night by your study fire, run into the next room, and pop into bed in a pistol flash. In chambers you are free from those annoyances and practical jokes which the feminine members of a man's family often think it very witty to play off upon him. There is nobody to disturb your papers, derange your books, and put your room in uproar, under pretence of cleaning and dusting it. What a capital article that is of Franklin's about white-washing! There is nobody to burn your snuff-box, hide your cigars, or plug up the tube of your meerschaum. You are the absolute, the despotic monarch of your own dominions.

Then you can be, if you choose, so completely secluded. Sport your oak—shut your thick, black, outward door—and it is a barrier far more impenetrable, and somewhat less expensive, than a brace of the most impudent footmen the west end could furnish. Safe from all unwelcome intrusion, you read, you write, you cogitate, or take your siesta, until it shall suit the vein of your humour to signify you are "at home" by again throwing open your exterior portal, and giving your visitors access to the knocker of your inner one. And here let me throw out a hint which you may find useful. Get a small bell hung, with the handle cunningly concealed in some part of the framework of the door, where nobody would ever suspect its existence. With the secret of this, you can enlighten one or two very particular cronies, whom you might be inclined occasionally to admit at seasons when you would exclude the οἱ πολλοί of your acquaintance. Verb. sap.

Are you poor? I don't mean miserably poor—because, then, you can't live anywhere—you can only hide your head in a hole; but moderately poor, genteelly poor, so that you find it expedient to have your boots soled, and a new collar to a three months' coat—to think before you incur bills, and look over the items before you pay them? If such be your predicament, chambers will be the description of residence precisely suited to your finances. There you have nobody to speculate impertinently on your ways and means, or sneer at your little economies. Friends and enemies are alike in happy ignorance, whether you dine upon mulligatawny and venison, or solace yourself with a mutton-chop and a glass of stout. I knew a very good fellow, not overburdened with the goods of this life, who used to keep a gridiron, saucepan, &c. in his chambers; and, when he did not feel disposed to dine at a public table, he bought his own prog, and prided himself not a little upon the dexterity with which he performed the office of cook. A man who lives in chambers is not expected to give parties—though there is nothing in the world to prevent him from having as many delightful choice symposiums of good fellows as may be consonant with his means and inclination.

Are you a misanthrope, a disappointed man, a professed grumbler, an uncomfortable sort of person, enamoured of nothing but self, solitude, and sulkiness, hating to be bored with company, except when it suits you to emerge from your den in search of somebody to snarl at, snarl with, or snarl to? Why, there is no idiosyncrasy in human nature to which a residence in chambers is better adapted. You will not find it by any means difficult to get hold of a suite with the front windows looking into a paved court, through which there is no thoroughfare, and the view at the back bounded by a brick wall rising within six feet. There is a lair in which you may shut yourself up, and growl away through day and night to your heart's content, read Reuchefoucault, and indite savage articles à la Jeffrey, or satires à la Gifford.

In fact, with the exception of the codlles before alluded to, it is difficult to imagine any genus of bachelor to which a residence in chambers doth not offer advantages. To an author, a hard-reading or scientific man, it would be almost impertinent to point out its peculiar fitness. Some, indeed, are nervous, and say they do not like to sleep locked up alone, for fear of an attack of illness, when they could neither get out to obtain assistance, nor anybody gain access to them except by breaking open the door. Pooh! stuff! But, if you really do live in perspiratory expectation of a nocturnal visit from cholera or apoplexy, you can easily have a bed put up in your waste room, where your scrub, or factotum, or the old woman who sweeps your rooms—anybody you employ to attend upon you—may sleep, and so be within call in case of any such unpleasant emergency.

I have done my duty—I have recommended you to the habitation in which I conscientiously believe you will enjoy the most comfort; and now, supposing you to be snugly located, lock the door of your chambers, put the key in your pocket, and let us pedestrianise about town, to see what is to be seen.

THE DAY STORM OF THUNDER.

THE black clouds hover;
Mass on mass, they crowd
Before the sullen wind;
Darkness spreads around;
A flash doth sever
That impending shroud,
And light gleams forth behind
The loud, long, thunder sound
Rolls o'er the world, with crash and dread rebound.

Now, where yon clouds are blending,
Like rolling mists descending,
The winds awake;
The rain in torrents pourth,
The frozen hail down show'rsth,
The lightnings break;
The pine which waved to heaven,
Is smitten down and riven;
The firm earth shaken—
Whilst, darkening and bright'ning,

Now roaring, and now light'ning,
The thunder speaks.

What saith that shout of thunder,
In words of awe and wonder?

It saith, "I come!
From God's eternal throne,
Who doth the kingdoms own
Of earth and heaven ample,
I come, I come!
His chariots are unbound—
Ten thousand thousand tread
The starry dome
Of creation around.
The wind and rain,
The fire and snow,
Move in Jehovah's train,

DEAR SIR,—The coalition of the two landed factions, their fierceness, insolence, and desperation, especially in the colonies, and the declaration of Lord John Russell, that landlord's law is to be law still—all plainly indicate, that the catastrophe or the drama of the food-tax, is rapidly approaching. They have dowered their wives, and fortune their daughters, as if it could last for ever, without asking themselves how they are to live, even if they could succeed in destroying the trade of this country, and yet avoid being devoured by their victims. Do they expect that the Almighty will create a hundred Canadas, to be converted into beggar-posts for their sons and nephews, and where the authorities may rebel, that martial law may be proclaimed, for the benefit of palaced paupers? That is their affair. To get rid of their injustice is ours. We shall accomplish that object in the fifth act of the play; and the moment the masses open their eyes, that act will commence. Let us then make the best use we can of our eye-salve.

The average price of wheat at Sheffield, during the last twelve months, was 59s. 2d., and at Hamburg, during the same period, 28s. 4d. per quarter; while that of beef at Sheffield was 7½d., and of shipping beef at Hamburg, 2½d. per lb.† The corn-laws, then, offer to foreigners, for the destruction of our trade, a premium of sixpence in the shilling, in the price of our bread, and of eightpence in that of our beef. But, if we suppose that this premium for ruin is only sixpence in the shilling, and that the Quarterly Reviewers are correct in their estimate, that the annual value of the whole agricultural produce of Great Britain is equal to that of one million quarters of wheat, or about three hundred millions sterling, it follows that the direct yearly cost of these laws to the productive classes of this country, is one hundred and fifty millions! Yet our palaced paupers, the authors of those laws, (whom God dooms he infatuates!) have enacted another law, the new Poor-Bill, by which they deprive their most helpless victims, the honest paupers, of the privilege of out-door relief. These poor victims—who, if they were not robbed of half their earnings by one law, and, at the same time, deprived of employment, would need no relief at all—feel the horrible cruelty of this law, but perceive not its still more horrible inconsistency, or the food-tax would not exist another week. Some of the more energetic of them, however, the Hampdens of the loom, whom famine can kill, but not unsoul, are beginning to question the integrity or the wisdom of their oppressors or deluders. One of these down-trampled men, Edward Sunderland, stuff-weaver, of No. 38, Weaver's Square, Leeds, has addressed to two celebrated "Friends of the Poor," a letter, which ought to reach the souls of our cormorancy, even in their bellies. Here it is.

To J. Fiskien, M.P., and R. Oastler, Steward at Fisby Hall.

SIRS,—It appears that we are to have the Assistant Commissioners at Leeds very soon, to inquire into the condition of the hand-loom weavers; and, as I am one, I intend to see them, if possible, and give them such information as I am possessed of. But, before I do so, I beg to ask two of our greatest friends a few questions, lest I should err, and thereby bring upon myself and country the greatest calamities. These two gentlemen seem to pay a marked attention to our circumstances, and seem very anxious for our welfare. I therefore can rely on them for prompt answers to the questions I ask, if you will only furnish me with the means to make my desires known. Then, to come to the point:—I am a hand-loom weaver, with a wife and three children; we are wanting some of the first necessities of life, especially bread, and two persons are anxious to furnish me with the same: there is no difference in the article as to quality or quantity, but one wants fifty-two shillings for what the other will furnish me for twenty-six shillings. To buy of the former, it will take all the money I have

* We have often thought that a Bureau, for the collection of public opinion, as indicated by popular movements of all kinds and degrees, as they may now be found recorded, with tolerable fairness, in the newspapers, from the John o' Groat's Journal to the Falmouth Packet, from the Belfast to the Kerry newspapers, would be a most useful department of government; so deplorably ignorant of the progress of opinion, are the men who conduct the public business, generally found, when a great crisis evolves. Such an institution, turned to profit, might have averted the horrors of the first revolution in France, and the necessity of the second. Next in importance to what may be gathered from the public press, we consider the opinions of those men who are entitled, by the force of their intellect, and their contemporary influence with the mass of the people, to lead or indicate the way in all onward movements. Such a man is EBENEZER ELLIOTT. Cordially agreeing with him in reprobation of the Corn-Laws, and, generally, in all his ultimate views, if not always in his immediate policy, we differ from him in much that is advanced in this letter. The greater wrong of the landed aristocratic combination, can never excuse the lesser mischief which Mr O'Connell has been manfully combating, as much, we think, for the sake of the deluded instigators themselves, as for the peace and the security of society. One of Mr O'Connell's conclusions, every Reformer must adopt to the utmost extent. How true is it that had one-half, yea, one-tenth of the talent, the pains, the money, and the time, consumed in pernicious and senseless combinations, conducted upon a false and most despotic principle, been devoted to the more legitimate and tangible object of associations—to procuring that good government which comprehends the true interests of all classes, of the workman as well as the master, the consumer and the producer alike—the result might already have been very different. When will the masses learn the essential, though simple lesson, of beginning at the beginning, by forcing a full, free, and equal representation of the people; and planting that important step securely, before they attempt to make a second?—E. T. M.

† Shipping beef at Hamburg is untaxed; but the meat which is consumed in the town itself, I am told, pays a tax to the municipality, of about a halfpenny a-pound, which raises the price to threepence.

for that article, and for the other necessities of life we may need. If I buy of the other, he has no objection to take the produce of our looms in exchange for the article, and let me have it too at one half the price the other gentleman asks for the same. Now, if I buy of the latter, I shall have half of my money to furnish other comforts or necessities for my family. I could send my children to school, or, if need be, I could assist my aged parents, and prevent them becoming a burden to the parish in their old age. But, if I buy of the latter, there will meet me in my road home a person to demand what I have got. If I tell him it is a quarter of wheat that I have bought for the use of my family, and that I consider I have a right to buy where I can buy cheapest—"You are mistaken," he will say, "and, by the authority of the Corn Law, I demand of you thirty-four shillings and eightpence for leave to eat that quarter of wheat before I let it pass!" Now, the question I ask Mr Oastler of Fitzby, is—"Shall I ask for a Ten Hours Bill, or a Repeal of the Corn Laws?" My present conviction is, I shall ask for the latter.

The other great friend of the hand-loom weavers is Mr Fielden, M.P., a great power-loom proprietor. He is very desirous to get a bill passed to relieve the hand-loom weavers, by fixing a minimum of wages, below which no master shall go. This might do, if he could insure the hand-loom weavers plenty of work. The wages we receive for weaving stuff goods at Leeds is about twenty per cent. on the value of the piece; but they are woven by power-looms for half that price, or about ten per cent. on the value of the goods. Now, Mr Fielden, you know that there are 120,000 power-looms in this kingdom; and that labour, like water, will find its own level; that it will go where it can be done the cheapest; that any law you can get for fixing a minimum for wages would only accelerate its passage from the hand-loom to the power-loom; and that you, the power-loom proprietors, would get all the work, and the hand-loom weavers would starve. Now, I shall tell those Commissioners of Inquiry, that, if they wish to give effectual relief to the hand-loom weavers, they must repeal the corn laws.

This is the evidence I shall give, unless you, my great friends in or out of Parliament, shall convince me by your answers that I am in error. The question I ask is, Shall I state these things to the Commissioners, or shall I not?

Gentlemen, your prompt answers to these questions will oblige my neighbours, who are anxious to see them, and very much oblige your most humble servant,

EDWARD SUNDERLAND.

Stuff Weaver, 38, Weaver's Square, Bank, Leeds.
—Leeds Mercury.

It is something to have lived to read a letter like this, written by a hand-loom weaver. But, alas! it will never reach one in a thousand of the writer's fellow-sufferers. They cannot buy newspapers; and, if they could, cannot read them. Will Mr Bell, or any other advocate of the food-tax and its victims, reprint this poor man's letter, which, full of argument based on eternal principles, is therefore unanswerable? I fear he will not. Will the editor of The Manchester and Salford Advertiser give it currency? Will O'Connor announce it to the workmen of Leeds as a good omen? I hope he will. Will the landowners bid Mr Oastler read it to their victims, the plundered poor of Huddersfield? No, no. Will O'Connell send it as an angel of salvation, on wings of living thunder, from one extremity of the nation to another? No, no, no. Our "man of men" is far otherwise employed. What is he doing? Ask the Dublin Evening Post. He is straining at gnats, after swallowing a camel; upholding the authors of mischief, and denouncing the effects of which they are the causes;—yes, he is exhibiting himself to the Dublin Trades' Union, in the awful character of blindness contending with the blind! But his ignorance is inexcusable, while that of his auditors is the deplorable crime of their oppressors. He is wasting time and temper. Come what may of the contest, it will be useless; for while the Corn Laws and our present bad monetary system exist, combinations are defensible if they benefit the combinators, and inevitable whether they do so or not—as I will now shew.

About three years ago, those Tories called Whigs, whom O'Connell delights to honour—our baby ministers of giant mischief—gave to the Bank of England a new monopoly of the measure of value! Government owed to that corporation about fifteen million; and, as they could wring from white slaves here twenty millions, and give that sum to the owners of black slaves in the West Indies, under pretence of liberating the slaves, but really to place them in worse thralldom—it is plain that they could have paid the debt if they would. But they chose to be bullied by their creditors, who dictated to them the terms of the new charter. It is remarkable that, after almost ruining the nation in 1825, the bank did little further mischief until it had obtained its new charter; that is to say, while it was on its good behaviour, it could conduct itself well during eight years. But, having obtained a new monopoly of the measure of value—the most prodigate concession, in all the circumstances, ever made by any administration—what followed? The nation was forthwith deluged with paper money, which—and the payment of the twenty millions to the slave-owners in the West Indies—caused a great and sudden demand for goods. Workmen, then, universally struck for an advance of wages, and partially obtained it; but, scarcely had they done so, when the prices of all the necessities consumed by them rose in the same proportion. In about thirty months the demand for goods suddenly and almost totally ceased, as every thoughtful man knew it would; and then, those manufacturers who still continued to employ any of their workmen, gave them half work, at great risk and loss to themselves. Now, I ask O'Connell, whether the men who have been starving twelve months because our bad monetary system had destroyed the demand for their labour, were not justified in combining for an advance of wages two years before, when the same bad system had caused an unnatural demand for that labour? I wait not for his answer, but proceed to tell him that, in striking for an advance of wages, they obeyed a law of nature, eternal as that which wheels the planets in their courses. When six pounds of butter are in the market, and twelve are wanted there, the lady of the basket strikes for an advanced price, and obtains it. Why? Because time is an essential ingredient in the production of butter and oak trees. Yet, O'Connell talks of putting combinations down! He will soon have an opportunity of trying. There are more grand strikes, and grand crashes, in the term of the renewed Bank charter; and we are now within six months of another run of prosperity, which will terminate in another sudden and dead stand! But does he think, because he is virtuous, that, during the run, there shall be no cakes and ale?

These opinions are no new madness of mine. I addressed them, during our file-strike, more than two years ago, to the master manufacturers; and, previously, to the Sheffield Mechanics' Institute, in the presence of one of O'Connell's Whig favourites, John Parker, M.P. But, if those Tories whom O'Connell calls Whigs, are worthy of his support, why did they renew the Charter of the Bank of England?—why do they support the Corn Laws?—why have they declared that our landed paupers are still to reign paramount?—why, in short, have they defeated the intention of the Reform Bill? If I had not believed that it was intended to establish perfect freedom of trade in money, food, and all things, I would not, to obtain it, have crossed the threshold of my door. And, if O'Connell really is the wisest man in that assembly of barbarians who legislate for the greatest commercial nation on earth, in the name of mercy, honesty, and common sense, let us seek for legislators among the yet surviving Cherokees or Iroquois.

In the disputations of O'Connell with the trades-unionists of Dublin, I am sorry to say, I can find none of the wisdom of Edward Sunderland. But discussion teaches; and this is certain, that one, at least, of the disputants has something to learn. In the presumptuous hope, then, that he may condescend to learn even from a political economist, I beg leave to quote from The Dublin Evening Post a few of his wise sayings:—

"Though the operatives are willing to work," says he, "there is not nearly so much employment in Ireland as there should be." Why is there not? O'Connell, I fear, knows too well that the corn-laws increase the competition for land in Ireland as well as in England, and that, if these laws were repealed, there would be more landlords competing for tenants than tenants for farms. He knows, too, I doubt not, that the more the landlords gain under the corn-laws, the more the public lose; and, as Ireland is brought down to the lowest food that will support life—and as, whenever that is the case, neither life nor property can be safe—he need not wonder, I think, that capitalists are in no haste to seek employment for their capital in that country.

"If we are to have poor-laws for Ireland," he says, "let the rates be paid out of rent." Yes, no man knows better than O'Connell that propositions to tax rent may be safely made in the House of Commons; but he does not seem to know that, while the corn-laws exist, an effectual law to tax the rent of land is an impossibility.

"You may work or not work, just as you please," said he to the unionists; who had not the sense to reply—"Yes, indeed, we may, if under our corn-laws and bad monetary system, we can get any work."

"Labour," says he, "is property." Yet he blames men who are robbed, by one law, of half that property, for trying to defend it, which, I contend, they have a perfect right to do; in the circumstances, by any means which are consistent with their personal safety—"for the labour of the poor is his life." But, like O'Connell himself, they quarrel with the effect, instead of removing the cause. The interest of what they have spent in trades' unions would have won the ballot and universal suffrage, and quelled for ever the monopolists, of whom they are at once victims and imitators. But, when the example of combination is set by the rich, are the poor to be hanged if they follow it? Is O'Connell aware that all strikes, in their origin, have been defensive? Such was the strike of the Roman workmen—slaves, under Spartacus; and such was the first English strike, that of the free-masons, hundreds of years ago. The strikes now complained of have, at least, prevented the wages of mechanics from being brought down, at once, to potatoes; and, by so doing, have given a respite to the aristocracy, who may be assured that potato-wages and potato-profits cannot pay for bayonets, and that the competition of Irish victims with English labourers is intense enough without adding the mechanics of Dublin to their number. Does not O'Connell know that the food of this country is restricted by act of Parliament, while its population is constantly increasing? Cannot he count ten on his fingers? Is he aware that wages are ultimately measured by profits? and that capital will not stay here for potatoes, if elsewhere it can get plum-pudding?

"I know a gentleman," says he, "who is about to give up business, because he will not submit to the dictation of his workmen." But he does not seem to know that, if the corn-laws continue, all the productive capital of the nation will depart to other shores; and that it would long since have departed, had not its departure been prevented or retarded by the folly of the continental governments, who, instead of offering it a safe asylum, imitate our restrictive system, imagining that we have thriven by it, whereas we have thriven in spite of it. Under the corn-laws, then, our continued existence, as a commercial state, is an accident!

The great danger of combinations here is this—that they precipitate our improvements in machinery; which improvements, made by us at immense cost, our rivals will get for nothing, when the governments of Germany and France, opening their eyes to the light of common sense, make trade free. Our opponents will then have nothing to do but to copy perfection. All British capital, not previously destroyed by our monopolists, will go abroad; the people will devour each other, as some of them are already doing; and, if the remnant of them return to prosperity, they must do so by seizing the land for themselves, or by fighting up from the lowest food that will support life. But, with freedom of trade, the reverse of danger would result from improvements in our machinery.

"Will your priests," says O'Connell to the ~~unbelievers~~, "administer the sacrament to those who interfere with the rights of another man's child?" He forgets that the Corn-Laws interfere with the rights of every man's child. The Corn-Laws alone prevent masters from taking apprentices; and, if continued, will destroy both masters and workmen, and the landowners themselves. Why, then, does this "greatest of criminal lawyers" strain at effects, and swallow the causes of them? "In a free country," says he, "you cannot dictate to any man what he shall do with his own." But in what country does he say this?

"Your combinations," says he, to the unionists, "are already stained with blood. Three murders have been committed in the streets of Dublin in open day, and only one of them has been avenged by the law." Avenged! barbarian! and by the law? The law is the murderer, for the bread-tax is law. Man! man! art thou a man? "There are now," says he, "five or six men confined in Edinburgh, for a murder at Paisley." Avenger that murder, then, by committing five or six legal murders, if it must be so; but, when the Corn-Laws shall have covered the nation with murders from sea to sea, who will avenge them? Conscientious jurymen already feel unwilling to visit on the victims of the food-tax the vengeance of its authors. That tax may, and I believe will, dissolve the social compact; but "vengeance is mine!" saith the Lord.

"If every day adds to the dominion and dictation of the workmen," why does not O'Connell denounce the cause of that dictation, the Corn-Laws? If, with our present legislation, the leisure necessary for the education of the people is impossible; if, without national education, apathy and ruin are certain; and if "combinations benefit the combinators only for a time, but in the end injure them"—why does he not, as a friend to the landowners, haste to destroy their combination, the source and example of almost all others now existing, and itself the most cruel, horrible, and cold-blooded on record? Is he, too, deluding both workmen and masters, and laughing at both? Is he one of the Tory Radicals? No; he is a good man, and ought to be a great one. But his ignorance is astounding!—and therefore, his opinions on Trades Unions, Poor-Laws, or Corn-Laws, are (in themselves, and apart from his position) of very little importance. But not so are those of Edward Sunderland, hand-loom weaver. Founded on eternal principles, they are irrefutable. He is an individual of plundered millions, instructing those millions; and, when they think as he thinks, the plunderers will be made to live on their own.* If justice is not a mockery, an empty name, the landowners, by their Corn-Laws, have struck a blow at the foundations of property. It is possible that they may yet be made to pay a duty on home-grown corn, to those who have so long been forced, for their benefit, to pay double prices for bread. And, when these landowners shall have to come into court as plaintiffs, and request O'Connell to say, as a lawyer, if they will not come into it without a case, can there be any doubt what his answer must be?

In conclusion, I wish him joy of the junction of his pretended friends with his sworn foes, and beg leave to assure him that the two united factions will very soon repudiate and discharge from office his true friends, Mulgrave and Morpeth, as much too honest for their places.—I am, dear Tait, yours very truly,

EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

SHEFFIELD, 14th January 1838.

* Sunderland should propose, instead of a tax on power-loom, maintenance till the hand-loom weavers have learned a new trade, and till one has been provided for them.

PAST HOURS.

"YOUNG thoughts have music in them, love,
And happiness their theme;
And music wanders in the wind
That fills a morning dream.

And there are angel voices heard
In childhood's frolic hours,
When life is but an April day
Of sunshine and of flowers."

Canst thou remember those early hours
When "life and hope" were young,
And every dream of our beating hearts
A radiance round them flung?—

When we wreathed wild flowers like coronets,
To fling them on the stream,
And little reck'd of the passing hours,
Or the bliss of that early dream?

We dream'd not then of each future year;
For that fairy world of ours
Was bright as the passing sunny gleam
That awakens the young spring flowers.

Oh, little we knew of sorrow then,
Or the hopes of distant years!
The future, to us, was an unknown path,
Too soon to be traced in tears.

We parted, to meet in other scenes,
When youth's sweet hopes had fled.
Oh, many a heart which loved us then,
Is slumbering with the dead.

And yet how these visions will haunt me still
With these dreams of my childhood's days—
Of my early home, its deserted hearth,
And each tone of love and praise!

Oh, faintly the future has shadowed forth
The dreams which then filled my heart—
Those bodiless visions of future fame
Which were then of my being a part.

Al, youth and hope, how ye vainly trust
In the dimness of future years!
It is vanity all—this passing earth,
With its dreams, its hopes, its fears.

HANNAH LAWRENCE'S HISTORICAL MEMOIRS OF THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.*

So much were we interested and gratified by the perusal of this picturesque and manners-painting volume; when it appeared some three months back, that we placed it honourably among a few other good works, reserved until we should have an opportunity of introducing them to our readers with the attention we considered due to their merits. But life is short, and this year, at least, the publishing season is long; and we must redeem time, by attempting to give prompt if not adequate notice of the existence of literary excellence of no vulgar kind, to which we have not the means of rendering the more ample measure of justice which we had meditated. Hannah Lawrence, spinster or matron we cannot tell, has chosen a walk not common to literary ladies. Those historical memoirs, and biographies of historical persons, which we have been accustomed to receive from female pens, are generally compilations from sources neither recordite nor difficult of access. She has gone to the fountain-head, and dug deeper in the tangle of antiquity, than many accredited excavators of the other sex. As a black-letter student, a porer over musty records, and a British-Museum haunter, she equals, if she does not, with her woman's patience and industry, surpass, in diligence and pains of research into small obscurities, the most indefatigable of our historical antiquaries. What she has been able to rescue from oblivion, regarding the wives and mothers of the Plantagenets, is, however, of less value than that variety of rich and curious information, gained in searching through those MSS., and rare and voluminous works, from which she has selected with equal taste and judgment. The authoress has thus contrived to give interest to a work which, more than any we have lately read, illustrates the domestic manners of England during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, while it faithfully traces the progress of the arts, the literature, the commerce, and civilization of the kingdom. To early literature in particular, which was liberally patronized by several of the early English Queens, great attention has been paid; and, after the labours of Warton, Ellis, and others, we still owe a debt of gratitude to this new, tasteful, and careful gleaner, in the same wide field. An introductory chapter takes a rapid and able retrospect of the period of the Conquest, of the reign of William the Conqueror, and the Red King. The authoress is an enthusiastic admirer of William, for whom she makes out a good case; and she considers the Norman invasion, as the greatest blessing of England—a subject quite open to debate. We know what is, but not what might have been. The memoirs open properly with the Life of the "Good Queen Maude," the Saxon Princess espoused by Henry Beauchlerk, mainly as an act of grace and conciliation to his Saxon subjects, who were still restive under the Norman yoke. Maude was the daughter of Malcolm Canmore, and of that Queen Margaret—Queen and Saint!—whose memory is still fragrant in Scotland. The work before us is devoted to English Queens. May we not be allowed to advert very briefly to the most illustrious of our Scottish Queens, if virtue, and talent, and usefulness, of which the effects are still discernible, are the qualities which give the greatest lustre to thrones? The memory of the mother of "Good Queen Maude," is cherished to this day in the locality which she blessed and adorned. From her were named the Queen's Ferry, and Margaret's Hope, a sheltered bay well known to distressed seamen, driven up the Frith of Forth. A stone by the wayside, about two miles from the shore, which is dinted with something resembling a gigantic foot-step, is still pointed out as "Queen Margaret's Stone," and from it the adjoining farm takes its name. The tide, more courteous to the gentle Margaret than to the royal Canute, upon her arrival in Scotland, flowed on, bearing along her barge, until she stepped ashore, two miles above high-water mark, on her way to Dunfermline, and upon the remarkable stone. Her ashes were secretly conveyed abroad by some Catholic devotees, long after the Reformation. We recollect of an old gentleman, an inhabitant of Dunfermline, probably touched with Papistical, and certainly imbued with Jacobite prejudices, pointing out the broad slab which had covered her grave, and to which the tradition attached was, that, when lifted from the earth, it had accidentally fallen, and cracked into the form of the irregular Cross which the transverse fracture certainly resembled. A principal street in Dunfermline, is still called the Maygate, or Maiden's Street or Walk, from the processions of those young girls who were the objects of Queen Margaret's peculiar care—her instruments in spreading civilization throughout the barbarous dominions of her husband. We have been led to say so much from casually turning to Mercer's Poems, mentioned at the end of the Magazine, in which there are some appropriate lines to this truly princely woman. Since we have digressed so far, we may as well allow the "Saxon Chronicle," hoary with the moss of centuries, to prelude the modern verses. "This summer, the child Edgar [Edgar, the Saxon Prince, usually named the Noble Child] departed with his mother Agatha and his two sisters, Margaret and Christina, for Scotland, and many good men with them, and came to Scotland, under the protection of Malcolm, who entertained them all. Then began Malcolm to yearn after the Child's sister, Margaret, to wife; but he and all his men long refused, and she also herself was averse, and said, she would neither have him, nor any one else, if the Supreme Power would grant that she in her maidenhood might please the mighty Lord in pure continence. The king, however, earnestly urged her brother, till he answered "Yea." And, indeed, he durst not otherwise, for they were come into his kingdom. So that then it was fulfilled what God had long fore-shown; and else it could not be, as he himself saith in his Gospel, 'Not even a sparrow on the ground may fall without his foreshowing.' The prescient Creator wist long before what he of her would have done, for that she should increase the glory of God in this land, lead the king aright from the path of error, bend him and his people to a better way, and suppress the bad customs which the nation formerly followed, all of which she afterwards did." Though Margaret was only a Scottish Queen, the authoress has ventured to overstep her bounds to celebrate the virtues of the mother of Maude. Great and important benefits did the Saxon Princess confer alike on her husband and her kingdom. "She afforded a secure asylum to those of her countrymen who fled the rigour of the Norman yoke; she welcomed with magnificent presents learned men from all parts of the Continent; she introduced the Saxon tongue into her dominions, and, both by precept and example, promoted the spread of religion; nor did she consider the civilisation of the people as below her care, for she encouraged a taste for pomp and splendour; patronised the importation of gold and silver plate, of rich precious foreign stuffs; increased the number of the king's personal attendants, and adopted an unusual magnificence of apparel. With affectionate admiration, did the rude warrior king behold the splendour and refinements which the taste and intelligence of his beloved Margaret had placed around him; and, fascinated by her many talents—talents which, in the eyes of the unlettered monarch seemed little short of angelic—he unquestioningly listened to her counsels, and devoutly imitated her religious duties. Her confessor relates with what devotion he used to kiss her prayer-books and missal, and how gorgeously he had them bound, although to him sealed volumes—for the far-famed Malcolm Canmore was unable to read a syllable. When the Queen undertook to correct some alleged abuses in the Church, Malcolm stood interpreter between her and such of the clergy as did not understand English, which he loved, because it was the native tongue of Margaret. After Malcolm and his eldest son were killed together at the siege of Alnwick, his deeply-attached wife, disgusted with life, earnestly entreated of God to die—she soon concurred." And now, eight hundred years after her decease, the poet of Dunfermline thus embalms her memory and celebrates her virtues:—

In art accomplished, pious, mild, serene,
A graceful woman and a gracious queen,
Placed 'mongst a people rude, as sometimes grows,
And bristly tribes, on the wild rose;
She deemed it unbecoming to despise,
But gave her mind to teach and civilize.
The fragrance of her memory so blest,
Has reached the future ages; and will last

So long as men in veneration hold
The brightest virtues—gifts of rarest mould."

But this digression to the earthly immortality of virtue, is culpable desertion of our duty to the attractive work before us, in which learning and antiquity are seen attired by the Græces.

The marriage of Beauclerk, like many other royal marriages, was one of policy. The Saxon princess, "the good Queen Maude," never possessed the affections of her Norman lord; but she was treated with respect and royal munificence, and amply supplied with the means of gratifying her taste in patronising minstrels and bards, and in endowing religious establishments.

The second queen of Beauclerk, the young and beautiful Adelais of Louvain, whom he married after his children and nephews had perished in the disastrous wreck of the "white ship," forms the subject of the second memoir. Adelais was even more distinguished for her munificent patronage of scholars and minstrels than "Good Queen Maude"—tastes which her indulgent husband, "the Scholar-King," approved and encouraged. Among the other royal ladies celebrated, are Maude of Boulogne, the partner of Stephen; Maude the Empress of Germany, the daughter of "Good Queen Maude," and afterwards the wife of the first Plantagenet; the illustrious Elinor of Aquitaine; Elinor of Provence, the wife of Henry III.; and others. The authoress proposes to continue these memoirs down to the beginning of the sixteenth century, if her first volume receive the approbation of the public. Of that we should hope its intrinsic merits give assurance—although the auspicious period of the commencement of a female reign, promising to be long and happy, did not present the most favourable opportunity for the appearance of such a work. Nearly every page of the volume presents entertaining extracts; the picture of London, as it was when "the Good Queen Maude" entered the capital, to proceed to Westminster, where her marriage united the Saxon and Norman dynasties, possesses, to modern readers, the interest of contrast.

Little of splendid pageantry met the eye of Maude, as she took her way through London to the sumptuous palace of Westminster. No gilded conduits pouring streams of wine; no tapestry-decked streets; no city-watch with its glittering armour; no city companies, with their quaint but costly pageants; no Lord Mayor, in his robe of scarlet, welcomed her who came to bind Norman and Saxon together in bonds of firm and enduring brotherhood. Those gorgeous observances, and those picturesque processions, which duly graced the entrance of subsequent queens into the capital of their kingdom, were as yet unknown; for chivalry had but just received a name and a law; and romance, the mother and nurse of every splendid pageant, had scarcely awakened to life; nor had commerce, as yet, poured into the quays of London that profusion of wealth that are long rendered her merchants the rivals of nobles and of princes.

Nor did London herself present much to attract or delight the eye. The conventual establishments were few, the churches scanty, as compared with later times; nor did the tall spire, the traceried window, or the richly-carved door-way, contrast, in picturesque variety, with the rude low houses around. The materials of the churches were mean and perishable: timber, or rubble, formed the walls; glass windows were but scantily seen; and but one parochial church boasted the unusual splendour of stone arches. This was in St Mary's in West Cheap, called from that circumstance, "de kirchburh," a name retained to the present day, in its Norman designation, "Le Bow." The metropolitan cathedral—that venerable structure, which, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, stood proudly the most splendid cathedral in the land, without tower or spire, built principally of timber, and yet bearing marks of that fatal and very extensive fire, which in 1082 almost levelled it with the ground—rose, unvalled, in the midst of a desolate area, looking mournfully on the ruined remains of the palace of her Saxon kings, which occupied the site beyond its southward boundary.

Little is known of the architecture of the private dwellings, but they were probably low-built, thatched, and with windows of wicker-work. The Thames was then spanned but by one frail wooden bridge. The streets were straggling and unpaved; and for the forest of masts now seen on the river—

Beside the Tower, at the Vintry, and at Edred's-hithe, a few small vessels might be anchored; and from time to time some tall Norman galley, or some light osier-bound shallop, might glide by; but the broad and spacious quays, with the palace-dwellings of their merchants, the stirring life, the busy crowds, the sounds of never-ceasing activity, as yet were not. At either end of the city, and close to the water's edge, arose those equally impregnable fortresses, the Tower and Castle Baynard; on the other side of the river, the rude collection of huts marked the site of that general receptacle of thieves and outlaws, the Broomfield; close beside them rose the house of nuns and lowly church, dedicated to the Virgin, by the grateful maiden of the ferry, Marie; and, far beyond, rising conspicuous from among the green marshes, were the towers of the palace of Lambeth.

But a fairer spectacle would meet the eye of the Saxon prince, as he proceeded along the rude and irregular road which led to the palace of Westminster. There the hand of improvement had lavished countless cost, both on church and hall; and the numerous buildings—"framed," as the admiring chronicler relates, "with masses of stone, so correctly laid, that the joint deceives the eye, and leads it to imagine it is all one block,"—undimmed with age, and uninjured by long exposure to the weather, must have, indeed, appeared dwellings worthy the ruler of all England and Normandy.

The most flourishing towns of that period were Winchester, Reading, Northampton, Lincoln, Boston, Stamford, Grindley, and Huntingdon, all now dwindled into third-rate places.

Guilds, for purposes of trade, were by this time established, and improvement must have been rapid. The history of the common people, however, remains, as in the early annals of all countries, in great obscurity. By the time of Henry Plantagenet and his Queen, Elinor of Aquitaine, London had greatly increased and prospered. It was surrounded by a wall, pierced by seven gates, and defended at either end by a strong castle—the Tower, namely, and Castle Baynard—and on the north side by turrets.

Withinside, the several tradesmen resided in the streets appropriated to their respective callings, a plan which continued many centuries after. Three principal schools, St Paul's cathedral school, the convent school of St Martin's le Grand, and that of the Holy Trinity at Aldgate, besides others held "upon good-will and sufferance," were devoted to the instruction of its youthful inhabitants; while thirteen great conventual churches, and one hundred and twenty-six parochial, supplied religious services to the citizens, and the dwellers in the suburbs. From the same account [Fitzstephen's] we learn, that the suburbs were, even at this early day, very populous, especially toward the west. "On the west side," he, "is the king's palace—an incomparable building, having a wall before it, and bulwarks. It is two miles from the city, and continued with a suburb full of people." "On the north side are fields for pasture, and open meadows, very pleasant, among which three waters flow, and turn the wheels of the mills. Very near lies a large forest, in the covers of which lurk bucks, does, wild boars, and bulls." Nearer the city, he tells us, there are "three fountains, sweet, wholesome, and clear, streaming forth from among the glittering stones," (the worthy monk's style is tolerably ornate;) "these are Holywell, Clerkenwell, and St Clements well, where the youth of the city take the air on summer evenings." London, even at this early day, seems well to have deserved her long appropriated title of "pays de cocagne;" since from the same authority we learn, that good eating and drinking abounded in this favoured city; and that, for the accommodation of those who had not means or opportunity of cooking various delicacies at home, a range of shops extended by the river side, where every kind of food, dressed in the most approved style, might be obtained. At these, he tells us, "you may call for fish, small or great, ordinary flesh for the poorer sort, and more dainty, such as venison and fowl, for others;" and he enlarges, in a very housekeeperlike way, on the great convenience of these shops; for "if a citizen have friends come in, let the servants give them water to wash, and bread to stay their stomachs, and, in the meantime, run to the water side," where they would find everything necessary to furnish a complete and even sumptuous entertainment.

The authoress has taken pains to rescue the memory of Elinor of Aquitaine from the stigma affixed to it by tradition and popular poetry. Her summing up of the character of this illustrious and unfortunate woman, may be taken as a fair specimen of the historical style of the work.

Four illustrious women have been more unfortunate in their after-fame, than this fair heiress of Aquitaine, who successively wore the crown of France and of England, and who numbered among her progeny, three crowned kings of England, and two consorts of continental monarchs. Yet her beauty, her unquestioned talents, and her misfortunes, have all been forgotten; and she is handed down by popular tradition, only as the vindictive fury who tracked to her closely-concealed retreat that beautiful rival to whom she proffered the murderous alternative of the poison cup or dagger. This idle story is now rejected by all who have any claim to historical knowledge; still the three other apparently better founded charges, remain to cast a dark shadow on the memory of Elinor. The first—that of her improper conduct in the Holy Land—has been proved, in the foregoing pages, to rest upon the most apocryphal authority, and, consequently, to be unworthy of credit. The second—her inciting her sons to rebellion against their father—must be viewed in connexion with all the preceding circumstances; and then, harsh will be the verdict that condemns the injured and insulted wife, for quitting a husband from whom she had received injuries instead of protection; or a mother for taking part with her sons, against the tyranny and injustice of their father. If it be true that Elinor of Aquitaine neither possessed the uncomplaining meekness of the first Maude, nor the strong conjugal attachment of the second; still, be it remembered, that Beauchamp paid every respect to his excellent, though unloved queen; while Stephen's strong attachment to Maude of Boulogne, is evident in every page of their history. But Plantagenet repaid Elinor's unbounded confidence, that yielded up without stipulation her precious dower, with neglect and infidelity; and, ere age had impressed a wrinkle on her brow, the fair daughter of Aquitaine learned the bitter truth, that her wealth alone had won him. What right had she to expect that he would love her for her beauty, and not for her wealth?

boastings, and sell her Plintheogenes, to expect domestic happiness? In the third charge, that of supporting the claims of her son King John, against those of her grandson Arthur—we must remember that, in so doing, she belied herself fulfilling the last wish of her beloved son Richard. That she took any active part, no chronicler informs us; and that, if besieged by a grandson, she should send to her son for aid, is certainly only natural. With the subsequent fate of Arthur, she could have no concern, since she retired to Fontevraud. In viewing the character of Eleanor, it would be unjust, as unphilosophical, to overlook the many difficulties and irritating circumstances by which she was surrounded. The absence of temptation often affords a claim to high moral worth; and freedom from causes of irritation, as frequently gives a title to forbearance and self-denial.

As the patroness of literature, the name of Eleanor of Aquitaine deserves a high station; in her court, the poets of the langue d'oïl, and of the langue d'oïl, sang in friendly rivalry together; and, beneath the sunshine of her smile, chivalric romance burst forth. Nor should the philosopher refuse his praise to that important act of her English regency, which, reversing the sanguinary provisions of the Forest-laws, summoned every outlaw, from the Trent to the Severn, to repossess his forfeited rights, on the easy terms of taking the oath of allegiance to the new king.

One beautiful chapter is entitled, "The Poet-Fathers of England," in which the authoress has given metrical specimens of translations from the "Voyage of St Brandan," which shew both learning and accomplishment. The poem, of which only one copy (in the Cotton Library) is supposed to exist, is of rare invention, and possesses an elegance of imagination, for which the reader must be unprepared, in an age so rude. The author is supposed to be an Englishman and an ecclesiastic; but his name is unknown to fame. "The Voyage of St Brandan" is made to the terrestrial Paradise. A metrical history of the kings of England, by a trouvère, named Geoffroi Gaimar, is another of the ancient poems with which we are for the first time made acquainted. One of the most remarkable of those early metrical pieces, bears the title of "Le Sermun du Guichart de Beaulieu." It is considered to be the production of some zealous way-side preacher. Our authoress says, in a note—

This phrase may appear strange to some readers, who are not aware how extensively the practice of itinerant preaching prevailed during the middle ages. Indeed, by a singular but most beneficial anomaly, the Latin church, whilst she insisted on the consecration of every place where the service was to be performed, allowed her preachers to go forth as unfettered in their great work as the Puritan; and thus, in the market-place, on the seashore, or by the wayside, hundreds of earnest and warm-hearted men preached, free from all superstitious adjuncts, the great truths of the Gospel; while, in the scorn with which they were viewed by the higher orders of the clergy, we have testimony to the purity of their doctrine.

It is conjectured that Guichart de Beaulieu now become a zealous preacher, may have been a lawless man in his younger days—perhaps the leader of one of those bands of plunderers that abounded in the broken times of Stephen, who might afterwards have become an inmate of Beaulieu, a cell attached to the Abbey of St Albans. Whoever Beaulieu might be, he enjoyed no royal patronage; and he was the stern and uncompromising denouncer of error, and promulgator of truth. It is melancholy to reflect that, in the lapse of seven centuries, the world is so very little better than when the preacher Beaulieu denounced its vices, and pointed out the straight path. "Le Sermun" is, in spirit and tendency, nearly the same as "Mammun," the most modern discourse in a similar vein.

Hannah Lawrance infers a better state of society at large, in the thirteenth century, than is generally believed; and she reasons acutely and plausibly, if not convincingly, her data being the lately-published rolls of the period. This part of the work is exceedingly curious and interesting. After enumerating many particulars, establishing her position respecting the legal security and the comparative wealth of the common people, and endeavouring to prove that the villains were not slaves of the soil—she continues:—

Where might we find an instance of the Russian serf, or the American negro slave, engaged in a legal contest with his master? Another instance that the villain was capable of exercising the rights of a freeman, may be found in the case of Ralph Cloer, in which it is adjudged, that he cannot hold the land claimed, "because he is a villain, and that he be amerced for making the claim." Here the first law-officer of the land, Geoffry Fitz-Peter, imposes a pecuniary fine on a member of that class, which we have been told, and by no mean authority, had no legal rights to the possession of money. The bondsman, therefore, with his iron collar, which forms so interesting an object in so many a picture of the middle ages, must, in England at least, be placed among those many picturesque embellishments which may "adorn a tale," but which certainly cannot be permitted to "point a moral."

She considers that, if the yeomen of Essex and Hertford had legal justice placed within their reach, "Cedric the Saxon needed not to fear the injuries Front de Bœuf could do, either to house or land." Some of these villains, whose actual condition has occasioned so much controversy, held themselves a considerable quantity of land. By "the Boulden Book," it appears that the villains of Boldenare held each thirty acres of land; and their payments were partly in service, partly in kind, and partly in money.

In Southbydyk the villains held their vills in farm, and find "eight score men to reap in autumn; thirty-six waggons to carry the corn; and they beside pay £5." Many of the entries in this ancient document are very curious; at harvest time it is determined that the whole household shall turn out to work, "exceptâ husewifâ," and this respectful attention to the mistress of the house, is repeated in every entry.

This is much more than the indulgence, cherishing the habits of civilization and the sentiments of humanity, which philanthropists now claim for the housewives of negro cabins; they would even take their services in the field during the pressure of the sugar crop. Our authoress rests her assumption of the superior condition of the lower classes of the middle age upon another foundation. In these early times—

The political economist had not put forth his brutal axiom, that "mere food and clothing are all that the poor have a right to demand;" but a better and wiser, because a Christian feeling, pervaded the higher classes. The great hero of chivalry, Arthur, was pointed out, by the equally poor himself, as "a monk and pious to the poor." The knight kneeling at the altar's pale, in the same vow that pledged him to be true and loyal to his monren and his lady-love, pledged himself also, "always to maintain the right to destroy all those who would injure widows, poor maidens, and the fatherless; to love poor folk to the utmost of his power, and with all this to love the holy church." Thus the duty of protecting and aiding the poor, was placed side by side with the duties of religion; and while many a romance told how the charity of the knight was returned to him a thousand-fold, the hotly and the legend echoed the same lesson of mercy, and enforced it by the irresistible argument, "for our Lord himself was a poor man."

That these lessons produced their due effect, numerous regulations of the middle ages prove: in those days, at times of high festival, none of that morbid horror of the mingling of the higher and lower classes seems to have prevailed. "Cloth of gold" shunned not contact with "cloth of fritz"; but the peasant as well as his lord hastened to the tournament, the civic procession, the gorgeous festival at the king's palace—secure not only of a place, but of refreshment; for the dole of "white bread" was provided for such, and garments were often given; while, in order that the poor might, on festive occasions, participate in the very luxuries of the higher orders, the conduits poured forth wins. Indeed, looking back even on this early period, and contemplating the kindly feeling which was cherished toward the poor and destitute—the abundant convent dole, which supplied them in times of scarcity, and the noble hospitals, in which age and helplessness found repose; the poor man in the present day, crushed down by "the greedy avarice of civilization," might turn a sorrowful look on the days gone by.

We should adopt the lady's benevolent opinions, if we did not indulge the hope that the present evil condition of society, in a state of painful transition, points to the period when the independent working-man's own labour may suffice without the charitable dole; and the well-secured fruits of his early industry sustain his old age.

The state of the Jews forms a curious feature of these times. Before the reign of Beauclerk, little is known of Oxford, save that the Jews received their education at that place, which is assumed to establish the fact, that the sciences were taught there from a very early period; and this is not all.

To refer the introduction of all science that deserved the name, to the settlement of the Jews in England, would appear to the reader, who is acquainted with that singular people only in their present state, most strange and improbable. Yet such was the fact; and the first schools which taught experimental philosophy in England, were those of the Jews at Oxford. Whatever may be the character of the Jew in the present day, in those earlier ages, ere a Lanfranc had aroused the intellectual powers of two nations, and ere one Christian university had raised her head—in the Moorish schools of Cordoba and Toledo, "the highest chairs of philosophy were filled by Jewish Rabbins; and a succession of Hebrew scholars shed lustre on the literary history of Spain." Oriental in their tastes as in their origin, the Jews, like the Saracens, especially pursued those studies to which the eastern nations had, from earliest times, been attached, and to watching "the stars in their courses," to inquiries into all the hidden mysteries of nature, their attention was almost exclusively directed. Of the precise character of their instruction, when, in the reign of Beauclerk, they occupied three hostels in Oxford, called after the respective names of their owners, Lombard-hall, Moses-hall, and Jacob-hall, we possess no information. That Christian students should resort to these halls in great numbers, merely to attain, according to Antony à Wood, a knowledge of Hebrew, is most improbable—surely it was rather to learn the wonders of astrology, the singular powers of that newly-discovered Arabian science of numbers, the profound mysticism of the Cabala, that Christian youth flocked to these Hebrew schools, and meekly sat down at the feet of their Jewish professors. From other sources, we learn that astronomy—combined with those wild but beautiful dreams of planetary influence which have been the belief of successive ages, ever since the Chaldean fed his flocks on the plains of Shinar, and the crowned Magian ascended the topmost tower of gorgeous Babylon, to watch the mystic dance of the planets—was a favourite study of the cloister. Prior Walcher's rhyming epitaph, among other eulogies, expressly records that he was "bonus astrologus;" and the remark of the chronicler, that the priest, whose testimony he quotes to avouch some marvellous fact, was "learned in the stars," seems to be considered sufficient to render his testimony equivalent to that of a whole jury of unlearned men. The exact sciences were, however, also cultivated; and in geometry, and the higher branches of mathematics, many denizens of the cloister attained celebrity. It was very questionable whether, at this early period, the witching dreams of alchemy (that unquestionable parent of modern chemistry) were believed by the learned of the day, or even by their Jewish instructors.

By the middle of the eighth century, Jews were settled in England, and, probably, long before that period. Strange that none should have appeared in Scotland until the end of the eighteenth! They were taken under the protection of the Conqueror, for which they paid according to the usual terms of the covenants made between helpless wealth and rapacity invested with power.

The Conqueror enacted, "that they should be under the king's protection; that they should not subject themselves to any other without his leave; that they, and all theirs, should belong to the king; and that if any should detain any of their goods, he might challenge them as his own." And on this miserable pretence of protection, were this singular people willing to dwell in England, even until the period of their compulsory exile. During the reign of Rufus, they seemed to have enjoyed both quiet and security. . . . In the tenth of Stephen, we find first mention made of the charge, afterwards so frequently brought against them, that of crucifying a child. This was said to have taken place at Norwich; but it was probably a fiction of their enemies, since Dr Tovey truly observes, "they are never said to have practised it, but at such times as the kings were manifestly in great want of money."

In the reign of Plantagenet, the Jews first obtained a piece of ground in London, for a cemetery. Previously, there was but one in all England in which the persecuted race were permitted the rites of sepulture. Their original burying-ground in London was in the place now called Jewin Street. Their "money" made them the prey of the kings and nobility, while, to the people, they were hateful for their "usances." In massacres and plunderings of Jews, the people might imagine that they were only, by "wild justice" taking back their own. The prodigal and pious Henry III. was as severe in mulcting the Jews as his father, who, being aware that money cannot be obtained save where it is, had extorted nearly as much from the few Jews in the country as from all the rest of his subjects together. Plantagenet had made their property be registered for his better convenience in at any time obtaining "forced loans." Henry III., at one sweep, extorted from them a sum equal to £200,000 of modern money.

On two occasions, during his reign, the malignant charge of crucifying a child was brought against them; and, on the one occasion, many of the richest Jews fled except, and the king seized all their property; while, on the same night, of the wealthiest Jews of Lincoln were hanged, and sixty-three conveyed to the Tower, to undergo a similar fate. Besides these general persecutions, some of their number seem to have been marked out for most extensive spoliation. Aaron of York, declared to Matthew Paris, that no less a sum than 30,000 marks (£300,000), besides 200 gold marks for the queen, had been extorted from him in seven years; and others were heavily mulcted.

Next to the Jews, the merchants of London were the greatest "ready-money men" in the nation; and "those churlish Londoners" did not escape heavy mulcts. Improvement was, nevertheless, rapid and steady during this long reign, especially in the police of the towns and in domestic security. Watch and ward was established in most of the towns and boroughs. Foreign trade extended rapidly, and the markets began to be steadily supplied with cheap and abundant provisions. London was then first supplied with water brought from Tyburn, in leaden pipes, to the conduit of Westcheap. That contrivance for domestic convenience, which an intelligent though savage New Zealander lately admired above everything he saw in England, was nearly perfected in the middle of the thirteenth century. The philosophy of our authoress does not always inspire us with so great admiration as her skill in picturesque narrative; but here is one emphatic observation, shewing, besides, the best possible use that can be made of an acknowledged grievance:—

For these, and many other instances of improvement, the character of Henry has received higher praise than strict justice will allow; and that advancing civilization, which really was the result of national spirit and enterprise, has been too hastily attributed to the enlightened encouragement of the monarch. But, looking more clearly into the records of these times, we shall find that every one of these improvements originated with the people; and that the beneficial influence of the monarch, was rather the result of his contrary conduct—of the capricious exactions which stimulated the industry, and the weak efforts of tyranny, which aroused the spirit of the nation to bold and independent exertion.

The arts in the thirteenth century, form the theme of a charming chapter. The era of improvement in trade and in domestic affairs, was eminently that of the advance or resurrection of the higher arts.

Then first the graceful saint smiled from her foliaged canopy on the gazing crowd; then first the suppliant effigy adorned the altar-domb; then first the gorgeous window, with its "glass of thousand colourings," shed its flood of rainbow light upon the kneeling worshipper; and then first did Gothic architecture display all her surpassing beauty, and rear those splendid fabrics which, even to the present day, challenge the admiration of every beholder.

The dignified clergy of the age were the liberal patrons of the arts; and to ecclesiastical architecture they often voluntarily devoted a large part of their incomes. The clergy were, at the same time, not indifferent to the splendour of their private residences. "Noble stone houses" began to be built on the road to Westminster.

Among these, the town residences of the bishops of Worcester and Chester were conspicuous; most of the mitred abbots, too, had houses (some they were mostly called) in the suburbs. From a short description given of that purchased by Abbot William of St Albans, and stated to be in London, we gain some notion of the character of these mansions. It stood back from the street, and was entered by a court-yard; it was "like a palace for size," and, besides the usual apartments, had a chapel, a kitchen, stables, and "great apartments;" it was also provided with garden, orchard, and well. Nor were the citizens contented to dwell in mean and inferior houses, while the nobles and prelates occupied their tall stone mansions. The wealthy mercers of Westcheap, the enterprising drapers of Candelwyck, and the princely merchants of the Vintry, erected houses that vied in size and splendour with those of the neighbouring nobles, and exacted an unwilling tribute of admiration from the envious king and his rapacious kinsmen. Even the Jews—hated and persecuted, on all occasions, by the citizens, and so unmercifully mulcted by the king—obtained permission to construct a noble synagogue in the district assigned to them, the Old Jewry; and build houses that rivalled those of their haughty persecutors and oppressors.

These dwellings, but especially the churches, were richly decorated by the painter, as well by the carver, gilder, and enameller. Minutely "precepts" issued in the reign of Henry III., for the embellishment of churches, shrines, and royal chambers, which are still extant, shew the style of decoration to have been rich, whatever it might lack in refinement. One of the "precepts" affords decided evidence that oil-painting existed in this age, a subject often contested. At least, the King's treasurer is directed to pay "to Odo and Edward, 117s. 10d., for oil, varnish, and colours, bought by them;" not surely save for use. The beautiful art of painting on glass, was now coming into favour, both in the dwellings of the rich, and in ecclesiastical buildings. This, too, was the age of effigies, refined sculpture having been introduced by the Crusaders into northern and western Europe. It is said—

A peculiarly classical character, indeed, pervades the effigies of this period: the noble effigy of Elinor, with her lofty regal brow, and the full folds of her mantle, so gracefully gathered up beneath the girdle, and from thence flowing to her feet, might be placed in a collection of Grecian sculpture, nor excite surprise. The effigy of Isabella, too, though a woman of a far inferior style of beauty, is yet distinguished by much grace and elegance; and the drapery, which is very full and light, is chiselled with great freedom and delicacy. Nor is it only to the effigies at Fontevraud that we must turn; the effigy of Edith Astley, the graceful female figure in Bedale church; that of Edmund Crouchback, and that beautiful, though so greatly mutilated effigy of his first wife, Avilene de Foribus, both in Westminster, are proud monuments of the skill of the artist, at a rather later period. The classical character, just before alluded to, is singularly heightened, by the graceful female dress of this period. The robe, flowing in ample folds to the feet, the mantle, sometimes fastened by rich ornaments on the shoulders, and sometimes flung loosely across the figure, and the plainly-banded hair, just seen beneath the delicate wimple, give these effigies a close resemblance to the remains of classical antiquity; while the knight, in his sleeveless surcoat, open at the side, and its ample folds confined by the sword-belt, wears the very counterpart of the Grecian tunic.

During the middle period, and especially towards the close of this century, Gothic architecture continued to advance in grandeur and beauty; and, while it began to display a greater degree of ornament, the ornaments had not, as yet, encumbered the general design. In all their accessories, the Gothic architects seem to have been guided by the most delicate perception of beauty. No strange and startling combinations of bird and beast, of the human figure with animals or foliage, meet us in the pure Gothic; the human figure when introduced either gracefully and naturally occupies the niche, or fits to the —spandril of the keel alone, whiplod, crowned, or with flowing hair, forms the bracket of the arch. But in foliage, the taste of the Gothic architect absolutely revelled: every leaf—rose, thistle, strawberry, ivy—every one, from the simple trefoil to the elaborate acanthus, from the light and graceful convolvulus to the richest oak—find a place: and almost every flower, too—lilies, marigolds, delicately drooping bell-flowers, and rich clusters, which resemble the hydrangea, and roses of every kind, from the formal heraldic rose, to the simplest hedgerow, or the many-leaved rose of Provins—all, delicate and natural, as though by sudden magic, they had been frozen to marble, clasp the graceful shaft, adorn the moulding, or enrich the ponderous key-stone.

The close of this century was distinguished, too, by the erection of those numerous chapter-houses of unrivalled beauty; and by those additions to our cathedrals, which many judges have considered to be the most exquisite parts of the whole. This, too, was the era of the graceful market-cross, and of those unrivalled sepulchral crosses which, amid their mouldering desolation, still exhibit so much grace and beauty.

The authoress traces the progress and refinement of art, in humbler departments—in the finely-carved seals, in the beautifully illuminated manuscripts, and the works of the London goldsmiths, famed, before the Conquest, for the elegance and taste of the gold and silver crosses, figures, and altar plate which they wrought.

We take leave of this interesting and graceful fragment of early history, with respect for the taste, talents, and industry of the authoress, and cordial recommendation of her work, to those who, though appalled by the dry or repulsive facts of general history, delight in pictures of early manners, and in tracing the development of civilization, from the bursting germ to the unfolding of the bright consummate flower.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Mrs. Jameson's Memoirs of King Charles's Beauties, with their portraits, after Lely, Wissing, Kneller, &c.

There is a new issue of an elegant and expensive work, in Monthly Parts, equally elegant as the original edition, and at a much cheaper rate. Part I. contains portraits of Queen Catherine of Braganza, engraved for the first time, for this work, from the picture at Windsor. The termagant Castlemain—the most abandoned, impetuous, and prominent of the ladies of the Royal harem—forms the second portrait. She is habited as an Amazon. We look in vain for that dazzling beauty in Barbara Villiers, which enchanted honest Mr. Pepys nearly as much as the lustre of those rich-laced petticoats which “it did him good to look upon.” The “voluptuous vixen,” who is certainly the most impudent, as well as the most rapacious royal harlot upon record, was probably somewhat indebted for the brightening of her charms to court flatterers. If Dryden could compare her to Cato, why might not other courtiers magnify her into a Juno? It is not surprising that Fox, with the history of England before him, should call a Restoration “the worst of Revolutions.” This harpy was but one of its blessed consequences. “These were the times, Mrs. Rigmarele.” Lady Castlemain alone had £20,000 a-year out of the customs, and £5,300 a-year from the post-office revenue; besides all that she could squeeze out of Ireland, and pillage from her royal lover, in the shape of gifts and presents, in jewels, plate, houses, &c. The retributive moral of the tale of that “hell-upon-earth” life, which this woman—to whom a common trull is a respectable character—led the King, brings a sort of consolation. As soon as she knew her ground with Charles, she never attempted to carry any point by insinuation or cajolery. She raged, stormed, and burst into fits of uncontrollable fury—and was dreaded and obeyed, however unreasonable, capricious, or exorbitant her demands for money or power might be. “Wearied by the din of her vituperative tongue,” the King was glad to relieve his ears and eyes by congealing all that she desired. This “anonymous rammer!” favourite, as Burnet calls her, was as extravagant as rapacious; and, indeed, rapacity and extravagance are ever twin-sisters. She was accustomed to stake a thousand pounds on a game of cards, and, in one night, lost £25,000. As Burnet says, “the good humoured, sympathetic, polite” Charles, and of which gentle epistle Mrs. Jameson is pleased to apply to the King—had shamelessly and tyrannically forced this fury into his wife's household, by which she obtained apartments at Whitehall immediately above those of the King, her dominion over him became absolute. “In her chamber,” it is stated, “and among the profligate crew who surrounded her, was prepared the plot against Lord Chancellor Clarendon, which ended in the disgrace and banishment of that great nobleman.” When he returned to Whitehall after resigning the seals, she jumped out of bed in her night-clothes, to look down upon him as he passed, and stood in her balcony, abusing him loudly, and in the coarsest terms her vulgar malice could suggest. When she quarrelled with the great Duke of Ormond, who had offended her in many ways—but especially by resisting her enormous drains upon the Irish treasury—she reviled him, swore at him, and finally told him she “hoped to see him hanged.” To which the Duke replied, with the grave humour becoming his character, “that, far from wishing to see her Ladyship's days shortened in return, his greatest desire was to see her grow old.” Such is the kind of entertainment to be found in Mrs. Jameson's lively sketches, illustrating the series of engravings of King Charles's Beauties, the pride of Windsor Castle. Had the court lady, afterwards made Duchess of Cleveland, been a fish-woman in Billingsgate Market, or the concubine of a sailor at Wapping, instead of being the King's favourite mistress, she could not have escaped the ducking-stool. The advantages of monarchy would require to be signal to counterbalance such pretty accidents as this ode royal mistress.

La Belle Hamilton, afterwards Countess de Grammont, a malicious practical joker, who, with all her imputed elegance, we have always considered indebted to her husband for much of her wit and wisdom, looks here a handsome woman, of rather luxuriant proportions. But the Countess of Ossory, a charming portrait from a painting by Wissing, is the gem of this Part. In every higher attribute of beautiful womanhood. After the many ideal characters with whom one's eyes have been sated since last October, it is refreshing to turn to the homeliest of these ladies; real women, and looking real. We anticipate great success to this publication, and had less pleasure in the forthcoming numbers than the present, when we remember the long train of characters that remain—the buxom “Mistress Nelly,” “poor Nell!”—the lovely Jennings, and Hydes, and Charles Hills, and fifty others, who will live and flourish once more in true portraiture, and in the lively memoirs of Mrs. Jameson.

NEW NOVELS, ROMANCES, SKETCHES, &c. &c.

Books of entertainment have come forth in such abundance within the last six weeks, that we can only notice the flower of them, and that in the slightest way.

Jerrold's Men of Character

Is, however, something more than an ephemeral work of entertainment. It is a transcript from the ever fresh and open volume of daily life; teeming with instruction to the reflecting, and with knowledge and amusement to the most superficial. We are glad to meet these inimitable scattered sketches, collected into one portfolio; and not sorry that the familiarity of general readers, with their Hogarthian excellence, makes it unnecessary to say much about them. Who has forgotten Job Pippin's or Isaac Cheek's misadventures, the rotten egg of Barnaby Rime, or Mathew Clear's "Hooking?"

Misrepresentation; or, Scenes in Real Life,

Is a mere slice of the daily bread of the circulating libraries, and not very richly buttered. It purports to be one of a series of tales on the passions; but what passion is illustrated, we cannot guess, unless it be that of the heroines of novels, for tormenting themselves and all around them, by the old game of cross-purposes.

Royston Gower, or the Days of King John,

Is an historical romance, abounding in incident, and, if not in memorable characters, yet in dramatis personæ. It is the production of the writer known as the Basket Maker. The author's tasteful eye for soft landscape, and for forest scenery, and his love of ancient rustic sports and usages, imparts grace to his narrative. He has made himself acquainted with the manners of the age, which he undertakes to describe, and never outrages costume by those glaring anachronisms into which some historical romance-writers are apt to fall. With all this, "Royston Gower" is more to be commended for the fretting of the husk, than for the richness or raciness of the kernel. What matters it?—It is a pleasant, readable tale of the olden time, which will, in many particulars, beguile the hour as well as another; while Robin Hood, and his merry men, and Sherwood Forest, "time cannot stale;" and they are all flourishing here.

The River and the Desert, by Miss Pardoe,

Is not exactly a romance; but it is a book of amusement, and of the most gossamer texture. It is in the form of letters; and the perplexing title is simply translated into "Recollections of the Rhone and the Chartreuse." Next time Miss Pardoe writes, she should do herself and her readers the justice of having something to write about; and to take a little more pains with it.

PROGRESS OF PUBLICATION.

Modern Process of Preserving Alimentary Substances. By H. W. Brand.

The directions are brief and plain. They apply to every sort of fresh provisions, vegetables, and fruits.

Christian Sentiment of Flowers

Is a very small tract, containing a popular verse of poetry and a text of Scripture, applied to a great variety of common flowers.

A Second and Improved edition of Curtis on the Preservation of Health

Has been published, with improvements.

Gems from the British Poets,

Four small tomes, each forming a complete work, and the whole a very desirable addition to a juvenile collection. One tiny tome consists of sacred poetry; another of pieces from living authors. The selection is generally judicious, as the selector has wisely walked in the exact footsteps of the best of his precursors.

Southey's Poetical Works. Vol. V.

Gives us "Madoc" complete, and is a goodly volume in point of size. To us the charm of "Madoc" has ever been its sweet mother-English. It is the most purely Saxon of modern compositions, whether prose or verse.

Thoughts on Tactics and Military Organisation.

By Lieutenant-Colonel I. Mitchell, H. P. author of "The Life of Wallenstein."

Colonel Mitchell is a reformer of the economical and political departments of the military system, and also of the system of modern tactics, which he would supersede by one which he considers immeasurably better. The substance of his work has already appeared in The United Service Journal; and he now bespeaks the aid of these military men, qualified to judge, who encouraged the work in its progress, to assist in the completion of its grand object. Though that object is chiefly professional, the work is so managed as to interest general readers. It is often extremely lively, glancing brightly in all directions, as well as sensible and liberal. Yet the author is no exception to what may be made a general rule:—no old soldier without his prejudices. He has imbibed the prevalent contagious dread of the power of Russia, and has been carried a farther length by it than is common, even at this season of alarm. He is also an inordinate believer in the essential importance of colonies to national prosperity.

NEW POEMS.

Summer Months among the Mountains. By Andrew Mercer.*

This comprehensive title is given to a small volume of very miscellaneous character. It is, in fact, a collection of pieces, grave, gay, humorous, pathetic, descriptive, and complimentary, displaying more of the true spirit of poetry than we are accustomed to see in volumes of fugitive pieces,

"Nor wanting the accomplishment of verse."

The poems, indeed, partake more of the old school—more of the classical than the crude, though sometimes spirited, effusions with which the public have been made familiar of late. The locale of the poems is generally Ettrick Forest; and one of the finest of them bears the name, sacred to the Scottish Muse, of that resort—

"Whither the Scottish monarchs came,

By train of noble chiefs escorted,
In summer's prime to hunt the game
That here in pasturing crowds resorted.

Oh, grand the greenwood's rich display!
With hart and hind the glades abounded,
The eager stag-hounds loudly bay,
And bugles yell and horns neigh,
And arrows whizz, and fall the wounded.
Then deep carouse, when sport was o'er,
Held in the monarch's forest tower.

"The Forest rivers have been sung,

By many a bard in joy and sorrow;
'Tweedside' and 'Ettrick-banks' along,
And many a lay on lovely 'Yarrow.'
By Cadon's mountain stream, and Quair,
And Leithen braces, the Muse found matter
For love and song, then downwards where She warned the 'The Lads of Galla Water.'
And every brook, and vale, and grove,
Have list strains of poetic love.

"A chant here for that lovely scene—
The lakes of Lomax and lone St Mary;
Where, round the pyramids of green,
Soft summer winds their waters carry."

But we must turn from the tribute garland, woven of Forest Flowers, and from "Park, and Hagg, and Soest," who here find themselves in fellowship. Another Forest scene, Fairylee, is sweetly sung:—

"Though Yair be sweet by fair Tweedside,
And rich its scenery be;
Yet it blinks not in the morning sun,
Nor basks until the day be done,
Like sweeter Fairylee."

* Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black, pp. 200; price 4s.

"There, when life's curfew late hath tolled,
To sleep, how sweet 'twould be!
Beneath some long-loved elm or oak
That never felt the woodman's stroke,
The green sward covering as a cloak,
In the woods of Fairylee."

Some of the English songs are truly elegant, as that one beginning, "Why declare how much I love thee." So are the verses "To a Streamlet," and the "Wooing and Bridal of the Willow and the Brook." Though of humbler pretensions, this genuine Scottish lilt is not to be treated with indifference:—

"D'ye like, my lassie,
The fields, wild and free,
Where the song o' the herdman
Gars a' ring wi' glee?
Or the steep rocky glen,
Where the eagles abide?—
Then, on wi' the tartan,
And off wi' me ride.

"D'ye like the mountains,
Where the dun heather grows,
Where dwell the ptarmigans,
The wild goats, and roes?
Or the roar of the torrents
That rush down their side?—
Then, on wi' the tartan,
And off wi' me ride.

"D'ye like the woodlands,
Where grow the wild pines,
The birks, and the hazels,
And brambles—our vines?
Where the dun fallow-deer
In hundreds reside?—
Then, on wi' the tartan
And off wi' me ride.

"D'ye like the knowes, lassie,
That ever were green,
Unless wi' the blossoms
Of broom and of whin?
Or the sang of the liltie,
When wooing his bride?—
Then, on wi' the tartan,
And off wi' me ride.

"D'ye like the burn, lassie,
That loupes o'er the linnas?
Or the bonny green haughs,
Where it canny rine,
Wi' a cozy bit cottage
Sae snug by its side?—
Then, on wi' the tartan,
And off wi' me ride.

"Dye like the blue bonnet,
The plaid and the trows?
And a yellow-haired laddie
Wad ye like to choose?
Will ye gang to the Highlands,
And there be his bride?—
Then, on wi' the tartan,
And off wi' me ride."

We admire the philosophy of the "Contrast," where the balance of happiness is thus decided in favour of

Nancy, the hay-makier, and Against "Harriet in her Chariot."

"Which is happier—maid or lady?
On this the world will disagree;
But, for my part, I've decided—
Come, Nancy, I'll make hay with thee!"

Among the best of the humorous pieces, is "The Man of Interjections," of whom we are told, that—

"When Ultra-Tories talked of force,
To keep the mob in awe,
And threatened troops of foot and horse,
He gruffly muttered—Bah!

"When braggarts boasted of great powers,
He gave his friend a nudge,
Or, wicked, misbelieving winked,
And silyly whispered—Fudge!

"In physic, law, divinity,
There's quackery enough;
Whenever such was heard or read,
He peevishly cried—Stuff!

"But sterling sense, or genuine wit,
Or humour's merriest mood,
Well pleased he heard, and smiling he Ejaculated—Good!

"Or, if some noble sentiment
Demanded a display
Of approbation, then, indeed,
Rightly hearty his—Hurrah!"

We must give the moral, for the benefit of M.P.'s, and all speechifiers whatsoever; speechifying being the crying and prominent vice of the age:—

"If in and out of Parliament,
More silent would remain,
We should not be so often bored:
For this we pray—Amen!"

Is that not likely, courteous reader, to be a clever book which contains things like this? Buy it, therefore. It would not be easy to point out how you could spend four shillings more judiciously and agreeably.

The Cry of the Poor.

We have here a rhymed argument for the poor, by a man of amiable feelings, who is no despicable versifier. He is a Tory, moreover, and dislikes the French and the new Poor-Law, and admires the wisdom of our ancestors, and the manners and habits of that golden age of English cottage life, which, if it ever really existed, save in the poet's lays, contrasts painfully with the poverty, hurry, squalor, and uneasy restlessness of this transition period.

Sabbath, Honor Neale, and other Poems. By Richard Chenevix Trench,

Is a new volume of verse by one, who may be better known as the author of "Justin Martyr" than by his proper name. The volume contains no fiery revelation of the spirit of poetry; but, nevertheless, many copies of pleasing verses, of the purest and kindest tendency.

COMMUNICATION FROM MR. HUME ON THE CAUSES OF CANADIAN DISCONTENTS.

TO THE REFORMERS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Bryanston Square, 12th March 1838.

GENTLEMEN,—Being of opinion that every violation of the constitutional liberties of any portion of her Majesty's subjects, is an insult and injury to the whole, I think it of importance that the causes which led to the general discontent, for years past, in the province of Lower Canada, and the circumstances which occasioned the late lamentable civil war in a small portion of that colony, should be clearly understood by every British subject. I therefore request your careful perusal of the following narrative, lately sent from Vermont, one of the States of America adjoining to Lower Canada, which gives a more faithful and concise detail of the proceedings in that province than any account I have yet seen. The long-continued system of misrule appears to me sufficiently to account for what has taken place.—I remain your obedient Servant, Verona, 15th December 1837.

The popular outbreak which has recently and unexpectedly occurred in the neighbouring Province of Lower Canada, has, it cannot be denied, excited much interest in the northern and eastern sections of the Union. The papers from all quarters comment, more or less, on the subject. This, if there were no other proof, is sufficient to show the direction in which the public feeling is setting.

It is probable, however, that most of the citizens of the United States are yet in a great degree ignorant of the precise nature of the movement in the north; of the causes which have led to the temporary triumph of one of the parties, and to the temporary defeat of the other. But, above all, few of them are acquainted with the chain of circumstances which hurried long-lived and deep-rooted discontent into sudden resistance to the constituted executive authority of the colony. The following details will, it is hoped, enable the public to form, without going very far back into history, a distinct and clear idea of the rise and nature of the Canada difficulties.

The executive authority in that colony is perfectly irresponsible to the people of Canada. No matter how grave the malversation or misconduct of the persons exercising it—no matter how unfit they may be for the station—they can neither be removed from office, punished, or controlled by the people, whose affairs they mal-administer, whose property or resources they waste, or whose liberties or rights they may invade or destroy. A consequence of this state of perfect freedom from control has been, that the members composing that executive have divided among themselves, their families, and dependents, more than a million of acres of the public lands. They have permitted the treasurer of the Province to speculate and convert to his own use, with impunity, 600,000 dollars (£120,000) of the public money belonging to the colonists; and they still share among themselves enormous emoluments, large fees established without the authority of law, have obtained most valuable portions of the public domain for little or nothing, and combine, many of them, in their own persons, executive, legislative, and judicial functions. That is, the same individuals sit in one chamber as makers of the law; in another, as judges of the law; and in a third, as executors of the law. We need not tell our enlightened citizens, that every constitution of the Union wisely declares the exercise of these duties by the same persons to be incompatible.

In the next place, the second branch of the Provincial Legislature, which is called the Legislative Council, and which is equivalent to the Senate of this State, [or House of Lords in England,] is composed of persons appointed for life to that office by the authorities in Britain. The persons thus appointed are, nearly without an exception, the creatures of the government—some of them immoral men, and all of them totally independent and beyond the control of the people for whom they make laws. Let them behave ever so badly, they cannot be removed from office.

The great majority of the men holding seats in this branch of the legislature, are dependent on, or connected with, the government in one way or another. Some of them hold offices of profit, of from 2000 to 10,000 dollars a-year. Others among them have their children or connections in office; and many have had large grants of lands, or leases of public property, for which they pay but a nominal sum; the continuance or renewal of which leases depend altogether on the good-will of the government. The independent members did not, until lately, amount to more than half-a-dozen in a body of more than thirty members.

It is evident, from such a composition, that it is directly the interest of these men to support a system in which the salaries are high, the patronage extensive; to oppose small salaries, the economical administration of affairs, and the control of the public purse by the representatives of the people.

From these feelings, they have ever steadily opposed the just demand of the House of Assembly to control the public purse; and, in every possible way, embarrassed that body in the exercise of its just privileges of voting the salaries of the public officers. It is unnecessary to enumerate here all the measures which have been passed by the people's representatives, and destroyed in this Council. In fourteen years, they amount to more than two hundred bills, of the nature of which the following may give an idea.

They rejected the bill continuing common schools in the Province; and thus, at one blow, laid in ruins 1500 schools, and deprived 40,000 children of the means of acquiring the elements of education. There is not a public common school now in Lower Canada.

They have constantly rejected the bill to allow the people, in the country parts of the Province, to elect parish or town officers to regulate their local affairs; and have destroyed the corporations of Montreal and Quebec, by refusing to pass the bills continuing them.

In Lower Canada, there is no law for the impartial drawing of juries. The sheriff, who holds an office worth many thousand dollars a-year, during the pleasure of the Governor, has the power to put whomsoever he pleases in the jury box. In common language, he can "pack" the jury. Whenever the government prosecutes a person for political offences, it follows that the prisoner is sure of being found guilty; for the sheriff dares not displease the authority upon which his large emoluments depend. To rectify this vital grievance, the House of Assembly has passed a bill to regulate the drawing of jurors. The Legislative Council, the creatures of the government, destroyed the bill, so that it could not become a law.

They have arrested all public improvements. The Assembly voted over 100,000 dollars, in 1838, to finish a canal between St John's and Chambly, thereby to render uninterrupted the water communication from New York to Quebec; and also passed a bill to complete the docks and wharfs of Montreal. Both these bills were destroyed by the Legislative Council.

This list could be extended to ten times its length; but, as it is meant only to convey an idea of what the country has suffered from the irresponsible constitution of the Council, these few will suffice. As a remedy, it is demanded that the Members of that Council be elected to office, for a limited time, by the people, precisely as the senators of this state are elected. By that means, if they continued to prevent education and public improvement, or to refuse their consent to laws for the security of the people's liberties, other and better men might be chosen in their stead. This prayer has been refused by the Colonial Minister, and by the Imperial Parliament.

The next demand of the people of Lower Canada is that their representatives should have the control of all the public revenues raised within the Province. Some persons are under the impression that Great Britain pays all the expenses of the colony. This is an error. Lower Canada pays all the expenses of her own government, and has, at the same time, a surplus sufficient to defray the expenses of common schools and public improvements. Great Britain contributes not a cent to the civil expenditure, though she supports the military establishments at a great expense.

Having thus to pay all the civil expenses, it is natural that the Assembly should insist on the exercise of its constitutional right of controlling all the revenue. The government, which is not willing to have the means of rewarding its favourites curtailed—the office-holders, who like high salaries—have always opposed these rights of the representative branch of the Legislature. The Governor has, consequently, year after year, expended large sums of the people's money, without the consent and against the will of their representatives; and although the government promised, so far back as 1793, to surrender all the revenues to the control of these representatives, it has never performed its promise. In spite of all that the Assembly can do, the flood-gates of corruption and extravagance continue unobscured; and, to destroy all opposition, the Governor has at last accused the leading members of the Assembly, who have supported the people's rights, of high treason: he has, moreover, outlawed them, and set a price on their heads. When the waters wish to devour the sheep, they first wholy set about destroying the watch dogs.

A few more samples of Canadian grievance, and we have done with that part of the subject.

When the provinces belonged to France, large tracts of valuable land were given in trust to the order of Jesuits, for the purposes of public education. This property has been most shamefully wasted. Thousands, and hundreds of thousands of dollars, of the proceeds, have been squandered among officials and favourite churches—thousands of acres of the estates have been alienated for a mere nominal sum; and the college, founded by the Jesuits in Quebec, where, in the last century, youth acquired a knowledge of science and the higher branches of learning, has been positively converted into, and continues to be used as, a barack for soldiers by the British government! Does not this one fact suffice to shew the nature of British rule in Canada?

Again, nothing can give an idea of the difficulty which the people labour under of acquiring land to settle on. The militia of the Province were promised lots in return for their services during the last war. They fought and bled. Peace came. Their services and wounds were forgotten; and government has, by systematic quibbling, ever since evaded the performance of the promise it gave in a moment of danger and fear. It has, on the contrary, in order to raise a revenue independent of law, and beyond the control of the Legislature, sold nearly a million of acres of the public lands, to a company of speculators in London, at about twenty-five cents [twelve or thirteen pence] the acre; for which land this company, in return, demand and receive from a dollar and a-half to three dollars the acre, from emigrants and settlers. This land company has been chartered, and these lands sold, against the repeated protests of the local Assembly.

As a remedy for their grievances, of which the above is necessarily but a brief and faint outline, the people of Lower Canada demand:—

1st, That the Provincial Executive Council should be responsible to the people, through their representatives.

2nd, That the members of the Legislative Council should be elected by the people, on the same principle as the senators of the State of New York.

3d, That the representatives of the people should have the control of all the monies received in the public treasury, from public taxes and all other sources whatever, in the province, and that not a cent should leave that treasury without the authority of law.

4th, That no official incumbent should hold more than one place, and that the public salaries should be reduced. Many office-holders now hold three or four offices each, and the salaries are enormously high: the Governor, for example, receiving 20,000 dollars a-year, a sheriff 10,000 dollars, and judges from 4,000 to 9,000 dollars.

5th, They next demand, that various laws passed by the Parliament of Great Britain, wherein they are not represented, and affecting the internal affairs of the province, be repealed, and that the department of the public lands be regulated by provincial law; so that any man, whatever be his origin, language, or religion, who wishes to settle in the country, may have the means, at a very trifling expense of so doing, without favour or partiality for any class of settlers.

The House of Assembly, finally, have resolved not to vote any supplies to the government, until their various grievances be redressed; and, in accordance with this resolution, have steadily refused, for the four past years, to grant any supplies, but with conditions annexed: the Legislative Council have rejected those Bills of supply, whose conditions were annexed.

The British Government, in reply to these demands, reiterated for years, at length sent out a royal commission to inquire into their truth. This commission made its report in 1836. It is a singular fact, that all the evidence collected was from the office-holders and their political friends. Strange to say, the justice of all the complaints of the people is, notwithstanding, admitted. Stranger still, the commissioners recommended the government to refuse all the reforms demanded by them.

In conformity with these anomalous and unjustifiable recommendations, Lord John Russell, the British minister, introduced into the British Parliament, last March, a series of resolutions, rejecting all the prayers of the Canadian Reformers. Not content with this injustice, he went one step further. Following the bad and unconstitutional examples set him by the Grenvilles, the Norths, and the other enemies of American rights, and forgetful of the sound constitutional principle, that nobody has the right to dispose of a people's money except their own freely-chosen representatives, the minister submitted his eighth resolution,* authorizing the British House of Commons to dispose of—"to give, and grant"—the money belonging to the people of Canada.

It is superfluous here to point out the blow aimed in this resolve against the very vitality of all constitutional freedom. It is the same unwarrantable pretension that the people of these States successively opposed, in the shape of a stamp act and a tea tax, and which is so familiar to every schoolboy throughout this Union.

These resolutions were, after strong opposition on the part of the friends of American rights, passed by the British Parliament by overwhelming majorities. In the House of Lords, only one man was found to record his vote against them—that man was HENRY LORD BROUGHAM.

Though passed in England, they were not, to her honour be it spoken, submitted to in Canada. Her representatives persisted in refusing supplies, and demanded that the eighth resolution be expunged from the journals of Parliament. Taking a leaf from the history of the American Revolution, the people met in their several counties, and at once resolved not to consume any articles imported from Great Britain—to encourage domestic manufactures, and to trade almost exclusively with these States.

Conformably to these resolutions, wine and other luxuries forthwith disappeared from the tables of the people. The members of the Assembly, and the inhabitants, women as well as men, clothed themselves in cloth of domestic manufacture, and no tea or coffee was drunk, except such as was introduced from this country without paying duty.

A warfare such as this, the government well knew would be fatal to its power; for, the revenue proceeding in a great part from duties on imports, the non-consumption policy resorted to by the mass of the inhabitants, would most extensively affect the treasury.

To put a stop, then, to the spirit of incipient resistance, the Governor, Lord Gosford, issued a proclamation, denouncing as "seditious" the meetings above mentioned. This proclamation fell still-born from the press. It was derided and treated with every possible contempt; and the meetings continued. Finding proclamations of no avail against the Democrats of Canada, Lord Gosford next had recourse to acts of terror. He called magistrates and militia officers who attended the "anti-coercion" meetings, (as they were called,) to an account for so doing. These officers, with a spirit becoming free men, at once repelled this incipient attempt to coerce them in the expression of their opinions at public meetings, or in the exercise of their inherent rights. The Governor proceeded, thereupon, to dismiss them from office. These dismissals excited so much indignation throughout the country, that gentlemen who held commissions in the militia and in the magistracy came forward, in great numbers, in several counties, and voluntarily threw up the "royal" commissions, as officers of militia, and magistrates, which they held, and accompanied their resignation by letters couched in the most manly and independent terms. Whole counties by this means were left without a magistrate or a militia officer.

* The eighth resolution, carried, on the 21th April 1837, in the House of Commons—116 for 53 against—viz., That, for defraying the arrears due on account of the established and customary charges of the administration of justice, and of the civil government of the said province, it is expedient that, after applying for that purpose such balance as shall, on the said 10th day of April 1837, be in the hands of the Receiver-General of the said Province, arising from his Majesty's hereditary, territorial, and casual revenue, the Governor of the said province be empowered to issue sums and out of any other part of his Majesty's revenues in the hands of the Receiver-General of the said Province, such further sums as shall be necessary to effect the payment of the before-mentioned sum of £148,360 s 16 d.

To prevent society from falling into a state of disorganization, the Reformers next commenced laying the foundation of an elective system of local government. On the 23d October last, delegates from the six counties bordering on the River Richelieu,* assembled at St Charles, and passed a series of resolutions, recommending the people to meet in the present month of December, in their several parishes, and to elect their own magistrates and militia officers. An address was also voted by this meeting to the people of Canada, containing a declaration of principles, thoroughly democratic—recapitulating the grievances under which the Province laboured—protesting against the introduction of an armed soldiery, [troops had been ordered from Nova Scotia, &c.,] in times of profound peace, for the physical coercion and destruction of the people of the Province, who were determined not to submit to the arbitrary measures of ministers; and, finally, recommending to their brother patriots to organize in their several localities, so as to be prepared for whatever it might please the providence of God to bring about. This address expressed, at the same time, a confident hope that the people of these States would never permit the principles for which the fathers of American freedom struggled in 1776, to be crushed in Canada in 1837.

This great meeting, and this bold address, were the signal for the British Government in Lower Canada to develop its long-planned conspiracy against the liberties of the colonists—to hurry the people into resistance, in imitation of the well-known inhuman policy pursued by Lord Castlereagh towards Ireland in 1793, in order that it may the more easily crush all opposition, and “Polandise” the Province.

The 6th of last month was the day on which the first part of this plot was unfolded. On that day, a young men’s association, called “The Sons of Liberty,” held their usual regular monthly meeting in Montreal. The government, or Tory party, stated, at an early hour, their intention to assault these young men. The latter, not yet aware that it was a crime to meet publicly and peaceably, to express their opinions on the interests of their native or adopted country, treated the threats of the Tories with no attention, and held their meeting, at which they passed a series of resolutions. During this meeting, stones were thrown at the young men; yet this passed unresented. On their way home from the meeting, they were, however, assaulted—the assault was repelled—their opponents retreated; and the magistrates, most of whom are violent partisans of the official or Tory party, called out the troops; and they paraded the streets, accompanied by several pieces of cannon.

“The loyal” assailants of the “Sons of Liberty,” now safe under the protection of British bayonets and artillery, were not slow in committing excesses. The most prominent of these was the breaking of Mr Speaker Papineau’s windows; after which they broke into the office of the Vindicator newspaper, a reform journal, which, with the knowledge and within the sight or hearing of the magistrates, they utterly destroyed. Since that day, they have had undisturbed possession of the city of Montreal, and every public newspaper has been suppressed.

Not to be behind these furious men in zeal, the Government next proceeded to act his part in this lawless drama.

His first step was to remove all the liberal magistrates from the commission of the peace in the district of Montreal. He was well aware that, so long as a Reformer remained as a magistrate, the victims whom he intended to sacrifice might have some person to sympathize with them, or give them advice. He deprived them of this hope, by removing, in one day, between sixty and seventy magistrates, who happened to be Liberals, or were suspected of Liberallism, from the commission of the peace. Then the reign of terror commenced in good earnest. Warrants were issued in torrents against every man who had dared to take a prominent part in the recent meetings. The president and divers officers of the “Sons of Liberty” were arrested on a charge of high treason, for merely having signed an address to their brethren in the other colonies. Warrants were next issued against the officers of the meeting of the six counties, and against the Members of the House of Assembly who had attended that meeting, as they were bound to do, by the obligation they had entered into with their constituents; and the district jail was at once crammed with the victims of arbitrary government. “Liberty of speech, liberty of meeting, and the liberty of the press, were thus annihilated in the British Province, on our immediate borders, in the short period of twenty-four hours.”

The people of the country parts of the district of Montreal, on learning that warrants for high treason were issued against their most patriotic public men, and aware that, if the latter were once imprisoned, the chances were ten to one that their lives would be sacrificed, at once determined to oppose the execution of those warrants.

To those acquainted with the state of things in Canada, this determination does not seem strange. It rather does honour to the hearts of the Canadian farmers. The men doomed to incarceration, if not death, by the government, live among the people, are in daily intercourse with them, and have become connected with them by various ties. They are among the most intelligent, liberal, and able men of the Province, and of high moral and personal standing. The jail to which these patriots were to be conveyed, is not situated in the counties in which they reside. There are, indeed, but three jails in the Lower Province—viz., at Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers. Prisoners are removed, in many instances, fifty, sixty, and ninety miles from their homes, friends, and neighbours, and immured in damp cells, in solitary confinement, on bread and water. Add to this, the serious consideration, that they will receive only the mockery of a trial; for, in the absence of all law providing for the impartial drawing of juries, dependent sheriffs pick such juries as they expect will return verdicts to please the government. Thus, the political prisoner has no barrier between him and the vengeance of arbitrary power; and, convinced of this, the country people determined to protect their representatives and public men.

The first time on which this feeling was called forth, was in the early part of last month, when Dr Davignon and Mr Demaray were arrested on a charge of high treason, at St John’s. Instead of conveying these prisoners quietly to Montreal, direct by the railroad, the cavalry that captured them resolved on striking terror through the country, by conducting them round by Chambly and Longueuil, a distance of thirty-six miles, with iron fetters on their hands and feet, and ropes around their necks. The people in the neighbourhood of Longueuil had a short notice of this arrest, assembled in a moment to the number of between thirty and forty men, and rescued the prisoners. The government seized on this petty, unexpected resistance by a few, as a pretext for levying war on the mass of the Canadian people inhabiting the district of Montreal. Immediately, a force of 800 men, with four pieces of cannon and a howitzer, was despatched from Montreal—one-half to attack St Denis, the remainder to storm St Charles, where several of the leading reformers from Montreal had retired, when they could no longer remain at their homes.

So little expectation was there that such an armed force would be sent into the country on the grave expe-

* “To-day, two young French lawyers (C. S. Cherrier and Mr Peltier) were arrested, charged with treason, and committed to jail. I saw them marched from the court-house by one of the volunteer corps of this city—many of whom were American-born citizens. May the free soil of our beloved country never again be polluted by their unhallowed footsteps! There is not a man in this city who dares to declare himself a patriot—the liberty of the press is destroyed; and, to speak in favour of their cause, will consign the body to chains and dungeons. To see these young Frenchmen, the descendants of the original proprietors of this city, driven to prison by a horde of hireling Britons, aided and abetted by a clan of mercenary American Tories, was too much for my feelings, and I am not ashamed to confess that the revolting spectacle was almost hid from my vision by the blinding tears of sympathy.”—Letter from an American citizen, temporarily in Montreal, dated Dec. 1.

dition of arresting half a dozen of civilians, whose only offence was, that they had attended the St Charles meeting, at which they had taken an active part, that met the least preparation had been made to oppose such a body. There were no more than thirty men in St Denis previous to the arrival of the troops, and these were collected rather to prevent the sudden seizure of Dr Neilson by a posse of constables, than with any anticipation of contending against a regular armed force. The same may be said of St Charles. When, however, it was known the troops were coming, the tocan was sounded—a crowd of about 300 men, armed, some with fowling-guns and others with pitch-forks, assembled at St Denis, and, after an engagement of five hours and a half, repulsed the soldiers, with a loss of fifty men and one piece of cannon. At St Charles, the only triumph the troops obtained, was the empty one of setting fire to a range of out-houses, in which were stored a quantity of hay and grain, and from out of which the patriots, about 300 in number, had kept up a galling fire, and of compelling the patriots to withdraw, with a loss of some thirty men, killed and wounded.* They afterwards burned the house of one of the vice-presidents of the St Charles meeting, not being able to find its owner, against whom they had a warrant; and made prisoner of "a liberty tree," planted some weeks before by the people, in honour of "PAPINEAU;" the erection of which, the Governor in council had solemnly, though not very legally, considered to be an overt act of "treason."

After a week's campaign, the troops were obliged to return to Montreal, having lost, in the collision with the peasantry, nearly 100 men, without arresting a single individual of those, to seize whom they had been dispatched.

Two steamers, with four companies of soldiers, sundry pieces of artillery, a troop of horse, and a supply of rockets, were next despatched on a second expedition to St Denis, St Charles, and St Hyacinth, (the last-named village being 18 miles in the rear of the other two), to bring in "the rebel chiefs." Not succeeding in the object of their expedition, and meeting with no opposition, the gallant band amused themselves with firing the houses of defenceless women, helpless men, and absent individuals. Their course through the country may be traced by havoc and devastation similar to that resorted to by the British troops in these States during the Revolutionary War of 1775.

An impression prevails in this part of the Union, that the late movement in Lower Canada was the commencement of a system of revolutionary resistance to the government, regularly organized by the leaders of the Canadian people. This, it will be seen from what has preceded, is an error. The resistance to the troops was simply and purely the spontaneous impulse of the farmers, who were determined to prove their gratitude and attachment to a few of their public men, who happened to be in danger. If Dr Neilson and Mr Brown led the people on these occasions, it was rather from the immediate and uncontrollable necessity of the moment, than from any pre-arranged plan of general resistance. Under these circumstances, it should not appear strange that advantage had been gained by regularly equipped and organized troops. The wonder should rather be that the people had gained the day even at St Denis.

The nature of the recent commotion in Lower Canada is now before the public. It is evident, from the details, that the movement was without the participation, and beyond the control of the leading men of the country, who must be held guiltless of the charge of imprudence, to which subsequent events may seem to expose them; but of which, now that the real merits of the case are explained, they cannot be accused. The truth is, the British Government in Canada, and not the people, has been the aggressor. The latter pursued, all along, a strictly constitutional course. They met in their parishes, counties, and districts, where their proceedings were confined to the passing of resolutions, making speeches, and publishing addresses. By these peaceable and strictly legal measures, the people were becoming thoroughly educated; and the foundations were being deeply laid for the establishment of a purely democratic system of government. The British authorities foresaw this, and resolved, per fas et nefas, to goad the people into resistance, in order that they might have a pretext before the world for extinguishing all constitutional government in Canada.† With this view, they began by at once destroying the liberal newspapers in the Province, and offering large rewards for the arrest of the editors and printers thereof.† Next, warrants were issued against the most influential members of the House of Assembly, who had hitherto consistently opposed the pretensions of Downing Street; and they were charged with high treason, in order that all opposition on their part, in the legislature, might be most effectually removed. Whilst the people were still fancying that the law would be respected, large masses of armed troops were sent into the interior of the country, to court collision, which would furnish an excuse for further coercion and violence on the part of the government. That collision has occurred; and the government, ever ready to curtail the rights of the people, has followed up the conspiracy on which it entered, by offering a price for the heads of the leading reformers, and declaring martial law.

Thus, all law—all constitutional right—all civil liberty—is extinguished in Canada; the words of the American Declaration of Independence are verified:—"The free system of English law is abolished in a neighbouring province, and an arbitrary government established therein, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into other colonies." It is not difficult to foretell the result of this deep-laid scheme against popular liberty, if the measures of the British authorities succeed. The limited privilege, hitherto possessed by the people, of electing representatives, will be either entirely destroyed, or so modified as to render the Assembly what the Legislative Council now is—the creature of the colonial minister, for the oppression, not for the protection or defence, of the colony; and the continent of North America will, in the nineteenth century, furnish Europe with the singular phenomenon of possessing, in the vicinity of each other, at one and the same time, the freest and most despotic systems of government.

* The only offence committed by the people, or their leading friends, was that of peaceably assembling, setting forth their grievances, passing and publishing resolutions, addresses, &c. It is a fact, that the government found great difficulty in designating any acts that could be considered treasonable, and that the Council at last resorted to the pretext of the erection of a liberty pole, surmounted by a liberty cap, by a few of the more ardent young men, at the meeting of the six counties, as "the overt act" for which warrants were issued for high treason against some of the most intelligent, esteemed, and able men of the Province, and under which they were hunted down like wild beasts, by the myriads of power, with a price set upon their heads.

† There is not one liberal newspaper now in Lower Canada. There were four in the beginning of last month.

* The account which Colonel Wetherall, known here as the "hero of St Charles," gives of the affair at that place, surpasses (if he is to be credited) even the barbarities of the Mexicans. He says that the patriots fought without a leader and without bayonets; that the regulars charged and murdered, with bayonets and the butts of their muskets, ninety-six French Canadians, most of them young men, and many of whom had laid down their arms and begged for quarter! and that at last the British officers were obliged to interfere and prevent a blood-thirsty hireling soldiery from massacring all who had surrendered.—Letter from an American citizen, temporarily in Montreal, November 30.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE proceedings in Parliament now create so little interest, that, of late, we have not thought it worth while to notice them at any length. It is seen, on all hands, that the Reform Act is worn out, and that it is in vain to expect any further good measures from it. The People have been miserably deluded, and can hardly reflect, without shame and sorrow, that all the efforts they made in 1831 and 1832, to the sacrifice of their comforts and their interests, and at the manifest risk of bloodshed and civil war, should have ended in pushing one set of the aristocracy from their stools, to replace them by another, supported in office merely by their former opponents, who do not yet find it convenient to assume the reins of Government, and acting on the very principles which caused the Reform Act to be so eagerly demanded. Although we are only in the month of March, it is generally agreed that little more than routine business is to occupy the remainder of the session; the Lords are no longer to be "bombarded with good measures," and the quiet of the Conservatives is not to be disturbed. In short, the great parties in the State have declared an armistice, which, we doubt not, should there be any pressure from without, will soon end in a peace and a treaty, offensive and defensive, against all enemies. The representatives of the People—(we ought rather to say, the Members of Parliament—for not a score of them, at such a period as the present—a new reign, and the commencement of a seven years' Parliament—represent anybody but themselves)—already forgetting the promises and pledges they made a few months ago, during their canvass and on the hustings, boldly defy their constituents. They know that the electors have not the power they ought to have—that of dismissing, as well as electing a representative; and that to the call for a resignation of their seats, they can oppose against compliance, the authority of a Russell and a Peel, and the practice of an Andrew Johnston. But let them take warning by his fate. He had not the courage even to present himself at last election to any constituency in the three kingdoms. His refusal to fulfil his pledge closed his political career.

The personal squabbles of the month, however important they must, undoubtedly, at the time, have appeared, to those engaged in them, as unworthy of recording. According to the description of an eye-witness, there have been scenes in the House of Commons "which defy description, in ordinary limits of language; nothing more disgraceful ever occurred in the gallery of a suburban theatre." We merely allude to these scenes for the purpose of noting, that, while 517 Members assembled to take part in the ridiculous question about censuring O'Connell for stating what every one knows to be the truth, only 395 thought proper to attend the debate on Mr Villiers' motion for the repeal of the Corn Laws, on the 18th of March; yet this is by far the most important motion, in as far as the People are concerned, which has occurred during the session. Mr Villiers' speech was one of considerable ability, though we have found nothing new, either in the facts or the reasoning. He estimates the loss incurred by the Corn-Laws, supposing the price to be enhanced 12s. per quarter, at £15,600,000; but it is a very rough way of going to work—to compare merely the price of grain in Britain and on the Continent. The great mischief of the Corn-Laws is, that they prevent industry, they create idleness and misery, they render the existence of heavy poor's-rates, and the degradation of pauperism necessary evils. A cutler at Sheffield, a cotton-spinner at Glasgow, is out of work, or suffering under a reduction of wages. Do you ask him why? His answer is ready; the market is overstocked with the commodities of his particular species of labour. He is lectured about glut, and the evils of over production, and goes home—to starve. But what is the truth? There is a glut, an over production, simply because foreign nations are opposing restriction to restriction, and are not only supplying themselves with commodities with which we used to supply them, but are competing with us in countries, of the markets of which we had till lately the uncontrolled possession. But the evil will cure itself. A little more starvation will bring the working classes to comprehend the operation of the Corn-Laws; and who can say but that, in the rough operation under which the Corn-Laws will sink, many other excrescences of our never-sufficiently-to-be-admired constitution will at the same time go by the board? The aristocracy should take warning from the increasing resistance to the Poor-Laws. They have no right whatever, in justice or morality, to enforce these laws till the Corn-Laws be repealed. It is nothing but tyranny to reduce a man to idleness, and then punish him because he cannot support himself. Sir William Molesworth, in seconding the motion, took a profound and philosophical view of the question. He shewed that the vulgar notion, that a repeal of the Corn-Laws must necessarily create a great reduction of rents—the grand bugbear with our legislators—had no foundation to rest on; and he proved that the landlords injured not only all other classes of the community, but themselves likewise, through their ignorance of the effects of the Corn-Laws. Yet it was to this very class that Lord John Russell desired to give preponderance by the Reform Act; on which preponderance he had ventured to assert, that the stability of the institutions of the country depended. Sir W. pointed to the Corn-Laws in refutation of such doctrine, and contended that the stability of this country depended upon the wealth, power, and happiness of the community. He might, however, as well have spoken to the walls; and, in truth, the honourable representatives took care to keep up an incessant noise and confusion in the House, while the advocates of the Repeal were speaking. After a lengthened discussion, the motion was negatived by 300 to 95. So much for the Reformed Parliament! The Members of all the large towns in England voted in the minority, as well as those for Glasgow, Paisley, Aberdeen, and Dundee; but the member for Edinburgh (and we have only one) was an exception—Sir John Campbell having, we presume, on this as on the question of the Ballot and some others, not made up his mind. Would it not be advisable at next election to give him two or three years' leave of absence from Parliament, to enable him to study politics and political economy, of which two sciences it is no disparagement to him to say, considering his eminence in the law, he is miserably ignorant! As might have been anticipated in such a House, Colonel Sibthorpe's motion for a reduction of the tax on Fire Insurances, had little chance of success. Although the Reformed Parliament has relieved the "landed interest" of the whols of this tax in as far as their property is concerned, has reduced the poor-rates four millions, has imposed one half of the county-rates on the consolidated fund, and has granted them much relief by the Tithe Commutation Act, (which even exempts the advertisements made in pursuance of the act from the paltry duty levied from every one else)—the reduction of Fire Insurance duty to one-half, in as far as regards property not connected with land, was negatived by 95 to 20. Another instance occurred in the same week of the character of the House, on the motion of Mr Hume, regarding a recent appointment given to the Hon. Mr Bouverie Primrose, second son of the Earl of Rosebery, and nephew of the Earl of Lichfield, the Post-master General. This fortunate youth, who was never employed in the Post-Office, or anywhere else in his life, has been appointed Cashier and Receiver-General of the Post-Office in Scotland. It is as gross a job as was ever perpetrated by the Tories in the worst of times; yet only 9 Liberals and 20 Tories voted against the job, and 202 in its favour.

These are specimens of the proceedings in a Reformed House of Commons!

IRISH REAPERS.

BY THE O'HARA FAMILY.

IN a careful and luminous speech on the question of the Irish Poor-Law, a leading Cabinet Minister lately pronounced a high eulogium upon the peasant Irish who go over to England to cut the harvest. He praised their industry in getting, and their prudence in not spending, in a strange country, the products of the labour which they quitted their own to seek an opportunity of honestly exercising. And the statesman necessarily added to this, or superinduced around it, an admission of much good conduct on the part of the poor people during their sojourn in England;—and with obvious reason; for how, indeed, could the other merits he had enumerated have been accounted for, without supposing an attendant, a guardian sense of moral propriety, and a knowledge of social duties and actions? Humble we—the thrice-Irish O'Haras—were delighted to read those statements, not simply because they pane-gyricized Irish people like ourselves, but also because they did us the honour of going hand in hand with our own observations of the class of persons in question, during many years' residence in the noble Lord's country. In Kent, in Sussex, and in other agricultural English counties, we have indeed seen the Irish labourer, come over to reap his neighbour's crop, earn and anticipate this excellent character now given him upon such high authority. In small towns, in very small villages, and in farm-houses, we have heard him admired and respected for his conduct and his prudence, to say nothing of his almost unrivalled prowess in task-work in the fields. It would be easy for us to mention the names of Sussex farmers in particular, who spoke nearly in terms of attachment of their Irish visitants. We remember one who told us that the same man, with his family, had been coming to his father and him, during harvest-time, every year for twenty years previously. But how with his family? First, the poor fellow appeared, leading a sickly mother in his train, and supporting her out of the fruits of his labour; and this went on for many years—till, while absent in Ireland one severe winter, the mother died. Next year, he presented himself anew with a young wife; next year, with the same accompaniment, and the adjunct of a toddling infant; the next, with the wife still, and that archin, now able to trudge steadily along, and a second, as if to keep up his elder brother's former place, mounted upon the father's shoulders. In due course of time, the wife stopped at home, to take care of her now flourishing establishment in her own "green isle"—(made so by her husband's consistent industry in England)—but still and still the original emigrant returned, leading by the hand, or bearing in his arms or on his back, one or other of his children; and the very day upon which the worthy Sussex farmer spoke to us, he took us out into one of his fields, and shewed us the individual in question, employed in cutting down wheat, while a little Irish imp, not more than two years old—and Irishly clad, too—was half crawling round him, like a kind of tame frog, (if such a thing could be,) through the stubbles; father and son making very good company with each other, and eloquently discussing various subjects in their native tongue.

But how could Paddy save so much of his English earnings, and so many village "taps" near him? Whisky, to be sure, his usual beverage, he could not get; but gin was a pretty good substitute—and what paid for his consumption of that? Did he not reel or caper about, drunk, as often as ever? No—he did not tipple at all. Not even as much as his English brother. Strange enough!—and how to be accounted for? Very easily. He was now well occupied, and well rewarded, and kindly treated; and success gave him self-respect, and the kind treatment confidence in the future; he was away, too, from the contagion of bad example supplied in his own country by the ill-rewarded, ill-treated, if not totally neglected, and, therefore, reckless peasant; and so he became, not only a sober man, but a prudent, a well-conducted, and a consistent one. Ye that run, read!

Nor is it alone for mere industry and good conduct that the Irish agricultural labourer in England and Scotland merits our approbation. He is also to be applauded for much endurance and good-temper under annoyances of a peculiar nature. While the more respectable of the two sister countries, almost invariably, are kind, just indeed, to the poor stranger, the same is scarcely to be expected of the humbler classes of English and Scotch, who naturally regard him as an intruder in their harvest-field, and sometimes treat him accordingly. Topics lie abundantly at hand through which to vent their unamiable, though, perhaps, natural feeling; and Pat has to encounter sneers and gibes upon his drawl, his brogue, his idioms, his very dress, air, and manners, as well as upon his country and his religion. But he meets and bears all this patiently. We do not mean to speak of such atrocious Irish colonies as those of St Giles or Chelsea. In places like these, the emigrant Irish are a hundred times worse-conducted than they can be found at home, because they still congregate together—indeed, are forced to do so—cut off from good example, or mixing only with such specimens of English or Scotch as deprave them down to the blackguardism of all large cities and towns. No, in one of the London-Irish principalities, Pat, we are free to admit, is always prepared to kick up a row upon any or no provocation. But we do speak of the poor Irish labourer alone, or clanning but with a few of his countrymen, in the agricultural districts of England; and in such positions, we repeat that his command of temper, nay, his not unchristian meekness under unmerited taunt and insult, deserve a generous sympathy and commendation.

Cowardly foes, unfortunately, are to be found, now and then, in every community; and worse than the sarcasm of the tongue is occasionally inflicted, by his jealous neighbours, on the wandering and unbefriended Irishman. Blows, entailing severe bodily harm, are thus, though seldom, his lot. And we have seen him, too, almost without his knowing it, suffering under such rough treatment, and witnessed how he met the injury; and it was with patience, philosophy, and religion, still. We have heard him, indeed, make allowances for the irritated sense of rivalry of brother John, and pray to God to forgive him. Yes! explain it to yourselves as you may, all good and gentle readers, of every sect, who differ from him, your poor fellow-subject Pat has, in his heart of hearts, a feeling of religion, which, in many varieties of to you perhaps unimaginable privation, woe, and wrong, is—must be—his sole refuge against despair and all its frightful consequences.

Upon a former occasion, we illustrated some assertions, something like this one, by reference to the public columns of a newspaper; and, in the present instance, we shall do the same thing—scarcely, as in the case alluded to, altering in any way the printed report to serve our purposes. The incident is intimately connected with all we have been gossiping on the subject of Irish reapers. Unhappily, too, it records the perpetration, upon one of them, of an act of excessive cruelty, by a few individuals of——we shall not say whether England or Scotland. It is not in the view, Heaven knows, of holding up to national obloquy the whole people of the country in question that we would recur to the unfortunate circumstance; and a little innocent mystifying may therefore be permitted on this one point. Doubtless, however, we are not the only persons upon whom, of all the newspaper-reading-public, the matter made an impression, now some ten years ago; and, presuming such to be the case, we may expect that references will be made by some of our readers to the real scene of action as we go along.

It would be superfluous to observe here, that want of good demand, or, even with that, want of good reward for labour at home, is the cause of the emigration to other harvest-grounds, of the Irish peasant. And, generally speaking, he crosses over to England or to Scotland, not in consequence of any sudden failure in worldly prospects in his own country, but simply to better a lot which, in common with millions, he has been accustomed to from his cradle—ay, and to which the father who rocked him in that cradle had also been accustomed. Sometimes, however, a change for the worse in circumstances does send a new claimant across the Channel in harvest-time; and it is with such a case we are at present concerned. And, as the change alluded to arose from occurrences which, in the present state of the world, can take place only in Ireland, we are necessitatedly warned, as it were, to commence our anecdotes of Davy Ryan on his own soil.

Few of the proprietors of a quarter of an acre of ground in Ireland endeavour to keep even the smallest patch before their cabin door for ornamental purposes; and yet Davy Ryan contrived to do so. Not, indeed, that he exhibited anything like a flower-garden; yet his neighbours thought that he approached very near to its pretensions in rearing, within the area of a few square yards round his threshold, cabbages, parsnips, carrots, turnips, and radishes, with a few roots of parsley, tongue-grass, and thyme; nay, even “the flowers themselves”—in the shape of bachelor’s-buttons, blue-bells, &c.—audaciously peered up among the borders of his more usefully-employed beds. And he had actually fenced in all this from the intrusion of pigs, dogs, cows, and horses; to say nothing of men, women, and children, who might be inclined to pay his pleasure-ground an unceremonious visit, either from his potato ridges, which commenced immediately outside its boundary, in front of his cabin, or else over the very low wall which half defined the highroad to one side of it.

In fact, country and locality considered, Davy was well to do in the world. Along with cultivating the whole important extent of his own grounds, and doing a day’s work for a farmer whenever he could get it, he, with the assistance of his simple, pains-taking wife, reared domestic fowls of all kinds, which she, or her eldest child, a girl of sixteen, sold in the next market town. He had, moreover, a plantation of osiers, in the headland of his quarter of an acre of potatoes, which he industriously—and skilfully, the neighbours said—manufactured into coarse but serviceable hand-baskets, also vendible on market day. And thus everything went on prosperously and happily with him.

Some points of Davy’s character it is here convenient to notice. In precision of conduct and orderly habits, and, above all, in seriousness of disposition, he differed from the majority of his equals in life around him. But, perhaps, these virtues ran into their own extremes. For the every-day enjoyment of an existence which is not doomed to be always sombre, and certainly to the apprehensions of his neighbours in general, Davy did not smile or laugh enough. And then his constant exhortations to keep everything tidy and in its place, in doors and out of doors, sometimes proved a bore to his otherwise affectionate and admiring family; his younger children in particular—two boys of six and of four years—thinking him quite too exact.

He was a religious man, from feeling and upon principle; and a strict observer of all the duties and discipline enjoined by his church: and his family imitated and followed his good example. No cursing, or swearing, or profane language of any kind, was heard in his house; and drunkenness was a stranger to it. Nor, though a strict adherent to his own creed, did he shew any uncharitable feelings to those who differed from him. The blacksmith of his village was a stern Protestant, and yet he and Davy were constant visitors at each other's houses: it must be added, constant disputants too. And here comes in something of our poor hero, which may, we fear, make him seem a little absurd. Davy was a great theological arguer. Having partially acquired, in early youth, the art of reading, he became acquainted, all on one side of the question, with the history of the Reformation, ("as they call it," he used to add.) A very mutilated and greasy copy of a curious book, "Warde's Cantos," also found its way into his hands, and he made great use of it. Perhaps few of our readers have seen the rare production in question. 'Tis written in Hudibrastic rhyme, and is evidently a copy of Butler's style, in all respects; its wit and sarcasm are not, however, so neat and playful. For instance—it introduces, if we recollect aright, the ghosts of Queen Elizabeth and her worthy father, Henry VIII., holding learned and not polite colloquy, on the Reformation, in no less a place than the infernal regions. Such as it was, however, and also considering how small a portion of the whole work ever came under his notice, Davy Ryan worked wonders with his quotations of verse from "Warde's Cantos." The blacksmith could stand against anything but these; but, under their cutting acerbity, he lost his temper, and with it his argument.

But, though Davy would "argue religion" against all comers, we must again request him to be considered as, in the heart—say, and in all outward observance, too—Christian-like towards even his pitted antagonists. No personally-offensive language of his own ever disgraced the diction of his syllogisms. He entered upon the good work of disputation in a solemn feeling of right, and a serious sense of duty; and his monotonous voice would go on, as he sat weaving his baskets from morning till night, if he had any one to listen to him, repeating over and over the same dogmatical things, with a manner the most unimpassioned, and a gravity of face that betokened an inward, self-satisfied conviction, which it was out of the power of living man, or of human wit, to shake for one moment.

With these excellent general materials for a disposition towards politics, it may be inferred that Davy Ryan did not remain quite indifferent to the great public questions of his own day. In fact, he was a sturdy O'Connellite, and had formed a village club, the members of which, by subscribing a halfpenny per fortnight each, produced a sum sufficient to bring down by the coach, to their "town," every Sunday morning, Michael Staunton's Weekly Register. And the newspaper used to be directed to "David Ryan, Esq., Ballymarnock;" and Davy used to read it aloud to all his subscribers—they ceding to him the right of keeping and filing the journal, when its contents had been fairly exhausted, in consideration of his trouble in bawling it out for them "from bignin to indin;" and also for having formed the society by which its blessings were distributed among them all.

Now, it was the time when the celebrated and, we believe we may add, to-be-ever-memorable question of "passive resistance" to tithes became the great public one in Ireland. The Register teemed with it each Sunday, either in the shape of speeches and resolutions in the immortal rooms of "The Association;" or of comments from the editor; or of accounts of the successful working of the tremendous system, throughout the country. Added to this, Davy had actually been eye-witness to a futile attempt to sell, under a distress warrant of the parson of his parish, a great master of sheep and horned cattle; and he saw that, among thousands of men on foot and on horseback, all keeping their hands crossed over their breasts, they did not command a single bidder; so that the sheriff was obliged to send them home again to their owners; only requiring bail for their good behaviour, and reappearance at some undefined future period. And the whole of this made Davy Ryan, joined with what we know of his general character and mental habits, a determined, unflinching, and magnanimous non-tithe-payer. No! not for a single inch of his whole ground of a quarter of an acre, potato field, and vegetable and flower garden, and all, would he pay one "rap" to the luxurious and "big minnither." Patriotism, conscience, historical knowledge, and a sense of polemical adroitness, all combined to make Davy resolute upon this point.

So, no tithes did he pay—having owed a considerable arrear, by the way, some time before forming his resolution. And years rolled on, and still he was a defaulter, and allowed to continue so with impunity. Perhaps the debated and distracted state of the question at issue—perhaps the indifference, if not contempt, with which the non-payment of the very little he could pay might have been regarded—or, perhaps, both causes together, may have operated to keep Davy in what may be called a blissful state of self-triumph and exultation.

But this did not last. It has been said that the side-fence of Davy's garden, such as it was, bounded the highroad to his village. In it, by a door of rudely-framed rustic paling, was an entrance to that garden. On a plat, or rather (it was so small) a tuft of grass, opposite this door, he used to love to sit, manufacturing his osiers into baskets on a summer's evening, and prosing away, as we have before hinted, upon his usual topics, to all and every one who would attend to him. We select a particular summer's evening upon which he was so engaged. His auditors were—the meek and master-of-fact wife, sitting opposite to him on a “boss,” gravely knitting a stocking for him, and often looking up from her almost self-assured work, (we would, indeed, nearly endow it with the power of getting on of itself, so little attention did she seem to pay to it, or else such a negligent mastery had she over it,) in order to applaud and honour his discourse;—next, almost at his feet, reclined his eldest child, Peggy, handing to him his peeled osiers, as he worked on, and also regarding him with a look that emphatically, though silently, said, “There is no born man like you, father;”—and his third listener, seated upon a capsize old basket, a few feet from Davy, was a little spare figure of a man, who, with ferret eyes, watched his mouth, as if to note and take advantage of the moment when it could possibly have done speaking; and the nose and chin of the face of this little figure almost met; and that face itself, albeit recently washed, (as its owner said,) exhibited but a kind of light, bluish-black tint; and he bent forward his body, leaning his elbows on his widely-opened knees; and between his raw-boned hands he clutched a pot of beer, which he had brought up from the village for his own particular, and, indeed, necessary comforting during his accustomed evening visit to Davy; and, in a word, this third personage was Davy's old friendly foe in controversy—the little polemical blacksmith; yes, a little man, although a blacksmith.

James Blunt, the name of the cunning artificer in question, had actually grown fond of his benighted Popish neighbour, by dint, it would seem, of incessant hostility to him, or else out of respect to Davy's unconquerable toughness in holding out in a bad cause. He felt towards him

“The stern joy that warriors feel
In foemen worthy of their steel.”

Or he loved him as brave soldiers love a little fortress, which, beyond possible calculation, baffles, month after month, all their sapping and mining, trench-work and bombarding. The daily interest, too, which his attacks upon Davy created, became habitually a chief portion of his enjoyment of existence; he longed for the evening hour of assault, as he did for the gratification of the draughts of ale that were to accompany it; and, if the truth were known, felt an inward discomfort at the thought of the future day, when (for come it must, sooner or later) Davy was to be vanquished and silent.

A very long-winded parenthesis in Davy's present harangue, was interrupted by a figure, darkening the checkered sun-light which danced in upon the party through the rude tracery-work of the little door that opened from the public road-side. Peggy Ryan was the first to recognise the new comer; though this she did, not by speaking a word, but by blushing so as to more than rival the scarlet of his jacket. Small and isolated as was her native village, a detachment from a regiment, headquartered in a rather remote city, was to be found in it; and a corporal of this detachment, a lad of not more than nineteen or twenty, had, “somehow or other,” become a not unwelcome visitor at Davy Ryan's house. Irishman he was not, Catholic he was not, and yet Davy and his wife, as well as his daughter, received him in a friendly way. His well-known good conduct in his regiment, his good humour, his frankness, his scholarship, and his seemingly respectful attention to Davy's religious lectures, to say nothing of his good looks, won for him this joint cordiality. It was ascertainable, too, that he was the son of a respectable farmer in his own country, had enlisted in a pettish fit of disobedience to his father, was allowed by his family to follow his self-chosen course long enough to repent of it, and to grow submissive towards them; and that he now entertained well-founded hopes of lawfully escaping, by their assistance, from the duties of a soldier, and once more engaging in his usual occupations at home. And, in a word, it was this young corporal, Wat Saunders by name, who came to pay an evening visit to our friends the Ryans.

He was admitted by one of the group—we need not say which; he assumed a seat by the side of that person; and there was a moment's pause in Davy's exhortation—taking watchful advantage of which, James Blunt snatched a hasty sip of his ale, and, poking out his sharp chin, said, tartly, to the master of the premises—“Well, an' maybe you're done now?”

“Maybe I am, an' maybe I amn't,” answered Davy, stooping to Peggy for a peeled osier, (which, however, was handed to him by Wat Saunders)—“at any rate, we will wait to hear what you can thry to say for a start, on the head o' the matter, Jimmy Blunt.”

“Much obleeged for the compliment, Davy, and more an' more, because it isn't very often you pay id to a body, you know. Bud now for to ax you jist a civil question or two—Can you find nothin' aginst poor Cromwell, Harry the Eighth's prime minister, (afthur he turned off that consaid, blind-eyed, big turkey-cock of a Pope's cardinal,) only that he was the son of an honest blacksmith?”

“Deed an' I can, Jimmy, an' a great dale more; by reason I find no fault at all wid him, on that score—far frum me be id to do so—a blacksmith's thrade is a good, honest thrade for any man's father to have; an', if Cromwell rose higher than his father was, by takin up wid another thrade, more praise be to him!—only, I'd like to hear tell that his new thrade was as honest as his ould one;—bad it wasn't—his new thrade was the thrade iv a born rogue, an' thief o' the world—rebbin the fine ould abbeys an' churches o' their gould an' their silver chalices an' crucifixes, and runnin' 'em into coined money, to buy new wives, an' new pleasures, an' diversions iv all sorts, for his unloocky mather and himself."

"Musha, an' dun' you tell us so, Davy?" sneered James Blunt, good-humouredly; "and what's that you were for sayin' about the great Cranmore?"

"What I'll say agin, Jimmy, an' what I'll uphold: I said, an' I say, that, afore the time that he was sure Harry the Eighth 'ud give minishthers and bishops lave to have wives, he had shipped over seys to him from Amsterdham, a lump of a woman, that he called a wife, (the Lord forgive him!) in an impty starch-barrel, or a thing o' the kind, an' lived wid her in Lunnnon town, unknownst."

A loud burst of polite laughter from the door by the road-side, commented upon Davy's historical anecdote. All eyes were turned in that direction, and saw standing, on the threshold of the door—which had been unwittingly left open by Peggy, after admitting the boyish corporal—the very tall and yet very corpulent figure of the Protestant rector of their parish, side by side with the low and slight one of a considerable land proprietor of the district.

The clergyman had been dining with his neighbour; both had set out for a walk, after dinner—that is, some time after it. Passing by Davy's garden, the group inside attracted their notice—and they had stopped at his door soon after Wat Saunders' entrance, and heard, unperceived, the whole of the conversation we have reported.

And at first it would seem that Davy's bold philippics provoked only the good-humoured indulgence, if not the contemptuous forbearance, which, from gentlemen of their rank and education, they might naturally have insured. The clergyman advanced a few steps into the little garden, still smiling heartily; a generous after-dinner colour on his ample cheeks; his fine black eyes glittering cordially through his gold-mounted spectacles; his hands thrust into his small-clothes pockets; his professional jack boots creaking harmoniously to his easy stride; and the broad and half-peaked brim of his still more professional hat, attached to its proper crown with silken cords and loops, in a mysterious kind of way. He was one of those reverend victims to non-payment of tithes, who, a short time before, had submitted to the legislature very touching pictures of their privations and sufferings under the new popular system; and yet, upon this evening, at least, few outward symptoms of misery or stint appeared in his colossal figure or well-rounded features: neither were his habiliments much the worse of the wear—nay, strange to say, he had gone to dine at his friend's house, that day, in a handsome carriage, drawn by two horses worth thirty guineas each, leaving at home two other pleasure-vehicles, with all appurtenances, for the use of his reduced family; and it may sound still more strange to add, that, even during the whole fearful persecution, so vividly described in his letter to the Secretary in London, neither he nor they had ever wanted such slight indications of comfort. How other clergymen, of less active or tenacious habits, or of more yielding, if not more amiable feelings, (and we are bound and anxious to say that many such were and are to be found in Ireland,) might have fared under the law of "passive resistance" to tithes, is a question in itself; we are only certain that the important personages with whom we have now to do, seemed to have endured or lost very little by the arrangement.

As he advanced on our humble party, all, except the young corporal, arose, in surprise and some confusion, to salute and do him honour. Peggy and her mother were the most flurried and "struck-of-a-heap" of the circle; James Blunt bowed low, and with an expression of infelt and heart-yielded awe; Davy Ryan's salute was also very lowly, yet there was a certain something in it which told spiritual independence, at least, of the dignified visitant. Wat Saunders, after one glance, took no notice whatever of the great man, but, still reclining on the patch of grass, went on peeling osiers for Davy—or rather for that individual's daughter.

Without making the least return to the humble greetings of our friends, the "big minister," as Davy had called him, addressed "the man o' the house," speaking very fast, while he partially resumed his former laugh. "What, what, my good fellow?—in a starch-barrel, you say?—got the lady smuggled over in a starch-barrel? Are you quite sure it was a starch-barrel?" And he, and his little slim friend at his back, again laughed outright.

Davy answered very gravely, slowly, and cautiously.

"When I spoke to my honest neighbour James Blunt, here, please your Riverence, of the nature o' the vessel that ould Cranmore got the poor misfort'nate crature iv a woman put into, on board ship, I said 'a starch-barrel, or a thing o' the kind,'" (Davy pronounced the above Italic words with emphasis;) "maning thereby to make James undherstand that I wouldn't give my word entirely, but that it might be some other kind iv a barrel—or even a chest, maybe, or a thrunk, or a box itsef—or whatever it is that they pack up their cheeses in, whin they sind them over frum thim counthries: so that your Honor's Riverence can take your pick-an'-choose an' please yourself among all sorts o' consalements to hide her in from the world's gibe an' schandle; only, come to him she did, in sich a manner as I made mintion of."

"But, my good man, why need he have hid his wife in anything?" resumed the clergyman, still almost good-humouredly; "why not let her go about the ship, like any other passenger?—or why should a man's honest wife be a gibe or a scandal, as you say?"

"I tould James Blunt that, too, your Riverence. She wasn't his honest wife, at that time; (no, nor at any time; for she never could be, durin' ash, oak, or ellum, for the plain reason, that ould Cranmore was in priest's ordhers at the first goin' off, and couldn't take any woman to wife, till the day of his death;) an' he coopered her up in the kind iv a way we're talkin' of, became Harry VIII.'s mind wasn't sart'n as to lettin' the turn-coat clergy of his Riformation (as he called id) live wid poor desaiaved women, undher the name iv wives; an' he was afraid o' vexin' his masther on unsafe grounds; an' he couldn't wait to make sure, he was in sich a hurry at ould Nick's promptin' (the Lord preserve us!) to break his vows, an' taste some o' the rewards of his threason to the ould, pure religion; an' as to the gibe an' the schandle, afore the world's face"——

"Come, come," interrupted the dignitary, his good sense not now continuing to support his jocoseness, and the little cause for his change of temper might perhaps have been traced to a humorous smile that moment appearing on young Wat Saunders' mouth—"come, come, my good fellow!—enough of your nonsense; you are a silly, romancing fellow, not knowing what you say—though, indeed, you may do some harm among fools as ignorant as yourself. Blunt, is this a fit place for you?"

The poor blacksmith nervously hastened to assure the questioner that he came to convince Davy of his absurdities, not to be convinced by them; an assertion which, in his own way, Davy fully and anxiously bore out.

"So—and this young hero, here—you, sir," magnificently confronting young Corporal Saunders, "can you find no better occupation for your time than to sit listening to the ravings of a foolish old Popish bigot?"

Wat Saunders, reddening a little, looked up quietly at the clergyman, and answered that, as he was not his officer, he need answer him no such question.

"Oho! so very independent, young corporal? Well, and perhaps your officer may repeat to you that very question. And so good evening! And good evening to you, too, Master Davy Ryan!—Is not that your name?" And the speaker was striding with much tall dignity towards the door of the little garden.

"Praise your Riverence," cried Davy, in a loud but not impassioned voice, "we ax your pardon, but would just be haggin' of you to stop one moment longer wid us."

"And for what purpose?" demanded the rector, turning round and again confronting him, with a smile—an assumed one, however.

"I'll tell your Riverence. Your Riverence called me very hard names just now; and, moreover—and what I think worse of, into the bargain—tould me plump, afore my little family here, and afore my ould neighbour, James Blunt, and afore Watty Corporal Saunders, and afore my head landlord; at your back, that I didn't well know what I was for talkin' about. Now, I'd be much behoulden to your Riverence if you'd make that sayin' good, or else wait to hear what I can say to take id out of your mouth for another time. I b'lieve id's talking about the reason why Cranmore put the for'n woman in the starch-barrel, or in the cheese-barrel, or in the thrunk, or the chest, or in the box, we were. Well, I gave you one raisin, and I can give you another. The tithes of the new church was not settled at that same time, and ould Cranmore didn't know in what way they'd be likely to be settled, and whether or no the share he'd get out of the plunthur of the ould church id make him be able to keep up anything like a wife at all; for, as everybody in the wide world knows, as well as your Riverence, the pure aasient religion, afther bein' striipt of its lawful dues, the half of which id gave away in mate, and dhrink, and clothin', and firin' to the poor"——

His listener once more laughed loud, interrupting Davy's earnest harangue; but his laugh, though loud, was not as kindly as, at his entrance into the garden, it had been. "So, so—you are a learned Theban on these points, I see? You do know all about tithes as well as other matters; and this comes, of course, of your paying them so punctually, and with such goodwill."

"Indeed, and it does not," answered Davy, holding himself up into a tower of strength, as it were, against a foreseen coming storm; and Wat Saunders now tittered gleesishly, and Davy's reverend opponent frowned. "Indeed, an' it does not. I pay no tithes, an' I never paid tithes, an' I never will pay a rap o' tithes. The knowledge I have o' what I'm talkin' about cum to me by other mains than that, please your Honour's Riverence."

His legal pastor, his pastor malgre lui, looked sharply through his glittering spectacles at Davy Ryan, and then at his small friend, the great land proprietor, who returned the meaning of the glance; and, finally, he hurried to the high road, his features wearing, however, a good-humoured expression at parting, and his farewell words uttered in a condescendingly cheerful tone.

"Perhaps you can find law, or history, or whatever it is, for not paying your rent, as well as for not paying your tithes?" observed the gentleman who lingered behind.

"No, your Honour," replied Davy; "'Render unto Caysar the things that are Caysar's,' is what I am bid to do, and I athrive to do id. I owe bud the runnin' gale for my whole quarter iv an acre, barrin' the thriffe due for the little cabin last Michaelmas."

"Whom do you hold under, from me?"

Davy gave the man's name, and his head landlord drily bid him good-by, and followed his reverend friend.

About a year after this evening, let us walk along the village road to take another peep at Davy on his grass tuft in his garden—for the day is fine enough to give promise of his being at his tireless work of twisting osiers and historical facts together. But, arrived at the outside of his little trellised door, you need not look in to bid him good morrow. He is sitting, almost opposite to that door, his back against the fence at the other side of the road, supporting, with the assistance of his daughter Peggy, his wife, who lies insensible in his arms. His two little boys are crying loudly at his side, and James Blunt, his eyes running tears, stands over his old polemical foe. The wife is almost insensible, though working in pain and convulsions, the warnings of a premature accouchement. Peelers and soldiers are stationed at the entrance to his once comfortable little home; and some of the former, led and assisted by bailiffs, are passing in and out of the yard and the house, conveying Davy's household furniture, such as it is, or rather was—not excepting the bed, which would now be a solace to his wife—into a cart, which is in the middle of the road. His “slip iv a pig,” too, is squeaking obstreperously in the cart; and the very last things which the agents of the law hurry out with, are a file of The Weekly Register, and Davy's few ragged and soiled leaves of “Warde's Cantos.” ’Tis all over with the poor polemic. For the last year, landlord and tithe-proctor have been at him together, and his whole earthly property will not now cover his law-costs. He is a houseless pauper on the roadside; his wife dying, his children helpless; and, though one good Samaritan, poor James Blunt, stands at his side, little comfort can he pour into the sufferer's heart.

“You must bring her home to my poor place, Davy,” said the blacksmith.

“Thank’ee, James, for the lave—an’ the Lord’s will be done!” answered Davy.

They did so; but had soon to remove her from that humble roof, too, to another home—her last. The poor woman's dead baby was buried with her.

“An’ now, Jimmy,” said the widower to his still attentive friend, after the humble burial was over—(they stood in the churchyard; Davy had just knelt up from the new grave; his daughter Peggy and her little brothers were crying over it)—“and now, Jimmy, God be wid you and prosper you!—I’m for the road, an’ its time for me.” He was securing a sickle at his back. “An’ maybe I’d see you agin, afore the fall o’ the lave, to give you thanks for all your friendship to me an’ mine—thanks, an’ more than thanks, please God. Come, Peggy; come, a-lanna; come, childher.”

“Why, where are you goin’, man alive?” asked Blunt, in surprise and interest.

“I’m goin’ the nearest road to the sey betwixt me an’ England an’ Scotland, James Blunt; an’ then, wid God’s help, I’ll cross the sey, an’ be in another counthry. It’s the harvest time, very nigh hand, an’ I don’t forget the field-work; an’, though I’m no longer a young boy, I’m sthrong an’ healthy yet; an’ the English an’ Scotch farmers give good hire, they tell me; an’ I’ll work hard to please ’em, any how; an’, when they pay me, I’ll come back an’ pay you, a-vich.”

“Pay the divvie!” cried James, gruffly and crossly. “Don’t be botherin’ me. An’ what ’ll you do wid the childher?”

“Take ’em wid me, Jim. Peggy is well able for the road; an’, when the weenucks gets tired, I’ll carry ’em on my back, by turns.”

“Why, you havn’t a lagina, startin’!” still remonstrated Blunt.

“I have God,” replied Davy, in a low, solemn voice, taking off his hat, and looking upward.

The smith was silent, only he vainly rummaged his pockets for a help for Davy, which they did not afford.

“Come, Peggy, a-tourneen, I bid you agin—’tis time. Too much grief for the dead is sinful against the Lord’s will. Come, my honey; or, wait a start agin.”

He returned to the grave, still bareheaded, knelt, took Peggy’s hand in his, passed his left arm round the necks of his younger children, and all prayed aloud, though in broken voices, “for the repose of the soul” of the poor wife and mother. James Blunt, looking on askance, sympathized with them, although, from his childhood, he had been taught to regard such an observance as superstitious.

Davy arose, surrounded by his family, and took a final leave of his friend.

“I’ll only ax you to do one mere kind turn for me, Jim, while I’m away,” he whispered, as he wrung Blunt’s hand. “Keep the poor grave marked, an’ clear of weeds, if you can; for I don’t give up the hope of hyin’ a little headstone for it another time: will you, Jim?”

“I’ll do what you say,” promised the blacksmith.

And Davy and his orphans turned their backs on the village.

We next get a glimpse of the wandering group, creeping along the highroad, under the shade of a fence, in a strange country. The sun is scorching; the dust of the road blinding. Davy’s shoes, and those of his daughter, are broken; the little boys are bare-footed and in rags; and, indeed, their father and sister are not much better clad. All look way-worn, dejected, hungry, and thirsty. The awe of strangeness in a land of bustle, riches, and order, is also upon them. They feel that they are very inferior, as well as very friendless, among the well-dressed, energetic people around them. Doubt, distrust, if not fear, are in their troubled eyes. They scarce ask a question of any one they meet; or, if they do, ’tis in a misgiving of not being understood or heeded, or else of being jeered at or insulted. In fact, carrying his youngest boy on his shoulders, and leading the other limping little fellow by the hand, while Peggy moves a step in advance, it seems to be poor Davy’s policy to steal along the road, unnoticed altogether for the present. He is not yet far from the coast where he landed from Ireland, and the scene of his proposed industry is some days’ journey distant.

A stage-coach, fully freighted, appeared on the road behind. Before it came up, half a dozen men and lads, spying the Irishman from a neighbouring field, jumped over the road-fence, and began to hoot and pelt him with hard clods. He bowed his head to his breast, to save his face—lowered the boy on his back, to shield him also—put the other child with Peggy behind him, and continued his way without a word. The stage-coach rattled up, as a clod, to which the poor fellow silently winced, struck him hard on the shoulder. A cry of discouragement against his tormentors arose from the passengers, inside and outside; and, at the same instant, Johnny Coachee wound a long, well-aimed lash round the neck and shoulders of their ringleader, and Davy was allowed to hobble on, without further present molestation. Perhaps young coachee used his whip at the pure impulse of indignant humanity; perhaps in the hope of an additional half-crown among his Irish outsiders; at all events, he performed a useful action in behalf of a fellow-creature. The jealous field-labourers consulted together, as if they would follow Davy when the stage should pass out of view; but it drew up almost immediately, at a little inn, to change horses; and then many of the passengers got down, surrounded Davy and his companions, spoke kindly with him, English, Scotch, and Irish as they were, showered pence into his pocket, and conveyed him, while the horses were being put to, out of all danger from his assailants.

This was not Davy's first trial since he came from his own country, though it was, as yet, the most cruelly hostile one he had encountered. He was doomed, alas! to find it outdone in cruelty as he travelled onward. From some acquaintances of his old Irish neighbourhood, before he left home, Davy had learned the residence and name of a farmer who, in the country he now passed through, had a character for great good-heartedness and fair-dealing among his Hibernian harvest-cutters. To the abode of this individual—all thought of occupation on the way cast aside—Davy pursued his pilgrimage. It would seem that he dreaded to demand work at any farm of which the owner was unknown to his countrymen, or, at least, to the few of them, of emigrating habits, on the list of Davy's friends. So northward he walked.

The summer's evening was falling as he and his children entered a beautiful little village, only a few miles from his point of destination, where, as he said to himself and them, they could all have a good night's rest, and start fresh for the house of the kind farmer by daybreak next morning. But how to secure the good night's rest was a question. Davy had met no chance charity since the day the stage-coach passengers assisted him, and he was, upon this evening, penniless. Still more wayworn and ragged, too, than when we glanced at them last—short time ago as that is—the poor Irish group cut a sorry figure as they emerged from the shaded, cool, delightful green lane which opened immediately into the village in question. They well knew they must not beg, at peril of the cage and many other terrors; what were they to do then for food and a place to lay their heads?

"O father, father dear!" sobbed Peggy, in a low, fearful voice, "the childer 'ill never go through the night, widout victuals, an' widout a roof! Their little feet is sore blistered an' crippled, an' they are half dead already wid the fatigue, an' the sleep, an' the hunger! O Wat Saunders!" continued Peggy, to herself, "an' is this the ind iv all your promises to me? A year come an' gone since you left Ireland, out o' the sojers, to come home here to your own country—your own rich, beautiful country—and never a word sent afther poor Peggy Ryan, to comfort her heart in her sore affliction! Father, father, what'll become of us, this night!"

"We'll sleep sound, Peggy, a-courasen," answered Davy—"sound an' happy, afther kneeling down and saying our prayers, this night: that's all that will happen to us. Heuld up, a-lanna! Don't cry, my pets; sure, we're nigh hand to comfort an' plinty, an' everything that's good. To-morrow mornin' we'll be at the work, please God! An' here, Peggy—here's a few preaties left in the wallet yet, ever since we quitted poor Ireland; an' here's the sauce-pan to boil 'em in, too; an' some good Christen 'ill give you lave to put 'em down on their cabin-fire, for the love o' God! An', don't you see that cow-shed across the village, an' the man in it? We'll go over to him, and ask him for the night's lodgin there, an' I'll be bail he won't refuse us; an' then you can go and beg of a neeber to let you boil our supper on her fire, an' so we'll be as happy as kings on their thrones. Come over to the shed, Peggy, a-charra, an' lift Paddy in your arms. Just this start, an', never fear, I'll take care o' Micky."

They approached the shed slowly and humbly, The man they had seen in it had pity on them; and told them they might stay in it for the night; adding that he had power to give them permission, as he was employed by the farmer to whom it belonged. He then left them. Davy, making the children sit down in a corner, engaged himself in collecting into a heap, for a bed, the cleaner portions of the cow-litter it contained—the animals being, at present, absent—and sent Peggy, as had been arranged, out into the village, to try and get her sauce-pan of potatoes boiled on a neighbour's fire. She returned to him in a short time, crying bitterly, the vessel of potatoes undressed in her hand. The people of one or two cottages into which she had entered, had behaved harshly to her, refusing the use of their fires, and calling her and her father hard names, and reproaching them for wandering over from Ireland, to deprive honest people of their honest earnings in their own country. The last woman she saw said worse than this; she threatened, in fact, to go after her husband to the tap, and get him and his friends to cuff the beggarly strangers out of their village; and Peggy seemed much afraid of evil towards her father, in consequence. Still poor Davy found words of patience and submission to his lot. He said nothing hard, in return, of his churlish neighbours; on the contrary, he reminded Peggy that it was natural they should act as they had done ; and that strangers strolling over to Ireland to share harvest work with its people, might, perhaps, encounter similar treatment. For the want of the few boiled potatoes for supper, he preached resignation and patience, until the morning : one night's fast, in addition to all they had suffered, was not much, he said ; and the good breakfast at the good farmer's house, would be the more welcome ; and then, hiding the tears in his own eyes, at the cries of his boys, he took the little fellows in his arms, one after the other, kissed them, laid them on the litter, spread his own tattered coat over them, knelt with Peggy at their side, repeated the usual night-prayers for all, with a broken voice added another prayer for their mother's soul, and then, causing Peggy to lie down at their side, stretched himself across his children's feet.

"An' we'll soon be fast asleep, my little pets," said Davy, "an' forget everything ; and, though we don't lie in a bed o' down, wid grand curtains, an' afther a grand supper, our consciences are clear, an' we owe no living creature a grudge, an' the good God o' heaven an' earth is watchin over us ; an', b'lieve the words out o' my lips, many a great man in the world, ay, an' many a king, will sleep worse than we'll sleep this holy and blessed night."

Awful and mysterious are the ways of Providence !—in dispensation of earthly good and ill to the suffering poor, particularly awful and mysterious ; and, were it not for blind, adoring faith, very hard to be bowed down unto by human reason, and by the human heart of man ! The blessed sleep which poor Davy had anticipated as a balm for all his present sorrows, had scarce fallen upon his mind, when he was roused out of it to be plunged into the final sleep of death. Peggy's fears proved but too well-founded. The wretches at the tap, excited into momentary fury, came indeed upon the friendless stranger, dragged him from his children's feet, and, with bludgeons as well as with their fists, beat him so cruelly that he died under their blows. In vain he remonstrated—asked them to forgive and pity him—him and his orphans—and promised not to offend by seeking for work ;—amid the shrieks of those orphans, and while his last audible words were, "God forgive you ?"—they killed him.

They were immediately arrested ; indeed, almost on the spot and in the act. A farmer and his son, riding by to their home, some few miles off, heard the noise of the outrage, hastened to the shed, and, with assistance, secured the man-slayers for justice. Romantic things will happen in spite of us. The farmer turned out to be Wat Saunders' father, and the farmer's son Wat Saunders himself.

The trial of the guilty men came on at the next assize town. It called forth great interest and sympathy. Poor Peggy Ryan, supported by Wat Saunders' mother—under whose comfortable, and humane, and right friendly roof she had been, with her little brothers, domesticated since the murder—gave her evidence in a manner that commanded universal respect, as well as sorrow for her father and for herself. Young, pretty, an orphan—and under such circumstances—she told her weeping tale so pathetically, so mildly, and so unhatingly towards the prisoners at the bar, that all admired, praised, loved her. The simple recital of her father's adventures, since landing from Ireland to the moment of his death, his conduct, manner, and words, all through riveted the attention, and moved the very tears, of a crowded court. His words while stretching himself across his little ones' feet—which we have reported—produced a powerful effect on every hearer ; the very culprits on their trial wept as Peggy repeated the words ; and the judge dwelt on them, in his charge, with respectful earnestness. "They are a lesson to us all," he said.

The prisoners were found guilty of manslaughter, of the most grievous class.

Peggy is now Mrs Wat Saunders.

THE TRIUMPH OF WOMAN.

In distant times, when barb'rous man
In ceaseless contests warr'd,
And, crushed by strife's relentless ban,
All social peace was marr'd ;

Woman as umpire interposed,
With plaintive eye rebuked
The sanguine broil. The tumult closed—
Strife ceased where'er she looked.

Or, if some ruthless monster still
Her winning power defied,
With tame submission to her will,
He yielded when she sighed.

If some crime-foster'd son of Cain
The bonds of peace upript,
To strict obedience forced again,
He paused when woman wept.

When thus she was with victory blest,
Her tears away she brushed ;

And, whilst rude man her worth confessed,
With modest pride she blushed.

Now all-entranced he gazed, and spoke
His love in language wild ;
Then o'er his heart, to seal her yoke,
With Heavenly grace she smiled.

While thus, before man's spell-bound eyes,
Charm after charm up-sprung,
He listened, with a new surprise,
As, triumph-crowned, she sung.

No art such conquests could complete—
'Twas Nature's magic all ;
'Tis but when woman tries deceit
That man escapes her thrall.

May woman's power continue long,
When by such armour gained !—
By tears, by smiles, by sighs, by song,
Be still her sway maintained !

THE POETICAL WORKS OF THOMAS PRINGLE.

THIS is a volume in which the public will feel a deep and affectionate interest. It contains the poetical remains of a man of no mean talents, and of the greatest personal worth; a faithful and an earnest labourer in the cause of humanity, and a willing sufferer for the advancement of truth. The poetical works of Pringle are edited by his friend Mr Leitch Ritchie, who has prefixed a sketch of his life, written in the most affectionate spirit.

Like his friend Sir Walter Scott, the immediate ancestors of Pringle were a race of respectable Border farmers; and, like Scott, by an accident in infancy, he lost the use of his right leg, and remained lame for life—walking on crutches—though, it would seem, a bold horseman, and even lion and elephant hunter. Like every other man who has afterwards displayed similar tastes, Pringle, as a boy, was fond of fairy tales, ghost stories, narratives of adventure and vicissitude, but especially of battles. "Oh, that I had a book full of battles!" cried he to his old nurse Nanny Potts, who, having first lamed him for life, by way of atonement spoiled the motherless child ever afterwards. She gave him Bunyan's "Holy War." Pringle received his early classical education at the grammar school of Kelso; and afterwards accompanied his friend Robert Story, now the minister of Roseneath, to the University of Edinburgh. The lads lodged together in one room, and were remarkable for the purity and piety of their lives. Pringle's admiration of Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope," at this time, and of "Park's Travels," mark both the period and the peculiar cast of his mind. To Park Mr Story imputes his subsequent travelling enterprise, and to the admiration of Campbell's verse that "germinating love of freedom and abhorrence of oppression which became the ruling passion and determining motive of his future life." Pringle, while at college, was more conversant with English poetry and belles lettres than with his proper studies, in which he made no distinguished progress. He, however, began to take a lead among his young contemporaries. He organized a literary club; and once led his friends on to combat what we are inclined to believe was a windmill mistaken for a giant. In The Edinburgh Review there had appeared a rather flippant and disparaging critique of Miss Baillie's dramas; and it was imagined that the reviewers and their adherents were to vindicate their critical opinions by damning the "Family Legend," when it was produced in the Edinburgh theatre. Pringle chivalrously organized a body of forty or fifty young men, armed with clubs, who took possession of the pit, and riotously put down the imagined symptoms of a disapprobation, which, in all probability, never was meditated, and much less organized. A statement in The Quarterly Review, that Pringle became a parochial schoolmaster on leaving college, is formally contradicted; with other assertions which are equally inaccurate, and, as the biographer appears to think, disparaging and unjust to his late friend. Like every other man who has not resolutely, and in the face of all difficulties, early fixed upon a profession, and adhered to it until they are surmounted, Pringle lived to repent his indecision. As a temporary means of support, he became a copying-clerk in the Register-Office of Scotland—a situation of very slender emolument—to which he added some trifling literary employment, as a congenial pursuit, which also eked out his small salary. Like at least nine-tenths of all men whose trade is letters, he fell upon this perilous employment through chance, and nearly unavoidable circumstances.

He published some occasional pieces, which had the ordinary fate of fugitive verses; and, in the course of years, became known as a contributor to the Scottish poetical miscellanies of that day. His imitation of Sir Walter Scott, in the "Poetic Mirror," was much praised by the writer imitated; and Pringle rather rashly gave up his place in the Register House, and began the magazine afterwards known as Blackwood's Magazine, and also undertook the editing of The Star newspaper. The early numbers of his magazine were graced with a communication on the gipsies, of which Sir Walter Scott chiefly furnished the materials; and in the same numbers were papers by Mr Lockhart, "a young advocate;" "a Mr Wilson, a new recruit of the lake bands;" Dr Brewster; James Hogg; and others. On a rupture with Mr Blackwood, who found persons in this corps far better adapted to his purpose, and who saw in the new magazine an instrument for their own purposes, Pringle assumed the management of Constable's Magazine; and a warfare, now forgotten, and at the time more entertaining to the bystanders than creditable to the assailants, was waged against Constable's editor and his literary allies.

In the flush of his literary prospects, Pringle had married; and, soon afterwards, both The Star and his other undertaking failing, he, at the age of thirty, returned to the Register-House.

The establishment of a colony at South Africa was projected by the government at this time, and Pringle made application for a grant of land, and the other promised advantages, for himself, his five brothers, and a brother-in-law; and ultimately put himself at the head of a band of twenty-four South-African emigrants, all of them that description of persons who form the best material, physical and moral, for commencing a new colony. They were hardy, sensible, Teviotdale sheep-farmers and agriculturists, with their wives, children, and labourers; so that Pringle's band must have been a most valuable acquisition to the settlement. The account which their guide and philosopher has given of their proceedings in the voyage, and the adventures of their first days and first seasons after transplantation to the African wilderness, is the most Crusoe-like and picturesque authentic narrative we have met with, and one which will long form an interesting study to Scottish emigrants. Mr Pringle states, that, having received a collegiate education, and been engaged for many years in literary concerns, as well as with Blackwood's Magazine while a Liberal journal, and afterwards with Constable's, it never was his intention to become a permanent agricultural settler, which his previous habits and want of capital, among other reasons, made unadvisable; but that, after re-establishing "his father's house," he hoped to procure some civil appointment in the colony. He accordingly left the colony of Glen Lynden in the peace and prosperity to which his talents and good offices had mainly contributed to raise it, and came to Cape Town to settle. Mr Ritchie makes some remarks upon the condition of the Cape colony at that period, which are more true than palatable; and certain observations upon the strictures of the Quarterly Review upon the line of conduct followed by Pringle, which are exactly of the same nature—much more just than likely to prove agreeable. Pringle, through the influence of Sir Walter Scott and Sir John Macpherson, had obtained letters of recommendation to Lord Charles Somerset, who was quite the beau idéal of the colonial governor of the good old times. Had Pringle been disposed to become the mere tool of the governor, and, like so many other subservient and convenient instruments, have quietly pocketed his salary, and stifled his convictions about the wrongs of the aborigines, and the right of free discussion, it might have been all very well; but, though no visionary, he had carried abroad liberal opinions, and for these there was no toleration in the colonial office of the Cape.

Pringle ventured to expose, though in the calmest and gentlest manner, injustice and cruelties to the aborigines and others, of which he had been the eye-witness, and consequently became the object of the bitter animosity and unceasing persecution of the Governor, until, worn out in spirit and ruined in his affairs, he was compelled to return to England. When we have seen Mr Buckingham pertinaciously and very properly insisting for years upon public compensation for losses incurred in a similar manner, the equally just claims of Pringle have ever occurred to us; and, if these rights were Pringle's, they are not less those of his surviving family. This makes a few words of explanation necessary. On coming to Cape Town, Pringle was, by the Quarterly's much-vaunted generosity of Lord Charles Somerset, appointed librarian of the colonial library, with the moderate salary of £75 a-year. This seems the exact amount of his personal obligations to the Governor. To eke out his income, he projected opening an academy, and invited Mr Fairbairn, a friend in Edinburgh, well qualified for the undertaking, to join him; and the school, commenced before Fairbairn's arrival, thrives every day. This was at a remarkable period in the history of the Cape. The importunity of the anti-slavery "brawlers" in England and the colony, had at last extorted the appointment of a commission of inquiry, and the commissioners were now on their way out. "Lord Charles was busily employed in settling his house in order to receive them," since needs must. Slavery was, for the first time, pronounced by authority to be an evil. Schools were to be established, and the English language and literature patronised; nay, more—there was, at first, a whisper that the Government Gazette was to be put into the hands of the new librarian, and rendered subservient to the diffusion of knowledge; but the most signal triumph of liberalism was the execution of a white or whitish man for the murder of one darker in hue by several shades.

"Putting all these things together," says the memoir, "it is no wonder that Pringle's heart beat high at the prospect which seemed to open before him. As if conducted by a special Providence, he had reached the seat of government at a moment when the elements of all things great and good were in motion. The dawn of a new era was opening upon the darkened land; and the march of that civilization he could himself be permitted to assist in pioneering, was, in all probability, destined to traverse, not merely a colony, but a continent."

Pringle, accordingly, in connexion with the Rev. Mr Faure, a Dutch clergyman in Cape Town, made arrangements for disseminating knowledge through the medium of a literary journal or magazine. But the Governor must first be consulted; and to the memorial presented to Lord Charles, the verbal reply was, "that the application had not been seen in a favourable light." What were the projectors to do? Pringle was for insisting for written reasons from Lord Charles; but Colonel Bird, the colonial secretary, and a liberal and enlightened man, who seems to have appreciated Lord Charles Somerset more truly than his panegyrist, the Quarterly Reviewer, and certainly with as good opportunities of knowledge, "warned him of the danger to all his prospects which would attend such a step." Before going further, he waited the arrival of the English Commissioners. They had no powers to interfere; but the British Colonial Secretary, Lord Bathurst, was favourable to his publication; and Lord Charles Somerset, as in other instances, "could do no more than shew the ill-humour with which he consented."

The South African Journal accordingly appeared; and was followed by the South African Commercial Advertiser, a weekly newspaper, of which Pringle and Fairbairn were merely engaged to superintend the literary department. Both publications flourished in their little day; the pupils of the academy increased; and Pringle fancied himself on the fair way to fortune, combined with public utility. Mr Ritchie complains that the character of these journals is misrepresented by the Quarterly Reviewer, whom he presumes the editor, and who was consequently Pringle's former antagonist, and in some sort his successor in Blackwood's Magazine. He declares the whole article, "though in some respects just, as in the greater part grossly and cruelly incorrect"—that is as to Pringle personally; for the biographer, though of opposite opinions, does not assume the right of condemning those entertained by the Reviewer on Colonial policy; he only dissents from the assertion, that Pringle's journal was seditious and dangerous to the peace of the colony; and certainly the specimen he has cited, "of the uniform political tone of the South African Magazine bears out no such assumption;" while Pringle's account of a publication which probably the editor of the Quarterly only knew through the distorted medium of the Governor's anger, and his persecution of the Liberal journalists, describes a colonial newspaper of a character and complexion rare in young communities.

"We had strictly excluded personality," says he, "(the besetting vice of small communities,) from our columns: not a shadow of a complaint could be brought against us on that score. Mere party politics we had shunned, as being altogether alien from our objects as colonial journalists. Topics likely to excite violent controversy in the colony, such as the Slavery Question, the condition of the aborigines, &c., (however decided were our own opinions on such points,) we had also carefully abstained from discussing. We had, in fact, rejected numerous communications on all these subjects; considering it injudicious to arouse premature debate, even on legitimate and important public questions, in the then critical condition of the press and of the colony. We had, therefore, flattered ourselves, that it would be scarcely possible for the most jealous scrutiny to find a plausible pretext for interference. But it was our singular fate to be sacrificed, not for sins actually committed, but from the apprehension of those which we might possibly commit."

The affair very soon came to an issue. A man named Edwards was tried for an alleged libel against the Governor; the trial was, of course, expected to be reported, like others, in the newspaper. The editors, Pringle and Fairbairn, had cautiously expunged from the report all offensive allusions to the noble person interested; but this was not enough. Lord Charles Somerset ordered the Fiscal of the colony to the printing-office, to assume the censorship of the press; and the head of Pringle's offending was indignantly refusing to allow this prostitution of the British press, and open act of tyranny. But redress was out of his power; and he and his colleague threw up the editorship of the paper. Mr Greig, the printer and proprietor, could not carry on the publication by himself; and he announced its temporary discontinuance, and his intention of awaiting the decision of the Home Government on the arbitrary act of the Governor. For this offence his press was sealed up, and he was arbitrarily commanded to leave the colony within a month. The Fiscal next attacked the magazine, before the third number had appeared, and it was also discontinued; Pringle refusing to recognise the assumed right of censorship. The injurious impressions of Pringle's conduct in this affair, given by the very incorrect statements of the Quarterly Reviewer, might be of less importance, if the same thing had not been repeated in Lockhart's Life of Scott; where Sir Walter describes Pringle as a conceited and wrong-headed person, who provoked his own misfortunes by his Whiggery. The prudent, sensible, and easy-humoured Sir Walter, was probably among the last persons in the world to approve of any man quarrelling with his bread and butter, for such pragmatical nothings as the civil or natural rights of Hottentots and Caffres, or the freedom of the press; and, above all, questioning the absolute will and supremacy of a colonial governor, and especially one who had already given him a small post, and who might patronise him farther, if he behaved discreetly.—i. e., became the advocate and apologist of colonial abuses, and the adulterator of the Governor's policy. It is not alone for the vindication of Pringle's conduct, but for the sake of the noble lesson given of that temperate and manly resistance of oppression which it conveys, and which, we trust will ever characterise British men, that we give, in Pringle's own words, the account of the transactions which draw forth the condemnation of the eminent individual whom he highly esteemed.* As soon as the magazine and newspaper had been discontinued, a petition to the King in council was got up by the respectable inhabitants of the colony; and the Governor became himself abandoned. He resolved to try what personal intimidation would do, and summoned the person described by the Quarterly Reviewer as "small," "weak," "distorted," "unusually deformed," and bred in mean society, to his august presence in the audience-room at the Colony Office.

* Sir Walter's notice of Pringle, in his private Diary, is very characteristic.—"Thomas Pringle is returned from the Cape. He might have done well there, could he have scoured his brains of politics; but he must needs publish a Whig Journal at the Cape of Good Hope!! He is a worthy creature; but conceited withal—Amicus Isaac Lockhart. He brought me some antlers and a skin, in addition to others he had sent to Abbotford four years since."—Lockhart's Life of Scott, vol. vi., page 363.

"I found him with the Chief-Justice, Sir John Trotter, seated on his right hand, and the second number of our South African Journal lying open before him. There was a storm on his brow, and it burst forth at once upon me, like a long-gathered south-easter, from Table Mountain. 'So sir,' he began—'you are one of those who dare to insult me, and oppose my government!' And then he launched forth in a long tirade of abuse; scolding, upbraiding, and taunting me, with all the domineering arrogance of men and sneering insolence of expression, of which he was so great a master, reproaching me above all for my ingratitude for his personal favours. While he thus addressed me, in the most insulting style, I felt my frame tremble with indignation; but I saw that the Chief-Justice was placed there for a witness of my demeanour, and that my destruction was sealed if I gave way to my feelings, and was not wary in my words. I stood up, however, and confronted this most arrogant man with a look of disdain, under which his haughty eye instantly sunk, and replied to him, with a calmness of which I had, a few minutes before, not thought myself capable, and told him that I was quite sensible of the position in which I stood—a very humble individual, before the representative of my sovereign; but I also knew what was due to myself, as a British subject and a gentleman, and that I would not submit to be rated, in the style he had assumed, by any man, whatever were his rank or station. . . . I asserted my right to petition the King for the extension of the freedom of the press to the colony; and I denied altogether the 'personal obligation,' with which he upbraided me, having never asked nor received from him the slightest personal favour, unless the lands allotted to my party, and my own appointment to the government library, were considered such—though the latter was, in fact, a public duty assigned me, in compliance with the recommendation of the home government. This situation I now begged to resign, since I would not compromise my free agency for that, or for any appointment his Lordship could bestow. Lord Charles saw he had gone too far—he had, in fact, misapprehended my character, and had made a not uncommon mistake, in taking a certain bashfulness of manner for timidity of spirit. And, as his object then was, not absolutely to quarrel with, but merely to intimidate me, and thus render me subservient to his views, he had the singular measure, after the insulting terms he had used, to attempt to coax me by flattery, and by throwing out hints of his disposition to promote my personal views, if I would only conduct myself discreetly."

The consequence was, that Pringle resigned his appointment of librarian, and this grievous persecution became more violent. A "Literary and Scientific Society," begun by Pringle, was next attacked; and the Chief-Justice and other government functionaries, who had become members, were ordered instantly to withdraw their names; while it was distinctly intimated, that everything in which Pringle was concerned, should share the same fate.

And (continues his biographer) this was no empty threat. A system of espionage was set on foot, in which the catfif Oliver, so well known in this country, was employed. Terror and suspicion were depleted on every countenance. Persons were examined as disaffected, for being known even to continue in acquaintanceship with Pringle. The result may be foreseen.

This statement is at complete variance with that given by the Quarterly Reviewer, who, by a singular perversity, seems to have imagined that he was singularly gracious and beneficent, and not a little condescending withal, to Pringle; and who probably had intended to be so, and might fancy he had succeeded.

"Ruined in circumstances and in prospects," says Mr Gorder, who has also given the world a short memoir of Pringle, "but sound in conscience and character," he returned to England, having first visited his relatives at Glen Lynden. On coming home, he demanded compensation for the various losses he had sustained through the persecution of the Governor; but the claim was refused by Lord Bathurst, and still remains unsatisfied. The persons examined in his case—the colonial officials, namely,—as might have been expected, imputed the ruin of his prospects to his own choice; and the affair was settled by law if not by justice. "Pringle had been refused for asserting the rights of a freeman; and his claims, while they were allowed in theory, were disregarded in practice by Government." That men may not be too much discouraged in well-doing, it is proper to state that Pringle's indiscreet and presumptuous interference with colonial abuses, had made him favourably known in England. Before leaving the Cape, he sent home an account of the real state of slavery in the colony, which was published in The New Monthly Magazine, then edited by Campbell, and which attracted the notice of Mr Z. Macaulay and Mr Buxton. This circumstance ultimately led to his appointment as secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society. The arduous duties of that office he continued to discharge, with great zeal and ability, until the act of Emancipation was passed, and the Society was dissolved, its great object being imagined accomplished. It could not have been foreseen that some of the worst evils of slavery were still to flourish under the name of Apprenticeship. Pringle's character, and his connexion with this Society, procured him the esteem and personal friendship of its leading members, Wilberforce, Stephen, Clarkson, Buxton, and other eminent abolitionists. He was also intimate with Coleridge and other literary characters; and we find it stated here, that, humble individual as he was, to him, poor Coleridge, distinguished by many of the great and noble, and nearly allied to the wealthy, owed the restoration of his pension, which was stopped with the other Literary Pensioners, as they were called, on the death of George IV. In South Africa, he had become acquainted with Colonel Fox, who had been a guest in his Crusoe cottage in Glen Lynden; and to this gentleman, when he came to London, he owed the acquaintance of Rogers and Sir James Mackintosh, through whom he applied for Coleridge. We are on principle no great admirers of literary pensions, or pensioned or patronised literature of any kind, and almost rejoiced when that miserable pauper fund of £1000 a-year—doled out among ten individuals distinguished in letters and science, yet not equal in all to the tenth-part of some aristocratic sinecures—was withdrawn; but Pringle's kindness was not the less well intended, and we find notes from Mackintosh and Rogers, congratulating him on the success of their application for the renewal of Coleridge's annuity.

In course of his official connexion with the Abolition Society, Pringle became the advocate and protector of many individuals of African origin, who, when brought to England, claimed their freedom. These cases were much talked of at the time, as some of them were discussed in courts of law or made public through the press. The subject of one of the most beautiful poems in the volume, "The Bechuana Boy," was suggested by a poor child, who had been carried off from his native country by a party of Bergenaars, and sold to a Boer for an old jacket. The poor boy was received into Pringle's family as a little servant. He accompanied Mr and Mrs Pringle to England, and was treated by them more like an adopted child than a stranger and menial. He was of a singularly amiable, docile, and affectionate disposition. He died of consumption, at a very tender age, in the bosom of the family by whom he had been so fondly cherished. There is no poetic license in the concluding verses of the "Bechuana Boy."

"Such was Marosi's touching tale:

Our breasts they were not made of stone;

His words, his winning looks, prevail—

We took him for 'our own.

And one, with woman's gentle art,

Unlocked the fountains of his heart;

And love gushed forth, till he became

Her child in everything but name."

Another slave, protected by Pringle, was Mary Prince, who also lived for two years in his house, as a nominal servant, after the Anti-Slavery Society had in vain tried to procure her manumission from her former owner, when the woman wished to return to Antigua to her husband, but not as a slave. Pringle published her story in a popular Anti-Slavery tract, which drew forth a "criticism" in Blackwood's Magazine, then the regular cogn of the planters, which is strongly, if not severely, described by Mr. Ritchie, and for which Pringle prosecuted his former friend, the publisher, and obtained a verdict. The West India body, in revenge, prosecuted Pringle, in the name of Wood, the former owner of Mary Prince; and, as he could not obtain evidence from the West Indies, he failed in proving the truth of his narrative, and was cast in damages. The cases were in reality neither Pringle versus Blackwood, nor yet Wood versus Pringle, but cases between the Anti-Slavery Society and the rancorous body of planters and their hired mouthpieces and agents in England. For himself, Pringle disclaims the prosecution, in the extract of a letter given:—"The prosecution of Blackwood is not an affair of mine. I wished to have replied in print, and I will still do so in a fourth edition of the tract. The blackguardism I cannot reply to; but there are some misrepresentations that require to be set right."

It is a remarkable fact that, on the very day after Pringle had concluded a service to which he had devoted the best years of his life, and the highest energies of his mind, he was seized with the fatal illness which in a few months terminated his virtuous and useful life. He burst a small blood-vessel, in a fit of coughing, which was followed in a day or two by a copious spitting of blood; and the usual symptoms of consumption, hitherto unsuspected, appeared in rapid succession. His prospects had darkened with the failure of his employment, even before his health gave way. An application made to Mr Spring Rice for an appointment at the Cape, was unfavourably received; and painfully does he say—"Many of the persons who will thus have a preference to me, were among the vilest tools of Lord Charles Somerset's administration. But to have been persecuted by a Tory government for maintaining Whig principles, or rather the principles of truth and justice, seems, even under a Whig administration, rather to one's disadvantage than otherwise." Before anything had been done, or even promised about the Cape appointment, which he solicited, the state of his health became so much worse that he was urged by Dr Clark to return to that colony, as the only chance of recovery. The means were totally wanting; but the written opinion of Dr Clark, communicated to Messrs Z. Macaulay and Buxton, was no sooner made known, than, in less than a week, funds were raised amply sufficient for the outfit and passage of himself, his wife, and her sister Miss Brown, who had been the inseparable and the faithful sharer of all their fortunes from their first embarkation for Africa. "Never," he says, "was anything more affectionate, delicate, and generous than the conduct of these two invaluable friends. . . . It is intended, I understand, after I am gone, to attempt something on a larger scale for my advantage." Spring Rice was again applied to, and, through him, the new Governor of the Cape, for a grant of land and money to stock it, in consideration of the losses Pringle had sustained through the tyranny of Lord Charles Somerset. His friends put all irons in the fire; but again without success; and he prepared to go out with merely a recommendation to Sir Benjamin D'Urban. But this was not to be. After a passage had been taken, the voyage was postponed, owing to his increased weakness; and he awaited that crisis, at home, for which "few men," his biographer emphatically says, "have ever been better prepared." Quite aware of the near approach of death, he prepared to meet it, and, to his latest hours, maintained the greatest cheerfulness and resignation. He died on the evening of the 8th December 1834, in the forty-sixth year of his age, regretted even by those who, in life, had been his adversaries. Enemies he could not have had, who is described "as one of the gentlest yet firmest of human beings; made up of qualities which excite, in equal proportions, affection and respect; one with whom benevolence was not a weakness, but a principle. . . . He was warm and steady in his attachments; but, though he would have risked his life for his friend, he would not have sacrificed his probity. He was deeply religious; but not of those devotees 'who crucify their countenances.' Cheerful, buoyant, and even gay, he exemplified his faith only in his actions. Open, generous, manly, and sincere, I may address him in the words of Charles Lamb—

'Free from self-seeking, envy, low design,
I have not found a whiter soul than thine.'

The poems collected in this volume, beautiful and tender in themselves, and well worthy of the admiration which they received from critics of no mean name, have the farther sacred object of being published for the benefit of Pringle's widowed partner and her sister. The sole means of support of these bereaved ladies, is stated to be an annuity of £20 a-year, purchased for them chiefly by some anti-slavery friends. This book is, therefore, no bookseller's speculation; and we earnestly trust that Mr Ritchie's labour of love will be amply rewarded, even in a pecuniary point of view. Pringle's claim of compensation we still consider a just one; but it is rarely that governments are just to the tolling pioneers in the march of civilization. It is left to the public to reward public benefactors.

Some of Pringle's poetical pieces were warmly admired by Coleridge, and were well worthy of the approbation of one whose instinct of the beautiful was as delicate as true. His African hunting songs breathe the fiery spirit of the old Border land—the region of Leyden and Scott; and some of his pastoral songs, the tender sweetness and simplicity of the Scottish love ballads. The African Sketches, in particular, possess a spirit, truth, and a freshness of imagery, which raises them far above the level of even very fair modern verses. The whole compose a volume which, we are certain, natives of Scotland, in all parts of the world, and those with any mixture of true Scottish blood in their veins, will dearly prize; and surely not the less that they know the poet to have been one of those men of whom his country has reason to be proud, for reasons much higher than either mere intellectual superiority or poetical accomplishment. Pringle "was the advocate and protector of the oppressed. He bequeathed to his fellow-countrymen the example of enduring virtue." Such qualities do not always mingle with the fame of the poet; but they were those of Pringle.

LONDON SKETCHES.

EQUIVOCAL SOCIETY.

BY TOBY ALLSPY.

It is surprising what a liberal fund of excuses people of the world are able to draw upon at night, for doing what is agreeable to them! At a fashionable watering place, such as Baden just now, and Bath half a century ago, everybody contrives to be afflicted with the very disorder for which the waters are a specific; and not a squire's lady, who grows weary of her country seat, but suffers severely from delicacy of the lungs, and is ordered for the winter to the south of France and its blee, or Brighton and its cutting breezes. Flirting mammas find it necessary to repair to Paris for the education of their daughters; while sporting papas consider it expedient to adhere to the covers and preserves of their country seat, in order to keep up electioneering interests for their son.

A house to which I occasionally repair for an evening's amusement, affords me a most amusing study of the hypocrisies of human nature. The proprietor has the honour to, what is termed, "enjoy" a very indifferent reputation. No matter to my readers, the origin of the scandal; whether he be a marker of cards, or boxer of the stock exchange—whether a seducer of other men's wives, or conniver at the seduction of his own—signifies not a jot. He is ill thought of in the world. Not a soul in society, but has heard things laid to his charge, the charge of which ought to lay him on the shelf. Nevertheless, his courage is undaunted. Either he despises the ill report of his fellow-creatures, or chooses to outface it. Mondor (so let us call him) is rich; gives dinners, balls, concerts, dejeunées, and fêtes of every description; and people of all descriptions attend his dejeunées, concerts, balls, and dinners. But, instead of saying, with a degree of audacity equal to his own, "I go there because it suits me—because I find amusement"—every species and variety of specious lie is adopted as an excuse for the indecorum of the measure.

"Are you going to Mondor's ball to-night?" said I, the other evening to Lord A., at a party where we chanced to encounter.

"I go there!" replied his Lordship, affecting a look of indignant amazement, because he fancied he could discover in my inquiry a tone of disapproval which guaranteed my absence. Yet the first person I beheld on entering Mondor's sumptuous house, was the Earl of A——.

"Are you going to Mondor's?" I had afterwards inquired of Miss B., a pretty girl standing near us.

"I fancy so," she replied; "Mondor was formerly under great obligations to my father; and mamma thinks it would look as though we presumed upon his situation if we constantly declined his invitations. Shall I meet you there?" continued the lady, turning to young Quickset of the Guards.

"I am afraid so. The fellow is rather strong in our county; and my cousin John means to stand the next vacancy."

"I am surprised to find that Mrs B., with so many daughters to marry, should take them to Mondor's," observed Lady Queenhithe, who was of the party. "I take Laura there now and then, because, as an only child, with her fortune, beauty, and accomplishments, it matters little where she is seen."

"If I had even one daughter, I would not go there!" observed Lady Cutandshuffie, to whom she was addressing herself. "But as I am sure of my rubber there, and, at my age, such things are immaterial, I seldom miss the man's parties."

"O fie!" ejaculated Lady Superfine. "It is all very well being seen at his grand balls, where all the rest of the world is seen also; but to be an habituée of such a house—a man of such very infamous character!"

"What right have we to trouble ourselves with the mote in our brother's eye?—because we are virtuous, shall there be no more cakes and ale?" cried Major O'Reilly, a man who has been bowed out of two regiments, and half a dozen London drawing-rooms. "Pon my soul and honour, Mondor's a deuced good fellow; and I consider it my duty, as a gentleman, to keep him in countenance."

"One does not go to keep him in countenance exactly," lisped a young gentleman, languishing through a near-sighted glass. "But that exquisite gallery! One cannot refuse oneself a sight now and then of his admirable Guido!"

"As far as reputation signifies," observed one of his lounging companions, "certainly no man ever lost himself more completely than Mondor. But he gives us such capital music! Griai, Rubini, and Tamburini once a fortnight! I consider it every man's duty to patronise so liberal a patron of the arts."

"Patron of a pack of lazy fiddlers!" cried old Drusus. "If that were all, no respectable man would lose himself by being seen in such company. But look at Mondor's public charities! Twenty guineas annually to the Mendicity Society; twenty to the Ophthalmic Hospital (though, by the way, it might be all the worse for him if the world were able to see clear;) twenty to the deaf and dumb (a word to the wise;) twenty to St George's Hospital; ten to the Houseless Poor; and five to the Small Debts; besides figuring in all the lists of to-the-humane-whom-heaven-has-blessed-with-affluence advertisements, from one year's end to the other. Such a man is a most desirable acquaintance—the sort of person for whom one is always looking out."

"I do not pretend to be a licensed dealer in charity-mongering," observed Sir George Shelfham, with a sneer. "The poor-laws take care of the poor, and we take care of the poor-laws. But when was Mondor ever behindhand when the prospectus of a work of merit was placed in his hands? He has obliged me by taking shares in several new periodicals, which might have survived to become old, had the public been as liberal as himself; and subscribed to I know not how many standard classical works, which, should the subscriptions fill, may, perhaps, one day or other see the light. Rising genius has a splendid patron in Mondor. Last year he was very near fitting out an expedition for Ulick O'Flannaghan's projected voyage of discovery to the Antarctic regions; and, entre nous, has advanced many hundreds towards the scheme. To be sure, nothing can be more disagreeable than to have such a man come up and accost one in the street. But certain sacrifices are due to the advancement of letters and the cause of science. I never miss one of Mondor's literary dinners and am therefore bound to attend his ball."

"Chacun a son goût!" cried Colonel Martinet, shrugging his shoulders. "I should expect to be poisoned at his table."

"The young Duchess has no such apprehension," said I. "I met her there at dinner last week."

"The Duchess dine at Mondor's?"

"I had the honour of sitting next her."

"You amaze me! I thought nothing but the worst company frequented his house?"

"Do you call the Marchioness of Aylsham and her daughters bad company?"

"And they visit him? Is it possible! Could you get me a card for his next fête? I always make it a point to meet the Aylshams when I have an opportunity. Perhaps you could take me there to-night?"

"Let us inquire of Lady Lindo whether the Aylshams are at the ball. See, she is just entering the room with her daughters. Are you come from Mondor's?—are there many people there?" said I, addressing her Ladyship, in a natural tone.

"Hush, hush!—not a word!—pray don't speak so loud! I would not let Lady Marmozet suspect I had been there for the world. She would whisper it all over the town, and it might be a great injury to the girls in a certain set."

"But why did you take them there, then?"

"Because I knew that William was invited, and things are getting rather particular between his Lordship and Sophis. However, I took care to be there early. People tried to persuade me that I ought to come here early, and go there afterwards. But, of course, at such a house, I did not choose to be seen by all the world. So, as soon as the room began to fill, I came away; and having arrived here thus early, no one will be able to prove that we were there at all."

The clock-regulated prudery which makes it criminal to be seen in society after midnight, which passes for respectable early in the evening, I am unable exactly to understand; and on reaching Mondor's crowded ball, I was fated to be still more puzzled by the curious tenderness of people's consciences.

"Let us make up a quiet little quadrille in this room," said Lady Letitia to her sister. "In such a house as this, it does not do to put oneself en évidence in the ball-room."

"Stay supper, indeed? Oh, dear, no!" cried Mrs Peachick. "It would by no means suit my views of propriety to be seen supping at Mondor's?"

"Heyday! you here?"—exclaimed another. "Well, I am amazed! I always fancied you one of the very precise people. I do not set up for one of the rigidly righteous. But you!"—

"Just listen to that shocking woman," mumbled Mrs Sneak, who was eating ices quietly in the corner. "As if it were not wrong enough to come here at all, without making a boast of it! Now, though I am weak and good-natured enough to accept Mondor's invitations, thank God, I have sufficient self-respect to keep it to myself!"

Some entered the ball-room bowing to Mondor with a patronising air, which spoke a sense of their own magnanimity, or Christian charity, in being seen under his roof. Some entered timidly, as if apologising to the society assembled for increasing the amount of the sinful company;

some saucily, brazening it through the crowded rooms, as if to say—"Here I am!—find fault with my proceedings if you dare;" some with an air of conscious virtue, implying, that, "to the pure, all things are pure."

Poor Mondor, meanwhile, unconscious of the vast movements going on behind the dial plate, kept bowing to one fair guest, and smiling to another; satisfied that all were delighted to be there, and that the absent were vexed and envious.

"Seven hundred invitations, and not above twenty excuses!"—he whispered to me, as we passed each other in the crowd. "I am afraid I have offended half the world by refusing cards. But what is one to do! In London, one's house is limited; and it is really unfair to crowd one's friends to death, in order to accommodate strangers. There is Colonel Martinet, I see, has kept away, because I refused to let him bring a whole family of country cousins. Mrs Peachick asked leave for her three younger daughters; Mrs Sneak wanted me to ask her aunt; and Lady Lindo is gone already, because I did not choose to let her invite the three regiments of guards as partners for the Miss Lindes!"

Little did my poor friend suspect the parting salutations at that moment exchanging in his hall.

"Good night, Littledale! You needn't say at home that you met me here."

"Of course not. In return, pray don't mention to my wife that I was here. I told her I was going to the opera."

"By the way, Lady Mary, this man's parties are never announced, I hope, in the Morning Post?"

"I am sure I hope not. If there were any danger of it, it would be worth while to give a dounce to the porter to leave out one's name."

"I wish to goodness my coachman would not get so low down in the string. There is William having my carriage called by every link-boy in waiting! Just listen! Not a person living in the street but will know that I was at Mondor's ball!"

"Well!—at least one comforts oneself by knowing that one has done a good-natured action. When people are under a cloud, it becomes a charity to support them. Can you tell me whether it is Gunter who serves Mondor's suppers, or whether he engages a man cook?"

"Can't say, indeed. The supper and music here are faultless. Poor man!—one does one's best for him, because he does his best for us. But it is a sacrifice. I came here in a hackney coach, because I did not choose my servants to know that I entered such a house. One cannot be too particular in upholding the standard of public morals."

Such are the equivocations of the frequenters of Equivocal Society.

HYMN TO SPRING.

Thou bringer of new life,
Welcome thou hither !
Though with thee comes the strife
Of changeful weather.
Oh, young and coldly fair,
Come, with thy storm-blown hair,
Down-casting snow pearls fair,
For earth to gather.

Approachest thou in shower ?
Mist hath enroll'd thee ;
Till, changed by viewless power,
Bright we behold thee.
Whilst chilling gales do fly,
Thou wanderest meekly, by Green holme and mountain high,
Till shades enfold thee.

By dusky woodland side,
Silent thou rovest ;
Where lonely runlets glide
Unheard thou moveest ;
Wide strewing buds and flowers,
By fields, and dells, and bowers,
'Mid winds and sunny showers,
Bounteous thou prevest.

Though ever changeful, still Ever bestowing ;
The earth receives her fill
Of thy good sowing ;
And, lo ! a spangled sheen
Of herbs and flowers between,
Blent with the pasture green,
All beauteous growing.

Now comes the driven hail,
Rattling and bounding ;
A shower doth next prevail,
Thunder astounding ;

Until the glorious sun
Looks through the storm-aloof sun ;
And, as the light doth run,
Glad tones are sounding.

The throats tune his throat,
On top-bough sitting ;
The oxale's wizard note,
By dingle sitting.
The loved one, too, is there—
Above his snow-plashed lair,
He sings, in sun-bright air,
Carol beating.

Come, ev'ry tone of joy !
Add to the pleasure !—
Sweet Robin's melody
Joins in the measure ;
And echoes wake and sing,
And fairy-bells do ring,
Where silver bubbles fling
Their sparkling treasure.

The hazel bloom is hung
Where beams are shining ;
The honey-bine hath clung,
Garlands entwining
For one who wanders lone Unto that bower unknown,
And finds a world his own,
Pure joys combining.

Then, bringer of new life,
Welcome thou hither !
And welcome, too, the strife,
Of changeful weather !
Oh, ever young and fair,
Cast, from thy storm-blown hair,
Bright drops and snow pearls fair,
For earth to gather.

BARDOUR

TO AN IDIOT.

Poor, witless youth ! come hither. Let me trace
What lines distinctive part thee from thy race :
Their voice thou hast—their features—upright form—
And heart that throbs with instinct not less warm.
But, ah !—the feelings of that heart are blind,
And stray unguided by far-seeing Mind ;
Where proud imperial Reason's throne should be,
Thou hast but dull and gloomy vacancy.
What varied fancies crowd to me, when'er
I mark—as toward me turns thine empty stare—
The quiet of the unreflecting eye !
No thought to mirror, or be lighted by,
It finds within ; and meaningless it reves,
Ne'er kindling, though it rest o'en where it loves !
And that strange hollow laugh I never hear,
Without replying by a sudden tear.
Alas ! on Earth, there is no light for thee—
Sightless, thou trav'lest to Eternity !
No stamp of thought is seen upon thy brow—
Th' unwritten page of Nature's book art thou !

Yet, can the angel say thou art not one
That Heaven's most favouring look is turn'd upon ?
Unknowing and uncaring, 'mid the strife
Of those who feel the duties born of Life—
Unbarm'd and harming none—the care and crime
Through which for ever is the march of Time,
Disturb thee not. The hours fly o'er thee fast,
With noiseless wings. The future, as the past,
Is but a blank—the present is a joy,
Ne'er mingled with that bitterest alloy,
The misery of mind. Rememb'ring naught
To cease thee pain, and wake desponding thought—
E'en safe from Him, the Demon, Foe of Man,
Undamp'd wilt thou live thy little span.
Thou dost not think upon the sunny hour
Of childhood ; nor lament that ev'ry flow'r

Which bloom'd about thee then, is faded now !—
Thou dost not weep the blighted hope !—the vow bandon'd soon as register'd !—the dream
Of joy, that, like the bubbles on the stream
By which, in boyhood's merry time, you roved,
Hath vanish'd !—the bright things that first you loved,
All changed—departed, wither'd, or grown cold !—
Thine heart thou feel'st not prematurely old !—
The hallow'd home you dwell in when a child,
Where on your early sports your mother smil'd—
The happy circle, broken up !—the days
Thou hadst not trodden Vice's tempting ways—
Of these thou thinkest not ; nor wilt ever know
That Recollection is a fount of we !

Yet those we deem the glorious of our race,
May not hereafter find a resting-place
As tranquil as the home prepar'd above
For thee, unconscious child of Heaven's love !

Oh, pausing in our passionate wild career,
Should we not gaze on thee, and, with a tear,
Not of compassion, but of envy, own
That, rather than possess an Empire's throne,
Thy fate we'd choose : To pass the time below
Sinless and sorrowless, and hence to go,
Without one heart-rent retrospective sigh,
To share the ever-during bliss on high !

What dost thou, Idiot, here on earth ? Thou art
Not one of us. Why dost thou not depart ?
Why wert thou sent at all ?—to mope alone ?
Outcast ! to find companionship in none ?
Vainly we ponder on that mystery—
All that we learn is, not to pity thee !

Kilkeny, 1832.

THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, AS IT WAS, AND AS IT IS.*

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

NO. III.—FRIENDS AT THE YEARLY MEETING.

In our last chapter, we introduced our readers to some acquaintance with the domestic manners and peculiar notions of the Friends; we will now take a view of them in their great annual assembly, which they themselves always designate by the simple title of "The Yearly Meeting." This is held in London, opening always on a Wednesday in the latter end of May, and continuing into the month of June, generally lasting about ten days or a fortnight. Of course, it is the most important event in their religious system, the most interesting season in their year. To this great meeting, the business of all their lesser meetings points, and is here consummated. In this meeting, every subject which, as Friends, they deem important, is discussed; every public act determined; and the religious condition and moral discipline of the Society are reviewed. To it delegates are sent from every quarter of the island; by it committees are appointed to receive appeals against the decision of minor meetings—to carry every object which is deemed desirable within their body, or beyond it, into effect; by it Parliament is petitioned; the crown addressed; religious ministers are sanctioned in their schemes of foreign travel, or those schemes restrained; and funds are received and appropriated for the prosecution of all their views as a Society.

For the better understanding of the working of their system, it may be as well to explain that, in every place in the kingdom where the Friends have a meeting-house for worship, they hold, once a month, after the meeting for worship is over, a meeting of discipline—a meeting, in fact, for the transaction of the civil affairs of the Society; such as providing funds for the support of the poor, for the education of the children of the poor; inquiring into the general moral condition of the meeting; or taking individual delinquents to task. This is called a preparative meeting—that is, a meeting preparative to the monthly meeting, which is a meeting consisting of several preparative meetings. To the monthly meeting, one or more representatives are sent from each preparative meeting; and, from the monthly meeting, others are sent to the quarterly meeting, which generally includes within its jurisdiction one or two counties; and, of course, several monthly meetings. From the quarterly meetings, then, in spring, representatives are sent to the yearly meeting; and here it should be understood, that the women, as well as the men, hold their preparative, monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings of discipline, as they are called. The grand basis of the Society is that of the most perfect human equality—an equality which, it was stated in the first of these papers, extended to sex as well as to every other condition of humanity. Women are placed on the footing of companions and co-heirs of all social rights and privileges, and, therefore, hold their own meetings of discipline, and transact all affairs belonging exclusively to their own sex; that is, they watch over the wants, interests, moral conduct, and religious consistency of the female part of the community; so that, at the close of a meeting for worship, once a-month, the women retire into another apartment, and open their books, and discuss their own concerns, as the men do theirs, in their meeting; and, of course, they send, to the monthly, quarterly, and yearly meetings, their own representatives too.

We will now suppose that the spring quarterly meetings, in each county throughout the kingdom, have been held; and both men and women have appointed their respective representatives, generally two or three of each sex in each quarterly meeting; and these important personages are on their way. But they are not on their way alone; for they are not the sole attendants of the yearly meeting. The system, as we have said, is a system of full and equal enjoyment of all social privileges; and, therefore, every individual of the Society has a clear

* Since the appearance of my last article on this subject, "A Member of the Society" has published in this Magazine some strictures on that and the preceding article; and it will very probably be asked by "Friends"—"What has William Howitt to say to those strictures?" My reply is—Nothing. In the first place, I never notice the observations of anonymous writers. I never, myself, write a syllable about any body of men without putting at the head of my remarks my name at length. My remarks are my own deliberate observations and convictions; and, unless my facts can be falsified, or my opinion changed, they can only stand as my avowed sentiments. If any one can convince the public that his sentiments are more rational, he is, of course, at perfect liberty. I could say a great deal on the points adverted to by the anonymous Friend; but all who have read the preceding papers must be aware that I avowed my intention to avoid controversy. All the arguments adduced by the anonymous Friend are perfectly familiar to me; and, if replied to, would lead to that very controversy that is raging in other quarters. I am content simply to record my honest view of the Society, as it was, and as it is. The anonymous Friend has, however, stated one thing as a fact, which is not exactly a fact—he has instanced various Continental languages as preserving the use of the singular pronoun, thou. Every one that knows anything of the Continental languages, knows that it is preserved only as we preserve it—partially; and that those of the educated classes addressing each other are most ceremoniously scrupulous in avoiding the use of the second person singular.

right to attend the yearly meeting in his own person. The only difference between the representatives and the other members, as to attendance, is, that the representatives must attend; every other individual may attend, if he or she please. And great are the numbers which do attend; for, it may well be supposed, that such a meeting must have many attractive attributes to every one who loves the conversation of Friends—who loves the Society, and is interested in the judicious management of its affairs. The representatives are charged, of course, with all specific matters of business; but every individual is interested in every general discussion, and in bringing it to the best termination. Every man, therefore, as he possesses the right, may, if he please, take part in the general business; may give an opinion when an opinion is necessary; and there naturally arise some men, more adroit, or who take more pleasure in the discussion of the Society's affairs in their meetings, and who come to be called great disciplinarians; but every man may offer his opinion; and numbers do offer them in a very brief shape indeed.

But, besides the attraction of debate, of religious and moral interest, in the Society, we may believe that the attractions of a social nature are not the less powerful. The yearly meeting is a grand point, at which Friends from every quarter of the island meet, where old Friends may renew their fellowship, and young ones may become acquainted, and form the most interesting connections. Behold, then, every motive which can stir the human frame—apostleship, leadership, friendship, acquaintanceship, courtship—all at work to send up old and young to the yearly meeting. The care of the Church is on some—its ministry, its money, its morality, or reformation; the renewal of old ties, the meeting, once more, of “the old familiar faces,” draws others; and many a fairy vision, no doubt, floats beneath the shadow of beaver or drab-bonnet, making the smoky walls of London more delightful, in perspective, than the green fields and quiet paradises of home. Accordingly, when the time approaches, the question, Who is going to the yearly meeting? circulates through every place where Friends reside, with a daily increased rapidity and intensity; and those who are not averse to take the charge of representation on their shoulders, are not backward to announce, that “they have some thoughts of going.” Sly old disciplinarians, however, who have felt what it is to sit out every meeting and committee, morning, afternoon, and evening, for a fortnight, and are quite willing to be excused the onus and responsibility of the office, keep their tongues in their heads; and young ones, quite as sly in their schemes of pleasure, are as silent too. “Oh, they should like it very much; but they really can hardly hope for such a treat—matters of business are so pressing at home. Perhaps father, or mother, or uncle, will be going, and then they must be at home. They see little chance.” They know very well that, if they only let it slip out, that they mean to be there, some good Friend, at the quarterly meeting will be sure to call out their names when the time for nomination of representatives arrives; and they are nailed, not only to going, but to a daily attendance at meetings and committees, while, many a fascinating party is made by their less engaged friends on days of less general interest—days when none but members of committees and representatives are wanted at meetings—to the exhibitions of paintings, the British Museum, the Zoological Gardens, and other places, where young hearts, indulging the same tastes, and occupied by the same objects of admiration, naturally grow into closer union and into warmer sympathy. No, the “Quaker sly” was not a truer epithet when Pope wrote it, than it is now; and, when the hour of nomination comes in the quarterly meeting, you would really think that nobody was going at all; that nobody could possibly be found to take the honorable office of representative. Name after name is called out; but one does not know that he is likely to be there: who, indeed, can see into the futurity of a fortnight? Another confesses that he “has had some thoughts of it, but cannot see his way clear as yet.” A third “would like to enjoy the privilege of once more being at the yearly meeting, and perhaps may be favoured, to attend, but has had his name down these last three or four years—thinks it cannot be required of him at this time—thinks it well that some of the dear youth should be nominated—that it is well that they should be taking on them the yoke of duty, and growing up to fill the places of those valuable ancient members who are, from time to time, going from works to rewards.”

Well, a whole catalogue of young Friends are called upon forthwith—but catch them if you can! No; none, but the unlucky or devoted mortals who have let it transpire before-hand that they “had intentions,” are to be caught; or those few patriotic characters, who give way at the demand of pressing duty, consent to go up, and dedicate themselves to the service of the Church, because none else can be found—the very rams whose horns are caught in the thickets of necessity for especial public sacrifice.

The number, however, is sure to be made up, and then very pleasant it is after meeting to compare notes—men and women. “Who are appointed by your meeting?” “Oh, John Such-an-one, and Thomas Such-an-one.” “And who by yours?” “Oh, Susanna Such-an-one, and Rachel So-and-so, and Jane Such-a-Friend!” And then comes the news who are the representatives from the neighbouring quarterly meetings, and the time is looked forward to, and a pleasant season is anticipated. And, lo! as it comes near, it turns out, that plenty of Friends are going. Those who “had not thought of it” before the quarterly meeting, have thought of it seriously since. Those who “did not see their way clear,” have found the atmosphere brighten up amazingly. Matters of business have given way to the young have found fathers or uncles are not going, so that they can all go very well together. In short, the only difficulty now is to secure places by the coaches. On going to take a place by the mail about this time, you are pretty sure to find the whole inside taken by Friends! Inside and outside, you see them proceeding from all parts of the country for a few days before the commencement of the meeting. The day before, they pour into London by tribes—coaches and private carriages, barouches and chaises; you meet them on every road near the metropolis, travelling, if in their own carriages, at an easy pace and with goodly horses—for a merciful man is merciful to his beast; and, besides, they are not fond of hurrying themselves. In London, even at this thronging season of the year, when all the worlds of this kingdom are met in it—the world of fashion, the religious world, the parliamentary world, the world of pleasure, and the world of business, jumbled and confounded together out of doors, however distinct they may be within; when vehicles, public and private carriages, omnibuses, break-neck cabs, patent carriages, cars, waggon, britchkas, tilburies, are rushing, crushing, scouring, and dashing together, as if their only aim were the utmost pitch of speed and confusion; when ministers of State and ministers of religion, popular orators and popular preachers, are thronging to their particular places of exhibition—to St Stephens, or to Exeter Hall, to nightly debates or anniversary occasions; when visitors of Exhibitions, and troops of lawyers watching the progress of private bills, are all swelling the tide and tumult of the Great Babel—even at this multitudinous season, the influx of Friends becomes strikingly conspicuous. The city is their place of resort. Bishopsgate Street, where their meeting is situated, in which the yearly meeting is held, is the great place of their gathering together.

We have on more than one occasion travelled up to town with a whole inside of Friends, and we could not help imagining that those who are apt to regard them as a very self-denying people, would have seen with some degree of wonder the quiet indulgence in which they travelled on. Going up to the yearly meeting, is like the going up of the Israelites of old to the Passover at Jerusalem—and it is plain that it is a time of feasting and good cheer. At every meal, our Friends seemed to enjoy themselves with a sense of the good things of Providence which even Solomon must have approved, when he said, "Let us eat and drink, for it is the gift of God." I speak now more particularly of one full-grown and full-fed party which filled the coach as a nut is filled with its kernel. They enjoyed the festivities of the table, and laid in stores of substantial food for discussion in the intervals of travel. At breakfast, they ordered a quantity of eggs to be hard-boiled, to take with them, and a pint of Sherry, which they carefully decanted into a handsome wine flask. Whenever the horses were changed at any place noted for the production of any good thing, they sent and procured of it:

at one place a Stilton cheese; at another, a cream cheese; nay, even young radishes were purchased. It was evident that they were providing for the lodgings in town which were themselves already provided—for experienced yearly-meeting goers, always secure good and appropriate quarters, before leaving the "warm precincts" of their own houses. This party being a stout and jolly quartet, and the weather being unusually warm for the season, they travelled with the coach-doors open, to get as good a share of fresh air as they had already got of provisions. Every coachman and every traveller that we met, wondering at the winged aspect of our vehicle, its doors both standing wide, invariably cried, "Coachman, your doors are open!" Coachman nodded assent, and went on without farther notice, to the increased astonishment of the people. If our Friends, however, took good care of themselves, it was evident that they extended their care to all those, too, who had a claim of fees upon them; for those invariably expressed their lively satisfaction on feeling the gratuity in the palm, by the most expressive faces, and other indubitable signs. Let no one accuse me of wishing to represent sober Friends as gourmands. I here merely relate a particular case which I have seen; and I am bound, by a large experience, to describe them truly as temperate, but yet a self-indulgent people, who, in fulfilment of their own and the Psalmist's prayer, have been led to "lie down in green pastures and by the still waters."

The mingling of plain coats, broad hats, friendly shawls, and friendly bonnets, in the great human stream that for ever rolls along the pavées of the city, is in that neighbourhood, at this season, become very predominant. As you pass along almost any street thereabouts, you see at the upper windows of all the inns, and at numbers of the private houses, tribes of Friends' faces. Collarless coats and plain caps catch your eye at every turn. Bishopsgate Within and Bishopsgate Without, Gracechurch Street, Houndsditch, Liverpool Street, Old Broad Street, Sun Street, almost every street of that district, fairly swarms with Friends. The inns and private lodgings are full of them. The White Hart and the Four Swans, are noted places of their sojourn. It is said, I suppose more in joke than earnest, that, while the yearly meeting lasts, almost every article of food or luxury rises in price—fresh butter, poultry, eggs, veal, lamb, and vegetables, are dreadfully dear; and that jarvies are more than ordinarily difficult to deal with. No doubt, Friends help to swell the tide of strangers at this crisis, and to increase those effects which are felt distinctly enough in "the season."

It is curious to see the numerous groups of Friends that are there moving about: threes and fours of young women in their dove-coloured garbs, and quiet fresh faces; the men-Friends moving along at a more leisurely pace than Londoners are wont; the stately dowdy-like matrons, most plump and well-fed personages, with their silk gowns folded carefully round them, and held with one hand, while they lean with the other on some staid man-Friend, or some slender slip of a growing son, who sees mighty London, wondering, yet with a quiet face, for the first time in his life. It is curious to see the many quaint and picturesque figures of men, some with their looped-up hats and walking-canes, and distinct air of wealth and citizenship, which clearly marks them as men of note in their own distant cities; others lank and long, with flying limbs and raiment of uncouth cut, who have evidently issued from far-off dales and secluded abodes, to bear the din and jostle of London a brief while, for the fellowship of spirit to be found in the yearly meeting; and others, again, especially the young, with a cut of coat, progressing by rapid degrees from the most antiquated pattern of Quakerism to the nearest possible approach to the fashionable style of the day; not, indeed, with dress-coats, but with coats scalloped to resemble them—not with collared coats, but with coats rolled to resemble collars!—timid approaches to what is not worth approaching if it be not worth adopting, a mulish state between the man-Friend and the man of fashion, a hankering condition on the borders of the broad land of common observance, when a bold leap from the narrow pound of sectarian living had been at once more manly and becoming.

It is equally curious, and far more delightful, to see the continual recognitions of different parties, the running across the street to meet each other, the hearty shaking of hands, and introductions of each other to mutual friends, and the hearings and tellings of news of old friends and relatives in every part of the kingdom; of who is here, and who is not, and where different parties are located. This is what is continually passing in the streets at the first coming up of Friends; and at the different inns and lodgings, many are the visits and the similar inquiries. Numbers, as I have observed, have taken their lodgings before coming up; and those being known to their own friends, serve as guides and links to the discovery of others. At the inns, they have a table d'hôte, at which they generally breakfast and dine; and here they can invite any of their friends as their guests. Every Friend's house at this time has its guests; and many of the wealthy keep a sort of open house, and invite as many to their tables as their houses will possibly hold. At their tables, and the tables d'hôte, there is a continual circulation of fresh faces; and you are sure, at the one or other of them, to meet, during the yearly meeting, almost every person of distinction in the Society. There are always some individuals of interest amongst them—popular ministers, or leading persons of one kind or other at almost every table. Nothing, therefore, can exceed the facility of introduction, and the formation of new acquaintances by those young persons who are desirous of making them.

The business of the yearly meeting commences by the assembling of the meeting of ministers and elders, previous to the meeting of the body at large. What is done here I cannot positively say; for these persons form a secret conclave—a thing little in keeping with the general democratic form and spirit of the Society; and, therefore, of late years, an object of considerable jealousy, and where the late divisions appear to have originated. This select body, however, receives and hands to the meeting at large all "Testimonies" of ministers and elders; records and takes cognizance of all writings of members on the doctrines of the Society; and what more does not so clearly appear. Leaving, then, the meeting of ministers and elders, let us come to the general assembly of the yearly meeting; and in describing this, I shall describe it in its general character. We do not want to know what was done at any particular yearly meeting, but to have a clear notion of what the yearly meeting is at all times. To do this, we must take it in three points of view—its mode of transacting business, the sort of business which occupies it, and its general aspect and character. The place of its meeting is, in fact, a cluster of three meeting-houses. On entering the meeting-house yard where the Friends are assembling, the first thing which strikes you is the extreme plainness of their dress. Meeting Friends as you do in their ordinary places of abode, you often feel, especially in the young, the marked departure from the strictness of the old costume; here, on the contrary, you are surprised at the general retention of it. This may, perhaps, be accounted for in a great measure by the fact, that, after all, the most orthodox are those who attend the yearly meeting; and that even the young, who are not too particular on other occasions, may select the plainest coat from the wardrobe, to wear on an occasion where it is likely to be most in esteem.

It is a pleasant sight now to see the women Friends proceeding to their own meeting; a lengthening train of fair creatures, clad in vestures as delicate as a dove's; matrons and mothers in Israel of stately and dignified manner, mingled with younger forms and faces, as fair as any that the sun of England shines upon; but all calm and serious in demeanour, free and independent beings in their character of Christian women, proceeding to act for themselves and their sister friends, with an ability and decorum which might shame male assemblies in places of the highest pretension.

But the doors of the men's meeting are thrown open, and in they are going. Let no one, however, whatever be his curiosity, attempt to enter who is not a member of the Society. Near the door stands one who marks with a sharp eye any one who is a stranger to him, especially if he have a worldly coat on his back. If he doubts him, he steps forward, and asks whether he be a member, and with a quiet, keen look, that seems ready to detect whether the answer have truth in it. If he still doubts, he demands his name, and that of his monthly meeting. Having these, he has only to go to any known member of that monthly meeting, to identify the individual at once, or detect the imposition.

It may be asked, why so much care to exclude strangers? What mysteries are there celebrated, that need so much secrecy? What Elusian rites, what inquisitorial tortures, or masonic arcanæ, are concealed in a Friends' Meeting, that require such jealous hiding? And, since some differences of opinion on certain points of doctrine, or matters of practice have arisen in the Society, it has frequently been asked, by the movement party, why not allow the free publication of the proceedings of the meeting? The answer to these queries is very simple. The Society is a corporation of private individuals, united upon the basis of certain common principles of faith and morals, and for the enjoyment of them; and it is not amenable to the public, nor has the public any claim of inquisition into its proceedings, while its opinions, which are well known, and its practices, which are equally cognizable, are not injurious to the peace or good of society. As a question of right, therefore, it has the clearest title to confine the witnessing of its proceedings to its own members; and, as to propriety, it must be recollected that one of the Society's most prominent principles of association, is the inquiry into the necessities and maintenance of its poor; another, the education of their children; a third, the moral right of its body, as a Christian Church, to exercise a watchfulness and a power of admonition and rebuke over its members; and it must be obvious enough, that these circumstances, and the raising and applying of the necessary funds, must involve many points of personal and peculiar delicacy, which no one ought to witness, or to desire to intrude himself into, who is not a member, and bearing a common portion of the public burden—pecuniary, moral, and religious. Then, let it be recollected what would be the situation of the ladies in their meetings, if they were exposed to the intrusion of even such of their own sex as chose to go in; or to have their deliberations exposed to the utmost publicity. A circumstance, which I have repeatedly heard stated in their Society, as having occurred at the yearly meeting, may give a pretty good notion of what such an openness of proceedings would subject them to; and that is, that one of the royal princes—I have heard it stated by some as the Prince of Wales, by others the Duke of York, but certainly one of them—took it into his head to witness the proceedings of the women-Friends; and, for that purpose, introduced himself, in the disguise of a young woman-Friend's dress, into the meeting. Though but a slim and smooth-faced youth at the time, he was presently detected; for it is impossible that any young man, even of the Society, could ever successfully imitate the delicate niceties of dress and bearing of a young woman-Friend of taste and education. And we may very well believe that the wild young Prince, who had come there to make use of his eyes—perhaps to see if he could not find, like his father, another Anna Lightfoot—could not preserve a very staid and passive aspect. In fact, he forgot himself, and, thrusting his hand into his pocket, displayed, through the pocket-hole of his gown, the yellow buckskins that he wore beneath. The incident is quite sufficiently instructive on the subject of facility of entrée into the women's yearly meeting, at least.

Of late, it has been the practice of certain parties, to take notes of the proceedings of the yearly meeting, and communicate them to the newspapers; and, strongly as I am persuaded of the benefit of the utmost publicity which can be given to the transactions of all corporate bodies, consistent with the delicacy just adverted to, it must be confessed that this proceeding, protested against as it has been by many members, and by the clerk, as the official organ of the meeting, has been a breach of honour, and a doing evil that good might come of it. However much we may regret that the meeting does not give all rational publicity to its discussions, and however much we may feel satisfied that by this publicity it would consult its best interests, still, till it chooses to do so, it has the most undoubted right to refuse; and whoever violates the clear sense of the Society on this head, violates the law of honour and integrity. It is to be hoped that, as a strong desire seems to exist in the religious public, to be made acquainted with its proceedings, the yearly meeting will adopt the plan of the House of Commons, allowing regular reporters; but reserving to itself, on any question of delicacy, the right to resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, whose deliberations shall be sacredly private. But, in order that it should be understood what is really the opinion of the bulk of the Society on this subject, the question itself should be submitted to the vote.

We have been stopped on our entrance, however, into the yearly meeting, not only by the wary janitor, but by a very grave and knotty question. The meeting-house appropriated to the business of the men, is capable, I suppose, of holding two or three thousand people. It is seated with rows of seats, ascending from near the centre of the house to the wall, each way, in the manner of the House of Commons; and, instead of the Speaker's chair in front, runs across another ascending platform of seats, meeting those of the two sides. Around the meeting above, runs a spacious gallery. The Friends pass on, and place themselves where they please, except that the ministers, elders, representatives, and other Weighty Friends, (a phrase that will presently call again our attention to it,) arrange themselves on the cross seats at the head of the meeting; in the midst of which is placed a plain table, at which the clerk and his assistants are to sit. The first act of the meeting is to choose this clerk. In his "Portraiture of Quakerism," Clarkson says, that the yearly meeting, unlike other large popular assemblies, has no chairman; but the clerk is, in fact, both chairman and secretary. He is the centre of business. To him, and those immediately about him, every one addresses himself. He announces what subject is next coming before the meeting; and he pronounces what termination it has arrived at;

and, moreover, in his capacity of secretary, records the decision in a minute. To counterbalance this onerous combination of offices, he has an assistant appointed him, who reads long articles, and otherwise lessens the amount of his duties. The clerk being chosen, he takes his place at the table, and places on record the opening of the yearly meeting. The names of the representatives are delivered in, and entered on the book.

We cannot here pretend to give an exact detail of the proceedings of the meeting; it will be sufficient to state, generally, that the meeting is held by repeated adjournments, generally morning and afternoon, from day to day, till the business is gone through. The meetings for worship are held regularly on the regular days, Thursdays and Sundays. The first great business of the meetings is to read and consider the answers from all the quarterly meetings, to a standing set of queries on the moral and religious condition of the Society; whether there be any "religious growth" in the Society; whether all social and moral duties are carefully discharged; whether Friends are mindful to be faithful subjects, obedient to the laws, good citizens, and just in their dealings with all men; whether they educate their children, and the children of their poor members; and whether they maintain their "testimonies" steadfastly before men, and live in love one with another. Epistles are read from the yearly meeting of Friends in Ireland, and from those of the various States of America; and committees are appointed to draw up answers. They have committees also sitting on the affairs of their public schools, on the subject of slavery, and other matters in which they take a high interest, and on which they often feel bound to address the crown, petition Parliament, and call upon the public for its aid or attention. They also receive an account of all the seizures upon the members of the Society for tithes, church-rates, &c., generally amounting to about £14,000 a-year; and a committee draws up a general epistle to the members of the Society, which is afterwards canvassed and adopted in the meeting at large; and then printed, and folded in a particular form, and sent to be read, first in the quarterly, then in the monthly, lastly in the preparative meetings, and then, at the doors of the meeting-houses, distributed to the head of every individual family.

This is a bare outline of the kind of business which occupies the yearly meeting; but there is a good deal in its manner of conducting its business which is peculiar to itself. The discussion of every question, however exciting it may appear in its own nature, is carried on with a coolness and passive quietness which forms the most remarkable contrast to the tumult, vehemence, noise, and confusion of popular assemblies in general. There is no attempt to excite the feelings and the passions. There is no attempt at anything like oratory or zealous pleading; every one states his opinion, or gives his evidence on any question, in the most deliberate, plain and concise manner possible. There is, in fact, a sort of Spartan brevity used, that it would be most difficult for any one accustomed to the free and animated style of harangue, used in public meetings or in Parliament, to acquire. An attempt to influence the mind of the assembly by anything like artful or vehement language, would alarm and shock the whole body, and produce exactly the contrary effect to the one aimed at. The Friends consider that they sit there to hear and ascertain the truth, and to come to such a decision as shall consist with truth, and the dignity of Christian minds. They look upon themselves as sitting in the presence of the Divine Spirit, and under its guidance, and think it equally an affront to that pure and sacred presence, and to the sound sense of grown men, to use or to suffer any passion to be stirred, or practice to be employed, which may unsettle that calmness of spirit most conducive to right judgment. Truth and justice being their objects, they deem them only to be arrived at by the simplest, the clearest, and most honest means. The speakers, therefore, speak calmly and briefly, and are listened to with profound silence. Such a thing as a token of approbation or dissent from the audience is literally unknown. If the speaker wander from the point, he is immediately reminded of it by the clerk, or by some one calling the clerk's attention to the fact; but such a thing as a hiss, a groan, a clapping of hands, or stamping of feet, is never heard within these walls. How would such an assembly be startled and confounded by a fiery outbreak like Sheil's in the House of Commons! A cry of hear! hear! would electrify the whole place. Such vehemence of harangue, such vivacity of attention, would sound there as much out of place, as music in a tomb. To one who has mingled in more stirring elements, it is strange to witness such equanimity of speech and passiveness of attention: the whole body listens without the slightest outward indication of their inward impressions; they break out into no murmur of indignation or surprise; they smile at no sally of wit or humour; they express no weariness or dissent; the speaker only knows that he is heard, and that is all.

But what is, perhaps, more singular than their mode of speaking and writing, is their mode of deciding. All other popular assemblies decide by a show of hands—that is, by numbers; but Friends decide by weight. They take no show of hands, not even on the most vital questions; they do not consult the voice of the majority; the question with them is—What is the opinion of the WEIGHTY FRIENDS? I alluded to this term of Weighty Friends, just now, and it is one to which none but Friends can attach any meaning. It simply means, men of influence, weight of character—moral character, and experience. These, by a singular anomaly in the Quaker system, are permitted to decide and settle everything, and that often without assigning a single reason. The Society being ostensibly founded on the principle of equality of right, one would have supposed that in its assemblies every individual would have a vote; but not so. All are presumed to live under the divine influence; but certain characters are supposed to live more closely under it; to be more watchfully attentive to its monitions. These are imagined, by this sort of reasoning, to be living nearer to the principle of all truth, and, therefore, more sure of deciding according to it; and so a few of them have only to arise and say simply, "My opinion is so and so," and "I am quite of that Friend's opinion;" and they carry the question against the whole body. It must be confessed that this is a singular phenomenon in a body of men who have shewn themselves, in other respects, so independent, and affords another striking demonstration how easily men, by their feelings, may be drawn into slavery, if not to priestcraft, yet to something very much akin to it. The pretence of spiritual sanctity is here set up in opposition to the clearest of recognised rights—that of individual vote, and the judgment of the majority; and when this custom is taken in connexion with the close meetings of ministers and elders, already mentioned, and it is understood that these Weighty Friends are, for the most part, those very same people, it must be confessed that this is a very dangerous concession of right and reason to an assumption of spiritual sanctity in a ministry; and is, unquestionably, the weakest point of the Quaker system. These Weighty Friends are, moreover, generally found to be the men with weighty purses. Wealth as uniformly gets to the head of the Friends' meeting as it does to the head of any other body; and even this simple people have an aristocracy of wealth amongst them, as marked as the aristocracy of the country at large. There are some few opulent families, which a young Friend, whatever his moral or intellectual rank, would, unless opulent himself, as soon thing of proposing a matrimonial alliance with, and no sooner, than with the most exclusive of our national nobility. These things, spite of all professions and all systems to the contrary, will be; but it behoves a people equally distinguished for their good sense and independence of character, to guard jealously against the predominance of monied or sanctimonious influence, by the rational protection of individual vote; and it is with satisfaction, as a lover of the great principles of the Society, that I have seen, of late years, a growing spirit in the mass of the community to remedy this palpable defect.

That, then, is the mode of transacting the business of the yearly meeting—the kind of business I have already alluded to; but there are a few subjects of its attention which demand a more distinct mention; and, indeed, the highest possible praise. These are—justice to the Negro and the American Indian; opposition to tithes, and other impositions of the State Church; denunciation of war; the improvement of prison discipline, and the promotion of education. From their first existence as a body, they have never ceased to denounce tyranny and bloodshed; to struggle for the freedom of the oppressed, and the reformation of the depraved. These are the topics which warm up even their discussions to something like eloquence; on these they are unanimously agreed, and are ready to devote their persons and their purses most freely. These are the traits in their character which make us rejoice in their accumulation of wealth, and inspire us with a hope that they will yet add more zeal to their integrity, and boldness of action to their purity of heart.

But we have not yet seen the women-Friends in the midst of their deliberations. There they are, nevertheless, all this time, in their own court, engaged in deep discussion on all that affects their female polity—weighing their moral and religious growth or retrogression, admonishing on the past, taking measures for the future, with as much gravity, ability, and tact as their brethren can shew in theirs. Vain, however, would be all our desires to take a peep into this peaceful Amazonian republic, into this forum of fair pleaders, were it not for the kind intervention of one of their body. Such obliging Friend now sits on our right hand; and she tells us that nothing in this whole assembly struck her so much, on her first visit to it, as the array of stately forms and fine heads displayed by the more matronly part of the assembly; that the sight of such a company of ladies—a company completely filling a large meeting-house from side to side and end to end, all dressed in the same style of simple elegance, and all quietly attending to the transaction of their affairs—had something very novel and interesting in it; but that the ministers and elders, and other matronly women, had a dowager-like air and dignity about them that was quite peculiar, with a placid purity of countenance that few dowagers of the fashionable world could lay any claim to. The full and portly forms of many of them seemed to speak of easy and even Sybaritic lives—of good tables, soft couches, and carriages of smoothest locomotion. Their countenances had a freshness and a freedom from "spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," at a very advanced age, that were truly surprising, and told of an existence that had passed like a velvet dream, far from all tyrant passions and vehement emotions. We have seen countenances amongst them that are the finest of their kind that can be imagined; such ample and well chiselled features, such fine expansions of forehead, scorning every false and meretricious ornament—the silver hairs of age, in all their honest simplicity, shewing themselves only around them. Others, again, with a stern and masculine style of countenance—cold, determined, commanding women, who have left their homes, and crossed the seas, and traversed wildernesses, in a sense of duty, which would shrink from nothing which it deemed to be demanded of it; masculine intellects in female forms, yet without the softness impressed by feminine feelings; heads and features which filled you, while you looked on them, with strange ideas of Spartan mothers, or the conceptions of Michael Angelo, and which, indeed, it would have been worth anything for a painter or a sculptor to behold. Others, again, of a Raffael character: faces full of the softest blandest feelings; souls of womanly affection; eyes, large and liquid, that beamed with tenderness; piety that, in softest tones, dropped words of sympathy, which fell like dew. The weather was warm, and our fair friend found these ladies sitting unbonneted—so that they were seen to great advantage; for, while a coiffure of the strictest simplicity and great uniformity, the plainest Quaker-cap, gave a sameness to the continued line of heads, their individuality of character, of feature, and expression, was only the more strongly brought out.

But, in the midst of her contemplation of these heads, our fair informant's attention was arrested by a circumstance which, though common enough in Friends' meetings, is nowhere else to be witnessed, and which must appear very strange to other people. A woman-Friend was in the midst of a sermon—for Friends, in these meetings, mingle sermons and business very oddly together—for the movements of the Spirit are not to be restrained by the movements of business, and often manifest themselves very differently from what one would expect, from the general harmony of the divine economy, and very much to the dislocation of the discipline—a woman-Friend was preaching, when the door softly opened, and there appeared at it a little company of men. This was a well-known minister and two Friends, his companions on the occasion. They stepped quietly in; but the woman-Friend went on; for she was in the body of the meeting, and her back was towards them.* It was true that this visit from the men had been announced, and the ministers in the front gallery, who before seemed to occupy every inch of the whole line of it, now compressed themselves, and their liberal garments, into so much less space as to leave room for their visitors in the midst of them, whither, with soft steps, they were advancing. But the woman-Friend—though she knew these visitors were expected, though she saw the female ministers in the gallery quickly put on their bonnets, and make space for the men-Friends, and though their steps were heard on the floor—yet, the burden of her own spirit was too mighty to permit her to attend to these signs; on she went, higher and higher, louder and louder; and the poor men paused, and stood still. Anon, the preacher seemed to pause, and again they advanced a few paces; but again she went on, and they were compelled to stand—three tall men, bolt upright, yet with subdued looks, in their dark habiliments—in the midst of one wide expanse of sitting women, in light-coloured garments. There was something very ludicrous in the scene. They seemed, notwithstanding their subdued looks, as though they would fain be at their seat, and the elderly ladies as though they would be glad if the preacher had done; but there was no alternative: they must bide her time. She ceased, and they advanced, and, after a pause, the Friend delivered what he had to say; a second pause, and they retired.

These visits are very singular; and, what is more singular, the women have their messages to the men's meetings. One would have thought such an adventure too formidable for any woman; but ministering women-Friends seem to have no fear, and acknowledge no nerves. When a Friend "feels a drawing" to visit the women's meeting, he announces the fact to his own meeting; a message is dispatched, to inquire if it be convenient to receive such a visit; and, on the return of an affirmative answer, away he goes, accompanied by one or two Friends appointed for the purpose. Just the same is the form in case of a "drawing" on the part of a female minister. This custom is as old as the Society, and of the most common occurrence; but, of late, Luke Howard, the meteorologist, has made direct war upon it, as disorderly, prejudicial to business, and of no good result of any sort; and it is probable that a very short time will witness its extinction.

Let us now take one more view—one general view of Friends in the yearly meeting—and then good-by to them. They are assembled at a meeting of worship, be it on Thursday or Sunday. All business has ceased; men and women are met together. It is true, we have not the whole body here; for they have various meetings in and about the metropolis; and, on these days, each attends his own place, and the stranger ministers disperse themselves amongst them, in common language, "as they please"—but in theirs, "as they are drawn." Some are gone to the West-End, some to Stoke-Newington or Tottenham, some to Peckham or Camberwell. We will go into the city; for there we shall find, perhaps not the most aristocratic, but the greatest number. You now understand pretty well the constitution and disposition of a Friends' meeting. The men are sitting all on one side by themselves, with their hats on, and presenting a very dark and sombre mass; the women sitting together, on the other, as light and attractive. In the seats below the gallery, are sitting many Weighty Friends, men and women, still apart; and, in the gallery, a long row of preachers, male and female, perhaps twenty or thirty in number. You may count safely on a succession of sermons and prayers. Men and women arise, one after another, and preach in a variety of styles, but all peculiar to Friends. Suddenly, a man-minister takes off his hat, or a woman-minister takes off her bonnet; he or she drops quietly on the bass before them; at the sight, the whole meeting rises and remains on its feet while the minister enters into "supplication." Most singular, striking, and picturesque are often the sermons you hear. As we entered a meeting last year, a female was in the act of speaking. She stood aloft in the centre of the gallery—a woman considerably in years. Her tall form, her bonnet of an odd, wild air, the long grey shawl, hanging to her feet and enveloping her figure like the robes of a priestess, and the arm held aloft in the energy of a wild and figurative strain of denunciation, made her appear some weird woman of a by-gone age, some prophetic of the troubled times, such as came forth in the plague, or issued from the hiding-places of the Covenanters, rather than a woman, a lady indeed, of these smooth, oily, and commonplace days. She appeared the fit descendant of the Mary Dyers and Barbara Blaugdens of the first days of Quakerism, who went into New England in spite of menaces of death, only too surely fulfilled; or into the precincts of the English Universities, to warn the wild collegians, and to suffer at their hands. The strangers present seemed electrified; the sensation was general and vivid; the tears were running down the cheeks of hardy men, and were only hidden on numbers of softer faces by a wide display of cambric handkerchiefs. For ourselves, we must confess we were more amazed than moved; and, the harangue over, turned with a more pleasing interest to notice that striking and unique spectacle which the young women-Friends, sitting together in one great mass, present. They are continually compared to doves; and, it must be confessed, the tout-ensemble is very dove-like. There is such a delicacy and spotless purity in their whole appearance, and they sit in such a profound and devotional quietude; there is such a subduedness and, indeed, total absence of colouring in the whole scene, so different from the strong and varied colouring of most assemblages of females; there is something so unworldly, so cool, so exquisitely clean and fresh—that they look rather like an assembly of spirits or of vestals, than women who have to move amongst the corrodings, harassings, and bedimmings of every-day life. It must be confessed that, though the costume of the men is not to be much commended for its grace, that of the elderly women-Friends is very becoming, and that of the younger ones truly graceful; and by their taste, they have even given it a certain elegance. The bonnets of the most genteel and refined amongst them have a striking superiority of figure over those of the rest, though constructed of the same materials. Their shawls are more tastefully disposed. There is an air, a style about the young Quaker lady which it is not easy to describe. The prevailing colour of their bonnets at this season of the year is of a delicate silver-grey; their shawls of rich crape, of delicate French white, or of silver-grey, to correspond with the bonnet, sufficiently large to fall in graceful folds, pinned in front in a manner peculiar to them, and of so soft a texture as to shew the bust and fall of the shoulders very beautifully. A clear muslin collar, and a light zephyrine scarf round the neck; the gown of a delicate shade of drab; and kid gloves to match, always well-fitting, new, and spotless—complete the young lady-Friend's costume. Here and there you see a darker gown, a shawl of darker shade, or even a bonnet of a rich brown, giving some variety and contrast to the mass; but it is really wonderful, with so few elements to work with, with almost no colour at all, how they produce so good an effect as they do. It is the extreme delicacy, the purity, the freshness of the whole, which impresses you with an irresistible feeling of a corresponding purity and tone of mind. You cannot help looking upon them as creatures of a purity of thought, of a loving and domestic habit, of innocent and unworldly tastes, that, as wives, sisters, and friends, must present a very grateful contrast to the vanity, the vulgarity under fashionable forms, the lax morality, and the dissipated feeling, which you find around you continually in the world. They remind you of Charles Lamb's "Hester," one of their own sisterhood—

* It is supposed that she was not yet an "acknowledged minister."

"When maidens such as Hester die,
Their place ye may not well supply,
Though ye among a thousand try
With vain endeavour.

"Her parents held the Quaker rule,
Which doth the human feeling cool;
But she was trained in Nature's school—
Nature had blest her."

With this testimony to the fair and estimable daughters of the Society, we announce that the yearly meeting is at an end. The Epistle to the Churches has been read—the last words of exhortation and Christian fellowship have been dropped—the last pause of silence made—the last general and cordial shaking of hands given—and, by many a coach, carriage, and steamer, the Friends are, many of them, already on their way to their far-off homes; some strengthened in their spirits by the general communion of mind—some by a sense of duty discharged—all by bearing with them delicious remembrances of the pleasant intercourse of the last ten days. Depend upon it, there have been new schemes and hopes of life originated; new dreams of happiness awakened; there are embryo connections springing up that shall, ere long, come to the light and be heard of. All those pleasant dinings and tea-drinkings, whether in the goodly mansions of the city, or in the rural paradises of Tottenham, Newington, or Peckham-Rye—all those goings to picture galleries, and to the Zoological Gardens, by no fewer than three hundred in one day—have not been in vain. The yearly meeting is over, indeed; but there shall be other meetings in consequence of it, still more pleasant and profitable than it has been.

THE WORM THAT NEVER DIES.

A BEAUTEOUS flower may sweetly smile
In summer light, although the while
A canker gnaws its stem;
But, drooping soon, it fades away,
O'ercome, at length, by slow decay,
A broken garden gem!

Thus, oft a smile may light the brow
Of him whom inward sorrows bow—
Whose heart can ne'er be glad;
And, though he mingle with the throng
Who pleasure's pathway rush along,
Still is he ever sad!

PEEPS INTO PARIS.—NO. I.

MARRIED AND SINGLE.

BY GRIMGIBBER.

ONE of the most respectable features in French society is the colonization of families. The Parisian hotels are constructed upon a prodigious scale; and, when belonging to a family of consideration, the various suites of apartments are inhabited by its various branches, instead of being apportioned to lodgers. A family mansion, in a first-rate situation, is usually devoted, on the ground floor, to shops or offices; the first floor, or appartement d'honneur, is inhabited by the heads of the family; the second, by the married sons and daughters; the third, by bachelor sons; and the fourth and mansarde by domestics. In some instances, the little household unite at a common dinner-table; in others, they live separately: the stables, offices, and cellars being common to the family. All this is patriarchal enough. The inexperience and pranks of the young are controlled by the vicinity of the elders; and the children of all brought up in happy sentiments of family union. Often the warm, snug entresol is inhabited by a venerable grandmother, the presiding influence of the house.

My humble Grimgibber attic overlooks the courtyard of one of these nests of Parisian domesticity. A magnificent hotel, erected during the Regency, by a celebrated Fermier-Général, has been, for the last thirty years, inhabited by a wealthy banker—one of the class created by Napoleon, as completely as the Rue de Rivoli, or the Column of the Place Vendôme. The rez de chaussée is devoted to the bureau or banking house of Monsieur Lingot. The first floor lodges, towards the street, the banker and his lady (a contemporary of the Empress Josephine, who seems to fancy herself the contemporary of the Empress Josephine's granddaughters;) and towards the courtyard, Monsieur Paul, his eldest son—a sober-looking gentleman, worthy to succeed to the banking-house, and having a young family of sons under the training of a sober-looking pedagogue in the entresol, in order to succeed him in their turn; with a pretty wife, Madame Paul Lingot—sober, steadfast, and demure.

For eight years past, have I had my eye upon the family—a favoured tribe among the worshippers of the golden calf—whose proceedings I find rather tantalizing than entertaining. The comfortable equipages and handsome horses of these people are the cause of bringing the rattling stable-pails and merry songs of grooms and helpers forth into the courtyard on many a spring morning, when, after a sleepless night, I would fain find rest; and, on hungry wintry days, the fumet of their soups and ragoûts ascends to my very window, from the vast kitchen, whose batterie of copper stewpans glitters within my view, some thirty feet below. Above, on the first floor, through the four lofty windows of the diningroom, I discern, every day at one o'clock, the family assembling for the meal which the French call breakfast, and the English, luncheon. I can perceive the snow-white quality of the damask—the richness of the china, outspread upon the buffet fronting the windows; nay, I can even see the maître d'hôtel carving upon the sideboard the fat capons and Strasburg pies, and handing them round a table steaming with cutlets, mounted on silver rechauds, and crowded with the china cups of café au lait of the united family of Lingot.

Breakfast being cleared away, in an hour or two commence the preparations for dinner. Freshly-trimmed lamps are brought to the buffet; bougies are placed in the sconces of the chandelier overhanging the table; clean linen is distributed by the lingère of the house; the covers are placed in array; the cruet-stands and salt-cellars replenished; the busy lackies have set the room in fair and cheerful array for the family-party of ten, which is to re-assemble at six o'clock. Soon afterwards, the noble staircase becomes brightly illuminated with gas. The carriage of Madame Lingot precedes, by half an hour, into the courtyard, the carriage of her daughter-in-law. The young ladies of the house, and their brothers, have already dismounted at the door, after their daily ride in the Bois de Boulogne. From entresol to attic, the vast hotel becomes brightened by sounds and symptoms of habitation; and, but that the crimson curtains of the diningroom are shortly afterwards closely drawn, I should be able to behold the family seated at their overflowing meal, mutually recounting the adventures and pleasures of the day.

Hitherto I have described nothing that proves the vicinity of the banker's family an acquisition to my airy habitation. The pair of rooks which has built, for the last three years, in an opposite chimney, are more my companions, and more amusing in their fussy domesticity. The smartness of Madame Lingot's waiting-maid is an abomination in my sober eyes; and the quantity of handboxes which, every winter in Carnival time, traverse the courtyard to the second staircase, or escalier de service, a reproach to my conscience. Sometimes a cartau, jauntingly borne along by a milliner's girl, proclaims the arrival of a hat and feathers, to shine at one of the court balls of the Tuileries. Sometimes a wooden case, strapped to the shoulders of a strapping porter, announces a ball-dress for Madame Paul, from the far-famed factory of Madame Oudot-Manoncy. On New-Year's Eve, arrive legions of rocking-horses, waggons, dolls, and playshops, from the costly atelier of Geroux, with a pretty trinket-case or two, in mosaic leather, from Fossin's, containing glittering strennes, from the old gentleman to his wife, daughters, and daughter-in-law.

It is not cheering to go supperless to bed after witnessing all this prodigality of luxury; or to reflect, on a solitary pillow, upon the improbability that my literary realizations will ever enable me to add a Mrs Grimgibber to the domestic comforts of my miserable attic.

But the consolation and delight of my observations on the morrow, used formerly to rest upon a certain third floor overlooking the courtyard, hitherto undescribed, but affording me as much amusement as I ever derived from witnessing a fashionable farce by Scribe. A gay little suite of apartments, au troisième, in the Hotel Lingot, was at that time inhabited by the banker's second son, Alphonse de Lingot—a fine young fellow of twenty-five, a gay-spirited dasher, by whom all the sympathies of my nature were kept on the qui vive. The arrival of his fencing-master, on fine spring mornings, gave the signal for throwing open my windows, that I might enjoy a full view of his vigorous and graceful attitudes; and when, five minutes after the hour for closing the banking-house, (to the deck of which he was chained by his father like a galley slave to the oars,) I used to see him vault upon his half-bred Arabian, to gallop off to the Bois de Boulogne, it was an indication to me that my morning labours were at an end; and that I might betake myself to the cabinet de lecture to which I subscribe, for the perusal of the daily papers, previous to repairing to my soupe and bouilli, at a certain favourite table d'hôte à quinze sous, without bread. There was something inspiring to my feelings in the hilarity of Alphonse; a freshness in his whole person, a frankness in his manners, a cordiality in his smile, even when addressing the grooms and helpers by whom some hack on sale was trotted round the courtyard for his approbation. He looked so handsome when mounted on field-days, for his duties as Capitaine de la Garde Nationale à Cheval, that I wondered his father should choose to make a banker of him, and did not wonder to find how little it was his choice to be a banker.

I could always detect within six hours, by the sudden change in Alphonse's demeanour, the moment of old Lingot's periodical commercial visits to Brussels and Frankfort. No more waiting for the regular hour of shutting up shop: off to Tortoni's before it was open; off to the Bois before it was closed; and never home again till half-an-hour after the ringing of the dinner-bell! If the snow was on the ground, I prepared myself for the jingling of sledge-bells, and the glancing of Alphonse's handsome traineau—a gilded dragonfly—across the courtyard, having his pretty sister-in-law seated between the wings, with Alphonse holding lightly over her head the Morocco reins of his wildly prancing horse. It was a comfort to me, by the way, to hear the jingling recur, and ascertain that the little party was safe home again. Towards evening, throughout the Carnival, I was on the watch to see his valet-de-chambre (a far finer gentleman than the master) steal up the escalier de service, with a masquerade-dress hanging on his arm, a Pierrot's pointed beaver in his hand, or a brigand's cap, or some other intimation that Alphonse was to spend the night at Musard's, Valentina's, or some other of the second-rate bals masques, where Parisian dandies, though not ashamed of seeing, are ashamed of being seen. On Saturday nights, however, apportioned to the bals masques de l'Opera, (where folly and licentiousness are paraded at a higher cost, and it is consequently no disgrace to shew one's face,) I used to observe my young neighbour making an elaborate toilet at eleven o'clock, as if preparing for one of Madame Appony's or Monsieur Rothschild's fetes; and, one mysterious Sunday morning of the Carnival, when I had sneaked out of the ports cochères to early service, between seven and eight o'clock, I saw Alphonse step, at the corner of the street, from a handsome carriage, in which sat a lady in an elegant black domino, closely masked; and heard her mingle, in her adieux to her handsome cavalier, an injunction not to follow the carriage. It was evident that he had passed the night at the bai de l'Opera with some fair unknown. I had half a mind to follow the carriage, and detect her. The lady's prohibition did not extend to me. But, on second thoughts, I amended my motion, and proceeded decently to church.

It was amazing the number of triangular notes and billets on coloured paper that flew up the escalier de service towards the door of Alphonse's antechamber. The letters of the rest of the family were left, according to Parisian custom, at the porter's lodge; but these private and confidential missions were to be expressly delivered, by the pages, jockies, or commissionnaires, by whom they were brought, to the hands of either Alphonse or his valet. An answer was to be waited for; and often were the shutters of the young man's bedroom thrown open an hour before the usual time, to enable him to decipher the delicate handwriting à patte de mouche, which upbraided him with a promise broken, or exacted promises for the future. I could always ascertain, even without examining the livery of the page, or ragged jacket of the commissionnaire, whether the epistle in hand were a first effusion—the opening of a new negotiation. On such occasions, Alphonse would throw himself out of bed, fling on his dressing-gown of Persian silk, and, seated close beside the window, devour every syllable of the exciting billet. Once, (it was in the merry month of May,) I detected him pressing to his lips a dainty little dispatch, of which the bearer was a chasseur, in a flaming livery. Yet, only six weeks afterwards, when the same chasseur made his fortieth visit to the house, instead of so much as rising to do honour to the correspondence, I saw the letter delivered to him in bed, and almost fancied I could detect a yawn while he was perusing it, through the half-drawn muslin curtain, velling the open window.

The gayest scenes enacted in Alphonse's bechelor-hall, were on Sunday mornings from nine to twelve, between April and June. From the periodical regularity of their visits, I conceive that the noisy fellows who, on these occasions, crowded his rooms, were young men of commercial or official pursuits, enjoying, like himself, their weekly holiday—dies non for the slaves of Mammon. Such hearty laughs as used to greet my ears when his windows were thrown open by the earliest of his guests! All were as much at home there as Alphonse. Some leaned out of the window, with Turkish pipes in their mouths; others were busy with Alphonse's foils; others with his sparring gloves; while some were examining his newspapers, and others his new detonator, or a pair of Lepage's patent pigeoners. I could hear the click of the locks as they tried them, and see the flash in the pan. I once heard high words pass between Alphonse and one of the wildest and handsomest of his comrades, who, having seized a letter from the secretaire, was only prevented reading it aloud by having it wrested from his hand; and half-fearing the affray might lead to a more serious use of these alarming implements. But friends good-humouredly interfered; hands were shaken before they parted. Next day, I met them driving out together in the tilbury of young Lingot; and, in the course of a few weeks, having watched the same dandy accompany home Alphonse with hurried steps, observed the secretaire again opened, the secret drawer spring out, and a rouleau of Louis torn open, and poured by Alphonse into the hands of his agitated friend. From his vehemence of grateful hand-shaking at parting, it was plain the money was not given in payment of a debt; and I loved my young neighbour from the glee with which, on the departure of his friend, he carolled forth the caratins of the Postillon de Long jumeau in a voice that Duprez might have envied.
