Has he forgotten, can he have forgotten, that last May, (May 1837,) I both urged the same charges and recorded them on your Journals? I even pursued the self-same course of argument which has, I observe, to-night given him so great offence. He speaks of "acerbity." A person supposed to have used bitter remarks is perhaps not a judge of the comparative "acerbity" of his different observations—nor is that person possibly, against whom they have been employed. But I venture to say, that of all I said this night, the portion which he felt the most bitter, and to which, be it observed in passing, he made not the least allusion, was my comparison of his conduct towards unrepresented Canada and well-represented Ireland. Well—last May I drew the very same comparison, and nearly in the same terms—made the same quotations from the Ministerial speeches in the Commons—and recorded the substance of the comparison in my protest. My Lords, I indignantly and peremptorily deny that the motive or principle of my conduct is changed. But I know that the changed conduct of others has compelled me to oppose them, in order that I may not change my own principles. Do the Ministers desire to know what will restore me to their support, and make me once more fight zealously in their ranks, as I once fought with them against the majority of your Lordships? I will tell them at once! Let them retract their declaration against Reform, delivered the first night of this session, and their second declaration—by which (to use the Noble Viscount's phrase) they exacerbated the first; or let them, without any retraction, only bring forward liberal and constitutional measures—they will have no more zealous supporter than myself. But, in the meantime, I now hurl my defiance at his head—I repeat it—I hurl at his head this defiance—I defy him to point out any, the slightest, indication of any one part of my public conduct having, even for one instant, been affected, in any manner of way, by feelings of a private and personal nature, or been regulated by any one consideration, except the sense of what I owe to my own principles, and to the interests of the country!

Upon this occasion Lord Brougham seems to have been not a little nettled by Lord Melbourne, certainly in sheer ignorance and with no disrespectful meaning, designating Robertson the historian, that kinsman of whom Lord Brougham has so much reason to be proud, "a florid and fanciful writer."*

• Upon another very recent occasion, the third reading of the Slave Vessels' Bill, Lord Minto took occasion to wander from the coast of Africa to the woolsack, and to attack Lord Brougham as a disappointed man, actuated by selfish motives in his opposition. This was in presence of Lord Melbourne and of the other Ministers who are Peers, and upon, we think, the 26th of July last. Lord Brougham thus attacked, defended himself face to face with those quidam friends of his, not one of whom replied one word to his statements. They sat dumb; but it is not a little remarkable, that his speech, or personal defence, call it as we will, which had been found unanswerable in the House of Peers, is not to be found in any London journal, save The Sun; though, after special notice had been drawn to it, it did appear in at least one provincial paper. We can give but a small specimen; but, until that be satisfactorily answered it may suffice." He admitted that the Great Seal was an object of ambition to honourable minds, but then

An admirable argumentative introduction to a speech on the Privileges of Parliament, which Lord Brougham delivered when, as Lord Chancellor, he pronounced judgment in the case of Wellesley v. the Duke of Beaufort, carries complete conviction. Jealous, as every liberal man must be, of the infringement of the constitutional and necessary privileges of Members of Parliament—even when, as at present, we have a Parliament not worth caring a pin about—the monstrous doctrines promulgated, and the pretensions lately set up, required to be exposed. We only wish that our worthy representatives would make use of the unquestionable privileges guaranteed to them by the laws of Parliament, the privileges akin to those which Lord Brougham employed in condemning the Irish judges.

The "Dissertation on the Eloquence of the Ancients," some brief illustrative specimens of modern eloquence, and an Appendix containing critical remarks on the orations of the ancients, with a translation of Demosthenes' oration upon the affairs of the Chersonese, and of the peroration of the second philippic of Cicero against Mark Anthony, together with numerous notes and different readings—conclude this memorable work. This latter section, though intimately connected with the studies and pursuits of the greatest of if his object was to let in the Tories, Lord Lyndhurst must be their Chancellor, which could not particularly gratify him:—He recommended Lord Cottenham, for he (Lord Brougham) conceived that he made an excellent Judge in Equity, and gave general satisfaction. Why, then, should he, (Lord Brougham,) having set up the nine-pin, be so anxious to knock it down again? All this the noble Earl (Minto) passed over, in the wit of the lightsome and merry mood he was in. Possibly, indeed, he was not in the secret. But this was not his only omission as to facts—and facts which he must be aware of—though he might not be acquainted with the one he (Lord Brougham) had just adverted to. If his (Lord Brougham's) quarrel with the Government had anything at all to do with the Great Seal, why did he not oppose them in 1835 when the Ministry was formed? Why not, in 1836, when the Seal was given to its present holder? Why not in 1837? These were known facts and dates, which there was no getting over—and the retail dealers in falsehood who defend the Government through the press, wilfully shut their eyes to these well-known things. But till this evening, he had never known any Minister who deemed it becoming or discreet to take the same line. Yet, surely the Noble Earl must know that the quarrel, if quarrel there had been, on account of office, and the Great Seal, was complete in May 1835; and yet how had he (Lord Brougham) acted? If his opposition to the Government had any connexion whatever with his not being Chancellor, how did it happen, that, in the whole session of 1835, he had stood by the Government helping them at every turn—lifting them whenever he could out of the mire—keeping their heads above water to the best of his small means—saving, as far as his utmost exertions could, their existence for some months, during which they were fluttering between life and death; defending them at a moment when the least attack must have tumbled them down from their slippery position? Had he not, at the end of a laborious session of judicial business, in which he had presided voluntarily in the House, notoriously sacrificed his own health, by undertaking the defence of the Government, during the laborious month's combat on the English Municipal Bill? Had he not fought that bill through all its stages, for and with the Government, whose whole existence depended upon the measure? Then, in 1836, though absent at first for three months through illness, brought on by his support of the Government the autumn before, yet for the last two months of the session, he (Lord Brougham) was quite recovered, and announced to the Government his ability to attend Parliament; but he did not—and why? Because on two important Reform questions he was compelled to differ from the Ministry; and he was informed by them that his opposition might be fatal, as they were then circumstanced. All this was probably new to the Noble Earl, (Minto.) He was not in the secret. His colleagues told him what they liked about navy matters, and gave him their opinion about quadruple treaties, setting him down somewhat bluntly and unceremoniously—but this, which happened in 1836, they had not told him; yet certain it was that he, (Lord Brougham,) at their desire, had kept away, in order to keep them in their places. And yet the noble Earl, not being in the secret, supposed, with some of the Government newspapers, that, his (Lord Brougham's) not being in office was the cause of his differing with the Ministers, and made him wish to turn them out, in order that he might again seize the Great Seal. Those newspaper authorities, however, from which the noble Earl took his facts, should have known, and so should the noble Earl, that his (Lord Brougham's) opposition, even in 1837, was confined to entering a reluctant protest against the Canada Bill, which had produced a civil war, and that in all other measures he had, during that session, supported the Ministry. His opposition only began, as every man in the country knew, and as these slanderous assailants alone wilfully forget, when in November last the Government took a new line against reform of Parliament, and other reforms; and when, on that, and on their extravagant Civil List, and their Canada Bills, and the Slave Question, they had compelled him to oppose them, if he (Lord B.) did not mean to abandon all his most sacred and most constantly avowed principles and feelings upon the whole policy of the State. These things were quite notorious—they were facts, and even had dates, which at once dispelled the whole charges made by wilful fabrications out of doors, and at length, with an indiscreetness which great wits, like the noble Earl, are too subject, brought forward by a Cabinet Minister of that House.

It would have been obliging if the Ministers themselves, in whose presence Lord Brougham spoke as above, had cleared up the mysteries referred to, and which, it would seem, were secrets even to the Earl of Minto. But they were mute; and that man must be either devoid of understanding or of common candour, who will ever again listen to their mouth-pieces upon a subject which they themselves have been again and again openly challenged to explain in their place. Let Lord Melbourne or Lord John Russell answer the statements of this one speech, and then will their defenders have something like a case.

modern orators, is so much a thing apart, and is, though most precious to classic statesmen and to all scholars, so comparatively little adapted to the taste of the men of the time, that we make no apology for postponing notice of it to a more convenient season.

Having already endeavoured to give our readers an idea and foretaste of these volumes, we consider it worse than superfluous to attempt any idle panegyric upon the author or his writings, the orator or his orations. To readers whose object is truth, we would recommend a very homely, but a true test of the utility of the work. Let them examine the mere index, and say what other body of writings indicates so many of those topics most interesting to the happiness, and the moral and social progress of the human race, in its most magnificent as well as in its most important private relations; so many topics that bear practically on the affairs of every man's business and bosom, and which go so directly towards raising and improving the entire social edifice. It is enough to add, that these topics are treated with that solidity of judgment, that largeness and justness of view, that self-reliance, indomitable energy of purpose, and affluence of the Knowledge which is Power, which his bitterest enemies allow to distinguish Lord Brougham.

PRACTICAL ILLUSTRATION OF THE DURHAM AND BULLER ORDINANCES, IN THE CASE OF SIR THOMAS ARMSTRONG, TRIED BY LORD CHIEF JUSTICE JEFFERIES.

Clerk of the Crown.—Thomas Armstrong, Hold up thy hand. Thou hast been indicted in London, &c. &c. What hast thou to say for thyself, why execution should not be awarded against thee upon that attainder, according to law?

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—My Lord, I was beyond the sea, at the time of my outlawry; I beg I may be tried.

Lord Chief Justice (Jefferies).—That is not material at all to us; we have here a record of outlawry against you, Sir Thomas.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—I desire to be put upon my trial, my Lord.

Lord Chief Justice.—We cannot allow any such thing; we have nothing to do upon this record before us, but to award execution. Captain Richardson, what are your usual days of execution?

Captain Richardson.—Wednesdays and Fridays, my Lord.

Mrs Matthews.—Here is a statute, my Lord.

Lord Chief Justice.—What is the matter with that gentleman?

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—Hold your tongue. My Lord, there is a statute made in the sixth year of Edward the Sixth, which I desire may be read.

[Stat. 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 11, read.]

Mr Attorney-General.—Sir Thomas, I suppose, will now shew he yielded himself to your Lordship.

Lord Chief Justice.—This is the first time I have seen Sir Thomas.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—My Lord, I have been a prisoner, and the year is not yet out; I now render myself.

Mr Attorney-General.—Before he went out of England he might have rendered himself and been tried, if he pleased.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—I am within the benefit of the statute, I conceive, my Lord.

Lord Chief Justice.—We think otherwise, Sir Thomas.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—My Lord, I beg I may have counsel to plead for me in this case.

Lord Chief Justice.—For what reason? We are of opinion it is not a matter of any doubt. For you must not go under the apprehension that we deny you anything that is right; there is no doubt nor difficulty at all in the thing.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—Methinks, my Lord, the statute is plain.

Lord Chief Justice.—So it is very plain that you can have no advantage by it. Captain Richardson, you shall have a rule for execution on Friday next.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—A little while ago there was one in this place had the benefit of a trial offered him, if he would accept of it; that is the thing I desire now, and I thank God, my case is quite another thing than his—I know my own innocence; and I desire to make it appear by a trial.

Mrs Matthews.—I hope you will not murder my father; this is murdering a man.

Lord Chief Justice.—Who is this woman? Marshal, take her into custody.—Why, how now? Because your relation is attainted for high treason, must you take upon you to tax the courts of justice for murder, when we grant the execution according to law? Take her away.

Sir Thomas Armstrong.—I ought to have the benefit of the law, and I demand no more.

Lord Chief Justice.—That you shall have by the grace of God. See that execution be done on Friday next, according to law. You shall have the full benefit of the law.

He was accordingly executed on that day.

In The King and Johnston, Mich. 2 Geo. 2, K. B., the prisoner was allowed to be within the benefit of the proviso; and, though he had escaped out of prison and was retaken in England, was admitted to prove himself beyond sea at the time of the outlawry, which, being therefore reversed, he was admitted to a trial, and acquitted. Armstrong's case was declared a precedent not fit to be followed.—State Trials.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Hammer's Correspondence.

SIR HENRY BUNBURY, in searching his family archives, has discovered a number of letters and other writings of a very miscellaneous character, from which he has selected the contents of a goodly volume, containing a considerable quantity of really curious matter, and a more moderate infusion of papers of some interest and value. Amongst the latter, are an epistle sent by Wordsworth to Fox, with the "Lyrical Ballads," touching beautifully upon the condition, or rather the melancholy transition in the condition of the rural population; the rapid disappearance of the old English yeomen and small proprietors; and the weakening of the bonds of the domestic affections, in consequence of these changes. We do not know whether Mr Wordsworth will be delighted with the re-appearance, after nearly forty years, of a letter so complimentary to the great chief of the party whose policy he has long disapproved; but yet there is much in it to be proud of, and which is more forcibly true now than on the day it was written. Complaining of the rapid decay of the domestic affections among the lower orders of society, he remarks, that the rulers of the country disregard it.

By the spreading of manufactures, the heavy taxes on postage.—[Mark that, Mr Rowland Hill!—]—by work-houses, houses of industry, soup-shops, &c. &c., super-added to the increasing disproportion between the price of labour and that of the necessities of life, the bonds of domestic feeling among the poor, as far as the influence of these things has extended, have been weakened, and, in innumerable instances, entirely destroyed. Parents are separated from their children, and children from their parents; the wife no longer prepares with her own hands a meal for her husband, the produce of his labour; there is little doing in his house in which his affections can be interested, and but little in it which he can love.

Mr Wordsworth tells the story of an aged couple, in his neighbourhood, in Westmoreland, long supported by their parish, but living decently under their own roof, where the old matron fell into an agony of mind, from the idea that, in consequence of their increasing infirmities, they must be boarded out among the other poor. He said, "It was hard, having kept house together so long, to come to this. It would burst her heart."—"I mention," says the poet to Mr Fox, "this fact, to shew how deeply the spirit of independence is, even yet, rooted in some parts of the country. These people could not express themselves this way, without an almost sublime conviction of the blessings of independent domestic life."

He then refers to his poems, "The Brothers," and "Michael," as a picture of the domestic affections as they exist—must we say as they did exist?—among his neighbours the Dalesmen—

Small independent proprietors of land, here called statesmen, men of respectable education, who daily labour on their own little properties. The domestic affections will always be strong amongst men who live in a country not crowded with population, if these men are placed above poverty. But, if they are proprietors of small estates, which have descended to them from their ancestors, the power which those affections will acquire amongst such men, is inconvertible by those who have only had an opportunity, in observing hired labourers, farmers, and the manufacturing poor. Their little tract of land serves as a kind of permanent rallying point for their domestic feelings, as tablets upon which they are written, which makes them objects of memory, in a thousand instances in which they would be otherwise forgotten. This class of men is rapidly disappearing. You, sir, have a conscientiousness, upon which every good man will congratulate you, that the whole of your public conduct has, in one way or other, been directed to the preservation of this class of men, and those who hold similar situations. You have felt that the most sacred of all property is the property of the poor. The two poems which I have mentioned, I have written with a view to shew that men who do not wear fine clothes can feel deeply.

This is a lesson which, we apprehend, the great world, and also the middle world, still require to be taught—those who speak of "the great unwashed," "the mob," "the horny-handed," with "shocking bad taste," &c. &c. &c. Mr Wordsworth, by the way, ought to forgive the French Revolution, which, in place of a handful of corrupted nobles and churchmen, has created small proprietors, by tens and hundreds of thousands. One of the most interesting portions of the volume, is a long autobiographical letter from Czarbe to Burke, which will form a valuable appendage to the one given by the poet's sons, in their recent memoirs of their eminent father. The letter had, with many others, fallen into the hands of the late Sir Charles Bunbury. There is also a letter from poor Bloomfield to the Baronet, describing his fortunes and adventures, when engaged—wretched, degrading trade!—in soliciting the patronage of the great and fashionable in London, to whom Sir Charles, it would seem, had given him letters of introduction.

Mr Windham was too much engaged to see me. The Earl of Carlisle sent a message to the same effect, but added, that, if I would call any morning next week, he would be glad to speak to me. Accordingly, I took a charming walk in Hyde Park, and called a second time, when his Lordship sent down for my address, and said he should see Sir Charles Bunbury. On the same day, at half-past one, I met with a civil reception from the servants at Devonshire House. But the Duchess was not up; I therefore left your letter and the book.

Had all along a great desire to see Mr Fox, &c. &c. &c. No one need condemn the great ones thus assailed. The true blame rests with the rhyming botes and their injudicious introducers. But these things make us forget the volume before us. It contains a Memoir of Sir Thomas Hammer, who, if not the most amiable of men, nor, indeed, remarkably eminent in any way, occupied a pre-eminent station in public affairs at an important crisis in modern English history. The Memoir occupies the first hundred pages of the volume. The correspondence of Hammer follows it, and contains a few sprightly letters from Frim, one or two from Bolingbroke, Harley Earl of Oxford, and other statesmen with whom Hammer had been connected by office or party feelings. A curious letter, purporting to be written from Rome, by a young traveller to his father, and giving a minute account of the original Pretender and his little court, would be of value were it authentic, which the editor doubts. At an early age, Sir Thomas Hammer married the widow of the first Duke of Grafton, a connexion which brought him a great accession of fortune and worldly acquaintance. The lady was considerably older than her second husband. Though one of the most celebrated beauties of her time, and, in at least one point, of irreproachable character, she does not appear to be a favourite with the editors. Her innocent childish years, as traced by Kipling, and the old age of cards succeeding a youth of folly, indicated by the notices in this work, form a singular contrast. She was the only child and heiress of the Earl of Arlington, and was betrothed to Henry Fitzroy, the second son of the Duchess of Cleveland, created at his birth Baron Sudbury, Viscount Ipswich, Earl of Euston, and Duke of Grafton. The bride, at her betrothal, was only five years of age, the bridegroom nine. Evelyn says, though Sir Henry Bunbury does not deign to notice it—1672. August 1.—I was at the marriage of Lord Arlington's lovely daughter (a sweet child if ever there was any) to the Duke of Grafton; the Archbishop of Canterbury officiated, the King and all the grantees of the court being present.

The infant pair were married again some years afterwards—

"I confess," says Evelyn, "I would give my Lady Arlington little joy, and so I plainly told her; but she said the King would have it so, and there was no going back. Thus, this sweetest, hopefulest, most beautiful child, and most virtuous, too, was sacrificed to a boy that has been rudely bred, without anything to encourage them but his majesty's pleasure. I pray God the sweet child may find it to her advantage! who, if my sugary deceive me not, will, in a few years, be such a paragon as were fit to make a wife to the greatest prince in Europe."

1683. I went to compliment the Duchess of Grafton, now lying-in of her first child, a son, which she called for, that I might see it. She was become more beautiful (if it were possible) than before, and full of virtue and sweetness."

She was then not much more than fifteen. The death of her husband, who was killed at the siege of Cork in 1690, left her a youthful widow, which she remained for eight years, when she gave her hand to Sir Thomas Heames, then a handsome youth of twenty-one. The editor, Sir Henry Bunbury, views the highly-connected and celebrated beauty, flattered by so many wits and poets, with eyes much less partial than those of the venerable Evelyn. Among the other papers in Sir Henry Bunbury's possession, is the private account book of the Duchess, from 1708, ten years after her second marriage, and when she was beginning "to fall into the mere and yellow leaf," until the time of her death, in 1723. On the cover is written, "Isabella Grafton is my name."

Good spelling, (the editor remarks,) was far from universal in those days among men of rank; and the sample here afforded by the only child of a noble statesman, and daughter-in-law of King Charles II., is not calculated to give us a favourable impression as to the education of ladies of high birth.

The Duchess had £500 a-year of pin-money from her husband, Sir Thomas, which would now be considered a miserable allowance for a woman of her rank, and, moreover, of independent fortune. She seems to have been a great frequenter of operas and card parties, expensive in her dress, and apt to lose money at play. The sums paid at operas, playhouses, and to chairmen, are minutely entered. Entrance money was then paid at the door of the opera house, and, in the latter years of the Duchess, varied from 8s. to 10s. 9d. Her regular presents to celebrated actors and the box-keepers was £1:1:6. Betterton, Mrs Barry, Cibber, Nicolini, &c. &c., are all down in turn at £1:1:6 a-head. The London season in those days began in November, and lasted almost as late as now. The entries of money given to the servants of the houses where the Duchess visited shew valde at their final point of enormity. People of fashion would then seem to have nursed their children by a contribution levied upon their acquaintances at every christening:—"To my Lady Harvey's christening, £10:15s.; to my Lady Rebecca Holland's christening, £10:15s." A few of the items of her Grace's disbursement will be curious to modern ladies:—"To Lady Jersey's woman, for a French gown, £30."—"For a stinkirk, £1:12s."—"A green embroidered steenkirk, £1:1:6."—"To Mrs Lilly, for two pound green tea, £2:8s."—"To a man for cleaning my teeth, 10s." This is a frequent item. "Paid to Lady Charlotte de Rouse, for a black laced scarf, £16."—"Paid for paint, £60."—"Three yards and a quarter of muslin, £1:6s."—"For cutting my hair, £1:1s."—"An embroidered apron, £2:10s."—"For stockings, £1:7s."—"Paid for four peaces of Turkey taby," (her Grace's autograph,) "£5." We find such entries occasionally as, "Given to the mob, 2s. 6d., or 5s.;" "To the poor people, 8d." These, we presume, were her Grace's charities. Her largesses were upon a more liberal footing:—"To the Duke of Grafton's [her son] cook, £2:3s."—"To a gentleman of my Lord Bolingbroke's, £2:3s."—"To a fan, £2:10s."—"Paid for two quarts of usquebae, 14s."—"Lost to Sir Thomas Hammar [her husband] at cards, £7:10:6."—"Lost at cards this month, £17:4s." We find "A pound of bohea tea for Mrs Manley" in one place, probably the authoress; and once, "To the Tailor, £2:3s," which it is not easy to make out. The frequent purchase of "orange butter," which the editor cannot understand, and £3:3s. for "a baby," probable mean orange marmalade and a doll. As her Grace waxed in years, the nature of her expenditure varied. She began to give 10s. 6d. a-year "to ye bills of mortality," and to purchase brandy and Brazil snuff. Her bookseller's account must at all times have been very moderate, though she latterly purchased "Atterbury's Sermons" for 6s., and "Nelson's Festivals and Fasts" for 5s. 6d., and sometimes The Flying or Evening Post at 1½d. each. Six quires of paper, such as a Duchess might use, were then bought for 3s. 10d. "A hackney coach for your Grace" cost 1s., and "two saddle horses to Windsor," 12s.; a quart of brandy, 1s. 3d.

Among the letters to Sir Charles Bunbury there is one from Goldsmith, who, from his previous connexion with the Homecks, visited the Bunbury family; and there are two or three from Garrick, of no particular interest. One might have expected to meet with some scribbles by Mrs Inchbald among these family papers; but none appear. A memoir of the American General Lee, who was by birth an Englishman, and a near connexion of the Bunbury family, finishes a volume which the ancient literary loungers will find pleasure in turning over.

Recollections of Caulincourt, Duke of Vicenza.

How far these Recollections are authentic, it is not easy to say; but, if not unimpeachable as history, they are at least amusing as historical romance, full of the striking incidents of history, and having, for their scenes and characters, the principal courts of the Tuilleries and St Petersburg, and the most distinguished men of the era of Napoleon's downfall. There seems a good deal of truth in the work, and not a little bolstering. While the others were in Paris, and after Napoleon had signed his abdication, the following scene is alleged to have taken place, and is related by the Duke of Vicenza to the fair compiler of his "Recollections," in the same manner as the whole materials of the book are said to have been communicated, in friendly conversation. Caulincourt, the reader is to know, had left Napoleon on the previous evening in a dreadful state of despondency.

"I had not been long in bed when Pelard or Constant, I now forget which, knocked loudly at my door, telling me to come with all speed to the Emperor, who wished to see me. A fearful presentiment shot through my heart; and before five minutes elapsed I was by the bed on which the Emperor, a prey to frightful convulsions, seemed on the point of expiring. It was a horrible sight! His face was of a livid paleness, his lips were contracted, his hair matted to his forehead by a cold perspiration, his eyes dull and fixed. Oh, the rigidity of that look made me shudder!"—(and the Duke, by an involuntary movement, covered his face with his hands, as if to avoid a fearful vision.)

"Racked by a horrible suspicion," continued the Duke, "I wished, but I dared not, I could not, question him."

"Duke," said Ivan to me, in a low voice, "he is lost if he do not drink; he refuses everything; but he must drink—he must vomit. In the name of Heaven, persuade him to drink."

"I snatched the cup from the hands of Ivan; it contained tea, I believe. I presented it to the Emperor, who pushed it from him. 'I die, Caulincourt—to you I commend my wife and son; defend my memory—I can no longer support life.'"

"I was choking; I could not speak. I presented again and again the cup: he again and again pushed it aside: this struggle drove me mad.—'Leave me alone!—leave me alone!' said he, in a dying voice."

"Sire," said I, exclaiming by my grief, "in the name of your glory, in the name of France, renounce a death unworthy of you."

"A deep sigh escaped from his heaving breast. 'Sire, cannot Caulincourt obtain this favour of you?'"

"I was bending over the bed, my tears fell upon his face; he fixed his eyes upon me with an undefinable expression. I held the cup to him; at length he drank. A vomiting, accompanied with violent spasms, threw all of us into a mortal fear. Exhausted, he fell back almost lifeless on his pillow."

"Ivan, with a distracted air, said, 'He must, he must drink again!—he is lost—he is lost if he do not drink.'"

"I again commenced my entreaties, and he resisted them. At length, by dint of supplications and prayers, he drank at intervals, and repeated vomitings brought some relief. The cramp in the stomach became less violent, his limbs became more supple, the contraction of his features ceased by degrees. He was saved!"

"During the two hours that this alarming crisis lasted, not a single complaint escaped his lips. He smothered the cries which his agony drew from him, by grinding a handkerchief between his teeth. What fortitude that man possessed!"

"The interior of this chamber of death, this agony, by the pale light of the tapers, cannot be described. The silence was uninterrupted but by the sobbings of those present. There was no witness of this terrible scene present who would not have given his own life to have saved that of Napoleon, who, in his domestic retirement, was the best of men, the most indulgent of masters. The regrets of all who served him survive him."

"A short calm succeeded. He slept for half an hour. During that interval, Constant told me that, whilst he was in bed in the entresol beneath, he had heard a noise in the chamber of the Emperor. He ran to him, and found him in violent convulsions, his face turned upon the pillow to stifle his cries. He refused all the assistance poor Constant strove to give him. Ivan was called. When the Emperor saw him, he said, 'Ivan, the dose was not strong enough.' Then it was they acquired the sad certainty, that he had taken poison. 'Let the Duke de Vicoenza,' added he, in a voice scarcely intelligible, 'be called.' The fearful crisis seized him, and at that moment I arrived."

"Alarmed for the result of the action of the poison upon the health of the Emperor, I turned to consult Ivan, whom I thought to be still in the chamber. He had disappeared. I sent in search of him; he was nowhere to be found. This disappearance at such a moment was inexplicable. I learned at length that Ivan, alarmed at the responsibility which the words of the Emperor—'the dose was not strong enough'—might bring upon him, had taken the first horse he found in the court-yard of the Castle, and set off for Paris. We saw no more of him."

"The Emperor awoke. I drew towards his bed; the attendants retired—we were alone."

"His eyes, sunk and dull, seemed seeking to recognise the persons by whom he was surrounded; a world of tortures was revealed in his expression."

"Heaven has forbidden it," said he, as if applying to some innermost thought; 'I could not die.'"

"Sire, your son—France, in which your name will live for ever, impose upon you the duty of supporting adversity."

"My son!—my son!—What a sad inheritance I leave him—a child born a king to-day without a country! Why did they not let me die?"

"Sire," replied I, "you must not die thus. France must deplore you living!"

"France? She has abandoned me; and you, Caulincourt—you, in my place, would have done what I did. When fortune smiled on me, have I not often faced death in the field of battle?"

"Ah, the circumstances in which your Majesty is placed are deplorable; but—"

"It is not the loss of the throne," interrupted he, with vehemence, "which renders my existence insupportable. My military career is sufficient for the glory of a man; and," added he with emphasis, raising himself on his side, "a crown of laurel is less fragile than the jewelled diadem which encircles the brows of the most powerful monarch. . . . But do you know what is more hard to bear than the reverses of fortune? Do you know what it is that pierces the heart most deeply? It is the baseness, the hideous ingratitude of man. I turn my head in disgust from their cowardice and selfishness. I hold life in horror; death is repose—repose at last. What I have suffered for the last twenty days cannot be comprehended."

"Whilst he spoke, I regarded him with an inexpressible regret. Exile was about to hide the meteor which then shone so brightly. Its first rays enlightened, vivified France; and France suffered it to disappear."

"At this moment the clock struck five; the rays of the sun, shining through the red curtains, coloured with a deep tint the serene and expressive face of Napoleon. There was so much grandeur, so much power, in this man, that it seemed he could be destroyed but by a phenomenon."

It is not necessary to place implicit faith in this part of the Duke's "Recollections." Yet there were many virtuous well-thinking Britons, who considered it a great blot on the character of Napoleon, that he outlived these scenes, and especially Waterloo.

The Book of Roses, or Rose Fancier's Manual. By Mrs Gore. Colburn.

France, the country in which Mrs Gore has for several years resided, is the first country in the world for the culture of roses. Though the rose be the national flower of England, which excels in the cultivation of many other flowers, and of all tender exotics, large quantities of new roses are annually imported from France; and standards, and even stocks, form a regular article of commerce. The French horticulturists allow, however, that, though roses are easier of propagation in France, it is in England that they attain their highest perfection, and that the roses of Rivers of Sawbridgeworth are the finest in the world. Mrs Gore accounts for the general superiority of the French rose-growers in a very satisfactory manner. The high price of fuel places the cultivation of tender exotics out of the question; and the attention of the French floriculturist is, therefore, almost exclusively absorbed by roses. The higher orders in France, unlike the English, live at their country-seats in the summer season, leaving them at the beginning of winter, and thus prize the most highly those plants which flower out of doors and in the summer. The Empress Josephine gave a strong impulse to the cultivation of roses, and formed a collection of the rarest plants at Malmaison. For many years the garden of the Luxembourg was exclusively devoted to the cultivation of roses, under the superintendence of the late Empress's gardener. And now there are many private nurserymen at Paris, and in other large towns, whose sole business is to raise roses. By their cultivation, one family, the Noisettes, who have given their name to a beautiful and prolific variety, have amassed a large fortune. The Noisettes Rose was, however, originally obtained at Charlestown, South Carolina, by Philip Noisette. From the most celebrated nurseries of France, large quantities are, as we have stated yearly exported to England. We read with chance—that one fine collection, that of Descemet, at St Denis, “was cut up by the English troops in 1814.” The injured rose-grower failed to obtain indemnification for the outrage of the Goths; and he proceeded to Russia, and re-established himself there with honour and success. Scotch roses are much prized on the Continent, as well as many of the rarer varieties obtained in England. From Ragland, France originally obtained the China or Bengal rose, and other natives of China. We cannot think meanly of British rose-growers, when we learn that the varieties cultivated by Messrs Loddige, at Hackney, are two thousand five hundred! In the gardens of the Luxembourg, eighteen hundred kinds are cultivated; but the French rose-growers are generally of opinion, that only the trifling number of twelve hundred sorts are worthy of attention. They are probably not under the mark, though new and beautiful varieties are obtained every year. Owing to the mere extent of culture, the plants are much cheaper in France than with us, even of the rare varieties; and hence a greater variety is found in the humblest cottage and farm gardens. “Vandael of Vangirard, for instance, produces annually, from slips, in a very small forcing house, fifty thousand plants of fine varieties;” nor can this be an ill-paying trade, though these fine varieties be sold at sixpence a plant, or even less. Beautiful noxels are obtained in France at that price, and consequently such roses as our nursery-men would sell at from five shillings to half-a-guinea, or perhaps higher.

The Book of Roses opens with the geography of that lovely plant, which is found in all parts of the world—for the author concludes, that, though still undiscovered in South America, the rose must exist there. Roses are found in all parts of North America. With the deep-red blossoms of the Rosa nitida, the Esquimaux love to decorate their hair, and the skins in which they are clothed; while the Creoles of Georgia adorn their dark tresses with the large white blossoms of the Rosa lavigata, a climbing plant, which winds its tendrils round the most majestic forest trees. But Asia alone boasts a greater number of species than all the other quarters of the globe. China possesses fifteen native species, already ascertained, all of great beauty, and capable of producing the finest varieties. Roses are found in Siberia and Kamschatka, and beyond the Ural Mountains, on to the shores of the Frozen Ocean. Africa boasts that charming species, the Rosa Moschata, whose tufts of white flowers give out a musky odour. The Musk Rose is found in Egypt, Morocco, Mogadore, and the Island of Madeira. It abounds in the plains around Tunis, and on the borders of the vast desert of Sahara. The Rosa Mailas, small, sweet, and of a brilliant hue, is seen blooming almost under the snows of Lapland; and the same lovely species is found in Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. England has six native roses; and, in addition to these, in Scotland, is found the Rosa involuta, an Alpine rose. The Swiss mountains and the Alpine chain in general, are rich in native roses; and Italy and Spain have some distinct species. The Musk Rose, common to Africa, is also found in Spain.

Mrs Gore's volume contains brief and clear directions for the culture of the rose-tree, according to the best methods practised in France and England; and whether the plants are raised from seed, (the only way to obtain new varieties,) or are propagated by grafting, layering, or from suckers or slips. We are tempted to extract her modes of retarding the flowering of the rose-trees, of obtaining flowers in winter, and of training espalier roses, but must refer amateurs to the book, merely copying out this favourite mode of training the boursault, and the multiflora roses in the rosaries of France: To effect the purpose, let the trees “attain a considerable height from the ground; and, in the month of October, unite the young shoots of several trees into a large hollow sphere, which, in the course of the following summer, forms a ball of verdure, adorned with several varieties of flowers.”

The second part of the work is devoted to the Monography of the Rose, in its numerous species, and endless varieties and sub-varieties. A strictly scientific arrangement is adopted. We should fear that this section of the work is out of proportion to the wants or tastes of popular readers. But then the book is intended exclusively for rose-growers; and they may wish to know minutely as much as can be known of the habits and character of their favourite plants. In the present season, Cels, a floriculturist of Paris, has obtained four new and beautiful varieties; Joly of Wissons has recently obtained ten kinds; and, in the year 1836, Vibert, who has written a valuable “Essai sur les Roses,” obtained no fewer than forty varieties. Mrs Gore's elegant book must be a desideratum to all who either admire or wish to cultivate “the Queen of Flowers.”

Sartor Resartus.—The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh, &c. &c.

By what fatality was it that the most radically Radical speculation upon men and things, which has appeared for many years, should have first come abroad in a violent Tory periodical? This work, which was, but cannot always be, neglected in England, has been reprinted in America, in which land we have the authority of the late traveller Miss Martineau for saying, that the prophet has found the honour and acceptance not at first awarded in his own country. A collected edition of the papers, which went through several numbers of Fraser's Magazine, has, however, at length appeared in London; and we are farther promised Mr Carlyle's Miscellaneous Works, which, we presume, must include his editorial labours also, or “The Life and Opinions of Herr Teufelsdröckh,” that true philosopher of the Radical school, and original expounder of “the Philosophy of Clothes.” He is a somewhat mysterious personage this said Professor Teufelsdröckh—“a Voice publishing tidings of the Philosophy of Clothes; undoubtedly a spirit addressing spirits.” His English editor cannot promise the Discloser “a paramount popularity in England.” Apart from the choice of the subject, the manner of treating it “betokens rusticity and academic seclusion, unblamable, indeed inevitable in a German, but fatal to success with our public.”

He speaks out with a strange plainness; calls many things by their mere dictionary names. To him, the upholsterer is no pontiff, neither is any drawing-room a temple; were it never so begirt and overhung, “a whole immensity of Brussels carpets, and pier-glasses, and ormolu,” as himself expresses it, “cannot hide from me that such drawing-room is simply a section of infinite space, where so many god-created souls do for the time meet together.” To Teufelsdröckh, the highest Duchess is reputable, is venerable, but nowise for her pearl bracelets and Malines laces; in his eyes, the star of a Lord is little less and little more than the broad button of Birmingham spelter in a clown's smock. “Each is an implement,” he says, “in its kind, a tag for hooking together, and, for the rest, was dug from the earth together, and hammered on a anvil before smiths' fingers.” Thus does the Professor look in men's faces with a strange impartiality, a strange scientific freedom, like a man unwarped in the higher circles; like a man “dropped thither from the moon.” To thinkers of our British nation, the Editor ventures to recommend the work, and he imagines that even among the Unfathomable sinks too, it'll be true, as Teufelsdröckh maintains, that "within the most starched crust, there passes a windpipe and a weasand, and under the thickest-embroidered waistcoat, beats a heart," the force of that rapt earnestness may be felt, and here and there an arrow of the soul pierces through. In our wild sea, shaggy, unkempt-like, a Baptist living on locusts and wild honey, there is an untutored energy, a silent, as it were unconscionous strength, which, except in the higher walks of literature, must be rare. Many a deep glance, and often with unspeakable precision, has he cast into mysterious Nature, and the still more mysterious life of man. Wonderful it is with what cutting words now and then he severs asunder the confusion, shears down, were it furthest deep, into the true centre of the matter; and there not only hits the nail on the head, but, with crushing force, smites it home and buries it. On the other hand, let us be free to admit he is the most unequal writer breathing. Often, after some such feat, he will play truant, and so dawdling and dreaming, and mumbling and maundering the merest common-place, as if he were asleep with his eyes open, which indeed he is. Occasionally we find consummate vigour, a true inspiration: his humming thoughts step forth in fit being—words like so many full-formed Minervas issuing amid flame and splendour from Jove's head; a rich idiomatic diction, picturesque allusions, story, poetic emphasis, or quaint tricky turns; all the graces and terrors of a wild imagination wedded to the clearest intellect, alternate in beautiful vicissitude, were it not that sheer sleeping and soporific passages, circumlocutions, repetitions, tautologies of pure and doing jargon, so often intervene! On the whole, Professor Teufelsdröckh is not a cultivated writer. Of his sentences, perhaps not more than nineteen stand straight on their legs. . . . Nevertheless, in almost his very worst moods, there lies in him a singular attraction; a wild tone pervades the whole utterance of the man, like its key-note and regulator, now averting itself aloft, as into the song of spirits, or else the shrill mockery of fiends; now sinking in cadences, not without melodious heartiness, though sometimes abrupt enough, into the common pitch, when we hear it only as a monotonous hum; or gleams of an ethereal love burst forth from him, soft washings of infinite pity; he could clasp the whole universe into his bosom, and keep it warm; it seems as if, under that rude exterior, there dwelt a very seraph. Then again he is so sly, and still, so imperturbably satiric; shows such indifference, malign coolness towards all that men strive after, and ever with some half visible wrinkle of a bitter sardonic humour, if indeed it be not stolid callousness, that you look on him almost with a shudder, as on some incarnate Mephistopheles, to whom this great celestial and terrestrial round, after all, were but some huge foolish whirligig, where kings and beggars, and angels and demons, and stars and street-sweepings, were chaotically whirled, in which only children would take interest. . . . Certainly a most self-enclosed, altogether enigmatic nature this of Teufelsdröckh!

We must, however, leave the reader to discover how these singular characteristics of the Professor are unfolded in the course of his lucubrations on the Philosophy of Clothes. These lucubrations have puzzled both the Old and the New World. Editors and Booksellers' Tasters have been at a loss what to make of them, or even to determine whether the affair presented as a translation from the German, was not what the English call a hoax, and the Yankees a hoax. The North American Reviewer had been nearly fairly bitten, though his rare sagacity finally discovered that Professor Teufelsdröckh is about as real a personage as Tristram Shandy's father, Captain Gulliver, or Don Quixote. We can, no more than the English translator, promise the Professor's discursive, light, profound, quaint, and humorous disquisitions, a permanent popularity in England; but this we promise: those who can taste him, will not easily forget his race.

The Hebrew Wife; or, The Laws of Marriage Examined.

This is a reprint of a treatise by S. E. DWIGHT, an acute American lawyer, which has been warmly recommended by Dr Wardlaw of Glasgow, and printed in consequence. There is no one of these writings now, we believe, legitimated by the legislature of the United States, to which the reverend Doctor feels strong repugnance; and, as we conceive, not without grave reasons. His remarks—"There are cases of affinity, respecting which doubts have been entertained whether they are within or without the line drawn by the Divine law in regard to matrimonial union; and, in not a few instances, as might have been anticipated, such doubts have given way before the strength of inclination. I need not shrink from saying that I refer especially to marriages on the part of widowers with the sisters of their former wives. In the volume before us, ('The Hebrew Wife,') these doubts are settled in the only way that is consistent with the safety of either the virtue or the happiness of domestic life; both of which would, in many ways, be endangered by such an extension of that sacred boundary as some have pleaded for: and the decisions of the inspired Volume are satisfactorily shown to be in full harmony with the secure maintenance of that

Of Paradise that has survived the Fall."

Mr Dwight complains that the American Legislatures have unsettled a law which subsisted undisturbed under the Israelitish church for fifteen centuries, and under the Christian church for more than seventeen.

"The Hebrew Wife" is, from the nature of the subject, a very learned and curious work. Dr Wardlaw expresses the highest admiration for the scholar-like style in which it is executed. We shall cite but one passage relating to the marriage law-makers:—"The curious reader, in examining some of our statute books, will be struck with sundry nice distinctions made between lawful and unlawful marriages. In various instances he will find that a man is allowed to marry his wife's sister or niece, while a woman is forbidden to marry her husband's brother or nephew. In endeavouring to account for these distinctions, he may perhaps imagine that the law-makers were guided by the modern notion—that a woman is more nearly related to her husband than a man to his wife. This, however, could not have occasioned them; for the statutes in which they are found were made before the publication of the pamphlet in which this notion was first promulgated. Their real origin is to be traced to the following facts:—The law-makers were exclusively men; men usually wish to marry women who are younger than themselves; men commonly prefer maids to widows. A brother's wife and an uncle's wife must, of course, be widows, and the latter is usually older than her co-relative, a husband's nephew; but this is not the case with a wife's sister or a wife's niece. Had the law-makers been women, as ladies are willing to marry men older than themselves, and do not refuse widowers when they cannot get bachelors, the popular feeling in the legislatures would probably have been in favour of all four of the exemptions, and would, doubtless, have required a brother's wife and an uncle's wife to be placed on as high ground as a wife's sister and a wife's niece. This operation of female views and sympathies on our marriage acts, would have brushed away several odious distinctions without a difference, and would have put widows and widowers on a level." The work is well worth the attention of those whose opinions are fluctuating upon the subject of which it treats.

The Scottish Endowment Question, Ecclesiastical and Educational. By the Rev. John Skinner, of Perth.

Here is a large volume put forth by an able advocate of Voluntaryism, which exhausts the whole subject, spiritual and secular, political and statistical. The author draws attention to the insidious advances made by the Compulsory party in their demands for Church Extension. Five or six years ago, when the cry began, 100 new churches, and £10,000 a-year to endow them, was the very modest demand; but, at a Church-Extension breakfast in Edinburgh, a few months back, "Dr Chalmers, from the Chair, and in the hearing of three hundred zealous partisans, declared that, instead of a 100, they would require at least 700 churches—nay, he would not consider the object attained till they had got 1000 of these new churches; and that, instead of a paltry £100 a-year, the ministers of these churches should receive, at the very least, the minimum stipend of the poorest parochial clergy—that is, £300 each. Nay, says he, we must have a church for every 700 of the population—that is, 1428 new churches, and £300 for the minister of each—that is, £285,600; and all to be drawn annually from the taxes of the nation. Now what," says Mr Skinner, "does this imply, but that dissenting ministers must be expelled from the field, and dissenting churches shut up, as being nuisances at present, and as doomed to be tolerated no more?" The reverend author warmly approves the extension of education to the Highlanders, and at the national expense; but he contends that this should be done in a national and Christian, and not in a narrow, sectarian, and exclusive spirit. The excessive and arbitrary power over schoolmasters granted to the parochial clergy, and to Presbyteries, by the act 43, George III., is most justly reprobated. By these regulations, "no dissenter who does not sacrifice his convictions to his secular interests, can fill the petty office of a parish schoolmaster. Whatever may be his talents and learning, his skill and enthusiasm as an instructor of youth, the door is shut against him by this act." Concerning the parochial schoolmasters, it is inquired, "How often do they assume in the public eye but little more than the ignoble aspect of truckling serfs and scavengers to the kirk minister; gathering and serving up to him the parish gossip, and seconding and promoting all his little darling and pettifogging projects!" And what wonder, when, at the nod of the minister and his clerical allies, these functionaries hold their little benefices?

Lockhart versus Ballantynes.

The trustees and family of the late Mr James Ballantyne of Edinburgh, have published a pamphlet in refutation of "The mis-statements and calumnies contained in Mr Lockhart's life of Sir Walter Scott, respecting the Messrs Ballantynes." These gentlemen were Sir Walter's friends from boyhood, and his partners in printing and publishing. We reserve our notice of the "Refutation" until we shall have seen what Mr Lockhart has to say in explanation, vindication, or palliation; for it is impossible that he can permit grave and serious charges, supported by documents and tables of figures, which so deeply implicate his character as a man, as well as his fidelity as the biographer of Scott, to pass unnoticed. If he shall, there is but one inference to be drawn.

Poems and Songs. By Alexander Rodger.

This west-country popular bard, has collected his poetical pieces, many of which are already well known and much admired, and dedicated the volume to the "Master Mind of the Age." If we cannot promise the Bowerer of Glasgow and Paisley, a great fame on the south side of the Tweed, we may safely predict, that the better he is understood, the more he will be admired. Now, this does not by any means hold, save of the greatest and most original poets. Radicals as we are, we fear that "Sandy Rodger" has rather overshot the mark, not in the pungent quality, but in the quantity of his political squibs, satires, and bons. Were it not that the chosen specimens of Rodger's muse are already in every body's mouth, we might be disposed to cite "Sanct Mungo," or, "Behave yourself before folk." As fine, in their peculiar mood of cheerful laughing sagacity and humour, are "Baith Sides o' the Picture" and "Jamie Macnab;" or, better still, "Marry for love, and Work for Stiller."

A True Treatise on the Art of Fly-Fishing, Trolling, &c., as practised on the Dove, and the principal Streams of the Midland Counties.

We take this to be a really good practical treatise. The author, William Shipley of Ashborne, is an angler himself of course; but his father was also a famous angler, who lived, man and boy, in Ashborne to a great age, and was for fifty years accounted the best fly-fisher that appeared on the banks of the classic Dove. Nay, more, he was acknowledged to be such by both gentle and simple among the jealous "brothers of the angle." William I. left, together with the knowledge of his art, several memoranda to William II, upon the pastime to which his life had been dedicated; and those precious relics, after long solicitation, he has been induced to arrange and publish. In this task, he has been aided by a certain Edward Fitzgibbon, Esq., who is not needed; and who perhaps may be mere moonshine in water. The book is, however, well worth the attention of practical anglers, for Mr Fitzgibbon's garnishings and condiments have not spoiled its native flavour. It will be valuable to those especially whose fishing head-quarters may be Ashborne, Bakewell, or any place in the midland stations. The "gentle brethren of the angle" are well known to be—indeed above any other class of sportsmen; save those who shoot flying—addicted to the use of another tool, which wags term the Long Bow. Of this amiable weakness in amateur and literary anglers, Mr Shipley gives some amusing instances.

Medical Portrait Gallery.

Fisher & Son are publishing, in monthly parts, the portraits of the most celebrated physicians and surgeons, with biographical memoirs, written by Mr Pettigrew. The work begins with Esculapius, who is immediately followed by Sir Henry Hallard. Of the modern country physician, there is a very good portrait. The memoirs, though necessarily brief, are comprehensive and well executed. The Parts already published give a fair selection of the most eminent medical men of different countries, though those of England properly preponderate. There is a very striking head of Akenhead, and fair portraits of Sir Charles Clarke, Dr Blundell, and the late eminent Richat of Paris. Sir Astley Cooper, engraved from a painting by Lawrence, is one of the best pictures in a series which must have peculiar interest for all medical men. To them the Medical Portrait Gallery has indeed double interest, from the memoirs containing an account of the discoveries of the different physicians, and of whatever was peculiar in their professional practice.

Ireland not a Conquered Country.

An English clergyman, of the Whig persuasion, has put himself to the trouble of proving that the Irish are neither a conquered nation nor yet aliens, and that they have the same civil and religious rights as the British people. His learned labour is somewhat superfluous. The Liberals require no argument on the subject; and the high Tories are far above conviction.

Astronomy Simplified. By F. B. Burton.

This very small elementary treatise is the composition of the authoress of "Distant Glimpses, or Astronomical Sketches," another popular treatise on the science. The compilation will be found useful to the young, and to those who have not leisure or taste for the study of more elaborate works.

The Invalid's Book.

Every one has his book of amusement, and why not the invalid? The "Invalid's Book" is a series of tales, essays, and sketches in prose and verse, generally of a serious character, and not very remarkable for anything, save a good design.

Hints on Study and the Employment of Time.

By a late Member of the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple.

This is a grave and didactic treatise, conveying much good advice to the young. Will the lads heed it?

Scriptural Studies on the Creation, the Christian Scheme, and the Inner Sense, by the Rev. William Hill Turner, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge,

Is another new theological work, which appears worthy of the attention of theological students.

Esther Copely, authoress of "Cottage Comforts," has bestowed "A Word to Parents, Nurses, and Teachers," upon physical education. She seems a sensible enough though commonplace directress.

PAMPHLETS.

Among those on our table is a Letter to Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, on the irreligion, not of Operas, but of Oaths, by a member of the Church of England. Oaths he considers the greatest existing abuse, and that, if they were abolished, the Church would no longer need to blush for its connexion with the State. The writer, who is a sincere and earnest man, goes the whole length of the Quakers.

Lectures of W. J. Fox.

The lectures last published will attract particular attention, from the late coronation heathen mummeries being discussed in a grave manner, as if they were understood to be anything more than an idle, expensive, and worthless pageant, got up to gratify the vanity of one class, and to gull another.

Popular Control over Party Legislation.

By W. S. Sankey.

This pamphlet, by a thorough and intelligent Radical, would occupy nearly as much space in the description as it does in the original. Let those who wish to know Mr Sankey's views on an important subject, buy his groat's worth.

"* We must entreat the forbearance of the poets, whether actual or amateur. There is a pile of volumes on our tables, of which "Attila, King of the Huns," and "Italy," a poem, form the base, and Miss Barrett's "Seraphim" the apex; and which bids fair soon to rival a dwarf Parnassus; which "has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." To the lady in particular, in whom, at a first glance, we think we recognise the sister-spirit of Crawshaw, our especial apologies are due; but we would not have her jostled in the promiscuous crowd.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE PARLIAMENT was prorogued on the 16th August, by the Queen in person. The speech laments the civil war in Spain, states that the disturbances in Canada have been suppressed, rejoices at the progress which has been made in the Abolition of Negro Apprenticeship, alludes to the Abolition of the Imprisonment for Debt, the Church Plurality, the Irish Poor Law, and Composition of Tithe Bills, and cannot "sufficiently thank" the Commons for the extravagant Civil List. Thus has ended a Session of unexampled length, and in the proceedings of which, the people have taken less interest than in those of any Session since 1830. It sat 173 days, and 1,134 hours were devoted to public business. The principal Bills which have been passed are those on the Civil List, Canada Coercion, Canada Indemnity, Irish Poor, Irish Tithes, Imprisonment for Debt, Slavery Act Amendment, and Benefices and Pluralities. The measures affecting Scotland chiefly relate to some alterations on the administration of the law. The result of the Session has been to sink the Commons and raise the Lords in public estimation. Nowhere do we hear of any proposal to swamp the Lords, or to remove the Bishops from the Upper House; but the remonstrances against the proceedings of the Lower House, and assertions that the Reform Act has proved a complete failure, are both loud and general. Many people imagine that, at their next meeting, there will be less cause to complain. We are not among the number. It is our firm belief that next Session will be much the same as the last, and that there is no immediate prospect of those measures which it was supposed the Reform Act would ensure being attained, within any definite period. If not worse than the rotten-burgh Parliaments, the present is no better; but perhaps the deficient revenue, high price of food, and the obvious discontent of a great portion of the working classes, may bring relief sooner than we anticipate.

ENGLAND.

CRIMINAL CONVICTIONS.—The writers on the English law and constitution laud, almost to nausea, the institution of trial by jury, and the efficiency of their criminal code. But, if we are to judge of it by its results, there appears little ground for laudation. In the year ending Michaelmas 1837, there were in England, exclusive of persons fined, no fewer than 59,364 persons convicted without a jury, while 16,684 were convicted by jury, out of 27,469 committed for trial; of these 4682 were acquitted, against 1498 no bills were found, 1243 were not prosecuted, and the remainder were disposed of, either on account of insanity, being admitted King's evidence, or their trials delayed. If we compare these results with those of our criminal law of Scotland, we shall see the superiority of the latter. In 1830, 2063 persons were committed, of whom 1429 were tried, 1282 convicted, and only 142 acquitted, the remainder being found to be insane. Thus, in England, one person in five tried is acquitted; while in Scotland the proportion is only one in ten. It must be presumed that all those acquitted were innocent, and that they were unjustly accused and imprisoned. We thus see the necessity of speed and dispatch in the administration of criminal justice; for, it would appear, from the above returns, that there are annually between 7000 and 8000 persons accused, and most of them kept longer or shorter time in our jails, for crimes of which they are innocent.

SCOTLAND.

HIGHLAND DESTITUTION.—We predicted last year, when the appeal of the Highland lairds and clergy was so well responded to by the people of England and the south of Scotland, that it would not be long before another attempt on their pockets would be made; and now this year we have demands from Shetland for charity equally clamant as those of last year from the Highlands; and so it will always be as long as the lairds can contrive to extract from others what they ought to give from their own rentals. As long as any money is given, it will be sure to be asked for. We therefore beg to inform the people of England, that there are perfectly efficient Poor-Laws in Scotland, and that they are in operation in two or three hundred of the midland and southern parishes; but that the lairds of the Highlands and Islands have never chosen to put the law fairly in operation in the northern parts of the kingdom, and hence the continual outcry about destitution. But the best part of the matter is to come. From £12,000 to £15,000 of the money collected last year remains in the hands of the Committee, and, instead of applying it for the purpose for which it was collected, relieving the present distress, the Committee have announced their intention of applying the surplus in their hands in building and endowing at Strathpeffer an hospital, and in the promotion of Scriptural education; and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of a great proportion of the subscribers, they seem determined to carry their resolutions into effect. If this does not prevent the success of any future appeal of the Highland lairds, we do not know what ought.

THE CORN LAWS.—The high and rapidly increasing price of wheat—it having sprung up 8s. in one day at Wakefield, and the highest quality approaching the war price of £5 per quarter—the late and unfavourable harvest, and the accounts of deficient crops in foreign countries, have caused much alarm throughout the country. Anti-Corn-Law Associations have been organized in many places, and numerous persons are giving lectures throughout the manufacturing districts on the iniquity of the Starvation Laws. One of the most efficient of these lecturers is Mr W. A. Poulton, who has recently given a course at Bolton to crowded audiences. He shewed the injustice of the proceedings of the legislature on this subject, the selfishness of the landed interest, and the hollowness of their claims for protection. One of the first grounds set up for this claim, is the amount of our taxation, caused by our heavy national debt. But it is plain that the Corn-Laws have been the cause of the great amount of the national debt, and that a great proportion of it must have found its way into the pockets of the landowners. The high price of corn during the war necessarily raised wages and the price of every commodity purchased by the government; and as rents, in consequence of the high price of grain, increased three or fourfold, the landed interest were the chief, if not the only party who derived any benefit from the high prices. In the shape of rents, the landed interest must, therefore, have received a great part of the money which was borrowed, and of the taxes which were raised, for the greater part of both were expended within the country; the sums remitted abroad for payment of the troops, and for other purposes, being quite inconsiderable when the total amount is regarded. In other countries, the land pays, by a direct tax, a large proportion of the taxes. In France, the proportion is one-fourth. In Prussia, rent pays a tax of twenty-five per cent. In Great Britain, little more than a million, out of nearly fifty of taxes, is raised by a land-tax; and it has not been increased since the time of William III., 150 years ago, although rents have been augmented during that time from ten to fifteen fold.

As to the argument, that a free trade in corn would make us dependent on foreigners, and that they, by withholding the supply, could starve us at pleasure, it is a perfect chimera. In 1810, in the heat of the war, with the full knowledge and concurrence of Buonaparte, we received 300,000 quarters of wheat direct from France. On the other hand, all his efforts to depress the manufactures of this country, by prohibiting their importation into the Continent, equally failed. Notwithstanding the Milan and Berlin decrees, our export of manufactures was hardly sensibly diminished. They reached their former destinations on the Continent as surely and in nearly as great quantities as ever; the only effect of the prohibition being, to raise the price to the consumers. It is singular it never occurs to those who are continually talking about the danger of being dependent on foreigners, that we are already dependent on them for many of the first necessities of life, and yet that, even during war, we never wanted a regular supply. For example, we get a large proportion of our tallow, and nearly the whole of our tar and hemp, from one country alone—Russia. The raw material of our cotton manufacture—now the most important in the country—we procure almost entirely from foreigners. Yet these articles are raised in a few countries only; corn, on the other hand, is produced, in more or less quantity, all over the face of the earth; and it could only be by a universal combination of all nations, such as the world never saw, that the importation of grain into Britain could be stopped.

The effect of restricting the import of the raw materials of our manufactures, which corn may essentially be considered, is strikingly shewn by the history of the wool trade. Down to 1802, the importation of foreign wool was free. In 1802, however, a duty of 5s. 3d. was laid on; in 1813, it was raised to 6s. 8d.; and, in 1813, Mr Vansittart, having the consummate folly to yield to the interested clamours of the landowners, raised it to 56s. a-cwt., or 6d. per lb. The consequence was, that it occasioned a great decline of the woollen manufacture, from which it has hardly yet recovered. The absurdity of the proceeding was perhaps unequalled; for there are a great many kinds of cloth which cannot be made at all from British wool; and the demand for the fine wools coming abroad, the price fell, and foreigners were enabled to compete with us in markets which we had previously exclusively supplied. Without, therefore, in any degree raising the price of British wool, or putting more money into the hands of the landlords, it injured essentially one of our staple manufactures. On the duty being reduced to 4d. per lb. on wool, under the value of 1s., and to 1d. on wool of higher value, the manufacture began to revive; and, so far from depressing the price of British wool, it rose, in the year 1834, to a higher price than ever it had been before, and the price still continues much higher than it had been during the high duty, and this in face of a continually increasing import of wool. In 1800, the imports amounted only to nine millions of pounds weight; now they exceed thirty millions of pounds; and yet the English wool-grower suffers nothing, while all the rest of the community are benefited.

The subject is so important, that we need not apologise for again bringing before our readers the precarious situation in which our manufactures are placed by the high price of food, and the retaliatory measures adopted by foreign states in consequence of our obstinate adherence to the prohibitory system. In 1820, we sent five-and-a-half million yards of cotton cloth to Prussia; in 1837, not one yard. In the same period, our export to Germany has fallen off by ten millions of yards. Instead of exporting cloth on which 10d. per lb. is expended on weavers' wages alone, we send twist, on which only 5d. per lb. is expended on wages altogether. It is thus that the Corn-Laws have depressed the hand-loom weaver down to his present state of wretchedness. Between 1820 and 1837 the exports of twist increased sixfold—a proof of the rapidity with which the foreign cotton manufacture is advancing. America now consumes as much raw cotton as Britain did in 1816. Before 1808, the whole cotton spun in the United States did not exceed 100 bales; in 1826, it was 100,000; and in 1836, 237,000 bales. From 1828 to 1833, the consumption of cotton increased 65 per cent, in America, but only 40 per cent in Britain. Switzerland, notwithstanding numerous disadvantages from her inland situation, is competing with us in the markets of Italy, North and South America, and even of the East Indies. In France the consumption of cotton was, in 1833, 262,719 bales; in 1836, 353,000; and, in the last-mentioned year, 60 new mills were in the course of erection. In Austria, Bohemia, the Tyrol, Lombardy, and in Italy generally, the most rapid strides are making in this very important manufacture.

We hope, in the struggle for the repeal of the Corn-Laws, it will not be forgotten that not only the importation of grain, but of food of all sorts, is either placed under severe restrictions, or altogether prohibited. Here we have a few of these duties:—Bacon, 28s. per cwt. Beef, (salted,) 12s. per do. Hams, 28s. per do. Spirits, 22s. 6d. per gallon. Coals, 40s. per ton. Butter, £1 per cwt. Cheese, 16s. 6d. per do. Potatoes, 2s. per cwt., that is 3d. per peck. Soap, 90s. a cwt. Eggs, 1d. a dozen. Fresh beef, mutton, pork, cattle, sheep, lambs, and swine, prohibited to be imported.

This certainly is the only country which ever existed, whose rulers maintain that it is advantageous to a country to starve its inhabitants!

IRELAND.

- RAILWAY COMMISSION.—Commissioners were appointed in 1836, to examine on the spot the various localities in Ireland, for the formation of Railways, for which bills had been brought into Parliament. The report of the Commissioners has lately been published; and they have come to the rather unexpected conclusion, that no line of railway in all Ireland will pay the shareholders more than four per cent; and, consequently, that none should be allowed to be made by private enterprise; but that the Government should take the railway system into its management. If it do, it will become a fertile source of jobbing; and, after all, the thing will be a failure. The Caledonian Canal must not be forgotten. Mr O'Connell has stated, and we think with truth, that he looked upon the labours of this commission as having done incalculable mischief to Ireland; for they had not contented themselves with reporting proper lines of railway, but they had utterly condemned and forbidden the introduction of railways into Ireland. It is fortunate that no such commission was issued for England, before the great lines of railway now completed or framing, were undertaken; for we believe the result would have been the same, and that capitalists would have been deterred from engaging in these useful and hitherto generally successful undertakings.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the crops are very contradictory; but from all that we have seen and read, we have come to the conclusion, that, even with fine weather, there is no probability of the crop reaching an average. In this neighbourhood, the wheat and oats are middling crops, but the barley is the worst we remember. The early turnips, planted for the use of the cowfeeders, who generally begin to consume them by the end of September, promise fair on light soils; but the later crops, particularly where the ground is stiff, must turn out very deficient. The potato crop has greatly improved, but the numerous blanks by failure of the seed will greatly diminish the produce. We have heard nothing in Scotland of the maggot which appears to have attacked the wheat crop in England. We subjoin abridged accounts of the state of the crop in various districts.

Dumfriesshire.—Wheat is a complete failure. Oats, on dry and well-cultivated soils, are most luxuriant; on poor soils quite the reverse. The same may be said of barley, except that there are fewer poor crops. Potatoes are very unpromising.

East Lothian.—Winter wheat is well planted on dry leamy soils; but on strong heavy soils, thin, and likely to produce grain of an inferior quality. Spring-sown wheat is short in the ear. Oats and barley, on good dry soils, will be a full average crop; but on stiff heavy soils the crop is indifferent. Potatoes are weakly; and it is only on fine dry soils that an abundant crop of turnips can be expected.

Renfrewshire.—The rains threaten injury to the crops, and will render the harvest late. The hay crop has suffered severely by the wet.

Aberdeen.—The crops of all kinds are luxuriant.

Between Forfar and Crief the crops are generally very late. The grain crops are above an average; and on the banks of the Tay every crop looks exceedingly well. The turnip crop is in general bad, and in some places an entire failure.

Ireland.—In the west of Ireland the wheat and oats will be a full crop. The potatoes are an average crop; hay and flax scanty. In Meath and Louth, the crops are most luxuriant. The potatoes are abundant, though late; but all the grain crops have been much laid with the late rains.

England.—In the western and middle counties, wheat is very backward, and much complaint is made of injury by maggots. In the eastern counties, and particularly in Norfolk and Suffolk, the crops are excellent. In the south, the wheat crop is said never to have looked better. In the north, the produce will fall short of the harvest of last year. Barley is represented as an abundant crop, but it is feared the quality will be injured by late rains.

In Wales, on good land, well cultivated, the wheat is a fair crop, and also barley on light soils; but, in the inland valleys, the crop will be very late, and a great part of it will never be reaped at all.

The rise in the price of wheat of late has almost been unprecedented. Two years ago, the general average was 36s.; in the end of December last, 53s.; and the general average of the week, ending 3d August 1838, was, wheat, 70s.; barley, 32s. 9d.; oats, 23s.; beans, 30s.; peas, 35s. 2d. The aggregate average of the six weeks which regulates the duty, was, wheat, 68s. 5d.; barley, 31s. 11d.; oats, 22s. 10d.; beans, 37s. 8d.; peas 35s. 7d.—showing a considerable rise on every species of grain except peas. The duty on wheat has sunk to 16s. 8d.; barley, 16s. 4d.; oats, 13s. 9d.; beans, 14s.; peas, 16s. 9d. Wheat has been sold in the Edinburgh market as high as 90s. The average at Haddington on 10th August was 80s.

At the first Falkirk tryst for the season, held on the 18th August, about 4000 head of black cattle were exposed. Angusshire stots, four years old, brought from £14 to £14 10s.; three-year olds, £9 10s. to £10; two-year olds, £7 to £7 10s.; Highland stots, four years old, from £4 to £5; two-year olds, £3 15s. to £3 5s. At the great Doncaster wool fair, held on the 6th of August, prices exceeded those of last year by 4s. per stone on the average. The averages were, hog, 19s.; hog and ewe, 17s. 6d.; ewe, 16s. per stone.

COMMERCE AND MANUFACTURES.

The increased circulation of the Joint Stock and Private Banks, the average of the three months ending the 30th June, exceeding by £818,992 that of the three months ending 30th March, appears to have stimulated trade; and the accounts from the manufacturing districts are more favourable than they have been for some time past. At Leeds, the cloth trade is very brisk, and large quantities of goods have of late been exposed at the cloth halls. At Huddersfield, much business is doing in every description of heavy woollens, though complaints are made that prices have not risen in proportion to the rise in the price of the raw material. The accounts from America are also favourable. Business is perceptibly improving; the crops are abundant, and orders for British manufactures are expected to increase during the autumn.

OCTOBER, 1838.

PEEPS POLITICAL, FROM THE LOOP-HOLES OF RETREAT.

" 'Tis pleasant from the loop-holes of retreat
To peep on such a world."

THE recess of Parliament brings pleasures of a kind that must be highly prized, but which are not often spoken of. How pleasant it must be, for example, to the wearied politician to lie quietly by for a time, and coolly overlook the game in which he was but lately keenly engaged! How interesting the employment of watching, from a distance, the complicated movements of the great political and social machine; from the strong throbbing of its mighty heart in London, to the distant but vigorous vibrations which may be marked in its farthest ramifications—at the Government House of Quebec, at Darrynane, at a Sheffield Radical meeting; or be it no more than in the humble parsonage of Knockany, where an obscure parish priest may give an impulse to the machine which is felt to the extremities.

The mere State machine is at present little attended to. It is known to be laid up, dreadfully damaged and quite unfit for farther operations; and attention is riveted upon the more intelligent of those persons who, having an interest in the concern, are earnestly engaged in attempting to tinker it up, and to cajole the public anew into the belief that, if not quite sound in all its parts, yet, if one rusty lever is taken away, and a new screw supplied—one wheel greased, and another hitched over an obstruction—the crazy, old, worthless thing may hobble on through the tear and wear of another year. To lay aside these bald figures:—the more able of those professed Liberals who, if they saw any chance of the Melbourne Government holding together, might not be at all troublesome with their remonstrances or complaints, perceive that its salvation, even for one session, is impossible without a change of measures. They perceive that the country can no longer be deceived. Even Ireland is opening its eyes, and the case is become alarming. From indications not to be mistaken, and which are quite as marked in Ireland as in England, there is a strong and, on this one point, we believe, a very sincere desire to get rid of a part of the Cabinet, in order to save the rest, and protract Lord Melbourne's reign, with all its concomitant blessings and advantages, for as long a period as possible. The "Irish Chiefs," as the Irish Ministerial supporters now delight to be called, would, in general, be content to sacrifice Lord John Russell, who possesses some little nerve; Mr Spring Rice, and probably the noble Secretary for the Colonies, so that the Melbourne Administration might be kept together for certain remaining "Irish objects," which are anything but the objects upon which the Irish people have set their hearts. No one will now say that it is for Church Reform, whether in England or Ireland, that a Melbourne Government should be supported by Ireland; nor yet for Corporation Reform in that unfortunate country, always oppressed by its open enemies, and betrayed by its treacherous friends. Although neither the "Irish Chiefs" nor the English Melbourne adherents would care one pin about the fate of the three Jonahs of the Cabinet, they might have no great objection to get rid of them handsomely—to Lord Glenelg being shipped off for India, Lord John Russell being kicked up stairs, and, if better might not be, to giving the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Speaker's chair, as an honourable retreat. By this purgation, and such an accession of strength as the Chiefs should sanction, if not prescribe, Mr O'Connell might again try his skill in cajoling the Irish with better success than has attended his Precursory exhibitions. It is obvious that Lord Melbourne's personal adherents, those backsliding Radicals of the press who are tied to support not the Ministry, but the Minister, vehemently desire the same thing. The forlorn hope is, getting rid of the more obnoxious Members of the Cabinet, and projecting either some good measure, or, at need, some delusion of mock liberalism. It is not that one of them can seriously expect greater liberality, or more firmness or statesman-like policy from Lord Melbourne, and any new staff that would consent to serve under his tarnished banner; but the plan might suffice to keep him in office for a while, and realize their own hopes of good things by and through him.

Lord Melbourne has the Court by the ear, and is therefore to be preferred; and the nonchalant Lord is also composed of more malleable material than little John; more impressible to the Irish screw. O'Connell's organ, The Dublin Pilot, has accordingly opened a hot fire upon the denounced portion of the Government, while a cross-fire is poured in by Lord Melbourne's small engines in London. Far be it from us to defend the individuals marked out as scape-goats; but we hold the entire Cabinet guilty alike, art and part, and believe that any intrigue to maintain one section in power at the expense of another, can have none other than selfish objects, and the continuance of delusion under a new guise. In O'Connell's Dublin journal, The Pilot, of the 5th September, we find the following passage from The Examiner, Lord Melbourne's personal London organ:—

None will rejoice more sincerely than ourselves, in seeing Lord Melbourne's Ministry occupying a higher and a stronger popular ground, as we are sure they may yet do, than that from which they have so unfortunately descended. But for this, as for any other purpose, be it for better or for worse, it is certain that the government must undergo some repairs, some renovation; for, constituted as it is, it cannot go through the first stage of the next Session. A deplorable deficiency of the faculties of business has lately been observable in Parliament. This must be cured, for it most certainly will not be endured.

Upon this, The Pilot, well-knowing the quarter whence the threat proceeds, remarks—

Now, this we take to be a very distinct and audible beating up for ministerial recruits; and this is the point on which we wish to fasten the attention of the clergy and the Irish people.

We do not remember to have read in English, or indeed European history, of any ministry that possessed equal advantages and powers for serving their country as the Melbourne Ministry possessed, on the assumption of the sceptre last year by the present monarch. But, unluckily, on the very first night of the assembling of parliament, Lord J. Russell, the leader of the reform movement and of the House of Commons, suddenly came out with a declaration against the ballot and all further reform! This at once had its effect on the people; and the Tory lords were not slow in perceiving the advantages it gave them. It was a similar declaration against reform that unhinged the Duke of Wellington in 1830, and produced his downfall. The Tory Peers, we say, immediately on the declaration of Lord J. Russell, saw that the Melbourne Ministry was overthrown; and they accordingly assumed the duties and powers of government in both houses, and even the forms of address, appertaining from time immemorial to ministers of the crown. For it not unfrequently happened that Lord J. Russell, the successful leader of the British people against the Tory benches, would find himself constrained to "ask the right honourable baronet (Sir R. Peel) what course he meant to pursue on Thursday night with respect to the Irish municipal bill?"

Accordingly, this ministry and their measures were kicked unceremoniously by the Tory leaders in the Lords and Commons, and they were driven to the miserable position of eating up their own declarations. They are now beaten to the earth, and must either resign their clumsily-wielded power into the hands of the Tories, or else come back again to their insulted and disgusted constituents. But it is useless for them to come, unless identified with great measures, and accompanied by men drawn from the ranks of the people to represent these measures. Upon this there cannot, and there shall not, be any mistake. The office, for instance, of Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is notorious, is at present filled by incapacity, if not by something worse. Ireland, at least, will not long endure that man and his crochets.

There is much more of it; and abundant abuse of a proscribed few of the individual members of a Government every member of which is to be held equally guilty, and which the Irish Chiefs disgraced themselves by supporting in all their worst measures. But this shallow intrigue—the forlorn hope of the exclusive supporters of Melbourne; those who care not who perishes, so that the Premier is saved—cannot succeed.

The Whig-Tory Ministers must stand or fall together. The Tories, like men of sense, shun and disdain alliance with persons so hopelessly damaged; and no acute, forecasting Liberal, who is merely wise in his generation, and has any little character to risk, would take office in so rickety a Cabinet. Nor can any rational Reformer see one whit to choose between Lord John Russell and Lord Melbourne, save that most fickle of all earthly possessions, the favour of a young Queen held by an elderly courtier who chances to be her Minister, and for the endurance of which he must tremble every day that he rises. If there be any difference, it is rather in favour of Lord John Russell. He occasionally shews some power of resistance in a right direction. So much for this incipient intrigue, which can never ripen. Mr Spring Rice and Lord Glenelg might be got rid of to their own satisfaction; but what is to be made of the hope of the house of Russell?—And could Melbourne do without him and his collateral advantages?

The more moderate portion of the Liberal Ministerial supporters—those who, though they cannot defend the policy or measures of the Government, still, for some vague reason and more vague hope, desire to keep in the Whigs, but at the same time to make some progress in Reform—perceive as clearly as The Examiner or The Pilot, that, without actually doing something, as well as making vast professions, the Melbourne Ministry cannot longer exist. They, however, dread a disruption in the Cabinet. They try to keep it united, coax it to eat in its words, to hang out some fresh device, and to get up a new "principle."

The Melbournites are great men for "a principle." They can do nothing without one. It was on "a principle"—that, namely, indicated in the Appropriation Clause—upon which they proclaimed that their Government was based! The new principle recommended for their adoption is Ballot, which has the additional recommendation of giving them a chance of salvation, however small, at the next election; or, if not Ballot, which Lord John cannot in decency now countenance, then something else, to conciliate, and, if possible, pacify the grumbling Reformers. Will they do this? And, if they should promise, how far are these men of principle to be depended upon? It is not for us to laugh at the sanguine expectations of sincere Reformers, and much less to laugh derisively. Shortly after the formation of the second Melbourne Administration, we gave up all hopes of the Whig-Tories; yet, no longer ago than the accession of the new Sovereign, we were again willing to be deceived, to hope the best of them, even when we saw no sure foundation of hope. Thanks to Lord John Russell, he did not protract the delusion.* That energetic Little Finality probably outwitted himself, for it appears that he actually resigned—the most remarkable phenomenon, by the way, of the late Session;—but he effectually opened the eyes of the nation. There is, however, charity to be extended to those who, like Mr Ward, are willing to hope still, even against the tendencies of the Whig-Tory policy so glaringly manifested, and with not the substantial difference of a hairbreadth between the principles and objects of the two factions who have hitherto alternately made the people their spoil. But we wrong the Tories. They have something like a fixed creed, withering as are its dogmas; some comprehensible and consistent principles of action, bad as they are. To those real, though very, very moderate Reformers who persist in going over the old ground, and using the old language of superstitious dread of the Tories, rather than of rational dislike of Tory and of Whig-Tory principles, we speak more in sorrow than in anger, when we inquire how they vindicate their farther trust, or place any hope of good in men, who, imbecile to a proverb, have also shewn a reckless profrigality in their abandonment of their principles, unparalleled since the Revolution. Tory Governments, the worst of them, at least possessed the vigour which placed them above the necessity of practising such manifold deceptions, ending in the shameful desertion of the measures to which they were solemnly pledged.

How does it sound to hear, in this extremity, the Ministerial advocates, hired or voluntary, bid them stand forth like men, and save themselves by the adoption of some new principle of reform, such as Ballot; or—more futile still from snakity men—the reform of the Reform Bill! The matter can only be reconciled in the view, that, to keep their offices, it is imagined by such men as Mr Ward, Ministers will at need do anything:—and hence, in the eyes of Reformers, their superiority to the Tories. They will do anything to which they can be compelled; while the Tories would probably have the honesty and manliness to resign, as Sir Robert Peel did, to make way for Lord Melbourne and his “principle.”

To take but this one example of the good faith of Whig-Tories, and the depraving example they are setting to future Administrations:—If ever any government, and every individual member of that government, was solemnly pledged to a measure, it was Lord Melbourne's second Administration, to the great principle involved in the Appropriation Clause. That clause was their Palladium. Session after session, while Reformers cheered their spirit, they renewed the tokens of their allegiance to the principle of all church property being public property, and, as such, liable to be dealt with as the wisdom of Parliament thought fit. It was the thing upon which the Finality Ministers were fairly at issue with the Tories, and upon which there could be no concession, no compromise. They were pledged as gentlemen, as well as in their official capacity. Lord Melbourne, in particular, the chief of the Cabinet, roused himself from his ordinary complacent mood of pleasant drowsiness, and displayed energy foreign to his disposition, when the cause is merely public and not personally annoying. And how could he do less in that question upon which he said his Government was based? Great pains were taken by Ministers individually, to proclaim, that, on the carrying their Irish bill, “their existence as a Government depended;” and we have all seen how much they will peril and sacrifice in that dear cause—their official existence! Accordingly, when Lord Lyndhurst moved the destruction of the grand palladium, up got Lord Melbourne, in huge wrath. The proposition was almost a personal affront, in his peculiar circumstances. He declared that “He would not accept the bill when deprived of THE PRINCIPLE to which he was pledged.” He and his colleagues stood on that principle. They stood on that to which they were pledged; and—[now mark the noble Viscount's stalwart determination]—if they were no longer sustained in the maintenance of that principle, THEY WERE READY TO RESIGN THE OFFICES THEY HELD!!!

How we all crowed—poor simpletons, as the Tories called us, and as the Whigs thought us—at this brave declaration of the Premier! Here was a manly Minister! Here was a vigorous Government!

“Not only in point of honour, but in point of feeling, and in point of every regard which they would consider binding upon themselves as public men, he [our heroic and immovable Premier!] and his colleagues felt bound to adhere to the principle and to the letter of the resolution.”

And is it for the men who so lately made these studiously energetic declarations, and have so shamelessly, and with such sacrifice of personal and of public character, abandoned the cause they

* There is a delectable passage in O'Connell's second letter of the season to the “Hereditary bondsmen.” On the night when Lord John Russell solemnly confirmed his petulant declaration against the Ballot, on the fatal 21st of November last, poor Mr O'Connell went home to bed, and wept bitter tears all night! So, at least, he says; while, with Moore, in his melody of the “Bright Sword of Erin,” we say—

A drop of his heart's blood shall reek on the blade.”

Instead of going home to bed, and blubbering, why did not Mr O'Connell go to rest with a clear and quiet conscience, after having discharged his duty in warning the Cabinet Minister, as did Harrey, Leader, and Buller?—or act like Mr Ward, who, on the instant, told the testy Conservative Secretary that, by that declaration, he “had signed his own death-warrant, and chalked out the graves of his colleagues.” But, no! Mr O'Connell had no thunder-bolts to launch that evening. It was all drizzling rain. And what a picture of the pathetic!—

“The big, round tears coursing each other down his innocent nose

had sworn to maintain, that the member for Sheffield now challenges the farther reliance of the People?—that is, if they, and especially Finality John, can only be coaxed into hanging out some other Reform principle. A principle is a sine qua non with their advocates. A Principle seems as necessary to their existence as was a Moral to the character of Joseph Surface. We use Mr Ward's name, as the representative of a class of Reformers which we desire to respect though we cannot understand why they should encourage the delusion of continuing faith in the Finality Ministers—men of whom even Mr Ward was compelled to tell this disgraceful tale to his constituents:—

On the Irish Church I did suppose that the Government had given such distinct pledges to the country as to the policy they would pursue, that any departure from them was impossible. They have departed from them; and I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider the conduct of the Government on this question one of the grossest instances of political tergiversation that ever occurred. When we remember the fact, that, in 1835, this question was the Ministry's stepping-stone to office; that Lord John Russell then said, the principle of Appropriation was one of so much importance, that, if Sir Robert Peel's Government could only exist by succeeding against the principle, it were better that the principle should succeed and the Government should fall—that Mr Spring Rice said that the attempt to settle the question without this principle was one of those impossibilities which no man in his senses could contemplate—that Lord Melbourne said he considered himself pledged as a gentleman, to adhere to the principle—remembering all this, I confess it is with grief and pain I have seen the course which the Government have pursued on this question.

And yet Mr Ward would not abandon these men to their fate, lest a more Conservative Government might be put in their place! It is a strange state of a country when its rulers have no recommendation save their weakness and incapacity, and not daring to be so Conservative as the present Ministry are plainly inclined to be, ever since they gained the Court. Mr Ward, with many acute persons, believes that, though the Administration has been of no advantage to England, it has been a great blessing to Ireland. Even this is very questionable. A lull has been obtained for that poor country; but the permanent advantages remain to be proved. To pull down one vile and detestable faction only to rear up another, which would soon become as bad, will be found no enduring advantage. How many lulls, and respites, and highly popular Lord Lieutenants has Ireland had?—And in what have they all ended? Mr O'Connell represents Ireland as more volcanic than ever, and loud complaints are now made by his organs, of abuse of patronage by the paragon Irish Government. The best symptom of the national feeling of Ireland is, that, being as hostile as ever to Tory and Orange domination, the People begin to think for themselves. The vessel no longer answers so promptly as in times past to the helm, while the helmsman steered in which direction soever best suited his interest or inclination.

To come back to the heroic adherence of the Finality Ministers to their "principle:"—the very cream of the thing is, that some blabbers upon our side the Channel, charge O'Connell and the Irish Liberal Members with having forced poor Lord Melbourne upon the course which friends and enemies alike feel so humiliating and injurious; upon the abandonment of that single principle, which he could the worse spare, as he has not another liberal one left with which to shift himself. It is not surprising that his friends should seek to lay the blame on the Irish members; but can anything so monstrous and incredible as their accusation be really true? This extraordinary statement appeared first in The Examiner, when that print found it necessary to plead, in extenuation of the unprincipled abandonment of "the principle," that the Irish Members, not the Tory Irish, but the O'Connellites, had coerced the unhappy Premier, placed between the Devil and the deep sea, into the act which Mr Ward leniently describes as "an instance of the grossest tergiversation that ever occurred." The same extraordinary assertion, as to the Irish Chiefs, has been made in other quarters; and thus the mystery of iniquity deepens, and every man forms his own hypothesis as to the alleged conduct of O'Connell. Is it then true, as the Tories declare, that the Irish Chiefs make the British Minister yield to the screw as often as they have a mind? But, above all, is it true that the Irish chiefs forced Lord Melbourne to give up the Appropriation Clause, and carried that infamous Tithe Bill which the Irish nation spurns? O'Connell's choicest flowers of blarney, and his direct denials of a fact so incredible, cannot blind his countrymen to the part he so openly acted in Parliament in support of that bill, and its pleasant collateral, the million; which last, however, more nearly affects us than the Irish. But, if it be true that he was the instrument of compelling the Government to disgrace itself, and abandon whatever was of value in the bill—namely, the assertion of the great principle, that Church property is public property, and to be dealt with as such—what then shall we say? The thing appears monstrous:—and yet it cannot be denied. The fact is reiterated; and O'Connell takes no notice of it. It passes with Mr Roebuck's, and now Mr Sharman Crawford's letters; and is, like them and Mr Davern's epistles, cushioned by all the Irish papers that are under O'Connell's influence.* According to one con-

* Mr O'Brien Davern, a Catholic priest at Knockany, in the County of Limerick, and an unfeigned seeker of "Justice to Ireland," has addressed two very able letters to the "Liberator" upon his policy since he became an ally of the Whigs, which Mr O'Connell has not yet noticed, and with which the Irish Liberal press has, according to the Northern Whig, one of the few independent liberal journals in Ireland, dealt in the same way.

Mr Davern tells the simple truth, when he assures Mr O'Connell, that the people feel "humiliating sorrow," that he, of all men on earth, should not only have lured them into dependence on the Ministry, but actually assisted in the manufacture of those bonds with which their worn manacles were to be strengthened." He also states, that they feel " vexation," that, as a people, they should have been so hoodwinked, so foolish, so guilty, as to com-jecture, the Irish Liberal Members and their friends were anxious for any sort of adjustment which might stop the course of those rude messengers, Exchequer writs, to their doors, now when their personal liabilities were to be fixed; but, in the special instance of O'Connell and one or two more of the Irish leaders, some suspicious persons go much farther. Their uncharitable hypothesis is, that the reason of O'Connell and the other Catholic chiefs favouring a Bill for perpetuating tithes, is that the tithes may in due time be handed over to the Catholic Church! Now, this of O'Connell the Voluntary!—of O'Connell pledged to the Voluntary principle a hundred and a hundred times; and more deeply, if that be possible, than was Lord Melbourne to the Appropriation Clause—is much too bad. Still the difficulty remains; and Mr O'Connell is placed in a dilemma, from which he will find it difficult to extricate himself with credit. This very remarkable fact is stated in the Northern Whig of the 8th September, in relation to O'Connell's stanchness to Voluntaryism:—

It cannot be forgotten that, when Mr Sharman Crawford endeavoured to pledge the National Association, two years ago, to stand by the principle of total extinction or total appropriation, and to admit of no compromise that would favour or sanction the continued collection of tithes for the Church, he was strenuously resisted by Mr O'Connell; and that, though the latter gentleman, in the end, assented to a general declaration in favour of the principle, he managed to get a resolution added, which he afterwards used as an excuse for continuing the miserable instalment policy—that is, the policy which he has followed out to the extent of accepting the humiliating and coercive Tithe Bill, which has just become law. Mr Crawford mentioned to us, at that time, a circumstance which we considered very extraordinary, and which has not, as far as we know, been hitherto published. When Mr Crawford's resolutions were proposed in the Association, they were referred to a Committee. In that Committee, Mr O'Connell, to the surprise of Mr Crawford, opposed the proposition of extinction; and, among the reasons which he assigned for doing so, was this—that he thought there were many of the Catholic Clergy who would not be in favour of it! The matter, however, was finally arranged, in the way we have above stated. Mr Crawford thought, indeed, that he had got the Association pledged against the unfortunate compromising, and fatal instalment doctrine; but Mr O'Connell, as it appeared, had out-manœuvred him.

The above fact, which was mentioned to us at the time, greatly surprised us. As to Mr O'Connell, we ceased from that moment to believe that he had the least notion of struggling for tithe extinction. It was subsequently stated, as a matter of fact, by The Examiner, of London, that Mr O'Connell was the very individual who urged Ministers to abandon even that small advance on the road to justice, the Appropriation Clause! The same assertion has been reiterated, over and over again, and never denied; and, only a few days ago, The Examiner ascribed the abandonment of the principle, on the part of the Ministry, to this, as “the true cause,” that “the parties mainly concerned, the Irish Chiefs, were clamouring for a surrender.”

Irishmen will not believe this of O'Connell. The Examiner, they will say, is labouring to vindicate its patron; The Northern Whig must be mistaken. But Mr Ward, the Radical Member for Sheffield, and the friend of the Administration fully as far as any honest Reformer can be their friend, told his constituents, the other day, the self-same tale:—that O'Connell and Sheil were the real authors of the Tithe-Bill.

“I know,” said Mr Ward, “that these views have been forced upon the Government (and this is their only excuse) by the Irish Members.”

The Northern Whig acquits the Catholic clergy of the secret design of preserving tithes, which might so soon become their own again; and we hope this may be so.

To return to Mr Ward, or to that intelligent and moderately Liberal party which his opinions may be held to represent—to those who are either committed in opposition to the Tories, on personal grounds, or are anxiously desirous to maintain the Melbourne Ministry, because it is the least bad that can be found.—If the Cabinet hold together at all, it can, in the judgment of Mr Ward, only do so by an immediate change of measures. But can he or any man lay his hand upon his heart, and say that the same Ministers who, in the first flush of hope and power last session, advisedly and solemnly declared against all good measures, are to return, and place their strength in them now? Were they capable of such conduct, the nation would accept the benefit, though it must despise the givers. But they have neither the wisdom nor the courage to retrace their course. They are doomed men; doomed by their inherent weakness, and by their ingratitude and perfidy to those who gave them power. O'Connell can help them no farther than he has done; and they have deeply damaged him. No reflecting Reformer can longer flatter himself that Lord Durham is qualified, either by intellect, temper, or inclination, to strengthen the tottering Whig Government, where it most needs strength, even although Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell could conquer their suspicions of the noble Earl, and although he were persuaded to pocket his late affronts, and come to the rescue. Much less is Durham the man to accomplish the hopes of Reformers. But, supposing that Lord John were sunk, as he deserves, with Ballot and Finality tied round his neck, how could the Melbournites go on without him? The case is hopeless: the members of the frail concern must stand or fall together. O'Connell can do no more—and he will not longer sacrifice himself; and Lord Durham must be left to play the only parts for which nature has fitted him—the Small Czar or the Sulky Boy; while the mysterious “Durham policy,” of which so much was heard, remains an enigma for future antiquarian research. But the Whigs are now, it seems, favourable to some change in the achievement of their freedom, and their children's freedom, to any one living creature, when they felt the growing invincibility of their own power.” This is noble. “What faith,” says this honest priest, “can the people any longer feel in the leader who, on Wednesday, wrote a letter from London, denouncing the Ministerial bill ‘as worse than ever was imposed by Mahomedan sword on Grecian vassals,’ and on the following evening, and with protests from five Irish counties in his pocket, made a speech in support of it; and recorded a vote in its favour? Oh, sir, believe me the people are sick of this blowing hot and cold.”

the Corn-Laws, some modification of the Food-Tax—and Mr Ward seems to place a lingering hope in that direction. This is a gross delusion. There will be no change in those laws that the People do not force. It was upon this very text that Lord Melbourne took occasion to profess his universal Conservatism—his hatred of change; and he was as explicit on this point as ever was Lord John Russell on Finality or Ballot. To pin the Premier down to his declaration against change of all kinds, but especially in the Corn-Laws, the Duke of Wellington, at the very close of the session, and when Lord Brougham was speaking against the Food-Tax, paid “the noble Viscount at the head of the government” compliments, which were taken in gracious part. Far was Lord Melbourne from hinting, “I do not deserve the praise of the noble Duke on this point, as I am rather favourable to a revial of the Corn-laws. I consider this an open question.” By putting the most convenient gloss on Lord Melbourne’s equivocal language, Mr Ward properly encourages the people of Sheffield to persevere in bombarding upon the Corn-laws. The Premier, according to Mr Ward, is like the girl in the farce, with her brisk lover—“I will never consent unless you ravish me.” The People are worn-out, sickened, and contemptuous of these hollow pretexts—these refuges of lies, which Ministerial advocates and supporters have, from year to year, erected, by putting flattering and glozing constructions upon a few double-handed words, used by Ministers once or twice in a session.

What hope the issue of the registrations gives the Whig-Tories, we cannot tell. Both factions claim the victory; and, though the Government influence and patronage must have their weight, Tory activity, and Tory confidence in the accession to office of the party whenever they please, more than counterbalance the temporary distribution of the loaves and fishes. In the wholesale and infamous corruption of the county constituencies by the manufacture of fagot-votes, it is impossible to say which party deserves the palm. Both have been alike indefatigable; though the Tories, at least in Scotland, have been the most successful. Indeed, from the example of Lord Melbourne and his “principle,” downward through Mr O’Connell and his Tithe-Bill to the principal fagot-manufacturers and their raw material, we are constrained to believe that public morality was never at a lower ebb than now, under the working of the Reform Bill.

On the main question, and after the volumes of speculation and speechification that have been expended since the recess, it is clear that the Ministry know no more of the course they are to steer than the man in the moon. They have the young Queen, they have the means of corruption, and the will to employ them. They have considerable patronage, and, as usual, the Chapter of Accidents. They might turn the Corn-Law agitation to some account, could so pressing a matter be protracted and nothing done. Now that “Justice to Ireland” is shelved, a running fight might be got up between Churchmen, and Liberals and Dissenters, by prostituting to so vile a purpose the sacred question of National Education:—this, of course, after the old fashion of playing fast and loose for as many years as the people can be gulled, to have the matter settled in the old way, by yielding it to the Tories and the Church.

Our lucubrations have been confined to the Ministry and its props; but what shall be said of the Parliament, and, in particular, of many of the men sent to it by large reforming constituencies? Have they played their parts well? Or is there any good hope that in the next session there will be a better understanding and stricter union among those who ought to constitute the Radical Opposition? We see none.

PROFESSOR NICHOL'S PHENOMENA AND ORDER OF THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

ANY popular exposition of the science of astronomy can be little more than a history of the successive discoveries of those eminent men who have made the nature and the laws of the heavenly bodies the subject of their investigations. The chief aim of Professor Nichol’s work is, accordingly, to familiarize the most important of these discoveries; and, by presenting them in a striking light, to lead captive the imagination, and to raise the young student or the general reader from the dead letter to the living spirit of the most sublime of the physical sciences. The work, therefore, is not to be considered a mere elementary treatise or grammar of solar astronomy; and, indeed, its plan presupposes that the student shall be previously conversant with the routine of names and numbers, and with the leading outlines of the system. Even those “beggarly elements” may be acquired here, but certainly not in the way best suited to “the lowest capacity.” The author appeals at every step to the understanding; and, not contented with asserting that such things are, demonstrates why they must be so. He must have been aware that there is no want of elementary works; and he appears to feel that horror of the trite and the commonplace, which, if not kept in check by the well-defined boundaries of science, might become fatal to simplicity. This tendency co-exists with a faculty for clearness and perspicuity in demonstration, to which we shall afterwards have occasion to advert.

It is mentioned, in a prefatory note, that the present volume should be regarded as the first of a series, of which the author’s “Views of the Architecture of the Heavens” forms the second link. He requests that the volumes may be taken in this more natural order; rising from the great to the greater—from the contemplation of the harmony and beauty of our own little system, to the majesty and grandeur of the Universal Heaven—to the sublimity of the Infinite, which formed the lofty and awful subject of the preceding work.

In the present view of the Solar System, astronomy is traced from its birthplace, in the plains of Chaldaea, to the latest discoveries of Sir John Herschel, and the contemporary German astronomers, where these bear upon the subject. The Professor displays not a little enthusiasm in expatiating upon the memory of the philosophers and heroes, we might say martyrs, of his favourite science; and an astronomer without enthusiasm would, indeed, be little more than a mere calculating machine. The Treatise is, accordingly, filled with aspirations after the Infinite, the Eternal Source of light and love; with symptoms of that instinctive longing of the human heart, whether in sage or savage, emphatically alluded to in our author's reference to the origin of judicial astrology, as "that first and most daring expression of the human mind of its belief in the existence of a wide and permanent sympathy through all things, and also the first outburst of the ambition of man—a wild but grand effort to break from the bondage of disorder, and to unite his destiny and being with these far and noble orbs."

Long periods of obscurity and ignorance intervening in the progress of discovery, or absolute retrogression, are among these mortifying facts in the history of the human race, to which astronomy has been more subjected than any other of the popular sciences. Dr Nichol justly imputes these benumbing pauses or retrograde motions to causes which, we fear, are not yet wholly conquered: to that cowardly, unquestioning, slavish subjection to the authority of great names and to received opinions, which made the technicalities of the Ptolemaic system be regarded by the disciples of Ptolemy as more sacred than its essence, and rendered them more desirous of obtaining distinction as his followers, than imitating his high love of truth. The evil deplored is not peculiar to astronomy. In philosophy, how long was Aristotle a kind of Old Man of the Sea; though the fault was not in the philosopher, but in those who, having voluntarily bent their necks to the burden, to which they became so firmly yoked by authority and custom that they could not move save under it. From such considerations, the rapid sketch of the persecutions endured by Copernicus and Galileo, presented in this volume, has a reflex moral value, independent of the history of Astronomical discovery, by exhibiting the pitiable weaknesses and wickedness into which bigotry, and intolerance, and slavish submission to creeds and names, may precipitate the very men who assume to be the lights and guides of their age. Conceive the principal professor of philosophy at Padua obstinately refusing to look at the planets and their satellites through Galileo's newly-framed powerful telescope, lest he should be compelled to become the convert of his own eyes!—or the blind and venerable Galileo himself on his knees before the Sacred College, renouncing the Damnable Heresy of the motion of the Earth, while the secret heart of the crushed and persecuted sage clung firmly as ever to the wicked belief which he declared that he "abjured, cursed, and detested!" Persecution, whether for Truth or Error,—and against Truth persecution has ever been the most rancorous,—cannot now be carried quite so far; but has it ceased to annoy, injure, and ruin its victims? Now the heresy may be connected with astronomy, now with geology, and again with something else, or with merely speculative opinion; but that principle of intolerance which is branded by our author as the essence of malignity, and which would seem something demonic rather than human, is ever active, and ever relentless.

The second chapter of the work opens grandly and solemnly with the downfall of those fallacies, bolstered up for centuries by the authority of names, and fenced with the flaming sword of intolerance; and with the reform, or, it might be said, the regeneration of astronomy. It is remarked—

When logic has done its uttermost, and ingenuity made successful use of every artifice to prove that natural which is not so, some remote or obscure mind, less than usual under the shroud of custom, and, it may be, gifted by the Divinity with a nearer view of himself, sends forth from its retirement some bold thought, some quiet reclamation on behalf of common sense, or some sincere appeal to the general reason of mankind, at which the surly logician, amid all their security, cannot help being angry and amazed, and in presence of whose silent majesty—albeit in the mere commencements of its power—their cumbersome and imposing superstitious tremble in ominous presentiment of their fate. Even at such a moment—the moment of the seeming triumph of the Ptolemaic machinery—in the hour of its glory and pride—this still small voice was heard, issuing from the solitude of an unknown Polish ecclesiastic, promising to lighten us on the true way towards celestial truths, to open prospects of the Heavens new, vast, and inapprehensible, and to reveal a more exalted knowledge concerning the power and wisdom of God? The promise was bold, but to the very letter has it been kept. By the word of this Pole, the curtain of the outward senses was rolled up, and the Universe exhibited in its own majestic attributes.

The obscurity of the times in which he lived rests over the early character of Copernicus. We do not know how far favourable circumstances contributed to the development of his genius, or whether, without peculiar advantages, he owes all to an inborn energy. But whatever his mental culture, the greatness of his mind he could borrow from no one, as of all who had yet lived, he was the first to accomplish a task most difficult for man. Feeling, with the intuitive force of the highest genius, that those popular systems of the Heavens could not be true, and at the same time recognising that the logic which sustained them was impregnable, he threw from him the weight of the belief of ages, and quietly asked whether that fundamental tenet, which asserts that the Earth is motionless, might not be false. The mental effort required, even to hesitate on a point which all mankind had up to that moment undoubtedly believed, and which had now interwoven itself with all their modes of thought, was an achievement for the highest order of genius; the question being put, it required only superior but not uncommon talent, to follow it to its conclusions. . . Modesty—a characteristic of the finest minds—indeed Copernicus, after he had obtained sight of this great idea, as search through the ancient philosophies, lest perchance there might be precious relics buried there, which could confirm and encourage him; and accordingly he did find certain hints, touching apparently on a simpler order of things—hints which his correct and discriminating intellect speedily methodized into that system which, in the somewhat hyperbolic language of his successor Tycho, “moved the earth from its foundations, stopped the revolution of the firmament, made the sun stand still, and subverted the whole ancient order of the Universe.”

The discoveries—or, to call them by a more modest name, the bold ideas and grand speculations of Copernicus—are next briefly elucidated, and also the nature of his positive discoveries, and with that clearness, brevity, and simplicity, which we consider one of Professor Nichol's best characteristics as a popular instructor, and which he may probably have perfected by his previous experience as a lecturer and private teacher: the closest alone could never give this valuable faculty. But an exemplification of this useful power would be difficult, without the plates and diagrams employed; and, besides, the eloquent general speculations and reflections—the moral results, as it were—are better adapted to our purpose. In these we can bring forward the author, speaking in his own person, and unfolding the wonders and sublimities of creation, and the powers and excellencies of those sages who may be called the first-born of human intelligence. The demonstrations are for private study. The faculty most apparent in them, perspicuity, was prominent in the illustrative demonstrations of Dr Nichol's work on the Sideral astronomy; but, in our Lilliputian home-system, the expositor treads upon ground more familiar to most of his readers. We are not so helplessly bewildered and overwhelmed with the vast and infinite of the Universe which is opened up there; with multitudinous starry systems in all stages of progression—with that mighty maze, which, if not without a plan, yet so far transcends our limited powers, as to mock our boldest conceptions, and cast down the imaginations of the most profound sage, almost to the level of him who, prostrate, wonders and adores.

In prosecuting the course of discovery in the Planetary Astronomy, or rather in the Solar System, “The wisdom of our ancestors” is amusingly illustrated by the prejudices and notions of those who brought the whole force of logic to the refutation of the damnable heresies of Copernicus and Galileo. What they alleged ought not to be true, it was not convenient, not according to propriety, to have true, and therefore it was not true. Upon the discovery of the satellites by the instruments of Galileo, a discovery which threw Conservative astronomers into so much trepidation, and especially upon the whisper or avowal of that awful innovation upon the settled constitution of the Heavens—

Francesco Sizzi, an astronomer of no mean note, and a townsman of Galileo's, thus gravely and impressively delivered himself:—“There are seven windows given to animals in the domicile of the head, through which the air is admitted to the tabernacle of the body, to enlighten, to warm, and nourish it; which windows are the principal parts of the microcosm or little world—two nostrils, two eyes, two ears, and one mouth; so in the heavens, as in a macrocosm or great world, there are two favourable stars (Jupiter and Venus), two malignities (Mars and Saturn), two luminaries (the Sun and Moon), and Mercury alone undecided and indifferent. From which and many other phenomena of Nature, such as the seven metals, &c., which it were tedious to enumerate, we gather that the number of planets is necessarily seven. Moreover, the Satellites are invisible to the naked eye, and therefore can exercise no influence over the Earth, and therefore would be useless, and therefore do not exist. Besides, as well the Jews and other ancient nations as modern Europeans have adopted the division of the week into seven days, and have named them from the seven planets; now, if we increase the number of planets, this whole system falls to the ground!!!” Reader! in judging of Sizzi's logic, beware of one inference—Sizzi was as sane as yourself? There is much emphasis in that last paragraph—“If the new planets were acknowledged, what a chaos would ensue!” Repose-loving man cares not to be disturbed by discoveries—he prefers old opinions, somehow as Selden liked his old allipers—because they were easiest for his feet. The spirit as distinguished from the mere opinions of these times, will be tolerably apprehended by an expression of another astronomer, a young German, Martin Horky. “I will never,” says he, “concede his four new planets to that Italian, though I die for it.” Horky was very valorous, but the suspicion is, he would rather have made Galileo die for it.

Dr Nichol becomes almost romantic about Tycho Brahe, the doughty and noble Dane, and even about his princely castle, for it was an Observatory, and the best the world had seen. Uraniburg, or “The Castle of the Heavens,” stood on the small island of Huen, a spot between Sweden and Zealand, which had been bestowed upon Tycho by the munificent patronage of the King, who, to induce the noble-born astronomer to settle in his native kingdom, promised him an Observatory to his taste. The Castle of the Heavens, reared on this petty islet, was filled with noble instruments, and, for twenty years, was the scene of the splendid discoveries of him who is emphatically termed, and in contradistinction to Kepler, “the Observer.” Dr Nichol, we have alleged, is enthusiastic about the heroes of astronomy, and he makes his apology, at least, very gracefully:—“I introduce no discordant consideration, for they also are Stars; and we are drawn nearer the ETERNAL by the memory of their greatness.” He embellishes his volume with several engravings of the sculptured effigies of Tycho, and of the armorial, and, as it seems to us, sedical decorations of Uraniburg. Among its finer interior ornaments, was a globe upon an immense scale, constructed by Tycho, and upon which he had fixed the positions of a thousand stars. This precious relic has an interesting history. Fickle is the favour of princes: after above twenty years of devotion to scientific pursuits in his beloved island, Tycho, by the intrigues of a court favourite, whom his high spirit had offended, was banished from Huen, the royal grant resumed, and “the best observatory the world had ever seen, destroyed.” He found another royal protector in the Emperor Rodolphus, and an asylum at Prague, where, after languishing for some years in exile, pining for his beloved solitude, he died prematurely at the age of fifty-five—repeating, in his last moments, “I have not lived in vain!”

An estimate is made of the value of his discoveries, and an able analysis given of the peculiar ties of his genius, which we must leave to the leisurely reader, contenting ourselves with the parallel between "the noble Dane" and his young friend Kepler, who, by the way, was not the least important of his discoveries. The origin of the friendship between the illustrious Dane and the young, obscure, and, as a superficial man might have too hastily concluded, the fantastic and unpromising Kepler, is a beautiful trait in the history of science, disfigured by so many of the petty squabbles and jealousies of its most distinguished professors. To return to the parallel—

It appears almost as if the minds of this admirable observer and John Kepler, were one mind almost perfect—split into two—each half constituted not by a share or portion of all the faculties, but by the whole of one set of faculties, which subsequently operated in it alone. Tycho's genius lay exclusively with observation; Kepler panted after analogies and relations: Tycho had no power to theorize, and when he attempted it, the failure was miserable; Kepler's enthusiasm made his whole life that of a theorist, divided between the pursuit of mystical relations, and the discovery of some of the noblest truths in the science of Astronomy;—an enthusiasm, however, most diverse from that of the common theorist, who usually seeks not after truth but distinction, and is pleased no better with a great discovery, than a startling and noisy paradox: for, springing from the finest genius, it prompted him ever to search out real relations, and until those relations were discovered, never to be at rest. If this ardent, speculative, and often erring mind, had been truly in union, in the same person, with the faculties of the calm, observant, and unphilosophical Tycho, it could not have otherwise beheld it, than to be an instrument of importance scarce calculable towards the reformation of all science: and the truth is, the imperfect union which did take place—the happy association until Tycho's death of the two persons, and Kepler's subsequent and most pious devotion to the memory of his patron and master—has produced an epoch second to none in the importance of the truths it revealed, and which therefore will always be accounted famous.

An account of the mighty discoveries of Kepler follows the relation of those results of Tycho's persevering and unwearied observations which cleared the way for them. As a single specimen of Dr Nichol's clearness and precision in conveying knowledge, we shall cite his detail of Kepler's discovery; the nature of the first of what are often termed Kepler's Three Laws. Of course the reader must imagine the simple diagram—

Tycho had devoted great attention to the planet Mars; and without delay Kepler threw himself, with unbounded enthusiasm, into the effort to find from these facts the path in which the planet moved. They alone who know the state of practical astronomy in those days, can be aware of the difficulty of this task, of the genius, fine discrimination, and infinite labour, required to evolve it; but no reader can fail to apprehend the value of the truth thereby brought out. There is a curve of an oval shape termed an ellipse, whose description is easy. Take a thread, and fix its two ends on a card, so that it may hang very loose between them, and a pencil carried round by the loop of that thread will describe an ellipse. The points A and B, are termed the foci of the ellipse—each one being a focus. Now Kepler demonstrated that no system—no demonstrable complex scheme of circles or circles—would correspond with the motions of Mars, which could only be explained by supposing it to revolve around the Sun in an ellipse—the Sun being not in the centre, but in one of the foci: and on applying this idea to the case of the other planets, he found—after Tycho was no more, and could not be gladdened by this triumph of Uraniburg—that he had alighted on a GENERAL LAW—that the orbit of every planet was precisely such a curve—and that now, the simplicity of the system—having arisen above cycles and epicycles—for the first time emphatically appeared! The work on Mars, in which this great discovery is unfolded, is perhaps the most remarkable in the whole library of science.

The discovery of the law of the velocities and that of the relation of orbits follow; but Kepler's exultation at the successful completion of one discovery, which evinces the warmth and simplicity of his nature, is more attractive than demonstrations, mighty as are their results. In the introduction to one of the books of his "Harmonics," the most fanciful of scientific men thus breaks forth—

"It is now eighteen months since I got the first glimpse of light, three months since the dawn, very few days since the unveiled Sun, most admirable to gaze on, burst out upon me. Nothing holds me: I will indulge in my sacred fury: I will triumph over mankind by the honest confession, that I have stolen the golden vases of the Egyptians, to build up a tabernacle for my God—far away from the confines of Egypt. If you forgive me, I rejoice; if you are angry, I can bear it: the die is cast, the book is written, to be read either now or by posterity—I care not which; it may well wait a century for a reader, as God has waited 6000 years for an observer!"

The music of the spheres, the mystic dance, "not without song," was no longer the dream, the fantasy, which still, even in its wildest moods, and in the very noon of the night, of the long eclipse of philosophy, was heaven-born and tending heavenward.

In a brief chapter, closing the first part of the Treatise, the subordinate or supplementary laws of planetary phenomena are unfolded, and then the author is free to proceed to that branch of his subject which, properly speaking, ought to come last, although some readers may find it useful to glance over the V., VI., and perhaps the VII. chapters in the first place, and thus gain more intimate acquaintance with the personal character, so to speak, and relative condition of those mighty orbs of which philosophers can discourse familiar as their garter, before entering upon the considerations of the laws by which their order and movements are sustained and regulated. The demonstration of Kepler's laws is wound up by this striking suggestion—

That three laws like these can result from chance, were a supposition too monstrous for belief. Considering the relation of the phenomena they include to the Sun's Rotation and his Equator—for all the motions are in the direction of his Rotation, the orbits are nearly in the plane of his Equator, and almost as circular as the path of a point on his vast surface—the suspicion obtrudes itself that some profound secret of Nature is before us in dim shadow—probably a first hint of the parentage of these subservient orbs.

And Dr Nichol's rule in philosophic investigation seems ever

"Be bold, be bold—be not too bold."

The laws of the solar system having been discussed, the leading characteristics of the different orbs of which it consists come next in order. The motions of the planetary bodies are indeed noticed at the very outset, but only as they must strike the untaught observer, and lead from wonder on to inquiry. The aid of telescopes is disheartened; and we can speak by experience in asserting that they more frequently, like many other helps, lead to confusion of ideas than to distinctness in apprehending the motions of the planets, and the relative distances of their orbits. An orrery, to give just ideas of the motions of the eleven constituents of our little system, with their nineteen satellites already ascertained, and their primary orb the sun, would require a wider surface than Tycho's island of Huen, and a mechanism on a scale which it is difficult to conceive. Dr Nichol's ideal orrery—of which the idea is in substance, as he states, taken from Sir John Herschel—conveys a tolerably clear notion of the movements of the planets and their moons, and one which it does not seem difficult to realize by the mind's eye. The effort will, at all events, form a pleasant exercise to youthful fancy:—

Conceive the Sun represented by a globe two feet in diameter;—at eighty-two feet distance, put down a grain of mustard seed, and you have the size and place of the planet MERCURY, that bright silvery point which is generally enveloped in the solar rays: at the distance of one hundred and forty-two feet, lay down a pea—it will be the similitude of VENUS, our dazzling Evening and Morning Star. Two hundred and fifteen feet from the central globe, place another pea, only imperceptibly larger—that is Man's WORLD—(once the centre of the Universe!)—the theatre of our terrestrial destinies—the birth-place of most of our thoughts! MARS is smaller still—a good pin's head being his proper representative, at the distance of three hundred and twenty-seven feet: the four small planets, VESTA, JUNO, CERES, and PALLAS, seem as the least possible grains of sand, about five hundred feet from the Sun; JUPITER as a middle-sized orange, distant about a quarter of a mile; SATURN with his ring, a lesser orange at the remoteness of two-fifths of a mile; and the far URANUS dwindles into a cherry, moving in a circle three quarters of a mile in radius. Such is the system of which our puny Earth was once accounted the chief constituent—a system whose real or absolute dimensions are stupendous, as may be gathered from the size of the SUN himself—the glorious globe around which these orbs obediently circle; which has a diameter nearly four times larger than the immense interval which separates the MOON from the EARTH. Compare this mighty diameter, or the space of nine hundred thousand miles, with the assumed diameter of two feet, and the proportion will tell by how many times the supposititious orbit of Uranus should be enlarged! The dimensions of the system surpass all effort to conceive or embody them;—and yet a wider knowledge of the Universe shows that they belong only to our first or smallest order of INFINITIES.

Our author delights to indulge in fanciful speculations upon what may be the conditions of being in the different planets; going upon analogies taken from “the dear, green earth,” which, speck and ant-hill as it is in illimitable space, is yet so important to its own inmates, that they occupy themselves much more about its single attendant than with all the other planets. Our moon's proximity is, no doubt, partly the cause of the attention its various phenomena and its internal structure receive; and Dr Nichol has gratified this taste by discoursing largely on lunar affairs. Our great vaasal, the “arbitress of tides,” who is even assumed to influence the flux and reflux of our wits, and to perform more functions, and exercise more frequent interference in sublunary matters than is at all proper, or than it is easy to enumerate, is so much our next-door though humble neighbour, that her motions must ever continue to be closely watched. Her distance is, in the first place, so trifling, that, were everything else conformable, the journey might be made by a Liverpool locomotive carriage in a fourth of the time that was consumed by the early navigators in circumnavigating the globe. Philosophers have raised plenty of Castles in the Air, as baiting-places; and it is as feasible that part of that debris which, some conclude, has been falling ever since the frightful irruption of that conjectural planet conjecturally split into the tiny orbs of Vesta, Juno, Ceres, and Pallas, might be caught or intercepted, and converted into fuel, as many of the guesses of theorists. To resume—Dr Nichol has bestowed great pains in gratifying a rational curiosity about our satellite, by telling all that philosophers have really discovered; though he gravely abstains from those more diverting things which they have guessed and devised, and especially their serious plans of opening a direct communication with the lunars; which plain folks, not logicians, might fancy quite in time when it has been deemed probable that there were any Men in the Moon. The truth is sufficiently attractive in this case without the stimulant of absurdity. For ourselves, we were never half so well acquainted with the Moon as to-night, in consequence of Dr Nichol's particular introduction; though perhaps, as is sometimes the case with other ladies, we might have loved her quite as well when we less understood her true character, when she was only “the beauty of the heavens, the glory of the stars, an ornament giving light in the high places of the Lord.” Such was the Son of Sirach's moon; and there is the poet's moon, the lover's moon, or the Yeung May Moon; and the Moon as she notes the progressive stages of civilized man—namely, the hunter's moon; the harvest moon, which we gaze on now, and which will shine for ever; and, lastly, the thieves' moon, which makes up the sum of her changeful characters, as indicative of social progress. But our proper business is with the astronomer's moon, with which, after reading Dr Nichol's book, and examining his maps, we find ourselves much better acquainted. One of these maps is a miniature of the magnificent map of Baer and Madler of Berlin, which is three feet in diameter, and, we are told, vastly more accurate than any map of the earth we can yet produce. This is not complimentary to our sublunary mathematicians and practical surveyors; but it must be remembered, that the seleographists have the Moon much at vantage. The end of a telescope is a far more convenient station than that traverse of wide oceans, “antres vast and deserts idle,” to which our map-makers are condemned. By parity of reasoning, the lunar geographers and mathematicians ought to have more accurate maps of the Earth than we can shew; though they have but a distant view, they can take in an immense surface. Dr Nichol has illustrated his account of the moon; with a number of sectional maps of its mountain chains and ridges—its soaring peaks and summits, all of which have been christened by astronomers; and of which many bear honoured and time-hallowed names. But these lofty conical peaks and sugar-loaf mountains, springing directly from the plain, and attaining an immense height, are not the most original or characteristic feature of the moon's mountain scenery. That feature is craters of varying size, which occupy nearly two-fifths of the moon's whole visible surface, either pressing huddled together, or inosculating each other.

On the steep interior declivities of the walls which surround them—walls all serrated on the tops, although the fractures are by no means deep—terraces are sometimes seen going round the whole ring, not unlike the terraces of Glenroy; at other times, as in Tycho, ranges of concentric mountains encircle the inner foot of the wall, leaving intermediate valleys; again, we have a few ridges of low mountains stretching through the circle contained by the wall, but oftener conical peaks start up, isolated like the Puy de Griou, and very frequently small craters having on an inferior scale every attribute of the large one.

It is demonstrated that there cannot be a drop of water in the moon, and consequently not a cloud can be in its shallow atmosphere; and it is a problem with philosophers, whether its epoch of stidity be past, or yet to come—whether, in short, the moon has reached the age of Mother Earth, or that at which the earth was fit for the reception of the beings we see around us. These are curious and difficult speculations, which must be left to moon-explorers, and those whom Dr Nichol's significant hints may tempt to become such—and the moon has become as interesting to geologists as to astronomers. His intimations and soundings about the great Upheaving Cause, that grand energy the agency of which is visible in every planet whose surface is submitted to the telescope, scarcely take a definite shape. It is enough, that the Professor concludes, that, if his conjectures approach the truth, and they are not his alone, then “the crater-form is the chief or primary manner in which the upheaving cause manifests its energy.” With the speculations we cannot here intermeddle.

The sun comes after the moon in the volume; and the discoveries of Dr Alexander Wilson, Professor Nichol's predecessor in the Astronomical Chair of the Glasgow University, about the spots of the sun, discoveries afterwards perfected by the first Herschel, are narrated, and lead to conjectures very eloquently expressed. After adverting to Sir John Herschel's observation of remarkable changes in the South Star, our author thus concludes of our own Star.

Many other stars have altered slowly in magnitude, also preserving rigorous invariability of place; and some, as SIAUS, have changed colour—this star having turned from the fiery dog-star of old times, red and fiery as MARS, into the brilliantly white orb now adorning our skies. Is it not likely then, that the intrinsic energies to whose development these phenomena must be owing, act also in our Sun—that, in short, he also may pass through phases, filling up myriads of centuries—once it may be shining on Uranus with a lustre as burning as that which now dazzles Mercury? How vast are the effects involved in such a change! The reign of the Sun are not merely light-giving; for, combined with these, in the same beam or pencil, there are rays whose function is heat-giving, and others equally distinct, which are productive of chemical influences. Now, in the probable march of our Luminary, how great a variety in the relations of these three systems of rays may be involved; and, of course, what diversities in his action on his dependents! Imagination clinging to such conjectures, passes to the august conception of this Master of surrounding worlds, this majestic globe—himself organized—progressing slowly through his destiny, ever acting as he moves onward, on the inner and proper principle of each planet, drawing from it (which also may itself vary, according to some intrinsic energy or law) every form and manifestation of which it is capable, and conducting them all through a long and wondrous history. How emphatically does even this guess inform us, that we see only sketches of the History of Things—that a leaf or two of the Mystic Volume is all that ever will be read by Man!

The idea above referred to—shadowy though it is—may be supposed true of the whole Universe. Conceive it, also, a Unity—a scheme through which a common life runs; wherein larger parts involve, modify, and exalt inferior ones, without hurting their individuality; all going on indestructibly, and in interminable progress. IMMORTALITY! that grandest of those dim conceptions which lie looming around the outer circumference of the region of positive knowledge, and to which misdeeds of human structure are only opening—a conception whose reality we recognise, although we cannot fully grapple with it or define it—what indeed is it, but such indestructibility, such progress—the FACT that every organism has a life of its own, which cannot depart from it, or be absorbed by the life which rushes through all things? This wonderful truth is stamped on the minutest pebble; and, lo! it is also emblazoned by the radiance of the STARS.

The nature of comets, and Newton's discovery of gravitation, and the wondrous results, conclude the work, with a few notes on subjects too abstruse to be embodied in the text. If the reader is not acquainted with the nature of Newton's researches, this is not the place to trace the discovery of gravitation; but the general reflections which follow are too weighty and essential to be passed over. They are highly indicative of the spirit of Dr Nichol's astronomical treatises; and they concern us, one and all.

With the real philosopher, want of devotion is impossible; and the great but simple Newton, feeling more than some of his followers the bearing of the truths he had revealed, seems in this respect, even in the pride and fame of his immortal discovery, possessed and sometimes overcome by the emotions of a thankful child, bending in reverential gratitude that he had been enabled to look into the ways of the beneficent Fashioner and Father of All!

It is recorded, that towards the close of his work—when it seemed that the results were coming in accordance with his surmise—when he felt on the verge of obtaining one of the most important laws ever revealed to man—when, in short, he was recognising that which for ever more would bind the heavens to the earth, and constitute himself the first of philosophers—the nerves of the great man quivered, and he could not finish his task. He called in the aid of a friend, pacing his room in tumultuous agitation, while the few last arithmetical operations were being concluded, and perhaps as fearful at the moment lest his conjecture might be true as that it should prove fallacious! It is difficult now to conceive the intensity of Newton's feelings when the result was finally announced to him. By effect of familiarity it has become common; but revert back to the revolution it made in man's knowledge of the universe. No order or connection among events had then been discovered save what lay in Kepler's laws—which, limited as they are, it had required the intellect of the previous world to elaborate; but here was a revelation not merely tracing some farther small analogy, not binding together more closely the character of the planetary orbits, but uniting them in all their majesty, with the simplest of terrestrial phenomena, and demonstrating that over a drop of spray, tossed in an apparently random course through the gulf of a cataract, or across the rocky barriers of a raging ocean, is dominant the same regulating power which retains the great planets with their moons in their sweep around the sun. Knowing how trifling a novelty may agitate the firmest minds, no wonder that Newton was affected by an uncontrollable tremor.

It is such contemplations as the above which, pervading all Dr Nichol's scientific Discourses on Astronomy, give them the added value of works on Astro-Theology. While they address and exercise the intellect, they appeal to the moral sentiments, and, by heaping up so many stupendous proofs of the wisdom and power of the Great First Cause, exalt devotional emotions into intelligent worship.

CLARKSON'S STRICTURES ON THE LIFE OF WILBERFORCE.

EVERY one who read the "Life of Wilberforce," that had any previous acquaintance with the history and personal character of Thomas Clarkson, must have felt that great injustice, and that of a paltry and invidious kind, was done to the venerable Apostle of Abolition. This, we believe, is so generally the impression, that Mr Clarkson's "Strictures," and the commentaries and explanations of his friend and editor, Mr Robinson, were scarcely called for, in vindication of the noble character and the high claims of "THOMAS CLARKSON." Public opinion had done him justice, and the press has revenged him upon his detractors—if, in relation to Clarkson, we may in any shape employ the word revenge. Even the Edinburgh Reviewer of the "Life of Wilberforce"—who, by that novel and most unfair practice which has crept into periodical literature, was permitted to give an improper bias to readers before the work appeared—seems conscious of wherein it offended against truth and Clarkson, and he even deprecates the publication of certain private letters.

In Tait's Magazine for June last, in which the "Life of Wilberforce," written by his sons, was reviewed, the whole merits are noticed in the statement, That the biographers of Mr Wilberforce had raised an injudicious controversy about the relative claims of their father in the glorious work of abolition; and attempted to give him a predominance over Clarkson and others, to which he never pretended. It is said, "In arrogating too much for their venerable father, and detracting from the merits and unequalled services of Clarkson, the biographers will, we should imagine, neither increase his true glory, nor raise the reputation of their own work." And if this was true before the appearance of "Clarkson's Strictures," the case for the Messrs Wilberforce is now much worse, when it is seen that the sons of Mr Wilberforce must have made their invidious statements less in ignorance than under feelings which it is painful to see indulged by the sons of their excellent father, and especially against his old friend and fellow-labourer.

So early as 1834, Mr Robert Wilberforce had been in correspondence with Mr Clarkson upon the subject of the "Life," and had given him warning of what the biographers were to say, "from regard to truth, and the claims of filial duty," but which they hoped to "express in a manner as free as possible from all insult and unkindly feeling." Mr Clarkson was naturally surprised at this announcement; and he immediately wrote a long explanatory letter, which appears in the "Strictures," in his own defence. The Messrs Wilberforce, nevertheless, persisted in their purpose.

Clarkson, in his "History of the Abolition," had given their father his true and honourable place among the body of active abolitionists; but this did not satisfy those who would have him handed down to posterity as the Alpha and Omega, the originator, the main instrument, and sole director of that vast and complicated movement; and Thomas Clarkson as one of his hired agents, and far from faultless in this subordinate capacity. The attempt has failed so signally that it is now scarcely worth advertisement. The case was always bad, and the facts and letters in the "Strictures" have, as we have said, made it much worse. Wilberforce is lessened in the eyes of the world by the officious and ill-advised zeal of his sons, and by their unfairness, and, it would seem, studied misrepresentation of the motives, and conduct, and character of Mr Clarkson. Clarkson is, however, too deeply-rooted in the esteem and enthusiastic affection and admiration of his countrymen, and we may say of the whole civilized world, not to render such an attempt quite futile, or only dangerous to the experimenters. Mr Wilberforce will ever be remembered and admired for his eminent services in the cause of humanity, at a period when devotion to objects of philanthropy was comparatively a rare virtue among men in prominent stations; but Thomas Clarkson will be loved, and honoured, and revered, for that entire and enthusiastic devotion of the whole man to one grand object; for the sacrifice of health, fortune, and every worldly hope, to one cause, and that from the first hour of his entrance upon active life. He came abroad into the world to abolish slavery. This was his duty, his task, his delight, to which every faculty was bent. It were not more unwise than stupid and ungrateful, were mankind to keep their apostles and missionaries upon the same level with those who become the leaders and auxiliaries of a great cause among legislative bodies and in public assemblies; or, in other words, their CLARKSONS in the same rank with their WILBERFORCES. Of the latter class, there is now always a respectable, though small number ; of the former, not even one appears in an age. There was but one Clarkson concerned in the Abolition of Slavery ; though, among so many active members of Parliament, there might have been other Wilberforces, had the ground not been occupied. There is seldom want of champions to fill the vanguard, never any want of officers—of those who, with much less labour or danger, are to have far greater honour and distinction. Universal feeling has for ever settled this particular question ; and sympathy, now cooled down and corrected by thirty years' experience, should be regarded as all but infallible in its decisions. The chief honour devolves on Clarkson and Granville Sharp ; and this without underrating, much less denying, the meritorious services of Wilberforce, Stephens, Macaulay, Smith, Brougham, and many others. With this natural and right judgment, no one seems discontented, save the sons of Mr Wilberforce. The first place has long been assigned to Clarkson by the first minds of his age. The Edinburgh Reviewer complains that Mr Talfourd, in his "Life of Charles Lamb," appears to put Clarkson first among the annihilators of slavery ; but Mr Talfourd has done no more than Wordsworth, Southey, Lamb, Hazlitt, and all the world—the dull with the brilliant, the illustrious with the obscure—had done before him. Human instincts are rarely at fault in matters interesting to universal humanity, when there is no selfish opposing interest to give a false bias. Had the biographers of Wilberforce not been his sons, men less distinguished than their father, and perhaps requiring reflected lustre, they would most probably have been of the common opinion, and, like Sergeant Talfourd, have pronounced Clarkson "the true annihilator of Slavery," without in the smallest depreciating the services of Mr Wilberforce.

A letter addressed by Mr Clarkson to Lord Brougham, one of the few surviving individuals who may be held cognizant of the private history of the Abolition movement, from its commencement, from his after intimacy with the actors, has drawn forth a reply which does great honour to the generous and genial feelings of the writer—him whose intellect could nicely appreciate their different excellencies, while his heart could find room for both Wilberforce and Clarkson, and for every fellow-labourer in the common cause. This letter must have been written during the greatest heat and pressure of Lord Brougham's late memorable Session. It is dated 29th July 1838. We take a very few sentences :—

DEAR THOMAS CLARKSON,—Our friend, H. C. Robinson, has communicated to me your letter, which you propose prefixing to your statement ; and I feel bound to give you my testimony on this occasion. This I do with great willingness ; while I most sincerely lament that, in discharging what they deemed a duty to their father's memory, the sons of our venerated friend Wilberforce should have given you any pain. I have repeatedly heard him speak of you, both before and after the publication of your history, and I never remember any expression on his part but that of the greatest kindness and affection towards you. I have frequently heard him, in perfect good humour, allude to things which he considered as defects, though of a trivial nature, as your sanguine temper, &c. ; but I never heard him utter a word of disapprobation upon anything connected with your work.

Lord Brougham then shews, that Wilberforce must have read Clarkson's "History of the Abolition," which the sons say he threw aside ; and he makes an acute cross-examining lawyer's remark, shewing that the biographers who deny their father having done so, elsewhere admit that he had read and that fully. What follows is more important.

It was he (Wilberforce) who first introduced me to your acquaintance ; and I distinctly recollect his telling me at the time how much he rejoiced that I had done you justice in my book upon the Colonies ; he added—"for Thomas took the field before any of us." I have heard him say the same thing in public, I think in the House of Commons ; but that he said so at a public meeting, a few years before his death, I am quite certain. Although Granville Sharp had attacked slavery generally, and on one question connected with it had gained an important victory, and although Mr Ramsay, and one or two others, had denounced the horrors of the West India system, I certainly had always heard you admitted to be the person who substantially began the controversy—who first brought the question forward. That this was Wilberforce's view of the matter also, I really never had any more doubt than that he knew your name was Thomas Clarkson. But I need not add, that this never, for one moment, made me question or undervalue the services of that great and good man, under whom, as our leader, we were all proud to avow that we fought the good fight, which has at last been crowned with victory.

How unfortunate that the sons of Wilberforce had not been able to take the same true view of the question, and that they have placed Mr Clarkson in the painful position which he thus describes—

I did not expect, in the seventy-ninth year of my age, to be called upon to defend the correctness of every part of my "History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade," published thirty years ago, against any one, and least of all against the two sons of my late revered friend Mr Wilberforce, his biographers. My history was in his hands for twenty-five years before his death ; and he, who was well acquainted with all the material facts recorded in it as they occurred, never himself intimated that it contained any mis-statements.

Besides the decided letter of Lord Brougham, Mr Clarkson has brought forward the testimony of other abolitionists of the olden time, which, if they come from less distinguished quarters, are of equal authority. To shew the small spirit in which the Messrs Wilberforce have proceeded, we may only state that, in noticing the public meeting referred to by Lord Brougham, at which, a few years before his death, Wilberforce declared that Clarkson had taken the field first, the fact is pitifully suppressed that Mr Clarkson was also present, and had moved that Mr Wilberforce should take the chair. We have said that this is a question upon which no one, not wishing to be deceived, can be deceived ; that the world has made up its mind, and for ever fixed the place in its esteem, which shall be held by Mr Wilberforce and by Mr Clarkson ; but from respect to Mr Clarkson, since he has thought it necessary to take his vindication into his own hands, and out of that jurisdiction where we think he was certain of full justice—the breast, namely, of every intelligent reader of the "Life of Wilberforce"—we shall quote this one passage from his Strictures. Mr Clarkson refers to his History for the time and manner of his first acquaintances with Mr Wilberforce, and proceeds:—

If this be not a wilfully false statement, it was I who sought Mr Wilberforce, not he who sought me. And therefore it is certain, that, at least at the commencement of our connexion, it was I who implored his aid, he being a man of fortune and in Parliament—not he who retained me in his services as an agent.

In this light, the Messrs Wilberforce throughout labour to represent Mr Clarkson—an agent employed, paid, and directed by their father; while the fact, as indeed the whole world knows, is very opposite. Mr Clarkson states—

By the advice of my friend Richard Phillips, [a young Quaker gentleman, studying law, with whom Clarkson, also a young man, was very intimate,] I visited personally those members of both Houses of Parliament, who at that time were reputed to bear the fairest characters. I took my Essay in my hand, and presented it to each, and implored him to peruse it, that he might become acquainted with this great subject. It was to be hoped that some of those might, by means of my book, be brought over to sympathise with the injured African, and that some one might spring up out of those, who would advocate his cause in Parliament. Among those whom I thus visited was Mr Wilberforce.

And what was then the relative position of those two eminent abolitionists? Clarkson, an enthusiastic young man, who had spontaneously at his college forsaken all, to devote himself, soul and body, to the cause, and immediately from college entered the world as the apostle of Abolition; and Wilberforce, a young man of fortune, and in Parliament, the friend of the minister, strangely divided, as his Diary shows, between "serious impressions" and fashionable frivolities; who, when the question was presented to him, was struck, and finally consented to become a leader in it, but not until Mr Pitt gave his sanction to the step, and recommended it as a fit subject for his friend to introduce and manage. As the member for Yorkshire, it became not more the interest of Wilberforce to be the leader in the Abolition of Slavery, than it was the glory of Clarkson to have been its dedicated missionary, with no possible motive of personal interest or ambition, with no selfish view, and with the willing sacrifice of every merely worldly prospect. Well is he entitled to say—

I was introduced by no man to Mr Wilberforce. I went to his door alone, with no other introducer than my book. . . . I found the subjects of slavery and the slave-trade, deeply impressed on his heart, but of the slave-trade especially, he had very little knowledge in detail. We had already learned from Mr Ramsay and Mr Latrobe, more concerning the treatment of the slaves in the West Indies; but he knew very little of the African department of the subject. . . . I state not this to depreciate Mr Wilberforce's knowledge, nor to claim merit for being the accidental instrument of communicating it to him; but it will be found to have an important bearing on some of the allegations of his sons. Now, in all these assertions concerning anything that passed between Mr Wilberforce and myself, I shall obtain full credit from all who knew me. Nor will that credit be shaken, because the Messrs Wilberforce haughtily decline to point out mis-statements, which they say would be easily enumerated.

Mr Clarkson does not, however, "haughtily decline" to produce his witnesses, safely as he might have rested his case upon his character.

He concludes with the testimony of Wilberforce himself, given at the public anti-slavery meeting above referred to, and held in Freeman's Tavern, in May 1830. There, on the motion of Clarkson, Wilberforce took the Chair. It was his last appearance in public; and almost his last public words were—

When I see those by whom I am surrounded—when I again meet my esteemed friend, Mr Clarkson, in this cause, I cannot but look back to these happy days when we began our labours together, or rather, when we worked together—for he began before me.

After all, it is not as Mr Clarkson says, the question whose benevolent feelings were first excited, but who first put his shoulders to the wheel—who first conceived the object and acted upon it, of rousing a whole nation to a sense of the national iniquity, and, by means of an organized committee, paved the way for a legislative abolition of the trade. That man was not Wilberforce. His biographers dare not say it, while they insinuate that he held back, taking no prominent part, while secretly directing the operations of the committee, which is proved to have been in action a considerable time before he had in any way declared himself. He was, in fact, so far from rash, that he was tardy; though, having once put his hand to the plough, and being cheered and encouraged in his efforts, he never drew back. It is, therefore, worse than idle to contrast his labours with those of Clarkson, whose labours would, indeed, have been impossible to almost any other man. If any one save the sons of Mr Wilberforce had instituted the comparison, it would have seemed invidious and disparaging, and done of set purpose to dwarf Mr Wilberforce by placing him in juxtaposition with his illustrious forerunner.

In his editor, Mr Robinson, the venerable Clarkson has found such an advocate as so truly good a man deserves, but does not always obtain. Mr Robinson, however, says nothing for his friend, that the whole world will not confirm, nor more than the intelligent already know—than a cloud of illustrious witnesses have testified both in prose and verse. Who will dispute—not now, we should imagine, the sons of Wilberforce—

*That many a pious prayer had been breathed, and many a benevolent wish secretly nourished, but no one public act had been done, when Mr Clarkson left his college with his prize essay in his pocket, and came to London in 1784, to perform the vow he had uttered, and devote his life to the abolition of the Slave Trade? He combined with zeal an intelligence and a power of endurance seldom found in one man. He immediately took the best, the only means to effect his purpose. He looked out for friends and associates. The first he found were Quakers, some half dozen who united in a little society. He joined them, and infused practical vigour into their otherwise acquiescent society. He joined with these few, other mercantile friends; and, by mere solicitation, going from house to house, and from man to man, he brought together the original committee, who were all collected in the city of London. But, at the same time, he waited upon peers, bishops, and members of the House of Commons; and his book was a master-key to open both doors and hearts. *It was in this way that he met with Mr Wilberforce.

It would be mere impertinence to proceed.

We may say, with Mr Fowell Buxton, in a letter written to Mr Robinson upon this controversy in July last—"What need has he (Clarkson) of vindication? He must know that there is more true glory in such achievements than in all the victories of the heroes and conquerors who have slaughtered mankind."

We are not sorry that this unfortunate controversy, unfortunate for the Messrs Wilberforce, gives us an opportunity of bringing forward a humble, but heart-felt tribute to CLARKSON, which, but for this circumstance, might never have seen the light. The verses we subjoin were written by the late lamented Robert Nicoll, editor of the Leeds Times, and sent by him to a friend in Edinburgh, a day or two after another friend, a warm admirer of Clarkson's, had related to Nicoll the following anecdote, found in the "Letters and Recollections of Coleridge," then just published. This was a considerable time before Nicoll went to England.

"I once asked Tom Clarkson," said Coleridge, "whether he ever thought of his probable fate in the next world? To which he replied—'How can I? I think only of the slaves in Barbadoes!' Does Mr Wilberforce care a farthing for the slaves in the West Indies, or if they were all at the Devil, so that his soul was saved? As there is a worldliness, or the too-much of this life, so there is another worldliness, or rather other-worldliness, equally hateful and selfish with this worldliness." Elsewhere, Coleridge styles Clarkson a moral steam-engine. The opinion of Coleridge is thus added to those of Wordsworth, Southey, Lamb, and Hazlitt, who finishes a brief notice of Clarkson's character in nearly, we think, these words:—"His hair divides on his forehead as we see in paintings of the apostles. He was worthy to have been one of the Twelve."

The mind of young Nicoll dwelt more upon the beauty of Clarkson's nature and the grandeur of his mission, than upon the corroding severity of Coleridge's remark upon Wilberforce, or his species of religionists. Nicoll wrote—

Dear Sir,—The foregoing lines were suggested by the story Mrs J—— told me on Saturday of Clarkson. When Coleridge asked him if ever he thought of the welfare of his soul, he answered—"I can think of nothing save those poor slaves in the West Indies."

THOMAS CLARKSON.

Man of the bold, brave heart!
God gifted thee with stemless will to dare
And to achieve. Men ne'er successful were
Who, with thy great endeavour, joined a pure,
High, holy heart like thine, that could endure
Hated, and scorn, and tell that would have crushed
A weak, despairing spirit to the dust.

And now!

Time tells thy name unto Eternity;—

A noble man revealed,
Thy soul of light unsealed,
Thy life a battle-field,

Where fearless manhood set a race from bondage free!

Man of the dauntless soul!

Great in restless goodness as was He
Who came like summer forth of Galilee!
Who saves one living thing is ever blessed;
Good actions soothe, like angel songs, his rest;
And good men worship round the hero's grave,
Who lived and died one land of earth to save.

But thou!

Found a whole race of God-created men
Slaves, bound and scourged, and vile with every stain—

And now!

They tell what one soul-strengthened man can do!

That race is fettered

Thou pitiedst in distress;

Thee, saviour, they bless,

Great, Christ-like, pure and holy, good and true!

Man of the stainless life!

True hearts adore thy faithful Earnestness,
Thy Hope, that 'midst all trials ne'er grew less,
Thy thoughtful Love, that hatred never quenched,
And Perseverance;—power that would have wrenched
Aught good thy heart desired from Fortune's hand.
Chance, Fate, and Change, determined men command.

But thou!

Hadst nobler aims than these the foolish prize;
Loved mightier deeds than little men devise!

And now!

Giver of Freedom! who shall stand with thee?

Greater than throned kings,

Time e'er thy memory sings

Glorious imaginings!

A countless race arise and say, He made us free!

Robert Nicoll wrote under the common idea, that Clarkson, who had been labouring for Abolition fifty years before, had finished his course. But the kindred-hearted, youthful poet was to drop at his own honourable post, before the patriarch of Negre Freedom closed his career. When a herd-boy, some few years before, on the braes of Lowland Perthshire, the self-educated Nicoll had probably first heard or read of Clarkson; nor could this have been without a responsive chord being struck in his fervid bosom. At a very early age for such a task, he became the editor of the Leeds Times, and at once acquired an influence among the manufacturers and handicraftsmen of the West Riding, which, to those unacquainted with the sympathetic influence of mind over congenial minds, must have appeared unaccountable. We have sometimes wished that the valuable lesson, both for encouragement and warning, which might be drawn from Robert Nicoll's brief history, were given to the young men of his class—now a numerous and most important one. His genius, of which Ebenezer Elliott, the head of that noble class, has said, "Burns, at his age, had done nothing like him," was, all circumstances considered, less remarkable than the purity of his life, and the fortitude and energy of his character. A few specimens of his verse are, we believe, preserved, and an account of a volume, and a very remarkable one, of his juvenile poems, appeared in this Magazine.* At the time of his death, there was an impression that he had been a frequent contributor to Tait's Magazine, and to other Liberal periodicals. This was altogether a mistake, but one hardly worth rectifying. His only contributions were a very few poetical pieces to our columns, which bore his name; and one or two prose trifles in the Monthly Repository, while it was conducted by Mr Fox. A time seemed coming, when any publication might have been proud of his contributions. As it was, he was prized for the purity and singleness, and the ardour of his mind—for the bright promise of that dawn too soon overcast, and for enthusiastic devotion to what he considered the good and the true. Robert Nicoll emerged in life in almost the same circumstances of self-privation and rigorous self-denial, with Garrison of Boston, and with the same apostolic zeal for freedom, and missionary devotion attributed to that remarkable person; but with more splendour of poetic genius. From unacquaintance with the world, or with the habits of society, and ignorance, and perhaps unwise contempt of its conventionalities, he was, as a journalist, occasionally chargeable with the same faults as Garrison—intemperance of language, and what are usually called personalities; nor is it easy for those who would denounce abuse and iniquity, and rouse masses of men to the assertion of their rights, to be always bird-mouthed or choice in their expressions. But all his verse is remarkable for tenderness and sweetness; and for simplicity, without rusticity; shewing nothing of that stanch uncompromising Democrat, who, reared in and among "the huts where poor men lie," gave all his love, all his sympathy, and probably all his esteem to the virtuous poor.

For two or three years before his death, which took place at the age of twenty-three, Nicoll's physical strength had been literally consuming in the fires of his sleepless mind. He had contrived to subsist upon the pittance of about 2s. 6d. a-week; burning with the thirst of knowledge, and giving day and night to study and composition. When he went to Leeds as a journalist, aware of the deficiency of his education, or of his non-education, his anxiety "to do his best" as he termed it, and a high and sustaining consciousness of his real powers, made him doubly task himself. The consequence was the rapid popularity of the newspaper, whose editor was known only by the fervour of his writings, and by that resistless sympathy with the feelings and wants of the People which obtained him their confidence and admiration. He struggled on, until he literally dropped at his post; though his last breath was drawn in that native land which he loved so dearly, and to which so much of his sweetest verse is dedicated.

We rejoice that this desultory reference to Robert Nicoll, gives us a fit opportunity of mentioning a circumstance which ought to be made known to all the world, and especially to the Radicals of Leeds and the West Riding. When his days were evidently drawing to a close, Mr Tait wrote Sir William Molesworth to the effect that young Nicoll of the Leeds Times had been induced to leave his post, in the last stage of a decline, aggravated by the prospect of destitution, rendered much more bitter by the distress of those who looked to him for daily bread. But his wants were few, his time, in all probability, to be short in this world, and little would suffice. Sir William, without an hour's delay, transmitted an order for fifty pounds, in a most kind and delicate letter. It would be a sin to conceal this unostentatious deed of benevolence in their Member to their late Editor, from the Radicals of Leeds.

Some idea may be formed of the character of the youth who wrote the above lines to Clarkson, from the primitive and emphatic farewell which he took of his readers, when about to return to die at home. This letter and paragraph, which we copy from The Spectator of 4th November 1837, was the last thing connected with politics which he could have written, and almost the last thing of any kind, for he died early in December. But, even after his arrival in Scotland, it was impossible to win his excitable spirit from the cause of the People. His last denunciations, while the fires of consumption glowed in his eyes, and hectic flushed his cheeks, were of "that man Durham, who has deceived us all."

The Spectator says—"We learn with regret from the following letter, that Mr Robert Nicoll has been compelled by ill health to give up the Editorship of The Leeds Times, a journal which he has raised to a large circulation, by following an independent course in politics with vigour and ability."

TO THE RADICALS OF THE WEST RIDING.

BRETHREN!—Ill health compels me to leave your locality, where I have laboured earnestly and sincerely, and I trust not altogether without effect, in the holy work of human regeneration. I go to try the effect of my native air as a last chance for life; and, after the last number, I am not responsible for anything which may appear in The Leeds Times, having ceased to be Editor of that paper from that date.

I could not leave you without saying this much, without bidding you one and all farewell, at least for a season. If I am spared, you may yet hear of me as a Soldier of the People's side; if not, thank God! there are millions of honest and noble men ready to help in the great work. Your cause emphatically is

The holiest cause that pen or sword
Of mortal ever lost or gained.

And that you may fight in that cause in an earnest, truthful, manly spirit, is the earnest prayer of one who never yet despaired of the ultimate triumph of truth.

ROBERT NICOLL.

This was the kind of young man who, two years before, had attempted, in the above expressions of his feelings, to add a leaflet to the wreath of Clarkson. And in the hearts of thousands of such nameless youths dwells the pious regard which will defend the memory of all who have, like Clarkson, fought the good fight in the strife of humanity, from the attacks, whether of ignorance or envy. This may seem an irrelevant conclusion to our random observations upon the "Strictures," and Mr Robinson's Remarks; but it all means the same thing to those who have the key; and if, as we fondly hope, Mr F. Buxton's judgment be correct; and benevolence, and active goodness, the "putting the shoulder to the wheel," be the only true greatness, whether found tried and confirmed in the veteran soldiers of Humanity, like Thomas Clarkson, or only beginning to be gloriously developed in the smaller achievements of right-hearted and enthusiastic lads like Garrison, the printer's boy of Boston, and, at an humbler distance, Robert Nicoll.

* Lord Durham had, shortly before this, been reading his recantation of Liberal opinions, in his epistle to Mr Bowly, and, making the amendment honorable to the Court and the Whig Conservative aristocracy, for the sake of peace and unity in Edinburgh and Glasgow.—Spectator.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS TWO YEARS HENCE.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1841.

The royal assent was given by commission to several private bills.

LORD RODEN presented a petition, signed by the Bishop of Exeter, and many of the clergy of his diocese, humbly praying that no further changes might be made in the Established Church. The petitioners did not dispute the right of the State to interfere, but pleaded that national religious institutions were essential to sound piety and morality; and, also, that, if the Establishment were again curtailed, it would be virtually destroyed. The noble Lord said, that he fully concurred in the prayer, and expressed his deep regret that the Prelate whose name stood at the head of the petition, was no longer permitted to employ his zeal and abilities in that House, in defence of the customs and faith of their forefathers; and the more so, as the utmost efforts of all enlightened friends of the Church, and all good subjects of the Queen, were now needed, to avert the last and worst consequences of revolutionary frenzy and violence.

LORD HOLLAND said he was intrusted with a petition having a very different prayer from that just laid on the table of the House. It was signed by the deputies of three denominations of Dissenters, and to the respectability and conscientiousness of the petitioners, generally, he could bear a cheerful and unhesitating testimony. The petition was couched in the most respectful terms. The deputies acknowledged that many grievances arising out of the Establishment had been removed; but they affirmed their belief, that it was due to the nonconformists, and desirable for the sake of Episcopalians themselves, that the last vestiges of a schismatic system should be swept away, and that all sects should be placed on a footing of perfect equality. As an opportunity would present itself during the Session, of fully discussing the subject of the petition, he should not detain their Lordships at present by any further observations respecting it. Before, however, he sat down, he could not avoid a slight allusion to the tone of the petition which the noble Lord had presented, and to the remarks by which the noble Lord had accompanied its presentation. The petition itself was deserving of much commendation, considering the quarter whence it emanated. Its tone was subdued, and afforded a cheering contrast to the lofty and extravagant pretensions in which the noble Prelate and others had been wont to indulge. The right of the State to interfere was distinctly admitted; and he could not but congratulate their Lordships and the country on these signs of the times. (Hear.) He wished he could apply the same congratulations to the remarks which had fallen from the noble Lord. That noble Lord had chosen to designate the proceedings of the three estates of the realm, by the phrase revolutionary violence. (Loud cheers.) Was this the boasted loyalty of the noble Lord? (Hear, hear, hear.) Was this what that advocate of the Bible, and the whole Bible, understood by subjection to the powers that be? (Renewed cheering.) For his part he did not think an orange handkerchief was the substance of loyalty, or an atonement for the constant breach of the ninth commandment. He would recommend the noble Lord to cease from such vituperation; and, the rather, because for many years he had indulged in it in vain. There had been scarcely a measure of importance brought forward by the present Ministry, or their predecessors, which the noble Lord, being exceedingly mad against them, had not denounced as revolutionary. The noble Lord's eloquence began with revolutionary; and with revolutionary it ended. Now, it was quite true that much might be done by harping on one string. Paganini, for instance, had by one string entranced all the musical connoisseurs of Europe; but then Paganini himself did not always fiddle on one string. He would recommend this example to the noble Lord. (Loud laughter.) Revolutionary violence was a fine strain, and very pathetic, but it was too bad to din them with the same strain everlastingly.

LORD LONDONDERRY thought his noble friend did not deserve the rude treatment he had received from the noble Lord opposite.

Somedesultory conversation ensued, when LORD DURHAM, who had entered the House whilst the Marquis of Londonderry was on his legs, rose and moved, that the part of the royal speech relating to the suffrage be read by the clerk. The clerk accordingly read as follows:—"My Lords and Gentlemen,—Your attention will be called, during the Session, to the state of the suffrage, with a view to such alterations as the present state of the nation may seem to require. A subject so important as this, and so interesting to the great majority of my subjects, will, I am sure, receive the calm and earnest consideration it demands."

LORD DURHAM again rose, amidst profound silence, and said:—

My Lords,—The Roman orator, habituated as he was to the duties of the Forum, confessed himself to be the prey of anxiety when he did but anticipate the day on which he must plead. Cum illius diei mihi venit in mentem, quo die, citato reo, mihi dicendum sit, non solum commoveor animo, sed etiam toto corpore perhorresco. Many who have altogether wanted the great powers of the Roman, have been no strangers to his perturbation. My Lords, it might be superfluous in me to avow, on the present occasion, an unusual anxiety; but, though not unaccustomed to the conflicts and responsibilities of political life, I confess myself to tremble greatly at the task from which I cannot escape. The tremor, however, arises from a deep sense of the importance of my undertaking; and certainly not from the slightest doubt of the justice and practicality bility of the measure which it is my duty to introduce to the notice of your Lordships. But, my Lords, I draw courage from the assurance that I plead for truth; and truth is mighty, even in the hands of the weak; and I am further encouraged by knowing that the great abilities of other noble Lords will be exerted to supply what is deficient in my efforts, for conciliating the good will of your Lordships to the measure which will quickly be explained. My Lords, the constitutions of states have been, in almost all cases, of gradual formation; and generally their growth has been very slow and often checked. Having their origin, for the most part, in times of barbarism, they have been, as civilization advanced, altered and improved, and adjusted to the varying circumstances and wants of mankind. The British constitution has been thus formed by degrees. It was not dropped from the clouds by the angel of Britain; nor did it come forth entire from the mind of a Solon or a Plato. It is the production of ages; and has, in fact, been changed, till its identity becomes almost doubtful. (Great cheering from the Opposition.) Noble Lords opposite cheer. May I remind them that their ancestors, the Barons of England, were the first to modify the monarchical constitution. (Cheers from the Ministerial benches.) Compelled, in self-defence, to place restrictions on the sovereign power, they led the way in the career of freedom. The struggle for liberty was long confined to the King and the nobles; the mass of the People remaining in feudal slavery. By slow stages the bourgeois advanced to power; and, after the lapse of ages, the fetters of feudal bondage were shaken off, even by the rustic population. And could one of the mail-clad Barons, who confronted majesty with the famous expression, Nelumbo leges Angliæ mutari, have risen from the dead, he would have gazed on that most unconstitutional sight, a nation of freemen. (Cheers.) Noble Lords who just now cheered when I spoke of the constitution having almost lost its identity, are, perhaps, sighing for the luxuries of feudalism. (Renewed cheering.) Later times have added to the changes already enumerated. The People, as they have gained knowledge, have increased their political influence, and multiplied the forms in which it is exerted; and I must contend, and I hope in doing so to have the concurrence of your Lordships, that the people at large, of the United Kingdom, have now advanced as far in knowledge and power that it is no longer safe or just to withhold from them the right of choosing Parliamentary representatives. (Loud cries of "Hear.") My Lords, the question you have now to consider is certainly not open to the charge of novelty. It has been long and anxiously discussed; and more out of Parliament than within its walls. At first it found favour with but a few. It has gradually and surely risen to popularity; and the hour of its triumph is now at hand. (Cheers.) In the progress of that cause as the humble advocate of which I appear before your Lordships, we may discern evidence of its truth.

Political chimeras may find favour for an hour, but will soon disappear. It belongs to Truth, however much disowned at its first announcement, to subdue opposition, and advance with sure step to victory. It is thus that the most humane and glorious changes in our national policy have been effected—thus that the annihilation of religious tests was accomplished; that the extinction of slavery was secured; that the Reform of the House of Commons was carried. It is no long time since a few individuals, whose names were cast out as evil, united and proclaimed the People as the only legitimate source of power; a sentiment which the People themselves feared to indulge, for they had been taught to regard it as treasonable and almost blasphemous. And it is but very lately that the middle and most influential classes have detected, in this first political axiom, the true secret of national concord, security, and glory. (Cheers.) Your Lordships, I trust, will not charge upon my plan for a complete extension of the suffrage, a tendency to destroy or diminish the honour which is due to rank and wealth. Standing as you do on the pinnacle of society, you have nothing to dread. My Lords, they who bid you jealously guard your privileges, and apprehend, in every change that is made, an interference with your influence in the State, do you wrong. That influence is, and must be, great. The People of this kingdom are not backward to discern your worth and pay respect to your greatness. Treat them frankly and justly, and you will be enthroned in their hearts, and attain to honour, compared with which the servile homage your ancestors received was worthless. My Lords, I shall detain you no longer by any preliminary observations, but proceed to state, in few words, the leading features of the measure to which your consent is now asked. Our proposal is, to give to every man born in the United Kingdom (with some few exceptions afterwards to be mentioned) a vote when he reaches the age of twenty-one. (Tremendous cheering.) This, it will be said, is a Radical measure. It is so, my Lords. I wished it to be so. The sooner the government is established on a basis thoroughly popular, the sooner will the dissensions which have long distracted the country be brought to an end; and one fruitful source of animosity and discord, now existing in every neighbourhood, will be dried up. Convinced that any change less sweeping than the one I propose to make, would not be final, I am anxious at once to introduce that change which must be final. (Hear, hear, hear.) My Lords, if I am asked on what principle I concede the suffrage to every man, I reply, because every man has a natural right to a share in the management of the national affairs—that is, of his own affairs. Circumstances may place this right in abeyance for a time, or may prevent it from being discerned; but, as society advances in civilization, this right will become apparent, and be felt; and then the only alternatives are the destruction of the State by popular violence, or, on the other hand, some such constitution as both expediency and justice as that now proposed. My Lords, I deny utterly the right of any individual, or any few men, or any society even of the whole population, to assume the government. For the reason that your Lordship would raise your voices, and, if indispensable, draw your swords, to prevent an absolute monarchy, or an oligarchy, (using the latter word in its ordinary acceptation,) do I protest against that more extended oligarchy (a laugh) which has hitherto, in this country, held the power of the State in its hands. Noble Lords opposite smile at the phrase, "extended oligarchy." I did not use it unthinkingly, nor am I convinced of its impropriety. The electors of Great Britain and Ireland are unquestionably, as compared with the whole male adult population, few: and the government of the few is an oligarchy. I intended, my Lords, to accuse the present system of exclusiveness, and to fix upon it the stigma which the term oligarchy conveys. (Loud cheers.) In this country, up to the present time, property has been the test of fitness for exercising the suffrage; though how loosely the test has been applied, it can hardly be requisite to remind your Lordships. In counties, the owner of a 40s. freehold has a vote, and the owner of landed property, to the amount of £10,000 per annum, but a vote. Where the tenure is copyhold, £10 yearly is the qualification; and, in boroughs, a £10 rental suffices. In short, the law of the suffrage is a chapter of accidents. It rests upon no principle. Its enactments, when viewed separately, appear arbitrary, and, when viewed together, confused. My Lords, I propose to sweep away these absurdities, and replace them by the one simple measure which has been explained; a measure clear in its principle, unembarrassed in its details, and easy to be executed. By this plan, should it be adopted, every man born in the United Kingdom, when he reaches the age of manhood, will have a share in the government. His manhood is his claim to a vote, unless there can be shewn something peculiar in his circumstances which unfit him for exercising the rights of a man; and whatever distinguishes him as man, will, by a law of providence, give him the additional influence which he ought to possess. Be he wealthy or wise, his wealth or wisdom will enable him to exercise an influence over others proportioned to the degree in which it is possessed. The slightest fear, my Lords, lest property should by this bill lose its influence, is preposterous. Nebuchadnezzar's subjects were not more ready to bow before the image of gold than are the People of Great Britain and Ireland to pay deference to the rich. If any law must be made exclusively for the wealthy classes, I contend it ought to be a law depriving them of the franchise, on the ground of the great indirect influence they exert, and not a law confining the suffrage to them. (Hear, hear, hear.) Not that such a law could for a moment be thought of; but, of the two evils, I do maintain that it would be the least. Look, my Lords, to a district in which there dwells some wealthy Whig, and you will find that his neighbours are Whigs also. Jacob's expedient for making the sheep speckled did not more surely succeed than Whig land makes Whig farmers, and Tory soil grows Tory farmers. (Loud laughter.) There is a healthy influence which station and property ought to exert—and ever will exert; and the measure I propose will increase rather than diminish that influence, though it will change its character—divesting it of much of that servility which now belongs to it. (Hear, hear.) My Lords, I referred to some exceptions which it is necessary to make to Universal Suffrage. Of course, all persons of unsound mind, and all prisoners, will be excepted. These two classes differ widely from each other; and there is another, differing as widely from both, from which it seems to me but just to withhold the right of voting—I mean paupers. Every one who provides honestly for himself and his family fulfils the duties of a citizen; but when man is incapacitated for fulfilling those duties, he ought not, I apprehend, to expect longer to exercise the rights of a citizen. He who is dependent upon another's industry is not to make laws for his supporter. Anxious, however, to confine this class within the narrowest limits possible, we propose that no man who has not obtained parochial relief for six months before the day of election, shall lose his right of voting. The clause, so modified, will, owing to the commercial prosperity of past years, and the wholesome operation of the present poor-laws, narrow the constituency to a very slight amount only. Ten years ago, it would have formed a very serious item in our calculations. Now, my Lords, it is introduced, much more as a matter of principle, than for any immediate practical consequences that will flow from it. The numbers to whom it will deny the suffrage are quite inconsiderable: still, I deem it my duty to lose no opportunity of strengthening, by legitimate means, the motives to industry and independence. (Cheers from all sides.) I do not think it needful to occupy more time by explanation. The whole plan is doubtless understood, especially after the long discussion it has elsewhere received. In conclusion, suffer me to remind your Lordships, that great advantages may fairly be expected to flow from the measure I have the honour to recommend. The quarrels of centuries will be ended; and the question which has, for many years past, in various forms, occupied much of the time of both Houses of the Legislature, and given rise to much angry feeling and altercation, will be for ever settled. When other changes have been sought, noble Lords opposite have contended that we were but commencing concessions which would never terminate; and that one demand would but lead to another, keeping the legislative bodies employed in altering the frame-work of government, to the neglect and hinderance of the great practical purposes for which that frame-work had been constructed. Against the present alteration, no such objection will apply. The dissensions which noble Lords deprecate must exist till this boon be granted. Concede it, and they can arise no more. By the same means, you put an end to them now, and silence them for ever. (Cheers.) The responsibility of government will be made to rest, where it ought to rest, on the People themselves; and the causes of the endless, and not always unjustifiable jealousies, with which the government has been regarded, will be removed. Give every man a vote, my Lords, and when you meet with complaints at Manchester or in Buckinghamshire, amongst manufacturers or agriculturalists, the reply is at hand; and it is one which cannot be gainsaid. Those complaints must be directed, not against the Monarch, not against the Lords, not against the Commons, nor all combined, but against all the People of the United Kingdom. Give every man a vote, and you annihilate every pretext for murmuring, and render sedition impossible, by enlisting every man in the defence of institutions which he himself has helped to form. (Cheers.) Or, should there arise a Thistlewood, he conspires, not against the Cabinet, but against the nation; and madly attempts to overturn what a whole People have joined to establish, and are leagued to protect. No measure, my Lords, can be so heading and soothing, and so well fitted to bind the inhabitants of Great Britain and Ireland into one harmonious and happy brotherhood, as that which, having been sent up by a considerable majority of the other House of Parliament, it has been my aim to commend to the good-will of your Lordships. (Cheers.) The noble Lord then moved the second reading of the bill.

The Duke of WELLINGTON gave the noble Lord who had just spoken credit for the clearness and frankness with which he had introduced the subject; but could not agree with that noble Lord as to the necessity of the measure he advocated, or the good consequences that would flow from it, if it should become law. In his (the Duke of Wellington's) opinion, the expectations entertained, that all peace and good-will would flow from universal suffrage, were a marvellous exaggeration, or rather an entire mistake. (Cheers.) Did the noble Lord's love for a democracy arise out of his knowledge of history? Perhaps the unbroken tranquillity of the ancient republics—(loud cheers)—the absence of all political animosity at Athens, for example, combined with the security of life and fortune in the city of Socrates and Demosthenes—(renewed cheering)—led to the present measure, and the hopes that were built upon it. But still he (the Duke of Wellington) was not quite convinced that, when the People had the authority all in their own hands, they would always think what was true, and do what was right. (Hear, hear.) The government of any country, but especially of a country like this, required a mind capable of large views, and required also time for the examination of almost endless details. Did the noble Lord mean, when he talked of self-government, that all people who had lived twenty-one years, possessed the qualifications for government. (Hear, hear, hear.) In his (the Duke of Wellington's) opinion, we should commit a radical error if we drew away the labouring population from their peaceful pursuits, by which they gained their daily bread, and converted them into politicians. (Cheers.) He had no wish to see the day when the man who holds the plough, and the boy who drives it, should dispute about politics. He thought that neither the master's field, nor the labourer's comfort, would be improved by such an alteration. (Hear, hear.) The noble Lord, in his speech, affirmed the right of the People to political power. Why then did he not give them that power by the Reform Bill, in the preparation of which it was well known that noble Lord was concerned? Was it not the very principle of that bill, that the suffrage was dependent upon property? (Loud cries of "Hear.") Why then did the noble Lord now introduce a bill resting on a totally different principle? (Cheers.) The effort of the noble Lord to prove that his measure would not impair the dignity and influence of the nobility, was more creditable to his good feeling than to his discernment. He would not, however, contend about the interests of noble Lords, but would point to a higher position than that which they occupied. He would point to the throne, and ask if they were not undermining its foundations. (Tremendous cheering.) Loyalty used to be in high esteem. (Hear.) But he did not see how the measures of the present administration, and particularly the one now before them, were to be carried without leading to republicanism, and quickly too. (Hear, hear, hear.) Universal Suffrage might suit very well the American People and American customs; but was not adapted to England. He was particularly anxious to bring under the notice of noble Lords opposite this view of the subject; and he put it to them, whether they had no suspicions that Universal Suffrage, and an hereditary monarchy, were, in the long run, incompatible with each other. (Loud cries of "Hear.") He asked if they had no apprehensions, should he say, in some cases no hopes, that the step now proposed, led towards the subversion of that form of government which had existed in England for a thousand years. (Cheers.) He would not detain their Lordships longer. He should certainly vote against the levelling and democratic scheme of the noble Lord. (Cheers.)

EARL SPENCER was induced to address their Lordships by the speech to which they had just listened. The noble Duke had presented (as he usually did) many reasons for his conduct, in a narrow compass. He could not pretend to follow the noble Duke throughout his speech, but hoped he might be indulged in a few allusions to some parts of that speech. The noble Duke seemed greatly to fear that the People would become too wise for him—(No, no! from the Opposition, responded to by loud cheers from the Ministerial side)—and his tenderest sympathy was given to the rural population. Now, though he granted that the opinion of the noble Duke was decisive in military science, he hoped he might, without vanity, differ from him, when the discussion related to agriculturists and farmers' labourers. (Hear, hear, and laughter.) He had had opportunities which had not been quite neglected, of marking carefully the classes of the population referred to; and had no hesitation whatever in affirming, that, other things being equal, the most intelligent man was the best servant—most to be trusted for his honesty, and most to be valued for his skill. (Cheers.) The most indolent, and the intemperate, amongst the operatives of all classes, will generally be noisy politicians; seeking to atone for their own vices, by finding out and condemning the faults of those above them. Under any system of Government, the most dissolute labourers will always be the most eager politicians; but he would contend that the more instructed the industrious labourer was, the better labourer he would become. His belief was, that the more enlightened a man became, the better he was fitted for his station, whether he were a master or a servant. (Cheers.) The noble Duke had given them some historical allusions, and he (Lord Spencer) might add one to the number. There was no man that had lived he would like better for a ploughman than Cincinnatus—(Cheering)—and he thought he would have an excellent chance of the prize at a ploughing match on any soil. (Laughter.) Another point touched by the noble Duke, was a supposed inconsistency in the conduct of his noble friend who opened the debate, and who also took part in framing the Reform Bill. The charge certainly applied not less to him, (Earl Spencer,) disposed as he was to support the motion, than to his noble friend who introduced it. Indeed, he might be thought more open to the charge of inconsistency, because he had affirmed that the Reform Bill was intended to be a final measure. (Loud cheers from the Opposition.) Now, what he meant was, that they (the Government then existing) had no intention whatever of bringing forward any further measure of Reform. (Oh! oh!) He hoped noble Lords who expressed their astonishment at this explanation, did not doubt its truth; however unsatisfactory they might deem it. (Hear, hear.) He could assure them he was simply stating the fact. He would confess, too, that he had not the slightest expectation that, during his life, any further extension of the franchise would be effected. He was not weak enough in 1832 to suppose they were enacting laws for eternity; but he did then think they were settling the suffrage upon a basis which would not require to be widened during the nineteenth century. Events, however, had proved that he had thought wrong; and that was the only explanation he had to give of that expression, "final measure," which noble Lords opposite really seemed to have converted into a pater noster, to be repeated the oftener, the more virtuous they would become. (A laugh.) The noble mover of the present measure was not limited to the same defence. (Cheers.) But he would not presume to take that defence out of the hands of the noble Lord. The call for general suffrage, in exchange for that which was select, (without any very intelligible principle of selection,) was so loud, that he thought it now quite expedient—indeed, he would say, indispensable—to concede to the people at large the power of choosing Parliamentary representatives: thus carrying out a maxim, which noble Lords opposite would not condemn as new-fangled, or unconstitutional—taxation without representation is tyranny. (Great cheering.) The noble Duke had deprecated the measure before their Lordships as one, which, if it became law, would make the People at large politicians. They were politicians already. The petitions that had been laid on the table proved them to be so—petitions emanating not only from the large towns, but also from villages and agricultural districts, and from people of all classes. The question to be decided was not whether the People should concern themselves in affairs of State—they would do it—but whether they should give vent to their political feelings and wishes peaceably, and through their representatives, or by political unions, and large and dangerous assemblies. (Great cheering.) The noble Duke had brought before them some of the difficulties of Government, and had asked if the fact of having lived twenty-one years were a sufficient guarantee for the possession of that information without which no government, but especially that of England, could be conducted. The noble Duke seemed to him to labour under a radical mistake, and his reasoning to be quite fallacious. The constituency had not, of necessity, to decide upon the measures of Downing Street, or of the legislature; but upon the character, both for wisdom and probity, of those to whom the affairs of State were to be intrusted. The more the constituency knew, the better they were qualified to exercise the suffrage; but all that was essential, was common sense. (Hear, hear.) The choice might not indeed always be judicious, but generally it would be so; and the ends of justice and humanity would probably be promoted far better by such an arrangement than by any other. Besides, if a perfect knowledge of the science of government were the qualification for political rights, he feared many of the present constituency must be disfranchised; and perhaps some of their Lordships might scarcely make good their claim to their seats in that House. (Loud laughter.) The noble Duke's argument proved vastly too much. He should vote for the second reading. (Cheers.)

LORD LONDONDERRY rose to protest against the measure which had been explained. He did think they had advanced far enough in the career of revolution. The noble Lords opposite might have been satisfied with the success which had crowned their past efforts to destroy the constitution; but nothing would content them short of its utter subversion. (Order, order!)

The noble Lord who commenced the debate, talked much of the People, and of giving to them what was their due. He objected entirely to the assumption that all care for the lower orders was confined to the Whigs and Radicals. Why did the noble Lord class together paupers and felons? (Oh, oh.) Yes, the noble Lord had classed together paupers and felons. Was not this making poverty tantamount to crime? He did not see how, if this measure passed, we were longer to retain the respect of foreign powers, or to escape those fatal convulsions at home, which the unbridled power of the populace had always produced.

EARL FITZWILLIAM did not think there was much force in the objections of the noble Lord who had spoken last; and, though he did not deny that much might be said against universal suffrage, he was inclined to vote with the noble Lord who commenced the debate. He thought in the present state of this country, and after the wish expressed by the myriads who had petitioned on the subject, that the point might be safely and wisely conceded. He could not overlook the fact, that the worst measures had been introduced and upheld, in spite of all evidence of their injurious effects, by men who had been born in the mansions of nobility, and educated in the universities. He must doubt whether the representatives of the nation, if the right of voting were universal, would ever make the absurd and inhuman blunder of imposing a tax in order to raise the price of corn, the prime necessary of life.

LORD LYNDHURST.—My Lords,—Heartily approving, as I do, of the uncompromising opposition by which the noble Duke near me meets the proposal of her Majesty's Ministers, I am unwilling to join with him in that opposition by giving a silent vote. Much do I wish that it were in my power, by taking part in the debate, to arrest the legislature in its downward progress, and induce your Lordships to pause, if not to retrace your steps. If this be too much to hope for, I would at least secure the satisfaction of having done what I could to preserve the ancient and wholesome practice of the realm—to preserve those institutions through which this nation has risen to unequalled glory; and by which (should they be perpetuated) this United Kingdom will be even more remarkable for stability than for glory. My Lords, the ancient monarchies, and some kingdoms of modern times, have rivalled us in extent of dominion, in wealth, in the arts, and the general improvements and embellishments which perfect civilisation induces. If England has her Wellington, Carthage had her Annibal, and Rome her Cæsar, and Spain her Charles V., and France her Napoleon. Babylon was as rich as London, and Athens outvied it in architecture. In their rise to opulence and power, and perfect civilisation, we have emulated the famous nations of antiquity; and now it seems we are to imitate them in their decline and fall. (Cheers.) The tide of democracy, unchecked, and even encouraged, by well-meaning but mistaken patriots, has ruined many states, and is now threatening to add Britain to the number. Headless of the downfall of other people, shall we press on in the career of destruction? Whilst boasting of the proud position which, as a country, we have attained, shall we destroy the means by which we have reached it? Beware, my Lords, of ripping up the goose, if you wish to have more golden eggs. (Hear, hear, hear.) Property in this country has been more than protected—it has been patronised by the law. The man who, by his skill and industry, has amassed wealth, or whose ancestors, by bequeathing wealth to him, have given to the State a pledge (not always redeemed, it is true, but yet a pledge) of his good conduct, and to a certain extent of his intelligence also, has hitherto been endowed by the state with various privileges; which are to all classes a stimulus to future exertion, and to some, the merited and honourable reward of exertions already made. My Lords, why should we destroy this arrangement?—why annihilate this stimulus to enterprise and industry; and, by severing political influence from wealth and intelligence, uproot the wise, and, I will add, humane, institutions of our ancestors? We shall gain nothing, but lose much, by the levelling scheme of the Noble Lord, should it be adopted (Hear, hear)—a scheme by which the distinctions of civilized life will be thrown away, and the beautiful variety which, down to the present time, has marked the institutions of our country, destroyed. The motion before your Lordships will put us in possession of nothing worth having, and leave us nothing to hope for. My Lords, the perishable wreath, bound upon the brow of the Olympic victor, had been of little value if such a crown had encircled every man's brow. All wise rulers have taken care, indeed, to render justice to all their subjects; but they have taken equal care to secure to the brave, the wise, and the good, a pre-eminence, meted out, not by the rules of arithmetic, but by the dictates of generosity. The Noble Lord (Durham) in the affairs of government, worships no divinity but the blind goddess with the scales in her hands. I contend that it is false worship he pays to her; for I deny that justice requires the measure which it is now sought to introduce. But, letting this point pass for the present, I dislike the cold and heartless system of the noble Lord, which resolves all subjects into the bare question of right and wrong; divesting them of the generous and chivalric sentiments with which our forefathers delighted to adorn and enrich them. Why should we have a system of jurisprudence, the sanctions of which are all punitive? Why will noble Lords, who talk much, not only of truth, but of the beauty of truth, labour to sweep away the few rewards that are now included in our civil polity? (Hear, hear.) Why reduce all legislation to pains and penalties? (Cheers.) I trust your Lordships will show, by a large majority against the motion, a fixed determination not to set aside the institutions which the framchime; as now regulated, presents to those who possess it not to improve their social condition; and thus earn a right which, if conferred indiscriminately, would no longer be a stimulus to forethought, economy, and diligence. My Lords, I have another reason for objecting to the motion of the noble Lord. Its tendency to destroy utterly one inducement now laid upon the unrepresented part of the community, to act as good citizens, is the least part of the evil. Its tendency is also to the destruction of the constitution itself. It will not merely interfere with the working of it: its very existence is threatened. Uter caset is the question your Lordships have now to answer. (Hear, hear, hear.) You are called upon to commit the control of the State to those who have no stake in the country. (Hear, hear.) The noble Lord has told us that he would surrender the government to the multitude, without inquiring whether they possess a penny or not. (Cheers.) I cannot be mistaken in my recollection of the strain of the argument of the noble Lord, whose motion we are now discussing. He dwelt much upon the wisdom, the beauty, the nobility, the necessity of mob-government. (Loud cheers.) Nothing will satisfy him but that the mass of the People—to whom it is of very slight importance whether peace and order, or anarchy, should prevail—shall have the sceptre and the sword in their own hands. Not contented with lowering the property qualification, and thus carrying out further the true and constitutional theory of the suffrage, he throws that theory, much boasted of by our ancestors, and renowned amongst all civilised people—he throws that theory to the winds; and proposes to a British House of Peers, to drag down the state into all the mire and the turbulence of an absolute and unchecked democracy. (Loud cheers.) My Lords, I deny the right of any man to claim a vote in the management of the affairs of a country in which he has no stake. (Cheers.) That a man should have the control over his own affairs is a very favourite maxim, when it suits their purpose, with the advocates of the present ruinous measure. Why will they not apply it in the present case? Why should noble Lords wish to resign the legislative control of their estates, and the law by which those estates descended to them from their forefathers, and ought to be handed down to their posterity, into the hands of an ignorant and irresponsible multitude? For to this length will the proposal of the noble Lord, if acceded to, carry us. If universal suffrage shall not awaken into life the revolutionary violence which now slumbers in the breasts of the discontented—if concessions to popular clamour do not lead to new aggressions, till all that is most to be valued perishes amidst the demoniacal fury of a revolutionary mob; yet, certainly a step will at once be put to wholesome legislation on the one hand, and, on the other, the flood-gates of change will be drawn up. Do noble Lords suppose, for one moment, that the poor-law now in existence, which all parties joined in passing, and the operation of which has been salutary beyond all our hopes, and which had become indispensable if pauperism and demoralisation were not to become universal, would have passed if the right of voting had been unlimited? (Loud cheers.) Is it to be doubted for a moment, that that favourite measure of the Whigs, with all its good effects, (and I do not deny them,) would, with an unrestricted suffrage, have been crushed in embryo—(cheers)—as I trust the measure now before your Lordships will speedily be? (Renewed cheering.) Or can any one of your Lordships have simplicity enough to hope, that the laws which guard the privileges of your order, and perpetuate your names, will long continue to exist, if intrusted to the tender mercies of the weavers of Spittalfields, and the operatives of Birmingham? My Lords, I call upon you to read anew your armorial bearings. You are the descendants and representatives of illustrious ancestors, whose names are inseparably interwoven with the dignity and glory of their country and your country. The footsteps of great and good men—your forefathers—once echoed in the halls and galleries of your mansions; and the pencil of the painter has adorned the walls of those mansions with the very form and feature of the departed. All beneath you is transient and evanescent. The multitude, like the waves of the sea, is ever changing, leaving behind scarcely a vestige of that which once was. The nobility are the pyramids of England, looking down serenely and sublimely on the waste of ages. Whatever is rich, or romantic, or great, or glorious in our national history, belongs to the history of England's ancient aristocracy. And to you, my Lords, have your ancestors bequeathed the sacred trust of handing down to your posterity and theirs, unimpaired, the name you have received, and the proud position you hold. Proinde sturi in aciem, et majores vestros, et vesteros cogitate. (Loud cheers.)

Lord BROUGHAM.—My Lords, it may be in the recollection of your Lordships that my opinion has frequently been given against Universal Suffrage; (loud cries of "Hear," from the Opposition;) nor, I think, without reason. (Cheers.) Noble Lords who cheer are too precipitate in their conclusions, and by far too lavish in their applause. (Loud laughter.) I do not quite concur in all the reasoning of my noble friend who commenced the debate, and who brought to bear upon the question at issue, his strong sense and masculine eloquence. But, from the course pursued by other noble Lords, and from the reasoning by which they would defend that course, I utterly dissent. (Cheers.) My belief that a much greater extension of the suffrage is requisite than the Reform Bill accomplished or contemplated, has been repeatedly expressed. (Hear.) Without entering upon that disputed topic—a man's abstract right to the franchise—I am willing to rest my argument on other grounds. Noble Lords opposite will admit that an improvement in a man's circumstances may be properly fol-luded by an extension of his civil rights. If he have no property, they would not include him in the constituency. If he have a £2 freehold, they would give him a vote. Now, I contend that a change has passed upon the whole community immensely greater than that of which the phrase, "a forty-shilling freehold," is the exponent. If the possession of a hut worth a shilling a-week, qualify a man to choose parliamentary representatives, a much stronger claim arises, and a much higher qualification, out of that most felicitous change by which the poor have, in a few years, passed from pauperism into independence, and, owing to the diffusion of education, from darkness into marvellous light. It seems to me that much more ought, therefore, to be conceded now, than it would have been either wise or safe to concede ten years ago. Then, owing to the reckless expenditure, and yet more reckless legislation of the party long dominant in the State, the nation was pauperized. To have granted, without limitation, the right of voting, would have been to intrust all property to those whose immediate interest it was to render all property but a name; and a universal franchise from which paupers were excluded, would have been a most glaring and ludicrous misnomer. So long as that state of things continued, Universal Suffrage would have been, in my opinion, ruinous. Happily this difficulty, which at one time appeared insurmountable, has been overcome. Passing from this improvement, which the illustrious Duke who has spoken to-night would be the first to admit, I cannot refrain from adverting again to the intelligence now diffused amongst all classes of the people, as contrasted with the ignorance which a few years since prevailed. The prodigious advances which the People of this United Kingdom (a kingdom never so glorious as now) have made in knowledge—knowledge which fits them to discharge their duties as citizens—certainly calls for some corresponding changes in the machinery of Government. It is admitted, by the most determined opponents of the present measure, that the Commons should represent, not the property only, but also the intelligence of the constituency. Even those who deny that all should possess the franchise, confess that the wisdom, as well as the wealth of the community, should be felt in the legislature. But, my Lords, sound information is at the present day diffused to an extent quite unknown heretofore; and it may fairly be argued, that, with this extension of knowledge, there should be some extension of political influence also. (Hear, hear.) Your Lordships will suffer me to remind you of another fact. The nation is awake to the subject we are discussing. Petitions, in numbers almost unexampled, ask you—respectfully but firmly ask you—to aid in making the lower House of Parliament representative of the whole nation; and, finally, the Commons themselves have given heed to similar petitions addressed to them, and have sent up to your Lordships the measure which you are implored not to originate, but to promote. You have to consider, not merely whether you will give the boon, but whether you will refuse it; and I would humbly plead that it would ill become your Lordships, as you value your own dignity, or the respect of a great and enlightened nation, to step in between the people and the privileges which the Commons have shewn their readiness to grant. For the reasons which have been concisely and very imperfectly obtained, I shall certainly give my vote, and give it most cordially, in favour of the second reading of the bill. (Loud cheers.) Before I sit down, it may be allowed me to refer to some parts of the debate which is now drawing towards a close. A noble Lord opposite (Lord Londonderry) has brought a charge against the promoters of this measure for having classed together paupers and felons—seeming to suppose that, by so classing them, my noble friend designed to identify them in all respects. (No, no.) No, no? But why then complain of the classification? It may, perhaps, go forth to the world that Lords Londonderry and Brougham took part in this debate. But would any sane man accuse the reporter of reducing Lord Londonderry to the level of Lord Brougham? (Laughter.) Could any man be so wooden-headed as, on the ground of this accidental junction of names, to charge the reporter with attributing to Lord Londonderry all the obtuseness, all the doggedness, and all the littleness of Lord Brougham? (Lord Londonderry rises to order, amidst roars of laughter.) I will not trouble the noble Lord to guide me to a more useful topic, but will willingly proceed to comment upon some sentiments of the noble and learned Lord who has just resumed his seat, and who warned us to take care of the golden eggs—a warning much in the way of the party to which my learned friend has, for many years, been allied—a warning which certainly comes most gracefully from those lovers of golden eggs who were long employed in multiplying emoluments, and keeping them all to themselves. When the learned Lord was telling us so pathetically about the golden eggs, my thoughts instantly reverted to the prolific means of wealth once possessed by a certain party in the state—but now lost; and, alas! it would seem, lost for ever. Noble Lords opposite have a two-fold evil to deplore: the goose does not lay so freely as formerly; and, what is worse, when she does lay, they can rarely pick up an egg. (Loud laughter.) To pass to another objection: we have been warned against introducing into England the rashness and frenzy of Athenian democracy. My Lords, there may be some danger of such violence in this country. The existence of the Birmingham Union, and similar societies, has shewn it. But it surprised me that the illustrious Duke should forget that the representative system is exactly adapted to prevent such outbreaks of popular opinion. The parties to whom the bill would give the right of voting are now strongly tempted to form themselves into dangerous combinations; and what ever produces the frequent convention of vast multitudes of the most excitable classes is to be dreaded, as in the last degree perilous to the commonwealth. The very purpose of the measure now proposed is to remove all temptation to assemble, by enabling all parties to exert a direct and wholesome influence through their representatives. (Cheers.) Let not the noble Duke flatter himself that he can be above the reach of the influence of the thousands of his fellow-countrymen who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. (Loud cheers.) He has to choose whether that influence shall be exerted quietly and steadily by representation, or by such sudden and fierce outbreaks of feeling as have often shaken this country in recent times; and once at least compelled the hero of Waterloo, and the hosts marshalled under him, to retreat. (Great cheering.) But the learned Lord argues that no man has a right to a vote who has no stake in the country. I perfectly agree with him; but, my Lords, I cannot express, in terms sufficiently strong, my dislike of the mercenary estimate which knows of no stake save money. Surely there may be other interests which may render an Englishman solicitous for the welfare of his native land besides those which a forty-shilling freehold presents. Does the noble and learned Lord, who said so much of generous and chivalrous sentiments, think that the peasant has no stake in the land which gave him birth—the land in which his forefathers sleep—the land in which his children are to live and die? Has the owner of a forty-shilling freehold something to care for, and the father of ten children no interest in the peace and good government of the country? Even as a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, the plea of the learned Lord is unsound; for, surely, if two pounds per annum received as the rent of a cottage constitute a stake, five-and-twenty or thirty pounds a-year received for labour may be allowed to be a stake. But (to adopt the words of my learned friend) away with such a cold and heartless reckoning! Whatever the charities of home are worth—whatever value we should venture to assign to the love which binds the virtuous husband to the virtuous wife, and both to their offspring, where a man's home is his world—all these constitute the stake which the poor and good peasant has in his country. Cari sunt parentes, cari liberi, propinqui, familiares; sed omnes omnium caritates patria una complexu est. (Loud cheers.) The noble Duke, in arguing the question, laid much stress upon the tendency of the present measure to republicanism. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear," from the Opposition.) I will frankly give the illustrious Duke my views on the subject which, with much force, he introduced. The feeling of the People of this kingdom is decidedly and strongly loyal; and nothing can endanger the Government, as at present constituted, but the rash and needless refusal to accede to the reasonable claims of the nation. (Hear, hear.) The popular sentiment is unquestionably averse to the frequent changes and struggles of a republic, and quite in favour of the steadiness of government which an hereditary monarchy ensures. At the same time, it is not to be denied that the days have passed by when monarchs could sport at pleasure with the interests of their subjects. Wo to the king who should repeat the freaks of the Fourth George! Let the monarch act discreetly, and the throne will be more stable, and the crown brighter, than ever; but let the counsels of the noble Duke and his allies prevail, and I, for one, will decline to dispute the gloomy forebodings in which that noble Duke has indulged. The noble Lord sat down amidst cheering, which was long-continued.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH moved that the debate be adjourned, and their Lordships rose at twelve o'clock.

The Morning Chronicle.

An hour was occupied in the House of Lords last night, by some sharp skirmishing on the Church question. The debate, on the second reading of the bill for the Extension of the Suffrage followed; and was well sustained till midnight. Lord Durham's speech was statesmanlike, and eloquent. The Duke of Wellington discovered, as usual, vigorous common sense. He made the best of a bad cause. Earl Spencer was happy in his reply. Lord Lyndhurst never speaks without shewing himself an able speaker. He was last night more sophistical and less effective than usual. We never knew the learned Lord more entirely merge the legislator in the advocate. Lord Brougham, who seemed very unwell, but was evidently unable to remain silent, disposed in a few words of everything deserving the name of reasoning, which had been advanced by the Opposition. Whatever may be thought of the merits of the point of dispute, all unbiassed men must admit, that on the field of argument, the Ministerialists at present remain victors; and that their victory is complete. There is not, we believe, the slightest doubt of the success of Lord Durham's motion, though the majority will be small. We shall return to the subject.

The Standard.

The time has at length arrived when, if the Peers cannot, or will not, check the tide of innovation, the last bulwarks of the constitution must be swept away by revolutionary violence. Universal Suffrage, alias mob-rule, and the utter subversion of the Established Church—that is, of the religion of the country—are only two of the measures which our republican rulers propose to carry during the present session of Parliament. It is whispered that some of the Conservatives are preparing to yield at the present awful crisis, and thus prove recreants, when there is the greatest necessity, and the noblest opportunity, for the exercise of their piety and courage. We will not believe that their number is considerable, or their influence great. We trust to England's true aristocracy to shew themselves worthy of their exalted station, and their great names, and their very difficult, but, for that reason, very glorious position. They may yet run in between the living and the dead; and the plague will be stayed. There is still in the Upper House a sufficient number of good men and true, to out-vote the crowd of hungry officials, supported, as they are, by a herd of modern Lords who have been indecently titled (not ennobled) during the past years of Radical misgovernment, and (we are grieved to say) by a few men of birth, and wealth, and character, who might have done honour to a good cause.

The Times.

We congratulate the country on the position in which, as shewn partly by the debate of last night, the great political parties of the state are now placed. The Tories are distracted by faction. Some of their leaders would grant a moderate extension of the franchise: others would refuse the slightest change: whilst some again, are plainly disposed to exhibit the better part of valour—that is, discretion—and to yield prudently, if not graciously, what cannot be withheld. The Ministerialists are firmly compacted together. The Whig party of 1838 has disappeared. Lord John Russell is no longer the helmsman of the House of Commons. The proceedings of the Government were not determined by accident, but are the fair development of great principles.

An evening contemporary (we will not deign to name it) has charged us with double inconsistency, because of the support we give to the present administration. We laugh at this baseless charge, coming, as it does, from a journal which is positively incapable of supporting even a valid accusation. Whilst the Whigs were not Whigs, but formed a useless, and, indeed, dangerous party in the state—whilst they were halting between two opinions, being powerless for good, and mighty only for evil—we fearlessly and conscientiously denounced them. But no sooner had the Liberal party taken truth for its guide, and in good earnest adopted liberty as its motto, than we were found fighting in its ranks. We deny that The Times has been guilty of the slightest inconsistency, and we appeal confidently to our readers for the truth of this denial.

THE EMIGRANT SHIP.

'Tis the evening hour, and the sun hath given
To earth one tinge of his native heaven;
And all seems harmony and love
On the sea below and the sky above.
One stately vessel in pride is seen,
Breasting the ocean's wavelets green;
The seamen spread each fluttering sail,
To catch the breath of the evening gale;
But slowly she moves from the glitt'ring strand,
As if loath to leave so fair a land.

Heard ye the shout from the sea-girt shore,
Or the answering peal that its echoes bore—
A sound of mirth, o'er the whispering waves,
That murmuring died in the rocky caves?
It pass'd from the lip with a joyous swell,
But jarr'd on the heart like a funeral knell;
And many a tale of the heart is there,
Of love undying, of hope, and despair.

Mark ye that pale and lovely cheek,
That tearful eye, whose aspect meek
Is fix'd with a lingering look on the scene
Where the flow'ry path of her youth has been?
Her head is leant on the noble form
For whose sake she hath vow'd to brave the storm;
He has sworn to cherish her too, and well
Do the doating looks of his fondness tell
How dearly he holds that sacred vow,
How deep is his love, and his faith how true!

But who is he that, with haughty brow
And lip of scorn, hath turn'd him to view
The crowds that circle the fading shore,
The land of his home and heart no more!
Say, what hath caused that deep unrest
In so fair a brow and so young a breast?
Hath the sting of crime, that brings despair
On its barbed point, e'er enter'd there?
Oh, no!—that fearless look may tell
No stain of crime with him can dwell.

The tyrant sought, with oppression strong,
To bind him down; but he rose from the wrong,
And, because his soul might not brook command,
He is seeking a home in a freer land.

There's a grief-worn man, whose furrow'd cheek
And scatter'd snow-white hairs, all speak
Of the ravages of time and grief—
Oh! what may bring that heart relief?
An exile now from the land where first
The visions of hope on his childhood burst;
Where he lived to see those visions fly,
Like the golden beams from the western sky.
His looks are turn'd to the lone churchyard,
Now distant and dim, beneath whose sward
Sleeps every soul to his heart allied,
Save the trembling youth by his aged side,
Whose pale lips murmur this faint relief—
“Father! O father! calm, calm thy grief!”

And there is the youth whose heart beats high
With the visions that gild futurity;
And the aged man who hath seen each ray
Of hope, save the hope in death, decay;
And the eye which beameth with love is there,
And the frowning brow of dark despair;
Yet each as he turneth his eye to the shore,
And thinks of the scenes that must know him no more,
Feeleth a loneliness o'er him creep,
In leaving the land where his fathers sleep.

Oh, many a straining eye will watch
That vessel fade on her path, to catch
One last long look, till the tear-drops start,
To ease the load of a bursting heart—
Then turn away with thoughts of pain
On those whom they ne'er may meet again.
And many a sigh and many a prayer
Will be breathed to heaven for the exiles there—
And that God who biddeth the storm depart
Will hear the prayers of the fervent heart.

THE DEFENDER.—A TALE OF 1797.

BY THE O'HARA FAMILY.

UPON an evening towards the close of the summer of 1797, a gentleman, advanced in years and of a striking appearance, issued from a country town in the east of Ireland, and sauntered along the pathway that led from it by its river's edge into the open country.

For a few hours that he had been a guest, along with two younger companions, dressed in half military attire, at the principal inn of the town, he proved an object of much curiosity to the good folk of the community around him; but, as yet, all their attempts to ascertain his name, quality, or occupation in the world, were unsuccessful.

Unlike his young friends, he was habited in what is sometimes called, in Ireland at least, "plain cloths;" but, in fashion and material, they bespoke a gentleman of the time, and of the higher order of gentlemen; and his features, air, and manner, bore out this pretension. He seemed to be between sixty and seventy; his stature was tall, his step firm and noble; and his face, shewing the remains of youthful beauty, expressed a peculiar mixture of mental habits of blandness and command, urbanity and determination, condescension and self-respect.

At the very commencement of his rural excursion, he was observed to pause and look about him; turn and glance back the way he had come; turn again and gaze steadfastly along the way he was about to go. And so he continued on his saunter, stopping, and turning, and looking, again and again; his handsomely-shaped lips, sometimes in motion, as if unconsciously they gave utterance in words to thoughts connected with the objects he contemplated.

It was plain, indeed, that he enjoyed the scenery, either under the excitement of a first impression from it, or in consequence of his renewal of an old acquaintance with it, after a long separation. Even a casual observer, arguing from the earnestness and vivacity of his regards and his manner, such as we have described both, during his walk, would have declared as much; but we can draw the necessary distinction for the reader. It was indeed an old friendship that the visitor of our country town was claiming with the mute features of nature. Years—many years—more than half the term usually allotted to human life—had elapsed since the summer's evening when he last trode the little pathway over which he now wandered; and the hills, the trees, the water, the meadows, the houses, the distant mountains, everything he gazed upon, reappeared to his eye as indeed familiar objects, and yet seemingly with a kind of strangeness upon them, as to form, or size, or colour, or relative position, which rendered them unsatisfactory in the overweening pretensions of memory, and which long absence, among scenery widely different in character from them, had treacherously produced.

No events in the spectator's life of very great interest were connected with the present landscape; yet it served to call up before his mind the great changes of fortune, of feeling, and of opinion, which he had experienced during his distant and devious separation from it; and by reminding him of the simple and every-day tenor of the portion of his youth whiled away in its presence, the subsequent passages of his manhood and of his age, to the present hour, became more contrastedly important. "Ay," he would say, "when I used to lie in the shade, under that granite rock, to coquet with my pocket volume of poetry, or when I used to cross-fish for salmon with young Martin Doyle, the miller's son, on the banks of this pretty stream, little did I foresee the swelling circumstances, the exertions, and the dangers which, in other climates, among a strangely different people, were to form my future and my present character and place in the world."

His thoughts took another and a sadder turn. "Little, too, did I then calculate the changes that time has since wrought within me and upon me: the cooling-down of the fine breezy freshness of those morning-days; the stilling of the delightful pulsations of hope, in the certainty of experience—say, even of achievement and of fame; the sense of age, and its near fellowship with death; ay, and even this changed person, these furrowed features, this staid step, these sinewy hands, this snowy hair—ah, yes, I grant ye, youth is delusion, or else carelessness; but even, for that very reason, it is happier than age."

And again his reflections, as connected with the place, diverged in their nature. Though not a native of the little valley, nor even of the country which contained it, he had formed a passing intimacy, during the early part of his life alluded to, with some of its inhabitants; and upon this intimacy arose, in his kindly heart, good wishes towards them, which time, absence, and, above all, coming back to their vicinity, served but to strengthen. But circumstances had lately visited with misfortune the district inhabited by his old, humble friends, and a cloud of danger at present hung threateningly over their heads; while he had returned amongst them, a stern man, endowed with much of the power which was to direct the final workings of the storm, for their weal or their wo. And now he paused a moment to ponder the wondrous chances which take place in personal responsibility, and in an individual's relation towards his fellow-creatures: and then arose a benevolent sigh for the human misery he had witnessed upon earth, and which he was doomed still to witness—nay, perhaps instrumentally to cause; and, as one of the minor chords of memory became generously touched at the thought, he began to feel interest for the present and future fate even of some of the former lowly dwellings on the banks of the gentle river by which he walked.

Quickening his pace, he advanced up towards its source. Two or three men passed him; he looked critically into their features, but memory found in the survey nothing she could own. Still he proceeded onward, until he came in view of another man, who, with a fishing-rod in his hand, was sitting over the water under a huge fantastically-limbed ash-tree. This person seemed very intent upon his solitary sport. He was old, and not hale for his years; on the contrary, it seemed, if one might judge from his sitting position, that his tall and gaunt figure was somewhat bent and prematurely enfeebled. He wore a whitish hat, made whiter by flour-dust, which also plentifully covered his whole person, and even his face; and, in fact, it was plain to be seen that he was a miller; nay, a look up the river at the little mill, in the eddies of the broken stream from whose weir his fishing flies were floating, intimated that he was the miller of the valley.

The strange gentleman regarded him with attention, but, it would seem, not with satisfaction to his object in doing so. He stepped nearer and nearer to him, and appeared still at fault.

"It must be a new proprietor of the mill," he said to himself, "or else Martin's father, whom I have never before seen—for still I half fancy there is a kind of family likeness. Good evening, friend," he continued to the sportsman, suddenly coming close to his side.

The old man, his attention previously absorbed by his fishing-rod, and his ears thrown off their guard by the near noise of the rushing weir, and of the rippling and dancing water that ran to him from its base, had not till this moment noticed the stranger; now he started at the sudden salutation, and having glanced at the person who gave it, looked earnest and respectful, took off his white hat, and inclined his head—we had almost said politely—as, with a smile, he answered—"A kind good evening, sir." But the other observed that there was no recognition in his bow, nor in his smile, nor in his glance.

"Don't let me interrupt your sport; there ought to be some good trout-fishing about this part of the river."

"Thank you then, sir; and I will throw out again." Suiting the action to the word, he wound, with the hand of a master, his angle and fishing-line above and around his head, cleverly steering them clear of entanglement with the branches of the ash-tree, and then caused the line to fall lightly and without a curve in it upon the water. "And indeed it is a good spot to find a trout in, sir, as you say—or, to speak nearer the truth, it used to be long ago, when I was a boy; but—dickens in 'em for throats!—I believe it's gettin' bad an' scarce they are wid the times, like all the rest of the world. But look, sir, there's a fine rise at me! Is he hooked? No—bad manners to him, he's off!"

"From what you say, my friend, you and the trouts hereabout seem to be a long while acquainted."

"And so we are, sir, sure enough—all our lives long; born and bred together, your Honour."

"You live in the mill, I suppose?"

"I own the mill, your Honour—that is, little Martin and I between us; we owns it aqual-alike."

"And how is Martin—little Martin, as you call him?"

The fisher half stopped in his sport, and looked with curiosity at the speaker, as he answered—"Why, then, brave and hearty, sir; an' will your Honour let me ask you where you met Martin afore to-night, to know him or care about him?"

"Oh, no matter for that; we are old friends.—I was right," resumed the stranger, in his own mind; "this is indeed Martin's father, by the twinkle of his eye." Then he went on aloud—"Can I see him? Is he at home?"

The old man laid his rod on the bank, and, with a changed countenance, in which some alarm mingled with scrutiny, again fixed his eyes on his catechist as he hesitatingly replied—"At home, sir? an' you'd want to see him? Why, I believe—I'm almost sure—he is at home wid 'em at the hopper; only I'd make bould to be asking again, sir, who is it that wants him?"

"Oh, don't be afraid of me," said the gentleman, smiling; "I mean him no harm; let him come out from the hopper, and, when he knows who I am—which he will be sure to do at the first look—Martin will tell you so himself."

"Why, then, sir, I'm inclined to think you mean him no harm, sure enough; for, now that I look at you myself the second time, it isn't the likes of your Honour, with that smile on your face, and your Honour all alone too," he continued, glancing watchfully around, "that he or I need be afeard of. But here he comes, at any rate, to make us all sure one way or another."

A man in the undress of a miller, carrying a chubby child in his arms, with which he talked and laughed cheerily, approached them from the mill; and this "little Martin" was about thirty years of age, and about six feet two inches high, and tall, athletic, and seemingly almost riotous in his spirit of activity, for he came jumping and bounding along, over every obstacle, great or small, in his way.

"Come here, Maurtheen, you gommerat," cried his father; "here's a strange gentleman—and a gentleman he is every inch of him—that knows you well, and that you know well, and that wants to be speaking to you."

Little Martin, stopping short at a civil distance, looked more disturbed than his father had just done. "Me, father? Want to spake to me? I never saw him afore in my life then."

The stranger saw, indeed, that he had been quite mistaken in his anticipations of the identity of this individual, who, perhaps deriving all his features from his mother, bore not the slightest resemblance, except in the loftiness of his stature, to the old angler under the tree; and a new light began to break in upon the observer's mind.

"I beg your pardon," he resumed; "I certainly must have been in error. Of this little Martin of yours I have, indeed, no recollection; but let me ask you another question or two: your own name is Martin, I suppose?"

"It is, your Honour; and so was my father's afore me."

"Martin Doyle?"

"Martin Doyle, sir, an' nothing else."

"Is this possible?" asked the gentleman of himself. "Is that old man before me the real Martin Doyle I want?—the former obliging companion of my fishing sports on the banks of this little river? Well, time has dealt harder with him than with me; and yet I am not recognised by him either," he added, with by no means a pleasing argument, philosophically-minded as he was, built thereupon in his own thoughts; perhaps he had never before so fully admitted to himself that he was old. The looking-glass, with its everyday familiarity, may flatter us into a comfortable idea that, as years pass on, our features do not change much; but when we meet, after a long absence, an early associate of about our own age, and find his features changed very much, then we just begin to suspect our own liability to human accidents of the same kind.

"And maybe it's about myself, and not about my son, you'd be asking, afther all, sir?"

"Do you recollect the —th regiment, that was quartered, some time ago, in the town yonder?"

"Blood an' ages! an' sure I do, sir. Some time ago?—haith, an' it's a good long time ago; let me see, it's nigh hand to forty—forty-one—forty-two years ago, every day of it; but I remember the —th regiment for all that."

"And why do you remember it so well?"

"Because I loved and liked every man in it—common men, officers, and all; an' all in regard of the officers—five, or six, or seven of them, that used to run out from the town to the river side here, two or three at a time, an' call me from the hopper to go fishin' with them; hearty, pleasant cratures they were. An' many a summer's night they'd bespake a loand o' the kitchen fire, in the mill; an' we'd fry the throats we used to ketch together on it, and have to say that we eat 'em out o' the river, afther a manner. An' there was one or two o' the whole clan o' the officers that I liked above the rest; an' good reason I had: I fell sick o' the faver that was in the place, and it's kind friends they shewed themselves while it had me down—bad manners to it!—kind friends to me an' my poor ould mother—God bless 'em for the same, wherever they are, alive or dead, this evenin'!"

"I believe you earned the good-will of the two gentlemen you speak of by a good action of your own towards one of them?"

"Blessed hour, your Honour! how do you know that?" The old miller started up as nimbly as he could, now wholly abandoning his fishing-rod.

"I knew your old friends abroad."

"Praise be to God! Strange things 'ill always be comin' to pass in this world. Musha, sir, maybe"—He drew quite close to the stranger, peering at him in the coming twilight, as if he hoped to make a gratifying discovery; but added, with a disappointed expression of face—"Avoch, no!—your Honour is neither the one nor the other o' them. But you met 'em abroad, you say, sir? An' they spoke to you of one poor Martin Doyle, it seems? They thought of him, an' of ould, innocent times; an' of the poor little ould mill, an' the throats, an' the ould river's side, in Ireland—an' they far away? It was like them, the cratures."

"Indeed they did; and they would have been ungrateful if they had not done so—one of them, at least—the young gentleman you saved from drowning, at the risk of your own life—at almost the certainty of losing it, indeed—very near this very spot, the spring when there was such a tearing flood in the river."

"Huth, sir! that little matther is not worth spakin' about; what did I do, but what we're all bound to do for aoch other?—An' they're alive, sir, an' well an' happy, I hope, this blessed day?"

"They are alive, and well, and as happy as, I believe, the generality of their fellow-creatures."

"Musha, then, the Lord be praised! and more o' that to them; but there is one o' the two I'd be asking afther, your Honour, wid all the veins o' my heart—young Masther Ensign Abercromby—how is he?"

Before the strange gentleman could answer, little Martin, who had been listening in great interest, said, in a tone of excitement—"You're spakin' of a great man now, father; the great General Abercromby; him that the whole world is talkin' about; an' a man as good as he is great, they say; an', more than that, the very general that has come over to Ireland from England, about a month ago, to review the King's throops, an' see if they are in fit order to finish their work on the people."

"The Lord be praised, again!" ejaculated the old man; "sure it was thrue for me when I said, a while ago, that strange things id never stop happenin'; an' is what little Martin says thrue, sir?"

"I cannot vouch for the truth of the compliments he has paid to General Abercromby," answered the gentleman, smiling; "but the principal facts he has mentioned are true."

"They are, your Honour, an' what I am goin' to say is thrue, besides: the general has been reviewing the throops, in different parts o' the country; an' so bad did he find 'em, in regard o' their bein' so long let loose to murther and plunder the poor people, that he tould themselves to their faces, that they 'were in a state of discipline that made them formidable to any one but an enemy.'" And little Martin related this anecdote with increased vivacity—with a vehemence, indeed, which was not lost upon the most observant of his hearers.

“Well, Martin,” resumed this individual, addressing the father; “so far so good, as regards your own good-natured inquiries after your old friends; but they will, doubtless, be asking, in their turn, after your welfare in the world, when I happen to see them again; I want to know, therefore, all about you, for their satisfaction—how you are in health, in wealth, and in expectations.”

“Thankee kindly, sir. The health is nothin’ to brag of, praise be to God! there’s anould rhumatiz on me this many a year, an’ I had a heavy pleuracy the last spring—but we mustn’t complain. As to the other things, why, the hopper clacks merrily, praise be to God over again! an’ I’m alive to see little Martin, there, and another little Martin intirely, in his arms, growin’ fat on it; and while there’s wather in the river to keep it goin’ for them, an’ for the little girl of a wife he has—an’ a good little crature she is—never a throuble comes into my mind about the hereafter in this ugly world; that is, if the Peep-o-day-boys, and the Defandher-boys, an’ the sogers, ’ud only let us alone, your Honour, an’ lave us in pace an’ quietness.”

The son fidgeted, and seemed about to speak again, very earnestly, but checked himself.

“And no doubt they will let you alone, Martin; for I am quite sure you have had too much good sense to give any one cause to inconvenience you, in these unsettled times.”

“I’m obleeged to your Honour for your good thought—an’, deed-an’-deed, I deserve it from you, sir; never a meddle nor make can any one bring agin ould Martin Doyle, on the head of a single disturbance that’s in the counthry.”

“And you can say the same for your son?” half questioned the stranger—much doubting the fact, however; and little Martin fidgeted more and more.

“I can, your Honour—I hope and pray to God that I can; ever an’ always ’twas my word to him, and my advice, and my command, to keep clear of oath-takin’, an’ everything o’ the kind; an’ if he hasn’t hearkened to the words o’ my mouth, he’s a worse boy and a worse son than I took him for.”

“I’ll do nothing to shame you, father,” said the person spoken of, still vehemently; “an’ I hope an’ pray, like yourself, that we may be left to rest in pace; only, how can we expect to escape, in the long run, our share of what a most every other man, woman and child, in the land of Ireland, is sufferin’ or has suffered? In our own poor county alone, I could reckon four hundred cabins, an’ smuggler houses, burnt down within the last two months; there’s six smokin’ yet, on the very next lawn-land; and where are them that, last May-day, lived under their roof-threes?—I’ll tell your Honour,” continued the young “Defender,” his eyes still kindling, and his voice and manner becoming still more marked with excitement, as he clasped closer, with one aimewy arm, the urchin that nestled on his breast, and began to wave the other round his head—“I’ll tell your Honour—if your Honour will take the answer from the greatest-spoken Irishman that Ireland ever saw, insid of from my own foolish words—I’ll tell your Honour!”

Little Martin meant, indeed, Ireland’s immortal Curran; even then, in the very exercise of his oratory, well known among the humbler politicians of his country; and the young miller went on with a quotation, truly learnt by heart, from a speech recently delivered, upon an important trial in Dublin, by the orator. We subjoin the passage, without adding little Martin’s brogue to it.

“Where shall you find the wretched inhabitant of this land? You may find him perhaps in a jail, the only place of security—I had almost said of habitation; you may see him flying from the flames of his own dwelling, or you may find his bones bleaching on the green fields of his country; or he may be found tossing upon the surface of the ocean, and mingling his groans with those of tempests, less savage than his persecutors, that drift him to a returnless distance from his family and his home.”

And such truly were Curran’s words, descriptive of the social state of Ireland in this year of 1797; not—we request it to be observed—not the year of the rebellion in Ireland, and of the surpassing vengeance which it entailed upon the devoted population; but the year before that rebellion, into which visitations such as those spoken of by the orator chiefly tended to precipitate the people.

“That is all very well in its way,” quietly observed the gentleman; “and all very beautiful language, I willingly admit; but surely the people of this fine country could not be subjected to such severities, if they had not given cause to provoke them.”

His words now called forth a great flow of explanation and expostulation from the young man, and, even in his own way, from his father, to which, redundant as it was, their new friend listened with attention. He proposed questions, too, as if he would inform himself, according to their knowledge of facts, of the full subject in discussion; though, indeed, he really lacked no acquaintance with it, and put his queries solely to ascertain the extent and correctness of theirs, together with their incidental opinions and feelings. The statements they made are, however, interesting to our present reader, and we shall, therefore, condense them—again, as in the recent case of the quotation from Curran, not preserving the language of our immediate authorities.

But the rebellion about to break out, they said, no more originated with the people of Ireland, than did the American rebellion originate with the red men of the western continent. It heads were descendants of English and Scotch colonists—Church-of-England Protestants, and Presbyterians—who, as their American pretotypes had done, quarrelled with the mother country, because they wanted to rule independently over the land of their adoption. England overawed them with her disciplined troops, and then they seduced into their ranks the native population, who—to recur again to the model-contest across the Atlantic—bore, to the two parties really at issue, about the same political affinities as did the tomahawk allies of the American war to the true combatants in that struggle; so insignificant, in the eyes of their masters at every side, were then the “Catholic millions” of Ireland. Circumstances had, however, indifferently well prepared the Irish mass-goer for enlisting against the established authorities. For some time previously, a majority of the High Church colonists of Ulster had come to a resolution to banish out of their neighbourhood all aboriginal Papists; and, being more locally numerous than the objects of their aversion, and calling in to their aid fire, and sword, and all legitimate means of extermination, they were very successful in their attempts to do so; for these were the fine old “hell-or-Connaught” times. The Protestant bands voluntarily organized on the occasion, dubbed themselves Peep-o'-day Boys; and the banished Papists, spreading among their own sect, wherever they wandered through Ireland, terror and hatred of their persecutors; counter-bands of Catholics became formed, in many parts of the country, under the name of Defenders.

Government had never openly countenanced or applauded the gratuitous loyalty of the Peep-o'-day Boys; the Defenders, however, did not think that it repressed or punished them as vigorously as it could and ought to have done; and these sitting in high places, consequently, began to share some of the feelings with which the illiterate Irish Catholic regarded his enemy; and, just at this nick of time, in stepped, amongst the fermenting Defenders, William Orr, Arthur O'Connor, and their friends; and, as the Peep-o'-day Boys were Government supporters as well as Papist-haters, the Catholic people, hoping for ample and exemplary vengeance upon them during the struggle, soon became converted into United Irishmen—rebels, in fact, against English dominion in Ireland.

“An’ that’s the way we—the poor people o’ the country, I mane—were made united men,” continued the young miller; “though now it’s we alone that bears the brunt on every side; ay, an’ that are likely to be the only army General Abercromby ‘ill meet in the field.”

“Yes,” assented his father; “yes, the misfortunate spalpeens—whoever dances, it’s they must pay the piper.”

“But who is this coming up to us, now?” questioned the son, stepping back, the infant still in his arms, and looking really alarmed. Two young gentlemen, in military undress, approached our party, along the bank of the river, from the direction of the town; and, owing to the increased twilight, they had come near before they were observed—their pace was hasty, and their manner anxious. The old miller more than shared his son’s nervousness.

“Still fear nothing, Martin; these gentlemen are friends of mine, and only here to seek me. Farewell! I am authorized by your old fellow sportsmen on the river side, to take your hand.” He did so, with an air of cordial though condescending urbanity; while Martin, his eyes reverting to the new comers, received, in an embarrassed and bewildered manner, the unexpected salutation. “And farther, Martin, I have to inform you that the young Master Ensign Abercromby you spoke of awhile ago, will be in your town to-morrow, and if you inquire for him at his quarters, pleased to see you, perhaps. Now, good night.” He turned away, joined his young associates, and soon disappeared with them along the path by which they had approached, all conversing earnestly.

“Who are they at all?” resumed little Martin, his troubled eyes straining after them. “An look up there, father!—what’s that?”

About half-way between the speaker and the town, a reddish spot appeared in the darkening sky.

“That’s the sign of another house a-fire,” answered the father, in a solemn, doleful tone; “though we can’t see the flames by reason of the high grounds between us and it.”

“By the lot o’ man!” half screamed the son, smiting his thigh with his disengaged hand, “it’s the house of little Micky Glennan, our baronial sacretary; and he had all the baronial papers under his roof; an’ if they are found, we’re lost men; or if he is found, all the same; for the little tailoring *thrawneen of a orature will never bear three lashes o’ the cat-o’-nine-tails on his back without telling on the whole of us.”

“What words are them you’re saying, Martin?” asked his father, fixing his eyes upon him in misgiving and terror.

Before little Martin could make answer, a feeble and tremulous voice cautiously pronounced his name. Both startled and looked round. The call was repeated; and they could now perceive that it arose from under the bank near to the verge of which they were standing. They peered over the bank, and imperfectly discerned beneath them, standing breast-high in the current of the waters, a little slight-built man, who with difficulty supported himself in his not unperilous position, by grasping at the roots of the ash-tree before mentioned as growing in this spot.

feet under the ash-tree. The poor tailor secretary stood dripping and shivering in the very undress in which he had jumped off his shopboard—namely, stripped to his waistcoat, and shoesless and hatless—upon the first alarm of the approach of the military to his house.

"Hurry, Martin, hurry!" he now cried, taking from between his clenched teeth a bundle of papers tied round with a strip of listing. "You know what these are, an' I just had time to save 'em for your hands—hurry into the mill and burn 'em—burn 'em well, well! or the whole world is destroyed! you among all the rest! you and yours—hurry, hurry! No terrier could bring them better to you between his teeth, out of the fire first, an' out o' the wathers afther—hurry, man!—but, no—stop—there's no time for you to do it now—give them to your father there—let him make away with 'em—the sogers will be here on yourself in the turning of a hand! I see their bagnets bristlin' over the fence on the high-road above, dark as it's growin', an' they'll be down on the poor mill like a hawk on the wing! Yes, Martin, they have your name, as well as they had mine, an' the ould mill 'ill burn to-night, as sure as Mick Glennan's roof is burnin' beyant there! Hurry, ould Martin, hurry, I bid you!—my duty is done here, an' I can't stop a moment longer. No, nor your bould son oughtn't to stop, if he cares for the breath he's brathin'! To the wather, agin, wid me, for the bare life, an' for the lives of a thousand men along wid it! Follow me, little Martin, an' I'll shew you the way to a good hidin'-hole! Follow me! It's across the river to the ould wood I'm goin'—an', oh, the Lord puctect me, for my life is worth a mint o' money!"

The utterly terrified, and yet self-important little man, delivered this speech in gasping and catches of breath, and almost in a whisper, while not only his features, but his hands, legs, and feet worked in spasmy gesticulations; and he had scarce ended it, when he dropped by his hands from the bank into the water, in the very place where, assisted by Little Martin, he had made his appearance. His auditors, stunned by the nature of his communications and exhortations, had not been able to address to him a single word. Little Martin now first recovered presence of mind. He glanced up to the high road, and saw indeed the glistening of the bayonets; he glanced at the death-fraught parcel in his hand, and felt that, as the tailor had said, fire ought that instant to consume it to ashes; he glanced at his father, and perceived that he was so shaken by fright and consternation, it was impossible he could effect this object; then he ran headlong to the mill-house; gained it and disappeared into it, by a succession of bounds, such as a race-horse might make, when pushed hard near the winning-post; reappeared, and reapproached his father, at the same speed; found the old man sitting helplessly, and with a pitiable expression of face, upon the curled roots of the ash-tree; flung himself on his knees at his feet, and addressed him.

"'Tis all too thrue, father, dear—I am the ruin o' you, in your ould days! The mill will burn to-night, as little Micky said, an' I must run like a hare to save life itself from the hands that 'ill put the red fire to it. Father, can you forgive me? But the ould man has no speech for me, an' I can't stop till it comes back to him."—He eyed the high-ground over the mill, and saw the soldiers jumping upon it from the road. "Father, listen to one word; they can't touch you, you know, for you're free o' the matter. When you see Anty, tell her to come look for me to-night in the ould wood. You heard what Micky said—didn't you, father?"

"Yes, aviah, yes, yes," answered the old miller, incoherently.

"Tell Anty, then, as I bid you—and you'll come wid her—won't you, father? But don't tell her till all is over, an' the sogers gone—her grief might misguide her tongue. An' now, father dear, the good night, an' God look down on you, an' pity you—an' forgive me!"

He jumped up, took his father's hands, kissed his cheeks, gave one short look over his shoulder up the hill-side, and the next moment plunged, head foremost, from the bank into the river.

The people in Ireland sometimes give strange names to places, names which purport or pretend to describe their characteristic features, but which, in reality, do no such thing; and indeed, had we time to pause for the purpose, we might perhaps shew that such is the case in other countries also. In the present instance, at all events, the place of refuge spoken of by the little rebel secretary, as the "ould wood," was as unlike a wood as could possibly be. It was a bog, in fact; but perhaps, in the very olden times, trees had covered its surface, conferring a name which, even after their total decay or eradication, became hereditary in the neighbourhood.

It was an extensive bog, too, overspreading many acres; very little of it solid; and such spots of it as were so, connected with each other by narrow strips of miry soil, or else almost quite separated by deep holes filled with water, across which it was necessary to bound with a sure foot and an agile limb. To those acquainted with its recesses, however, and well inured to jumping, leaping, and splashing, it could be explored partially at least; and from this description, we may infer that it afforded to our present fugitives a secure temporary retreat from pursuers not as well acquainted as they were with its statistics.

It lay about four miles from the town in the neighbourhood of which Martin Doyle's mill stood, or used to stand, and was distant perhaps fifteen miles from another town, a sea-coast one, whence small ships occasionally sailed to distant parts of the world. Some hours after his last disappearance from us, we discover young Martin Doyle, and his little shivering friend, Micky Glennan, accompanied by another man, who bore a pedler's pack, crouching in the shade of a huge turf clump, upon a nearly isolated patch of almost quagmire in its centre.

They had been conversing, but they are now silent, straining their eyes over the waste around them, as if in expectation of the approach of some person whom they anxiously wished to see. It was midnight, and, although an autumn midnight, cloudy, and moonless, and starless over-head; and altogether nothing could be more cheerless and more dreary than their position. There was no running motion in the black bog-water, to give it sound and life; there was no breeze abroad to stir the tufts of rushes or of flaggers—the only vegetation of the bog—which grew at its edges, or up through its stagnant wave; upon the shelves of the low line of falling ground which embasined the desolate place, no human habitation was in view; in fact, no object of interest met the eye upon the land or in the heavens; and the only sounds which now and then broke the dull and painful silence, were the mouse-like squeak of the bat, or the angry hoot of the horned owl—each animal unseen—as it flitted or flapped by them, or a sudden splash, through its dreams, of a sleeping waterfowl, near at hand.

And here little Martin and his two companions lay still, under the clouds of the night, wearily watching, as we have said, the coming of an expected visitor. But the grey morning began to break, and no one approached them; and, half-dressed and wet out of the river, as two of the three men continued to be, and unsupplied with refreshment of any kind, chilliness and hunger aggravated the misery of their feelings as outlaws, as houseless beggars, and as victims doomed to the death. Morning almost fully shone out, indeed, before Anty Doyle, with her little boy on her back, gained her husband's side.

They did not exchange a word at meeting, but embraced many times, the child encircled by their intertwined arms—poor Anty only too eloquent in her incessant sobs and tears.

"Well, ma colleen—sure there's no use in asking—the ould mill-house hasn't a roof on it by this time?"

She could but cry on.

"Shure, I knew it, alanna; and what's the use of frettin' over it now? We're all safe, and all here together, anyhow; all but the ould man. Where is he, Anty? Why didn't he come the road with you?"

Still the poor woman was able to give only a weeping answer.

"He just staid behind to see what comfort or help he could pick up for us, an' he'll be with us in no time?—isn't that id, Anty? Musha, to be sure it is; and so, as I was saying, we'll be all together, after the whole that is come an' gone; an' you and I are young and hearty yet, Anty; an' the world is wide, achona; an'—whisper in your ear—there's luck in store for us yet; ay, and nigh hand to us. Here's a friend o' Micky Glennan's," (pointing to the third man in company,) "an' he has room enough bekoke for us all aboard a good ship, only a few miles off; an', if the ould man id only come among us at onco, we could be running off towards the sey this moment—couldn't we, Matty, ma bouchal?"

He snatched the child from her arms, and began to dandle and toss it about, singing and laughing, and even dancing to it, in an outbreak of false vivacity. "But when will he come, Anty?—did he tell you?"

"Martin, Martin," sobbed his wife, sinking down in a sitting position, and covering her face with her hands, "the ould man won't come to us."

"What's that you say, Anty? won't come to us? Is he so vexed with me entirely?"

"Martin, I mean to tell you that he can't come to us."

"Can't?—what's to hinder him? They daarn't harm a hair of his head; they daarn't lay a hand on him. He has done nothing to deserve it from 'em. Where is he? where is he, Anty? Where's my father?"

"He's in the sthrong gaol o' the town beyont, Martin."

"What's that you tell me, woman?" He stepped back slowly, put the child down as if a master-feeling had suddenly chased out of his heart all fondness for it, and then, looking deadly pale, continued in a slow, low voice—"The gaol!—how could that happen? What did they put him in the gaol for? I tell you again, he's as innocent of thrason against them as the child unborn."

"And I'll tell you how it came to pass, Martin. While the mill an' the house was burnin', an' every chair and table we had were thrun into the flames to help them, they found the ould man and me whispering together. He was afther telling me where to go and look for you then; an' they axed him about the road you took, an' he shook, and thrembled, and denied his knowledge of you, with such a wake, poor manner on him, that they easy guessed he knew well everything about you; an' so they axed him agin, threatenin' him; but he denied them still, growin' stouter and heartier this time; an', at last, they dhragged him off between 'em to the gaol; an' your ould father's bare back, Martin, is to be flogged at their thrilage, afore breakfast time this blessed mornin'—ay, Martin, an' flogged, flogged, flogged, till he gives 'em the word where to find you."

The strong young man looked utterly overwhelmed; he changed colour again and again; his forehead grew moist, and he smote his breast solemnly, as, with upturned eyes, and meaning forth the words like a sick woman, he said—"O my God! my God!—Oh, the Lord forgive me! the Lord forgive me!"

His wife and he had spoken apart from his companions; now he turned slowly away even from her, walked round the pile of turf to a side of it where he could remain unseen, leaned an arm against it, and drooped his head; wept and sobbed, but not loudly; wrung his hands; and, as his thoughts and feelings rose fully upon him, even shivered; then he knelt, prayed, took his final resolution, and, wiping the tears from his cheeks, returned to his wife, sat down by her side, drew her to his bosom, kissed her, and spoke again.

"It's now nigh band to three years since we were married, Anty?" She assented.

"An' few poor couples, I believe, far and wide, has lived happier together, during that time, ma-colleen." Her confirmation of this fact was given eagerly and fondly.

"This much I'll say of you, Anty: God never gave a better wife to man, than you have made to me—an' I'm ready to say the same words wid my dyin' breath;—an' did I make a bad husband to you?"

"What's the use in askin' me that question, Martin a-graw? Could I love you as I do, an' as you know I do, if you ever gave me reason to think such a thing?"

"But aint I givin you reason for it now, Anty?"

"How, Martin, ma-bouchalleen?"

"Aint I the cause o' your sittin here this mornin, without house or home, Anty, an' without a hope for the to-morrow in this world? An' when I'm gone from your side—an' when you are left quite alone—you an' little Matty?"

"Me an' little Matty!" she interrupted; "left alone! how? an' where ud you be goin from either of us? What do you mane, Martin Doyle? Arn't we goin to the ship, together—we three—an' this moment, if you like."

"And lave my father's bare back to be cut into the bone, Anty, as you tould me?"

"And how can you help him, Martin?"

"And on my account—to save me—me his son—his undutiful son; is it my own corra-ma-chree, Anty Doran, that gives such an advice?"

"Why, what other advice can she give you, Martin? Go to the ship, or stay away from the ship, how can you, I ask again, screen the poor ould man from their hands! 'Tis a terrible an' a sore thing to think of, an' many's the salt tear it has taken out o' my eyes, comin the road to see you here; but, over an' over I say—what can you do to hindher it?"

"Listen to me, Anty. My father is to be flogged—ould an' sickly as he is—an' the best father to me, ever since I could climb his knee, and larn the Lord's Prayer from him, that ever a son had—my father, I say, is to be flogged this morning, and flogged till he dies under their lash, maybe—because he won't tell them where to lay hands on me. Isn't that thrue, a-lan-na?"

"Well! an' is it is?"

"An' I have the knowledge of all this—isn't that thrue, too?"

"Well, Martin, well."

"An' here I am, wid that knowledge on me, an' time enough to make use of it—no more nor half an hour's good run from the barrack-yard, where they'll tie him up—and do you think now, Anty, I ought to let them tie him up, when stan'nin' straight afore 'em, an' just sayin'—'Here I am!' would save him?"

"Give yourself up, Martin!" she screamed—"give yourself up from your wife and child! O my God! Sure, well you know it isn't the thriangle alone is ready for you, but the gallows three—the black gallows, Martin!"

"Well, an' maybe I do know it, as you say, Anty."

"An' you'd go and daare it!"

"I would, Anty; I will, Anty; I must."

"Never!" she again screamed—"never, while the world is a world!"—(she clasped him tightly)—"never, Martin, unless you cut the arms out o' my body, never will I untwist them from around you, to let you from me on such an errand! Oh, our boy, Martin, our little boy! look at him!"—Forgetting, in the breath that uttered it, her threat not to release Martin, she now snatched up Matty, first springing to her feet, and held him close to his father—"Look at him, Martin, ma courneon! look at his blue eyes—your own blue eyes—an' his roses of cheeks—an' his early yellow hair—och! the good God never gave the sun to shine upon a more lovely babby! There—yes—take him and kiss him—well I knew you would!"—Martin, also standing up, caught indeed the little fellow in his arms—"An' talk of lavin' him, indeed! lavin' him on the wide world, without a father!—hush! what nonsense!" and she laughed hysterically through her tears.

"Here—take him back from me, Anty," (he held out the child to her with one hand, covering his eyes with the other,) "and take him quick—I can never do what I have to do, if I as much as look at him again. And don't be cast down, Anty; there is a good God to watch over him and you, when I am gone; and the poor ould man that I will save for ye, he will be a father to ye both, and make up for my loss; and, in a few years, little Matty himself!"

"Bad man, bad husband, and bad father, and bad Christian, toe! you can never mane what you say—you can never mane to!"

"Hushth, Anty, hushth—bad Christian I am not, I hope—in this matter at last. He is my father, Anty—the earthly giver of my life—and am I to be his murderer? Against his advice, and against his commands, I have made my own lot—and is he to screech to death, still strivin' to save me from that lot, because I am coward enough to skulk and be afeard of it? Is that what you want the world to tell our little boy, when he grows ould enough to understand it? Is—but, hurth! what rammanak I'm talkin'—spendin' the precious time here, givin' reasons for going to do what no living man, that has man's blood in his heart, could think of argufying for one instant? and so, Anty—Anty ma vourneen!"—He extended his arms.

"Martin, Martin!" (she flung herself on her knees at his feet, speaking rapidly and hoarsely,) "listen to one word from me. A rich, a blessed thought comes into my head—a blessed thought to save you both—the ould man and yourself.—Listen to me well, I say—if go you must; do this, when you are face to face with them; they know well you have secrets that they would give you your life for, if you only could 'em out plump.—Well, Martin, promise them!"

"Tarn informer, Anty?"—he drew back from her, his brows knitting—"save my own life, by swearin' away the lives of a hundred other men in a whisper?—dhyr up your tears, by earnin' the curses of a hundred poor women like yourself? No, Anty; our son shall never grow up to hear said of him a worse saying than this—"There goes the child of the man who could have made many widows, but made only one." And while the young miller spoke these words, there was an air of true, lofty dignity about him. "And come now, Anty, the last kiss for you, and for little Matty"—he raised her, and again took her in his arms.

"Oh, I'm lost! I'm lost!" shrieked the poor wife and mother.

"An' you called me bad father and bad husband, a while ago, Anty? Oh! the merciful Lord that looks down in pity upon me, this moment, knows that I am not; he knows that there never breathed a Christian creature that loved wife and child in the very veins of his heart, within, better than I do!—ay, an' you know it yourself, a-lanna, and you just said them words without thinkin'—certain sure I am that you did. Here then a-lanna—here is the last kiss entirely for yez both—an' may God look down on ye both!"—he knelt—"and be a husband and a father to the widow and the orphan!"

"No, Martin Doyle! No, no! stir from us you shan't!" She clung to his limbs as he arose. "Matty, child, stay here by me and kneel too. Let him deny our prayers together, and let him kick us away together, while we are praying up to him, if he can! O Martin, ma-bouchal, life is sweet to man!—and the ship is on the sey for us, Martin, an' waitin' for us."

"Yes, yes, Anty, and the thriangle is put up for my father, if the lash is not already on his back! Hush!—I think I hear the sound of it, an' see the marks of it on his flesh! an' the old blood that gave me life a-thraming like wather! and his screeches, they are wringing in my skull. Let me go—let me go—let me go! or— Ah, poor creature! she can't hold me. Now, and now, is the time to quit her. Here, Micky Glenan; come here with your crony." The men drew near to him. "Here, take Anty from my hand—kindly, kindly—the faint is on her, poor soul! Lay her down where she can come to herself, quiet; and, when she opens her eyes, tell her I kissed her again, afore I left her for ever; and our gorsoon too, our gorsoon too!" With streaming eyes and broken voice, he embraced, indeed, his insensible wife and his unconscious infant many times; then, before his friends could obtain a word of explanation from him, bounded like a chased stag across the bog.

Little Martin had erred in thinking that the place of his father's punishment was to be the yard of the barracks of the town, towards which he raced. In about the middle of the main street, and where it was spacious, stood the jail, surmounted by the court-house, the united buildings falling back some distance from the line of ordinary houses at either side, and allowing an open space before them. On one side of this space, upon the morning we are speaking of, stood a triangle, on the other, a gallows. A line of soldiers was drawn up before both; and within their line appeared some officers, grouped with loyal citizens of distinction; and without it, in the street, a crowd of the common people, of whom the countenances of some evinced compassion for what was going on at the triangle or at the gallows; while those of others grew pale in terror on their own account, perhaps a few among them looked on with scowls of indignation, or of longing vengeance. For, as we pause before this remarkable spot, neither the triangle nor the gallows is idle; nor, indeed, have they been so during the whole morning; for, above, in the court-house, sits an almost permanent court-martial, which can quite conveniently send off to the noose or the lash, as the case may require, without much loss of time, a convicted "Defender."

Two peasants descend together, well guarded from the court-house, the flight of steps which lead most immediately to the more important piece of mechanism erected for the fulfilment of the edicts of martial law; they had come in from the country tied on a common car about half an hour before. They stand on two ladders under the gallows. In a twinkling, the ready swinging ropes are adjusted round their necks; and, hand in hand, they direct their eyes amid the low wailings of the crowd, whose looks are fixed in the same direction, towards an open window in a house of the street immediately opposite the jail. At that open window appears a man stricken in years, wearing a portion of an ecclesiastical dress; his features seem troubled, his eyes are red; his lips move in a murmured prayer; he extends his arms towards the doomed man—at a distance, of perhaps forty yards; the rebels' eyes catch his, and their lips also move rapidly; and the next instant they are turned off the ladders. This circumstance asks a word of explanation. It was not, during this season of excitement, the etiquette always to allow rebels to be attended, in their last moments, by a clergyman of their own persuasion; an old priest endeavoured, as well as he could, to remedy the deficiency; he craved, and obtained permission of a friend to stand at a window in his house, conveniently facing the jail, as the sufferers were led forth to be hanged; they had previously got a whisper of his intention; when he extended his arms, they knew they were to join him in prayer, and they did so; and thus martial law became half-cheated of a portion of the full measure of its awarded punishment.

The bodies of the two peasants had not yet done struggling, when another man was guarded down from the court-house; but, as he was only on his way to the triangle, the gallows did not require to be cleared for his accommodation. We have lately spoken of a little tailor, upon whose endurance of the lash, with a good many lives at stake, young Martin Doyle placed a very slender reliance; and this was another little tailor, and now in precisely the same position that Micky Glennan must have held, had his Majesty's troops succeeded in catching him the previous evening. But very different were the minds and hearts of the two little men. The individual before us was known to be possessed of information which, if fully imparted, would lay bare the whole conspiracy of defenderism in the district; and, in order to argue him into confession, he had received five hundred lashes a few days before, but without effect. Upon this morning, having been again confronted with his judges, he was still contumacious; and he is now marched down from them to be tied up again; and he is tied up again; and, with scarce a loud cry, he undergoes five hundred lashes more, only praying for a drop of water, which is denied to him. We will give a sentence more to this obstinate little fellow. Strange to say, he did not die under the lash; and, what is quite as strange, having been found proof against the triangle, he was not turned over to the gallows; for we saw him alive and well, twenty years at least after the year 1797; nay, and, with a great concourse of other people, of all political parties, we attended at his funeral; and his name was and is invested with heroism among the humble classes of his native place. We subjoin it for the curious in those matters—Dooly. Had he been a citizen of an older town, old Rome, and had he thus borne to be tortured in one of the streets of old Carthage, what would classic history now say of him!

The people knew that little Dooly had been flogged a few days before—indeed, had they been ignorant of the fact, his unhealed back might now have proclaimed it—and they therefore looked on at his present punishment with feelings of great commiseration; groans and lamentations—which called forth frowning glances of reprehension from the loyal gentlemen, civil and military, standing near the triangle—often escaping them. Now and then the flogger would be commanded to desist for a moment, in order that some authorized person might reiterate to Dooly the prudent recommendation to save his back, by turning informer; and when the subborn little Defender only gave his invariable answer of—"Let me die ay—let me die ay, in the name of God;"—and when, in consequence of his pertinacity, the big-drummer's lash again descended upon his puny carcass with redoubled vigour, the cries of the spectators outside the line of soldiers, became quite too loud for the ears of loyalty. One man amongst them, in particular, aroused the angry notice of his superiors. He was taller by a head than any of his neighbours in the crowd; he had arrived hastily amongst them, running at his utmost speed; he was greatly agitated, though he seemed to make efforts to stand quietly and observantly; he was without waistcoat, coat or hat, and dripping with wet and covered with mire; and this person it was who, as Dooly silently cringed under a good blow, dared to call out—"Huth! can't ye hang the poor crature, to put him out o' pain? Ay sthring him up at once, if there's a man's heart among ye!"—upon which he was sternly commanded to stand back and hold his tongue, at the risk of being dragged from where he was, and thrust into the jail.

"Huth! huth!" laughed the offender, "ye would not let me stir out of where I am, for a hat full o' goold this mornin'; stir out of it to go backwards, I mane."

A new incident appealed to the sympathies of the lookers on. When Dooly had nearly received his day's punishment, a second candidate for the triangle was led down the court-house steps. His appearance called forth a burst of lament from the crowd; and—"God of glory!" cried the man who had before spoken, while his eyes stared, and his teeth set hard. The rebel now to be flogged was tall, old, white-haired, and stooping from feebleness. His bleared blue eyes wandered vaguely around—his white lips moved rapidly—his hands were clasped. His guards stationed him behind Dooley, at a point from which, for his edification and the King's expected advantage, he might fully observe what was in store for himself, under a certain proviso. The moment they allowed him to stand still, the old man fell on his knees, fixed his roving eyes, as it was hoped he would have done, on Dooley's back; then clasped his hands tighter, and, glancing upward for a moment, his lips moved more quickly than before.

Dooly was taken down from the triangle, and borne, fainting, between two soldiers, into the jail. A fresh big-drummer, wielding a fresh instrument of torture, approached the kneeling old man, slapped him on the shoulder, and cried, "Strip!" The official was a black, of unlovely aspect; and his own shining, sooty, muscular arms and body were bared for his proposed task.

"Yes, Doyle, strip!" repeated another official, a gentleman of the civic corps; "or else change your mind, and give the information demanded of you."

"Yis, avich, yis—yis, your Honour, yis!" answered old Martin Doyle, rising with difficulty. "Sthrip I will, by all manes; only I'd ask again what I asked above in the court-house—couldn't I see aforehand, young Masther Insign Abercromby, for the love of God?"

The gentleman who had addressed him, exchanged smiles with the friends around him, and all shrugged their shoulders; the big black initiated them, and the former spokesman resumed.

"You positively refuse, then, to declare your knowledge of where Martin Doyle, the younger, may at present be found?"

"Avoch," was the old man's reply.

"In that case, go on," said a sergeant of yeomanry, who had accompanied him down from the court-house, nodding to the black.

"Come, old chap," commanded that important individual, tearing open the buttons of the old miller's white coat.

"Here, then, in the name o' God!" said old Martin, beginning to undress.

"Stand back, there!" roared a sentinel, who confronted the crowd outside the line of the soldiers—"Stand back, or I will run my bayonet through you!"

"Huth, man alive!" cried Little Martin in reply, his voice good-naturedly toned, though, as will be seen, his actions proved none of the gentlest. "Huth, man alive! stand back yourself. I don't mane to hurt you, but I'm wantin inside, there." He kicked up the musket; wrested it with little effort from the sentinel's grasp; twirled him aside among the people; pitched it forward into the space before the jail, where it rang sharply on the pavement; pushed through the soldiers before him, with perfectly erect figure, and quiet, though prodigious strides; gained his father's side; put his arms round him; extended widely his gigantic limbs; and said, in a mild, but firm voice—"Nobody is to touch this ould man; nobody has a need to touch him; nobody has a right to touch him;—all ye want of him is to make him tell where his son is to be found, and I can tell ye without botherin him; he is to be found here—here where I stand. I am his son; I am the Martin Doyle that ye called the younger, just now; so tie me up; lash me as long as it plases ye, and hang me up afterwards; but this ould man is to go his ways in pace."

Every one looked on in astonishment and silence—that is, every one inside the soldiers; but the people in the street allowed to escape them great cries of pity and admiration; and so engaged were the feelings of all, that a burst of the music of a band, a few streets off, and the arrival, outside the military line, of a superior officer on horseback, attended by other mounted officers, remained for a short time unheeded.

"Is id you, Martin, avich?" cried old Doyle, hoarsely, gazing wildly into his son's face. "Och, an' what ill luck sent you here? Go home again, little Martin," he continued, whispering incoherently. "Go home again to your wife an' child, in the ould mill. Go home, or they'll lay hands on you here, an' hang you. Go, an' never fear me. I won't tell; an' don't be troubled about what they can do to an ould man like me. I'm no Difendher, an' so my life they can't take; an', as for anything else, why it's aasy to bear id, avich. Sure a father ought to bear something for his own son—ay, an' for that son's son again; so go home, I bid you, I lay my commands on you to go home; or even, if it 'ill be too hard for me to bear"—

"Put on your coat, father dear," interrupted little Martin, kissing the old man, while his own voice broke. "Ye will let me help him, gentlemen?" turning with a smile to the authorities around—"ay, ye will, I know. Men are men to each other, afther all. There, father, now you're fit for the road, and God speed you on it, an' do what you can to comfort poor Anty, father. An' now, gentlemen, here's my hands and arms for ye—tie them, and tie me, too, either there or there," pointing alternately to the gallows and to the triangle—"either there or there, which ever ye choose, as I said afore. I'm ready for the one or for the other."

"You must go up to the court-house first," said the person who had previously spoken; "but, stop a moment, men, as soldiers approached him, here's the general after returning from the inspection. Right about face! present arms!" he continued to the soldiers who enclosed the space before the jail, and they, obeying his orders, presented arms to the superior officer before alluded to, who still kept his horse stationary in the middle of the crowd in the street, earnestly watching from his saddle the scene between Martin Doyle and his father, while the troops which he had been inspecting in the vicinity of the town, came nearer to the court-house, their band playing loudly and gaily. As all eyes fixed on General Abercromby, many voices whispering his name, little Martin recognised the features of the stranger who had conversed with him and his father, the evening before, upon the river's side. The old miller, half aroused into a confused perception of the same kind, and, acting wildly upon it, cast himself on his knees where he stood, clasped his hands, and hoarsely shrieked—

"Mercy upon him, your Honour! Mercy upon ould Martin Doyle's only son, Masther Ensign Abercromby, my darlin'!"

The white-haired general hastily turning his moist eyes from the pair, beckoned to an officer near the triangle, who hastened to attend him; and, after some private conversation with this individual, rode away. Father and son looked as hopeless as ever, when a guard separated them, and led the latter into the jail. He was never led up to the court-house, however. In a few minutes afterwards, a servant in a rich livery came through the crowd to the old man, and, after whispering him to an effect that brought the light-of-joy tears into his old eyes, conducted him away from the triangle.

"I have often been obliged to curb my private feelings, Martin," said Abercromby to him, when, almost immediately upon this, he and his old fellow cross-fisher spoke together in a private room at the General's quarters, "but, perhaps, never with so much pain to myself as a while ago when I could not shake hands with you at once, down there at the jail; now, however, be of good cheer. I cannot, indeed, in these disturbed times, get Little Martin back again for you all at once; but they shall not hang him outright; and something he does deserve to suffer."

In less than two years after this day, there was a new mill built on the river's side; and, on a fine evening, old Martin might be seen fishing, as earnestly as ever, under the old ash tree; while little Matty prattled to him; little Martin sang merrily within at the hopper; and Anty was getting supper ready for the whole family.

WILD SPORTS OF THE FAR WEST ;

OR, A FEW WEEKS' ADVENTURES AMONG THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY'S FUR TRADERS, IN THE AUTUMN OF 1836.

I HAD been residing for several years on a farm in the neighbourhood of Montreal, and had frequently received pressing invitations from my cousin Charles, who crossed the Atlantic with me, to visit and enjoy, for a few months, the field sports so amply supplied in his vicinity. He had obtained an appointment under the Hudson's Bay Company, as manager of their fur-trading station at Hunter's Island, in the north-west territory of Upper Canada.

There were many causes to prevent my compliance with his request, although, to me, the temptation was very great. The chief obstacle was the distance which separated us; it being nearly a thousand miles.

Early in the summer of 1836, I made up my mind to visit Toronto and Niagara; so, having left my farm in good hands, I, on the 3d July, went to Montreal, intending to remain there with a friend for a fortnight. While in Montreal, I received a letter from Charles, to inform me that he was on his way to Goderich, where he would be glad to meet me, and hoped I might be tempted to return with him. Here was an opportunity which might never again occur; I, therefore, after some deliberation, determined to take due advantage of it; and, having added my guncase to my stock of luggage, which, for convenience sake, was very small, I started, by the usual route, for Toronto, and from thence to Niagara. I met with so much kindness and attention on the way, that, after staying two days at Niagara, I only reached Goderich on the 25th. Charles had arrived some days before me, and, having transacted his business, was making preparations to be off again.

Next day, we got on board one of the company's trading packets, and sailed across Lake Huron to Mackinaw, where we found several Indian and half-bred hunters and trappers awaiting us, with a small schooner, in which we were to sail along the southern coast of Lake Superior, visiting the fur-trading stations situated within forty miles of the lake.

We left Mackinaw on the 3d of August, after having visited the falls of St Mary and other objects worthy of notice in its vicinity. On the morning of the 6th, we anchored off the mouth of the St John River, and proceeded in the ship's boat about twenty miles up the river to Fort St John. Here we were warmly welcomed by Mr R——, the superintendent, and his coadjutors. The establishment presented a scene of the utmost confusion, from the arrival of above three hundred Chippewa Indians, who had brought an immense quantity of racoon, beaver, and squirrel skins, with a few bear and bison hides, which they were eagerly bartering for guns, knives, whisky, bells, trinkets, &c. &c. They had also some very beautiful wild horses, of which I got my choice for a knife and two bottles of rum.

I chose a beautiful cream-coloured mare, which had been in captivity about two months, and was already perfectly quiet and pleasant to ride. Charles was presented with one equally good by an Indian, to whom he had rendered some trifling service a year or two before.

The day after we arrived, I went out with one of the clerks to shoot in the woods. We saw several deer, but they were too shy to allow us to get within shot-range. We returned to the fort just before dark, well laden with pigeons, orioles, and a few grey squirrels. While returning from the woods, we heard the dismal howling of wolves in every direction around us; only one, however, was foolhardy enough to come within view; and he was rewarded for his temerity by a round of shot, which apparently only hastened his retreat.

My companion informed me, that the wolves were frequently seen in packs, of from two or three to ten hundred, in the neighbourhood of the fur factory, to which they were attracted by the smell of the skins. They had several times, during the last Winter and Spring, attacked the factory, and had carried off upwards of twenty horses, but the skins of the wolves killed on these occasions amply compensated for the loss.

The wolves are not considered as dangerous neighbours except in winter, when the frost and snow have driven the deer and buffaloes far to the south. Then it is not considered safe to fall in with them; hunger renders them furious, and they will attack man or beast that crosses their path; they even, it is said, devour the weaker members of their own species.

In the evening, while assembled round a blazing pine fire, which the damp situation of the fort and factory made necessary even at this warm period of the year, an Indian trapper entered, and informed us, that, while in the forest during the day, he had observed many fresh traces of bears near a spot about four miles from the fort, where five bears had at various times previously been shot. He imagined, from the trails, that there was a she bear with cubs. Now, thought I, we'll have a bear hunt. I was right. Mr R—— directed the Indian to be in readiness to guide us to the spot early on the following morning, and set about making preparations for being absent a whole day.

Next day, Mr R——, Charles, and myself, mounted our horses, with our guns slung by our sides, and proceeded through the clearing towards the forest, preceded by our Indian guide, and accompanied by two half-caste hunters, carrying hatchets, and taking charge of five powerful dogs, of a breed very similar to the old English hound, which were chained together, to prevent their leaving us on the trails of deer or wolves.

We rode on through the forest, in a different direction from that in which I had been the previous day. The trees were so close and large that the genial rays of the sun had evidently not reached the ground for centuries. Mr R—— informed me that the bed of leaves on which we were riding, was, on an average, five feet deep, and that the soil was of better quality here than in any part of America he had visited. The leaves, besides greatly benefiting the soil by decomposition, absorbed a great deal of the superabundant moisture, and prevented the ground from being so swampy as it was in other places; to avoid which we had often to take a very circuitous route.

After riding for about an hour, during which we had more leaps over fallen trees, roots, &c., than fall to the share of many English fox-hunters during a day's hunt, the dogs began to prick up their ears, whine anxiously, and make many efforts to free themselves. Mr R—— requested me to observe the Indian. He was a few yards in advance, kneeling down, with his ear placed close to the ground. He looked round to us, and held up two fingers. "There are two," said Charles, evidently much gratified. He and I dismounted and knelt down beside the Indian. I heard (or fancied I heard) a low indistinct murmur, repeated every few seconds. Mr R—— now ordered the dogs to be set at liberty, and directed me to have my gun in readiness. The dogs, when loose, snuffed about for a few seconds, and then, as if they had made sure of their object, bounded off into the woods. We followed as fast as the swampy nature of the ground would permit. We had not, however, proceeded many yards, when we heard the loud and deep bay of the hounds, as they got a view of the objects of their pursuit. We got to a less dense part of the forest, and put our horses to the gallop. Charles' eagerness predominated over his natural politeness, and he was soon a long way before us. As I was not much accustomed to riding slapdash among trees, stumps, roots, and brushwood, I was soon obliged to pull up; on observing which, Mr R—— kindly did the same, and we proceeded more leisurely, till we heard Charles' view-halloo, followed by the report of his rifle, when we once more broke into a gallop.

We soon got within sight of him. He had dismounted, tied his horse to a tree, and was standing with one of the dogs, at the foot of a tall, thick, fir tree. We also dismounted, tied our horses, and went up to him.

"There is a monstrous brute up there," exclaimed Charles, pointing upwards, "as large as an ox. He was coming down to punish the dog for disturbing his slumbers, when I got a glimpse of his corpus, and sent a ball after him; upon which he turned tail and trotted up the tree again. I don't think I hit him, however, as my horse started as I drew the trigger; but we must not be long in ousting him," said he; "as I hear the hounds telling us there is more game to be had."

We fired a few random shots into the tree; but, with the exception of a solitary growl, no notice was taken of us by its inhabitant; so we agreed to wait till the trappers, attracted by the report of our guns, should come up. In the meantime, I expressed my hope to Mr R—— that we should not, by remaining to finish the existence of our quarry above, lose what the dogs were so eagerly pursuing.

"No fear of that, sir," replied he; "when the bears are tired of running, they'll climb into the thickest tree they can see, and I do not think we shall have far to follow them, as they, when hunted, do not often run in a straightforward course, but generally endeavour to return to the place whence they were started."

At this moment the Indian came up to us, and corroborated Mr R——'s statement, by informing us that a bear, with a cub in her mouth, had shuffled past him, followed by the four hounds; and that they were making their way towards the factory.

The trappers then came up, carrying a dead cub, which had evidently been worried by the dogs. They had hatchets with them, and commenced to fell the tree immediately. We stood back as soon as it began to totter, and then we saw Bruin in the act of descending, tail foremost.

"Give it him in the breast," said Mr R——, as I levelled my piece. "Ah, I see you have broken his left fore leg."

On receiving this small token of my regard, the bear paused, and, with an angry growl, ensconced himself in the heart of the foliage, without doubt fancying himself hidden; but a ball from Charles' rifle put an end to his delusion, and down he came headlong to the ground, the large, heavy drops of hot blood pattering in all directions.

We fell back for a moment, supposing he was done for; but, though severely wounded, he was still a powerful and dangerous adversary; for, when the dog, who had been anxiously watching his descent, flew upon him, he rose with a hideous yell, and dashing the dog to the ground, rushed towards me—I happening to be nearest him. My presence of mind totally forsook me; and, in another second, I was scouring through the wood at a tremendous pace, imagining every branch I trod upon, as it fell back to its place, and every echo of my own footsteps, were those of the grisly monster in pursuit of me. I had not gone far, however, before I heard two reports in quick succession, when I ventured to look over my shoulder, and, seeing nothing, began to retrace my steps; and found the party assembled over the remains of my enemy.

We measured him, found his length to be nearly nine feet from the tip of the nose to the insertion of the tail, and girth eleven feet. We then left the two trappers engaged in skinning him, and, mounting our horses, proceeded at a brisk rate through the forest, followed by the Indian, who easily kept pace with us, as we had to avoid all the most swampy places, which would not bear the weight of a horse and rider, though they bore that of the Indian on foot.

On the way, Mr R—— informed me, that, after following me for a few yards, the bear turned on him, and was immediately shot dead; and that, had they been apprehensive of any danger to me, they would have shot it at once; but that, from its loss of blood and broken limb, they saw it could not take many steps.

With this explanation I was quite satisfied, being rather ashamed of my precipitate flight.

Mr R—— also gave me directions how to act if I should again be in a similar position. "Stand firm," said he; "ten to one, if you do so, Bruin will turn on some one else. If you run, he is sure, if not prevented by a shot, or enfeebled by loss of blood, to run after you; and your chance of escape is but small, for Bruin enters into the spirit of the chase, much more than your nervous agitation will allow you to do, and will dodge you round the trees with the greatest coolness imaginable; then, if you manage to get the start of him for sufficient time to allow you to climb a tree, it would astonish you with what celerity the animal would drag his clumsy carcass up the tree after you, whetting his teeth and growling with perfect indifference as to your feelings on the occasion—then you must make up your mind for a fatal embrace, or risk a leap on to some other tree, or let yourself down by one of the thinner branches to the ground."

Here the unequal nature of the ground we were riding on put an end to the conversation; but I promised to observe his instructions.

After riding on for about three quarters of an hour in the direction of the factory, wondering we had not seen or heard anything of the dogs, we heard the Indian, who was considerably in advance, shouting; we answered his call, and then pushed on till we got up to him; he was standing by one of the dogs, which, though alive, was so dreadfully torn, that Mr R—— put it out of pain by shooting it on the spot. On going a little farther, another dog, one of Mr R——'s especial favourites, was found dead, but still quite warm. Mr R—— said, there must have been some desperate hot work here, and wondered we had not heard it.

We called loudly on the other dogs, but they did not appear, though we thought we heard a faint bark in the distance. We rode on, and were soon gratified by seeing the dog which had been stunned by the bear's paw, and which Mr R—— had committed to the care of the trapper, come bounding up to us, completely recovered from the effects of the blow. It seemed to be quite aware of our ignorance of the position of the object of our pursuit, and immediately began to lead the way, by keeping steadily on a few yards in advance of us.

When we had gone on for some time in this way, the dog, which had increased its distance from us considerably, suddenly stopped, looked back at us, and then looked forward, as if it wished to point to some object it saw or heard. At this moment, the Indian shouted to Mr R——; we heard a loud cracking of the branches; and, in another instant, an enormous bear dashed along within a few yards of us. We all three fired at once, but apparently without effect, as he only growled, and hastened his retreat.

We were going to follow it, when Mr R—— reminded us that the one we were in chase of was a female with cubs, while the one which had just passed was evidently a male, and was, moreover, probably just started, as he appeared quite fresh, and might run several miles before he stopped. We therefore again put ourselves under the guidance of the dog, who seemed impatient to be off, and in a short time reached the edge of an open part of the forest, occasioned by Indians setting fire to the trees which sometimes burn for miles.

Here we found another dead cub, evidently killed a few moments before; and, immediately after, the dog, after pricking up his ears for a few seconds, ran across the open space, disappeared in the forest on the other side, and immediately a chorus of yells broke on our ears. We galloped across; and, as soon as we reached the wood, saw the three dogs lying panting at the entrance of a hole or den among a heap of logs and roots, which a thick covering of leaves made to resemble a natural hillock.

We could hear a low growl every now and then emanating from the inhabitant; and, as each growl reached the ears of the dogs, they gave vent to a new yell of delight; but we could not induce them to enter the hole. We remained at the entrance of the den, each of us alternately gathering dry sticks and leaves, while the others were prepared to fire, should the animal attempt to escape, until the Indian came up, and assisted in stuffing combustibles into the den, and in setting the whole on fire. In this we had to use much caution, as, from the quantity of combustible matter near at hand and the dry state of the trees, they were very apt to take fire, and when once kindled, there is no putting it out; and many instances are recorded of the woods burning for several weeks together, to the extent of from twenty to fifty square miles, and even more, though even this extent is almost incredible.

When Bruin found the heat and smoke insufferable, she gave utterance to a tremendous growl, and bolted out, overturning Mr R—— and myself, who were close by, not expecting her appearance so soon, and rushing past the dogs, who missed their catch of her as she passed. She seemed for a moment to meditate whether she should resent a severe blow which the Indian bestowed upon her as she passed him, or make the best of her way to the woods. She would probably have adopted the latter course, had not a ball from Charles at this moment put an end to her running powers. As she fell, the dogs flew on her, and a bloody combat began; which we put an end to, by calling off the dogs, and sending some half dozen balls through her head.

Having carefully extinguished the fire, we examined the den, which bore evident proofs of having contained two or more cubs. The old ones had probably been apprehensive of their retreat having been discovered, and were, when we met with them, in the act of conveying their young to a place of greater safety.

We now partook of some refreshment, and, finding that one of the dogs had been roughly handled, Mr R—— took it up beside him, leaving the others to follow leisurely with the Indian.

Charles again left us to ourselves; but, on the way to the factory, we heard the report of a rifle in the distance, and, soon after, he came came up to tell us that he had shot a moose deer.

On arriving at the factory, Mr R—— despatched several half-breeds to bring home our game, of which Charles' elk was no inconsiderable part. I had never seen an old specimen of this animal of the deer species before, and certainly had no conception of the enormous bulk.

Nothing else worthy of remark occurred during our stay at St John's Factory, except that, on the following day, I went out in a boat to fish on the river, caught several dozen trout and white fish, the name of which I forget. I also saw a deserted beaver village, built on a dam, across a stream, running into the St John River.

On the 12th August, we left the factory, as we arrived at it, in a boat, for the mouth of the river. We reached the lake in about three hours, and, re-embarking, sailed in the schooner towards the factory in Keewaiwona Bay, about seventy miles west of the St John River.

We anchored in Keewaiwona Bay, on the evening of the 13th. The factory is situate near the junction of the river Keewaiwona with the lake.

Charles requested me not to go ashore, as he wished to remain here merely long enough to accomplish his business. We weighed anchor on the morning of the 15th, and proceeded, sailing within a few miles of the shore, towards the factory on Madeline Island; the last station at which Charles had to call, before crossing the lake to his own charge.

We did not arrive here till the 21st, having got aground several times on the way, by keeping too close ashore.

When we anchored, Charles went ashore and found that Mr C——, the superintendent, had gone to a new station which was forming on the Fish River, about forty miles from Madeline Factory. We sailed for the Fish River, and anchored near the mouth; we then proceeded along the banks of the river on horseback; accompanied by two trappers as guides. We had about fifteen miles of prairie ground to cross.

In doing so, we saw an immense herd of buffaloes, blackening the plain for miles. As we were so small a party, we considered it unadvisable to molest them.

We also saw about a dozen wild horses, beautiful animals. We rode within a quarter of a mile of them; our horses, which, a few months before, had been in the same free state, taking but little notice of their old friends.

They neighed several times; and their wild namesakes returned the compliment; but they evinced no desire to run off to their old companions.

We arrived at the factory just as evening was setting in, and, being very wearied by our long ride, were merely introduced by Mr C—— to his wife and two daughters, who set before us a comfortable repast, before we retired for the night.

We were awakened early next morning, by the clanging sound of the axe and the crash of falling trees. On getting up, we found every one had been up for some time before we made our appearance, and that our late fatigue had made us sleep for some hours after the noise began. When we went out to see what was going on, we found Mr C—— giving directions to several lumberers, who, in their turn, were directing several hundred red-skins, who were busily engaged chopping the branches off the trees with which the ground was covered.

Altogether, the scene was of a most animating description.

Finding that Mr C—— would not be at leisure for some time, Charles and I each got an axe, and proceeded to try our felling skill on a tall spruce; we worked hard for nearly an hour before it began to totter, and just as it fell with a thundering crash, Mr C—— came up to us, and we went with him to see "logging in perfection," as he called it. I was well acquainted with logging on a small scale, having had above an hundred acres logged within the last two years; but I certainly never saw such logging as was to be witnessed on this occasion.

There were, as Mr C—— informed us, upwards of seven hundred Sioux Indians, divided into three parties, each under the direction of four lumberers. One party felled the trees and chopped off the branches; another rolled the trunks, by means of levers, to the third party, who notched the ends, and piled them up in their places by means of levers and fixed cranes. The noise occasioned by the crash of the trees and the shouts of the Indians, was tremendous. Mr C—— then informed my cousin that he had leisure to attend to the business he had come on, and recommended me to take my gun and go out into the woods, while Charles and he were busy, as I would certainly meet with good sport.

I set out, accompanied by an Indian and two dogs—a species of terrier, trained and much used to find and tree racoons.

Racoons are animals of the bear genus, but much smaller and more elegantly formed; the fur is valued next to beaver.

It was a striking contrast to enter the deep impenetrable gloom of the cool damp wood, after being exposed to the full heat and glare of the sun, now for the first time reaching the soil of the cleared space. In the forests of North America, the tall, thick trunks of the ancient trees stand so closely together, that their branches cannot assume a natural position, but are, as it were—to use a carpenter's expression—dovetailed into one another. The branches are, however, almost entirely confined to the top of the tree, so that the traveller is but little incommoded by them, as he walks or rides through the forest, though he is very much annoyed by the quantity of brushwood which entangles his path. Brushwood is the term intended to designate not only fallen branches, &c., but also the numerous shoots which spring up from the roots of the trees. Occasionally a few straggling rays of light or sunshine may illuminate the sable gloom. This is generally occasioned by some tall tree which has elevated its proud head above the level of its less aspiring neighbours, and, in one of those furious hurricanes but too common in the western territories of North America, has been blown over, perhaps overturning several others in its fall; or, as is often the case, has been torn from its hold of the ground, and, suspended by its thick branches resting on the summits of the surrounding trees. When any clear space is produced by an accident of this kind, a year or two is sufficient to remove all marks of it, as the branches stretch out and soon fill up the space, and the ground below becomes as dark and cold and damp as before.

I enjoyed myself exceedingly in this excursion. Pigeons and squirrels were plentiful, and I bagged some dozen of the former, which are considered good eating, and a few of the latter, the skins of which are valuable. I treed two racoons; the first was easily brought down, by a ball, from its perch; the other must have escaped, by leaping from one tree to another, as we completely lost it.

On my return to the factory, I found Mr C——'s family engaged, and assisted them in distributing to the Indians an ample meal of oat-bread, and an allowance of the Indians' favourite—malt-whisky.

Having finished this employment, Miss C—— requested me to accompany her to the kitchen, to view the preparation for the supper of the red-skins. I willingly assented, and found the kitchen to be a cleared space about an acre in extent, situated some hundred yards behind the factory. In the centre were two trees, which had been allowed to remain standing about thirty feet from each other; between them was a pile of red ashes, smouldering away without smoke or flame, and over this out-door furnace were suspended, by a chain fastened to the charred trunks of the trees, the huge carcass of a bison, with those of three deer, shot some days before in the neighbourhood of the factory. Several Indians were watching and turning the weighty carcasses with long poles. On one side were ranged, side by side, many split trunks of trees, with the flat side uppermost, to serve as tables, as the red-skins, though not particular as to having knives, forks, or plates, always like to eat their food off an elevated surface; so, at least, said my fair conductress, as we returned to the factory; on our arrival in which, we were immediately summoned to dinner. I was glad to hear of dinner, my appetite having been considerably sharpened by the smell of the cooking I had witnessed; and, finding that the bison's hump, a haunch of venison, and my pigeons, formed the chief part of the entertainment, I was most anxious to commence operations.

Bison's humps are often to be met with in Montreal or elsewhere, salted or smoke-dried. I had never tasted a fresh one, and consequently never before tasted anything so rich and juicy. What would not some of our London aldermen give for one alic and another! Having finished dinner, we commenced to brew some of the best half-and-half I ever had the luck to taste. Mr C—— distilled for himself, and his spirit was many degrees over proof. We used maple-sugar, which has to my taste a remarkably fine flavour, though Charles declared it sickening.

Our conversation turned upon the Indians employed by Mr C——. I expressed my surprise at their being so industrious and willing to assist in the formation of a factory on their own territory. Mr C—— explained the advantages which the Indians derived from the establishment of a fur-station amongst them.

"I had only," said he, "to make known the request of the Honourable Company to the Sioux chief, backing it with a present of a double-gun, a quantity of ammunition, &c., and promise to all the Indians engaged an ample supply of the necessary food, including an allowance of spirits during the progress of the work, and some trifling reward on dismissal, when all the able-bodied men of the tribe, except a few who were left to guard their wigwams and squaws, arrived, accompanied by their chief and his two sons, who remained with us for a couple of days, and then left us, on a hunting excursion, from which they will not return during your stay."

Charles and I then informed Mr C—— of our having met with the herd of buffaloes on our way to the factory, when, much to our gratification, he proposed to form a hunting party for the following day, and requested us to accompany him to the stable and kennel, previous to his giving orders to the trappers, who were to be employed on the occasion. Those buildings had been the first erected, and were of the same materials with the other erections—log-walls and shingle-roofs. The factory was thatched. The stables contained nearly an hundred stalls. At present, however, scarcely half of them were occupied. Among the rest were our own cattle, certainly not the least handsome. Horses, as I have mentioned before, are easily caught and broken in—consequently they are to be had for a mere trifling and their keep is not expensive, as corn is cheap, and the Indians bring quantities of dried grass from the prairie ground; besides which, the horses are remarkably fond of the leaves and tender shoots of many of the forest trees, and are often knees haltered—a bell tied to their neck—and then turned into the woods to shift for themselves.

The dogs were almost all out; but I had already had an opportunity of seeing most of them. They are of the same breed with those used at the St John station; and, indeed, the same breed, rather differently crossed, is employed by the trappers at almost all the fur-stations. They are tall, noble-looking animals—their body and head are much like the bloodhound's—their limbs are similarly formed with those of the greyhound, but are much more muscular. The ears are naturally long and pendent; but are always cut close to the head, to save their being torn in their encounters with bears and wolves. Their hair is long and coarse, and generally of a black, and tan or brindled colour. They bound along with great fleetness, and are valued for their keen scent, perseverance in the chase, and for the courage and tenaciousness with which they fasten on the object of their pursuit, never willingly quitting their hold till death relieves them of their charge.

There is also a small breed of dogs which I have mentioned before—they resemble our Skye terriers. They are trained to trace racoons, squirrels, wild turkeys, grouse, partridges, &c., to the trees in which they conceal themselves; the dog never leaves the foot of the tree, till all the game in it are shot or have left it; he then proceeds to find any game which may have been wounded, or follows a new trace.

Mr C—— soon made arrangements for our next day's hunt. About a dozen trappers were ordered to set out before daybreak on horseback with led horses, and with the hounds in leash, for the edge of the prairie, distant about twelve miles. Here they were to remain quiet, avoiding exposing themselves to the view of the wild horses or buffaloes. A party of Indians were to disperse in different directions, keeping in the forest, but ready to advance in small parties to the edge of the prairie as soon as the hunt began, for the purpose of distracting the attention of the herd from our movements, and of preventing their retreat into the woods. We were to follow to the rendezvous soon after daybreak, accompanied by several half breeds on horseback; and, after breakfasting, were to mount fresh horses for the hunt, leaving those we rode out on to the care of some of the Indians till our sport was over, when we would return on them.

These preliminaries being settled, we returned to the house, and soon after retired for the night. I was very tired with my day's excursion, and would willingly have gone to sleep at once; but my imagination was too busy, depicting the sport of the following day, to allow me to do so till far on in the night. And I had not been asleep long, before I was without ceremony pulled out of bed by Charles, who told me that Mr C—— was ready and impatient to set off. Having made my appearance, we partook of a slight refreshment, and then, having packed up a quantity of provisions of various kinds, with plenty of ammunition, and given them and our guns to the care of some twenty Indians and half-breeds who accompanied us, we mounted and set off. Our own horses had been sent on about three hours before, so as to be quite fresh; by the time we began the hunt, we formed a pretty large party; and, as we trotted leisurely through the gloomy labyrinths of the forest, the occasional neighing of the horses, the crackling of the decayed branches under their feet, and even the sounds of our voices, were redoubled in every direction by the tall columns around us. These sounds—frequently accompanied by the distant howl of a hungry wolf, as he sullenly dragged his gaunt form back to his den—probably having been unsuccessful in his search for prey during the night—or the more cheerful sound of the wild turkey or grouse cock calling to his mate, or the merry tap-tap of the wood-peckers, the cooing of the woodpigeons, or the chirping of numerous small birds—enlivened the still obscure scene.

On the way I received many instructions as to how I must conduct myself during the hunt, I being quite a novice so far as regarded buffalo hunting. Mr C—— related many anecdotes of the escapes he and his fellow-hunters had had from enraged or wounded bison bulls. On one occasion, he and three companions went out for a hunt. It was early in July—the season when the bulls are in heat, and consequently very furious. They rode boldly among the herd, and, selecting a fat cow, with a calf by her side, all fired together, and brought her down. "The herd," said he, "had not seemed to take much notice of our party; but, as soon as we fired, they floundered off in all directions. We dismounted, and, having hobbled the calf, which affectionately remained to witness its mother's decease, we proceeded to bleed and dissect the cow. While thus engaged, I observed a buffalo disengaged from the herd approaching us. On calling my companion's attention to the circumstance, one of them insisted on going to meet, and have a shot at it. We expostulated with him, pointed out the danger of attacking, single-handed, an animal, which, from its manner of approach, seemed to have no amicable intentions; but he would have his way, and we contented ourselves with reloading our rifles and preparing to follow him. We were on the side of a small elevation and therefore could only see one side of the prairie, and it was on the other side that our friend and the buffalo were. While mounting our horses, we heard a shot, and immediately after a loud cheer. We proceeded up the slope at a canter, but had not gone a dozen yards, when we heard the peculiar thundering noise which heavy feet make upon the prairie. Just as we reached the top, a fearful sight presented itself: our friend the hunter galloped furiously past about an hundred yards distant from us. We could hear the loud panting of the horse, and see the flakes of foam dropping from its mouth, as, with convulsive energy, it bounded along. About twenty yards behind him was the buffalo—apparently an enormous bull, bellowing with rage, and tearing up the ground with his horns, as he madly rushed on after our poor friend, lately the hunter, but now the hunted. Not a moment was to be lost; we galloped on, keeping at a wary distance on one side, and ready to fire the moment we got within shot. One of the hunters, a half brother to our apparently devoted comrade Pierre, kept up within two hundred yards of the buffalo; the other hunter and I, finding the distance increasing rather than otherwise, began to despair of getting up in time for a rescue, when suddenly Pierre changed his course, and made off nearly at right angles to his former direction, thus getting the start of the buffalo, and giving us the opportunity to ride across to meet him. We spurred on our horses, and in a few minutes were considerably in advance of Pierre and his pursuer; we each took our station at a few yards' distance on either side of the course, and raised our rifles ready to fire. In another moment, Pierre dashed by between us. We both fired at the maddened animal behind him. Whether wounded by my ball or not, I do not know, but in an instant it rushed on me. My eyes began to darken, I felt a severe pain, and then became unconscious of what passed, until I was recovered by the usual remedies of brandy and cold water, and then found that my left arm and three ribs were broken. I had been lifted off my horse on the bison's horns and pitched up in the air. My poor horse was gored terribly; it died on our return. Pierre's brother, on coming up, fired at the monster, on which it left us and trotted off to the herd, probably mortally wounded; but we were in no condition to pursue it. Pierre never stopped his furious career till far within the shades of the forest. When his half brother got up to him, he found that extreme terror had deprived him of speech. He, however, recovered his speech before night, and informed us of the circumstances. He had fired at the animal; it tottered and fell, which was the occasion of the cheer we heard; he then trotted up to it, reloading as he went on, when, in the twinkling of an eye, the buffalo was on his legs, Pierre threw down his rifle, and the chase began. I, concluded Mr C——, was assisted home, and was confined to bed for several weeks after; however, both Pierre and I have shot many buffaloes since then."

The foregoing is a specimen of the anecdotes narrated on our way to the prairie. The circumstances were very various, but the moral of all seemed to be this, that a wounded bison, especially a bull, was a dangerous antagonist, and I determined to be cautious during the day's sport. I was horribly annoyed by mosquitoes as we drew near the prairie, more so than I have ever been since the first summer or two after I arrived in America, and I had forgotten my usual remedy—viz., a few cigars; they made me scratch my face so that Mr C—— declared I looked like an Indian warrior returning in triumph from a victory, with his face adorned with stripes of the blood of his enemies.

As we drew near the prairie, we could hear the distant bellowing of the buffaloes; and wherever there was an opening among the trees, we could see them, like dark spots, in every direction on the plain. On reaching the appointed rendezvous, we breakfasted, and then, having ascertained that the Indians were either on their way to, or at their proper places, we each stuck a pair of long pistols into our belts, and, accompanied by one-and-twenty hunters, mounted the fresh horses, and with the hounds coupled, proceeded, two and two, towards the herds. When within half a mile of them, they began to move off slowly, every now and then looking round and bellowing. Charles called to me to observe the use and training of the dogs, which were at this moment slipped. They bounded off towards the nearest herd, and now the sport began. The hounds were trained to hunt in couples. These ran together, and, singling out a buffalo, kept leaping round and before it, snapping at it when it attempted to run, and dexterously avoiding the furious rushes it made at them, and distracting its attention, until the hunters came up and shot it. Several were soon killed in this way, and many more would have been, had not our attention been at this time attracted by the yelling of some of the hounds at a distance, and the shouting of the hunters. We found that some of the dogs had set on to an old bull, which proved rather more difficult to deal with than those already shot. He had tossed two of the hounds, and was now making off at full speed, with all the others at his heels, treading on some, and tossing the more forward of the others high in the air. Seeing the danger of the hounds, we rode off after him; but, before we got up to him, one of the hounds seized the opportunity when the bison put down his head for a gore, ran between his legs, and laid hold of him by the under lip. In a moment, his flight was stopped, and, before he could rid himself from his dependent enemy, we shot him dead by several balls through the brain.

We now saw the herd of buffaloes approaching, having been turned by the Indians sent to cut off their retreat. They rushed down a deep gully, the former bed of some tributary of the Fish River, while our whole party galloped off to meet them at the other extremity. We got there first, and, ranging ourselves in two lines on either side of the deep gully, presented our guns, and awaited their arrival. On they came. The foremost seemed aware of their danger, and would have returned; but the hundreds behind who could not see us, gored them on; so that, finding there was no retreat, they pushed on boldly, and tried to escape the danger by speed. We did not fire till about half had passed before us, and then Mr C—— gave the word, and each, singling out his mark, fired, and then throwing down our guns and rifles, a few who had brought down their game, flew to take possession ; while the others, and I among them, kept up with the ones we had fired at, wounded or not, and as soon as we had an opportunity, fired at them with our pistols. I had not the good fortune to kill my mark. Having got pretty near it, I fired one of the pistols at it, on which it turned round and looked so fierce that I left it to its meditation, and returned to the party, thankful that it did not follow me. I found Mr C—— had been more fortunate in his aim than I had—he had shot a young buffalo. We proceeded to kindle a fire, cut out the tongue and hump, and make preparations for roasting the same. All the hunters and Indians had come up before we had completed the necessary preparations ; and soon the smell of roast beef was sent far and wide over the prairie.

Having discussed our meal without the use of plates or forks, the hunters were directed to take the dogs and follow the herds, for the purpose of recovering any of the buffaloes which, from being wounded, could not keep up with the rest, while we remained to rest ourselves, enjoy a cheerful glass, and talk over the day's sport.

I expressed my surprise to Mr C——, to find the trading forts such comfortable residences, where one had such plenty of the necessaries and many of the luxuries of life to boast of, with such advantages for enjoying all manner of sport, at comparatively no expense, although so many hunters, trappers, clerks, &c., &c., were supported by the establishment. I had heard and read numerous accounts of the trading posts in the west, as being the most wretched of all human habitations, and the traders the most ill-used and miserable of mankind.

"But, my dear sir," replied Mr C——, "you have, as yet, not visited any of the internal trading posts ; when you do, you will find them equal to any description you may have heard of them. Instead of being, like our establishments, forts for the protection of the interests of the Company, and a general depot for goods and peltries, superintended, generally, either by partners or by men of intelligence and experience, the small trading posts (in one of which I served my apprenticeship) are merely temporary sheds, or skanties, as they are called, in which is stowed a quantity of goods for trading for peltries. They are superintended by a clerk, with one or two young men as apprentices under him, and a few hunters and trappers, who are sent out in all directions to hunt deer and bisons, and trap beavers, &c. These men, with a few horses and dogs, constitute the whole establishment. They are frequently plundered by stray parties of Indians, sometimes detained as prisoners for years among the Indians. They often suffer much from hunger, considering themselves happy if they have a sufficiency of horse or dog flesh to eat. They are sometimes reduced so far as to eat their stock of skins. After collecting all the peltries they can procure in one neighbourhood, they move off to another, often enduring great hardships on the way ; and having gone the round of the places in their district, return to the fort from whence they were sent, deposit their peltries, and again set out with a new stock of goods fit for trading with the red-skins."

Charles promised to take me to see some of the traders in his district, when we were staying at Hunter's Fort ; of whom I may say more hereafter.

After some time spent in conversation, the hunters returned, bringing two bisons with them. The dogs had caught and held them while the hunters fastened strong ropes to their horns, and then a hunter on horseback on each side, held the ropes tight, and tugged them along. They were sent on, accompanied by the Indians, each carrying his share of beef, towards the fort. We also prepared to return, but retained with us seven hunters and several of the hounds, hoping to raise a bear or wolf, on the way home. Whether we were successful or not, I shall detail at another opportunity.

LORD LINDSAY'S LETTERS ON EGYPT AND THE HOLY LAND.

THIS book is likely to enjoy a considerable popularity, especially in Scotland, and among that daily increasing section of the fashionable world, consisting of church-building old countesses recently become devout, and young ladies who, like the Honourable Miss Biddy Fudge, hold that

"We girls may be Christians, without being 'frights.'"
It is, first of all, the production of a young Lord, the heir to an ancient Earldom, who is, moreover, possessed of agreeable talents, and is a lively and fluent writer. It has better claims to distinction. The author displays, throughout, a frank, affectionate, and cheerful disposition, and not a little of the engaging romance of youth, apt to kindle into enthusiasm at any and everything. He is equally enraptured about the crusading paladins and the more sacred traces of a higher antiquity in the scene of his travels. It would, perhaps, be unwise to discourage religion in the higher ranks, and among the young and ardent, even as a mere fashion of the hour. The true test of pure and enduring Christian principle may be sober-mindedness, and a deep sense of the difficulties of the Christian course ; but, even as a mode of the day, and originating in secular and political causes, not ill to be understood, it is something better than that which it is exploding—the half-affected recklessness, gloom, mystery, and misanthropy of the school in which clever young men of rank were lately so ambitious of taking degree. We know not what the Travellers' Club may think of certain "serious" passages in these letters; but no one will question that, in Syria and Egypt, this young lord was undergoing a far more wholesome and invigorating preparatory discipline for the active duties of life, than that which, in the perilous interval that elapses between college life and marriage, is found by the common system of beginning in the saloons of Paris and Vienna, and finishing in the equally dangerous haunts of German watering-places and London gaming-houses.

Lord Lindsay appears to have travelled on the Continent previous to his eastern expedition. Here he starts from Cadiz; and his first letter we should imagine to be addressed to a brother, if a man only twenty-four by the calendar could have a brother a lieutenant-colonel, though such precocious prodigies do sometimes occur in our service. The opening descriptions are somewhat flowery and lady-like withal; but the writer improves in style as he gets on—and in Cadiz he was compelled to indulge in raptures, as there was no time given by the captain of the steamer for reflection. The halt was only of a few hours; and the view of the city was one to beget rapture, although Lord Byron had not been there before, and given the cue.

Like a town of King Salem's sprung up from Ocean, at the farther extremity of the bay, tipping its horn, as it were, with a diamond crown—the lateen sails scudding around us like gigantic nautiluses, stooping over the green waters like the beautiful sea-birds that were sporting in every direction—oh! it was lovely, very lovely!

We had but four hours allowed us to visit Cadiz; I threw my shyness to the winds, and used my eyes, stared into every nook and corner, and at every one, man and woman, we met. But you cannot have forgotten the scene, though long familiarity with its details may have effaced the remembrance of your first general impressions; to me it was all "fresh and fresh, new and new," like the Indian beauty in the song—a living, breathing, moving tableau, a waking dream, rather—for whether I was in or out of the body, I can scarce tell, now that I reflect on the vision, so many ideas familiar to my fancy were then presented to my eyes in the warmest glow of reality—all, too, intensely Spanish: the long, black cloaks of the sleepy hidalgos, long as their names, threadbare, many of them, as the mantle of chivalry their ancestors wore so gracefully; the Moorish faces, conical hats, and sashes of the lower, and, as they seemed to me, far poorer order; the cigarillos, common to all; the fans, mantillas, the black eyes, beautiful feet, and graceful gliding gait of the senoritas—but, oh, what frights the old women are!—and then the painted balconies above, that give such a character to the straight, narrow aceras—flowers in most of them, but, alas! the "fairer flowers," Eve's daughters, were few or none visible upon them; and the dazzling whiteness of the houses, everything, too, as clean as if the Gaditanos were Dutchmen—it was like a scene of enchantment; to say nothing of the exquisite delight of being on Spanish ground, and hearing the language of Calderon and Cervantes on every lip that passed me.

Is it to the French invasion, and the military police discipline of France, somewhat unceremoniously enforced in the Spanish towns, to British example, or to national regeneration, that this agreeable change from the filthy to the scrupulously clean has arisen?—or is the renovation so complete as the hurried traveller imagined?

He carried a Shakespeare with him, and a few other favourite authors, and seems to have read with true feeling—"placing" "the gentle lady wedded to the Moor" in a higher niche than the poetical and passionate Juliet. Gibraltar detains him until the heroic Spanish names of antiquity give place to Algiers' "thrilling name." There he met with a young Dane, son of the Consul, who was proceeding to join the French expedition against Constantine, and who could talk intelligently about Northern Antiquities, and sing the national songs of his country—accomplishments which will, we fear, soon be left to the natives of Northern Europe. For Britons, save a few of the De Lyndsayes, Howards, and so forth, who had "ancestors" long before the Pitt or even the Walpole Administration, there will soon be neither national heroic ballads nor antiquities, until, in the long lapse of ages, the cotton wool of the Peels and Arkwrights may rise in dignity equal to the Golden Fleece; and the era of Steam Power eclipse that of the Norman Invasion; when it shall be the boast that our Saxon forefathers were illustrious powerloomists, and mechanical inventors on the broad scale, while the Norman lords were only consuming the bread of idleness, and the fruits of other men's labour.

At Malta, Lord Lindsay found the future companion of his journey, his friend and relation Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, whose melancholy and sudden death at Damascus, on their return, caused much grief to the traveller, and to that domestic circle and admiring society of which this accomplished person gave every promise of becoming the blessing and ornament. A few of Mr Ramsay's notes, affixed to these Letters, are, from their solidity of manner, and the objects of Mr Ramsay's inquiries, not the least valuable portion of the volumes. The ancient headquarters of the Knights of Malta calls up fresh raptures in the bosom of the young traveller, to whom chivalry and biblical story, knights or apostles, are always alike inspiring. Alexandria, with its long train of stirring associations, comes in for its share of crowding and swelling raptures, all about Daniel's Prophecies, Cæsar, Cleopatra, Mark Anthony, Shakespeare, Origen, Athanasius, "devoted to God's truth against Arius," and the "gallant Abercrombie," devoted to the service of his country, in quelling the French political heresy.

The Pasha, Mehemet Ali, had, while the travellers were at Alexandria, pressed all the boats to convey his son's harem to Cairo. This movement produced, in the "serious" young travellers, curiosity marvellously like that which might have been expected in morally unregenerate young Englishmen. Lord Lindsay writes this P.S. to his mother:—

P.S.—Dec. 1. Think of our scampering off this morning, on jack-asses, (instinctively,) on hearing that the harem was about to embark for Cairo! We had about three miles to ride, and when we got near it there was nothing to be seen of the ladies, nor could we approach the carriages (English, and four-in-hand) they rode in. We watched them from a distance, and, after going past or three children banded out, followed by a veiled lady, whom William pronounced to be dreadfully thick ankled, we turned round and retraced our steps at a gentle trot, and have been laughed at for our wild-goose chase ever since. We were not, however, the only English who joined in it, and were the first to retreat—that is some comfort.

At Cairo they formed a close intimacy with the enthusiastic Caviglia, whose later grievances appear to be unknown to Lord Lindsay, as they are altogether unnoticed. Under his guidance, and as his guests, they examined the Pyramids. But as these have been often described before, as well as the important discoveries of Caviglia, we shall choose, as the greater novelty, if not mystery, Caviglia himself. On returning from their fatiguing examination, it is said—

After ablutions, &c., we drank tea, delicious tea! in Caviglia's tent; a candle stuck in a bottle enlightened our repast; but dark, mystical, and unearthly was our conversation, a sequel to the lecture he had given us inside the Pyramid, pointing out an end, a hidden purpose, a secret meaning in every nook, cranny, and passage of the structure—the scene, he told us, of initiation into the ancient Egyptian mysteries.

We had him to breakfast two or three days ago at Cairo, and I had had a long confab with him before that. Living, as he has done, so solitary, I should rather say, in such society as that of the old Pharaohs of Egypt, their pyramids his home, and that strange enigma of a sphinx his fellow-watcher at their feet, he has become, to use his own expression, "tout-à-fait pyramidal" in dress, feature, manner, thought, and language. We are told that, in Ceylon, there are insects that take the shape and colour of the branch or leaf they feed upon—Caviglia seems to partake of their nature; he is really assimilating to a pyramid. His history is very curious:—"As a young man," he told us this evening, "je lisais Voltaire, Jean Jacques, Diderot—et je me croyais philosophe"—he came to Egypt—the Pyramids, Moses, and the Holy Scriptures converted him, "et maintenant," said he, "je suis tout Biblique." I have seldom met with a man so thoroughly imbued with the Bible; the saving truths of the Gospel, man's lost condition by the fall of Adam, Christ's voluntary death to expiate our sins, our inability to save ourselves, and the necessity of our being born again of the Holy Spirit—every one of these doctrines he avowed this evening; he seems to cling to them, and to love our blessed Saviour with the simplicity of a child—he never names him without reverence; but on these doctrines, this rock, as a foundation, he has reared a pyramid of the most extraordinary mysticism—astrology, magnetism, magic (his familiar studies), its corner-stones, while on each face of the airy vision he sees inscribed in letters of light, invisible to all but himself, elucidatory texts of scripture, which he read off to us, with undoubted confidence, in support of his positions.

Every religious truth, in short, unessential to salvation, is in his eyes fraught with mysticism. His memory is as accurate as a Presbyterian minister—every text he quoted was prefaced by a reference to the chapter and verse where it occurs. He loves the Arabs, and looks forward to their conversion and civilisation as the accomplishment of the prophecies, that "there shall be a high-way out of Egypt to Assyria" in that day when "Israel shall be a third with Egypt and Assyria, even a blessing in the midst of the land"—when the Lord shall have "set his hand the second time to recover the remnant of his people from Assyria, from Egypt, from Pathros, from Cush," &c., and shall bless the assembled myriads, saying, "Blessed be Egypt, my people, and Assyria, the work of my hands, and Israel, mine inheritance."

He quoted these remarkable prophecies, and I had the pleasure of telling him I looked forward to their speedy fulfilment with the same interest as himself.

Caviglia seems really to enjoy himself in his little fortress; the Arabs are very fond of him—he is monarch of all the surveys, knows his fame, and enjoys it—and long may he do so! He is now sixty-six, but still hale, active, and hearty.

This region seems to have a particular power in generating a species of wild religious mysticism in many of those who breathe its air—Caviglia, Lady Hester Stanhope, De La Martine, and, perhaps, a few more of those mystics, might be named.

To come back to the work-day world, here is a picture of the street population of Cairo, which has nothing of the unreal:—

We are now tolerably familiar with oriental objects; but the first three or four walks we took through the bazaars were like a visit to another world, familiar to the imagination, but passing strange when first realized by the eyes; portly dunnas, veiled from head to foot, waddling along, followed by their slaves—harems taking the air on donkey-back, escorted by their black eunuchs, the most consummate puppies in Cairo—Arabs on their dromedaries—richly-drest Bedouin Sheikhs on their prancing steeds—Turks with their long pipes and ataghans—water-carriers, buffaloes, half-naked Santons, or religious fanatics, singing and rocking backwards and forwards—criers perambulating the bazaars with objects of curiosity to dispose of—the small shops on either side the street, their owners sitting cross-legged and smoking—everything reminded us of the Arabian Nights and Haroun Al-Raschid.

In one respect, however, a great and happy change has taken place; the insults Christians were formerly subject to are now unknown.

The Pasha and his doings naturally attracted the attention of the travellers, and especially of Mr Wardlaw Ramsay, who is more statistical, and much less rhetorical, than his young friend. His opinion of that remarkable and equivocal personage of whom we have heard so much, and are now likely to hear so much more than could be wished, coincides with that of most other intelligent travellers. They were introduced to Ali by the Consul, Colonel Campbell; but young English mi Lords are not the kind of visitors on whom Mehemet Ali bestows much attention. He does not find, probably, that they understand his plans, or that they can give him any useful information about growing and manufacturing cotton. Mr Ramsay says:—

He did not address any of his guests, but I observed his sharp cunning eye fixing itself on every one. The light was not strong enough to remark minutely, but I can agree with former travellers as to the vivid expression of his eye, and, for the rest, under a huge tarboosh and immense white beard and mustachios, it is absurd to talk of, or to have any clear idea of the expression of his face; but an expression I have read somewhere, "his cold heartless laugh," came suddenly into my head when I heard him laugh; it sounded hard, cold, and pleasureless, and enough to make one any freeze whose head was at his mercy.

The character which Mr Ramsay gives of this political regenerator seems entitled to full credit:—

He "has drained the country of all the working men. He presses them as sailors, soldiers, workmen, &c., and nobody can be sure of his own security for a day. His system appears to be infamous, and the change which has taken place in the general appearance of the country within a few years is said to be extraordinary. Everywhere the land is falling out of cultivation, villages are deserted, houses falling to ruin, and the people disappearing."

"He taxes all the means of industry and of its improvement, and then taxes the product. Irrigation is the great means of cultivation and fertility; he therefore charges fifteen dollars' tax upon every Persian wheel; and, as the people can find a way of avoiding it by manual labour, raising the water in a very curious way by the pole and bucket, he lays a tax of seven dollars and a half even on that simple contrivance.

"He then, in the character of universal land-proprietor in his dominions, orders what crop shall be sown, herein consulting his own interest solely, in direct opposition to that of his people. He settles the price of the crop, at which the cultivator is obliged to sell it to him, for he can sell it to no one else; and, if he wishes to keep any himself, he is obliged to buy it back from government at the new rate which the Pasha has fixed for its sale, of course, many per cents. dearer than when he bought it. Numberless are his little tricks for saving money; e. g. when he has to receive money, it has always to be paid in advance; taxes, particularly, he collects always just before the plague breaks out, so that, though the people die, he has their money; in paying the troops and others, it is vice versa; he pays after date, and gains also upon the deaths.

"We have heard much at home of the reforming enlightened spirit of Mohammed Ali—but what has founded on? It looks more like a great and sudden blaze before the whole is extinguished and falls into total darkness; and whether this is to happen at his death or before, seems the only question: it seems not to be far distant. Last year he had no money (and he pushed hard for it) to pay his troops and dependents, and this year he will have no more than he had last.

"He has forced the riches of the country prematurely, and to an extent they could not bear, at the same time removing the means of their reproduction, and thus he has procured the present means of prosecuting the really wonderful, and what, in other circumstances, would have been the useful and beneficial improvements and institutions, which we have heard so much of, and which certainly strike a traveller much. It is to the unprincipled roguery and ignorance of his European advisers and officials that most of this waste and expense is to be charged. His councillors consist of all the needy emigrants from France and Italy, who are scouted or in bad odour at home, and who have the assurance to pretend to be that they are not here, where detection is difficult, and where success is their fortune for life. Ideas of the most extravagant kind, such as that of damming up the Nile, and others on which he has thrown away many hundred thousands of pounds, have been put into his head by these speculating adventurers, who fill their own pockets by it, and thus prey upon the country.

"A man, who has received the education of a scribe or clerk, comes out, talks of cotton-growing, and soon rises to the head of the cotton department; another, who has thought of nothing but trade or manufacturing, is put into the engineering office; and thus everything is mismanaged. The English are no longer employed in his service, he has found them too hard to deal with."

Those, however, who would, from this book, learn more of the political condition of Egypt, and the probable results of the ambitious projects of the Pasha, should peruse the letter or rather pamphlet of Mr Farren, lately the British Consul at Damascus, which Lord Lindsay has appended to his "Letters."

The modern Egyptian magic has, of late, mightily excited the wonder of certain English travellers, of whom it may be safely predicted that they are no conjurors. Though they belong by birth to the land of gramerie, the spell did not work with Lord Lindsay and his companion. The former writes:—

Do you remember the strange story Miss H—— told us of the Egyptian magician? I have had him twice here—that is to say, the gentlemen at the Inn had him the first time, and, as I was not satisfied with his performance, and he hardly got fair play among us, I had him a second time to myself, wishing to give him a fair trial. I am not yet satisfied; he succeeded in the first person we called for, but failed egregiously in the others.

The first night we all assembled in the salle à manger of the hotel, and, the wizard being introduced, we seated him on the divan, furnished him with a pipe, and then proceeded to question him as to his power, &c. He said he was from Algiers, (query, of Sycorax's family, Caliban's mother?) and that he belonged to a tribe or caste who were ruled by sheikhs or chiefs, and call themselves the servants of Solomon. We asked him whether he worked by Allah or by Satan; he gave me a Scotch answer the first day—"Does not Satan come from Allah?" but the following evening affirmed it was by Allah.

I asked him whether he understood the words he used, which are not Arabic—at least one of my friends here, who speaks the language, could make nothing of them—he said Yes; and, in answer to my further inquiries, repeated thirteen words or names, which he said were all a man needed the knowledge of to obtain the same power with himself; you must learn them by heart, (he is willing to teach any one "for a consideration.") then for seven days make a fire seven times every day, throw incense on it, and walk round the fire seven times, pronouncing seven times the thirteen names, then go to sleep, and you will awake with the faculty required. A complicated receipt this!

The magician, meanwhile, was writing several lines in Arabic, which he afterwards tore into seven pieces, each containing a distich. A boy having been procured, (for a child only can receive the power of magical vision,) he drew a double-lined square, with strange marks in the angles, on his hand, put some ink on the palm, and bade him look into it and tell us what he saw.

A chafing-dish having now been brought in, the wizard, his beads in his hand, began mumbling prayers or invocations, the same words, I believe, over and over again, at first in a loud voice, then gradually sinking till they were quite inaudible, (like a top falling asleep,) though his lips continued moving apace. From time to time he placed incense and one of the torn scraps of paper on the fire, frequently interrupting his incantation to ask the boy whether he saw anything, to which he as frequently replied in the negative; at last he said—"I saw something fit by quickly," but nothing more came, and the wizard said he must procure another boy, which we did.

The same ceremonies having been repeated, a man made his appearance, and, at the word of command, began sweeping; then he bade the boy call for seven flags in succession, all of which made their appearance, and, last of all, the Sultan, whom he described as seated on his divan drinking coffee. "Now," said the magician, "the charm is complete, and you may call for any one you like."

The first person we summoned was the Rev. ———, a mutual friend of William's and mine, and the first person who told him of these magicians; he was described, upon the whole, accurately, but this was the only successful summons; the spirits either would not come, or appeared by proxy, to the sad discomposure of our Arab Glendower, who, it is but fair to state, attributed the failure to its being Ramadan.

I tried him with Daniel Lambert, who, I was informed, was a thin man, and with Miss Biffin, who made her appearance with arms and legs. He has been equally unsuccessful with a party of Americans—this is odd enough when one considers how strongly Mr Salt, Lord Prudhoe, and Major Felix, who subjected him to long and repeated examinations, were impressed with the belief of his supernatural powers.

One thing is unquestionable—that the children do see a crowd of objects, following each other, and at the commencement of the incantation, the very same objects—as vivid and distinct as if they looked out of the window at noonday. How is this to be accounted for? Cellenius is out of the question.

But all children see no such crowd of objects, nor any distinct object at all. If it were not often more agreeable to human beings to be mystified than convinced, the magician and his flags would long since have been hors de combat.* We will, by the way, take an equal bet that that the person first summoned by the magician was Dr Chalmers; nor was it difficult to call up the semblance of any clergyman, a matter which colour and costume would settle of themselves to all little Egyptians, or any other boys. Had George Fox, in his leathern doublet, been summoned, and as a preacher, we would defy all the wizards of Egypt to produce his semblance.

The travellers purchased and comfortably fitted up a boat, in which they meant to ascend the Nile to Upper Egypt. The crew, and the scenery on the picturesque voyage, are really very charmingly described. It is in such narrations that Lord Lindsay shines. After noticing their snug upfittings and equipments, in which the bookshelves are not forgotten, he proceeds:—

The crew consists of ten men, besides there is or captain; they are active, willing, good-humoured fellows, and have harmonious voices, a great lounge (to speak Ktonicé), as the Arab boatmen are a noisy set, constantly singing to their work, and always in chorus; one of them leads, and the rest join in, generally line by line, alternately, neither uttering more than five or six words at a time. The chorus of each song is always the same, but the Coryphæus, or leader, seems to sing ad libitum, words and air both, often deviating into a wild yell.

A curious scene was going on around us three or four evenings ago. We are now in Ramadan, the Mahomedan Lent, always rigorously kept by the Arabs, who taste nothing from sunrise to sunset. The sun had gone down behind the bank of the river, but, as they might not eat till the legal hour of sunset, there they sat, poor fellows! each with an onion in his hand, their eyes fixed on Missirî's watch, by which he was to let them know when they might conscientiously set to. That evening was a very merry one; squatted in a circle, they sang unceasingly for two hours or more—strange wild chants, keeping time by clapping their hands, a custom handed down to them from the ancient Egyptians, and to the accompaniment of a rude tambour or drum. Each song ended with two extraordinary yells, not inharmonious, in which all joined, the voices dropping, as if from exhaustion, at the close. Between each song was heard the distant chorus of a crew toiling on the other side of the river, and the whistling drone of a reed-pipe from a boat full of Bedouins from the west, pilgrims to Mecca, keeping company with us; sitting silent and motionless, their features almost invisible—their dark eyes gleaming from under their massive white drapery—never saw I figures more savagely picturesque! The reises, meanwhile, being in the complimentary mood, guns and pistols were going off every moment, each followed up by the yell of all the crews, succeeded, at least on board our vessel, by another song—and so on. The rolling echo of the guns from the rocks across the river added to the effect of this strange night-scene on the Nile. I do enjoy these wild old airs.

We have had favourable breezes for the most part hitherto, and have gone night and day, the crew relieving each other; the breeze generally fails at sunset, when they punt the boat, or tow it along the shore. We constantly run aground, and then they dash over into the water, fearless of the crocodiles, and push away, hands and shoulders, to the usual chant of "Haylee sa! haylee sa!" till they clear her. William gets a walk and a little shooting every day, and I often accompany him as his gamekeeper. The banks, as we skim past them, are sometimes absolutely covered with wild geese—fire a gun, and they rise in myriads, as clangingly as Homer heard them settle on the banks of the ready Cayster.

And what delicious weather! the morning and evening clear and transparent as the dew; but no pencil could paint, no tongue describe, the rich glow of the western sky at sunset, or the pink zone that girdles the horizon as the night falls—pink at first, but changing from shade to shade, like the cheek of Iris, till the last, a delicate green, like chrysophras, darkens into night. And night, how lovely! the moon riding triumphantly along, not let into the sky, as in the north, but visibly round and detached—you can see far beyond her—with all her starry train around her, "the poetry of heaven!"

Never, dear mother, knew I what luxury was till now! I have realized Horace's idea of complete repose in lying at length under a green arbutus (at least as shady a tree), beside his own bright fountain at Lucrétia, but what is that to reclining under a tent on a Turkish divan, in an Arab boat, ascending the Nile—a never-ending diorama of loveliness! villages, dove-cots, mosques, santons' tombs, hermits' cells, temples, pyramids, avenues of the thorny acacia (from which the country derives one of its old Sanscrit names,) and, lovelier than all, groves after groves of date trees,

"bending
Languidly their leaf-crowned heads,
Like youthful maids, when sleep, descending,
Warns them to their silken beds!"

all slumbrous—all gliding past like the scenery of a dream—without effort—peacefully—silently; and yet, as when watching the stars at midnight, you feel all the while as if the sweetest music were murmuring in your ear.

Instead of dallying about the ruins of Thebes' tombs, temples, mummies, and all sorts of Egyptian traditions and antiquities, and the meditations, sentimental and heroic, which they call up, or the learning they serve to draw forth, we shall pass to the diversified tribes of Upper Egypt—a living dog being, in many respects, better than a dead lion. In mooring one night at Korosko, the Turkish governor of the country lying between the Cataracts, who chanced to be resting at the same place, offered the voyagers a visit, to their great perplexity, as they had no means of shewing hospitality to so illustrious a guest. They made the best of it, and found the governor a rather remarkable person, though such a degree of book-ignorance, in a naturally intelligent man, seems singular even in Egypt:—

The first compliments were scarcely paid, when he produced a little Arabic treatise on geography, printed by the missionaries at Malta, and asked how many men formed the standing force of Russia? We expected to be regularly catechised on the resources of every state in Europe, but his subsequent questions were chiefly geographical; he had evidently made the most of his little book—his sole library, he told us—and had treasured the information he had picked up from travellers. I gave him four or five Arabic books, one on astronomy, the others chiefly religious, that I had found lying at Alexandria along with some books I bought there, and included them in my bargain, on the chance of finding some opportunity of giving them away.

All his geographical ideas, except those derived from his text-book, were very vague. He discriminated the Abyssinian branch of the Nile from the western river, the most considerable of the two, by calling it emphatically Bahr el Nil, or the Blue River; I believe it is always painted blue in the sculptures—the word is Sanscrit too, and applied in the sacred books to the western Nile, though the name for it is Cali or Chishana—

the Black, which corresponds in meaning with the Hebrew name Siber; and yet, oddly enough, the river is neither black nor blue, but a muddy colour. The Kinshaf, in reply to our question where the sources were, said they were not very distant, but that the barbarous tribes and fierce animals, with which the intermediate country abounded, rendered them difficult of approach. One of these tribes, he told us, is a nation of dogs with women wives! the old tradition, then, of the Cynocephali, or dog-headed men, is still current here. The same belief prevailed in Tartary in the time of Zinghis Khan; and Mr. Buckingham was asked at Ascut, east of the Jordan, whether he had ever been to the Balled al Kelh, where the men had dogs' heads. The Nile, added the Kinshaf, parts into three rivers—the Egyptian stream, another that reaches the sea near Algiers, and the third near Spain.

Naming our acquaintance, Omar Effendi (a young Turk, sent by Mohammed Ali to study in England, but now returned and settled at Cairo,) he said he was from the same village, and seemed interested in hearing we had been at college with him.

Taking his departure, he sent us a couple of turkeys, and a sort of firman or order, to furnish us everything we might need between the cataracts. Nothing could be kinder than his offers of procuring us men, camels, and assistance of every sort, whenever we might be disposed to go. It was interesting, but painful, to see a man, evidently of talent, born and bred in intellectual darkness, and aware of his situation, struggling and catching at every ray of light. He entered at once on his inquiries, never doubting our willingness to afford him what aid we could; the conversation seldom flagged a moment, and, in his eagerness, the pipe was often neglected. On paying us another visit on our return, he told us very feelingly that, since he had become acquainted with Europeans about three years ago, he had disrelished the society of other Turks; all their conversation ran on women or dress, never on subjects of real interest. "Now," said he, "I like to know how the sun shines, how the world was created, who inhabit it, &c., and because I do so, and seek the society of those who can instruct me, my countrymen call me proud, and I am quite alone among them;"—"solo, solo, solo!" as Abdallah translated it; it went to my heart—poor fellow! he must indeed be lonely, and so must every one be who outstrips his fellows.

Both the travellers were alike struck with admiration of the Nubian race, or Berbers:—

A very handsome race, far superior to the Arabs of Egypt at least; almost black, but with a polished skin, quite unlike the dirty hue of the negro; the eye rests far more complacently on their naked limbs than on those of the whiter castes: they are tall, for the most part, and beautifully proportioned—sinewy, no fat—the heel on a line with the back of the leg, a noble expression of countenance, and fine phrenological foreheads; their honesty is proverbial. Cultivation, I think, might do wonders with them. So much for the race in general; the individuals on this occasion—naked except the waist, and full of fun and merriment—punted and rowed us up the river as far as the boat could ascend, and then, landing on the western bank, we proceeded on foot, alternately over sand and rock, to Abousir, a lofty cliff that overhangs the rapids, conspicuous from afar, and covered, we found, with the names of former travellers.

Probably a little European prejudice, and not a little of the English-skin ideas of beauty, had some influence in this favourable judgment. In Mr. Ramsay's Journal we find the following:—

Jan. 17, beyond Derr. The country grows wider and more picturesque. The varieties of inhabitants are remarkable; each village appears to have a different race—at one point, a group of thorough-bred, woolly-headed, frightful negroes—at another, that race we call (whether rightly or no) Nubians, a handsome, interesting people, not black, though nearly approaching to it—at another, the Berbers (I suppose,) a peculiarly fine set, with the free independent air of the desert, and distinguished dress. They are considered as having the best character of any people in every respect. The Arabs also here and there appear, the same as in Egypt. The women's dress in some places is peculiarly elegant.

A shipwreck, or rather boatwreck, at the cataracts of the Nile, formed the most perilous adventure of the whole expedition. They were certainly in some danger, but it was not of long duration; and the troublesome consequences of the ducking were borne with great good-humour. They were throughout blessed with a most invaluable man of affairs in Missirie, a Greek by nation, who had travelled with several gentlemen in the east, and who, to great activity, judgment, and intelligence, added the rarer quality, in persons of his class, of sterling probity. Their Turkish friend of the little treatise on geography learning their disaster, sent camels and donkeys to bring themselves and their attendants and baggage, to visit him at Esouan, which they reached by a singular sepulchral kind of track, a scene of the wildest desolation:—

It was dusk by the time we dismounted at the Kinshaf's harem, the first house we came to; he brought out a couple of arm-chairs, and gave us a most acceptable cup of coffee, and then, leading the way to the government-house, ushered us into the presence-chamber, as I suppose I must call it, where the Bey gives audience during the summer.

Here we again smoked our pipes, and drank the coffee of our hospitable friend. William and myself, seated in arm-chairs of state—the Kinshaf, (as grave and silent as a judge, now he was among his countrymen,) and a Turkish officer—on two plain chairs—and the Armenian secretary cross-legged on his mat, formed our party, and a very pleasant one it was, for nothing could be more cordial than their attentions.

Dinner at last made its appearance. Napkins were first given us; then raisins and a fiery liqueur of aniseed were placed on the table as a whet; then came the dishes dressed à la Turque, which we partook of à l'Anglaise; the Turks eat after their fashion, dipping in the dishes very neatly, with pieces of bread for spoons: little was said during the meal, for the Turks don't talk on such occasions; lastly, a servant brought water to each of us, to wash our hands, pouring it over them;—then coffee again. We had a good deal of conversation afterwards, through Abdallah and a Nubian, who had travelled with Lord Belmore some years ago, and spoke a little Italian. The officer spoke highly of his own achievements in the chase, of having killed (and eaten?) a lion, &c. &c. A lion, he told us, would never attack a woman, even armed:—

"'Tis said that a lion will turn and flee
From a maid in the pride of her purity."—

I did not expect to hear a sentiment of chivalry in this part of the world.

About nine, we rose and wished the party good-night.—Missirie, we found, had made our rooms comfortable in the extreme, putting up the camp-bedsteads, making a divan of the cushions of the boat, and putting the things in order; everything almost had been saved. We were much the better for our tea, as you may suppose, and read and wrote afterwards till bed-time, by the light of an immense Turkish candle stuck in the orange-basket.

Next morning, before we were up, Welles Kinshaf had been to see us, and had smoked three pipes; he returned about ten, and breakfasted with us; he drank his tea and ate his omelet with great apparent satisfaction, and afterwards smoked his pipe again, seated on the divan, and cherishing his foot. The Armenian secretary also came to see us. An Abyssinian boy attended, the Kinshaf's page, and apparently a great favourite—suspicious, but without servility; the Kinshaf spoke kindly to him, and the boy made his observations freely, though modestly—the henchman stood at the door, like Evan Mac Combish in Waverley.—William gave the Kiashef a musical snuff-box, which he seemed pleased with. After staying about an hour, he again inquired whether he could do any thing for us, and protested, on our reiterating our gratitude for his past kindness, that really it was ‘nothing—nothing.’ He then rose to go, and, with kind wishes and salame, we parted. We then started, with Abdallah, for the Cataracts, to see after the boat.

On reaching the boat,

Swarms of Nubian children clustered around us, with curiosities for sale; we bought some necklaces and bracelets of red and white beads and straws, (they shew beautifully on a black skin,) and several fetiches or amulets, which they wear generally under the right arm—the dagger under the left; the latter even the children carry. William [Mr Ramsey] dissected one of these fetiches afterwards, and found a long roll of paper inside, covered with Arabic writing and mystical diagrams, magical and astrological apparently.

After sauntering about, identifying the scenes of our first and second passage, we returned by a Nubian village built on the shore in a grove of date trees—plenty of women and children—no reserve in the former, though one of them, whenever we looked at her, hid her face like the Arab women, for fear of the evil eye probably; the boys were naked, most of them; the little girls wear belts of small leather-thongs. One of the children danced before us, naked, and brandishing a short spear, a thorough young cannibal.

Here they accidentally met with Dr Maclean of Bombay, and Mr Clarke, a young officer, and the son of Dr Edward Clarke, the celebrated traveller; and were, in so unlikely a place as the Cataracts of the Nile, overwhelmed by the most welcome gift of half-a-dozen of Hodgson's ale, a dozen of Madeira, and four bottles of Constantia! This it is to be Lords, or private gentlemen of fortune; and Lord Lindsay naturally exclaims—“What sunshiny days are such in human life!” And, indeed, it is not every day such windfalls chance below the Cataracts. Once again, their barge, named or nicknamed the Hippopotamus, was moored in the harbour of Cairo, and, after a brief season of rest, the travellers started for EDOM and the HOLY LAND. They travelled in the Desert with a rather respectable caravan for mere tourists, consisting of ten camels and two tents, one for themselves, and the other for their guide Missirie, and Abdallah their dragoman. Lord Lindsay's enthusiasm kindles to the most intense degree in the Desert, and, truly, it is not very easy to resist contagious sympathy. The attendant hardships and privations were disregarded, for they were fairly in the Desert—delightful thought!—following the steps of the Israelites to the Promised Land.

It was early spring, and the weather charming, and, even without the animating associations of Hebrew history, one can easily conceive the delightful exhilaration of such a journey to a high-spirited and enthusiastic young man:—

I always commenced the day with a long walk; nothing can be more enjoyable; the desert, half gravel, half sand, crunches under the feet like snow; sometimes bounded by low hills, sometimes it stretches out into an interminable plain, but always of the same unvaried hue. We passed skeletons of camels repeatedly, and scattered bones bleached to the whiteness of snow; and, one morning, prowling about near our encampment, I found an open grave and a skull grinning up into my face within it—the relic, doubtless, of some hapless pilgrim. Melancholy memorials these! but all was not death there; a frog, a species of grey lizard, some quails and vultures, were symptoms of animal—and various thorny plants, a few wild flowers, and a strongly scented plant, (a species of wild camemile we thought it), called by the Arabs behharon—of vegetable life; nor should I forget a solitary tree, long conspicuous on the horizon, with the apparent dignity of a palm, but which dwindled, long before we reached it, into a stunted thorn, covered with rage streaming in the wind, hung there by every pilgrim as he passes on chemin for Mecca. The half-eaten carcase of a camel lay beneath it, and the vultures that had been garbaging on it flew heavily away at our approach.

On Thursday we started, with the Arabian mountains, and, as we conceived, the Red Sea, in front of us; it was the mirage! A ship, too, was curiously refracted in the clouds before we came in actual sight of either ship or sea.

At Suez, they esteemed themselves fortunate, in obtaining Hussein, the same renowned Bedouin who had accompanied M. de Laborde, as their protector in their pilgrimage to Sinai, and while they should journey in Arabia. Hussein and Lord Lindsay became forthwith great friends, the Bedouin encouraging the young Lord when he approved of his conduct, by caressing pats on the back, especially when consideration was shewn for the camels, or any trait of humanity or manhood displayed by the Giaour, who was naturally gratified by the Arab's esteem. Hussein provided camels and dromedaries for the cavalcade, and the part of the expedition, which he managed, seems to have been peculiarly to the content of the principal personages. Lord Lindsay remarks that the political condition of the Bedouin tribes, strongly resembles that of the clans in the Highlands of Scotland; but he must mean what these clans once were, not surely what they have become. He says—

My heart warms to these Bedouin Highlanders, and the Tora tribes are a peculiarly fine race; the whole party, indeed, were good-bumoured, hearty fellows. All of us, masters and men, were armed to the teeth, William with rifle and gun, myself with holster pistols; every Arab had his sikkeen, or short sword, and some of them long match-lock guns, ornamented with pebbles, shells, and Turkish coins, which they use very expertly. One of them, unpoetical villain! shot a young gazelle one morning, and had the barbarity to press me to eat it.

Their attire was very simple—the kefia or kerchief of the desert, loosely and gracefully tied round the head by a piece of rope, or a turban—a long white robe of rather cumbersome drapery, sometimes of lighter material, secured by a girdle—a long blue cloak, (peculiar, I believe, to the Arabs of this peninsula,) and sandals of fish-skin, secured across the instep, and by clasps at the ankles, exposing the foot as in Scripture paintings; a small kneading-trough or bowl, a leathern bottle for water, a short pipe, tobacco-pouch, and sometimes the short crook-headed stick, represented in the hand of Osiris in the Egyptian sculptures, completed their equipment. Throw away the pipe and tobacco, (many of the Bedouins, however—our friend Hussein for instance, never smoke,) substitute a lance or a sword for that ignoble weapon the gun, and any one of them might fit for a portrait of the Caliph Omar.

We generally halted about sunset, on some smooth spot under the rocks or hills, made our camels kneel down, unloaded, and then let them go free to browse à discretion; in half an hour more, the tents were pitched, fires blazing around, and the stars above us, for in these countries there is little or no twilight. The camels were then tethered down, and the Bedouins, their frugal meal and merry chat over, wrapped themselves up in their abbas, and went to sleep. We also dozed from dinner till tea-time, and then, after a cheerful cup or two, followed their example. Evenings as peaceful, and cups as cheering as those immortalized by Cowper, yet how different in their accessories!—no newspapers, no politics, no prose of the present to mar our meditations on the past.

We all lent a hand in the tent-pitching; this Bedouin life is quite to my taste; 'tis the realisation of one of my childhood day-dreams, when I used to pitch a tent on the nursery floor at Muncaster, and call it my home. And yet I have a lingering touch of European prejudice; there is something very melancholy in our morning flittings; the tent-pins are plucked up, and, in a few minutes, a dozen holes, a heap or two of ashes, and the marks of the camel's knees in the sand, soon to be obliterated, are the only traces left of what has been for a while home. There are a thousand allusions to this primitive mansion in Scripture, almost unintelligible, till familiarity with the tent, the camel, and the desert, explains them. I never drive in a tent-pin without thinking of Jael and Sisera.

This is full as delightful as grouse-shooting or deer-shooting. Wady Feiran, an enchanting and enchanted valley, which Lord Lindsay will have to be Paran, and, where, in Gebel Serbat, he was certain he saw Mount Paran, is thus introduced:—

Following the windings of the valley, alternately through sun and shade, under lofty rocks and umbrageous date-trees, whispering in the breeze, and shedding the most delicious coolness, we heard from time to time the chirping of birds, the barking of dogs, and the merry voices of children—generally unseen, though occasionally we caught a passing glimpse of them and their dusky mothers and sisters under the thick foliage embowering their huts and tents. We exchanged cordial salamats and bissatams with some of the natives that we met on the road, particularly with one aged white-bearded patriarch. Our guides, too, were constantly meeting their acquaintance, receiving their welcome, and striking wrists with them: their greetings struck me as remarkably low-voiced, though cordial as between brothers.

The blending of greens in these gardens is exquisitely beautiful—a regular gradation from the pale transparent foliage of the tarfa to the darker hue of the date towering over it, and the still deeper green of the sidr or nebbek, as dark as that of the orange and citron. Our Bedouins brought down the fruit with stones, and gave them to us as we rode along; it was delicious. In twenty days the sidr harvest will be quite ready; they sell the greater part of it at Suez, part they keep and dry in the sun, press and reduce it to flour, which, with water or milk, they make into small cakes.

In the proper season, the Zoalia Arabs, the owners of these gardens, who intrust the cultivation to the Tebenna, a branch of the Gebali tribe, (who receive three out of every ten dates for their trouble,) hold a sort of harvest-home in the valley—and a merry scene it is then, by all accounts. These Gebali are the descendants of a Christian colony, transported by Justinian from the shores of the Black Sea, to act as servants to his monastic establishment at Mount Sinai. They have long since become Moslems and Bedouins, though the pure tribes never intermarry with them; and, as their daughters are the prettiest girls in the peninsula, many a sad tale of the course of true love thwarted is current in the glens.

About four o'clock we lost sight of the last palm, and, after riding awhile through a wood of tarfa-trees, they too ceased—adieu for ever to the gardens of Wady Feiran! I shall never probably see them again; but often, often will they gleam in loveliness on my waking and sleeping visions. We encamped at a quarter to five, about ten minutes beyond El Bouseh, "the Mouth," a remarkable defile in the valley, not more than eight paces broad in the narrowest part, and beyond which the valley takes the name of Wady Sheikh.

These "gardens" are properly date-grounds, and it should be mentioned, that Wady signifies a valley, and Gebel a peak or mountain top. They were now in sacred precincts, and every advancing step was storied and hallowed. Sinai was in view! At the place where Moses, in coming down from the Mount, broke the tables of the law, on seeing the worship of the golden calf, Hassan, one of the Bedouins, who had been saying his prayers, saluted "Moses' stone" with his hands. They reached the monastic fortress of St. Catherine, on Sinai, and were hoisted up, with their baggage, by a rope and windlass. They lived here a strange sort of life for a time, making exploratory excursions in the wild environs, and visiting the other convents of this holy mountain region, having been detained much longer than they expected, from the interpreter, Abdallah, severely wounding himself by the accidental discharge of a pistol. The travellers humanely dispatched a messenger to Cairo for Dr MacLennan; but, long before the doctor appeared, Hussein, who had taken the case into his own hands, cured the patient, by dressing the wound with date-brandy, and administering a soporific draught formed of some shrub, prized in Bedouin medical practice. A hare had crossed Abdallah's path one morning. He had cocked his pistol to fire at it, but was too late, and replaced it in his belt without uncocking it. At night, as he was hanging it up, something caught the trigger, and—but the thing is common in all countries—the Arabs blamed not the carelessness of the man, but the unlucky omen of the hare.

The pilgrimage was continued by Mount Seir, Petra, across the Desert to Hebron, and by Bethlem to Jerusalem. But at the fort of Akaba they parted with their Bedouin escort, and their esteemed friends, Hussein and Toualeb:—

They offered to go on with us, if we wished it, but said that the Alouins (with whom we were to proceed to Petra and Hebron) were men with "big bellies," and they were nothing in comparison with them, and could be of no use to us. They were evidently very unwilling to proceed, and we, also, on further consideration, thought it would be better to make our own bargain, and trust ourselves wholly to the Alouins, when once it was struck. We kissed, therefore, and parted, and they went back to their own country the same night.

Bed-time came—the travellers' room absolutely awarmed with bugs—my friends went to bed—I had not courage to do so, but sat up reading all night—they were kept awake, too—grievous were the exclamations. However, I had a refreshing dip in the Red Sea next morning, which set me quite to rights. The second night we slept under the verandah—a most happy change.

The extortion usually practised by these men of "big bellies," who undertake to protect travellers to Petra and Hebron, they resolved to resist; and they did so successfully. Fifteen thousand piastres were at first demanded, which the firmness of the travellers reduced to four thousand, thus giving a good lesson of English resolution, and conferring an obligation on all future travellers who choose to profit by it. These money matters, and the affair of begging presents and bagshish, which it seems, mean vails, or something to the boots, the waiter, and the chambermaid, being arranged, the escort got on very well. The party, always excepting their beggarly Sheikh, were cheerful, good-humoured gillie-camstraites, and very handsome fellows, though with the fierce and wild expression of all the Ishmaelitic race.

They set out for Petra; the place they had left looking thus poetically pretty in Lord Lindsay's pages. "Nothing could be more beautiful than the Gulf of Akaba, gleaming through its fringe of palm-trees, as we left the fort, like a placid lake—an eye, rather, of the deepest blue, eyelashed with palms, and eye-lidded with the Arabian mountains."

The Turkish Governor of the fortress had that morning attempted to swindle them out of two hundred piastres, as a gratuity to his soldiers, which was probably meant for his own pocket. They resisted this compulsory levy. But, before the Sheikh joined them, five hundred of what they had just paid to him had been extorted in the country fashion by the governor. This part of the journey is at once so picturesque, Arab-like, and patriarchal, that we must indulge in a rather long extract.

The description of one night's encampment will give you an idea of all. We halted usually on some spot where the camels could find shrubs for food, and we dry bushes for fuel. Three fires were then lighted, one for Missirie and Hassan, Clarke's servant; one for the Sheikh and his children; and a third for the lower caste of his clansmen. Nothing could be more picturesque than the night-scenes these fires and the wild groups gathered round them exhibited. The first night two Arabs quarrelled, and flew at each other with their drawn swords; but were held back by their friends, and with some (apparent) difficulty pacified. If a ruse to try our nerves, which I hope we were not uncharitable in believing it, it failed egregiously. 'The Arabs, by the way, when they do come to blows, always strike with the palms of their hands, as the soldiers struck our Saviour, never with the fist. Our tent was soon pitched and struck; our food was rice, bread, tongues, coffee, and occasionally mutton; a blanket and the sheets of our bedding took up little room, serving for saddles during the day-time, and we made easy shift with two or three changes of linen. And was not this faring like princes? We were off almost always before sunrise, and travelled about ten or eleven hours, till near sunset, resting about half an hour, generally at mid-day. We enjoyed the most lovely weather during the whole journey; excessive heat was what we expected; but it proved, on the contrary, delightfully cool and temperate.

Starting at four in the morning, we reached Sheikh Hussein's camp about one, on Sunday afternoon. The tents were ranged in a crescent, and very low, except the Sheikh's. We alighted before it, and were most gracefully received by his eldest son, a boy about ten or eleven, arrayed in his little kafia, or head-dress of the desert, red boots, &c., a Bedouin Sheikh in miniature; in fact, he bears that rank, and wields a sheikh's authority in the camp during his father's absence. Sheikh Hussein, determined that we should be his guests that evening, had ordered the camels that carried our tent to be kept in the rear. Coming up presently, he renewed our welcome, and invited us into his tent, whither we followed, and sat down on the mat beside him, our backs towards the ladies' compartment, separated from ours by a thin partition only. We heard them chattering behind us at a great rate.

It was a bright, warm afternoon, and the fire in the centre of the tent, and the clouds of tobacco-smoke, were, at first, almost stifling. The wild Alouins gathered round us, and presently our dejeuné made its appearance; first, leban was served—sour milk, and then a mixture of butter, bread, sugar—I really do not know all its component parts; but it was excellent;—then pipes; and coffee was repeatedly served by a slave who sat constantly grinding and supplying new comers with that truly oriental luxury. Each guest, as he entered, was kissed by the principal members of the circle, except the Sheikh, hearty double kisses. The Sheikh rose when Sheikh Salem made his appearance. Little ceremony was observed, though much respect was shewn to the Sheikh, who spoke and gesticulated with considerable dignity. It was a strange scene altogether; but one group was really beautiful—Sheikh Hussein, in his robes of scarlet and red turban, widely different, both in dress and features, from his clansmen, with his young son, so fair and graceful, lying at his feet, and looking fondly up in his face. Many other children were admitted into the circle, or played outside the tent—all of them, seemingly, much indulged. Others, quite black and stark-naked, were running about among the tents.

When we had had enough of it, we slipped away under the corner of the tent, and repaired to our own, where we found the little Sheikh Mohammed sitting at the door, watching Missirie's proceedings. We invited him in; he sat down very modestly, first on the sand, then on the bed. We gave him some preserved dates and nebbeks for himself and his little brothers. While dinner was in preparation, (for the Sheikh killed a sheep for us,) we squatted before the tent with the Bedouins, playing with a young wolf, and watching the evening occupations of the camp. Children were at play; women, in their long blue robes, bringing in dry wood for the night-fires; two others were grinding at the mill at the door of one of the tents; an animated talk was going on in the Sheikh's; his horse was prowling about in its rich trappings; goats (the little Bedouin goat is a beautiful creature) smelling about our tent, and at the slumbering Hassan, not knowing what to make of him; dogs barking, &c., &c.—a happy, cheerful, peaceful scene as ever I witnessed.

At last, Sheikh Hussein made his appearance with a huge wooden bowl full of mutton, and we all gathered round it—the sheikh and his son, ourselves, Missirie, and Hassan—and commenced operations, dipping in the dish, and eating with our fingers in the eastern fashion. Large soft cakes of excellent bread, like Scotch scones, disposed round the dish, served at once for plates and food—read this to Sir Robert Leigh, and he will quote Virgil. The sheikh came again to coffee, with Abdel-Hug's (M. Linant's) letter of introduction for Clarke and Mac Lennan, stuck in his girdle; yesterday he carried it on his turban. I doubt whether he could read it.

The camp at night was a beautiful spectacle—a crescent of lights and fires flaming around us, the grinding still continuing. A lively confab was still going on in Sheikh Hussein's tent. We were told afterwards that the tribe were much dissatisfied at his having engaged to conduct us for so little; if so, it tells highly for him that he never mentioned it to us.

The grinding was still going on when we woke next morning; and a man churning butter in a skin, see-sawing it on his knee; two children were plaguing the poor little wretch of a wolf, pulling it about with a string—but it will bite soon. The little Sheikh Mohammed breakfasted with us on coffee, leban, and bread, and, before starting, we presented him with a pair of yellow Morocco slippers and boots for his mother, who made her appearance in her finery at the moment of our departure. And so we bade farewell to our friendly Bedouins.

After four hours' continual, but very gentle ascent, we came in sight of Mount Hor, now called Gebel Haroun, or Aaron's mountain, whose house, Hassan very gravely informed us, he had seen at Bagdad—mistaking him for Haroun Alraschid. An hour and a half farther, after passing the entrance to Wady Sabra, we quitted Wady Araba, and ascended eastwards into the dreary Gebel Shara, the Mount Seir of Scripture.

By many a romantic wady and wild gabi, they winded on to Petra, entered the Land of Promise, at length saw Hebron, and here broke up their cavalcade, which had protected them from no greater visible danger than a few harmless shepherds from Gaza, at first mistaken for a predatory band. At Hebron, the children called them pigs; but otherwise they were civilly enough treated, being regarded as pilgrims to the Holy City. They engaged camels for Jerusalem in Hebron, which they found a rather improving place, with well-built houses of hewn stone, and bazaars well filled. They set forward at noon—

Following the ancient road, along the brac-side, and between corn-fields, olive-groves, and vineyards—each with its watch-tower, the stones carefully gathered out, and fenced in with a stone-wall—as in the days of David, Ishiah, and our Saviour. At two, we stopped at a place called Derriwuh, evidently an ancient site, and continued for some hours winding among hills, presenting the same monotonous but pleasing scenery. It was a lovely evening—the birds were singing sweetly, and numerous flocks of sheep and goats were cropping their evening meal as we drew nigh to the city of David, who so often must have fed his flocks on those very hills—the scene, too, just as probably, of that apparition of the heavenly host who proclaimed to the humble shepherds of Bethlehem the birth of the good shepherd, David's namesake—"The Beloved" of God—in those blessed words, "Glory to God in the Highest, and on Earth peace, good-will towards men."

About an hour and a quarter to the south of Bethlehem, coming to the brow of the hill, we saw the celebrated pools of Solomon below us, and a beautiful crop of wheat covering the slopes of the valley where probably once stood his palace and pleasure-gardens. These reservoirs are really worthy of Solomon. I had formed no conception of their magnificence; they are three in number, the smallest between four and five hundred feet in length—the waters were discharged from one into another, and conveyed from the lowest, by an aqueduct, to Jerusalem. I descended into the third and largest; it is lined with plaster, like the Indian chunam; and hanging terraces run all round it. I wonder if Solomon ever walked there with the Queen of Sheba.

At half past seven, that evening, we reached Bethlehem. It stands on the slope of a hill, of difficult ascent, at least by night. The stars were out, but it was still unusually light as we entered the town, and proceeded to the Spanish Convent, a large fortress-like building, where we were kindly welcomed, and ushered into a very handsome apartment. The venerable Superior presently came to see us, and grew very talkative. He honoured us with his company to breakfast the next morning, and we afterwards visited the church and the supposed Cave of the Nativity, gorgeous all—but what most touched me was the simple tribute of several little children, who, speaking in a whisper, and with awe in their faces, lighted their little bodkins of tapers at the large candles, and stuck them at their side.

In proceeding next morning to Jerusalem—

A marriage party came past, or, rather, a crowd of women and children, some of them very pretty, all gaily dressed and unveiled, and singing a most discordant epithalamium—to meet the bride at the church door, and convey her home. While they awaited her appearance, two parties detached themselves from the throng, the one dancing round and round, hand in hand, as in some unsophisticated nooks of merry England they were probably doing at that very moment round the Maypole, for it was May-morning—the other, their arms linked, advancing towards them, and retreating in regular measure; the song going on all the time. Presently the bride came out, veiled from head to foot, and mounted her horse; her companions closed round her, and the procession moved. We sat on our camels enjoying the scene, and expended not a little gunpowder in her honour; to her death she will remember the nuptial honours paid her by the English.

You can scarcely imagine what a cheerful aspect the rich and varied costumes both of men and women, particularly the latter, impart to these towns of Palestine; the contrast is delightful to us, so long accustomed to the dull blue cloaks and veiled faces of the Egyptian women.

Riding slowly on to Jerusalem, we met numbers of most picturesque-looking white-headed old men, and many lovely children. One of them, particularly a Russian boy, taking off his fur cap to return our salutation, with his flowing ringlets and sweet face, reminded me of one of Raphael's angels. We met many parties too of Turks, Armenians, and Greeks, pilgrimising—the former to Rachel's tomb, the latter to Bethlehem. Some saluted us with "Bon viaggio," and "Benvenuti, Signorini!" others with the emphatic "Salam," "Peace!" or by simply laying the hand on the heart in the graceful oriental fashion. It was delightful thus to be welcomed to the City of Peace by men of all creeds and countries, a sort of anticipation of the happy time when all nations will go up to worship One God at Jerusalem, and all will receive the welcome of the heart as well as the lip.

They entered the Holy City by the Bethlem Gate, and took up their abode at the Latin convent. Lord Lindsay enjoyed the hallowed spots in the precincts of Jerusalem much more than the filthy and half desolate streets of the Holy City. He ascended the Mount of Olives, he journeyed to Bethany, to the valley of the Jordan, to the plain of Gilgal; and he bivouacked by the banks of Jordan. They proceeded to Damascus. The country, always romantic and lovely, became more and more rich as they rode through thickly clustered villages, which find no place in any map. One grieves to read what follows:—"The whole country was teeming with the richest crops when we passed through it; but the enlightened government of Mahomed Ali precludes their profiting by the bounty of nature; and the conscription, as in Egypt, has so drained the villages of men, that more than once, and in the most out-of-the-way parts of the country, none of the peasants would act as guides, for fear of being impressed for soldiers."

There was still much to see, and Mount Carmel, and Tabor, and Nazareth, and the plain of Jezreel, and Cans of Galilee, and many other memorable places were visited; and, on the ridge of Hermon, Dr Maclellan, who, with Mr Clarke, had travelled in company with Lord Lindsay and Mr Ramsay, from Mount Sinai, saw snow, which he had not seen for sixteen years.

Lord Lindsay, who is blessed with a lively fancy, imagined he had found out different ancient places, the sites of which no one now pretends to determine; and it is probable that some of his conjectures may be correct. One would at least wish to believe so. Twenty-three days were spent on the meandering journey between Jerusalem and Damascus; the weather was now hot, and the party had almost always camped out, even when some sort of lodgings might have been obtained. From Damascus, Lord Lindsay went to Palmyra with two Englishmen, and a Dutch and a Danish gentleman, bent on the same quest. They took an armed escort, but scarcely required it. Mr Ramsay also set out on the journey; but, feeling himself indisposed, returned, after five hours, to Damascus. Distances are measured by hours, where neither roods, miles, nor milestones are known. Symptoms of cholera had come on; and Mr Ramsay died on the following day. On returning, Lord Lindsay received this painful intelligence. He expresses no regret at not having given up the city of Zenobia and coming back with his sick friend; but we are certain that he must have felt much. After this, Lord Lindsay visited Baalbec, and camped under and luxuriated around the ancient, glorious, and renowned Cedars of Lebanon and their younger offshoots; but a damp is cast over the narrative, to the reader, by the death of Mr Ramsay in circumstances so desolate and distressing; and, after this, the liveliness of his friend sounds harsh discord. At Damascus, these really agreeable Letters are concluded; and the remainder of the volume is filled with Mr Farren's speculations on Turkish, Russian, and Egyptian politics. This gentleman had lived for several years as British consul at Damascus, and he seems well acquainted with the various tribes and clans of Syria, their intestine divisions, and the history of the contests, warlike or diplomatic, &c., fraudulent, between the Sultan and his ambitious and refractory great vassal, Mehemet Ali. Mr Farren's sympathies go with the Sultan, which is the general way, we believe, whether it may be that of sound policy or not.

LONDON SKETCHES.—NO. II.

TIGRIS MAJOR AND TIGRIS MINOR.

"Two tigers met on Afric's shore;
The first tiger thought the second a bore."
Varior. Bombastes Furiosus.

My friend Joe Green would be the greatest bore on earth, if there existed no such person as Colonel Clump; or rather Colonel Clump would retain undisputed possession of the same bad eminence, were not people to be found who assign the palm to Joseph Green. It is a choice of evils. Joe is a fine fine gentleman; Clump, a coarse. Joe is a sipper of green tea, who sports a broken-down hack in Hyde Park; stares every woman in the pit tier, at the opera, out of countenance every Saturday night; and lounges on the wait for chance tickets at the Zoological Gardens every Sunday afternoon. He is as true to all the exhibitions as the check-takers; and wherever well-dressed women most do congregate, there the over-dressed person of Green becomes a fixture. Dividing his leisure between London and Brighton, his face is grown familiar to the sauntering world as the sign of the Bull and Mouth, or any other vulgar generality. Yet Joe affects a conscious simper, in the notion that, because the eyes of five duchesses a-day fall unwittingly upon his trivial unmeaning countenance, he is thereby enshrined in the odour of fashionable sanctity!

Colonel Clump, on the contrary, has a soul above duchesses, and fancies himself a knowing blade. Dividing his year between Cheltenham and town, Clump eats his ice at Farrance's, his dinner at the Bedford or the Blue Posts, and "looks in at Gliddon's." Clump is apt to play the bully at half-price with the box-openers, and is great at Vauxhall on the opening and concluding nights. He is, in short, a noisy vulgar beast, with either a cigar or an oath perpetually in his mouth.

It is easy to perceive that these two are varieties of the same species. Yet, though alike partaking of tiger nature, a sort of natural antipathy exists between the two. Whenever they meet, where it is possible to tip each other the cold shoulder, Clump whistles, as if for want of thought, while Green hums an air from Lucia di Lammermoor, and both pass by unrecognising. Each is in the secret of the other's small means and large pretensions. Clump knows that poor Joseph labours under a caoutchouc wig; Joseph is aware that the Colonel sports a dicky. There is no mutual esteem between the two tigers.

It was my hard fate to make the acquaintance of both at the same moment; no matter whether in a steamboat, on a railroad, or in a balloon. A common danger begetting a common panic, (one of those touches of nature which make the whole world kin,) brought about a momentary familiarity which clings to me like the filthy stain to the hand of Lady Macbeth! To whatever extremely public place I betake myself, either Green is sure to be beforehand with me, or Clump to be in waiting, with his, "How are you, my dear fellow?" ere I have time to look about me. Beulah Spa, Tyrolean Minstrels, Madame Tussaud's Gallery, or any one of the ten theatres now open in the metropolis, exhibits to my loathing gaze the unwelcome features of either tigris major or tigris minor; and the first sentence uttered by the one, is sure to reflect bitterly upon the other.

The other night, in the lobby at the opera, I found my arm familiarly laid hold of by Joe Green; and, as the hand that rested upon it exhibited a large turquoise ring outside the glove, and was adorned by a plaited ruffie, I looked round involuntarily, to make sure that the malicious eye of some dear familiar friend was not taking note of my degradation.

"How are you, my dear fellow?" cried the tiger, in his usual impertinent phrase. "Amazingly fall open—prodigiously hot—Lal-lal-lal in tremendous force. The first time I've met you here this season! and, 'pon my soul, you're out of luck."

"In what way?—Lablache, as you allow, is in tremendous force, and Grisé in the finest voice. I came to hear them, and see the new ballet."

"But you did not reckon upon all you were likely to see—that fellow Clump is here to-night!"

"I hope he is well, and has got a good stall," said I, striving to bow my way off. "There is room enough in the house for all of us."

"Don't flatter yourself of getting rid of him, my dear fellow," cried Joe, seizing my button. "Clump is the very man to lay hold of you the moment he sees you; and I can tell you it is no easy matter to shake him off. Clump has not the slightest consideration for the feelings of others. He has no idea of the annoyance a man about town may experience from having such a person hanging upon him in public. One night, if you'll believe, he attacked me in the saloon at the Colosseum, put his arm in mine, and walked me about, without the smallest apology. What was the consequence? The moment I was released, a hundred fellows came up to me, with Brummel's question to Albanley—'Who is your fat friend?' What could I say? I vow to — it was too bad!"

"What was too bad?"

"To place one in such a predicament. It is not every one that cares to own he has an acquaintance in the Poyaisian Green Hussars, or the British Legion, or Horse Marines, or whatever it may be in which Clump calls himself colonel."

"He calls himself a half-pay captain in our army, I believe," said I. "But I really know little or nothing about him. I made his acquaintance, Mr Green, if you remember, at the same period as your own."

"To be sure you did; and very sorry I was for you at the time. I have often said since to my friend Lady Phynn, and my friends Lady Fitzwiggon and her daughters, how truly I felt for a gentlemanly fellow like yourself being so horribly bored. For, between ourselves, that Colonel Clump is the most abominably pushing person! Lady Phynn declares that he left his card upon her for no earthly reason but because he dined in the next tent to her at Beulah."

"Clump was aware, perhaps, that his friend, Joe Green was a favourite, and thought it a sufficient passport to her Ladyship's good opinion," said I, with a significant smile.

"Very likely. But it does not exactly suit me to have a person of Colonel Clump's description Joe-Greening me. What would Dashwood and Fitzroy think, if they were to hear him take such a liberty? One Sunday, too, he actually came and joined me as I was looking at the Giraffes with Lady Fitzwiggon and her girls; and because little Bessy (who, I admit, is a bit of a hoyden) happened to smile at some of his vulgarities, the fellow takes off his hat to the Fitzwiggons whenever he meets them."

"A compliment to yourself through your friends," said I, endeavouring to slip away; and, having at length succeeded in extricating myself from the paws of the tiger, I was hastening up to my sister's box, to escape a renewal of my martyrdom, when a hasty slap on the back informed me that I was overtaken by Colonel Clump.

"How are you, my fine fellow?" cried he, in a tone that proved him, like Lablache, to be in tremendous voice. "Escaping from that horrid fellow, Joe Green—eh? By heaven, 'tis enough to make one forswear the Opera!"

"What is enough?"

"The certainty of having that nauseous animal fasten upon one. The moment he finds out that a man is tolerably well up in society, like you and I, Joe Green sticks to him like a burr. Now, really, though, as times go, no one can answer for not having a disagreeable acquaintance or so, there is no occasion to wear them like a feather in one's cap—eh? I don't suppose myself more fortunate than others. Thanks to clubs, watering places, and my cousin Sir Phelim's standing for a county, I am occasionally compelled to touch my hat to an odd-looking fellow, more or less. But I do it in a quiet way. I don't feel myself required to pull up and hail them before the windows of the United Service Club."

"You are a member, then?" said I, somewhat surprised.

"Not exactly. But I am acquainted with an infinite number of fellows who are; and I've been up these two months for the Junior."

"With the chance of being blackballed ten years hence," thought I; but I held my peace on so gunpowder a subject.

"Yet, if you'll believe me," resumed Clump, still harping on his tiger, "that horrid person, Mr Green, seized my hand last winter, as I was coming out of the St James' Bazaar, arm in arm with Sir Murtough M'Flannagan; and Sir Murtough was so disgusted that he immediately shuffled off. Now, as Sir Murtough sailed the next day for Paramatta, (where he is appointed Lieutenant Governor,) I may never have it in my power to explain to him how very slight is my acquaintance with Mister Green."

"Poor Joe!" was my involuntary ejaculation, with an involuntary smile.

"My dear fellow, beware how you 'Joe' such a tiger as that, in such a place as this!" cried Clump. "People who don't know you as well as I do, may overhear, and fancy you one of his intimates."

"It would be a very far-fetched fancy," said I, coldly, "as no one is better aware than yourself. I had the honour, Colonel Clump, to make Joe Green's acquaintance at the same time, and in the same accidental way, as your own."

"Indeed, you had; and, by heavens, I know how to pity you! At present, my dear fellow, you little guess to what extremities such an acquaintance may lead. I've no doubt you saw in the papers," he continued, lowering his voice, "an account of my little frac cas at Boulogne, last summer. A vastly disagreeable piece of business, to have one's name in that way before the public, especially for a man who has views of distinguishing himself in his profession. I was at that moment on the very point of starting for Barcelona; but, after so unpleasant an affair, I thought it better to defer joining Don Carlos, till the story blew over."

"'Tis an ill-wind," thought I, "that blows no one good. Don Carlos is a luckier dog than he deserves."

"But by heavens, sir, the remote cause of the whole business, was neither more nor less than my bowing acquaintance with Joe Green! When I found myself compelled to make an appeal, on the score of character, to two distinguished members of the wretched squad which Boulogne sur Mer presumes to call a club, they had the impudence to answer, that 'the only harm they knew of me was, being too good-natured in the choice of my acquaintance.' That this innuendo pointed at Joe Green, I could not for a moment doubt. Yet, after all, the fellow will go on shaking hands with me, as if I had no fear of the caricature shops before my eyes! But come along! I caught a glimpse of him just now, sideling up the staircase. He's looking for us! Rely upon it, he wants to fasten upon us for the rest of the evening."

For "come along," I chose to read "go," and scudded along in an opposite direction. But the following day, on the race-course at Epsom, I heard myself hailed by name in a stentorian voice, and, on looking round, perceived the Colonel perched on a barouche box, side by side with an individual whose whiskers were still more bushy, and his mustachions still more lengthy, than his own. All the colours of the rainbow, and a few intervening tints, were included between the fancy waistcoats and neckerchiefs of the two. A cursory view of the case determined me to pass and make no sign.

"Ha! my dear fellow!" cried a voice, which convinced me that, having escaped Soylla, I had rushed upon Charybdis—and Joe Green immediately appeared in view. "I saw you scudding along to keep clear of the tiger squadron! That awful barouche full of Clumps! Poor Lady Fitzwiggon gave a guinea to a stray coachman, for the loan of a pair of horses to get on the hill with, when she found, after her ponies were taken off, that she was close to Colonel Clump; while poor, dear Lady Phynn is actually remaining behind in town, because he gave her to understand that he should be here! Really, such fellows are a public nuisance."

Before the end of the day's sport, Clump took occasion to creep up to me, and observe—"Do you know, I could scarcely tell what to make of you this morning, when I saw you fighting shy of my cousin's, Sir Phelim's party. But, a moment afterwards, I spied out Joe Green standing near us, and understood in a jiffy your motive for being off—a word to the wise."

My anxieties, however, on account of the feuds of the Tigers, are happily at an end. I am now (I write it between sorrow and gladness) released from their rival officiousness. Tigris major and Tigris minor are as safe as their tailors can make them, and Whitecross Street and Banco Regia keep them. Clump's sole bargain on finding himself tapped on the shoulder, was a prayer that he might be spared the Queen's Bench, whither Joe Green had been translated the previous day; Joe Green, on travelling to the Surrey side, having been heard to ejaculate—"Thank heaven, I shall at least be spared, in the Bench, the affront of associating with that horrid fellow, Clump! It really requires more nerve than I am master of, to be seen in company with such a tiger!"

THE STRANGE PREACHER.

"Wherever I went, the rumour spread through the place before me, 'The man in the leather suit is come.'"—George Fox's Journal.

AN old man there came to the market-place,
With a strong and a bold, yet a cheerful face;
And one after one people drew to the spot,
Who lingered, and lingered, unknowing for what.
In the looks of the stranger who stationed was there,
By the market-cross in the open air,
Was something they were not accustomed to see—
So they questioned each other of what it could be.
Some said 'twas his dress, which of leather was made,
Some spoke of his features' peculiar shade:
Whatever it might be, the folks grew to a crowd,
And questions were getting impatient and loud.
With one word of his mouth they were silent as death:
When he stretched forth his hand was a pause in each breath;
And a feeling like thought through each bosom there ran,
That the being they heard might be more than a man.
In his words were such fervour, and fulness, and grace,
And the truth of his heart lent such truth to his face,
Had he urged them to pluck down the town, they had tried,
Although in the effort they vainly had died.
Had he spoken of wrongs which the people suffered,
Of evils the people themselves should have cured;

NO LVIII.—VOL. V.

Had he told them of tyrants and tyrannous laws,
They had risen to shed their hearts' blood in his cause.

But his words were of peace, and of truth, and of love,
And of One once on earth who came down from above;
Who, that peace might abound, in good will unto man,
Had endured all the pangs that humanity can.

Much spoke he of temples that were but of stone,
And priests clothed in purple whom Christ did not own,
Of merciless pastors, whom Christ had foretold:
Should seem to protect, while they ravaged the fold.

Such a picture of Christ and his people he drew—
Of the chosen and simple, the faithful and few—
That, absorbed in the vision, they saw what he said,
And it seemed that his words gave new life to the dead.

They were chained by his spirit, they could not depart;
Conviction, like lightning, he flashed on the heart;
Though powerful his language, his aspect was mild;
And their thoughts were at once of a king and a child.

Ere he ceased, all the strongholds of pride were o'erthrown;
And natures were softened, though harder than stone:
When he ceased, in dim eyes were affectionate tears;
And in hearts a remembrance deep given for years.

3 K

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

A DOMESTIC SKETCH.

"You do not wonder at my admiration of Isabella, and you hope my choice will prove a happy one," repeated Henry Wallace. "This is rather less cordial approval than I had hoped for from you, my dear aunt. With the generality of relations, I should have well known that the smallness of Isabella's fortune would be considered an obstacle, which could not be counterbalanced by her beauty and talents, or by what I prize so much, the charming enthusiasm of her character; but you are so far from mercenary—you can, in general, overlook all paltry considerations—and you gave such hearty approbation to Philip's marriage with my cousin Jane Seymour, who had even less fortune than Isabella—that I own I am rather disappointed. But when you know Isabella better, I trust you will think me the most fortunate of all your nephews."

"I did indeed rejoice in Philip's marriage with my dear Jane," said Miss Jervis, after a pause of meditation on both sides; "for I felt that her character was one which would fortify her husband's in every good resolution; assist and support him in adversity, if evil days should come; and that the moderation of her desires was not merely the effect of temporary circumstances, but the result of principle. Many a girl, if transferred from the exact economy of secluded life to the enjoyment of a large income, becomes an extravagant and lavish wife. In short, it is very difficult to judge what, in altered circumstances, a young and apparently ductile being is prepared to become. Isabella has great advantages both of mind and person—love her then, Henry; but do not love blindly; seek to strengthen her character, and do not, as too many do, spoil your wife before marriage, and then appear the austere judge afterwards."

Miss Jervis was the kind friend and counsellor of several nephews and nieces, who were in the habit of confiding to her their most important plans; desirous, if possible, to obtain the sanction of her approval; and who felt secure that, if they were not so fortunate as to gain her approbation, they were secure from ever receiving a taunt or an unkind reflection afterwards. Philip Maxwell and Henry Wallace were both promising members of the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn; and the latter was, as we have seen, now determining to marry a beautiful girl, whom his aunt well knew—Isabella Talbot, who had been chiefly educated in France; one who was, in conventional phrase, "fond of society, and formed to adorn it."

The course of life which Isabella led in London after her marriage, gratified and stimulated her ambition. The Government of the day was liberal, party ran high, and she took a warm part in political discussions. The children with which she was blessed, were successively designated by patriot names. She prided herself on the enthusiasm of her character. She was intimate and friendly with her relation, Jane; but with her she rather affected a tone of superiority, which sometimes, though not often, had its effect even with Philip Maxwell, and made him, for a while, look upon Isabella as a superior being.

"How well Isabella dresses, and how admirably she talks!" said Philip, on his return from a dinner party at Henry Wallace's. "What feeling, what enthusiasm, and how much taste she has, Jane!" added he, gently, but gravely. "Why do not you employ the same milliner that Isabella does? You are rather too unobservant of these things."

"I could not, if I would, rival Isabella," was rising to the lips of Jane; but she did not utter the words. "Perhaps I am, Philip," was all the reply she made; and there was no irritation of look or manner; and, trivial as such matters may well appear to the philosopher, they are often a severe test of a woman's temper.

"Yes," said Jane to herself, when next she went to her toilet—"I have been too negligent in these little things; small as they are, it is right, as my mother used to say, not to neglect a husband's taste, and never to let him feel ashamed of his wife, if possible." Poor Jane heaved a sigh, to think that human love should be in any degree dependent on human vanity; but she resolved to remedy her error, and she did so with her usual good sense, and without going into any excess.

One day, Isabella and Jane were both in company, when the interesting French novel of De Vigny, "Cing Mers," was made the subject of debate. Isabella expressed her great aversion to the character of Mary of Mantua—she said that it was heartless and unnatural.

"Heartless, but not unnatural in one educated to value show and state above personal affection," said Jane.

"Can you imagine such a character possible?" exclaimed Isabella, with an appearance of indignation, which, as usual, made the company enraptured with her charming enthusiasm.

"Yes," said Jane, calmly; "when ambition once gains possession of a mind, I do not think there is any space left for disinterested love or true patriotism. I think the scene in which the Queen of France tries the diamond tiara on the head of Mary, is admirably painted. The character is natural in such artificial circumstances."

"And can you," said Isabella, "sympathise with such feelings of vanity? I thought you had been too sensible to comprehend the love of diamonds."

"I should have been a blind frequenter of the gay circles of London, Isabella, if I had failed to observe the powerful influence which the glittering paraphernalia of rank exercises on the minds of women. Nor on women only, else might the brilliant badge of the garter become obsolete among statesmen; but, alas! how unfortunate is this influence among women! It is not the royal rank alone which seems raised above the sweet connexions of true love and friendship, and which strives to content itself (if I may use the word content) with perpetual glitter in the place of real happiness. Even in our rank of life, I see girls approach the altar, seeking to dazzle their own eyes with the artificial splendour of their lot—looking, like poor Mary of Mantua, at the brilliant ambassador and the diamond crown, and striving to forget the poor old King of Poland, who is to be the husband !”

“There are not many women, certainly, who have your plain matter-of-fact sense,” said Isabella.

One of the company mentioned a late article in one of the Quarterly Reviews, in which the writer deplores the unromantic influence of modern education, and declares that, for the first time perhaps in history, youth of both sexes, in the higher and middle classes of life, are universally growing up unromantic, from which he seems to forebode national evil.*

Isabella smiled triumphantly at what she considered an authority on her side. “I do love a little romance,” said she: “without a disposition to value the beautiful without weighing its utility, to turn from the dull and trite details of drudgery and duty to the brighter creations of hope and imagination, the world would be dull indeed !”

The smiles of the company sympathised with Isabella. “I am inclined to think,” said Miss Jervis, “that you do not take the same view of the word romantic which the reviewer intended. The world is not, I apprehend, getting more dry and plodding, more addicted to the close duties of the desk ; and works of imagination are, I believe, as much patronised as ever. The word romance is one of the most vague in its meaning ; it is often applied to almost everything which is not real, which does not exist. Every boarding-school Miss is romantic in her own eyes, when she fancies herself an object of admiration to those who view her with indifference, and thinks that a cottage at Windermere, and fifty pounds a-year, would be charming for the forever of a fifty years’ futurity. Is the world getting less romantic in this way ? If so, I see not the pity.”

“No, my dear Miss Jervis,” said Jane ; “I should agree with you in wishing to keep young heads from such vain chimeras ; but yet we gain but little, if a spirit of sordid calculation take the place. Love in a cottage may often be but a foolish dream ; but it is surely a purer vision than the castle, the diamonds, and the brilliant appendages, without love !”

“Yes,” said Philip Maxwell ; “and I do believe, Miss Jervis, that my little wife has as much romance, only of a pure and sensible kind, as any one can wish for. The influence of London life tends much to destroy such feelings. A young man comes from his college full of thoughts of disinterested patriotism, pure self-denying friendship, and all the other virtues which he hopes to find in life combined with all the talents. But by degrees, he finds himself mistaken, deceived, deluded ; forced in one case to retract the homage which he had thought due to a venerable statesman, at another time compelled to relinquish his hope of finding a young Alfred in a youthful prince. The details of business often weary, the selfishness of partisans often disgusts him—then it is refreshing to the mind to come home to one who is ever pure in thought and steady in counsel. Jane is my nymph Egeria !”

“I did not know,” said Isabella, who overheard the concluding sentence, “that Jane had been a politician.”

“She wisely keeps herself free from all intrigues,” said Philip ; “but she enters into all my views and opinions, and I am often glad to feel my judgment confirmed by hers. Jane’s education has fitted her for this.”

“Would it be well if women were to take an open part in politics ?” asked one of the company.

Isabella exclaimed enthusiastically, that it would—“That it was a shame, in our country especially, where a woman is allowed to sit on the throne, for her sex to be excluded from the right of voting, and the other political privileges of men. What say you, Mrs Maxwell ?”

“I am quite satisfied that men should vote for us,” said Jane. “Even if women had votes, they must surely elect men as their representatives ; they must therefore even then confide in their protection ; and why should not women now, as heretofore, rest satisfied that the cause of freedom must be the same for both. If women do indeed labour under some legal disabilities which might be easily removed, I think the case needs only to be fairly stated, and we shall not long need champions. The cause of the injured Africans was pleaded by the most eloquent and gifted of the British Parliament ; they needed not black orators to assert their rights ; and surely we may securely depend on the justice, (to speak not of the affection,) of our brother Englishmen.”

“While election contests are carried on as at present,” said Philip Maxwell, “I must think that women are saved from great annoyance in not being required to give their votes ; but no one can dispute their influence, which I am sorry to say is now generally exerted to retard the march of improvement.”

“And in revenge,” cried Isabella, “you would confine them to the small duties of the household ?”

“By no means : I would enlarge the sphere of their knowledge, that they might be fit to be the mothers of patriots. I would seek to ennoble their minds, not in order to give them an ambition for distinction—that fallacious Will-o’-the-Wisp—but that they may be happy themselves, and best promote the happiness of others. It is well observed by an eloquent French writer on this subject, that when we seek to confine

* See article on “Letters from Palmyra,” in the Westminster Review.

women to the management of their households, and adapt their education to that alone, we forget that, from the domestic circle, and from female influence, arise the errors and prejudices which govern the world."²

The first years of the married life of both Jane and Isabella were years of prosperity; both their husbands rose in their profession, and both were in time rewarded with part of the patronage which government is so well able to bestow on a few of its learned friends.

Isabella's ambition ever led her husband on in his aspirations: it is so virtuous for the mother of a family to be ambitious! Who that has a son of promise at school at Eton does not view in him the possible successor to the station of Pitt and Canning? What young wife of an ascending barrister sees not, in shadowy perspective, the honours of the woolstack? To live, then, in one of the most fashionable streets, to keep the most distinguished company, give splendid entertainments, and live quite up to your income, is the path of prudence—is not it?

Isabella at least pleaded expediency, that common apology for what our own reason half condemns; and well did she perform her part in the management of the brilliant drama. It was sometimes said by visitors that, with such a wife, a man's fortune was half made. But the drama was not over.

The breath of popular applause is proverbially inconstant; but not more inconstant is it than the favour of courts, and the slippery foundation on which depends the office of prime minister, with all his hosts of friends!

After a few agitating days and nights of stormy debate, Maxwell and Wallace returned to their respective homes, with the news that the Ministers had resigned; that their party was out of office; that another star had gained the ascendant.

"It is mortifying, deeply mortifying," said Jane, "to know that so many projects which we hoped might have added to the happiness of our generation, are cut off by party intrigue or court levity! Your plans for the improvement of education are interrupted, and you must submit to find your ideas borrowed and brought forward perhaps again by your old opponents, who will seek for popularity by now proposing the same measures which they formerly rejected with asperity."

"Well," said Philip, "let us hope they may adopt some measures of improvement for the country, and then we will not quarrel as to who was the originator of the plan; but it is not on public grounds alone that you will have to regret this change."

"Your income is reduced; well, we shall do very well notwithstanding," was Jane's immediate reply. It was not the reply of thoughtlessness, but of cool judgment. Jane immediately revolved how alterations might be the best made in their mode of life, without diminishing her husband's happiness or her children's improvement. She took a ride with Philip into the country. Nothing tends more to calm the mind when it has been over-stimulated, than the quiet aspect of nature and the breath of the pure air; and she pointed out to her husband, when they were removed a little way from the circles of fashion, how many dwellings contained all requisites for family comfort, without requiring the income of an East Indian.

"I have often thought," said she, "that those who live in London, where buildings are pressed together until fresh air becomes a luxury, are at last apt to consider air and space as the high-bought privileges of affluence, and to connect ideas of irksome restraint and obscurity with economy; but the world is wide enough yet to have sunshine and air for all her children, without their buying it at the costly rate of a residence in the Regent's Park. I have been thinking, Philip, how delightful it would be to have our boys live with us, and go to day-school, instead of sending them to Harrow."

"But they would be sadly in your way, Jane, I fear."

"I should like the employment of superintending them," said Jane; "and now that you will have a little more leisure, you will be able to give them some of your time, will not you?"

"My dear Jane, how delightfully unspoiled you are by your London life!"

"Perhaps I was never quite up to it, and so can more easily come down," said Jane, with a smile.

Isabella heard of the change in her husband's prospects with consternation. Anger against the Ministry for resigning, was combined with lamentations over the ruin of her husband's and sons' prospects in life; then she threw out hints against what she termed the romantic folly of adherence to party, when fortune and consequence are at stake.

It seemed impossible to her to change her style of living: bills were already pressing, for Wallace and Isabella had rather forestalled the future, than contented themselves with the present income.

At last Wallace's mind was brought, although reluctantly, to adopt his wife's suggestion, that he might try to make terms in the victorious camp. She felt convinced that a man of his talents would be received with acclamation.

The minister was courteous; but when pressed on the subject of offices, declared that he had many candidates on every list. "Perhaps something in the colonies?" Henry Wallace shuddered as he thought of Sierra Leone, and the other climes where the pestilence walketh by noonday.

"I have a delicate wife and a young family," said he, with diffidence.

"Well, sir," said the minister, in a tone of willing benevolence, "I will see: there is a situation in New South Wales—climate, you know, unobjectionable; a near relation of my own had it in contemplation; but I think your talents deserve such a post ; and, if my colleagues should not disapprove, it shall be yours."

There was evidently no superior alternative ; and Henry Wallace endeavoured to shew the adequate amount of gratitude.

Isabella was in despair : she reviled the ingratitude of the human race ; she compared herself and her husband to the noble spirits formerly banished for their patriotism, or for their adherence to principle.

"We are not banished for our patriotism, Isabella—say rather for our ambition : but well said Lord Bacon, 'the man who has wife and children, has given hostages to Fortune.'"

Philip, whose wife was rather a hostage to virtue than to fortune, lived to gain a most respectable rank in his profession, while Henry and Isabella were banished to the distant settlements of Australia.

"Alas !" said Miss Jervis, "I am afraid that Isabella will now find little comfort in her 'charming, romantic enthusiasm.' But, in my opinion, she was very worldly ; and worldliness, surely, is not romance."

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Steam-Engine. By Hugo Reid.

Mr Reid's description of this engine is an excellent one, and was wanted. Within a moderate compass, and as freely as possible from technicalities, he has given its history, and an account of its existing condition ; so that any one desirous to know the nature of that power which is working such marvels within all civilized societies, may now have his curiosity gratified. The work, although popular, is likewise accurate. It is the production of a man of science, who has already distinguished himself in the field of popular instruction.

There is not a more impressive subject than the contemplation of this extraordinary power. Coming among mankind almost with the suddenness of an apparition, it has, within the space of a half century, risen to be one of the most potent of all the influences which modify and guide the course of human affairs ; nor can the very boldest thinker yet dare to say what vast changes in the forms of society will not ultimately evolve from the operation of an agent, capable of indefinite extension, applicable to the execution of any labour, and which has reduced the toil of man to a mere aid or supplement of its own ! New powers in the social world, like new ideas in the system of thought, work their way to full efficiency, slowly but surely ; they first endeavour to operate within existing forms, striving as if to accommodate, and patient of inconvenience. So now is the steam-engine. But soon the kernel, with this new life which has been given to it, after expanding and filling every cranny and wrinkle of its shell, refuses such bondage any longer, and the prison-house explodes. The time must and shall come, although it is not yet, when this exhaustless, and, in regard to man's economic wants, this omnipotent agent, shall have knocked the chains from the bondsman, and raised the stature of the drudge !

Two things now restrain the power of steam, which "our mind's eye" can see as passed away. The first is the mechanical difficulty of using steam of very high pressure. The advantage of such is enormous ; for, besides the simplicity of the construction of engines employing it, it is a well-established physical law, that the higher the pressure under which steam is generated, the less is the heat necessary to produce a given effect. This law has no known limit, so that the economy of high-pressure steam may be almost indefinitely extended ; but, unhappily, mechanics have not yet assured us against those accidents so frequent on the Mississippi, (in that country, everything—even an explosion—is done on the grandest scale,) and which, in one second of time, send some 500 human beings, along with the disjecta mem- bra of some 500 more, a-journeying unwillingly towards the moon ! The obstacle here is clearly mechanical, the inadequacy of existing securities, and the fault of materials ; and these are difficulties over which mankind will unquestionably be victorious. The second restriction will also undoubtedly pass away. It will be manifest without explanation, how much cheaper and more commodious one engine of double power must be, than two engines of half its power. If, for instance, one grand engine were substituted for the multitudes now at work in Manchester, the saving (including original construction, expense of fuel, and attendance) would be, as we are prepared to maintain, more than three-fourths of the existing expense. One superb example of a grand engine, is about to be placed by Mr Robert Napier, in the BRITISH QUEEN. May the gods be propitious ! Mr Napier will succeed if mechanist now can, and there is no hazard, except in relation to the strength of the castings. He will succeed—and we do not despair that before he closes his grand terrestrial vocation of making steam-engines, he will have furnished a ship for the Australian trade—in length, at least, a quarter of a mile ! The only limit to mighty engines in manufacturing districts, is defect of the co-operative principle, or the want of correspondence among the owners of capital. But why should this be, seeing that in river districts, numbers can take advantage of the same stream, and participate equally in the benefit of its falls ? It cannot be much longer ; and the economic discoveries now confidently prophesied, will farther advance that grand and growing CO-OPERATION, which, as we have hinted, will yet abolish the very name of la'bourer. We speak, of course, absolutely, of the far times of the Millennium ; but there is something in promise and prospect.

Symptoms of progress, clear and definite, are not wanting around us. What is the meaning of that bridging across the Atlantic, of that rapidly increasing union of town with town, unless a mining of prejudice, a preparation for the assimilating of races and nations, for the destruction of all intolerance, which is ever ignorance and destructive folly ? This result is the grandest and most obvious of the changes so rapidly evolving ; but there is another, not less momentous, in our own society, which is sure to follow. For the division of our people into virtually different nations—the AGRICULTURAL and MANUFACTURING—the time is rapidly going by. No longer shall we find our people necessarily crowded into uneasy masses, choking with over-heat, near some small cranny of the sea ; no longer shall our interior districts be devoid of life, of the stir and progress of civilization, of the active eye, which betokens that a man can see the universe amidst which he is. Still valley of the NILE, by-and-by ye shall hear and be gladdened by the cheering voices of Men!

Guide through Ireland. By James Fraser.

This Guide is ample, and, we dare say, accurate. It contains a great body of well-condensed general information, and avoids the discursiveness and garrulity which is apt to beset most Guides. Starting from Dublin, 153 great routes are traced; and there is an exact account of the present state of the roads, and of travelling, whether by steamers, canal boats, regular coaches, or cars. The list of the cross-roads is, however, much too brief, occupying only about one leaf in a very thick volume. This book is, also, full two months too late in appearing; but it may have better luck in future years. Some useful tables, and a map of Ireland, are appended. These tables shew the exports of Belfast to be considerably more than those of any other Irish town. They were, in 1837, £4,341,794. Those of Cork come next in value; they are £2,909,846. Dublin imports a vast deal more than it exports, forming an exception to most of the other places. A few neat engravings of gentlemen's seats and views of towns, embellish the volume, without, however, adding much to its value. One great defect in this and in all guide books, is, that travellers obtain no hint of the probable expense they must incur in the inns and hotels, and the usual rates of posting, mailing, carrying, and steaming. The author often quotes Henry Inglis as an authority; now, this kind of information is a good feature of Inglis' Travels in Ireland.

China Opened; or a Display of the Topography, History, Customs, Manners, &c. &c. &c. of the Chinese Empire. By the Reverend Charles Gutzlaff.

The name of Gutzlaff—that missionary who has attained so remarkable a knowledge of the language and manners of China, as to have been taken by the Chinese for a native—must draw attention to this work. It is a comprehensive and accurate account of that extraordinary empire, so far as the excellent opportunities and the literary researches of the author have gone; though it contains less original matter than we had, perhaps unreasonably, expected to find. Those, however, who know little of China, will find this one of the best authorities which they can consult, whilst those who are familiar with former writers, will still gain some valuable additions to their previous information. It is proper to mention, that the book is merely a much improved edition of M. Gutzlaff's "Outline of Chinese History," published some years back. But the remarkable coasting voyage of the Amherst has since given celebrity to the author's name, in connection with discovery in the locked-up, muzzled, and hermetically sealed Celestial Empire.

Alexander's Discoveries in Africa.

Captain Alexander, who is already well-known as a traveller in different regions of the globe, has just published the results of what is by far his most memorable expedition. We have followed his track in the hitherto undescribed countries of the Great Namaquas, the Boschmans, and the Hill Damaras, with lively interest, warmly sympathising in his perils, as indeed every reader must do, and exulting in the providential escapes and final success of his gallant and hardy party. Captain, or we believe we ought to say, Sir James Alexander, as we have a confused recollection of a recent creation of this sort, among other literary knights, has also much improved in his ideas and tone of speaking about the Aborigines of South Africa since we met him last. We merely announce this as an interesting work, as we fully intend laying the traveller's new discoveries before such of our readers as may not have an opportunity of perusing the original work.

Hickson's Singing Master.

So warmly do we approve the cultivation of vocal music among the young of all ranks, but especially the poor, and in schools, factories, prisons, or penitentiaries, that we should be exceedingly tolerant of even an indifferent elementary work for giving instruction in an art, which we consider at once a moral agent in education, and as the most harmless and refining of youthful pleasures. Of the SINGING MASTER, the Second Edition is now before us, revised and corrected. It consists of five detached pamphlets, comprehending, in Part I., Lessons in Singing for Young Children, with the notation of music. Part II. The Rudiments of the Sciences of Harmony; while the three other Parts consist of tunes for singing classes in different stages of progression. Something cheaper, and more compendious, might in this age of cheapness be hit upon, and greater scope and variety in the specimens might be desirable; but in the meanwhile, we recommend the Singing Master as a valuable Elementary System. Part V. forms a good selection of hymn tunes for Sunday schools; and we presume each part may be had separately. The Singing Master has borrowed much from Germany; and the more the better.

Herr Ollendorff.

DR BECKER of Berlin, and now of Paris, who received his medical education, and lived for a good many years in Edinburgh, has published a satirical and ludicrous pamphlet on a quack method of teaching the German language in SIX MONTHS! invented and practised by Herr Ollendorff, and extensively patronised by the English of the higher ranks in Paris, and also in London. The learned and scientific men of Paris would not be converts to Herr Ollendorff's system; and he seems to have had no success until Captain Basil Hall became his pupil and his trumpeter. Dr Becker appears to have doubts whether the Captain has yet a very profound knowledge of German, though he has been properly initiated into the Nursery System. The Doctor is indeed somewhat over-sarcastic about our countryman's attainments of all kinds. There is little doubt that Herr Ollendorff must be, as a language-master, a "pretty considerable humbug;" but he caught the fashionable English as soon as Captain Hall had pronounced him "the truly philosophical teacher." Among his noble pupils, Herr Ollendorff boasts of Lord and Lady Kinmaré, (?) Lady Adare, and "Ladies Louisa et Anne Cowslip, filles de Lord Roseberry." The Cowslip, we presume, being of the same genus as the Primrose, the mistake is not important to the rest of the world, if the fair and noble roses of the Prime are not offended at being metamorphosed into the blossom consecrated to the dairy. Dr Becker chooses to be sarcastic upon other matters besides English gullibility about novel or royal roads to learning languages. After remarking upon our Liberal Foreign Policy, he says, "Glory be for ever to the liberal banners of England, with its noble motto—'The Liberals of every country on Earth have a right to impose upon their Countrymen new Forms of Government, EXCEPTING only in Ireland, Canada, and the East Indies!'"

This is a fair hit, and we submit to it. The examples of Mr Ollendorff's lessons are so exquisitely ludicrous, that we can scarcely believe them copied in good faith.

Bennett's Pocket Directors.

Here are four little works, compiled respectively for engineers, mill-wrights, painters and plumbers, brick-layers, glaziers, stone-masons and plasterers, carpenters and joiners. Each volume contains a directory of the persons who, in London, are masters of these different trades. The works contain a great deal of useful information—tables of measurement, prices, &c. &c. which will both be useful to tradesmen, and to those employing tradesmen. We have been much struck with the extremely low original prices of many articles in general use in building and furnishing. How much dearer in proportion is every article renewed or repaired than the same thing when originally constructed! These little books contain a good deal of useful miscellaneous information, and many receipts connected with the different trades; and we have no doubt will be found valuable Directors.

Ure's Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

The house of Longman & Co. have issued Part I. of this work, which is to be concluded in Ten Monthly Parts, with above a thousand illustrative engravings. The character of Dr Ure, as a professor and historian of practical science, needs no eulogium from the periodical press. An announcement of his work is sufficient. All who require his instructions, may be assured of obtaining a good book, and, moreover, a good bargain of it.

Wilson's History of Christ's Hospital.

This is a new edition of a work which the eminent persons who have in the last half century received their education in Christ's Hospital have made interesting. As a piece of popular antiquity, it is interesting in itself.

Aristomenes, a Grecian Tale.

This is a purely classic story, the production of probably a young mind, imbued with the love of Grecian literature, and with admiration of everything Hellenic. To Solon, Tyrtaeus, and other sages, poets, and heroes, we are personally introduced. We fear that everything purely classic falls coldly on the general heart and ear nowadays; and though there is interest in the story, and animation in the narrative, the Oracle cannot foretell a warm reception from the public of the adventures of heroes and heroines so remote from modern European sympathies, as those of Athens and Sparta. The story is, however, very creditable to the talents of a young writer.

An Epitome of the History and Geography of Greece

Has been published by Mr Thomas Swinburne Carr, a classical master in King's College, London, and the author of several useful classical school-books. We have not gone through nearly half its 465 pages, and are only qualified to say, that it is much pleasanter to the eye than the ordinary overlaid pages of school-books of this description; and is probably worthy the careful examination of those for whose benefit we announce it—namely, classical teachers.

Osborne's Grand-Junction Railway Guide.

We have here a really useful guide, such as we scruple not to recommend to travellers by the Grand-Junction Railway. Fares, distances, stations, hours of departure and arrival, and of the collateral modes of conveyance, are all carefully noted. The country through which the line lies, with its towns, villages, gentlemen's seats, &c., is well described; and we obtain some glimpses of the condition and manners of the people of the districts through which the trains fly. To make the book complete, the charges of the different hotels, taverns, and lodging-houses should be stated, as well as the fares on the road; but this can only be done by the voluntary co-operation of the keepers of these houses.

How do You do?

The pin-cushion-sized tome, with this quaint title, is a moral treatise in miniature. The author, How d'ys does his young, his middle-aged, and his aged friends; and gives each a brief sensible discourse suited to his time of life. He does the same to his business, his professional, his political, his gay, and his afflicted friends; and perhaps his great brevity, and the singularity of his accent, may procure him attention that would be denied to ordinary preachers.

The Mountain Minstrel.

In a second edition, requires no particular notice, as we are glad to perceive that the poet, Evan Mc'Coll, has obtained a respectable list of subscribers, chiefly among the Clans. The Mountain Minstrel has, at the same time, published a volume of his Gaelic songs and poems. In the first edition, the Gaelic and English appeared together, to the great discomfort of merely English readers. We should imagine that his native Celtic songs eclipse the Saassenach effusions, but can scarcely pretend to be judges. The former are, at all events, the more lively, and are likely to become the more popular.

Literary Varieties. By William Mackenzie.

This writer has, by selecting choice passages and specimens from his different commonplace books and MSS., contrived to put together an agreeable miscellaneous volume, to which the only objection, if it be one, is, that it has no more definite object than the selections usually made for young persons, and for what we call snatch-reading. To both of these objects it will be found well-adapted, and, if not a remarkably brilliant, yet a safe and very pleasant literary companion.

Hoary Head and the Vallies Below.

The little book so entitled, consists of three or four tales, written by the Rev. Jacob Abbott, of the United States, we presume, and published in London. They are tales of New England homely life. Besides enforcing a good moral, they are agreeably descriptive, and often strikingly picturesque; and, besides, true examples of rural life in the northern division of the United States.

A Hand-book for Visitors to the Zoological Gardens.

This little work can only be of the full use of which it is capable, to the inhabitants of London and the vicinity, or to visitors to the Metropolis. Still the engravings and sketches in the history of the animals and birds, and especially the references to those seen in other collections, and gardens in France and Great Britain, render it a nice little book of popular natural history.

Teachers' Tales.

We have here a neatly got up series of little stories, written with good judgment, taste, and feeling, and an admirable moral purpose. They are greatly superior to the average run of such productions; and we have pleasure in pointing them out to those who select amusing and improving reading for the young, and for the humble and teachable.

Mrs Marcott's New Work for Children.

This lady's name is a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of her writings. The present "Conversations" are "On Land and Water," which afford the ingenious authoress great scope for illustration.

Crusts in Soak for Chickens to Peck,

Is a first reading-book for children, arranged in the manner of Mrs Barbauld, and very clearly printed.

Mudie's Man in his Physical Structure and Adaptations.

An ingenious work, evincing, like all those from the same practised pen, a well-stored mind. One important character of the work may be learned from this sentence—'Cuvier was an able and candid philosopher, but still he was only a material philosopher; and thus, while by his example he was giving very high and convincing proofs of mind, he took no notice of it in his precepts. It was this which led him to omit the distinctive character of Man, given with so much truth and effect by Linnæus—the fact of Man's being the only inhabitant of the earth that can be described as 'knowing himself.'

THOMAS RHYMER JONES, Esq., Professor of Comparative Anatomy, in King's College, London, has commenced a "General Outline of the Animal Kingdom," which is to appear in Ten Monthly 2s. 6d. Parts.

LEUTENANT COLONEL CAPADOSE, an officer in the British service, has translated Kotzebue's "Comedy of the Organs of the Brain." The theme is somewhat stale, now that Craniology is so old a doctrine; but those who like to amuse themselves with organology may enjoy a laugh still.

THE REV. AUGUSTUS CLISSOLD has published a view of the "Practical Nature of the Doctrines and alleged Revelations of Swedenborg," in a letter (a lengthy one) addressed to Dr Whately, the Archbishop of Dublin, who seems to have little reverence for Swedenborg's revelations, even admitting that they were real; and Mr Clissold is, therefore, moved to a warm, and, in many respects, an ingenious defence of Swedenborg.

PAMPHLETS.

The People's Friend

Is a political penny periodical, published at Darlington, by J. S. Metcalfe. Our attention was attracted by the title of the seventh number, "Moral Power Superior to Physical Power," which contains sound truth, very necessary to be spoken to the people at this time, excited as they are by the injudicious, if not incendiary, appeals to their passions, made by certain wild, if not traitorous itinerant orators.

Mr Ashurst has published a most useful pamphlet, in support of Mr Rowland Hill's scheme of postage. It exhausts the entire question, and leaves the opponents of the cheap rate not a leg to stand upon.

FINE ARTS.

A very beautiful engraving in mezzotint has just been made by LUTTOW, from Mr Watson Gordon's full-length portrait of Dr Chalmers. This painting, in which the artist appears to have tasked his powers to the utmost, has been, by competent judges, pronounced his chef d'œuvre in what we may call Historical Portrait, the Reverend Doctor being no every-day subject. The painting was made for the purpose of being engraved, which it has been with great care and effect. The size of the print is 24 inches by 16. It forms a very fine and imposing picture, and a faithful and spirited resemblance of the original, and, moreover, a memorial to which time will only give increased value.

The Land of Burns.

A series of Landscapes, from designs by D. O. Hill, is publishing, under the above title. The literary department is by Professor Wilson—though we perceive few traces of his pen in the early numbers—and Mr Robert Chambers. The engravings are, in general, soft and clear, though the landscapes are often too rich and luxuriant to characterise the rugged and stern features of "our auld resspectit mither." The "Banks of Doon," and the "Braes of Ballochmyle," shew more of the amenity of the South, than of the landscape of "Caledonia, stern and wild." A few portraits of distinguished persons, closely connected with Burns, and of others who had little relation to him, or with anything else important to the public, diversify a pleasing and elegant work, which will interest national feeling. There is a very sweet, if too soft, portrait of Burns; and one more which will be universally welcomed—Mrs Dunlop of Dunlop. It is full of character, and of sensible benignant expression.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

Now that Parliament has risen, the Members—at least such of them as dare—are rendering to their constituents an account of their stewardship; and a miserable account, in most cases, it is. Even those Members who are anxious to shield Ministers, cannot venture to defend their whole conduct during the session. In his address at Sheffield, Mr Ward stated that, at the beginning of the session, he had hoped that the Radicals might have taken Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell for their leaders, without any sacrifice of principle; but that hope had been entirely destroyed by Lord John Russell's speech on the first night of the session. The principle then avowed was pertinaciously adhered to throughout the session, and has created a barrier between Lord John Russell and his supporters, which no time can remove. Lord John has raised up a new principle, and has taken his stand upon the finality of the Reform Bill, and to that principle he is willing to sacrifice everything. In the course of his speech, Mr Ward mentioned that Lord John Russell threw his whole strength into the debate on the Ballot, and so deep was his mortification at being deserted on that occasion by so many of the Whigs, that he sent in his resignation the morning after the division, and it was not without considerable difficulty he was induced to resume his seat in the Cabinet. (Would it have been any great pity if he had not?) The abandonment of the Irish Appropriation Clause, Mr Ward stigmatised as the grossest political tergiversation; but he added that he knew that the abandonment had been forced on Government by the Irish Members. So long as the peasantry bore the brunt of the tithe war, they cared little about it; but they succumbed immediately when the Exchequer processes were directed against themselves. Now that the conduct of the Irish Members not only on the above occasion, but on the Corn Law Repeal question, is known, Mr O'Connell may save himself the trouble of sending deputations to England and Scotland to preach up justice to Ireland, and the propriety of giving her fifty additional representatives. She has already more than she makes a good use of. At Sheffield, as elsewhere, the question of Universal Suffrage is eagerly pressed forward, in season and out of season, by a portion of the working classes; and because Mr Ward had said, that, if he attended a meeting on Universal Suffrage, he would be compelled to oppose that question, a vote of want of confidence was moved, which, however, was rejected by a large majority.

STEAM BOAT ACCIDENTS have become almost of daily occurrence; for, besides those reported in the newspapers, many occur which the public never hear of, great care being taken to conceal them. Within these few weeks, we find the following reported. The Hull Packet mentions, that, during the voyage of the Antelope Steamer to Glasgow, when opposite to Morville, one of the lower plates of her boiler gave way; and the water suddenly rushing out into the hold, destroyed eighteen head of cattle, and scalded four or five others. Had the weather been severe, no doubt all on board would have perished. The voyage between Newcastle and Leith is commonly made by steam in ten or twelve hours; but it is mentioned by The Mining Journal, of the 1st September, that the Northern Yacht proved so unseaworthy, that, after having been out seventeen hours from Newcastle, the water rose so rapidly as to preclude the working of the engine. One pump alone was in order, and that imperfectly. No gunpowder could be obtained wherewith a signal might be made, nor was there a bell or any other means of communication. In this state, trusting alone to the wind, and after being six hours longer at sea, the vessel was espied by a pilot boat, and subsequently towed into Berwick by a steam-boat. The Tyne Mercury reports the explosion of the boiler of the Vivid at Shields, whereby two men were scalded to death. Several other accidents have lately happened. By the wreck of the Forfarshire Steamer from Hull to Dundee, on the 6th September, no fewer than forty persons were drowned. In this case, the grossest negligence on the part of the owners has been proved. Before leaving Hull, a leak in the boiler was discovered and patched up in a temporary manner. When at Flamborough Head, a small leak appeared, which the engineer says, he thought of little consequence, and he has frequently seen as bad; but the leak having increased during the night, the engine could no longer be worked, and in attempting to run back to Hull with the sails, the vessel struck, and forty persons were drowned. We know, from other information than that of the engineer in the above case, that it is by no means an uncommon case for steamers to set out on voyages with rents in their boilers of considerable extent, and with other parts of their machinery in bad condition. The necessity of appointing inspectors of steam-vessels has therefore become imperative; but before this is done, the relatives of the sufferers by the Forfarshire have the means of giving an important check to the negligence of steam-boat owners. Let them raise actions of damages against the proprietors of the Forfarshire for the loss of their relatives; and there is no doubt that they will succeed in obtaining such damages as will make every steam-boat company, which has communication with Scotland at least, look more carefully to the state of their vessels and machinery than they have hitherto done. The coroner's inquest which sat upon the bodies which had been cast ashore, gave a deadweight of £100 on the vessel, and would have given more had there been anything to levy it on; but in Scotland there is no such difficulty, as the owners are personally liable for the damage occasioned by their negligence.

THE STEAM-ENGINE.—The recent discoveries of Mr Bell and Mr Ivison, will have the effect of extending the use of the steam-engine to purposes to which it has not been hitherto employed, and will render it practicable to make the longest voyages by steam. It is little more than two years ago since Dr Lardner asserted that it was impossible to accomplish the voyage from Great Britain to America with steam-ships; but already these vessels pass and repass between the two continents with the utmost regularity, and with a rapidity four times greater than the best sailing vessels. The grand difficulty, hitherto, was the great bulk of fuel required to propel the vessel in long voyages; but this difficulty has been obviated to a degree which was hardly to have been expected. Mr Bell estimates that, by his new invention, one-third of the fuel is saved. The process consists in the use of air, highly heated, being passed through the water in the boiler in tubes, and then being conducted under the ash pit to supply the furnace with heated instead of cold air. Mr Ivison has discovered that, by taking a pipe from the boiler and bending it down so as to throw a current of steam on the burning fuel, not only is the dense black smoke, so annoying in steam-engines at present, prevented, but fully one-half of the fuel, now required, is saved. In an experiment made at the Castle mills, Edinburgh, in presence of the editor of the Mining Review, Dr Fyffe the chemist, and other scientific persons, on 27th August last, it was found that, by Mr Ivison's simple discovery, the quantity of steam formed was increased 115 per cent.; one pound of coal having evaporated 12,881 lbs of water, while, without it, not more than four to six pounds can be evaporated—six being considered a high product. From a recent analysis of various species of coal by M. T. Richardson, it appears that equal bulks give out very different quantities of heat. Taking Edinburgh canal coal as a standard, or as giving out 100, Glasgow cherry coal gives 108, Newcastle cherry 112, Glasgow splint 114, Lancashire canal 118, and Newcastle caking 119; that is, it is nearly one-fifth more powerful than the canal coal found in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. If the comparison is made by weight, the value of the Edinburgh coal is still less; for, if its heating power be represented as 100 as before, that of the Newcastle caking is 122½. We thus see the importance of attending, in steam navigation, to the quality of the fuel. Let us suppose now, that Messrs Bell & Ivison are correct in their experiments—the saving which may be effected in fuel amounts to one-third and one-half, or from three-fourths to five-sixths of the consumption of the coal; and, as steam vessels now sail 3000 miles without renewing their supply of coal, there appears to be no place on the face of the earth which may not be reached by steam, and the time spent in the voyage reduced to one-third or fourth of what it is at present. The effect of speedy and certain communication with the most distant parts, on our trade, manufactures, and on civilization, can hardly be over-estimated.

EMIGRATION TO AUSTRALIA.—So many persons are at present looking towards Australia as the future seat of their fortunes, and so many have relations or connexions already settled there, that every information regarding that part of the world is at present more than usually interesting. Various publications have recently appeared, which set forth, and we believe truly, the highly flourishing economical condition of the colony, and the almost certainty with which a fortune can be made with ordinary prudence; but they sedulously keep out of view many of the hardships to which the emigrant can hardly fail to be exposed, and many of the circumstances which ought to be taken into view by him who is considering the propriety of emigrating. From the recent Parliamentary inquiry on transportation, it appears that crime and immorality prevail to an incredible degree in New South Wales and Van Dieman's Land. In one month, in the year 1835, 247 convicts were flogged in New South Wales, and 9784 lashes inflicted; which is at the rate of 2964 floggings per annum, in a population of probably 80,000 of both sexes and all ages. As we presume females are not flogged, we have at least one in ten of all the boys and men in the colony suffering flagellation annually. But this is only one of numerous sorts of punishments. In 1834, 1000 persons were employed in the chain gangs of New South Wales, and 700 in those of Van Dieman's Land. The severity of this punishment may be estimated from the following description. The convicts are locked up from sunset to sunrise in caravans, or boxes, each holding from 20 to 28 men; but in which the whole number can neither stand upright, nor sit down at the same time, except with their legs at right angles to their bodies. In some instances, the space allowed for each individual to lie down on the bare boards does not exceed eighteen inches. They are kept to work in chains during the day, under a strict military guard, and liable to suffer flagellation for trifling offences, as obstinacy, insolence, and the like. Convicts who commit crimes after transportation, are dealt with in the most summary manner. If not instantly hanged, they are retransported to Norfolk Island, Moreton Bay, or Port Arthur; and the severity of the punishment is so great that numerous instances have occurred of men committing murder, with the perfect certainty, and obviously with the intention that they might immediately be sent to Sydney or Hobart Town, to be executed. Macquarrie Harbour (now abandoned) was a penal settlement of Van Dieman's Land; and of 132 convicts who made their escape from it, between 1822 and 1827, 75 perished in the woods; one was hanged for murdering and eating his companion; two were shot; eight were murdered, and six eaten by their comrades; twenty-four escaped to the settled districts; thirteen were hanged for bush ranging, and two for murder; altogether, 108 out of 132, who came to a violent death. In Van Dieman's Land, in 1837, there were 13,000 convicts, and a free population of 38,000, and the number of persons brought before the police was 17,000; one seventh of the free population was fined for drunkenness. In New South Wales, the number of convictions for highway robbery alone exceeds the total number of convictions for all manner of offences in England, taking the difference of population into account. Rapes, murder, attempts to murder, and other atrocities—are almost of daily occurrence. In Sydney, with a free population in 1836 of 16,000, there were 219 licensed public-houses, besides numerous unlicensed spirit shops. The prevalence of drunkenness is also shewn by the quantity of spirits consumed. In 1835, there were entered for home consumption, 201,138 gallons, which gives an annual average supply of nearly four gallons to each individual. The total quantity of spirits of all sorts, foreign and home made, which paid duty in Great Britain and Ireland in 1838, was 264 millions of gallons, little more than one gallon to each individual. The female convicts, as may well be supposed, are, with hardly a single exception, the most drunken and abandoned prostitutes; and so great is the dread of contamination to the children from such wretches, that it is usual to employ men in the performance of duties fulfilled by women in this country, and to dispense with servants altogether as much as possible. In 1833, the total population of New South Wales, was 60,794; of whom 38,350 were free, the remainder convicts. Of the free, 22,788 were males, and 13,452 females; of the convicts, 21,846 males, and 2,698 females. In 1836, the population of Van Dieman's Land was 40,171, of whom 16,968 were convicts, and at the same time, the whole males, convict and free, were, to the whole females, in the proportion of 22 to 124. This disproportion of the sexes has led to the most serious atrocities; and the attempt of Government to remedy it, by sending out free female settlers, has merely substituted one sort of prodigality for another.

On a full consideration of all the evils attending the present system of transportation, the Committee have come to the conclusion, "that transportation to New South Wales, and to the settled districts of Van Dieman's Land, should be discontinued as soon as practicable," and that crimes now punishable by transportation should, in future, be punished by confinement, with hard labour, at home or abroad, for periods varying from two to fifteen years. It is probable that the effect of discontinuing transportation, though beneficial to the moral, would have an injurious effect on the economical condition of the colony. Of late years, upwards of 3000 men and 400 women have annually been transported to New South Wales. These convicts are assigned to the colonists, who give them no wages, but merely food and clothing; and to this cause much of the existing prosperity of the colonists must be attributed. We doubt not, therefore, that they will oppose the proposed change.

Another consideration for an emigrant is, that, in New South Wales, great droughts appear to be periodical; and to them may perhaps be ascribed the scantiness of the native population, and the few quadrupeds which are to be found. These droughts sometimes prevail for years together. The last great drought began in 1826, and did not terminate till 1830. During all this period, very little rain fell, and for more than six months there was not a single shower. In 1835, there was also a severe drought. On the other hand, the rivers are subject to inundations, at intervals of several years—a circumstance which renders it a precarious matter to cultivate the alluvial soils along their banks. The hostility of the natives, also, renders it more difficult than is commonly supposed to settle on the unoccupied land, at a distance from the inhabited parts of the colony. The late three expeditions into the interior under Major Mitchell, were all driven back by the natives; and it appears to have required great circumspection and address to prevent the whole party from being cut off. As it was, there were several skirmishes, attended with loss of life on both sides. These expeditions have, however, led to the discovery of a very fertile tract of country, apparently the best suited for colonisation which has yet been found out in New South Wales. Major Mitchell has given it the name of Australia Felix, and here is part of his description of it. "We now descended on one of the most beautiful spots I ever saw; the turf, the woods, and the banks of the little stream which murmured through the vale, had so much the appearance of a well-kept park, that I felt loath to break it by the passage of our cart wheel. Proceeding for a mile and a half along this rivulet, through a valley wholly of the same description, we at length encamped on a flat of rich earth, nearly quite black, and which seemed to surpass in richness any that I had seen in New South Wales; and I was even tempted to bring away a specimen of it. We had at length discovered a country ready for the immediate reception of civilized man, and fit eventually to become one of the great nations of the earth. Unencumbered with too much wood, yet possessing enough for all purposes, with an exuberant soil, under a temperate climate, bounded by the sea coast and mighty rivers, and watered abundantly by streams from lofty mountains, this highly interesting region lay before me, with all its features, new and untouched, as they fall from the hand of the Creator. Of this Eden it seemed that I was the only Adam; and it was indeed a sort of paradise to me, permitted thus to be the first to explore its mountains and streams, to behold its scenery, to investigate its geological character, and, finally, by my survey, to develop those natural advantages, all still unknown to the civilized world, but yet certain to become, at no distant date, of vast importance to a new people." This fertile tract is situated in east longitude 141, and south latitude 38, and adjoins the new colony of South Australia; so that this climate is cooler than that of Sydney, while it is probable that the Indian corn, and the other valuable products of hot climates, may still be cultivated there. We hope that Australia Felix will not be incorporated with the new colony, and a high price, as there, be demanded for the land. In such an extensive and thinly peopled country as New South Wales, it is in vain to attempt to concentrate the emigrants, by exacting from them a high price for land. They may purchase it at first, but when they find that there are fertile tracts, at comparatively short distances, which they can occupy for nothing, they will soon dispose of their purchase to new comers, and set off with their flocks and herds beyond the bounds of the colony. To sell land at a high price in a new colony, is to counteract the very object for which emigration is undertaken, which is to have plenty of fertile land, and, consequently, the necessities of life, at a cheap rate. The present mode of selling land has given rise to much disgust, and to great loss to individuals. Between the time when the Colonial officers receive notice of the piece of land fixed on and the actual obtaining possession of it by the settler, five months commonly elapse, during which he and his family must live in idleness, possibly contracting bad habits, and, at all events, seriously encroaching on his capital, at Sydney, or some other expensive town. Farther, the price paid for the land cripples the settler at the outset, by diminishing his capital; and it is extremely doubtful whether the Colonial officers can, by bringing labourers from Britain or otherwise, ever employ the price to such advantage for the colony, as the settler himself would do, by attending to his own interest. We doubt if there is any instance of Government's making money by any speculations; their business hitherto has always been to spend. We are aware, that great mischief has arisen, particularly in Canada, from large grants of land being made to the favourites of those who happened to be in power; for, having neither capital, nor inclination to clear and cultivate the ground, these grants keep the more industrious colonists from communication with each other, to the evident injury of the colony; but were a regulation made and rigidly enforced, that all grants not cultivated and stocked within a short period should be forfeited, we believe it would be found a more beneficial arrangement than the present, by which a settler is deprived of a part of his capital, when he most needs it.

THE CORN LAWS.—Notwithstanding the high price of food, bread being at present nearly double the price in this country which it is in Paris—by no means a cheap market—the apathy of the middle, and the hostility of a small but presumptuous and noisy portion of the working classes, seem likely to prevent, for some time, the repeal of the existing Corn Laws. The plausible pretence held out—but not the real reason—is, that the abolition of the restrictions on the importation of corn would throw much land out of cultivation, and that the agricultural labourers thus deprived of work would be driven into competition with the manufacturing operatives, and thus reduce the wages of labour. Upon the same principle, the reduction of the army—the great cause of taxation—should be opposed, lest the disbanded soldiers should become manufacturing operatives. The answer to this argument is obvious. If there are at present more agriculturists than can be profitably employed, as well as more soldiers than are necessary, and were they to become manufacturing operatives, no harm would be done to those engaged in manufactures; for as it is, they are kept at the expense of the latter. The mere amount of wages in money is nothing; the only criterion is the quantity of food and raiment the wages can purchase; and if the soldiers, instead of earning nothing, and being kept in idleness out of the wages of the industrious, were to earn their own subsistence, it is difficult to see who would be injured. Low wages may be much more beneficial to the workman than high wages. 2s. a-day are of more value than 3s. if, in the latter case, 1s. 6d. is to be immediately disbursed in keeping up a standing army, or in paying an exorbitant price for food. But, in point of fact, there is not the slightest chance of the repeal of the Corn-Laws throwing any land out of cultivation. The great fall in the price of agricultural produce, from the period of the greatest agricultural prosperity to the point of the lowest depression, may have had the effect of ruining many farmers who foolishly relied on legislative enactments to keep up the price of corn, and may have caused many small estates to change hands, but unquestionably it did not throw land out of cultivation. On the contrary, both in England and Scotland, an immense breadth of land, never before cultivated, has been brought under the plough; and we say, advisedly, that never was there more spirit in agriculture shewn, than during the last few years, when we had very low prices comparatively, and when we have heard of nothing but agricultural distress. We have not the slightest doubt but that there are more persons employed in agriculture in Great Britain at this moment than at any former period; for, though the price of grain had sunk at least fifty per cent. between 1831 and 1833, yet the census of 1831 shewed that, in every county, the population had increased, although many counties depend on agriculture alone for their support. The real reason, we believe, why some of the operatives oppose a repeal of the Corn-Laws, is because they believe starvation will drive many who could not be roused by a stimulant of inferior power, to join them in the demand for Universal Suffrage, which some believe will prove a panacea for all their evils. So thought both the middle and working classes with regard to the Reform Bill, and we see where all their expectations have ended. It is assumed by such of the operatives as are friendly to free trade, that, were Universal Suffrage obtained, the Corn-Laws would, as a matter of course, be repealed in the course of the first session of the Universal Suffrage Parliament. So thought we in regard to the Reform Parliament; but seven years have elapsed, and the question stands precisely where it did, except that there appears a greater reluctance to hear any discussion on the Corn-Laws than in the Rotten-Borough Parliaments.

SCOTLAND.

LECTURES ON POLITICAL ECONOMY IN SCOTLAND.—

In our number for August, we gave it as our opinion that lectures on Political Economy should be regularly given in our Mechanics' Institutions, and other similar establishments. This science not only involves the important public questions of Banking and Currency, Free Trade, Colonial Policy, Poor-Laws, Tithes, Taxation, &c., but teaches the principles which regulate wages, profits, and rent, or shews the proportion of the proceeds of industry which, in a free country, should fall respectively to the labourer, to the capitalist, and the landlord. It thus unfolds the mechanism, both of social life and of civil society, and teaches how the interests and the happiness of a community may be best promoted. Such being the nature and importance of the science, we are glad that a knowledge of its principles is at present, and for the first time, making considerable progress in Scotland. Our townsman, Dr Thomas Murray, has been engaged for the last few years in giving lectures on Political Economy, not only in this city, but in Glasgow, and in several of our provincial towns; and his courses varied from fourteen to twenty-nine lectures. Of four full courses which he has delivered in Edinburgh, one of them (in Elder Street chapel) was attended by 800, chiefly of the industrious classes, and another (before the Philosophical Association) by a somewhat greater number belonging to the middle ranks of life. He delivered a course of twenty-six lectures in the Glasgow Mechanics' Institution in 1836-7, as also, in the same year, one to the merchants of that city in the Monteth Rooms, having previously received a public requisition to that effect. He has also given courses in the following provincial towns:—Hawick, Kirkcaldy, Montrose, Falkirk, and Dunfermline. Indeed, he has given two courses at Kirkcaldy; the first, attended by 350 hearers; the second, by 1200; the latter consisting almost exclusively of the industrious classes. In Dunfermline, (where his course consisted of twenty-nine lectures,) the number of his hearers was nearly a thousand, or about a twelfth part of the whole population, consisting of all classes, males and females, masters and workmen, clergymen and laymen. And so highly is the usefulness of the science appreciated, that in no one instance, we believe, has the original number fallen off, however long the course; but, on the contrary, the attendance has not only been maintained, but it has greatly increased as the course advanced. In Kirkcaldy, last year, for example, the Doctor began with a class of 600; but that number was doubled before the end of his labours. As a proof that a taste for instruction in this science really obtains among the people, and calls loudly for its own gratification, it may be mentioned that the lecturer never delivered a course without an invitation either from the directors of an existing Philosophical Association, or from a committee of the inhabitants, appointed at a public meeting, convened for the purpose. This latter was the case in Hawick, and in regard to his course last year in Kirkcaldy. The price of a ticket, too, is very properly fixed so low as that no individual can urge the plea of expense for non-attendance. In Dunfermline, the ticket for mechanics was a shilling for each half course, and for non-mechanics half-a-crown; so that the fee for the whole course of twenty-nine lectures was, for mechanics, only two shillings, or considerably less than one penny each lecture. And it is not unimportant to mention that, in the case of Dunfermline, a larger sum was realized by low-priced tickets than had been previously received when the ticket cost double the sum. It is with great pleasure we mention these facts; because they shew that public attention is now awakened to the importance, not only of Political Economy, but of Education in general; and that the people are using, on the whole, the best and most efficient means for achieving their own instruction. Knowledge and education, when they have once been fairly introduced into a country, and a desire for them generally diffused among the people, can never be banished; they can never be superseded; can never die. We already stand on high vantage ground in this respect; though much requires to be done, both as to the kind of education and as to its extent.

DR BOWRING.—This distinguished advocate of free trade, and of enlightened principles of government, has recently visited Scotland, in consequence of an invitation from his late constituents of Kilmarnock and the other burghs of that district. In passing through Edinburgh, he was entertained at a banquet, by a party of his friends and admirers. The speech he delivered on that occasion, and which has gone the round of the press, was one of the most interesting we ever heard. At Kilmarnock, Dr Bowring was met and welcomed by an immense multitude, whom he addressed after being conducted in procession to the centre of the town. In the evening he received a banquet from about 600 of the inhabitants; and was presented with an elegant silver vase, value about £150, as a testimony of the esteem and affection of his old constituents. The Doctor's reception in the other burghs was also marked with great kindness. And, in all these places, he was, only a few years ago, a perfect stranger. Were the suffrage as widely extended as it ought to be, Dr Bowring would carry these burghs by an overwhelming majority. Some other Scottish constituency will, we hope, when opportunity offers, do itself honour, by electing one of the most single-minded and benevolent, as well as able public men, of whom this country can boast.

IRELAND.

Mr O'Connell no sooner secured the million lent to the clergy and tithe owners, and prevailed on the Ministry to abandon the Appropriation Clause in the Tithe Bill—which bill he supported on the second reading—than he set out for Dublin to organize a new association for the avowed purpose of obtaining a redress of Irish wrongs; and, among other objects, the repeal of the very tithe act he had supported. If not remedied next session, then the Repeal agitation is to be set on foot. This has been so often mentioned, and the time for commencing it so often postponed, that it causes no alarm to any one. The new association, however, proceeds very slowly in obtaining members. The truth appears to be, that O'Connell has lost a great part of his popularity; and, as he is opposed, not only by such influential men as Sharman Crawford, but by part of the Catholic priesthood, his power of agitation is greatly diminished. There will be a fearful defalcation in the "rint" this year, unless he can contrive to raise his popularity before the day of collection.

THE CONTINENT.

On the 24th August, the Dutchess of Orleans was delivered of a boy, who has been named Louis Philip Albert, Count of Paris. The French Government has been involved in a fresh quarrel with Switzerland, because Louis Buonaparte, who has acquired the right of citizenship in the Canton of Thurgovia, will not quit the Republic, and the different Cantons appear resolved to resist the demands of France to compel him. Louis Philip is said to have been half crazy, and his fear of Louis Buonaparte gives some plausibility to the rumour. The National Guards of Paris have adopted a petition complaining of the restricted state of the elective franchise. The total number of voters is only about 180,000. This petition has excited much notice, not only as coming from a body of armed men, but from those persons who have been the firmest supporters of Louis Philip. The Emperor Ferdinand has been crowned at Milan, and has granted an amnesty for political offences. Great numbers of arrests continue to take place at Warsaw, Wilna, and other parts of Poland, and many young men of the most respectable families have been flogged, and ordered to serve as private soldiers in the army of the Caucasus, for being parties to an alleged conspiracy against the Russian Government. The Spanish Cabinet has fallen to pieces, and a new Ministry, at the head of which is the Duke of Frias, has been formed.

AMERICA.

The banks of the United States have resumed specie payments. The accounts of the grain crops are far from favourable; and, if there be any surplus, it will all be required for Canada, where the wheat has suffered much from the fly. At the last advices from Canada, thanks to the immense military force in the provinces, everything was quiet.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the state of the crops from all parts of the United Kingdom are more favourable than they were a month ago; but we believe that there is no probability of the crop reaching an average. On nearly all the clay ground, which, in ordinary years, yields the most abundant crops, there is a great deficiency; and in the upland districts, the grain is still green, and, what is worse, has suffered severely from the frost. There is less old grain on hand, by all accounts, than for a great number of years at the same period; and, although the bringing of the foreign wheat in bond into consumption may lower the markets for a month or two, cheap bread is not to be expected this winter. The quantity of foreign wheat in bond was 800,000 quarters, equal to three weeks' consumption, according to Mr McCulloch's estimate; and another million of quarters is said to have arrived in time to be entered at the nominal duty of 1s. It will be curious to observe the effect upon the markets. The farmers have now a fine specimen of the working of the existing Corn-Laws. Precisely at the period when the greater part of their crop has been secured, and when, of course, there is not the slightest need for foreign grain, hundreds of thousands of quarters—much of which has lain in the granaries for years, is all at once brought into competition with them, and will probably lower the markets until all their grain has passed out of their hands into those of speculators, who will probably realize a handsome profit in the course of next summer. Thus it always has been, and always will be, under the fluctuating scale of duties.

In consequence of the deficiency in the turnip crop, the demand for lean stock has been very limited, and prices have fallen. At Falkirk Second Tryst, on the 10th and 11th September, the supply of sheep was nearly one-half less than usual—there not being more than 30,000 on the field. Prices were from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per head lower than last September tryst; but the condition of the sheep was inferior. White-faced wethers brought from 20s. to 26s.; ewes, 18s. to 22s. About 20,000 cattle—rather a small supply—were brought forward for sale; but, though small, it exceeded the demand. Very few of the Scotch dealers from the south or east attended the market; and prices for lean cattle were lower than at last tryst. It was the dulllest market which has been at Falkirk for many years, and many of the cattle remained unsold. A large show of horses was exhibited; but sales were very dull. A few very fine heavy draught horses brought from £30 to £35.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

NOVEMBER, 1838.

THE DURHAM PANIC.

LORD DURHAM has fulfilled our predictions to the letter, and disappointed the hopes of those who, like ourselves, saw nothing better for the Canadas in the meantime, than his administration, and who now, in his abrupt and angry resignation, see these unhappy provinces placed in a much worse condition than if he had never visited them.—When is Parliament to be called together? Lord Durham's reasons for resigning, which give a severe, if not finishing stroke, to the Whigs, may render it inconvenient and somewhat disagreeable for Ministers to face their new difficulties until the edge of his wrath is somewhat blunted, and the general feeling of sympathy with the ill-treated and high-tempered Governor-General abated; but, if an early meeting of Parliament was requisite last year on account of Canadian affairs, it is doubly necessary now. Antecedently to this unhappy rupture, which must encourage the Canadian party as much as it has dismayed the British, there were, according even to the Government papers, rumours of fresh revolt—"symptoms of an outbreak not to be mistaken." These provinces cannot be abandoned to anarchy and misery, because the Whigs have acted to Lord Durham precisely as they have done to the Radical reformers—first cajoled, and then deserted and insulted him; and Lord Durham is an individual not in the least likely to allow personal feelings to be overcome by a magnanimous sense of public duty, or to sink the self-willed peer in the patriot. He complains bitterly that he has been "sacrificed by his friends—those whose duty it was to stand forth in his defence." And this, of course, whether he is right or wrong—whether his public acts were defensible or indefensible. The "keen and quick sensibilities" of Lord Durham, where he is in any way personally affected, could not pause to consider the dilemma in which his unfortunate friends were placed. It would have been all too little to the stomach of his great revenge upon Lord Brougham and the Peers, had the Whigs lost their places full six months before, in the course of nature, that dreaded event must have taken place at any rate. His Ordinances—and the very word is hateful to the ears of freemen—might have been illegal, impolitic, and, what Mr Buller guessed they would be called in England, "monstrously despotic;" yet he thinks it was the bounden duty of his "friends" to bear him out; and this, we think, they would have attempted, save for that fatal consequence, a minority, which would have placed themselves in imminent jeopardy, to do him small good. It was impossible to bear him through unblamed; and less, we fear, would not have satisfied his "high sense of dignity," and his chivalrous feelings, which could never brook being found in the wrong. But his Lordship being in the mire, his friends were bound, by every feeling of honour and good-fellowship, to act the part of the generous drunk man with his fallen comptator—"My dear fellow, I am totally unable to raise you to your legs—you see I have not a leg to stand upon myself—but I will lie down in the dirt beside you; it is all I can."

Far are we from acquitting, on private grounds, the dastardly conduct of Lord Durham's cabinet friends; on public grounds, they are equally worthy of condemnation. They stormed and bullied while law and constitutional liberty only were at stake; but as soon, and it was in a very few hours, as their precious places seemed endangered by the support of Lord Durham's illegal and tyrannical edicts, they kicked him over-board—sneaked and succumbed. At the very moment, and by some strange want of proper concert, when Lord Cottingham, their own Chancellor, had been brought up to pit his official judgment against the other legal authorities, they chose to bolt, and to leave the Durham Ordinances to their fate. They were accordingly nullified—and thank heaven for that! although the immediate consequence should be something yet more disastrous than the angry resignation of Lord Durham.

Any honest Ministry must have condemned those decrees. It is not, therefore, the act done, but the act first resisted, and then on base and sordid motives submitted to, that is worthy of reprobation.

Lord Durham has been ill-used, betrayed, perhaps sacrificed by his friends, as he complains; but neither has he been guiltless; and those who, in condemning the Government, acquit him, must be prepared to vindicate, to the utmost extent, those illegal and despotic ordinances which the British legislature was constrained to nullify.

From the worst description of Tories—those who glory in tyranny, and care little for human blood—a vindication of the Canadian ukase might be expected; but, when we find those who profess attachment to liberty condemning the course taken by Lord Brougham and the Parliament, we are compelled to pity an extraordinary conglomeration of understanding. Had the Government acted with sincerity and common sense, instead of bullying and trying to put down a grave charge, a milder course would, doubtless, have been practicable, than that to which the “friends” were consenting, and which has given Lord Durham such deadly offence. He boasts, nothing repentant of his edicts for punishing men neither arraigned, tried, nor convicted, that he dealt substantial justice, tempered with mercy; but so thought not the Canadian people and their friends in England; and wo to the nation which shall tamely submit to the violation of the legal defences of freedom! The Czar, Lord Durham’s friend, deals substantial justice to the Poles and to his own subjects; the paternal Emperor of Austria deals substantial justice to the Italians languishing in his dungeons and fortresses. The English people prefer, even to Lord Durham’s mercy-tempered tyranny, those constitutional forms by which the laws strictly and rigidly protect liberty and life. Such ideas as his may suit the military commander of a Russian province; but not the Governor of a British colony. We do not mean to say that Lord Durham intended to play the sanguinary despot—far from it; but to assert that neither he nor an angel from heaven, were the advent possible, should be tolerated, for an instant, in the assumption of illegal powers fatal to freedom; and that there was nothing in the state of the colony to justify an act, at the best one of vainglory. But, if it be true, as stated by Mr Buller, that these ordinances were necessarily promulgated, because no jury could be found in the colony to convict the patriots or “the villains,” how does this avowal mend the case?

And now that Lord Durham’s inadvertence, to call it by the gentlest term, has, in the natural order of events, brought its proper punishment, he has no right to complain; or, if self-love blinds him to his errors, no friend of freedom has a right to separate the functionary from the fitting consequences of his deeds.

The illegality of banishing untried and unconvicted men to the Bermudas for their political sins, instead of sending them to some place where he had clear jurisdiction, is so like a lawyer’s wretched technical quibble, that we have never much regarded it; although aware that it is rash and unwise to brush away, were it but the flimsy cobweb which, woven across the lock, may tend to keep back the burglar from trying his false keys on the shrine which guards the jewel Liberty. Had any of the individuals whom Lord Durham and his Council chose to condemn to death, a la Russe, without either trial or conviction, found courage to brave him, and to return and demand a trial, in what a dilemma would he have been placed! The rabid Ultra-Tories who now defend him, would have justified summary execution, in terms of the Governor-General’s edict; but he durst not and would not have committed a cold-blooded murder in the face of America and Europe: and what then became of the authority of the Governor-General, so cruelly destroyed by the nullification of those ordinances which one brave, determined man could have defied and crushed!

The Ultra-Tories and the despairing Whigs, the anti-Canadian faction in Quebec and in Downing Street, agree in calumniating Lord Brougham. Lord Durham is rather more candid and reasonable, in reference to Lord Brougham, than his senseless defenders. Opposition, he says, he expected from Lord Brougham; conscience might have whispered here; for, in the illegal course he took, he could expect no less. Was Lord Brougham, now almost the sole guardian of liberty in the Upper House of Parliament, to abandon his public duty upon a great emergency, because Lord Durham, a few years before, had endeavoured to subvert him in the affections and confidence of the People by a couple of speeches made at Edinburgh and Glasgow?—which, the moment that words might have fructified into deeds, on the accession of the young Queen, he took great and ostentatious pains to retract? Was it for this that Lord Brougham, who limits his public hostility to no party, but attacks in turn Whig and Tory—Lord Melbourne, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Durham, or Lord Minto, as the public service may require—was it this, we ask, and the paltry fear of being thought jealous or resentful in consequence, that was to deter Lord Brougham from doing his duty only, when the Governor-General of the Canadas had committed a grievous error? Not long before, when Mr Turton’s appointment was called in question, and the coy and immaculate Premier, from the inherent impulse of purity, was forced to condemn and abandon “his noble friend Durham,” Lord Brougham, not being quite so rigid a theoretical purist, defended the absent Earl, manfully and effectively. But, if his hostility to the illegal edicts of the High Commissioner originated in private pique, in what originated, long before, his strenuous and single-handed opposition to the Canada Coercion Bill?—and if he be the personal enemy of Lord Durham, is he not equally the personal enemy of Lord Minto, whose conduct he mercilessly exposed shortly before, and who was also “sacrificed by his friends?”—or of Lord Lyndhurst, against whose strong attack he ably and elaborately vindicated the foreign policy of the Whigs, where a factious man, or one whose resentment was stronger than his patriotism, would have left them to their own resources? And this is but one instance of the many in which Lord Brougham lends them a helping hand, as often as the good of the country justifies it. Those who condemn Lord Brougham’s exposure of the tyrannical Durham ordinances, should at least be prepared to defend them. Had he suffered this act of oppression and injustice to pass unquestioned, he would have been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty; and if he had kept silent, surely some one member of the legislature would have come forward in defence of the violated law and the oppressed individuals. Had such things been attempted in Ireland by Lord Wellesley, under the tyrannical Grey Coercion Bill, half the Radicals in Britain would have been in uproar. But Canada is weak and far distant, and Lord Durham is a highly privileged man, who may do what he pleases. Some of his small friends are already insisting, that, if his high spirit hold good, and if the saviour of the Canadas abandon the Canadas to their fate, and comes steaming home, as "consistent a Reformer," so magnanimous a statesman, ought forthwith to be made Prime Minister, and the head of the Movement party! Now, these sort of men can read and write. Truly the knowledge qualification will hardly do.—First and last, however, Lord Durham has a right to complain of intriguers in the Cabinet. They knew him to be fond of titles, stars and ribbons, pomps and shows—a proud man, but not too proud to be vain; and they fumed him with the incense of flattery, and inflated his natural pride, until he forgot himself. The girlish Queen was made the instrument of the purposes of her Ministers, until Lord Durham appeared to have forgotten in what age he lived, and to have conceited himself a Leicester or an Essex, fulfilling the heats, and exercising the almost sovereign powers confided to him by an Elizabeth! The bubble has burst, and great is his indignation at being presumed not quite infallible, nor altogether above law. The world has given him credit for considerable arrogance; to be quite the man likely to be as true at all times to his pique as to his patriotism, and to comprehend little of the calm, imperturbable magnanimity of a self-poised and great mind, where his will is crossed, and his temper roused by contradiction. A stab to the self-love of such a character will rankle long after a much deeper wound inflicted upon the public cause comes to be viewed with indifference. The Examiner shrewdly guesses "that, but for the misunderstanding about Mr Turton, there would probably have been a better understanding of the part acted by Ministers in the debates on the Ordinances; for certain impressions on the mind, like certain impressions on the sight, remain as continuous after the object causing them has passed away." In plain terms, the Turton affair was rankling in Lord Durham's galled back when the new blister was applied, and both together were beyond his patience. His flatterers, or the tools of the Whigs, still express a hope—which they can hardly entertain—that he may be induced to remain, and consummate the regeneration of the North American colonies. His remaining would certainly be most desirable to his poor friends in Downing Street, whatever become of Canada; but we we fear his "high spirit," his "keen and quick sensibilities," preclude the hope. Every one prophesies that Canada will be ruined by his resignation. Lord Melbourne has written, Lord Glenelg has written, the Queen has written!—all are entreating his pardon or forbearance; and his friends beg that he should not give the Tories and Lord Brougham a triumph. No one can seriously expect that he will yield to these entreaties, after the declarations he has made against Whig treachery and Whig betrayal; of being "sacrificed by his friends." If Lord Durham were a high-minded statesman, a true patriot, we could guess what course he would follow; but, being merely a high-tempered nobleman, we know that he will follow. He will return; and we to the Whigs for one day of consuming wrath! But still they may weather it. And, after all, we know not if either the real friends of his Lordship or of the Canadian people, ought to regret his precipitate return. He has, in every probability, made his escape from an embarrassing position most opportunely; with public sympathy running strongly in his favour among the inconsiderate in this country, and the anti-Canadian party—"the British interest"—flattering him in the colony. He comes back while there are others to share the blame, which might soon have concentrated upon his head.—And who is to take his place? who, next, in England, that "knows little about Canada," is, in little more than three months, to work the miracles which Lord Durham says he has performed, in "restoring tranquillity and reviving confidence." In other quarters, we hear of nothing but of gathering storms, and of threatened outbreaks; and the Tory papers of the colony regret Lord Durham's departure, because they think that, if the French Canadians had offended and roused him by their discontents, he would have shewn spirit in putting them down. The Montreal Gazette, a violent Tory journal, declares—"that the whole loyal inhabitants of British North America, reposed the utmost confidence in the Earl of Durham." The only thing he wanted was power, to put down the disloyal; who will have another story. It is our grave opinion, looking to the state of affairs in Canada, that Lord Durham has had a fortunate escape; though, bitter as is the provocation he has received, he discovers little magnanimity in throwing up his appointment at the very moment when a truly great man would have clung to it, until he had realized those mighty hopes on which Lord Durham expatiates, as if to enhance the demerit of preferring the indulgence of his personal feelings and resentments to the good of his country.

In the meantime, we sincerely wish he may remain, and sometimes half hope that he may. If not, when the fiery modern Essex rushes from his ship into the presence of his Sovereign, to resign his appointment, as he threatens to do "if he live," may the royal mantle cover the devoted and venerable head of our beloved Whig Premier, and the cushion of the Throne be his shield!

We intended to bestow a few words upon our friends in Ireland; but the Durham panic, which is carried to almost ridiculous excess, engrosses every thought. The Dublin Pilot, a very able paper, and Mr O'Connell's principal organ, says we charged it with "intriguing." Not we indeed: intrigue is a business of its patrons; and if the intrigue should be, as it explains, to place Mr GROUT in the room of SPRING RICE, and Mr HUME in the place of LORD JOHN RUSSELL, with a few more liberal changes, why, then, Good speed to it! The "Irish chiefs" have rarely, of late, been so well employed; though we still think the whole of the rotten concern ought to, as it must, sink together. The affairs of Ireland look brighter: O'Connell is aware of his danger from the Whigs, fatal to all who come into alliance with them; and he is still quite able to extricate himself, damaged somewhat perhaps, but perfectly fit for service.

We meant also to bestow a few words in answer to the challenge of another respectable

Liberal Irish print, The Kilkenny Journal. It says—"Will Mr TAIT or Mr SHARMAN CRAWFORD, instead of exhibiting the evils—many of which we admit—of keeping in the Whigs, prove the certain advantages of putting them out? They may thus gain some converts." The challenge was fair, and fairly given; and we certainly intended in this very month to have accepted of it; but, behold our friend himself announcing that, "before the meeting of Parliament, the cry throughout Ireland will be, 'Overboard with the Whigs, and defiance to the Tories!' We must," he says, "try a new experiment; and that is, to pull no longer in the same boat with the Whigs; let them be flung overboard, and we shall work the gallant vessel into safe harbour, by the strength of our right arms."

This is answer enough: and, moreover, lets in a flood of light upon the O'Connell tactics. In both countries, the rats are forsaking the ship.

THE ANNUALS FOR 1839.*

THE ANNUALS may now be regarded as a staple literary manufacture, quite as much as the supplies of the circulating library. Like these, they are a symptom of the progressive refinement of taste in society, if our theory hold, that they have taken the place of the savoury and substantial tokens of Christmas cakes, turkeys, and chimes, and of the flimsy and tinsel perishing gifts of tawdry millinery and coarse jewellery. No one will question that this change is for the better. A book at worst is a book—a picture a picture; both endure, and are capable of diffusion; and these are but the smallest of their claims to superiority; for there is something to give intellectual pleasure, something to admire and to profit by, in the humblest Annual; while among them are embodied some of the most finished performances of living artists and authors. And this in addition to their value as gifts, as — "the beads of Memory's rosary,

Whereon she reckons kind remembrances
Of friends and old affections."

The competition of publishers, and the becoming pride of artists and literary contributors, but, above all, the ambition, and by'r lady, the interest of all concerned, is every season improving the new literary manufacture in one respect or another, and sometimes in all. Each in its own sphere, so far as we have yet seen them, maintains its character and its claim on public patronage.

And first among the first comes Miss Mitford's special charge, FINDEN'S TABLEAUX, again "regally gorgeous" in its garniture of green and gold, and containing gems worthy of so rich a casket. Miss Mitford has herself praised her friendly contributors so cordially and handsomely, that she has left us nothing to say. The "Tableaux" are this year illustrative of the "Womanly Virtues and Affections;" the designs are chiefly by Perring. They are all fine things enough in their way; but Zuliete and The Greek Wife are something more; and the Coronation is exquisite, and beautifully engraved. It is not the Coronation of Queen Victoria, nor indeed any vulgarity of the sort, but the picture of a lovely young girl, half reclining, half kneeling at a way-side chapel, in the attitude of devotion. It is the Elisabeth of Madame Cottin's "Exiles of Siberia," which is "done into" flowing and mellifluous verse by Richard E. Townsend, Esq., for Miss Mitford's superb book. But the literary gem of this poetic volume is the "Romaunt of the Page," by Miss Barret. It is not without the peculiar blemishes of that lady's style—haziness, and an occasional quaint simplicity, verging on something very like affectation; but, at the same time, it is rich in all the higher beauties of her poetry—a graceful and deep-toned composition, shewing true and original genius, and of a fine order:—

"A knight upon a battle-steed,
And a page on a steed beside,
From the holy war in Palestine,
As slow and thoughtful ride
As each were a palmer, and told for bead
The dew of the even-tide.

"O young page," said the knight,
'A noble page art thou;
And fearing not to steep in blood
The curls upon thy brow;
Anon in the tent, and anon in the fight,
Didst ward me a mortal blow.'

"O brave knight," said the page,
'Awhile since talked we
In tent and field, and then we talked
Of the deadly chivalry;
But I have not a breath of that battle-rage
To breathe betwixt grass and tree.'

* As we find it quite impracticable to announce all the Gift-Books in the present month, we have selected them in the order of their arrival in Edinburgh, and shall have the pleasure of making up our arrears in the December Number, when the whole bright galaxy will be before the public.

As they ride on, the knight speaks of his lady as of one whose bower might ill suit his silent page.

"Slowly and thankfully
The young page bowed his head ;
*His large eyes seemed to muse a smile,
Until he blushed instead ;*
And, I ween, no lady in her bower
Could blush more sudden-red !
'Sir Knight, the bower of thy lady
Will suit me well,' he said."

A beautiful descriptive passage intervenes, and heightens the dramatic effect of the scene ; but all passes unheeded by the musing page.

" 'A boon, thou noble knight,
If ever I served thee—
Though thou art a knight, and I am page,
Now grant this boon to me.
Now, tell me sooth, if dark or bright,
If little loved, or loved aright,
Be the face of thy ladye.'"

"Gloomily looked the knight—
'As a son thou has served me ;
And, oh, that I never had granted boon
To another, saving thee !
For haply then I should love aright ;
For then I should know if dark or bright
Were the face of my ladye."

" 'Yet ill befits it knightly tongue
To mourn that granted boon ;
For her Baron-sire avenged the wrong
To the fame of mine, sepulchred long,
By a lying caitiff done,
Who looked up the minster nave,
And dared to lie ; for my father's glaive
Was changed from steel to stone.'"

The baron fell in this quarrel, and his dying wife, recovering from her swoon, as the knight relates, summoned him in haste, and demanded the boon that he should marry "the sweet child" made an orphan, for his father's sake. He proceeds :—

" 'I said, my steed neighs in the court,
My bark rocks on the brine ;
And the warrior's vow I am under now,
To free the pilgrim's shrine ;
But fetch the ring, and call the priest,
And call that daughter of thine ;
And rule she wide, from my castle of Nyde,
While I am in Palestine."

" 'In the dark chambere, if the bride were fair,
Ye wis I could not see ;
But the steed thrice neighed,
And the priest fast prayed,
And wedded fast were we :
Her mother smiled in her bed,
As at its side we knelt to wed.
When the bride rose from her knee,
She kissed the smile of her mother dead
Or ere she kissed me."

" 'My page, my page, what grieves thee so,
That the tears run down thy face ?'
'Alas ! what if mine own sister
Was in that lady's case !
But she laid down the silks she wore,
And followed him she wed before,
Disguised as his true servitor,
To the very battle-place.'"

"And wept the page, and laughed the knight,
A gay laugh laughed he :—
'Well done it were for thy sister,
But not for my ladye !
No woman bright my loves requite, Unwomaned if she be.'"

"The page wept not—he smiled cold.
'Some wisdoms may declare
That womanhood is proved best
By the golden brooch and glossy vest
The mincing ladies wear ;
Yet almost is it proved as well
By truth or by despair.'"

"No more he smiled, no more he wept,
But passionate he spake :—
'Oh, womanly she prayed in tent,
When none beside did wake !
Oh, womanly she paled in fight,
For one beloved sake.
And her little hand, defiled with blood,
Her tender tears of womanhood
Most woman-pure did make.'"

" 'Well done it were for thy sister,
Thou tellest well her tale ;
But, for my lady, she shall pray
I' the kirk of Nydersdale.
No dread for me, but love for me,
Shall make my lady pale—
No casque shall hide her woman's tear—
It shall have room to trickle clear
Behind her woman's veil.'"

" 'But what if she mistook thy mind,
And followed thee to strife ;
Then, kneeling, ask thee for thy love,
As Paynims ask for life ?'
'I would forgive ; and evermore
Would love her as my servitor,
But never as my wife."

" 'Look up—there is a small bright cloud
Alone amid the skies :
So high, so pure, and so apart,
A woman's glory lies.'
The page looked up—the cloud was sheen—
A sudden cloud did rush, I ween, Betwixt it and his eyes."

"And so his eyes did drop away
From welkin to the hill.
Ha ! who rode there ? the page is 'ware,
Though the cry at his heart is still !
The page seeth all, the knight seeth none,
Though banner and spear do flock the sun,
And the Paynims ride at will."

"He speaketh calm, he speaketh low—
'Now ride, my master, ride,
Or ere, within the broadening dark,
The narrow shadows hide !'
Yes, fast—yes, fast—thou zealous page,
And keep thou by my side.'"

The page prays to remain behind—he has a vow, and again urges his master to ride on——"Who smiled free at the fantasy,

And adown the dell did ride."

"Had the knight looked up to the page's face.
No smile his words had won ;
Had the knight looked up to the page's face,
I ween he had never gone ;
Had the knight looked back to the page's geste,
I ween he had turned anon.
For dread was the wo in the face so young,
And wild was the geste wherewith he flung Casque, sword, to earth, and downward sprung,
And stood alone, alone."

"He clenched his hands, as if to hold
His soul's great agony :—
'Have I renounced my womanhood,
For wifeness unto thee ?—
And is this the last look of thine
That ever I shall see ?"

" 'Yet God thee save—and mayst thou have
A lady to thy mind,
More woman-proud, not faithfuller,
Than one thou leav'st behind !"

And God me take with Him to dwell,
For Him I cannot love too well,
As I have loved my kind.'

"She looked up in earth's despair,
The hopeful heaven to seek—
There floateth still the little cloud
Whereof her love did speak!
How bright the little cloud appears!
Her eyelids falls upon the tears,
And the tears fall down her cheek."

The Paynims ride up; and the faithful page refuses to tell of his master, and answers them proudly;—

"They cursed her deep, they smote her low,
They cleft her golden ringlets through—
The loving is the dying!"

A pathetic dirge closes this exquisite tragic ballad.

We have to complain of Miss Mitford giving way so much to her contributors as to have left little room to herself; though there are several gem-like stories from her own pen; one in particular, of which the scene is laid in the Imperial Court, and in which Napoleon, as well as Josephine, is made amiable. This little story is a sweet specimen of the pathos of the domestic affections.

Mrs Ople, Mr Kenyon, the brothers Chorley, and others, have brought tribute to the gifted Editress: but we turn from temptation, as we can go no farther with the "Tableaux."

FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.

This old favourite, with its familiar face, makes its sixteenth appearance before its patrons and the public, and much in its usual guise.
Its literary contents are judiciously balanced.
The tales are pleasing; and, if none of them rise to first-rate excellence none fall below mediocrity. Allan Cunningham contributes a racy Scotch story, and Mr St John one of Naples, which opens charmingly. The usual number of poetical pieces is found, and among them several that surpass the tinkling-cymbal, smooth, but hackneyed, monotonous, common-place of verse.
We would instance, in passing, the very beautiful verses, "Linger not Long," and the "Winter Picture," by Cornelius Webbe; but we are impelled to cite, from Barry Cornwall's triad of verse, the most pathetic and effective composition in the volume. Why will not our poets of all degrees do themselves and their readers the justice of having something to write about? A flight of thistle-down upon a breezy autumn day, is a beautiful thing to see; but it becomes tenfold more beautiful when we remember that it is the exquisite machinery provided for spreading far and wide the wheeled seeds. What an amount of modern verse resembles the downy wheels, wanting the seed, floating in air—beautiful but barren!

A LONDON LYRIC.

Without.

"The winds are bitter; the skies are wild;
From the roof comes plunging the dawning rain;
Without, in tatters, the world's poor child
Sobbeth aloud her grief, her pain!

No one heareth her, no one heedeth her;
But Hunger, her friend, with his cold, gaunt head,
Grasps her throat, whispering huskily,
'What dost thou in a Christian land?'

Within.

"The skies are wild, and the blast is cold;
Yet Riot and Luxury brawl within.
Slaves are waiting in crimson and gold—
Waiting the nod of a child of sin.
The fire is crackling, wine is bubbling
Up in each glass to its beaded brim;
The jesters are laughing, the parasites quaffing
'Happiness,' 'Honour'—and all for him!

Without.

"She who is slain 'neath the winter weather—
Ah! she had once a village fame—
Listened to love on the moonlight heather;
Had gentleness, vanity, maiden-shame.
Now her allies are the tempest howling,
Prodigals' curses, self-disdain;
Poverty, misery—Well, no matter;
There is an end unto every pain.

"The harlot's fame was her doom to-day—
Disdain, despair; by to-morrow's light,
The ragged boards, and the pauper's pall;
And so she'll be given to dusty night.
Without a tear or a human sigh,
She's gone—poor life and its fever o'er;
Soh! let her in calm oblivion lie,
While the world runs merry as heretofore.

Within.

"He who you lordly feast enjoyeth—
He who doth rest on his couch of down—
He it was who threw the forsaken
Under the feet of the trampling town:
Liar, betrayer, false as cruel—
What is the doom for his dastard sin?
His peers they scorn? high dames they shun him?—
Unbar you palace, and gaze within.

"There—yet his deeds are all trumpet-sounded—
There, upon silken seats recline
Maidens as fair as the summer morning,
Watching him rise from the sparkling wine.
Mothers all proffer their stainless daughters;
Men of high honour salute him 'friend'—
Skies! oh, where are your cleansing waters?
World! oh, where do thy wonders end?"

THE FORGET-ME-NOT.

The first-born of the Annals, the beginning of their strength, has many claims to attention in this, we think, its eighteenth year. Some of the plates are gems—as Almeria, painted by Parrie, with skill and retrospective knowledge of manners and art. Morning Prayer is fine in its subject; and we have a capital Highland Gillie by Cooper, though the rough-coated garron is too well-fed; and St Palazzo by Barrett, a beautiful Italian view. But the literature of the "Forget-me-not" constitutes its beauty and strength. It is not tame and commonplace, it is not wishy-washy, it is not pribble-prabble—it is not full of "affectations." The "Genie of Wealth," the first tale, may be somewhat too long for an annual, but it is well-written, and has a deep and excellent moral;
but "The Siege," by Jerrold, a spirited manners-painting dramatic tale, which comes next, is all we could wish for, and far superior to the average contents of even the best annuals. "The Belle Sauvage Plot," an English historical tale of the reign of George II., is equally deserving of high praise. It is written by Miss Lawrence, whose "Historical Memoirs of the Queens of England," we had lately occasion to commend, and it proves, among other things, how much real and systematic knowledge may add to the power and accomplishment of the fictionist. The reign of the Second George was fertile in small and insipient plots, or ephemeral plotikins, which were, in general, based on the Pope and the Pretender, but especially on the latter; and which notably served the purpose of Walpole in their day and generation. There was no need to create them; in a favourable atmosphere of bigotry, ignorance, and credulity, they sprang up spontaneously, like the Cock Lane ghost, ready to be employed in frightening the people out of their wits, and especially all good Protestants and London citizens. What Sir Robert Walpole really thought of the plots—not carried on in the bold, swaggering style of “the three-score young gentlemen of Portingale,” who swore on their daggers to assassinate the nursing mother of the Reformed Faith; or of Guy Fawkes, who intended to make wholesale work with both Houses of Parliament—Miss Lawrence cannot conjecture; but she is not far out, we think, when, in the development of her clever story, she exhibits the blunt and yet wily Minister laughing in his sleeve, and employing the trick to bend the pig-headed monarch to his purpose. As this lady is a new aspirant for literary fame in this particular walk, and an exceedingly promising one, we shall do her and the public reciprocal justice, by giving a specimen of her scenes:—

LONDON CITIZENS, A HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

The vast majority saw in the Prime Minister the saviour of his country, and, loud in their admiration of the Walpole administration, were unwavering in their belief of all and every plot, duly “set forth by authority.” Among this majority, nearly every citizen of our good city rejoiced to enrol himself; and, acting on the laudable maxim, that, “when bad men combine, the good must associate,” each city worthy, (save when taking stock, or family parties intervened) proceeded each evening, with newly-combed wig, and freshly-filled snuff-box, to his respective club, determined to smoke his pipe in honour of old England, and to toast with his whole heart the favourite minister, in the glass of punch which concluded his quietly industrious day.

It was at one of these clubs, held in a comfortable room, well furnished with “aids to reflection,” in the pleasant forms of pipes, glasses, bottles, Daily Courants, gazettes, and huge china punch-bowls, that some of the most respectable inhabitants of Ludgate Hill were assembled, discussing the meaning of the following ominous paragraph, which had appeared that very morning in the Daily Courant.

“We have been credibly informed by an honourable gent., just come over from Ostend, that the Duchess de B—— sent last week from Versailles, to a certain person whose pretences are well known, a white rose tree in a Dresden china pot, and that thereupon this worthy personage sent thirteen of them wrapped in white paper, and tied with white ribbon, to his chosen friends here. Lord C. and S., without doubt, had one, and we think if we asked at R. House, we should find the noble owner had one, too. This honourable gent. also saith that one is coming over by a special messenger to the old Duchess of B. That suspicious persons are coming over, there is no doubt; a worthy skipper in the Cognac trade told us only last week, how they are casting cannon-balls at Strasburgh, and he also saith that two French officers of the Carabiniers are coming over to recruit in the Highlands, the which we the more believe, seeing that a Jesuit-like looking man came over to a place in Kent, which shall be nameless, and, after staying there two days, went away nobody knew where.”

“There is something in this,” said old Mr Neville, the lawyer, laying down the paper. “I always said France would not long be quiet; but then what say you to this letter on the other side?—ah! it’s written by somebody who knows what he’s about.”

Mr Neville resumed his spectacles, and read with due emphasis the following high-sounding letter, addressed to the editor:—

“To be prepared for danger is the proud prerogative of enlightened man, who, combining the lessons of the past with the anticipations of the future, can draw inferences therefrom, wherewith to regulate his future conduct. These considerations have induced me to take up the pen to urge upon my compatriots the necessity of strict adherence to the glorious constitution and the principles of 1688. Nor do I lift a warning voice in vain: mischief is it hand. The Gallic monarch, crafty and vigilant; the Pretender with his finger on the map of England; the Jacobites shewing their face in open day; and Alecto and her baleful sister furies about to rush forth from their darksome cave! Truly, in times like these, where might we look for help? were it not that we have at the head of affairs that noble minister to whom we may well address that line of the great Roman poet, and say:—

“Nili desperandum, Teuaro duce et auspicio Tutiora.”

The high-sounding phraseology of this delectable epistle, so different from the usual style of newspaper correspondents a hundred years ago, but, above all, the Latin quotation, rendered it perfectly irresistible. The whole club was in a state of excitement. Mr Wingate, the draper, proposed an instant address to the Minister, offering, not their lives, (Sir Robert would have cared little for them,) but their property, to aid in repelling the Pretender, and chaining “Alecto and her baleful sisters” in their cave; while Mr Hewitson, the silversmith, recommended an instant muster of the city train-bands, he having the honour to be one of the captains in that august company.

“I should like Mr Cooper’s opinion about it,” resumed old Mr Neville, “for he is of a solid judgment, and thinks much on these matters.”

“He does,” answered Mr Wingate; “and I know it is his opinion that the Pretender will make another attempt ere long; he told me he feared so, when it was said that white-flowered silks were all the vogue at Versailles; and here he is.”

Mr Silas Cooper, the silk-mercant, turns out the very soul of the plot. His old established shop, the Blackamore’s Head, was exactly opposite the Belle Sauvage, and he duly watched the arrival of all the coaches, and was particularly assiduous Dover-ward. The way in which he finds out and lays things together is amazing. He has everything in train for discovery, when Mr Neville remarks, on the subsequent night—

“Ah, and you will have enough on your hands now; for truly, you must keep a close look-out, that, as soon as the plot is properly concocted, Sir Robert may be made acquainted therewith.” In this suggestion Mr Cooper acquiesced; the conversation took a more domestic turn, and parochial affairs superseded public, until the nine o’clock bell summoned them home.

Anxious to put in instant practice the admonition of the preceding night, the next morning saw Mr Cooper take his patient stand at his door, and keeping a vigilant watch over the gate of the Belle Sauvage.

For many hours his vigilance was exercised in vain. The lumbering Cambridge waggon jolted in; the York Dispatch, with its six “strong trotting horses,” rambled out; but the suspicious stranger never made his appearance. Occasionally, Mr Cooper’s eyes glanced down the hill toward the small neat shop known by the name of the “Fan and Feathers,” where Mrs. Nurdan and her daughter resided, following the then quiet and genteel occupation of milliners. It was doubtless from the daughter’s name having been associated with the “awful plot” now in hand, that Mr Cooper thought of her at all.

but, as he meditated, he could not help recollecting what an excellent judge of silks she was, what a pretty Italian hand she wrote, and how patriotic were her opinions respecting contraband French goods. Indeed, so singularly absorbed was the worthy mercer in these meditations, that we cannot tell how long he might have indulged them, had not the appearance of the very young woman who yesterday visited his shop, forcibly recalled his mind to more important duties.

Yes, there she was in her sprigged chintz gown and black hood, cautiously gliding up the very gateway. Mr Cooper's watch was not long; as she returned, crossed the way, and proceeded to the "Fan and Feathers." What was now to be done? Gentlemen never in those days entered milliners' shops to make purchases, else Mr Cooper would have followed her for two yards of black ribbon for his tie-wig; but anxiety and fear quicken our ingenuity, and, ere the young woman came out, the worthy mercer determined to send his shop-boy, bidding him give especial heed to the young woman in the chintz gown, and carefully mark what she bought.

"And what did she ask for?" was his question almost ere the boy had re-entered the shop. "Three dozen yards of white satin ribbon," was the reply. "I thought as much!" ejaculated Mr Cooper; "but three dozen yards—goodness!" "Yes, sir; and she said she'd take the whole piece, for more might be wanted."

Mr Cooper went into his back parlour, and sat down to think what was best to be done; and then it came into his mind that Mrs Norton ought to be made acquainted with the risk she ran in serving white ribbon to Jacobites; and also that, if Miss Hetty, who was so prudent, were just warned of this plot, she might be able to do good service. It was true, Mr Cooper had not spoken to the lady since he met her at Mr Hewitson's last Christmas; but then she was a neighbour, and then it was for the public weal that the white satin ribbon should be inquired about; in short, zeal for his country eventually induced Mr Cooper to lay aside his gown, put on his chocolate coat and laced cravat, and, taking his gold-headed cane, to proceed to the "Fan and Feathers." "O Mr Cooper," exclaimed Miss Hetty, not without surprise, "is it you? pray, walk in." The worthy mercer shut the half glass door, which, as well as the window, was shaded by the green silk curtains, (for milliners in those days kept as much as possible from public view) and followed Miss Hetty into the back parlour, where the little shining round table, with its thread-papers, needle-case, and point sprigs upon green oil-skin, bore honourable testimony of the genteel industry of the fair occupier. "Pray, sit down, Mr Cooper," said the lady, placing one of the high-backed chairs for him; "pleasant summer weather!" "I'm sure I interrupt you, madam," said our mercer, bowing, with his three-cornered hat in hand. "I'm sure I'm an intruder." "Indeed you are not," courteously replied the lady, taking up the thread-paper. "Why, madam," hesitated Mr Cooper, and at length depositing the hat in the window-seat, "I called because I fear sad things may be going on." "Sad things, sir!" cried Miss Hetty, in amazement; "what I has our boy? or our maid?—dear, dear, I fear she will not suit us, for she came home from her holiday full ten minutes after half-past eight." Mr Cooper smiled at the female narrowness of mind that never contemplated "sad things" beyond the restricted circles of domestic life. "No, my dear madam," said he, "Molly seems a very worthy person; but dangerous people from France are about." "Thank you, I'll be on my guard; but I never buy French lace, except openly of M^{rs} Delaune." "Ah, madam, it is not about French lace," said the mercer—"but I'm sure I interrupt you!" "O dear no!" replied the lady, resuming her thimble, and taking up the small piece of green oil-skin on which the rudiments of a point aprig had just been traced out. Mr Cooper glanced a look at the taper fingers plying the needle upon that prettiest and most lady-like species of fine needlework, point, at the comely though not youthful features, the plainly banded auburn hair, so neatly confined by the clear muslin fly cap, and he almost forgot the "horrid Jacobitical plot." His thoughts soon, however, resumed their wonted channel, and he proceeded to give the lady a full account, and to express his fears about the white satin ribbon. But the milliner, although she duly expressed her alarm at the earlier part of the story, was not alarmed at this. "It is for trimming a white satin petticoat," said she, "and the young woman said it was to be worn at Lady Pomfret's ball—indeed, she's to come back again for some more." "I should greatly like to see her," said Mr Cooper, musingly, "I should, of all things." "She will be here in less than an hour, I dare say," replied Miss Hetty. "It is really of importance that I should see her," returned Mr Cooper, hesitatingly, "because, you see, my dear madam, that I could then be certain whether it was the same person that yesterday came to my shop." "Ah, surely so; well, Mr Cooper, take a dish of tea; I'm sure she will be back again soon."

Mr Cooper again hesitated; he stammered out something about leaving business so early, and then earnestly protested that he was quite sure he was an intruder. The lady, as in politeness bound, flatly contradicted him, rung the little hand-bell that stood upon the mantel-piece, and ordered the tea-things.

Within ten minutes, Molly, having exchanged her check apron for one of snowy Holland, and having arrayed herself in a clean mob-cap, with Flanders edging, came in with the little round tea-board, and the little china cups, the little teapot, and the little silver cream jug, standing like a pipkin, on its three little legs, and placed them on the table. Then, Miss Hetty, carefully laying aside the point sprig, drew from beneath her book muslin apron a huge bunch of keys, and, unlocking the corner cupboard, took from hence the jappaned tea-cannister, the china sugar-bason, a pair of scissor-shaped tongs, and two diminutive spoons. Then, being duly certified by Molly that the kettle was actually boiling, Miss Hetty measured out four tea-spoonfuls of tea into the tea-pot, and, carefully replacing the lid, lest the fine flavour should escape, proceeded herself to the kitchen; for "making tea" among our great grandmothers was too important a trust to be delegated to a servant.

Very pleasantly did Mr Cooper and the lady (for old Mrs Nurdun was confined up stairs with "the rheumatics") chat together; about Mr Hewitson and his country house; so rural, only half a mile beyond Moorfields; how Mr Atkins and the children were going gipsying to St John's Wood, and how old Mrs Neville was sadly frightened with the cows in Spa Fields, (for your regular Cockneys always, during summer, talk of ruralities;) and then the patterns of the new silks were discussed; and, ere the fifth cup was finished, both the lady and the gentleman wondered that they had not become better acquainted, and each thought the other exceedingly pleasant company. But the shop-bell rang, and two ladies entered. Miss Hetty promptly obeyed the call, while Mr Cooper impatiently awaited her return in the little back parlour.

"And she has not returned, after all," said Miss Hetty, coming back for her scissors; "but these two ladies are come instead." "Then beware, my dear madam," whispered Mr Cooper; "for these are doubtless also in the plot; what have they come for?" "To bring back the white satin ribbon, and to say that they should like the gauze." "But while, I suppose." Oh, yes; for it will make rosettes better." "Ah, truly, white roses would not come amiss to them." "Why, the eldest lady was just asking me if I had any white artificial roses, only they must be without green leaves." "Ay, doubtless, a pair of French Jacobites." "Oh, dear no, Mr Cooper, they're English ladies, I'm sure; and the youngest, whom the other calls Almeria, is one of the sweetest creatures you ever saw." Mr Cooper shook his head. "Ah, Miss Nurdun, you are not aware of this plot; here a servant comes, and then, lest she should be discovered, her mistress comes, and then, you'll find to-morrow somebody else will come; 'tis a fine plot that's in hand, and I'll tell you what, if you could but get them into this back parlour, and lock the door, I would run off to Alderman Fludger's for a warrant; a pair of papistical baggages!" "O Mr Cooper!" cried Miss Hetty, "what are you saying:—what, to think of inveigling customers, and locking them in a back parlour? really, that's jerusalem, Mr Cooper." Mr Cooper felt that zeal for the Walpole administration had certainly carried him a little too far. "Don't be alarmed, my dear madam," said he, in tones soft as his superfine satin; "but when the Protestant cause and our invaluable constitution are at stake, one's feelings are apt to overpower one—why, the Pope and the Jesuits may have a hand in it." "Ah, true—well, 'tis a mercy that the Pope, the Devil, and Pretender, are kept out of England," replied the lady.

Turn we now to a different scene, and one equally truthful.

QUEENS AND COURTIER, AND THEIR ROYAL MASTERS,

IN ALL AGES.

The morning's sun shone pleasantly into a large room furnished in the heavy fashion of the day, and there, in a ponderous arm-chair, placed beside an equally ponderous table, on which lay a rich gold-embroidered housewife, and a rich gold crui case, sat a lady, in blue damask, with ruffles and aprons of Brussels point; her hands employed on some cambric, but her eyes more frequently directed towards the door than fixed on her work. She was past the middle age; but her small and regular features, and the delicate fairness of her complexion gave her a much younger look; and, but for her excessive embonpoint, she might have passed for twenty years younger. The door opened, and admitted a tall, portly, middle-aged man, whose dress and air alike required the aid of a Chesterfield, but whose aid, judging from the haughty and nonchalant air, might have been proffered in vain. He advanced, after cautiously closing the door, and, with a respectful bow, laid a packet of papers on the table. The cambric was hastily laid aside, and the soft and rather heavy blue eye of the lady lighted up with a sudden intelligence, which shewed that affairs of state were far more congenial to her mind than the easy labours of the needle. That room contained the arbiters of the destinies of England, perhaps of Europe—Queen Caroline and Sir Robert Walpole.

"Sit down, Sir Robert," said the Queen, "I am sorry to tell you this office cannot be given. 'Good heavens! your Majesty cannot say so!—it is most important.' 'I know it; but he says every office that falls is asked either by yourself or some of your friends.' 'Certainly,' replied the Minister, 'certainly, your Majesty: who are to have offices except those who support us?' 'Certainly,' replied Caroline, with an arch smile; 'but in this case he is determined.' 'But we are bound to give it to Beauchamp, and, had old Winslow died three years ago, he would have had it; here has he been always at our call, always ready to sag upon committees.' 'Or to make speeches in coffee-houses in praise of the Walpole administration, or to write letters,' said Caroline, laughing. The Minister bit his lip. 'Ay, he's a confounded puppy, I know, but then his brother is worth keeping; and if Harcourt Beauchamp is refused the place, Lisle Beauchamp will join the opposition.' 'In spite of that splendid letter in the Courant?' inquired Caroline. 'Ah, true, that was better than usual; but, your Majesty, it is for this very reason the place is fitted for Harcourt Beauchamp; it's almost a sinecure, so he can do little mischief, and I have no other to offer him, for we are three and four deep in promises already, and, by some plaguy chance, whenever a man gets a snug place, he's sure not to die until he has killed off half-a-dozen with waiting for it. But might we not yet persuade him?' Caroline gave a significant glance, and shook her head. 'We must be quiet for the present, he is quite put out.' 'With what some rascally Jacobite has put in his head,' said the minister. 'Yes, I believe it is John Hinde Cotton's doing. My Lord So-and-so told Mr Somebody, who told his wife, who told somebody else, (you well knew how a silly story gains currency) that our dear ally and cousin Louis said, last week, at Versailles, that he should take care to keep in with you, for then he could pension off half his court with the treasury places that fall into your hands.'

The Minister bit his lip; for he well knew that a silly remark like this was more likely to injure him with his royal master than a direct charge of treason. "I see it all," he at length said, "ay, whatever that party may say about our plots, a shrewd plot is hatching not far from here. And it is on this very account that Beauchamp ought to have the office; for if we seem to lose our influence, it is high well gone." "It is," said Caroline; "but he is strangely put out; one could almost wish there was some rumour of a plot, for that is the only thing to bring him round." "Why, as to plots, your Majesty, we can have them made to order at ten minutes' notice, as my peruke-maker says," answered Walpole, laughing; "and now I remember I have a letter in my pocket all about one; and sent me by a foolish fellow on Ludgate Hill, who seems to think unless people go about with their names pasted on their backs, they must be Jesuits or French spies." The Minister drew from his pocket the large sheet of foolscap, and laid it before the Queen. "It may be as well to mention this," said Caroline gravely, after she had hastily glanced over its contents; "indeed you are in duty bound to do so."

The Minister looked earnestly at the Queen; there was a suppressed smile on the lip, but the keen blue eye laughed outright. "Certainly, your Majesty," said he. Caroline burst into a hearty laugh. "Why, truly, this genuine plot has happened most opportunely; all men are managed either by their hopes or their fears; but, hush!" Her quick ear caught the sound of footsteps; she took up the cambric, resumed her thimble, and, while the Minister, rising from his chair, stood, hat in hand, as though he had just entered, the Queen of England plied her needle, like a very sempstress earning sixpence a-day. The door opened, and a little, dark man, in a chocolate undress, entered; his sharp, thin features wore an expression of continual anxiety, and his keen, black eyes looked searchingly into every corner, as though he expected at least to find a hand-grenade. "Well, Sir Robert, but you are early," said he. The portly minister bowed with more reverence than gracefulness. "Ay, you are come, I suppose, to ask for some place." "By no means, your Majesty; I have come to say that the few thousands you mentioned will be at your disposal by the fifteenth; a little management will be required, but that can easily be settled." The little dark man nodded, and almost smiled. "That is well. And now, Sir Robert, whatever else you have to say, say out; madame will not tell," and he nodded smilingly to the Queen, who sat plying her needle as though hemstitch were the whole duty of women. "I have received this letter just now," said Walpole, carelessly taking up the silk-mercer's epistle. "I think it my duty to shew it. But we must remember that citizens are easily frightened." The little man took the letter eagerly. "What! anything about the Pretender?" said Caroline, just glancing her eyes from her needlework; "I thought everything was quiet now." "Ay, more quiet, more mischief, madame; look at this," said her liege lord, putting the letter into her hand. "Then your Majesty thinks we had better inquire?" said Walpole; "to be sure, I have heard accounts from tolerably good authorities about the white roses being sent, but it is difficult to get correct intelligence." "And there may be nothing in it, after all," interposed Caroline, quietly. "But there is something in it, madame; and, Sir Robert, I trust you will do your duty," said the little man. "Assuredly; but I know of no one who is so fitted to inquire into this as Mr Harcourt Beauchamp—he wrote that letter in the Daily Courant—for he is heart and hand for us." "But he may expect that place in the Treasury, and you know you can't give it him," said Caroline. "But he shall give it him, if I please, madame," said her liege lord, sharply; "he shall have the place, I say; so send, Sir Robert, and find out all you can."

How the plot works we do not mean to tell. One morning Walpole came laughing into the Queen's apartment. The plot had been blown up. "How shall we manage now?" said he. "Still your Majesty will remember that I always expressed my disbelief of the plot, and so did you." The clever story would make a good petite drama. Mary Howitt, Miss M. A. Brown, and L. E. L., T. K. Hervey, and several anonymous poets, have contributed to the "Forget-me-Not," in which Major Calder Campbell appears both in prose and verse. His "Howdie-Witch of Cawdor," and Dr Shelton Mackenzie's "Bleeding Heart Yard," are both powerful sketches of the dark and supernatural; and, upon the whole, "The Forget-me-Not" for 1839, is a right worthy and creditable performance to all concerned.

THE ORIENTAL ANNUAL.

This gift-book or souvenir has changed its editor, for the brighter, and perhaps, from this circumstance, for the better. It has this year come out under the auspices of Thomas Bacon, Esq., a clever and tasteful draughtsman, and the author of a lively, entertaining, and fresh work on India, with which many of our readers may be familiar—"First Impressions and Studies from Nature in Hindostan." This gentleman must necessarily possess many of the pre-requisites necessary to the concoction of an Oriental Annual; and he has put all his powers in requisition. His great fault is excess of diffidence, which, however, may be forgiven in a military man, were it but for the rarity of its occurrence. He does not seem to think it possible that he and his auxiliaries shall ever properly fill their predecessors' shoes; and there is no matter though they should never try them. They will walk both more gracefully and surely in their own boots. He is, however, consoled, so far as he is himself concerned, by the reflection, that a great critic found pleasure in a miserable work, purely for the sake of the embellishments and the binding. In his work both are faultless. A host of eminent artists is mustered in fair and imposing array; and the engravers are the Findens. The descriptive parts, and the tales, legends, and historical romances, are nearly, without exception, from Mr Bacon's pen. His, too, are the original sketches of the scenes, retouched by Stanfield, Roberts, Creswick, Dibdin, &c. They are full of character, and highly finished. We are meditating an extract from a very graceful story, told under the scene and chapter, "Hardwū," but must turn from it, all we can find space for being a few pretty lines on "Infanticide," from the section "Benares." They are written by an anonymous young lady; the time is morning, the beautiful morning of the East,

"Ere panting Nature sinks o'erborne"— when,

"Lo! from the grateful shade,
By spreading tamarinds and rich mango made,
The snowy temple its light dome upreareth;
While scattered here and there,
As though appealing to its guardian care,
The modest Hindoo hut appeareth.

Near to the sacred fane—
O'ershadowed by the banyan's linked chain
Of leafy boughs unending,
Upshooting, spreading, and descending—
A lakelet, small and clear,
Reflects the emerald-tinted atmosphere;

Around the dark brown trunks gay blossoms creep;
From twig to twig the lively squirrels leap;
Birds of gay plumage and sweet song
The laden branches throng;
And stately peacocks through the long grass rove:
Already, to their light and graceful toils,
The women gather 'neath the fragrant grove,
Spinning the white line from the fleecy spoils
Of yon rich field, which far away
Lies basking in the opening day."

In this delicious scene a young and beautiful female appears, whose personal loveliness and graceful costume are charmingly described. Her features bear the deep impress of sorrow:—

"Across her bosom, closely drawn,
Descends her veil, in shining folds;
And something to her heart she holds,
Which often, with convulsive clasp,
She presses close and closer still;
Her right hand's rose-tipped fingers grasp
A basket framed with care and skill."

In her bosom nestled the foredoomed female infant. The basket contains her votive offering. The young mother gazes on the stream:—

"As to the breezes cool
The pensile sprays and verdurous foliage shiver,
Their painted brethren, as in mockery, quiver
Beneath the glassy surface of the pool;
And there, its glossy leaves around it closing,
The silver lotus floats, reposing.
"Even thus, even thus," passed through poor Zeida's breast,
'I might have cradled thee to rest,
Calm as the lily on that pearly water—
As safe from storms, as beautiful, as blest—
Wo, wo is me! my daughter! O my daughter!"

Her sacrifice must be completed before she,

—"Returning with reluctant feet,
Again may sit by Meon's side,
And find her consolation, if she can,
In the caress bestowed by flattered pride,
Which oft is deemed and chartered love in man;
For beautiful is Zeida, and her lord
Knows well to prize and guard so fair a gem—
A richer never shone in Delhi's hoard.
But can he love her and condemn
That young heart to such agony
As now each pulse is torturing?"

Oh! could he but that infant see,
From its brief slumber just awaking,
Still pillowed on that bosom, aching,

"Zeida hath laid her basket down—
Her offering to the sacred river;
No tears, even yet, her eyes doth own,
But every feeble limb doth quiver;
And sobs, each like a dying gasp,
Burst from that agonized breast,
To which, with strong and straining clasp,
The hapless babe is pressed;
A smile across its features plays
Unconsciously; and now another,
Answering the miserable gaze
Of that most wretched mother.

At last the sacrifice is consummated.

This poetic pleading against the foulest crime of the East, and one which is not yet altogether unknown, is worth a dozen homilies. There the principle of aristocracy, of high caste, gains its full development. Female infants are destroyed, that the nobility and purity of blood may be preserved; for—

"They of the pure flowing blood, Seek none but sons to grace their line."

THE DRAWING-ROOM SCRAP-BOOK.

It is with a gentle touch of melancholy that we open this volume. Is it, indeed, to be the last of that beautiful series which we owe to the fervid and charming pen of her on whom is now devolved the honour of being the most brilliant of living English poetesses—the admired L. E. L.? Something like this bereavement is intimated in her preface—her real Farewell!—which is far more touching than the poem, under that title, which appears as the first in the “Drawing-Room Scrap-Book”—if her own Farewell be not, in its naked truth and simple pathos, the finest thing in the volume. Every one knows how L. E. L. has been magically turned into L. E. M. She has, in her new character, sailed away to another quarter of the globe, and taken a solemn and long, though, we hope, not a last adieu of that public whose generous sympathy and admiration cherished her youthful genius. She says—“I have again to solicit the indulgence which the Public have often awarded to this work. I ask it now, perhaps, for the last time on my own part. . . . For the last few years, ‘The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book’ has been the cherished record of my poetical impressions, and my only poetical work; and I grew gradually to look forward to June and July as recalling my first keen delight in composition, and in giving words to those fancies and feelings which constitute especially a woman’s poetry. I shall hope, with all the freshness of new scenes and thoughts, to write for England when far away from its shores; but that hope is, indeed, an uncertainty. Many circumstances may interrupt my future literary efforts; and I may not have another opportunity of offering my thanks for the constant liberality and kindness that I have met from the Messrs Fisher. I have always received the utmost assistance and encouragement, and I cannot better close these pages than by my sincere good wishes and earnest thanks.” This is pleasant, and handsome, and cordial; and, perhaps, not so rare a thing between authors and publishers as is sometimes believed; and it puts us in fit tone to open the book.

It contains a selection of sixty-three plates, all of them good, many eminently so, both in design and finish. A few of the engravings are portraits of individuals that ought to appear in ‘The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book.’ Among others there are portraits of Lady Blessington, Miss Jewsbury, and Moore the poet—looking not exactly the butterfly that loves to flutter in a lady’s bower, but, nevertheless, a true likeness of a man of genius, who rather prides himself, it is alleged, upon refinement and savoir faire, and the air of good society; and of whom we once heard the Ettrick Shepherd say, in a highly complimentary vein, “He’s just like a peesant, and the sweetest of a’ poets!” It is well that the world were disabused of the vulgar idea, that every poet ought to be an Adonis, as well as an Apollo, and every poetess a Venus, a Hebe, or a Grace. Mr Moore’s picture quite discounts this absurdity. There are a few exquisite and highly finished landscapes in the volume, chiefly Oriental and Turkish scenes; a charming view of Newstead Abbey; a few architectural and scenic pictures; and one delicious sketch by Hayter, of the Twain Sisters;—but those sweet and lovely girls are not twins, though there is no great difference in their ages. An Only Son, though a disagreeable subject, possesses great merit as a bit of art; and so does Jenkins’ Ancient Prude. But we do not pretend to enumerate the plates. These, to be fully appreciated, must be seen; and we hasten to what we are able to shew—fair specimens of L. E. L.’s graceful and facile pen.

The view of the Court of a Turkish villa, near Damascus, with figures—why not story-tellers?—forms the fit theme of the following gay and brilliant lines:—

“In the midst, a fountain
Singeth day and night;
Each small wave a mirror
For the changing light.
Now the golden sunshine,
Softened by the boughs,
Which a doubtful passage
To the wave allows;
Or the moon seems lingering near,
As she paused the words to hear
Of the Tales Arabian—
The old Arabian Nights.

“I can see the garden
Treasured from the day,
Where the young Aladdin
Took his wondering way.
Pale the lamp was burning
Which the genie swayed—
Would that at this moment
I could have its aid!
Thus, upon her twilight wings,
Memory beareth graceful things
From the Tales Arabian—
Those old Arabian Nights.

“Far away, the Island
Rises on the deep,
Where the fated Agib
Found the boy asleep.
Soon the fond old father
Came with songs and joy—
Ah! what bears he with him,
But his murdered boy!
Still does fate, in some dark shape,
Mock our efforts to escape,
As in the Tales Arabian—
The old Arabian Nights.

“Next a summer palace
Gleams with sudden light,
But the lovely Persian
Makes it yet more bright.
I can hear her singing
In the lonely tower,
Mournful—oh, how mournful!—
Of a happier hour.
Still the same star rules above,
Sorrow still companions love,
As in the Tales Arabian—
Those old Arabian Nights.”

This is, we think, very graceful; even the cadence of the chorus, if we may so call it, comes deliciously on the ear. The portrait of Miss Jewsbury (the late Mrs Fletcher, who died in India very soon after her marriage) is accompanied by a copy of remarkable verses addressed to L. E. L., which we give Miss Landon credit for magnanimity in publishing. It is a token that she has outlived the unwholesome symptoms lamented by her friend. They contain a beautiful lesson for highly-gifted and susceptible minds, that allow themselves either to be entangled by the snares of the false world, or dazzled by its glitter. Miss Landon's muse must have been in an unnatural—"a false position," when these earnest lines were addressed to her.

"Good night! I have no jewels,
As parting gifts to bring;
But here's a frank, a kind farewell,
Thou gay and gifted thing.

"In the lonely hour of night,
When the face puts off its mask,
When the fevered day is over,
And the heart hath done its task;

"When reason mourns the vanities
That stoop the lofty will,
Till the spirit's rock of worldliness
Is struck, and yields no rill:

"Then, then I think of thee, friend,
With sad and earnest thought,
As of a child from Fairyland
Into the desert brought;

"Forgetting there the visions
That make of childhood part;
And singing songs of Fairyland,
Without the fairy heart;

"As of a rose at noon-tide,
Waving proudly to the view;
Yet wanting, in its crimson depth,
The early drop of dew.

"I would my home were lovely
As some which thou hast sung—
I would there were around it
All lavish beauty flung—

"I would bear thee to its bosom,
Thou shouldst dwell with nature free,
And the dew of early truthfulness
Would soon come back to thee.

"Thy life is false and feverish,
It is like a masque to thee;
When the task and glare is over,
And thou grieve'st—come to me!"

A stately and gorgeous view of the entrance of Queen Elizabeth into Kenilworth Castle, affords L. E. L. a theme well suited to her genius. She has, in the opening lines, made pathetic use of the not improbable story of Leicester's neglected and imprisoned lady, of Wilkie's ballad, and Scott's romance.

"While the lovely lady keepeth
Vigil sad and lone,
Asking every hour that creepeth,
When will night be done?
Watching makes the hours seem long.
Mocking at the mourner's sadness,
Rises from below
Every sound of feast and gladness
That the night can know.

What avails those sounds among,
One low sigh that's borne along?

"From the topmost turret ringing
Comes the giant bell,
Till the very walls are swinging
Of the sad one's cell—
Deafened with the iron roar.

Low the fiery cannon sounding,
Seem to rend the skies;
While the multitude surrounding,
Answer with their cries.
Loud as waves upon the shore,
Fast the hurrying horsemen pour.

"Lute and voices soft are stealing,
Soft and musical;
But the trumpet, proud appealing,
Rises above all—
Proud it welcomes England's queen!

Slow amid the crowd she rideth,
With a stately grace;
While, with queen-like art, she chideth
Her white courser's pace—
That no one who there had been
But might tell what he had seen.

"Blue her eyes are, as the morning
Flashing into day;
Clear as are the falcon's, scorning
Not to meet that ray:
Now its light is soft the while.
In her golden hair are blended
Diamond and pearl;
But that glittering head is bended
To the favourite Earl;
And the lady of our isle
Listens with a conscious smile.

"At the royal rein attending
Does Lord Leicester ride;
To the mane his dark locks bending
As he keeps her side:
And his voice is soft and low.
Proud he welcomes in his sovereign,
Proud he paceth by;
Yet there was strong trouble hovering
O'er his large dark eye:
Mockery of life's fairest show,
Who can read the heart below!

"Where is she, the sorrow-laden,
In this glorious hour?—

On her hand her white brow stooping,
Leans she, alone;
With a weary spirit drooping
Over days now gone—
Days ere love the heart betrayed
Thus to solitude and shade.

"Ever thus does woman's spirit
Choose the dangerous part;
Still the worst she doth inherit
Of the beating heart—
Much must it abide.
Scarcely hath she left her childhood,
She who leans above;
Pining for her native wild-wood,
For her father's love;
Better far that she had died
Ere another love she tried.

"One brief, feverish sleep she taketh
From the night's long pain;
But the cruel morning breaketh,
And she wakes again;—
Music is upon the air,
Cheerily the horns are ringing
Round the captive's keep;
And the early lark is singing,
While her sad eyes weep.
The wild winds bear
Only bring doubt, death, despair."

"The Sailor's Bride; or, The Bonaventure," is a very graceful ballad, and the verses supposed to be spoken by the loyal cavalier, Sir Thomas Tyldesley, quite the heroic strain in which L. E. L. delights.

In the verses to Newstead Abbey, L. E. L.

may be privileged to interpret to the common world the dark thoughts and waywards moods of its once Master. We would, however, fain hope that poetic genius does not always bring an Iliad of woes upon its possessor; nor yet that—

"Care, envying, blame, disturb its bright dominion;
Fretted, it labours with its own unrest;
The wounded dove folds up its drooping pinions,
And pines and fevers on its lonely nest.

"Or rather say, it is the falcon scorning
The shaft by which he met his mortal blow;
Stately he rose to meet the golden morning—
Ere noontide came, the gallant bird lay low.

"Ah! who may know what gloomy guests unbidden,
Await such spirits in their unstrung hours!—
Thoughts by the better nature vainly chidden—
Forcing allegiance to the darker powers.

"The soul is out of tune, its sweet notes scattered,
Vexed, irritable, harsh, its power is flown,
Like some fine lute, whose higher chords are shattered
By forcing too much music from their tone.

"But few can pity such a mood as this,
Because they know it not—calm is their sadness,
Tranquil their joy; they know not how it is Genius is feverish in its grief and gladness.

"It has no quiet!"—

We shall not farther pursue this melancholy and erroneous doctrine, true as it may have held of him of whom the interpreter says—

"Vainly did he resist, half mirth, half rage,
The weight with which the world on genius presses;
What bitter truths are flung upon his page!—
Truths which the lip denies, the heart confesses.

"Life is a fable, with its lesson lost;
Genius, too, has its fable and its moral—
Of all the trees that down their shadows cast, Choose you a wreath from any but the laurel."

'Tis a melancholy dictum; but the poetess knows best. The same subject is pursued in complimentary lines, addressed to Lady Blessington, the friend of Byron, and in allusion to her "Reminiscences" of his conversations.

There are also, in "The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book" a copy of tender verses upon the "Death of Heber," and some sweet lines on "Sabbath Village Bells," which we should have liked to quote; but we have already lingered too long over this elegant volume, which will this year come to many English homes with the added charm, of being a memorial of "her that's far awa."

THE JUVENILE SCRAP-BOOK

Is beautifully bound, studded thickly with fine plates, and very neatly printed; but here our praise must halt, as its literary contents are not juvenile enough for our taste.

A PROMISING YOUNG MAN.

JACK Spencer is one of those anomalous heroes to be met with in London and other capitals; who, born of poor parents, and likely to people the world with still poorer children, enjoy, during their lifetime, the most lavish gifts of opulence.

It is rumoured of Jack, that he came into the world a fright; whereupon the nurse remarked, that handsome children invariably grow up ugly, and that the poor babe was a "very promising infant." Upon that hint, has he proceeded through life. At school, a confirmed dunce, the schoolmaster finding that the outlay in birch exceeded the profits of his board, soon gave him up to laziness, assuring his mother that great geniuses were usually idle, and that Jack was a very promising little fellow. On his own part, the great genius was equally certain that he never should be able to do anything at Prospect House; but he promised, if recalled home, (where his chief exercise consisted in catching flies on a window,) to achieve wonders.

Wonders he certainly did achieve; for, within six months of the domiciliation of the great, awkward, ignorant boy of fifteen, with his mamma, a widow lady, living on her small means in a Bath boarding house, notice to quit was served on mother and son. Every weak and defenceless animal within his reach had been made the victim of his persecution; from cats and canary birds, to gouty old gentlemen and sensitive young ladies. Miss Matilda Smith, the daughter of an opposite neighbour, was removed with her governess to a back attic, to be beyond reach of the pellets of his peppum; while the gold-headed cane of old Mr Tittlemouse, one of the boarders, gave way one evening, as he entered the lower rooms, with evident symptoms of having been maliciously sawn asunder. Jack Spencer pleaded guilty, but promised to be more cautious for the future, on condition that his mother would release him from boarding-house durance, and procure him a pair of colours. As an ensign in the Guards, he promised to become a greater man than had graced the army list since the days of the great Marlborough.

Even while complying with his entreaties, the fond mother assured him her fortune was inadequate to the expenses of such a regiment, and predicted that he would be ruined.

"I promise you," replied Jack, "that I will never exceed my allowance."

"How do you know that I can make you one?" demanded the widow Spencer.

"Because every fellow in the Guards has an allowance."

"An additional proof of the absurdity of your launching into a career beyond your means."

By dint, however, of promising to observe in London the economy likely to be promoted by the rigid vow of temperance, soberness, and chastity, required by the prudent matron, Jack finally accomplished his object. He was gazetted an ensign in the Coldstream, a probable prelude to figuring at some future time in another page of the same truth-telling periodical.

From the moment of joining his regiment, no bounds to the promises of Jack! He promised thirty guineas a-year to a smart groom, and twenty guineas per month to a livery-man for the use of two broken-winded jades, on which himself and the smart groom were to figure in the Park. By what process of arithmetic these two hundred and seventy guineas per annum were to be extracted from his allowance of one hundred and fifty, was best known to Jack; who, having a Cockerian code of his own, had promised payment out of the same fund to a fashionable tailor, (never known to render a raw ensign in the Guards presentable at less than two hundred a-year,) a hatter, a jeweller, a glover, a mercer, a bookseller, a bootmaker, and one or two other commercial items, to the tune of some hundreds more. Fortunatus's wishing cap seemed in his mouth. He had only to promise to call and pay, and everything on earth he desired found its way to his lodgings in Bennett Street.

Meanwhile Jack came to be accounted, among his brother officers, an agreeable good-natured fellow, a character which, from his brother officers, eventually spread into the world. Whatever they wanted done, the obliging Jack promised, not only to undertake, but to compass. He promised to get their bills discounted, their horses broken, their dogs entered, their billets-doux conveyed, their soft looks kindly returned. When a boating party was a-foot, he promised them there should be no rain; when a cricket party, no sun. He promised them free admission into the greenroom of the theatre, and promised the actors, in return for the privilege, his patronage at their benefits. He promised the rising young author to get his piece accepted by managers; he promised managers to bring them a capital piece from a rising young author; he promised Dactyl to introduce him to Lady Bas Bleu, and he promised Lady Bas Bleu an introduction to Dactyl the poet. Jack Spencer was in fact factotum to the whole household brigade—a universal promissory note.

In a less aristocratic regiment, Jack's promises might have been less needed, and therefore less heeded. But the Honourable Tom Shuffletons and Viscount Milkeops, with whom he was now associating, were the very fellows to live like "courtiers—promise-crammed." All were living beyond their income; and it was vastly convenient to have a gentlemanly-looking fellow like Jack Spencer, with such very white teeth and hands, ready at all hours to do their dirty work for them; to call upon that impudent rascal Snip in St James' Street, and promise him that, if he desisted from proceedings, his bill should be paid in February; or to promise a good thrashing to those wretched sneaks, Gadroon and Facet of Bond Street, if their small account for the dressing-case and pearl studs were sent into the "governor."

To ensigns rawer than himself, Jack Spencer proceeded so far as to promise vouchers and subscriptions for Almacks; which promises, as he was daily seen parading Pall Mall, arm-in, arm with Lord Thomas Trip, a younger son of the most influential of the patronesses, wore a sufficiently plausible appearance. To Lord Thomas, however, he had, in the meantime, "promised never to bore him about Almacks."

It is probable that this engagement on the part of the promising young man, was faithfully kept; for Jack Spencer was soon invited to pass his Christmas holidays at Upmore Castle, the seat of the Duke of Upmore, Lord Thomas's father. There were five Ladies Trip, ugly, dashing, fashionable girls, who, by dint of boundless audacity, obtained in the great world the name of having fair distinction. On a first acquaintance with their brother's obliging friend, Lady Anne and Lady Mary, the only two out and presented, or rather presented and out, were sufficiently satisfied with the promise of his aristocratic name, (his father having been a Bristol slopseller!) and competent bachelor establishment, to fancy it possible that, lacking the Earls and eldest sons who failed to offer themselves, Jack Spencer might be accepted as a forlorn hope. This supposition, however, quickly gave place to more appropriate plans. He was soon seen through as a marrying man, but by no means a man to be married, and adopted as an incomparable villa-drudge for the holidays; if not matrimonial himself, he might become a cause of matrimony in others. The Duchess was getting up charades, tableaux, and private theatricals, in order that her guests might have no cause to complain that sufficient pains were not taken to tire out their patience. "As to the theatricals," Jack had already promised to get the best advice from Bunn, concerning decorations and effects. Bunn was the best fellow in the world; and whatever properties were wanted for Upmore Castle, Jack promised should be forthcoming. "As to the tableaux," Edwin Landseer should make out sketches for him. Landseer was the best fellow in the world, and would do anything to serve him; Jack promised them that whatever assistance was wanted for Upmore Castle, from the author of Bolton Abbey, should be forthcoming. "As to the charades," his friend Alfred D'Orsay was the cleverest fellow on earth at such things; Alfred D'Orsay would furnish him with programmes of the best charades that have appeared since those of Theodore Leclercq. Whatever assistance his friend D'Orsay could render to the charades at Upmore Castle, he promised should be forthcoming! Jack Spencer was accordingly invited to spend the Easter vacations with the Trips, and promised to make his appearance; and at Easter, he promised to return to his post at the close of the London season; which of all his promises was the only one performed. But, though the aid of his friends the two Alfreds, and his friend the one and unique Edwin, were wanting, Jack Spencer expressed himself so indignant at their disappointing him, and promised so vehemently to punish his friends by dropping their acquaintance, that the Ladies Trip exerted themselves to pacify his wrath, and reconcile him to the three and the deuce.

From that period, Jack became as it were domesticated in the Trip family. In town, it was his business to wait on the Duchess every morning for instructions, in pursuance of which, he promised to be in waiting at such hours and such, at the Zoological, Horticultural, or Kensington Gardens, the British or National Gallery, the Opera, Almacks, or Devonshire House. His cue was to call carriages or carry boas—to lend an arm or borrow a parasol; and, for once, his promises were fulfilled so strictly to the letter, that the Duchess of Upmore scarcely knew her right hand from her left, or her daughter, Lady Anne, from her daughter, Lady Jane, unless when Jack Spencer was at hand to explain. Jack Spencer, meanwhile, was promising himself a rich reward for all this pain and trouble.

To aspire to the hand of one of her Grace's daughters, was a folly of which, even in his wildest moods, he was incapable. Had the five Ladies Trip been offered individually or collectively to his acceptance, he would not so much as have promised to be grateful. It was one of the Duke of Upmore's seats he was ambitious to appropriate—not his country seats, but his seats in Parliament! In the dilapidated state of Jack's finances, even his promises to pay were laughed to scorn, and no security remained for him but membership. Either the House of Commons, or the King's Bench!

At his future visits to the castle, accordingly, Jack became most assiduous in accompanying his noble friend, the Duke of Upmore, to corporation dinners and county meetings. Lord John and Lord Thomas, who were out of debt, and wished to remain out of Parliament, gladly accepted their obliging friend Spencer's promises that, so long as he remained at Upmore Castle, they should never be called upon to drink strong punch and drivel weak speeches in support of the family interest; and, in process of time, the mayor and freemen of the ancient and independent borough of Gooseswill, and the aldermen and burgesses of Greenhampton, became so accustomed to see his Grace their patron accompanied by that fair-spoken and promising young man, Captain Spencer of the Guards, that they had begun to regard them as inseparable as Saturn and his ring. Of the Duke, who was a solemn, solid-looking old gentleman, with a nose as thick as a milestone, and a forehead shaped like a sugar-loaf, they stood tremendously in awe; and even their Lordships, Thomas and John Trip, knew how to take upon themselves when opportunity offered. But the young Captain was such a monstrous pleasant chap! The young Captain was always offering to do the honours of London town to them, in case of their visiting the metropolis, and promising to be the making of their nephews and younger sons. Jack Spencer was now almost as great a favourite at Gooseswill and Greenhampton as at Upmore Castle.

At length came the battle of the frogs and mice! The cause of Reform triumphed. Gooseswill was disfranchised; and Greenhampton, thrown open, was at liberty to elect John Spencer, Esq., commonly called Lieutenant Spencer of his Majesty's Second Regiment of Foot Guards, to represent its diminished honours in Parliament! It could scarcely do less. Jack had promised the worthy and independent electors the abolition of taxes—the emancipation of prisoners for debt—the repeal of the corn and all other vexatious laws—and promised the Duke of Upmore, who, by the way, had made no such request, to maintain the influence of the Trip family in the borough, by keeping warm his seat till better times.

Lord John and Lord Thomas, finding the "governor" somewhat surprised by the turn affairs were taking, voted it a devilish good joke, and expressed their gratitude to the promising young man who had taken the burthen of national affairs off their shoulders, by becoming a promising young member.

John Spencer, Esq., M.P.'s course in the House is now what is called "before the public!" His promises to his constituents of bringing forward motions for the suppression of the Civil and Pension Lists, Negro Apprenticeship, and Corn Monopoly, have been redeemed as such promises usually are, by voting silently, on every question before the House, for Ministers and the Ministerial; and Jack is proportionably highly thought of in Downing Street. Were he to rise in his place for the purpose of promising to the House the smallest possible concession, Jack would be interrupted by "loud cheers from the Treasury Bench." Spring Rice has marked him for his own; Lord Melbourne has him in his pocket. What may have been promised to Jack it is impossible to guess, though his creditors (following the example of Prince Talleyrand's inquisitive butcher) are "curious" to ascertain. What Jack may have promised in return—But mum.—We pledge our veracity that this largest of magazine sheets would be unable to set forth even an abstract of the pledges tendered to her Majesty's Government by our highly "PROMISING YOUNG MAN."

NATIONAL APPEAL TO THE SENATORS OF GREAT BRITAIN.

—"The sacred call of 'Independence, Liberty, and Good Government,' which should excite in all but one sentiment, directs us to gather under the same standard."

We are the people of a fertile land,
Whose native manufactures, famed of old,
Require the zealous workman's skillful hand
Still high our vaunted name in art to hold;
And, for the nation's weal, experienced men and bold.

Our clime is healthful, and the teeming soil
Full well the patient husbandman repays;
Nor doth the hardy seaman vainly toil
To reach our coast, whose spacious coves and bays,
"A safe and steady anchorage," he needs must praise.

For three-and-twenty years the olive tree
Hath mingled with the rose; and science here
Beguiles the hand of labour—yet are we Crushed by a load most galling and severe,
A weight of odious tax, dragged on from year to year.

While to the very earth our necks are bow'd,
Ruin and bankruptcy on every side,
Our toils are insufficient for the crowd
Who proudly o'er the necks of millions ride,
Reckless how long their souls such thralldom may abide.

Before us waves the promise of the year—
A golden harvest of abundant grain—
While pale-faced Penury, with trickling tear,
Points to the produce of the smiling plain,
And mutters—"God's own gifts by man are rendered vain."

The trembling workman, paralysed with dread,
No more pursues with zeal his wonted craft;
His starving children cry aloud for bread*—
He hears them not—transfixed as by a shaft;
In answer to their moans, 'twas Madness' self that laughed!

On every side we look around—but, lo!
Nature and Providence disclaim the cause
Of our distresses: wherefore then the woe?
Is it human minds? or human laws,
That twisted web of wrong, which time more tightly draws?

The mental energies by nature given
Are wasted in a vile, a servile use;
They who the links of bondage might have riven,
By custom scared, prop up each old abuse,
Where every stone is piled on a foundation loose.

'Twas said "Reform" was wisely, kindly planned,
To sweep oppression from our hearths away,
And that no more on us the iron hand
Of petty tyrants should un pitying sway.
Words! words! all false they were, and meant but to betray.

Still have the many to the few succumbed,
The few have governed for the good of few;
Our trade declined, our industry benumbed;
While aching hearts have ample time to rue
The abject state of those who oft (unheeded) sue.

Yet now, in calm humility, we bend
Before our country's rulers, once again,
Hoping that justice will our case befriend,
Pleading our cause before our fellow-men,
Whose lot was as our own—let by-time whisper when.

How have we drained the bitter dregs of life
Vainly!—for long will misery endure
Extended tortures, ere the hour of strife
Brings in its fiery course a certain cure—
For then is welcome death or retribution sure.

But in our compass is a sterner force
Than war or civil discord; we are free
In "undivided will;" and Reason's course
May not be stemmed—as well might yonder sea
Be threatened from its shores, when firm in trust are we.

And thus we say—"No more shall we become
Our own enslavers; for to us ye owe
That power which fain would strike our voices dumb;
We are the channel whence your riches flow,
Ye high careering clouds, exhaled from marshes low!

For, Honourable Lords and Masters all,
'Tis meet that lowly labour claim its due;
Why should the o'er-wrought slave unheeded fall,
While bloated luxury may still pursue,
Unbeck'd, his vicious way?—We must such things undo.

* Read the many fearful instances, recorded within the last few years, of paupers, under the influence of morbid insanity, devoting their offering to a violent and premature death, or sharing with them the slow consuming pangs of actual starvation.

When war demands our gold, our lands, our lives,
Who then is backward to obey the call?
Each in his country's service nobly strives,
Or on the crimson field, if doomed to fall,
Grieves not to spill his blood in the defence of all.

Since rank'd as freemen we may fight and die,
Why not as brother freemen breathe and live?
One sun looks down on all beneath the sky,
One common air doth heaven to mortals give—
Though some are born to joy, and some, alas! to grieve.

Errors are light when nearest to remend,
But lapse of time accumulates an ill;
The greatest evils should have swiftest speed,
As old diseases will be growing still
More rancorously deep, when far removed from skill.

Let UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE then be ours!
The sorrows of the past dismissed as naught—
In the sweet blessing of descending showers,
We think not of the late consuming drought,
Too happy in the change that in our fate is wrought.

The SECRET BALLOT can alone maintain
Our boasted "freedom of election" pure,
Unawed by tyranny, unbribed by gain,
Unwarped by casuistry, that specious lure,
Which snares with subtle wiles its victims, rich or poor.

And next, should ANNUAL Parliaments supply,
What most the nation needs—a patriot band,
Nurtured beneath the people's watchful eye;
Whose interests are connected with the land;
Not swayed by private zeal, or claims on either hand.

But ne'er may Delegates, as heretofore,
Apart in pride and prejudices stand;
Such frivolous distinctions should be o'er
When man aids man—as head, and foot, and hand,
To work her sacred will, hath equal Nature plann'd.

The land is worthy of a master's care,
The labourer is worthy of his hire;
'Twere base to limit to a niggard share
Those who embrace our cause: the glowing fire,
If not with fuel fed, must soon or late expire.

What now is our condition, forced to choose
From men incapable of such a trust?
Traders, stock-jobbers, (trembling in their shoes Lest cunning speculations fall to dust,)
Or lawyers, scant of briefs, defiled with legal must.

And haply land-proprietors are there,
To whom their country's sufferings are unknown;
Merchants—no more oppress'd with anxious care,
In wealthy indolence lethargic grown—
Whose narrow views of good were bounded by their own.

These are not ever likely to improve
The pride, the wealth, the commerce of the State;
And such we hold 'twere fitting to remove Ere sorrowful experience come too late—
Ere mingle wise and weak in one promiscuous fate.

From no light sophistry or love of change,
Springs our remonstrance; to a cause more deep
It owes its origin—mind's gifted range,
Which doth o'er ages past and future sweep,
And brings back fearful signs, enough to make men weep.

Yet, from the awful shadows of the past,
And from the visioned future, we have caught
Some lights of better knowledge; which, at last,
Within our sphere of practice may be brought,
Nor all our sanguine hopes again be set at naught.

So that no more the selfish and the vain
Shall probe a nation's wounds with cruel art;
For false experiments augment the pain,
While spreading canker still consumes the heart—
Our country's only cure is—FREEDOM'S GLORIOUS

INTERVIEWS WITH MEHEMET ALI.

I HAD been nearly a month in Egypt before an opportunity was afforded to me of seeing the extraordinary personage who rules with such absolute power the destinies of that interesting country. However great my curiosity to behold the destroyer of the Mamelukes might have been on landing at Alexandria, it was very much increased at each step I took within his territory, by the traces which were everywhere discoverable of his all-pervading and engrossing genius. Not only the ships and public works, but the more striking private houses and warehouses of Alexandria, were pointed out as belonging to the Pasha. As I proceeded by the canal to the Nile at Atfeh, the numerous boats with their cargoes were all under the orders of the Pasha's agents; and, on embarking upon the river for Cairo, I encountered a continued succession of djermes, or large sailing boats, descending from the upper country, laden with cotton for the stores of Mehemet Ali. Struck with the appearance of several large buildings erected upon the shores of the river, I inquired their use, and was told they were the Pasha's cotton factories. And going ashore one day with my gun, I approached a village containing some large pigeon-houses, when I was told by an Arab peasant, who described himself as the Pasha's tenant, that the birds were the property of the Pasha! In short, I soon discovered that Mehemet Ali is the sole merchant, shipowner, manufacturer, and proprietor; and, with far greater propriety than ever Louis XIV. used a similar sentiment, expressive of his relation to France, he may say—" L'Egypte, c'est moi."

It was with feelings of curiosity, heightened by so many visible evidences of his genius and energy, that I proceeded to pay a visit to the Pasha in his palace in the Citadel of Cairo. A party consisting of six English travellers having assembled by appointment at Colonel Campbell's, the Consul, we set off at six o'clock in the evening, accompanied by a janissary, and preceded (it being dark) by a man bearing a small grate, filled with burning pine-wood, raised upon a long pole or handle, and which is called a mushallah. Our ride to the palace, which occupied more than half an hour, took us through the most populous part of the town. The sun had set nearly an hour; and it being the Rhamadan, or Mahommedan Lent, which enjoins a complete abstinence, from sunrise to sunset, to all the faithful, the entire population of Cairo had now begun the feasting and rejoicing which generally occupy great part of the night. On both sides of the streets and bazaars through which we passed, parties were beheld, eating, drinking, smoking, and rejoicing; here and there we heard singing; and the harsh nasal sounds of the vocalist were accompanied by the grating tones of Arabic instruments. It was a novel and a busy sight; so busy indeed, that very few of the actors found time to turn even a glance at our cavalcade. As we approached the high ground on which the citadel stands, the scene changed. The steep and winding thoroughfare, lighted up and filled with shops on either side, like a bazaar, was crowded with soldiers, who were loitering about the stalls of the fruiterers, and occasionally interrupting, with a purchase, the reverie of the lazy-looking dealers, who were sitting cross-legged upon little mats before their doors, and apparently so absorbed in the luxury of their pipes as to be insensible to the surrounding din. Several officers, mounted on richly-caparisoned horses, were met, issuing from the fortress above, some of them wearing the martial cloak, and the ponderous shovel stirrups which characterised the ancient Mameluke costume. We now entered the outer walls of the citadel; and as we climbed the path, which is hewn out of the solid rock, and flanked by lofty walls, the lighted pine-wood blazed high over our heads, and cast its bright reflection upon the embrasures and loop-holes above. I shuddered as I recollected that the massacre of the Mamelukes was perpetrated on that very spot! The incidents of that fearful state-tragedy crowded upon my memory; and I must confess, as I passed over the very stones which had once been crimson with human butchery, the reflection that I was about to offer homage to the murderer, caused a momentary feeling of remorse in my bosom. Alas! I thought, we are the worshippers of success, however it presents itself, whether embodied in the form of an angel or a demon!

The circumstances connected with the well-known event, the massacre of the Mamelukes, may not be familiar to all. Under pretence of doing honour to the ceremony of investing his son, Ismail Pasha, with the command of his army, Mehemet Ali invited the whole of the Mamelukes then residing in Cairo to be present. It should be borne in mind that, previous to this time, (1811,) the power of this military oligarchy, which had so long oppressed Egypt, had completely succumbed before the genius of its present ruler; and that those Mamelukes who were found still inhabiting the metropolis and its neighbourhood, had capitulated with the Pasha, and had, for some time, subsisted upon his bounty, and under his protection. To the number of several hundreds they obeyed the summons of their ruler, and were admitted to his presence. Coffee was served; and it was remarked that Mehemet Ali loaded them with caresses and attentions. At the conclusion of the interview, they retired, with renewed assurances of his regard and protection. As they descended from the palace, through the avenues leading down from that part of the citadel, it had been previously contrived that the Albanian soldiers should head the procession, followed by the Mamelukes in their gorgeous dresses, and mounted on their finest horses. As soon as the cavalcade reached the gate, the Al-banians, unobserved by their unsuspecting followers, turned suddenly to the right and left, and ascended on each side of the rocky precipice, overlooking the path in which the Mamelukes were still proceeding; the first of whom had just reached the gate, as it was closed for ever upon them. From each side a volley of musketry now scattered death upon the defenceless victims. One only escaped by a miracle. Turning his steed back upon the path he had descended, and forcing him up to the summit of the citadel, he plunged from the battlements into the gulf below. The rider escaped, at the cost of the life of his faithful animal.

Having passed under a gateway, and along a winding arched passage of lofty and massive masonry, we found ourselves, after an abrupt turning or two, in a large open square, the opposite and right-hand sides of which contained spacious apartments, whose lofty windows were brilliantly lighted. We proceeded obliquely across an angle of this open space, and here, just as the circles of water or rays of light are closest where the motion or heat which gives them existence has its origin, the throng of military became more dense as we approached the centre of power from whence, in this country, all rank, wealth, and authority are derived. Dismounting at the portico of the principal entrance, we entered a hall, which, together with the staircase leading to the state-apartments, we found to be almost impassable, owing to the crowds of soldiers, of every rank, who were loitering, in not the most orderly manner, in the way. The head of the stairs opened into a large ante-room, which presented a very singular appearance. Along its entire length and breadth, with the exception of just a sufficient space on one side to afford passage room for reaching a door at the farther extremity, we espied, seated cross-legged upon little mats or carpets spread upon the floor, a crowd of Turkish and Arab soldiers, their arms and slippers deposited beside them, apparently prepared for an exhibition of a devotional kind, from a small pulpit-shaped seat elevated at one side of the apartment. Passing, however, too quickly to have more than a minute's gaze at the strange spectacle before us, we entered a large and lofty chamber, covered with matting, from the centre of which hung a chandelier, holding probably a score of yellowish-brown wax-candles, and having in its centre a row of four gigantic silver candlesticks, whose flat stands, measuring more than a yard in circumference, rested on the floor, and held each an enormous candle, resembling those we see before the altar of a Roman Catholic chapel. By their light we could only indistinctly see to the extremity of the apartment, from the farthest corner of which two or three persons retired as we entered, leaving us, as I thought, alone in the huge apartment, which, being destitute of furniture, reminded me of a ball-room at a first-rate English provincial town,

The consul, who took the lead of our party, was observed to direct a bow towards the furthest corner of the room; the rest of the party imitated the motion, and then passed on. A few steps more brought my feet close to a long and superbly enriched pipe, whose glowing bowl rested in a little metal pan upon the floor, and the other extremity of which touched the lips of an aged and portly personage, who was sitting alone, just to the right of the corner of a divan which ran nearly round the entire circumference of the room. As soon as we approached him, he laid his pipe aside, and repeated several times a few words, which we took for expressions of welcome, being accompanied by the motions of his hands, as he pointed, with rather more hurry than dignity, to the divan on each side of him, as signs for us to be seated. The Colonel took his seat immediately to the right, and the remainder sat down just as they happened to be standing: it chanced that I was placed immediately to the left of Mehemet Ali. At the moment of our arrival, the dragoman or interpreter was not in attendance; and, as soon as we were seated, a slight dilemma ensued. The Pasha directed a glance towards the door, called for somebody, and then turning to the Consul, uttered a few words; but immediately smiled at the recollection that he was not understood: again he looked towards the door, and called in a louder, though not an angry tone; but, as nobody for a moment appeared, he turned to the Colonel and to the rest, and laughed: he next fidgeted on his seat, rubbed one hand upon his knee, and twisted the fingers of the other about his sword-handle. All this was but the affair of a minute or two, when an attendant of apparent rank entered the room, to whom the Pasha explained good-humouredly the nature of our predicament; and he took upon himself the office of interpreter, until the dragoman made his appearance shortly afterwards. The Pasha began the conversation by offering us the usual compliment of a welcome. Whilst some preliminary remarks were passing between him and Colonel Campbell, I had leisure to observe more closely the extraordinary person beside me.

Mehemet Ali is, I am told, about five feet six inches in height; but, as he now sat beside me, sunk deeply in the soft divan, he did not appear so tall. He was dressed in the Turkish costume, which he has retained, amidst all his innovations in the dress of his people, with the exception of the turban, for which he has substituted the Fes or Tarboosh cap. His white beard and mustachios, now so generally curtailed by reforming Mussulmans, appeared to be cherished with orthodox care. His features are regular and good; but, being somewhat rounded by fatness, the expression of his face may rather be said to be that of a comely than handsome person. Far from perceiving the traces of cruelty or ferocity in the lines of his countenance, had I been called upon at a glance to give an opinion, without knowing the character of the person beside me, I should have pronounced him an amiable, good-humoured man. It was natural, however, that I should scrutinize severely the physiognomy of one so renowned, in the hope, nay, perhaps with the determination of discovering something uncommon in the expression of his features; and in doing so, I encountered more than once the glance of his bright and restless eye. If character be not reflected from this mirror of the soul, it will be vain to seek for its expression in the more ignoble features of the human countenance; and I thought, as his unquiet eyes glided incessantly from one to another of the party around him, or glanced stealthily at the door beyond, I could trace, in their workings, the restless and ever-watchful spirit of Mehemet Ali. I was startled too on observing, that, whilst the mouth, which was partially concealed beneath his white beard and mustache, put on the semblance of laughter, the eyes were all the while peering coldly from beneath their heavy brows, with an expression quite opposite to that of unguarded mirth. The great size of his head accords, phrenologically, with the extraordinary force of character possessed by this successful soldier; whilst a broad and massive forehead harmonizes with that subtlety and depth of intellect which he has evinced in his intrigues and schemes of personal aggrandizement. Upon the whole, however, let me hasten to confess it, there is nothing remarkable in the appearance of Mehemet Ali. His manner is undignified; and there is something unpleasant in the sharp broken tones of his voice, resembling the discordant sound of a cracked bass instrument. I could fancy that, when enraged, his notes might be more like the midnight bark of the jackal of his country, than the voice of a human being. I ought to add, however, that a portion of the unfavourable impression made by the appearance of the Pasha's person, ought to be put down to the attitude in which he always receives his visitors. What man could look otherwise than undignified and ridiculous, when perched upon the middle of a broad divan, with his legs tucked under him, so as just to shew a yellow slipper projecting on either side from beneath his voluminous inexpressibles!

After the usual civilities between the Viceroy and the Consul had passed, and when coffee had been served to us in small porcelain cups, held in filigree stands of gold, richly set with diamonds, the Pasha, who had just returned from a tour in the Delta, took up the conversation, in replying to an observation upon the soil of England, and gave us, with considerable animation, an account of the productiveness of his territory; instancing a village whose extent, population, and crop of cotton that season, he described with much minuteness and pretended exactness, using his hands freely, by way of giving emphasis to his harangue; and he drew a picture of the prosperity and wealth of the inhabitants of this "happy village," which certainly bore no resemblance to any part of Egypt which I or any other traveller ever had the good fortune of seeing. In the middle of his narrative, I was astonished at an interruption from the next apartment, which now sent forth a sort of song or chant, in a loud nasal tone, which was continued with short intermissions during the remainder of our interview. At first, I was startled at this boisterous interruption, which scarcely allowed us to enjoy the tête-à-tête with our distinguished host, and I looked round inquiringly for an instant; but, recollecting the attitude of those we had left upon the floor of the adjoining chamber, I at once concluded that the sounds were devotional.

The discussion afterwards turned upon the subject of navies; and the Pasha proceeded to maintain stoutly, that the quality of his Syrian pine was equal to that of British oak for the purposes of ship-building. There was nothing remarkable in the conversation that followed; unless it be here observed, that, in the choice and handling of his subjects, the Pasha displayed a practical taste, and considerable shrewdness of mind—never being at a loss for arguments, and wielding them with an ease and fluency of language that sometimes rose almost into eloquence. After an interview of about half an hour, we made our parting salutations, and retired. As we proceeded through the anteroom, we found the pulpit occupied by a priest, whose dissonant psalmody we were glad to escape, by making our way through the room with as much speed as a prudent regard for the toes of the prostrate congregation of the faithful permitted. As I descended the stairs, and passed through crowds of soldiers, loitering in the courts and halls below, I could not help reflecting upon the strange scene in the anteroom, and speculating upon the policy which led the destroyer of the Mamelukes to surround his blood-stained divan with a bodyguard of Mollahs, and their fanatical followers, in preference to the disciplined regiments of Colonel Sèves; and I thought, whether even, whilst I passed, a prayer was offered up by this reverend clerk of the closet in behalf of Mehemet Ali, the defender of the faith! Strange flight of the imagination! I now also found myself repeating the famous lines of Burke in favour of a state-church, and recurring to the time when she "raised her mitred head in the courts and palaces" of our own "religious and gracious king," George the Fourth! But these reveries were disturbed by the roaring of the lions and other wild beasts, as we passed the menagerie belonging to the palace; and we proceeded back to our quarters in the city, enjoying by the way a recital, by the Consul, of several anecdotes of the famous personage we had left behind us.

I passed a few weeks in the capital of Egypt, subsequently to the time of paying the above visit to the Pasha, during which period I had an opportunity of examining into the condition of his cotton factories, which presented a lamentable spectacle of misdirected capital and labour. The Consul had, in the meantime, explained to the Viceroy, that I had had some opportunities of becoming acquainted with the state of the manufacture in Europe and America; and he appointed an evening for another interview, of which I gladly availed myself, in hopes of being able to submit some facts or arguments, which might tend to discourage further outlays in so ruinous a field of adventure.

A little after six o'clock in the evening, I called at the house of the Consul, and we proceeded together to the citadel, preceded, as before, by an attendant, bearing aloft upon a pole a grate filled with blazing pine-wood, the sparks and smoke from which were sometimes carried by the wind against our faces. As we passed through the avenues and open spaces included within the outer walls of the fortress, its extent struck me to be even larger than I had previously supposed. Passing by similar crowds of military to those described before, we reached, by a different entrance, a more spacious quarter of the palace, and soon found ourselves in a very large saloon, with several doorways leading into state apartments, in one of which I could observe the Pasha's judicial bench sitting, the members of which were clad in crimson and white robes. In one large recess, about fifty of the soldiers of the guard were observed squatting on the floor, listening to the devout exhortations of their priest or shekh. The saloon itself was partly filled with attendants and others, who were loitering and pacing upon the floor; whilst around its walls, for a considerable portion of its circumference, ran a divan, on which numbers were seated à la Turque. A lofty doorway, hung with crimson curtains, led into the audience chamber; before it stood an attendant with a wand in his hand, which, as often as any one approached, he placed athwart the passage; by his side a sentry mounted guard. The Pasha being engaged in an interview with Hamet Pasha from Syria, we were conducted for a minute or two into an adjoining apartment, where we found Artim Bey, the principal dragoman or interpreter, reclining upon a low divan, attended by a couple of scribes, who were seated cross-legged on the floor, and holding sheets of paper in their hands, upon which they were busily writing with reeds; and, in this awkward position, they had to lean forward to catch the light of a lamp, which, in default of a desk or table, was standing on the floor beside them. After the never-failing ceremonial of offering us pipes and coffee, the dragoman proposed, as the Pasha's visitor was merely engaged in a familiar chat, that we should proceed to the presence-chamber, which would be the signal for his departure. Accordingly, the crimson hangings were drawn aside, and we entered an apartment of about the same dimensions as that described before, but more richly ornamented. Upon the centre of the floor I observed the same old-fashioned huge silver candlesticks. At a doorway, on the opposite side of the room, stood three black eunuchs, richly clad, and bearing scimitars by their sides, who guarded the entrance to the private apartments, or the sacred precincts of the harem. On a corner of the divan, wrapped up in furs, sat Mehemet Ali, in the same solitary state in which we had before found him; beside him lay two time-pieces, of a watch-like shape, but in size almost as large as a common clock dial. The Consul and I were desired to be seated; and, in reply to inquiries after his health, the Pasha told us he was suffering from a cold and cough. A few observations upon the politics of Europe now passed between us. Mehemet Ali remarked that he heard Don Carlos was making progress in Spain; and he asked, I thought with a triumphant expression, and with a well-merited sneer at our blundering policy in that quarter, what was to become of the quadruple alliance in case he succeeded. Turning to me he said, he supposed I had found his manufactures very inferior to those I had inspected in the course of my travels in Europe and America; and in reply to my observation, that the bullocks, which turned his machinery, were expensive substitutes for the steam or water power of other countries, he remarked that he did not profess to carry on his manufactures for the sake of profit, but to render Egypt independent in case of war. I assured him the people of England were disposed for commerce rather than war.

"I believe so," said he; "but there are two events which no one can foresee, and which every wise man ought to be prepared against—the one is the occurrence of our own death, the other the breaking out of war."

It was now suggested that, even in case of war, the ingenuity of the smuggler would still supply the wants of his people; to which he instantly replied—

"The goods so procured are a great deal dearer on account of the risk, and I want to save my people that expense by enabling them to live within themselves."

It was objected that, in case of war, his ports would be blockaded, and his country inevitably ruined; to which he replied, with considerable animation—

"Egypt contains within itself every necessary of life to enable its people to endure, without inconvenience, a blockade of twenty years."

Seeing that we smiled at this sally, he added, with great emphasis, and much earnestness of manner, rising almost upon his knees as he spoke—

"I have made the calculation, and I repeat, nay, I have the estimate by me in writing, and," turning to the Consul, "I will let you see it at some future opportunity; but, I repeat, and it is entirely my own idea, that, if Egypt were blockaded for twenty years, she could maintain her present population without an external commerce." Observing that we were still incredulous, he demanded with increased animation, "Which is the necessary of life that my country does not produce?"

I mentioned the article of iron; but, without noticing me, he entered into an enumeration of the various products of Egypt, expatiating in rapturous terms upon the riches and fertility of the country; and then, as if satisfied with his display of argument, he added in conclusion—

"Well, well, in such a case a country must do the best it can to save itself."

The subject of his manufactures was now recurring to; and the number of Fellahs who were employed in spinning and weaving having been mentioned, I took the opportunity of expressing an opinion that they would be more profitably engaged in the cultivation of the soil. He laughed slyly, as if to intimate that he considered the advice to proceed from an interested party; and asked why England, with her enormous commerce, should object to his small manufacturing establishments. With a view to remove the impression of British jealousy, I entered into some particulars of the actual extent of our cotton trade, explaining that the yarns alone exported in a year from England amounted to upwards of a million cantars, (the Egyptian weight of about 95 lbs.) being more than three times the weight of the crop of raw cotton produced annually in Egypt. "And how much manufactured cotton goods, besides, do you export?" was his instant question; and, upon my informing him that the total of the spun and manufactured cottons exported from Great Britain amounted to one hundred millions of dollars, which was only the half of our foreign commerce, he observed, moving his hands slowly and emphatically as he spoke—"A nation possessing such a trade as that, need not care for my manufactures, which consume only fifteen or twenty thousand cantars of cotton." I assured him that we entertained no jealousy, but looked with great interest to Egypt as a large and most prolific field of production for the supply of our raw material, for which we were now almost exclusively indebted to the United States. He now inquired what quantity of cotton was produced in America, and what proportion the Americans consumed in their own manufactures? I replied, about a fifth of their crop, which this year would exceed 1,500,000 bales. After a moment's thought, he exclaimed, gaily—"You see that the Americans manufacture twenty per cent. of their materials themselves, whilst I consume only five per cent. of mine."

In reply to my remark that the Americans had discovered the impolicy of fostering their cotton manufactures by high duties, and were discontinuing the system—"I suppose," said he, "they are talking about it; but, in the meantime, what is the duty on your manufactures?" He next asked me the weight of the American bales; and on my replying that they ran from four to five cantars, he observed, that he had an impression they did not exceed three cantars; upon which it was explained that the Americans had gradually augmented the weight of their bales.

He next introduced the subject of the "Sea-Island" cotton—pronouncing the name in English; inquired about its price; stated that he had latterly only introduced the seed into Egypt; that last year he had grown a few fedans, (the Egyptian measure of something less than an acre,) but that this year he expected his crop would be about 30,000 cantars. "Its cost," said he, "to me for growing it is no greater than that of the Mehu (or ordinary) quality of cotton, but it yields rather less in weight; and, therefore, I shall require a higher price for it. I understand that my first samples brought twenty-seven dollars a cantar (about 18d. a lb.) in England; if the merchants continue to give an advanced rate, I shall produce more and more every year. I can turn all my land over to Sea Island; it is the same thing to me; but all will depend upon the merchants' prices."

Whilst luxuriating upon the prospect of high prices, it was quite evident that he was on a favourite topic. Upon being told that the demand from England would equal his utmost means of production, he replied, that, if the demand for raw cotton were great, he should fabricate less and less in Egypt every year, and that he had already given orders to use only the worst qualities in his own factories; and he intimated that he should be thereby induced to pursue an agricultural rather than a manufacturing policy. Thinking that such an authority would have a charm for him, I now reminded him that Napoleon, whilst in Egypt, had calculated that, under good government—such were the resources of its soil—this country might, in fifty years, be made to sustain six millions of inhabitants, and contribute a proportionate increase of revenue to the State.

"How much do you reckon my revenue to amount to?" he asked with eagerness; and, upon my answering, "About sixteen millions of dollars!" he exclaimed, at the top of his voice, striking the palms of his hands together, by way of adding emphasis to the assertion, "Thirty millions of dollars!" and, after pausing a moment to enjoy my astonishment, he continued—"And yet I do not receive more than ten per cent. of the Fellahs' produce; but, if I live fifteen years longer, I'll make it one hundred millions of dollars." Again, pausing for an instant, and looking complacently, he then continued—"Napoleon was a great man, a far greater man than I, and yet you see" (stroking his beard) "I have done more than Napoleon proposed to do."

As he chuckled over this sally, the white beard, laughing but sensual mouth, portly, round-shouldered trunk, and the twinkling yet vicious-looking eyes of the person beside me, called instantly to my recollection Falstaff and his men in buckram. It was in a twofold manner characteristic of the speaker; for, as it was well-known that my estimate of his actual revenue was as near as possible to the truth, his audacious attempt upon our credulity, in thus almost doubling the amount, could have been practised only by one who had acquired a competent hardihood of countenance by previous efforts of a like character; whilst the mode in which he turned a subject involving the question of the population of Egypt into a matter of revenue for himself, illustrated happily the spirit of egotism, which is one of the ruling passions of his nature. I would have gladly reminded him of the real state of the Fellahs, who, instead of yielding a tithe only of their produce to his treasury, are allowed to retain just so much only as is necessary to supply them, from year to year, with the bare means of existence; but, recollecting that I was within the precincts of a court, where a conventional etiquette shields alike the Pasha's divan and the King's throne from the rude assaults of truth, I contented myself with remarking, that I believed at present the population of Egypt did not exceed two millions, and that two-thirds of the soil, capable, by a slight effort of labour, of being fertilised by the Nile, were at present out of cultivation. Upon this, he entered into a statement, as full of exaggeration as the preceding one. Beginning with the assertion that two and a-half per cent. only of the Delta remained out of cultivation, he ran rapidly over the districts of Damanheur, Mansourah, &c. &c., affecting to give a minute statement of the proportions of cultivated and waste lands belonging to all the districts into which his territory is divided. When he came to enumerate the provinces of Upper Egypt, he admitted that considerable tracts were lying waste for want of hands to till the land. In reply to my remark, that the population of the country appeared to have diminished, he remarked, in general and evasive terms—"Egypt is not generally understood; it requires a very long time to know its people. A traveller in passing through the country, cannot fully understand the number or condition of its inhabitants. A person may even reside some years here, like the Consul, for instance, and yet not have time to know the people of Egypt; but," he added, with a complacent and self-satisfied smile, "I know them!" After spending nearly an hour in familiar conversation with the Pasha, and receiving the customary refreshment of coffee, we prepared to depart; but, before quitting his presence, he again recurred to the subject of his cotton projects, and took the opportunity of informing us, that, if he succeeded in completing the barrage of the Nile, (a great work, projected with a view to inundate the Delta,) there would be scarcely any limits to the amount of cotton which might then be produced in Egypt. We now took our leave, and, in bidding adieu to Mehemet Ali, I could have persuaded myself that I was leaving the presence of a merchant or a cotton-broker, had not my eyes, in turning towards the door, encountered the sable figures of the three eunuchs who guarded the entrance of the harem—a spectacle that at once dissipated such an illusion, and reminded me that I was in the palace of a Turkish satrap, where, notwithstanding that commerce had, for the first time, asserted its supremacy, all the worst evils of Mahometanism still flourished. In again threading my way amongst the crowd of the faithful, who, in prostrate attitudes upon the floor of the anteroom, were listening devoutly to the exhortations of their priest, I could not help again paying homage to the sagacity of the Pasha, who, in imitation of European precedents, had thus surrounded his divan with the safeguards of an established church. Nicholas of Russia, Charles

Albert of Sardinia, and the Tories of England, were presented to my mind, as I recollected how, differing as they do in faith, they, nevertheless, in common with Mehemet Ali, trust to the aid of priestly influence, whether Catholic, Greek, Protestant, or Mahometan, for the success of their common aim—political despotism.

In my interview with the Pasha, he evinced, in his choice of conversational subjects, a love of practical topics, and an avidity for facts, in his inquiries, which struck me as characteristic of his mind. He entered with great readiness into calculations; dealing, in the course of his observations, with two and a-half, five, and twenty per cent., in a manner that shewed they had been familiar terms with him. Unquestionably, this calculating turn has contributed materially towards elevating him to his present position; for although, upon emergencies, he has manifested no lack of daring and courage, it is notorious that he has always preferred the use of diplomatic stratagems to the more open tactics of the field. Cunning and craft have done far greater service than the sword, in the career of Mehemet Ali. But nothing struck me so forcibly as the egotism which seems to be the predominant feature of his character. He sees, feels, knows, dreams of nothing but self. The projects of this singular personage, however enlightened or disinterested in appearance, are all designed solely with a view to augment his own solitary state, or confirm him individually in power. If he speaks of the resources of Egypt with exultation, or refers with apparent delight to the fertilising properties of its noble river, it is because, in the same breath, he can remind you that the valley of the Nile is his estate; and it will have been seen that, if he amused his leisure by calculating the manifold riches of this favoured region, it was only that he might boast of being able to shut himself up for twenty years, and bid the world defiance. Having self-interest predominant in his own mind, and, truth to say, having in his career experienced but little of the disinterestedness of others, it is not wonderful that he should suspect every one approaching his divan to be actuated by a similar principle. I was amused at discovering, from the commencement of our interview, that he had come to the conclusion that I was anxious to persuade him to put down his manufacturing establishments, in order to favour my countrymen, his rivals in Manchester. Nor do I flatter myself for a moment that, up to the time of my departure from his presence, he gave me credit, in the sentiments I uttered, for any higher motive. In this respect Mehemet Ali ought not to be too severely criticised; for no Turkish pasha ever dreamed, or was ever warranted by experience in dreaming that a person would visit him merely for the purpose of discussing a question of political economy, without reference to his own personal interests.

I have spoken of his egotism; but there is another ruling passion—the love of approbation—by which the character of Mehemet Ali is greatly influenced. It is owing to a sensitiveness about the kind of report which Europeans may make of the condition of his people, that he is accustomed to boast, after the fashion I have had occasion to describe, of the prosperous state of his Fellah population: hence arose his exaggerated picture of the gains of the cotton growers in the Delta in our first interview; and hence, too, springs the constant plea, which he puts forth as often as he finds a stranger venturing to doubt the prosperity of his subjects, that nobody but himself understands the situation of the Egyptians. I was informed by one of his oldest and most intimate connexions, that he is accustomed, in his private intercourse with his friends and ministers, to express his belief that the wretched Fellah cultivators are much better off than they appear to be, and that they have secret hoards of money and jewels. This habit must be accounted for, I presume, on the principle laid down by Burke, that a man who, for a twelvemonth reiterates a falsehood, will at last believe it to be a truth; for it cannot be supposed possible that he should be the dupe of any other individual's representation, since there could not probably be found another person in the country who shares his conviction. It is from a desire to possess a favourable reputation in European circles, that he has been known to subsidize writers, both in France and England; and should a tourist, whose account of the country is likely to excite attention in Europe, visit Egypt, he is loaded with civilities, and every art is practised to impress him with a good opinion of the Pasha's government. I was witness to the tactics pursued towards Prince Puckler Muskau, who arrived in Alexandria the day I took my departure from that city. His reception was so flattering that it appeared the wily Viceroy and his court had conceived a notion that, to lead the German to form a high opinion of his entertainer, it was only necessary that he should be first confirmed in an exalted estimate of himself. Mehemet Ali is accustomed to hear the books of such travellers translated to him; and I was told by his confidential friend, before quoted, that he was much annoyed by the accounts contained in Mr Wilkinson's work on Egypt, reflecting upon the scanty earnings of the Arab cultivators; but, added my informant, drily—"Mr Wilkinson knew and described the condition of the people better than the Pasha himself."

Let me not, however, close this account of my interview with the Viceroy of Egypt, without paying a justly merited tribute to his conversational talent. The manner in which he throws aside all reserve, and puts himself upon a level with his visitors, inviting controversy, and even contradiction, shews a confidence in his own powers, which is amply warranted by the resources he can bring to bear upon every subject of debate. His utterance is quick and energetic, and the unpleasant tones of his voice are soon forgotten in the animated features, sharp gestures, and earnest manner with which he carries on his conversation. Whatever subject may be introduced, he is ready, apparently without previous study or preparation, to concentrate upon it in a moment all the force of his vigorous and impetuous intellect. It is this talent which enables him, in the course of one half-hour, to devote his mind to the details of a dozen questions of public and private policy. On one occasion, an individual, who related the anecdote to me, called, by appointment, upon the Pasha, to take his directions relative to the equipment of a steam-boat; when he found him surrounded with sample-bundles of hose, from which he was selecting a quality of stockings to be worn by his Europeanised troops, or Nisam. They were interrupted in their interview by the arrival of a messenger of rank from Syria, who immediately held a secret conference with Mehemet Ali upon the state of military operations in that province; after which he gave audience to an American inventor of an improved machine for a rice-mill, who submitted a model of the invention to his critical inspection.

Often, in recurring to my interviews with this extraordinary man, and recollecting the eagerness of his inquiries upon practical subjects, as well as the vehemence of manner with which he sustained his opinions—evincing the spring-like elasticity of mind, which manifests its power in proportion as it is pressed—I think with pleasure of the refreshing and animating scene, not unminged with regret, that I shall probably never again have an opportunity of chatting with old Mehemet Ali.

FRIENDSHIP IN TRADE.

OR, THE PRACTICAL RESULTS OF THE PROTECTIVE SYSTEM.

"No friendship in trade," is a commercial maxim. It is, however, only applied between citizens; for practical men maintain, that to protect our countrymen against foreigners is the true old English policy, and the perfection of political wisdom. Yet, theoretically, its wisdom may be doubted, for—putting consumers out of the question—why allow one citizen to undersell another? Or how does the accident of birth render competition more palatable? Why should not the leather gloves of Worcester be protected against the cotton gloves of Manchester—named, in mockery, after a foreign city, Berlin—as well as against the kids of Paris? Why should the rail-road projectors be allowed to compete with the established proprietors who have a vested interest in canals, whilst those who have invested their capitals in ships' bottoms possess an advantage over their competitors? If we practically take up the point, and fully work out the whole results, any branch, almost any item, of our tariff will shew the inconvenience of friendships in trades. Tea, timber, silks, spirits, the taxes on the raw materials of manufacture, or on the tropical luxuries of our breakfast and dinner tables, display the mischiefs which flow from a narrow interpretation of the wisdom of our ancestors. One instance is, however, as good as fifty; and, since the sugar question has so lately been before the public, we will take sugar. It will shew how one false step in commercial legislation leads to others, and how the wheels of protection run one within the other, till, in due season, the whole tend to a dead-lock, and threaten to overthrow the vehicle.

The duty on sugar, "the produce of and imported from any British possession in America," is 24s. the hundred weight. This is imposed for the purposes of revenue; and, we opine, the true principle would be, to get as much sugar imported as we can, in order to raise both the revenue and the comforts of the people. But as, out of friendship to the Canadians and the British shipowners, the planter is obliged to buy the provisions for his negroes, and some of the implements of his trade, at a higher rate than he could otherwise procure them, he is protected against foreigners. On all foreign* sugar, therefore, a duty of three guineas the cwt. is levied. As this is considerably above the wholesale price, including duty, and fully equal to the retail selling price in London, it is obvious that the equally good and (40 or 50 per cent.) cheaper sugars of Cuba and the Brazils can never be brought into the English market, unless the producers should feel inclined to give away the commodity, pay the freight, and throw in some ten or twelve shillings bounty, to obtain the honour of his produce being consumed by the "Pride of the world, and the Envy of surrounding nations." From this cause arises another difficulty, which the protective system, or friendship in trade, brings into play. During the war, raw sugars were scarce upon the continent. Loaf-sugar, also, if it were to be had at all, must of necessity be imported. But, with the return of peace, all nations—save France, which befriends beet-root growers—could import raw sugars; and all nations could refine them. England, however, had an established trade; and, in her coal-mines and her machinery, she possessed great facilities for its indefinite extension. The protecting duties on foreign sugars, and, till the last year, also on East Indian, however, restricted the supply of the raw material; but, if negro-drivers and nabobs had a claim to friendship, it was also the British refiner's right. He is accordingly protected against the refined sugars of all the world, by a duty which is now eight guineas a hundred weight, or eighteen-pence a pound. This protection of 50 per cent., beyond the price which is paid for the dearest article, in the dearest of retail shops, pretty effectually prevents either West Indians, or any one else, from refining sugar for importation into England. But, though it secures to the British refiner the monopoly of the British market, it is of no avail abroad, where the people can refine those cheap foreign sugars which Englishmen cannot take at a gift. Home manufactures and the export trade have always, however, been deemed important matters; and, having placed the refining business in this predicament, and the trade beginning to pine, notwithstanding its swaddling clothes, it was thought necessary to give it a friendly lift. To enable our refiner to procure the raw material at as cheap a rate as his continental rivals, he was permitted to import foreign sugars at the same or at about the same rate of duty as that levied on the West Indian sugars, provided he guaranteed their exportation. Sugar, however, in refining, diminishes in bulk—a cwt. of the raw commodity yielding only from 70 lbs. and upwards, according to its purity and quality. To allow, on a cwt. of refined sugar, a drawback of 24s. only, would be contrary to all principles of our commercial policy, which never places a tax upon an exported article. Experiments were accordingly instituted, or professed to be instituted, to discover what quantity of refined sugar a cwt. of raw would yield, and a rate of drawback was founded upon their alleged results. The nominal amount of this drawback fluctuated, of course, with every change in the duties on sugar; but, from various circumstances, especially from the price of refined sugars on shipboard, after the drawback was obtained, "being from 1s. to 3s. a cwt. less than the cost of the raw material,"* saying nothing of waste and the expenses of manufacturing, it was concluded that this apparent drawback was in reality a bounty. The experiments instituted by Mr Poulett Thomson have officially established this fact beyond a doubt. "Three experiments had been made," said the Right Honourable gentleman in his speech upon this subject, on the 24th July, 1837, "on West Indian sugars; and the first, which was made from a necessary cause upon very different sugars, left in result, that there was a bounty upon that description of sugar to the amount of 1s. 6d.; the second experiment left a bounty of 5s.; and the third left one of 6s." We may assume, from the following passage, that the manufacturers do not refine the one-and-sixpenny sugar for exportation:—"We had inspected the books of a manufacturer for the last three years, from which it appeared, that in the first year the bounty was 4s. 10d.; in

* One of the pretences is, that foreign sugar is produced by slave labour. But, if this be a sound objection, we must prohibit all Turkish and African, and many Asian commodities. Nay, the great staple of England, the cotton trade, must be annihilated; for the bulk of our raw material is drawn from the slave provinces of the United States, where slavery exists in its most horrid form. Some foreign sugar, too, is the product of free labour.

the second, 4s. 3d.; and, in the third, 3s. 9d.; thus proving that there is a bounty which varies between 45s. and 58s. on every cwt. of sugar refined in this country. We now come to the subject of foreign sugars. By an experiment on one parcel of foreign Brazilian sugars of an inferior quality, it appeared that the bounty on it was 2s.; when, however, it was mixed half and half with West India, the bounty rose to 3s. 3d. From another experiment made on foreign sugars, of the average price of West India sugars, a bounty of 8s. was produced;" and we may imagine these sugars are the favourites. From a fact subsequently stated, it would seem that this bounty, large as it is, is far from being the whole sum levied on the public. The West Indians, prevented from refining their own sugars, and thus unfairly restricted in the free employment of their capital and labour, to benefit the British refiners, (who are equally restricted, though in another way, to benefit the West Indians,) have made such improvements in clarifying their raw produce, "that sugar, in almost a refined state, was brought into this country, on which there was a duty of 24s. only; which sugar was brought by one boiling into such a state that a bounty was received upon it of 35s." And the result of the whole inquiry, as stated by Mr Poulett Thompson, was, "that, taking the bounty at 4s. the cwt., which would not be above the mark," (but very much, we conceive, below it,) "it would appear, that, upon £4,000,000 of produce, there is a tax levied upon the people of £900,000." Nor is this all. By excluding competition, both in raw and refined sugars, the price of both, or, at all events, of raw, was so considerably raised as to be equivalent to a tax of from 1½ to 2 millions a-year; whilst, by shutting out, or altogether prohibiting the cheaper sugars, the consumption was diminished, and a less revenue was raised from a high rate of duty than would otherwise be yielded under a low rate. To expose such a state of things was sufficient; and the consequence has been that the drawback on refined sugar exported has been, this session, reduced from £1 : 16 : 10 to £1 : 10 : 8 per cwt.

The average consumption of sugar by each individual in Great Britain is 24 lbs. per annum; so that each family, of five persons, pays annually 28s. of sugar duty to Government. Since 1790, the consumption of sugar has only doubled, while that of coffee has increased no less than twenty-two fold, and that of tea has much more than doubled. There can be little doubt, therefore, that, had the duty been from time to time reduced, the consumption of sugar would have been five-fold what it is at present; and it is exceedingly likely that a diminution of the duty would speedily be followed by an increase of the revenue. In Ireland, the consumption of sugar does not average 6 lbs. for each individual yearly. In England, the allowance to each person in the workhouse, is 34 lbs., and to each domestic servant, 52 lbs. yearly: more than double the average consumption. To prevent beet sugar being raised in this country, a duty of 24s. per cwt. has been imposed, and the manufacture put under the odious surveillance of the Excise. It is needless to say, that all attempts to produce beet sugar in this country have been thus effectually stopped.

But the maze which the practical system has constructed, is not quite threaded. Since the days of Cromwell, the shipping interest has been befriended; but let that pass—we are dealing with the present state of things. As enormous taxes are laid upon timber, to benefit the Canadians, and on the other materials of ship-building, (except hemp,) chiefly to protect the mining interests of England, the ship-owners have a claim to protection. It is granted at the expense among others of the colonists, who can neither export their surplus produce, nor import the equivalents by the cheapest conveyance, but must pay for the artificially enhanced price of British freight; and hence another reaction. The unexampled growth of British commerce, during the present century, has diminished the importance of the West Indian market, which is now of considerable less consequence than the trade of the Brazils.* But our prohibitive duties, excluding its staple productions from the English market, our ships, in the commerce of that, as well as of many other countries, are deprived of the employment which an unrestricted trade would create. In the conduct of that which prohibitive duties have not yet destroyed, our vessels have to come back in ballast, or are driven into round-about carrying trades, with such freights as they can procure. Nor is this wonderful. We export to five sugar countries, manufactures to the annual value of five millions. We import, in return, productions to the extent of one million only, "the residue of about four millions being thus forced, by the highly restrictive laws of this country, into foreign channels, and to the employment and encouragement [alas! where has the protective system landed us?] of foreign shipping and manufacture."†

Let us put the skeleton of these facts in the tabular form, by way of presenting them more distinctly to the mind. We do not arrange them in chronological order, for they are the product of various times; we do not class them in geographical order, for the protection operates at different stages; but we put them in what may be called the accumulative shape, that the consumer may form some notion of the rate at which he pays for the successive protection of other people.

To benefit the Canadians and the British ship-owners, restrictions and protecting duties are laid upon provisions, lumber, and casks, &c. imported into the West Indies, which the colonists deem equivalent to a tax of . . . £1,000,000

* The exports from the British manufactures to the Brazils, three millions; to the West Indies, from one and a half to two millions.

† Liverpool Brazilian Association Edition: 2

In consequence of this, other protecting duties are laid upon foreign sugars; which, besides checking the consumption of this country, the cultivation of the countries which would furnish us with the additional supplies, and diminishing the demand for our manufactures, imposes, in the increased price of the sugar they do consume, a tax upon the people of this country, of from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000

Whilst, in consequence of less sugar being consumed, high duty is necessary to raise the same or a smaller revenue, than, under other circumstances, would be gained by a lower duty. If this be rated at only 4s. per cwt. we have in addition, about £750,000

The refiner being injured by these protecting duties, is allowed to prevent the sugar growers from refining their own produce. This is accomplished by a prohibitive duty of £8 : 8s. a cwt. The cost of this to the consumer we have no means of estimating. But, owing to the bounty which is rendered more complex by, and perhaps, might be abolished but for the restrictive system, the Treasury annually loses, according to the official statement of Mr P. Thomson, £800,000

Protecting taxes are laid upon the timber, and some other materials of ship-building. The pressure upon the ship-owners we have no data to ascertain; but the cost to the public generally, from timber alone, is estimated at least at £1,000,000

As a counterbalance, the ship-owner is allowed to retain the monopoly of the West Indian carrying trade, (the burden of which to the colonists, is included in the first item.) This, however, is now useless, if not injurious, since it shuts him out from opening up any new markets in the tropical world, and deprives him, as we have seen, of the freight of four millions' worth of commodities.

Such—in one branch of the subject—are the practical results of the protective system, or friendship in trade. The Canadians, being British settlers, are allowed to befriend themselves by taxing the ship-owners and planters. These parties then reciprocally tax one another, and the West and East Indian sugar growers combine together to annihilate the foreigner. As this, however, imposes a tax upon the British refiner, he claims the privilege of taxing the three, and the long list of conflicting taxes, the cost of levying "each and every" the trader's profits, both upon tax and cost, (with a handsome commission for his own trouble,) and the losses which flow from the general derangement, consequent upon the system, are gathered together, and placed upon the shoulders of John Bull. The pressure, when combined with that of some four or five others of a similar nature, may be equivalent to about the three-fourths of the national debt, and must exceed the whole public expenditure, both for active and inefficient service. But John Bull, although sinking under the weight, is too busy to exert himself to get rid of the burden. He is engaged in drawing up petitions, and threatening revolutions, whilst the young gentleman and the old lady whom he has entrusted with his colonial and financial matters, have given away twenty millions of his money to some sugar planters, without saying one syllable of sugar in the course of the bargain, unless it be to hint that John may have to pay a higher tax upon it. But John Bull is a practical man, who is always for dealing with friends, and—he pays very dear for his whistle.

SPECIMENS OF POPULAR GERMAN POETRY.

FRIDOLIN.

A Ballad, from Schiller.

A gentle page was Fridolin,
Whose pride was all to earn
His lady's love, withouten sin,
The Countess of Savern.
Oh! she was kind—so kind and good!
But even caprice's tyrant mood
He would have borne, and borne it cheerly,
For Jesus' sake, who bought him dearly.

From early break of morning till
The toll of vesper chime,
He gave her, with good heart and will,
The service of his prime.
"Nay, toil not so!" the dame would cry;
Then would the tears start to his eye—
For zeal alone, he thought, to duty
Gave all its excellence and beauty.

And therefore did the Countess raise
Him o'er her menials all,
And from her beauteous lips his praise
Unceasingly would fall.
He in her heart the office more
Of son than page or servant bore;
His comely form each grace united,
And on him oft she'd gaze delighted.

Now, in the huntsman, Robert, this
Woke wrath and hate accursed,
For envy's smouldering fires in his
Black breast he long had nursed.
Urged by the fiend, he sought the Count
As he did from the chase dismount,
And thus, in tones that smoothly flattered,
The seeds of dark suspicion scattered.

"Oh, my good lord"—thus he array'd
His toils—"how are you blest!
Doubts, spectral phantoms, never invade
Your golden hours of rest."

For you possess a noble dame,
Of virtues rare, and spotless fame.
Vain were it all, that daring wooer
Should with his pleasing wiles pursue her."

Dark gloomed the Count—he was full wroth—

"How now!—what mean ye, knave?"

Shall I put faith in woman's troth,

That's changeful as the wave—

What every flatterer's tongue can sway?

My trust, I ween, hath surer stay—

Here's none to tempt with artful wooing

Count Savern's dame to her undoing."

Quoth Robert—"Right, my master—you'll

But think it worth your scorn,

That he—O Heavens! presumptuous fool!

A thrall, a minion born—

Should court with smiles and phrases trim

His lady, who has fostered him!"

"What!" cries the Count, with passion choking,

"Lives yet the man of whom thou'st spoken?"

"My Lord, not heard what runs the round

Of every mouth! But, true,

You'd have the tale in silence drowned—

Well, I'll be secret too!"

"Speak, or thou diest the death, base liar!

Who dares to Cunegeond aspire?"

He grasped his falchion, and half drew it—

"Yon whey-faced page—methought ye knew it.

"It is a shapely youth, I wot!"—

Thus went his glozing tongue,

While through the listener's veins, now hot,

Now cold, the quick blood sprung.

"Nay, nay! you must have noted, sir,

How he has eyes for none but her;

And o'er her chair at table seen him

With air of lovesick wooer lean him.

"And then the verses which he wrote,

Where he avow'd his flame!"—

"Avowed?"—"And a return he sought,

Dead to all touch of shame!

Your gentle dame, in pity, hath

Been mute, to screen him from your wrath—

Would to the fact you'd still been stranger!

For what have you to dread of danger?"

Away the Count in frenzy rode

Into a neighbouring wood,

Where, belching flames that redly glowed,

An iron foundry stood.

Here his bold serfs with sweltering hands

Piled, day and night, the blazing brands;

Sparks flew about, and bellows roaring

Sent ores in molten torrents pouring.

The might of fire and flood ybient

Gave out a brawling sound,

Wheels, driven by hissing waters, went,

Aye clattering, round and round.

By day, by night, the works within,

Rose up a stupefying din

Of clanking hammers, which descended

Till even the stubborn iron bended.

Two of his men he beckons near,

And thus assigns their task—

"The first, whom I shall send you here

That of you this shall ask—

'Are the Count's orders speeded well?"

Him cast into yon seething hall,

Till flesh and bone to dust are cindered—

So shall my beasts no more be hindered."

With fiendish glee the inhuman pair

Received their lord's behests,

For senseless as the iron were

Their hearts within their breasts.

And now they heap the furnace fire,

With panting bellows urge it higher,

And, on the restless flames glaring,

Stand for the sacrifice preparing.

Says Robert now to Fridolin,

In accents smoothly sleek,

"Up, comrade mine, and get ye in—

The Count with you would speak!"

The Count, he bids him—"Do not wait,

But hie thee to the foundry straight,

And ask—my man will understand it—

If they have done as I commanded."

"Even so!" replied the page, and would

Have gone, when suddenly

He paused—"How, if my lady should Have some commands for me?"

He seeks the dame, and, bending low,

Says—"I must to the foundry go,

That stands upon the forest's borders;

But, ere I go, I wait your orders."

Then answered him the dame again

With gentle voice—"Alas!

My son is sick, or I would fain

Have heard the holy mass.

Go thou, my child, and let me not

Be in thy orisons forgot;

And so shall I partake the sentence

That crowns with pardon thy repentance."

Glad of the welcome task, he lost

No time, but forward sped;

But, as he through the village crossed

With rapid step, o'erhead

He heard the minister's solemn bell

Through the still air serenely swell,

Bidding frail souls, in concord mystic,

To share the banquet eucharistic.

"Shun not the call of power divine,

When 'tis before thee set!"

He says, and turns into the shrine.

Here naught is stirring yet;

For now, the harvest toil begun,

Keeps all men busy in the sun,

And neither clerk nor choir advances,

To chant the service and responses.

Estoons, to fill the sacrist's post,

Young Fridolin did go—

"The time," he said, "is never lost,

Which we on heaven bestow."

Then to the priest he speeds anon,

And girds his stole and cincture on,

Prepares, with holy zeal elated,

The cups and vessels consecrated.

These duties ended, at command:

He stept the priest before,

Along the aisle, and in his hand

The sacred missal bore;

Knelt right, knelt left, before the altar,

Did in no single duty falter,

And, when the sanctus was repeated,

Sounded his bell three times to greet it.

And when the priest, with awe devout,

Bent low, then reverently

In his uplifted hands held out

The present deity,

Tink, tinkle, went the sacrist's bell;

Stirred by its sound, men's bosoms swell,

And, to the host, all, lowly kneeling,

Beat on their breasts with contrite feeling.

What else the office asked he wrought,

He failed not in the least—

His mind these hallowed forms had caught—

Nor tired he, when the priest,

The mass and service ended thus,

Gave the Vobiscum Dominus,

And, God's unbounded grace confessing,

Dismissed the people with a blessing.

He saw each vessel, where 'twas kept,

In safety placed anew,

The sanctuary next he swept,

Then from the church withdrew;

And now, serene of soul, and gay,
Made for the forge, and on his way,
Because their tale was uncompleted,
Twelve patternmasters more repeated.

He gained the reeking forge, and spied
The workmen near it stand—
"Ho, now! my men, have you," he cried,
"Fulfilled the Count's command?"
They turn, and, with a hideous grin, Point to the raging gulf within—
"He's safe enough, and stowed securely;
The Count will praise his servants surely."

With hurrying step and mind at war,
Back to his lord he hies;
He sees him coming from afar,
And scarce may trust his eyes.
"Unhappy boy, whence comest thou?"
"Sir, from the iron-foundry." "How!—
Thou hast been loitering then?" "I waited
For prayer and service consecrated.

"For, ere I bent me to your task,
I sought your dame to see—
For this, methought, did duty ask—
If she would aught with me.
She bids me go to mass, and I,
Well-pleased with the behest, comply;
And there, for her and your uncumbered
Welfare, my beads four times I numbered."

The Count fell back in deep dismay—
The colour left his cheek—
"And to thy question what said they,
The foundry workmen—speak?"
"Darkly they spoke—to the furnace red
They pointed with a grin, and said—
'He's safe enough, and stowed securely;
The Count will praise his servants surely.'"

"And, Robert," cried with mind on rack
The Count, and trembling stood—
"Met ye him not, as ye came back?
I sent him to the wood."
"Sir, nor by wood nor meadow green
Have I a trace of Robert seen."
"Now," cries the Count—smit with contrition—
"Here may we read Heaven's own decision."

Then to his dame, to whom unknown
Was all had passed, he led
Her gentle page, and thus in tone
Of deep emotion, said:
"Be ever gracious to this child:
No angel is more undefiled.
Though we may deal ungently by him,
God and his saints are ever nigh him."

VANITAS VANITATUM, VANITAS.

From Goethe.

I place my faith and trust on naught—
Huzza!

With dear experience wisdom bought—
Huzza!

Then when with comrades next I dine,
I'll quaff to naught, best friend of mine,
A bumper full of Rhenish wine.

I placed my trust in gaining wealth—
Huzza!

In doing so spent youth and health—
Ah, well!

My hopes by fickle fortune cross'd,
What in collecting so much cost,
Through bankrupt agents, I have lost.

To Eve's fair daughters next I went—
Huzza!

There sadly found my time mispent,
Ah, well!

If faithless, they deserted me;
The constant caused me ennui—
Thus woman ceased my trust to be.

On foreign travel went I next—
Huzza!
And there was plagued and sorely vex'd—
Ah, well!

While bills were high and fare was bad,
And bar'rous jargon drove me mad,
I nowhere English comforts had.

I placed my trust in rank and fame—
Huzza!
And tried to gain a deathless name—
Ah, well!

To honour's post at last when raised,
My worth and merits none one praised,
While jaundiced Envy on me gazed.

I placed my trust on glorious war—
Huzza!
In hopes to change my lacklens star—
Ah, well!

Victorious oft, with laurel crown'd,
One limb I left on Spanish ground,
And then in war no pleasure found.

But now on naught I place my trust—
Huzza!
And so Dame Fortune do thy worst—
Huzza!
For while I spend the whole day long,
In mirth and feasting, wine and song,
To me does all the world belong.

TO A SPARROW CAUGHT IN MY HALL.

From the German of Bürger.

Good day, my Lord!—Look at him well!
Thou'rt welcome in my hall to dwell!
Thou'rt taken prisoner, dost thou see?
Exert thine every energy,
And fly about on every side,
And leave no window pane untried,
Shouldst even break thy beak or skull—
Thou'rt taken prisoner, little fool!
Thy tyrant I, and thou my slave,
Although a prince, or count, or grave,
Among thy sparrow folk! Now, hear
What, if I chese to be severe,
I have the power to do with thee:—
Can pluck thee, twist thy neck; decree
The fate awaiting cock and dog,
(To end this little catalogue,)
Should they refuse to crow and bark—
Death at one stroke! and, hark!
Although I say the words with grief,
And that with right, thou gallows thief!
Dost know the cherries, day by day,
Thou from my mouth hast snatched away?
And princely pastime it would be
Should I bring Pussy in with me!
But, if more merciful, indeed,
The garden-shears I have, at need,
Wherewith to cut thy fluttering wing
And saucy tail, thou little thing!
Then, under hedge and bank, thou must
Be always fluttering in the dust!—
Ha! fellow! how dost like the plan?
But know thou that I am a Man!
I'll let thee flutter, frank and free;
But that, e'er mindful thou mayst be
That Freedom is a golden price,
First, I will gently tyrannize,
And scare thee o'er the room. Sh! sh!
Now, through the window to your bush!

No! no! no tyranny for me!
God guard us all from slavery!

CHAPTER FROM THE CHRONICLES OF ENGLISH QUEENS; OR, THE LEPER-HOUSE OF JANVAL.

BY MRS GORE.

Among the unquiet reigns succeeding the epoch of the Norman conquest, which (while the original Britons were colonizing in exile in that maritime province of France which still exhibits such remarkable traces of the Celtic origin of its population) established a third race of aliens and foreigners in authority over the harassed mother country, that of Stephen—harassed by perpetual struggles with the Empress Matilda and her son—was, perhaps, the most uneasy to the Sovereign, the most unsatisfactory to the people.

Henry I. had been endured on the throne by his English subjects chiefly in deference to his union with a Saxon Princess, the niece of Edgar Atheling. Though the haughty manners of the Queen estranged from her, in the sequel, the hearts of her own people; while the Normans, instead of being propitiated by her renouncement of her Saxon name of Edith for the Norman one of Matilda, persisted in asserting that the Saxon Princess was a recanted nun, devoted in childhood to the altar by her aunt, the Abbess of Wilton—still her influence promoted peace in the land; and there was every prospect that, in the person of her son, Prince William, the Saxon and Norman races united would uphold undisputed sway over the kingdom. There were those, however, among the English, who still predicted evil from the results of a sacrilegious marriage. Many were heard to declare that, so long as Edgar Atheling survived in exile in Normandy, the representatives of his niece could have no lawful claim to the English throne; while others boldly related reports of Prince William's animosity to his maternal kindred—the son of Maud, reared by Norman preceptors, having been heard to protest that his English subjects should be trained like oxen to the plough, as worthy only to become beasts of burden to the Normans.

The evil intentions of the heir-apparent were fated to be frustrated by that fatal catastrophe which history commemorates as having filled with lamentations not only the palace of the Sovereign, but the mansions of the Norman nobility. King Henry, when on the point of embarking from Harfleur for England, with his court, after pacifying the Dukedom of Normandy, was unluckily accosted by one Fitz-Stephens, the son of Fitz-Evard, a Norman privateer, who, after presenting on the strand a mark of gold to the King, in token of feudal service, made claim to the monopoly of conveying the royal cortège across the channel.

"It was my father," pleaded the blunt Norman, "who, in this same good vessel, the Blanche Nef, transported to Hastings your royal father, the Conqueror; and I demand the enjoyment of the privilege then conceded to the family."

In deference to the omen, the English King forthwith entrusted to the vauntful captain his two sons, his daughter, his nephew, with three hundred youthful courtiers of noble lineage; and, lo! at midnight, on the eve of St Catherine, the Blanche Nef, manned by fifty gallant oarsmen, quitted the port, and, in a tranquil sea, without visible motive for the calamity, struck upon a fatal ledge of a rock, then known as the Ras de Catte. The cries of the crew reached even unto the King's ship; but so little was Henry prepared for the calamity, that, on landing in England, he persisted in asserting that the Blanche Nef had put back into port; nor was it till the sole survivor of the crew (a butcher of Rouen, saved by clinging to the mast) made known the piteous fact, that Prince William, having fairly escaped the wreck, had returned to receive on board a favourite daughter of his father, and been lost, through a number of his noble companions leaping into the boat, that Henry became convinced of the extent of his misfortune. From that hour to the day of his death, the countenance of the afflicted King was unvisited by a smile. Beholding in this severe dispensation of Providence the chastisement of his cruelties towards his brother Robert, and of his unlawful marriage, he began to apprehend that his fated line was destined never to reign in England.

"I have failed to propitiate the wrath of Providence," murmured the King. "Albeit the rich foundation of Reading Abbey hath appeased the rancour of the clergy, it hath done nought to conciliate the indignation of a jealous God. The line of William the Norman is a destined line. It is written—La race de l'enfant batarde périra!"

The prudent counsels of Anselmus, the Archbishop, suggested, however, at that juncture, to the King, that, instead of indulging in unavailing regrets, much might be done to secure the succession to the throne for his daughter, Maud—the youthful widow of the Emperor, Henry V. of Germany; in obedience to which advice, the Empress Maud was invited back, and welcomed with royal state to Windsor Castle, to receive the allegiance of the barons of England, as heiress-apparent to the crown.

The pride of a warlike nation might have been expected to rebel against this substitution of a female ruler, at a period when every man's foot was in the stirrup, and every man's hand on his sword. But compassion pleaded for King Henry. It was no moment to thwart the desires of the afflicted man. The youth and beauty of the imperial widow wrought wonders in her favour with the chivalrous youth of the kingdom. Certain of the higher nobility cherished secret hopes of being honoured by the King with her hand ; others venerated the Empress as the sole representative, in name and nature, of her Saxon mother, (styled on her tomb at Winchester—MATILDIS REGINA, ab Anglis vocata MOLD, THE CODE QUEEN ;") and not a few mentally reserved to themselves absolvment from their oath of allegiance, in case the young Earl of Blois, son to Adela, sister of the Conqueror, could be prevailed on to attempt a second invasion.

The Empress, meanwhile, in the fullest bloom of youth and beauty, gave herself up to the propitious seeming of the time, without much heed of the secret intentions of her obsequious vassals. As yet, too young and fair for ambition, her youth was spent among the deteriorating brilliancies of a court. Transplanted, in thoughtless girlhood, from the somewhat pedantic precincts of the palace of Westminster, beset at that period by learned clerks and ambitious priests, to the gay Imperial court, with all its array of chivalry, its vivid heraldry, joyous tournaments, and gentle arts of poesy and song, the young Empress had passed in review the gallant nobles of Hainault, Brabant, Saxony, &c., in her early widowhood, she returned to present herself before the iron-handed barons of Britain ; and, though she came prepared to be an object of idolatry to the courtiers of her father, and to see the knees of men and the eyes of women bend down before her, she was pre-resolved that neither the savage English thanes (her father's reluctant subjects) nor the rude Norman barons (her mother's ferocious enemies) should obtain any ascendancy over her heart. She would be a Queen !—every inch a Queen ! She would enjoy the revenues of the crown, trifle with the liberties of the people, repress the insolence of the barons, and enjoy the sports and pastimes of her sex, without paying a tribute in return to its feelings or frailties. Love was not for one of royal degree. There were chancellors and archbishops to hold in charge her conscience and her immortal soul. The youthful Sovereign reserved to herself the care of her heart.

When Matilda took her place, for the first time, beside her father in the Council Chamber at Windsor, surrounded by venerable men, renowned for valour in the field or wisdom in the closet, many admired the listless serenity of brow with which she pronounced the words dictated to her by the King's Ministers, applauding the clear enunciation of her firm and silver voice. Others there were, however, who descried heartlessness in her too-ready self-possession, and would rather have traced a tear in her youthful eye, or a faltering accent, when addressing, for the first time, the chosen of her future subjects, than have witnessed her cold and measured propriety of demeanour. There was no sensibility, they said, in Matilda—no woman—no angel. They might reverence, but they could not love the automaton of the counsellors of the throne.

These cavillers, however, withdrew their objections, when, in the course of the jousts and tournaments which followed the solemn convocation confirming the succession in the female line, the youthful Empress was required to bestow, three successive times, the palm of victory upon a certain Sir Kenric Ceorcil, only son of the Saxon Earl Waltheam, a youth whose high accomplishments threw into the shade those of the gallant Norman nobles flourishing under the protection of the court. Sir Kenric was, in fact, regarded as the flower of English knights ; and when, at the close of the day, the young Empress invested him with a scarf of gold, embroidered by her own fair hands, and woven in her colours, the Harcourts, Montaignes, Alyottes, Mortemers, Noels, and all the horde of foreign adventurers, honoured with posts of state, bit their tilting gloves for very shame at being thus overmastered by one of the native boors of the uncivilized land they designed to plunder for a maintenance. But the fault was their own. Their presumption of skill and valour had suggested a challenge to all England, in honour of the fair Matilda, else had not the son of a Saxon Tiern presumed to wield arms within the privileged lists of the royal castle of Windsor.

Still deeper was their shame when, at the banquet and ball following this chivalrous display, they beheld Sir Kenric graced with the especial notice of their future Queen and the noble ladies glittering in her train. King Henry, on dissolving the baronial council held in the grand hall of the castle, had entreated pardon for absenting himself from the ensuing entertainments in a spot where, but a year before, his gallant son had born off the prizes of the tourney ; and the youthful Empress was consequently sole occupant of the throne of state ; but it was judged no derogation that she should mingle in the dance, led successively by the Earls of Devon and Hereford, and young Geoffrey, son to Fulk, Earl of Anjou, the ward of King Henry during his father's absence in the Holy Land ; and Maud—who united the accomplishments of foreign countries with the fair-visagedness and modesty of her own—acquitted herself so gracefully under the guidance of these distinguished cavaliers, that even the Lady Godfreda d'Ypres—the favoured friend of her deceased mother, appointed by King Henry, as a woman of renowned virtue and prudence, to officiate as keeper of his daughter's household—could espy nothing to amend in the deportment of her charge.

The Norman Lords, however, saw much cause for blame, when—under sanction, as they supposed, of the Lady Godfreda, the English governante, the Saxon duenna—her Majesty dismounted once more from the throne to the dancing-floor, conducted by a partner no less obnoxious than Sir Kenric of Waltheam. An unseemly murmur arose in the hall, which nought but the presence of the solemn chamberlains with their wands, and the attendance of yeomen with their partisans, availed to subdue into decorum. Indignant, however, at this presumptuous show of displeasure on the part of her vassals, her mother's haughty spirit broke out for the first time in Matilda. Instead of shrinking rebuked by the dissatisfaction of the Court, the Empress redoubled her show of favour towards the noble Saxon she was honouring with her hand. On her other partners, she had scarcely deigned to bestow a token of notice. With Sir Kenric, she entered cheerfully into conversation. The young knight was recently returned from Ratisbon, where the Empress flattered herself she had made a highly advantageous impression; and to his replies to her interrogatories touching the friends she had reluctantly left behind, Matilda listened with such sparkling eyes and varying complexion, that the Lady Godfreda, uninstructed in the cause of her pupil's emotion, began to view with some uneasiness a scene likely to give rise to cruel misconstructions.

"Thy gentle friend, the Princess Isolina of Austria, should have furnished you with a token to my presence," observed the Empress, on learning that the young Knight had been her Highness' inmate in her castle of St Pölitz. "Tidings from her friends in Germany are ever welcome to Matilda."

"I had the glory, madam," returned the knight, with grace and dignity, "of bearing to England, both from the Earl of Hainault, and the Duchess of Austria, gifts and letters for your Majesty, which I duly delivered to the hands of your seneschal, to be entrusted to those of the Lady Godfreda."

"Letters!—gifts!" cried the Empress, with surprise.

"A cross and chalice of gold of Augsburg work," replied Sir Kenric, "and a chaplet of onyx, consecrated at the shrine of Maria Zell in Styria."

"And how came it," demanded the Empress, turning by sudden impulse towards her daughter, "that these tokens were remitted to my hand without intimation that they were intended to bespeak my favour for the bearer?"

"I crave your Majesty's pardon," replied the Lady Godfreda, (using her native dialect, in trust not to be understood by the Normans by whom they stood surrounded,) "for having adhered so closely to your royal father's instructions as to recognise the imprudence of bestowing public notice upon an English subject, whereas the foreign favourites, cheered by the sunshine of the throne, might be moved to take umbrage."

This reproof, intended to recall the Empress to a sense of her indiscretion in prolonging a parley with the English knight honoured with her colours in the lists and her hand in the dance, served only to aggravate the mischief. A sense of her recent accession of consequence swelled in the bosom of the youthful Sovereign. She was a woman, had been an Empress, was to be a Queen! Why submit to be lectured by a prudish woman, who had survived the age of grace and gallantry?

Aloud, in French, and with marked significance, accordingly, did Maud intimate to Sir Kenric of Waltheam her commands to present himself, on the morrow, at her apartments in the Eastern Tower of Windsor Castle, at the hour when the King afforded daily opportunity to his daughter to introduce her friends and dependents to his protection.

The graceful, silent, and reverent obedience with which this dangerous token of favour was received by the English knight, would probably have provoked a second murmur from the courtly throng, had not Maud, directing at that moment round the circle a stern glance of her clear blue eye, imposed silence upon the malecontents. Not a word was spoken, not a look adventured towards the graceful form of the retreating cavalier, who had accepted the words of the Empress as a form of dismissal. The lovely daughter of the King retired to dream of the noble person, expressive countenance, and mellifluous voice of the young Saxon, who had thrown all competitors for her smiles into eclipse; while the discontented Barons were scarcely less excited by newly awakened apprehensions that they might behold an English subject promoted to the English throne, and be compelled to bow the knee to one whom the rules of precedence and laws of conquest pointed out as their inferior.

Their fears, however, were premature. No Kenric presented himself to do homage to the royal lady, who esteemed herself more highly as queen of human hearts than as a dweller Empress, or sovereign expectant. Vainly did Maud chafe and wonder at the absence of her protégé; vainly dispatch her maids of honour and waiting gentlewomen to inquire of this usher and that seneschal whether a young knight, wearing a scarf of crimson and blue, had sued for admittance to her presence. The English knight was seen no more at Windsor Castle. Either the presence of the Lady Godfreda had alarmed the precautions of the King, and secured his banishment from Court, or the callous coldness of his English nature rendered him insensible to favours the mere witnessing of which had set the blood of the Norman nobility into a ferment.

If, however, the interference of the King purposed to obliterate the dangerous impression made on the heart of the future Queen of England, by one whom policy forbade her to elevate to the throne, the project evinced little knowledge of the human heart. Matilda, who would have perhaps seen less to admire in Sir Kenric on a mere familiar acquaintance, began to dwell perilously on his attractions the moment she conceived him to be forcibly detained from her presence. Every word of their interview was recalled and re-recalled; every look stored in her memory; every gesture remembered with partiality. She felt that she had lost a friend in the gallant partisan who had so chivalrously won and so gracefully worn her colours.

In vain did the Lady Godfreda remonstrate against the indelicacy of her inquiries, and the imprudence of her regrets. The young Empress did not scruple to avow that, were she assured of the interposition of the King, her father, in preventing the advances of Sir Kenric, she would abide no longer at Windsor Castle, to be subjected to espionage and tyranny; but, returning to Germany, live frugally but independently upon her dower, with the privilege of enjoying the society of her choice, and treading a measure when and where she listed, with partners of suitable degree.

"I pray your Majesty to recollect, ere these imprudent sayings transpire, and alienate from your royal person the hearts of the commons of England," quoth Lady Godfreda, "that the fair and fertile island over which your future sovereignty is appointed, is well worth the sacrifice of a coranto. It were a degrading fact to be commented upon by the Princesses of Christendom, that the widow of the German Cæsar sat wailing in her bower-chamber because a fair-visaged adventurer scorned to avail himself of her too gracious invitations. The man may be wedded, madam, or betrothed; and his affianced lady evince reluctance to have his feelings exposed to the courtesies of one whose happiness her friends ardently desire to see secured by prudent wedlock."

"Sir Kenric of Waltham is neither wed nor like to wed!" retorted Maud. "Thus far my inquiries have determined. What further they may detect concerning him, I know not. But should harshness or evil dealing be included in my discoveries, I make the cause of the innocent my own, and pledge my word to repay heavily hereafter the smallest injury sustained in my behalf by my noble champion."

Induced, by the remarks of her lady gover-nante, whom she knew to be honoured with her father's confidence, to fear that Sir Kenric might in sooth be made to pay a heavy penalty for the distinctions she had rashly accorded him, the young Empress applied to her half brother, Robert Fitzroy, Earl of Gloucester, (an illegitimate son, on whom King Henry had recently bestowed a name, a title, and a wealthy bride,) to ascertain the cause of Ceorcil's absenting himself from Court. But the answers hazarded by Gloucester served only to augment her vexation. He replied by entreating his sister to banish Sir Kenric from her recollection, since it needed but a show of further favour on her part to draw down on the object of her care the most cruel persecutions of the King.

"Be warned by the fate of our uncle Robert," whispered the Earl of Gloucester. "That he was an obstacle to the projects of the King, sufficed to condemn him to a barbarous extinction of sight, and eighteen years' imprisonment."

Against the frightful inference thus hinted, the young Empress began loudly to exclaim. But, in the midst of her anxieties, on account of one whom a single interview had thus unaccountably promoted to her good graces, King Henry signi-fied his intention to proceed to Normandy, to demand from his vassals the same pledge of allegiance to his daughter which he had received from his commons of England; and Matilda, who, from her early marriage and long residence in Germany, had been prevented accompanying her father in former expeditions, was gladdened by the prospect of beholding the cradle of her illustrious ancestors—the Castle of Rollo, the founder of her line—the early abode of her grandfather, the Conqueror—the sunny meads of the Seine—the gorgeous churches—the princely dwellings of Caen and Rouen.

With the versatility of her sex, she soon ceased to trouble her thoughts for the courteous knight who had done service for her in the lists; and, though Sir Kenric was known to have disappeared mysteriously from the dwelling of Earl Waltham, and was lamented of the English nobility, as a most accomplished youth, who, by force or stratagem, had come to wrong, Matilda embarked in her gorgeous galley, without so much as a prayer to the King that search might be made into the affair, and the aggressors yielded to punishment.

Glad was the heart of the lovely young Empress when, after a day's propitious sailing, the white cliffs of Fécamp appeared in sight. Her life had been a series of progresses and triumphs. She had become habituated to the glare and tumult of festivity, till the very heart within her was hardened by the atmosphere of pomp and ostentation. The wrongs of the oppressed, the sorrows of the poor, were forgotten, while her young eye dwelt upon glittering jewels, shining silks, and waving plumes. As she presided peerless over the lists, or sat aloft listening to the minstrelsies and clashing goblets of the gorgeous banquet, there was no world elsewhere for Matilda.

A heavy lesson, however, was in store for her. The Saxon parentage which so recommended her to her English subjects, created an equal prejudice against her among the Norman lieges of King Henry. The bold barons of the duchy swore that they would rather groan again under the sceptre of Robert the Devil, than submit to be swayed by a distaff; and, contrary to all that might have been anticipated from a country so civilized, her beauty, instead of working miracles in her favour, was converted into a cause of offence.

"This woman," cried the rough barons of Tan-carville, Eu, and Harcourt, "hath no thought save for the jingling of minstrels, and garniture of robes of estate. Give her the jewels and car-canets of the duchesses of Normandy, and a tiring-glass wherein to view her fair visage, and send her back content to Westminster! But for us, a warrior for time of need—for us, a grave councillor for strait of peril—for us, a chief who, in his chain-mail, and mounted on a gallant war-horse, can lead us on to victory! No mincing woman-sovereigns for Normandy! 'Tis contrary to feudal usage—'tis contrary to decent usage—'tis contrary to sense and judgment! If King Henry must choose a successor, be it his young nephew, Stephen of Blois, whom he might have wedded with this fair-faced widow, ere the count took to himself a bride of his own selection. Stephen is a brave and stalwart man. To Stephen will we gladly do service for our land. But away with this woman-prince, whose sceptre is a gittern, and whose senate a council of coifs and stomachers!"

The gauntlet thus thrown down, all Normandy stood forward to resist the summons of the King. Instead of the triumphs predicted to her, the young Empress found herself condemned as the illegitimate offspring of a revolted nun—as a pretender and usurper. Ecclesiastics, from the pulpit, denounced the daughter of "Sister Edith, of Wilton Abbey, falsely styled Matilda, Queen of England."

"Behold!" said they, "the hand of Providence is on the generation of the blasphemer of the altar. With the Prince, her son, perished the pride and prime of the noble houses of Normandy; and, for the Princess, her daughter, a yet more fearful sentence shall be accomplished! The man who weds with Maud shall be stricken with the sword; and with foul disease the children borne unto them. Therefore, oh, therefore be the race accursed in Normandy! Let them not sit in the seat of our rulers. Let them not defile the steps of our altars. Home with them to the land of the Saxon and the idolater!"

These hostilities were clearly stirred up by the party which, from the catastrophe of Prince William's grievous end, had been rallying round the standard of the Earl of Blois. But they were not the less alarming to Henry and his daughter. The King, who, from the agonizing hour which bereaved him of three of his offspring, had been overwhelmed with melancholy, appeared to hearken with peculiar despondence to the denunciations of the church. Though aware of the falsehood of the allegation against his wife, (who, though bred in a convent, had, from personal repugnance, refused to pronounce the vows of the order,) the unhappy King doubted not that his cruelty to his captive brother had called down upon his head the ire of Providence. The premature death of his sons and son-in-law, seemed to inspire terror of his alliance; for no suitors presented themselves for the hand of his daughter, whose beauty and heirship to the throne of England placed her above all other princesses of Christendom.

"I shall not live to fold a grandchild in my arms," was the ever-recurring cry of King Henry. "My race is doomed! Beaucherk will bequeath no inheritors to the loyalty of Britain."

His anxieties were shortly increased by the troubles of a neighbouring state. Fulk, Count of Anjou, (surnamed, from his custom of bearing a branch of broom or genest upon his helm in guise of plume, "Plante Genest," a name afterwards Anglicised into Plantagenet,) was pursuing, in conformance with the spirit of the times, his fanatic adventures in the East, leaving his country to be harassed by cruelties and exactions; and Henry, who had volunteered his protection to young Geoffrey, the heir of Anjou, could not refuse his aid in reducing to submission the turbulent Angerine nobles, who took upon themselves the control of his inheritance.

Abandoning, therefore, his personal dissensions with his Norman subjects, the King placed himself at the head of a numerous army, and marched towards Angers—leaving the young Empress and her train, with a sufficient escort of men-at-arms, intrenched in the strong Castle of Arques, in Talon, one of the most important citadels of Normandy.

The impatience of the fair Maud, at this sudden change of prospects, was scarcely to be controlled. Already she had imbibed the strongest prejudices against Normandy and the Normans, by whom her rights were so insolently impugned; and to devote to the dreariness of a gloomy fortress in a sequestered valley those golden hours of youth which she had trusted to devote to the gorgeous halls of Westminster or Winchester, and the trophied galleries of Windsor, was a cruel disappointment. Of all her female train, there was only one, the Lady Ada de Tancarville, whose society was supportable to the spoiled heiress of the English throne; and even against her the King, her father, had breathed a word of warning at parting.

"Confide not too tenderly to any of Norman birth," said the King, on taking his way from the stern embattlements of Arques. "These people love you not, my dear Maud, and will be apt to spread snares for thy undoing."

Nevertheless, when the young Empress observed with what zeal her fair companion laboured, even in that secluded spot, to minister to her enjoyments, it would have been black ingratitude to persist in the mistrust suggested by the King. The Lady Ada despatched messengers to her father's castle, at Tancarville, to procure, for the recreation of her lady, the choice falcons in which the old baron took delight; managed to train for her entertainment a company formed of the acolytes of the church of St Remy of Dieppe, by whom mysteries were performed in the grand hall of the donjon; and, while the Empress, surrounded by her maidens and women, whiled out the summer day upon the battlements of the watch-tower, commanding the beautiful valley of Arques, with its noble forest, rich pastures, and winding stream, procured the favour of Sire Guy de Harcourt, the governor, to exercise his billmen and bowmen in mimic warfare in the vale below—a fitting sport and pastime for the leisure of a queen.

For these considerate attentions, the lovely Maud was duly grateful; and the influence of Lady Ada soon exceeded that of any former favourite. The Empress loved to sit alone with her noble attendant beneath the canopy erected upon the platform of the donjon, to shelter her from the summer heats; engaged in deep discussion of the mysteries of religion, politics, love, or fashion. The jealous rivals of the Lady Ada adduced the two latter topics as exclusively occupying the attention of the noble ladies; the faithful partisans of Maud, the former. But it was in presence of her whole train the Count de Tancarville's daughter acquainted the Empress that a minstrel, of singular proficiency, had been, for some days, exercising his art in the guard-room, for the diversion of the soldiery. "And, good sooth, it were a shame and scandal to have it whispered," persisted the wily lady, "that there came a minstrel to the gates of Arques; and that there were none to shew favour towards the gai science but a bluff captain and his unlettered men-at-arms."

On this hint, the ladies of the young Empress surrounded her with entreaties, that the minstrel might be admitted to her royal presence that very afternoon; when Maud, after some show of reluctance, either real or feigned, acceded to their prayer. Her Majesty's almoner, Brother Anselmus de Gisors, was required to be in attendance, to afford countenance to this introduction of a stranger into the royal sanctuary; and it was noticed, that the learned priest and the Norman lady in waiting exchanged significant glances when, on the entrance of the minstrel, the Empress half started from her seat, and, after manifest and uncontrollable changes of countenance, let fall her veil over her face as she gave ear to the strains with which her young countryman was emboldened to amuse her royal leisure.

For, though the Norman ladies by whom, as a token of conciliation, King Henry had seen fit to surround the Empress, noted only in the jongleur a youth too manly and stalwart for his graceful calling—one who had far better become the lists of chivalry than the clerical weeds in which he was habited—the daughter of King Henry beheld in the intruder the well remembered knight who, in the tilting yard at Windsor, had so gallantly worn her colours, Sir Kenric of Waltheam, the flower of the Saxon chivalry!

PART II.

From that eventful hour all was changed in the Castle of Arques. Instead of the listlessness wherewith the Princess had heretofore sat amid her maidens, watching, with weary eyes, the progress of their embroidery, or listening with uneasy ears to the tedious homilies of Father Galfridus, the chaplain, she now began to betray unwonted care in the choosing of her tires and the readiness of her palfrey for morning exercise. Her monotonous walk upon the battlements no longer sufficed her; the bracing air of the cliffs by Candecôte being necessary for the maintenance of her health, or the cool shade of the wood by St Nicolas d'Alihermont for her refreshment.

No one found ought to urge against this sudden accession of activity. There was peace in the country. Brawlers were not likely to intrude upon her Majesty's pleasures; and those of the little court, who had been overpowered by the contagion of royal ennui, were right glad to adopt, without too curious investigation, a happier frame of spirit. Cheerfulness shone upon the brow of the young Empress, health dawned in brighter colours upon her cheek, and the knights and dames of her train rejoiced at being authorized to resume their health and happiness.

Lady Ada de Tancarville had little difficulty in obtaining from her kinsman, Sire Gay, the governor, that the companies of spearmen and bowmen, appointed for the especial escort of the Empress in these equestrian expeditions, should consist of picked men, the vassals of the Count de Tancarville, whose soldiers were of high account in the King's army for discipline and training; and thus encompassed, Maud was at liberty to go and come as she listed; sometimes to take her pleasure in the noble pastime of hawking—sometimes to dream away refreshing hours on the seashore beneath the cliffs by Pourville—sometimes to penetrate towards the ancient Gaulic intrenchment or city of refuge, which bore the name of Caesar's Camp, purporting to have been an Oppidum of the epoch of the Roman Invasion.

It was summer—gorgeous, glowing, glorious summer. The woods with their trembling foliage, the sea with its gentle tides, seemed to confess the genial influence of the season; the meads and vales were enamelled with a thousand wild flowers; the shelving downs above embalmed the air with their aromatic herbage; even the stern battlements of the fortress of Arques were rendered fragrant by the yellow blossoms of the wall-flower bursting into bloom from every rift. The birds poured forth their joyous clamour from the boughs—the grasshopper was merry in the green field—the dragon-fly heaved in brilliant elasticity over the reeds of the Bethesda and the Saône; and the roughest peasant-boy, labouring in the fields, felt that, in the midst of summer gladness, his heart must expand into song, or burst!

If such the general influence of the season, was it likely that a young and lovely Princess, abandoned to the impulses of nature, should listen unmoved to the prayers and protestations of one who, with the connivance of persons engaged for her counsel and protection, was ever by her side? When Sir Kenric of Waltheam was introduced, by the cunning stratagem of the Count de Tancarville's daughter, into the Castle of Arques, the sole sentiment evinced by Maud was surprise. She had almost ceased to think of the hero of her transient love dream; and, perhaps, would have never more recalled him to mind, but for the art with which the Lady Ada, on learning, in a moment of listless gossip, that the feelings of her royal lady had been for a moment disquieted, brought back to her presence the dangerous English subject, who was likely to distract the Empress's wishes from a suitable alliance. But leisure, listlessness, and the vacuity of mind generated by a right royal education, soon afforded space for the growth of a master passion; and the accomplished knight, who was scarcely less than the Empress the dupe and victim of the Lady Ada, unconsciously served the purposes of a Norman faction.

The devotion of Sir Kenric towards King Henry's daughter, or rather towards the grand-niece of King Edgar, was a sentiment of mingled loyalty and love. From the moment of beholding her in her Dalmatic robe of satin, studded with golden stars, presiding over the lists at Windsor Castle, the deference he had affected as a stepping-stone to courtly favour, became an overwhelming attachment. The counsellors of the King evinced their clear-sightedness in pointing him out to Henry as a youth likely to attempt some rash enterprise to attract the notice of the Empress, and promote the interest of the English cause; and so rapid and so active had been the precautions taken to intercept all further intercourse between the Empress and her young admirer, that the kinsmen and friends of the Earl Waltham became alarmed for Sir Kenric's safety; and, ere that knight had time for resistance, he was conducted by his father's authority on board a vessel lying in the Thames and about to sail for the Mediterranean; and, within three days of the tournament at Windsor, while the emissaries of the court were vainly attempting to obtain a clue to his retreat, had already, in a stout merchantman, passed the channel of St George.

Sir Kenric meanwhile was irritated beyond all patience by this undue exercise of paternal authority. On landing in Sicily, instead of pursuing his way to Palestine, according to the letter of Earl Waltham's instructions, he lost no time in retracing his steps towards the Northern Litteral. The partiality of Henry's daughter, pointed out to him by the Earl, his father, as a source of peril and loathing, was to him a sacred appeal. If Matilda's heart really inclined towards him—Matilda the Empress, whose every word and look was indelibly engraved in his soul—it was his duty to hasten back to her feet, and devote himself eternally to her will—even if exposed to the utmost enmity of the Norman Court—even in the fatal presence of the King. With this view, defying the surveillance of the trusty squires to whom he had been given in guidance by his father, Sir Kenric fled from Sicily, and sailed for the coast of France.

The pilgrim, after a brief sojourn at Avignon, where the Pope, driven from his Italian States, was then residing, pursued his way towards Thoulouse, for the purpose of gaining the north, through Aquitaine and Anjou. In that city of poesy and romance, his strains in honour of the Empress Maud soon attracted such universal admiration, that the Lady Ada, when exercising her ingenuity for the discovery of the object of the Empress's dormant affection, had little difficulty in detecting the enamoured Sir Kenric in the English troubadour, who had won the golden opinions of Languedoc and Aquitaine, by his virelays and feats of arms.

To attract him into Normandy by a pretended message from the descendant of his Saxon princess, was a matter that needed only boldness for the attempt. Within a few weeks of the Empress's confidential disclosure to Lady Ada, that, of all men living, Sir Kenric Gecoril had alone excited emotion in her heart, he was standing in presence of his future Sovereign. Ere a more familiar meeting could be brought to pass, it was essential for the Lady Ada so far to deceive him, as to admit that the summons was despatched by herself without the participation of her royal mistress. But she protested that she had acted only from zeal to restore health and happiness to her illustrious friend, by recalling to her presence the object of her dearest affections. So artfully was the game of deceit carried on around the young couple, that it needed not long to insure the smiles and indulgence of the royal recluse of Arques, for the knight who had defied time and place, peril and persecution, for her sake. Encouraged by evil counsel, Sir Kenric scrupled not to declare to the daughter of kings his passionate attachment; while, encouraged by evil counsel, the daughter of kings did not hesitate to avow in return that she was deeply sensible to his devotion.

Under such auspices, the growth of love is of rapid progress. The Lady Ada, aware that the cautious King had left especial instructions with the Sire d'Harcourt regarding Earl Waltham's son, had warned him to present himself at the castle as a Provençal minstrel; under which quality he obtained unmolested access to the Empress. Certain that her father would not for many months return to Normandy, she had no fear that the adventurous knight should be detected by the Normans composing her little court; and, blessing her fate that the age and infirmities of the Lady Godfreda d'Ypres had detained her in England, Matilda acceded to Lady Ada's recommendation, that the Provençal jongleur, who found such small encouragement among the unlettered bores of Normandy, should be enlisted in her service so long as she remained immured in the iron fortress of Arques. When, however, for the first time, the Empress beheld Earl Waltham's son habited in her household livery, like some poor hireling minstrel, she felt convinced that the dignity of his department must betray him to the household, or at least to the practised eye of d'Harcourt, as a disguised noble. She saw how gracefully "William the troubadour" submitted to the duties of his calling; how gaily he recited ballads for the amusement of the chambermaids; how sweetly warbled complaintes for the delight of the ladies in waiting; and, above all, with what sober and scholar-like discretion he argued with Brother Anselmus or Father Galfridus. All these sacrifices were, she knew, made for her sake; and it was difficult to withhold a smile as the reward of so much love! Already the songs of the minstrel-knight had made her name renowned at the courts of Raymond of Thoulouse, and Roger of Sicily. The rumour of his devotion to the daughter of Henry of England had drawn the attention of the Tanquerville party towards his retreat; and the vanity of her sex enlisted itself with the weakness of her heart, to further the pretensions of the enterprising and interesting stranger.

When now she lingered on the battlements in the stillness of the summer twilight, William the jongleur, as well as the Lady Ada and her favourite wolf-dog, were suffered to be in attendance ; and it was noticed by the warders and sentinels posted on the adjacent turrets, that, so far from witching with minstrelsy the ear of his liege lady during these interviews, the discourse of the Provençal with his noble companions was breathed in as low a voice as when Brother Anselmus was admitted to the honour of pouring ghostly counsel into the ear of his royal charge. It was only after the banquet, or when seated amid her maidens in the hall, that the troubadour was required to make proof of his skill. At all other times, the Empress seemed to take greater delight in listening to his recital of the wonders of foreign lands ; the sweetness of southern countries, with their gentle airs and sunny fruitage ; and the pastimes of courts less rude and warrior-like than the kingly circles of Normandy and England. It may be inferred, at least, that such were the themes with which the stranger recreated the ears of the Queen. For so closely was William stationed behind her chair of state, or kneeling on the rushes beside her, that it was impossible for the most curious ear to obtain a snatch of their discourse ; and it was but from the varying expression of the lady's countenance—now eager with curiosity, now softened by emotion, now harsh with displeasure and disdain—that the spectators obtained any index to the subjects on which the eloquence of William was untiringly exercised. The latter sentiment, however, rarely disfigured the lovely countenance of Maud. The projects of the Normans for the Empress's enthrallment in a derogatory marriage, were thriving almost beyond their expectations.

Every day, when the palfrey of the Princess, with its footcloth and housings of crimson and gold, crossed the drawbridge on her way to the forest, amid the numerous train by which she was escorted, William, though never prominently placed, was ever to be found, ready, in case of emergency, to place his hand upon the rein, or guide the impatient steed of the Empress through the fords by St Aubin, or up the steepes towards Janval. The minstrel, as by especial privilege, and to lighten the burthen of the way with ditties and romances, was accustomed to pace at the stirrup of the Empress or the Lady Ada, from the moment they were beyond espial from the castle ; and when fairly launched into the country, the Princess would bid her guard of bowmen retire to a distance, to insure her from approach ; and while her ladies and pages dispersed themselves in the forest, would proceed onwards with her two favourite companions, to enjoy, secure from molestation, those higher flights of poetry and romance which are never imbibed so sweetly as under the noble canopy of Heaven, while the glorious influence of the works of nature outspread around attune the soul to lofty contemplation.

One of the favourite haunts of the Empress, was a fair and wooded acclivity situated between Arques and the sea-shore, wholly secure from the frequenting of the neighbouring peasants. For lo ! amid its shady recesses stood the leproserie or leper-house of Janval !

At that period there were many lepers in the land. The constant transit of pilgrims and warriors between Palestine and Christendom, was fatally apt to transport the scourge of the Assyrian provinces to the fair field of Europe. Many a city of the south had been again and again desolated by the plague ; and many a noble family of the north, afflicted by the spectacle of one of its young and promising members, " a leper as white as snow ! " Divers leper-houses or infirmaries were accordingly set apart for the cure of this hideous distemper ; usually served by brothers of the severe religious orders, and avoided by the surrounding population as spots consecrated to misfortune, and marked out by the awful finger of divine wrath.

Among these was the leper-house, consecrated at Janval to St Mary Magdalen in the year of grace 1083, by Duke Robert of Normandy, whom reigning in his Castle of Arques over the province of Talon ; and with such repugnance were its precincts regarded by his subjects, that, saving in the intercourse needful to obtain alms and medicaments for the sick, the brothers ministering to the afflicted inmates of the leper-houses presumed not so much as to accost a fellow-creature.

It was towards this fatal spot, nevertheless, that the young Empress, to secure to herself, unmolested, the society of him who alone excited interest in her listless bosom, was fond of directing her wanderings. At the distance of one hundred yards round the leproserie, grew an ancient belt or grove of beech-trees ; beyond which, the unhappy victims were never suffered to penetrate. They were allowed, indeed, to emerge from the walls only on two days of the week, during the hour succeeding the ringing of the Angelus ; and, at other times, the beech-grove and its environs were wholly deserted—a lonely and unfrequented place, where the chaffinches and linnetts perched fearless on the lowest boughs, in blessed security from the cruelty of the human race.

Such was the ill-omened trysting-place selected by the Empress and her true knight, for the interchange of their vows of affection. In that fated grove, not a sound reached their ears—not a step startled their solitude—as they sat together on some mossy mound, enshrouded by the drooping branches of the glossy-stemmed beech-trees ; gazing, through their leafy screen, upon the distant ocean, or on the tranquil valley below, with its grazing herds and glassy waters. There needed no prohibition to secure them from the intrusion of even the most privileged straggler of the royal train. Not a breathing soul at Arques, saving the twin who, at all oaks, desired to emancipate themselves from observation, would have approached the accursed limits of the leproserie of Janval.

"We are safe here!" was the earnest ejaculation of the Empress, whenever they approached the silent confines of the lazaret, whose lofty walls of flint and deeply-embanked moat assumed, on days of strict clôture, the aspect of a prison.

"We are safe here!" echoed the Knight, gently leading her towards the closest shelter of the grove, and spreading his cloak upon the ground, that they might sit fast by each other's side, for the interchange of those vows of tenderness which, though now of daily occurrence, were unwearied to their infatuated hearts.

"We are safe here, my beloved, my queen, my idol! And here, in presence of that Almighty Being in whose sight all men are equal, hear me renew my vows to love and honour thee, in trouble, in sickness, in old age, as in this golden hour of beauty and prosperity! Hear me swear to obey thee as my liege and Empress—to love thee as my bride and mistress! Though, during thy royal father's lifetime, it were both vain and unbecoming to harass him with prayers for sanction to an union so adverse to his ambitious views, the infirmities of the King forbid much prolongation of our suspense. There is no treason in recalling to mind, that, in his address spoken last winter to the Barons of England, Henry avouched that his anxiety for the regulation of the succession arose from the certitude, that, before many months, he must be summoned to his dread account. When that day, beloved Matilda, shall arrive, the anointed Queen of England will have nothing further to fear from the intrigues of fastidious nobles! Once on the throne, thou wilt be free to avow the preference of thy gentle heart; and I, to devote my strength of arm to thy defence. There shall be no thorn in thy path—no bitter in thy cup. The heaviest cloud that overshadoweth thy gentle head, shall be no darker than yonder filmy vapour of silvery threads floating betwixt thee and the clear azure of the summer skies."

Such words and protestations, uttered by the mellow, manly voice of the seeming minstrel, and enforced by the impassioned glances of the dark eyes fixed upon her face, and the tender grasp of the hands enclasping her own, were as music in the ears of Matilda. She forgot the stern counsels of the King, and the severe lessons of divines and statesmen, as she listened to the vows of Earl Waltheam's son. The kingdom of England, the duchy of Normandy, receded from her view. She saw only the fair young knight, to whom every hair of her head was dear as his life's blood; she heard only the rapturous vows which declared her peerless among women—more than Queen—more than Empress—even the Sovereign of his soul.

Sometimes, carried away by consciousness of his deep affection, the lovely Maud would pass her ivory hand caressingly through the clusters of chestnut hair which mantled round the noble brow of her beloved. Sometimes, bewildered in dreams of future happiness, she painted the joys of that happy time when, supreme in her palace of Westminster or Castle of Windsor, she should be at liberty to enthronise him by her side, renouncing her authority as Queen, to obtain the holier distinctions of a dutiful and loving wife.

"There may be those who will blame thine elevation, my Kenric," whispered the Princess, in these, her softer moods—"people who know not thy valour, thy nobleness, thy brilliant accomplishments, thy true and trusty heart! But, even to these murmuring subjects, over-jealous for the honour of their Sovereign, we may reply, that, among the Saxon Tierns, none rank higher than Leofric, Earl Waltheam, the descendant of our Mercian Kings. Whereas, the Norse adventurers who, after subduing Normandy, were allowed, by the fortune of war, to conquer England!"

"Even when advocating my cause, sweet heart," interrupted Sir Kenric, "disparage not thine own illustrious condition; nor, to efface the disproportion betwixt us, forget that thou art widow of a Cæsar of Germany—daughter to a King of England! It is my glory to be indebted to thy love alone for raising me to equality with thyself. Nay, I would be chosen as the wandering minstrel, rather than as son to a Saxon Thane, or descended from a chief of the Heptarchy. Were I a worm at thy feet, Matilda, thy choice and attachment would honour me above the honour of princes!—rather be the object of thy gentle love than heir to Anjou and Aquitaine! I swear to thee, dearest, I shall be content to have lived and died, so it be written on my tomb, 'Here lies the man beloved by Maud of England!'"

The more lowly the views of Sir Kenric, the more generous, of course, became the projects of the Empress.

"Nay, but thou shalt be King," was her reiterated protest. "Never will I sit in King Edward's chair at Westminster, or submit my brow to the consecrated oil, unless thou sharest my throne, while the proud Barons tender us their homage of allegiance! Gladly will the English throng to the feet of a prince of their tribe and lineage; and, for my Norman subjects, let them dare but wag a finger against the partner of my selection, and away with them to their necessitous province! Neither largesse nor benefaction for such as presume to withhold their submission from the lord of my bosom's choice!"

"It were, in sooth, a triumph," cried the Knight, "to humble the pride of these insolent Normans, by whom thy right and title have been impugned; and to aid in redressing the wrongs of the English, on whom, during the last three reigns, the conquerors have been permitted to trample! I would fain behold the people of England—the people by whose thews and sinews the land hath been cultured into fertility—restored to the enjoyment of their ancient rights, and relieved from the heavy oppression of laws framed in a tongue unknown to them, and enforced by tyrants, who leave them plunged in the night of ignorance, that they may remain patient and unresisting. I would behold my fellow-subjects razze, Matilda, that they may have cause to love and honour their Queen! Thy mother's and my father's people must not be condemned, as was the threat of thy ill-fated brother, to live chained like oxen to the plough, to provide the bread of tyrants. Give them to enjoy an equal distribution of the law of the land—an equal share of its profits; and behold, enfranchised thousands shall bless thee, and labour with their heart's blood, that the name of Britain may remain honoured among the nations!"

The young Empress smiled at Sir Kenric's enthusiasm; but she assented while she smiled; and William the minstrel cherished the dear delusion, that his influence over the mind of the Queen would convey peace and prosperity to the island kingdom!

Meanwhile, the days drew on. The corn ripened in the fields, and the fruit of the vine hung heavier on the wall. But, though autumn was approaching, the messengers dispatched from Angers by King Henry to the Castle of Arques, conveyed no prospect of his return. The revolt of the Angerine Barons was of a graver nature than he had anticipated; and bidding, in his letters, his daughter be of good cheer, for that all would eventually be well, his Majesty confessed a fear that, till the feast of the Epiphany, or, at soonest, Christmas tide, it would be unsafe for the Empress and her train to meet him at Caen or Rouen.

With an exulting voice did Matilda deliver this intelligence to Sir Kenric. "How fair thou art, dearest, when gladsome thoughts smile out of thy blue eyes upon my face!" he exclaimed, folding her fair hands in his own, and drawing her closer towards him beneath an overspreading beech, under which they were sheltering from the rays of the setting sun. "Be ever thus joyous, my Matilda, thus loving, thus pure, thus true! all worldly thoughts gliding from thy mind like rain-drops from the rose-leaf, whose brightness they are forbidden to sully! Superior to the pitiful aspirations of thy sex, thy desires are not for the pomps of courts, the glittering of jewels, or clashing of cymbals. This calm retreat is thy happier empire; this beechen shade thy appropriate canopy. For these, shared with thy chosen love, thou dost joyfully abjure the tapestried chamber and the robe of estate."

"Is not my throne established on that most glorious of foundations, a devoted human heart?" whispered the young Empress, laying her hand upon the manly arm whose every pulse throbbed responsive to her touch. "I give thee up, God wot, my poor kingdom of England. But thou, my Kenric, dost surrender more—even the governance of thy noble soul. A man's mind constitutes a more glorious empire, than one of mere royal prerogative; and on thine, beloved, do I enthrone myself! In thee I rule and govern! I am an empress, thine empress, whenever, as now, I behold tears gather in thy glistening eyes, while listening to my avowals of affection!"

"What wouldst thou deserve, what punishment—what pain," faltered the knight, after a pause of deep emotion, "wert thou hereafter tempted to betray the trust my adoration reposes in thy love!"

"Betray thee?" reiterated Maud, with an incredulous smile. "For whom or what should I betray thee?"

"Not from the wantonness of woman's sickle will!" cried Sir Kenric—"for to that thou art superior; but the intimidation or persuasion of others; thy father's authority and reprobation, might, at some moment or other, move thee to renounce an attachment against which, I admit, reason and prudence have much to urge."

"Never!" cried the Empress, with indignation. "I say to thee again and again, never!"

"Be not too strong in denial!" persisted the young knight, kissing the hem of her embroidered robe. "Thou knowest not how potent the counsel of learned divines—the importunities of loving friends!"

"Friends have I none, save only thee!" cried the Princess. "Nay, hearken and I will pledge myself by an oath more fearful than ever yet was spoken by woman's tongue."

"I ask no oath, I wish for none!" cried the noble Saxon, "lest I bring guiltiness upon thy soul. Thy word, sweet heart, sufficeth!"

"It sufficeth not!" persisted Maud, "or thou wouldst not bend upon me these searching and anxious looks. I swear to thee, therefore, as my plighted love, that, if ever I suffer either prayer or authority to prevail over my affection so as to yield my heart or hand to another, the God of vengeance shall deal with me even as with the wretches in yonder spital. Let me become unclean and loathsome in the sight of men—let me die the victim of sore and searching leprosy!"

As she uttered these terrible words, Matilda raised to heaven the attestation of her clear blue eyes and ivory hands; and, for some moments, Sir Kenric abstained from reply.

"Does not my vow suffice?" faltered Matilda at length, mortified by his ungrateful silence.

"I could have framed a stronger!" was the mild answer of her lover.

"A stronger?" cried Matilda, her cheeks flushed with vexation.

"There is a moral pang exceeding all we nerve ourselves to bear in the flesh!" resumed Sir Kenric. "Had I desired to bind myself in irretrievable bonds, I should have entailed the penalty on those I love. Then were the compact immutable."

"I pray the Almighty, then," exclaimed Maud—determined to fulfil the whole measure of his exactions, and again pointing towards the walls of the lazaret, "that, should I fall in my vows of fidelity towards thee, the being most dear to me on earth, may live and die the suffering inmate of yonder mansion of misery!"

Touched to the soul by the unreserved generosity of a vow expressly calculated to appease the jealousies of a heart in fear of rivalry, Sir Kenric now snatched to his bosom the beautiful woman in whom at that moment he beheld far more than queen or empress; while the light of joy, gleaming in the eyes of Matilda, avouched that she was experiencing the delight consequent upon a generous action. Habituated to the pageants and trappings of royal life, she was conscious of their incompetency to promote one hour of human enjoyment. Under the influence of a pure and disinterested affection, her heart was becoming attuned to higher purposes.

Scarcely was she released from the dear embrace rewarding her self-sacrifice, when the Lady Ada, who had studiously absented herself, made her appearance, to point out to the lovers that the sun was already below the horizon. In the happiest frame of mind, accordingly, they descended hand in hand the shrubby hill of Janval, without even a parting glance at the gloomy retreat—sole witness, save the accusing angels of God, of the solemn engagement entered into by Matilda of England.

On the return of the royal train to the Castle of Arques, all was in confusion! Even after a second summons of the squire of the body in attendance upon the Empress, the warder neglected to let fall the drawbridge; so absorbed was he in examination of a body of armed men advancing from the farthest extremity of the valley towards the fortress. As they drew nearer, their purpose was seen to be amicable; their colours being those of England and Normandy intermingled. But while the fears of the watchman subsided, those of the Empress were awakening. This cohort, perhaps, brought tidings of her father; perhaps announced the arrival of the King!

She had only time to attain her bower chamber and assume her usual dignity of demeanour, when the horn was blown, and an audience demanded of her in the name of King Henry, by no less a personage than Turgis, Bishop of Avranches, charged with an especial mandate from her father; not merely a letter of paternal counsel, acquainting her with the progress of his arms, but a sternly-worded command to get in readiness to attend the lord Bishop to his presence, seeing that he had matters for her private ear which admitted of no delay. A second ordinance invested the prelate with full powers of authority in the Castle of Arques, as guardian of the person of the heiress-apparent of England, who was to be governed by his judgment, till she found herself in presence of her father.

"I crave your Majesty's courtesy to observe," said the Bishop, after delivering his credentials, "that so urgent is the business necessitating an interview between you and my gracious master, that I have already presumed to order your litter and an armed escort to be in attendance at daybreak; (we must needs halt for the night at the Abbey of Montvilliers;) till when, I am under the painful necessity of interdicting your Majesty's egress from this chamber."

"A prisoner?" cried Maud, with indignation. "What means, my good Lord, I beseech you, this sudden outbreak of authority on the part of the King? Does his Majesty forget that, albeit his daughter and ward, I am also an estated dowager, anointed of the Holy Roman Empire? I pray you let there be no more of this, lest I be compelled to disparage in your sacred person the wisdom of my father."

"In this same Duchy of Normandy, madam, whereof your title as successor to the throne is still unadmitted, the sign-manual of Henry I. of England conveys paramount authority," replied the haughty churchman. "I would fain avoid all contention or displeasure with so fair a lady; and, therefore, entreat her to be admonished in time, that to submit to a lesser evil, will be to avoid the penalty of a greater. Till daybreak, to-morrow, meanwhile, I humbly withdraw from your Majesty's presence."

Overwhelmed by this startling defiance, Matilda, after his departure, remained silent and motionless in her chair of state. No one came to her assistance. All communication with her ladies was forbidden—guards were posted on the staircase leading to the royal apartment; and at every issue thereof, she was under arrest, she was a captive! Malicious tongues had borne to her father tidings of her recent proceedings; and the measure of Henry's vengeance was about to fall upon her head!

The night drew on. At her usual hour for retiring, instead of her train of ladies, there appeared in attendance only two aged nuns, sisters of St Catherine of Arques, who were often in waiting at the Castle in cases of sickness or emergency; and from their brief replies to her agitated interrogations, it was clear that they were acting under authority.

"Retire to rest, gracious madam—be advised, and retire to rest," whispered the younger of the sisters, as she stooped to remove the embroidered pantoufles of the Empress. "You have trials in store that may task the exercise of all your strength and fortitude."

At this insinuation, which she doubted not regarded the partner of her fault, Matilda rushed to the door of her apartment, and, with loud outcries, demanded an interview with Sire Guy d'Harcourt, or the Bishop of Avranches. But the sole reply vouchsafed consisted in the crossing of spears and partisans at the entrance, to remind the princess that she was a prisoner. After exhausting herself in vain exclamations, the royal captive soon betrayed the weakness of a mind easily elated in prosperity, easily depressed by adversity. One moment, she indulged in invectives and menaces; the next, in devout appeals to the interposition of the saints. There was no real dignity of mind in the haughty daughter of Queen Maud; no confidence in the steadiness of her own purposes, or in the strength of her father's affection. She was willing to stoop to any submission, to secure enlargement for herself and immunity for her lover. The mere crime of having attached herself to a Saxon of noble birth and royal descent, seemed to have so lowered her in her own esteem, as to justify the anticipation of cruel rigour on the part of King Henry.

Apprehensive of the extremities to which the young princess might be driven in her despair, the two venerable sisters watched all night beside her couch; and at day-dawn, the door of her apartment being thrown open, the prelate again appeared to lead forth his illustrious charge. Resistance was in vain. Matilda paused only to bestow a largess on the poor nuns who stood weeping at her plight, and to entreat their prayers in her behalf; then, letting fall her veil, to conceal the tears she was unable to repress, she passed through a closely serried file of armed men unto her litter. The portcullis rose, the drawbridge fell, and the heiress of the English throne was borne, under a numerous escort, from the hoary walls of the fortress, whose towers frowned sternly over the captivity, or perhaps over the mangled remains of the truest knight in Christendom, Sir Kenric de Ceoril!

PART III.

Thrice did the cortège, escorting Henry's daughter, pause for a night's rest, ere Matilda was ushered into the presence of her father. Sleep visited not, however, her eyelids, nor was she prevailed upon to break bread for her refreshment. Terror had taken possession of her soul; not only for her friend and lover, but for herself. It was impossible to guess to what barbarous extremities Henry might be instigated, on discovering that the daughter, in whom he prided himself, and whom he had delighted to raise to the imperial and royal estate, had flung herself into the arms of a minion, of a race abhorrent to his Norman pride, with the sanction of traitors who derided the trust reposed in them by their King!

The nearer the unhappy princess approached towards Rouen, the greater her panic. She expected to confront, unsupported, the rage of her father. She expected to be repelled from his knees—to be dashed upon the flinty pavement—to be immured in solitary shame, and hurled from her high ascendancy as heiress to the English throne. Robert, Earl of Gloucester, the illegitimate, but favourite son of King Henry, would doubtless be preferred in her place. When from afar off she beheld the royal standard of England floating on the towers of St Mary, her heart, instead of warming to the Leopard, sank heavily in her bosom, and, more dead than alive, she was lifted from her litter at the gates of the palace. Scarcely conscious of what was passing, she saw not that the troops, drawn out to do her honour, saluted her, by declining the points of their lances as she passed; nor noticed that it was into the arms of her brother of Gloucester she was received, and borne into the presence of the King. But she did note with amazement, that to the very threshold of the great hall did King Henry advance to receive her; and that, so far from hailing her as a criminal, or an offender, his Majesty, who was clothed in robes of estate, and surrounded by the chief nobles of his court, saluted her as "trusty and well-beloved daughter and Queen," and bade her welcome to Rouen.

"Thou hast made good speed of thy progress, Maud," continued the King, leading the Empress by the hand towards the upper end of the hall, where a dais was erected, "which well accounts for the fatigue wherewith thou art overwhelmed, and the disorder of thine array; and must equally account, lady fair, to thyself, for the absence of thy bridegroom, who scarcely reckoned to meet thee here before to-morrow, for the execution of the marriage contract. But be of good cheer. At morning, Geoffrey of Anjou and his father will be here; at noon, the banquet and betrothing!"

At this cruelly sudden intimation of the fate impending over her, concerning which a harsh grasp from the mailed hand with which the king was guiding her, admonished his daughter that she should betray no surprise, a deep groan escaped the bosom of the harassed woman, and she fell senseless on the pavement of the hall; and while the Earl of Gloucester, motioning away all interference, bore her in his arms towards the wing of the palace containing the women's apartments, his Majesty proceeded to excuse to his Norman Court the indisposition of the fair traveller, as arising from bodily weariness rather than the emotions of so critical a moment.

It afforded, meanwhile, some solace to the wounded heart of the young Empress, that, on recovering her consciousness, she found herself in a secluded chamber alone with her brother Robert.

"Be comforted!" whispered the Earl. "Albeit the King knows all, and is sorely moved against thee, his desire to promote thy union with our young kinsman of Anjou will secure thee against all outward demonstrations of his displeasure. So apprehensive is he lest rumours of the backslidings of Arques should reach the ear of Count Geoffrey and his father ere the contract be fulfilled, that thou must prepare for the immediate solemnization of nuptials purporting to unite with the Crown of England one of the fairest provinces of France."

"Those nuptials shall never be!" cried Matilda, starting from her couch, and flinging back her dishevelled hair. "Is the daughter of King Henry so much a slave to his caprices, as to be denied the privilege of the poorest flax-wench, who will have neither suitor nor husband save of her choice?"

"Calm thyself," replied the Earl of Gloucester, unawed by this outbreak of violence. "The poor flax-wench enjoys but that single privilege;

the Queen of England a thousand. The loyalty and feudal service of the people, and a rich portion in all their havings, are for the Queen. Let the Queen requite them in her turn with fair example of Christian humility, womanly modesty, filial submission, and, above all, a discreet governance of the passions given to be our ordeal upon earth. Shall it be said that Maud of England, with all her fair breeding and enlightenment, had so little command over herself as lavish her favours on a subject—a Saxon adventurer—when the representative of one of the noblest houses in Europe sued for her hand?"

"I will none of Geoffrey Plantagenet!" cried the Queen, with obduracy. "The youth is a likely youth, whom I regard as my father's ward, and my own kinsman. But my heart and soul are pledged to Sir Kenric of Waltheam; and while he lives, none other shall be my husband."

"Let the King hear so much at thy lips, and that Saxon's days were short in the land!" cried the Earl. "Thy minion, my poor sister, lies in the lowest dungeon of the fortress of Arques; and shouldst thou evince so much as reluctance to-morrow, in pledging thy vows to the young Earl of Anjou, a cruel death will be his doom. Harsh counsellors away the ear of King Henry. The Sovereigns of Christendom, never disposed to much tenderness of mercy, have learned in the East black lessons of cruelty and oppression. Torture, mutilation, sufferings without a name in our language, are now hourly inflicted both in France and England, on Saxon and on Norman. Against this English knight, the King is incensed beyond all patience; and I warn thee, sweet heart, as a loving brother and friend, that, if thou wouldst recover thy father's favour, and redeem from torment the partner of thy levity, (styled high-treason by the King,) thou wilt submit to a marriage every way honourable; which, but for thy fond favour to an English boor, would have gratified at once thy pride and predilections."

Often and impressively were these sage counsels reiterated, ere the young Empress could be brought to believe that her father's will was inexorable; and that her sole chance of preserving the life so dear to her, and obtaining pardon for her noble confederates, was unqualified submission. At length, the eloquence of the Earl so wrought upon her mind, that she consented to accept his mediation, tender in her name to Henry a dutiful submission, on condition of obtaining from his hand, previous to the signature of her marriage contract with Geoffrey Plantagenet, a warrant of indemnity for Sire Guy d'Harcourt, the Lady Ada de Tancarville, Father Anselmus of Gisors, and all others suspected of abetting her indiscretions; with a safe conduct out of the British dominions for Sir Kenric of Waltheam, to secure his liberty and honourable entreatment.

Among the admiring crowds who witnessed on the morrow the splendid ceremony of the espousal of Maud, daughter to Henry King of England, with Geoffrey son of Fulk, Earl of Anjou, not one of those whose eyes were fixed upon the pale but lovely countenance of the bride, (whose brows were encircled with an imperial coronet of precious gems, and her robes of cloth of gold, richly hemmed and guarded round with minever,) suspected that the accomplishment of the ceremony had been purchased with such bitterness of grief as during the preceding night racked the bosom of the despairing Matilda. Exhorted by the Bishop of Avranches, in the name of God and his saints, to fulfil her destiny as a Princess, born of the blood royal, and appointed by the will of the Almighty to the high duty of self-sacrifice—admonished by her brother of Gloucester, that resistance to Henry's will would yield up her ill-fated lover to hasty and ignominious death—Matilda's resolution had finally given way. In the presence of Fulk, Earl Anjou, the great vassals of the English crown, and the leading Barons of Normandy, Eu, and Anjou, she gave her hand to the noble youth, with whom her marriage had been so hastily concerted, and, lo! the trumpets announced to the assembled throng that Maud, the Empress, was again wedded to a royal prince! Amid the loudest of their tumults, however, a still small voice seemed breathing into the ear of the bride, that the guilt of perjury was upon her soul!—and though prelates consecrated her with their benedictions, and the King with a hollow embrace, Matilda staggered from the altar, a broken hearted woman—withered in her best affections, and a mark for the indignation of an all-seeing and all-righteous God.

Vain were the caresses of her youthful bridegroom—vain the gratulating acclamations of the people. From that day, the demeanour of the English Princess became harsh and ungracious to all approaching her. From the Normans, she feared treachery—from the Angerines, abhorrence—from the English, contempt. Though reconciled by her submissiveness, never again did the King take her cordially into his arms. Even her brother Robert, by whose instrumentation her marriage with Geoffrey Plantagenet had been brought about, secretly condemned the feebleness of soul which had first pledged her in a degrading engagement, then permitted her to break asunder the sacred tie.

During the first year of their union, the Earl of Anjou and his bride abided together in his princely palace on the Loire; and unwearied were his efforts to dispel the habitual melancholy of one whose gaiety of character had, in former years, constituted her chief attraction. Recalling to mind how cheerful he had beheld her at Windsor Castle, he laboured to create around her the pastimes and pleasures of merry England—bow-matches, tilts, jousts upon the Loire; hawking, hunting, and other sylvan sports. But, alas! nothing availed to dispel the settled melancholy overclouding the countenance of the bride, nor to thaw the icy reserve with which she repelled the advances of her youthful bridegroom. The hope of perpetuating his line, the ostensible motive of King Henry for hurrying the nuptials of his daughter, without having previously obtained the assents of the Barons of England and Normandy, was scarcely likely to be gratified ; since the Countess, affecting to treat as a child a spouse so many years her junior, never suffered him to approach her presence, save when occasions of public festivity exposed them together to the notice of the King. The Earl of Anjou, who, on occasion of so brilliant a marriage, had ceded to his son the government of the County, soon departed for the East, where, after uniting himself in second nuptials with the daughter of Baldwin, King of Jerusalem, he succeeded to his throne. There was none, therefore, save Henry, to take heed of the disunion prevailing between the youthful couple ; and so little was the King of England inclined to confront the inquiries of his daughter, touching the fulfilment of his contract with her concerning Sir Kenric de Ceorill, that he rarely entered her apartments ; and on her removal to her husband's capital, pursued his purpose of reducing to submission certain of his rebellious Barons in Normandy.

Among her Angerine subjects, meanwhile, the unpopularity of Matilda assumed an alarming appearance. Overwhelmed with sadness, haunted by unceasing remembrance of her broken vows, and the fearful penalty entailed upon those who might become dear to her, her care was to avoid all intimacy with the unfortunate youth compelled to become her husband ; and her fixed resolve to avoid becoming the mother of a child predestined to loathsome disease. But this afflicting apprehension was locked within the depths of the soul ; and the Angerine nobles, attributing her reserve to scorn of themselves and their young Count, regarded her with rage and abhorrence.

"This woman, whom the English are proud to style Empress," cried they, "disdains the humble appellation of Countess of Anjou. Her sullen grief is for the husband shrouded in his imperial sepulchre at Spire. Nothing short of an empire will content her ! She despiseth our fair province. She hungereth after the homage of the haughty Barons of England. Let her go ! We will none of such misproud queans in Anjou." These dissatisfactions did but aggravate the breach between Geoffrey and his wife. Already the young Earl, though but in his seventeenth year, evinced tokens of the harsh and obstinate despotism characterising his after life ; and, thwarted in his ambition of becoming father of a race of English Kings, and stung to the quick by the disdainful reserves of Matilda, Geoffrey opposed no interdiction to her proposal, on the year succeeding their marriage, to return to Henry's protection.

"I will go to my father !" faltered the young Countess one day, when composing her spirit in solitude, after being exposed to severe mortification by the rude Barons of Anjou. "At his feet I will implore pity and forgiveness. This hateful marriage may yet be dissolved. When he learns by how perilous a vow my soul is enthralled, he cannot refuse to consign me to the arms of the husband of my choice."

Nevertheless, when the afflicted Maud presented herself in presence of the King, who was then sojourning at Caen, and admitted that she was but in name the wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet, whose roof she had deserted, and from whom she was about to demand a legal divorce, the long-suppressed rage of King Henry broke out.

"Back to thy husband, minion," cried the King. "Though my weak indulgence, and a desire to conceal thy shame, determined me to overlook the offences of the knaves and fools, thy abettors at Arques, know that the arch-traitor is still in my power ! The same dungeon at Arques, which for years chastised the perfidy of Osmont de Chaumont, the traitor of Brenneville, still holds in durance the slave, thy paramour ; and so surely as I find thee not, ere many weeks are over thy head, a penitent and submissive wife, the fellow dies on the gibbet."

Horror-struck by intelligence for which she was unprepared, by knowledge of that astuteness on the part of the King which had formerly induced Blewit, his grand justiciary, to exclaim, "The King praises me—I am lost !" Matilda began to revile her own pusillanimity for not having already enforced the fulfilment of his royal promise, to set at liberty the injured Kenric. Little, however, as she was now inclined to rely upon the word of the King, she saw that her sole chance of saving the object of her affections was by establishing herself under the protection of the Bishop of Avranches, as the unmourning but broken-hearted wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet.

Year after year passed away, and the unfertile marriage of his daughter seemed to deal retribution upon the harsh dealing of Henry. Distracted between anxiety for the fate of one whom she still regarded with unhallowed affection, and the terror of giving birth to a diseased and afflicted being—a shame to the royal houses of Europe—Matilda attempted to propitiate Divine wrath by the liberality of her gifts to the Church—laying the foundation of endowments which still uphold, in Normandy, the memory of her name ; and when, six years after her hated marriage, young Henry (afterwards crowned King of England under the title of Henry II.) was born to the still sorrowing woman, she trusted, as she gazed upon the fair and unblemished face of the infant, that the wrath of the Almighty was appeased, and the fearful vow breathed beside the leper-house of Janval effaced from the eternal archives of Divine vengeance.

The birth of a second son, Geoffrey, destined to succeed to the Earldom of Anjou, in due time succeeded, and at length, three years after that, of Henry, a third infant, William, Earl of Mortaign, came to seal the hollow union of Plantagenet with the still lovely Maud.

But, though the prelates of Anjou, and the Bishops of Evreux and Avranches, had managed to instil into the mind of the royal penitent the her only chance of obtaining remission for past offences was by becoming mother to a race of Princes destined to confirm the pacification of Europe, and to keep up the war against the infidels, her heart remained impiously unweaned from its first affection. Contend as she might against the spells of memory, it was impossible to forget, amid the barbarous insults of her Angerine subjects and disregardful husband, the accomplished knight to whom she had been an object of adoration, and whose heart was as humane, and whose views as liberal and enlightened, as those of Geoffrey Plantagenet were narrow and despotic. In spite of herself, the revolted wife still adored the recollection of him she was never again to see; and little did she suspect that this lawless attachment secured her present exemption from the penalty of her awful vow. "The object dearest to her on earth" was still the English knight, alone entitled to demand from heaven the accomplishment of the sentence! Matilda had, however, other punishments awaiting her.

Henry I. had not long survived the joy of holding a grandson in his arms. On his deathbed, in presence of Hugh Archbishop of Rouen, the Earls of Leicester, Warrene, and others, he confirmed to his daughter Maud, and her offspring, the succession of the throne; and to his son, the Earl of Gloucester, a rich portion of his treasure; without mentioning the Earl of Anjou, who had displeased him by claiming possession of the Duchy of Normandy as part of the dowry of Matilda. The dying and penitent King, however, shewed himself, for the first time, sensible of the claims to which he was subjected as a man and a Christian, by recommending earnestly to his successors the care of the poor, the restoration of all forfeited estates, and the recall from exile, and deliverance from prison, of all offending subjects.

Scarcely, meanwhile, was the body of the deceased monarch removed from the Cathedral of St Mary of Rouen, to the vaults of Reading Abbey, when the trials of his daughter commenced. Many of her Norman and English vassals refused to recognise the legitimacy of her children, born of a marriage to which their consent had never been obtained; and while Matilda was despatched by Geoffrey Plantagenet into Normandy, to secure her rights, Stephen Earl of Blois effected that memorable landing in England which was to add to the list of her Norman kings a grandson of the Conqueror.

It was in vain that Matilda, supported by her half-brothers, Robert Earl of Gloucester and Stephen of Caen, immediately followed, taking up her abode in Arundel Castle, under the protection of her father's widow, Alice of Louvain. Excluded from the throne of her ancestors, forbidden to approach the royal palace of Windsor, so dear to her recollections, the Queen gave way to despair. Though occasionally successful at the head of an army of mercenaries, her sufferings were most severe. At one period she was compelled to fly from Oxford, at midnight, in the depth of winter, with only three attendants, and to cross the Thames at Wallingford over the ice. At another, when besieged by Stephen in the Castle of Devizes, so long the prison of her uncle Robert, she escaped by submitting to be enclosed in a coffin, and carried out of the gates in a funeral procession, as for interment.

For a short period, indeed, her arms were successful; and, recognised by the Husting of London, the daughter of King Henry took up her royal residence in the Conqueror's Tower, on the banks of the Thames, and prepared to enjoy the rights of her inheritance.

The evil genius of Matilda, however, prevailed. The first inquiry of the Queen, on visiting the Palace of Westminster to receive the homage of her barons, was for Earl Waltheam; and, while the demand proved most offensive to her influential Norman adherents, her own heart was racked by the reply that "the earldom was extinct; Kenric, the last of the Ceorcls having perished in foreign climes." Struck to the soul by this intelligence, Matilda gazed with listless and unconscious brow upon the noble vassals presenting themselves to do homage, who quitted the palace indignant at her haughty indifference; while, having obeyed with equal recklessness and unconcern the suggestion of her brother Stephen of Caen, that, at her first interview with the citizens of London, she should make claim to the levy of an exorbitant talliage, and renew the obnoxious tax known by the name of Danegelt—her unpopularity was complete.

Revolt soon broke out. Stephen was recalled to the throne by the repentant people, and Matilda driven with contempt from the kingdom of her fathers. Harassed by the long continuance of civil war, the English were not likely to be tempted to further rebellion; and the despairing Countess of Anjou, trembled at the thought of confronting her ambitious husband, thus cruelly thwarted in his expectations of establishing the future sovereignty of his son. She was aware that young Henry and his brother shared in the aspiring views of their father, as well as in his antipathy to herself; and severe was the trial to find herself a dethroned Queen, a detested wife, a despised mother, and, above all, a self-accusing Christian.

But Matilda knew not as yet the full extent of her calamity. The sword of divine vengeance was still suspended over her head, her sentence had still to be accomplished.

Though Stephen held undisputed sway in England, many towns, cities, and castles of Normandy remained faithful to her cause, or were held in awe by the valour of her husband and son. The county of Eu still held to its allegiance; and the Castle of Argues and city of Rouen were garrisoned with Angerine troops. Severe as was the trial to her feelings, Matilda determined, therefore, to take up her abode in the city which had witnessed her ill-fated nuptials; and while Geoffrey and his elder sons carried on the war, she was permitted to recall to her charge her youngest boy, William Earl of Mortain, the inheritor of her own beauty and the scholarship of Henry Beauclerk.

It was impossible to behold a fairer youth than young Mortain, when, prepared to atone to his beloved mother for the indifference of her elder children, he knelt humbly at her feet in the very hall which had witnessed the signature of her marriage-contract, and raised to hers the soft mild eyes which were as those of some youthful saint. Though destined, like his brothers, to the career of arms, the high courage of William Plantagenet was redeemed from the harshness peculiar to his line, by accomplishments of mind and manners derived from the lessons of his renowned tutor, the Abbot Raoul of Cluny. Though an expert swordsman, the young Earl was a profound scholar; and those who detested the ambitious egotism of Geoffrey and his elder sons, predicted that the glory of the sinking family would be renewed in William. Every day tended to add new graces to his person, new acquirements to his mind; and now, for the first time, Matilda felt that there was joy in being a mother!

The deportment of the young Prince towards her whom he had known only in sorrow and adversity, was tenderness itself. His voice softened, and his looks declined, whenever he accosted his now gentle and humiliated mother, whom he revered as the consoler of the poor, the foundress of colleges and monasteries, the liberal benefactress of hospitals and lazarets. From the church of St Nicaise at Rouen to the leper-house of Janval, not a charitable institution in the country but had cause to venerate her munificence! He knew, too, that, in another year, he must bid her adieu, in order to receive the long coveted honours of knighthood. The King of France had consented to become his sponsor in arms; and William burned to do honour to so illustrious a protector.

It was on the day succeeding the feast of Pentecost, on the year of Matilda's return to Normandy, that, having summoned the Earl of Mortain to her presence, for the delight of bestowing upon him a cast of hawks which she had caused to be fetched from Norway for his use, that the Abbot presented himself before her with excuses, that the Earl, her son, had been suddenly smitten with a sore disease.

"Your Grace may be pleased to remember, that, while instructing me during Holy Week, to put up at the altar of St Mary, an especial mass of intercession for your royal son, the object dearest to you on earth, a company of palmers entered the church on their return to England from Palestine. And, but that I tremble to instigate a surmise so afflicting, I should suggest that infection was in their garments; and that my young and promising pupil—my William—my pride—my glory—was stricken with leprosy!"

The frantic shriek of Matilda warned him to desist from this horrible insinuation. Flying, in spite of the ecclesiastic's entreaties, to the couch of her son, Matilda, regardless of contagion, regardless of danger, took him into her arms—pressed his disfigured form to her bosom—and to her lips the long tresses of his once lustrous hair, now dimmed and matted by the influence of foul disease.

"My own—my child—my idol!" cried the frantic woman. "All that I loved—all that was to reward me for the sorrows of my harassed youth!—must thou, even thou, become the victim of my crime!"

The counsels of the learned of all nations were speedily put in request by the prudence of the Abbot; and tidings of his son's misfortune duly conveyed to the Earl of Anjou. But in vain. The most skilful leeches of Rouen, Paris, and Montpellier, had already pronounced the Earl of Mortain to be an incurable leper!

"Let him retire to a cloister!" was the harsh sentence of Geoffrey Plantagenet, on learning the family calamity. "My eyes must not be offended by the aspect of his uncleanness."

"Let him find a tranquil retreat in the leproserie of Janval," added Matilda, in a subdued voice. "For thither will I follow my unhappy son; and, in the garb of a Sister of Mercy, minister to his sufferings."

Even this poor consolation was, however, denied her. Before the completion of the buildings which Matilda commanded to be added to the lazaret for the reception of the illustrious youth about to become its inmate, the Countess was commanded by Geoffrey Plantagenet to set sail for England, to prepare the way for the landing of her son Henry, to whom he had already resigned the Duchy of Normandy, and who was now invited over, by the factious subjects of his cousin Stephen, to assume possession of the crown of England; and, ere the young and illustrious patient could be installed in his gloomy abode, in a condition in which he was scarcely reconciled to live by the dictates of profound piety, his distracted mother was again forced upon the field of battle, and compelled to forward the ambitious projects of a son by whom she was detested.

It was not till the accidental death of Stephen's only son and heir (an event attributed by the superstitious of the times to his recent sacrilegious pillage of a domain consecrated to the blessed martyr, St Edmund) had opened the way to young Henry's succession to the throne, shortly afterwards confirmed by an act in Council passed by the King, that Matilda was released from her arduous duties, and permitted to retire once more into Normandy, to abide with "the child in whom her soul delighted."

Towards the feast of St John, in the year of grace 1153, the young Duke of Normandy and his bride, the Duchess Aliena, or Eleanor, of Aquitaine, having already sailed for Harfleur, to regain their good city of Rouen, the Countess of Anjou landed at the port of Arques, then a fishing village, dependent on the fortress of that name, but soon to be magnified into the flourishing town of Dieppe. As the vessel in which she had embarked approached the shore of Normandy, the tearful eyes of the agitated mother, fixed yearningly upon the wooded heights of Janval, visible far off at sea above the harbour. She longed to be once more by the side of her youngest born, to gather into her soul the precious accents alone unattainable by the deteriorating progress of disease. She longed to hear herself addressed as "mother," by a voice less harsh than those of her sons, Henry and Geoffrey. She longed to console and to be consoled by the afflicted one, on whose head her perjury had called down so heavy a measure of punishment!

A quarter of a century had elapsed since Maud, a widow and an Empress, had departed from the grim towers of the castle of Arques to perpetrate her fault. Yet even the disastrous vicissitudes of the harassing interim had not effaced from her recollection the features of the well-known landscape. She had seen it in her dreams—she had seen it in her waking reveries. While presiding over councils at Westminster, or engaged at Winchester in penitential prayers beside the grave of her mother, the moated wall of the léproserie at Janval, with its associations of anguish and remorse, had often seemed to hover before her eyes, and cast its shadow upon her soul. As she now approached the spot so encircled round with lofty trees that the stately chapel and refectory recently added to the foundation by the Earl of Mortain were wholly concealed from view, Matilda checked more than once the pace of her mule, that she might compose the agitation of her heart ere she entered the presence of her son. Her attendants, attributing these repeated pauses to the fatigues of her voyage, craved permission to seek for her use the litters of the Lady Avelina de Tracy, wife to the commandant of Arques, to enable her to ascend the hill—so little did they enter into the struggles of a mother's heart, burning to strain in her arms the object of her dearest affections, yet dreading lest some irrepressible start of horror should betray to the sufferer the momentary repugnance excited by the loathsome nature of his disfigurements! The tender and pathetic letters of the young Earl had prepared her to find him fearfully changed by the progress of disease. She dreaded to have lost in the leper all trace of her beloved William. Perhaps even the melancholy lustre of his serene eyes was lost amid the encroachments of his affliction? Perhaps even his voice was changed?—perhaps his very nature?

"Shrink not from the poor leper, O my mother, when you again behold your son!" was the tenor of the last letter he had addressed to her. "Cut off from intercourse with my kind—debarred the sweet affections of my age—condemned to heavy seclusion, lest even the beggar on whom I presume to bestow alms should recoil from his benefactor—alone—alone in the world—let me still find comfort in thee! Though no longer fair and spotless as when nestling in thy bosom, and rewarding thee by my infant smiles for a mother's sufferings, my heart is still unchanged; nor hath the plague-spot eaten into my soul! These—these are pure as ever; still worthy to love thee—still worthy to be beloved! Others may judge them less favourably. But thou, beloved mother—thou, of whose flesh I am the flesh—thou, whose caresses linger in my recollection till my poor disfigured frame thrills with the impression—thou, whose words of endearment are indelibly written in my soul, and recur refreshingly to mine ear in the night season, when my torments are greater than I can bear—thou, sweet mother, be merciful. Let me not see that I am loathsome to thee. Let pity be in thine eyes towards my sufferings, as in those of the tender women who watched beside the Calvary of Christ. Let the leper of Janval forget himself one single blessed hour in the cherished son of Queen Matilda.

"There is one among the holy brothers ministering to the inmates of this refuge of affliction, whose lessons have instructed me to overcome with patience a chastisement purifying the soul to blessedness. But Father Edric, though my hourly companion and ghostly comforter, hath attained so high a mark of sanctity as to loathe as sinful all demonstration of human affection. When ministering to my sufferings, I sometimes attempted to press my feverish lips to his hand in token of gratitude. But he rebukes my vain effusions of sensibility; and it is only my mother's heart I can hope to soften into an avowal that the God of peace hath endowed us with impulses of tenderness, that in our pilgrimage of sorrow we may love each other even as he hath loved us.

"Return, therefore, O mother! to thy long-suffering child, that a happy moment may shine upon the Leper-house of Janval."

Matilda shuddered as she called to mind the piteous terms of this heart-rending epistle. She was approaching the spot. Already, she was beneath the shade of the spreading beech-trees, whose growth had so prospered as to shut out all glimpse of the summer sky. The moated wall, doubled in extent, was before her, screening the chapel dedicated by the Earl of Mortain to St Mary Magdalen, beneath whose altar she trusted that, at some future hour, her ashes would repose beside those of her son; and, lo! above the square gateway, according to the custom of the times, was carved a shield, emblazoned with the arms of England, Anjou, and Normandy, announcing the spital to be a royal endowment. Descending from her mule, the Countess approached on foot the scene of her humiliation, blessing Heaven that the sun had sunk while she was slowly ascending the hill, and that twilight was upon the dreaded spot.

Vespers were celebrating in the chapel, the gates of which were widely flung open to admit the salutary sea-breezes, so vital to the enfeebled inmates of the place. Clad in the same linen ephod assigned to all the patients of the léproserie, and careful to seek a place undistinguished from those of his companions in misfortune. William of Mortain was not, at the first glance, discoverable to his mother. Having let fall her veil over her mourning habit, Matilda half-concealed by the rich Saxon columns of the portal, kneeled submissively on the pavement during the remainder of the service. She scarcely dared raise her eyes, as, one by one, at the conclusion, the lepers went forth to enjoy their customary recreation in the grove, though their linen garments swept the raiment of the kneeling woman, whose humble attitude in that desecrated place seemed to point out as a mendicant the daughter of a line of kings.

At length, amid her tears, a gentle voice greeted her ear, bidding her, if she was in need, repair to the refectory for relief, and, in compassionate accents, inquiring the motive of her anguish. It was the voice of her son—it was the voice of William. Raising, with indescribable emotion, her eyes towards his face, she beheld, through the misty twilight, the emaciated but not loathesomely disfigured countenance of him whose expressive eyes were still as those of an angel! But scarcely had an ejaculation of thanks to Heaven burst from the lips of the weeping mother, when her eyes fell upon the face of the Benedictine brother by whom he was accompanied, whose sallow brows were distinctly apparent beneath his cowl to the woman kneeling at their feet.

“Rise, rise, O blessed mother!” cried the Earl of Mortain, instantly recognising the beloved voice, whose ejaculation, at that moment, reached his ear. “Thou art come at last, then, like summer rain to the thirsty desert! Oh, that I dare hold thee in one dear embrace! Father Edric—my friend, my counsellor—turn not away thus reproachfully that I yearn for the endearments of my mother. Even so tenderly as thou hast watched over my recent sufferings, did this woman attend upon my happy infancy! Mother! I pray thee, know and thank this reverend comforter of my afflictions.”

But Matilda was now overpowered to stupefaction by excess of emotion! For, behold! she was under the roof of the léproserie; and in the twain by whom she was raised from the ground, and laid in the open air upon the greensward of the surrounding cemetery, she recognised in the gloomy recluse, who was devoting himself to the solace of her child, the injured lover of her youth; in the royal leper whose scalding tears fell unheeded upon her hand—“the object dearest to her on earth”—the victim of her perjury, the manifestation of the accomplishment of the wrath of Heaven.

The hand of God was upon the memorable three, assembled, at that moment of retribution, under the roof of the LEPER-HOUSE OF JANVAL.

* * * * *

Centuries passed away. The scourge of other times and climates ceased to afflict the nations of Europe; and, at the epoch when the arms of Henry of Navarre conferred immortal renown on the Castle of Arques, the leper-house, devoted to general purposes, had assumed the name of the infirmary or maladrerie of Janval. Curtailed by the lapse of years of its princely dimensions, the tomb of William of Mortain, the founder of the chapel was now exposed to the injuries of the elements; and the learned inscription, commemorating his pious life and early death at Janval, in the year of redemption 1168, was already partly obliterated.

The rich endowments bestowed upon the léproserie by his mother, the Empress Maud, Countess of Anjou, were shortly afterwards assigned in council to the service of the Hotel Dieu at Dieppe, by which the revenues are still enjoyed; and the spital was dismantled and became deserted. Throughout the succeeding century, however, on the festival of St Mary Magdalen, and at the feast of St John, the clergy of the neighbouring church of St Remy repaired to the decaying chapel for the celebration of mass; till, at the close of the eighteenth century, the ruinous condition of the building necessitated its desecration. The remains of the maladrerie were assigned to the farmers of the estate; when the gravestone of William Earl of Mortain was removed and placed among the royal sepulchres of the capital of Normandy.

The embankments of the moat are now alone visible, surrounded by a grove of lofty beech trees, bequeathed to the soil by the original veterans of the place. The traditions of the spot are still, however, sacredly preserved; and many a ghostly legend is related by the peasants of unsightly forms seen wandering in the twilight over the precincts of the ancient cemetery. When the neighbouring sea is sufficiently calm to admit of the ringing of the Angelus at St Remy being heard on the heights, the villagers of the hamlets cross themselves with anxious devotion, if they find themselves within view of the grove. Often have I beheld them at eventide hurrying homewards, lest night should surprise them on the detested spot.

Among the dungeons of Arques is shewn the gloomy retreat where, during twenty years, an English knight was incarcerated by Henry the First of England, and released only by the death of the king. The walls of that noxious prison reveal nothing of the prolonged tortures endured by Sir Kenric of Waltham; but the records of many chronicles and charters attest the tender care of the Empress Maud, and the pious resignation of William Earl of Mortain, during his retreat in the LEPER-HOUSE OF JANVAL.

SCROLL OF A LETTER TO THE QUEEN, ON THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.

To the Editor of Tai's Magazine.

Mrs SMITH and Mrs BROWN had a conference with my wife a few evenings ago, the subject of which was betrayed to me by the following letter, which dropped from the reticule of one of the ladies. The poor women seem to know little of the proper forms of address employed towards majesty; but you will excuse them, and will, I think, be touched by the sincere simplicity of their appeal.

The Address of a few Respectable Women of the Middle Class, to her Majesty Queen Victoria, on the subject of signing Warrants for the Execution of Criminals.

MADAM,—So we must address you, with distance and respect; but our hearts overflow with feelings which at this moment would rather prompt us to write as to a friend on whom we bestowed our deepest pity. Why do we pity, you proudly ask. Because imagination depicts you to us as signing a death-warrant; and we shudder as we contemplate the image even in fancy. Yes, we are full of compassion for you—you, who are but an instrument, a tool, bade to act by the barbarous laws of your country. We feel that to us it would be as awful to write the word which should command the death of another, as to prepare to meet the King of Terrors ourselves. But your ministers and the judges of the land, who stand around you, were you to express this our sentiment, would say, "Ignorance, weakness, cowardice! It is for the good of society that the death of the guilty is commanded." Ay! but we know that this ignorance, this weakness, this cowardice, was the rule of life of Him who came down from heaven to teach man his duty to man. Had He who possessed divine power possessed only human judgment, how would he have acted when surrounded by the infuriated rabble of a degraded city? Raising that hand which could have called down instant death, he would have said—"There is a murderer, there a robber, there an adulterer, there an incendiary—let each die!" Or, using the coward plea of self-defence, which society has justified, he would have said—"All these hate me without cause: they thirst for my blood: they are murderers in desire: they force me to command their death, that I perish not by their hands." But no! He chose to die rather than be just as man is just; he said—"Father, forgive them: they know not what they do!"

"They know not what they do." And after this example has been eighteen centuries before our eyes, shall we continue to deal condemnation on those who know not what they do?

How is life known to you but by its vanities, its splendours, its pleasures, its comforts, and by the simple feeling that it is dear to you? You know not that it would be dearer yet, if the means of existence had been dealt out to you day by day in a scanty pittance from the hard hand of a task-master, until the soul of the slave had become yours—until at last, when the pittance was refused, you would have been tempted to commit crime to prolong that life. How many thousands of such are there! Do they, degraded till reason is almost lost, do they know what they do?

You know not how many thousands of your fellow-creatures are educated, trained, step by step, in vice, from the cradle to the prison or the scaffold. To them virtue, and honour, and immortality, are names unknown: life is the only good; and to grasp in any way aught that can give it value or prolong it, is, to them, what is right. Do they, thus uninstructed, know what they do?

You know not to how many thousands in this land the sacred volume, which contains the commands—"Thou shalt not steal; Thou shalt do no murder; Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour"—is a sealed book. Nor do you know how many, in the close and noisome lanes of crowded cities, remain pent up, to conceal either vice or wretchedness; and never seek the house of God, where they might hear those commandments. Are they, who break laws of which they are ignorant, guilty? Do they know what they do?

Think not that we would lead you by casuistry to the opinion, that all vice springs from ignorance, or want of right reason—that it should no more be punished than idiocy. Far from it. We know that the just Ruler of this world has not left the vices of the ignorant unpunished, although a greater condemnation is pronounced on those who sin under the law; and we know that those who aspire to rule societies must also humbly aspire to follow His great laws of justice. Dread responsibility! Do they understand those laws? When they say, Punish! have they asked why the Deity punishes? Have they looked into the whole constitution of nature, which shews that the object of His punishment is to make better? Have they looked into the intention of our holy religion, which says, "Leave time for repentance, that it may work newness of life?"

We ask not that the criminal should go unpunished; nor do we ask that he should be sent back to a society which taught him only evil. We say only to him who would condemn—Let thy brother live—he knew not what he did; let him live, that he may know; let him live, that he may offend no more; let him live, that he may deserve freedom; let him live, that he may taste the bitterness of repentance and the sweetness of hope; let him live, that he may teach others how great the wretchedness of vice, how great the mercy of God; let him live, that he may yet be happy, for life was given for happiness, and the vicious cannot have tasted it; let him live, because humanity pleads for mercy; let him live, because Christianity commands it.

Oh, may sentiments of piety and humanity become yet more deeply fixed in your heart!—sentiments of charity and pity for the poor, the wretched, the vicious, with whom, in the kingdom of spirits, where distinctions and titles are unknown, you must stand before the throne of judgment! Our prayers in sincerity and truth are ever yours.

Thus their address ends, unfit, indeed, to be presented to any royal personage; yet the appeal made to one may waken some Christian sentiments in the many. If I might add a word on this subject, which is by women naturally regarded on the side of religion and feeling alone, I would remind my readers that Nero wept when first called on to sign a death-warrant; and I would ask those who counsel adherence to the good old customs of past times, have they ever considered how much of the vast tide of vice that poured in on his soul, was owing to the breaking down of the barrier of natural feeling which made that act so repugnant to him? But if it was odious to even a Pagan, what should it be to a young woman, a Christian, whose feelings must be a hundredfold more keen, whose conscience a thousandfold more enlightened? The demoralizing effect of public executions on the masses, is of no account with legislators—let then the womanly feelings and the virtue of their sovereign be of some. What would now be the fame of Elizabeth, if, free from the bloody stains which rest on it, she had acted from the conviction, that to command the death even of the guilty is forbidden by the Christian religion!

THE BROOM O' THE HIGHLANDS.

BY AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

THE broom o' the Highlands!—'tis surely the same;—
Na! here it may only be kent by its name.
The broom, yellow broom—it is even the same;—
Na! here 'tis a' droopin', it isna at hame.

For there it is stalwart, an' gowden, an' lang;
'Tis the joy o' the peasant, the theme o' his sang;
The bonny wee birdies hop through it wi' glee,
An' its flow'rets rejoice i' the hum o' the bee.

But here 'tis aye stinted, an' paly, an' weak,
An' has nocht o' its ain but the tear on its cheek;
Nae birdies, nae bairns, gaily lilt in its praise,
Nae lassie's heart louns as it draws her glad gaze.

The winter comes on wi' its cauld, killin' frost,
But the pride o' the north a' its vigour has lost;
The blasts o' the mountains pass o'er it in vain,
But here it maun dee—for, alas! 'tis its lane.

'Tis thus wi' the Scot when he quits his ain land,
The land o' his forebears, for ony strange strand—
His manly bauld bearing's nae langer the same,
He's kent like the broom only just by his name.

They ca' him sae paughty, they ca' him sae sleet,
They ca' him sae pauky, because he wad flee
Frae the snares an' the wiles that encompass him round,
For the words o' his mither are a' noted down.

He pines for the strath where the burnie's aye pourin',
He pines for the braes where the linn is aye roarin';
For gowd an' for siller he's stricken wi' care,
An' he longs for the sough o' his ain native air.

But if aiblins the garb o' his country he see,
The sigh frae his heart an' the tear frae his ee
Are burstin'—an' how her sweet sangs mak' him fain!
Oh! he feels an' he looks the brave Scotsman again.

THE POET'S REWARD.

"I cannot express what my feelings were on first hearing a song of mine sung by a beautiful young lady in Ettrick, to her harpichord.—Hogg.

HONOUR to old Philosophy,
And all her stately homes!
She sits on foreheads clear and high,
She breathes in reverend tomes;
Hers the pure fame, the tranquil lot,
Remote from strife and wrong:
Yet these rewards I covet not—
I'd rather write a song.

Proud Eloquence, for ill and good,
With stately march and free,
Moveth amidst the multitude,
Like sea-god on the sea;
By her the mighty men are weak,
By her the weak are strong:
Yet will I not her favour seek—
I'd rather write a song.

The story-telling art around
A halo bright appears,
When sparkling things with smiles are crown'd,
And tender things with tears;
O'er many a heart the charm'd page
Holds influence deep and strong:
Yet doth not this my hopes engage—
I'd rather write a song.

There's one reward doth all eclipse,
And this shall be my prize—
To see my thoughts move ruby lips,
Enlighten glorious eyes;
To hear a silver-sounding voice
Sweetly my words prolong:
Say, what reward can more rejoice
The bard who writes a song?

ALEXANDER'S DISCOVERIES IN THE INTERIOR OF AFRICA.*

MANY is the goodly and entertaining volume of travels which the young Victoria's gallant knight, Sir James Alexander, has put forth; although those before us are the first in which he has come forward as an original discoverer. If he has not, in his new capacity, added a very great deal to the existing amount of geographical or commercial information by his late African expedition, he has contributed a fresh chapter to the social history of the human race, and presented some striking and fair aspects of the state which we are pleased to term savage or barbarous. These, together with the personal narrative of the traveller, which is often deeply interesting, constitute the chief attractions of the best work which Captain Alexander has yet produced, although its title-page may arrogate rather more than its contents bear out.

The African expedition, which Captain Alexander had gone to the Cape of Good Hope for the express purpose of undertaking, was delayed for some time in consequence of the late Caffer war, of which he has written an account. Since then, by the way—and it is always pleasant to note improvement—his views about slavery, and especially concerning the rights of the aboriginal tribes, seem to have become more just and enlarged; and, although he makes no open recantation of the hasty and erroneous opinions put forth in his former book on the internal affairs of the African colonies, and upon the bad policy of the colonial functionaries, he at least evinces a desire to conciliate, or not farther offend, that “religious party,” which, in order to vindicate his new friends and patrons in the colony, he formerly chose to vituperate.

The recent journey of Dr Smith, whose narrative has not yet, we believe, been published, changed the original object of Captain Alexander's expedition, which was Delagoa Bay; and, as he was determined, after coming so far, to go somewhere, and seems to have had, in the colony, what the Irish call “a strong back,” his ultimate point became the tracts inhabited by the Damaras, a nation of which very little was known, and generally the country to the north of the Orange River, on the west coast. Government, and the Geographical Society, contributed the necessary funds for an expedition extending to about four thousand miles, including, of course, many roundabouts and zig-zags, and occupying above a year.

Those who read for entertainment and for instruction in the science of human nature, will commence at Cape Town, and go along with the traveller; while those who only wish to acquire precise scientific information, not to be found in other narratives of discovery, may safely omit a very considerable portion of preliminary matter; for it is not until we enter upon the second volume that new ground is fairly broken. Captain Alexander set out on the 10th September

1836, in high spirits, under the most favourable auspices, and with every advantage that could ensure a happy result to the expedition. He had originally seven attendants, afterwards increased to a band of fifty, with every requisite for prosecuting the journey with comfort and security; and they were all required long before it was concluded. In passing through the settlements, the traveller makes many judicious observations, and points out useful reforms and improvements. He also gives an amusing account of the domestic manners of the gross-feeding Dutch boors, who are, in some respects, greater bears, if not barbarians, than their African neighbours. When he had reached the valley of the Olifant River, Captain Alexander rejoiced in all the glorious freedom of the Bush:—

I could dress as I liked, could rise and lie down when it suited my pleasure, went fast or slow, sang aloud or kept silent, ate my food with an appetite of the keenest Savigny edge, and was gratified with the appearance of picturesque hills and broad and verdant plains, was cheered with the sight and sound of birds and insects; while lizards of various colour, with yellow or green scales, tipped with red and gold, continually hurried across our path, or an occasional snake would glide among the stones and bushes, with its striped or spotted skin. On the road, light-heartedness is indispensable.

The settlers in that part of the colony which the traveller had now reached, occupy very wide ranges of pasture, in order to save the grass about their principal residences; and they roam about in Tartar fashion during the months of July, August, September, and October. In the course of their advance, the party reached one of the field residences of Mynbeer Nieuwoud, situated in a sheltered nook among the hills, adjoining the Swart Doorn or Black Thorn River. It consisted of a few irregular wigwams, formed of bent boughs covered with yellow rush mats. By these stood the kraals for the cattle, and the waggons which transported the family, with their household gear, from one to another of these African shielings. The residence of Mynbeer Nieuwoud, to which the traveller was hospitably invited, may serve as a fair specimen of all, and of the pastoral mode of life in the back parts of the colony:—

Nieuwoud was a very burly man, in a broad-brimmed hat, blue jacket, and ample skin trowsers; and, as is the custom of the boors, his pipe was seldom out of his mouth. He is a very civil man, and bears a good character for kindness to his people. His wife sat at the door, in a close cap and blue cotton gown, sewing: There were two or three long guns slung at one side, and a pair of low stools were in the hut; but neither table, chairs, nor bed; karosses, or mantles of sheep skin, spread on the floor at night, and rolled up in a corner during the day, served the place of the latter; and when the farmer gave the order to “Schenk een zoopjé,” (pour out a dram), and then to “Skep op,” (set the victuals on the table), a waggon chest was drawn from one side, on which a cloth was spread, and pewter plates arranged. Two large menses of boiled mutton were then produced, and boiled wheat, when, on the words “Kom zit bij,” we placed our stools alongside of the chest, and each drawing a pocket-knife, we made a vigorous assault on the viands, washing them down with warm milk, handed to us by a Hottentot female.

After the repast, we carried our stools outside the door, to a blazing fire in front of the hut, and sat conversing about country matters till it was time to retire for the night.

Leopards and Boschmans are sometimes troublesome in this district. One of the former lately killed eleven horses here before it was destroyed itself. Boschmans, hovering about the frontier, too, carry off a single sheep or a cow now and then from the flocks and herds in the field, which they kill and devour in some neighbouring dell among the mountains.

The Boschmans here, as elsewhere, have neither sheep nor goats, nor do they cultivate grain or melons. At one season of the year, they catch with their dogs the fawns of the springbok; at another, the nests of the white ant are robbed of grass seed, and of the ants themselves, for food. Flights of locusts they delight in, and honey is sometimes most abundant; roots are found after rain by their green shoots; and, in the months of July and August, ostrich eggs supply the wants of these "children of the desert."

When they visited Nieuwoud in their seasons of scarcity, he killed a sheep for them, and gave them a small present of tobacco, to prevent their robbing him.

The Wesleyan and other missionary stations, upon which the traveller came in the course of his route, are described, though with less minuteness than many readers will desire. These moral oases are the most beautiful feature in the African wilderness. Shortly after passing the temporary headquarters of Mynheer Nieuwoud, the party—

Descended to a valley called the Two Rivers, where we found a community of Little Namaquas, belonging to the Wesleyan mission station of Lily Fountain. They were living in mat huts in a glen. The men were decently dressed in leopard skin or tanned jackets and trousers; and the women in sheepskin karosses and tanned petticoats.

We got milk for tobacco from the yellow-faced and Chinese-looking Namaquas; and, passing through the valley, we again ascended by a steep road to the higher parts of the Kamiesberg, where we saw the strange koker boom, or quiver tree, with its thick and silver-green trunk, hollow arms (from which quivers are made), and leaves like those of the aloë. We passed through level tracts, which were covered with crops of corn; and, on the 10th of October, a month after I had left Cape Town, we reached the elevated and beautiful Wesleyan mission station of Lily Fountain.

The station of Lily Fountain is placed about 4,000 feet above the sea, and immediately under one of the peaks of the Kamiesberg. The highest peak, six or seven miles distant, and south, from the station, is estimated at 5,000 feet in height. In the sloping mountain valley of the station is found a good church, school, mission-house, and out-buildings; a productive garden, watered by an abundant fountain, which poplars overshadow; whilst around are the mat hats of the Namaquas of the station.

My worthy friend, the Rev. Barnabas Shaw, first formed this interesting station in 1817. He was succeeded by Mr Edwards, who laboured here for fourteen years most successfully. Part of the remains of the Little Namaqua nation was here collected—there are eight hundred on the books of the institution; and I was quite surprised and pleased to see the quantity of land they cultivate, stimulated as they are to exertion by the missionary, under whom are two corporals and six councillors, or heads of families, elected by the people by ballot.

The Namaquas of Lily Fountain had sown latterly about 100 muids, or 20,000 lbs. of wheat annually, and had raised from this 1,500 or 2,000 muids. Mr Edwards was absent at Cape Town when I arrived at the station, and a thin-looking corporal (Buchan) resided me. I thought that he was very poor from his appearance, and I intended offering him the head and liver of a sheep I was about to kill, to keep him from starving, when I found, to my surprise, that he grew forty muids of corn annually, had a span of fourteen oxen, a waggon, twelve horses, and seven hundred sheep and goats.

Once a month disputes are settled here in council, which are principally for cattle trespassing on corn land; and those brought before the council can of course appeal from its decision to the field-cornet of the ward, or magistrate of the district. Yearly a herd is appointed, and yearly the ponds must be cleared out for the cattle. For misdemeanors there is no flogging, but a fine of grain is imposed. If honey-beer is made, the maker of it is expelled the station; and no native dances are allowed, for they open the door to vice, the dancers being in the habit of remaining to sleep where they danced, and relations hearing of this, quarrels ensue. Thus the missionary, besides having his spiritual duties to attend to, the farming, carpentry, and smith's work, has much to do with the temporal matters of his people.

Captain Alexander remained at Lily Fountain for some time, in consequence of an annoying circumstance, not of interest to the public, and—where will troublesome visitors not intrude?—was tormented with the visitations of the Boors, who seem bores of the first magnitude. Yet their endless questions were only very natural in their situation. They were such as—

If I was not afraid to travel alone?—If the Governor was "versch," (pronounced fresh,) or in good health?—If the King was an old carle?—How many children the Governor had?—If they were married or single?—If I was tired of this place? These with their answers, would, perhaps, occupy an hour and a-half: the lusty boor, all the while, sitting in the middle of the bed, for want of a chair; while I, in my turn, would ask if the farmer was married; the number of his children; would repeat the old story of the rust in the corn; the horse sickness, and wolligchaap, (Merino sheep: asked how far it was from one place to another; when the game was to be got: then would hint how much I had to do—shewed my writing materials—which would merely produce a drowsy "yaw;"—would look at my watch, and, on being asked the time, hear, as usual, the reply of, "het iz niet laat," (it is early yet); and, as a dernier resort to get my wax-seated visitor out of the room, I would be compelled to put on my hat, with an apology for being under the necessity of visiting a patient.

"Zo," says the Boor, "I'll go with you, Mynheer;" and, once up and out, he goes to look after his riding-horses turned out to graze, one of which is, perhaps, (fortunately for me,) lost; which affords me some hours quiet, until I give him his "bread and cheese," and see him fairly in the saddle, with "grootems ta hais," (compliments to all at home.)

The Boors entertain the same feelings of jealousy and aversion to the Hottentots, which the Americans do to the negroes. It would not be difficult, in the United States, to find parallels to the facts stated in this extract, in every particular:—

A missionary told me that he had halted at a farmhouse on a Saturday, intending to remain there over Sunday, so as not to be on the road on the day of rest. On the Sabbath morning, he proposed to the farmer to assemble the people and hold service, which he assented to, and called his wife and children.

"Where are the Hottentots?" asked the zendeling. "The Hottentots!" cried the farmer; "you would not have them with us also? We are told in the Bible that the sheep are to be separated from the goats, and I cannot, therefore, admit the Hottentots."

"Very well," said the missionary, "as I am sent to teach all mankind the way of salvation, I cannot consent to hold worship unless white and black both join in it."

The farmer would not agree to this arrangement, on which the missionary very properly went out to his waggon, and, calling his driver and leader, he prayed with them. Presently he heard the people in the house singing a hymn, and then the door opened, and the farmer halloed to his people to bring the horses, and tread out the corn on the threshing floor. And thus was the Sabbath spent!

Though the farmers affect to have a great abhorrence for any admixture of black blood, yet, strange to say, I saw, at a farm house, several dark children running about, who, I was told, were the offspring of one of the daughters of the family by a Hottentot youth. Another of the daughters of the same family married a Boor, and, seven months after marriage, produced a black child, which, a trader seeing, asked "Hoe kom dat? (How did that happen?) When the husband coolly replied, "that one day his wife was going out and was frightened by a black man whom she suddenly saw behind the door, and that the child became black in consequence." The wife was by, and, on hearing this, she merely laughed. So both parties "thought no harm."

The next step of the journey, in point of interest, was to the London Mission Station of Komakas, where the traveller was kindly received by the worthy and venerable German missionary, Schmelen.

Komakas consists of a long mission house of one story, a church, and out-buildings, situated under a mountain of about a thousand feet high, and facing the south, and some rocky hills. In the valley, and opposite the buildings, were the mat huts of the Bastards and Namaquas of the institution. To save the grass about the station for another season, most of the people of Mr Schmelen were in the field with their flocks and herds, and only about thirty or forty were now present.

There was a small wind-mill for grinding corn, also a good garden; and no less than five fountains of excellent water were in this green and secluded valley, in which the distant roar of the sea can be heard, and over which peace seemed to wave her olive branch.

Mr Schmelen had laboured for upwards of thirty years in the wilderness of Great and Little Namaqua land, and in the region of the Orange River, principally. No one can be more highly respected than he is by the natives; among whom he has been very successful as a teacher, and over whom he has great influence. Single and solitary, he wandered about with the people, living often on game, and without bread, for a great length of time. He established the station of Bethany, occupied it for some years, and at last was forced to abandon it, as shall afterwards be recounted. He had travelled further to the north in Great Namaqua land than any white man previously.

Mr Schmelen is compactly made, and combines great energy with excellent judgment and good nature. His first wife was a Great Namaqua woman, who led a most exemplary life, and by whom he had several children; his second wife is from the Cape, and is most active and indefatigable as a schoolmistress. May they both long labour in their sphere of usefulness!

Two Rhenish missionaries were at Komakas during Captain Alexander's visit. An interesting description of the tribe among whom Mr Schmelen labours, must be omitted here, from its great length; but will be read with pleasure in the original. They are naturally a well-conditioned race, of whom much might be made, merely by the observance of justice. The following observations merit attention; and let it be remembered that the traveller is by no means among the enthusiastic friends of the aboriginal tribes.

Many of the Namaqua tribes are very rich in cattle, which they would willingly barter within the border for cloth and cutlery; but they are afraid at present to venture into the colony without being adequately protected. I asked one or two of those living about the Orange River why they never took their cattle into the colony, but preferred going to Angra Piquena Bay with their herds; before reaching which they often suffered most severely from thirst on the road; and when they did get there, they were often grossly imposed upon by the whalers; obtaining only two quart bottles full of coarse powder, or forty bullets, for an ox; and even sometimes being made drunk, and getting nothing at all for their property. To this, they replied, that they had tried once to take cattle into the colony; but that the first farmers they met abused them—asked them whose cattle these were they had stolen; if they had been plundering the Damaras; and said, "Vordoom de Hottentots! what business have they with cattle?" So, becoming afraid of violence, and seeing that they had little chance of fair dealing with the white men, they had never ventured to the borders of the colony again.

One cannot conceive a more dastardly and selfish spirit than that which could induce white men to behave in the manner that some of the whalers do. The natives wish to deal fairly, and part with their property, in their ignorance, for the value of a few pence; and, not content with getting them on these terms, the captains and crews of some whalers actually rob the natives, careless of the bad effect which this conduct will have in future dealings between the ships and the Namaquas.

On shore, everything is promised; but when the natives are induced to go on board with their cattle, they are either frightened into parting with them for next to nothing, or they are made drunk, and sent on shore without any remuneration; and still, with all this, they prefer Angra Piquena to the colony.

I said, "A magistrate unconnected with the farmers is required on the borders." At present, the magistrate at Clanwilliam is too far distant, and the field-cornets and the farmers are all related or connected; every one is oom or neef (uncle or nephew) to his neighbour, so that it is not very likely there can be much justice got out of a field-cornet on the servant of his nephew complaining of ill treatment. Besides, most of the old farmers cannot get over their thorough contempt for the coloured races. It is, therefore, evident, that, unless the magistrate is a man without local connexions and prejudices—unless he does what is right, without minding the breath of popular applause—the vox popularis aures—he will do little good in this quarter.

In a few days afterwards, a case exactly in point occurred:—

Paul Lynx, the chief of the Orange River, a strapping fellow, with one eye, and a peculiar savage look, came with two or three of his counsellors, and laid this case before me for decision, and on which we sat in solemn conclave in a mat hut.

That for ten or twelve years, Paul Lynx's people had caught the seals on the island before mentioned, had preserved their flesh, on which three hundred had annually subsisted, and had sold their skins. That lately, a white man, anxious to acquire possession of the Seal Island, though it was many miles beyond the border, had actually memorialized the Governor for it, and had shewn them a paper which he said was the Governor's answer to his memorial, granting him the Seal Island. He had asked Paul to put his mark to a paper, giving up the Seal Island, or allowing this trader alone to obtain the skins at his own price. The Namaquas then asked me if the Governor had any power to give away their Seal Island; and if I thought he had done so. I said he certainly had no power to grant to any one an island which was at least forty miles beyond the border; and that the paper which had been shewn them must be a forgery—which it was—and that they might rest assured that no Governor of the Cape would attempt to annoy them, or deprive them of their property. They then said, "We shall shoot the white man if he attempts to catch seal on our island." I told them on no account to use any violence.

Suitable advice was given them; and it is to be hoped that they have profited by it. Were we asked to point out the practical uses of agitation, we should go no farther than to instance the Cape colony, and the efforts of its friends at Cape Town and in England.

We must notice one more missionary station before plunging farther into the wilderness. It is that of Bezondermeid, occupied by that veteran labourer in the vineyard, the Rev. Mr Wemer, a German, under the London Missionary Society:—

Nothing can be conceived more desolate and forbidding than the appearance of the country about Bezondermeid, at this the hot season of the year. Some black and bare hills bounded sandy and bare plains, on which, beside the dry bed of a stream (in which there was one hole for water) stood three or four mat huts and a waggon. This was the picture of the station.

Mr Wemer, living like his flock in a mat hut, was seventy-four years of age; and during a great part of his life had moved about among three hundred of the natives south of the Great River, he and Mr Schmelen being the only two missionaries between Lily Fountain and the Great River. Mr Wemer had a very tidy native wife, by whom he had several children; one was in arms when I was at Bezondermeid. Ye dwellers in cities, nourished in abundance, think of the life this old man was leading! and yet he seemed cheerful and contented, particularly when I gave him a supply of tobacco, of which he was in want, to supply his meerschaum pipe. But for a year he had not tasted bread, and had been out of salt for six months. Till my waggon came up, he regaled Mr Schmelen and myself on boiled salt beef and Bush tea.

Could not some portion of the funds of the London Missionary Society be applied to pensioning off such aged and faithful labourers as Mr Wemer, so that, in their latter days, after years of privation and hardship, they might partake of, at least, the common necessities of life? I am sure it is unknown to the directors of the Society what some of their old missionaries suffer.

Let us hope that this valuable hint will not be wholly disregarded. The full reward of such labours as those of Wemer are not of this life; yet something might be done for the solace of the old age of those self-devoted men, when they are inclined to leave their important stations on the outposts of humanity. This we imagine would not be frequent.

Instead of the information, which, by dint of pertinacious inquiry, the traveller continued to obtain about the Great Namaquas—and which, if not incorrect, must be crude, and much less to be depended upon than what is communicated by the German missionaries, who are, as it were, naturalized in the country—we shall give as a specimen of Captain Alexander's best narrative style, and as an interesting picture of what man is capable of performing, his account of Henrick the Hunter.

On the 13th March we continued our journey over the same delightful country as we had seen the day before, and in two hours and a half descended to the bank of the Gnuanip river, (whose name is untranslatable,) and outspanned at Tuais (or Mud) Fountain, where lay Henrick the hunter "par excellence."

From Tuais we saw the long line of the 'Un'uma, or Bulb mountains, two or three thousand feet high, east of us, and between us and them was the Koanquip, a branch of which was the Gnuanip.

In the evening, Henrick came from his huts to visit me; he was a spare made and athletic Namaqua, of forty years of age, about five feet eight inches in height, nose low, but inclined to aquiline, teeth rather prominent, but covered with his lips; a good-humoured smile about his mouth, and altogether with a very amiable and intelligent expression of countenance. He was beautifully formed, deep chested, small waist, and muscular arms, thighs, and calves, without any extra flesh beyond what was necessary to give perfect symmetry to his figure. His feet were small, as is usual among the Namaquas, but his instep was particularly high, and even rose in a sort of knob in the middle: this may have added to his astonishing power as a runner.

The reader must not imagine I indulge in a traveller's license when I say that Henrick could catch and kill zebras by fleetness of foot: I believe he has often done this; for I have seen him turn zebras towards the guns; and when I tell how he managed to catch them, I may be believed; if not, I must lie under an evil imputation, which I would willingly avoid—for, Hora et semper, now and always "Truth me guide."

When Henrick's powder ran short he took a hunting knife in his left hand (for he was left-handed, and continued so, though it was through his left arm he had received a ball at the skirmish at Bethany) and knowing there were zebras in his neighbourhood, he went out to the field to seek them, to their grazing ground, and to run them down.

Walking on his toes with an elastic springing step, at the rate of upwards of five miles an hour, he paced over the plain, glancing at the ground for foot-marks, and on each side of him, with his keen eye. The prints of the compact hoofed zebras are observed on the sands, and presently the troop itself is seen grazing near. Henrick stoops, disencumbers himself of every skin covering which might encumber him, even to his leopard skin cap, and steals as near as he can to the game without being perceived; but the watchful eye of the stallion discovers the hunter, when he leaves the cover of the bushes, and, giving the alarm to the rest, the whole gallop off. Henrick, without putting himself to the top of his speed at first, follows them; the zebras stop to graze, Henrick running like a race horse, with his stomach near to the ground, bounds toward them. Away they rush again, snorting, and tossing their stripped heads in the air, and switching their light and mule-like tails in the pride of fancied fleetness and freedom. The hunter "sits on their skirts," and relaxes not from his pursuit for a moment; he clears stones, bushes, and other impediments; after three or four miles he is in perfect wind; the ground seems to fly from under him; and, as he expressed it, he was now unable to distinguish the heaven from the earth. The zebras stop and graze occasionally, as before; but it is now but for an instant, for their enemy is closing with them; he drives them towards a steep face of rock; they hesitate about the means of escape; Henrick is amongst them in a moment, and, seizing one of the stripped troop by the tail, he swings it to one side, throwing the whole weight of his own body towards the ground at the same time. The zebra falls on its side, when Henrick instantly plunges his knife into its chest, and then allows it to rise and run off; it keeps up with the rest for a short distance, then gradually falls behind the troop, weak from loss of blood. Its comrades wait for it till Henrick again dashes forward, repeats his fatal thrust, and if two stabs are not sufficient to stretch the zebra dead on the plain, a third is given, which rolls the beautiful body lifeless on the ground, covered with dust and perspiration. The successful hunter then returns to his huts, to send his people with pack oxen to bring home the prize.

Henrick is rivalled now in fleetness by his eldest son, Jan; which would not be, says the father, if it were not for his own crippled arm. Lately, the two were out in pursuit of giraffes, and getting close to three, the father told his son to assist him in stabbing the last; but Jan said, "No: let us attack the first and largest." Which they did; and after a smart pursuit, managed to stab the first with fatal effect.

It must be borne in mind that horses come up with both zebras and giraffes, but still the powers of both Henrick Buys and his son must be very astonishing to enable them to rival horses, and thus to show what a man is capable of accomplishing with temperance and training.

On the 14th March it thundered and rained all day, to our great refreshment. Thermometer at sunrise 69°; at mid-day 75°. I gave presents, as usual, to Jan and Henrick Buys, and to their wives, whilst tobacco and the fiddle put every one in good spirits; and on the advent of the expedition to Tuala, there occurred a sort of festival among the dependants of the two brothers. Some of the dancers shewed a good deal of humour in their performances of imitation reels—they stooped near the ground in going through the figure, then sprang up, beat the ground rapidly with their heels, kicked up before and behind, stopped suddenly, looked their partner earnestly in the face, and with the cry of "hoet," bobbed their heads forward, and then went through the figure singing an accompaniment. There was a little Damara too, with a pot-belly, who imitated the reed and fiddle very comically, accompanied with dancing. There were exhibitions with bows and arrows, lances, and wrestling, &c. Presents of cows and sheep were brought, but which, of course, I took care to pay for. More sheep were also brought for cotton handkerchiefs, which were here so wonderfully attractive that one of the prettiest girls in the place, or that I had seen on the north side of the Orange river, came, and, to my surprise, offered to marry me for a cotton handkerchief! I was thus in the predicament of St Anthony in the Wilderness.

Though thus tempted, Sir James did not yield. He was, indeed, at this time engaged in collecting jackal skins, to form a cloak for the beautiful ideal of his matrimonial dreams, and which promises to become as famous as that which Lieutenant Lesmahago presented to his bride Tabitha Bramble.

Henrick Buys the hunter, and his brother Jan Buys, with their cattle and attendants, were now added to the travelling party, which, as the way became more dangerous, had gradually been increased until it now reached, men and boys, about fifty souls. The Buys had been represented as cut-throats and robbers; but upon their fidelity and courage, Captain Alexander was led to place much of the success of his expedition and the safety of himself and his people. His confidence was well placed, though the number of hungry men to be fed, in the country through which they were to pass to the sea, greatly augmented difficulties which at length became quite appalling. The aim of Henrick's gun was unerring as his fleetness of foot was unequalled; but his venison became at last all too scanty for the number of his voracious comrades. Soon after the traveller had been joined by the brothers Buys, the expedition entered the Boschman country. This was on the 20th of March, and they travelled for many hours without perceiving any trace of the inhabitants. There is something so fresh and animating in the following description, that, though foreign to our object, we cannot resist this one African pell-mell hunt.

Extensive plains were before us; on our left hand, beyond them to the west, were blue ridges in the distance between us and the ocean; whilst on our right the table-topped range of the 'Un'uma continued. We crossed the Humabib (root water,) where there was grass, water, and shade, and then missing Henrick the hunter, we looked out before us, and saw dust rising at the foot of the mountains. We knew that this must proceed from large game; accordingly, I rode with Kuieip and his men towards the right, whilst the rest of the people distributed themselves to cut off the wild animals, whatever they might be. We dismounted and lay down behind bushes in an extended line. The cloud of dust approached us, and below it seemed to dance several black bodies; it came near, and seven zebras, following each other, galloped towards us. It now appeared that Henrick and two or three men had run on before, and had turned the zebras towards our gun. It was a fine sight to witness the mares, young males, and a foal halt, whilst a powerful stallion, with his mane, as if newly hogged, and his tail switching his striped thighs, come on singly, to reconnoitre my horse and the riding oxen. He came close to the bush where I lay, but I kept quiet till the whole troop should pass. In the meantime, an impatient hunter crept towards the halted group of plump and round females, and fired into them without effect. The stallion, snorting wildly, galloped back to his charge, and the whole passed us rapidly, and received our discharge; long tracks of dust followed their heels. One fell on the plain, as it was breaking the line of the people facing the mountains, but, recovering itself, it was tracked by its bloody spoor towards the Koanquip, and was nearly come up with by two of the people, when a party of Boschmans appeared, intercepted, and secured the prize.

We saw white-rumped springboks ahead, and went after them; and then among hills on the right a troop of gemsboks appeared, the antagonists of lions, with their long straight horns, like that of the fabled unicorn. We made a dash at the gemsboks, and intercepted them as before, between our extended hunters and the mountain; but it fell dusk. The old ones all escaped with apparently slight wounds, whilst only a young fawn, in appearance very like a brown calf, with a short tail, was secured alive. We carried it with us to the waggon, and gave it the cow's milk.

To an African traveller goats are invaluable; they can accompany him everywhere, and live where cattle would pine away and die; though the cattle of South Africa are assuredly the most hardy and enduring in the world.

Captain Alexander had five or six of these useful creatures, which, scanty as was the supply of milk which they afforded, proved a source of great comfort in the dry and parched land which he traversed. In the course of the narrative of the expedition, many curious facts as to the habits and history of the lion are stated, which will be new to naturalists. The Boschmans appear an inferior race to the Namaquas, and in a low state of barbarism. They had never seen white men; did not admire them, and fancied them flayed!—but they expressed little surprise at anything, save the facility of obtaining light with Lucifer matches.

The sight of Mr Schmelen's waggon had, at first, produced great consternation among them; they ran away from it for a whole night, and constantly jumped over the track of the wheels of this wild monster, which tracks they imagined its foot-marks. On another occasion, Mr Schmelen sent out an old waggon with a hunting party, when one of the fore-wheels was broken, and the waggon remained standing in the field for two months, at the end of which time a Boschman came to Mr Schmelen's place, and said that he had seen the missionary pack-ox standing in the field for a long time, with a broken leg; and that, as he did not observe that it ate any grass, he was afraid that it would soon die of hunger if it was not taken away! This, however, is not worse than the Highlander in the Forty-five, fancying the stolen watch a living thing, which had died when it ceased to tick.

At halting, one night, Captain Alexander became alarmed to hear that some of his young Namaquas had ill-used the women of a Boschman party, who rested near them. To prevent a repetition of such outrages, he told the men of the Boschmans, next evening, to remain near him with their families, and he would prevent the women from being troubled. "The Boschmans said—'Take the women; the people may do with them as they please; what else is the use of them?' Seeing the Boschmans' feeling on this point (beasts could not have been worse) I now thought that the occurrences at the Great Fountain were not of so serious or disgraceful a nature as I had at first imagined they were."

A favourite mode of spending the evening hours when the cavalcade halted, was hearing Henrick or his brother relate their hunting exploits, and those of their father Cobus, who had also been a mighty hunter. Their feats, especially with the black rhinoceros, an animal which appears as ill-conditioned as it is ugly, beat those of Squire Waterton all to naught. This is one story told by Jan, which may serve as a specimen:—

"Once on a time, my father took his sons out to hunt; he only had a gun, and we had assegais and knives. At first we were very unsuccessful; we found nothing till the second day; we were very hungry, when we came on a rhinoceros. The old man soon wounded it in the leg, and he then told us to throw stones at it, to make the wound worse. You know how Namaquas can throw stones; so we crept upon the rhinoceros, followed it, and threw stones with such effect, that it at last lay down from pain. I being armed with a knife, then approached it from behind, and commenced to hamstring it, while my elder brother, who is now dead, Cobus, remarkable for two strange rings round his eyes, tried to climb over the back of the rhinoceros to thrust his lance into its shoulder, (it would have been very dangerous to have gone up to its shoulder on foot;) he had just begun to climb, when the rhinoceros rose suddenly with a terrible blast of snort, and we all ran off as fast we could to a tree, and there held a consultation about our further proceedings.

"We had not been long at the tree, when the rhinoceros, observing where we were, rushed towards us with his horns at first in the air, and then as he came near, he tore up the ground with them. We scattered ourselves before him, when Cobus getting in a passion, stopped short in his flight, called the rhinoceros an ugly name, and turned and faced it. The rhinoceros, astonished at this unexpected manœuvre, also stopped and stared at Cobus, who then commenced calling out loudly and abusing the monster; it now seemed to be seized with fear, for it sidled off, when Cobus, who had a heart like a lion's and was as active as an ape, immediately pursued the rhinoceros, seized the tail, sprung with its assistance on its back, rode it well, and plunging his assegai deep into its shoulder, it fell, and was despatched by the rest of us. Hungry men can do extraordinary things—and this is a true story."

"I do not doubt it in the least," I said, "for I know that all the Buys have first-rate courage."

The thoughtlessness of a Portuguese youth, who formed one of Captain Alexander's train, threw the whole party at this time into great peril and difficulty. He had wandered away one evening, while a group of the Boschmans, who were to act as guides, were at sundown exhibiting their national dances for the amusement of the traveller, with unbounded hilarity and entire confidence. The guns fired off as signals to the wanderer alarmed the native guides in the midst of their sport, and they fled to the mountains with their women and children, imagining they were about to be killed by the Whites and Namaquas. They left all their goods, in their haste, to the mercy of the strangers, taking only their arms. Suspected of evil intentions, and thus abandoned by their Boschman conductors, who alone knew the country and the watering places, the situation of the party became alarming, especially as they were at the last watering-place for nearly sixty miles, the weather very hot, the oxen and horses emaciated and weak from their previous exertions, and a desert of heavy sand lying between them and the Kuinip River, which, when they approached it, might, for aught they knew, be dried up. There was now, however, no retreating, and the sufferings and horrors of the journey fairly commenced. They were of no ordinary kind, and the narrative becomes painfully and intensely interesting.

If the Boschmans had not deserted us, we should have crossed the barren waste comfortably enough, for both men and cattle might have drunk half way from holes in a rock; but where to look for these now, we were quite at a loss.

On the 4th of April, I found the Namaquas washing clothes, and some their bodies, in the only drinking place we had at Ababies. I am not very nice, but this was too much. However, I was now compelled to keep my temper, and to content myself with reproving the people for their excessive thoughtlessness. The oxen came late at night from the upper part of the river. I asked the cattle guards if they had been at the water with the beasts, and they said they had; but next day, when it was too late, I found out that the cattle had not been taken to the water at all, and early on the morning of the 5th, we left with thirsty oxen.

Our course was north-west, whilst the Chuntop left us, and inclined to the west, to disappear in the sand before it reached the ocean. The waggon moved slowly along, but frequently stuck fast, and it was most painful to be obliged to use the whip to the unfortunate cattle. After five hours, we got to a dry and nameless river, and most of the Namaquas dispersed to look for water, but found none—thermometer 90°.

I sat down for some time on a hill, and waited till the waggon and pack-oxen came on, and though I saw a large flock of springboks below me, no one was after them; water, not flesh, was our only desire; the train, with two or three drivers, passed on. I saw a few long-legged plovers moving about, and after five more hours, we halted at half-past eleven at night in a valley of grass between low hills. The poor oxen were so knocked up with the heavy sands they had passed, with the heat of the day, and with thirst, that they could not touch a blade of the dry pasture, amongst which flights of locusts lay nestled for the night, here and there, and chirruped like young sparrows. I distributed all the water I could spare from the waggon among the people; for, with their usual improvidence, the Namaquas had converted the goat skins I had given them to carry water for themselves, into clothes bags, and now, consequently, they were reduced to extremity. I lay down, thinking that to-morrow night most of the party are to perish.

Long before dawn I was awake from an uneasy sleep by Aaron the guide calling out to the people, "Keires! Keires! Rise! rise! the sands are heavy, and the Kuinip is far off." I never got up with more uncomfortable thoughts. I rode to prevent the thirst as much as possible, but my horses neither answered whip nor spur: they were quite dull and very much knocked up, particularly the grey, poor Old Night, for whom I as well as my people entertained a great regard. I first made his acquaintance during the Caffer war in 1835, and up to this day he was always lively and alert. But my horses had a bad groom in Magasee, also first seen in Caffer-land. I thought, from his previous life among the Caffers, that he would have been my best hand on the road and in the bush; but he turned out the black sheep of the party, a lazy, worthless fellow, who neglected his horses, and whose only enjoyment was sitting talking with old Aaron, "par mobile fratrum," pretending to preach after the manner of a missionary; and, most strange to say, collecting the tobacco oil (a deadly poison) from his own and other pipes, that he might suck it. This powerful narcotic made him, perhaps, more indolent than he would otherwise have been.

We moved slowly on—that is, the headmen and my own people, with the waggon and pack-oxen—for the rest set off in advance in quest of water, and disappeared. Some hills shewed themselves on our left, and far in the distance on our right, twenty-five miles at least, rose a great tabular mountain called Tans, or the screen, for it shuts in all the lesser mountains and hills near it; on each side of Tans extended black mountain chains.

Grey sand and gravel were around us on every side, and single blades of grass waved with the hot wind on the bare and burning face of the desert. The silence was deep and profound, for not a bird or insect was to be seen or heard. The poor cattle, halting every few minutes, were ready to drop with heat and thirst, and tried in vain to bellow. After accomplishing a distance of about twelve miles slowly and painfully, the sand deepened so much that we could get the waggon on no further, and therefore we outspanned; and, as the only chance of saving the horses and cattle, I sent the whole of them off under old Jan, after the people who had gone towards the river, and remained myself by the waggon with Kuisip, Ghoubid, Henrick Buys, and my white men. We had with us a few quarts of water to support us in this region of drought.

In the afternoon, whilst sitting under the shade of the waggon, which appeared in the midst of the desert of Tans like a ship cast away far at sea on a reef, we were visited by a singular little bird the colour of sand, and about the size of a lark, which ran round us, apparently examining the strange visitants of the waste. One's desire of collecting was suppressed by the sight of this kindly and curious visitor. In the evening we went to the nearest sand-hill to the west, and hunted about for roots of shrubs and grass to make a fire, and collected sufficient to roast small pieces of meat for our supper. Expecting the oxen to come to us on the morrow, and placing our entire trust in Providence, we lay down at night and slept without being disturbed, though afterwards we heard that Boechmans were about us during the hours of darkness.

The whole of the next day we looked in vain for the oxen; we saw no signs of them, nor of any of the people; in the evening a gemsbok was tracked and shot about a mile from the waggon. We were now impressed with the belief that no water had been found in the Kuisip, where the people first reached it under a black mount which we saw in the distance to the north, and which I named after the well-known secretary of the Admiralty, Sir John Barrow.

No more water remained with us than barely sufficient to support the life of two men for one day, and, as I felt myself bound "to stay by the ship" to the last, I told the three Namaqua head men, that I intended sending away my white men to-morrow morning, to give them a chance of saving their lives, and that I intended (if no help came) to remain by the waggon till the water was expended, and if one of the Namaquas was willing to stay with me in following the spoor of game to lead us to the water, which we might find about Mount Tans, distant eight or nine hours from us, I should be very glad.

After a consultation, it was arranged that Choubib should stay with me, and Kuisip, Henrick Buys, and my four white followers, in the meantime should leave us to shift for themselves, and in the hope of meeting again; but whether that would ever take place was very problematical. I comforted the people the best way I could, by telling them it was not unlikely the men who had left us were resting the oxen for a day at the water, before they returned with them to our assistance at the waggon; that to-morrow, when Kuisip and the others should leave me to look for water, and should happen to fall in with natives, their guns would sufficiently protect them; and that they must not now give way to despair, but exert themselves to the last.

Having all eaten a little biscuit soaked in water (about the last of both we had,) we lay down to repose for a few hours beside the waggon wheels. "Another night of misery," said one of the white men to his comrade; and so it was, for great thirst and anxiety made it so. In an uneasy sleep, I dreamt that I saw a person spilling water on the ground, and that I ran up to him and fought with him for doing so.

At one in the morning of the 7th April, I got up and sent off the people, with Henrick Buys, carrying only their duffle jackets and arms, and accompanied by my poor dog. Kuisip, the excellent chief, whom I always found very quiet and obliging, declared that he would not leave me, but would stay with Choubib and myself, till we also should abandon the waggon on the following morning, if no help came to us.

We tried to sleep again, and at sunrise, we three deserted mortals were awake by the barking of a Namaqua dog, which had joined us, and on looking up we saw two black objects approaching; thinking they were Boechmans, we made ready to fire, if their appearance was suspicious; but they came straight to the waggon without hesitation, and turned out to be two Damara men (slaves under the Namaquas), who had been despatched by Jan Buys with a small supply of water for us in the stomach of a sheep, and in the pericardium of a rhinoceros. We partook of this thankfully and eagerly, and then asked the news.

They said that the distance to the water was great, and that they had set out yesterday morning at sunrise, and had only reached us now; that there were several high sand-hills between us and the river, and that it was impossible the waggon could get over even the first of them. It also now appeared that many of the people had nearly perished on the 6th. A number of them had fallen down one after another among the sand-hills; and with their skins dry, their eyes bloodshot, a contraction of the throat, and their mouth covered with a crust, they lay helpless and dying. Some cried like children for help; some nearly blind; and others, mad with thirst and the heat of the sand, had asked their companions to make a hole and bury them, for that they were dying, and could not go any further. That Jan Buys and the stronger of the party had gone on to the Kuisip with the cattle, which had then been three days without a drop of water. That the people and cattle, when they saw the water in the river below them, ran down as if they had been crazed, and cutting their legs on the rocks, they scrambled down a steep precipice to reach the bed of the river, and throwing themselves into the water, they lay in it, and drank till the water ran out of their mouths again; and that after this excess, some of them had been attacked with a sort of cholera. That Jan had then returned with skins of water and pack-oxen, to carry off those who had sunk down in a dying state among the sand-hills, and had saved them all! This last intelligence was very gratifying.

The worst was now apparently past; though abundant hardships and trials were yet in store. It was found impracticable to get the waggon forward to the Kuisip, on account of the heavy sand-hills and precipices about the river; and news came that some of the oxen had fallen down the crags and broken their backs, that some of the dogs and of the sheep were dead, and that Captain Alexander's favourite steed, Night, was dead, and his other horse dying. The lazy Caffer groom had also lost his riding ox and all his clothes, and was nearly dead himself; and finally, Jan Buys, who had come back with these Job's-messenger tidings, had seen nothing of his brother Henrick and the white men! The waggon was now abandoned, and the ammunition, stores, clothes, and objects of natural history collected on the journey, made up into packs to be carried forward by the oxen; and these arrangements completed, with a melancholy but resolute spirit, Captain Alexander followed the people and pack-oxen up the sand-hill, looking back upon the waggon, like an unfortunate commander upon the wreck of his gallant ship. But no language can equal his own in the description of the melancholy feelings excited by these complicated distresses:—

Another melancholy sight now presented itself: poor Night, with apparently a number of dark Boschmans about him; but they turned out to be immense black vultures, which had already committed sad havoc on the head and stomach of my old and faithful servant.

We passed over no less than seven sand-hills, which were very steep. On the north side, and on their summits, were tufts of stick grass. Half way we met some of the Namaquas with a supply of water in the stomach of another gemsbok, and of which we gladly drank. After seven miles' ride in the dark, we found ourselves on the brink of a precipice, and we looked down into a black yawning gulf, at the bottom of which, and about six hundred feet below us, glimmered a fire. This was in the bed of the Kuisip. The Namaqua head men wished me to sleep where we were; but I was so anxious about the fate of the white men and Henrick Buys, that I resolved to make my way to the fire below.

Accordingly, staff in hand, and guided by our Jan, I scrambled and slid down by a narrow, broken, and dangerous path, fit only for goats or baboons, the precipitous descent to the Kuisip. Jan being stout, got some heavy falls. When half way down, the people, hearing our voices, set fire to a dry tree, to light us on our perilous way, and they were then seen running about in the red glare like demons in the devil's den—the name we gave this hole.

Elliot and Magasee soon after joined me to assist me down; and at the bottom I was very glad to find Henrick Buys, and Taylor, Robert, and Antonia, all alive, but lying down and very much exhausted. They said their joints were stiff with their walk in the night through the sands; and that with drinking so much water, in which they could not help indulging, their stomachs were quite out of order, and that they could eat nothing. I asked them how they fared after they left the waggon; they said they had lost one another in the dark, had wandered about, and had laid down in the sand-hills till sunrise, and in the extremity of their thirst they had been forced to resort to the last means to try and alleviate it, but that this had increased it.

Most of the bullocks were recovering, but the horse, England, which was below, was standing under a rock with some untasted grass before him. I lay down near him, and in the morning, when I awoke, not seeing him, I went up the deep and fearful looking bed of the river, enclosed with frowning precipices, in search of him, but he was nowhere to be seen. On returning to my kaross I found him stretched out dead, within a few feet of where I had lain.

The above long extract, and what in the original follows it, is, we think, exceedingly creditable to Captain Alexander in every respect. His difficulties were not yet over; but his excellent sense and stout heart bore him bravely through; and fortunately his health never failed. He left his favourite dog, Moses, lying dying by the carcase of his second horse, England, in the place he had named the Devil's Den.

Their further course lay along the Kuisip river towards the sea. They had now about fourteen pack-oxen laden with their goods, and the happy prospect of supplies of grass and water, abundant and unfailing. Their progress was slow, and, so early as the second day, no water could be found! while the oxen suffered severely from the heat. Their route was generally in the bed of the dried-up river, and the heat 93°. At the close of a march of twenty-one miles in this temperature, and when the oxen had had no water the day before, the traveller was about to despond, when one of the party appeared with a gay countenance, and pronounced the magic word 'kams!' (water). The people set up a joyful shout, and the Namaquas set off to quaff the nectar, leaving the others to care for the cattle. There were still four miles to travel before the welcome water was reached, at this charming spot:—

This place was to us, parched and hard-wrought as we were, a little Paradise. I felt again quite contented, seeing how the people and cattle were enjoying themselves, repining under the trees and among the reeds. On the reeds, by bringing two or three together, the red-headed weaver bird had hung its light grassy nest, which waved in the air with the wind. In the evening, I went up the hills on the north bank, to look for the sea which we were striving so hard to reach; but I could see nothing of it. Bare and extensive plains lay to the north, and at my feet were large crystals of hornblende imbedded in quartzose rock.

We had not got any game for some days; the sheep were almost all eaten, and the broken-backed and lame bullocks devoured by my forty followers. Not knowing that we should obtain any supplies at the sea, (and we were almost certain we should find no game there,) we were now reduced to very short commons. A sheep was made to go a long way, and none of us ever had sufficient to appease our hunger. The Namaquas asked for a bullock's hide, which we had kept to make shoes of, and, roasting it at the fire, they pounded it between stones, and devoured the whole of it. I partook of it also, and found it very tough, but not disagreeable to the taste: to be sure, at the time, I could have eaten my saddle for hunger; and I certainly thought that our leather trousers must soon furnish a meal. Old Choubib was a great talker and a great eater; and when he got a morsel of meat before him, he made always a large hole in it. An ingenious device was fallen upon to cheat him of his usual portion. When he sat down to eat, one of the white men asked him a question on some subject, he answered it at length; then another would ask his opinion on something else, and thus he would be kept talking whilst the rest were busy eating from the mess; and, when he had finished his discourse, he found but a scanty morsel left.

We halted four-and-twenty hours, and then went on again. Shortly after we left the reeds, we saw the footmarks of men. Many of the Namaquas got alarmed at this, and wished to pack off, that we might ascertain who and what the strangers were. We had many stories among the people of the wild men who lived by the sea at the mouth of the Kuisip, of their killing white sailors, of their bloody battles with the Damaras, &c. But I would not consent to delay: we went on, and, after fifteen miles' march, having lost all the cliffs and crags which, higher up, had enclosed the river, we offpacked on its grassy bed. By moonlight we saw a place which looked damp, and digging there we luckily found water.

But water was not always thus easily found, nor were the hardships of the travellers yet near an end. It might, however, be tedious to dwell longer here upon what, in the original work, by many minute touches, so powerfully interests the sympathies. On one weary day, in their painful progress towards the sea, they had almost touched the verge of despair. Our traveller tells—

When matters were in this miserable state, I saw Kuisip approach, with two or three of his people; I hesitated at first to ask him the news, but at last said—"Is there water?"

"Yes," he answered, "and we passed it on our way here."

"Is there enough for the men and cattle?"

"There is enough."

On hearing which the poor people's eyes, which had been clouded with despair, immediately brightened, and they gave themselves up to joy. "Kams, 'kams!"—water, water, was heard on every side.

To compare great things with small—as the soldiers of the gallant Moore, languid with their distressing retreat, rose fresh from the heights of Corunna, with the prospect of a contest, so did my people, exhausted with their thirsty journey, acquire a new life with the prospect of moistening their parched bodies.

Little did our friends at home then suppose that we were delighted beyond measure at finding two little holes full of muddy water. Ye, whose tongues have clove to the roof of the mouth with thirst, can appreciate the exceeding relief we now experienced at the immediate prospect of wetting our cracked lips!

It is not wonderful that impatience and discontent prevailed among the men at this time; but their leader managed their feelings with great address, and, before matters came to extremity, they found some natives who were induced to place confidence in them, and from whom they obtained useful information respecting the Damaras. On the 19th of April 1837, they at last saw the ocean, now first reached at this point from the Cape—and pitched their tent near Pelican Point, in Walvisch Bay, in lat. 22° 55' S. They were in the greatest want of food, and were most thankful on finding a large dead stranded fish, and obtaining supplies of clams. Their biscuit was all done, and, as they never had vegetables of any kind, they had all become tired with flesh, save the Namaquas, who are neither fish nor bread eaters. Bread is, indeed, only the food of civilized men. The natives of Walvisch Bay live much on fish, and now upon the carcasses of the whales killed by the crews of the whaling ships which frequent the place. These seem to be only Americans; and Captain Alexander's earnest hopes of some British ship appearing in the bay, which had long encouraged his people, were sadly disappointed. The Bay people had either fled on the appearance of the armed party, or were not there at that season, for none were seen save some very old women, and a few young men, who seemed to act as scouts, and always went about armed. On shifting their first position in the bay, an American whale-boat was seen nearing the beach, and some of the party were nearly frantic with joy, which Captain Alexander felt more moderately. He says—

The crew, seeing such extraordinary figures as I and my men were, with our beards, ostrich plumes, hunting frocks, and arms, hesitated to land; but hearing us speak English they stepped ashore, and, in the cool New England way, they shook hand with us without saying a word, when one of them, a mate, said—"What gang do you belong to?" Now, gang, in Yankee phraseology, does not mean, as with us, a gang of robbers, slaves, or convicts, but merely a company; so I, having travelled the States, from Chesapeake to old Kentuck, answered, without feeling annoyance, that we had come from the Cape of Good Hope so far, on an Expedition of Discovery; on which the mate, with a half incredulous look, answered, "Oh, H—l!"

I asked what ship had anchored in the bay, and the mate said she was the Commodore Perry, Hoborn master, from New England—"and there is my captain," pointing to a lusty man in his shirt sleeves, who had just landed from another boat. The captain came up in a friendly way, and said he thought we were shipwrecked mariners, for he had never seen or heard of white men before in this section of Africa, said he should like to see our camp, "at the head of the navigation," and "guessed" we should like to come on board, and eat a little ship-biscuit and drink a glass of grog. I thanked him, and said that I was on the look-out for a new "location" for my tent, but would be with him by-and-by. I then directed Taylor to accompany the captain in his boat on his way to the tent, and went with Robert, Elliot, and the guide, among the sand hills, to find another watering place.

We had been landing another cabalja, and had left our shoes in charge of a boy. At first, on the soft mud, we felt no inconvenience, but when we got on the burning sands we longed for the receipt of the Fire King; however on we trudged, crossed the mouth of the Kuisip, in which there appeared to have been water only after floods in the river; toiled up and down the sand hills, and found, in different valleys between them, six or eight holes, in which was brackish water; but we saw no place where the oxen could have found food half so good as where they were, though the pasture there was coarse enough.

After labouring for four hours under a hot sun, sometimes half-way up to the knee in sand, and with our feet scorched with the heat, stung with the quick grass, and bruised with the baked clay, we reached the tent, and found Captain Hoborn and his people there. We had nothing to offer the strangers but some haras fruit and brack-water, which last the Americans could not swallow. I told them that we had suffered so much from want of water of any kind, that sweet or brack, clear or muddy, was all the same to us, provided we got a belly-full of it.

"That's d—d hard, I swear," cried the carpenter of the whaler.

"Can we get any green or fresh here?" (vegetables or fresh meat) was next asked.

"We have seen none yet," I said; "we are ourselves much in want of provisions, and would be glad to trade with you for a little ship's beef and biscuit."

"What can you miss?" was asked.

"Some rope, knives, sambuks or whips of rhinoceros hide, pipes, and zebra-head skins for pouches."

"Well, come on board, and see what we have got, and speak to the Niggers here, will ye, for some fresh for us, and we'll miss them a musket for two or three bullocks."

I went off with the Americans toward the boat "at the head of the navigation," and we found it high and dry, with the boat-keeper asleep in it. He was saluted with this strange abuse—"You've been taking a dodger, eh! you damned h—l!" and we then put our shoulders to the gunwale of the boat and shoved her over the mud into deep water again.

I was hospitably entertained on board the Commodore, and enjoyed especially the biscuit, potatoes, and penquin's eggs boiled hard, the yolk of which is capital eating. Captain Hoborn said he thought of remaining four months at Walvisch Bay, that he was now looking out for hunchback whales to come in every day to breed, and that they had already got some fish lower down the coast. They never heard of any British whalers coming to Walvisch Bay, but saw an English brig at Angra Piquena lately, and said that our people seemed to overlook the fishing on the African coast almost entirely, which is certainly true.

I told the Americans several stories of the chase, in return for their good fare; and one of the mates "calculated" that he would make his fortune in a month if he had "that runner of ours" (Henrick) in New York.

The Namaquas were cheated in attempting to trade with the Americans—a circumstance which, we fear, is not rare in commercial transactions between the civilized and the barbarous of all nations; but when Captain Alexander pointed out the mistake, it was rectified.

No British ship appeared, the American succours were just nothing, and the Namaquas became impatient to return home. The situation of the party and their leader was certainly not enviable, nor their prospects brilliant. Digging for clams was a frequent employment; and Captain Alexander good-humouredly remarks:—

It was rather an odd employment to go down on one's knees, as the tide was receding, and black shags and white gulls were screaming round one, and wingless penguins were shuffling along the beach of the dark main, and to dig with one's hands in the wet sand, and at half a foot under the surface, to find the desired shell-fish. I have not much of "the kid glove or silver fork" in me; still this occupation rather spoils my nails; but what will not one do for dear life—for food! We got bushels of clams at Pelican Point; and they ate very sweetly at the tent.

They at last got the Bay people to exchange a few lean sheep and goats for cutlery, and such articles of traffic as they still possessed; and one of the American captains, "a worthy, kind-hearted man," offered to run over to St Helena with the traveller, and those persons he had brought from the Cape, for £70, or the price of one whale. But from this proposal his gallant spirit revolted; and he accordingly held council with the head men about their further proceedings:—

Henrick Buys said he would go with me to the world's end if I chose; the determination of this fine fellow and prime hunter was quite an "I pre, sequor" one; and I highly appreciated his resolves and merits; as to Kuisip, he was also willing to assist me with his own services and those of his people; but he was under the guidance of the cunning old fox, Choubib, the interpreter; who, seeing that the man-of-war, from which he expected so much, did not arrive, did all he could to persuade me to return by the shortest road to the Orange River, pretending that he was quite alarmed about my resolution to go to the eastward, that we should now certainly perish either from hunger, thirst, or the wild Damaras; and that the only chance he saw of saving the expedition was by returning to Ababies again, and recrossing the Great Flat.

I answered that I would sooner die than again see Calabash Kraal, where began our greatest miseries; that if he did not choose to go farther with me, I should now give him the musket and the other things which had been promised him, and that he might depart in peace; but that nothing could induce me to give up the attempt to penetrate to the east. Seeing that he could not carry into effect his own secret intention of returning direct to his people, he at last said he would also accompany me to the sources of the Swakop and Kuisip.

Choubib was no favourite with my people. He was a short-tempered, pragmatical old fellow, and was also excessively greedy; he carried with him sundry bags, in which he stowed away whatever odds and ends were lying about; small bits of tobacco, straps, buckles, needles, buttons, soap, &c., and it was very difficult to prevent a positive fight between him and my attendants, white and coloured, so capacious and quarrelsome was he.

As we could have now done without him, (having Henrick Buys, who could also interpret for me,) I wished Choubib to leave for the sake of harmony; but he would not; and even tried to persuade me to remain longer at the sea for the man-of-war. I had waited a fortnight and saw no signs of her; and we had had so much difficulty in getting a small supply of provisions, that I could not remain longer by the sea side, eating up everything, and consequently was obliged to move. Why Choubib was so glad when he first saw the whale boat, was because he thought it belonged to the man-of-war I expected, and that, if I sailed in her, to him would fall my bullocks, stores, &c., and that he would obtain besides, a handsome present from the vessel!

Captain Alexander speculates about the capabilities of Walvisch Bay, which, as a station, he imagines, to possess many advantages besides a good climate. The accounts which he received from native chiefs and guides about the nations to the northwards, or in the interior, are so confused and contradictory that little reliance is to be placed on them. One nation of Nubees, or red men, to the north of the Bay, whom the Bay chief, Quasip, had once visited, strongly excited the traveller's curiosity; but he could get no one to go with him to the place indicated.

With two Boschmans for guides, the party left the Bay, suffering from hunger in ascending the Kuisip, as they had suffered more dreadfully from thirst in descending it. But they sometimes diverged from the course of this river; and the cattle found abundant grass, and the men zebra flesh, while Captain Alexander ventured to kill the fattest heifer as a regale on approaching a land of greater plenty. They were now near the country of the Damaras, the scene of the traveller's original and principal discoveries. In the first Damara village, no inhabitants were found:—

The huts were of a conical form, and were composed of stakes meeting at top, and covered with grass. Round the bottom outside were placed stones to keep the grass from being blown away. To some of the huts there was a sort of porch to exclude the wind. Each hut was about ten feet high; and the whole eighteen were arranged at some distance from each other, in a circle. In the middle was the dancing place; but there were no kraals for sheep or cattle.

The village was a mile distant from the water (a pool of the small river Numsep, or man's-kaross-lay-aside,) that the wild beasts might not be disturbed in their passage to the water by the vicinity of man. The hill above the village is a place of retreat; and it is the custom of the Damaras to sound an alarm, upon the sight of strangers, with a cow's or deer's horn, and to run up the hill to defend themselves, if necessary, with arrows and stones.

About the Numsep, the number of rhinoceroses was very great; old and fresh traces were seen everywhere.

We now saw miles of hedges, about three feet high, laid to direct the wild animals to pitfalls placed here and there for them; the pitfalls for the rhinoceroses were four feet deep and four broad, with branches and leaves over them, and were consequently not large enough to take in his whole bulk, but were only sufficient for his fore legs, which the people said was the best way of securing him; as his legs once in, they have no purchase with which to raise his body. There were also other means for securing the smaller game.

I ascended an eminence above Abashouap, and was much struck with the grandeur and beauty of this part of Damara Land. Looking towards the east, and at the distance of eight or ten miles, rose the huge mass of the Tans mountain, with its square top and furrowed sides; lesser heights were beside him, whilst the whole country was a series of ridges and valleys, on which were scattered dwarf trees and bushes, whilst fine grass waved gently in the breeze in every direction.

Huts, three and four together, of the same construction as I had lately seen, were observed in many parts of the varied and extensive landscape; but I did not see a human being. The guides said that, last year, there had been a drought and famine in the land, many of the Damaras had died of hunger, and the others had moved off for a time to the eastward, where more rain had fallen.

The cattle were now beginning to recruit from the plentiful supply of fresh grass; and though the fatigues of the journey were still severely felt, Captain Alexander's flattering consolation was, that "no white man" had ever before ascended the heights which they traversed. As the people are quite as little known as their country, we shall copy the first account of this dull race of highlanders.

I now learned from my guides that we were in the immediate vicinity of a Heis, or Damara village, which had not been deserted, as the others had been, which we had already past. I had not allowed any firing for four-and-twenty hours, as I was afraid of alarming the Damaras, and I now sent off Oahap alone, to prepare the Damaras for our seeing them, and to assure them that they should not be harmed in any way.

On the evening of the 18th of May, Oahap came down the glen, at the bottom of which we lay, with the head man of the Heis, and three others, at which I was much pleased.

These hill Damaras were about five feet seven inches in height, and in colour and feature had all the characteristics of the negro, even to the projecting shin bone. They came with long staves in their hands, and without arms, in token of friendship and confidence, though perhaps their weapons were not far off. Their hair was peculiar; that is, it was cut off quite round the head, and an inch above the ear, leaving only the hair on the top of the head—in the manner of the Roundheads of the Cromwellian period. They wore short karosses of deer skin, and softened flaps of skin before and behind, to cover their nakedness; and in the hind flap, which was longer than the fore one, there was a pocket for holding roots, &c. They wore soles or sandals.

The head man was about forty-five years of age, and was a pleasant and communicative person. He said he would make one of his men guide us to the next village, Oahap and Numeep having fulfilled their bargain in bringing us among the Hill Damaras.

I asked the head man how he lived at this season, and he answered, "Badly enough. We are now eating mice, lizards, roots, and sometimes leaves."

I inquired if he had always lived where he now did, and he said, "We have always lived among these hills; and we never knew of any other land."

I asked if he had anything to do with the Damaras of the Plains. "No, nothing," said the head man, "they are our enemies; they are black like ourselves; but they speak a different language; we speak the language of the Namaquas; and the Damaras of the Plains, or Kamaka Damap (Cattle Damaras) speak a language of their own."

I told him that he and his people must not be frightened at white men, and that I intended visiting his village next morning. He answered, "Though we never have seen white men before, yet we always expected to do so. We heard always that they would one day come into the land, and we now saw these strange men. I shall tell my people not to run away to-morrow."

We packed at sunrise; and the cattle going by a circuitous but easier path, north and east, I walked up the glen with a few men and riding oxen to the Damara village. We found it in a small mountain valley, surrounded with granitic rocks, amongst which were trees and shrubs, and with a citadel hill close at hand to retire to, on occasions of alarm. The twelve conical huts were arranged in a circle, and we now saw Damara women as well as men.

The women had their hair cut in the same way as the men, and many of them had lost two joints of one of their little fingers, which they said they had cut off when they themselves had been sick, or their children had been ill. Cowrie shells hung from their heads, and half way down their faces. They wore short karosses on the shoulders, and over the fore flap or apron there were hanging short thongs, on which were strung pieces of reed, bones of hares, beads, blue and white stones, &c. The hind flap, like the men's, was provided with a pocket, for what the Dutch call "veld kost," country food, as bulbs, the fruit of the mysebryanthemum, &c.

By the doors of the huts lay bows and arrows, like those of the Namaquas; and in the grassy covering of the huts was stuck the usual throwing assegai. Clay cooking pots of a conical shape were in every hut.

The hill Damaras are a numerous nation, extending from the heights south of the Swakop to the Little Koanquip river, and they live in small communities under head men, in the manner we now saw them doing, without one supreme or paramount chief of the nation. They are commonly called Koup Damap, or Dung Damaras, by way of reproach by the Namaquas; whilst the Namaquas themselves bear a similar contemptuous epithet, among their constant foes, the Damaras of the Plains. I think 'Humi or Hill Damaras is the best term for the people with whom we had now to deal.

"We call them Koup Damap," said a Namaqua, "because they keep nothing to kill, and not even dogs to catch the fawns of the springbok, as the Boschmans do."

As the Hill Damaras have no cattle to transport mat huts from one place to another (in the manner of the Namaquas,) their huts are permanent, and last for a long time; and sometimes they are covered with bark instead of grass.

The Hill Damaras cultivate no grain; only sometimes raise a little tobacco.

Few people are more simple in their habits than the Hill Damaras, and among them there are hardly any ceremonies on those occasions when most other nations shew marked peculiarities. Thus, when a man wishes to marry a girl, he goes to the father with a present of bulbs and striped mice, to feast the old gentleman; and, if he is accepted as a son-in-law, he adds to the onions and mice, an assegai or two, bows and arrows, a couple of karosses of springbok or rabbit skins, &c., and some of which he gets back again. They then dance a little, (they make no honey beer at a marriage,) and the bridegroom carries off his wife to his own huts. Among primitive folks, like the Damaras, none live in single blessedness.

Superstitions of different kinds were found among the Namaquas and Boschmans; but the stupid Hill Damaras have no religion or worship, either real or superstitious. They believe, the interpreter said, in neither God nor Devil.

The party came unexpectedly upon a large village of the Namaquas, who had shortly before defeated the Plain Damaras in three severe fights, and taken their cattle from them, but conciliated the Hill Damaras. This warlike expedition had been led by the great Namaqua chief, Aramap, who had procured some guns, which gave him an immense advantage over the Damaras, who knew nothing of fire-arms.

We now approach the heart of Captain Alexander's peculiar discoveries.

On the 24th of May, Aramap's brother, with several other Namaquas, came on riding oxen, and in their best apparel, to me, and to conduct me to the great chief. I left Nares with them. We passed over one of the finest plains I had seen in Africa, covered with sweet grass, and with high trees, and bushes dispersed on it in detached groups, and among which wild horses were seen. We approached the banks of a river with a strange name for such a scene, the Kel-kurup, or "First ugly river;" and we found its banks rather steep, and with pools of water in its bed, which was about seventy yards broad. Looking across it, there appeared to be a great town of Namaqua and Hill Damara huts, round and conical. The whole plain was covered with huts, in hamlets of five and six together; and cattle and sheep-kraals beside them. We had got then to "the fertile plains and fine cattle country," which were laid down from native report on Arrowsmith's map; and I was much rejoiced to think that the ship of war had not come for us, or we should have missed seeing the three hundred miles of new country we had just passed over, after leaving Walvisch Bay, and the very fine region for grass and game we were now in.

The landscape, besides being beautiful from the abundance of trees and pasture, (amongst which large herds and flocks were seen grazing in every direction,) was imposing by reason of the picturesque and primitive mountains to the north and east, and placing the town of Niais (or very black) as it were in a vast amphitheatre. The first mountain to the north had four summits; and as it had no particular name, I dignified it with that of the Hydrographer to the Admiralty, as Captain Beaufort had been of the greatest assistance to the expedition. The most distant mountain, a blue peak, (Karubee, or Roll Mount,) was subsequently named at the Royal Geographical Society after myself, whilst south of this was Huhap, Thorn Glen Mountain, Hubies, (much, or) the Great Mountain, eighteen hundred feet high, square topped, with a peak at the southern extremity, and whose sides were deeply furrowed. South of Hubies was Nahabip, or Tortoise Mountain, and some minor heights. I named this group of mountains, the most picturesque I had seen, after our most gracious Sovereign Lady, the Queen.

After enjoying the view of the detached mountains and of the plains at their feet, and calculating that, in the scattered town of Niais, there must have been about one thousand two hundred souls, I crossed the Kei-kurup, and halted on the other bank, where I directed the people to unload the cattle. Aramap now came from his hut, attended by several of his old people. He was a little, modest-looking man, with the usual Namaqua features, as to high cheek-bones, narrow eyes, and prominent lips, but his nose was slightly inclined to aquiline. He had nothing in his outward man to denote the bold and intrepid warrior, who had beaten the formidable tribe of Kamaka Damap, and had thus saved the Namaquas of the Upper Fish River from annihilation. But Aramap, like other great commanders, though short, is distinguished by a daring mind, by good judgment, and by very active habits.

He said that it was unsafe to "pack off" near the river, for lions swept along it almost nightly, and had lately carried off both sheep and cattle from his people; accordingly, we carried up the baggage, with assistance, to a clear space adjoining Aramap's hut, who erected mat screens to shelter the people, and who did all in his power to render us comfortable.

Here, then, was I now at Niais, far in the interior of Africa, but seated once more in my tent, and in the midst of abundance! It is true that we might be attacked by Kamaka Damaras, but having Aramap near me, who knew so well how to deal with them, I had no anxiety on this score. We might now have swam in milk if we had been so disposed; night and morning the women brought us great quantities to exchange for large-eyed needles; Choubib also had opportunities for getting drunk on honey beer, and though we had nothing in the shape of bread or vegetables, yet of flesh we had plenty. Aramap gave me a handsome present of pack and slaughter oxen, and of sheep. I gave him a cloak, medal, pipe, shawls, axes, beads, handkerchiefs, &c., in return, and we became great friends.

From this liberal and brave chief, Captain Alexander procured a great deal of information about the countries beyond him, but found no encouragement to go forward, either through the plains of the Damaras or to the Eastern Ocean. He also obtained information from some Kamaka Damaras, whom he found here prisoners of war.

They are a much finer race than either the Hill or Cattle Damaras. The men are square-built, and muscular; the women tall and graceful, with handsomer features than the other Damaras. From one of the women he heard that, at some of the creeks on the coast, they traded with white men, exchanging their cattle for iron, knives, and calabashes. Where this commercial intercourse takes place with the Portuguese, Captain Alexander is at a loss to guess; but he imagines it may be Great Fish Bay.

While here, Captain Alexander enjoyed a lion-hunt with the warlike chief Aramap, and killed one noble animal, of which the Englishman got the skin, and the Hill Damaras the carcase. Some fearful stories are related of the ferocity of lions in the plains of the Damara country. The latter tribe live apart from the conquering Namaquas, and act as their herdsmen. The traveller tried to converse with their chief, who, to his serious questioning upon his thoughts of life and death, replied, like a philosopher—"If I live, I live; if I die, I die: but the lambs are in charge of the children, and I must go away and look after them"—and he held out his hand for the expected piece of tobacco.

Resolved that, however it might be as to thirst, they should not again want provisions, Captain Alexander here increased his flock to the number of 160, giving in goods about a sixpence a-head for a sheep, and a gown-piece or a shawl for an ox.

On the 31st of May, Captain Alexander reluctantly turned his face Cape-ward. Having done his utmost to make an extensive sweep, he was satisfied that, in his circumstances, man could do no more. The greater part of the population of Niais turned out to see the party depart, many of their woolly heads ornamented with the gaudy handkerchiefs just obtained in barter. The chief Aramap, "his fine large wife," and his head people, accompanied the traveller to point out a copper mine. Aramap and his people are anxious for missionaries. The women, in particular, said—"Send us teachers for ourselves and for our children."

As the traveller proceeded, those who had joined him in his progress were gradually dropping off to their own places. Before parting, he obtained some farther geographical information from Henrick the Hunter, concerning the tribes in the interior, and about a short route to the Bechuana country; but it is probable that part of Henrick's intelligence, as the newspapers say, wants confirmation. His brother Jan, whom we left so long ago, had now safely reached the banks of the Koanquip, with the waggon, which was restored to Captain Alexander, and repaired for the farther homeward journey. Jan had his own share of adventures in this enterprise.

Among the numerous marvellous stories which the traveller picked up among the Namaquas, some were of baboons. One brownie of this species had acted the part of shepherd to a Namaqua man. It remained with the flock all day, and at night drove them home, riding upon a goat. The milk of one goat was allotted to its use, with a small allowance of other provisions, and, honestly stocking only its own goat, it was careful to guard the milk of the rest from the children. This hairy shepherd held the service for about a year, when it was killed in a tree by a leopard. Captain Alexander does not vouch for the truth of the story. Another tale of this kind almost rivals Hogg's famous Pongos; and many of the fables and traditions of the Namaquas display both fancy and invention. Captain Alexander rates them far too low.

Captain Alexander had the satisfaction to return to Cape Town, on the 21st September, in high health and spirits, and to bring back all his people in the same condition. He also brought many skins of beasts and birds, and a good collection of dried plants. He hopes that extended intercourse with the people beyond the Orange River, may result from his expedition, for the mutual benefit of the colonists and the natives. One main use of his entertaining work, is placing the character of the aborigines in a true and very favourable light. The people represented as cut-throats and robbers, were found, when tried, faithful, honest, and friendly; nor, in any single instance, was life put in peril among these tribes; while, but for their help, the traveller must either have abandoned the enterprise, or perished miserably with his people.

In conclusion, the reader will be glad to learn that, shortly after his return to the Cape and civilization, Captain Alexander bestowed the cloak of skins, much to his own satisfaction, and embarked with his lady for London, where they landed on Christmas Day—and thus with a wedding ends this strange eventful history, and the most entertaining book of travels we have opened for many a day.

Sketch of the Civil Engineering of North America.

By David Stevenson, Civil-Engineer.

THIS volume contains much that, in the present state of excitement about railroads and other great public works, will interest many persons in this country. The author, a highly respectable civil-engineer in Edinburgh, was professionally attracted by the marvels told of the engineering works of America; and, as he could find no satisfactory account of them, he resolved to take advantage of a period of professional leisure, and examine for himself. He has done so effectually, and supplied to others of the profession the want which carried him across the Atlantic, and from Quebec to South Carolina; to the great western lakes, and generally to examine all the important harbours, and lake navigations, steam-navigations, water-works, railroads, canals, bridges, and whatever in the United States can particularly interest an engineer. He appears to have been everywhere well received, and treated with liberality and kindness, both by the public functionaries, and those private individuals who had it in their power to communicate information.

In a Republic, they are frugal even in their great public works. Mr Stevenson visited many of the American ports; and he says—"I found that accommodation for vessels of great burden had been obtained in so satisfactory a manner, and at so small an expense, as could not fail to strike with astonishment all who had seen the enormously costly docks of London and Liverpool, and the stupendous asylum harbours of Plymouth, Kingstown, and Cherbourg. I have little hesitation in saying, that the smallest of the post-office packet-stations in the Irish Sea, has required a much larger expenditure of capital than the Americans have invested in the formation of harbour accommodation along a line of coast of no less than 4000 miles, extending from the Gulf of St Lawrence to the Mississippi. But the deeply indented shores of America present many natural facilities for forming harbours at small cost. The piers and breakwaters on the lakes are often more substantially formed than those of the harbours on the Atlantic coast; and this is found to be requisite to their stability, as gales and storms on the lakes are often very severe, and the lake waves become as formidable as those of the Ocean. The lake navigation of America closes about the end of November, and does not open until May; and in some seasons the ice has not disappeared even at the end of that month. Mr Stevenson has devoted one chapter to river, and another to steam navigation. The steamers of America he describes as built upon no fixed or general principle. Every builder follows his own ideas and opinions; and they cannot all be best. The different principles of construction, and ways of gaining the one great end, speed, are minutely explained. Mr Stevenson made a voyage from New York to Albany in the Rochester, a steamer whose average speed was above fourteen miles an hour; but sometimes above sixteen miles and a half. She draws only four feet water; and the power of her engine is greater than that of any British steamer.

In the United States, there are now 2700 miles of canals, 1600 miles of railways finished, and thirty-three railways going on, which, when completed, will give 2500 miles of railroad. "The seal," says Mr S., "with which the Americans undertake, and the rapidity with which they carry on every enterprise which has the enlargement of their trade for its object, cannot fail to strike all who visit the United States, as a characteristic of the nation. Forty years ago, that country was almost without a lighthouse, and now no fewer than two hundred are nightly exhibited on its coast; thirty years ago, it had but one steamer and one short canal." In road-making the Americans are far behind Europe; which is, however, mainly owing to physical obstacles, to the want of proper materials, and their severe and protracted winters. Travelling on Corduroy roads through the forests might, in a Catholic country, form a convenient, if not too severe a mode of penance. The railroads of America are much more cheaply constructed than ours, from the low price of timber, and from the proprietors of the land not being allowed those large concealing damages which English landholders claim and obtain; yet all the rails are brought from England.

We have all heard of the Americans moving a house on wheels; but believed the locomotive dwellings to be always constructed of wood. And this was once true; but now they make brick buildings shift their quarters, those shifty Americans. What will they do next? Mr Stevenson saw the operation performed on No. 130, Chatham Street, New York, and was so much interested that he delayed his departure for three days to witness it. Could he but transport the method to London alone, it would be worth a fortune. Meanwhile, the travelled house, No. 130, Chatham Street, is described as twenty-five feet in width, fifty in depth, and four stories high. We wish we could copy out the entire process, for it is exceedingly interesting. Like many of Mr Stevenson's descriptions, it is illustrated by cuts. The people of New York think nothing of an operation which we would consider far more curious than a balloon ascent, or a man walking on the water. They do not even move their furniture; they are an economical people, and may consider that one carriage may do for all. Perhaps the family do not put out the fire or suspend their usual business; and, at any rate, they need not. Mr Brown, who occupied the lower part of the house as a carver and gilder's shop, carried Mr Stevenson to the upper story after No. 130 had been fairly set down in its new site, that he might convince him there were no rents in the walls and ceilings of the rooms. He was astonished to find one of them filled with plates of mirror-glass and picture frames, that had never been removed from the house. The glass alone, thus moved, was valued at £300. House-moving is necessarily a slow and expensive process. No. 130 had to fall back only 14½ feet, and it cost about £200, and took seven hours to move, after five weeks of preparation. Mr Stevenson saw a church that had been moved 1100 feet; but it was made entirely of wood, though it had galleries and a spire. A house-mover is now a business in the American towns.

Mr Stevenson's work must possess great interest and value to scientific men, and especially to those of his own profession, whether at home, in America, or upon the Continent. As it will be fully noticed in the scientific journals, and is not exactly in our way, we leave it, with the conviction that the author deserves well of his country and of his profession.

The Book of Family Crests.

We could not have supposed it possible to cram two volumes—arranged in the form of a dictionary—with crests, mottoes, and descriptions of the blazonry of crests. But here they are—1st, the dictionary of all English proper names, and of terms used in heraldry; next a brief history of heraldry, with a glossary of the terms used in the blazonry of crests; and, finally, cuts of the crests themselves—extraordinary monsters many of them are, though there is amusement in hunting them up, and trying to extract meanings from them. As this is the most comprehensive work of the kind attainable at reasonable cost, we have no doubt that it will be a desirable one to many.

Goyder's Epitome of Phrenology.

This very cheap, tidy, and neat tome forms a lucid compendium of phrenology. It exhibits the print of a bust, with all the organs marked upon it; and a History of Phrenology, with a variety of miscellaneous information, is followed by an account of the discovery, nature, and functions of each of them. A second edition of Mr Goyder's "Philosophy of Acquisitiveness" is also before us. It is a sensible treatise on Covetousness and Avarice, written in a truly Christian spirit; and if people let its phrenology alone, we suppose it will not meddle with or harm them.

Memoirs of a Prisoner of State.

The most popular foreign book which has appeared in England for several years, is probably the "Memoirs of Silvio Pellico." "The Prisoner of State," though a man of inferior note, and possessing nothing of the genius which has embalmed the story of the Martyr of Italian Freedom, has produced a work which will be read with interest in England, from reasons altogether independent of the author. The translator, an Italian from his name, has stripped the book of many of its ornaments, and yet left it sufficiently embellished. The prisoner of State was a young Frenchman, named Andryane, who, residing at Geneva, became acquainted with certain Italian refugees, and was by one of them induced to undertake a secret embassy into Italy, for the purpose of rousing the patriots. He had no sooner undertaken this rash mission than he repented; and he may fairly be styled as much the victim of his own inconsiderateness, as of liberty, or of Austrian emissaries. The papers entrusted to him at Geneva were found in his possession at Milan, where, in consequence, he suffered a tedious imprisonment, during which he was in daily fear of his life. The mode by which the prisoners of State, secluded in different chambers, contrived to hold communication, is very curious; but, now that the Schoolmaster is abroad, might be mischievous in the penitentiaries and bridewells of England—so we shall pass it.

The narrative of the State prisoner, M. Alexander Andryane, breaks off abruptly and provokingly, just as he approaches the castle of Spielberg, and is about to become the inmate of the dungeon of Count Confalonieri—"the hero," may we say the Wallace, of modern Italy. Count Confalonieri is described as the purest of patriots, and the most exalted and amiable of men; one who inspires the enthusiasm of attachment to his own person, and devotion to the cause of freedom, in all who approach him. His wife is described as not less noble. Their public virtue is of exuberant Italian growth; the colder northern world has need of such heroic examples. In Salotti—a zealous functionary of the Austrian Government at Milan, and a willing tool of despotism, who undertook the inquisitorial examination of the prisoners, and was ever eager to make discoveries of plots and conspiracies, whether they existed or not—there is a complete delineation of a tyrant's instrument, a modern chief inquisitor, cruel, cunning, and circumventing.

Political Discourses. By George Ramsay, B.M. Trin. Coll. Cambridge.

The careful analysis of these five Discourses by a philosophic Conservative would occupy far more space than we can at present afford. The author displays acuteness in investigation, and power of reasoning and reflection; and, although his bias is often apparent, he argues fairly and dispassionately, and with the advantage of good arrangement and a remarkably lucid style.

An Essay on Food. By W. Grisenthwaite.

This title is probably chosen to attract attention to a work—and certainly a very ingenious one—the object of which is to subvert the entire received system of physiology, and establish a new theory, we may say, of animal life. We have neither leisure nor space to let our medical readers into Mr Grisenthwaite's grand secrets respecting the waste of the body, the true cause of animal heat, &c., and must be contented at present to intimate the existence of his extraordinary hypothesis.

Essay towards a Science of Consciousness.

By J. L. Murphy.

This queer, and, in some respects, clever dissertation, is dedicated to Mr Owen by an ardent disciple. Though decidedly hostile to what he denominates supernaturalism, Mr Murphy is also opposed to the Malthusian doctrine and the principles of phrenology, at which he makes shrewd hits. Like the Chinese and the Hebrews, it is in the chest, the bosom, the heart, the stomach, he places the seat of consciousness and of spiritual impulses; and he makes a plausible story out of this hypothesis. Although the work is a strange jumble of truth, plain sense, and the wildest extreme of Mr Owen's doctrines, it has a redeeming spirit of earnestness and honesty about it, which covers a multitude of sins.

The Oracle of Rural Life; an Almanac for Country Gentlemen.

An admirable little work; and, we hope, to be a permanent one. Besides the utility department, which is amply supplied by a calendar, lists of fairs, instructions in gardening and farming operations in the different months, from high authority, Nimrod holds forth on his favourite topics of horses and hounds, hunting and racing, and Tom Oakleigh on the gentler branches of "woodcraft" and grouse shooting. There is also a great deal of information about the hunting packs kept in different counties; and, altogether, the "Oracle of Rural Life" is a delightful melange. It is embellished with numerous spirited and characteristic illustrations, very well executed; and, with all these excellent qualities, is wonderfully cheap.

MOXON has just published nearly the whole of Rogers' Poems, in one neat, low-priced volume. Though Mr Rogers' admirers are chiefly of a class that can afford fine paper and print, and costly embellishment, his refined and classic pages deserve to be placed within the reach of those who may be better endowed with poetic taste than the more substantial gifts of fortune. The Whig Horace is, besides, become a sort of antediluvian to the present generation; and his pure and classic gems may form to our ruder, but more vigorous and impassioned age, an improving study.

POLITICAL PAMPHLETS.

SIR ARTHUR BROOKE FAULKNER has published a Letter addressed to the RADICAL REFORMERS of GREAT BRITAIN, in which he is as radical as any of them, save on the one question which to many of them is now the all-in-all, Universal Suffrage. He thinks the Radicals unwise to press almost the only point upon which there is diversity of opinion among Reformers. He may, in a prudential view, be right; but when we remember how magnanimously the working class behaved while we were all struggling together for the bastard or supposititious Reform Bill, how can we blame them? Sir Arthur's suggestions are of more worth than his objections. He says, in reference to Radical tactics:—

If such a course be impolitic, let me suggest your sending delegates, should it not be too late, to confer with your Parliamentary friends (the tried integrity and talents of such men as Hume and Oroté, Molesworth, and others, ought not to lie idle at a time like this) for the purpose of coming to a distinct understanding on the minimum which you will be content to accept, in place of the maximum which you would extort. Should the present Government be well disposed, (which I wholly distrust,) your moderation would clothe them with strength to grapple with their adversaries; if ill disposed, it would as surely and completely expose their treachery, and furnish the most irresistible of all arguments for taking any further steps we might see necessary.

Sir Arthur blames the Reformers for discontinuing agitation in 1832 until every object was gained. He is right and wrong. In the first place, the people were caajoled into the belief, that in the Bill and the whole Bill, every object was gained; and, secondly, though men think a good deal of their country and posterity, they must, in the meantime, attend to their families and their business. Disinterested and patriotic agitators are not the rich and leisured. After exposing that antiquated delusion, virtual representation, Sir Arthur proposes to give the people a control over the Government without Universal Suffrage, and one of instant possession; and this is the most practical part of his letter:—

The people alone (he remarks) can be trusted to manage their own business, by watchfully superintending and controlling their representatives. My plan is, therefore, to constitute popular meetings a permanent power in the state, a sort of fourth estate of the constitution. We have had enough of experience to show, that desultory gatherings, no matter what the amount of numbers, can never be relied upon as a sure and steady check to perfidious rulers; such assemblies being no sooner dispersed, than the knaves are at their dirty work again. Besides, while the agitator is left to his discretion to convene the people, they have no assurance that they will be called upon to meet, perhaps, when it is most necessary that they should be up and stirring. I would, therefore, have these meetings not contingent or casual, but periodical, say annually, at the close of the Parliamentary Session. . . . At present, the people are, by the fiction of being present in the persons of their deputies, made consenting parties to every act of the legislator, no matter how atrociously inimical to their best interests. They are made consenting parties to their own starvation by enacting the Corn Laws; by his consent the Dissenter is rated to support the Church, the Irish are tithe-hunted, the country 800 millions in debt for a ruinous war, and Queen Adelaide gets, with your consent, £100,000 a-year. While the popular meetings were periodical, the people would have constant successive opportunities of discussing their opinions before throwing them ultimately into the shape of petitions to Parliament. Their views, as they become enlarged by this discipline and the progress of instruction, in place of being hastily taken up and crudely presented, would challenge all the respect which repeated and patient consideration could confer. We should then no longer depend upon an accident for calling for the expression of popular feeling; such as famine, want of employment, a commercial crisis, or the like; nor should we be driven in a fit of revenge, to devise such wild expedients, as starving our legislators into their duty by a "strike," "abstinence from taxed articles," or any such feeble contrivances, which would only recoil upon their authors.

A Patriot's Third Letter to the British People; with a Second Letter to the Operatives, a Second Letter to the Queen, &c.

Here we have another Radical Baronet's effusion, who is much more hot-breathed than Sir Arthur Brooke Faulkner, and who "goes the whole hog," reminding us, indeed, of the hot youth of Sir Francis Burdett. All that we can do is to cull a few pithy sentences from Sir William Boyd's free, easy, and very unceremonious epistles. To the People he says—what, indeed, every one who cares for them says—

All future benefits which may arise to yourselves must be from yourselves. The boasted Reform Bill of the shuffling, imbecile, reptile Whigs has turned out, so far as good to you is concerned, not worth the parchment which was speiled in drawing it up. Let us ask, What then has it done? It has placed the present Ministry in office, where they fondly hope to remain, as the Tories did, for nearly half a century, to fill their empty pockets, at your expense; and to provide for—a burden to the country—every naturally-born idiot who can claim relationship with them. My countrymen, in this vast metropolis of London, can you go East, West, North, or South, without hearing what is in every one's mouth?—that the Whigs and the Court are playing into each other's hands; and hat they care not a single farthing for the true interests of the nation.

Having given the Tories their mittimus—"Depart, ye cursed!"—he proceeds:—

We are told, however, that the Whigs have given us the Reform Bill, the value of which is described with great truth and correctness in "The people's petition," where it says—"The Reform Act has effected a transfer of power from one domineering faction to another; and left the people as helpless as before. The fruit, which looked so fair to the eye, has turned to dust and ashes when gathered." Yes, my countrymen, you justly estimate the present made to us by the proud, aristocratic Whig, Grey; it was a proper emblem of his own measures, and those of his party, in its being good for nothing; it answered his purpose, however, by placing him in power; and enabling him to provide for, at the expense of the country—by placing them in office—every useless block-head who could claim cousinship with him; after which, he magnanimously retired. He had seen a ghost, forsooth, and his nerves were much shaken.* If it were so, it must have been the fiend Hypocrisy grinning in his face.

On the evening of the first of May, the Whig Government was guilty of an act which has filled to overflowing the measure of their iniquity—I mean their decision, by a majority, in Parliament, to pay, from the resources of this country, a yearly pension of twenty-one thousand pounds to the King of Hanover. Notwithstanding the impropriety of their conduct in granting an extravagant Civil List to the Queen—an additional income to her mother—the monstrous annuity of £100,000, with a palace, to the Dowager Queen Adelaide—there is in that pension to the King of Hanover the grossest insult to the British people—combined with guilt of so deep a dye that it is sufficient to fire the brain and lacerate the hearts of all who are not willing slaves. It is pointing the finger of scorn in our faces; and saying to us, in language impossible to be misunderstood, Poor, credulously-generous people, see what fools you have proved yourselves in entrusting us with the government of the country, on the silly supposition that we would act towards you with honesty or principle!

* Alluding to the report that he had seen a spectre.

I have now endeavoured to lay before you a correct view of the conduct of the Tory and Whig factions. The former, the Government of the aristocracy, was a proud, corrupt, energetic, sassy tyranny; the latter, the Government of the shopocracy, or as it is usually termed, the shopkeepers' Government, is a mean, shuffling, crawling, equally corrupt tyranny; it exactly resembles a set of rascally tradesmen determined to cheat their customers, so far as the confidence placed in them will permit; these two factions started from opposite sides, terminate in one centre, that of despotism. No men ever became ministers, however, with more excellent prospects than the Whigs; they enjoyed the unlimited confidence of the country, and had only to proceed forward in the straight path of honourable principle and independence, making the good of the nation their first object; and, although they have been in office but a very few years, from their misconduct, their name has already become a byword; and should they remain in power even a couple of years longer, there is every probability that, when we may wish to describe an individual as all that is conceivably and inconceivably infamous, we shall simply term him a Whig. Wm. Lamb, otherwise Viscount Melbourne, doubtless thinks himself very clever, whilst neglecting the interests of the people, that he has not failed to lavish their money upon the Court; but I would tell this superficial man of pleasure, this twister of ringlets, to whom we may with correctness apply the Persian Allegory, "O my soul," said a stick, "could I but get at him;" that, if the sentiments of courage and freedom be not extinct in Great Britain, he will find himself miserably mistaken; and that the conduct of his ministry will only tend to draw upon the Court itself the indignation and contempt of the people.

Having thus done for the Whigs and Tories, Sir William is not much more merciful to the leaders of the Radical party. He, indeed, vies in abusive and intemperate language with the worst writers of any of the three parties. He avows himself a tardy convert to Universal Suffrage and the Ballot, as he, in this resembling every other Reformer, "places not the shadow of a hope in the honesty and good intentions of the Whigs."

POLITICAL REGISTER.

RIGHT OF FREE DISCUSSION.—Lord John Russell, at the dinner given to him by the Lord Mayor of Liverpool, in alluding to the recent meetings of the working classes, said—"There were some who would, perhaps, put down such meetings; but that was not his opinion, nor that of the Government with which he acted. He thought the people had a right to free discussion. It was free discussion which elicited truth. They had a right to meet." Why, then, do you not, Lord John Russell, who have been now eight years in office, repeal the Gagging Bills of Pitt and Castlereagh, and restore us the right of free discussion, and the freedom of the press as it existed forty years ago? Why do you allow the Six Acts of Castlereagh, against which your party was so eloquent when out of office, to continue to disgrace the Statute Book? Simply because, though it may be very well to talk of the People's right of free discussion at a Lord Mayor's dinner, you and your Government wish to continue to have the power, which the infraction of the Constitution by Pitt and Castlereagh gives you, to pounce on the leaders of the People, whenever it may suit your convenience. Some of the Ultra-Radical organs seem to think that the Government has not the power, if it had the inclination, to put down meetings such as those which have been held of late; but let them not be mistaken, and become the victims of the popular notions entertained in Great Britain about the right of free discussion and the liberty of the press. Whatever may have been the case formerly, there is certainly no such right under the present state of the law. Free discussion, whether oral or written, is merely tolerated, and may be put down whenever "the powers that be" think fit; and, notwithstanding the boasting about the increased intelligence of the age, and the physical power of the masses, it is by no means certain that a Minister of the nerve and courage of Castlereagh could not, in three months, render the People as quiet as they are on the Continent in regard to political subjects. It is not so long ago since 1819, when the People were awed into submission; and, were the Tories to get back to power, they would not long tolerate the free discussions which are going on.

We do not say this from any approbation of the conduct of the present Ministry or of the Whigs generally; for we have repeatedly said, that it is most disgraceful to the whole party that they have not long ere now repealed the gagging acts. But we say it for the purpose of warning those who take part in public meetings. The after-dinner oration of the Home Secretary would, on a trial for sedition, be very little regarded either in the King's Bench or in the Court of Judiciary. For what is the state of the law? Sedition, we are told by English lawyers, "consists in attempts made by unauthorized public meetings, (and all popular meetings are unauthorized,) by speeches, or written publications, to disturb established institutions, or the peace and order of society. A public meeting is unlawful, which assembles under such circumstances of terror, arising either from excessive numbers, the alarming manner of assembling, or otherwise, as endangers the public peace, or tends to excite the fear and apprehension of the people. The general rule of law, in regard to public meetings, is, that numbers constitute force, force terror, terror illegality." There is far you! Fifty persons would be considered "numbers," as we shall see presently. Mr Hume, the greatest authority among the writers on the Criminal Law of Scotland, tells us, that sedition comprehends "all those practices, whether by deed, word, or writing, or of whatsoever kind, which are suited and intended to disturb the tranquillity of the State, for the purpose of producing public trouble and commotion, and moving his Majesty's subjects to the dislike, subversion, or resistance of the established Government and laws, or settled frame and order of things." Among the illustrations of what sedition is, he gives, "such a work as would hold that all monarchy and hereditary rank, or all clerical dignities and establishments of religion, are an abuse or usurpation, contrary to reason and justice, and unfit to be any longer suffered." So that, in Scotland, the maintenance of Republican principles of government, or of the Voluntary system in religion, is, in Mr Hume's opinion, seditious! He gives us another example of sedition—viz., the maintaining "that the Commons are a mere nominal and pretended representation, and entitled to no manner of regard." The punishment of this sort of sedition, in Scotland at least, is transportation. This is now held a settled point. Then we have an offence called leasing-making, which means, in Scotch law, "the publicly declaiming, or privately writing or speaking any purpose of reproach or slander of his Majesty's person, estate, or government; such, for example, as if any one should charge the king with adultery, or describe him as a common liar." Leasing-making also includes slander of the great officers of state. One would have thought that the common law was sufficient for putting down these verbal offences; but the factions who have, in alternate succession, ruled us for the last half century have thought otherwise. Thus, "every house, room, or place in which any person shall publicly lecture, or any public debate be had on any subject, for the purpose of raising money from the persons admitted, shall be deemed a disorderly house, subjecting the keeper to a penalty of £100 a-day, unless previously licensed by two Justices of the Peace." So that the meetings which have been held in the Waterloo Tavern, when money was collected at the door, were illegal; and, indeed, all our lecture-rooms are apparently "disorderly." A public meeting of above fifty persons, held in the open air in London or Westminster, for the purpose of petitioning the Queen, or either House of Parliament, for alterations in matters of Church or State, is illegal, if the Parliament is sitting, or any of the judges at Westminster Hall. Almost all clubs and associations for political purposes, are illegal. Then we have the law of libel, which is thus defined:—"With respect to individuals, anything is deemed a libel which tends to injure the feelings or reputation; and, with respect to Government, anything is libellous that tends to hold it up to hatred, contempt, or disrespect." The Roman law has always been reprobated for the doctrine that "whatever pleased the Prince has the strength of law;" but our own laws, in as far as respects freedom of discussion, are much more tyrannical; for, from what we have stated above, it is plain that the following definitions are not overstrained:—Sedition may be defined, whatever discussion displeases the Government; leasing-making, whatever displeases the King, or the great men; and libel, whatever displeases a private individual. We shall shew, in our next number, how the liberty of the press has, of late years been curtailed; but we think we have said enough for the present, to show how far the people have the right of free discussion. Indeed, we will venture to say that very few meetings of the Liberal party have, of late years, been held, in which some offence or other against the law, as it now exists, has not been committed; and the people will never be able to meet and discuss their grievances with perfect safety, until not only the statute book is thoroughly examined, and all the enactments against popular assemblies, associations, and political discussions expunged, but also until the common law, as extended by Tory judges and lawyers, has been curtailed.

THE CORN-LAWS AND THE WORKING CLASSES.—

We beg such of the working classes as oppose a repeal of the Corn-Laws, on the ground that a repeal would reduce the rate of wages, to reflect on the following facts, and then consider whether there is not every probability of a reduction of wages, or rather of a great proportion of them obtaining no wages at all, if the Corn-Laws are not repealed without farther delay. Some time since, Mr W. R. Gregg was examined before a Select Committee of the House of Commons on manufactures, commerce, and shipping; and the following is a summary of his evidence:—He had personally examined the cotton mills in Austria, Hungary, and Naples, and had procured minute information regarding those in Switzerland, the Tyrol, and the North of Germany. In the mills he examined, he found the newest and most improved machinery. Recently, before he left England, a new machine had been imported from America, named Darnforth's Throstle, not twenty of which had been erected in England, and that machine he found in operation in the neighbourhood of Vienna; it having been made, not from a model or drawing, but merely from its principle having been made known. Wages are from one-half to one-third lower than in this country, including persons of all ages and of both sexes. In France, the average, per week, is 5s. 8d.; in Switzerland, 4s. 5d.; in Austria, 4s.; in the Tyrol, 3s. 9d.; in Saxony, 3s. 6d.; at Bonne, in Prussia, 2s. 6d. At Naples, the spinners are paid 6s.; while ours get 28s.; the rovers, 2s. 2d.; while ours are paid 7s. The hours per week during which the people are employed, are as follows:—In the north of France, 72; in Alsace, 84; in Prussia, 72 to 90; in Switzerland, 78 to 84; in Austria, 72 to 80; in the Tyrol, 80; in Saxony, 72; in Baden, 84; and in the Rhenish provinces of Prussia, sometimes as high as 94. The prices of provisions are—the best meat from 2½d. to 3d. per pound; bread ½d. per pound—or 2d., instead of 10d., as in Edinburgh at present, would purchase a 4lb. loaf; potatoes, the eighth of a penny per lb., or 1½d. per peck. Mr Gregg stated that the work people consumed as much meat as those employed in our mills, that they were in every respect in as good a condition, and that their wages would purchase as much of the necessaries of life, in the countries we have mentioned, as the operatives of Manchester could with their higher wages in that town. All over the Continent, the cotton manufacture is rapidly extending. In France, the ratio of increase, from 1812 to 1836, was 310 per cent; in England, only 270. He farther stated that, in his opinion, the repeal of the Corn-Laws would be beneficial to the workman; and, as to its effect on the cotton manufacture, he had ascertained that two-thirds of the manufacture were exported, and he was confident that the permanency of our cotton manufacture could only be secured by an assimilation of the prices of the necessaries of life in this country to those in the Continental states.

The efforts that foreigners are making to introduce manufactures into their respective countries, is unprecedented. We know on the best authority that the Emperor of Russia has had, for some months, an agent here, engaging the most skilful workmen, in various branches of manufacture. As soon as a workman or overseer is hired, he is put on Russian pay, and instructions are given to him, at whatever cost, to make himself master of the most recent improvements in his particular manufacture. He is authorized to bribe the workmen to exhibit their masters' machinery; and we have every reason to believe that some of the most recent improvements in the spinning and weaving of flax, tow, and cotton, will be put into operation at St Petersburg before the end of the present year. There were lately, at Nottingham, no less than nine parties from Calais, Lille, and St Quentin, who are purchasing or contracting for machinery to export to France. No difficulty whatever is found in exporting the machinery, notwithstanding the prohibitions against its export. These parties declared, in all companies, that the French have determined to have the trade from England. At Lille, numerous stocking-frames, upon the English principle, are in the course of erection. In the countries adjoining the Baltic, growing grain for exportation has been, in a great measure given up; and the capital formerly employed in that pursuit, turned towards manufactures.—It is obvious that, if we lose any considerable portion of our export trade, there will be a superabundance of operatives in this country, and that wages must fall. Indeed they must have fallen ere now, had it not been for the immense demand for labour, created, of late years, by the railways; but this demand must now rapidly decline, as the chief lines are nearly completed.

Another circumstance that shews the necessity of a total repeal of the Corn-Laws, is the increase of the population of this country. Since 1828, when the present law was enacted, the population of the United Kingdom has increased three millions, and continues to increase at the rate of one thousand a-day! There is little waste land now which can be brought into cultivation; and it is impossible to suppose that such improvements can be made in agriculture, as to keep pace with the increase of population. If, therefore, we insist on being fed from our own soil, there is only one way of doing it, by resorting to coarser food—in other words, to potatoes; for we have nothing else to retreat upon; and any one who has been observant of the agriculture around our large towns, for the last quarter of a century, must see that the growth of potatoes is yearly increasing, and must now form the food of a very large portion of the people. If the working classes think this a desirable state of matters, it is more than we do; but they are, of course, the best judges of their own affairs.

One of the arguments in favour of the fluctuating scale of duties is, that it keeps prices steady. But there cannot be a greater mistake. For, taking even the annual average, we have the following fluctuations in the price of wheat:—1829, 66s. 3d.; 1830, 64s. 3d.; 1831, 66s. 4d.; 1832, 55s. 8d.; 1833, 52s. 11d.; 1834, 46s. 2d.; 1835, 31s. 4d.; 1836, 48s. 6d.; 1837, 55s. 10d.; in the week ending 25th December 1835, the average was 36s.; and in that ending 31st August 1838, 74s. 5d., nearly double, not the lowest price, but the average of the whole year 1835. Another argument is, that the working classes were in better circumstances during the war than at present, and that it is immaterial to them what is the rate of wages, as wages rise with the price of food. Lord Milton, however, in one of his pamphlets on the Corn-Laws, has shewn that this is a perfect delusion, and that labour was never worse remunerated than during the period of high wages and high prices. He proves this by the decisive test of the quantity of food wages could purchase at different periods; and this, in truth, is the only means by which it can be ascertained whether wages are high or low. In Scotland, a day labourer earned, during the early part of the war, 9s. a-week in summer—the annual average price of wheat being about £3 a quarter; but, when it had risen to £6:5:5 in 1812, the wages were not 20s., as they ought to have been according to the landlord's theory, but only 12s., the highest point they ever reached, and at which they continued only for four years, notwithstanding the high price of food, and that the demand for men for the army and otherwise was so great that it was with the utmost difficulty that a sufficient number could be got during harvest to bind up the sheaves. In the years of famine, 1800 and 1801, when, without any depreciation of the currency, wheat averaged 115s., the day-labourer's wages were only 8s. a-week. Have wages, we may ask, doubled since 1835, when wheat was one-half its present price?

The high price of food is a matter of much more consequence to the working classes than to any other class. Take, for example, the middle classes—very few individuals spend one-half of their income on food, many not one-fourth; but take the case of a labourer, making 10s., 12s., or 15s. a-week, it will be found that from three-fourths to four-fifths of his wages are expended on food, and at least two-thirds of it on bread and meal alone. In this manner, it is the operative not only who feels first, but who all along feels most severely the high price of food; and nothing but ignorance or downright infatuation, can make him object to a Repeal of the Corn-Laws. We doubt not that their eyes will be opened before next year at this time.

It is far from being true that wages rise with the price of food, as the Universal Suffrage men would lead us to believe. Lord Milton has shewn that this was not the case during the last war; and here is a statement, taken from Mr Lowe's works, (p. 203,) extending over a larger period, which shews the fallacy of the notion:—

Years.	Weekly Pay.	Wheat per Quarter.	Wages in Price of Wheat.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
1742 to 1752	0 6 0	1 10 0	102 pints.
1761 to 1770	0 7 6	2 2 6	90 ...
1780 to 1790	0 8 0	2 11 2	80 ...
1795 to 1799	0 9 0	3 10 8	65 ...
1800 to 1808	0 11 0	4 6 8	60 ...

THE DEAD WEIGHT.—Simple persons imagined that because the half-pay and pensions were pretended to be given to the officers and soldiers who fought during the war, or to their widows and children, that the Dead Weight would rapidly diminish, and in a short time become extinct. It is now twenty-three years since the battle of Waterloo; and, taking the average age of the officers and soldiers who then retired on half-pay or were pensioned, at forty-five, very nearly one-half of them, according to the ordinary law of mortality, must now be dead. But the dead weight has suffered little or no reduction, and, of late, it has shewn a tendency to rise rather than fall. Thus, in 1832, the military half-pay and pensions amounted to £2,625,090; in 1837, to £2,702,258. The naval half-pay, in 1836, was £1,498,580; in 1837, £1,532,470. The ordnance half-pay, in 1836, was £154,053; in 1837, £157,405. On the total of the three military services, the increase was £114,411 in one year. The retired allowances in the civil department, in 1837, was £529,526, and the total of both military and civil service, £4,921,660. This is an enormous sum to pay annually for retired allowances. Why the civil servants of the Government should not save money for the support of their old age, like other people, is more than we can see; and were the officers on half-pay, who are willing and able to serve, put on active service, as opportunity occurred, not only would a large sum be annually saved to the country, but our army and navy be placed on a much more efficient footing than at present. And why is this not done? Simply because the sons and connections of the aristocracy must be provided for out of the public purse, that the law of primogeniture may be kept up, and the whole estate given to the eldest son. We see in what manner Lord Althorp's boast, that the Whig Government was to be carried on without patronage, has been realized!

GOLD CURRENCY.—Owing to the practices of "sweating" or washing the gold coinage with acids, and shaking it in bags, which are afterwards burned, and the gold collected by exposing the ashes to a high temperature, the diminution of the weight of the gold coinage is so rapid, that it appears, from experiments made at the mint, in 1833, that the sovereigns of 1817 had lost 8s. 10d. in each hundred pounds; those of 1821, 9s. 1d. per hundred; those of 1825, 6s. 8d.; and those of 1829, 6s. 2d. per hundred; whilst, upon the half-sovereigns coined in 1817, the loss, according to the same experiments, was as great as 16s. 4d. per two hundred; of 1821, 13s. 10d.; of 1825, 13s. 6½d.; and of those of 1829, 6s. 2d. per two hundred half-sovereigns. At the same period, the total gold coin in circulation was estimated, by Mr Horsley Palmer, at £30,000,000; and, supposing that the average diminution of weight was 10s. per cent., we have a loss to the public, and a gain to the "sweaters," of £300,000. It does not appear to be generally known, that "sweating" the coin is an offence of no lower degree than high treason. By 5 Elizabeth, c. 11, "Whoever shall wash, clip, round or file—and, by 18 of Elizabeth, c. 1.—"Whoever shall impair, diminish, falsify, scale, or lighten the proper coin of this realm, is to be deemed an offender in high treason. The English laws of treason were substituted for the old Scotch laws against that crime by the treaty of union; and the statutes of Elizabeth are, unquestionably, in full force at this moment in all parts of Great Britain.

SCOTLAND.

CALTON JAIL.—The disgracefully crowded state of this jail was some time ago brought under the notice of the Town Council, in as far as regards the criminal prisoners; but no notice has been taken of the situation of the debtors. Formerly, each debtor had for himself a cell as a sleeping place, and there were one or two large apartments in which the debtors could sit during the day; they had also a pretty extensive airing ground. But now, to make room for the numerous criminals, the whole debtors have been crowded into a dark apartment on the ground floor, not fifteen feet square, a place which was formerly used, we believe, as the kitchen; and here they must sleep, cook their victuals, see their relations, and transact any business they may have to do, all in public. There have been, of late, from eight to ten debtors generally confined in this place, and their sufferings it is needless to describe. Farther, one-half of the airing ground has been lately cut off by a high wall; so that it is only for an hour or two during the forenoon that the sun can shine into it. The cause of all this misery, both to debtors and criminals—and there are unquestionably, among the latter, many persons innocent of the charges imputed to them—is the long vacation of our courts of justice. From 12th July to 12th November, yearly, justice may be said to be asleep in Scotland. It is now six weeks since the Circuits terminated; and we do not think it would have been any very great hardship, had three out of the six Judges of the Court of Justiciary come to Edinburgh for a week, and tried the criminals whose cases were ready for trial. There must, or, at least, there ought, if the crown lawyers do their duty, to be sixty or eighty criminals, whose cases ought to be ready; and if the repose of the judges cannot be broken in upon during the vacation, we submit that it is incumbent on the Government to issue a commission to such lawyers as are willing to work in Autumn, for the purpose of clearing our jail. A few years ago, an additional circuit to Glasgow during the Christmas recess was established. Something similar should be done for Edinburgh, during the Autumn. It is fearful to think what a mass of vice is at this moment congregated on the Calton Hill, and how rapidly the young and inexperienced culprit, accused, perhaps, of some trivial offence, and how many persons altogether innocent, are becoming demoralised by the constant association with old and hardened offenders. This state of things ought no longer to be tolerated. A public meeting of the inhabitants should be held, to memorialize the Secretary of State on the subject. It is quite impossible that relief could be refused, if the case were fairly represented. An obvious remedy is to extend the sittings of the Court of Session for a month annually, according to the authority given by 1 William IV. c. 69, § 10; for, if the judges were once collected together in Edinburgh, they would hardly object to proceed with criminal business.

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN CATTLE, &c.—For a short period after the termination of the war, foreign cattle, poultry, &c. were allowed to be imported on payment of a moderate duty. The effect was to produce a very great fall in the price of provisions. Cobbett, writing in September 1814, remarks:—"How surprised you must have been to see the wheat, barley, oats, neat cattle, sheep, hogs, and poultry of France crowding upon our shores the moment that peace was made. From everything I hear, and indeed I see quite enough, I am convinced that, in ordinary years, France is able to supply us with food equal in amount to that of all our counties on the borders of the Channel. This ought to be regarded as a great blessing. There is annually a great fair for neat cattle at Barnet in Hertfordshire. Hither are brought the cattle from Scotland, Wales, Devonshire, and elsewhere, to be distributed among the numerous graziers and stall-feeders of the southern and eastern counties of England. When exhibited at the fair, the cattle cover a space of ground about two miles in circumference. Now, I have no scruple in saying, that I am fully convinced, from my own observation, and from information gathered nearly on the spot, that the French have, since the month of May last, (in three months,) brought to and sold in this country a far greater number of neat cattle than are brought in any one year to this great national fair. Let any one estimate the effect of such an importation. The effect really has been to reduce the value of every man's stock above one-third." This, however, was soon put a stop to for the benefit of the landed interest. In October 1814, Cobbett writes:—"France was pouring in upon us food of all kinds, till a stoppage was put to the entry of cattle, and till other articles of food were taxed at our custom-houses. In this country you cannot go by a farm-house, or over a heath, without seeing French cattle, sheep, and hogs. We were eating turkeys at 4s. each, and geese at 2s. before the stoppage took place. How many a waiting, watery mouth has this stoppage disappointed!" We have thus had a practical example of the benefit which a free trade in cattle, &c. would confer on the people of this country.

CHURCH EXTENSION.—Dr Chalmers has been on a tour of agitation on this subject, which has naturally led to increased activity on the part of the Voluntaries. At a meeting held at Paisley, the Rev. D. King of Glasgow put the matter in a clear light by a very short statement. Dr Chalmers maintains that there ought to be a minister for every 2000 of the population. Now, there are 917 parishes, and 1100 places of worship belonging to the Establishment in Scotland, some of which places of worship have more than one clergyman. The population is 2,500,000; so that there are only 2300 persons to each church, without taking into view the Dissenters at all, who have 839 clergymen. It is plain, therefore, that, even on Dr Chalmers' own showing, there is, so far from destitution, a superabundance of church accommodation; for it is in vain to suppose that accommodation in the Establishment should be provided for Catholics, Unitarians, and the other denominations of Dissenters.

POLICE REGULATIONS.—One of the most absurd of these regulations is that which prevents carters riding on their carts, even when empty, and although they have double reins. We believe that nowhere else has such regulation been made. In Glasgow the carters all ride in their empty carts, and have a moveable seat for the purpose, which fixes in to the middle of the cart. It is obvious that, with such a seat, the carter has as much command of his horse as a person in a gig, or the driver of a coach; and there is much less chance of accident, as the carter sees better about him than when walking at the side of his cart. The Glasgow practice should be adopted here without further delay.

THE BIBLE MONOPOLY expires on the 17th July next, and the Select Committee of the House of Commons have recommended that the patent to the Queen's printers should not be renewed; that Bibles and Testaments, from presses of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and from the Queen's printers in England and Ireland, should be allowed to be freely introduced into Scotland; that the General Assembly and the four Scotch Universities should be empowered by license from the Queen to appoint a printer of the Holy Scriptures, and that all other persons should be permitted to print them on finding security for the conformity of the text with that now printed; and that interpolation or corruption of the text should be made an indictable offence. It has been proved, by the evidence taken before former Committees, that, while the monopoly of the Queen's printer has increased the price of Bibles one-half, it has not secured accuracy; and that a great annual loss was sustained by the public revenue offices in Scotland being furnished with stationery by the Queen's printers, and not from the stationery office in London.

CANADA.

It appears, from the United States papers, and private accounts, that, though tranquillity prevails in Canada at present, fears are entertained of fresh disturbances during the winter. We should think, that, with the immense force, military and naval, at the disposal of the Governor, any outbreak would be speedily put down, and that there can be no one so foolhardy as to attempt an insurrection at the present moment. Lord Durham, before his resignation, was said to have devised a scheme for consolidating the whole of our North American colonies into one federal government. The scheme, if it really was Lord Durham's, does him honour; although it found no favour in the sight of the Ministerial press, nor, as we may suppose, in the eyes of Ministers themselves. It was too liberal, too just, to obtain the approbation of Lord Melbourne or Lord John Russell. They had evidently intended to reject Lord Durham's constitution. Instead of resigning his government, and leaving the colonies in confusion, at the instigation of his feelings of resentment against his "friends," Lord Durham should have submitted to the inevitable consequence of his own errors; and continued to discharge his duty to his country and the colonies. When the Ministry should have rejected his wise and liberal plan of a new constitution for the colonies, then would have been the time for him to resign. We fear there is little chance of Lord Durham being prevailed upon to resume his office; and as little of his successor proposing a scheme of colonial government that will be accepted as satisfactory by the Canadians. Had Lord Durham been able to carry through the plan attributed to him, one of two results was sure to follow: either the colonies would have retained their connexion with the mother country—a connexion cemented by good will and mutual interest; or they would have parted in peace, when a separation became inevitable, or highly desirable. As things now are, we see no prospect of any government of her American colonies by this country, but one of undisguised force. Such a government cannot long continue. The discontents in Lower Canada, and others of the colonies, in conjunction with the now pressing question of the boundary with the United States, make it impossible that we should retain these colonies—and the sooner, in our opinion, we get rid of them the better. They are a source of endless expense, and expose us to continual quarrels with foreign powers; the patronage the various offices in them affords, fosters corruption at home; and, sooner or later, do what we like, they will become independent. But there is no chance of our rulers, present or future, having the sense to give up their supremacy over them till our troops have been defeated in a protracted and expensive war. Whether we look to the past, the present, or the future, we find colonies a source of expense and annoyance.

AUSTRALIA.

In the accounts which have been recently published and extensively circulated of this colony, little or no notice is taken of the natives: and hence some of the emigrants who lately sailed seemed to think that they might settle in any part of the country, however distant from the present settlements, without risk. This, however is by no means the case. It appears, from the best authenticated accounts, that attacks by the natives are by no means rare; and the Sydney Herald of the 21st May, states, that fifteen men, who were on their way to Port Philip with sheep and cattle, were attacked by a body of the natives, amounting to 300; seven of them killed on the spot, and one so severely wounded that his life was despaired of. The project to discontinue sending out convicts was regarded with some alarm, owing to the scarcity, and consequently high wages, of labourers of every kind. Hill Coolies from India had been tried, but were found not to be fit for hard labour; many of them had absconded, and all required to be sharply looked after. In these circumstances, perhaps, the most eligible place of settlement at the present moment is the new colony in South Australia, although the land is much dearer there than in the older settlement. The settlers, indeed, derive the advantage of the high price; for, by act of Parliament, the commissioners for the colony are bound to expend the revenues arising from the sale of land in sending out emigrants of the working classes. At present the land is divided into sections of eighty acres, the present price of which is £1 per acre; and by paying the price in London, the purchaser is entitled to have taken out, at the expense of the commissioners, four persons of the labouring class, two of each sex. The purchaser is also entitled to a lease of 640 acres of pasturage, at a rent of 40s. a-year; but this lease, we believe, must be given up when the land is sold. Although it is little more than two years since the colony was established, it contained, by the last accounts, 6000 inhabitants, and there were eighteen vessels lying in the harbour.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The state of trade in the manufacturing districts is not at all satisfactory; and much distress during the winter is anticipated. At Leeds, both in the Cloth Halls and in the warehouses, little business has of late been done. At Huddersfield, the demand for plain woollens has been dull. At Bradford, a reduction of 1s. a-piece on goods of inferior quality has taken place; and at Liverpool, the market for cotton twist has been much depressed; and the demand for cotton wool has hence been very limited.

The Preston Chronicle says that the hand-loom weaving trade is at its last gasp. Most part of the goods now woven are paid for with less than three shillings a-piece, and wages are from twenty to forty per cent. lower than those paid when meal and potatoes were one-third cheaper. The fact is, the Corn-Laws have all but ruined the trading community; but the ensuing winter will put them to the test.

AGRICULTURE.

The reports from nearly all parts of Great Britain concur in representing the wheat crop as under an average, and of inferior quality. In Fife, it is said, that the wheat is very deficient, and is far below an average. Barley will not yield on an average over the country more than four or four and a half bolls an acre. Oats are a very fine crop, but very late. Beans are in some cases fine, but peas are a complete failure. In Roxburghshire, by the 12th of October, the pools had been repeatedly covered with ice, and much grain in the Highland districts remained uncut. At the same date, the crops in the moorlands of Stirlingshire were quite green, and only fit for cattle. There was also a failure of the potato crop, and prices had in consequence risen. It is to be feared that most of the grain which was not cut by the middle of October will be worth little or nothing.

The Irish crops, which appeared luxuriant on the ground, have turned out in thrashing less abundant than was anticipated; and the quantity is indifferent. The wheat crop is said to be one-third short of an average; but barley and potatoes are good crops, and oats unusually productive. No great supply need be expected from abroad, for the crops in Germany are deficient, and Canada will require all that the United States can afford to export. At Dantzic, the price of fine mixed wheat had risen, by the end of September, to 45s. 6d., and the accounts of the crop were so unfavourable that it was doubted by the best informed corn-merchants if 50,000 quarters of grain in all could be shipped from Poland next year. The French Government has shewn uneasiness lest any wheat go out of the country, and has hastened the time for imposing the duty of 5s. on each quarter exported, although the operation of the French corn-law, and the rise of the price, would have of themselves accomplished this result. In Belgium, the export of wheat has been prohibited. It has been doubted by persons well qualified to judge, whether two millions of quarters of wheat are to be purchased at any price over the whole world for exportation to Britain. This is the pass to which keeping up the supremacy of the loaded interest has brought us!

At the Falkirk Tryst, commencing on the 8th October, 60,000 sheep, and 50,000 black cattle, were on the ground. The demand both for sheep and cattle was very brisk, and the whole were sold. Black-faced wethers brought from 16s. to 20s., and the best 23s. One lot of 1,500 brought 27s. White-faced wethers, from 28s. to 30s. Black cattle brought fair prices, but not higher generally than at the September Tryst. The market was quite overstocked with horses, and prices were low.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

DECEMBER, 1838.

LETTER TO THE QUEEN, ON THE STATE OF THE MONARCHY; BY A FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE.

"Anything for an easy life" is, according to a new Junius, who has just risen on the London world, the leading maxim of the Premier, whether in his public or private capacity. The Durham panic having passed away, and, like all excessive panics, flatly enough, and the Russian panic not having yet taken a definite form, her Majesty's Government has again relapsed into its former state of suspended animation. To expect that Parliament will be summoned, whatever perils may threaten the country, from war, famine, or intestine feud, until the Queen shall come to London for the season, is manifestly idle. The distance of that troublesome locality, Brighton, should the Court go there, must, of itself, render Lord Melbourne's Palace-duties more severe; and that exposed coast position is, besides, more difficult to defend than the avenues of the stately fastness of Windsor Castle. The merely public or national business must, of course, give way to the convenience of the Premier; who, after all, when his years and habits are considered, is to be pitied as a hard-worked gentleman. His industry may lie in a quite different direction from that of his predecessors in office; but no one can deny that it is great and incessant. For a few months after the accession of George III., Lord Bute played a somewhat similar part, until public indignation cut short the attempted thralldom, and restored the young King to his constitutional functions and the love of his subjects. But Lord Bute's duties were light when compared with those of Lord Melbourne.

Respect for the station of the Sovereign, and a feeling of pity, delicacy, and even regard, inspired by the sex and youth of the Queen, have kept down the expression of indignation at certain unconstitutional and indecorous exhibitions, which, however familiar they may have become to the public eye, are not for that one whit more agreeable. But the sentiment of disapprobation, if not of disgust, is more deeply rooted, and far more generally spread, than her Majesty's Ministers seem to be aware. Nor is it going too far to affirm that the monarchical principle has been more freely brought into question in this country within the last eight months, than at any period since the Restoration.

These reflections have been forced upon us by the perusal of a bold and well-timed Letter, addressed, by a FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE, to the Queen, upon matters deeply involving her honour as a Sovereign, the safety of the monarchy, and, above all, the tranquillity and happiness of the country. The able and high-toned remonstrance to which we allude, is not limited to party or temporary objects, all of which it disclaims as worthless and insignificant compared with the mighty interests of which it treats. Of its authorship we know nothing; and we do not pretend, from a line, to tell how "Painters write their names at Coe."

It is enough that its important contents afford us both text and commentary; and we fully believe that we could not more beneficially to the public interest, occupy a few of our pages, than by endeavouring, as far as lies in our power, to make them generally known. The new Junius is evidently no every-day person. His glance is too broad and far-reaching for a partisan; he is too liberal for a mere Whig, and far too outspoken for a "glozing-tongued" courtier. Earl Grey might thus have laid down the constitutional character and functions of the Sovereign; but not thus would he recognise popular rights, and the necessity of their wide and immediate concession. Not one of the Radical leaders is likely to thrust so directly to the point, or assume courage to tell truths so severe to royal ears. But it is idle to indulge in conjecture; the author will be found out: and, whether he be or not, we regard him chiefly as the vehicle through which is conveyed to the country solemn truths, most needful to be spoken, and to be spoken now.

THE FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE takes leave to address her Majesty, rather than her servants, for two reasons—first, because he wishes to convey instruction to her subjects, and fears there is no name among her Ministers to ensure attention to his teaching; and, secondly, that, though the truths he has to tell her Majesty may be more wholesome than palatable to her taste, the Whig body-guard by which she is surrounded may not have the courage to keep from her eyes a paper bearing her superscription. If they keep back the Letter, it can only be under the pretext that it is "disrespectful" in manner. This the frank-spoken writer wholly disclaims; manfully assuring the Queen that he who treats her as a rational being, and speaks to her as the most really illustrious persons of both sexes within her dominions are addressed, treats her with as much real respect "as any mortal ever can receive from the children of men." The Queen might have sufficient good sense, and enough of the becoming diffidence of youth and sex, to be satisfied with this measured though really respectful address; but those about her will be as sure to carp at its tone as to misrepresent its object. To herself it might be enough that a true Friend of the People and of the Monarchy approached her with the language of truth and sincerity, and poured into her inexperienced and bewildered mind lessons of wisdom and warning; but this may not suffice, and outcry in certain quarters is sure to arise at so bold an attempt to disabuse the understanding of the Queen. "I acknowledge you," he declares, "as my sovereign."

I am an experienced man, well stricken in years. I bend myself respectfully before you, a girl of eighteen, who, in my own or any other family in Europe, would be treated as a child, ordered to do as was most agreeable or convenient to others—whose inclinations would never be consulted—whose opinion would never be thought of—whose consent would never be asked upon any one thing appertaining to any other human being but yourself, beyond the choice of a gown or a cap, not always upon that:—yet before you I humble myself as one anxious to conciliate your favour to my principles, to gain your approval of my opinions. I sit down to write a letter intended for your perusal in the first instance, and I acknowledge that your agreeing or differing with me upon its subject-matter may have the greatest influence upon the destinies of four-and-twenty millions of people. I pass over all the soldiers and the councillors by whom your throne is surrounded, all the holy prelates who minister at your altars, all the learned judges who distribute justice to your People in your name; and I lay at the feet of one just emerging from childhood, wholly without practice of government, absolutely without experience of mankind, utterly ignorant of all or almost all the things that go to accomplish a ruler of the people, those opinions, the result of a long life of political observation, no little political experience, and a diligent study continued above half a century of the most eventful period in the whole history of our species. Is not this sufficiently respectful? Does not this shew deference enough for your station; or, if your courtiers will have it so, for your person?

The experienced sage having thus bowed the pride of intellect and manhood to gain the favourable regard of the youthful Princess, proceeds to shew the danger in which the monarchical principle, if not the monarchy, is placed by a young girl being called to exercise its functions, and the severe trials to which it must be exposed in the present fluctuating state of opinion.

Children both in France and England have before now held the sceptre, or have been presumed to hold it; and in England, in our Sixth Harry's instance, a slaving idiot was called upon to satisfy the "longing desire of his faithful Commons, by making a sign that he heard their prayers;" but Queen Victoria is very plainly told, that it is fit that she and her courtiers and Ministers should remember that, since these regal times, have come the Republican times of both France and England; and, if the experiment has once failed, of men exercising their imprescriptible right of governing themselves, it is only because they had assumed, before they were properly prepared and qualified to use, that right. Since this great experiment has failed, improvements have been proceeding with giant steps both in Europe and America. The writer proceeds—

And we have also found that, with a thing so excellent as a giant's strength, men have learned the wise and the humane lesson, how tyrannous it is to use it like a giant. Nevertheless, the power is acquired. On the western side of the Atlantic, it is exerted without control; and it is your fate to have the experiment tried in your person, how far a monarchy can stand secure in the nineteenth century, when all the powers of the executive government are intrusted to a woman, and that woman a child.

From what has been premised, you will at once perceive that matters personal to you form no part of my subject. I have higher things and more mighty interests in view, than any of those questions which keep your courtiers and your Ministers on the alert, and in anxious inquiry, "from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same." I care not a straw to what men you may most probably give your confidence, on what women bestow your favours; when you may choose to be married, or whom to marry; how far your habits may resemble the business-like propensities of your father and the late king, or the pampered indolent ones of George IV.; if you are likely to be extravagant or parsimonious; to consult Belgian or English friends; or apt to spoil your mother by your indulgence; or to become jealous of some new Duke of Cornwall's natural alliance with the enemies of your government.

The Friend of the People regards none of those things. He fixes his attention on a single point—on the one essential question, the constitutional character and functions of the Sovereign, be that sovereign George, William, or Victoria.

Our constitution being a mixed monarchy, does this really mean an aristocracy or a commonwealth? or, if you please, an aristocratic commonwealth, in which the nobles or the people alone are to rule; or is it a government in which the sovereign, as well as they, has an effective voice? In other words, is the king a mere figure of speech, to represent the executive power, as the crown is a figure for the king—and can the whole functions of the constitution be performed by the monarch's name being used in accordance with the will of the two Houses of Parliament? Or does not our system assume, as one of its foundations, that, besides the voice of the Lords and Commons, a deliberative and independent discretion in the selection of ministers, and in the choice of measures, shall be exercised also by the sovereign? Is the king a mere cipher, or a significant figure, in our polity?

That this question has been oftener put than answered, is very certain. But, as it has latterly been put a vast deal more frequently than at and soon after your accession, so has it been far oftener answered; and, by all but a few speculative republicans, answered in one way, that way being an affirmation of the real and substantial authority vested in the king. A year has made great changes in the feelings of exuberant loyalty and unmeasured affection which greeted you on your first public appearance—feelings which, if they were sincere, and meant anything more than curiosity, did the People little credit; for what possible claim to national gratitude, or to public confidence, could you possess, when you had never rendered a single public service, except by surviving the Princess Charlotte, nor been tried or known in any one particular, except that nothing unfavourable to you had ever transpired? But the folly of this general excitement has been outstripped by the gross injustice which has followed; and, as you were popular without having done a single thing to gain the esteem of the People, so you are become unpopular without having done any one thing to forfeit their favour. The People have shewn a kind of waywardness by no means unusual; and having awoke from the trance of loyalty that had come over their senses, they are vexed at having let them be overpowered, and are out of sorts with you, instead of being ashamed of themselves. However, the fact is undeniable; and, without the frail protection of that ephemeral favour which followed you last year, your authority, and the monarchy of which it is parcel, are about to undergo a scrutiny the most rigorous and unparing that ever sifted any human institution.

Am I apprehensive for its ultimate fate? Friendly to this form of government, and believing it to be better suited, at least to our present condition, than a republic, do I feel alarmed lest it should be overthrown? I answer the question, though with much hesitation and some difficulty, upon the whole, in the negative; because I think that the People of this country are, generally speaking, favourable to monarchy; and that the republican party is, in point of numbers, not a majority; in point of weight from property, rank, and capacity, a most inconsiderable minority indeed.

With the anxious hope, rather than any firm assurance of the ultimate safety of the monarchy, the Queen's fearless correspondent proceeds to take a statesman-like retrospective view of the condition of the country before the passing of the Reform Bill, and of the mighty change begun by what he denominates the Revolution of 1832, which, in itself, he regards as only the beginning of the beginning. If the old, corrupt state of things had remained untouched, the case must have been different from that which we see. Now he says:—

I perceive the most manifest increase in the prevalence of even pure republican doctrines. I know that the favourite occupation of the community at large is to dwell upon the anomalies of kingly government, and to count its cost, while no pains whatever are taken to recommend it, or to meet the coming storm, by propping up the regal fabric with popular supports. On the contrary, the line is drawn deeper and broader than ever, between the few and the many—between the few who are to share in the administration of our affairs and the many who are to be for ever excluded from all participation in it. Nor can I bring myself to regard the property-qualification, by which this line of separation is traced, as in the least degree calculated to make the existing state of things more safe or more natural, unless I can also bring myself to believe that the arrangement which shuts the door against the million is the better or the wiser for putting all property in the same jeopardy with all power, by reminding the great body of the People that they are disfranchised because they are poor.

The old arrangement, of a House of Commons, nominated by the court and the aristocracy, was strenuously supported by the Duke of Wellington, and the other leaders of the present Opposition; while another party—that, namely, of Lord Melbourne, and the other leading members of her Majesty's present Government—were equally hostile, though they differed in their plan of hostility. We must, however, quote this very characteristic passage:—

The Duke and his men openly and honestly resisted every proposition for the disfranchisement of even the most corrupt borough, and would not hear of transferring the franchise, most scandalously abused, to the largest and wealthiest manufacturing towns. The Viscount, [Melbourne,] who had then no men of his own, but was a follower of Mr Huskisson and Lord Dudley, was friendly to the more unfair and insidious manœuvre of granting a very little bit indeed—just enough to wear in order to resist with the more effect the consummation equally dreaded by both these classes of politicians—the fearful consummation which should restore the People to their rights. Both the Duke's party and the remnant of Mr Canning's party foresaw the tide that approached. The former gallantly stood up, resolved to try their strength against its surge; the latter, more wary in their generation, turned their backs and ducked down, in the hopes of the wave passing over them, and leaving them unscathed. The Duke's men were swept away; the Canning men, by a sudden change of measures, contrived to get upon the flood, and it carried them into port; where they must, for some little time, have found themselves in strange company, among men, like Lord Grey, all whose lives had been spent in supporting reform. In port, however, they were; and in a port which those good gentlemen never willingly quit, to fare forth on any wild adventure of principle or public character, or any romantic voyage of discovery in quest of the terra incognita of political consistency. So they remained in Downing Street while the revolution of 1831-2 was effected, and wore themselves active workmen in the grand operation by which the whole parliamentary constitution of these realms was placed upon an entirely new foundation—quite as much as if it had been taken to pieces, pulled down, and built up again, with but a few bricks and beams (forty-shilling freeholds and votes of freemen) that had formed any part of the old edifice. This great and bloodless change—the most important alteration by far that our form of government ever suffered; the largest, indeed, that any country ever underwent without violence—was effected while you, Madam, were yet in the nursery; and it was the fashion of the courtiers, at Kensington, to congratulate your royal mother upon all the storm being well blown over long before it became your lot to fill the throne—a feeling much more natural than sagacious. For, assuredly, the most turbulent and difficult times through which your predecessors ever passed, while the ancient Parliamentary Constitution remained, were calm weather and smooth water compared with those that await your Majesty under the new dispensation, and the perils with which that dispensation necessarily compasses you round about.

So ends this sly and very curious passage; and having noticed the tactics of Canning and the Duke; who, if wrong in refusing all reform, were, at any rate, clear-sighted to its consequences and consistent in their opposition, the Queen's Monitor thus contrasts the position which the old Tory party had to maintain, with that which the Whig-Tories, the once Reform, but now Finality Ministers, have to defend. That of the Duke of Wellington was far from being easy to defend. But he tells the Queen—

How much less easy is that in which your Ministers have chosen to intrench themselves, when, having let in the People, they would maintain a vain conflict with countless numbers; when, having avowed that the Lower House of Parliament is intended for a true representation of the community at large, they declare that the whole community shall be absolutely excluded from all share in electing it, except the trifling fraction of the People which is possessed of property to a certain amount! This is the slippery footing on which your present Ministry has taken post; this is the exposed ground on which these feeble and defenceless men have chosen to contend against the country. Reformers, opposing all improvement; advocates of popular rights, contending against the whole privileges of the People; enemies of the aristocracy, that loathes, if possible, as much as it scorns them, yet sacrificing themselves in fighting against their own natural allies, the multitude upon whom that aristocracy would trample; as individuals, feeble to a byword; as a party, weak to a laughing-stock; as a government, compared with whom, it has truly been said, Mr Addington's and Richard Cromwell's were vigorous and secure; yet rejecting all aid from the only quarter to which they can look for succour ; utterly without the chance of any help to save them, any accident to ward off their destruction, except the restored confidence of the country ; yet resolved, at all hazards, to make the breach irreparable, and to forfeit that confidence for ever !

Such is the position of your present Ministers ; but also such are the Ministers to whom you have, I will not say given your confidence—you have only continued to confide in them, because you chanced to find them in office at your accession. Before, however, we proceed to consider the inevitable consequence of the fatal line which they have chosen, deliberately chosen, to take, and the utter impossibility of their keeping by it, except to work their own ruin, it is necessary to pause for a moment, at this point, because your Majesty is here concerned.

They are your Ministers, you are pleased to keep them filling up all your offices, and constantly about your person. You are surrounded by them, and by their partisans of either sex, in a manner hitherto unknown to the people of this country. Downing Street, Whitehall, are no longer the resort of the Cabinet. The official residences are deserted ; and one palace holds the Sovereign and the servants of the public. This novel, inconvenient, and not very seemly excess of royal favour, is at once injurious to the public service, and personally advantageous to the Ministry : for, although it must necessarily prevent them from attending to the duties of their several departments, and thus make them far worse Ministers than they might, by more diligence and harder work, become ; they care mighty little for this, provided they gain a further hold on your mind, and shew the country more strikingly how unbounded their influence is over your Majesty. The absolute impossibility of thus holding any communication whatever with the numberless parties who have daily claims upon their attention, is manifest. Whatever business they may transact, beyond royal promenades, and rides, and banquets, must needs be transacted in writing ; and consequently the affairs of this country are now carried on pretty much as they would be if those to whom they are intrusted were living abroad. When you return to London, some months hence, no doubt part of this serious evil might be removed ; but only part. The Ministers will be in London, and we shall no longer be governed by course of post ; yet the chief among them will have their whole time divided between sleeping and attendance in your palace : no time for calm discussions ; none for careful preparation of dispatches, and other state papers ; none for meditation, to inform and enlarge their views, on the great questions that occur ; none for reading, if they ever think of so vulgar an occupation.

The Friend of the People entreats her Majesty to allow her Ministers (if possible, we presume) to attend a little more to their duties, were it only to give them an opportunity of making up, by assiduity and industry, for what they lack in capacity for business. But other, and far more important considerations than the fate of her Ministers, are urged upon the Queen. "Consider, Madam, if you please," says this grave and stern monitor—not much more courtly or "glozing-tongued" than was John Knox with another youthful queen, the levity and gaiety of whose court, long before imprudence and guilt had marked her to misfortune, afford a closer parallel to the present state of the English court than any that the history of this kingdom affords—

Consider, Madam, whether all this exuberant favour is more beneficial to others than to themselves. You are identifying yourself with them in a way which your wary grandfather never dreamed of with his greatest favourites. You are delivering yourself up into their hands, far more fettered and helpless than your indolent uncle George IV., or your easy and well-natured predecessor, ever, for an instant, contemplated ; though the one was surrounded by men as dear to the aristocracy of Church and State as these men are the detestation of both ; and the latter had for his ministers the chosen favourites of the people. Reflect, I do beseech you, on this position in which you are placing yourself. It is true, and you lately used expressions which prove you to be aware of it, and shew your conviction, that this Ministry has none other support but yourself. On you, and on you alone, their existence depends. With an overwhelming majority of the Lords against them ; with all the Church and nearly all the landed interest their implacable enemies ; with a feeble and precarious balance of the Commons returned during the heyday of your accession to the crown, and their first acquisition of royal favour ; with the People altogether alienated from them, and regarding them as the main obstacles to all reform and to all improvement—where, indeed, shall they look for strength, or anything like it, but to you ? A word from your lips, and they sink into utter insignificance ; while a firm majority of both Houses—that in the Commons trebled by a dissolution—would at once support the government which should succeed to their places. But all this only shews the more clearly, that upon you rests the responsibility of the existing state of things ; the praise if it be for good, the blame if it be for evil.

I know well enough the lesson which you and all sovereigns have been made to learn by heart—that the king of this country has no responsibility. In one sense this is true ; and, in that sense, nothing but a violation of the constitutional law, or a subversion of the dynasty, can make you responsible. In that sense, your celebrated ancestors, the first Charles and the second James, were wholly irresponsible. It required a rebellion to make martyr of the one ; and a revolution to make an exile of the other. But there is a sense in which you are just as responsible as the meanest of your subjects. Morally, you are responsible ; and really, as things are nowadays managed, I know none of your Ministers more responsible than yourself. They may lose their places indeed ; so far your condition is less precarious than theirs, and depends less upon your conduct. But punishment for a bad Minister, or, which is the same thing, for a man who has no kind of talents except to be an agreeable member of society, and who chooses to play at being Minister because he finds (he says) the excitement of it pleasant ; for the public guilt of such a man there is no punishment, by the modern practice of our government, beyond that to which kings are as liable as their servants—the hatred and the scorn of their country. If the just demands of your People shall be disregarded ; if their lawful rights shall still be withheld from them ; if the men who have abandoned all their principles, forfeited every pledge, truckled to each adversary in proportion as he was wrong and strong ; deserted each friend who preferred being in the right to being in their good graces ; if these men shall still be suffered to rule the country in your name, and in your name to obstruct the progress of general improvement, then, Madam, be you well assured that a day of reckoning will soon come, in which you, and not they, will have to stand the scrutiny of four-and-twenty millions of people, resolved to make their pleasure known, and to speak very plainly their whole mind upon your conduct.

Will the young, heedless, beleaguered lady be permitted to read and ponder this ? Is there near her person one, were it but one, sincere and intelligent friend, who might teach her to apprehend the full import of lessons so important and so impressive ? Has the sound, constitutional doctrine, so clearly and forcibly laid down in the passage which follows, ever, we wonder, formed the theme of her daily and hourly conversations with Viscount Melbourne, her favourite Minister ?—for, doubtless, it enters into the first rudiments of the sound education of an English Prince.

Although Lord Melbourne's agreeable small talk may never have diverged into this dull direction, if the Queen will read this Letter, she may find the real, substantial, actual, tangible responsibility of the sovereign for the choice of his Ministers, so plainly laid down, that the capacity of a child, fit to discern right from wrong in the simplest question of morals, may apprehend it. "Believe me," the Monitor of royalty concludes—

Believe me, whatever those subtle doctors may say, the bulk of mankind look to the SOVEREIGN, and to the SOVEREIGN alone, as the party responsible for the choice of the Minister.——But there are far more important interests at stake than the fate of a Ministry: or, permit me respectfully to say it, the fate of a Monarch; else I should not have given myself the trouble of writing these pages. The best interests of this country are involved in the misconduct of the Government, and in the confidence which you continue to give it. My hopes are indeed slender that they will retrace their steps, and once more deserve the People's favour. My prayer is, that the People's steady determination may attain the People's fixed purpose, without any shock to the public peace.

The Queen's correspondent again adverts to the mighty change wrought by the Revolution of 1832, the effects of which are only beginning to be understood. From that era, a new conduct, and a new principle of policy in the Government, became matter of necessity, although we imagine that neither Lord Grey nor Lord John Russell have yet discerned this. After this mighty change, it is said—

Little knots of politicians, courtiers of St James's, or of Devonshire House, or Apsley House, or Holland House, could no longer expect to settle, in their more select meetings, the affairs of this great empire. Above all, there was an end of the absurd notion, that it signifies not how the House of Commons may be chosen. The People were now acknowledged to be the electors of their representatives; and the function of those representatives was declared to be, speaking the sense of the community at large. Then, if such be now the admitted origin, and such the avowed use of the Lower House, what shall be said of the arrangement by which a mere handful of persons are alone consulted in the selection of the members? How can any one, who maintained the necessity of giving the people a choice in the government of their country, affect to believe that it is enough if this share be conveyed to a few, all the rest being excluded; to thirty thousand men, for instance, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, there being above three hundred thousand in that district; and still more, if precisely the same share in the legislature is enjoyed by a place having two hundred or three hundred voters, and by a province having between twenty thousand and thirty thousand? Can any distribution of political influence be more revolting to common sense than that which awards to a paltry town like Harwich, precisely the same share with London or Westminster, or the West Riding of Yorkshire; giving to five thousand or six thousand persons the self-same voice in the conduct of public affairs with a million? Or, if we view the absurdity in its larger scale, by taking aggregates instead of individual anomalies, what defence shall be made for a system which gives to fifteen boroughs, whose inhabitants are short of one hundred thousand, as many representatives, and as much direct power in the legislature, as all Middlesex, Yorkshire, and Lancashire, with their six millions of people, and their countless resources of industry, and wealth, and skill?

This is the language of a decided and a far-going Reformer. His advocacy of a vastly extended constituency, and of equalized electoral districts, is powerful and strenuous; and this subject occupies nearly as much of "The Letter" as the more direct address to the Queen. In yielding or withholding these rights, he sees the peace of the country and the safety of the monarchy involved; and he turns back to consider so important a matter more deliberately.

That the adversaries of reform have now gained a complete victory, all must allow. They see the whole fruits of the change, so much dreaded, by them, blighted in the blossom; they find their opponents ranged on the same side with themselves, and eager to prop up every abuse by the very same means themselves had in vain attempted to employ for the obstruction of all improvement. They find that any risk of the People gaining their due weight in the government is chimerical, as long as the Reform Ministry, or rather the poor remains of the Reform Ministry, hold the reins of government; and they feel confident that no other liberal party will, for ages to come, be possessed of power to improve and to annoy.

I beg it may only be recollected, how very large a proportion of all the arguments ever used with effect to subvert the old parliamentary system, are precisely those to which I have been adverting. What was the reason which made all men feel the rotten boroughs to be wholly untenable? Was it not that there is a gross absurdity in five or six hundred persons electing a hundred members, while as many hundred thousand elect none at all? But wherein does this differ from the absurdity of fifteen thousand electing one hundred members, while four or five millions have not amongst them the fraction of a vote? The old system was condemned, because seven petty boroughs chose as many members as all Middlesex, town and country, together with the counties of York and Lancaster. Is this outrage on common sense much diminished, when, instead of seven petty boroughs, the same thing must now be affirmed of fifteen? The old system was ridiculed, and has been exploded, because units of the population had as great weight in naming the representatives of the whole community, as hundreds of thousands. Have we gained very much, in our progress towards making this scheme rational, by constituting tens for units? . . . Assuredly, had Mr Canning or Mr Huskisson survived to see their party placed in the cross-fire which they have now to sustain, from the real reformers on the one flank, and the equally consistent enemies of all reform on the other, we may conceive with what glee they would have undertaken the easy task of exposing the utter inefficiency of the reform, should it stop here; inefficiency for all other purposes except to uncover the nakedness of the system which acts upon certain principles, up to a certain point; and then abandons them, to adopt their contraries, and make a result as incongruous as any impossible monster that ever was created by a wild imagination. But the gross absurdities of the old system were not the only causes of its downfall. It sinned against all the principles which ought to regulate the conduct of the government towards the People.

Our readers do not generally belong to the class which most requires enlightenment on this subject; so we forbear pressing it farther.

The ten-pound-house qualification finds no more favour with the Queen's Monitor than the present numerically unequal constituencies, or than any one branch of the exploded system; and this prepossession he perhaps carries too far. If wealth, he argues, were to be made the criterion of respectability and independence in the voter, the ten-pound qualification is so low as to form no test at all; and, moreover, swarms of dependent creatures were by it made sharers of the legislative power, while other multitudes of men, among the most independent and respectable of the whole community, were deprived of all voice in the management of the public affairs. The Friend of the People is surely too severe upon that class of voters which Earl Grey's Bill delighted to honour. He beseeches her Majesty's attention to the anomalous character of that part of the constituency; but above all, to reflect upon the character and claims of the class excluded—his favourite class it would seem—the intelligent and skilful among the working men.

I beg of you, Madam, to reflect for a moment upon the class of persons whom the present system excludes from all share in the choice of their representatives. It might seem enough to say at once, in order to make us pause, "All the labouring classes of the community are shut out; all those upon the strength of whose arms our realms depend for their defence in war; all those upon the work of whose hands your people depend for food, for talent, for lodging." All are treated like the cattle upon the soil they till, or like the serfs upon those foreign soils, whose produce we are not suffered to purchase, in order that the country gentlemen, the lilies "which neither toil nor spin," may have larger nominal incomes than they could appear to enjoy, were bread sold at its natural value. But so much for justice; what says prudence, a monitor often listened to by the ears that justice finds deaf? Those men, the labouring population of the country, the disfranchised classes, are to be counted by millions, while the privileged body is to be numbered by thousands. How long will the many suffer themselves to be governed and despised by the few? If, however, I am told that men may be stout of heart and strong of arm, without having the head required to consult on state affairs, and choose those who can best consult for them, my answer is twofold: First, I am confident little learning is required to teach men what measures of peace, of freedom, of justice, of tolerance, are most deserving of support; what laws are wanted for relieving us of heavy burdens, for reducing the unequal pressure of those which are indispensable; for promoting and protecting industry, by removing obstacles to our trade at home and abroad; what men of independent station and character, of honest and plain minds, of clear manly understandings, and of good moral and religious repute, are most worthy of trust, and best calculated to join in making or in mending our laws. The qualification which an elector wants the most of all is independence of other men—having a will of his own—freedom from corrupt feelings—resolution to think for himself. If the farm labourers and cottagers are too much under the dominion of their employers, (and I am inclined to think that the ballot would not prevent them from following blindly, but voluntarily, their landlord's course,) this is no reason why the countless myriads of workmen in our towns should not be both enfranchised by an extension of the suffrage, and protected from all undue influence in the exercise of it.

My second answer then to the proposed objection is this:—The workmen in the towns are, without any doubt and with hardly any exception, fully qualified to exercise the franchise; and, generally speaking, they are incomparably fitter to be intrusted with it than the small shopkeepers—let me say, than any shopkeepers whom it has been my lot to know. Their intelligence is great, and it is daily increasing. Their information upon political subjects is not exceeded by that of any rank in the community. Many classes, and most numerous classes of these, are persons of extraordinary skill in difficult crafts; many unite a refined taste with expert manual dexterity; many work at things which require great scientific knowledge. Think only of the outrageous folly of a test which allows the most ignorant creature that ever walked upon two legs, to vote, because he rents a small hotel, and which no book, or pamphlet, or penny magazine, or even weekly paper, ever entered; and excludes from all voice, at all elections, whether municipal or parliamentary, a journeyman optician, whose lodgings are filled with mathematical instruments and works of natural philosophy, and who occupies his leisure hours in studying the discourses of Newton and Laplace. But, again I say, independencies more valuable than even knowledge; which, politically considered, is chiefly valuable because it makes a man think for himself, and scorn the dictation of a master, and spurn at the bribes of a candidate. Are the ten-pound shopkeepers men who scorn dictation and spurn at bribes?

The severe and bitterly sarcastic description of the shopocracy, which follows the above, pleases us much less, though it is not without a colour of justice; while to the eulogium upon the working men we most heartily subscribe. They have already established, and upon sure grounds, that claim to the franchise which the Friend of the People eloquently demands for them.

A good workman is to the full as independent of his master as his master is of him—in many crafts, a great deal more so. Among those men you never hear any demand for the ballot. No; they demand the right to vote! Give them that, and they will exercise it, like men, in the face of day; and leave the little shopkeeper, smirking behind the counter when my lady condescendingly steps in, to sneak behind the ballot-box when my lord is pleased to command his vote—or his account. Yes! these men, the ornament, the pride, and the glory of their country, are not suffered to choose her parliament; and are condemned to political annihilation. Those men whose exquisite skill and admirable dexterity carries the fame of your arts into every sea that a ship can plough, teaches envy to the proudest of your rivals, and inculcates admiration, almost to worshipping, on every tribe, however remote, as soon as its existence is known—whose miraculous industry maintains a struggle against all disadvantages of climate and of soil with the most favoured nations of the earth; nay, even bears up against the intolerable burdens which representatives they never had any choice in choosing, have laid upon them: these men from whom our whole capacity of continuing the government is derived, who nourish our commerce, who supply our revenue, whose genius and whose toil are necessary to our existence, are treated as if they were beasts of burden; and never are suffered to interfere in the management of those public affairs which, but for them, would be hurled into instant confusion and destruction! These are they who now demand, not the ballot, but the FRANCHISE; and the FRANCHISE they must, they will, they shall have!

Madam, have a care! Have YOU a care! I beseech YOU, have a care! This question cannot, it must not, be trifled with! You have Ministers whose incredible folly it is to fancy, because you are for them, they may turn round, against all their pledges, upon the People. Those Ministers have been supported when the court frowned upon them—partly from the reluctance of many friends to risk a Tory government, partly by the Irish members, under the direction of an individual. As long as they were ill at court, they affected a care for reform, and stood by their promises to Ireland.

Having shewn that the last shreds of support which the Ministers possessed, through the tergiversation of O'Connell, and the pitiable credulity of the Irish people, and also through the petty corporators—Tories wearing Whig clothes, since the latter became a fashionable and profitable costume—seeing these are about to fall them, and having foretold the fate of the Government, the Queen's uncourtly Monitor concludes with an exquisitely discriminating and graphic sketch of her Majesty's Prime Minister. We do not so much as hazard a conjecture as to the authorship of this pungent and stimulating, and, as we hope, efficacious epistle; yet there are touches in this particular delineation, which look as if it could proceed from but one pencil. Who, save one, could thus penetrate, thus dissect, and, as it were, turn inside out, the enervated and lax individual which it was one of Lord Brougham's most fatal and least pardonable errors to have aided in shuffling into that station for which he was by nature and training, in every essential point of view, so eminently unfit? Yet this is one of Lord Brougham's errors which has hitherto escaped condemnation, while his great public services and noble attempts to serve the People are converted into crimes. But, to return to our text—of Lord Melbourne the Queen is told—

The fate of your present Ministry is sealed. But the struggle to displace it will shake other powers than those of Downing Street. If you be your father's daughter, and your uncle's niece, you are not made of very yielding materials. Besides, you are young, and quite without experience. The indolent, careless individual who (with the help of his Canning-school companions) governs you as entirely as he leaves Parliament and the country to govern themselves, no doubt tells you—"It is all nothing, all a fancy, all a dream; nothing in it, nothing at all." He has an unusual contempt for all opinions, all doctrines—this he mistakes for being practical; indeed, for all subjects whatever, which he thinks is profound; nay, for all men, not even excepting himself—which he fancies is sagacious and enlarged. Of course, he laughs at the people, and laughs much at their leaders; forgetting that men may be very respectable who, by mere accident, are following contemptible enough leaders—as truly the present fortunes of the ministerial party might easily have taught him, had he really known as much as he pretends of the maxim which, in old times, was said to come down from heaven; forgetting, too, that the difficulty in great popular movements is not to find good leaders, but numerous followers, and that the former may very swiftly be changed when the latter are quite ready. As his constant maxim seems to have been, both personally and officially, "Anything for a quiet life," doubtless he has inculcated the same seductive and perilous doctrine upon his young mistress; and it would be wise and well, if all she had to trouble her repose, were the question, who should be asked to dinner, or who to dance? or if all the occupations of her station were, to do what her Ministers seem resolved she shall wear out life in performing—endless entertainments, constant amusements, everlasting parties, unceasing exhibition, and perpetual locomotion. But, Madam, if your whole duties consisted in these things, we might have them all performed just as well at a much lower rate. I will not say, with Thomas Paine, that "an able-bodied man might be easily got to do the work of king for five hundred a-year;" but assuredly a great saving might be made upon our royal establishment, if at the head of it there were not placed a great functionary, whose services require such a rare union of talent and judgment with firmness and with virtue, that I conscientiously believe it is hardly possible to pay for it too highly. But then we do pay very dear for it; and we must have something like it, or we are cheated. If then, the maxim of "Anything for an easy life" is to rule the sovereign, as it does the Ministry, the People must have their share of it too; and, believe me, Madam, there is nothing that would more tend to give them an easy life than a cheaper government. This is a doctrine which your Ministers of course will laugh at. They can only lose their places. Nay, the same men who, to serve King William, gave up all enmity to Reform; and, when they had got all they could by being Reformers, to serve your Majesty, gave up Reform itself—how do I know that they would not, to serve the People, give up all enmity to a commonwealth, as soon as they saw such a change inevitable? They assuredly never defended monarchy more stoutly than they did rotten boroughs; and, to tear them from Windsor, would take no greater wrench than it did to sever them from Old Sarum.

History records many greater wonders than such betrayal and desertion.

The mind of the young Queen is farther poisoned, or, at the reader's choice, is farther warned of her danger, and enlightened upon the true character of those who have won, to abuse her confidence; and her blunt Monitor states that he takes this liberty from his attachment to monarchy, (in the present state of society,) and an exceeding averseness to any change. He is deeply interested in the fate of the Queen, because the peace and prosperity of the country are involved in hers; and, therefore, the Friend of the People cannot be indifferent to it. "Your silly courtiers," he remarks—

Affect to call this a scanty measure of loyalty. Mind them not. They who hold this moderate and rational language will be found standing by you, with pen, and tongue, and sword, when that vile and false generation have been scattered to the wind by the echo of the first cheer which the multitude will give upon the first battalion refusing to fire on them; ay, and standing by you when it is no "easy life" to do so, and when the great patron of the "easy" doctrine, and the agreeable exemplar of the "free and easy," will be roaring out peals of laughter at the romantic folly of those who go against the grain, cling to monarchy now that it is out of season; and display an ardent affection for your person, after the imbecility of your advisers has stripped you of a crown!

The experiment has been twice tried, in cabinet-making, of a Ministry excluding all the men of all parties who possess and deserve the nation's confidence. First, Mr Addington failed in it, at the beginning of this century, and retired from the attempt with discomfiture and a nickname. The second experiment of this sort is now pretty plainly drawing near its natural close; and then will begin an experiment in constitution-making of a far more important kind, which has also once before been tried, and failed—that of a Government founded on popular principles, and excluding the great body of the People from all share in the conduct of it. I venture fearlessly to affirm, that, if it was found nearly impossible in 1832 to keep out the whole People from their share of power, it will be now absolutely impossible, after letting in the few, to exclude the many; and that whatever was done at the former period will be found to make the conflict which now awaits us incalculably more desperate. The most numerous class of the community, the most industrious, the most skillful, the creators of all wealth, and payers of almost all taxes—nay, themselves in the aggregate by far the richest class in the country—will not, you may be well assured, much longer suffer a state of things to continue, which gives to the other, smaller, weaker, poorer class, the whole legislation, the whole government, and the whole expenditure of the state. Sooner or later, that is to say, a year or two sooner or a year or two later, admitted they must and will be within the pale of the constitution. But it is of the greatest possible importance that this admission should be soon, not late; and it is of unspeakable importance to the monarchy and to your Majesty. I will tell you very plainly why. All the interval that may elapse before this consummation, how think you it is to be employed? I mean, employed by the excluded classes. In preparing to obtain admission? In combining to make their way good? In knocking at the door of the Constitution? In pressing against the door till they force their way? No such thing. They will prepare, they will combine, they will knock. They will press—no doubt of it—as men are wont to do who find the door of their own house barred against them. But they will also, as such men are very apt to do, pass the time they are kept outside in asking what those knaves are doing within; and not merely in such awkward inquiries; but in somewhat angry exclamations, and, I fear, even in somewhat sturdy resolutions to make those change places with them, who have kept the door of their house shut in their face. Depend upon it, Madam, such will be the occupation of your People, while you continue to keep them out. A constant, vigorous, unsparring scrutiny of all the parts of our system is beginning—a close examination of all its defects is undertaken. But this inquiry will go much farther if the time is prolonged. Account, an accurate account, will be taken of the expenses of monarchical government. Every particular will be canvassed.

We cannot go farther into detail.

However strongly inclined, we must not copy out the entire contents of this remarkable state missive, and shall therefore compress as much as possible, though the task is not easy. The inevitable tendency of the democratic principle is pointed out, though the Friend of the Monarchy does not once employ the obnoxious word; and the reasons for conciliation and prompt concession to the righteous demands of the People are forcibly stated. Finally, the epistle closes with a solemn warning to Prince and People which the writer fears may be in vain. It is his belief that there is yet time to avert the evils which he has foreseen and foretold, and which no friend of the present order of things can contemplate without dismay. "But if this time"—and we entreat the attention of all those who hope to live and thrive by Whiggery to the warning—"if this time

Shall be spent in miserable expedients to prop up a falling system, without getting a beam from the only quarter whence sound timber is to be had—the People; if the wretched folly of the Reform Bill being final is again to be broached, 'as the only answer to our just demands; if the outrageous absurdity—rather let us call it the blunder, too gross for even any part of Ireland—is to be committed, of calling that bill a final experiment; or if, which is about as ludicrous, the self-sufficient boast is to be vapoured forth by men, mere human lawgivers, of any measure man can devise being by possibility other than experimental; then I foresee neither comfort for your Majesty's days, nor length for your reign, nor safety for the monarchy; nor, what I value infinitely more, peace for your realm. But if the lessons of political wisdom which experience hath taught in all ages be listened to, and the courage be shewn—the prudent courage be shewn—of placing the Government upon a broad, a secure, popular foundation, then, knowing as I well do that no other structure ever can be stable in this land; that there is no other remedy for a state of things like the present, which actually leaves the country without any semblance of power or authority anywhere; that this hopeless impotency at home and abroad, this abnegation of all Government everywhere must continue to paralyze us, let whoever will be in office, until our system is fixed upon a deep and solid popular foundation; and convinced that a building so based must defy all shocks, I look forward to your Majesty's reign, not only as perfectly safe, but unspeakably glorious; and to your People as finally rescued from all the perils that beset them.

That the Almighty and All-wise Disposer of events, He in whose hands are the hearts of men, may endow you with the wisdom to desire this blessed consummation, and the firmness to work for it, is the devout prayer of every real

FRIEND OF THE PEOPLE

So closes this memorable Letter; which, however it may be viewed at Court, cannot fail to make a deep and solemn impression on the public mind; and to be received as more akin in spirit and in object to the warnings given by the prophets of Israel to their kings—or to the remonstrances of Knox directed to a giddy and self-willed young Queen, duped and misled by her favourites and flatterers, and blind to the dangers which, in a great national crisis, were gathering darkly around her—than to the adulatory and fulsome writings with which courtiers really insult the essential human and rational dignity of princes, while they affect to view them as demi-gods.

SONG.

OLD IRELAND FOR EVER !

OLD Ireland for ever !—hurrah for the Isle

Where eyes ever sparkling, and wit ever new,

Give life to the blarney, and warmth to the smile,

Which, stealing the heart, yet enraptures it too !

Let your fools and your fops for their beauties go roam—

The true son of Erin finds plenty at home;

And, in troth, with his arch little nymph, it were strange—

Where'er till that moment of bliss he might range—

If, when tasting her lips, he could think e'en of change.

Old Ireland for ever, &c.

Let them boast of the bloom of each orient bower,

And quaff till they wink the cold juice of the vine;

But where like the prairie was e'er there the flower ?

Or where like potheen was there ever the wine ?

Yet the hills of old Erin are smiling in green

O'er valleys as lovely as ever were seen ;

Nor are wanting the bowers by the bright flowing stream
Where oft, 'neath the light of sweet Cynthia's beam,
Och, who hath not whispered some little love dream ?

Old Ireland for ever, &c.

Old Ireland for ever !—hurrah for the boys

In whose fists the shillelah's no gum-stick, I trow ;

But whose hearts, though they glory 'mid danger and noise,

Are not the less kind at the end of the row.

Och, it is not your outspeken darling, you know,

Whose anger feeds malice for brother or foe ;

For, when the first thunder of passion is o'er,

Though beat, if 'twas fairly, he thinks on't no more ;

Nay, he'd fight for the friend who had thumped him before !

Then, old Ireland for ever !—hurrah for the Isle

Where eyes ever sparkling, and wit ever new,

Give life to the blarney, and warmth to the smile,

That, stealing the heart, yet enraptures it too !

CHRISTMAS.

THEY watch ! a shepherd band upon the plain,
Keeping their flocks from ravenous beasts by night—
When, lo ! in heaven as of a sun the light,
And voice symphonious of a choral train !—
"Glory to God most high ! on earth again,
Peace and good will to man !—for, dawning bright,
A star in Bethlehem riseth, that shall reign
Pre-eminent, when other planets wane—

The Star of Jacob, sung by prophets old ;
Light of the world, before whose glorious shine
All other lights are waxing dim and cold,
Doomed, by the power that made them, to decline ;
But thy dominion, Infant God, shall be Lasting and wide as thy eternity !"

ON THE OPENING OF THE SHEFFIELD AND ROTHERHAM RAILWAY.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

THEY come! the shrieking steam ascends,
Slow moves the bannered train;
They rush! the towering vapour bends;
The kindled wave again
Screams over thousands, thronging all
To witness now the funeral
Of law-created pain.

Behold it, Omgathorpe,* behold!
Look down, and cry, All hail!
Skies! brighten into blue and gold,
O'er all the living vale!
Pale, lingering foxglove! you, ye trees!
Thou, wood of Tinsley! tell the breeze
That Hell's dark cheek turns pale!

For Mind shall vanquish time and space;
Bid east and west shake hands;
Bring over ocean, face to face,
Earth's ocean-sever'd strands;
And on his path of iron bear
Words that shall wither in despair
The tyrants of all lands.

Eternal River!—roaring still,
As roared thy foamy wave
When first each wildrose-skirted rill
Heard moorland echoes rave—
Thou seest, amid thy meadows green,
The goodliest sight that earth hath seen
Since man made fire his slave.

Fire-kindling man! how weak wast thou
Ere thou hadst conquered fire!
How like a worm, on Canklow's brow,
Thou shrank'st from winter's ire!
Or heard'st the torrent-gathering night
Awake the wolf, with thee to fight,
Where these broad shades aspire!

But he whom cold and hunger ban,
Whom law and ease belie,
Who vainly asks his fellow-man
For leave to toil and die,
Is sadder, weaker, than wast thou,
When, naked here, on Winco's brow,
Thou dashed the wolf defy.

* Omgathorpe, Canklow, Winco, and Tinsley, are hills and woods, portions of the scene.

† The Don.

In vain thou mak'st the air a slave
That works, and will not tire;
And burn'st the flame-destroying wave,
And rid'st on harness'd fire—
In vain, if millions toil unfed,
And Crompton's children, begging bread,
Wealth-hated, curse their sire,
Fire-kindling man! thy life-stream runs,
Ev'n yet, through sighs and groans:
Too long thy Watts and Stephensons
With brains have fatten'd drones!
O Genius! all too long, too oft
At thee the souls of clay have scoff'd,
And sold thy little ones!*

Sold them to misery's dungeon-gloom,
To rapine's menial blow,
To beggary's brawl-fill'd lodging-room,
Where Famine curses Wo;
Then to the pest-den's workhouse floor,
To which good Christians send the poor,
By stages sure and slow.

But, lo! the train! On! onward!—still Loud shrieks the kindled wave;
And back fly hamlet, tree, and hill,
White steam, and banners brave;
And thoughts on vapour wings are hurld,
To shake old thrones, and change a world,
And dig Abaddon's grave.

Eternal River! roaring now,
As erst, in earliest years,
Ere grief began, with youthful brow,
To live an age of tears;
Thou hear'st, beneath thy forests high,
A Voice of power, that will not die
While man hath hopes and fears.

He, conquering fire, and time, and space,
Bids east and west join hands;
Brings over ocean, face to face,
Earth's ocean-sever'd strands;
And on his iron road will bear
Words that shall wither in despair
The tyrants of all lands.

* I do not believe that men of genius are less able than other men to earn their living; but, if they attempt more, they are more liable to failure; and, if they live where men are robbed of three-fourths of their earnings, is it surprising that they do not thrive?

HOME THOUGHTS.*

BY THE LATE ROBERT NICOLL.

THROUGH Scotland's hills be far awa,
And her glens, where the clear siller burnies row,
I see them, and hear her wild breezes blaw
O'er the moors where the blue bells and heather grow.

Oh, hame is sweet!—but thae hames o' thine
Are the kindest far that the sun doth see;
And, though far awa I have biggit mine,
As my mother's name they are dear to me!

I love the tale o' thy glories auld,
Which thy shepherds tell on the mountain side,
O' thy Martyrs true, and thy Warriors bauld,
Who for thee and for freedom lived and died!

Land of my youth! though my heart doth move,
And sea-like my blood rises high at thy name,
'Boon a' thing there's a' thing in thee I love—
The virtue and truth o' thy Poor Man's Hame.

The Poor Man's Hame! where I first did ken
That the soul alone makes the good and great—
That glitter and glare are false and vain,
And Deceit upon Glory's slave doth wait.

Thy Poor Man's Hame! wi' its roof o' strae,
A hut as lowly as lowly can be—
Through it the blast ane cauldride does gae;
Yet, Hame o' the Lowly, I'm proud o' thee!

Scotland! to thee thy sons afar
Send blessings on thy rocks, thy flood and faem—
On mountain and muir, on glen and scaur—
But deeper blessings still on thy Poor Man's Hame!

* These, with some other poetical pieces, were sent by Robert Nicoll to a friend in Edinburgh, shortly after he fixed his residence in Leeds.

FEATURES OF COUNTRY SOCIETY IN THE VICINITY OF LONDON : WITH SOME EXPLANATION OF THEIR CAUSES.

BY WILLIAM HOWITT.

To William Tait, Esq.

Esher, Surrey, Nov. 1838.

MY DEAR SIR,—When I had lately the pleasure of seeing you here, the Canterbury Riots were the subject of common conversation; you were expressing your surprise that such instances of popular ignorance should present themselves in the immediate vicinity of the metropolis; and I introduced to your notice several actuating influences, which appeared to dissipate a good deal of that wonder which, in common with people from the more northern part of the kingdom, you very naturally entertained. The fact is, that the state of society in the counties immediately bordering on the capital is very peculiar, and unlike that of any other part of the kingdom with which I am acquainted. Similar features, no doubt, are visible, to a certain degree, in other parts of the country, but nowhere do they possess the same strange prominence; for nowhere does or can the same amount of causation exist.

You would naturally imagine that, as London is the great centre of activity and talent—that, as there mercantile, philosophical, and literary ambition flock as to the chief theatre of exertion and reward—wealth and knowledge, and a quick spirit, would overflow together and diffuse themselves through the adjacent country. All inquiry, however, only proves that the farther you get from the metropolis, the more active is the disposition to a general diffusion of education amongst the people; and that nowhere does such gross ignorance exist as in the rural districts within fifty miles round London. The various reports of government commissioners, of parliamentary committees, and of popular societies, all testify to this fact. Look into the Reports of the Commissioners of Public Charities, into those of the Poor-Law Commissioners, and of the British and Foreign School Society, and you will find that all throughout the agricultural districts of the north of England the peasantry are better educated, and that pauperism consequently never assumed there the terrific aspect which it did in Kent, Essex, Sussex, Norfolk, and other southern counties. It was in Kent that Swing more particularly signalled himself by risk-burnings, and it was in Kent that the madman Thoms found such besotted votaries. The metropolitan journals have, one and all, joined in exclamations of surprise and indignation on this latter event. All have agreed in the strange fact of this dense cloud of rural ignorance with which the capital is encircled, but few or none have gone down into the real causes of its existence. Some have attributed it to the very nature of purely agricultural districts; others to the poverty of the peasantry, forgetting that a vast number of excessively wealthy people are scattered all through those districts; others to the location of so many parsons at Canterbury, and other equally rational causes. It is worth while to inquire whether the country bordering on the metropolis may not be affected by some powerful influences which exist there only in equal strength, and which may pretty well account for the singular phenomena which, from time to time, draw the public attention to those districts, just for a nine days' wonder, and then leave them, without any genial interposition, to go on for a few years more, maturing fresh miracles of folly and credulity for the general wonder. I see a state of things existing in this part of Surrey which I never saw existing anywhere farther from the capital; but which must exist in a greater or less degree all round it. I will now attempt to describe it, and leave it to the reader to determine whether it may not account, more fully than any solution which has yet been given us, for a condition of ignorance and moral degradation of the peasantry so near the centre of British wealth, intelligence, and philanthropy, at once so wonderful and disgraceful.

We are here only fourteen miles from Hyde Park Corner. When we came to reside here, about two years ago, we were immediately struck with a peculiar state of society, a peculiar condition and tone of mind and manner, in the peasantry, which we were not able, all at once, to comprehend or account for. We were just returned from an extensive tour through various parts of the kingdom, and especially from one in which our object had been to see as much as we could of the peasantry, and to make ourselves as well acquainted as possible with their actual condition, both physical and intellectual; but we instantly felt that the peasantry and villagers here had moral features very different from any we had hitherto encountered, and those, in the main, not of the most attractive character. Of course we were naturally curious to ascertain the cause of this, and we have now satisfactorily explained the whole matter to our own minds, however I may succeed in doing so to those of others.

We soon observed that the population in this district consisted simply of three classes: the aristocracy; the little tradesmen who supply their houses with the common articles of consumption; and the farmers, with their labourers. The social relations bore a striking resemblance to those of the feudal ages. There were the inhabitants of the castle, or enclosed park; the sumptuary population of the castle hamlet; and the tillers of the land. The many intervening links of modern society in England, in general, were totally wanting. We had neither the great tradesman, a man of large capital, living in the market-town, and depending not merely on this or that wealthy family for an existence, but on a numerous and independent public; nor the master manufacturer, with his warehouses and workmen, his extensive machinery and numerous people. We had nothing like a body of active, wealthy, and educated agriculturists, such as give impulse and life even to some rural districts; and as to that miscellaneous multitude of personages who animate towns and manufacturing districts with their various degrees of capital, and various descriptions of occupation, character, and religious or political persuasion, they had not a shadow of a representative here. Towns in the counties near London, compared with the towns of the midland and northern counties, are insignificant and inert. The attraction of the great wen, as Cobbett used to call London, is too powerful for them; it draws all their life, and the bulk of what would otherwise be their people and trade, into itself. They are like shrubs that grow beneath a great evergreen tree—they are chilled by its shade, and parched by its rain-defying mass of foliage, and exhausted by the hungry influence of its giant roots that spread themselves all through the soil that should nourish them. The bond of society here had but three links; and so little social connection had they, that they scarcely seemed links at all.

In the general disposition of things throughout England, the houses of the great landed aristocracy are thinly distributed. They occur, as you travel along, here and there. In the great mass of the habitations, they are the exception; but here they seem to constitute the majority. Wherever you go throughout the country, within twenty miles of London, and especially on the Surrey side, you find the stately mansions of the wealthy as thickly strewn as, in other parts of the country, you find the cottages of the poor. Or visit any of the pleasant eminences of this part of Surrey, and you will overlook a wide landscape of dense foliage—it is like one great and continuous forest. Penetrate into that part, and you find it to consist of the parks and policies of noblemen and gentlemen, in which they have shrouded themselves in woods, as if from each other's observation. It is amazing what numbers of proud and substantial mansions are buried in these woody seclusions; and what numbers of other goodly houses, in which men contrive to spend the amplest incomes. The whole track of country surrounding the metropolis, for twenty or thirty miles, but especially in Surrey, Kent, and Middlesex, swarms with the residences of the wealthy. The families of the aristocracy, who have seats and estates in distant parts of the kingdom, have seats again some ten, fifteen, or twenty miles out of London, where they can refresh themselves with a little quiet and country air and greenness during the season. Judges, barristers, wealthy professional men of all kinds, have their country houses at a convenient distance from London. The merchants have theirs; and the vast mass of families "whose fathers have lived before them," and laid up good store of the gold to be won in towns, and of those who have won it themselves, and now seek to enjoy it, have, by the aid of Mr Robins, and such painters of the picturesque, found out and located themselves in terrestrial paradises in all the country round busy London, wherever there are pleasant places, and green pastures to lie down in. There is no similar space in the whole world, where such a host of wealthy people have built and feathered their nests, and where, to every charm of nature, they have added those of art and affluence; have created lawns of velvet softness, the richest gardens, the finest green-houses, the most productive hot-houses, and, with splendid establishments and equipages, are prepared to roll down the hill of life, on springs of the most approved construction, and in the perfection of cushioned and pillowed ease.

But why have all these people thus located themselves? For their own entire enjoyment, to be sure. They have not gone into these gardens of Eden to look after their fellow-creatures; to consider how much good they may do; in what way they may best labour to spread knowledge or happiness amongst their less fortunate countrymen; how they may most effectually advance the interests, and diminish the crimes and sufferings of humanity. If these were their objects, they might have found ample employment for their philanthropic desires in London itself; or they might have spread themselves far and wide through England, where there exist numerous masses of human creatures that are dreadfully in want of comforters, and advocates, and advisers—that are, through all their lives, struggling to live, and feel themselves, by some awful curse, of which they cannot comprehend why they should be the objects, thrown upon existence—

"As in a place of agony and strife,
Where, for some sin, to sorrow they are cast
To act and suffer."—Childs Harold.

They might find employment, and that of the noblest and most godlike kind, in making themselves acquainted with the evils that thus embitter the days of so great a portion of their fellow-countrymen, in ascertaining their causes, and raising their voices, and exerting their energies, and making their wealth mighty in the behalf of the neglected and the oppressed. There are manifold institutions for the amelioration of the condition of these wretched beings—for their instruction, for their physical, social, and moral advancement, in which their pains and their personal attention and influence would work wonders. How much political good they might effect! They might stand up, and manfully unwind the knots and webs of that fatally intricate policy, which dooms labour to be unproductive, and renders the ancient usage of Tantalus a mere scarecrow, to that of an honest man, working sixteen hours a-day, through the whole course of his life, (Sunday scarcely excepted,) in order to see his children half starved, and totally uneducated. There are grievous evils in this country, operating on millions of miserable and despairing creatures, which might employ, most gloriously, all the powers and faculties of those who have, on their own account, no occasion to take any thought for the morrow. But such is not the object of the numerous and affluent class of which I am speaking. It is not their ambition. It does not belong to their creed or their philosophy. They are partly of the Norman blood, who have always deemed it their particular vocation "to live at home at ease," and rule the Saxons. They are partly the children of those who toiled and sweltered in offices, and behind desks in their warehouses, for the means of building a palace, and owning acres; and who talked of retirement so perpetually, that their sons and daughters have grown in the belief that a luxurious indolence is the great end of life. And they are partly of those who have plodded hardly for it themselves, in courts and on 'Change; and care not how the world goes, so that they have their easy chair and the morning paper. What are the groans of humanity to them? They never heard them when they were in the midst of the crush of the Great Babel itself.

It is not to be supposed, however, that all this class consists of the perfectly heartless and indifferent. No; there are unquestionably the average share of the amiable and well-disposed amongst them. There are, doubtless, numbers who are benevolently disposed, and who desire to do good in their day and generation. They give, as the printed lists shew, large sums of money to the great societies for humane and patriotic objects in town; and so far so good. But their great object is, like that of the majority of mankind, to enjoy themselves to the utmost—and to do that, they removed themselves from the scene of much action. They have purposely shrunk aside from the hot and dusty paths of human life, where misery sits by the way, and is grievously importunate. They have pounced on some sylvan nook—

"the choice retreat
Of latest grandeur from the city's noise;
And were it humbler, it in sooth were sweet;
But peace abhorreth artificial joys,
And pleasure, leagued with pomp, the zest of both destroys."—BYRON.

And, in truth, from this sylvan nook they have still an eye on the city. They still hang wittingly and wilfully on the skirts of Babylon. They still keep a fixed watch on the fashionable world. They have still their "house in town." They are ready, at the first call of the awaking world of dissipation, to take flight to London. They would not, for all that England has to bestow, be out of the speedy reach of the opera, the levee, the morning "at home," and evening rout or concert. From their "coop-hole" they can still hear "the roar of the great Babel;" and, in the strength of that, they can bear to hear the rustle of green trees, and to breathe the pure air of the uncontaminated heaven, for two or three months. That is, as all the world knows, the real condition of a great bulk of those whose splendid mansions stand in so many noble groves, and parks, and sylvan seclusions around London. They are, even so near town, there only a comparatively short period each year. The town season carries them away for half the year; and then they fly to watering-places or shooting parties, or some such thing, for another quarter. Those who stay in their country houses, and the rest, when they are there, are shut up in woods, and within park-walls, and see nobody but their own circle, who come in their carriages for morning calls and evening dinners. Of the people who live in the villages, and of the peasantry, they see nothing and know nothing. It is not likely that they should. They did not come there to make any acquaintance with villagers and peasants. That was not their object. They came there to enjoy themselves, and for that purpose they find ample matter amongst their own class. They have no feelings, sympathies, thoughts, pursuits, or conceptions in common with the children and tillers of the soil. They do not look upon them as having any claims to notice from them. They are not the people amongst whom they have grown. Part have sprung amid the swarming tribes of the city, too numerous to be grasped in any very lively sympathetic embrace. Part have stately houses and estates in some far-away county, and look upon the people there as the legitimate objects of their neighbourly concern. The rural people here are aliens to them; they live amongst them as mere visitors and strangers. The consequence is, that, as they form the principal and most important class, and as there is no middle class, in the common acceptation of the word, the working class are almost altogether an overlooked and unthought-of people.

In large towns, in manufacturing districts, in all districts where there is a mixed and money-making population, spite of the great quantity of extreme poverty, extreme and ill-paid labour, and too much neglect of the education of a very large portion of the artisan class, there are, nevertheless, causes and principles of action at work that constantly tend to cherish human sympathies, to quicken and civilise the very poorest, and awaken the most beneficial feelings and sentiments in the hearts of those who have the means of exercising an influence over their less fortunate brethren. These means of moral influence are there thrown within the reach of great numbers. It does not require a man to be very wealthy, or very accomplished, in order to be able to act on some portion of his fellow-men for their good. The great manufacturers are, for the most part, Reformers. The restrictions on commerce make them so. At the very least, they are Whigs. Independently of the natural sympathy with their work-people, which an intimate knowledge of them and their concerns is calculated to awaken, they know besides, that any great political measure is not to be carried without the assistance of the multitude; and on this account they are drawn to cultivate on all points (except, perhaps, that of the rate of wages, where the interests of the two parties are diametrically opposed) the good-will of the working class. They promote schools, and savings-banks, and benevolent and provident societies, to help them in their need. They stand forward, on public occasions, when reform is sought, as their mouth-pieces and leaders. The tradesmen follow a similar course; and in all the numerous grades and varieties of trade, there is scarcely a man but has the power and opportunity to confer a good on some other man. Every man has his religious connection, his political party, his parish affairs, in which to exercise an influence. There are numbers of tradesmen who may be seen behind their counters, every day of their lives, (Sundays excepted,) as busy as bees, who yet could purchase the estates of some of our noblemen, and who yet find time, besides attending diligently at the receipt of custom, to do a world of business for the good of their neighbours. I could name plenty of them, and of our own Society too, who are generally as keen as anybody after "the matter of the coined money," who are up in a morning, and, with all the young people they can press into the service, are teaching schools till breakfast time; who have a busy, practical interest in a score of institutions, schools, savings-banks, artisans' libraries, tract societies, Bible societies, anti-slavery societies, &c.; and are always at the call of their fellow-citizens, the first to come forward with purse and voice, to put down oppression, and to call for public justice and public humanity. There are a hundred opportunities and incentives in the thoroughly mixed society of towns and manufacturing districts, which conspire to awaken the faculties and the affections, to stir all the best sympathies and the highest principles of human nature; to make men feel that they are men, and have it in their power to imitate the Divinity in his ceaseless work of beneficence towards his rational creatures. They are enabled to ennoble their own minds by the very offices and practice of doing good, and indulging, and thus strengthening all their highest sentiments; and, at the same time, to raise the tone, and increase the happiness of society around them. There are great privileges; but how different is the case of the mass of wealthy people in the districts of which I am speaking! Men and women, too, may be naturally very amiable; but the desire of good dies with the opportunity of doing good. When people shut themselves up in woods and parks, at a distance from common life, they abstract themselves from all stimulus to practical philanthropy. It is the direct consequence of luxurious indulgence, to lull both the faculties and the emotions into a voluptuous torpor. The only spur that they feel is to rival their wealthy neighbours in the splendour of their existence. They become indolent in habit, and fat in the heart. They live in a stately dulness. They have too much dignity to mix with the class that may need their aid; to inquire into their condition, and promote their education. They cannot—it is an utter impossibility—like the wealthy tradesman, amalgamate themselves with all the pressing needs and interests of the struggling many. Their aptitude for it is destroyed; they have removed the struggling many out of their sight. How much higher and nobler a being, in the scale of human life, is the smallest shop-keeper, who devotes his scanty portion of leisure to the benefit of his species, than the wealthiest man, who shuts himself up in a wood, and forgets, in luxurious grandeur, the solemn responsibilities of humanity! I never traverse the rich country on this side London, thickly studded with magnificent abodes, without being reminded of Thomson's "Castle of Indolence." Most readers imagine the scenery of his poem to be merely ideal; but Thomson wrote a great part of his poetry at East Sheen, near Richmond; and his opening stanzas are literally imbued with the spirit of the country around him:—

"In lowly dell, fast by a river's side,
With woody hill o'er hill encompassed round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is nowhere found.
It was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground.

Was naught around but images of rest,
Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between;
And flowery beds that slumberous influence kist,
From poppies breathed, and beds of pleasant green.

A pleasing land of drowsy-head it was;
Of dreams that wave before the half-shut eye;
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
For ever flushing round a summer sky:
There eke the soft delights that witchingly
Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast,
And the calm pleasures, always hovered nigh;
But, what'er smacked of noyance or unrest,
Was far, far off expelled from this delicious nest."

So much for this class of society. Let us now see what has been the effect on those below it. The next is the class of tradesmen. This was at first a strange puzzle to us. When a fresh family comes to settle in this part of the country, the tradesmen who supply articles for house-keeping, &c., immediately appear, hat in hand, to solicit its custom. You have a zealous levee of bakers, butchers, grocers, brewers, shoemakers, tailors, inn-keepers offering post-horses and chaises, blacksmiths, &c. &c. Having made your selection, you seem handed over to those particular people as their property, and every day they come driving round in their light spring-carts, to take orders and deliver what you want. Every other man appears to consider the rejection of his services as a real injury committed against him—such, in nine cases out of ten, will refuse to serve you afterwards, if you go to his shop. In all other places, you find tradesmen with whom you have not been in the habit of dealing, only the more civil and assiduous in their attentions if you enter their shop. They naturally hope to gain your commands by their obliging behaviour; but not so with those villagers. You have adopted a tradesman, and to him you may go.

My man, on one occasion, went into an apothecary's shop to purchase some small article. The apothecary, instead of giving him the article, looked at him and observed—"Oh, you are Mr Howitt's servant—he employs Mr —; you had better go there." The man said—"I am going to pay you for it." "Oh," replied the doctor, "I don't doubt that, but I don't choose to sell my articles to those who employ another doctor. If you want anything, any time, for yourself, you know, you shall have it with the greatest pleasure." My cook went into a shop to get an ounce of olive oil. The man took down his bottle, and was just in the act of filling her vial, when, looking at her attentively, he said—"I think you are Mr Howitt's servant?" She replied in the affirmative. "Ah, then, we have not got it," (holding the very thing in his hand all the time;) "you'll get it, you know, at Love-ridge's." That was our grocery!

On mentioning those and other singular facts of the same kind to an old inhabitant—"Oh, no!" he observed, "they won't sell you a single thing, unless you make your custom all over to them." We tried the experiment repeatedly, to be sure of so odd a circumstance, and always with the same result. They told the servants that anything for themselves they would let them have with pleasure; but that they would not sell anything to their master, unless they sold him all he wanted.

Another thing equally singular, was the surly and ungracious manner of some of the people that you did employ. They seemed as though, having once got your business, they were to hold it by prescription, in whatever manner they executed it; as though they looked upon you as their natural prey, and that you must take just what they please to give you. A shoemaker soled me a pair of shoes—one sole came off in at least three days. I sent it, and desired the man to make it good. When done, he brought it, and made a charge equal to the original one. I said—"No. I expect you to make that good without additional charge. I do not expect to wear out a sole in three days. You are bound to make good your bad workmanship." The man insisted that it was as good leather, and as good work, as any in England. "Then, why has one sole stood, and the other given way directly?" He could not pretend to tell that; all he knew was, that it was as good work as any man in the King's dominions could make. I desired him to recollect himself—that, if he persisted in his charge, I would pay him, but would not employ him again. He persisted. I then, at the recommendation of a neighbour, tried a man in the next village. This man's work was just as bad, and all his answer was—"The long and the short of the matter is, the shoes have worn out." "Yes, but then the time." It was no use adding any remark. The only reply was—"It was the best leather and the best work in England." Having occasion to call on a gentleman in the village, I mentioned the fact, and added, that I supposed, from this man's ungracious and cavalier manner that he did not want custom. "The truth is," said the gentleman, "he is as poor as a rat; but such is the man's churlishness, that I have been obliged to leave him myself, and go to a village five miles off."

Now, to what are this gross impolicy, this surliness, and utter intractability of character to be attributed? There appears no assignable reason but ignorance, and insolent usage by the higher classes, or by their servants. These people have not a numerous class of customers, who, when they choose their tradesmen as their fancy dictates, still divide and afford plenty of customers for all. There are a certain number of wealthy families, whose custom constitutes the bulk of the business of the neighbourhood. If they miss them, they feel sore; a spirit of jealousy and surly ill-will is generated. They are too ignorant to perceive that no good is done by resentment—that the best policy is politeness and superior management; and they become unmanageable, churlish, and extortionate. What is still more ludicrous is, that these people deal out their bows and lifting of their hats, by the exact rule of what they hope to get out of you. There is nothing like the cheerful civility of more mixed, and I must say, more morally healthful districts. You do not meet an open smile and a respectful greeting; it is either a servile obeisance, or a surly stare. Nothing like such a salutation as passes in other parts of the kingdom of, "How do you do, sir?"—or, "I hope you are very well, sir," could pass. To the stately grandeur of the wealthy families, such a salutation from any one not exactly of their own grade, would be regarded as the grossest insolence, and resented accordingly by an imperious stare. The only salutation, therefore, in passing between those of different classes, can only be a lifting or touching of the hat; and you will soon find that your tradesmen and their servants, off with their hats with great reverence and at great distances.* But all others give you a silent and sort of bull-froggish stare. If you ceased to employ a tradesman in the morning of any given day, in the afternoon of the same, should you meet him or any of his men, they would give you the dead set of not knowing you, any more than if they had never seen you.

This is all very pitiable, but it springs out of the nature of things, and admits of no alteration while the constitution of society remains the same in the same districts. There are, of course, some very excellent exceptions amongst the tradesmen; but the general character is what I have stated it. It is very probable that Clarendon, which is here, having been a court, may have produced its effect; for courts cannot exist without communicating their corruptions even to rural districts; and all here agree, that the social features of which I am speaking in this paper, are more aggravated hereabout than in most other quarters of the juxta-metropolitan districts.

* A friend of mine says, that one of his tradesmen's servants regularly takes off his hat as he passes his house, though nobody is to be seen, as if it were a church or some more sacred place; and that he believes, if the house were shut up and the family absent, he would do the same from mere habit.

If such, then, be the condition of the middle class, it may readily be divined what is that of the peasantry. They are in the most stupid state of ignorance. The first thing which struck us, in them was, the absence of that open, good-humoured look, which is common to the peasantry of the midland and northern counties. There was a sullen boorishness about them, that produced a very unpleasant impression. If you attempted to get into conversation with them, you found it a difficulty. Instead of evincing any satisfaction in your attention, they appeared suspicious and uneasy. They evidently were not accustomed to be addressed with any degree of familiarity by their wealthier neighbours. Farther observation soon shewed us that there was a great gulf placed between them and that class which, by its affluence and station, might work wonders amongst them, by diffusing education and intelligence. They never saw the rich, except as they passed them in their carriages, or as they themselves happened to be employed in their grounds. The only intercourse which ever passed between them, was what George Fox used to call "hat-homage." They felt that they were treated with perfect contempt by the aristocracy, and they naturally lost that manly and open look and carriage which a man ought in every situation to maintain.* However poor a man may be, and however wealthy his neighbour, he ought never to forget, for a moment, that "A man's a man for a' that,"

It is a sentiment which cannot expire, without a certain nobility of nature expiring with it. Self-respect is perfectly consistent with respect to every one who is worthy of it.

But while the peasantry of these districts are neglected by the aristocracy, there is neither a numerous middle class to take up their cause, nor do they exist in such numbers, or in such union themselves, as to supply, in any degree, the want of patrons and helpers. They are scattered about in their cottages, and are dependent for a livelihood on the aristocracy, who seldom see them, or on the farmers, who are nearly as ignorant as themselves. He who imagines the farmers in these districts anything like the farmers in the midland and northern counties, is very much mistaken. The farms are rarely large, and the farmers are rarely men of that capital and education which they are more northward. In the north, the wealthy agriculturists are active promoters of education amongst the peasantry; but nearer the metropolis, the bulk of the farmers resemble the smallest class of farmers from the north. They are honest, plodding old chaps, who can just read and write themselves, and hate most cordially any attempt to instruct the labourers' children. Perhaps I may here be allowed to quote a passage from myself.

"The villages themselves are often very picturesque. They are frequently scattered along extensive commons, amidst abundant woods and grey heaths; generally buried in their old orchards, and built with many picturesque angles and projections; often thatched, and consisting of old framed timber-work, or wood altogether, with gardens full of flowers, and goodly rows of bee-hives. . . . But the people themselves seem lost in their umbrageous hamlets, and on their commons unthought of. There is the village of Oxshott, some three miles hence. Go through it on a Sunday, when the agricultural people are all at leisure, and there they are, as thick as motes in the sun, in the middle of the village street. There is no church; nor any inhabitants, but farmers and labourers. Boys, girls, men, and women, all seem to be out of doors, and all in their every-day garbs. The colour of tawny-soiled slops and straw-hats gives, as a painter would say, the prevailing tint to the scene. The boys are busy enough, playing at ball or cricket. The men seem to pass their time sitting on banks and stiles, a-gossiping or smoking in groups. Scarcely a soul will move out of the way to let you pass. The intellectual condition of this obscure hamlet is strikingly indicated to every passer through, by a large school-house, bearing on its front, cut in stone, this proud title—THE ROYAL KNUT SCHOOL, founded in 1820;† but which has since been so far confounded, that its windows are broken to atoms, and it is at once recent and in ruins! This state of things should not be suffered to continue. The vast wealth of the aristocracy living hereabout, and the ignorance around them very ill accord. Amongst the affluent families in this county, there are, no doubt, many who would be anxious to secure an education to the rural children, if they actually knew that it was needed! In the village of Kewer this has recently been done; let us hope that other places will 'go and do likewise.'‡

In Kewer, a gentleman who happened to be a

* Servants, by the haughty treatment which they have been uniformly accustomed to, have also contracted a very peculiar nature and notions. They look upon it as a part of gentility to be imperious and reserved; and they despise any one who relaxes the reins of discipline, speaks to them in any but an authoritative tone, or shows them indulgence. It had always been our custom to use conciliating language, and show as much kindness to our domestics as possible; but we soon found that here they could not bear it. They grew at once familiarly insolent, or everything went as speedily to confusion and neglect. It was evident that, if you treated them with anything but strict and positive dictation, they looked upon you as nobody. A lady of our acquaintance, going into the kitchen to iron some muslin collars of her own, which she did not like to trust to the maids, was speedily informed by the cook, that "the last mistress she lived with was quite a lady, and never did anything." These hints were not lost. By continuing to afford them every substantial comfort, but treating them as persons without a choice or an opinion, we found them turn out very good servants.

north-countryman, and therefore awake on the subject of education, made an inquiry, and found two hundred children in the parish running about without the slightest chance of learning their letters. He raised, after many difficulties and objections, a subscription, and collected them all into a school, and not before it was wanted. As I have observed, the Parliamentary Commissioners give a deplorable picture of the ignorance of the agricultural population in the counties bordering on the metropolis. In some parts of Essex, Sussex, Kent, Buckinghamshire, and Berkshire, schools of any kind are represented as unknown; and that in others, not more than one in fifteen of the labourers is able to read. In this part of Surrey, the difficulty is to find a labourer at all that can read, and none but those who have had to do with them can tell the density of their minds. The rust of ages seems to be settled upon them. If ignorance were laughable, some most ridiculous instances of it might be given. When I came here, I asked the gardener who had lived all his life here, what house in the village Jane and Anna Maria Porter, the novelists, used to occupy. He told me; and added, gratuitously—"How much these ladies were made of by the gentry!" "And on what account?" I asked. "Oh! they made drawings for young ladies, or something." As I was going into Chertsey one day, I was curious to know whether anything was remembered of Abraham Cowley, who lived some time and died there. There is a stone tablet fixed in the front of his house, still bearing Pope's line—

"Here the last numbers flowed from Cowley's tongue;" so that one would think the house a matter of sufficient notoriety in a place of perhaps a couple of thousands of population. I asked two old women who sat on a bank at the town-end, if they could tell me whereabouts Cowley's house stood. "Cowley! Cowley!" said they. "What is he?" "Nay," I observed, "it is rather what was he?" Oh, then, they knew nothing about him, and they knew nobody of that name. "Well, but," I added, "it is Cowley, the poet, that I mean." "A poet? a poet?" said one old woman to the other, looking very full of wonder—"what is a poet?" They shook their heads and could make nothing of it. I repeated my inquiries to every person that I saw, but with as little success, till I got very near to the house itself, when I found a man who knew it. My two little boys, the eldest not more than seven years of age, who were with me in the chaise, were vastly amused that nobody knew what a poet was, and continued repeating the old woman's query at intervals all the way home—"A poet! a poet! What's a poet?"

Looking at the general appearance of the habitations of the peasantry, you do not see that squalid poverty which you do in many manufacturing districts—nay, you would say that they were well off. They have their gardens, and vines on their walls, and a good stock of fruit trees generally. I was myself so far deceived by appearances as to think, that however great their ignorance, they were not physically ill off. An occurrence last winter shewed how much I was mistaken, and how little the aristocracy knew of them or their concerns. Towards the end of that severe winter, it was found that the greater part of them had been out of employ for five months, and were in a state of absolute destitution, without either food or fuel. It is only justice to say that, the moment it was discovered, a liberal subscription was raised to assist them. But what remedy for the future? Who goes amongst them to teach them habits of providence, or to see whether their earnings will admit of laying up anything against winter. I have suggested to several persons to establish a branch Savings' Bank for them; but the only answer is—"It is useless—they would not avail themselves of it."

I have now, I think, developed the elements of a curious state of society, and one which must dispel any wonder at the ignorance hovering round the metropolis. Where the chief and most influential class is devoted to a life of pleasure, and is cut off by its habits from all contact and all knowledge of the others—where there are wanting the many degrees of property, and the busy multitude that creates a feeling of independence—then the populace must be neglected and untaught. At all events, there must be a class of persons of active mind and liberal views, who will feel a lively interest in the education of the labouring community, before that education will be attempted.

Those who know anything of the aristocracy will not expect them to issue from their parks, and descend from their chariots, to teach the peasantry, while Taglioni can dance or Grisi sing. The village tradesmen are not more likely to become the apostles of education; and the farmers hate it.* Unless, then, some national scheme of education be established—or some Education Society extend its views to the land of the shadow of death round London—or other William Allans send out their emissaries to ascertain where there is most need of schools, and build them, as he built one at Lindfield in Sussex—it is to be feared that "the people who sit in darkness" in these counties will not see, at present, any great light; and that other Thoms may arise, and find plenty of votaries equally credulous. I am, my dear sir, yours very truly,

WILLIAM HOWITT.

* The Methodists, who effect so much with their preachings and their Sunday schools amongst the poor, wherever there is a dense population, seem to make no way in a scattered one. Here we hear very little of them, or of any other Dissenters; so that the excitement and intelligence which they generally bring with them are wanting. One would think that a field-preacher would find a fine opening in such villages as Oxshott; but none seem to be aware of it.

A BRIEF APPRAISAL OF THE GREEK LITERATURE IN ITS FOREMOST PRETENSIONS :

By way of Counsel to Adults who are hesitating as to the Propriety of Studying the Greek Language with a view to the Literature ; and by way of consolation to those whom circumstances have obliged to lay aside that plan.

BY THOMAS DE QUINCEY.

No question has been coming up at intervals for reconsideration more frequently than that which respects the comparative pretensions of Pagan (viz., Greek and Roman) Literature on the one side, and Modern (that is, the Literature of Christendom) on the other. Being brought uniformly before unjust tribunals—that is, tribunals corrupted and bribed by their own vanity—it is not wonderful that this great question should have been stifled and overlaid with peremptory decrees, dogmatically cutting the knot rather than skilfully untying it, as often as it has been moved afresh, and put upon the roll for a re-hearing. It is no mystery to those who are in the secret, and who can lay A and B together, why it should have happened that the most interesting of all literary questions, and the most comprehensive, (for it includes most others, and some special to itself,) has, in the first place, never been pleaded in a style of dignity, of philosophic precision, of feeling, or of research, proportioned to its own merits, and to the numerous “issues” (forensically speaking) depending upon it ; nor, in the second place, has ever received such an adjudication as was satisfactory even at the moment. For, be it remembered, after all, that any provisional adjudication—one growing out of the fashion or taste of a single era—could not, at any rate, be binding for a different era. A judgment which met the approbation of Spenser could hardly have satisfied Dryden ; nor another which satisfied Pope, have been recognised as authentic by us of the year 1838. It is the normal or exemplary condition of the human mind, its ideal condition, not its abnormal condition, as seen in the transitory modes and fashions of its taste or its opinions, which only or give even a colourable permanence to any decision in a matter so large, so perplexed, so profound, as this great pending suit between antiquity and ourselves—between the junior men of this earth and ourselves, the seniors, as Lord Bacon reasonably calls us. Appeals will be brought ad infinitum—we ourselves shall bring appeals, to set aside any judgment that may be given, until something more is consulted than individual taste ; better evidence brought forward than the result of individual reading ; something higher laid down as the grounds of judgment, as the very principles of the jurisprudence which controls the court, than those vague responsa prudentum, countersigned by the great name, perhaps, of Aristotle, but still too often mere products of local convenience, of inexperience, of experience too limited and exclusively Grecian, or of absolute caprice—rules, in short, which are themselves not less truly sub judice and liable to appeal than that very appeal cause to which they are applied as decisive.

“Can lay great bases for eternity,”

We have remarked, that it is no mystery why the decision should have gone pretty uniformly in favour of the ancients ; for here is the dilemma:—A man, attempting this problem, is or is not a classical scholar. If he is, then he has already received a bias in his judgment ; he is a bribed man, bribed by his vanity ; and is liable to be challenged as one of the judges. If he is not, then he is but imperfectly qualified—imperfectly, as respects his knowledge and powers ; whilst, even as respects his will and affections, it may be alleged that he also is under a bias and a corrupt influence ; his interest being no less obvious to undervalue a literature, which, as to him, is tabooed and under lock and key, than his opponent’s is to put a preposterous value upon that knowledge which very probably is the one sole advantageous distinction between him and his neighbours.

We might cite an illustration from the French literary history on this very point. Every nation in turn has had its rows in this great quarrel, which is, in fact, coextensive with the controversies upon human nature itself. The French, of course, have had theirs—solemn tournaments, single duels, casual “turn-ups,” and regular “stand-up” fights. The most celebrated of these was in the beginning of the last century, when, amongst others who acted as bottle-holders, umpires, &c., two champions in particular “peeled” and fought a considerable number of rounds, mutually administering severe punishment, and both coming out of the ring disfigured : these were M. la Motte and Madame Dacier. But Motte was the favourite at first, and once he got Dacier “into chancery,” and “fibbed” her twice round the ropes, so that she became a truly pitiable and delightful spectacle to the connoisseurs in fibbing and bloodshed. But here lay the difference : Motte was a hard hitter ; he was a clever man, and (which all clever men are not) a man of sense ; but, like Shakespeare, he had no Greek. On the other hand, Dacier had nothing but Greek. A certain abbé, at that time, amused all Paris with his caricatures of this Madame Dacier, “who,” said he, “ought to be cooking her husband’s dinner, and darning his stockings, instead of skirmishing and tilting with Grecian spears ; for, be it known that, after all her not cooking and her not darning, she is as poor a scholar as her injured husband is a good one.” And there the abbé was right; witness the husband's Horace, in 9 vols., against the wife's Homer. However, this was not generally understood. The lady, it was believed, waded petticoat-deep in Greek clover; and in any Grecian field of dispute, naturally she must be in the right, as against one who barely knew his own language and a little Latin. Motte was, therefore, thought by most people to have come off second best. For, as soon as ever he opened thus—"Madame, it seems to me that, agreeably to all commonsense or common decorum, the Greek poet should here"—instantly, without listening to his argument, the intrepid Amazon replied, (ὑποδραϊόσα;) "You foolish man! you remarkably silly man!—that is because you know no better; and the reason you know no better, is because you do not understand ton d'apameibomenos as I do." Ton d'apameibomenos fell like a hand-grenade amongst Motte's papers, and blew him up effectually in the opinion of the multitude. No matter what he might say in reply—no matter how reasonable, how unanswerable—that one spell of "No Greek! no Greek!" availed as a talisman to the lady both for offence and defence; and refuted all syllogisms and all eloquence as effectually as the cry of A la lanterne! in the same country some fourscore years after.

So it will always be. Those who (like Madame Dacier) possess no accomplishment but Greek, will, of necessity, set a super-human value upon that literature in all its parts, to which their own narrow skill becomes an available key. Besides that, over and above this coarse and conscious motive for overrating that which reacts with an equal and answerable overrating upon their own little philological attainments, there is another agency at work, and quite unconsciously to the subjects of that agency, in disturbing the sanity of any estimate they may make of a foreign literature. It is the habit (well known to psychologists) of transferring to anything created by our own skill, or which reflects our own skill, as if it lay causatively and objectively* in the reflecting thing itself, that pleasurable power which in very truth belongs subjectively* to the mind of him who surveys it, from conscious success in the exercise of his own energies. Hence it is that we see daily without surprise, young ladies hanging enamoured over the pages of an Italian author, and calling attention to trivial commonplaces, such as, clothed in plain mother English, would have been more repulsive to them than the distinctions of a theologian, or the counsels of a great-grandmother. They mistake for a pleasure yielded by the author, what is in fact the pleasure attending their own success in mastering what was lately an insuperable difficulty.

It is indeed a pitiable spectacle to any man of

* Objectively and subjectively are terms somewhat too metaphysical; but they are so indispensable to accurate thinking that we are inclined to shew them some indulgence; and, the more so, in cases where the mere position and connexion of the words are half sufficient to explain their application.

sense and feeling, who happens to be really familiar with the golden treasures of his own ancestral literature, and a spectacle which moves alternately scorn and sorrow, to see young people squandering their time and painful study upon writers not fit to unlace the shoes' latches of many amongst their own compatriots; making painful and remote voyages after the drossy refuse, when the pure gold lies neglected at their feet. Too often he is reminded of a case, which is still sometimes to be witnessed in London. Now and then it will happen that a lover of art, modern or antique alike, according to its excellence, will find himself honoured by an invitation from some millionnaire, or some towering grandee, to "assist," as the phrase is, at the opening of a case newly landed from the Tiber or the Arno, and fraught (as he is assured) with the very gems of Italian art, intermingled besides with many genuine antiques. He goes: the cases are solemnly disgorged; adulatory hangers on, calling themselves artists, and, at all events, so much so as to appreciate the solemn farce enacted, stand by uttering hollow applause of my Lord's taste, and endeavouring to play upon the tinkling cymbals of spurious enthusiasm: whilst every man of real discernment perceives at a glance the mere refuse and sweeping of a third-rate studio, such as many a native artist would disdain to turn out of his hands; and antiques such as could be produced, with a month's notice, by cart loads, in many an obscure corner of London. Yet for this rubbish has the great man taken a painful tour; compassed land and sea; paid away in exchange a king's ransom; and now claims on their behalf, the very humblest homage of artists who are taxed with the basest envy if they refuse it, and who, meantime, cannot in sincerity look upon the trumpery with other feelings than such as the potter's wheel, if (like Ezekiel's wheels) it were instinct with spirit, would entertain for the vilest of its own creations—culinary or "post-culinary" mugs and jugs. We, the writers of this paper, are not artists, are not connected with artists. God knows it, as well as Mr Tait. And yet, upon the general principle of sympathy with native merit, and of disgust towards all affectation, we cannot but recall such anecdotes with scorn; and often we recollect the stories recorded by poor Benvenuto Cellini, that dissolute but brilliant vagabond, who (like our own British artists) was sometimes upbraided with the degeneracy of modern art, and, upon his humbly requesting some evidence, received, by way of practical answer, a sculptured gem or vase, perhaps with a scornful demand of—when would he be able to produce anything like that—"eh, Master Ben? Fancy we must wait a few centuries or so, before you'll be ready with the fellow of this." And, lo! on looking into some hidden angle of the beautiful production, poor Cellini discovered his own private mark, the supposed antique having been a pure forgery of his own. Such cases remind one too forcibly of the pretty Horatian tale, where, in a corner between two men who undertake to mimic a pig's grunting, he who happens to be the favourite of the audience is applauded to the echo for his felicitous execution, and repeatedly encored, whilst the other man is hissed off the stage, and well kicked by a band of amateurs and cognoscenti, as a poor miserable copyist and impostor; but, unfortunately for the credit of his exploders, he has just time, before they have quite kicked him off, for exposing to view the real pig concealed under his cloak, which pig it was, and not himself, that had been the artist—forced by pinches into “mimicry” of his own porcine music. Of all baffled connoisseurs, surely these Roman pig-fanciers must have looked the most confounded. Yet there is no knowing: and we ourselves have a clever friend, but rather too given to subtilising, who contends, upon some argument not perfectly intelligible to us, that Horace was not so conclusive in his logic as he fancied; that the real pig might not have an “ideal” or normal squeak, but a peculiar and non-representative squeak; and that, after all, the man might deserve the “threshing” he got. Well, it may be so; but, however, the Roman audience, wrong or not, for once fancied themselves in the wrong; and we cannot but regret that our own ungenerous disparagers of native merit, and exclusive eulogisers of the dead or the alien—of those only “quos Libitina sacravit,” or whom oceans divide from us—are not now and then open to the same palpable refutation, as they are certainly guilty of the same mean error, in prejudging the whole question, and refusing to listen even to the plain evidence of their own feelings, or, in some cases, to the voice of their own senses.

From this preface it is already abundantly clear what side we take in this dispute about modern literature and the antique.* And we now propose to justify our leaning by a general review of the Pagan authors, in their elder section—that is, the Grecians. These will be enough in all conscience, for one essay; and even for them we meditate a very cursory inquest; not such as would suffice in a grand ceremonial day of battle—a justum prælium, as a Roman would call it—but in a mere perfunctory skirmish, or (if the reader objects to that word as pedantic, though, really, it is a highly favoured word amongst ancient divines, and with many a “philosopher,

Who has read Alexander Ross over;”)

why, in that case, let us indulge his fastidious taste by calling it an autoschediastic combat, to which, surely, there can be no such objection. And as the manner of the combat is autoschediastic or extemporaneous, and to meet a hurried occasion, so is the reader to understand that the object of our disputation is not the learned, but the unlearned student; and our purpose, not so much to discontent the one with his painful acquisitions, as to console the other under what, upon the old principle of omne ignotum pro magifico, he is too apt to imagine his irreparable disadvantages. We set before us, as our especial auditor, the reasonable man of plain sense but strong feeling, who wishes to know how much he has lost, and what injury the gods did him, when, though making him, perhaps, poetical, they cut short his allowance of Latin, and, as to Greek, gave him not a jot more than a cow has in her side pocket.

Let us begin at the beginning—and that, as everybody knows, is Homer. He is, indeed, so much at the beginning that, for that very reason, (if even there were no other,) he is, and will be ever more, supremely interesting. Is the unlearned reader aware of his age? Upon that point there are more hypotheses than one or even two. Some there are among the chronologers who make him eleven hundred years anterior to Christ. But those who allow him least, place him more than nine—that is, about two centuries before the establishment of the Grecian Olympiads, and (which is pretty nearly the same thing as regards time) before Romulus and Remus. Such an antiquity as this, even on its own account, is a reasonable object of interest. A poet, to whom the great-grandfather of old Ancus Martius (his grandfather, did we say—that is, avus?—nay, his abavus, his atavus, his tritavus) looked back as to one in a line with his remote ancestor—a poet who, if he travelled about as extensively as some have supposed him to do, or even as his own countryman Herodotus most certainly did five or six hundred years afterwards, might have conversed with the very workmen who laid the foundations of the first temple at Jerusalem—might have bent the knee before Solomon in all his glory:—Such a poet, were he no better than the worst of our own old metrical romancers, would—merely for his antiquity, merely for the sublime fact of having been coeval with the eldest of those whom the eldest of histories presents to our knowledge; coeval with the earliest kings of Judah, older than the greatest of the Judean prophets, older than the separation of the two Jewish crowns and the revolt of Israel, and, even with regard to Moses and to Joshua, not in any larger sense

* In general usage, “The antique” is a phrase limited to the expression of art; but improperly so. It is quite as legitimately used to denote the literature of ancient times, in contradistinction to the modern. As to the term classical, though generally employed as equivalent to Greek and Roman, the reader must not forget this is quite a false limitation, contradicting the very reason for applying the word in any sense to literature. For the application arose thus: The social body of Rome being divided into six classes, of which the lowest was the sixth, it followed that the highest was the first. Thence, by a natural process common to most languages, those who belonged to this highest had no number at all assigned to them. The very absence of a number, the calling them classici, implied that they belonged to the class emphatically, or par excellence. The classici meant, therefore, the grandees in social consideration; and thence by analogy in literature. But if this analogy be transferred from Rome to Greece, where it had no corresponding root in civic arrangements—nam, by parity of reason, to all nations.

junior than as we ourselves are junior to Chaucer—purely and exclusively with regard to these pretensions, backed and supported by an antique form of an antique language—the most comprehensive and the most melodious in the world, would—could—should—ought to merit a filial attention; and, perhaps with those who had waggon-loads of time to spare, might plead the benefit, beyond most of those in whose favour it was enacted, of that Horatian rule—

“vos exemplaria Græcæ, Nocturnâ vorante manu, vorante diurna.”

In fact, when we recollect that, in round numbers, we ourselves may be considered as two thousand years in advance of Christ, and that (by assuming less even than a mean between the different dates assigned to Homer) he stands a thousand years before Christ, we find between Homer and ourselves a gulf of three thousand years, or about one clear half of the total extent which we grant to the present duration of our planet. This in itself is so sublime a circumstance in the relations of Homer to our era, and the sense of power is so delightfully titillated to that man's feeling, who, by means of Greek, and a very moderate skill in this fine language, is able to grasp the awful span, the vast arch of which one foot rest upon 1838, and the other almost upon the war of Troy—the mighty rainbow which, like the archangel in the Revelation, plants its western limb amongst the carnage and the magnificence of Waterloo, and the other amidst the vanishing gleams and the dusty clouds of Agamemnon's rearguard—that we may pardon a little exultation to the man who can actually mutter to himself, as he rides home of a summer evening, the very words and vocal music of the old blind man at whose command

“—————the Iliad and the Odyssey
Rose to the murmurs of the voiceful sea.”

But pleasures in this world fortunately are without end. And every man, after all, has many pleasures peculiar to himself—pleasures which no man shares with him, even as he is shut out from many of other men. To renounce one in particular, is no subject for sorrow, so long as many remain in that very class equal or superior. Elwood the Quaker had a luxury which none of us will ever have, in hearing the very voice and utterance of a poet quiet as blind as Homer, and by many a thousand times more sublime. And yet Elwood was not perhaps much happier for that. For now, to proceed, reader—abstract from his sublime antiquity, and his being the very earliest of authors, allowance made for one or two Hebrew writers, (who, being inspired, are scarcely to be viewed as human competitors,) how much is there in Homer, intrinsically in Homer, stripped of his fine draperies of time and circumstance, in the naked Homer, disapparelled of the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious antiquity, to remunerate a man for his labour in acquiring Greek? Men think very differently about what will remunerate any given labour. A fool (professional fool) in Shakapere ascertains, by a natural process of logic, that a “remuneration” means a testoon, which is just sixpence; and two remunerations, therefore, a testoon, or one shilling. But many men will consider the same service ill paid by a thousand pounds. So, of the reimbursement for learning a language. Lord Camden is said to have learned Spanish, merely to enjoy Don Quixote more easily. Cato, the elder Cato, after abusing Greek throughout his life, sat down in extreme old age to study it: and wherefore? Mr Coleridge mentions an author, in whom, upon opening his pages with other expectations, he stumbled upon the following fragrant passage:—“But from this frivolous digression upon philosophy and the fine arts, let us return to a subject too little understood or appreciated in these sceptical days—the subject of dung.” Now, that was precisely the course of thought with this old censorious Cato: So long as Greek offered, or seemed to offer, nothing but philosophy or poetry, he was clamorous against Greek; but he began to thaw and melt a little upon the charms of Greek—he “owned the soft impeachment,” when he heard of some Grecian treatises upon beans and turnips; and, finally, he sank under its voluptuous seductions, when he heard of others upon duns. There are, therefore, as different notions about a “remuneration” in this case, as the poor fool had met with in his case. We, however, unappalled by the bad names of “Goth,” “Vandal,” and so forth, shall honestly lay before the reader our notions.

When Dryden wrote his famous, indeed matchless, epigram upon the three great masters (or reputed masters) of the Epos, he found himself at no loss to characterise the last of the triad—no matter what qualities he imputed to the first and the second, he knew himself safe in imputing them all to the third. The mighty modern had everything that his predecessors were ever thought to have, as well as something beside.” So he expressed the surpassing grandeur of Milton, by saying that in him nature had embodied, by concentration as in one focus, whatever excellencies she had scattered separately amongst her earlier favourites. But, in strict regard to the facts, this is far from being a faithful statement of the relations between Milton and his elder brothers of the Epos: in sublimity, if that is what Dryden meant by “loftiness of thought,” it is not so fair to class Milton with the greatest of poets, as to class him apart, retired from all others, sequestered, “sole-sitting by the shores of old romance.” In other poets, in Dante for example, there may be rays, gleams, sudden coruscations, casual scintillations, of the sublime; but for any continuous and sustained blaze of the sublime, it is in vain to look for

“The beauty of this famous epigram lies in the form of the conception. The first had A; the second had B; and when nature, to furnish out a third, should have given him C, she found that A and B had already exhausted her cycle; and that she could distinguish her third great favourite only by giving him both A and B in combination. But the filling up of this outline is imperfect: for the A (loftiness) and the B (majesty) are one and the same quality, under different names.”

it, except in Milton, making allowances (as before) for the inspired sublimities of Isaiah, Ezekiel, and of the great Evangelist's Revelations. As to Homer, no critic who writes from personal and direct knowledge on the one hand, or who understands the value of words on the other, ever contended in any critical sense for sublimity, as a quality to which he had the slightest pretensions. What! not Longinus? If he did, it would have been of little consequence; for he had no field of comparison, as we, knowing no literature but one—whereas we have a range of seven or eight. But he did not: τὸ ὑψηλόν,* or the elevated, in the Longinian sense, expressed all, no matter of what origin, of what tendency, which gives a character of life and animation to composition—whatever raises it above the dead level of flat prosaic style. Emphasis, or what in an artist's sense gives relief to a passage, causing it to stand forward, and in advance of what surrounds it—that is the predominating idea in the “sublime” of Longinus. And this explains what otherwise has perplexed his modern interpreters—viz., that amongst the elements of his sublime, he ranks even the pathetic, i. e. (say they) what by connecting itself with the depressing passion of grief is the very counter-agent to the elevating affection of the sublime. True, most sapient sirs, my very worthy and approved good masters: but that very consideration should have taught you to look back, and reconsider your translation of the capital word ὑψος. It was rather too late in the day, when you had waded half-seas over in your translation, to find out either that you yourselves were ignoramuses, or that your principal was an ass. “Returning were as tedious as go o'er.” And any man might guess how you would settle such a dilemma. It is, according to you, a little oversight of your principal: “humanum aliquid passus est.” We, on the other hand, affirm that, if an error at all on the part of Longinus, it is too monstrous for any man to have “overlooked.” As long as he could see a pike-staff, he must have seen that. And, therefore, we revert to our view of the case—viz., that it is yourselves who have committed the blunder, in translating by the Latin word sublimis† at all, but still more after it had received new determinations under modern usage.

Now, therefore, after this explanation, recurring to the Longinian critiques upon Homer, it will avail any idolator of Homer but little, it will affect us not much, to mention that Longinus makes frequent reference to the Iliad, as the great source of the sublime—

“A quo, ceu fonte perenni, Vatum Pieriis ora rigantur aquis;”

for, as respected Grecian poets, and as respected his sense of the word, it cannot be denied that Homer was such. He was the great well-head of inspiration to the Pagan poets of after times, who, however, (as a body), moved in the narrowest circle that has ever yet confined the natural freedom of the poetic mind. But, in conceding this, let it not be forgotten how much we concede—we concede as much as Longinus demanded; that is, that Homer furnished an ideal or model of fluent narration, picturesque description, and the first outlines of what could be called characteristic delineations of persons. Accordingly, uninventive Greece—for we maintain loudly that Greece, in her poets, was uninventive and sterile beyond the example of other nations—received, as a traditional inheritance

* Because the Latin word sublimis is applied to objects soaring upwards, or floating aloft, or at an aerial altitude, and because the word does sometimes correspond to our idea of the sublime, (in which the notion of height is united with the notion of moral grandeur,) and because, in the excessive vagueness and lawless latitudinarianism of our common Greek Lexicons, the word ὑψος is translated, inter alia, by sublime, sublimitas, &c. Hence it has happened that the title of the little essay ascribed to Longinus, Περὶ ὑψους, is usually rendered into English, Concerning the sublime. But the idea of the Sublime, as defined, circumscribed, and circumstantiated, in English literature—an idea altogether of English growth—the sublime byway of polar antithesis to the Beautiful, had no existence amongst ancient critics; consequently it could have no expression. It is a great thought, a true thought, a demonstrable thought, that the Sublime, as thus ascertained, and in contraposition to the Beautiful, grew up on the basis of sexual distinctions, the Sublime corresponding to the male, the Beautiful, its anti-pole, corresponding to the female. Behold! we shew you a mystery.

† No word has ever given so much trouble to modern critics as this very word (now under discussion) of the sublime. To those who have little Greek and no Latin, it is necessary in the first place that we should state what are the most obvious elements of the word. According to the noble army of etymologists, they are these two Latin words—sub, under, and limus, mud. Oh! gemini! who would have thought of groping for the sublime in such a situation as that?—unless, indeed, it were that writer cited by Mr Coleridge, and just now referred to by ourselves, who complains of frivolous modern readers, as not being able to raise and sequester their thoughts to the abstract consideration of dung. Hence it has followed, that most people have quarrelled with the etymology. Whereupon the late Dr Parr, of pedantic memory, wrote a huge letter to Mr Dugald Stewart, but the marrow of which lies in a nutshell, especially being rather hollow within. The learned doctor, in the first folio, grapples with the word sub, which, says he, comes from the Greek—so much is clear—but from what Greek, Bæsonian? The thoughtless world, says he, trace it to sub, (hypo) sub, i. e., under; but I, Ego, Samuel Parr, the Birmingham doctor, trace it to super, (hyper) super, i. e., above; between which the difference is not less than between a chestnut horse and a horse-chestnut. To this learned Parrian dissertation on mud, there cannot be much reasonably to object, except its length in the first place; and, secondly, that we ourselves exceedingly doubt the common interpretation of limus. Most unquestionably, if the sublime is to be brought into any relation at all to mud, we shall all be of one mind—that it must be found above. But to us it appears—that when the true modern idea of mud was in view, limus was not the word used. Cicerio, for instance, when he wishes to call Piso “filth, mud,” &c. calls him Cænum: and, in general, limus seems to have involved the notion of something adhesive, and rather to express plaster, or artificially prepared cement, &c., than that of filth or impure depositions. Accordingly, our own definition differs from the Parrian, or Birmingham definition; and may, nevertheless, be a Birmingham definition also. Not having room to defend it, for the present we forbear to state it.

the characters of the Paladins of the Troad.* Achilles is always the all-accomplished and supreme amongst these Paladins, the Orlando of ancient romance; Agamemnon, for ever the Charlemagne; Ajax, for ever the sullen, imperturbable, columnar champion, the Mandricardo, the Bergen-op-Zoom of his faction, and corresponding to our modern "Chicken" in the pugilistic ring, who was so called (as the books of the Fancy say) because he was a "glutton;" and a "glutton" in this sense—that he would take any amount of cramming, (i. e., any possible quantum of "milling," or "punishment.") Ulysses, again, is uniformly, no matter whether in the solemnities of the tragic scene, or the festivities of the Ovidian romance, the same shy cock, but also sly cock, with the least thought of a white feather in his plumage; Diomed is the same unmeaning double of every other hero, just as Rinaldo is with respect to his greater cousin, Orlando; and so of Teucer, Meriones, Idomeneus, and the other less-marked characters. The Greek drama took up these traditional characters, and sometimes deepened, saddened, exalted the features—as Sophocles, for instance, does with his "Ajax Flagellifer"—Ajax the knouter of sheep—where, by the way, the remorse and penitential grief of Ajax for his own self-degradation, and the depth of his affliction for the triumph which he had afforded to his enemies—taken in connexion with the tender fears of his wife, Tecmessa, for the fate to which his gloomy despair was too manifestly driving him; her own conscious desolation, and the orphan weakness of her son, in the event which she too fearfully anticipates—the final suicide of Ajax; the brotherly affection of Teucer to the widow and the young son of the hero, together with the unlooked-for sympathy of Ulysses, who, instead of exulting in the ruin of his antagonist, mourns over it with generous tears—compose a situation, and a succession of situations, not equalled in the Greek tragedy; and, in that instance, we see an effort, rare in Grecian poetry, of conquest achieved by idealization over a mean incident—viz., the hallucination of brain in Ajax, by which he mistakes the sheep for his Grecian enemies, ties them up for flagellation, and scourges them as periodically as if he were a critical reviewer. But really, in one extremity of this madness, where he fixes upon an old ram for Agamemnon, as the leader of the flock, the 'αυτῆς ἀνδρῶν Ἀλαμύωνων, there is an extravagance of the ludicrous against which, though not exhibited scenically, but simply narrated, no solemnity of pathos could avail; even in narration, the violation of tragical dignity is insufferable, and is as much worse than the hyper-tragic horizon of "Titus Andronicus" (a play which is usually printed, without reason, amongst those of Shakspeare) as absolute farce or contradiction of all pathos must inevitably be a worse indecorum than physical horrors which simply outrage it by excess. Let us not, therefore, hear of the judgment displayed upon the Grecian stage, when even Sophocles, the chief master of dramatic economy and scenical propriety, could thus err by an aberration so far transcending the most memorable violation of stage decorum which has ever been charged upon the English drama.

* There is a difficulty in assigning any term as comprehensive enough to describe the Grecian heroes and their antagonists, who fought at Troy. The seven chieftains against Thebes are described sufficiently as Theban captains; but, to say Trojan chieftains, would express only the heroes of one side; Grecian, again, would be liable to that fault equally, and to another far greater, of being under no limitation as to time. This difficulty must explain and (if it can) justify our collective phrase of the Paladins of the Troad.

From Homer, therefore, were left, as a bequest to all future poets, the romantic adventures which grow, as so many collateral dependencies,

"From the tale of Troy divine;"

and from Homer was derived also the discrimination of the leading characters, which, after all, were but coarsely and rudely discriminated; at least, for the majority. In one instance only we acknowledge an exception. We have heard a great modern poet dwelling with real and not counterfeit enthusiasm upon the character, (or rather upon the general picture, as made up both of character and position,) which the course of the Iliad assigns gradually to Achilles. The view which he took of this impersonation of human grandeur, combining all gifts of intellect and of body, matchless speed, strength, inevitable eye, courage, and the immortal beauty of a god, being also, by his birth-right, half-divine, and consecrated to the imagination by his fatal interweaving with the destinies of Troy, and to the heart by the early death which to *his own knowledge impended over his magnificent career, and so abruptly shut up its vista—the view, we say, which our friend took of the presiding character throughout the "Iliad," who is introduced to us in the very first line, and who is only eclipsed for seventeen books, to emerge upon us with more awful lustre;—the view which he took was—that Achilles, and Achilles only, in the Grecian poetry, was a great idea—an idealized creation; and we remember that in this respect he compared the Homeric Achilles with the Angelica of Ariosto. Her only he regarded as an idealization in the "Orlando Furioso." And certainly in the luxury and excess of her all-conquering beauty, which drew after her from "ultimate Cathay" to the camps of the baptised in France, and back again, from the palace of Charlemagne, drew half the Paladins, and "half Spain militant," to the portals of the rising sun; that sovereign beauty which (to say nothing of kings and princes withered by her frowns) ruined for a time the most princely of all the Paladins, the supreme Orlando, crazed him with scorn,

"And robbed him of his noble wits outright!"

* "To his own knowledge"—see, for proof of this, the gloomy serenity of his answer to his dying victim, when predicting his approaching end—
"Enough; I knew my fate: to die—to see me more My much-lov'd parents, and my native shores;" &c. &c.

in all this, we must acknowledge a glorification of power not unlike that of Achilles:—

"Irresistible Pelides, whom, unarm'd,
No strength of man or wild beast could withstand;
Who tore the lion as the lion tears the kid;
Ran on embattl'd armies clad in iron;
And, weaponless himself,
Made arms ridiculous, unless the forgery
Of brazen shield and spear, the hammer'd cuirass,
Chalybean temper'd steel, and frock of mail,
Adamantean proof;
But safest he who stood aloof,
When insupportably his foot advanced
Spurned them to death by troops. The bold Priamides Fled from his lion ramp; old warriors turn'd
Their plated backs under his heel,
Or, groveling, soil'd their crested helmets in the dust."

These are the words of Milton in describing that "heroic Nazarete," "God's champion"—

"Promis'd by heavenly message twice descending;
heralded, like Pelides,

"By an angel of his birth,
Who from his father's field
Rode up in flames after his message told;"

these are the celestial words which describe the celestial prowess of the Hebrew monomachist, the irresistible Sampson; and are hardly less applicable to the "champion paramount" of Greece confederate.

This, therefore, this unique conception, with what power they might, later Greek poets adopted; and the other Homeric characters they transplanted somewhat monotonously, but at times, we are willing to admit, and have already admitted, improving and solemnizing the original epic portraits when brought upon the stage. But all this extent of obligation amongst later poets of Greece to Homer serves less to argue his opulence than their penury. And if, quitting the one great blazing jewel, the Urim and Thummim of the "Iliad," you descend to individual passages of poetic effect; and if amongst these a fancy should seize you of asking for a specimen of the Sublime in particular, what is it that you are offered by the critics? Nothing that we remember beyond one single passage, in which the god Neptune is described in a steeple chase, and "making play" at a terrific pace. And certainly enough is exhibited of the old boy's hoofs, and their spanking qualities, to warrant our backing him against a railroad for a rump and dozen; but, after all, there is nothing to grow frisky about, as Longinus does, who gets up the steam of a blue-stocking enthusiasm, and boils us a regular gallop of ranting, in which, like the conceited snipe* upon the Liverpool railroad, he thinks himself to run a match with Sampson; and, whilst affecting to admire Homer, is manifestly squinting at the reader to see how far he admires his own flourish of admiration; and, in the very agony of his frosty raptures, is quite at leisure to look out for a little private traffic of rapture on his own account. But it won't do; this old critical posture-master, (whom, if Aurelian hanged, surely he knew what he was about,) may as well put up his rapture pipes, and (as Lear says) "not squiny" at us; for let us ask Master Longinus, in what earthly respect do these great strides of Neptune exceed Jack with his seven-league boots? Let him answer that, if he can. We hold that Jack has the advantage. Or, again look at the Koran: does any man but a foolish Oriental think that passage sublime where Mahomet describes the divine pen? It is, says he, made of mother-of-pearl; so much for the "raw material," as the economists say. But now for the size: it can hardly be called a "portable" pen at all events, for we are told that it is so tall of its age, that an Arabian thoroughbred horse would require 500 years for galloping down the slit to the nib. Now this Arabic sublime is in this instance quite a kin brother to the Homeric.

However, it is likely that we shall here be reminded of our own challenge to the Longinian word ὑψηλον as not at all corresponding, or even alluding to the modern word sublime. But in this instance, the distinction will not much avail that critic—for no matter by what particular word he may convey his sense of its quality, clear it is, by his way of illustrating its peculiar merit, that, in his opinion, these huge strides of Neptune's have something supernaturally grand about them. But, waiving this solitary instance in Homer of the sublime, according to his idolatrous critics—of the pseudo sublime according to ourselves—in all other cases where Longinus, or any other Greek writer has cited Homer as the great exemplary model of ὑψος in composition, we are to understand him according to the Grecian sense of that word. He must then be supposed to praise Homer, not so much for any ideal grandeur either of thought, image, or situation, as in a general sense for his animated style of narration, for the variety and spirited effect with which he relieves the direct formal narration in his own person by dialogue between the subjects of his narration, thus ventriloquising and throwing his own voice as often as he can into the surrounding objects—or again for the similes and allusive pictures by which he points emphasis to a situation or interest to a person.

Now then we have it: when you describe Homer, or when you hear him described as a lively picturesque old boy, [by the way, why does every body speak of Homer as old?] full of life, and animation, and movement, then you say (or you hear say) what is true, and not much more than what is true. Only about that word picturesque we demur a little: as a surgeon, he certainly is picturesque; for Howship upon gunshot wounds is a joke to him when he lectures upon traumacy, if we may presume to coin that word, or upon traumatic philosophy, (as Mr McCulloch says so grandly, Economic Science.) But, apart from this, we cannot allow that simply to say Ζακύνθος νερμώδης, woody Zacythus, is any better argument of picturesqueness than Stony Stratford, or Harrow on the Hill. Be assured, reader, that the Homeric age was not ripe for the picturesque. "Pries on the Picturesque," or, "Gilpin on Forest Scenery," would both have been sent post-haste to bedlam in those days; or perhaps Homer himself would have tied a millstone about their necks, and have sunk them as public nuisances by woody Zante. Besides, it puts almost an extinguisher on any little twinkling of the picturesque that might have flared up at times from this or that suggestion, when each individual had his own regular epithet stereotyped to his name like a brass plate upon a door: Hector, the tamer of horses; Achilles, the swift of foot; the ox-eyed, respectable Juno. Some of the "big uns," it is true, had a dress and an undress suit of epithets: as for instance, Hector was also καρυθαίολος, Hector with the tossing or the variegated plumes. Achilles again was διος or divine. But still the range was small, and the monotony was dire.

And now, if you come in good earnest to picturesqueness, let us mention a poet in sober truth worth five hundred of Homer, and that is Chaucer. Shew us a piece of Homer's handywork that comes within a hundred leagues of that divine prologue to the "Canterbury Tales," or of "The Knight's Tale," of the "Man of Law's Tale," or of the "Tale of the Patient Griseldis," or, for intense life of narration and festive wit, to the "Wife of Bath's Tale." Or, passing out of the "Canterbury Tales" for the picturesque in human manner and gesture, and play of countenance, never equalled as yet by Pagan or Christian, go to the Troilus and Cressid, and, for instance, to the conversation between Troilus and Pandarus, or, again, between Pandarus and Cressid. Rightly did a critic of the 17th century pronounce Chaucer a miracle of natural genius, as having "taken into the compass of his 'Canterbury Tales,' the various manners and humours of the whole English nation in his age: not a single character has escaped him." And this critic then proceeds thus:—"The matter and manner of these tales, and of their telling, are so suited to their different educations, humours, and calling, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and serious characters are distinguished by their several sorts of gravity. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different. But there is such a variety of game springing up before me, that I am distracted in my choice, and know not which to follow. It is sufficient to say, according to the proverb, that here is God's plenty." And soon after he goes on to assert, (though Heaven knows in terms far below the whole truth,) the superiority of Chaucer to Boccaccio. And, in the meantime, who was this eulogist of Chaucer? Why, the man who himself was never equalled upon this earth, unless by Chaucer, in the art of fine narration: it is John Dryden whom we have been quoting.

Between Chaucer and Homer—as to the main art of narration, as to the picturesque life of the manners, and as to the exquisite delineation of character—the interval is as wide as between Shakespeare, in dramatic power, and Nic. Rowe.

And we might wind up this main chapter,* of the comparison between Grecian and English literature—viz., the chapter on Homer, by this tight dilemma. You do or you do not use the Longinian word ὕψος in the modern sense of the sublime. If you do not, then of course you translate it in the Grecian sense, as explained above; and in that sense, we engage to produce many scores of passages from Chaucer, not exceeding 50 to 80 lines, which contain more of picturesque simplicity, more tenderness, more fidelity to nature, more felicity of sentiment, more animation of narrative, and more truth of character, than can be matched in all the "Iliad" or the "Odyssey." On the other hand, if by ὕψος you choose absurdly to mean sublimity in the modern sense, then it will suffice for us that we challenge you to the production of one instance which truly and incontestably embodies that quality.* The burthen of proof rests upon you who affirm, not upon us who deny. Meantime, as a kind of choke-pear, we leave with the Homeric adorer this one brace of portraits, or hints for such a brace, which we commend to his comparison, as Hamlet did the portraits of the two brothers to his besotted mother. We are talking of the sublime: that is our thesis. Now observe: there is a catalogue in the Iliad—there is a catalogue in the Paradise Lost. And, like the river of Macedon and of Monmouth, the two catalogues agree in that one fact—viz., that they are such. But as to the rest, we are willing to abide by the issue of that one comparison, left to the very dullest sensibility, for the decision of the total question at issue. And what is that? Not, Heaven preserve us! as to the comparative claims of Milton and Homer in this point of sublimity—for surely it would be absurd to compare him who has most with him whom we affirm to have none at all—but whether Homer has the very smallest pretensions in that point. The result, as we state it, is this:—The catalogue of the ruined angels in Milton, is, in itself taken separately, a perfect poem, with the beauty, and the felicity, and the glory of a dream. The Homeric catalogue of ships is exactly on a level with the muster-roll of a regiment, the register of a tax-gatherer, the catalogue of an auctioneer. Nay, some catalogues are far more interesting, and more alive with meaning. "But him followed fifty black ships!"—"But him follow seventy black ships!" Faugh! We could make a more readable poem out of an Insolvent's Balance Sheet.

* The description of Apollo in wrath as with cosmos, like night, is a doubtful case. With respect to the shield of Achilles, it cannot be denied that the general conception has, in common with all abstractions (as e.g. the abstractions of dreams, of prophetic visions, such as that in the 6th Æneid, that to Macbeth, that shown by the angel Michael to Adam,) something fine and, in its own nature, let the execution be what it may, sublime. But this part of the Iliad, we firmly believe to be an interpolation of times long posterior to that of Homer.

One other little suggestion we could wish to offer. Those who would contend against the vast superiority of Chaucer, (and him we mention chiefly because he really has in excess those very qualities of life, motion, and picturesque simplicity, to which the Homeric characteristics chiefly tend,) ought to bear in mind one startling fact evidently at war with the degrees of what is claimed for Homer. It is this: Chaucer is carried naturally by the very course of his tales into the heart of domestic life, and of the scenery most favourable to the movements of human sensibility. Homer, on the other hand, is kept out of that sphere, and is imprisoned in the monotonies of a camp or a battle-field, equally by the necessities of his story, and by the proprieties of Grecian life, (which in fact are pretty nearly those of Turkish life at this day.) Men and women meet only under rare, hurried, and exclusive circumstances. Hence it is, that throughout the entire "Iliad," we have but one scene in which the finest affections of the human heart can find an opening for display; of course, everybody knows at once that we are speaking of the scene between Hector, Andromache, and the young Astyanax. No need for question here; it is Hobson's choice in Greek literature, when you are seeking for the poetry of human sensibilities. One such scene there is, and no more; which of itself, is some reason for suspecting its authenticity. And, by the way, at this point, it is worth while remarking, that a late excellent critic always pronounced the words applied to Andromache δακρυσιν ἰλασασα (tearfully smiling, or, smiling through her tears,) a mere Alexandrian interpolation. And why? Now mark the reason. Was it because the circumstance is in itself vicious, or out of nature? Not at all: nothing more probable or more interesting under the general situation of peril combined with the little incident of the infant's alarm at the plumed helmet. But any just taste feels it to be out of the Homeric key; the barbarism of the age, not mitigated (as in Chaucer's far less barbarous age) by the tenderness of Christian sentiment, turned a deaf ear and a repulsive aspect to such beautiful traits of domestic feeling; to Homer himself the whole circumstance would have been one of pure effeminacy. Now, we recommend it to the reader's reflection—and let him weigh well the condition under which that poetry moves that cannot indulge a tender sentiment without being justly suspected of adulterous commerce with some after age. This remark, however, is by the by; having grown out of the δακρυσιν ἰλασασα, itself a digression. But, returning from that to our previous theme, we desire every candid reader to ask himself what must be the character, what the circumscription, of that poetry which is limited, by its very subject,* to a scene of such intense uniformity as a battle or a camp; and by the prevailing spirit of manners to the exclusive society of men. To make bricks without straw, was the excess even of Egyptian bondage; Homer could not fight up against the necessities of his age, and the defects of its manners. And the very apologies which will be urged for him, drawn as they must be from the spirit of manners prevalent in his era, are reciprocally but so many reasons for not seeking in him the kind of poetry which has been ascribed to him by ignorance, or by defective sensibility, or by the mere self-interest of pedantry.

From Homer, the route stretches thus:—The Grecian drama lies about six hundred years nearer to the Christian era, and Pindar lies in the interval. These—i. e., the Dramatic and Lyric—are the important chapters of the Greek poetry; for as to Pastoral poetry, having only Theocritus surviving, and a very little of Bion and Moschus, and of these one only being of the least separate importance—we cannot hold that department entitled to any notice in so cursory a review of the literature, else we have much to say on this also. Besides that, Theocritus was not a natural poet, indigenous to Sicily, but an artificial blue-stocking; as was Callimachus in a different class.

The drama we may place loosely in the generation next before that of Alexander the Great. And his era may be best remembered by noting it as 333 years B. C. Add thirty years to this era—that will be the era of the Drama. Add a little more than a century, and that will be the era of Pindar. Him, therefore, we will notice first.

Now, the chief thing to say as to Pindar is—to shew cause, good and reasonable, why no man of sense should trouble his head about him. There was in the seventeenth century a notion prevalent about Pindar, the very contradiction to the truth. It was imagined that he "had a demon;" that he was under a burthen of prophetic inspiration; that he was possessed, like a Hebrew prophet or a Delphic priestess, with divine fury. Why was this thought?—simply because no mortal read him. Laughable it is to mention, that Pope, when a very young man, and writing his "Temple of Fame," (partly on the model of Chaucer's,) when he came to the great columns and their bas-reliefs in that temple, each of which is sacred to one honoured name, having but room in all for six, chose Pindar for one* of the six. And the first bas-relief on Pindar's column is so pretty, that we shall quote it; especially as it suggested Gray's car for Dryden's "less presumptuous flight!"

"Four swans sustain a car of silver bright,
With heads advanc'd, and pinions stretch'd for flight;

* But the Odyssey, at least, it will be said, is not thus limited: no, not by its subject; because it carries us amongst cities and princes in a state of peace; but it is equally limited by the spirit of manners; we are never admitted amongst women, except by accident (Nausicaa)—by necessity (Penelope)—or by romance (Circæ).

* The other five were Homer, Virgil, Locrine, Aristotle, Cicero.

Here, like some furious prophet, Pindar rode,
And seem'd to labour with th' inspiring god."

Then follow eight lines describing other bas-reliefs, containing "the figured games of Greece." (Olympic, Nemean, &c.) But what we spoke of as laughable in the whole affair is, that Master Pope neither had then read one line of Pindar, nor ever read one line of Pindar: and reason good; for at that time he could not read the simple Homeric Greek; while the Greek of Pindar exceeds all other Greek in difficulty, excepting, perhaps, a few amongst the tragic choruses, which are difficult for the very same reason—lyric abruptness, lyric involution, and lyric obscurity of transition. Not having read Homer, no wonder that Pope should place, amongst the bas-reliefs illustrating the "Iliad," an incident which does not exist in the "Iliad."* Not having read Pindar, no wonder that Pope should ascribe to Pindar qualities which are not only imaginary, but in absolute contradiction to his true ones. A more sober old gentleman does not exist: his demoniac possession is a mere fable. But there are two sufficient arguments for not reading him, so long as innumerable books of greater interest remain unread. First, he writes upon subjects that, to us, are mean and extinct—race-horses that have been defunct for twenty-five centuries, chariots that were crazy in his own day, and contests with which it is impossible for us to sympathise. Then his digressions about old genealogies are no whit better than his main theme, nor more amusing than a Welshman's pedigree. The best translator of any age, Mr Carey, who translated Dante, has done what human skill could effect to make the old Theban readable; but, after all, the man is yet to come who has read Pindar, will read Pindar, or can read Pindar, except, indeed, a translator in the way of duty. And the son of Philip himself, though he bade "spare the house of Pindarus," we vehemently suspect, never read the works of Pindarus; that labour he left to some future Hercules. So much for his subjects: but a second objection is—his metre. The hexameter, or heroic metre of the ancient Greeks is delightful to our modern ears; so is the Iambic metre fortunately of the stage: but the Lyric metres generally, and those of Pindar without one exception, are as utterly without meaning to us, as merely chaotic labyrinths of sound, as Chinese music or Dutch concertos. Need we say more?

Next comes the drama. But this is too weighty a theme to be discussed slightly; and the more so because here only we willingly concede a strong motive for learning Greek; here, only, we hold the want of a ready introduction to be a serious misfortune. Our general argument, therefore, which had for its drift to depreciate Greek, dispenses, in this case, with our saying anything; since every word we could say would be hostile to our own purpose. However, we shall, even upon this field of the Greek literature, deliver one oracular sentence, tending neither to praise nor dispraise it, but simply to state its relations to the modern, or, at least, the English drama. In the ancient drama, to represent it justly, the unlearned reader must imagine grand situations, impressive groups; in the modern tumultuous movement, a grand stream of action. In the Greek drama, he must conceive the presiding power to be Death; in the English, Life. What Death?—What Life? That sort of death or of life locked up and frozen into everlasting alumber, which we see in sculpture; that sort of life, of tumult, of agitation, of tendency to something beyond, which we see in painting. The picturesque, in short, domineers over English tragedy; the sculptural, or the statuesque, over the Grecian.

The moralists, such as Theophrastus, the miscellaneous or didactic poets, such as Hesiod, are all alike below any notice in a sketch like this. The Epigrammatists, or writers of monumental inscriptions, &c., remain; and they, next after the dramatic poets, present the most interesting field by far in the Greek literature; but these are too various to be treated otherwise than en passant and in detail.

There remains the prose literature; and, with the exception of those critical writers who have written on rhetoric, (such as Hermogenes, Diochysius of Halicarnassus, Demetrius Phalerus, &c., &c., some of whom are the best writers extant, on the mere art of constructing sentences, but could not interest the general reader,) the prose writers may be thus distributed: 1st, the orators, 2d, the historians; 3d, the philosophers; 4th, the literateurs, (such as Plutarch, Lucian, &c.)

As to the philosophers, of course there are only two who can present any general interest—Plato and Aristotle; for Xenophon is no more a philosophic writer than our own Addison. Now, in this department, it is evident that the matter altogether transcends the manner. No man will wish to study a profound philosopher, but for some previous interest in his doctrines; and, if by any means a man has obtained this, he may pursue this study sufficiently through translations. It is true that neither Sydenham nor Taylor has done justice to Plato, for example, as respects the colloquial graces of his style; but, when the object is purely to pursue a certain course of principles and inferences, the student cannot complain much that he has lost the dramatic beauties of the dialogue, or the luxuriance of the style. These he was not then seeking, by the supposition—what he did seek, is still left; whereas in poetry, if the golden apparel is lost, if the music has melted away from the thoughts, all, in fact, is lost. Old Hobbes, or Ogilvie, is no more Homer than the score of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" is Mozart's "Don Giovanni."

* Viz., the supposed dragging of Hector three times round Troy by Achilles—a mere post-Homeric fable. But it is ludicrous to add, that, in after years—nay, when nearly at the end of his translation of the "Iliad," in 1718—Pope took part in a discussion upon Homer's reasons for ascribing such conduct to his hero, seriously arguing the pro and con upon a pure fiction.

If, however, Grecian philosophy presents no absolute temptations to the attainment of Greek, far less does Grecian history. If you except later historians—such as Diodorus, Plutarch, and those (like Appian, Dionysius, Dion Cassius) who wrote of Roman things and Roman persons in Greek, and Polybius, who comes under the same class, at a much earlier period—and none of whom have any interest of style, excepting only Plutarch:—these dismissed, there are but three who can rank as classical Greek historians; three who can lose by translation. Of these the eldest, Herodotus, is perhaps of real value. Some call him the father of history; some call him the father of lies. Time and Major Rennel have done him ample justice. Yet here, again, see how little need of Greek for the amplest use of a Greek author. Twenty-two centuries and more have passed since the fine old man read his history at the Grecian games of Olympia. One man only has done him right, and put his enemies under his footstool; and yet this man had no Greek. Major Rennel read Herodotus only in the translation of Beloe. He has told us so himself. Here, then, is a little fact, my Grecian boys, that you won't easily get over. The father of history, the eldest of prose writers, has been first explained, illustrated, justified, liberated from scandal and disgrace, first had his geography set to rights, first translated from the region of fabulous romance, and installed in his cathedral chair, as Dean (or eldest) of historians, by a military man, who had no more Greek than Shakespeare, or than we (perhaps you, reader) of the Kalmuck.

Next comes Thucydides. He is the second in order of time amongst the Grecian historians who survive, and the first of those (a class which Mr Southey, the laureate, always speaks of as the corruptors of genuine history) who affect to treat it philosophically. If the philosophic historians are not always so faithless as Mr Southey alleges, they are, however, always guilty of dullness. Commend us to one picturesque, garrulous old fellow, like Froissart, or Philip de Comines, or Bishop Burnet, before all the philosophic proser that ever prosed. These picturesque men will lie a little now and then, for the sake of effect—but so will the philosophers. Even Bishop Burnet, who, by the way, was hardly so much a picturesque as an anecdotal historian, was famous for his gift of lying; so diligently had he cultivated it. And the Duchess of Portsmouth told a noble lord, when inquiring into the truth of a particular fact stated by the very reverend historian, that he was notorious in Charles the Second's court, and that no man believed a word he said. But now Thucydides, though writing about his own time, and doubtless embellishing by fictions not less than his more amusing brethren, is as dull as if he prided himself on veracity. Nay, he tells us no secret anecdotes of the times—surely there must have been many; and this proves to us, that he was a low fellow without political connexions, and that he never had been behind the curtain. Now, what business had such a man to set himself up for a writer of history and a speculator on politics? Besides, his history is imperfect; and, suppose it were not, what is its subject? Why simply one single war; a war which lasted twenty-seven years; but which, after all, through its whole course was enlivened by only two events worthy to enter into general history—viz, the plague of Athens, and the miserable licking which the Athenian invaders received in Sicily. This dire overthrow dished Athens out and out; for one generation to come, there was an end of Athenian domination; and that arrogant state, under the yoke of their still baser enemies of Sparta, learned experimentally what were the evils of a foreign conquest. There was therefore, in the domination of the Thirty Tyrants, something to “point a moral” in the Peloponnesian war: it was the judicial reaction of martial tyranny and foreign oppression, such as we of this generation have beheld in the double conquest of Paris by insulted and outraged Christendom. But nothing of all this will be found in Thucydides—he is as cool as a cucumber upon every act of atrocity; whether it be the bloody abuse of power, or the bloody retribution from the worm that, being trampled on too long, turns at last to sting and to exterminate—all alike he enters in his day-book and his ledger, posts them up to the account of brutal Spartan or polished Athenian, with no more expression of his feelings (if he had any) than a merchant making out an invoice of punchcoons that are to steal away men's wits, or of frankincense and myrrh that are to ascend in devotion to the saints. Herodotus is a fine, old, genial boy, that, like Froissart or some of the crusading historians, kept himself in health and jovial spirits by travelling about; nor did he confine himself to Greece or the Grecian islands; but he went to Egypt, got bousy in the Pyramid of Cheops, ate a beef-steak in the hanging-gardens of Babylon, and listened to no sailors' yarns at the Piræus, which doubtless, before his time, had been the sole authority for Grecian legends concerning foreign lands. But, as to Thucydides, our own belief is, that he lived like a monk shut up in his museum or study; and that, at the very utmost, he may have gone in the steamboat* to Corfu, (i. e. Coreyra,) because that was the island which occasioned the row of the Peloponnesian war.

Xenophon now is quite another sort of man; he could use his pen; but also he could use his sword; and (when need was) his heels, in running away. His Grecian history of course is a mere fraction of the general history; and, moreover, our own belief, founded upon the differences of the style, is, that the work now received for his must be spurious. But in this place the question is not worth discussing. Two works remain, professedly historical, which, beyond a doubt, are his; and one of them the most interesting prose work by much which Athens has bequeathed us; though, by the way, Xenophon was living in a sort of elegant exile at a chateau in Thessaly, and not under Athenian protection, when he wrote it. Both of his great works relate to a Persian Cyrus, but to a Cyrus of different centuries. The "Cyropædia" is a romance, pretty much on the plan of Fenelon's "Telemaque," only (Heaven be praised!) not so furiously apoplectic. It pursues the great Cyrus the founder of the Persian empire, the Cyrus of the Jewish prophets, from his infancy to his death-bed; and describes evidently not any real prince, according to any authentic record of his life, but, upon some basis of hints and vague traditions, improves the actual Cyrus into an ideal fiction of a sovereign and a military conqueror, as he ought to be. One thing only we shall say of this work, though no admirers ourselves of the twaddle which Xenophon elsewhere gives us as philosophic memorabilia, that the episode of Abradates and Panthea (especially the behaviour of Panthea after the death of her beloved hero, and the incident of the dead man's hand coming away on Cyrus grasping it) exceeds for pathos everything in Grecian literature, always excepting the Greek drama, and comes nearest of anything, throughout Pagan literature, to the impassioned simplicity of Scripture, in its tale of Joseph and his brethren. The other historical work of Xenophon is the "Anabasis." The meaning of the title is the going-up or ascent—viz., of Cyrus the younger. This prince was the younger brother of the reigning king Artaxerxes, nearly two centuries from Cyrus the Great; and, from opportunity rather than a better title, and because his mother and his vast provincial government furnished him with royal treasures able to hire an army, most of all, because he was richly endowed by nature with personal gifts—took it into his head that he would dethrone his brother; and the more so, because he was only his half-brother. His chance was a good one: he had a Grecian army, and one from the very élite of Greece; whilst the Persian king had but a small corps of Grecian auxiliaries, long enfeebled by Persian effeminacy and Persian intermarriages. Xenophon was personally present in this expedition. And the catastrophe was most singular, such as does not occur once in a thousand years. The cavalry of the great King retreated before the Greeks continually, no doubt from policy and secret orders; so that, when a pitched battle became inevitable, the foreign invaders found themselves in the very heart of the land, and close upon the Euphrates. The battle was fought: the foreigners were victorious: they were actually singing Te Deum or Io Paan for their victory, when it was discovered that their leader, the native prince in whose behalf they had conquered, was missing; and soon after, that he was dead. What was to be done? The man who should have improved their victory, and placed them at his right hand when on the throne of Persia, was no more; key they had none to unlock the great fortresses of the empire, none to unleash the enthusiasm of the native population. Yet such was the desperation of their circumstances, that a coup-de-main on the capital seemed their best chance. The whole army was and felt itself a forlorn hope. To go forward was desperate, but to go back much more so; for they had a thousand rivers without bridges in their rear; and if they set their faces in that direction, they would have 300,000 light cavalry upon their flanks, besides nations innumerable—

* “In the steamboat!” Yes, reader, the steamboat. It is clear that there was one in Homer's time. See the art. Phæacian in the “Odyssey!” If it paid then, 2 fortiori six hundred years after. The only point unknown about it, is the captain's name and the state-cabin fees.

"Dusk faces with white silken turbans wreath'd; fierce fellows who understood no Greek, and, what was worse, no joking, but well understood the use of the scymitar. Bad as things were, they soon became worse; for the chiefs of the Grecian army, being foolish enough to accept a dinner invitation from the Persian commander-in-chief, were assassinated; and the words of Milton became intelligible—that in the lowest deep a lower deep had opened to destroy them. In this dilemma, Xenophon, the historian of the expedition, was raised to a principal command; and by admirable skill he led back the army by a different route to the Black Sea, on the coast of which he knew that there were Grecian colonies: and from one of these he obtained shipping, in which he coasted along (when he did not march by land) to the mouth of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles. This was the famous retreat of the ten thousand; and it shews how much defect of literary skill there was in those days amongst Grecian authors, that the title of the book, "The Going Up," does not apply to the latter and more interesting seven-eighths of the account. The Going Up is but the preparation or preface to the Going Down, the Anabasis to the Katabasis, in which latter part it is that Xenophon plays any conspicuous part. A great political interest, however, over and above the personal interest, attaches to this expedition: for there can be no doubt, that to this proof of weakness in the Persian empire, and perhaps to this, as recorded by Xenophon, was due the expedition of Alexander in the next generation, which changed the face of the world.

The literateurs, as we have styled Plutarch and Lucian, though far removed from the true classical era, being both posterior to Christianity, are truly interesting. And, for Lucian in particular, though he is known by reputation only as a humorous and sneering writer, we can say, upon our personal knowledge, that there are passages of more terrific effect, more German, and approaching to the sublime, than anywhere else in Greek literature, out of the tragic poets. Of Plutarch we need hardly speak; one part of his voluminous works—viz., his biographies of Greek and Roman leaders in arts* and arms—being so familiar to all nations;

* "In arts," we say, because great orators are amongst his heroes; but, after all, it is very questionable whether, simply as orators, Plutarch would have noticed them. They were also statesmen; and Mitford always traces Demosthenes as first lord of the treasury and so forth. Plutarch records no poet, no artist, however brilliant.

and having been selected by Rousseau as the book for him who should be limited (or, like Collins the poet, should limit himself) to one book only—a foolish choice undoubtedly, but still arguing great range of resources in Plutarch, that he should be thought of after so many myriads of modern books had widened the range of selection. Meantime, the reader is not to forget that, whatever may be his powers of amusement, a more inaccurate or faithless author as to dates, and, indeed, in all matters of research, does not exist than Plutarch. We make it a rule, whenever we see Plut. at the bottom of a dictionary article, as the authority on which it rests, to put the better half down as a bouncer. And, in fact, Joe Miller is quite as good authority for English history as Plutarch for Roman.

Now remain the orators; and of these we have a right to speak, for we have read them; and, believe us, reader, not above one or two men in a generation have. If the Editor would allow us room, we would gladly contrast them with modern orators; and we could easily shew how prodigious are the advantages of modern orators in every point which can enter into a comparison. But to what purpose? Even modern orators, with all the benefit of modern interest, and of allusions everywhere intelligible, are not read in any generation after their own, pulpit orators only being excepted. So that, if the gods had made our reader a Grecian, surely he would never so far mispend his precious time, and squander his precious intellect upon old dusty quarrels, never of more value to a philosopher than a tempest in a wash-hand basin, but now stuffed with obscurities which no man can explain, and with lies to which no man can bring the counter-statement. But this would furnish matter for a separate paper.

SONG FOR AUTUMN AND WINTER.

BY SAMUEL BAMFORD.

AUTUMN blithe is come again,
With her brown and merry train—
I caught a sweet glance of her face:
With a sickle in her hand,
She came o'er the golden land;
And reapers came shearing apace.

Bending lowly as they step,
First they hook, and then they grip;
Cut and carry, with hook and with hand.
Merry gleaners sing behind,
Sweet as viol of the wind;
For the poor still have joys in the land.

Blessed one is he who leaves,
By his furrows and his sheaves,
A crumb for the humble and poor;
Winter thorough shall he rest,
With his harvest hous'd and bless'd,
And no wail shall be heard at his door.

Now the cherry-lipped maid
Unto orchard bow'r hath stray'd,
Where the plums are all dropping adown;
And the apple, bright as gold,
On the soft green sward hath rolled;
And the sweet pear, so melting and brown.

Then come forth the aged dame,
And old John, a little lame;
And baskets are filled with the store.
Rarest fruit will soon be seen
At the market cross, I ween—
Such fruit as was scarce seen before.

Bonny Bess, and rosy Kate,
Are gone down through the gate—

Twain fairer are seldom a-field;
And, with each a handy fork,
They set cheerfully to work
At the drills where the potatoes yield.

There's "Red Farmer," dusky sweep,
(That's a famous sort to keep;)—
And "Pink Eye," and rough-coated "Rad;"
Food for ladyship or queen, (Bacon slice or beef between,
And a jack of good ale, let them add.)

Now the carrots should be dug;
Up with turnips by the lug;
And earth them, withouten delay.
Whate'er weather then betide,
We can shelter or abide;
And let Winter come on as he may.

Hark! the olden ruffian's shout,
Leading storm and wassail rout,
Maiden frost stepping crisply before;
Strewing hoar on fallen leaves,
Painting windows under eaves,
Warning Autumn to linger no more.

Fuel stack is huge and round;
Cottage roof is thatch'd and bound;
There are brown ale and bread on the board—
Winter, bring thy wassail band,
Clog on foot and glove on hand;
Hearty welcome art thou as a lord.

Pleasures such for him who leaves,
From his garner and his sheaves,
A handful to comfort the poor!
Be the bleaser ever bless'd!
Days of peace and nights of rest
Keep affliction from dark'ning his door!

WINTER PIECE.

WITH scarlet berries glistening in the sun,
The holly from its snowy mantle peeps,
Minding of home, of Christmas cheer and fun,
And of old churches with the leafy heaps
Piled in ancient candlesticks aloft.
Beneath their coverlet so fleecy soft,
The fields lie sacred and uncropt; as age
The trees are reverend; a hermitage
Has not a deeper quiet than the groves,
Save when, amid the cold, the redbreast loves

At intervals to pipe his little song.
The wondering rustic, as he toils along,
Slow trudging through the snow, with wide-stretched eye
Gapes at the o'erladen stage that rattles by,
The heaps of boxes, Christmas-presents, game,
The joyous faces, and the dashing team;
And frequent turns, as he pursues his way,
The mighty wilderment to resurvey;
Lists to the strain that comes upon the wind,
And longs to be in that red coat behind.

W. H.

* These are Lancashire and Cheshire names for potatoes; they are probably cultivated in other districts under different names. It must be understood as a piece of characteristic simplicity that recommends such common things to "ladyship or queen." What else than a mere cottage rustic could suppose such refined beings capable of imbibing sustenance from "bacon slice," and "a jack of good ale," (though Queen Bess, and our late grandmothers, as it is reported, used to quaff from the foaming tankard?) Cobbett, who was thoroughly English in all his tastes, would have growled at this introduction of "the accursed root," unless the English liquor had mollified him. However, "such as I have, I give unto thee"—and a cottage rustic cannot be expected to offer anything better to "ladyship or queen."

THE NEW COLONY OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA, AND THE PENAL COLONIES.

WHATEVER may be wanting to the new colony of South Australia, it has, from first to last, never lacked puffing. Its friends are most indefatigable, its patrons most zealous: that they are equally impartial and disinterested, is with many a matter of extreme doubt. The principle upon which this highly-favoured new colony was organized, has excited warm discussion in the mother-country. It possessed some good features, some bad, and many more equivocal, and with what seemed a strong predisposition to run into jobs, and to promote selfish or class interests. But the time for arguing about the semi-feudal organization of the colony has passed away. Some objectionable things have been obviated, and others modified; and, now, the substantial question becomes, what are the real condition and prospects of the colony, and what are its ascertained capabilities, advantages, and disadvantages, and the causes of the preference to be given to it over the older settlements of New South Wales, Van Dieman's Land, and Western Australia?

South Australia has lately excited considerable interest in Scotland, where people are repelled by the many evils and horrors attending the convict settlements. A few highly respectable Scottish settlers of capital have lately gone out, with the intention of fixing in the province, and also a good many labourers, as free emigrants, either under their immediate auspices, or connected with them. The unhappy state of affairs in Canada, has, for the present, arrested the current of western emigration, and is, indeed, converting Canadian settlers into emigrants; so that, in the opening year, the stream will be directed to some part of the Great South Land. Many families and individuals are already anxiously pondering their ultimate destination—that important step which, once taken, cannot easily be recalled. Each of the colonies has its advocates; each, moreover, has its peculiar and decided present advantages; but individuals, and especially heads of families, deliberating upon the step of changing their country, must look forward as well as around.

To the consideration of this important question, we come with as little bias as it is possible for human beings to feel; and, so far as South Australia is concerned, it so happens that nearly all our information has been derived from sources and persons liable to the suspicion of being but too favourable to the new colony, from direct personal interest in its prosperity. South Australia is, at present, in the ascendant with what to us is a most interesting class of emigrants—respectable labourers and artisans, and intelligent and educated small capitalists, aspiring to improve their condition, or to keep their place in society, after the struggle has become hopeless in the Old World. Now, it strikes us that some of this class are likely to give a preference to South Australia as their new home, without sufficient knowledge and consideration, and from relying too implicitly upon statements sent abroad under the sanction of popular names. Very little is yet known of that colony, save the nature of its organization; nor is it possible to see a single advantage which it possesses to set against its drawbacks, save that immense one, the absence of a convict population. Yet enough has transpired, through the new colonists themselves, to shew that even this advantage exists more in name than in reality. The publication of the Report of the Committee on Transportation, or what is familiarly termed Sir William Molesworth's Committee, will be favourable to the new colony, with respectable settlers, by placing the moral condition of the penal colonies in the darkest and most repulsive light, and by accumulating their horrors in one frightful mass; but, for its few years, and its scanty population, carefully (in the lower class) selected from the untainted poor, we must own that South Australia is, in manners and morals, treading very hard upon the heels of its elder depraved brethren. In the mother-vice of these colonies, low drunkenness and debauchery, Mr Gouger, the Secretary of the Colony, already gives his own city of Adelaide pre-eminence over Hobart Town.

It is known, to all interested in the subject, that the land of the new colony was vested in commissioners, not, perhaps, in the way best fitted to promote the general public interests; but it is too late to turn to that topic now. These commissioners held discretionary, unlimited, and irresponsible power, for the allotment and sale of all the land in the province. Before a single settler had landed, £35,000 were raised in London by sales, which sum was applied to defraying the first expenses of forming the settlement. The land was then sold at twelve shillings per acre, the minimum price, and a very high rate indeed, compared with that of the other colonies; but then the full advantage came back to the purchaser, or, at any rate, to the colony, in the produce of the sale of all lands being at once consolidated in the Emigration-Fund, which was to bring out labourers. The money arising from the sale of crown-land in the other colonies, is now, in like manner, devoted to bringing out labourers, and young women as servants. The price of land in South Australia is now raised to £1 per acre, which must at once be paid into the Emigration-Fund. Though there are, we believe, numerous complaints of unfairness in allotting and disposing of land, and though, in all probability, there might at the outset, have been a little jobbing, the plan now fixed and acted upon, appears perfectly fair and above-board. The Commissioners—the absolute Commissioners—reserve the power of fixing what shall be sold, and in what quantities, but the sales seem fairly managed, by sealed tenders and a fixed order of giving preerence. This power of allotting they hold, to prevent a straggling settlement, and to secure the alleged advantages of a denser population to the new colony, than if farmers were permitted to range about, and sit down where they please. The smallest of the sections is eighty acres, and two sections are about the smallest purchase that seems to be made. Every holder of 100 acres is entitled to the labour of three men and three women, the agreement as to wages and food, being, we imagine, quite free. The holder of a certain quantity of land in actual property, is now entitled to rent a range of pasturage upon very easy terms, as we shall afterwards see; and the rule as to locality, is lately so far relaxed in favour of extensive purchasers, that, if 4000 acres be bought at once, the offerer may point out a place where the commissioners are bound to survey 15,000 acres, and give him his choice out of this quantity of land. Very flattering accounts are given of the richness and fertility of the soil; but, we are bound to say, upon what appears exceedingly narrow experience, and insufficient data. It has always been said, that the soil of New South Wales is superior to that of Van Dieman's Land; but that of South Australia is in turn represented as very superior to the soil of Eastern Australia.

The raptures with which Captain Sturt spoke of the paradise he had discovered, affects people's imaginations to this day. Mr Gouger, the secretary of the colony, rests his opinion of the fertility of the soil upon the report of Colonel Light and of one or two more colonial officials who have made long journeys into the interior, and upon a letter published in The True Colonist, of Hobart Town, and written by a Mr Wade, a native of Van Dieman's Land, of considerable property, who has settled in South Australia. The exaggerated tone of his letter in other respects, renders this gentleman's testimony doubtful as to this exceeding superiority of the soil.

The natural productions of the province are, perhaps, similar to those of New South Wales; but we can learn little about them. We hear of no minerals save limestone, which is found about Adelaide town, and of no metals. The timber is useful for fuel and fences, but this is not a country of wood. The climate appears almost as hot as that of the West Indies, and at some seasons very variable; and the only decided natural superiority of the colony to counterbalance its natural disadvantages, are the alleged absence of those scorching droughts which are the bane of agriculture, as of stock and sheep, in New South Wales. One account states, that there are never three weeks without rain, and Mr Gouger asserts that hardly a week in summer passes without refreshing showers. But experience, unless it were that of the aborigines, who have not, we presume, been consulted, is still unable to pronounce on this important subject; and all observation tends to establish the fact of droughts being of as probable occurrence in the new colony as in the older one, and, if so, the evil must be aggravated by the greater heat of the climate.

But we prefer taking our testimony upon all debatable points from the mouth of the official people, the colonists, or those under their influence. We have seen that the entire sum obtained by the sale of land, goes to procure labour to cultivate that land, or to purposes necessary to the very existence of the colony; and we are willing to believe that, if there have been any abuses in this department, they will not again occur. For public objects, the commissioners are empowered to raise by loan, £250,000, on the security of the colonial revenue, and, failing that, on the land—a somewhat dangerous latitude. What debt has been incurred does not appear; and, probably, the £35,000 previously raised in London, has hitherto defrayed all the public charges of surveys, salaries, &c. &c.; for hitherto there seem to be no public works either executed or undertaken. There is not one bridge nor a mile of road yet made, so far as we learn.

The first settlement, and the capital of the colony, is the town of Adelaide, the site of which was adopted after considerable dubiety. It appears well chosen. It is situated six miles inland from Port Adelaide, and at about the same distance from a chain of hills, of which Mount Lofty is the most prominent, ranging in height to 2600 feet. The capital was planted so far from the sea for the sake of a plentiful supply of water, and to avoid the social evils which appear inseparable from all sea-port towns. It is divided by a stream, named the Torrens—in honour, we may presume, of a most zealous patron of the colony, and a speculator on its prosperity. Ground is reserved for a town at the harbour, which can easily, if the colony flourish, be connected with the capital by a railroad or canal. Great forethought has been shewn for the health, convenience, and pleasure of the future inhabitants, in laying out the city. Sites have been set apart for many useful public buildings; and around the town there is a park, 500 yards wide, reserved for public walks and drives. The town land was sold from the first at £7 an acre. It has risen rapidly in value, and may be expected to rise much farther. The example of Sydney and Hobart Town, and other colonial towns, where the most extravagant sums have been obtained for building ground, may be expected to introduce the speculating or gambling spirit into these transactions; but only a few persons can obtain prizes in this lottery, although the colony should flourish. Limestone is found, we have said, at Adelaide, and is applied to purposes of building; and fuel is obtained from the gum-tree. The locality is tolerably well covered with this and other useful kinds of wood. We hear nothing of even the smallest attempts at raising grain crops. Vegetables have thriven, and many fruits will no doubt thrive; but far more has been said on these minor subjects than the experience of the settlers can warrant. We hear nothing of success in raising even potatoes; and Mr Gouger advises emigrants to carry out best white biscuits from London, packed in japanned tin boxes, to keep off the flies and white ants—"though bread of excellent quality," he says, "can now be had at Adelaide." It is decisive as to the heat of the climate, that Mr Gouger declares it too warm for currants and gooseberries. Pigs and poultry appear to thrive well, and to increase. Of sheep stock and black cattle no very decided opinion can yet be given. Every probability, however, is in favour of their thriving, although the soil should not prove so superior to that of the other colonies as it is declared. Even Mr Wade confesses his fears, that the immense crop of grasses which he saw on the plains will not stand the summer.

They bear an immense crop of grass; but I think they will not stand the summer. I am informed that they are very luxuriant grazing lands in the spring and fall of the year; but when I visited them it was the height of summer, (December,) and they then appeared dry. Some of them had been burnt while I was there; and I noticed, when leaving, some grass on a plain near Adelaide that had been burnt not a month previously, with new growth of grass at least four inches long.

In New South Wales, the natives set fire to the long grass, to favour their pursuit of the game; but we are not told who fired the plains near Adelaide. The climate, from the latitude, should not be hotter than in New South Wales; yet it is attended by all the Egyptian plagues of the swamps of the Mississippi. "The rivers," we are told "decrease in size as you approach the coast, and the grass is not so durable as inland." Mr Wade says, the climate, though hot, is very regular. But the letters of emigrants, published, and judiciously selected by the Secretary of the Colony, Mr Gouger, give contradictory testimony. Mr Wade "saw the thermometer at 132° on some days; but this is considered high;" but he saw no one with a cold. Now, influenza and catarrh are frequent in New South Wales, from the variability of the temperature. We do not hear of pestilential fevers, nor epidemics of any sort. Some of the emigrants speak of headaches, and there is a species of ophthalmia, occasioned by the hot wind; which disease, however, is denied by Mr Gouger, who states that the irritation in the eyes is occasioned by a small fly getting into them. He says, the climate, though hotter than the south of France, retains all the enlivening qualities of that delightful region. An emigrant labourer, named Chapman, and one of the select letter-writers, says of the climate—

Our summers, if we may judge from the last, are remarkably settled, and considerably warmer than in England; but the winter, or rather the rainy season and the spring, are, for aught I can observe, equally variable; but, although the changes are sometimes severely felt for the time, it does not appear that they are attended with that fatality, or rather ill health, so prevalent in the mother-country. It is quite common in this country to bask in the most agreeable sunshine for three or four days; and this will be succeeded by two or three days of cold wind, and frequently rain, now and then a hail-storm, but these are slight. The hoar-frost has made some of the potatoes droop, but we have no frosts like those of England; and, taking all circumstances into consideration, as well as soil and climate, nothing should induce me to return for a permanence. There is one thing justice compels me to mention: in the summer we sometimes have a hot wind which affects the eyes very materially; and I have known a person nearly blind for three or four days. The common house-fly, the blue bottle fly, and the mosquitoes, are quite a pest in the hot weather; but slight veils of gauze will protect our faces, and wire-gauze is a most valuable article to prevent the fresh meat from walking away.

On this important subject Mr Gouger confirms the above as to the plague of insects—

In decayed wood, and in the bark of trees, small scorpions, centipedes, and tarantulas are frequently found: the sting of the first, and the bite of the two last, would, of course, be very painful; but, unless in the case of an infant or person of diseased habit, no fatal effect would be likely to ensue.

Of the insect tribe, however, white ants are the most injurious of any I have met with. They are very numerous; and wherever a quantity of dead wood is to be found, the white ants assemble. But they do not spare living timber; I have seen trees of large growth, apparently solid and healthy, filled with them: they have been perforated to the very top by the ants, and have become the habitations of millions of these pernicious insects. Nothing escapes them, or seems above or beneath their notice. During my stay at Glenelg, I was obliged to place all my furniture and boxes upon glass bottles, and watch daily whether or not these marauders had commenced their attacks: still I found the damage done me was considerable. They nearly destroyed a box of valuable linen; the corks of all the bottles, not sealed, which were in some large casks, were demolished, and the contents let out; while the temporary floor of my tent, one-inch-and-a-quarter battens, was quite destroyed.

Mosquitoes are very numerous and troublesome in some parts of the country, and especially to new comers. At the harbour especially, where there is an extensive mud-flat, skirted by mangrove trees, they are in myriads. Cultivation, however, and the removal of dead timber, soon drives them away to a place where they may remain undisturbed.

In giving advice to emigrants, he says—

You will find it expedient to purchase jars and vessels in which liquids and stores are kept, with covers to them; the number of flies which seem to claim a right to everything consumable by man, is extraordinary; and not only economy, but common cleanliness, requires protection from the persecution of these marauders. The large meat-fly of Australia, be it known to you, instead of depositing the germ of maggots, deposits them actually living; in order to preserve meat, therefore, hot, cold, cooked or uncooked, for a single day, go to a wine-worker's and purchase some wire-gauze dish-covers, and some pieces of strong but close wire-work, sufficiently large for the manufacture of a commodious safe on arrival out.

The country is not, so far as we see, much annoyed with venomous reptiles, though they are found. Guanas and lizards are common, but they are harmless. The large kangaroo and the emu are already retiring. The wild turkey, or bustard, is still found, and quails and wild ducks are rather plentiful. This, however, does not appear a country of game. Fish are found near Adelaide, but not in plenty or variety. This source of comfort and sustenance is, however, still nearly unknown, and it may turn out more productive. Cockles and mussels have been found in abundance near the harbour, and also a few oysters. In the Torrens, the only fish is a small delicate fish like a smelt.

In this colony, the vine may thrive; and cotton, tobacco, coffee, rice, the sugar-cane, the tea-plant, may be cultivated at some future period. Indian-corn and wheat crops may, to a certain extent, be relied upon; but, in the meanwhile, the great staple commodity is grass, and nothing else is sure. If sheep-stock and cattle do not thrive as well as, or better than in New South Wales or Van Dieman's Land, the immediate prospects of the colony are gloomy. Mr Wade, the gentleman referred to as authority by Mr Gouger, on the question of the soil, is decided on the superiority of the new settlement, in these important cases. He says—

Men of capital would also find it advantageous to settle their flocks and herds in South Australia. I feel confident that the return on such beautiful pasturage would be considerably greater than here. They can also secure good stock-runs in advantageous situations. They would certainly have to pay £1 per acre for what they wish to purchase, or rather subscribe that sum to the labour-fund, as the produce of the land-sales is all expended in carrying labourers from the mother-country; where arrangements are making for sending a sufficient supply of useful servants, under thirty years of age. Then, again, the stockholder has the privilege of holding 1,280 acres of the unoccupied land, at a rental of £4 per annum, for every 80 acres he purchases. This privilege is given to buyers of land only, none but buyers being allowed to occupy grazing land.

It is not said how long the Commissioners are to continue this great privilege, though we hear of three years and a renewal, the preference to be given to the old tenant; and it is probable, they will not have much reason to withdraw the indulgence for a considerable time. We submit "to stock and store-farmers" this passage from Mr Gouger. If the quantity of land that he fixes, (four acres) for the subsistence of a sheep, be a just estimate, it gives a quite new view of all Australian farming. He is contending for the superiority of his own colony, and reasons thus:—

It has been urged by some that this mode of disposing of public land is nothing but a species of sale at a very high price, and that land can be got at a much lower rate in other colonies. In reply to this argument I offer the following facts relative to the only other British colony of which I have personal knowledge, Van Dieman's Land. I leave out of this question now the purpose to which the purchase-money of land is applied, because, though in the case of South Australia the money is returned in the form of imported labourers, in Van Dieman's Land colonists are brought to the settler's door by application to the government. In South Australia, land of the first quality is to be had in the greatest abundance by the payment of £1 an acre to the emigration-fund: of this land, upon comparison with much in Van Dieman's Land of the very best kind, two acres in a state of nature will be required to keep one sheep; in Van Dieman's Land no such land is now to be obtained of the Government; it is all appropriated; and of that which is now open, four acres would be required to keep one sheep. I speak upon this point, not only from my own observation, but upon the concurrent testimony of some of the oldest colonists and best judges in Van Dieman's Land. Again, in South Australia, land, peculiarly valuable by situation, can be obtained of the commissioners at the same rate as country land; in Van Dieman's Land it is now impossible to get any suburban or town lots without paying a very high price.

But Mr Gouger forgets that lots in the neighbourhood of Hobart Town or Launceston, if higher in price, are of rather more value than in the neighbourhood of the capital of Adelaide, and are likely for a long time to remain so. He contends, on another ground, that the highest-priced land is in reality the cheapest, as the fertility of the soil (in South Australia) gives two to one against Van Dieman's Land. Mr Gouger, in discussing the best way of employing capital, so as to obtain the most profitable return, considers, among other things, sheep-stock as one of the best. Taking the rate of increase of the flocks from that of Van Dieman's Land, which, however, he regards as far inferior to what South Australia, with its fertile soil and fine climate, must yield, he shews very flattering results, as likely to be obtained even in the infancy of the settlement. As we are convinced that, unless sheep, or rather wool, become the great staple, there can be no prosperity for the colony for generations, if ever, we submit these details fully to our readers:—

I have shewn this statement to some of the leading graziers in Van Dieman's Land, and they all agree that the data are under, instead of being beyond the facts.

In this calculation, the increase is taken at the rate of 80 per cent. per lambing season, and seven lambing seasons are supposed to take place in five years: the loss by natural and accidental deaths is calculated at five per cent. per lambing season. No deduction is here made for the expense of management, the produce in wool fully covering this outlay. The original purchase is supposed to be 500 ewes.

Thus, at the end of five years, the 500 sheep originally imported, would have increased to 1,477 ewes, 1,182 lambs, and 1,602 wether sheep; giving a total of 3,068 sheep, and 1,182 lambs. I shall not carry on this statement to money results, but this can be done by any one who chooses to calculate it. The cost of fine-woolled ewes, two and four teeth, in Van Dieman's Land, in January 1838, was about 18s. each, and the net cost of freight to South Australia from Launceston is about 10s. a-head.

A Van Dieman's Land grazier will pronounce this calculation crude. He would smile, for instance, at my giving all the value of the wool for the expense of management; and he would ask why the wethers should not be sold from year to year, and ewes bought with the proceeds, whereby the increase would be naturally much greater; but I have been content with shewing what the profit is upon the lowest calculation and inferior management. At your leisure, you can add to the computation I have made the extra profit arising from selling males and buying females, without being afraid of building castles in the air.

Oxen and cows, again, are a very fruitful source of profit, and the luxuriant pastures around Adelaide keep them always in excellent condition. I am by no means going beyond the fact when I declare that oxen in South Australia, worked hard up to the day of their being slaughtered, make as good beef as the best I have tasted in Van Dieman's Land, and quite equal to any commonly sold in the English shambles. Pigs maintain themselves, and get fat, in the swamps by Glenelg, without any care being bestowed on them: they are increasing very rapidly throughout the province, and some very good breeds have been introduced.

Poultry of all kinds succeed very well, and are increasing fast.

Those who are curious or interested may compare the above with Captain Sturt's calculations.

We may here notice a fact most important to the welfare of the colony, which has occurred since Mr Gouger wrote his letters:—

Some enterprising settlers of New South Wales have driven over from that colony to Adelaide a herd of oxen: three hundred and fifty head of cattle arrived safely without the loss on the road of one animal. The road thus discovered will now speedily become the track of flocks of sheep and herds of cattle from the overstocked market of Sydney to South Australia; and the consequence will be, that animals for the knife will be provided at low cost, while fine-wooled sheep will easily be brought to the colony at low prices.

This is undoubtedly a satisfactory incident. We set less store by the fact of thirteen colonial ships being at one time seen in the harbour of Port Adelaide, as, although they were trading to the colony, there could not be permanent trade for them.

Besides the Commissioners—the sole proprietors or trustees of the colony—there is in the province a rival interest, or another interest, The South-Australian Land Company—a body of commercial speculators in England, who already hold one-seventh of all the country-land sold in the colony, and a sixth of the town sections. These wholesale dealers started at once as bankers, whale-fishers, ship-builders, store-keepers, store-farmers, and dealers in everything. Their whaling has hitherto failed, and also some other of their multifarious callings; and the Company are now contented with their profits as bankers, (in which capacity they may become useful,) and as extensive land-owners and ship-owners. They seem enlightened landlords. They give encouragement to tenants of small capital, and offer leases. They assist tenants (for a consideration—ten per cent., the legal rate of interest in the colony,) with loans to build homesteads and purchase stock. One good feature of these Absentee Australian lords of the soil, is, that the tenant may purchase his farm at any time during the currency of his lease, at a price stipulated at its commencement. The leases are for twenty-one years. Probably this Great Kangaroo Company now find that they have enough of land and to spare. However, as their interests are closely bound up with the prosperity of the colony, their influence and enterprise must be of great use in the beginning of the settlement. For it is still only beginning; and there cannot be too much caution employed by persons of capital, meaning to become settlers, in committing themselves to the chances of its still doubtful fortunes. The exclusive system, and the high price of land, makes it almost impossible for labourers to become proprietors. It was, indeed, an original object with the Commissioners to guard against small proprietors, and at once to establish, if not castes, classes.

The inducement of high wages, held out to labourers to become emigrants, if not altogether fallacious, we consider extremely equivocal. A few clever and active artisans, when anything is going forward, do make great wages; but the rate is very fluctuating; and provisions, from the mere circumstances of the infant colony, although there were no jobbing and monopoly, are excessively dear, relatively to the highest rate of wages, and to prices in the older colonies. This must be for a time; but the evil will diminish. Mr Gouger states that when he was in Hobart Town in February 1838, "the emigrant labourers, who arrived from Ireland, could find no employment; and the streets of Hobart Town were accordingly as much infested with beggars as any town in France." In some parts of Van Dieman's Land, labour is cheaper than in England; while in other parts it is much higher. But, if emigrant free labour is thus plentiful, the complaint of the evils of convict labour is removed, as the settlers need no longer employ convicts. Emigrants for South Australia, if to be taken out at the expense of the emigration-fund, should be bona fide labourers, not handicraftsmen or artisans, though those possessing the common and necessary trades, as shoemakers, carpenters, tailors, masons, &c. &c., are, we believe, tolerated, if not welcomed. They must, if possible, be married, and not under fifteen nor above thirty, though this last rule has been relaxed. A good feature of the scheme is, that the number of the sexes should be as nearly as possible equal, so young single women may go out if under the protection of their friends. Children above one year are to be paid for. But there is some talk of relaxing this rule too. The colony requires young recruits and great encouragement. The free emigrants receive the necessary attention on landing from an agent; and employment is provided for them until they are hired by the private settlers. Mr Gouger frankly warns this class against indulging absurd expectations about their condition in the colony. There, labouring men must live by the sweat of their brow, as everywhere else. Disappointment, and its attendant, discontent, if not idleness and dissipation, are sure to follow the downfall of the towering hopes of finding a new Cockaigne, a Lubberland, where the fowls fly about ready roasted, crying, "Come, eat me." Imaginations of a similar kind are apt to affect the fair sex, of which Mr Gouger relates this diverting instance.

There is a standing joke in Adelaide against a young woman, who, having married just before she left England, got, during the voyage, certain elevated notions of her newly acquired dignity. On the emigrants from her ship landing, a gentleman walked down to Glenelg to hire a servant, and, seeing this person standing on the beach by her boxes, he walked up to her, and, after talking a little about the voyage, asked "if she was engaged?" "Engaged," said she, with a simpering yet modest smile, "I am married, sir?" "Oh! my good girl," rejoined the inquirer, "I beg your pardon, I, too, am married, and certainly did not mean the kind of engagement you supposed. I want a servant, and wish to know if you are hired." "Hired, indeed!" said she, in a very altered tone, and bridling up to her full height, "do you think I mean to work, then?—no, indeed, my husband will never allow that; he will keep me." The event, however, has not justified the prophecy; and, having recovered her senses, she now works hard. Colonization is hard work; and no one, unless possessed of a considerable capital, ought to think of going to a new country, unless he is disposed to put his shoulder to the wheel in good earnest.

The consequence of a sudden and great rise of wages, is often idleness, and rum and spirit-drinking; which, according to the Secretary, flourish quite as luxuriantly in this choice community, as in the old penal settlements. Mr Gouger is forced, reluctantly, to own that there is more drinking of the demoralizing kind in his own settlement than in the others. "In Adelaide," he says, "a dozen drunken people, mariners and labourers together, are to be found daily at those dens of iniquity, the gin-shops. In Van Dieman's Land, (and I draw the contrast with great sorrow,) during a three months' residence, I have not seen a half dozen men intoxicated." But a dozen mariners and labourers could not keep even one Adelaide gin-shop in brisk trade; and we hear of many such "dens" in the young colony, and apprehend that there is, at the outset, not a much higher rate of morality in the new than in the old settlement, nor much difference between the free emigrants of South Australia, and the emancipists and expirees of Van Dieman's Land. This last colony, however, is in a more healthful moral condition than New South Wales. The criminal sessions are held quarterly at Adelaide. While Mr James was there, (who has lately published a work upon South Australia, which we have not yet seen,) fourteen criminal convictions, as we learn by the newspapers, were obtained. Some of the persons convicted were banished to Van Dieman's Land! and one man was executed, under circumstances dreadfully revolting. His crime was shooting at and wounding the sheriff. He appears to have been a desperate character—and, probably, in the circumstances of the society, his execution may have been justifiable; but, alas! for such a necessity so early in the history of this pet and pattern colony. And what are we to conclude of a population of about 2500, very carefully selected, which already affords a criminal calendar like the above?

As to the prospects of working men in the new settlement, we should imagine that, for labourers, there may be a very considerable demand; and also room for a small number of the ordinary handicrafts, and even for a few glaziers, plumbers, and such like callings. But it must be evident that, in a population so small, leaving out that the wealthier part, at least, bring full supplies from England, there cannot be much demand; and that an artisan who finds over employment for a time, may shortly fail of work. "Labourers," says Mr Gouger, "of all kinds are wanted;" and "shepherds, especially from the Highlands, would obtain high wages." But shepherds have high wages at home, or equivalent advantages. In speaking of wages in all of these colonies, the public hear always of the prizes, and seldom of the blanks; or rather, in this lottery, it seems all prizes and no blanks. Mr Gouger treats the matter with candour in his own particular case, though his general assurances may be too flattering. For some months, he gave to six men "accustomed to all kinds of colonial labour—such as clearing land, grubbing of trees, fencing, and gardening—6s. a-day." But, he adds, "These were skilful men, and each worth two of those just landed from England. They were all Irishmen."

And 6s. a-day must, no doubt, have been deemed immense wages to an Irish labourer, dear as potatoes and all kinds of provision were then in Adelaide. Mr Gouger says that they are not dear; but many will take leave to differ from him who read his rates:—

Provisions are by no means dear: excellent beef and mutton are always to be obtained for 1s. a pound; salt beef and pork for about 9d.; kangaroo, 9d.; wild ducks, 1s. each; quail, 6d.; snapper, about 6d. a pound; and other fish in proportion. Fresh butter is 2s. 6d., and salt butter 1s. 6d.; milk, 10d. a quart; flour, 55s. the barrel of 196lbs.; sugar, 6d., and tea, 3s. 6d. and 4s.

With so many colonial ships in the harbour, and Van Dieman's Land so near, to look to no other quarters, we cannot understand why flour, salt beef, and pork, and the unexercised commodities of tea and sugar, and soap, should be so high.

In those letters from emigrants which Mr Gouger brought to England to their friends and relations, the rate of wages and the price of provisions are frequent topics. One steady man, named Simons, a blacksmith, who, from the nature of his trade, has prospered exceedingly at Adelaide, gives a rather interesting account of his progress. He sets out by complaining loudly of the conduct of the captain, surgeon, and superintendent of the ship in which he went out: but Mr Gouger affirms, that this must be a solitary case, and it may fairly be supposed that the Commissioners and their agents will try to ensure good treatment to those they are bringing out. Simons writes—

Good labourers, of any description, are now getting 5s. 6d. to 6s. per day, and they were and are very much wanted: tradesmen can get 10s. per day; but most that is wanting is carpenters, bricklayers, and masons. I can earn myself £1 per day, and not work so hard as I did in England for 7s. Beef and mutton is plentifully supplied by the commissioners at 1s. per pound; potatoes is very dear at present; but the next season I expect they will be cheaper than they are in London, as they grow very fast, as likewise do most vegetables. Fowls breed three or four times a-year; all cattle breed very fast, so that we may expect meat soon to be very cheap. Shoes is exceedingly dear; clothes is much cheaper than we could expect. Parrots and cockatoos are plentiful, which are excellent eating; there is plenty of kangaroo, but very shy, as likewise is emus, turkeys, geese, and ducks.

Dear brother and sister, if you can rely on my word, I would advise you to come out to Australia, where you will better your condition tenfold, as also would James Tupper, as he could by shingle-splitting earn £1 a-day, as it is an article of great consumption. Please to inform your mother if she will send R. Tupper out, Mr Gouger, the bearer of this letter, will bring him out with him, and I promise to do the best in my power for him. I have bought an acre of land in the city of Adelaide which cost me £8, which is now worth £50, without anything being done to it, and land of every description is increasing in price every day. We have now got a comfortable stone cottage and a good shop, with two fires constantly a-going, and a good garden well stocked with vegetables. My brother is now at work with me, and is doing very well.

This is one of the great prizes. A man named Cronk—who was probably skilful in colonial matters, as he had previous experience in both the other colonies, and seems to have been employed at Adelaide to negotiate with the Aborigines—writes thus—

Dear kindred, I do not know what sort of account

you have heard of this place : my opinion is, as many more, that there is every promising prospect of a flourishing colony. The town is improving very fast, and we have not had to undergo one-half of the inconveniences as I expected we should, for we never have been short of provisions yet, for the vessels are continually coming from Sydney, Van Dieman's Land, and other places. We have some large flocks of sheep, and herds of bullocks and cows, also horses ; and vessels still coming in with stock and provisions. The land produces very fine rich grass, of various sorts ; the town is beautifully situated on two spots of rising ground, with a strong running stream of water through the centre, which runs all the year round. The town is surrounded by large plains. The people that has made gardens, their crops has turned out very fair crops ; I have seen small spots of wheat and oats, looks remarkably well at present. Any person coming out here can never regret it, for labour will always be in full demand, and I hope I shall have the pleasure of seeing my brothers and relations out here. I have one acre and a quarter of land in the town, which will become very valuable in the course of a few years. My master gave £5 per acre, and I have been offered £80 for it ; but I refused to sell. I sold three-quarters of an acre, as I purchased for £10 per acre, I sold for £23 a few days after. Labour of every kind is in full demand. Wages here is, for labouring men, about 30s. to 36s. per week ; mechanics, from 50s. to 60s. per week. Price of provisions ; fat beef and mutton, 1s. per pound ; salt pork, 10d. ; butter, 2s. ; fresh butter, 3s. ; sugar, 8d. ; tea, 3s. ; kangaroo, 9d. ; milk, 8d. per quart ; beer, 1s. 2d. to 1s. 6d. per quart. Dear mother, I hope you have received the letters I have sent you, five in number ; for I am in expectation of seeing my brother John, and William Gray here shortly ; also, a letter from you. The gentleman, Mr Gouger, has had the kindness to favour me with bringing these few lines to London for you, which he will be so kind as to send you a letter where he resides, as you can ask any question of the colony, and of our way of employment ; and if either my sisters or brothers would like to come out here, he will have the kindness to give you every instruction how to proceed.

There are letters now in England from emigrants and settlers, of a very different complexion from the above ; but these have not come through Mr Gouger's care, and we look only to his selection, professing to take the most favourable view possible of the colony. The wife of one of the emigrants writes to her parents very circumstantially. Her husband had acted as cook on the outward voyage, for which he was to receive £5. At Adelaide he got into immediate employment as a butcher, at £2 a-week, with an allowance of fresh meat and a little milk. His employer was a store-keeper, for whose wife his wife charred. To those who love the "simple annals of the poor," Anne Cooke's epistle will have an interest besides the information which it conveys.

We had a most excellent man and perfect gentleman for our captain, and I must say the same by our doctor, which made things very pleasant on board. Our doctor was likewise very clever in his profession, which, I am sorry to say, I had occasion to prove. I was taken with sea-sickness before we got to Portsmouth, which continued till within a week of our landing ; for some weeks, I never left my bed, except to be lifted out to have it made : at the end of that time, my bed used to be laid on the deck of a morning, and I was taken up and laid upon it. Indeed I suffered much more than any other person on board, and we had a great deal of illness. A person of the name of Rush brought two children on board with the whooping-cough, which our little darling, Peter, caught, and suffered for two months on board with it, as it had such an effect upon his bowels. You have no idea of the miseries of illness on board of ship ; the dear little fellow seemed a great deal better the last week or two we were on board ; and on Saturday, the 21st October, we landed, and everybody was delighted with his little tricks in the boat, as we came to shore ; you might have taken a lease of his life, to all appearance, but he changed poorly in the morning, about eight o'clock, and on Sunday morning, about six o'clock, he had a dreadful fit, and continued out of one into another, till Tuesday night, and from thence gradually sinking till Thursday night, at twelve o'clock, when he expired like a lamb. My tears fall so fast, I can scarcely see to write at all. I endeavour to resign myself to the will of God, but nature will have its way ; and it seems hard, after bringing him so many miles, to lose him now. The doctor says it was the cough, and that his lungs were entirely gone. Dear father, if you could call and tell Mr Hutt, the mischief it caused letting those people bring such a complaint on board, as there was three died on board with it, besides my little dear, and there are at least twenty bad with it now here, I think they would be more particular in future. Notwithstanding all my trouble, I am now getting as strong and hearty as ever I was in my life ; the climate seems to have such wonderful effect upon my constitution, and indeed on everybody's that conduct themselves sober and steady. The heat, yesterday, at twelve o'clock, was 100° in the shade, and for all that, your appetite is as sharp as in frosty weather in England. We seem to be always hungry, which proves the healthiness of the climate. Indeed, it is a wonderful country ; a complete natural garden. The flowers which grow wild about, would shame many English gardens, and to see the trees and beautiful evergreens about the fields, it looks like a fine park.

The provisions are at present very high : fresh meat, 1s. per lb. ; butter, 2s. ; bread, 1s. 8d. per quarter ; sugar, from 7d. to 8d. per lb. ; tea from 4s. to 5s. ; pepper, 2s. per lb. ; soap, 7d. to 8d. ; coffee, 2s. per lb. ; but wearing apparel would frighten you. Boots and shoes are dearer than anything. Men's shoes, from 12s. 6d. to £1 a pair ; boots from £1 : 10s. to £2 : 10s. Women's in proportion. Straw bonnets, £1 : 6s., that would be about 8s. at home. I shall do well by the thimbles, hooks, and eyes, and other things I brought out with me, as they are an immense price here ; I have already sold some. I send this letter by Mr Gouger, a gentleman who will be so kind as to call on you, and he will give you £5 from me, if you will be so good as to lay it out in the following articles.

The articles wanted are strong leather boots, for both husband and wife, from a shop in Skinner's Street ; worsted stocking shirts for the husband, and flannel petticoats for the wife. Their experience of the colony would not be much, as they came to anchor on the 17th of October, and the woman's letter is dated the 7th November. This "always hungry" woman, upon her fortnight's knowledge, urges all her friends to come out. She was getting a pint of porter a-day from her mistress, while it was selling at 1s. 2d. a-pot !—and she continues—"Pray tell whoever thinks of coming out they must make make up their minds to be sober, as liquor, being so cheap here, it is the destruction of many here ; it is quite dreadful. Dear mother, I daresay you remember I am twenty-five years old to-day ; I wish you was here with me."

Mr Gouger cannot say quite so much for the sylvan beauties of the land of their adoption as romantic Anne Cooke. The trees he thinks "by no means handsome." The umbrageous part of the large trees is generally at the top. There is a yellow wattle of great splendour, which, when in flower, emits a most fragrant odour. There are also many well-grown and ornamental shrubs. The beautifully plumaged and splendidly coloured parrots and small birds of the other Australian colonies are found here.

There is a local necessity for the strong half-boots which Mrs Cooke ordered. Among the novel delights of the colony, there is one to be provided against, thus noticed by Mr Gouger:—

The clothing required in South Australia is just what you have been in the habit of wearing in England, but add thereto some blue camlet or light white jackets, to be worn during the summer season instead of a cloth coat. A supply of leather gaiters and strong gardening gloves will be found very useful; and you will in general find high-shoes or half-boots the best protection for the feet. There is a kind of spear-grass bearing a bearded seed, which much inconveniences pedestrians during half the year, and for protection against which gaiters or half boots are required. The seed is very sharp, and sticks into the feet and ankles with great pertinacity, unless they are well protected from it.

Brass and iron bedsteads are by far better than wood, and mosquito-curtains will assuredly be required by all new-comers. Good mattresses cannot be had in the colony; you will not be sorry, I think, if you brought out a bale of curled horse-hair, and the tick to put it into; there are persons who understand upholstering resident in the colony.

Well provided as the colony is with trading-ships and merchants, Mr Gouger orders his supplies of wine, dried-fruits, salted tongues, &c. half-yearly from the Cape of Good Hope, as the safer and cheaper market, and he advises his friends to follow his plan. "Ironmongery, furniture, articles of dress, and haberdashery, are all very dear in the colony; do not, therefore, hesitate to take out with you a sufficient supply of these really useful commodities." Draught bullocks and sheep may now be best obtained from Van Dieman's Land, where there are excellent breeds. Really, what with the mosquitoes, the myriads of flies, the live maggots, the white ants, the small snakes, the disease of the eyes, the native dogs, (which are like wolves, and attack the sheep, goats, and poultry,) the spear-grass, and all the other natural agremens of the colony, it would require some special advantages. Mr Gouger points out one; but it will, we fear, never be realized, as the law-makers must be the opposing interest. It consists in organizing a scheme of finance, for raising the colonial revenue, not from excise or customs, but from realized profits, or by a property-tax, in fact. He estimates that, in town and country, £178,998:16s. have already been realized in re-selling the lands originally purchased from the Commissioners: immense profits, certainly, and the world will have some curiosity about who have turned their silver or copper into gold! This balance (£178,998:16s.) is, he says,

The actual amount of profit gained by the purchasers of the town and preliminary sections, since the foundation of the province, a little more than a year. What a result! To obtain the foundation of this province, the sum of about £60,000 has been expended; it has already created within itself, property which would more than three times overpay the cost of its creation. But again here is a subject for taxation! Profit has arisen to individuals to an enormous amount, and in a very short time, by means for the production of which the gainers have expended no capital. Here is that "rent," scientifically speaking, that accidental profit which has always been deemed, by economists, the very best subject for taxation, because it is felt by no one; by the institution of this tax now, in the infancy of the province, it will be relieved from all debt, and need not be encumbered, for the sake of revenue, either with excise or customs.

Were this great and decided step taken now, in the infancy of the colony, its advantages would be incalculable:—but it will not. It would be setting a very dangerous example indeed to the people of the mother country. We, however, thank Mr Gouger for this liberal and statesman-like idea. The government of the new province, which was at first what this gentleman justly terms unique, is now the same as in the other colonies; though the extraordinary powers of the Commissioners are not to be touched. As soon as the population amounts to 50,000, the colony is, like the others, promised a constitution, which may perhaps, when the time comes, have some popular principle. The same objection cannot, at all events, exist which the Tories urge against giving the franchise in the penal colonies, as there is no convict population from which to obtain emancipists and ex-pirees. It is not unlikely, however, that a few of the above characters are already flourishing in Adelaide, and supplying some of its most lucrative callings. The colony is secured against convicts, but not against those who have been convicts.

It is needless to look too narrowly into the manner in which either the Commissioners, or those who placed the province at their disposal, obtained their titles; but we are compelled to think of what might be the consequences to the settlers of hostility from the aborigines. The most pleasing feature in the new settlement is the wisdom and humanity with which the natives have hitherto been treated. Still this is a ticklish and delicate point; and here exists a danger from which Van Dieman's Land, though by wicked and disgraceful means, is now forever relieved. Upon that beautiful island, as large as Ireland, there is now not one native of the original race! The last remnant of the aboriginal tribes, was, as we lately had occasion to notice, after foul treachery and violence had been done to them, sent to an island in Bass's Straits, where more than half their number have already died, of, according to the evidence of the surgeon, Mr Barnes, given last summer before Sir William Molesworth's committee, the home-sickness—the languishing desire to return to their country. If the colony of South Australia can manage to behave with somewhat less cruelty and treachery to the natives, than has marked the history of other colonies, they will not only promote the security of their own settlements, but gain public opinion at home to their side. Mr Gouger does not set out in the ordinary style, by giving an ill name to the black dog marked to be hanged; for he entertains no bad designs. Hitherto colonial dealing with the aboriginal race in South Australia, is a picture that has no sanguinary shades. We have, therefore, sincere pleasure in presenting it to our readers:—

About a fortnight or three weeks after landing at Glenelg, one of the settlers, who was out shooting, saw at a distance a native man and boy employed in making a fire; he prudently withdrew his sporting charge, and put a bullet into each barrel, in case of being obliged to defend himself. Having taken this precaution, he advanced silently until within a short distance, and then laughed heartily. The natives immediately seized their spears; but, as he continued laughing, and held a biscuit to them, they put down their spears and approached him. They then embraced, and he succeeded in bringing them down to the settlement. Having early intimation of their approach, I went to meet them. The man appeared to be of about thirty years of age, and the boy about eight; both seemed intelligent, and, as far as my knowledge of physiognomy went, anything but furious. As soon as they saw me, they laughed, and patted me on the back, which ceremony I, of course, returned; but, wishing to make them comprehend as completely as possible, that we wished to be friendly with them, I took a stick, and, holding it over my head, broke it, saying, "Wombarra, wombarra no good," upon which the man seemed perfectly delighted, and with great earnestness embraced me. The wombarra is a weapon used in the native warfare. We then went to the government-store, where they were supplied with a second-hand military coat, cap, and trowsers each, which wonderfully delighted them; and on a looking-glass being placed before them, they were almost convulsed with laughter. This sensation having subsided, we introduced to them a new wonder; a pipe being given to one of them, it was lighted by a burning-glass: they looked above and below to find the fire, and seeing nothing but a piece of transparent substance in a wooden frame, they seemed rather alarmed. On this, I pointed to the sun, then to the glass and tobacco; but the pantomimic explanation was hardly complete before the native patted his chest in token of comprehension, laughed, and then looked at each of the party as if impressed with awe at our superior knowledge and contrivances. They were then taken round the settlement; and as at each tent they got some small present, they were evidently highly gratified with their reception. They remained some days with the person who had succeeded with so much credit to himself in bringing them down, and then returned to the woods, under a promise to bring down their whole family. A few days afterwards, they reappeared, attended by their friends and relations, all of whom received the same useful presents and warm welcome as had their predecessors. From that time up to my leaving the colony, we were surrounded by natives, and not one instance of dishonesty or treachery on their part, has occurred.

The aborigines I have seen are generally a well formed and active race, differing in many important points from the accounts I have perused of the natives of New South Wales. They are also unlike those who once existed in Van Dieman's Land. Once existed! Yes, in less than thirty years, the black possessors of the soil have been nearly destroyed; and in a few more, not one will live to tell the tale. There are now, I am informed, but two women at Flinders' Island capable of perpetuating their race; and the proportion of deaths to births shews that the native population will soon be extinct. The progress of English colonization is marked by a trail of blood:—but this is episodic, and I gladly return to my account, with a feeling of pride, that, instead of being charged with cruelty, the inhabitants of my adopted country have, hitherto, acted towards the aborigines the part of a humane and Christian people.

I have said the South Australian natives are well-proportioned and active; I have not seen one deformed person among them; and they are not only generally healthy, and free from those cutaneous eruptions which so often afflict savages, but the excellence of their constitutions enables them to throw off diseases, and to recover from wounds which would be fatal to Europeans.

It is imagined the language of those savages is the Malay, but we think on very slender proof. Their weapons, and implements of hunting and fishing, are of the rudest kind. In feeding, they are nearly as omnivorous as the highly civilized

Chinese. Whale-blubber is a dainty lately added to their repasts, and they attend the whalers on the coast to procure it. They have the acute senses of other savage tribes, in tracking their enemies or their prey. They have no settled place of abode, but each family wanders over a space of miles, "punishing aggression made on their boundaries by other families!" When the Commissioner's settlers shall come upon these boundaries, the time will have arrived for testing the mutual dispositions of the colonists and the natives. Mr Gouger places them at the very lowest point in the scale of civilization, as regards the arts of life.

Yet they are not incapable of advancement; they are very observing and attentive, and have a degree of shrewdness which might serve as an indication of higher talent. They are, moreover, very obliging, and they very willingly perform works for those settlers of whom they form a good opinion. A little sugar, biscuit, or bread, is a sufficient inducement for them to bring wood, water, or stone for building, and several instances have occurred of ten or twelve of these poor fellows working during six hours consecutively for an individual for biscuit. With good usage they are exceedingly docile, and fortunately we have yet but once* had experience of them under other circumstances.

He regrets that no effective general arrangement has been made for attempting their civilization; but his own suggestions, and those he has given from other sources, do not meet the case. For what should our public service in those colonies require regiments of natives—like the Sepoys of India, or like the Hottentots regimented to protect the frontier from the Caffres; or more properly to assist the settlers in making hostile aggression on the aboriginal races? For what is a field-police of natives required in South Australia, save to overawe the natives themselves? This untainted settlement, which prides itself so much on its purity, is not surely yet sunk into the condition of a penal colony, where to set a black native to catch a white thief, might be good policy; and if the natives are not hostile, a very small police ought, for generations, to suffice to a population collected upon principles so favourable to morality. One passage of Mr Gouger's tempts a smile. It seems no legal provision by purchase of land has been made for the aborigines—and he thinks this best. Those who may be assumed to have had some slender rights in the soil, prior to the grant made to the Commissioners, are not, from sound reasons of political economy, to have their wants considered:—

No legal provision, by way of purchase of land on their behalf, or in any other mode, has been yet made; nor do I think that with proper care it is at all necessary. I can see no reason why they should not, in a comparatively short time, be made to understand our notions, and to depend upon their own exertions for a livelihood. The field-police would be a good introduction to civilization; and I have no doubt but that it would be succeeded by their adopting, to a great extent, our habits and modes of life. At any rate, until it and other means shall have been tried and found fruitless, the enervating effect of specific legal protection should not be tried.

We are not the least afraid that it will. But really to speak of the enervating effects of giving coarse rations and a few clothes to those miserable beings whom the settlers are driving from their hunting-grounds and fishing-streams, is something beyond a jest.

* In this case gross provocation having been given by the white man, revenge was taken by the black.

The commissioners have done one wise thing. They have made no reserve of lands for the Church, nor for any purpose whatever, save public roads. Mr Howard was appointed chaplain to the colony by King William, with the moderate salary of £250. The Lord Bishop of Australia has already attempted to extend his pastoral crook and care to this gentleman, in the matter of fleecing him of a good part of his fees; but the Bishop's jurisdiction is denied, and his spiritual encroachments are said to be provided against by the act in Council, appointing the chaplain along with the other functionaries. As there are neither Church lands nor tithes in the colony, Mr Gouger hopes that Voluntarism may be its principle in religious institutions; and Episcopacy will assuredly not wax rampant upon stipends of £250 a-year. But Church fees, of which we hear, are as objectionable in principle as tithes. An Independent and a Methodist minister have gone out; and one of them is to open a school of the better sort, or boarding academy. Schemes, upon rather a wide scale, for ensuring universal and good education, are, we are told, in progress; and a newspaper, though not, it would appear, printed in the colony, was established for its use, or to promote and advocate its interests. This opens up a dark chapter. Party spirit of the worst sort seems to reign with the utmost rancour in all these colonies; but especially in South Australia. This much appears, even from the very cautious statements of Mr Gouger, the Secretary of the Colony. He owns—

Our society is at present mixed and disjointed. That it should be mixed is no wonder, as the desire to emigrate is produced by so many causes, varying in different persons, according to their circumstances and habits. Society can be found here, therefore, of almost any kind, even from the very degraded, up to the most refined and gentlemanly. Of these two classes, and the many intermediate shades, I am glad to assure you that the great preponderance is in favour of the intellectual and good; and there can be no doubt that the evil passions of the badly inclined would not have appeared in such strong relief, had they not been encouraged by the only newspaper which the province at present possesses.

One party of the colonists, the dominant party, are about to establish another paper; but their protest against the organ which turned traitor to the views of the Commissioners, and the interest of the great Company, is far from satisfactory. The protesters, beginning with Mr Gouger himself, are nearly all official men. They complain that "the great and leading principles of the colony have scarcely been alluded to; while points which, for the interest of all concerned, should have been touched upon but slightly, have been brought prominently forward; that, instead of such accounts of the soil, climate, harbours, and other natural features of the country, as could have been honestly made, and, if made, would have encouraged emigration, and given confidence to the numerous and wealthy proprietors resident in England, partial and garbled articles have been inserted, and investments in land discouraged rather than advocated." This, with "anonymous calumnies" in every number, on public men, and so forth, finishes the charge against a print which, probably, told more truth than was at all times convenient, and perhaps not in the mildest way. It would, however, ill become us to condemn this unseen journal, as, even upon the shewing of the Secretary himself, and other eloquent advocates and trumpeters of the colony, we should be inclined, to a justifiable extent, to follow its example; and, at least, to urge upon persons of capital, and especially upon labourers contemplating emigration to South Australia, the most strict preliminary inquiries, and the utmost circumspection. Of the older settlements, it is so far satisfactory that we know the very worst; while their resources are only beginning to be developed. In point of morals, the grand point, South Australia, we fear, very much resembles all new colonies. If none of its inhabitants have been transported, some of them, according to Mr Gouger, have richly deserved that distinction.

The heat of the climate in the new settlement, is an irremediable and permanent drawback upon the happiness of life, admitting its superior fertility. Nothing can atone for the winged and crawling plagues of such a region, when added to the unavoidable discomforts attending every new society. The high price of land will be of less consideration to many, though the difference between 8s., the price in New South Wales, and 9s. in Van Dieman's Land, and £1, in this colony, is an important matter to small capitalists. To labourers, the high price of provisions and clothing, which, though it may be only temporary, and must give way if the colony thrive, is also a serious matter, in choosing a place of permanent residence. The narrow field offered to the industry of handicraftsmen by a small population, is another capital objection. Half a dozen tailors too many, for instance, would, in Adelaide, glut the tailor-market, reduce wages, and occasion great hardship to the craft. It appears to us that there is impropriety, if not wilful and cruel delusion, in the hopes which the Commissioners, and the Company, and other colonial companies hold out to working-men. In a series of letters published by, we believe, the local agent of the Commissioners, in The Stirling Observer, and reprinted as a pamphlet, and one, by the way, containing many fallacious and highly-coloured representations of the new colony, we see that "a free passage is offered to all sorts of agricultural labourers, shepherds, bakers, blacksmiths, braziers, tinmen, smiths, shipwrights, boat-builders, coopers, carriers, farriers, millwrights, harnessmakers, boot and shoemakers, tailors, tanners, brickmakers, and all persons employed in the erection of houses, and their wives." Now, say that, of the working-men of Great Britain and Ireland, only twenty in each of the above callings, with their wives and a child or two each, should volunteer for the paradise of South Australia, the accounts of which must unsettle the minds and excite the imaginations of tens of thousands, what would be the immediate consequence? Their numbers would at once about double the population, which is still considerably under 3000; provisions, which are nearly all imported, and already very high-priced, would rise, and there would not be full employment, save for the labourers, and a few handicraftsmen. What would become of all the superfluous bakers, tailors, glaziers, plumbers, harnessmakers, &c. &c. landed at once, not in a country like America, or even like the other Australian settlements, where employment may be found in one place if not in another? The best that could be hoped, would be converting handicraftsmen, for a time, and probably a long time, into indifferent labourers, and with slender pay. This state of things is not likely to exist, for it is impossible that the Commissioners and the Company's agents can permit emigration to an extent ruinous to the emigrants. They will undoubtedly check the numbers, and apportion the callings of the applicants to the real wants of the colony; but why send abroad, under their sanction, those delusory general invitations to all kinds of workmen? The letters in the Stirling newspaper drew the favourable attention of Mr Hutt, (then the agent for emigration, and one of the Commissioners,) who offered some correction of trifling errors in "these able statements," which were accordingly, we are informed, adopted by the publisher in the pamphlet alluded to. The Letters were published in the spring (February or March) of last year, when almost nothing could be satisfactorily known of the success of the colony. We extract but one or two sentences. After complimenting Mr Edward Gibbon Wakefield and Colonel Torrens, as originating the scheme, and pointing out the natural as well as the moral defects of New South Wales as a settlement, the writer, in eulogizing the new colony, continues—

Here also, by a happy coincidence, the two indentations of Spencer's and St Vincent's Gulfs, extending far into the interior, open up a large extent of fine land to water communication; and across the offing, Kangaroo Island stretches about 100 miles in length, abounding with excellent salt, surrounded by seas the most favourable for the black whale fishery, and with harbours and every adaptation for commerce. Such is the situation selected for a great experiment, the complete success of which has constituted an epoch in the history of colonization. This statement we propose to verify by an account of the progress and present state and advantages of South Australia, in our next.

What dependence can rational men place in the statements of a writer who thus early represents the experiment as already made—nay, a year or fifteen months ago, as attended with "complete success?" Again, it is said—

The first years of colonies have often been those of hardship and disaster; but even the earliest accounts from the settlers of South Australia have uniformly spoken in so lively a style of the unusual concurrence of favourable circumstances, that we propose in the sequel to lay before our readers extracts from their published correspondence, as the best means of realizing the picture of the little sylvan community; but, in the meantime, we shall proceed to explain the arrangements for encouraging and facilitating emigration.

Here details are given; and the statement concludes with this significant warning, "But from the great increase in the value of land in the colony, it is quite possible that these terms may be advanced."

We will ensure settlers, at a small rate, against a rise in the price of rural land for several years to come. A few extracts of letters are given by the Stirling writer—the principal ones, we see, written by the same gentlemen-settlers who are among the protesters against the blabbing newspaper. A few of these we select, that the reader may compare them with Mr Gouger's select correspondence. Mr Brown, the agent for emigration, had not long landed, when he wrote in high confidence. The Deputy-Surveyor-General is equally pleased. These gentlemen far transcend Mr Gouger in admiration of the beauties and capabilities of the colony; but a Mr Morphet—who went to act as agent for the absentee proprietors, who in London had "bought a pig in a sack," either to sell again with large profits, or to fatten, if that were found more profitable—is in ecstasy. He writes in February 1837, from Glenelg, a second township, of which little is now heard, and which is probably not progressing with much rapidity:—

Since I last wrote to you, many and great have been the improvements which we have made in this land of our adoption. I have no doubt of the success of our colony. Our flocks and herds are on the increase—merchandise are forwarded to our shores; the Commissioners in England send us well-selected, steady, and industrious labourers. The residents at Sydney, Hobart Town, and Launceston, not only approve of our plans, but will aid us, and many will join us as emigrants; and I hope the day is not far distant when the produce of our lands and pastures will be found in the marts of the mother country. It is almost impossible to speculate on the value which a few years will fix upon our land. Many who purchased from mere speculation, will find that their property will become a permanent support for themselves and families. The land on the eastern coast of St Vincent's Gulf, appears of the most beautiful and fertile character; and our sheep-runs, in the neighbourhood of Adelaide, will be extensive and of good quality. In a commercial position we shall be well situated, and the navigation of St Vincent's Gulf is very favourable. In a few years South Australia will be of great agricultural and commercial importance; and the principles upon which this colony has been founded, will spread to settlements already established, and many more which England will find it her interest to form and encourage. This is the country for a small capitalist, with sober and industrious habits. His family, which in England is oftentimes an incumbrance, will be a fortune here; and he will attain a rank in society, which in England is rarely attainable. To the ladies of our colony we are much indebted, for the good humour and forbearance with which they bear the few inconveniences incidental to the life of a first settler. After the exertions of the day, we have the pleasures of society and conversation; and the delight which we feel in such reunions is not surpassed by English entertainments. Many of the ladies in England, who feel qualms at emigrating, would not hesitate to join us, if they knew how small a sacrifice is made for future prosperity.

At this period, the colony did not amount in all to 1200 persons. In May 1837, another settler writes from Adelaide:—

"The town is situated in an extremely beautiful spot, and, perhaps, as lovely a one as any in the world. The situation is highly salubrious, and the climate most delightful. The harbour equals the London docks, and I am quite satisfied will be a most flourishing place of business in a few years. The country is tolerably woody, but sometimes there are plains of ten or twenty miles extent, almost without trees, and having every appearance of park land, with splendid soil. The voyage has been very agreeable with nearly all the ships that have come here. The climate far surpasses France—there are no creatures to injure you. There is already very good society, and the colony advances rapidly. I pronounce it will soon be one of the finest in the world, if those to whom the development of the principles are intrusted do their duty and carry out the instructions of the Act of Parliament." The Immigration agent, in another letter, dated May last, says—"We have now had nearly seven months of colonization. A finer climated country cannot be in the world."

I have hitherto been living in my tent, and have found no inconvenience from the exposure to the weather, excepting a profusion of dust in dry and windy weather, and a little chilliness in the clear and cool evenings. Yet, even now, though so near our Christmas, we have weather more like the fine days of our early autumn, than anything like winter. Beautiful plants and flowers are springing up constantly, and we have had such a succession of them, that scarcely a day passes but some one brings us another new flower. A very important subject for congratulation is, that we had no disturbance with the natives. I frequently go to sleep with fifty of them lying within ten yards of my tent, without a moment's suspicion, on either side, and without losing a wink of sleep. They are superior to the Sydney and Van Dieman's Land blacks, both in appearance and intelligence. My temporary house is putting up.

One letter contains a statement to which we entirely subscribe—"In this colony, every one is making a very large profit who has anything to sell." That is, of course, anything useful, or, especially, that will eat. This person, Mr Stephen Hack, soon afterwards went to Launceston to purchase bullocks, which, when the colony must have been considerably under 2,000 (in October 1837) he says, were required "by the butchers at Adelaide to the number of sixty a-week," weighing 640 lbs. each, and selling at 1s. a lb. At all events, the colonists must, in those days, have been well off in the article of beef; for here is about 19 lbs. a-week each, over head, to man, woman, and child, besides fish, kangaroos, cockatoos, wild ducks, quails, wild turkeys, pork, and salt provisions. Mr Hack says he could purchase and import these bullocks at from £14 to £15 a-head; so, at sixty a week—supposing Peter Cooke's employer had part of the business—he was driving a good trade. "Cattle," he adds, "pay better than sheep in South Australia;" and so they must, while stock is wanted, and while milk sells at 10d. a-quart, and fresh butter at 3s. a-pound. Yet, if any one be tempted by the immense profits of Mr Hack, we would implore him to consider their very precarious basis. The Scotch are too shrewd, the English too considerate a people to pin their faith to the statements of these heralds of the new colony; but credulous individuals, here and there, may, nevertheless, be their dupes.

Unless the Commissioners and the Company lay aside some of their magnificent theories of creating a system of agriculture all at once, and by their mighty fiat, like that of Norfolk or East Lothian, though on a far grander scale, they will retard the advancement of the settlement. Where labour is so dear, no capitalist will trouble himself much about agriculture, while his profits are larger, and his trouble less, in raising sheep. Whence, then, is the colony to be fed, if it is to have none of those useful pioneers of agriculture in every new country, yeomen labouring with their families upon very small farms, which are their own property; raising provisions for the neighbouring market, and, at the same time, in their children, a race of hardy and skilful husbandmen?

The omnipotent Commissioners might, at least, have secured a peasant's potato-garden upon each allotment. As it is, the agricultural labourer who can obtain a free passage to one of the other colonies, in which he may look forward to investing very small savings profitably in land—to New South Wales, where he may at this moment obtain as much land for £20 as he can in South Australia for £80, and where there is no restriction as to the size of allotments, nor interference with his rights and management—would be an egregious fool to go to South Australia. We are, however, quite in the dark as to the restrictions imposed by the Commissioners; though, unless a man purchasing one section, or 80 acres, or two sections, 160 acres, or whatever it may be, is tied up from dividing his freehold, either by sale or bequest, there must soon be plenty of small farms, as in the other colonies, and, moreover, very dear small farms.

To conclude this long paper:—For the interests of absentee proprietors—viz., capitalists in this country, speculating upon land at the other side of the globe, buying, as we have said, a pig in a sack, either to fatten or to sell at a high profit—we are not particularly solicitous. They can afford to let their capital lie dormant for a time, or even to lose it, if need be; but we would earnestly warn all persons meditating emigration to Australia, whether labourers, tradesmen, or small capitalists, and more especially those having families, to be on their guard against fallacious statements and direct perversions of the truth to promote selfish interests. Every one of those colonies has its jobbers, advocates, and trumpeters; and they all exaggerate, though none, just at present, carry the propensity so far as the individuals connected with South Australia. That colony may become, in time, all that it is said to be already; but, again and again, we would urge that very little is known about it. The colonists themselves have given up some of their first high-flown notions. It was intended at first to settle on Kangaroo Island, which was then the terrestrial paradise; but that idea was properly abandoned, upon farther inspection of the place.

The whale fishery has hitherto failed, though it may yet succeed. Harbours that were believed the best in the world have been found dangerous, and valuable lives have been lost in attempting to verify the rash conjectures of sanguine individuals.* The fact, that the province is not liable to the same parching droughts which have often proved most injurious to the older settlement, is not verified. The experiment, instead of "complete success," has not, in anyone branch, been fairly made. In adducing facts, we have not looked to the darkest side of the picture. We have, indeed, seen nothing on the dark side, save by reflection in the admissions or inadvertences of the colonial advocates. We by no means despair of any of the colonies. Yet we should think small capitalists, with families, thoughtless and rash who adventured to this one. The land there will not fly away—nay, the land will not rise in price for a long while; and the more matured settlements will be a safe step taken in advance towards the Southern or Western Goshen, to those who desire safely to establish a family, and on narrow means. To those commercial adventurers and land-jobbers—those who are always ready to hazard desperate costs to sweep large stakes—we have nothing to say. Such characters, and sharks of a still lower description, are never wanting in new settlements where there is money going.

Since the above was written, certain letters and paragraphs in The Times newspaper, have drawn forth a statement from Colonel Torrens, the Chairman of the South Australian Commissioners. We conceive it best to publish the whole correspondence, that the subject may at once be brought under the view of our readers, many of whom, in this quarter, are deeply interested in the fortunes of emigrants who can hardly yet have reached the colony.

FROM "THE TIMES" OF 25TH OCTOBER.—
CITY ARTICLE.

These journals [the Sydney papers] contain extracts from the South Australian papers. That colony is represented in an unfavourable light, and the Sydney writers observe that they are disposed to think that "colonization bubble" would burst ere long. The colony, it is asserted, was a prey to "jobbers" both there and at home; the "officials" out there were imitating their betters here in a "small way," by "jobbing in pork, to the injury of the settlers, who are subjected to a competition in the market by those who ought to support instead of oppose their interests." The same "officials," too, it appears, were all out of sorts among themselves, "assaulting each other, retiring or being dismissed from office." Altogether, the settlement seemed in a very confused state. In the meantime, the colonists were carefully advised from England that "£200 could readily be obtained here [in London] for a preliminary land order, and £50 for a town section." This, of course, kept up the spirit of land-jobbing in the colony, as probably intended, and, not to be behindhand, an account is given of the sale of a country-section there of 134 acres for £1000, being, however, situate "close to the town on the northern bank of the river, has a frontage to the proposed road to the harbour, is very excellent land, and one of the most valuable sections in the colony," a sort of description which would seem to shew that the mode of setting out things to the best advantage was as well understood there as here. These statements, it may be observed, must be admitted with a certain qualification, as probably exaggerated by the feeling of jealousy with which the new colony was regarded at Sydney.

The Goshawk, chartered by the South Australian Company, had arrived at Nepean Bay, on the 14th of May, from Hamburg, which she left in December, and the Downs on the 4th of January. She had on board two passengers only, and the servants of the company. The cargo consisted of "provisions only," it was emphatically remarked.

FROM "THE TIMES" OF THE 1ST NOVEMBER.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—Your paper of the 25th instant, contains two valuable pieces of information on the schemes of our colonization-mongers—the one on South Australia, under your city article, and the other on New Zealand. The unfavourable accounts from the former place must be very alarming to every well-wisher of his country people, whether approving or disapproving of the piracy of other people's land either by his own people or by the autocrat of Russia. Permit me to claim insertion for the following extracts from a letter I have received from South Australia: to the veracity of the writer I pledge myself.
D. L. N.

"Adelaide-town, June 2, 1838.—This colony continues an uproar; the officials are quarrelling and fighting amongst themselves, whilst the emigrants are nearly starving. It is true the land has been allotted, but the officials here hold so many of the best pieces of land that no further progress has been made. The expense, delay, and difficulty of clearing new land has caused the other (that possessed by the officials) to be sold at £150 to nearly £300 per acre; nor is the climate or land so good as was represented to us in London, indeed nearly barren, and never can pay the time, labour, and expense of cultivation; in this we were most grossly deceived in London, and glad indeed would many be to get back to their native country, even to a 'potato and salt.' Many of the agriculturists have spent their means in waiting for the allotments, and 'whilst the grass grows must starve.' All necessities here are exceedingly dear, indeed four times the price in England, and, as it is all exported, we must submit to the unfair competition of the officials, who, instead of attending to their duties, are speculating for themselves. The Company is the bane here, for by their means of buying up necessities for an outrageous profit, we shall soon have spent all our money, and be reduced to labourers on their lands. I can give you no idea of the infamous proceedings here of the various persons connected with authority; and, as to the 'allotments,' it is a mere farce, a 'jobbing,' like your companies in England. We are reduced to entire dependence on these persons; where it will end I cannot say, but I hope our countrymen will not be deceived to come out here, however advantageous it may be to the company and to the colonists. My own occupation enables me to be indifferent, in a pecuniary view, to all these things; but I cannot look coldly on the misery which awaits the people here, grossly deceived in every respect, and ill-used and abused."

FROM "THE TIMES" OF NOVEMBER 8TH.

To the Editor of the Times.

SIR,—The Directors of this Company once more deviate from their custom of disregarding anonymous letters in newspapers, to relieve intending settlers in South Australia, or the friends of persons already there, from alarm, in consequence of the unfounded statements of "D. L. N." in your paper of the 1st instant.

The accompanying letter from her Majesty's Colonization Commissioners merely states authenticated facts.

The charges against the Company are beneath notice when the assertions of "jobbing in allotments" can be tested by another fact—viz., that the orders of choice were decided by lot, and the selections made from upwards of 100,000 acres.

Requesting the favour of the insertion of the present letter, and that from the Commissioners, I am, Sir, your most obedient servant.

E. J. WHEELER, Manager.

19, Bishopsgate Street within, Nov. 7.

* A gloom was cast over the infant colony by the melancholy loss of its Supreme Judge, Sir John Jeffcott, and Captain Blenkinsop, and part of the crew of a whale-boat, in an attempt to explore the harbour of Encounter Bay, and the entrance of the Murray River.

"South Australian Colonization Office, Adelphi Terrace, Nov. 5, 1838.

"Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, representing that the Directors of the South Australian Company are desirous that the Colonization Commissioners should reply to a letter signed 'D. L. N.,' which appeared in The Times of the 1st inst., and which states that the soil of South Australia could produce nothing, and that the people were nearly starving.

"In reply, I beg to observe, that, after the multitude of authentic letters which have been received from South Australia, from persons who are of known respectability, and who all concur in representing the condition of the working people as most prosperous, and in confirming the original statement of Captain Sturt, that, in the neighbourhood of Gulf St Vincent, Lake Alexandrina, and the Murray, the land is of the richest quality, the Commissioners are of opinion that it has become unnecessary to reply to counter-statements put forth by anonymous writers in this country upon nameless authority in the colony; nevertheless, the Commissioners will be ever ready to communicate to the South Australian Company and to the public all the information respecting the state and progress of the colony which they may from time to time receive. The latest accounts from South Australia are confirmatory of its rapid prosperity. Despatches have been received from the resident Commissioner, dated May 23, stating that the Lord Goderich, the Canton, and the Trusty, had arrived at Port Adelaide with 382 emigrants; and that mechanics, before they had time to get on shore, were offered work at 14s. a-day. Despatches have also been received from Governor Hindmarsh, dated June 12, by which it appears that 200 of the working people had purchased amongst them a rural section of 134 acres in the neighbourhood of Adelaide for £1000, in order that they might build their own houses on their own land. When high wages can be paid for labour in a country which produces nothing, and when people almost starving can purchase land with their surplus earnings, than the statements of 'D. L. N.' may be worthy of regard. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT TORRENS,
Chairman of the Commission.

To E. J. Wheeler, Esq.

We do not mean to comment on the above. That the whole land is nearly barren, is obviously nonsense, and the manner of selling it seems perfectly fair. There may, indeed, be ruinous delays in a place where provisions are so dear as quickly to exhaust a small capital. The purchase made by the 200 workmen, of £5 worth of land each, on which to build houses, is so far gratifying; but The Times, city article points out the true cause of the high price of this rural land, in its quality and favourable situation. Next to the labouring people getting small farms and beginning to raise provisions for the market of Adelaide, the above must be satisfactory as to the prospects of working men in the colony. Still, for this class, the most satisfactory statement that could be published by the Commissioners, is, how much wheat and potatoes, &c., have been grown last year; how cheap are bread, beef, mutton, butter, milk, shoes, &c. &c., become. Colonel Torrens cannot mean that all, or nearly all, the mechanics on board the transports were offered 14s. a-day;* but that sum, in the present state of the colony, would be required by the artisans who have emigrated, though it should impoverish, if not ruin the agricultural settlers. In The Liverpool Albion we see loud complaints of the colony, and an earnest warning to working-men; while Colonel Torrens' letter has produced a reply in The Times of the 10th, signed T. H. B., in which the old story is reiterated, and alarming new facts brought forward. T. H. B. does not believe in "jobbing" in the sale of lands, but he avers that there is great difficulty in getting possession; and, to many settlers, delay must be injurious, if not fatal. He inquires of Mr Wheeler whether "a large proportion of the cattle of the colony have not died from a disease called the 'rotten horn,' for which no cause save the soil can be assigned, and for which no remedy has hitherto been discovered?—and whether this circumstance, together with the price of mechanical labour, has not reduced several persons who emigrated with £2,000 or £3,000, to the condition of day-labourers?"

Although there may be exaggerations in the statements on both sides, there is more than enough, in the circumstances of the colony, to justify our exhortations to full and deliberate inquiry. If the Commissioners, and those interested in the welfare of the colony, wish to retain public confidence, they ought not only to liberalize their scheme, but to shew, by specific statements, and not vague and general assurances, that it is the interest of emigrants to go in preference to South Australia.

* It is said that 14s. a-day is offered mechanics. If the Commissioners will assure mechanics of 7s. or 5s. a-day, and the necessities of life at a moderate price, or the rates of England, then we shall be glad to see thousands embark for the new colony. We at this moment know of a Scotsman, a cooper, in Hobart Town, who emigrated at his own cost about five years ago, and who writes home to his relations that he can make a guinea a-day; and many days he may have made a guinea. In the first eighteen months, he comfortably maintained a wife and three children, and saved £70, which might still purchase a small farm, if he could not put his money to better use where interest is so high. But would any one advise a legion of coopers, or any one cooper, to go to Hobart Town in the expectation of earning as much? Certainly not. If, however, the choice lay between Sydney, Hobart Town, Adelaide, or Perth, we know the advice we could conscientiously give.

FALLEN FLOWERS.

OUR child is dead!—strew o'er her grave
The fairest flowers;
Emblems of hope she vainly gave
Of brighter hours.
I'll watch them while their bloom can give
A passing breath,
And think our child, while yet they live,
Sleeps not in death!

But see!—their forms already fade
Beneath mine eye!—
Thus all things beautiful are made
To bloom and die.
Fair child! fair flowers! how tranquilly
Ye pass away!
Would I could thus unconsciously
Death's call obey!

THE ANNUALS FOR 1839.

THE KEEPSAKE.

THIS Annual, with the sweet old English name, appears for 1839 with more than its usual elegance and excellence. The plates are all good; but a few are choice. The Countess Guiccioli, not the natural "buxom parlour boarder" of past years, but a bit of exquisite art, forms the frontispiece. Is it Leigh Hunt, or Dr Granville, in his "Spas of Germany," who has disenchanted or desecrated the Guiccioli?—or how comes it that of her we are inclined to say—"Get thee to a nunnery, if thou seekest to retain thy lingering empire over the imagination and the feelings." Chalon has exerted himself to do justice to the languishing, conscious beauty, made up for having her picture painted; and the plate is most delicately engraved. Still, something in better taste might have been hit upon for the prominent design in a work of this nature; and this Beauty we consider the sole blemish of an otherwise perfect annual. The vignette, The Corsair's Isle, is light and lovely, as if touched with a feather from Ariel's wing. There are several charming landscapes, and some beautiful characteristic groups—Maida being one, and The Bridesmaid another. But the charm of the volume, in a pictorial view, is Mary Danvers; a sweet, open-faced, real-looking little girl, in an easy, natural attitude, and with the happiest expression. This charming print illustrates a tale such as is rare in annuals from the pen of young M.P.'s. It is written by Mr Bernal, in a very pleasing and unaffected style; and inculcates a cheerful, though deep and sound moral, in shewing the true and sure foundation of human happiness to be the love and the power of doing good. The Reefer will, however, be permanently the favourite plate in the volume. It is designed by Chalon. It will explain its character and excellence to say, that, on turning it up, unknowing what was meant, the instant idea was—the soul of Nelson is looking through the face of that boy! It is indeed impossible to mistake the expression of that intense look-out, which yet has something dreary in it; "looking as if it looked at something" beyond that weltering sea and those calm heavens.

The plate is gracefully and happily described by Lord Nugent, in the story which he makes the old Foretop-gallant-yard, of the Seahorse tell about the Young Reefer. The Seahorse had just been launched. It was the Foretop-gallant-yard's first voyage, as well as that of the Reefer. Both were alike alive with joyous feelings of exultation and curiosity. It was when they had cleared Cape Finisterre that they first came into contact. "And never, now," quoth old Foretop-gallant-yard,—as sound a bit of timber as ever grew in a Norwegian forest—

"Can I see the sun sinking, as it then was, in glory, amid the fiery streaks of a dappled sky, but I associate the emblem with that acquaintance so begun; recalling all that belongs to it, I know not whether in mere affection, pride, or sorrow. It was then that one of the young gentlemen, who had been sent on board as supercargo at Chatham, and whose station was in the foretop, mounted for the first time the top-gallant-mast rigging, to view the Spanish land, lit up as it was by the last waning beam which shot level from the broad bosom of the Atlantic. And from that time forth, not a day passed during the voyage blow high, blow low, so that the ship could carry top-gallant-yards across, but the same risk was repeated morn and eve. The same small spar form clung to me, and gazed out upon the sea, as I were an embodied spirit of young Hope looking forth from a home of safety upon the futurities of life, as they lie smiling or rise contentious before him. Oh! many has been the bosom that has pressed itself closely to me, when the youngers were lying out to reef or stow the sail, or when some stripling was sent up aloft and alone, on duty, or perhaps penance. And, holding converse, as I have often done, with the beat of various feelings—sometimes the light upspringing of a careless and thoughtless exultation—sometimes the throb of a deep and silent sorrow, such as loads the heart from the hour when it bade its first and long farewell to those friends whom it had loved earliest and dearest, and to that home whose last glimpse, perchance, is fading in the distance—sometimes the high swelling of ambition, a yearning after some bright vision of glory, deeply pondered and fondly cherished: all this does make one familiar with the spirit, and almost with each particular thought, that moves and reigns within. But never, never did I feel a young breast rise with a prouder joy, than did that of this boy, on the day, about three weeks after our departure, when, for his activity and diligence in his duties, he found himself rated on the ship's books as a midshipman, a warrant officer in the service of Great Britain! And, for hours, even when not on watch or on other duty, when his meridian observations had been duly taken, and his log made up to noon, would he resume his old station aloft, sometimes perched upon the foretop-mast head, but oftener leaning with his chest across me, half-supported by his right arm. I see him now as in those young days he was—his left hand holding his day-glass, his feet swinging on the horse, but his countenance steady and eager, as it bent forward to sweep the horizon round. Was a landfall to be made?—or had his glass just confirmed the suggestion of his keen and ranging eye, and was he taking a last look, to fix the bearings of the object which it was his pride to have been the first of those on the look-out to discover, and was he preparing to glide quietly down the rigging to the deck, and there, touching his hat to the lieutenant of the watch, report to him that, "if he pleased," there was a strange sail hull down on the weather-bow? In memory I feel that throb still, though now for more than thirty years that heart—but I continue my tale.

We should also wish to continue this well-imagined, felicitous sketch of Nelson's early life, of the dawning of Nelson's spirit—but it must not be.

A lively story, turning upon the mutual inconveniences of a young lady and gentleman being both short-sighted, is written by the Hon. Edmund Phipps; and a tale of horror—"The Eve of All-Hallows"—by Lady Charlotte St Maur. Mrs Shelley has contributed a heroic tale of high-souled Greece, and some small poetical pieces. "The Prediction" is another good tale.

From a poetical and imaginative story or poem, in prose, entitled, "The Marriage of Sion," by Mr St John, we extract these flowing lines:—

WOMAN'S LOVE.

"Wherefore do we toil in youth?
 Wisdom grave, confess the truth.
 Wherefore dare the battle's strife,
 Deeming light of death or life?
 Wherefore haunt the Muses' spring,
 Or touch Apollo's golden string?
 Or, in some ancient turret grey,
 Charm the drowsy hours away,
 By the spell of learned page,
 Full of precepts quaint and sage?
 Wherefore watch the golden fires
 Wherewith Night her head attires,
 When, in silent state, she lies
 Above the cloudy, fretted skies?
 Wherefore in the crowded hall
 With mercenary fury brawl?
 Or in wrangling senate sit
 And brandish eloquence and wit,
 To fire the heroic breast with zeal
 Unshrinking for the commonweal?
 Wherefore thus, in youth and age,
 Fret we o'er this weary stage—
 But that, by the wedded hearth,
 The loveliest, holiest spot on earth,
 Woman's smile should meet our eyes,
 And gild with love our energies?
 This, this is all the golden spoil
 We seek in life's Olympic toil;
 And this, through wavering good or ill,
 The central power, attracts us still;
 We think, we climb, we soar, we rove,
 And all we ask is—Woman's love!"

But poetry, this year, is not the stronghold of "The Keepsake," unless it be such poetry in prose as we find in Mr St John's tale, and in "The Reefer." A comic sketch, full of Spanish national character, is entitled "The Two Blind Beggars of Segovia;" and Miss Sheridan has given a slight, though one of her most finished performances, in the sprightly journal of the time "When I was bridesmaid." With how much life it opens, describing the delightful social duty of acting as bridesmaid, as the womanly, affectionate way of being Second to a friend!—and how cleverly are female caprices and vanities, and those airy nothings, lovers' quarrels, depicted in the diary kept by the bridesmaid. There is a gleam of the hereditary spirit, of that which produced "The Rivals" and "The Duenna," in this gay effusion. It is not very quotable; but we must try one scene—premising that Mr Devereux and Miss Allingham are heartily in love; that the young lady has even passed the era of flirtation; and that the symptoms of the final stage, timidity in woman, triumph in her master—are apparent to the clear-sighted bridesmaid, when a flirting Spanish Don, and some slight pique at the lover, rouse the demon of coquetry in the lady's breast.

Wednesday, midnight.—The Spaniard has been here, and has just departed. I wish he had never come. He arrived soon after breakfast, and his manner shewed the perfect confidence in his own merits and appearance, which provokes my dislike in proportion to its extent and success. His singing, guitar-playing, valseing, sighing, and love-making, directed to Miss Allingham, have given her a fit of nonsense, and Mr Devereux a fit of angry jealousy. The bright complexion of the Englishman has been deepened with annoyance all day; and I did not think blue eyes could have flashed such lightnings as fell on the exquisite Don Raymon de Rivas. The Caballero saw and enjoyed the mischief occasioned by his gallantries; and dear, thoughtless Charlotte forgot all her recently acquired steadiness, and gave way to a foreign new flirtation, à bride abbath.

The large party in the country house, where the lovers and bridesmaid were upon a visit, had got up Tableaux for their amusement, and, among others, one termed the "Surprise;" or Beppo coming unexpectedly upon his wife attended by the Count. Charlotte personified Laura, and the Spanish Don her lover. He had previously asked Devereux's consent to take this delicate part. The bridesmaid did expect Mr Devereux to be angry; but matters were far beyond that point, and she became alarmed at the ominous calmness with which he said to Don Raymon—"You have my permission, sir, to enact any character with the lady which best suits her taste."

The Tableaux were succeeded by waltzing, and much tender nonsense between the new flirts, though both secretly watched the pale, stern, calm countenance of Devereux—the Spaniard from gratified vanity, Charlotte with the mixed feelings of triumph and apprehension. The bridesmaid was glad when the Don's carriage was announced. We resume the diary:—

Thursday.—The lovers do not speak; and I find both are too proud to be manageable by reasoning on their dissension. Charlotte had promised one of the guests a drawing of the Abbey for her album; but, being Spaniard, this morning she drew for her a contra-bandista, in a sombrero, the very image of Don Raymon de Rivas. The album-keeper, with the well-planned innocence of an envious country miss, instantly shewed it to Mr Devereux, adding the warmest commendation of Miss Allingham's power of drawing from memory. The same amiable person then asked Charlotte to sing; and, as the latter is always crazy about some new melody, she sung one of Don Raymon's valse-like songs, ending with the eternal "ya, ya, i!" which, in Spain, supplies the place of our "la, la, ra!" and the accompaniment she played in the disagreeable Spanish style, by striking the guitar strings backward with the nails, as the Caballero had taught her. More praises to Mr Devereux from the young country lady, as to Miss Allingham's quickness at learning music! In the evening Charlotte said she was too tired to valse, when our worthy host wanted her to join the others; so she played for us all the evening. Mr Devereux sat apart with a book; and no salutation passed as the party separated.

Friday.—This is our last morning at the Abbey, as Miss Allingham and I are to set out for London immediately after breakfast. Mr Devereux has always distinguished me by a most gratifying friendliness; and, as we happened to meet tête-à-tête before the others came down, I had almost succeeded in bringing back some of his good-humoured smiles. Alas! just as his brilliant teeth were displayed to reward my pains, we heard Charlotte's sweet voice singing in the conservatory, "Una parloma blanca," and she came valseing down through the flowers to its chorus, "tripili, trapala." I shall never forgive the Spaniards for inventing such stupid words; in fact, I shall hate this very pretty little song for ever, because it pushed down my castles, which were not built en Espagne. One of Miss Allingham's great charms, and which raises her so immeasurably above the women here, is her perfect gentleness of manner. Her style is completely unassuming—that sure criterion of good-breeding and good-sense; and her brilliant conversation flows on in a sweet, low tone, and perfect repose of demeanour, which contrasts delightfully with the "animated" country misses, whose active mirth only enlivens themselves. Great was my surprise, therefore, when the brother of our Miss Marplot having expressed a hope that "the gay foreigners in London would not make

Miss Allingham desert her English friends," she answered, in a sarcastic tone, that Englishmen were proverbially illiberal towards foreigners, through jealousy of their superior accomplishments; but English women, not having such a cause of jealousy, could do more justice to their advantages." She left the room on concluding this ill-chosen speech; and Mr Devereux, as he went into the library, favoured us with a parting comment, "that women were always taken with novelty and assurance; the worse the more agreeable."

London, Saturday.—The belligerents exchanged a very dignified farewell yesterday. Mr Devereux was evidently anxious in the morning to end their differences; but ill-judged pride caused him to part from Charlotte almost as a stranger; while the latter, whose quivering lip betrayed to me her feelings at their separation in displeasure, chose to express her longing "to hear again the rattle of the dear London pavement." We all shrink from the obloquy of being thought unfeeling; yet, when we feel the most, do we not affect levity to veil it? And generally so successfully, that we are disliked for what we seem, rather than pitied for what we are. Ere we left the Abbey, I went into the library to replace a book, and found Mr Devereux alone writing. He requested me to take the charge of his letter to his sister, the Marquesa, with whom he was desirous I should become acquainted. "I have urged her to be very intimate with Char—with Miss Allingham," he added, in an uncertain tone; "at my sister's house there will be an opportunity of confirming her Spanish taste, or of seeing through the imposing glitter of their manners."

"The latter is sure to be the result," I replied, "and then you will come to town. Remember you have been rather rigid and unyielding in this trifling matter, to which opposition has given false importance." "When she is quite convinced of her present mistake, I will but too gladly visit London," he answered. "May I trust to your warm-hearted nature to watch over my interest, and let me know when the happy hour arrives?" I could not help assenting; and he bestowed upon me all the "dear, charming, noble, amiable, superior" epithets, with which lovers laud an obliging confidante—and thus we parted.

As we drove past the library, I discovered, over the wire-blinds, the richly-clustered chestnut hair of Mr Devereux, who had forgotten that his towering height would betray the watcher of our movements; and I certainly saw a white handkerchief passed across the eyes of the proud offended lover. His indignant fair one kept her head averted from the house; but the bouquet in her hand received heavier and warmer drops than ever before fell on its blossoms. If, instead of being attached, these two people had hated each other, the rules of society would have exacted the most scrupulous good-breeding. It is only hearts kindly enough for deep affection, that make each other completely miserable.

The sister of Devereux, the Marquesa, was married to a Spanish nobleman; and, accordingly, all the caballeros in London frequented her house on her tertulia nights. There Miss Allingham took more lessons in Spanish manners or affectations, to the infinite provocation of her friend, the intending bridesmaid. One evening, when, attired in the Spanish costume, Charlotte employed the usual high-flown complimentary phrases of that nation, and played off the pretty fan-exercise, and other airs of a Spanish belle, the lively English bridesmaid cried—"How ill you play those castanets!—the rule is to execute, with three fingers, what is termed 'a turn' on the piano, and then clic-clac your single notes to complete each bar." To shew la belle that she was imperfect in her Spanish affectations, I exhibited my own skill on those spirit-stirring pieces of ebony; and the Spaniards, who have extraordinary national conceit, were more pleased than if I had displayed an accomplishment really requiring genius, but not originating in their country. The beau seated at Miss Allingham's feet, paid me some extravagant compliments. My Tableaux acquaintance, Don Raymon, left a group of young men, to salute me, with—" Señoritas a los pies de usted." And he called to his mustachioed friends; and all the world hastened to the feet of an English lady who was as accomplished as a Madridena! The caballeros did her universal homage.

Miss Allingham's especial flirt was Don Christoval de Cebada, a nephew of the Marquesa. It was he who was now seated on a cushion at Charlotte's feet; and, being summoned to sing, without changing his sentimental position, he took a guitar, and sang an impassioned air at the lady, who, though she afterwards waltzed, in the Spanish style, with all the Dons, still returned to Christoval. The bridesmaid thought of her absent favourite, Mr Devereux. She feared that the wily Marquesa, who had become quite foreign in her manners, was encouraging her husband's Spanish nephew at the expense of her English brother; for Charlotte was an heiress. We resume the bridesmaid's journal. Her office seemed far enough off now, unless she had consented to be Charlotte's second, with the Don for bridegroom.

14th June.—Charlotte's mania is becoming worse than ever. At the first tertulia I attended, she had only adopted the mantilla-veil and high comb; but last night she wore also the basquina robe, with deep flounces of black fringe, nearly to the waist, fit only for a Bolero dancer. Her fan was flourished most intelligibly among the caballeros, (I could not help saying they followed it as dray-horses do the whip,) and as each approached she began with—" ¡Ahurr!" or "Ahi," and I requested she would speak to me at least in our native tongue; but she turned to the handsome de Cebada, and, exclaiming, "Ahi! Christoval, que barbaridad!" valsed off in his arms.

The bridesmaid in this extremity resolved neither to give up her friend, lose her lilac satin gown, nor yet wear it in the Spanish Ambassador's chapel; so she summoned the lover to town. He came not; and Charlotte, after dismissing Don Christoval, still flirted with the eternal caballeros, each in turn. She said she had refused Don Christoval, because, though only tolerated for his nationality, he had carried it too far, by partaking of an ollapodrida, after she had anathematized garlic! Such an act of treason the admired belle could not forgive. She added, that every one of these young men, notwithstanding their court breeding, had, on intimacy, evinced some vulgarity or coarseness which revolted her habits of refinement. Don Geronimo was slovenly all the morning; Pepé she had seen take liqueur before dinner; Jayme could not live without a cigar; Raymon's gallantry was obtrusive; Antonio used snuff, and could scarce spell his own romantic name. The bridesmaid saw, by these mighty causes of disgust, that the Spanish mania was nearly over, and that, if Mr Devereux would only appear, an hour or two might clear up the misunderstanding. She continues her diary on July 1; the season wearing fast away, and no wedding approaching.

This morning I expressed to Miss Allingham my extreme pleasure that she would not marry Don Christoval. "Marry! I shall never marry any one," she said, in her gentle tone.

"And why not, Charlotte? You have too much heart, under this slight surface of coquetry, to pass through life without an attachment." [A long conversation ensues, the bridesmaid concluding,] "I am sure, if Mr Devereux were here, he and I"—

"But he is not here," she interrupted, in a gentle yet proud tone; "and be so good as not to renew this subject."

The bridesmaid was, nevertheless, encouraged. When the lover chose to put off magnificent, and act the rational, there were very good hopes of tears, reconciliation, a wedding, and bridesmaids in primrose satin—but, alas!

July 18.—All my hope of being second, as I wished, is less probable than ever! Would that all the Don Christovals, Pepés, Geronimos, Raymons, and Antonios were back again!—for there is a new hidalgo arrived this week, in whom I see more peril than in all the other flirtations fifty times multiplied by fifty.

This paragon of Spain was tall, stately, with teeth of pearly English whiteness, though he had jet black hair, and an olive complexion, but also very bright, blue eyes;—in brief, he was, at all points, a perfect cavalier. The bridesmaid was half in love with him herself, though loving a foreigner passed her comprehension. It must be so maddening to an English damsel, she thinks, to hear them come out with "my sol," and "my loaf." The blue eyes of Don Pasquale must reveal the mystery to the reader, which neither Charlotte nor her second could penetrate. The Marquesa had aided in her brother's plot, as if inspired by the genius for intrigue of a native Spanish woman; and Charlotte, severely tested, came pure through the ordeal. Before July was out, the bridegroom placed a signet-ring on the bridesmaid's finger, with the motto, "Muchas gracias!" which his kind voice uttered with affectionate emphasis. He asked Charlotte, "could she not repeat it?" But bridal disobedience commenced with her translating it into "Many Thanks," as she embraced her Second.

And so ends this lively story, which has a double claim upon English gentlemen—first, as lords of the creation, "superior men," bound by this very superiority to be indulgent to the foibles of fond, weak, coquettish women; and, secondly, as pure ENGLISH CLAYS, superior to the men of every other nation, whether as lovers, husbands, or anything else.

THE DIADÉM; A BOOK FOR THE BOUDOIR.

This splendid, new, "first-class" Annual is edited by Miss L. H. Sheridan, who formerly superintended "The Comic Annual," which she has dropped. The plates are of the ordinary character and style of the annualse, and the literary contents a sort of miscellaneous scrap-book or album, furnished by persons of quality and fashion, dead and alive. The work may interest that particular class, and thus may make its fortune; otherwise, we should not be sanguine as to the success of this competitor in a field in which, to say truth, there is now little room. The editress complains of bad health, and the loss of valued friends—and the appeal will have its weight. Mr Campbell has contributed a ballad, of which the subject is an affecting trait in the life of Napoleon, which may have been true. As a favourable specimen of the Diademic poetry, here it is:—

NAPOLÉON AND THE BRITISH SAILOR.

- "I love contemplating, apart
From all his homicidal story,
The traits that soften to our heart
Napoleon's glory.
- "'Twas when his banners at Boulogne,
Arm'd in our island every freeman,
His navy chanced to capture one Poor British seaman.
- "They suffered him, I know not how,
Unprisoned on the shore to roam;
And aye was bent his youthful brow
On England's home.
- "His eye, methinks, pursued the flight
Of birds, to Britain, half-way over,
With envy; they could reach the white,
Dear cliffs of Dover!
- "A stormy midnight watch, he thought,
Than this sojourn would have been dearer,
If but the storm his vessel brought To England nearer!
- "At last, when care had banished sleep,
He saw one morning—dreaming—doting,
An empty hoghead, on the deep
Come shoreward floating!
- "He hid it in a cave, and wrought
The live-long day—laborious—lurking,
Until he launched a tiny boat
By mighty working!
- "Heaven help us! 'twas a thing beyond
Description—such a wretched wherry
Perhaps ne'er ventured on a pond
Or crossed a ferry.
- "For ploughing in the salt sea field
'Twould make the very boldest shudder;]
Untarr'd—uncompass'd—and unkeel'd—
No sail!—no rudder!
- "From neighbouring woods he interlaced
His sorry skiff with wattled willows,
And thus equipped he would have passed
The foaming billows!
- "The French guard caught him on a beach—
His little argo sorely jeering;
Till tidings of him came to reach Napoleon's hearing.
- "With folded arms Napoleon stood,
Serene alike in peace or danger;
And in his wonted attitude
Addressed the stranger:—
- "'Rash youth! that wouldst yon channel pass,
With twigs and staves so rudely fashioned,
Thy heart with some sweet English lass
Must be impassioned?'"
- "'I have no sweetheart,' said the lad;
'But—absent years from one another—
Great was the longing that I had
To see my mother.'"
- "'And so thou shalt!' Napoleon said,
'Ye've both my favour justly won;
A noble mother must have bred
So brave a son.'
- "He gave the tar a piece of gold;
And, with a flag of truce, commanded
He should be shipped to England old,
And safely landed.

"Our sailor oft could scantily shift
To find a dinner plain and hearty;
But never changed the coin and gift
Of Buonaparte."

As a thing more likely to interest our readers than the transcripts from old commonplace books, we shall copy this sketch from life, by Mrs Fitzroy Howard, who, falling into a delicate state of health, in consequence of a fatiguing overland journey, undertaken in the winter season, went to some nameless Turkish city to use the baths:—

In my excursion to the Turkish coasts, I had a sort of humble companion, a respectable Greek female, in reduced circumstances, who spoke Turkish fluently; and, though my visits after landing were limited to the baths, yet, by means of her interpretation, I was enabled to enter into much of what passed among the Turkish visitants. The appearance of the bath establishment greatly disappointed me; for, in the town where I tried them, there was but little evidence of that Oriental magnificence of furniture about which travellers to these regions seem to become insane. But there was much comfort in the arrangements; and, for a stranger, considerable amusement in the social customs of the place. It was a large, plain, windowless building, with a low door, whence we passed, through a court, into the general hall. Here the Turkish ladies sit for hours, before and after the bath, discussing all the news and fashions of the day—the real object for which more than half of them attend. There was something sweetly sad in the low voices of these fair gossips; and, during my visits, I never heard one of them commit the vulgarity of talking fast, or laughing loud; but the conversation was incessant as the glowing fountains near them, and really not altogether unlike in sound. The most striking novelty to me was the appearance of the children, who were there in great numbers. Descriptions and plates given in travels, with our theatrical costumes, prepare our eye, to a certain extent, for the dress of adults in foreign countries; therefore the lounging ladies in velvet and brocade did not seem altogether so strange. But the little girls of six or seven, instead of wearing clothes of a form and substance suited to their playful age, were decked forth in every costly, brilliant, and rare material, fashioned exactly like what their mothers wore! Even gold embroidery, rings, and precious gems, were not wanting to render the appearance of these poor "Marionettes" more absurd and precocious. The airs of the little creatures, too, their languid lipings, slowly-turning eyes, and studied attitudes, were so exaggerated a caricature of their maternal patterns, that I think they helped to my recovery by the constant amusement I derived from their artificial gravity. I must say, however, that my little friends were the best-humoured and least troublesome children I ever met; whatever the system of nursery discipline may be in Turkey, it might be introduced with advantage among the youthful Britons, who never hit the medium between shyness and intrusion.

At the end of the general hall where I first took my seat, I observed a heavy cloth curtain, and from its folds I saw ladies emerge, dressed like those in the hall, but having their hair enveloped in beautiful coloured handkerchiefs. These new-comers buried themselves among down cushions of bright satin; and a white silk mantlet being placed over their shoulders, their long hair was let down to be dried and dressed after the bath. This most tedious process must have been invented to waste time for the idlest of the female creation; for, through curiosity, I marked the time by my watch, and a coiffure was never completed under an hour and a half, or two hours! The hair of the Orientals, which we poetically fancy to be luxuriant, like every other growth of their clime, is in reality much inferior to that of my own countrywomen; being lank, thin, and lustreless, although attaining great length; and I was amazed by the sang froid with which false tresses were attached to almost every head, by its coiffure in the public room, without attempting concealment. For the form and materials of the ladies' dress, as I before said, I was not quite unprepared. But I was astonished by the richness being so universal. Between the costumes of those whom my Greek called "the great ladies," and those of inferior grade and wealth, I could trace no difference; satin, velvet, gold embroidery, and jewels, being employed by all with equal prodigality; and such was their extravagant carelessness, that the perishable materials cannot last, with a Turkish belle, half the time they would be in the wardrobe of even a capricious London beauty. Their lavish expense is not confined to the exterior garb; every appliance of the toilet is so costly, that I only wondered how pashas who have wives and daughters can ever save fortunes to tempt the bowstring. The exhaustion of the frame, after the heated sulphuric atmosphere, being very great, I used to sit for an hour or so in the general hall, and, of course, provided myself with some occupation to relieve the tedium. But, among the native visitants, I never once saw an indication of anything beyond complete idleness. These ladies sit helplessly to be dressed, like automatons, and carry on their sweet, languid murmur of news, &c., amidst the plaiting, twisting, and binding up their hair; and, when this is finished, they fall asleep amidst the noise and movement, with a facility and soundness which excite equal envy and wonder in a nervous invalid. No pampered Italian greyhound, snuggled within a cachmere, gives its large lustrous eyes more "day-sleep" than do the fair Turks to their similar orbs! One matter I observed among these elegant idlers, which prepossessed me strongly in their favour—namely, they are not gourmandes. Many took their dinners with their children in the assembling hall, either purchasing the light materials of their repast from the establishment, or having it brought by their own attendants. The splendour of the articles employed in serving it was extraordinary; but the meal only occupied a short time, and seemed to be hastily dismissed, to make way for the esteemed refreshment of smoking scented tobacco, from the smallest of gold and jewelled pipes.

Mrs Fitzroy Howard visited the Turkish baths by medical advice, and she imputes her rapid recovery from incipient consumption to their salubrious effects. She places great faith in the efficacy of slight sulphuric vapour as a preventive of the national malady, and seriously recommends herpanacea; seeking to do good through the gay medium of an Annual. Consumption is unknown among the beautiful Turkish bathers, (and, we dare say, the non-bathers also,) though their lives are far more sedentary than those of Englishwomen, and, we may add, than those of fair Americans, who seem to suffer more from this malady than their sisters in the old country. As an inducement to the use of the baths, she urges that the complexion of the Turkish ladies retains that smooth, transparent bloom to an advanced period, which, in this country, never outlasts childhood or extreme youth.

A narrative or legend is given here, which was told by Sir Walter Scott to Mrs Coutts, afterwards Duchess of St Albans, and of which, to render the affair more remarkable, he shewed the lady the scene. It was "the burnt Hill Fort," wherever it may stand, in the neighbourhood of Abbotsford; and near it the company all sat on granite blocks while the dreadful tale was told! It is a hash-up from the well-known tradition of the Macdonalds, when the Bastard of Moidart supplanted the Macchieff; with a sufficient quantity of blood and horror got up for the nonce, and thrown in, to set the hairs of the Duchess's wig on end. It is horrible, most horrible! and unworthy of Scott.

"The Alpine Lovers," a pretty tale, in a kind of blank verse, or something which at least is not prose, is by the Countess of Blessington, and need not be too severely criticised, as this lady, we believe, does not set up for a poetess. "Love's Inquest," a lively conceit in rhymed couplets, by the Hon. Mrs. J. C. Westenra, is among the best things in the collection; nor is this fair hit, by Lady Thompson, which is recommended by brevity, at all amiss:—

MAN'S THREE PERFECTIONS.

"Men confess some defects, that their sense you may know;

But to boast on Three points with the whole sex is common:—

When they ride, they are Centaurs no horses can throw;
When they drink, they've such heads the effects never shew;

When they love, they're ne'er cheated in love shewn by woman!"

Miss Sheridan's tale of "The Priest" is, however, the best performance in the volume. Her married priest has all Luther's passion and enthusiasm, lacking his fortitude and high intellect. If this lady come before the public in another volume of this expensive kind, she should draw less on namby-pamby fashionable contributors, and trust more to her own resources.

SYRIA AND THE HOLY LAND, ASIA MINOR, &c.

We have already had occasion to notice this illustrated work with hearty approbation. As a gift-book or souvenir none has higher claims. The views, which are drawn from nature, by Bartlett, Allom, and other artists or amateurs, are strikingly beautiful and characteristic. The subjects are chosen with judgment and knowledge; and the designs shew spirit and taste. These plates are charmingly described, and in turn illustrated, by the anecdotes, legends, and traditions collected by Mr Carne, who seems to have made this interesting region his home. Maps enable us to follow his steps through the the Holy Land, though no continuous narrative is attempted—a plate generally serving for the text of his graphic and poetical discourse. A view of the approach to Beirut leads us forward to Sidon, at the distance from thence of a seven hours' ride. Beirut had been a hospitable, and, to the Englishmen, a comfortable temporary home; and now they were consigned to the waste-room of a desolate caravanserai. We are fond, at home, of Eastern interiors, and Mr Carne gives us more of the domestic manners and social customs of the people than any other traveller, having somehow contrived to have more facility of entry into private houses.

In the evening, they left their forlorn caravanserai, to visit a merchant's family of Sidon. The contrast with their comfortless lodging was vivid and delightful. They sat on soft cushions and carpets; the pipe and coffee were presented, and some light Oriental dishes were soon served, with excellent wine. The lady of the house, a pretty woman, and well-dressed, presided at the repast, and the conversation was easy and agreeable. The entertainers were Syrian Christians, and spoke the Lingua-Franca dialect. The hostess assured the travellers that she had prepared some of the sweet dishes with her own hands. Mr Carne resolved henceforth to trust to the hospitality of the natives, whether poor or rich, rather than to the Khans; and he found no reason to regret the decision. At Jerusalem he lodged near the gate of Bethlehem; his apartments opening on the battlements of the ancient wall, near the tower of David. There his hosts served his breakfasts, on a little table about eighteen inches high—fresh cream and honey, bread and coffee. At dinner he was served with the wine of Jerusalem, which Chateaubriand pronounced excellent, though we do not find his testimony confirmed; and, in the evening, the family would assemble and sing some native air to the accompaniment of the guitar. From this pleasant lodging he was seduced away by the Franciscan monks of San Salvador—and the change was much for the worse. We give this little picture of manners in Sidon:—

We entered one of the coffee-houses in Sidon, that was filled with well-dressed Turks, lounging on the soft benches. Many of them sat at the open windows, which looked out upon the sea, which fell on the heart with a lulling sound. Having no tobacco, my next neighbour, a good-looking Turk, instantly offered me his little silken bag, to fill my pipe; for every Turk carries his bag about with him, as inseparably as an Englishman does his watch. In this manner is a great part of the day beguiled by this indolent and apathetic people—sipping coffee eternally—uttering grave and pithy sentences—stroking their beards—taking off their turbans, and smoothing their bald heads. To relieve this monotony, a story-teller often breaks in, stands suddenly in the middle of the room, and begins his tale with wild gesticulations, and a rapid flow of words. The Turk listens intensely, and then breaks forth into loud peals of laughter, shaking his heavy sides and wide garments with infinite glee, feeling all the luxury of the contrast. The cottages and gardens without the walls exhibit a more animated and more interesting scene of quiet industry and prosperity; for here each Syrian peasant rejoiced in the fruits of his own labour, and sat under the shadow of his own vine and fig-tree. These Syrians were comely in their person, and neat in their attire; the graceful cap and tassel, with the tunic, set off their light and slender forms. Many of the young women wore several rows of gold coins braided with their hair, and falling on each side of the face as low as the bosom; and the hair of others was braided behind, and fell down the back in long tresses. They wore sandals on their feet. . . .

Had Lady Hester Stanhope chosen her residence about a mile or two from Sidon, at the foot of the hills, and planted and improved the spot with the same taste as at Marilius, it would have been a luxurious, sheltered, and exquisite home—a bower of Armida, not a little oasis arrested from the mountain's brow; a retreat that may be said to be shelterless, neighbourless, a wild solitude over which passes furiously the sweep of the tempest. Would not some English companion or friend be a treasure here? To most persons it would; but not to the recluse of Marilius, who is surrounded by foreign domestics and attendants only. Miss W., who resided with her for some time, in a kind of honourable but bitter dependence, was married, some time since, to a young Syrian of Beirut, who had been her Ladyship's dragoman, but dismissed from her service for daring to fall in love with Miss W. The attachment, however, was mutual; yet sorely was it crossed for a protracted period. They both drank the waters of jealousy and suspicion; for, like Elizabeth, the Syrian recluse, cannot endure that any of her courtiers or attendants should be the slaves of love.

So much for Syrian gossip. Lady Hester Stanhope is now reconciled to the married pair. Mr Carne imagines, and probably correctly, that, if the secret heart of this eccentric, if not half-mad lady could be read, it would be seen that she longs to return to England.

But never will she return—pride, the fear of derision, the affected scorn of European tastes and habits, the rooted preference to Oriental feelings, (even, it may be said, in faith,) will cause her to go down to the grave without friend or lover to lament over her, or to say, 'Alas! her glory!' The powers of her mind are as acute as ever, and her conversation as animated and brilliant; but the pallid face, and now inactive frame, tall of increasing infirmities; and perhaps there is at times the thought that it is a bitter thing to draw near to the grave in a strange land, far from all the associations, the memories, the feelings of our earlier and better life. The conquest of Syria by Ibrahim will diminish the influence of Lady Hester over the potentates of the land. . . . Ibrahim is too powerful as well as too distant a despot to be sensible of the prestige, or gracious to the caprices of 'the great Lady,' whose queenhood of the East has, for some time, been passing from her.

Poor lady! we can think of nothing better than that Captain Basil Hall should take compassion upon her. She is precisely in the condition of the Countess Purgstall, in her forlorn Schloss.

The condition of the Jews at Antioch leads the writer to compassionate the sufferings of this singular people, and "the bitterness of having no country."

The Pass of Souk Barrada, the ancient Pharpar, is a wild and picturesque scene. A little farther on is the village of Zebdané, in the valley of Barrada, where a traveller might find a delightful retreat for a few weeks. It is flourishing with rich cultivation; shaded roads, rose-covered hedges, delicious pasturages; the people friendly and hospitable, clean in their dwellings, comely in their persons; provisions abundant, and religious intolerance and bigotry unknown. This last is rare in the East. There the mountain ballad is sung, and the tale told, and the wine of Lebanon drunk; and the mild, and kind, and well-clad circle gather round the stranger at evening. And this is a land into which Europeans were but lately afraid to venture!

A grand though rude Syrian entertainment, which cost the host no small pains, appears to have awakened little gratitude in the breasts of his guests. The feast certainly does want many of the agremens of a European dinner party, though the semi-barbarian banquet, unbrightened by woman's smile, has a wild charm of its own.

Balbec is becoming about as well-known as Staffa or the Giant's Causeway. It may now be reached from Beirut in one day, with no danger, and with greatly diminished expense; and it is next to impossible to go any day, when one will not encounter either a Yankee, with, perhaps, his wife and children, a Russian, a German, or a Pole, or all three at once. After discussing the imaginary or fabulous history of Balbec, Mr Carne concludes—

So little is known of the ancient Balbec, that it rather seems one of those cities of the "Arabian Tales," than a place for creatures of actual importance, wealth, and luxury. Perhaps it is best that it should be thus, as if it was destined that the noble ruins should alone tell the tale. Could any other tale be so impressive? Could any monument of the dead be so mournful? But is it not beautiful—amid the quick passing of generations, the fall of so many things holy and great—so many things intended for eternity—to be able to lean against one of these pillars, and think that the years are not always as a tale that is told; the life is not always vanity that can leave such relics behind? When shall these temples pass away? When shall their sun go down?

It is known that missionary efforts have long been directed to this region; where, however, intolerance and bigotry, or, in one word, priest-craft, oppose greater obstacles to the spread of truth, than could be found in the most barbarous, new-discovered country. A Dr W., a friend of the writer, having lived for two years in Damascus and other parts, ventured to distribute copies of St John's Gospel, and other portions of the New Testament, translated into Arabic, and printed in London, among the people of the hamlets and villages about Eden and Lebanon. These gospels and tracts were discovered by the priests, who quickly gave information to the great Maronite Patriarch in the monastery of Canobin, of the propagation of heresy. Orders were issued to prevent the farther circulation of the books, and to take away the copies already distributed; and the stranger was commanded to desist, under pain of excommunication. He paid no more attention to the threat, than one of the old Methodists might have done to the orders of a bishop or rector who debarred him from preaching; but continued to visit the sick as before, gratuitously relieving their ailments. He was very popular and much beloved by the people; and he lived in the house of the Scheich, and was a favourite with his host, who found him friendly, instructive, and useful. The Patriarch, inflamed by his obstinacy, at last excommunicated him; and, as we should say in Scotland, intercommuned him; debarring every family, under the severest penalties, from giving fire, water, food, or shelter, to the contumacious heretic, or holding any communication with him whatever. On the next Sunday, this sentence was thundered forth in all the churches, and the effects were instantly visible. Every dwelling was closed against him—every eye averted. The sentiment of honour, in the breast of his host, the Scheich, rose above the fears of superstition, and he entreated Dr W. to remain with him; but this the guest would not do. He pitched his tent at a little distance from the village, and lived there with his servants, in sight of society, yet in utter solitude, for two months. He must have starved, save for the cupidity of one old man, who had the hardihood to disregard the church, as long as he was well paid for going twice a-week to Tripoli for provisions and wine. Had Dr W. been a native, severer measures would have been taken with him than the priests durst venture to employ. In a few weeks, the people came to his tent-door, to state their complaints, and obtain advice and medicine—but they would not, in return, give the intercommuned man a bit of bread or a draught of water. His feelings on the Sabbath were peculiarly painful, when he heard the church bells calling the people together to hear the curse renewed against him. Human feelings could no longer hold out, and he left the place; but he is, we understand, about to make another attempt, under more favourable auspices.

On going to Tarsus, the traveller presented his letter to M. Gillet, the French consul there, but hesitated to accept his frank invitation to reside in his house. "But where will you go, my friend?" said the kind Frenchman; and, in half-an-hour, he was seated at a dejeuné, in the open divan, with his host and his family. They lived in the same manner as if they had been in Paris; but Madame Gillet confessed that they were at a sad loss for articles of the cuisine; and that she was compelled to be ever on the alert; yet entremets and fricassees came as if by magic. The Consul at parting begged the traveller "sometimes to recall the poor exiles of Tarsus."

After all that we have heard of the Cedars of Lebanon, what follows is as novel as it is beautiful:—

Every year in the month of June, the inhabitants of Besheral, of Eden, and other adjacent vales and villages, ascend to the cedars, and partake of the communion at their feet. Men, women, and children all esteem it a privilege to come and kneel, and sing their hymns beneath the aged trees; and this observance leaves a kindly influence on the memory throughout the year, and exquisitely appeals to the feelings of the children. Here one or many days are often passed; at sunrise and at sunset, and at intervals during the day, the splendid solitude is broken by their sweet voices. It is a spot in which many would desire to rest from their labours, and be laid here in the grave; beneath this bank, where kings and saints have wept—beneath these ancient witnesses—would it not be a hallowed resting-place? Amid the last glories of the cedars, the wind moaning through whose branches is like a dirge in winter; and in summer and autumn, the hymns and prayers of the people arise without ceasing.

There are other delightful holiday customs in this sacred territory, which we may as well notice here. At Bethlehem, on Christmas morning, the Christians repair to the very fields where the shepherds watched their flocks; and there, while the sun is rising, how beautiful it is to sit and look at the hill of Engeddi, and the tomb of Rachel! The only stream visible, flows down the vale from the fountain of Bethlehem, at which David longed to drink; it is, to this day, a pure fountain of delicious water.

The real character, the inmost soul and feeling, of the uncorrupted Hebrew, are frequent themes with Mr Carne. He sympathizes deeply with the afflictions of Jacob, with the desolate state of Zion. Contrasting the sordid Jew pedler and obsequious bargain-maker, with the same Jew remembering his high ancestry and glorious privileges, he remarks—

Here, in his synagogue, the Jew can feel that he has a faith, a country of surpassing though faded power and renown. The oppressor enters not here; Israel is alone with his undying recollections and stern bigotry. The face may be pallid, the form bowed, the rod of the oppressor may have entered his soul; but there is a lofty pride in his eye, with a scorn of every other belief. This is a solemn ceremonial; their richest vestments are put on; for there are many wealthy and influential men in the city [Jerusalem]; even the love of gain is perhaps forgotten, while the memory flies to the illustrious periods of their history, and hope still cleaves to the coming Messiah. So rooted is this conviction, that some of the chief supporters of the Jewish Mission, and their great missionary, the Rev. Mr Wolff, have lately adopted it also; the latter preaches to his countrymen wherever he goes, that the Messiah will come, and that shortly, as the Ruler of his people on earth, in resistless power, glory, and blessedness.

One of the most affecting sights in Jerusalem is the going forth of Israel from the gates, men, women, and children, to sit on the earth without the walls, to mourn beside the graves of their fathers. If it be consoling that the ashes of those we revere and love should be guarded with peculiar care and mercy, bitter must be the feelings of the Jew. "No monument, no memorial of pride or tenderness, tells where the rich, the holy, the honoured of the people sleep. A rude stone, stuck in the bare side of Zion, where the foot of the Turk, the Greek, the Arab tramples, as he passes carelessly by, alone marks the resting-place of their fallen people on the descent of what was once their haughty Mountain of God." The subject naturally leads to Mr Wolff, the enthusiastic Jew missionary, who some time since returned to England, and the narrative of whose strange wanderings the world looks for with great interest. Since his return, he has baptized his own brother, whom he had not seen since 1811, and who then cursed his apostacy and belief in Jesus Christ.

The wealthy mobility, who have cultivated minds, refined taste, and well-filled purses, now dog the heels of the nobility so closely through the several routes of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, that the latter will be forced on, to take refuge in Syria and Palestine. Many of the cities of the Holy Land and the neighbouring regions, afford very pleasant temporary residences; and the heart of all, the Holy City, is now no contemptible sanctuary. The last few years have introduced many facilities and comforts. Instead of finding no lodgings, save in the monasteries, they may now be had at a moderate price in the city, with civil and attentive hosts, whether they be Armenians, Greeks, or Catholics. Fruit and wine, meat and vegetables, are cheap and easily procured; and every year will render the city more convenient as a residence, though, alas! the same circumstances must also impair that lone, sublime, and gloomy character which spreads a spell around the high places of Israel. The traveller, who lived for some time in Jerusalem, remarks that "the climate is healthy, the winds on the surrounding hills fresh and pure, and the heat rarely excessive." The spring must be delicious; and then those lovely walks! wild and romantic, down the valley through which flows the stream of Siloam—

"Fast by the oracles of God"— and over the plain of Jeremiah to the sepulchres of the Kings; and on to that of the Judges; to Bethany, by the way of Olivet; or at early morning to go over the plain Rephidim to Bethlehem!—these, indeed, are exquisite rambles. And then the numerous objects, dear to memory and the fondest associations of earliest youth, which spring up on every side! We shall mention but one, which the traveller has selected with true feeling and tenderness. Near Bethlehem are the ruins of the village of Rama, in which was heard "a weeping;" and not far off is the tomb of Rachel, one of the many places in which the observer finds that tradition has not erred, as it fulfils literally the words of Israel in his last hour, when dwelling fondly on the only indelible remembrance that earth seemed to claim from him. The long exile from the home of his parents, the converse with the angels of God, the wealth and greatness which had gathered round him, all yielded to the memory and image of the beloved and faithful wife. "Rachel died by me in the way from Bethel, and I buried her there." The spot is as wild and solitary as can well be conceived. "No palms or cypresses give their shelter from the blast; not a single tree spreads its shades where the ashes of the beautiful mother of Israel rest. Yet there is something in her sepulchre in the wilderness that excites a far deeper interest than more splendid or revered ones. The tombs of Zacharias and Absalom in the valley of Jehoshaphat, or of the Judges in the plain of Jeremiah, the traveller looks at with careless indifference. Beside that of Rachel his fancy wanders 'to the land of the people of the east,' to the power of beauty, that could so long make banishment sweet." There was, indeed, more true gallantry, even in the chivalrous sense, in the courtship of the youthful Jacob, than in half the fictions of knight-errantry.

We cannot attempt to notice every interesting or consecrated and memorial spot which may be found in the environs of Jerusalem. One striking object, of which there is an engraving, is the Valley of Jehoshaphat, through which the travellers passed under the following picturesque and affecting circumstances:—"While we were at Jerusalem, we were invited to join the procession of pilgrims and monks to the Tomb of Lazarus." This tomb is near the village of Bethany, about two miles from Jerusalem; and there is a beautiful walk leading over the summit of Olivet, whence the ramblers descend upon the modern hamlet. A stream of clear water issues from a neighbouring fountain, to which the maidens of Bethany repair with their long-necked stone pitchers, such as may be seen in scriptural pictures—such, says Mr Carne, "as may have been used at the wedding-feast of Cana in Galilee." The ruins of the dwelling of Lazarus are still pointed out. The tomb is hewn out of the rock. But we return to the procession. It set out at two in the morning, while it was yet dark; almost every one carried a lighted torch or taper. The procession, leaving the Franciscan convent, passed out of the gate of St Stephen, descended the hill of Zion, and crossed the brook Kedron. It was a solemn and impressive pageant. At each sacred place, they paused and sung a hymn suited to the scene. The Glen of Jehoshaphat was dark and silent—the walls of the city, on the brink of the hill above, looked dim and vast in the starlight. The procession then wound up the side of the Mount of Olives, on whose rocks and trees the glare of the torches flashed as they slowly moved along. Again they stopped on the summit of this hill—a strange and solitary group at such an hour—and a fine subject for the painter. The pilgrim with his pale and excited features; the priest in his vestments; the lights they bore breaking on the gloom of night; the various attitudes of those that held them. They then passed to Bethany, entered the sepulchre, and, descending the ancient stone steps, filled the little area beneath. All stood silent for a time; the place where the dead lay was at their feet, and they circled densely around it; the tapers threw their glare on the roof and sides of the grotto, and on the grave beneath. The people of Bethany were buried in sleep; not a light was seen in the windows, or a voice heard in the hamlet. Suddenly from the pilgrims and priests broke a solemn strain; its effect, as it rose on the stillness of the night, was very fine; they sung, "O death! where is thy sting? O grave! where is thy victory?" When they left the sepulchre, the day was already breaking. Such are the subjects of this series of Views; and our few extracts may shew the manner in which they are elucidated. Among the embellished works of the day, we know of none more captivating, or of more deep and abiding interest.

Among the more remarkable of the plates in this series we may enumerate The Great Mosque at Antioch; Sidon, on the Approach from Beirut; The Pass of Barrada, which was mentioned above; The Tomb of St George; Tortosa; The Ford of the River Kishon, with the Bay of Acre. There are also many fine architectural plates, and scenic pictures of bazaars, fountains, khams, and whatever may give a lively idea of character, and of social customs and costume. But we must stop in the middle of the list. It would require considerable space to enumerate even the plates connected with Jerusalem—its tombs, temples, synagogues, and varied antiquities; so we close the book with this one exquisite picture of an oriental seat, or rather homestead:—

It is a spacious dwelling, on the banks of the ancient Pharpar, overhung by terraces, and shaded by immense trees. The venerable Scheich loves to lead his guests to the terrace, which is in part carpeted, and thus forms a divan beneath the trees, where the family group sit in evening, and where neighbours and visitors come to converse. This, says the traveller, is orientalism in all its simplicity and glory. The rich divans of the Pasha's palace, the splendid costumes of the attendants, his minute luxuries, do not touch the stranger's fancy like his evening's enjoyment, beside the stream and the aged trees, the patriarchal group, and its venerable chief. There is the singing of innumerable birds above his head. The murmur of the Pharpar, and the prospect over which his eye travels, as far as the last mountains of Anti-Lebanon; forests, plains, spots of exquisite verdure, and, last, the snowy crests red with the last sun-light.

The Scheich was a fine old man, with a white head and mild features. His family had for ages ruled this district. So peaceful, orderly, and prosperous a government is not often to be found in the Turkish empire. Hereditary legislation has been a blessing to Zebdani. It might have been far otherwise, had its chiefs chosen to be severe, exacting, or unprincipled men. In the interior of the Schiech's house the rooms were of good size, and clean; but the change from the river-side and the shady old trees, and the carpeted terrace was not a luxurious one. . . . On looking out next morning, it was easy at first to fancy oneself in England; the gardens, the hedges, the orchards, had so much the air of homes about them, save that some of the trees would not flourish in our climate. When we entered the place the preceding evening, the young men were engaged in athletic exercises in a large open space. They are a fine, healthy-looking race, and the women are many of them handsome, with a frank and kindly air and look, not usual among Turkish women.

ANNUAL OF BRITISH LANDSCAPE SCENERY. AN AUTUMN RAMBLE ON THE BANKS OF THE WYE.

MISS TWAMLEY, known by her elegant flower volumes, is not alone the editress—a new word, by the way, in the English language, and one most fairly introduced—but the sole author of this Annual. The lively and light-hearted lady has an exuberance of animal spirits, a good eye for the picturesque, catholic taste, an abounding love of fun, and that modern inclination for all the arts and sciences, which jumbles together geology, botany, ornithology, &c. &c., and which loads ladies with insect-boxes and botanical specimen-boxes instead of hand-boxes—and with hammers instead of fans. The scene of her perambulations was the WYE; and to those who have never seen the Wye, we cannot conceive why it should not be quite as captivating in description as the “lazy Scheldt or wandering Po”—“the blue and arrowy Rhone”—or, “the Rhine! the Rhine!”

Miss Twamley embarked at Bristol in a steamer bound for Chepstow, and saw and noted a great deal long before she reached port. Chepstow Castle detained her long; but we may safely slip the antiquarian and historical, to get at the descriptive parts. “Right pleasantly,” she says, “passed my morning, amid the thoughts and things but feebly, though, perhaps, too diffusely described here. While my patient and indulgent companion amused herself with exploring the recesses and loop-holes nearest my whereabouts, and chatted to an old gardener about Kings and cabbages, I sketched a few scraps of the ruin, and dreamed of ‘by-gones.’ Large, soft, downy-winged owls flew silently past, in the great hall, and sat staring at me from sheltering ivy-tods above the windows; and jackdaws, the unfailing tenants of ruins, cawed and grumbled about most noisily. Retracing our way back, we requested to see the underground apartments mentioned by some writers; and, on payment of an extra doucour, our blooming young conductress, unlocking a ponderous door under the uninhabited towers, led the way down a rather long and broad flight of stone stairs, in almost perfect darkness. We followed, and, groping our way on, found ourselves in a large vault, hollowed in the rock, with a groined roof, and one opening through which the light faintly struggles in, being nearly excluded by ivy and brambles, which fall over the cliff. Looking down, the Wye was seen rolling at a great depth below. Massive rings of iron in the rocky wall shew that this murky vault was used as a dungeon for the confinement of prisoners; and, damp, dark, and dreary as it is, was probably commodious, when compared with many a loathsome den allotted to such purposes in feudal fortresses.” And Miss Twamley recalled the prisoners of Chillon, and, with a thankful heart, bounded into the sunshine, and thanked her stars for British freedom. As she stood on a fine point of view above the Wye, commanding the town of Chepstow, the Severn, the Gloucestershire coast, and the Channel, she remembered another visit to the same spot; and, truly, the wanderers on the Continent rarely find so fair a scene, in so felicitous an hour—a soft, dewy, calm, spring evening. “The brightness of the day was over, but still lay upon the deepening sky, and were mirrored in the glassy river. The whole scene was so noiseless, so placid, that it seemed asleep—nothing but happy slumber was ever so still; but soon the spell was broken by a distant owl sending a long low hoot along the river, which seemed to awake in a dozen places, and echo back the notes. Other owls now answered at intervals; but, whilst we were listening, and trying to trace the different cries, a rich, rapid, but brief cadence thrilled on our ears from the opposite woods, and, as if they had only waited for a signal, a choir of nightingales took up the strain, and the whole atmosphere seemed vibrating with music. Not two, nor three, nor four, but a countless number of these wondrous voices burst forth as if by enchantment; and, hearing them as we did, across the river and its deep valley, the effect was more exquisite than anything I could have conceived.” And then Miss Twamley quotes some very sweet lines to the nightingales, by some young lady, whose initials are L. A. T. Of the far-famed Piercefield Park, she says, smartly—“The park is very much like most other parks that have fair lawny glades, and noble timber to adorn them, with a fine handsome mansion placed in a commanding situation, looking about with all its windows, and seeming to say ‘Am I not an exceedingly good-looking house for my years?’” We do not intend to say anything about the beautiful engravings of the Wye scenery. We shall only imitate the post-boy, who drove Miss Twamley, and, at a given point, according to custom, touched his hat with—“First view of Tintern, Ma’am!” Monmouth and Ragland Castle we also pass by, but we shall have a scramble to the summit of Symond’s Yat, for which the boat was moored in floating down the Wye, that the fair adventuress might scale its height:—

“‘The golden clouds, on which the sun had left
The footsteps of his splendour,’

The path being very steep and fatiguing, my companion preferred sitting in the guide’s cottage, whilst I set my pilgrimage; and, with his wife as my pilot, I sat forth, slipping and scrambling along, “through mud and mire,” the slippery clay causing more than one degradation of my dignity by a fall; but in due time we gained the platform of rock, crowning the narrow ridge, and I was well rewarded for my toils and tumbles, by the grand view spread around; with the Wye winding about below, and almost making an island of the lofty point on which I stood. A description of such a panorama as this view, would claim a chapter to its own share; the extent will be best estimated if I mention a few of the places within its range. The Kymin, Black Mountains, high land about Carmarthen, the Brown Clee Hills, Stoke Edith, and hills in Radnorshire, besides the comparatively nearer view, comprising the Dowards, and Goodrich Court and Castle; and all this lit up gloriously by real sunshine—not the counterfeit usually seen in our cloudy land, but clear, laughing, cheerful sunshine! It was a thing not easily forgotten. The variety of wild berries, which were ripe in the woods, on the mountain ash, wild service, viburnum, elder, dogwood, wild rose, and hawthorn trees, together with a few pale autumn flowers, delighted me exceedingly; and, as I was gathering sprays of each, the good woman who acted as guide, exclaimed regretfully, "Ah, ma'am, you should come here in summer, we've 'all the Aorchieses.'" Numbers of mules, laden with coal, pass over this high edge from the forest of Dean, and descend on the south side, where they are ferried over the Wye, and carry their burdens up to the kilns on the Great Doward, which are supplied in this manner. Many of the mules were really beautiful animals; and, as they wound down the rugged and narrow path, picking their way with unerring sureness of foot, and stepped into the ferry-boat, I heartily wished them a kindlier lot.

Such is a fair specimen of the entertainment that readers may expect in Miss Twanley's Annual. The good taste of some nameless lady, who has a right to rule in Wilton Castle, is thus blazoned:—

There remained but one more object of material interest for me to visit in the vicinity of Ross, and that was Wilton Castle, to which I walked in the evening, but only to experience disappointment and vexation, at the vile taste which has grafted a little pert, formal, fresh-painted, venetian-blinded, muslin-curtained "cottage of gentility" upon the crumbling old towers and ivy-grown walls of the hoary castle. There was something quite pitiable and melancholy in the forced and outrageous masquerade; and a very brief survey sufficed me. One tower is transformed into a thatched summer-house, among similar travesties; and a fine colony of rooks, that formerly inhabited the lofty trees near, has been exterminated by the same lady by whom the other improvements have been made.

Fancy those saucy artists and lovers of nature, who will not let gentle folks do what they like with their own! The castle, thus embellished and modernized, was built by King Stephen. Miss Twanley has interspersed several copies of pretty verses with her pleasant and pretty guide-book. She is one of Flora's favourite minstrels or glee-maidens at present, and one of the most mellifluous.

HEATH'S BOOK OF BEAUTY.

"The Book of Beauty" is not so much an Annual as a Portrait Gallery of those high-born or high-bred Englishwomen, entitled by their rank or personal charms to shed lustre on the arts. A few complimentary lines are generally connected with each fair likeness, and as many literary contributions as the good taste of the Countess-Editress has approved, are thrown in, to give variety and relief. The principal artist is that modern Lely, Chalon, to whom the female nobility delight to sit. Two or three portraits, are by Ross; and one, The Viscountess Fitzharris, by Landseer. And well may Miss Sheridan take for the burden of her verses, "How lovely!" The exclamation is drawn forth quite as much by the genius of the artist, as by the beautiful original of his finished and truly admirable painting, which might form the bright gem of any work in art. The Duchess of Sutherland, a gorgeous dame, with, however, a sweet and natural expression, which her princely robes cannot banish, forms the appropriate frontispiece to the volume. It is painted by Chalon, and is a highly-finished plate. The Viscountess Mahon, painted by Lucas, is a creditable picture, with that air of individuality which is often sadly lacking in modern fine-lady portraiture. This particular portrait is more Reynoldish than the general run, and, as such, is worthy of being distinguished. The Viscountess Vallétort is a pleasing picture, painted by Ross—pleasing from the sweet sentiment which it expresses, of gentle and happy maternity. The portrait of one very handsome woman, could not fail to delight the gazer, save for the painful apprehension that the lady is threatened, if not seriously affected, with the sad species of distortion, which the surgeons denominate "incurvature of the spine." From the verses of the Countess of Blessington, we are, however, happy to learn that the Spanish-looking maiden is in high health.

"Thine is England's beauty;
Where besides doth rose
Such a glow of brightness
On a cheek disclose?
Where besides such forehead,
Pure as early day—
Shrine where thought must holy Bids the careless pray?"

So the incurvature is, after all, mechanical; the unseemly consequence of back-boards and strappings, deforming a fine and graceful form. We cannot enumerate each bright particular star of Heath's galaxy; and pass to the letter-press. A lively sketch by Lady Blessington, and another by Francis Howard, Esq., are just the thing for this kind of work. The lady's story shews that young fashionable mothers, who can afford to keep upper and under, wet and dry nurses, should not suffer silly, maternal fondness to estrange them from their duties; and that, if they do not amuse their gay young husbands, the gentlemen will probably find amusement in other female society, where the babies are kept in their nurseries. Mr Howard's contribution is a lively sketch of the first quarrel or misunderstanding of a young married pair, who, with devoted mutual affection, have not yet learned the great lesson of forbearance in trifles, or graceful yielding on small everyday occasions. Mrs Erskine Norton furnishes a long romantic tale of the perennial Rosamond Clifford, of whom we desire never to hear another word, unless it possesses either novelty or high merit of some sort. Fair Rosamond, La Valliere, and all the rest of the royal harlotry of Europe, are now worn threadbare. "Sybil Craven"—a tale shewing how a young gentleman in orders fell in love with a strolling singer—very lovely and charming and virtuous—might, we suppose, be of dangerous precedent, were it not that she is found to be of a family at least equal to his own. This helps to obtain the pardon of the runaways from the old Squire, who had supposed Sybil just one of the "jades" and "adventuresses" who had nearly ensnared his sage self when "he was a young fellow." A contribution from the pen of Barry Cornwall draws, as seamen say, greater depth of water than any of the above. It is entitled, "A Passage in the Life of a Philosopher"—a passage which leads to the old termination—love and marriage. Balliol, a gentleman of family, but of small fortune, has been, for twenty years, a college tutor, and something of a book-worm, when the circumstance of a distant relative dying intestate, brings him a good estate. A "lovely young Lavinia," a village girl, whom the deceased had protected, is left destitute by the sudden death, and a strong prejudice exists in Balliol's mind against her and her aunt. This cloud is cleared away; the elderly scholar becomes the instructor of the beautiful and susceptible Mary, who insensibly imbibes a deep passion for her Abelard. The progress of the affair is delicately painted; its termination is unbounded felicity, spite of the trifling disparity of some five-and-twenty years. No one, by the way, is half so successful in those tender delineations of the young ivy clinging to the mature elm, as authors of a certain age imbued with a strong dash of the poetical temperament. Two dramatic scenes by Savage Landor—one, Anne Boleyn in the Tower, receiving intimation of her execution; the other, her brutal tyrant, hunting in Epping Forest, while the tragedy is performing—are, the first especially, most daintily touched. There is altogether enough of verse in the volume. An ode "To a Tree, leafless in June," by Bulwer, is not the least worthy of notice among the poems; or, if there be finer things, we are yet well contented with this as our specimen:—

"Desolate tree, why are thy branches bare?
What hast thou done
To win strange winter from the summer air,
Frost from the sun?

"Thou wert not churlish in thy palmier year
Unto the herd;
Tenderly gav'st thou shelter to the deer,
Home to the bird.

"And ever, once, the earliest of the grove,
Thy smiles were gay;
Opening thy blossoms with the haste of love
To the young May.

"Then did the bees, and all the insect wings,
Around thee gleam;
Faster and darling of the gilded things
That live i' the beam.

"Thy liberal course, poor prodigal, is sped;
How lonely now!
How bird and bee, light parasites, have fled
The leafless bough!

"Tell me, sad tree, why are thy branches bare?
What hast thou done?
To win strange winter from the summer air,
Frost from the sun?

"'Never!' replied the forest-hermit, lone,
(Old truth and endless!)

"Never for evil done, but fortune frown,
Are we left friendless.

"Yet wholly nor for winter, nor for storm,
Doth love depart:
We are not all forsaken, till the worm
Creeps to the heart!

"Ah! naught without—within thee, if decay—
Can heal or hurt thee!
Nor boots it, if thy heart itself betray,
Who may desert thee."

THE BOOK OF ROYALTY.

The name imports something rich and magnificent, and this superb annual possesses all the "appliances" which bear out its lofty title. It is bound in crimson Morocco and gold, and exhibits the insignia of royalty in its blazonry. The editress is Mrs S. Hall, and the volume is reverentially laid at the pretty Cinderella-feet of our gracious Queen Victoria. The subjects generally are termed "Characteristics of Palaces." They are either little historical tales, or slight sketches of courts and court manners; and in tone very courtly and loyal indeed. Some are in prose, others in metre. But the novel and really attractive feature of this Annual is the coloured plates, which exhibit the gorgeous, quaint, or rich costumes to advantage; albeit sometimes reminding us, though pleasantly enough, of "Ackermann's dresses for May."

The designs by Perring and Brown are generally clever, particularly in the grouping. Some of them, as the New Court Beauty, and Charles I. Parting from his Children, are truly beautiful, combining an exquisite softness with truth and spirit. The literary contents demand no particular attention. It is enough that they explain the plates. Among the best of them is "The Fair Forester," a passage relating to the gentle King Jamie and his daughter, which, save for the detestable imitation of the Scottish dialect, would be very good in its way. "The New Court Beauty" is also a clever scena; and the work altogether is rich and elegant.

THE COURT GAZETTE.

Before we close our account with the fashionable world and its literature for the season, we are bound to notice a new journal, which has been projected as its especial minister, and which promises to do its spiriting gently. We have not been rash in commending The Court Gazette, which started in the memorable week of the Coronation, and has proceeded flourishingly. Besides the all-important duties of a Court Gazette, and Mirror of Fashionable Life, the new journal pays considerable attention to light and elegant literature, and shews much taste and judgment in selecting from the foreign, the daily London, and also the provincial papers, whatever is likely to interest the higher female world in particular. Its sources of fashionable intelligence appear excellent; and, without interfering with politics, or any of those questions which agitate the public mind, the character of the print is less frivolous than journals of this stamp are usually imagined.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Truths from the West Indies. By Captain Studholme Hodgson.

THERE was a time when we should have been glad to see the darkest shadings of Captain Hodgson's picture laid before the public; but we doubt if that time has not gone by, and if it be not too late to turn back the public mind upon the cruelties and infamies which he lays bare. His book was chiefly written in the West Indies, some years since, while he was there on service. The ill health of the author has prevented its appearance until it is much less called for. We have no doubt of the purity of his intentions; but the affairs of the West Indies have recently assumed a new aspect; and unless some evidently good end is to be gained, it is proverbially unwise to cause exasperation by ripping up old sores. We must now, without too nicely scrutinizing the past, exercise in the future all fidelity and watchfulness in protecting the dearly-bought liberties of our black fellow-subjects, and take care that oppression, under the guise of law, shall not take place of the cart-whip, the manacles, and the tread-mill; and that the tyranny of privilege and caste be not consolidated upon their ruins.

Mr Zachary Macaulay read much of this volume in manuscript upon his death-bed; and, approving, was, it seems, anxious for the publication of the "Truths." This is high authority; yet even in that brief period which has elapsed since his death, the question has assumed a new and critical form; and, while insisting for justice, and vigilantly guarding the interests of the negroes, it might yet be well to avoid exasperation. Captain Hodgson has collected a great many instances of wanton and demoniac cruelty, and, in the lives of the planters, some cases of revolting depravity and licentiousness, which last, however, might, we fear, be paralleled at home; but these matters are all past—and, as regards the blacks, we would look with firmness to the brightening future, vigilant but hopeful. Morals, in the most essential points, are certainly very low in the West Indies. But the universal dissoluteness described by Captain Hodgson, seems everywhere the necessary concomitant of slavery. Nor can these deep-rooted evils be all at once eradicated, though the first great step is taken. Captain Hodgson pleads the necessity of exposing the gross and almost brutal licentiousness which prevails in the West Indies, because, in what he calls a joint-stock work, adopted by a Mrs Carmichael, it is alleged not only that morals are strictly pure in both sexes in the West Indies, but that the tone of morals is much more strict in genteel society in the colonies than in the mother country. Now, this is rather too much, surrounded as every writer in the colonies must at all times be with so many varying hues of complexion; with tawny skins, the vellum of pedigree. Captain Hodgson has pointed out many abuses in the administration of the internal affairs of the colonies, and in their courts of justice, for which the home government which tolerates either the particular acts or the system, ought to be condemned. The case of Sir George Hill is one.

Some years since, the planters, to obtain a supply of the human commodity, brought slaves—for such in effect they were—from the Islands of Madeira and Fayal, under the same pretences that have since been used to ensnare the Hill Coolies. The most favourable terms were held out; and the poor creatures bound themselves for seven years, exulting in the expectation of making their fortunes, and returning to their native islands, to enjoy the remainder of life. "But," says Captain Hodgson—

Once arrived in the colonies, they found themselves beyond redemption at the mercy of those by whom they had been deluded, and who now, throwing off the mask, sold the astounded creatures to the highest bidder, by whom they were distributed over the country, without, as I have been informed, in many instances, the least regard to the ties of family. In every conceivable point of view, their lot was infinitely more miserable than even that of the negroes; for, although exposed, like these, to the same treatment as to the degree of toil and coercion, they were far from being sharers with them in the advantages intended to be secured by the Abolition Act. The black slaves had the right, at any period, of purchasing their immediate freedom; not so with the white slaves. "Seven years," said the bond; and well resolved was each Shylock to insist to the last on the pound of flesh.

But even had the Portuguese, like the negroes, possessed the right of offering redemption-money, it would have availed them nothing. Far from their country, with which no communication was carried on, save through the circuitous route of England, it would have been impossible for them to quit the place to which they had been beguiled; they must have betaken themselves to the woods, and then, compelled by want of food to return to the vicinity of the towns or plantations, they would have been seized and condemned as vagrants; in other words, their former state as slaves on the sugar estates to the planters, would have been changed for that of slaves on the public roads to the government.

Conceiving that sufficient has been said to convey an accurate idea of the immediate position of the Portuguese on their reaching the estates of the persons by whom they had been purchased, I will present an outline of their subsequent lot.

Without distinction of sex or age, they were indiscriminately mixed with the negroes; the robust man, the delicate female, the tender child, were alike compelled to toil in the cane-fields, under a tropical sun, and the same quantum of labour was demanded from them as from their fellow slaves—the negroes.

In vain, after a short time, did they begin to implore as a mercy, that, at all events, if slaves they must remain, they might be sent to cocoa estates, where, under the shade, they could work without being struck by immediate death. In vain, on their prayer being refused, did they endeavour to make known their condition to the public authorities. No interpreter of their language could they find; and in one island no interpreter was allowed. In vain did they strive to escape to the towns, with the hope that their ghastly appearance, and bodies mangled by stripes, might attract the attention of the humane; they were quickly stopped by the guards stationed at all points, and lodged in the prisons on the estates, where some expired from the sufferings they were doomed to undergo; or if, by chance, one did overcome the vigilance of the watchmen, and make his way towards Government House, he was seized and shipped off to the coast; an effectual way, truly, of precluding the possibility of his obtaining a hearing.

The constitutions of these white slaves soon began to break under this treatment. Disease in hideous forms was not slow in exhibiting itself; and it was shown beyond a doubt, in this instance, that the labour, which is so fatal even to negroes, can never be performed by men whose bones and sinews are covered with a white skin.

Whole families, and theirs was the happiest lot, were swept from the face of the earth; while those who had the misfortune partially to recover, were, if unable to pursue their labour, turned off houseless and friendless by the vampires who had banqueted to the last drop on their hearts' blood. Their condition became so truly pitiable as to move the very blacks to compassion. So broken in spirit were these free-born subjects of the crown of Portugal, that they were to be seen suing, on their knees, the charity of the British West India negro slaves; and, the charity sued for was never refused by the kind-hearted, columniated black.

At length, the report of their sufferings, and of the startling rapidity with which they were dropping into the grave, travelled beyond the confines of the plantations, and was rendered the subject of inquiry by several persons who had already been conspicuous for their endeavours to ameliorate the condition of the negroes. The result was, the bringing to light the particulars I have detailed.

Immediate steps were taken to submit them to the executive.

We have given this long extract, (but cannot complete it,) from the perfect similarity that exists between the cases of the Portuguese, and those natives of Hindostan for whom the same snares have been laid.

It is gravely stated by Captain Hodgson, that when the slave-owners of Antigua gave up their right to the six years' apprenticeship, or six years of protracted slavery, a band of incendiaries were sent among the emancipated apprentices, by the slave-holders in other islands, to spread disaffection and excite them to revolt! This conspiracy was detected, and the treacherous visitors were compelled to be off with all speed—to carry on their machinations elsewhere.

This gentleman, after watching the working of the apprenticeship system for two years, was convinced that so far as the slave was concerned, his condition was not ameliorated, so many either invidious or open means were taken to evade or defy the provisions of the Abolition Act. "In the chartered colonies," he says, "the local legislature set the home-government at defiance, while, in the crown colonies, those who the most violently and effectually opposed the benevolent purposes of the crown, were the chief officers of the crown." So boldly was speculation carried on in the islands, that, when the knowing bought up the claims for compensation, held by the ignorant owners of a few slaves, the public money was taken from the treasury chest for this righteous purpose. On these buyings up of claims reaching the ears of Lord Glenelg, he interposed for the protection of the ignorant objects of this villany, and prevented the sales of claims from being confirmed in the courts of law; which, doubtless, the purchasers must have thought a very improper interference with free trade.

Captain Hodgson has no faith in the colonists acting justly to the black population, unless they are compelled to do so. He is not fond of leaving them, as they desire, "to themselves," in the management of their "free labourers." They made the special magistrates, sent to administer British law, subservient to their purposes; and now they wish to make laws affecting the blacks to please themselves, and suit their interests. He has little hope of equal legislation, and none of an equal and impartial administration of justice between black and white. To approximate a purer administration of justice, he thinks that jurymen should be chosen without distinction of colour; and that all negroes who can read and write, and understand the leading rules of arithmetic, should have the elective franchise. Here is innovation! Give to black men what is refused to white!

The evils against which the friends of the dark coloured race ought especially to guard, are embodied in an address preparing by the Central Negro Emancipation Committee, to be presented to the Secretary for the Colonies. We rejoice to find their interests in hands so able and alert; and perceive no prospect of the labours of the society being unnecessary for a long while to come.

Spectacle Secrets. By George Cox.

Among the many knaveries and frauds practised by dishonest traders, none are, we believe, more gross than those attempted in spectacles; and, save, perhaps, in medicine, none can be more dangerous and villanous. The medical quack endangers health and life; the optical quack a sense which gives these blessings much of their value. Mr Cox's little treatise, besides exposing the puffing quacks and their manifold arts and impudence, contains all the information required by those who use spectacles or eye-glasses in any form; rules for their selection; observations on the substances employed in making them, on fitting, &c. &c. Mr Cox disapproves of eye-glasses, unless for the most temporary purpose; and it is a remarkable fact, which a well-known optician stated to him, that he knew no instances of a short-sighted person who needed to increase the focus of his concaves, if he began by wearing spectacles; but that the cases were frequent, where a single eye-glass had been used, in which the individual had frequently required a change of glasses. We are glad to learn that good spectacles are so reasonable in price, though Mr Cox should inform his readers of the "whereabouts." The prices are, he says, much reduced; and that is true, though, in the best shops, spectacles are still, we fear, considerably above his rates. He says—and we endeavour to act upon his prompting—"It cannot be too universally known, that a person can have a pair of good convex glasses fitted into his spectacles, and correctly fitted to his sight, at from one shilling and sixpence to two shillings per pair, by any respectable optician. The poorest person may be defended against the tender mercies of the spectacle speculators; for he really can obtain a better article for his money, both in quality and suitableness to his sight, of the respectable optician; and, upon an average, at a less cost than the cheat contrives, by dint of manoeuvring, to extract from him. Good lenses, in plain frames—or, in other words, a good pair of spectacles—may be obtained for two and sixpence. Who then, knowing this, would suffer his sight to be tampered with?"

Among our many useful societies, why is there not one to detect and expose fraud and quackery; instead of which, newspapers and magazines, the most respectable in character, minister daily in spreading the delusion of mischief. Where the article is only one that costs a little money, and can do no harm, the case is not so criminal, though to be cheated of property is bad enough; but in cases like bad spectacles, quack remedies for deafness, toothache, &c. &c., and quack drugs of all sorts, the medium of propagating the guilty fraud cannot be held blameless. It is mentioned in this treatise, that the cost for advertising quack medicines in the United States is 300,000 dollars annually! A peck of pills is considered necessary for Boston per day, and half a bushel for New York! On an average, only one in twenty-five who take them are actually sick; and the proportion of those dispensing with some necessary of life to purchase nostrums which do them positive injury, is in the ratio of eighty-seven in the hundred. Truly, the schoolmaster is still required in America, if this hold. Some of the anecdotes related of the hawking and advertising-spectacle-quacks are amusing, as this:—"A military gentleman of Stonehouse was waited upon by a renowned optical quack, who, the moment he entered the parlour, exclaimed, 'Goot Got, sar! vy, you are a goin' blind; the sight is leaving your left eye. If you don't immejantly take to my improved classes, I will not answer for the konserkences. Kataract will grow on it in one month.' The alarmed gentleman purchased two pairs, for which he paid four pounds. They were found to be quite unsuitable to his sight, and, in real value, at retail charges, worth ten shillings a pair; for they were glass, instead of pebble, as they had been represented. We can the more readily believe this and other stories of the sort, as similar things have been practised within the immediate circle of our acquaintance, either by the same professor or one of his brethren. But the world is growing wiser; and this small book will do its part in assisting to clear its eyes.

Egypt in 1838. By Thomas Waghorn, Steam-Agent in Egypt.

This gentleman is the devoted humble friend of Mahomed Ali; but, at the same time, he often speaks good sense, though he may carry his views farther than home-politicians are disposed to go. He contends, that, having already lost Turkey and Persia, by permitting Russia to creep on, the only remedy is to acknowledge Egypt an independent state; and for France, but especially England, to conclude an advantageous treaty with the new sovereign, whether Mahomed or Ibrahim. The advantages which he perceives to the trade and commerce of Great Britain, and the security of the East, menaced by the gradual inroads of Russia, are great and various; and all these are to be gained by guaranteeing the independence of Mahomed Ali, and giving him assistance and succour in his independent kingdom of Egypt. Mr Waghorn says his pamphlet is not written to please Mahomed Ali, or any party. It ought, however, to have that effect. He prophesies that, on the death of Ali and his son, the Arab tribes, whom Mahomed has brought to order, will become as lawless as before, and the hope of establishing a steam communication to India, through Egypt, be destroyed. He very plainly intimates that it is great folly to be too honest, when we have to countervene the crooked policy of such men as Talleyrand, Metternich, or Di Borgo, and when "the secret service money of England ought to be dealt out with secrecy and liberality, in order that we may cope with those diplomatists, and get secret treaties signed in our favour, as Russia does." The pamphlet is dedicated to Lord William Bentinck, who is called upon to exert himself in Parliament, to promote the independent sovereignty of Mahomed Ali, and the consequent happiness of millions. An appendix contains an official report of the present state of Egypt. The Pasha musters (at least, on paper) a formidable fleet and army. Education is flourishing, and commerce has most enormously increased under the administration of his Highness. In 1836, it amounted to 100,000,000 of francs. Finally, Mr Waghorn thinks that we expend too much time and pains about Ireland and Canada, and neglect our eastern policy, the encroachments of Russia, and the capabilities of Egypt.

Colour as a Means of Art. By Frank Howard.

We do not feel competent to pronounce a judgment upon this work; but we may explain its design. Its object is, to fix and develop, for the benefit of the student in painting, and the amateur, some of the acknowledged general principles of Colouring as a Means of Art, without reference to the higher attributes of great works in painting. The first chapter treats of Harmony and Tone of Colour. The author, after rules laid down for producing pictures in colour, treats in separate sections of the peculiar principle of the most eminent colourists—the principle of the Venetian school, the modern manner, and Turner's principles of colouring, which last we shall cite:—"Turner has controverted the old doctrine of a balance of colours, by shewing that a picture may be made up of delicately graduated blues and white supported by pale cool green, and enlivened by a point of rich brownish crimson. It requires some care in the production and shapes of the masses of blue and white, and in the situation of the point of colour. Another principle adopted by Turner is, to contrast rich autumnal yellow in the foreground, with a brilliant Italian blue sky, graduated through a series of exquisitely delicate pearly tints, to meet the cooler greens of the middle ground. The warm colours in the fore-ground are qualified by purple half tints, and supported by warm shadows and some rich crimson; or sometimes reduced to sobriety by the opposition of the bright orange and white." We have not space to enumerate the many topics treated in the third chapter.

The fierce antagonism of the hostile factions in colouring, which the writer merrily terms the Bianchi and the Neri, from another faction of dark and light, is treated in a manner not the less just and discriminative that it is lively and happy. He says—"The Neri complain that the Bianchi want tone—the Bianchi, that the Neri want purity and light. Each of these factions contends, that all the difficulty of fine colouring is to be found only in their own aim; while they hold in perfect contempt the productions of their opponents, as being of such facile achievement as to [deserve?] the sarcasm of Michael Angelo, to 'be fit only for children,' and beneath the attention of those who profess to study the Fine Arts. The main difference between the principles of these two parties or factions, will be found to lie in the treatment of the atmospheric influence, and associations previously alluded to." The principle of difference is illustrated very beautifully, as we think, by an author who sees truth on both sides, and also lying on neutral ground between the combatants. For himself, his idiosyncrasy points to horror of green and greenness; but it will give an idea of the tone of his instruction to cite his qualification of this dislike of greenness:—"But, in reservation, it must be repeated that there is no tint that cannot be controlled and made available, by great skill and management, to the purposes of Art. These warnings are for beginners and amateurs; and the work is intended to shew them what they may do with safety. As they attain proficiency, they may attempt difficulties, which principally reside in truth of detail, in combination with agreeable general effect. When to this is added, a just subservience to poetical character, the greatest requisitions of art have been complied with; all other difficulties, of whatever nature, being a mere species of mountebank trickery, beneath the aim of high art, and deserving of the well-known sarcasm of Dr Johnson upon some difficult music, that he wished it were impossible. There are a great many coloured plates, illustrative of the principle of the different masters and schools, and of the author's instructions.

Dr Roget's Treatises on Phrenology and Physiology.

Following a plan which we trust the liberal publishers will find remunerative, since it must be of great advantage to the interests of science and literature, the valuable contributions of Dr Roget to the new edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," upon the subjects in the above title, are reprinted in two volumes, of the size of the other reprints from that universal work. It is not every student who can afford to purchase a copy of the Encyclopædia—nor will many of those who could, care for much of its contents, which must be quite foreign to their studies, pursuits, and tastes. The publication of desirable detached portions of that great work, in which the views, discoveries, and opinions of the most eminent philosophers and literary men of the age, would otherwise be, as it were, locked up, cannot therefore be too highly appreciated in its popular utility.

Dr Roget's "Treatise on Phrenology" occupies the first part of the first volume. A luminous and most candid and impartial account of phrenology is given; and is followed by a masterly and equally candid statement of objections to the leading principles of the "new science." The whole occupies less than 100 pages. It would be desirable that this portion of the volumes were published separately. It is quite right that the phrenologists should have fair play, but they have at present all the play; chiefly because those who are most capable of the task seem to think the doctrines of phrenology unworthy of serious consideration. This half-contemptuous indifference may, however, be carried too far. In the conclusion of his treatise, Dr Roget, alluding to the alleged progress which phrenology has made, remarks:—

We do not think it difficult to account for the progress which phrenology has made, amongst the very numerous class of persons who find in it a source of agreeable occupation, giving exercise to their ingenuity, in discovering striking coincidences, and gratifying their self-complacency, by inspiring them with the fancy that they are penetrating far into the mystic regions of psychology. For the last twenty or thirty years, popular writers, and lecturers without number, have been displaying their powers of elocution, exercising their skill in the critical examination of developments, and expounding the doctrines of the new philosophy to wondering and admiring audiences. With all these advantages, and appliances to boot, the wonder seems not that phrenology has met with the success of which so much boast is made, but that it has not speedily gained the universal assent; for had it been a real science, like that of chemistry, and other branches of natural philosophy, founded on uniform and unquestionable evidence, it could not have failed, by this time, of being generally recognised as true. When we consider that the present age is not one in which there is any lack of credulity, or in which a doctrine is likely to be repudiated on the score of its novelty or its extravagance, we cannot but smile at the complaints of persecution uttered by the votaries of the system of Dr Gall; and at the attempt to set up a parallel between its reception in this country and these times, and that which, two centuries ago, attended the speculations of Galileo, and subjected him to the tyrannous cognizance of the Inquisition; or to establish an analogy between the dogmas of phrenology, and the discoveries of the circulation of the blood, and the analysis of light, which have immortalized the names of Harvey and Newton.

The phrenologists are by no means wanting in zeal and a proper respect for the "Science," and its discoverers and promulgators; but we were not aware they had carried No. 10 quite so far as this. Dr Roget acutely remarks—"There is this very remarkable peculiarity in the pursuit of phrenology, that the student is perplexed, not with the difficulty, but with the facility it affords for explaining every phenomenon." And he proceeds to shew the extreme pliability of the doctrines of Gall's philosophy.

In the Treatise on Physiology, that science is treated clearly, fully, and in the systematic manner which a masterly instructor might adopt for the benefit of his pupils. Everything belonging to the science, down to the latest discoveries and speculations of eminent modern physiologists, finds a place; and, throughout, the writer has adhered strictly to the subject before him, though it be one which strongly tempts wandering into other regions.

The Natural History of the Sperm Whale.

By Thomas Beale, Surgeon, &c. &c.

To the Natural and Commercial history of the Sperm Whale, Mr Beale has added an account of his South-Sea cruises in pursuit of these Leviathans, which, we dare say, will be found the more attractive portion of his well-filled volume. We can at least speak for ourselves—though there is also much curious information in the utilitarian portion of the book, and great excitement in the mortal warfare waged between human ingenuity and brute force. The first memorable adventure of the voyager was being hounded and robbed by a dæmnel belonging to a party of Arcadians near Coquimbo, in Peru. They had killed some whales before reaching Owhy-hee; in which island, he tells some stories, at second-hand, of the Missionaries, which require confirmation. "Mikanary no good" was the constant observation of the simple islanders. The voyagers had some interesting adventures on the coast of New Britain, and among the beautiful Lousiade Islands, and other islands which are seldom approached save by the whalers. At St John's Island, two days' sail from New Ireland, an islander practised nearly the same necromantic arts to lull the storm, of which we hear in Scandinavian and other northern legends, down to our own days; and of which Scott has made good use in his Norna of the Fitful Head. Mr Beale's description of this South Sea magician is exceedingly curious. The gale abated, he received a pair of old trousers and a shirt for his supernatural exertions, and certainly an augmentation of fame and power among his countrymen. The Ladrone Islands were next visited; and Mr Beale changed his ship, and returned from Japan in another whaler to the South Sea Islands. There appear to be Temperance Societies in these islands, or something similar, under missionary influence, the rules of which, as at home, are broken through hypocritically, under the strong temptation of the rum improperly offered in barter by seamen. Horrible is the picture which this voyager gives of the miseries inflicted upon these poor islanders by European intercourse, chiefly, we fear, that of his own countrymen, and certainly persons who are not missionaries.

Wayland on Human Responsibility.

This is an American book reprinted in London. The author is the President of Brown University, and a writer on moral science and political economy. Had all the men of Germany, England, and America been of President Wayland's mind, the world had never seen the Protestant Reformation or the American Revolution. For example, he condemns slavery as strongly as any man need do; but, as an American citizen, he says, and truly—"Who ever supposes himself guilty, because Congress does not pass a law abolishing slavery in the United States?" As a citizen no one is responsible; but, moreover, "as citizens of the United States we have solemnly promised to let it [slavery] alone." This he founds upon one State having no right to interfere with another. It is needless to follow this wire-drawn argument. A main object of the little book appears to be to attack the principle of the affiliated societies for the abolition of slavery, which are described as "not intended to circulate truth in the South, but for the sake of exciting agitation in the North." The same thing may be said, and has been said, of all associations whose objects have been at variance with the views or interests of their assailants.

Reminiscences of South America. By John Hawkshaw, Member of the Institution of Civil Engineers.

The author of this modest and intelligent volume went to Venezuela upon professional business connected with the mines. He resided in that country for two years and a half, when ill-health compelled him to return to England. He travelled, and looked round him a good deal; and his book is full of facts and interesting information, given in a clear and unpretending manner, about a country of which little is known in England. The Venezuelans are desirous of attracting more Scotch and English emigrants—miners, mechanics, and artisans—to the Republic; and to encourage emigration toleration in religion is proclaimed, and liberty given to heretics to erect places of worship for themselves.—We should like to give a specimen of the work, though it must be slight. The population of the Republic is roughly estimated at about 800,000.

The population consists of—whites, who may be divided into classes, those who are born in Europe, and those who are born in the country; Indians, or aborigines, who, as an unmixed people, form but a small part of the community; negroes, some of whom had been imported by the Spaniards, and some that had come from the isle of San Domingo, and runaways from the other neighbouring islands. But the larger portion of the population consists of a mixed race between the negro, the Indian, and the Spaniard; amongst this class there is every shade of colour, from the dark bronze of the Zambo, to the lighter shades of the Mulatto and Mestigo. These are gradually commingling, so as to form a race of coloured men of lighter shade than the aborigines, of stronger frame, and of greater activity of mind. More than one-half the population may already be said to have assumed this physical character, differing essentially from the originals from which they sprung; and, perhaps, this light yellowish-looking race may be the type of the future nations of South America. Much will depend on the number and the nation of the emigrants to its shores. Should a large proportion of these be whites, its coloured races will come to have less of colour; but at present it would seem as if these countries were not to be beneath the sway of the white man. He has had his foot upon the soil for centuries, but as an alien he has been cast off. The white man's caste was not there to be supreme.

In Venezuela, the highest offices of the state are open to the man of colour; Paez, the late president, being one of this class. In this country, therefore, the negro is not an object of prejudice; and, if free, immediately takes his stand as high up in the scale of society as his capacity and intelligence may entitle him.

The manners of the Venezuelans generally partake, in some degree, of that of the Spaniards, being tintured more or less with that kind of pride called Castilian; even the poems are embued with it. Perhaps their pride is increased by the consideration that they are "republicanos." They are polite in accosting each other, down to the very labourers; and in their gait and outward carriage they are more graceful and easy than my own countrymen. Their habits are not social—they rarely meet together in numbers at their own houses; their rendezvous is the theatre or the ball-room, the billiard-table or the bull-fight. The higher classes are neither ostentatious nor extravagant as it regards their houses and their mode of living; but on the contrary they are temperate, and almost frugal. Neither science nor literature has many cultivators, there being too much of indolence in the habits of the community to make them fond of study, or of anything requiring close mental application. A jealousy of foreigners prevails to a considerable extent; perhaps because they find themselves outstripped by them in commercial enterprise, or outshone by them in their establishments and greater means: hence the English, German, and American merchants are confined chiefly to associating with each other, except at public places. Occasionally they intermarry with foreigners, but even this is not effectual in removing the barrier to social intercourse. Apart from their want of cordiality with other nations, the Venezuelans have not yet learned to enjoy social meetings; and they have not yet acquired, to anything like an equal extent, the faculty so eminently possessed by two of the nations I have mentioned, of appreciating a good dinner.

The females, except at public places, are very rarely seen abroad; they stay much within doors, and, as far as it regards the cultivation of their minds, are much neglected. They play on the Spanish harp, and some on the piano-forte, and, like bullfinches, being fed and taught to sing, are deemed sufficiently accomplished for the sort of cages they occupy. I have omitted one accomplishment—they dance, and dance gracefully, (all Venezuelans dance,) but these are all externals, and outward polish—a polish, though, which sometimes makes even paste glitter; but in all the more substantial acquirements they are sadly deficient. Their gait is graceful, even among the lower orders, (though, I believe, Depons thought otherwise,) and in my opinion the females walk much better than in England, but this arises, in a great degree, from their having fewer objects; they are never hurried, and it is a country in which there is no bustle. Persons are never seen walking as if for their lives, and, in fact, there is no occasion for it. Their carriage, therefore, is such as may be acquired by persons who walk for the sake of walking only, not for the purpose of arriving at some place within the hour.

There is not much display of dress; the chief articles of finery, among the higher classes, are large tortoise-shell combs, of the most costly description, carved and pierced with all manner of devices; long black veils, which cover the head, and almost the whole person, and small satin shoes, and stockings displaying much workmanship. It is evidently upon these articles that the females bestow most attention, while the males lavish all theirs upon the furniture of their horse, studding the head-piece of the bridle and the saddle with as much silver as can be stuck on; and often having silver stirrups, and always silver spurs.

This fashion for silver spurs and rich bridles infects the lowest ranks; and I have known men spend all they had to procure them; and it is not unusual to see a silver spur buckled upon a bare foot.

Mr Hawshaw returned to England by way of America. As he has told the story of his outward voyage, and his travels, he concludes with his adventures during a very short residence in the United States.

Wild Sports of the West.

Bentley has published this lively and popular book, in a single volume, and as a part of his "Standard Library." It is illustrated with a few spirited and characteristic plates, representing boating, fishing, sporting, and festive scenes, in the West of Ireland—embellishments which it hardly required. It should have appeared before young men stuff, for the season, their fishing-baskets, shooting-bags, and their other ingenious contrivances for packing up artificial flies, shot, brandy-flask, and, above all, the favourite author; but there is a good time coming, and, in the meanwhile, they may have a store of amusement for the long nights of winter, and opportunities of study, previous to the Irish ramble of summer 1839, to the realms beyond the Shannon.

The Unity of Disease. By Samuel Dickson, M.D.

This gentleman was formerly a medical officer of the staff. He would seem to be now a practitioner about Cheltenham. Some time back he published a medical work, with the vigorous and original character of which, in spite of its bold heresies and reckless innovations, we were much struck. By the present work we learn, that the medical critics have fallen foul of the author; and persecution has had its natural effects in rendering Dr Dickson tenfold more violent in his professional heresy. Like all promulgators of new theories, he may carry his system too far; and there is little doubt that he generalizes too much; yet we are persuaded that much original truth is blended with his errors and innovations. To his anti-sangradoism, which is furious, commonsense and observation must, in the great majority of cases, subscribe. He has a very contemptuous opinion of "the wooden oracle"—the Stethoscope; and there can be no doubt that, whatever good its responses may have effected, its application has done a world of mischief, both to the patients and their friends. He certainly brings forward staggering objections to the reputed uses, or infallibility of the instrument. Dr Dickson confesses himself a Revolutionist in medicine; but so he says were Hippocrates, Galen, Boerhaave, and Cullen; and, if a revolutionist, he is not a sanguinary one. No medical student need be afraid to peruse the pages of this Destructive.

Observations on the Causes and Treatment of Curvatures of the Spine. By Samuel Hare, Surgeon.

This gentleman claims to have been, for ten years back, successful in treating the increasing and painful disease of which he writes, in all the forms which spinal distortion assumes. His remedies are chiefly mechanical, but medicinal treatment accompanies their application. They are far too complicated to be explained here; so we must content ourselves with pointing out to the profession, and to those interested—too large a portion of the female world—this source of information. Mr Hare has detailed many singular cases, and also their cures effected by his treatment. His book is illustrated by plates shewing many forms of distortion, and figures before and after cure.

Heads of the People.

A new work, in Numbers, has appeared, with the above inexplicable title, of which we are inclined to augur favourably. It is a little of the Pickwick school, and may be plainly described as sketches of Londoners; outlines of character in the ranks of the people. In No. I. there are four heads—"The Dressmaker," very fair; the Stockbroker," one of a past day, not amiss; "The Diner-Out," a failure; "The Lawyer's Copying-Clerk," a clerk in the first stage—the hobbledehoyish—is capital. There is much liveliness, wit, knowledge of life, and, what is better, of human nature, in these sketches; and in some of them, as "The Dressmaker," depth of feeling, and an acquaintance with the evils which corrupt and corrode society to its core. Such things continually represented to the public eye, though only in fiction, ought to produce the desire of reform.

Poems, Moral and Miscellaneous; with a Few Songs. By a Journeyman Mechanic.

This collection of fugitive and occasional poetry does as great honour to the moral feelings as to the poetical talents of the Mechanic. "'The Corn-Law Rhymers' is a king," said Thomas Carlyle, writing of Ebenezer Elliott's poetry. The "Journeyman Mechanic" is not an Elliott; but he also possesses gifts and privileges which many kings might envy, could they be made to comprehend and appreciate them. May he continue to make the same good use of them, for his own happiness and the pleasure and improvement of his fellow-creatures, that he has been doing. The little collection is dedicated to the Earl of Durham. Noble and munificent Lords have often patronized very inferior Poets. We have been looking for a specimen of the Mechanic's verses; but, as his masterpieces have already appeared in the periodical publications, we are at a loss what to take. The following lines are not in his happiest manner, but the subject is congenial. Burns belongs exclusively to the people. He who declared—

"The rank is but the guinea's stamp,
The man 's the gowd for 's that," has ennobled the lowest-born of the order of Nature's Poets. It was of him and them Robert Nicoll sang—

"Before the mightiest of the earth,
We stand with an unbentched brow,
Like us, Thou wast a toil-worn man,
And we are noble now!"

The Mechanic's effusion is in a softer spirit:—

"My footsteps tread on classic ground,
Where he, of Scottish bards the chief,
Erst made his witching wild harp sound
In notes of mingled joy and grief.

"Here, once in majesty and might,
He walked the earth on which I tread,
Illuming by his genius bright
Each lonely glen and mountain head.

"Here I could stay, and muse for hours
And list the gurgling river's moan,
As if it mourned for him whose powers
Gave all its fame, for ever gone.

"Perchance now, in the twilight hour,
When balmy dews from heaven descend—
When sings the blackbird from her bower,
Whose branches o'er the water bend—

"His wandering spirit hovers near
The scene of former bliss and wo;
Where once he wooed his Mary dear,
Then made her mournful requiem flow."

The New Excitement.

This yearly gift for young persons appears for 1839 at a cheaper rate, but in a form equally neat, and with contents equally attractive and interesting with those selections which have gained so favourable a character for "The Excitement." We would remind our readers that "The New Excitement" is, in fact, the original "Excitement," if the editor and compiler, and not the mere publisher, to whom the copyright has devolved by an accident, is to be regarded as the true author of the work.

SERIAL WORKS.

The Second Number of Dr Ure's "Dictionary of the Arts and Manufactures," contains very elaborate articles on calico-printing and bleaching; and useful familiar treatises on baking, brick-making, and bookbinding. It promises to be a highly useful work.

Conversations Lexicon.

The last Part we have seen of the "Conversations Lexicon," contains the important articles—"History of the United States," "Unitarianism," and "The United Brethren;" also the article "Universities." We imagine the work is nearly completed.

Dr BOWRING has published a paper, read by him to the British Association, upon the abolition of all quarantine regulations. This change he bases upon a belief in the non-contagion of the plague; but, waving a controversy on which doctors differ, and on which much may be said on both sides, the propriety of abolishing quarantine whether plague be contagious or not, remains to be considered; and, we imagine, opinion is in favour of abolition. Every merchant should read this pamphlet.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

ALMOST the only thing to enliven the dullness of the month which has occurred is the resignation of Lord Durham, which has afforded scope for ample commentaries, by the press of all parties. It is plain to us, that the real pacification of Canada is as distant as ever, and that the probability of that colony being ever rendered beneficial to Britain, is very small. In the meantime, the unsettled state of matters is proving highly injurious to the colony. A great proportion of the most active and enterprising of the colonists in both provinces, having been compromised in the revolt of last year, are leaving the colony, whilst emigration to it is all but entirely at an end. Indeed, few people will be inclined to run the risk of being called out on 'twenty-four hours' notice to fight, perhaps against their friends, and against the cause they think just; or, on refusal, to be executed as traitors. Mr Roebuck has again come forward as the zealous and talented advocate of the outraged Canadians, in a series of letters published in The Spectator newspaper.

NO. LX.—VOL. V.

An attempt appears to be making by certain parties in this country to involve us in a war with Russia; the ground of the quarrel not being, however, by any means obvious. The Russians are said to have a large fleet in the Black Sea; but we do not learn that it has been recently augmented. As to the notion that the Russians have any immediate design upon our Indian possessions, we believe it is a perfect chimera. War would, no doubt, be very convenient for the aristocratic parties of this country at present; for it would effectually put an end to what they most dread—the progress of Reform.

ENGLAND.

THE RUIN OF THE FARMER.—It is said that the Repeal of the Corn Laws would ruin the farmer. This is rather remarkable; for we have been told, for this quarter of a century, that he was ruined already; and the fact has been attested by a cloud of witnesses, whose printed evidence is a good horse-load. It is said that the landlords would not, and indeed could not reduce their rents, from the extent to which their estates are mortgaged; but it is forgotten that, after the termination of the war, the landlords found themselves compelled to reduce their rents, for the simple reason, that it is impossible for the great bulk of the farmers to pay higher rents than the produce of the soil yields. But there is a very easy mode of protecting the tenantry from the rapacity of their landlords; it is, merely to convert the money rents, now payable, into grain rents, in the following manner. Suppose the present rent to be £600; then find out from the annual returns of averages how many quarters of wheat, barley, or whatever may be the grain the farm produces, would have been required to pay £600 during the last seven or five years; and declare that number of quarters to be the rent during the currency of the existing lease. Suppose, for example, the average price of wheat during the period has been £3 per quarter; then 200 quarters of wheat should be declared to be the rent, payable according to the annual average. In this way, the tenantry would be effectually protected against their landlords, whatever might be the fall in the price of grain, which a repeal of the corn-laws might occasion. As is well known, the greater part of the rents in East Lothian, and in some other of the Scottish counties, are paid in this manner; and it has been found much more equitable both for landlord and tenant, than fixing a rent in money for a lease of nineteen or twenty-one years' duration. The truth is, that a much higher rent than the farm is worth, can never be exacted for any great length of time; for the farmer is ruined and forced to abandon his farm, and the farm itself is generally greatly deteriorated; on the other hand, if, from the increase in the value of agricultural produce, the rent becomes too low, the tenant enjoys the sole benefit at the landlord's expense. We do not think that the Corn-Laws can be continued much longer as at present. Every person proposing to take a farm, should protect himself against the effects of their repeal, by stipulating for a rent in grain. If, however, the emigration to Australia proceed as it has begun, we have every reason to believe that the competition for farms will diminish, and that the practice of offering high rents to get possession of a farm—in expectation that, if it is too dear, the landlord will reduce the rent—will be abandoned. It is to this practice that a great part of the agricultural distress so long complained of is owing.

SCOTLAND.

RECENT STATUTE LAW AFFECTING SCOTLAND.—It is very remarkable that, while the debates or talking in Parliament, excite so much interest that an account of them is spread, within a week, throughout the empire—even to the most remote villages—the acts, or what is done—the result, in short, of the debates—is looked upon with so much indifference that you will hardly find a person who is thoroughly acquainted with the legislation during the year, even affecting his own trade or business.

Any notice, even of the titles of the statutes, or of the subjects they embrace, is hardly to be found in a popular form; and it is not, therefore, to be wondered at that in almost total ignorance of the statute law pervades all classes of the community. Every year, there are from 800 to 1200 folio pages added to our statute book; which, from their style and form, are all but unreadable, even to persons of professional habits. The local acts, though printed, almost entirely escape public notice; and, when it is necessary to refer to them, there is generally the greatest difficulty in finding them out, as we have learned from experience. The regulations of these local acts are often very important. Far less attention is paid to them by the public than they deserve. They are not unfrequently smuggled through Parliament without due notice of their object; for, although certain advertisements must be made, the title is sometimes so vague that it gives no notice of the real purpose of the act. For example, the act authorizing the Edinburgh Water Company to borrow money, contains more important provisions, in as far as the public are concerned, than the original act. As a new reign has lately commenced, we think it a favourable period for beginning to give some notice of such of the statutes as peculiarly affect Scotland. Our limits do not permit us to furnish any abstract, but merely to indicate the subjects on which legislation has taken place. As all the acts passed in one session, properly speaking, form only one statute, we shall, in this article, notice all the public acts passed in session 1837, leaving such of the local acts as deserve notice, to next Register. The first act affecting Scotland exclusively, passed in the 7 Gul. IV., (last year,) was c. 5, by which the punishment of banishment, for a second conviction of leasingmaking, sedition, and blasphemy, was repealed, and fine and imprisonment substituted in its stead. The punishment of banishment, for a first conviction, had been repealed by a previous statute, passed in the 6 of Geo. IV. The only other, is c. 14, relative to bills of exception in trial by jury. The first statute of Victoria, relative to Scotland exclusively, is, 1 Vic. c. 23, abolishing the punishment of the pillory in all cases whatever. This is a very appropriate enactment for a maiden queen to commence her legislation with, in as far as concerns her northern subjects. By the acts 32—36 inclusive, no fewer than about 100 acts, and parts of acts, relative to the Post-Office, commencing in the reign of William and Mary, and ending in the reign of William IV., are repealed, and a new set of Post-Office regulations established. It is to be regretted that the whole previous statute law on the subject was not repealed, and a new and complete code established; but it appears, from a schedule appended to one of the statutes, that there are still parts of no fewer than twenty eight of the old statutes in force. A Post-Office lawyer must, therefore, be well read in statute law. Chapter 35 contains a list of all the persons who are entitled to send or receive letters free from postage, and the conditions under which the privilege is to be exercised. Chapter 39 interprets the meaning of the words, "sheriff," "shire," &c. in acts of Parliament relative to Scotland. Chapter 41 repeals the Small Debt Sheriff Act of 10 Geo. IV., and enacts a number of new regulations. The most important of these are the provisions for a cheap and easy sequestration of tenants whose rents do not exceed £8 : 6 : 8; for declaring the wages of labourers and manufacturers not liable to arrestment; regulating the manner in which arrestments in other cases are to be laid on, rendered effectual, and removed, and declaring that they shall fall in three months from their date. Witnesses are compellable to attend Small Debt Courts under a penalty of 40s. Actions of damages for riot, under the Riot Act, (4 Geo. IV.) and for penalties under the Act for Preserving Salmon Fisheries, are rendered competent before the Sheriff under this statute. Regulations are also made for the holding Circuit Courts for small debts; and the review of the decisions of the Sheriff, is still more limited than under the former acts. Two defects have already been discovered in this act. In the ordinary courts of law, six defenders, though entirely unconnected, may be sued in one summons; but it is held, by a rigid construction of the words of this act, that there must be a summons for each set of defenders, whereby an unnecessary expense is incurred. The other defect is in the regulation as to the sequestration of small tenants. By the common law, it is competent to sequester, not only for payment of rents already due, but for rents to become due; and, in case of danger of the sequestrated effects being carried off, to remove them to a place of safety. But no such power is given by this act; and it is held that it is only for rent already due that sequestration can be awarded, and that the effects cannot be removed from the premises. In this way, the benefit of a sequestration under this act, is greatly lessened. These defects are, we believe, quite unintentional. We hope that Mr Wallace of Kelly, to whom the people of Scotland are so much indebted for his efforts to procure for them the cheap administration of justice, will bring in a bill to remove them. Chapter 57 imposes a duty of 24s. per cwt. on beet sugar manufactured in the United Kingdom, and places the manufacture under the surveillance of the Excise. This act must, as was intended, effectually put an end to all attempts to manufacture beet-root sugar in this country. Chapter 61 extends the exemption from duty contained in a preceding act to two-wheeled carriages having the owner's name and place of abode painted in a certain manner thereon. The arbitration of disputes between master and workman is farther regulated by Chapter 67; and Chapter 73 contains some very important regulations regarding trading and other companies having numerous partners; and authorizes her Majesty to grant letters patent of incorporation, limiting the responsibility of the partners, and pointing out the manner in which they may sue and be sued, on compliance with certain conditions as to registration, &c. The Usury Laws are repealed by Chapter 80, in as far as regards bills of exchange and promissory notes, payable within twelvemonths of the date thereof; but this act is declared to be in force only till 1st January 1840. Such are the public acts of the year 1837, peculiarly affecting Scotland.

REFORM OF THE UNION.—NECESSITY OF LOCAL LEGISLATION.—The preceding notice of the legislation affecting Scotland at a most important period, shews how little of the time of Parliament is dedicated to our peculiar concerns. Out of a huge folio, there are not more than five acts, not exceeding twenty pages in all, in which the name of Old Scotland is to be found, or its existence recognised! How is this? In the statute-book of Scotland, the old Scotch acts—in three small octodecimo volumes of 500 or 600 pages each—we find from forty to fifty of printed, or, as they would now be called, public acts, besides local and personal, passed in a session which lasted a month or six weeks only. And if we look to these acts, we shall find that they are, at least, as important, in every point of view, to Scotchmen, as the modern legislation of the three kingdoms. To take, for example, the first year that turns up to us—1696—when the kingdom was in a state of quiet, (for so confident are we of the superiority of local to what is called “imperial” legislation—as if Victoria was an Empress and not a Queen—that no search is required.) and we find that the Scotch Parliament met at Edinburgh on the 8th September, and adjourned on the 12th October; during which period forty-six acts were passed, and, among others, the following relative to the law, which are of the most important nature, and which are almost wholly in force at this moment; the experience of a century and a half having been able to add little or nothing to the efficacy of the provisions—viz., the statute relative to deeds executed on death-bed, whereby Scotchmen have been in a great measure relieved from the persecuting intercession on the part of interested relations and of the church as to the disposal of their property in their last moments—a law which has met with the highest eulogies both within and without Scotland, whenever the nature of its provisions have been understood. We have the act declaring noteworth bankrupts, the unrepealed foundation of our existing law relative to bankruptcy; the act relative to the nomination of tutors and curators, whereby a father was, for the first time, empowered to place his children under due protection, between the ages of fourteen and twenty-one; the important act against blank bonds, which obviated numerous frauds, formerly in daily commission, and checked even high treason itself, by rendering it difficult for traitors to protect their landed estates from confiscation on conviction; an act for providing for the poor; another, (we wish we saw it repeated at this moment of starvation,) for “encouraging the import of victual;” the salutary act, establishing schools in every parish—an act which has universally been thought to have done more to promote the civilization, and to forward the progress of Scotland, than any other act, either of her own or of the British Legislature; acts against profanity, against the barbarous practice of duelling—a practice which estimates the value of men, not according to the higher qualities of the intellect, or moral feelings, but according to the lowest of all his qualities, those by which he is linked with the brute creation, and which not only brutes but birds possess in a greater perfection than mankind themselves. Then we have, passed in the same Parliament of four weeks’ duration, the statute ever since known, and justly, by the name of “The Act of Grace,” whereby the inhuman and atrocious privilege of imprisonment for debt received a severe check, by compelling the hard-hearted creditor, who wished to indulge his feelings for revenge—him who must have his pound of flesh—to support his victim in jail; a provision which, by setting avarice at war with cruelty, has saved the poor and inconsiderate, as well as those whose misfortunes no human sagacity could have foreseen, and no human industry or prudence averted, an infinity of suffering. To the same Parliament we are indebted for the introduction of summary diligence on inland bills of exchange, by which the utmost facility is given to the recovery of debts constituted by bill, and thus, much confidence is conferred on commercial transactions; a mode of execution which, we believe, no country in Europe has to this day been able to rival—for provisions affecting the registration of sasines, on which the validity of our land-rights depends; also for an act rendering those who interfere with the property of persons deceased without due authority, justly liable for the whole debts due by the deceased; and a variety of other acts, introducing important improvements into the law. In commerce, we have statutes relative to the manufacture of malt, brewing, the sale of meal, and for protecting the salmon fisheries, &c. In finance, there are statutes relative to the cess, excise, poll tax, coining and clipping of money, &c. &c.; and several other statutes relative to the security of the kingdom, and the raising of troops. What is not the least remarkable part of the matter is, that the whole forty-six acts are contained in forty-eight small octodecimo pages. Nearly the whole of those relating to the law are, to this day, in force, and all of them have not given as much trouble in their interpretation to our courts of law, short as they are, as the Judicature Act, the Cessio Act, or any act relative to the law which has been passed within the last quarter of a century.

No one, we imagine, will be so absurd as to pretend that the affairs of Scotland can be as efficiently managed by a legislative body sitting hundreds of miles from her territory, and having the interests of an empire dispersed over the whole face of the earth, and containing more than a hundred millions of human beings, to attend to, as by a Parliament meeting in Edinburgh. The Imperial Parliament is, in truth, unfitted for that department of legislation, called “local and personal.” Such legislation is best conducted on the spot, or as near as possible to the spot which is to be affected. Witnesses are then at hand, information can be got with expedition and at little expense; the members of a local parliament can be dismissed and again called together with little inconvenience. The expense at present necessarily incurred for a Road, a Harbour, or a Railway Bill for Scotland is intolerable.* The members of an Imperial Parliament, the great majority of whom must naturally feel indifferent regarding the failure or success of any such measure, can with the utmost difficulty be got to attend, or even to remain in the House when the matter is under discussion; and it is even not easily accomplished to get a quorum of the committee, to whom the Bill is remitted, to go through their routine duties. Then, all matters relative to Scotland are slurred over in the reports of the debates—first, because the reporters think a “Scotch” bill, though vitally affecting Scotland, is of no public importance; secondly, because they cannot intelligibly report what they, in general, do not understand; and, third, because “Scotch” business is generally put off till past midnight, an hour at which, except on extraordinary occasions, the reporters, by a well-organized combination—Whig, Tory, and Radical reporters agreeing in this point—retire from their labour. The consequence is, that there is hardly a measure, however important, affecting Scotland, of the grounds for passing which her population are duly informed. All that they see of a long debate on a subject in which they perhaps take the most intense interest, is a line or two in which the very title of the bill is probably bungled, and its object misrepresented. We think it full time that this system should be remodelled. The Imperial Parliament has not time, in this age of speechifying and infinite gabble, were it otherwise qualified, to do anything like justice, or even to get through with decency, the business before it. The Sessions have, of late years, been lengthened more and more, and the daily period of sitting goes on increasing, till not only the faculties of the Members are obviously obscured, but their health impaired, and their lives themselves shortened. Besides, the long residence of the Members—the richest and most influential members in society—proves eminently prejudicial, not only to Scotland but to Ireland and the parts of England itself femote from the metropolis. Hence, all the evils of absenteeism. We have not, at this moment, out of eighty-nine Scotch nobility, one resident in Edinburgh, and very few of our considerable landed proprietors. Their visits, even to their estates, are short and far between, whereby the tenantry and peasantry on their estates are deprived of their aid and countenance in useful schemes; and excluded from the consumption in their own district, and among themselves, of those fruits which their own industry and labour have created. Of much, if not all of these evils, an Imperial Parliament, sitting for three-fourths of the year in London, is the cause. And not only ought we to have a legislature for our own local concerns sitting in Edinburgh, but similar legislatures should be established in York, Manchester, Bristol, and in London itself. Ireland would require at least two—one in Dublin, another at Belfast, Londonderry, or Cork. One of the mischiefs attending the present lengthened sittings in Parliament, which ought not to be overlooked, is, that it limits the choice of Members, and confines it almost exclusively to the landed interest. No person engaged in any extensive business, except in London, can afford to represent a constituency. Nor is it certain that even the payment of Members would extend the choice to eligible men, not in independent circumstances. Many fit persons would not choose to give up their business and go into Parliament, although insured of £300 or £500, for one year. Were, however, our Sessions as short as those of the old Scotch Parliaments, or of the United States, the encroachment upon other pursuits would be so inconsiderable as not to prevent the most able men, and the best men of business in the country accepting the office of representative. What is meant by a Repeal of the Union with Ireland, we do not exactly understand; but if all that is intended is, that the Irish should have the management of their own exclusive concerns, we heartily wish them success; and we hope that, when the people of Scotland shall see the necessity of a legislature in Edinburgh, the Irish will assist them in obtaining it.

* One thousand pounds a-mile, even in long lines, is not an exaggerated estimate for the mere Parliamentary expenses of obtaining the Bill!

IRELAND.

RAILWAYS.—The Irish seem to be using every effort at present to get farther grants of the money of the people of Great Britain for local improvements. At a meeting held at the house of the Earl of Charlemont, lately, the line of railway from the north of Ireland, recommended by the Government Commissioners, was approved of; but, instead of forming a company to make the railway, a committee was appointed to see how much money could be got from Government for the purpose. The Duke of Leinster read an address to the Queen, strongly recommending railways as the means of employing the poor. It is not said, but is of course taken for granted, that, although this employment of the poor must benefit the Irish landlords, they are to be paid out of the general revenue of the three kingdoms. When so much public money is yearly expended on Ireland, why should not Scotland have some small share? Why should not the Edinburgh police be paid out of the Consolidated Fund as well as the police of Dublin? Why should Scotland not be surveyed by Government, to discover the most eligible lines for railways as well as Ireland; and, if the Irish are to be assisted in making them, why not also the Scotch? Two and a half millions of Scotchmen paid in 1832 £5,113,353 of taxes—eight millions of Irishmen, only £4,292,445. Scotland is surely entitled to the difference between the two sums, the more especially as her government does not cost probably one-fifth of that of Ireland. For one soldier in Scotland, there are at least eight in Ireland. The people of Scotland have good reason to complain of the apathy of their Members in not procuring grants of public money. For our own parts, we think that there ought to be no such thing as such grants; for no more taxes ought to be raised than is necessary for the general government and the defence of the country against external enemies; and we cannot see why a man in Scotland should be taxed for building a harbour or making a railroad in Ireland, which he may never see. But, if the system of public grants is to be continued, we in Scotland ought, in justice, to be allowed to draw out of the Exchequer in something like the proportion we pay in. If it be objected to this reasoning, that the cause of Ireland being so expensive and so little productive of revenue, is misgovernment—we answer, Then remove that cause—abandon the misgovernment—do justice to Ireland; but let there be no grants from the general funds for local purposes.

MANUFACTURES AND COMMERCE.

A treaty of commerce has been concluded with Austria, which has opened up several important markets to British enterprise. Sugars have been transmitted by the Elbe into Bohemia, large quantities sent to Trieste, and at Vienna extensive sales of British produce have been made. By the above treaty, English vessels are permitted to trade with the countries of the Danube.

AGRICULTURE.

Ayrshire.—The taking up of the potato crop, was interrupted by falls of snow, and part of the crop, which is at any rate deficient, has been injured by the frost. Fife-shire.—As late as the first week of November, many fields of grain in the high, and some even in the low districts, remained uncut. A considerable proportion of the crop, particularly beans and oats, was still in the field. The hurricane of the 11th October did great damage; for nearly half of the oat crop was uncut, and from six to eight bushels an acre were shaken out. The high wind was followed by hard frost, which rendered a considerable portion of the unripe oats and beans almost useless. Barley is found to be a light crop; wheat under an average, both in quantity and quality; and, from shaking and frost, the produce of the oat crop will also turn out deficient. Potatoes also, though good in quality, are a small crop. East Lothian.—The hurricane of the 11th, caused a loss, at least equal to the seed, in every uncut crop. Potatoes, on fine soils, are of fine quality and tolerably abundant; yet the crop will hardly amount to an average. The turnip crop is deficient, and, in many cases, a total failure. Prices, when to be consumed on the farm, have been from £6 to £8 per acre, and when very good, from £10 to £12. The weather has been favourable to wheat sowing. Markets are rising steadily, both in this country and on the Continent. Potatoes, which, in Edinburgh, two years ago, were selling at 8s. a boll, are at present 15s.
