My observations, however, were not always equally favourable to Alphonse. There was a young peasant girl, in a clean starched lace cap, with pink riband, and a close-fitting chintz boddice, who appeared to me to descend at very extraordinary hours the escalier de service; and I could never perceive that she ascended higher than the floor of his apartment. She was evidently one of the pretty paysannes from the côte of Sarasne, where Monsieur de Lingot has a villa; but from the caution with which the damsel was escorted in and out of the house by Felix the valet, I could see that she had no legitimate pretext for her visits. I wish poor Perrette had not made her entrance so late, or her exit so early. There was something crooked in the business. One day I traced her distinctly into Alphonse's sitting-room, with her apron to her eyes; and in the course of the same day, the old banker, whom I never before beheld in his son's apartments, was closeted with him for more than an hour. I never saw the starched cap on the third-floor story after that morning. Alphonse was sadly out of spirits for nearly a month afterwards; but there was no yawning—no lounging with a meerschaum, as during the reign of the lady of the green and silver chasseur. On the contrary, he sat hour after hour, reading soberly near the window, where stood a flower-pot of sweet basil—too humble a thing to have been anything more than a village offering.

Soon afterwards, the neat court-yard of the banker was littered with straw; waggons and carts were packing, and post-horses arriving, with prodigious cracking of whips, to carry off two coachfuls of the Lingot family to their country-house near Lâon. I grew sad when I saw the young ladies' saddle-horses led away in their stable-cloths, and Madame Paul's gay britschka attached to the rear of one of the waggons. I knew by experience what a vacuity it would cause in my life to look out upon a silent court-yard, green with weeds, and rows of shuttered windows, instead of upon the gay doings of the wealthy family. They departed. Not a creature was left in the hotel but the compting-house slaves, and the porter and his wife, from whom I could have found it in my heart to ask for the gift of the pot of basil, which stood drooping on Alphonse's window ledge. In spite of occasional showers, the plant withered in the summer drought: grew first yellow, then brown—at length, the gnats disdained to swarm round it any longer—it was dead!

Early in September, (a month previous to the usual return of the family to Paris,) I perceived an unusual stir in the hotel. The window-shutters of a hitherto uninhabited second apartment on the second floor, were thrown open; the smell of paint soon became perceptible; then came paper-hangers; then upholsterers; then delicate curtains of figured muslin were fluted into the windows, and I discovered no more of what was passing within. The family took possession of the hotel for the winter. The dinner bell rang, and the gas flamed as usual on the stairs. The maitre d'hotel cut up his capons, and the young ladies resumed their rides in the Bois. In winter, I was always accustomed to see less of Alphonse; so that I was not surprised to hear no gay laughs, and no snatches of opera tunes from his window. Before Christmas, however, I saw him cross the court-yard one morning in a toilet of unusual elegance. Staub and Blin had evidently done their best; and the hand of Boivin was discernible in the folds of his cravat. The court-yard soon became filled with carriages; and that evening every window of the hotel was streaming with lights. It was clear that Madame de Lingot had commenced her soirées several weeks earlier than usual.

I now noticed that Alphonse's shutters were rarely opened. He was perhaps gone to Compiègne or Fontainebleau, for a partie de chasse; or his father might have despatched him in his place to Germany, on some commercial speculation. He was a loss to me. I almost ceased to interest myself in the affairs of the house. At length, having drawn one afternoon towards the window, to extricate a hair from my pen, I plainly saw my young friend hand a pleasant-looking girl into a handsome chariot in the porte cochère; and, when it had driven off, return slowly into the house. Nevertheless, the shutters of the third floor were as strictly closed as usual. Where could he be lodged? The truth glanced into my mind—Alphonse was married! The pretty girl and chariot were his property; and the apartment with the fluted muslin curtains, the retreat of their honey-moon!

It was now with a very heavy heart that I gazed upon the closed Persiennes of the third floor; for I knew that there would be no more joyous Sunday morning meetings—no more fencing bouts—no more sparring—no more Postillon de Long jumeau! When spring dawned, the windows were daily thrown open by the frotteurs of the house; but the rooms within had a look as though their owner was dead. No muslin curtains to the windows—no sheets on the single bed—no stirring about of the crimson dressing gown—no examining of flints, or crossbows, or Lepage's pistols. By some strange oversight, the pot of dead basil, instead of being wholly removed, was pushed out of sight upon the leads, where it was visible only to myself from my opposite window.

No one ever seemed to enter the rooms but the frotteurs and the spruce valet, who had replaced Felix, and came occasionally to dust the arms, suspended in racks to the wall, and certain wild boars' heads, which hung in the fencing room, as trophies of Alphonse's hunting feats. These seemed to be attacked by moth; for, in the month of March, five grinning monsters were hung out of the windows to take the air, displaying their fangs to me for several weeks, in place of the joyous countenances of Alphonse and his companions.

Thus passed away a twelvemonth. My favourite was lost to me. More frequent dinner parties were given in the state-rooms below; and my rest was oftener disturbed by calling up the carriages for Madame de Lingot's ball. But, throughout that winter, I saw no masquerade dresses carried up the back stairs—no billet-doux—no gay sledges dashing over the snow. And when May brought into their flush of bloom, the two venerable old trees, which twist their trunks in the court-yard, instead of accompanying his young sisters in their ride to the Bois, I more than once observed him saunter into the chariot of his young wife, whose step was now growing as heavy as the countenance of her husband.

At the end of the year, when the family returned as usual from their country seat, I began to detect the form of Alphonse wandering occasionally like a spectre through his old apartments. My favourite had lost his gallant air and smiling countenance; but I knew him in a moment. He went there apparently to peruse and answer certain private letters, and was apparently careful to bolt the doors on his arrival; for I never saw any person follow him to his retreat, though, more than once, while he was ensconced there, a white hand drew slightly aside the fluted muslin curtains of the second floor, and a female head inclined, as if gazing down into the court-yard towards the stables, to ascertain whether the truant were betaking himself to his tilbury or saddle-horse for an excursion; or whether his pretext were true of repairing to the banking-house to please his father by a diligent day's work. I almost feared his marriage might be a less happy one than I could desire. The bride was, of course, wealthy; because the extent of Alphonse's fortune must, according to French custom, decide the amount of her own. But had she been in all else equally worthy of him, how was I to account for the many a half hour I now beheld him pacing up and down those cold cheerless rooms, as if any escape from his own were acceptable to his feelings?

At length, I was witness to an incident which, with all my partiality, I could not altogether approve. One morning last summer, soon after daybreak, I beheld Alphonse sidgiting up and down his old chamber, and looking every now and then at his watch, as if expecting some person by appointment. Was it a dun? No. The overflowing prosperity of the Lingots forbade all idea of such an alarm. Affluence poured its treasures upon their heads; and everything in the house seemed to move on invisible golden castors. It certainly was not pecuniary difficulty which caused the untimely restlessness of the second son on the second floor.

The mystery was soon explained. There scudded along the court-yard a woman, holding a young child in her arms, who, from her air and the direction she was taking, I conceived to be the wife of one of the coachmen or grooms. But, no!—she entered the side door, and ascended the escalier de service! I saw her pause at the back door of Alphonse's rooms, unpin and repin her shawl, shake the summer dust from her feet, and occupy several minutes in adjusting the simple dress of her little boy. Yet all this preparation was not coquetry. I am convinced the young woman was only taking time to recover herself, and that she scarcely knew what she was doing. On lifting up her head from leaning over the child, her eyes were red and her cheeks colourless; and it was then I recognised the face once so blooming under the starched cap with pink ribbons, and now so care-worn under the bonnet demonstrating that the peasant girl was metamorphosed into the Parisian bourgeoisie.

She knocked, and was instantly admitted. It was wonderful with what emotion Alphonse de Lingot strained that little fellow in his arms, kissed his fair cheeks, examined his little limbs, and even took the rude shoe from his little foot, as if curious respecting the conformation of the child. I never saw a finer boy; and Alphonse seemed to think so too, for he was never weary of admiring him and covering him with kisses. The mother stood weeping humbly at a distance, as though overpowered by this tenderness towards her offspring. But I saw no more. I fancy I was weeping too!

GLIMPSSES OF THE WESTERN CORNER OF FAIRYLAND.

"THE Mussulmans," says a pleasant writer of the last century,* "are immutably preposessed that, as the earth approaches its dissolution, its sons and daughters gradually decrease in their dimensions. As for Dagjal, they say he will find the race of mankind dwindled into such diminutive pigmies that their habitations, in cities and all the best towns, will be of no other fabric than the shoes and slippers made in these present ages, placed in rank and file in seemly and regular order—allowing one pair for two round families." Without assenting to this whimsical prognostication as to the consequences of the world's age, we cannot but remark how ancient and sedate it has grown. The freshness of its youth has departed; if, indeed, it have not absolutely assumed periwig and spectacles, relictis nucibus. We sit and wonder at the rapid strides of a spirit of inquisition which is now marching "from Indus to the Pole," armed, as it were, with a fan, or rather a pair of bellows, which send such searching blasts into every nook and cranny of the mind, that not only the dust and spider-work collected there from time immemorial, but many graceful and shade-loving fancies also, which were wont to shelter there, have been scattered to all the winds of heaven. We are bound to believe that much good will result from this energy of extermination, even as the tropical islands are said to profit by their tornadoes. But the process is rather alarming to persons of sensitive nerves; and at present the strong wind, as it scatters the vapours which, hanging over the precincts of hoar superstition, were wont to wreath themselves into many shapes of majesty or dim loveliness, has rendered the atmosphere heavy and stifling with the dust and chaff, and dry leaves and twigs, which it has stirred up and driven before it. We are sufficiently old-fashioned to mourn over the broken fragments of eld, and to utter a mental complaint as we behold the harmless fears, and prepossessions, and popular traditions of a bygone time, perish like May-bloom in a sudden east wind.

Elves and hobgoblins have left us. Go where you will, you shall not find one learned disciple of the Rosy Cross who can reason of the occult properties of precious stones, or cast a nativity. Of witches, also, there is no more report; and there is not now, we believe, a straw periapt to be met with at the threshold of any ancient woman in the kingdom. Dr Brewster has given the coup-de-grace to all ghosts, incubi, and wraiths whatsoever. Comets appear, and the enlightened public, peering through their telescopes, dream not of "pestilence or war;"—an eclipse makes a holiday; and the awe that once attended the hiding of the eye of heaven is now replaced by curiosity, strong in science, and aided by smoked glass. There is not an old hall in the country where you could catch a glimpse of Simkin or Brownie. John Stump is turned philosopher, laughs at "the boggart" whose deeds are recounted by his grandmother, and reads the Penny Magazine in place of "God's Revenge against Murder." In short, there is not a sprite or demon left; and the fairy-rings are turned up by the plough, or covered with smoking brick-kilns.

Passé encore for omens—even dreams have lost their solemnity. It is not a week since we were struck by an instance proving how far we have proceeded beyond all faith in the supernatural:—A small circle of strangers, each of different habits and professions, were discoursing on the subject of dreams. From one of the speakers we had expected something cordial. He was neither tradesman nor savant, but a man careless of polemics or politics—a quiet man—a brother of the angle—and, therefore, of necessity, a frequent visitant of the undisturbed haunts of nature. We did not ask from him any recollection of the Homeric adage, so impressively revived by the German *Æschylus—for he was no learned Theban; yet something like this, we fancied, might have been whispered to him in his waking dreams beside some mountain lake, as he gazed on the floating clouds mirrored on its bosom. Alas! our angler was a greater philosopher than all the rest; for, rising, as he spoke, with an air of egregious self-complacence, "For my part," he said, "I know that dreams are merely affections of the stomach!"—a decision no less new than logically precise in terms. There was nothing more to be said—voilà le procès tout vuide. We are not quite sure that Helvétius or Voltaire would have been proud of their unconscious disciple.

All such as retain in secret a belief in invisible powers—they who in humility conceive that there may exist, in the outer as well as in the inner world, mysterious impulses and combinations, inscrutable by actual touch, and transcending the expressions of an algebraic formula—they who feel that, at times, the soul would utterly faint and grow withered, had it no refuge from the pursuit of pressing realities in a less material world, towards which its indomitable yearnings are evermore directed:—these have, indeed, fallen upon lonely and evil days. They must relinquish the sympathy of their fellows the instant they seek to approach the Land of Visions. The portal through which they would escape from the hot arena of actual cares to a calmer scene is condemned and walled up: if they climb over or creep under the barrier, it must be in secret and alone. The domain they have entered is under ban: when they return from thence let them seal up their lips, and breathe no syllable of what they may have seen, lest their wiser brethren cry out upon them as Mandeviles and lying Psalmanazars. Yet it were hard to abstain from all communion touching the wonders of that Land of Discovery. And it is well for those against whom the world would exclaim as dreamers, that they may at least find, amidst the neglected records of the past, the utterances of a kindred reverence for the mysterious and wonderful, which it would now be folly to seek elsewhere.

And what, after all, is our gain, when, under the pretence of a larger philosophy, we have clipped the wings of the human mind, thereby reducing homunculus to a truly unfledged biped? There are cravings in the soul of man which will not be stilled by epigrams, or satisfied with systems wherein its main want is utterly overlooked. It is easy to cry out delusion, brain-sickness, ignorance, superstition; but this, after all, will not quiet the restless eagerness born within us. Not all the theories ever invented can wholly reduce our being to a mere life-machine—a moving puppet in the world's Bartholomew Fair: no more than can the surgeon, by lopping off a limb, destroy the nervous sensation which still seems to animate the severed part. And where, in the name of all human sympathies, shall the amputation stop? What is the fervid enthusiasm of love—the energy of hatred—the foretaste of posthumous renown—the reverence which honours the tombs of departed worthies, or the scene ennobled by some great deed?—what is the charm of poetry—the witchery of music—the awe inspired by mighty Niagaras and sky-piercing Alps; nay, what is our belief in a True—a Right—a Soul—that may not, in like manner, be stripped of all that is exquisite, or beautiful, or solemn, as idle sprouts of the imagination, fancies of brain-sickness, and superstitions unbecoming the manhood of mind; or be pared down to the meagre growth sufficient for the purposes of an ungenial and thoroughly-selfish world-wisdom? Were it not better, considered as a matter of profit only, to examine if there be not, in the source of the wildest errors and absurdities (if it so please you) of credulity, some principle to be trained rather than uprooted—some faculty which may enable the soul to attain to a higher conception of its existence and powers—some gift whereby the beautiful may be wooed to mingle more intimately with the needful? Surely this were no small gain; the attempt to discover it would also, we conceive, be more truly philosophical than the opposite process generally adopted.

A glimpse of this truth appears to have visited even that arch-sceptic, Voltaire, when he wrote:—“Il semble que toute superstition ait une chose naturelle pour principe.” But let us hear a few words on this head, from a thinker of a different stamp. “Superstition,” says Jean Paul—“for which it might at times be well to choose a gentler name, as, for example, *ultra-belief—is in man's spirit a phenomenon far more sublime than the common errors wherewith it is generally confounded. For other errors are not, like this, bound up with feelings that endure when the errors themselves are removed. Superstition is properly a belief, true in itself, but applied to inconsistent objects; it errs rather as to the place than as to the existence of the spiritual world, which announces and discovers itself to our internal consciousness without the aid—nay, in the very teeth of our daily outward perceptions.” And, in another passage, brief, yet pregnant with meaning, he remarks—“We can as little attain to a conception of the miraculous, by mere gradual extension of power, as arrive at an absolute quantity, by means of approximations or infinitesimal series. Thus, superstition must be considered, in the abstract, as the poetry of reason.”

But this is not the place, nor are we at the present moment in a mood suited to the prosecution of inquiries, the gravity and importance of which deserve a wider field and more sedulous attention than can be afforded here. The chief object of the foregoing hints has been to relieve ourselves from the apology which many readers may consider to be indispensable from one who, in this age of “illumination,” loiters in the twilight of forgotten creeds, or recalls the shadows of a more credulous time from their slumber amidst obscure chronicles and moth-devoured romances. We have even now, in our mind's eye, a vision of the magisterial sneers which this announcement will set in motion on the lips of the sagacious. Something might be said in reply to such, who are not unfrequently better stored with gibes than with efficient reasons; but we are at present in no polemical vein, and shall be abundantly contented to remain the object of compassionate or scornful remark to all such intellectual superiors, provided they will allow us to ramble unmolested, for a while, amidst the regions of old tradition and romance, now rarely visited but by the antiquary. We have been haunted by voices from Fairyland, calling to us, night and day, to declare something of what we have gathered there. There are seasons (to us the spring appeals most imperatively in this wise) when the desire to revisit the scenes, to recover the sensations of youth, becomes a passion, and a fever that can only be cooled by full draughts from the fountain of old poetry and fiction—the drops of which, sprinkled over the dry path before us, bring to life, for a while, the feelings and hopes of a time long left behind. And surely it is not less wholesome than delightful, when weary and restless, and exceedingly wroth with all present things, to wander for a season, in search of serenity and forgetfulness of care, amidst fairies, and elves, and Arabian genii, believing, and wondering, and rejoicing, even as of old.

In our next excursion, Deo volente, we shall present to the ingenuous reader, the fruit of long from the turn of aberglauben (superstition) into ueberglauben (literally over, or ultra-belief.)

* It is impossible to transfer to our own language the expressiveness of this alternation in the German, arising and pleasant meditations upon the histories of Thumb, Jack the Giantkiller, and Sir Thomas Hickathrift, Knight, not omitting some notice of Cinderella, and other renowned personages. Our late wanderings, however, have been in a region less familiar, perchance, to some of our readers—amidst ancient lays and fabliaux of Provence, and France, and Almain, from whence we now would fain summon a few beautiful or pathetic records of the spiritual world.

In no era has the unconscious worship of the beautiful given birth to an ideal more exquisite than the fays or fairies, as they appear in the old fabliaux. We know not how the visions were first revealed to the men of the rude period in which they first meet our eye; they were assuredly no offspring of mere fancy, although modern invention, however superior in splendour and completeness, has created nothing more exquisitely lovely in essence and general form. We are inclined to believe that, in the infancy of nations, the intimations afforded them of whatsoever transcends their narrow experience in the regions of beauty or mystery, are of the nature of immediate revelations, which are thus poured forth on rude and ignorant races, with greater vividness and purity, in as much as, without this immediate aid, they must remain dark and invisible. The stream is wider, but more remote from its well-spring, as it flows down amidst later races, and its current is mingled with others, whereof the clearest is still Poetry. At the source, it gushes forth, alike single and fresh, as a spring of fable, or song, or music; there needs no bridge or boat to approach it—all that have thirst can stoop down and drink freely. Thus, we must conceive of early song, of early tradition, not as invented, as having been produced by any intermediate process or combination of faculties, but as springing up from the depths of the human heart, immediately touched by the wand of the Immortal. The fables now present to our recollection are imbued with the very life of beauty and tenderness; they are impersonations of that faith in the infinity of love, and that intense longing to possess it, to which the deepest chords of the human heart vibrate. But the squire, or chieftain, or serf, as he panted or wept in listening to the tale, to him, as full of authority as gospel writ, knew not to what faith his feeling was paying homage.

The beings whose appearance imparts the chief grace to the romance of the middle ages, and whom, in default of a more particular designation, we are compelled to term fairies, must not be confounded with the tiny folk whose moonlight gambols used to enliven the forest glades of our island, known to the Irish and Scottish peasant by the name of "the good people," or "the good neighbours." Those of whom we speak—called, in the Latin of the middle ages, Fada, in old French Faies or Fées, in the Gothic Feine—were creatures of a superior, and, in some respects, more interesting description. It is uncertain at what period they first became known. Some regard them as descendants of the Nymphs,* converted, from their old heathenish attributes, to a more Christian way of living. Gervase of Tilbury does not scruple to term them devils and ministers of evil, and classes them, in one sweeping list of denunciation, with incubi, spectre horses, larvæ, and other such unclean spectres. But he was a solemn pedant, with little perception of beauty, and just enough affectation of superior wisdom, to render his credulity the more ludicrous. We love the old man, nevertheless; but it requires all our love to win him forgiveness for this discourtesy towards our favourites. The relation between the nymphs and the fairies is, perhaps, no more than that which arises from the impulse, common to all poetical ages, to people the fair and quiet places of the earth, with beings of more than human loveliness, yet partaking, in some measure, of the sympathies and sorrows of human nature; an impulse proceeding from the innate striving in man's heart towards the infinite—which we must call a belief, rather than a superstition. To the believers in the early days of romance, these beings were known as something between women and angels—as spirits tinged with sadness, as in some measure fallen from a higher state, yet still possessed of power and passing beauty, and prolonged, if not immortal youth. This condition of their existence gave additional tenderness to the character of their intercourse with mortals fallen like themselves. They are invested in the old lays with all that imagination delights to picture as most exquisite in women—loveliness, fond affection, constancy, generous forgiveness, and an especial regard for the gallant and daring. They are capricious, like other beauties, and easily angered, but not implacable; the records of their histories represent them as benefactors—too often, alas! repaid with inconstancy or ingratitude, or suffering from the faithlessness or ill-timed curiosity of those to whom all had been given on the sole condition of observing the law of secrecy, or occasional absence imposed by their destiny. Is not this the moral of many another tale of love? It is, however, nowhere more touchingly told than in the old romances before us. But we will choose, for the first of our remembrances, a more cheerful theme—the love, not ill-required, of the brightest of all fairies, Morgana.

It is well known that King Godfrey of Denmark espoused Glorianda, daughter of the valiant Danemund, and by her became the father of Ogier, called the Dane, than whom was none braver of all the Paladins of Charlemagne. He was born under a happy star, like that noble Cid que en buena ora nació; and great were the rejoicings in Fairyland on the occasion. Around his cradle stood the brightest fays, each bearing some gift or charm to endow the child withal. One gave him valour; another, grace; and a third assured him good fortune in the field ; her sister, success in lady's bower. But the beautiful Morgana looked on, giving nothing ; yet, more generous than all the rest, (or more selfish) she promised him in her heart the treasure of her love, when he should be of years to enjoy it. She had fixed her choice on an earthly lover, and wisely waited to declare it until all gifts, save that most precious of all, had been shed upon him. Under his fairy guardians, Ogier grew and prospered amazingly ; slew Saracens by hundreds ; and was foremost wherever los was to be won by the free hand or the strong arm. Morgana, though unseen, was ever at his side, shielding him in battle, and watchful of every occasion to render him more worthy of her love. She needed not to fear that Time, by fading her charms, should chill the ardour of her lover, but patiently waited for years ; and then only—when his fame could require no addition, and his prowess was sung wherever the harp was heard—did she withdraw her hero to the happiness reserved for him in her enchanted island. Here death is unknown ; and the joys that inhabit the magic bowers are as unfading as their spring. For a season, indeed, two hundred years after his disappearance from Earth, did Ogier return, to rescue his native land from the Saracen. His brow was as smooth and eye as bright as ever, when he rose up by the side of Hugo Capet, and aided him to destroy the infidel invaders. And now that the soil is free once more, he returns to his beautiful Morgana, nor shall he be seen on earth again. It was a favourite task of the Trouveurs to describe the gardens where the warrior lives, blessed with the love of his fairy ladye ; and to them we owe the bowers of Alcina, and the magic paradise of Armida, which supplied Ariosto and Tasso with materials for their most luxuriant strains. Yet the fairest charm is lost in these revivals of the old legend. The spirit which inhabits the magic world of these great poets is love, indeed ; but love defiled by evil witchcraft and unhallowed agency. We dwell with greater delight on the older lay ; it is less rich, but nothing disturbs the delicious character of its tenderness. Yet, in the great poets we have mentioned, and in their immortal follower, our own glorious Spenser, it is delightful to observe how the light of a beautiful thought, although robbed of one of its fairest hues, will diffuse itself like a river of splendour over the fields of poetry.

Morgana was one of the most absolute and triumphant of her race. She was, as far as we can learn, independent of destiny, and owed no allegiance save to her own sweet will. When she chose to love, the idea of doubting if her love would be returned, never entered her beautiful head. Nor had it need ; for none could behold the most radiant of the fairies unwounded. But the land of Avalon has many inhabitants of power less commanding than Morgana's, subject also to the restraints of a severer destiny, but equally gracious, and lovely, and loving. Such was that young fairy (of all fairies, save one, the dearest to us) whom the beauty of Sir Gruelan, the comeliest knight at the Round Table, struck with irresistible passion, as he rode underneath her favourite tree. The next time Sir Gruelan passed through the wood—lo ! on the banks of that very clear and lonely stream that parts the open glade, just where the sun peeps in, a fair young woman, asleep on the bank, in all the luxury of unveiled beauty, attired in nature's glory alone, as though slumber had overcome her on emerging from the bath. Sir Gruelan was a true and courteous knight ; but a sight like this would have turned Nestor himself into wildfire. We can only shake our heads, and say, he had better have fled while yet at a distance, rather than provoke a temptation so enticing and opportune that it was irresistible. In tears, and blushing rose-red, and looking shocked and scared, the beauty, thus unexpectedly awakened, upbraids the cavalier for having taken an ungenerous advantage of her slumber ; and wrings her white hands, and vows never to be appeased. But Gruelan was too wise to believe her, and left not off coaxing and looking contrite, until his pardon was granted and sealed in the sweetest way imaginable ; and a promise of mutual and undying love exchanged between him and the stranger ladye. One condition only was attached to the grant of her favour for the future—namely, that her lover should keep his good fortune a secret. Having received the vow, and named the time of their next meeting, she kissed him, and vanished ; whereby Sir Gruelan knew that his mistress was a fairy. For a long time, the woodland glade continued to witness their rapturous meetings in secret. But Arthur's queen, alas ! chanced herself to cast a longing eye on Sir Gruelan, and doubted not of his grateful readiness to acknowledge her grace ; for she also was beautiful, and a queen. But Gruelan heeded neither glance nor whisper ; and Gineura saw that his heart was bound elsewhere ; nor did she cease to upbraid and persecute him, until, in an incautious moment, he betrayed the secret of his fairy love. If Sir Gruelan was weak, rather than intentionally base, his compunction would be only the more bitter, for his love remained as strong as ever. He sought the river-side at the wonted hour, but no one appeared. Again and again, did he wander thither, weeping and calling aloud upon his ladye ; but no voice answered his. So that he perceived his good fortune was wholly gone, and that his love would return to him no more. He became weary of life, and sought for death in battle ; but death comes last to such as long to die. And now, seeing that this profited nothing, he mounted his brave destrier Gedefer, and once more rode towards the forest ; and, when he had reached the river side, he resolves there to leave his life, where his happiness had left him. Even as he stooped to cast himself into the stream, a soft arm held him back. O joy beyond utterance !—it was his own fairy again. She had suffered not less than her lover from the estrangement, and returns, with all a woman's trustful fondness, to forgive and bless her penitent. Those alone who have been favoured to exchange the shivering prospect of a final plunge into a cold, bottomless-looking stream, for the warm embraces of a breathing, blushing, and beloved mistress, can attain to some idea of Sir Gruelan's transports. The fairy, as happy as himself, when she could find breath to speak, murmured her delight that the culprit's repentance had enabled her to grant the forgiveness which her heart had long yearned to bestow. Nay, at last, in the intoxication of a happiness long withheld, she betrayed, with a most captivating indiscretion, her own secret; and Gruelan learned that the scene of their first meeting was not accidental, the love-sick fairy having adventured upon the discovery of herself ex negligée, in order the more surely to win his heart. Another infidelity, and it would no longer be in her power, however she might desire it, to forgive or appear to him again. Gruelan, fearing the risk of losing her a second time, takes leave of earth, turns loose his war-horse, and follows his mistress to her dwelling in Fairyland. Every year, on the anniversary of his master's departure, Gedefer appears at the river side, and impatiently stamps with his hoof on the ground.

More tragical was the history of Melusina's love and marriage. Concerning her there is some doubt, whether she was a spirit by nature, or a weird lady, descended from the fairies by the mother's side only. For, although she possessed many superhuman gifts, we find her, for many years, contrary to fairy usage, a continual inhabitant of earth, like any Christian damsel. Her sire, King Helmas of Arragon, had, besides her, two other daughters, Mellor and Palantine; and all three were doomed, in punishment of a single act of filial disobedience, to suffer a terrible penalty. They had, say the old lays, caused the King to be imprisoned in their castle Avalon,* (the alleged motive we need not here repeat,) and were condemned, in consequence, to become, one day in every week, loathsome serpents from the waist downwards. At other times, they were fair, discreet, and graceful beyond all other women.

Melusina was the flower of the three. Her, gentle and beauteous as an angel, (saith the lay,) Count Raymond of Poitiers beheld disporting with her sisters beside a glass-clear spring, as he wandered through the forest in despair, sick of life, and unknowing whither he went; for he had, but a few hours before, slain his cousin and trusty friend Count Emmerick while hunting; the spear having swerved by mischance as it left his hand. But Melusina's extreme courtesy and sweet words, and melting glances, soon made him forget his sorrow. She consoled him with wise speeches; sheltered him from the avengers of Emmerick's blood, which they deemed had been purposely shed; and, when his gratitude and love found utterance in a passionate entreaty for her hand, she gave it him, on the sole condition that he would solemnly vow to leave her alone and unseen every Saturday. And, when he had vowed, she told him that the violation of his oath would be followed, not only by the loss of his bride and by her eternal misery, but also by disaster and sorrow to himself.

Melusina was never weary in heaping riches and power on her husband. Near the spring where he first beheld her, she built for him the fair Castle of Lusignan, and many others, some of which exist to the present day. Some now known but by their names or by ruined fragments, attest her skill and the generous warmth of her love. All these she richly endowed, and bestowed upon Count Raymond. Every day increased his attachment to Melusina; but fate willed not that their union should be wholly blest. The offspring which it produced, were all writhen, and ugly, and monstrous, both in body and mind; and people marvelled to see such an ill-favoured brood spring from so comely a sire, and a mother so splendidly beautiful. Upon this head, a certain jealous cousin of Raymond's would never cease to gloze, inspiring him with evil doubts connected with the weekly disappearance of his lady, until the Count forgot his vow, and procured the means of privately watching her when retired to her chamber.

Thus he perceived how all the lower part of his Countess's sweet body had been transformed into a writhing snake, spotted with grey and blue and white mixed. Yet remorse, rather than aversion, overcame him on beholding this spectacle; for he saw that the transformation was the fulfilment of some unknown fate, and that, by witnessing it, he had lost for ever the joy of his heart. And when Melusina returned, and lay in his arms, as bright in perfect loveliness as ever, he breathed no syllable of what he had seen; it seemed even as though she were dearer to him than before. But the consequences of his broken vow reached him ere long. His son, Freimund, would fain be a priest, and had settled himself, with some hundred monks, at the abbey built by Melusina, and called Cloltre Malliers. But, chancing, by mishap, to quarrel with his savage brother, Godfrey with the Tusk,* was slain by him miserably, felonement occis, and the monastery, with all its monks, was burned to the ground. Now, as Raymond sat alone, sorely dismayed at hearing what had befallen, and deeming that a curse had certainly settled on his house, the Lady Melusina came in, to comfort him. And he bethought him, in his anger, of what he had seen in his chamber, and put her from him, crying—"Begone, thou evil snake and

* This Avalon is the Swabian title for Fairyland, and is always used in this sense by Godfrey of Strasburg. Its occurrence, as above, shews that the Provençal tale from which we quote, has been drawn from a still older legend. This will account for a blending of the material with the spiritual, in a manner unknown to the earliest fables, which pervades the entire history. In the first and authentic version, we have no doubt but that Melusina, and all her race, were true fairies. Here she partakes too much of the character of a magician. It is thus the later poets defaced the beauty of these legends. Alcina is the climax of depravity.

base serpent, that hast brought shame upon my house !”

When Melusina thus became aware that Raymond had broken his vow, she could not speak for bitter grief, and straightway fainted outright ; and, on returning from her swoon, in great wo and dismay, she told the Count that their happiness was ended by these hard words, the first he had ever spoken to her ; and that she must now leave him for ever, being condemned, henceforward, to wander upon the earth as a spectre until the last judgment. Nor should she appear again to mortal eyes except on the death-eve of the chief of the house of Lusignan. When the castle was to change its lord, she would be seen on the turret she was wont to occupy. Having thus spoken, with great wailing and lamentation, she withdrew, and is now a miserable night-wandering ghost. Raymond did not survive her long. After a few months, passed in astonishment and despair, he died, a hermit on Monte Casino.

In after years, it was believed that Melusina's appearance preceded the death, not only of the male heirs of Lusignan, but also of the Kings of France. Her apparition was ever in a mourning robe ; she seemed exceedingly beautiful, but in great sorrow, and made such a moaning and wringing of the hands that it was a pity to see her. So lately as in the time of Brantome, there were persons living that had seen her on the Castle of Lusignan, and had heard the three “ sharp and terrible ” cries wherewith she announced the approaching mischance. It appears, moreover, that she was at other times visible in the neighbourhood of her favourite fountain, where she would steal down on Saturdays, about the time of vespers, to bathe her body, one-half a beautiful female, the other half a serpent. At least Brantome informs us that, during Charles V.'s visit to Lusignan, Catharine de Medicis, the French King's mother, had speech of certain trustworthy old women who had seen the doomed ladye at such times. This apparition was rare, for she had naturally a great aversion to be seen to so much disadvantage. Others had beheld her, in her natural aspect, as a perfect and fair woman, arrayed in mourning weeds. Great was the lamentation she made when the castle was beleaguered ; and when orders were at length given to raze it to the ground, her clamours were distinctly heard by many soldiers and persons of credit. “ Force de soldats et gens d'honneur, ” says the narrator, “ l'affirmèrent qui y étoient. ” Since the demolition she has been no more seen.

From this pathetic and beautiful legend, we turn to a more homely one, of a far later period, the object of which was, like Melusina, condemned, for some obscure reason, to exchange the better half of her person for a snake's tail. The residence of this second victim of destiny, her apparently gentle and generous mood, and the simplicity of her visitant, are so pleasantly described by the true-hearted Stumpff, in his “ Schweizer Chronik,” that we shall tell the story, as nearly as may be, in his express words. The comparatively modern date of the incident, and the respectable authority on which it is recorded, are striking circumstances.

“ About the year of Christ 1520, there was, at Basle in Switzerland, one Leonardus, otherwise generally called Lienimannus, a taylor's son, a simple and guileless man, to whom also, by reason of his stammering, speech was no easy matter. The said person, after that he had entered, by what art or means I wist not, the vaulted shaft or gallery, which leads under ground at Augst towards Basle, and had therein proceeded beyond the point reached by any other men, could speak of marvellous tales and doings—viz., he said that he, having kindled a consecrated taper, had gone therewith into the hole or shaft. Here must he pass through an iron door ; and thence from one to another vault ; lastly, also through certain right fair and pleasant green gardens, in the midst of which stood a princely and well-built castle or palace, and therein was an exceeding fair damsel, human in body to the reins downwards, which on her head wore a golden crown, though her hair flowed all abroad ; but beneath she was a lothely snake. By this said damsel was he led to an iron chest, whereupon, however, lay two black hounds, baying in such wise that for them no one might go to the chest. But the damsel had stilled and kept the said dogges in check for him, so that he might approach without hindrance. Thereupon she took a bunch of keys, which she wore about her neck, and opened the chest, taking from thence all sorts of gold, silver, and other moneys ; of which, out of her especial generosity, she gave him not a few, which also he brought with him out of the shaft, as he thereupon shewed and made manifest. He farther asserted, that the damsel had gone on to say she was born of royal house and lineage ; but so was she destined and accursed, that she had been changed into the monstrous thing she seemed. Nor had she hope in anywise to be freed, unless some bachelor, of unspotted chastity, should kiss her thrice. Thus might she regain her former shape and nature ; for which favour, she vowed that she would give all the treasure which in that place lay hid. Now, he went on to say, he did at once heartily kiss the damsel twice ; but, at each time, she displayed her great joy at the prospect of an unhopd for release with such ghastly mows and antics, that he grew fearful, thinking no other than that she would tear him asunder alive.” So the taylor's son fled like a craven, and unlike the hero described in a similar position, in Sir Walter Scott's ballad ; and afterwards, having indiscreetly forfeited the moral character to which it appears he owed his admission, could never more discover the cave's mouth—“ Which,” says Stumpff, “ he would often bewail and lament.” The concluding remarks of the chronicler are very easy and quaint. We are, however, far from taking his view of the subject, which we deem illiberal.

“ But who but must believe,” he says, “ that this was mere mockery played by the devil?—and yet the right ancient Roman coins which he brought back from the hole, and displayed to many of our citizens, prove that there is certainly buried in the earth in the said cave, a capital treasure, preserved and guarded by some Mammon-spirit. Even as in the hollows of mines, the miner folk have, in their digging, frequent experience and converse of such murderous hobgoblins, to their great damage. And that no one may hold this for a poem or fable, there are still at hand living witnesses, who have heard it all from the mouth of the aforesaid Lienimannus. After him, a burgher of Basle, in the late dearth, hoping to gain some aid for himself and his, betook himself to the same vaulted hole under ground, thinking to bring from them some of the moneys whereof report had been made. But whereas he arrived at a nook, and found therein nothing but certain dead men's bones, a sound fit of shivering and affright overcame him, so that, turning round, straightway he ran back, out of the hole."

Having wandered in this direction, we find it hard to repress the reminiscences which arise before us, of the many sleepers in caves and subterranean vaults; of the Emperor Rothbart; and of the three sleepers of Switzerland, who pass in slumber the interval which must yet elapse ere they return to earth. But these would lead us to a region too remote. We may just indicate, in passing, one of the most wild and yet alluring of these legends—that, namely, of the Venusberg, in which, by a mingling of heathen mythology with Gothic forms, the Goddess of Beauty is invested with a limited but perpetual dominion in the heart of the mountain where she, with other condemned spirits, lives in the enjoyment of everything that can ravish the senses. It is fatal to visit the place; for, at times, the Goddess is disposed to increase the number of her subjects; and none who have not been especially fortified beforehand by sacred observances, can resist her allurements. At other times, the entrance leading to her mountain palace is invisible. Those whom she allows to return to earth, come back pale, and haggard, and old, talking, like men in dreams, of youth, and beauty, and voluptuous enjoyment. They hold in their hand pebbles and dust, brought from the hill, and deem them jewels and gold. Such are doomed, and always take the first opportunity of returning whence they came. To this mountain of Venus it is that the dwarf in the Heldenbuch conducts the Berner* at the close of his brilliant career of arms. But here the Venus hill is only another form of Avalon, or Fairyland, fixed on earth, and endowed with a local habitation. Others of the legends adverted to, invest the spirits inhabiting these with a semi-demoniac character.

But, to return to the spirits that look out of shady nooks and still waters, laughing at the sons of men, and piercing their hearts with eyes like woman's, but brighter. The Nixies are, in general, a more petulant race than the gentle fairy ladies whose tales have been above told. These latter, in communing with mankind, appear as frequent yet forgiving sufferers from their lovers' frailty or faithlessness. But, with the nymphs of the water, it is requisite to be more circumspect and attentive. Like their sisters of Venus, they are (in spite of the coldness of their haunts) passionate in their loves, headstrong in will, terrible when angered. To betray them is a matter fraught with peril.* They do not content themselves with taking refuge in flight, or lamentation, or obstinate silence and retirement; when exasperated, they make little account of past love; and, indeed, appear to be young persons utterly destitute of bowels of compassion. An instance to this effect occurred as late as the fifteenth century. Peter von Stauffenberg, a knight at Kaiser Sigismund's court, had long been blessed with the embraces of a peculiarly handsome Nixie, when he received orders from the emperor to take himself a wife of Christian flesh and blood. In those days, the behests of a Lehn-herr, or feudal chief, were not to be lightly disregarded. Stauffenberg reluctantly offered his hand to the lady chosen for him. But, as the cavalcade were hastening to the marriage solemnity, the fairy crossed her forsaker's path. She came again as he sat at the marriage board, giving him a secret token of her presence and of her indignation. On a sudden, the knight was mightily shaken—he fell sick from that moment, and never approached the marriage chamber of his bride. On the third day he was a dead man.

A similar comment may be made on one of the Rhine legends of the water-nymph, Lurlei, which describe her as overwhelming the castle of her perfidious and ungrateful lover. But another version of the tale represents her as more placable or less powerful, and confining the expression of her wrong to wailing in her gurgling caverns alone. In general, the nymphs of fountains are beneficent and loving. The River Spirits have all a dash of the terrible in their natures. Our blood curdles at the picture in the Nibelungen Lied of the grim Meerwiber, or river-woman that, sitting on the waters of the Danube, sing to the Burgundian knights the burden of wo towards which they are hastening, deeming that a gallant high-tide alone awaits them at Chriemhild's wedding.

There is a ghastly legend attached to some of the German rivers. The spirit of the stream demands a certain number of human victims yearly; and it is remarkable that, even now,

* Witness Gervase of Tilbury.—“Habemus probatum quod quosdam hujusmodi larvarum, quas Fadas narrant,” (he is speaking especially of Water Fairies,) “amatores audivimus, et, cum ad aliarum feminarum matrimonium se transulerunt, ante mortuos quam cum superinductis carnali se copula immiscuerint: plurimorumque in summa temporali felicitate vidimus stellas, qui cum ab hujusmodi fadarum abstraxerunt amplexibus, aut illas publicaverunt eloquio, non tantum temporales successus, sed etiam miseram vite solatium amiserunt.”—At Imp.

* This is the romance designation of Theodric the Great.

(unless we have been misinformed,) it is observed that, by one means or another, the full tribute is annually levied by the waters in question. It must be rather appalling, towards the close of a year wherein no toll has yet been paid, to hear at midnight the swollen river shrieking in its wrath, and demanding its customary victims. But we are now rambling from the beautiful into the terrible—a circumstance that might of itself sufficiently prove how far we have entrenched on the domain of night, and which warns us to lay the pen aside. The crowd of associations which meet us on turning to a subject like the present, is so great that, were we to dwell on each, months would not see an end of our record.

It is not very soothing to the vanity of later times to perceive how far their choicest inventions, in all that combines beauty with imagination, are surpassed by the images spontaneously created by the simple belief of ages termed semi-barbarous. Yet this is, perhaps, no matter for wonder. In the midst of a people alive to the impulses of strong feeling, yet destitute of culture, we may almost always discover the germ of poetry—the parent of all such creations—springing in its most genuine form, because unpoisoned by a fictitious atmosphere, and uncovered by the trappings of affectation or commonplace. And it is the highest testimony that can be found of the absolute existence of spiritual power and capacity in the human soul, when we find it, like Apollo amidst the Thessalian herdsmen—the heaven-descended mingling its voice with the rudest accents of ignorant life. It shews us, moreover, that, as Jean Paul has indicated in a passage already cited, belief has a tone of inspiration to which no development of mere intellect can attain. The themes which have supplied inexhaustible matter for embellishment and digression to successive generations of poets, and which their own conceptions can only successfully imitate, may all be traced to a period in which judgment had not learned to be arbitrary, and mankind appear to have been little more than passive and confiding recipients of the faith which was whispered by a mysterious voice from without. Thus we arrive, after all the theories and systems of ingenious men, at the belief, which is surely both grateful and animating, that the source from whence springs our perception of the infinite, the sublime, the beautiful, is found in the uncorrupted springs of human nature. For a time, tyranny or misbelief seals up the fountain. But it cannot be wholly stopped, and must perennially gush forth, until, as we believe, it shall at length appear no longer turbid and overhung with mists, but flowing broadly onwards, a calm and bright river, from which all nations shall drink and be refreshed.

V.

LOCKHART'S LIFE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—THE CONCLUSION.

THE public seemed to take for granted, that the interest of Sir Walter Scott's Memoir had ceased with the sixth volume; and that little remained to be told of the six more mournful years in which he was to drag on the load of a weary life—shattered in health, saddened in spirit, and broken in fortunes. On the contrary, it turns out that the concluding volume, little as the pen of Scott has contributed directly to its contents, is replete with melancholy interest—especially to those whose sympathies flow more freely with adversity than with prosperous fortune; and who prefer the study of the mingled character of the man to that of the mere author. The melancholy story of the gradual breaking up, the protracted struggle, and final subjugation of a man of great genius—in whose robust nature the elements of goodness and kindness were largely blended with considerable selfishness and many pitiable weaknesses—affords, we think, one of the most solemn and affecting lessons which human beings can receive; a lesson impressively teaching wisdom and humility, and the true value of whatever ill-directed ambition the most prizes. The last words of Scott, spoken in a brief, but lucid or conscious interval, very shortly before the close of a life of almost preternatural exertion, were a virtual surrender of nearly all the objects on which his ambition had been inordinately fixed—a solemn confession of their comparative vanity and nothingness. Mr Lockhart relates that, after Sir Walter had lain in a state of complete stupor for six weeks or more—dead while alive—his attendant came hastily into the room one morning, "and told me," he says, "that his master had awoke in a state of composure and consciousness, and wished to see me immediately. I found him entirely himself, though in the last extreme of feebleness. His eye was clear and calm—every trace of the wild fire of delirium extinguished. "Lockhart," he said, "I may have but a minute to speak to you. My dear, be a good man—be virtuous—be religious—be a good man. Nothing else will give you any comfort when you come to lie here." Scott survived this memorable interview for three or four days; but immediately relapsed into a state of stupor, and never spoke again, though afterwards, in the course of these days, he seemed conscious of the arrival of his sons. When the character and remarkable career of the man are considered, we cannot recall a more solemn and impressive death-bed sermon than this. What, at that awfully realizing moment, were his extended acres, his young trees, and rising towers, or the ambition of founding the house of "Scott of Abbotsford," which had cost him so dear!—what even the nobler intellectual distinction which he had attained, apart from the things crowding on his awakening mind at that solemn crisis when the visual orb is purged, and the perishing things of time are first beheld in the light streaming through the opening portals of eternity! Viewed in this way, a few of the paragraphs in this closing volume of Scott's Memoirs, convey a more impressive moral than the whole of his multitudinous and beautiful fictions. These exhibit an endless diversity of brilliant and striking pictures of life; but here are its actual experiences, its stern realities, examined, probed, weighed in the balance. And what a heart-rending recital is the narrative of his latter days! Had the gigantic efforts and mental sufferings of Sir Walter Scott, during the last eight years of his life, to which he ultimately fell the martyr, been for mankind, and not a hard task made necessary by ill-directed ambition, he would have deserved to be canonized with the noblest benefactors of the human race. His final and strenuous endeavours were to satisfy the creditors which his mysterious huckstering and short-sighted avidity of wealth, for an object which soon became his master-passion, had made imperative; his death-struggle was to trample upon the obstacles which had been interposed between him and his dream of building up the house and name of "Scott of Abbotsford." For mere literary fame he had no appetite left. It had flowed upon him unasked for thirty years. He had been satiated with applause. It came of itself, like the incense which naturally follows the highest order of young female beauty, unmarked and unvalued, until, as in the case of the flattered beauty, symptoms of waning appeared, and awakened the painful apprehension of decay. On the subject of his master-passion, Mr Lockhart remarks—"By this idea, all his reveries, all his aspirations, all his plans and efforts, were overshadowed and controlled." And if it be true, "that to this ambition we owe the gigantic monuments of Scott's genius," the world may forgive the absence of nobler motives; and, since "his ambition to endow a family sleeps with him," deeply compassionate the ultimate disquiet of his troubled spirit. His biographer affirms "that his ambition was, at least, a different thing from the modern vulgar ambition of amassing a fortune, and investing it in land;" as if Sir Walter had no value for any acres which did not lie upon Tweedside. This is a matter of opinion, and we even question the general prevalence of this alleged "modern vulgar ambition." In almost every case, some feeling, elevated or fantastic, but, at all events, not vulgarly sordid, mingles in what seems the instinctive desire which men feel to appropriate a portion of their native soil, and above all, of the heritage of their fathers; though, viewed philosophically, there is little difference in elevation of motive between the man who feels, like Sir Walter, a burning desire to bring a few more acres within his ring-fence, and secure it to his eldest son, and him who looks mainly to a profitable return for his capital.

The entire scope of the life of Scott illustrates a fact not flattering to the pride of genius. He was a dutiful son, a good-natured husband, and, bating his aristocratic desire to endow a family, which made him so far unjust to all his younger children, an affectionate father. He was a pleasant companion, a kind master, and, as the world goes, a sensible and safe friend. Of anything like the ardent enthusiasm, the unthinking, reckless generosity with which men of high and warm temperament sacrifice themselves for a friend, a sentiment, or a cause, or even of that more vulgar, pecuniary generosity displayed by the general run of great authors and artists, enriched by their own labours, we see few decided traces. The instances given by Mr Lockhart rather prove the reverse of what is intended; though Sir Walter Scott, like, we should hope, the great majority of men in affluent circumstances, in the course of his life did several and, perhaps, many liberal actions to those whom he liked, and who were useful to his purposes, or who had claims upon his good-nature or benevolence. And yet, because the author of "Marmion," and "Waverley," and "Old Mortality," and the whole of that brilliant family, was not less, and yet, we should imagine, not much more exemplary in the discharge of his domestic and social duties than the bulk of his contemporaries, we delight to expatiate on his virtues, and to magnify the ordinary tenor of a sensible, well-conducted man's daily life into some miracle of sub-lunary goodness. This, as we remarked above, is not flattering to the pride of intellect, as we fear it argues that the union of the purest wisdom and goodness with the highest genius, which ought to be constant, is as rare as, when found, it is precious. Such speculations are, however, premature. Six years of Sir Walter's life were to elapse before a final judgment could be pronounced on his career—those weary and suffering years, when the wine of life was on the lees, and of which the chronicle must often excite the tenderest sympathy. We shall trace this period as briefly as possible.

The close of that year, to him of much good and ill, 1836, left Scott, immediately after his return from France, giving his days and nights to his literary tasks, of which the principal was, at this time, "The Life of Napoleon." The present volume of the memoirs, without making the matter more clear, lessens astonishment at his marvellous industry, which has sometimes been regarded as more wonderful than his gigantic power and facility in fiction. The world had attributed wholly to energy of will, what seems to have become, to a considerable extent, the increasing and, at last, resistless force of habit. He could no more refrain from literary toils, when his medical advisers and his children urged the necessity of repose as absolutely requisite to his health, than he could at all times summon resolution to follow rigidly a prescribed regimen; a far inferior triumph to the ordinary run of frail and indolent mortals. If he was bound to his desk by a sense of duty, habit had made the yoke not merely light but desirable. "As well," he says in one place, "may Molly put the kettle on, and then bid it not boil," as to expect him, in brief, to cease from literary composition. While his mind retained anything like consciousness, and long after its powers had waxed dim and departed, he was planning new romances; and throughout life, those on which he was engaged, were never, he said, five minutes at a time out of his head, in any circumstances. The medical men who bade him cease from writing, in mercy to his health, doomed him, he alleged, "to go mad." There can, however, be no doubt, that his fatal malady was aggravated and his death probably accelerated by excessive mental exertion—long uncheered by hope, and, latterly, unsatisfactory and always anxious. The dread of falling off and losing public favour, and, what was worse, its solid rewards, now become so necessary, seems to have often wrung his heart in his latter years, with unutterable anguish. He fell into a condition not much happier than that of the flattered prima donna, when her voice cracks, or the applauded and improvident actor, when the pit begins to perceive symptoms of declining power. In the homely, but pithy phrase of imprudent artisans—Scott was, in his declining years, working double tasks for a dead horse. Pride is an admirable corroborant, fortitude a powerful bracer, but they will not alone sustain the spirit, and much less the physical strength, of any overworked man; and, latterly, great as was his pecuniary success, endurance and stubborn pride were his chief allies. Hope came not but by fits—or, if a vision of Nicol Milne's Faldonside eked to Abbotsford, ever watched before his eyes, the debts, and the meetings of creditors, were sure to scare it ruthlessly away; and, before the ebbing tide of his fortunes had been fairly turned by his unparalleled exertions and good luck, his mental with his bodily powers were for ever laid prostrate.

The entries from Scott's private journal—that journal which he kept to give his thoughts and feelings that vent which he never seems to have freely sought in the sympathies of his friends or family, and which was to set him right with posterity—are less frequent in this new volume and, on the whole, less interesting than in the previous one, though they sometimes incidentally betray anguish of spirit, and even intensity of agony, which exceed the most pathetic expressions of his grief in his worst trials.

From the time of his journey to France, he was tortured with successive attacks of what is termed rheumatism; and his lameness, once so lightly borne that it scarce seemed a defect, daily became more painful. From the date of his bustling and thankless toils and anxiety, during the King's visit, in 1822, he had, according to Mr Lockhart, been liable to alight attacks of paralysis, or apoplexy, or both. At least his family suspected this—for Scott seems long to have striven to thrust the painful conviction from himself; while no one about him durst hint at so unpleasant a truth. Some of his entries will be curious to speculative physiologists, and, perhaps, to metaphysicians. Of one of his seasons of reverie, he says:—

"The sensation was so strong as to resemble what is called a mirage in the desert, or a calesture on board of ship, when lakes are seen in the desert, and silvan landscapes in the sea. It was very distressing yesterday, and brought to my mind the fancies of Bishop Berkeley about an ideal world. There was a vile sense of want of reality in all I did and said. It made me gloomy and out of spirits, though I flatter myself this was not observed."

In the summer of 1829, bad symptoms had become much more decided, but he was relieved by copious bleedings; and it was not until February 1830 that he had a first serious attack of apoplexy, which could not be misunderstood. He struggled manfully against his enemy, and soon went on "covering as many sheets with his M.S. as in better years."

Between this period and 1826, Scott had performed prodigies. In 1827, his "Life of Napoleon," begun in happier times, was completed and published. The first and second editions alone—for we are not aware that there has been another—realized the immense sum of £18,000. In the two years immediately following, he wrote the "Chronicles of the Canongate," "The Fair Maid of Perth," and the first and second series of "Tales of a Grandfather." The "Demonology," "Anne of Gelestein," and his "History of Scotland," for Lardner's Cyclopaedia, were the less successful productions of a later year. For the two volumes of history, he received £1500. He also wrote several reviews. These were busy and profitable, but, alas! far from happy years. Few men could have borne up so long under the mere mechanical labour which Scott underwent, and fewer still under the load of care and mortification which crushed him at last. In March 1827, we find him saying—"I cannot keep up with the world without shying a letter now and then. It is true the greatest happiness I could think of would be to be rid of the world entirely. Excepting my own family, I have little pleasure in the world, less business in it, and am heartily careless about all its concerns."

And yet, to the last hours of his conscious existence, he chose to remain the reluctant slave of society; "made a show-off," as he expresses it, when for a show "he was ill in tune."

Campbell, when he next gives Napoleon as a toast, in honour of the Emperor's great merit in the eyes of men of letters, for shooting a bookseller, should follow it up by the memory of Sir Walter Scott. The Trade are pretty generally accused of taking advantage of unfortunate authors; but, in some instances of fortunate ones, they certainly meet their match. Yet the case of Scott should perhaps be thrown out of view, in all ordinary calculations between author and publisher. It has, we believe, puzzled learned political economists whether to define the extraordinary profits of his literary labours as wages or rent. No one was ever a better economist of the fruits of his labour, whatever name its profits should bear. No rubbish, few sweepings of the study, remain to embarrass his exscutors; and the little that did remain, Mr Lockhart has prudently helped to use up in the "Memoir." About the end of 1827, Mr Charles Heath offered Scott £800 a-year to edit the "Keepsake," and £400 for any 100 pages he might write for that annual. He enters on his journal—

"Mr Charles Heath, the engraver, invites me to take charge of a yearly publication, called the 'Keepsake,' of which the plates are beyond comparison beautiful, but the letterpress indifferent enough. He proposes £800 a-year if I would become editor, and £400 if I would contribute from seventy to one hundred pages. I declined both, but told him I might give him some trifling thing or other. To become the stipendiary editor of a New-Year's-Gift Book, is not to be thought of; nor could I agree to work regularly, for any quantity of supply, at such a publication. Even the pecuniary view is not flattering, though Mr Heath meant it should be so. One hundred of his close-printed pages, for which he offers £400, are nearly equal to one volume of a novel. Each novel of three volumes brings £4000; and I remain proprietor of the mine after the first ore is scooped out."

Sir Walter regretted having meddled in any way with the toyshop of literature, and would never do so again, though repeatedly offered very large sums—not even when the motive of private regard was added, upon Mr Allan Cunningham's lending his name to one of these painted bladders.

In the same week that Mr Heath made his proposition, Sir Walter received another, which he thus disposes of in his Diary:—"I have an invitation from Messrs Saunders and Otley, booksellers, offering me from £1500 to £2000 annually to conduct a journal; but I am their humble servant."

But he did not slip the opportunity of turning a penny in the way of trade, which Mr Lockhart tells, like other matters of the sort, with infinite naïveté. Mr Heath wanted his writing, and especially his name, to grace his elegant and fashionable work; and Sir Walter sold the privilege to the best advantage. He chanced to have lying beside him his juvenile prose drama of "The House of Aspen," which had not found a place even in the literary department of The Edinburgh Annual Register, and two tales which James Ballantyne had rejected as unworthy of the "Chronicles of the Canongate." These—"My Aunt Margaret's Mirror," namely, and "The Laird's Jock"—were, accordingly, disposed of to Mr Charles Heath for £500. Scott was also the author of two sermons—very indifferent ones, certainly, yet connected with a tale of kindness which Mr Lockhart, who hides none of Sir Walter's acts of generosity under a bushel, has related with fully as much minuteness as delicacy to the party obliged. The "Religious Discourses" were originally written for Mr Huntly Gordon, a young gentleman who acted as Scott's amanuensis, to enable him to pass his theological trials at Aberdeen. The thing might not have been quite fair, perhaps, but this is of less consequence, as Gordon never produced, at the Hall, the effort of his theological grinder. At a subsequent period, Mr Gordon got involved in debt, and craved Sir Walter's permission to dispose of the two sermons to a bookseller, to relieve him of his embarrassments. Though Scott seems to have been exceedingly chary about this mode of assisting his friends—of which Hogg unduly complains —he kindly consented; and the sermons by W. S. were sold to Colburn for £250. "Well sold, I think," says Sir Walter; and we should imagine the publisher found reason to affirm the judgment.

The quarrel which the blustering French General Gourgaud attempted to fasten on Sir Walter Scott, after the publication of "The Life of Napoleon," exhibits him in a new light; for he had passed the first fifty-five years of his life, not without violent party squabbles, but unchallenged and unchallenging. Now he found he might have to turn out; and he took the affair coolly. His old friend, Clerk, was pitched on as his "friend" in this delicate emergency; and he had, ready for the field, a pair of pistols taken from the carriage of Napoleon at Waterloo, if the second should approve of seething the kid in its mother's milk, or shooting Gourgaud with his old master's weapons. The affair ended in Paris smoke.

Late in the autumn of 1827, Scott was invited to Ravensworth Castle, to meet the Duke of Wellington, then making a sort of progress in the north of England. He, at this time, met Dr Philpotts and a formidable gathering of rampant Tories, mustered to do homage to the great Duke. "There were bells, and cannon, and drums, trumpets, and banners, besides a fine troop of yeomanry. The address was well expressed, and as well answered by the Duke. The enthusiasm of the ladies and the gentry was great—the common people more lukewarm."

Scott went through the duty for which he was brought from Abbotsford. He assisted in the pageants—"jackal," as he says, "to the great lion;" and was probably as great an object of curiosity to some of the gathering as the great lion himself. He remarks—

"What is called great society, of which I have seen a good deal in my day, is now amusing to me, because, from age and indifference, I have lost the habit of considering myself as a part of it, and have only the feelings of looking on as a spectator of the scene, who can neither play his part well nor ill, instead of being one of the dramatis personæ; so, careless what is thought of myself, I have full time to attend to the motions of others."

London society, or fine society of any kind, he appears never to have heartily or healthily enjoyed at any period of his life; and, towards the end, it became more and more tiresome—wearier wo—though still to be endured with patience and fortitude, for good reasons understood. After describing a really congenial dinner-party, at Mr John A. Murray's, where he met some of his ancient Edinburgh Whig acquaintances, and another dinner at his friend Clerk's small bachelor dwelling in Rose Court, he breaks out—"In short, we really laughed; and real laughter is as rare a thing as real tears. I must say, too, there was a heart, a kindly feeling, prevailed over the party. Can London give such a dinner?—It may, but I never saw one—they are too cold and critical to be easily pleased."

Scott had, by this time, almost given up society, while residing in Edinburgh, and also correspondence; and he seems to have often suffered from deep depression of spirits, when there was no immediate cause. Yet no one ever used his admirable specific against this malady—labour, namely—more vigorously and steadily. He had not returned many days from a sort of minstrel progress from castle to castle, on the occasion of meeting the Duke of Wellington, when he heard that Mr Abud, his Jew-creditor in London, had again given positive orders to arrest him. It sends a pang to the heart to read such passages, in his Diary, as the following ; written, too, on the morning after a day when he had dined at the seat of the wealthy nobleman whom he delighted to call his chief, at whose board he boasts he had “maintained as good a face in the midst of his perplexities as a man need desire ;” and, probably, while gaily relating the glories of Ravensworth, Durham, and Sunderland, in which he had just borne his part. While the face was good, the agonized heart then, as often, knew its own bitterness.

“November 1.—I waked in the night, and lay two hours in feverish meditation. This is a tribute to natural feeling. But the air of a fine frosty morning gave me some elasticity of spirit. It is strange, that, about a week ago, I was more dispirited for nothing at all, than I am now for perplexities which set at defiance my conjectures concerning their issue. I suppose that I, the Chronicler of the Canongate, will have to take up my residence in the Sanctuary, unless I prefer the more airy residence of the Calton Jail, or a trip to the Isle of Man. It is to no purpose being angry with Abud, or Ahab, or whatever name he delights in. He is seeking his own, and thinks, by these harsh measures, to render his road to it more speedy. Sir Adam Ferguson left Bowhill this morning for Dumfriesshire. I returned to Abbotsford to Anne, and told her this unpleasant news. She stood it remarkably well, poor body.

“November 2.—I was a little bilious this night—no wonder. Had sundry letters without any power of giving my mind to answer them—one about Gourgaud, with his nonsense. I shall not trouble my head more on that score. Well, it is a hard knock on the elbow ; I knew I had a life of labour before me, but I was resolved to work steadily ; now they have treated me like a recusant turnspit, and put a red-hot cinder into the wheel alongst with me. But of what use is philosophy—and I have always pretended to a little of a practical character—if it cannot teach us to do or suffer ? The day is glorious ; yet I have little will to enjoy it. Yet, were a twelvemonth over, I should perhaps smile at what makes me now very serious. Smile ! No—that can never be. My present feelings cannot be recollected with cheerfulness ; but I may drop a tear of gratitude.

“November 3.—Slept ill, and lay one hour longer than usual in the morning. I gained an hour’s quiet by it—that is much. I feel a little shaken at the result of to-day’s post. I am not able to go out. My poor workers wonder that I pass them without a word. I can imagine no alternative but the Sanctuary or the Isle of Man. Both shocking enough. But, in Edinburgh, I am always on the scene of action, free from uncertainty, and near my poor daughter ; so I think I shall prefer it, and thus I rest in unrest. But I will not let this unman me. Our hope, heavenly and earthly, is poorly anchored, if the cable parts upon the stream. I believe in God, who can change evil into good ; and I am confident that what befalls us is always ultimately for the best.

Were it not for poor Anne’s doleful looks, I would feel firm as a piece of granite. Even the poor dogs seem to fawn on me with anxious meaning, as if there were something going on they could not comprehend. They probably notice the packing of the clothes, and other symptoms of a journey.

The sum which threw the man whose ready pen was a rich mine of gold into such perplexity and distress, was less than £2000. The debt was privately cleared off by Sir William Forbes, who became one of Scott’s ordinary creditors for the amount : nor is it at all likely that his gloomy anticipations of arrest could have been realized, surrounded, as he was, by wealthy relatives and kind friends. On settling in town for the winter, we find him, after the lapse of more than thirty years, renewing his acquaintance with the very aged mother of the lady of his early romance. Mr Lockhart still thinks it decorous to leave in mystery an affair which has been discussed at all the tea-tables in Edinburgh for a quarter of a century ; so we presume it would be against rule to lift a mask which conceals nothing. It was just as the threats of Abud had been met that he first saw the ancient dame whose presence revived so many tender reminiscences of his unfortunate attachment ; so that, like his own Claud Halcro, his low spirits, at this juncture, may be fairly presumed the joint effect “of love and some small debt.”

“November 7.— I went to make a visit, and fairly softened myself, like an old fool, with recalling old stories, till I was fit for nothing but shedding tears and repeating verses for the whole night. This is sad work. The very grave gives up its dead, and time rolls back thirty years to add to my perplexities. I don’t care. I begin to grow case-hardened, and, like a stag turning at bay, my naturally good-temper grows fierce and dangerous. Yet what a romance to tell !—and told, I fear, it will one day be. And then my three years of dreaming, and my two years of wakening, will be chronicled, doubtless. But the dead will feel no pain.”

Mr Lockhart has been too sentimental by far about this affair. From Scott himself, we hear no more of his first misplaced and painful passion, nor yet of old Lady—we check ourselves ; but, if Mr Lockhart would only say A, we should be willing to say B. For himself, Sir Walter concludes, “To me these things are now matter of calm and solemn reflection, never to be forgotten, yet scarce to be remembered with pain.” He had far other objects of interest. His younger son had been received into the Foreign Office ; and, most grateful to his gracious Sovereign for this act of favour, he went to Abbotsford, to spend his Christmas, and in much better spirits. A dividend of six shillings in the pound had been paid to his creditors, and the prospect before him was clearing and brightening. He was, as he imagined, restored in constitution ; and, “though still in troubled waters, rowing with the tide.”

In the following spring, he visited London, and mixed a good deal in society. A story about Godwin, entered in his journal at this time, looks so very apocryphal that it will not be permitted to pass unchallenged :—

“Canning’s conversion from popular opinions was strangely brought round. While he was studying in the Temple, and rather entertaining revolutionary opinions, Godwin sent to say that he was coming to breakfast with him, to speak on a subject of the highest importance. Canning knew little of him, but received his visit, and learned, to his astonishment, that, in expectation of a new order of things, the English Jacobins designed to place him, Canning, at the head of their revolution. He was much struck, and asked time to think what course he should take; and, having thought the matter over, he went to Mr Pitt, and made the Anti-Jacobin confession of faith, in which he persevered until —. Canning himself mentioned this to Sir W. Knighthon, upon occasion of giving a place in the Charter-house of some ten pounds a-year to Godwin's brother. He could scarce do less for one who had offered him the dictator's curule chair."

Those best acquainted with the character of Godwin—a man not merely cautious, but, as his Liberal friends thought, timid to excess, and even deficient in spirit—will entertain the strongest doubts about this improbable tale. A story, entitled to nearly the same degree of credit, but gay and amusing, is told of Charles James Fox:—

"A certain Mrs Phipps audaciously set up, in a fashionable quarter of the town, as a person through whose influence, properly propitiated, favours and situations of importance might certainly be obtained—always for a consideration. She cheated many people, and maintained the trick for months. One trick was to get the equipages of Lord North, and other persons of importance, to halt before her door, as if their owners were within. With respect to most of them, this was effected by bribing the drivers. But a gentleman who watched her closely, observed that Charles J. Fox actually left his carriage and went into the house, and this more than once. He was then, it must be noticed, in the Ministry. When Mrs Phipps was blown up, this circumstance was recollected as deserving explanation, which Fox readily gave at Brookes' and elsewhere. It seems Mrs Phipps had the art to persuade him that she had the disposal of what was then called a hyena—that is, an heiress—an immense Jamaica heiress, in whom she was willing to give or sell her interest to Charles Fox. Without having perfect confidence in the obliging proposal, the great statesman thought the thing worth looking after, and became so earnest in it that Mrs Phipps was desirous to back out, for fear of discovery. With this view, she made confession, one fine morning, with many professions of the deepest feelings, that the hyena had proved a frail monster, and given birth to a girl or boy—no matter which. Even this did not make Charles quit chase of the hyena. He intimated that, if the cash was plenty and certain, the circumstance might be overlooked. Mrs Phipps had nothing for it but to double the disgusting dose. 'The poor child,' she said, 'was unfortunately of a mixed colour, somewhat tinged with the blood of Africa; no doubt Mr Fox was himself very dark, and the circumstance might not draw attention,' &c. &c. This singular anecdote was touched upon by Foote, and is the cause of introducing the negress into 'The Cozeners,' though no express allusion to Charles Fox was admitted. Lady ——— tells me that, in her youth, the laugh was universal so soon as the black woman appeared."

The following apt description of a London dinner, of what is fancied the first-rate sort, attracts our eye en passant:—

"Dined with Rogers with all my own family, and met Sharp, Lord John Russell, Jekyll, and others. The conversation flagged as usual, and jokes were fired like minute-guns, producing an effect not much less melancholy. A wit should always have an atmosphere congenial to him, otherwise he will not shine."

Then we have the eccentric Haydon, and good old Northcote, and Edward Irving, and a round dozen more of the then London notorieties, all sketched in the best style of Scott's shrewd sagacity. We can notice but one or two of these lions; and, first, Coleridge, at feed, before exhibition:—

"After eating a hearty dinner, during which he spoke not a word, he began a most learned harangue on the Samothracian Mysteries, which he regards as affording the germs of all tales about fairies, past, present, and to come. He then diverged to Homer, whose Iliad he considered as a collection of poems by different authors, at different times, during a century. Morritt, a zealous worshipper of the old bard, was incensed at a system which would turn him into a polytheist, gave battle with keenness, and was joined by Sotheby. Mr Coleridge behaved with the utmost complaisance and temper, but relaxed not from his exertions. 'Zounds, I was never so bethumped with words,' Morritt's impatience must have cost him an extra sixpence worth of snuff."

Sir Walter dined, by command, with the Duchess of Kent, and saw the little Princess Victoria, heiress-presumptive to the throne. He says, after hoping they will change her name:—

"This little lady is educating with much care, and watched so closely that no busy maid has a moment to whisper, 'You are heir of England.' I suspect, if we could dissect the little heart, we should find that some pigeon or other bird of the air had carried the matter. She is fair, like the royal family—the Duchess herself very pleasing and affable in her manners. I sat by Mr Spring Rice, a very agreeable man. There were also Charles Wynn and his lady—and the evening, for a court evening, went agreeably off."

Scott's kindness, at this visit, proved useful to the family of his brother poet, Allan Cunningham. By his interest, cadetships were obtained for two of the poet's sons. He also administered good advice and kindly consolation—'twas all he could—to his unfortunate friend Terry. Poor Terry, in the utter wreck of his health and fortunes, soon afterwards proposed coming down to settle in a cottage near Abbotsford. It was, probably, a visionary scheme—the straw clutched by the drowning man; and it received no encouragement from his sensible patron, whose judgment was always sound save in his own affairs. Terry died in the following year, adding one more to the melancholy list of Scott's unlucky speculating friends.

Death was now become an object of familiar and interesting contemplation to Scott, and none of his early friends stumbled and vanished through the broken arches without attracting his earnest attention. His little sketches and portraits of those deceased, generally done on the instant, unite spirit with great truth of resemblance. Constable is one of his characters; and one would give something to hear what, on the other side, "the Crafty" might, in his latter days, have had to say of Sir Walter. If rumour were to be believed, that little was not flattering.

"Constable's death might have been a most important thing to me if it had happened some years ago; and I should then have lamented it much. He had lived to do me some injury; yet, excepting the last £5000, I think most unintentionally. He was a prince of booksellers; his views sharp, powerful, and liberal; too sanguine, however, and, like many bold and successful schemers, never knowing when to stand or stop, and not always calculating his means to his object with mercantile accuracy. He was very vain, for which he had some reason, having raised himself to great commercial eminence, as he might also, with good management, have attained great wealth. He knew, I think, more of the business of a bookseller, in planning and executing popular works, than any man of his time. In books themselves he had much bibliographical information, but none whatever that could be termed literary. He knew the rare volumes of his library not only by the eye, but by the touch, when blindfolded. . . . Constable was a violent-tempered man with those he dared use freedom with. He was easily overawed by people of consequence; but, as usual, took it out of those whom poverty made subservient to him. Yet he was generous, and far from bad-hearted—in person good-looking, but very corpulent latterly; a large feeder, and deep drinker, till his health became weak. He died of water in the chest, which the natural strength of his constitution set long at defiance. I have no great reason to regret him; yet I do. If he deceived me, he also deceived himself."

In a letter to Lockhart, he says:—

"Alas, poor Crafty! Do you remember his exultation when my *Bony affair was first proposed? Good God! I see him as he then was at this moment—how he swelled, and rolled, and reddened, and outblarneyed all blarney! Well, so be it. I hope

'After life's fitful fever he sleeps well.'

But he has cost me many a tollsome, dreary day, and drearier night, and will cost me more yet."

The death of an eccentric, famous, and once fashionable blue follows that of William Gifford. Both personages are well hit off:—

"I observe in the papers, my old friend, Gifford's funeral. He was a man of rare attainments and many excellent qualities. His "Juvenal" is one of the best versions ever made of a classical author, and his satire of the Baviad and Maviad squabashed at one blow a set of coxcombs, who might have humbugged the world long enough. As a commentator, he was capital, could he but have suppressed his rancours against those who had preceded him in the task; but a misconstruction or misinterpretation, nay, the misplacing of a comma, was, in Gifford's eyes, a crime worthy of the most severe animadversion. The same fault of extreme severity went through his critical labours; and, in general, he flagellated with so little pity that people lost their sense of the criminal's guilt in dislike of the savage pleasure which the executioner seemed to take in inflicting the punishment. This lack of temper probably arose from indifferent health; for he was very valetudinary. . . . He was a little man, dumpled up together, and so ill made as to seem almost deformed; but with a singular expression of talent in his countenance. Though so little of an athlete, he nevertheless beat off Dr Wolcott, when that celebrated person, the most unsparing calumniator of his time, chose to be offended with Gifford for satirizing him in his turn. Peter Pindar made a most vehement attack; but Gifford had the best of the affray, and remained, I think, in triumphant possession of the field of action, and of the assailant's cane. G. had one singular custom. He used always to have a duenna of a house-keeper to sit in his study with him while he wrote. This female companion died when I was in London, and his distress was extreme. I afterwards heard he got her place supplied. I believe there was no scandal in all this.

"January 28.—Hear of Miss White's death. Poor Lydia! she gave a dinner on the Friday before, and had written with her own hand invitations for another party. Twenty years ago, she used to tease me with her youthful affections—her dressing like the Queen of Chimney-sweeps on May-day morning, &c.—and sometimes with letting her wit run wild. But she was a woman of wit, and had a feeling and kind heart. Poor Lydia! I saw the Duke of York and her in London, when Death, it seems, was brandishing his dart over them.

"The view o't gave them little fright."

Since in this vein, we may as well take in Irving, who did not long survive the dinner alluded to:—

One of the last entries in this year's diary gives a sketch of the celebrated Edward Irving, who was about this time deposed from the ministry of the Church of Scotland on account of his wild heresies. Sir Walter, describing a large dinner party, says, "I met to-day the celebrated divine and soi-disant prophet, Irving. He is a fine-looking man, (bating a diabolical squint,) with talent on his brow and madness in his eye. His dress, and the arrangement of his hair, indicated that. I could hardly keep my eyes off him while we were at table. He put me in mind of the devil disguised as an angel of light, so ill did that horrible obliquity of vision harmonize with the dark tranquil features of his face, resembling that of our Saviour in Italian pictures, with the hair carefully arranged in the same manner. There was much real or affected simplicity in the manner in which he spoke. He rather made play, spoke much, and seemed to be good humoured. But he came with that kind of unction which is nearly allied to typhloeria. He boasted much of the tens of thousands that attended his ministry at the town of Annan, his native place, till he well-nigh provoked me to say he was a distinguished exception to the rule that a prophet was not esteemed in his own country. But time and place were not fitting."

Mr Lockhart has ended as he commenced; lowered in tone, perhaps, but still persisting in doing either stinted justice or positive wrong to the memory of Mr James Ballantyne. Early in 1829, Mr Ballantyne sustained the irreparable misfortune of losing an excellent and most amiable wife, by a fever, in the prime of life, and under family circumstances peculiarly painful. He was overwhelmed with grief. The conjugal relations of Scott and Ballantyne were, we apprehend, of a somewhat different character; although the former had not been made of sterner stuff. Scott, after penning a few exquisitely beautiful paragraphs in his Diary, touching the death of his wife, could at once stoically turn himself to his ordinary duties and literary tasks, with entire self-possession and composure of spirit. James Ballantyne bore his loss with far less of Christian resignation, though it drove him for solace to the only source of all lasting consolation. Mr Ballantyne was unable to appear at his wife's funeral; and "this Scott viewed with something more than pity," which we must construe into contempt. Ballantyne, however, promptly summoned resolution to settle his family affairs; and then he retired for a few weeks into the country, to struggle in solitude with an overwhelming sorrow. In the apprehension of Sir Walter, he had sunk, or was about to sink, into a religious dreamer; and he accordingly addressed several expostulatory letters to the man who could, indeed, be very ill spared from the printing office, which was busily occupied with "Anne of Geierstein;" "reminding him that, when our Saviour himself was to be led into temptation, the first thing the Devil thought of was to get him into the wilderness."

Ballantyne, after a few weeks, resumed his place in the printing office; but he addicted himself more and more to what his friend considered as erroneous and extravagant notions of religious doctrine; and I regret to say that in this difference originated a certain alienation, not of affection, but of confidence, which was visible to every near observer of their subsequent intercourse. Towards the last, indeed, they saw but little of each other. I suppose, however, it is needless to add that, down to the very last, Scott watched over Ballantyne's interests with undiminished attention.

Sir Walter was, by this time, incapable of attending to any one's interests; but we may aver that Ballantyne's love, reverence, fidelity, watchful affection, and unequalled services, never failed Scott. There are two sides to every tale; and we might shew more on the other, but it matters not. Besides his other weaknesses, Ballantyne began to be troublesome with his criticisms. He disapproved of "Anne of Geierstein," and the public affirmed his opinion.

Scott was now plunged in the strife of politics, and differing with many of the old staunch Tory party, by going with the Court, the Government, and the Whigs, in favour of Catholic Emancipation. We consider him in the right, without perceiving how he should have happened to think in this manner at this particular juncture. He expresses the strange belief, that the penal laws, if rigidly maintained, would have extirpated Popery—a novel effect of persecution, unless, indeed, six millions of Irish Catholics were to be extirpated along with their faith. He remarks—

"They must, and would, in course of time, have smothered Popery; and, I confess, I should have seen the old Lady of Babylon's mouth stopped with pleasure. But now, that you have taken the plaster off her mouth, and given her free respiration, I cannot see the sense of keeping up the irritation about the claim to sit in Parliament. Unopposed, the Catholic superstition may sink into dust, with all its absurd ritual and solemnities. Still it is an awful risk. The world is, in fact, as silly as ever, and a good competence of nonsense will always find believers. Animal magnetism, phrenology, &c. &c., have all had their believers, and why not Popery? Ecce! if they should begin to make Smithfield broils, I do not know where many an honest Protestant could find courage enough to be carbonadoed! I should shrink from the thoughts of tar-barrels and gibbets, I am afraid, and make a very pusillanimous martyr."

He seemed to have some misgivings, when induced to attend a public meeting in Edinburgh, to petition for Emancipation.

The Whigs were not yet come in; but, shortly after his first serious apoplectic seizure in the spring of 1830, "Circumstances," says his biographer, "rendered it highly probable that Sir Walter's resignation of his place as Clerk of Session might be acceptable to the Government, —and it is not surprising that he should have, on the whole, been pleased to avail himself of this opportunity." His Diary, long suspended, was begun again; but its contents were at this period too medical for quotation, though he does not refer to the real nature of his illness until he was tolerably well again.

"Edinburgh, May 26.—Wrought with proofs, &c., at the 'Demonology,' which is a cursed business to do neatly. I must finish it though. I went to the Court, from that came home, and scrambled on, with half writing, half reading, half idleness, till evening. I have laid aside smoking much; and now, unless tempted by company, rarely take a cigar. I was frightened by a species of fit which I had in March [February,] which took from me my power of speaking. I am told it is from the stomach. It looked woundy like palsy or apoplexy. Well, be what it will, I can stand it.

"May 27.—Court as usual. I am agitating a proposed retirement from the Court. As they are only to have four instead of six Clerks of Session in Scotland, it will be their interest to let me retire on a superannuation. Probably, I shall make a bad bargain, and get only two-thirds of the salary, instead of three-fourths. This would be hard, but I could save between two or three hundred pounds by giving up town residence."

This arrangement afterwards took effect; and a pension to the amount of the difference, or £500 a-year, was, we are told, offered and declined.

He retired with £800 of his £1300 of salary. Nor was his good luck at an end.

His Diary for the 13th July says briefly—"I have a letter from a certain young gentleman, announcing that his sister had so far mistaken the intentions of a lame baronet nigh sixty years old, as to suppose him only prevented by modesty from stating certain wishes and hopes, &c. The party is a woman of rank, so my vanity may be satisfied. But I excused myself, with little picking upon the terms."

He was now fast breaking down; and we have a touching picture of the inner heart of a house which carried a gay and prosperous face to the world. Oh! how much happier, as well as better, should we all be, were the courage and wisdom granted to seem exactly as we are! Must we first cease to be human?

During the rest of the summer and autumn, his daughter and I were at Chiefswood, and saw him of course daily. Laidlaw, too, had been restored to the cottage at Kaeside; and, though Tom Purdie* made a dismal blank, old habits went on, and the course of life seemed little altered from what it had used to be. He looked jaded and worn before evening set in, yet very seldom departed from the strict regimen of his doctors, and often brightened up to all his former glee, though passing the bottle, and sipping toast and water. His grandchildren especially saw no change. However languid, his spirits revived at the sight of them, and the greatest pleasure he had was in pacing Douce Davie through the green lanes among his woods, with them clustered about him on ponies and donkeys, while Laidlaw, the ladies, and myself, walked by, and obeyed his directions about pruning and marking trees.

It was obvious, as the season advanced, that the manner in which Ballantyne communicated with him was sinking into his spirits, and Laidlaw foresaw, as well as myself, that some trying crisis of discussion could not be much longer deferred. A nervous twitching about the muscles of the mouth was always more or less discernible from the date of the attack in February; but we could easily tell, by the aggravation of that symptom, when he had received a packet from the Canongate. It was distressing indeed to think that he might, one of these days, sustain a second seizure, and be left still more helpless, yet with the same undiminished appetite for literary labour. And then, if he felt his printer's complaints so keenly, what was to be expected in the case of a plain and undeniable manifestation of disappointment on the part of the public, and consequently of the book-seller? All this was for the inner circle. Country neighbours went and came, without, I believe, observing almost anything of what grieved the family. Nay, this autumn he was far more troubled with the invasions of strangers, than he had ever been since his calamities of 1826. The astonishing success of the new editions was, as usual, doubled or trebled by rumour. The notion that he had already all but cleared off his encumbrances, seems to have been widely prevalent; and no doubt his refusal of a pension tended to confirm it. Abbotsford was, for some weeks at least, besieged much as it had used to be in the golden days of 1823 and 1824; and if sometimes his guests brought animation and pleasure with them, even then the result was a legacy of redoubled lassitude. The Diary, among a very few and far separated entries, has this:—

"September 5.—In spite of Resolution, I have left my Diary for some weeks, I cannot tell why. We have had abundance of travelling Counts and Countesses, Yankees, male and female, and a Yankee-Doodle-Dandy into the bargain, a smart young Virginia-man."

Politics now began seriously to afflict and mortify Scott. The death of his royal patron, George IV., had been closely followed by the "Three Glorious Days" of Paris. The Reform Bill was in the wind, and all the wild elements of revolution were, as he imagined, let loose, as in 1792. In the meanwhile, Charles X. arrived at his old quarters in Holyrood; and Scott, ever fanatically zealous in the cause of legitimacy, took the ex-King under his wing. He published in Ballantyne's paper what Mr Lockhart calls "A touching appeal to the better feelings of his townsmen"—which appeal they almost universally regarded as an instance of singularly bad taste. Even the Ultra-Radicals of Edinburgh fancied they did not require to be schooled into the observance of hospitality and good manners by their eminent fellow-citizen. The national character was sufficient guarantee for a good reception to the ex-King—nay, more, the national prudence. The citizens of Edinburgh would, we dare say, have made half, or the whole of the potentates of Europe welcome to the town who came to spend, quietly, some £50,000 or £100,000 a-year among them. Mr Lockhart is under entire delusion when he supposes that Charles Dix was in the least indebted to what he terms Sir Walter's "manly admonition" for the quiet reception he received. Poor Sir Walter's influence over mobs—since assemblages of the people are to be so christened—was scarcely, about this time, sufficient to ensure courteous usage to himself in the little towns of his own immediate neighbourhood, when he came out to oppose Reform. The Edinburgh newspapers gave vent to the public feeling in grumbings at this "admonition," or "salutary interference;" and the Bourbons certainly owe no gratitude on this score, save to the natural feelings of the populace, compassionating an aged, would-be tyrant, humbled to the dust, and stripped for ever of the power of inflicting injury upon his country.* We can, however, well believe that, in this trivial matter, as in others of more importance, Mr Lockhart has spoken in ignorance, and that he really imagined Sir Walter the guardian genius of the Bourbons, as he had been the patron of George IV., on his visit to Scotland—the man whose single influence disposed Edinburgh to loyalty.

As the recipients of his real or imaginary alarms for the new growth of Jacobinism, Sir Walter seems to have prudently selected either Lord Montague or Lady Louisa Stuart. Some of those alarm letters, too, look as if got up for the nonce, when the ancient Tory gentleman would probably have been employed more to his own liking in pruning trees. They have not an easy flow. The reduction of the yeomanry corps, that excellent device of the good old times for keeping the rabble in order, he bitterly laments, in these letters, and, doubtless, in all sincerity.

In the winter of 1830–31, Scott's family were extremely averse to his remaining in the country, where it was so difficult to procure medical aid in case of another anticipated fit; but he would not leave Abbotsford; and the utmost that affection and unceasing care could do in the melancholy circumstances, was devotedly performed by his daughter, Mr Laidlaw, and his personal attendant, after the Lockhart family had been compelled to go southward. Laidlaw was now his regular amanuensis, and, from his position, obliged to witness that visible, gradual, and most melancholy change, which the most devoted regard could no longer doubt. This, we think, is very beautifully said:—

A more difficult and delicate task never devolved upon any man's friend, than he had about this time to encounter. He could not watch Scott from hour to hour—above all, he could not write to his dictation—without gradually, slowly, most reluctantly taking home to his bosom the conviction that the mighty mind which he had worshipped through more than thirty years of intimacy, had lost something, and was daily losing something more of its energy. The faculties were there, and each of them was every now and then displaying itself in its full vigour; but the sagacious judgment, the brilliant fancy, the unrivalled memory, were all subject to occasional eclipse—

"Along the chords the fingers stray'd,
And an uncertain warbling made."

Ever and anon he paused and looked round him, like one half waking from a dream, mocked with shadows. The sad bewilderment of his gaze shewed a momentary consciousness that, like Sampson in the lap of the Philistine, "his strength was passing from him, and he was becoming weak like unto other men." Then came the strong effort of aroused will—the cloud dispersed as if before an irresistible current of purer air—all was bright and serene as of old. And then it closed again in yet deeper darkness.

During the early part of this winter, the situation of Cadell and Ballantyne was hardly less painful, and still more embarrassing. What doubly and trebly perplexed them was, that, while the MS. sent for press seemed worse every budget, Sir Walter's private letters to them; more especially on points of business, continued as clear in thought, and almost so in expression, as formerly; full of the old shrewdness, and firmness, and manly kindness, and even of the old good-humoured pleasantry. About them, except the staggering penmanship, and here and there one word put down obviously for another, there was scarcely anything to indicate decayed vigour. It is not surprising that poor Ballantyne, in particular, should have shrunk from the notion that any thing was amiss—except the choice of an unfortunate subject, and the indulgence of more than common carelessness and rapidity in composition. He seems to have done so as he would from some horrid suggestion of the Devil; and accordingly obeyed his natural sense of duty, by informing Sir Walter, in plain terms, that he considered the opening chapters of "Count Robert" as decidedly inferior to anything that had ever before come from that pen.

Wellington was, at this time, driven from the helm; and the Whigs—whom Scott had hated through his prime of life with the bitter feelings of party, stimulated by personal interest, and pent up and fermenting in a narrow circle—came triumphantly into power. The consummation of those things was hastening, which, since his playhouse row in the end of the century, he had opposed with all his faculties and means—as a wit, a magistrate, a newspaper-writer, and a thorough Tory partisan. The whole party were chopfallen; but Scott, their Goliath, was totally overcome. Selkirk had nearly rebelled, Galashiels had lifted the heel against him, and there was but hollow faith and doubtful loyalty even in Melrose and Darnick. Mr Laidlaw was a Whig, Mr Cadell was another; James Ballantyne had, long ago, "deserted his banners;" and Sir Walter too late perceived that, during his long political life, save in personal emolument, he had "sown the wind to reap the whirlwind." His mortification must have been extreme, and even compassionate; and, utterly powerless as we hold his example and his party writings to have been on contemporary politics, the most determined Radical might now well afford to pity and forgive his life-long efforts to prevent the amelioration of the institutions of his country; or, as he fondly imagined, to stay its ruin. When his mortification, from the aspect of politics, was at the deepest, and when personal chagrin must have been as strong as his public feelings, Ballantyne conceived it his duty to his old friend once more to protest strongly against the romance of "Count Robert of Paris," on which Sir Walter was struggling to concentrate the shattered energies of his memory and fancy. If ever any one bore resentment against Sir Walter Scott, whether personal or political, it must melt and disappear before such agonizing revelations as the following:—

"Abbotsford, 8th Dec. 1830.

"MY DEAR JAMES,—If I were like other authors, as I flatter myself I am not, I should send you 'an order on my treasurer for a hundred ducats, wishing you all prosperity and a little more taste;' but, having never supposed that any abilities I ever had were of a perpetual texture, I am glad when friends tell me what I might be long in finding out myself. Mr Cadell will shew you what I have written to him. My present idea is to go abroad for a few months, if I hold together as long. So ended the Fathers of the Novel.—Fielding and Smollett—and it would be no unprofessional finish for yours, WALTER SCOTT."

Poor Sir Walter! He could speak without any touch of bravado to his old schoolfellow—his most faithful and devoted friend of more than thirty years; but to his bookseller—that "cool, inflexible specimen of the national character," as Mr Lockhart describes Mr Cadell—it was considered necessary to put a braver face on the matter. The letter referred to, addressed to this keen Scotsman, concludes thus:—

"I may perhaps take a trip to the Continent for a year or two, if I find Othello's occupation gone, or rather Othello's reputation. James seems to have taken his bed upon it; yet has seen Pharsalia. I hope your cold is getting better. I am tempted to say, as Hotspur says of his father—

'Zounds! how hath he the leisure to be sick?'

There is a very material consideration, how a failure of 'Count Robert' might affect the Magnum, which is a main object."

The "Magnum" was the collected novels, now selling to the extent of 35,000, in which Cadell had a large share, and about which he was naturally very anxious. A letter to Mr Cadell, of the following day, shews deeper despondency. It contains the following postscript; and those who remember the shallow, unfeeling, and impertinent gossip of Baron d'Haussez, may learn to compassionate the miserable thralldom in which Scott had involved himself with the great ones of the earth, and doubly to prize and cherish their obscure independence.

"P.S.—I expect Marshal Bourmont and a French Baron D'Haussez here to-day, to my no small discomfort, as you may believe; for I would rather be alone."

It would seem that Sir Walter's family had kept the nature of his illness as quiet as possible; but three days afterwards, he explained the whole story, in a third letter to Mr Cadell, stating the means and precautions taken for his recovery. Unjust as we consider Mr Lockhart to James Ballantyne, Scott himself, though temporarily hurt, never blames, never seems but grateful to his candid and really magnanimous friend for repeated warnings of failure. Scott says to his bookseller—

"It would have been the height of injustice and cruelty to impute want of friendship or sympathy to J. B.'s discharge of a doubtful, and, I am sensible, a perilous task. True

———"The first bringer of unwelcome news Hath but a losing office;"

and it is a failing in the temper of the most equal-minded men, that we find them liable to be less pleased with the tidings that they have fallen short of their aim, than if they had been told they had hit the mark; but I never had the least thought of blaming him, and, indeed, my confidence in his judgment is the most forcible part of the whole affair. It is the consciousness of his sincerity which makes me doubt whether I can proceed with the County Paris. I am most anxious to do justice to all concerned, and yet, for the soul of me, I cannot see what is likely to turn out for the best."

He invited both gentlemen to come out to see him, and added—

"You will think me like Murray in the farce—'I eat well, drink well, and sleep well; but that's all, Tom, that's all.' We will wear the thing through one way or other, if we were once afloat; but you see all this is a scrape. Yours truly," &c.

This letter, Mr Cadell says, "struck both James B. and myself with dismay."

They found him looking better than they had expected, for they had the pleasure to arrive just as his creditors, to express their sense of his honourable conduct, had requested his acceptance of his furniture, pictures, curiosities, and library—a gift which the proprietor valued at £10,000, though he probably saw it through his own spectacles, and Dan Terry's bills for old books, upholstery, and articles of vertu. He had, previously to their visit, composed a long political essay, a new "Malachi Malagrowth," which he imagined was to do as much for the Tories as his former epistle had done for the Scottish bankers, and at once demolish the vicious and revolutionary new-fangled scheme of Parliamentary Reform. Mr Laidlaw, though a Whig, seems to have considered this piece, and a subsequent production of the same nature intended for an address of the county of Selkirk, as equal to the first of Sir Walter's compositions in his happier days, in bursts of indignant and pathetic eloquence. It may have been so; but Ballantyne and Cadell condemned it in toto; the former in the gentle and forbearing manner habitual to him. But, says the biographer—

Cadell spoke out: he assured Sir Walter, that, from not being in the habit of reading the newspapers and periodical works of the day, he had fallen behind the common rate of information on questions of practical policy; that the views he was enforcing had been already expounded by many Tories, and triumphantly answered by organs of the Liberal party; but that, be the intrinsic value and merit of these political doctrines what they might, he was quite certain that to put them forth at that season would be a measure of extreme danger for the author's personal interest; that it would throw a cloud over his general popularity, array a hundred active pens against any new work of another class that might soon follow, and, perhaps, even interrupt the hitherto splendid success of the collection on which so much depended. On all these points, Ballantyne, though with hesitation and diffidence, professed himself to be of Cadell's opinion. There ensued a scene of a very unpleasant sort; but, by and by, a kind of compromise was agreed to—the plan of a separate pamphlet, with the well-known nom de guerre of Malachi, was dropped; and Ballantyne was to stretch his columns so as to find room for the lucubration, adopting all possible means to mystify the public as to its parentage. This was the understanding when the conference broke up; but the unfortunate manuscript was, soon afterwards, committed to the flames. James Ballantyne accompanied the proof-sheet with many minute criticisms on the conduct as well as expression of the argument. The author's temper gave way—and the commentary shared the fate of the text.

Mr Cadell opens a very brief account of this affair with expressing his opinion, that "Sir Walter never recovered it;" and he ends with an altogether needless apology for his own part in it. . . . His (Scott's) reception of Ballantyne's affectionate candour may suggest what the effect of really hostile criticism would have been. The end was, that, seeing how much he stood in need of some comfort, the printer and bookseller concurred in urging him not to despair of "Count Robert." They assured him that he had attached too much importance to what had formerly been said about the defects of its opening chapters; and he agreed to resume the novel, which neither of them ever expected he would live to finish. "If we did wrong," says Cadell, "we did it for the best; we felt that to have spoken out as fairly on this as we had done on the other subject, would have been to make ourselves the bearers of a death-warrant." I hope there are not many men who would have acted otherwise in their painful situation.

We believe there is not one.

Politics were still fermenting in Sir Walter's mind. He recalled the palmy days of Dundas and the "Life-and-Fortune" men; and, in a letter to Mr Scott, younger of Harden, then Member for the county of Roxburgh, he urged association.

"Call yourselves Sons of St Andrew, anything or nothing—but let there be a mutual understanding. Unite and combine. You will be surprised to see how soon you will become fashionable. It was by something of this kind that the stand was made in 1791-2—vis unita fortior. I earnestly recommend to Charles Baillie, Johnstone of Alva, and yourself, to lose no opportunity to gather together the opinions of your friends, especially of your companions; for it is only among the young, I am sorry to say, that energy and real patriotism are now to be found. If it should be thought fit to admit peers, which will depend on the plans and objects adopted, our Chief ought naturally to be at the head."

The address, alluded to above, was composed, in the spring of 1831, at the request of one or two of the leading Tories of the county of Selkirk. It was, however, rejected, at a county meeting, in favour of a much shorter and more direct document, drawn up by Mr Lockhart of Cleghorn and Borthwickbrae; and Sir Walter enters in his Diary—

"As I saw that it met the ideas of the meeting (six in number) better by far than mine, I instantly put that in my pocket. But I endeavoured to add to their complaint of a private wrong a general clause, stating their sense of the hazard of passing at once a bill full of such violent innovations. But, though Harden, Alva, and Torwoodlee voted for this measure, it was refused by the rest of the meeting, to my disappointment. I was a fool to 'stir such a dish of skimmed milk with so honourable an action.' If some of the gentlemen of the press, whose livelihood is lying, were to get hold of this story, what would they make of it?

It gives me a right to decline future interference, and let the world wag—'Transeat cum ceteris erroribus.'

"I will make my opinion public at every place where I shall be called upon or expected to appear; but I will not thrust myself forward again. May the Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this vow!"

He did well for himself, and certainly no great harm to the interests of his party. What could not be approved of by the Tory county gentlemen, must have been entirely lost on the Whigs and Radicals. Against the torrent then sweeping over the land, even his eloquent pamphlets, had he been in pristine vigour, would have been about as efficacious as the celebrated Dame Partington's mop opposed to the rising tide of the Atlantic. He was not equally wise regarding public meetings. He appeared at one in Jedburgh in spite of the entreaties of his daughter, and made a speech against Reform, which ungracious Liberals have denominated sheer Tory twaddle, though Mr Lockhart has faithfully preserved it. The people of the town had flocked to the court-house; and, in the excitement of the moment, so far forgot themselves as to hoot and hiss the venerable speaker—who unhappily persisted, and more vehemently, in the same strain. The disapprobation, consequently, waxed louder; and the great man, who had been literally incensed for twenty years with popular breath, the idol of his countrymen, the admiration of the civilized world, and who had in prosperity borne his faculties so meekly, was, on the sudden, and when he was least fitted to bear up against so unlooked for and painful a reverse, roughly cast down from his proud eminence. The impatient and rude audience, in the vehemence of their feelings of patriotism and zeal for Reform, forgot their habitual reverence for Scott. His opinions they were well entitled to condemn; but there is, probably, no one who was then present, who has not since heartily regretted that, in putting down the prejudiced Tory, greater respect and tenderness were not shewn for an eminent man in the visible decline of his faculties. Mr Lockhart tells nearly the same story that appeared in the contemporary newspapers. When Scott's speech had been unceremoniously interrupted, he became exceedingly indignant.

He, abruptly, and unheard, proposed his resolution, and then, turning to the riotous artisans, exclaimed, "I regard your gabble no more than the geese on the green." His countenance glowed with indignation, as he resumed his seat on the bench. But when, a few moments afterwards, the business being over, he rose to withdraw, every trace of passion was gone. He turned round at the door, and bowed to the assembly. Two or three, not more, renewed their hissings; he bowed again, and took leave in the words of the doomed gladiator, which I hope none who had joined in these insults understood—"MORITURUS VOS SALUTO."

We have heard that, when he found refuge in his carriage, he burst into a passion of tears. We have formerly said, that his Diary contains the truth and nothing but the truth, but by no means, either on this or other occasions, what was likely to be the whole truth. It was meant, in the fulness of time, for the world's eye; and Scott appears never to have given his full confidence to any one in the world, man or woman, much less to the public. His notice of the persons who hissed him is thus slight :—

" March 22.—Went yesterday at nine o'clock to the meeting ; a great number present, with a mob of Reformers, who shewed their sense of propriety by hissing, hooting, and making all sorts of noises. And these unwashed artificers are from henceforth to select our legislators ! What can be expected from them except such a thick-headed plebeian as will be ' a harebrained Hotspur, guided by a whim ? "

The tone of his mind, so far as he shewed it, may be gathered from his remarks on the passing of the Reform Bill by a majority of one. " It has fallen easily, the old constitution ; no bullying Mirabeau to assail, no eloquent Maury to defend. It has been thrown away like a child's broken toy. Well—the good sense of the people is much trusted to ; we shall see what it will do for us. The curse of Cromwell on those whose conceit brought us to this pass ! "

A circumstance which happens to be known to us, strikingly illustrates the deep personal mortification, and the angry and sullen sorrow of Scott, at the extraordinary triumph of his early political rivals and their party, and the progress of those opinions which it had been in part the business of his life ineffectually to put down. To stop the spread of these pernicious doctrines of the Whigs, and punish their propagators, he had, it would appear, projected the Quarterly Review, made speeches, and indited party ballads, become a proprietor of the silly and scurrilous Beacon, and committed himself in many ways redounding little to the permanent honour of the author of " Old Mortality." One of the most obnoxious of the Liberal party, because by far the most able and energetic, was Brougham, the champion of the popular cause in nearly every great struggle between might and right, since the period, now more than twenty years, when Mr Walter Scott had indignantly stopped his number of The Edinburgh Review, because, in it, Brougham had written an article offensive to him upon Spanish affairs. Brougham had, besides, been the advocate of the persecuted Queen ; and, by a coincidence worthy of notice, he was ably and eloquently defending the editor of the Durham newspaper at the northern assizes, in the very week when Scott was sweating and suffering as the lackey of George the Fourth and his household in Edinburgh. Who could then have foreseen that seven years were to make so memorable a change in the ostensible public position of those two eminent men ! Brougham—the People's man, the Liberal, the ungraced of princes, the hated of courts and courtly creatures—become Lord Chancellor of England !—and Sir Walter Scott, the servile and violent Tory of the Dundas era, the favourite at Court, having the entrance by the back-stairs, put back in all his aims, frustrated in all his ambitions—not even on the Scottish bench, now fast filling with his ancient Whig rivals, though his thoughts seem to have sometimes pointed to that goal of a Scottish lawyer's hopes. Although the world had not guessed the truth pretty accurately, Mr Lockhart has taken considerable pains to inform it, that Sir Walter Scott made slight account of the highest honours of literature, and of the purely literary character, of whatever rank, when compared with the station of great lawyers, statesmen, and captains, and all those who influence or guide the destinies of empires. He had zealously, through thick and thin, served his party, his prince, and his own temporary interests, and " ta'en his wages ; " and now the leader of the popular party, who had so long and stoutly buffeted with power, and borne its frowns, had won and held the Great Seal, while he was hooted and hissed in a paltry town in his own neighbourhood. This is rather a long preamble to a simple tale, of which the moral shews a striking instance of retributive political justice. Lord Brougham, now in office, had at once manfully cast behind him the memory of former feuds and injuries, and was literally heaping coals of fire upon the heads of his former political antagonists. All Tories are not, it is to be presumed, either insensible or ungrateful. One day, a letter was received by Sir Walter Scott from his friend Southey. There could be nothing in such a correspondence that it was not pleasant and even desirable that those around him should hear ; and he handed it to a friend to read aloud. Southey launched out into admiration at the career of Lord Brougham, and praise of his magnanimity. Poor Sir Walter ! It was too much to bear. Southey !—Et tu, Brute ! He instantly snatched the letter from the hand of the reader, and crushed it, in a mode and style which we leave the reader to imagine and pity. This one fiery trial—every circumstance attending it duly considered—may be received as the full and final expiation of Scott's manifold political delinquencies. It would be wrong to suppress it. The anecdote is full of character, of warning, and of encouragement.

About the middle of April 1831, he had another and severe attack of apoplectic paralysis ; and the number of shocks which his vigorous constitution must have sustained, during the ten years from the King's visit to his own death, seems incredible. His speech was now greatly impaired ; his children hastened to him ; and his physician recommended, and the family urged, certain means of recovery to which he was exceedingly reluctant to submit. This was not all. In about three weeks after this fatal seizure, we find him writing in a hand which it was very difficult to decipher.

" May 6, 7, 8.—Here is a precious job. I have a formal remonstrance from these critical people, Ballantyne and Cadell, against the last volume of " Count Robert," which is within a sheet of being finished. I suspect their opinion will be found to coincide with that of the public ; at least, it is not very different from my own. The blow is a stunning one I suppose, for I scarcely feel it. It is singular, but it comes with as little surprise as if I had a remedy ready ; yet, God knows, I am at sea in the dark, and the vessel leaky, I think, into the bargain. I cannot conceive that I should have tied a knot with my tongue which my teeth cannot untie. We shall see. I have suffered terribly, that is the truth, rather in body than in mind ; and I often wish I could lie down and sleep without waking. But I will fight it out if I can.

It would argue too great an attachment of consequence to my literary labours to sink under critical clamour. Did I know how to begin, I would begin again this very day, although I knew I should sink at the end. After all, this is but fear and faintness of heart, though of another kind from that which trembleth at a loaded pistol. My bodily strength is terribly gone; perhaps my mental too."

Lockhart follows this up with painful confirmation:—

On my arrival (May 10th,) I found Sir Walter to have rallied considerably; yet his appearance, as I first saw him, was the most painful sight I had ever then seen. Knowing at what time I might be expected, he had been lifted on his pony, and advanced about half a mile on the Selkirk road, to meet me. He moved at a footpace, with Laidlaw at one stirrup, and his forester, Swanston, (a fine fellow, who did all he could to replace Tom Purdie,) at the other. Abreast, was old Peter Mathieson on horseback, with one of my children astride before him on a pillion. Sir Walter had had his head shaved, and wore a black silk night-cap under his blue bonnet. All his garments hung loose about him; his countenance was thin and haggard; and there was an obvious distortion in the muscles of one cheek. His look, however, was placid—his eye as bright as ever—perhaps brighter than it ever was in health; he smiled with the same affectionate gentleness; and though, at first, it was not easy to understand everything he said, he spoke cheerfully and manfully.

He had resumed, and was trying to recast his novel. All the medical men had urged him, by every argument, to abstain from any such attempts; but he smiled on them in silence, or answered with some jocular rhyme. One note has this postscript—a parody on a sweet lyric of Burns—

"Dour, dour, and eident was he,
Dour and eident but-and-ben—
Dour against their barley-water,
And eident on the Bramah pen."

He told me that in the winter he had more than once tried writing with his own hand, because he had no longer the same "pith and berr" that formerly rendered dictation easy to him; but that the experiment failed. He was now sensible he could do nothing without Laidlaw to hold the "Bramah pen," adding, "Willie is a kind clerk—I see by his looks when I am pleasing him, and that pleases me."

In a very few days after the occurrence of the events drawing forth this most affecting statement, Sir Walter, in spite of the entreaties of his family, would be present at the nomination of the Tory candidate for Roxburghshire. The candidate himself, Mr Scott, younger of Harden, begged that he would keep away; but unhappily he would not be overruled, and he accordingly shared the rough treatment of the other Tory gentlemen at the election, no exception being made for the author of "Waverley," since he had chosen to put himself forward so prominently and needlessly. The people were, however, in all probability, quite unaware of the delicate state of his mental and bodily health, before they employed, riotously and rudely, the only means which the constitution leaves them to express their sentiments—their power of lungs, namely, and sundry light missals. They cheered those they fancied their friends, and insulted and hooted those they considered their enemies. Sir Walter attempted to speak in the court-house, and could not be heard; and it was with some difficulty that he and Mr Lockhart escaped safely out of the town, in his carriage, but by a back lane. The Diary contains the following notice:—

"May 18.—Went to Jedburgh, greatly against the wishes of my daughters. The mob were exceedingly vociferous and brutal, as they usually are nowadays. The population gathered in formidable numbers—a thousand from Hawick also—sad blackguards. The day passed with much clamour and no mischief. Henry Scott was re-elected—for the last time, I suppose. Troja fuit. I left the borough in the midst of abuse, and the gentle hint of Burk Sir Walter. Much obliged to the brave lads of Jeddart."

This idle and very brutal phrase, of which Mr Lockhart says nothing, whether it was really heard or only imagined, struck deeply into the weakened mind of Scott. At different times, when in delirium, and in his last days, he was heard to mutter, "Burk Sir Walter;" and he still seemed to imagine himself at the Jedburgh election. The insult and outrage which his feelings had received there, did not, however, deter him from appearing, a few days afterwards, at Selkirk, where he had the excuse of official duty. There he had the satisfaction of seizing, with his own hands, some roaring boy, who had ventured to hustle a Tory elector on his way to the poll, and of committing him to prison. This was probably his last feat of personal prowess in the cause of Toryism. The Reformers of Selkirk behaved handsomely to Sir Walter, though, like those of Galashiels without heeding his political bigotry or Tory opinions one jot. Their loyal declaration, as we have heard, bearing with his infirmity of judgment on certain points, and loving the man, while they repudiated his servile opinions, was—"We'll fecht for the Shirra; but we maun hae the Bill."

Mr Lockhart has indulged in a solemnly-amusing anathema against Jedburgh and the town of Hawick, which sent out "a thousand blackguard weavers," to hoot—not certainly, Sir Walter Scott, the great author—not the Laird of Abbotsford, the respectable private gentleman—but the interfering Tory Sheriff of an adjoining county, the vassal of the old Dundas interest, who came very far and unnecessarily out of his way, to prop a party and a cause hateful to their feelings and inimical to their interests. and to trample on what they conscientiously considered their dearest rights. Lockhart says—

I am sorry for Jedburgh and Hawick. This last town stands almost within sight of Branksome Hall, overhanging also sweet Teviot's silver tide. The civilized American or Australian will curse these places, of which he would never have heard but for Scott, as he passes through them in some distant century, when, perhaps, all that remains of our national glories may be the high literature adopted and extended in new lands planted from our blood.

While we do not suppose that future generations of either democratic Americans or Australians will think much on the subject, we are pretty sure that the present generations of Jedburgh and Hawick, especially when they learn from this Memoir how it fared with Sir Walter Scott when he came among them, will sincerely regret their violence.

As soon as Scott had recovered from the consequences of these election contests, he began his unfortunate Tale of "Castle Dangerous;" and he was, by this time, so much piqued by James Ballantyne's former candid and most friendly criticisms, though feeling their truth, that he wrote to Cadell—"I intend to tell this matter to nobody but Lockhart—perhaps not even to him—certainly not to J. B." Mr Lockhart adds:—

James's criticisms on "Count Robert" had wounded him—the Diary, already quoted, shows how severely. The last visit this old ally ever paid at Abbotsford, occurred a week or two after. His newspaper had by this time espoused openly the cause of the Reform Bill—and some unpleasant conversation took place on that subject, which might well be a sore one for both parties, and not least, considering the whole of his personal history, for Mr Ballantyne. Next morning, being Sunday, he disappeared abruptly, without saying farewell; and when Scott understood that he had signified an opinion that the reading of the church service, with a sermon from South or Barrow, would be a poor substitute for the mystical eloquence of some new idol down the vale, he expressed considerable disgust. They never met again in this world. In truth, Ballantyne's health also was already much broken; and if Scott had been entirely himself, he would not have failed to connect that circumstance in a charitable way with this never strong-minded man's recent abandonment of his own old terra firma, both religious and political. But this is a subject on which we have no title to dwell.

Surely Mr Lockhart has forgotten that he has himself stated, in several of the earlier volumes of this work, that Ballantyne was a Whig, and had long before deserted his colours. The Manchester Massacre, as we have formerly stated, was one memorable occasion when he ventured in their joint newspaper to differ from his Tory patron, who tried to write him down. The Queen's trial, according to Scott's biographer, was another. The abandonment of his old terra firma in religion, we do not pretend to understand. Scott had early abandoned the national faith of Presbytery, for the more aristocratic faith of Episcopacy; and Ballantyne continued through life by the Church of Scotland. Though he might, probably, towards the close of his days, have, within its bosom, changed many of his views, there was certainly, neither in religion nor politics, any abjuration of former professed creeds, far less apostacy.

Mr Lockhart gives an interesting account of a short excursion which Scott took with him into Lanarkshire about this time, to examine the scenery of the projected romance, interesting principally as exhibiting a human mind—a gifted and richly-stored one—in a very peculiar state. "It was now," he says, "that I saw him, such as he paints himself in one or two passages of his Diary, but such as his companions in the meridian vigour of his life never saw him—the rushing of a brook, or the sighing of the summer breeze, bringing the tears into his eyes not unpleasantly." Bodily weakness laid the delicacy of the organization bare, over which he had prided himself in wearing a sort of half stoical mask."

They spent the night at Mr Lockhart's brother's, where the Laird of Borthwickbrae, whose address had been preferred to Scott's, met them at dinner. This gentleman, who had been ailing, was seized with palsy that same night, on his return home, and was despaired of. Scott, who had now frequently "shaken hands with death," was deeply affected by this intelligence; and, though he had agreed to remain for two days, he insisted on going back to Abbotsford immediately. "I must," he said, "home to work, while it is called day; for the night cometh when no man can work." At Rome, ten months afterwards, he heard of the death of Goethe, and was in like manner seized with a restless desire to be at home.

His way of life at this season is minutely described by that favourite authority, Mr Adolphus:—

"At table, if many persons were present, he spoke but little, I believe from a difficulty in making himself heard, not so much because his articulation was slightly impaired, as that his voice was weakened. After dinner, though he still sat with his guests, he forbore drinking, in compliance with the discipline prescribed to him, though he might be seen, once or twice in the course of a sitting, to steal a glass as if inadvertently. I could not perceive that his faculties of mind were in any respect obscured, except that occasionally (but not very often) he was at a loss for some obvious word."

His tour to the Continent had been long resolved, and was now resolved upon; and the Whig government paid that respect to the author of "Waverley" for which the Tory party received the thanks. Sir Walter's passage to Malta, was provided for in a King's ship, and Mr Cadell employed a praiseworthy if not pious fraud, to set him at peace about his new novels of "Count Robert," and "Castle Dangerous." They were kept in type until he had departed, to afford an opportunity, probably, to Ballantyne, of abridging and revising them without vexing the sensitive author. The sale of the re-published novels was now so great, in spite of the agitated state of the times, that Mr Cadell was enabled to hold out cheering hopes for the future, while he kindly assured the invalid that he need not make himself uneasy though he spent a little money on his travels, and also lay fallow for a season. After this intimation, Sir Walter began to entertain the notion that his debts were paid off; and no one had the heart to dispel so soothing a delusion. He even began to dream of the renewed glories of Abbotsford, and the conquest of Nicol Milne's acres. And its brightest glories were renewed, for one last day of parting love, when the son of Robert Burns sat an honoured guest at the board of Walter Scott.

Whatever happy effect Scott's loudly-bruited progress to the Mediterranean and Italy might have had on the sale of the Opus Magnum, no one can read its history without feeling deep sorrow that it was ever undertaken. Even in London, he was much more in society than could have been good for him; and far more than could be agreeable to a man in his condition, whose pride and sensibility were still tremblingly alive. Abroad it was yet worse. If his death was not hastened by his unfortunate journey and foreign residence, the remains of life were embittered—the last ties were rudely broken. There is nothing in his own inimitable pictures of the weakness and woes of sinking humanity more affecting than the following—nothing in the Memoir, save, indeed, the pathetic scenes of his torpid mind awakening to consciousness and passion, which his biographer has afterwards described. A consultation on his case was held by Dr Holland, Dr Ferguson, and Sir Henry Halford, before he went abroad.

When they left him after the first inspection, they withdrew into an adjoining room, and on soon rejoining him, found that in the interim he had wheeled his chair into a dark corner, so that he might see their faces, without their being able to read his. When he was informed of the comparatively favourable views they entertained, he expressed great thankfulness; promised to obey all their directions as to diet and repose most scrupulously; and he did not conceal from them, that "he had feared insanity and feared them."

He remained at Portsmouth for a few days before the Barham sailed; and either the attention of the Government had mollified his spirit, or his natural caution and respect for the powers that be had begun to operate; for, though he had just seen Apaley House battered, and the windows boarded up, we find him saying of his daughters:—

"October 27.—The girls, I regret to see, have got a senseless custom of talking politics in all weathers, and in all sorts of company. This can do no good, and may give much offence. Silence can offend no one, and there are pleasanter or less irritating subjects to talk of. I gave them both a hint of this, and bid them remember they were among ordinary strangers. How little young people reflect what they may win or lose by a smart reflection imprudently fired off at a venture?"

To Mr Cheney, a friend whom he met at Rome, he declared he was no enemy of Reform:—"If the machine did not work well, it must be mended—but by the best workmen." This was a great advance on his Jedburgh oration.

He was accompanied abroad by his daughter and his eldest son, now a major. He seems to have stood the voyage well; but the excitement of Malta, though we are assured that he enjoyed the society, and the marks of honour lavished on him by the inhabitants, was too much for his shattered condition. The history of Scott's residence in this island is borrowed by Mr Lockhart from the journal of Mrs Davy, whose husband, the brother of Scott's friend, Sir Humphry Davy, then held a high medical appointment in Malta. Mrs Davy was herself the daughter of a brother advocate and old neighbour of Scott's in Castle Street, Mr Archibald Fletcher. As cholera was still prevalent in England, the travellers were put in quarantine; but Sir Walter's personal friends, of whom there were several at this time in Malta, approached him as nearly as they durst; while Mrs Dawson, a daughter of Lord Kinneder, carried her filial and sisterly friendship the length of sharing their ten days' irksome confinement. Mrs Davy's party, in paying their respects at the quarantine station, were accompanied by a gentleman who made Sir Walter a formal welcoming oration.

"Sir Walter replied very simply and courteously, in his natural manner; but his articulation was manifestly affected, though not, I think, quite so much so as his expression of face. He wore trowsers of the Lowland small-checked plaid, and, sitting with his hands crossed over the top of a shepherd's-looking staff, he was very like the picture painted by Lealie, and engraved for one of the Annals—but, when he spoke, the varied expression, that used quite to redeem all heaviness of features, was no longer to be seen. Our visit was short, and we left Mr Frere with him at the bar on our departure."

The lady, after Scott was released and settled in a hotel, continues—

"Our house was immediately opposite to this one, divided by a very narrow street; and I well remember, when watching his arrival on the day he took Pratique, hearing the sound of his voice as he chatted sociably to Mr Greig, (the inspector of quarantine,) on whose arm he leaned while walking from the carriage to the door of his hotel—it seemed to me that I had hardly heard so home-like a sound in this strange land, or one that so took me back to Edinburgh and our own North-Castle Street, where, in passing him as he walked up or down with a friend, I had heard it before so often. Nobody was at hand at the moment for me to shew him to but an English maid, who, not having my Scotch interest in the matter, only said, when I tried to enlighten her as to the event of his arrival—'Poor old gentleman, how ill he looks!' It shewed how sadly a little while must have changed him; for, when I had seen him last in Edinburgh, perhaps five or six years before, no one would have thought of calling him 'an old gentleman.' At one or two dinner-parties, at which we saw him within the week of his arrival, he did not seem at all animated in conversation, and retired soon; for he seemed resolutely prudent as to keeping early hours; though he was unfortunately careless as to what he ate or drank, especially the latter—and, I fear, obstinate when his daughter attempted to regulate his diet. A few days after his arrival in Malta, he accepted an invitation from the garrison to a ball—an odd kind of honour to bestow on a man of letters, suffering from paralytic illness, but extremely characteristic of the taste of this place."

Dr and Mrs Davy afterwards dined with him with a very small party; and on that day he told Scottish stories, and recited snatches of ballads, and was somewhat like his former self. One day, he dined at Sir John Stoddart's, and partook more freely, it is supposed, of food and wine than was advisable for one in his state of health; but by bleeding with leeches he was again relieved. What a mad life altogether for a man in his condition!—But the toils were around him. The intricately-woven threads of the Lilliputians had pinned the rebellious giant to the earth. Yet would that he had been at Inch Kenneth or Sumburgh Head, instead of Malta and Naples! Mrs Davy's account of her farther intercourse with Sir Walter during his short stay, is exceedingly interesting. In her society, many bright glimmerings of home, and of old times and associations, arose on his darkness.

At the time Scott reached Naples, his younger son was there, attached to the embassy; and also many English visitors and residents. His chief friend, however, during his stay, chanced to be Sir William Gell, who has furnished Mr Lockhart with copious memoranda. They were much together, and suited each other; not the worse, probably, for Sir William's helpless lameness, which established an immediate sympathy. Sir William had also a fine, large, favourite dog—and Scott was the friend of dogs. One day that he called for Sir William rather early, he said that he came to tell a piece of good luck.

"This was, as he said, an account from his friends in England, that his last works, 'Robert of Paris' and 'Castle Dangerous,' had gone on to a second edition. He told me in the carriage that he felt quite relieved by his letters; 'for,' said he, 'I could never have slept straight in my coffin till I had satisfied every claim against me.' 'And now,' added he to the dog, 'my poor boy, I shall have my house, and my estate round it, free, and I may keep my dogs as big and as many as I choose, without fear of reproach.'"

Encouraged, probably, by this welcome intelligence, and the implied triumph over Ballantyne's criticism, he actually projected two new romances.

Alas! (says his biographer,) ere he had been long in Naples, he began, in spite of all remonstrances, to give several hours every morning to the composition of a new novel, "The Siege of Malta;" and, during his stay, he nearly finished both this and a shorter tale, entitled "Bizarro." He also relaxed more and more in his obedience to the regimen of his physicians, and thus applied a twofold stimulus to his malady.

Neither of these novels will ever, I hope, see the light; but I venture to give the foundation of the shorter one, as nearly as I can decipher it from the author's Diary, of which it occupies some of the last pages.

Scott never affected a taste for the fine arts; and to even the historical antiquities of Italy he was by this time indifferent, though he suffered himself to be dragged to the usual sights. One day that Gell, a first-rate cicerone, accompanied him to Pozzuoli and to Cumæ; and, as in duty bound, expatiated on those classic localities, and ran over the long bead-roll of the names of the temples and lakes, and all that there is to be admired and remembered, Scott seemed courteously to attend; but almost immediately, he unconsciously repeated, and with great emphasis—

"Up the craggy mountain, and down the mossy glen,
We canna gang a-milking for Charlie and his men."

Sir William smiled at this strange commentary on his eloquent dissertation upon the Lake of Avernus. And what, save as in courtesy bound, cared Sir Walter for the classic lakes of Italy? He might have continued his recitation:—

"My heart's in the Highlands, my heart is not here."
To him Cauldshiels Loch was more than the Lucrine Lake, and Avernus to boot of it—"the wheeple of a whaup," more delightful music than the warbling of the most famed prima donna of the Neapolitan opera.

While at Naples, he frequently wrote home.

Some of these letters were of a very melancholy cast; for the dream about his debts being all settled was occasionally broken; and probably it was when that left him that he worked hardest at his Novels—though the habit of working had become so fixed that I may be wrong in this conjecture. In general, however, these last letters tell the same story of delusive hopes both as to health and wealth, of satisfaction in the resumption of his pen, of eagerness to be once more at Abbotsford, and of affectionate anxiety about the friends he was there to rejoice.

With his imagined returning prospects, his heart expanded, and he directed gifts and benefactions to be made to several of his friends. So strong was the delusion as to his amended fortunes, that we find him writing to Mrs Scott of Harden:—

"I should have said something of my health; but have nothing to say, except that I am pretty well, and take exercise regularly, though, as Parson Adams says, it must be of the vehicular kind. I think I shall never ride or walk again. But I must not complain; for my plan of paying my debts, which you know gave me so much trouble some years since, has been, thank God, completely successful; and, what I think worth telling, I have paid very near £120,000, without owing any one a halfpenny—at least I am sure this will be the case by midsummer. I know the laird will give me much joy on this occasion, which, considering the scale upon which I have accomplished it, is a great feat."

Scott knew little of Goethe, only one complimentary letter having passed between them; and he does not seem to have taken the German poet-philosopher at anything like the high estimate of his modern English admirers, real and pretended. He was, however, exceedingly shocked to hear of Goethe's death. He had intended to visit the patriarch of German literature on his way to England. He had long been impatient to return home; and now his impatience became disease. All his dreams of recovery vanished. "Alas for Goethe!" was his exclamation. "But he at least died at home. Let us to Abbotsford." He, accordingly, left Naples for Rome, attended by his devoted daughter and his younger son. He appeared as indifferent to the treasures of the Vatican as to the classic environs of Naples. What were they to him! Sir William Gell happened to be his frequent companion at Rome as well as in Naples. An old and magnificent Gothic castle, within twenty miles of the city, which they visited, and which he imagined had belonged to the Orsini, and a large Danish dog, belonging to the castle, were, to Scott, more attractive than all the classic antiquities and monuments of art in Rome. He warmly invited Gell to visit him in Scotland, and liberally offered £300 to bear his travelling charges. "He continued," says Sir William, "to press my acceptance of this sum, till I requested him to drop the subject, thanking him most gratefully for his goodness." "I have a perfect right to give it," said Scott, "and nobody can complain of me, for I made it myself." One rejoices to find Sir Walter becoming kinder in heart as he waxed feebler in mind. Yet flashes of his original humour were sometimes breaking through the gloom of his spirit. One day he visited Frescati with a friend:—

"During this visit, Sir Walter was in excellent spirits; at dinner he talked and laughed, and Miss Scott assured me she had not seen him so gay since he left England. He put salt into his soup before tasting it, smiling as he did so. One of the company said, that a friend of his used to declare that he should eat salt with a limb of Lot's wife. Sir Walter laughed, observing that he was of Mrs Siddons' mind, who, when dining with the Provost of Edinburgh, and, being asked by her host if the beef were too salt, replied, in her emphatic tones of deep tragedy, which Sir Walter mimicked very comically,

"Beef cannot be too salt for me, my Lord."

In the scenes of Byron's pilgrimages, he was in the habit of speaking of that wayward Peer with more admiration than in his Diaries; though we were scarce prepared for the declaration, that "he considered him the only poet we have had since Dryden, of transcendent talents, and as possessing more amiable qualities than the world in general gave him credit for." Upon the same occasion, he spoke of Goethe, whom Mr Cheney, the friend who was with him, said he had seen the year before at Weimar, very old, but in perfect possession of all his faculties.

"Of all his faculties!" he replied; "it is much better to die than to survive them, and better still to die than live in the apprehension of it; but the worst of all," he added thoughtfully, "would have been to have survived their partial loss, and yet to be conscious of his state."—He did not seem to be, however, a great admirer of some of Goethe's works. Much of his popularity, he observed, was owing to pieces which, in his latter moments, he might have wished recalled. He spoke with much feeling. I answered that he must derive great consolation in the reflection that his own popularity was owing to no such cause. He remained silent for a moment, with his eyes fixed on the ground; when he raised them, as he shook me by the hand, I perceived the light blue eye sparkled with unusual moisture. He added, "I am drawing near to the close of my career; I am fast shuffling off the stage. I have been perhaps the most voluminous author of the day; and it is a comfort to me to think that I have tried to unsettle no man's faith, to corrupt no man's principle, and that I have written nothing which, on my death-bed, I should wish blotted." I made no reply.

The following day, May 11th, he left Rome; after that period, in the sad words of his biographer, "the story can hardly be told too briefly." He hurried on, in a state of irritable impatience, indifferent to every object of interest in the towns on his route, until at Venice he desired to see the Bridge of Sighs. On passing the Appenines on a very cold day, the snow and the pine forests recalled his native land; and he expressed pleasure at beholding them. The travellers hurried on through the Tyrol, a country that would have been powerfully interesting to Scott in happier times—but he would look at nothing; and, though the weather was often severe, he even wished to travel all night, in his eager impatience to die at home. He had been several times bled by his servant, on the journey, in anticipation of a fresh attack of his malady, which, however, did not take place until after he had descended the Rhine by the steamboat from Mayence to Cologne.

He was travelling in his carriage from Cologne to Nimuegen, when, on the evening of the 9th of June, he had his last fatal attack of combined apoplexy and paralysis. Bleeding again restored him temporarily. He eagerly desired to move onwards, and was lifted from his carriage into the Rotterdam steamboat. When conveyed to a hotel in London, he was just able to recognise his assembled children, to whom he repeatedly gave his blessing, though he was never fit to converse. Dr Ferguson, who attended him, states, that he was calm, but never collected, and, in general, either in absolute stupor or a waking dream. "He never seemed to know where he was, but imagined himself to be still in the steamboat. The rattling of carriages, and the noises of the street, sometimes disturbed this illusion; and then he fancied himself at the polling-booth of Jedburgh, where he had been insulted and stoned."

After a rest of three weeks, he was carefully conveyed to Scotland, by the Leith steam-packet; both his daughters and Mr Lockhart attending him. While he lay ill in London, an offer had been made by Lord John Russell to advance any sum necessary to Sir Walter's comfort, ("to relieve him from embarrassment" is the phrase,) from the Treasury. This liberal offer—which, however, was to cost the offerers nothing—was gratefully acknowledged, but declined. The melancholy details of his last journey are of little comparative consequence, until the day he reached Abbotsford; for he lay in complete unconsciousness during the voyage, and while he remained in Edinburgh.

We will not mar the effect of the following passage by one word of introduction:—

At a very early hour on the morning of Wednesday the 11th, we again torpid him in his carriage; and he lay in the same torpid state during the first two stages on the road to Tweedside. But, as we descended the vale of the Gala, he began to gaze about him; and by degrees it was obvious that he was recognising the features of that familiar landscape. Presently he murmured a name or two—"Gala Water, surely—Buckholm—Torwoodlee." As we rounded the hill at Ladhope, and the outline of the Eildons burst on him, he became greatly excited; and when, turning himself on the couch, his eye caught at length his own towers, at the distance of a mile, he sprang up with a cry of delight. The river being in flood, we had to go round a few miles by Melrose bridge; and, during the time thus occupied, his woods and house being within prospect, it required occasionally both Dr Watson's strength and mine, in addition to Nicolson's, to keep him in the carriage. After passing the bridge, the road for a couple of miles, loses sight of Abbotsford, and he relapsed into his stupor; but, on gaining the bank immediately above it, his excitement became again ungovernable.

Mr Laidlaw was waiting at the porch, and assisted us in lifting him into the dining-room, where his bed had been prepared. He sat bewildered for a few moments; and then, resting his eye on Laidlaw, said, "Ha! Willie Laidlaw! Oh, man, how often have I thought of you!" By this time, his dogs had assembled about his chair—they began to fawn upon him and lick his hands, and he alternately sobbed and smiled over them, until sleep oppressed him.

Next morning, his restored consciousness happily remained, and on the second and third day, he seemed still better, and was wheeled about the doors and through the house in a Bath chair. On the morning following his return, after remaining out of doors for a considerable time, he desired to be drawn into the library, and placed at a window looking down on the Tweed.

Here he expressed a wish that I should read to him; and, when I asked from what book, he said—"Need you ask? There is but one." I chose the 14th chapter of St John's Gospel; he listened with mild devotion, and said, when I had done, "Well, this is a great comfort—I have followed you distinctly, and I feel as if I were yet to be myself again." In this placid frame, he was again put to bed, and had many hours of soft slumber.

Next day he asked for something "amusing—a bit of Crabbe." Mr Lockhart read a description of the arrival of the players, in "The Borough," which had been one of Sir Walter's favourite passages.

He listened with great interest, and also, as I soon perceived, with great curiosity. Every now and then, he exclaimed, "Capital—excellent—very good—Crabbe has lost nothing!" and we were too well satisfied that he considered himself as hearing a new production, when, chuckling over one couplet, he said, "Better and better; but how will poor Terry endure these cuts?" I went on with the poet's terrible sarcasms upon the theatrical life, and he listened eagerly, muttering, "Honest Dan!"—"Dan won't like this." At length I reached those lines—

"Sad happy race! soon raised and soon depressed,
Your days all passed in jeopardy and joy;
Poor without prudence, with afflictions vain,
Not warned by misery, nor enriched by gain."

"Shut the book," said Sir Walter; "I can't stand more of this: it will touch Terry to the very quick."

We need not remind the reader that poor, unfortunate Terry had been some years dead. On the first Sunday, Sir Walter desired to hear the New Testament read, and then a little of Crabbe; and he listened, as to something quite new, to the pathetic tale of Phoebe Dawson, which had soothed the death-bed of Fox. What a task for the reader! Although he had forgotten Crabbe's beautiful episodes, he retained a lively recollection of whatever was read from the Bible; and he also remembered Watts' hymns, repeated by his grandson. These things belonged to an earlier, deeper memory than Crabbe's poetry. The next passage is strongly characterised by the ruling passion. Two days after the above Sunday, when wheeling about out of doors, he Fell asleep in his chair, and, after dozing for, perhaps, half an hour, started awake, and, shaking the plaids we had put about him from off his shoulders, said—"This is sad idleness. I shall forget what I have been thinking of, if I don't set it down now. Take me into my own room, and fetch the keys of my desk." He repeated this so earnestly that we could not refuse; his daughters went into his study, opened his writing-desk, and laid paper and pens in the usual order, and I then moved him through the hall and into the spot where he had always been accustomed to work. When the chair was placed at the desk, and he found himself in the old position, he smiled and thanked us, and said, "Now, give me my pen, and leave me for a little to myself." Sophia put the pen into his hand, and he endeavoured to close his fingers upon it, but they refused their office—it dropped on the paper. He sank back among his pillows, silent tears rolling down his cheeks; but, composing himself by and by, motioned to me to wheel him out of doors again. Laidlaw met us at the porch, and took his turn of the chair. Sir Walter, after a little while, again dropped into slumber. When he was awaking, Laidlaw said to me, "Sir Walter has had a little repose." "No, Willie," said he—"no repose for Sir Walter but in the grave." The tears again rushed from his eyes. "Friends," said he, "don't let me expose myself—get me to bed—that's the only place."

With this scene ended our glimpse of daylight. Sir Walter never, I think, left his room afterwards, and hardly his bed, except for an hour or two in the middle of the day; and, after another week, he was unable even for this. During a few days, he was in a state of painful irritation: and I saw realized all that he had himself prefigured in his description of the meeting between Crystal Croftangry and his paralytic friend. He declined daily; but still there was great strength to be wasted, and the process was long. He seemed, however, to suffer no bodily pain, and his mind, though hopelessly obscured, appeared, when there was any symptom of consciousness, to be dwelling, with rare exceptions, on serious and solemn things; the accent of the voice, grave, sometimes awful, but never querulous, and very seldom indicative of any angry or resentful thoughts. Now and then, he imagined himself to be administering justice as Sheriff; and, once or twice, he seemed to be ordering Tom Furdie about trees. A few times, also, I am sorry to say, we could perceive that his fancy was at Jedburgh—and Burk Sir Walter escaped him in a melancholy tone. But commonly whatever we could follow him in was a fragment of the Bible, (especially the Prophecies of Isaiah, and the Book of Job,) or some petition in the litany—or a verse of some psalm (in the old Scottish metrical version)—or of some of the magnificent hymns of the Romish ritual, in which he had always delighted, but which probably hung on his memory now in connexion with the church services he had attended while in Italy. We very often heard distinctly the cadences of the Dies Ira; and I think the very last stanza that we could make out, was the first of a still greater favourite—

"Stabat Mater dolens,
Juxta crucem lachrymosa,
Dum pendebat Filius."

All this time, he continued to recognise his daughters, Laidlaw, and myself, whenever we spoke to him, and received every attention with a most touching thankfulness.

Nearly two months passed in this melancholy way, before that final, brief awakening, when he summoned Mr Lockhart to his bedside, as has been noticed above. He died about noon, on the 21st of September, in the presence of all his children. His remains were deposited in Dryburgh Abbey,* with every mark of attention and reverence from friends and neighbours of all parties—the inner and the outer circle. The head was examined after death, and very slight traces of disease appeared in one part of the substance of the brain. The report of the medical men, states, whatever the phrenologists may make of it, that "the brain was not large." "The cranium was thinner than it is usually found to be"—we presume, than it is usually found in a man of the green old age of sixty; and Scott was not much above that period of life.

It was remarked that Scott had a very narrow head for a man of his size, and required a smaller hat than even little men. His head, with great elevation—which, however, the busts rather exaggerate—had not corresponding breadth. This point also may be left to the phrenologists. We notice the fact to introduce the hypothesis of Hazlitt, who, somewhere in his writings, imagines he has found the true key to Scott's mixed character, in "that double forehead of his," which bound together, without ever fusing into one, the great writer; the man of astonishing imaginative power, and of universal if not intense sympathies; and the sagacious man of the world; the violent party politician, upon the winning side; and the keen, shrewd, bargainer, of whom we see so much in the Memoir. On this fanciful hypothesis of the "double forehead," we may conclude that the lofty region belonged almost exclusively to the works, and the dreams of the future grandeur of the house of Abbotsford, and the inferior region to ordinary earthly life.

Mr Lockhart notices that Scott piqued himself upon being a man of business, which he certainly, in one sense, was; but once, talking of his prevailing weakness, in a jocular humour, he remarked—"Blood will out;" and he narrated a merry anecdote of his grandfather, the Whig and horse-jockey, the Goodman of Sandyknowe, whom Scott resembled so much, that, bating a few inches of forehead, his portrait, now at Abbotsford, might be taken for that of Sir Walter. Early in life this clever person had quarrelled with his father; and "his chief and relative Scott of Harden"—for Sir Walter counts gentle kin, as far as ever did any Macdonald or O'Connor—gave him a lease of Sandyknows, where he took for his shepherd an old man named Hogg, who lent him £30, his whole savings, to stock the farm. They went in company to a Border fair, to lay out the money to the best advantage in sheep. In the autobiography, Scott relates that the old shepherd went carefully from drove to drove, till he found a kirsa likely to answer their purpose, and then he went to tell his master to come up and conclude the bargain. But what was his surprise to see him galloping a mettled hunter about the race course, and to find he had expended the whole stock in this extraordinary purchase! The moral of Sir Walter's tale was, that his grandfather, though more by good luck than good judgment certainly, sold the hunter for double the thirty pounds, and throve every day after his wild bargain. So "blood will out," he concluded. "Yet there is a thread of the attorney in me too." Some will be apt to think that the entire warp of the character was attorney, on which was enwoven bright silken threads, "barbaric pearl and gold," in those rich tissues and gorgeous patterns which had concealed the sordid binding material, until Mr Lockhart was compelled to exhibit so much of the seamy side, as has enabled the observers to guess at the true nature of the mixed fabric. Though much delightful, much elevating illusion has been dispelled, we must not forget that, save "for the thread of attorney"—the sturdy hempen warp—the world would never have possessed the precious and beautiful stuff with which it has been enriched—mortifying, as it no doubt is, to know that we may owe the highest productions of genius and imagination to the self-same motive which supplies us with our boots and shoes, and the japan liquid to blacken them.

The remarks made in former notices of these memoirs, almost supersede farther commentary on the manner in which Mr Lockhart has fulfilled his duty as Scott's biographer. We do not see any cause to modify the strongest of our censures. Mr Lockhart, whether biassed by affection, or blinded by prejudice, or both, has "distorted the character and conduct" of James, and even of John Ballantyne, and in a less degree that of Constable—we shall not say "for the purpose of raising Scott at the expense of other men," but certainly to lay too great a share of the burden of his follies upon other men—to make them, and, in particular, the Ballantynes, the scapegoats for his errors. On this subject, James Ballantyne's son has remonstrated—Constable's son has protested—John Ballantyne's widow has complained; and to them the matter may now be safely left. It would seem that the revelations which Mr Lockhart has been compelled to make of Scott's personal affairs—and we must now, from his preface, consider them as reluctantly given and skilfully managed—have so astounded some persons, (ourselves of the number)—so lowered their estimate of Scott, that it is supposed he secretly disliked Sir Walter, and invidiously, and in a treacherous and underhand manner, "has done his best to dishonour him." If this notion be not wilful slander, it is involuntary madness. Mr Lockhart is not altogether insensible to the grievous weaknesses of his father-in-law—to his worldliness and low-pitched ambitions—though his own mind has evidently been somewhat warped by the same influences; yet every feeling of his nature—the best and the weakest—kindness, vanity, pride, and a cordial, genuine, and perhaps overweening admiration of the genius of Sir Walter Scott—the distinguished grandfather of his children—with warm affection for his person, are so knit up and complicated in his mind, that they have become his master-passion. To Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott was, not merely the greatest of writers, but the most influential of all Scottish political characters; endowed with capacities of being the ablest of generals and the wisest of statesmen, and a few more equally imaginary things—all, however, proceeding from blind devotion, and the desire to enhero an essentially worldly nature. Assuredly, neither Sir Walter Scott's fame, nor even his popularity, will ever wax dim and fade, if his son-in-law can preserve its brilliancy; and the extraordinary notion of those persons who imagine that, secretly disliking, Lockhart seeks to betray the subject of the biography, strikes us as the most far-fetched and ridiculous idea ever born of fantasy.

In estimating the capabilities and suitabilities of Mr Lockhart for his really arduous task, the influence which Scott must have had upon the modes of thought of the young man who grew up beside him, an idolising disciple, must not be forgotten. Mr Lockhart is not only as violent a political partisan as his father-in-law was, but he appears to partake in many of Scott's Quixotries. Affecting, occasionally, a high-minded philosophy, and contempt for external show, to which Sir Walter never pretended, Lockhart sometimes displays the spirit of the tuft-hunter, though pride saves him from shewing that of the lackey; and this he does, not merely on occasions which fall fairly in his way, but on any which he can create. Sir Walter worshipped great people, without enjoying their society; and Lockhart strives to exhibit him as, at all times, on the footing of the most familiar intimacy with those titled persons, whom he studiously lugs in by the head and shoulders. In genealogies, and counting kin upwards, he is, to the full, more ridiculous and overstraining than the cousin, ten or twenty times removed, of Scott of Harden; and much of this spirit he must, probably, have caught from Sir Walter, as soon as the mingling of blood consolidated family vanities and glories, as well as interests. But this is a venial transgression, compared with the former.

Mr Lockhart has shewn another propensity, which does not emanate from true chivalry. He is accused of having given pain to individuals, either by inaccurate statements or improper disclosures. And much of this we should be disposed to excuse, did it not almost uniformly happen, that those with whom he has made thus free, are either the powerless, who sit below the salt, or those unfriended persons who have gone to their account, leaving their memories undefended, save by the courtesy and justice of society. Mr Lockhart must be familiar with many of Sir Walter's mots, glancing shrewdly upwards, as well as downwards and around; but he is all but mute on these. If a man will hawk, one likes to see him fly occasionally at high game. Mr Lockhart is more prudent than daring in his sport. We have formerly felt it a duty to censure these things, not from disapproving of far greater frankness and candour in biographical writing than prevails in Great Britain, but because we condemn obvious partiality, based on purely conventional, or low grounds. What useful information, what possible advantage, can the readers of Sir Walter Scott's life derive, for example, from the gratuitous double quotation from Scott's diary, about Mrs Grant of Laggan's small pension? But, if this venerable lady had been some dowager of quality, or some well-allied spinster Lady Louisa—acting the precis same part about a larger pension—and a very natural part we fear it is, to poor, yet proud humanity—should we have heard one word about it?—Or, if it became absolutely necessary to speak of her ladyship, then the blanks, the asterisks, the clouds of mystification that Mr Lockhart would have interposed between the wind and nobility! According to Mr Lockhart, none are privileged to act in a mask, unless their names are found in "The Court Guide Book," or some fashionable Directory. These are not the principles on which manly biography should be written.

The thorough sincerity of Mr Lockhart's inordinate admiration of Scott is shewn, we think, in his remarkable credulity; for we imagine that he is rather mystified himself than desirous of mystifying his readers. It is also shewn in his resentments, especially his dislike to poor Hogg, whom he ought to have known better from the first, to condemn so severely at the last. Hogg's gaucheries, and absurdities, and memorable sayings about all the rest of the world, were capital jokes until they were imagined to affect Sir Walter, or any member of the house of Abbotsford; and, in this sort of coin, giving, no doubt, often seems more blessed than receiving. Yet, take and give is the rule of life. And was Sir Walter Scott really Hogg's "best benefactor?" Though a very kind friend, he was at any rate not the most respectful or delicate one; but respect was nothing to be looked for in the case. And did the Shepherd, in his latter years, totally abandoned of grace, truly "insult the dust of his best benefactor," so that it would have been better for him had he been deep drowned in any pool of Yarrow several years before his actual death? These are solemn things to jest about; yet what better use can the public make of the final doom, pronounced on the Ettrick Shepherd, who, having plenary indulgence all his life from his friends, (Mr Lockhart long included,) to be a little outspoken and also poetical in his prose, took the same liberties with the deceased baronet which he was in the habit of taking with other men, who could as ill afford to bear it. Unless it is shewn that Hogg committed some outrage on the memory of Sir Walter, of which the world has no idea, it will take leave to consider this stern judgment much of a piece with the anathema pronounced against the towns of Jedburgh and Hawick; and rejoice that James enjoyed his own fire-side for three or four years after the time when he should have died from regard to his fame. All this is abundantly ridiculous; but it proves most convincingly the sincerity of Mr Lockhart's unquestioning devotion to Scott.

The length of the work—six half-guinea and one twelve-shilling volume—is justified by the biographer, on the plea that, "if Scott was really a great man, his life deserves to be given in much detail." But it is not to Scott's Life which any one has objected; not to his letters, though many of them are either mere essays or epistolary compliments, not much connected with his life; and still less to his Diaries, save the make-bulk of the Light-house Yacht log-book—but to much irrelevant matter lugged in, such as the published criticisms of Mr Adolphus, and many extraneous details, exhibiting little either of Scott the artist or Scott the man. It is needless to complain of the want of family letters—the best of all domestic records, "fond and trivial," or of the want of the outgushing of confidences, feelings, hopes, fears, and reminiscences, which render some great men's careless family letters so exquisite—as we are persuaded Mr Lockhart has held nothing back, either in the correspondence of Scott or his friends, that could give grace or glory to his hero. Some gleanings, and piquant morsels, may still remain in the Diaries; and the originals will no doubt be sacredly preserved; but the present generation need expect little more from the literary executor's repositories. Much fugitive information, however, concerning Scott is drifting about in the society of his contemporaries, referring especially to an earlier period of life than that in which Lockhart knew him; and in these busy days, it is probable that some one may collect and tell it; and, rejecting much and condensing much, untrammelled by prejudice, and unbiassed by partial affection, shew the truth of Scott's mixed character in full day, and through a transparent medium—becoming thus to Lockhart what he has been to Currie. To those who would judge with accuracy, there is small difference between colouring matter thrown into the body to be examined, and a medium similarly tinted, through which it is to be viewed. Lockhart's Life partakes of both defects, but the most largely of the latter. In the meanwhile, no future Life of Scott could have been so ample or complete as it may now be made, if Mr Lockhart had not written. The materials might have been preserved; but it is not little, either in quality or value, that the biographer has contributed from his own stores. Save James Ballantyne, no one could have seen Scott more undisguisedly than his son-in-law, for ten or twelve important years, who possessed equal power of observation. If the same circumstances which extended his scope of observation blinded his judgment, we know not how to condemn. He had not only to judge with tenderness, delicacy, and indulgence of his eminent relative, but to endeavour, as it were, to give the tone to his contemporaries and posterity, in deciding on the character of the remarkable person, whose glory was to shed lustre on his children and his race, after perhaps the name of the Lockharts might have merged in that of "the Scotts of Abbotsford." An impartial judgment of Sir Walter was impossible to Mr Lockhart, had he been a Brutus instead of a man of letters; and, if possible, would have been morally repulsive. Still we will continue to protest against his injustice to other men—to those attached friends to whom Sir Walter, who knew them best, uniformly did justice. He seems, at best, to consider the Ballantynes, Hogg, and even such men as John Leyden, as vassals of a great chief, by and through whom they lived and moved—and to have estimated them by the single virtue of fidelity, blind devotion to his interest and wishes, and enthusiastic attachment to his person. They all swerved, in his opinion, from their clan fealty; and Mr Laidlaw alone, of the whole corps, with Tom Purdie and some one or two more of the household troops, are praised uniformly, or mentioned with tenderness.

Differing so far from the biographer in many debatable points, and disapproving of the spirit in which he has written much of these Memoirs, we have the more satisfaction in cordially subscribing to his general criticism, and just and delicate appreciation of the literary merits of Sir Walter Scott. In Scott's voluminous imaginative works, while we can conceive something loftier to desire, we find nothing to condemn, save indeed latterly vast surplusage—which is a thing apart—unwinnowed wheat, so sent to market on calculations of pounds, shillings, and pence:—nothing to condemn; and how much to approve, admire, love, enjoy, feed upon, and grow with what we feed on! Yet there seems a tendency at present to depreciate Scott's genius, for which it baffles us to find a good cause. There is but one Shakespeare, and we leave him alone, enshrined—unwilling either to hear his name profaned, or to see other men lessened by idle comparisons. The growing disposition to undervalue Scott tempts us to proclaim the belief, that he is not merely the first of prose fictionists, but equal to them all taken together—that in him we find combined the elevation and delicate imagination of Cervantes, the sagacity of Le Sage, the pathos of Richardson, the inimitable truthfulness and humour of Fielding, the shrewdness and comic power of Smollett, the exquisite simplicity and tenderness of Goldsmith, and even the wild and luxuriant fancy of Radcliffe. There remain but Godwin, in his "Caleb Williams," and Mrs Inchbald, in "Nature and Art," to carry off a laurel which Scott did not seek to gather. There may be other fictionists who, with equal powers of imagination, liveliness of fancy, fertility of invention, magic facility of touch, and all-embracing sympathies, shall bring a higher philosophy to the sphere of romance; but they have not yet appeared, and we know not where to look for them. Not certainly in the modern intense school. If we ever there chance on any indication of more expanded thought and loftier aspiration in works of fiction, we miss the thousand other charms and graces of Scott's pen; and are constrained to take to his men and women as they are, in preference to the freezing or extravagant idealities of those whose aims may be higher, but who lack power to strike. Want of intensity is often objected to Scott—and systematic intensity of high moral purpose, may be wanting; but his critics would, we apprehend, express themselves more accurately if they described the defect of which they complain, as want of abandonment. If passion be meant, we know not where, in the entire scope of prose fiction, to look for that highly sublimated and concentrated intensity of feeling, which, superior to the weakness of abandonment, "dies, and makes no sign," if not in his passionate pages. No pathos, no exaltation, no exquisite intensity of sentiment and of imagination, in the last chapters of "Waverley"—in "Kenilworth"—in "The Bride of Lammermoor"—in Rebecca the Jewess—in Minna Troil—in Clara Mowbray—in Effie Deans, her father, and her sister—in "Old Mortality?"—We carry literary heresy so far as to be fervent admirers of Scott's inferior writings—his metrical romances. If Chaucer was a great poet, then there must be a niche for Scott by the side of the Father of English Poetry. There is close resemblance in the distinctive features of their genius: the same freshness, heartiness, sagacity, humour, clearness, and unrivalled command over the picturesque.

A more suitable time may arrive for indulging in these genial themes. Devotees and romantic persons must have leisure to recover from the shock of finding the author of all those exquisite works merely a lucky original cross between the shrewd modern W. S. and the picturesque and gallant Border Laird—a much more exciting and loveable character, though not a peculiarly spiritualized one. True it is, that nearly all great writers shew to most advantage in their works; and it is, we fear, equally true that the author of "Waverley" forms no exception to this mortifying rule.

BENTHAMISMS.

NO. I.—EMANCIPATE YOUR COLONIES.

It is the characteristic of genius, that its words, even when uttered for an immediate and momentary purpose, are available as lessons for all after ages. This is eminently the case with Bentham's pamphlet, entitled, "Emancipate your Colonies."

This tract the author threw into the form of a letter to the National Convention of France. It was published for sale in 1830, but had been printed long before. In most of the copies which, from time to time, were distributed in the way of gift, inserted in MS. at the bottom of the first page, in the form of a note to the title, was the memorandum following:—"Anno 1793, written just before the departure of M. Talleyrand, on the occasion of the rupture between France and England. Copy given to Talleyrand's secretary, Gallois, who talked of translating it."

The letter commences:—"Your predecessors made me a French citizen: hear me speak like one." Its whole texture is thickly sown, interwoven, with allusions to the peculiar position of France, at the time. It is a letter on French affairs, addressed to Frenchmen. Their national vanity is adroitly appealed to, with a view to make it play into the interests of right reason. Humour, sarcasm, indignant eloquence, shift and play through its pages, interchangeably. But the pamphlet is the work of a man who had, by serious and persevering meditation, evolved and established principles of action for himself and others, to which he referred on all occasions, which he never lost sight of. Some of these are stated, in concise and nervous terms, in his letter to the National Convention, and their application to the question before it, clearly made out. The letter itself is matter of history. Its interest is mainly of the past; but these precious enunciations of principle speak to all time. They are lessons to us as they were to our predecessors. They are lessons, in so far as present events are concerned, above all suspicion of bias or partiality.

Bentham first addresses himself to shew the impossibility that a distant dependency can be well governed by the mother country:—

Is it for their advantage to be governed by a people who never knew, nor ever can know, either their inclinations or their wants? What is it you ever can know about them? The wishes they entertain? The wants they labour under? No such thing; but the wishes they entertained, the wants they laboured under, two months ago—wishes that may have changed, and for the best reasons—wants that may have been relieved, or become unrelievable. Do they apply to you for justice? Truth is unattainable for want of evidence; you get not a tenth part, perhaps, of the witnesses you ought to have, and these, perhaps, only on one side. Do they ask succours of you? You put yourselves to immense expense—you fit out an armament, and, when it arrives, it finds nothing to be done. The party to whom you send it, are either conquerors or conquered. Do they want subsistence? Before your supply reaches them, they are starved. No negligence could put them in a situation so helpless as that in which, so long as they continue dependent on you, the nature of things has fixed them, in spite of all your solicitude. Solicitude, did I say? How can they expect any such thing? What care you, or what can you care, about them? What picture can you so much as form to yourselves of the country? What conception can you frame to yourselves, of manners and modes of life so different from your own? When will you ever see them? When will they ever see you? If they suffer, will their cries ever wound your ears?—will their wretchedness ever meet your eyes? What time have you to think about them? Pressed by so many important objects that are at your door, how uninteresting will be the tale that comes from St Domingo and Martinique!

Whoever peruses this rapid string of queries, endeavouring to answer them to himself as he goes along, must, by the time he comes to the close, feel the conviction that it is impossible the people of any country can govern the inhabitants of a distant country for their good, indelibly engraven upon his mind. Let us select, for an example, that case which at present is, or ought to be, uppermost in all British minds—Canada. The disturbances in Canada were, even by the admission of the originators of the monstrous bill for remodelling its form of government, occasioned entirely by delay in attending to and redressing grievances long and urgently pressed upon the attention of the home government. "Out of sight out of mind"—with so much to occupy our legislature and our ministers, what chance have Canadians ever had of being attended to? Even now that this country is called upon, in its capacity of sovereign, to judge between Canadian and Canadian in matters of blood, what is the answer you receive from nine out of every ten with whom you attempt to argue the question? "I dare say you are quite right; the Government measure has an ugly look; but I am quite ignorant of Canadian affairs." That very ignorance ought to convince the speaker that he is incompetent to legislate for Canada. His consciousness, that his own ignorance of these matters is no greater than that of almost all his acquaintances, ought to convince him that they are equally unfit. But, so long as the British Parliament shall retain the power of legislating for Canada, so long are he and his equally incompetent friends the real legislators for that province. They appoint the men who, in ignorance as gross as their own, legislate for Canada. They take upon them the responsibility of sanctioning, at hap-hazard, what may cause the weal or woe of Canadians. No man who entertains a due sense of this fearful responsibility, can continue to exercise it. "Emancipate your colonies!" The passage we have quoted from Bentham demonstrates the justice of such a measure in the abstract; your own consciences, in so far as Canada is concerned, corroborate his argument. Even the silly fallacy of Ministers—that we must retain the Canadas to secure the few attached to this country—is met by anticipation in Bentham's pamphlet:—

A minority among them might choose rather to be governed by you than by their antagonists, the majority; but is it for you to protect minorities? A majority which did not feel itself so strong as it could wish, might wish to borrow a little strength of you; but, for a loan of a moment, would you exact a perpetual annuity of servitude?

And again—

“Oh, but the good citizens! What will become of the good citizens?”—What will become of them? Their fate depends upon yourselves. Give up your dominion—you may save them; fight for it—and you destroy them. Secure, if you can do it, without force, a fair emission of the wishes of all the citizens; if what you call the good citizens are the majority, they will govern; if a minority, they ought not to govern; but you may give them safety if you please.

This is most true. If the British party, as it is called, be in the minority in Canada, all our efforts to preserve to it a permanent ascendancy will be unavailing: and, when these efforts terminate, they will leave the majority more embittered against the minority that has ruled them by foreign aid, than it is at present. Leave the people of Canada, even at this thirteenth hour, to fix their form of government for themselves, and the minority will be obliged—with some reluctance and grumbling, it may be—to acquiesce in the will of the majority. Let us throw our weight into the balance, and give the minority, for a time, a factitious preponderance, and, when the time comes that they must be left to themselves, (all parties allow that such a time must come,) the majority will come into power with a rankling sense of injuries sustained, and, in all probability, an unextinguishable thirst for vengeance. This will have been our doing. Our short-sighted policy will, in seeking to benefit the minority, in reality have rendered its situation more dangerous.

From the consideration of what is most for the interest of the colonies, Bentham turns to consider what is most for the interest of the mother country. He knew right well that the only available argument with the holders of power, is to shew them that the course of policy recommended, is that which it is for their own advantage to adopt it. The loudest railers against the doctrine of utility, are those who, conscious that they are sacrificing the general good for the advantage of a few, dare not submit the results of their own measures, and of those recommended by their opponents, to dispassionate measurement; and, therefore, seek to evade inquiry, by raising a dust of words about our ears, in the obscurity of which they hope to evade apprehension. Press home the declaimers upon disinterestedness on their own principles; demonstrate to them that their strict justice calls upon them to sacrifice themselves for others: they will laugh in your face, and tell you that, in a world where all men were just, they would be just too; but in this they are not going to expose themselves to ridicule by becoming the Quixotes of morality. Convinced of this truth, Bentham proceeds to shew the inutility of colonial dependencies, and attacks at once the stronghold of monopoly:—

“Oh, but we give ourselves a monopoly of their produce, and so we get it cheaper than we should otherwise; and so we make them pay us for governing them.” Not you, indeed; not a penny. The attempt is iniquitous, and the profit an illusion. The attempt, I say, is iniquitous; it is an aristocratical abomination—a cluster of abominations: it is iniquitous towards them, but much more as among yourselves. Abomination the first:—Liberty, property, and equality violated on the part of a large class of citizens, (the colonists,) by preventing them from carrying their goods to the markets which it is supposed would be most advantageous to them, and thence keeping from them so much as it is supposed they would otherwise acquire. Abomination second:—One part of a nation (the people of France) taxed to raise money to maintain, by force, the restraints so imposed upon another part of the nation (the colonists.) Abomination third:—The poor—who, after all, are unable to buy sugar—the poor in France, taxed in order to pay the rich for eating it.* Necessaries abridged for the support of luxury. The burthen falls upon the rich and poor in common: the benefit is shared exclusively by the rich.

Our author does not rest contented with establishing these truths in the abstract. He views them from every side, and makes them clear by redundant illustration. He carries out his principle; and, by stripping naked the whole deformity of monopoly, he makes good his point. He thus clinches this link of his chain of argument:—

Will you believe experience? Turn to the United States. Before their separation, Britain had the monopoly of their trade: upon the separation, of course, she lost it. How much less is their trade with Britain now than then? On the contrary, it is much greater. All this while, is not the monopoly of the colonists clogged with a counter-monopoly? To make amends to the colonists for their being excluded from other markets, are not the people of France forbidden to take colony produce from other colonies, though they could get it ever so much cheaper? If so, would not the benefit to France, if there were any, from the supposed gainful monopoly, be outweighed by the burden of that which is acknowledged to be so burthensome? Yes; the benefit is imaginary, and it is clogged with a burthen that is real.

Having exposed the delusion occasioned by mistaken views of interest, Bentham next proceeds to expose the hollowness and deadness of the idol, national power, in the form in which it is worshipped by those statesmen who are in the habit of arrogating to themselves exclusively the epithet of practical.

“Oh, but they are a great part of our power.” Say, rather, the whole of your weakness. In your own natural body, you are impregnable; in these unnatural excrescences you are vulnerable. Are you attacked at home? Not a man can you ever get from them—not a sixpence. Are they attacked? They draw upon you for fleets and armies.

These are the direct arguments in favour of emancipating dependent colonies. Bentham adverts also to the indirect. A few of the first sentences of the extract which we are about to make, are calculated to stimulate the honest pride of the representatives of a regenerated nation. It would almost seem as if our reformed representatives were already rendered too callous to the generous sentiments they once professed, to be accessible to such appeals. In public life, the sensitiveness of political honour is soon dulled. We cannot, however, bring ourselves to omit them. Bentham speaks to the French patriots, who scorned boroughmongering, Priestley-persecuting, Pitt-ridden England.

You who hold us so cheap—who look down with such contemptuous pity on our corruption, on our prejudices, on our imperfect liberty—how long will you take our example to govern you, and, of all parts of it, those which are least defensible? Is it a secret to you, any more than to ourselves, that they cost us much, and they yield us nothing—that our government makes us pay them for suffering it to govern them—and that all the use or purpose of this compact is to make places, and wars that breed places? You who look down with so much disdain on our corruption, on our prejudices, on our imperfect liberty, will you submit to copy a system in which corruption and prejudice are in league to destroy liberty—a compact between government and its colonies, of which the mother country is the sacrifice and the dupe? You have hitherto seen only what is essential—collateral advantages crowd in, in numbers: saving of the time of public men, simplification of government, preservation of internal harmony, propagation of liberty and good government over the earth. You are chosen by the people: you mean to be so. You are chosen by the most numerous part, who must be the least learned of the people. This quality, with all its advantages and disadvantages, you, the children of the people, must expect, more or less, to partake of. Inform yourselves as you can, labour as you will, reduce your business as much as you will, you need not fear the finding of it too light for you. What a mountain of arguments and calculations must you have to struggle under, if you persevere in the system of colony-holding, with its monopolies and counter-monopolies! What a cover for tyranny and speculation! Give your commissaries insufficient power, they are laughed at; give them sufficient, they become dangerous to their masters. All this plague you get rid of, by the simple expedient of letting go those whom you have no right to meddle with.

These, and all that we have quoted, are memorable words. They speak to us, at this moment, like a voice from the tomb. They tell us to pause, and to reflect before we sanction laws for Canada, which, passed in ignorant irritation, may be productive of evil we may yet shudder to reflect upon. What man amongst us, who pleads ignorance of Canadian affairs as a reason for not interfering to denounce the Canada Coercion Bill, but thereby acknowledges the incompetency of this country to govern Canada? What man, who acknowledges this incompetency, but must admit the wisdom and justice of this exhortation—"Emancipate your colonies?"

There is a specialty in the case of Lower Canada, we admit; but that specialty tells against the advocates of the Ministerial policy. Canada was originally peopled from France; its inhabitants were French in their language, customs, laws, and religion; they were long governed by France. They were transferred by France to this country, without their wishes being consulted. No sooner was Canada ceded to Britain, than British adventurers flocked thither, to make or mend their fortunes. These adventurers went to Canada, knowing that French laws and customs prevailed among its inhabitants; and it is the duty of such visitants to conform to, to respect the laws of the people among whom they beg leave to earn a bit of bread. Instead of doing this, however, our sturdy baggars availed themselves of home connections to influence the British government to force the people among whom they settled, to conform themselves to their likings and dislikings. This was the first origin of heart-burnings and discontent in Canada. Under Pitt, a compromise was arranged: by the act of 1791, the French Canadians ceded Upper Canada to the admirers of British law, upon condition that, within their narrowed limits, they might enjoy their own native laws, and a representative legislature, to amend them as occasion required. Still British adventurers continued to pour into Lower Canada; and, still regardless of the price at which its inhabitants had purchased liberty to live under their own laws, these newcomers insisted that a whole people should abandon its own inclinations and convictions, and conform to their crotchets. And now Sir George Grey proposes to settle the disputes thence arising, by again subdividing Lower Canada into halves, and allowing the French Canadians to enjoy their own laws within further curtailed boundaries. As the Red Indians have been driven from their settlements in the United States in violation of every principle of honesty and humanity, so are the French Canadians to be squeezed gradually out of the British provinces. This is the first origin of the mischief in Lower Canada. The acts of dishonest and contumelious aggression of which the British authorities have been guilty, have all been perpetrated in enforcing this wrong. We are told that the French Canadians are too ignorant for self-government; we heard nothing of this necessity while they were ignorant enough to endure, tamely, wrong at British hands. Reading and writing are not education, but only the means to that end. There may be good, substantial education without reading and writing; and with reading and writing there may be gross, imbecile ignorance. The French Canadians are a proof of the former position; our British aristocracy of the second. If Charlemagne, who could not write, was capable of keeping a large empire together after winning it, and of establishing laws the influence of which has not yet passed away, we confess ourselves unable to see why calligraphy should be indispensable in a voter for a member of the House of Assembly.

But, although the case of Lower Canada may be a special one, the cases of the other British provinces in North America are not. In all of them there are discontents, although the British government seem to have quieted some of them for the present, by the unworthy device of exciting the prejudices of the Englishman against the Frenchman. Such a low and dishonest method of governing, cannot endure. Both parties will come in time to their senses, and make common cause against the government which is Macchiavellian enough to act thus. And, in addition to their enmity, we run eminent risk, through the folly of the governors whom our precious Ministers have sent across the Atlantic, of being engaged in a squabble with the United States.

The short and easy method of getting rid of all those risks and annoyances, is to "emancipate our colonies." There is yet time to pass a law, ordaining that a convention shall be held in each of the British North American provinces, in spring, to settle how it shall henceforth be governed.

"That is exactly what Roebuck says." We are not aware that it is; and, if it be, what then? It is the advice and not the adviser that ought to be looked to. Is Mr Roebuck necessarily more biassed than Mr Ellice, whose son Lord Durham, with such exquisite good taste, is taking out as his private secretary? But, even on this point, Bentham has forestalled us, when he supposes his French auditors stopping their ears and abusing him:—

"Oh! but you are a hireling: you are a tool of your King and his East India Company. They have employed you to tell us a fine story, and persuade us to strip ourselves of our colonies, not being able to rob us of them themselves." "Oh, yes; I am all that. I have not bread to eat; and, no sooner is your decree come out, than I get £50,000 from the Company, and a peerage from the King. I am a hireling; but will you then betray the interest of your constituents, because a man has been hired to shew it to you? It would be of use to England; but are there no such things as common interests?—and are you never to serve yourselves but upon condition of not serving others at the same time? Is your love for you brethren so much weaker than your hatred of your neighbours? It would be of use to England; but are England and King of England so perfectly synonymous? and do you, of all men, think so? The King's interest would be served by it; but, by knowing a man's interest, his true and lasting interest, are you always certain of his wishes? Is consummate wisdom among the attributes of his ministers? Have they no passions to blind, and no prejudices to mislead them? Are you so unable to comprehend your own interest, that it is only from the opinion of others that you can learn it, and those your enemies? The King of England is your enemy; but because he is so, will you put yourselves under his command? Shall it be in the power of an enemy to make you do as he pleases, only by employing somebody to propose the contrary? See what a man exposes himself to by listening to such impertinences. I am hired; but are not advocates hired as often as a question comes before a court of justice? And is justice on neither side, because men are paid on both sides? Legislators, suffer me to give you a warning. This is not the only occasion on which it may have its use. Those, if any such there be, who call attention off from the arguments that are offered to the motives of him that offers them, shew how humble their conception is, either of the goodness of their cause, of the strength of their own powers, or of the solidity of your judgment, not to say of all three."

THE CONQUEROR'S DREAM.

A BRIGHT dream flash'd upon his soul; his mother, kneeling by,
Gazed with a mother's pride and love within her tearful eye.
She watch'd the play of noble thoughts upon his changing cheek;
She watch'd young passion's infant fire his snow-white forehead streak;
She mark'd from 'neath his half-closed eye soul-bright gleamings dart;
She mark'd the moving, wordless lip, the wildly-throbbing heart.
She deem'd his thoughts were far away, where his young co-mates play'd
Upon the mimic battle plain, with mimic battle blade;
Or climb'd the eagle-haunted cliff, or bounded on the turf,
Or dash'd aside in rival glee old Ocean's stormy surf.
She little wist that glowing eye saw visions brighter far
Than smiled within Paoli's isle, beneath the evening star.
That cheek the same high passion burn'd that glow'd in his who stood
With blade unsheathed, and waving plume, wet from the Granic flood;
That boyish bosom throbb'd with thoughts that claim'd their bound to be
A mightier tide than rolls its foam within the Tuscan sea.
He dream'd that, from a mountain's brow, beyond the white clouds piled,
He gazed on fair and sunny plains, that far beneath him smiled;
Around, ten thousand warrior men, ten thousand flashing spears,
That flung terrific brightness o'er the snows of ancient years.
Before him floated, in mid air, on dim and shadowy wing,
Luring him on, what seem'd to be the phantom of a king.
With face averted, on the plain, it waved its shadowy hand,
And he—the genius of the scene—spoke words of high command:

NO. LIII.—VOL. V.

He deem'd himself the Lybian chief of old heroic times,
Who tamed the Roman eagle's wing, in its own sunny climes,
And waved a foreign banner high above the Alpine snow,
And roll'd the war-blast of the south along the winding Po.
The scene was changed! A burning sky o'erhung a burning plain—
The ocean of the desert-ship—the bright sun's own domain:
Three vast old piles rose high and hoar amid an Afric levin,
The pride and mockery of man, at war with Time and Heaven;
And there, beneath these hoary towers, far gleam'd the warrior's brand,
And shout and shriek are mingling there, and blood is on the sand.
There casque and turban wildly blend, and high the crescent shines,
And high the eagle-banner waves above the conquering lines;
And he, the chief, with folded arms across his gallant breast—
With eye like lightning, keen, but calm, like thundercloud at rest—
Sits proudly on his noble steed; and there the shadowy form
Floats o'er the eagle-flag, and seems to guide the battle-storm.
The scene was changed, but not the clime. The herald-star of night
Flung o'er the trembling ocean-wave its melancholy light;
The blue deep murmur'd to the moon—the cloudless moon above
Mantled the wave and wilderness in one soft smile of love;
And in that holy light gleam'd mosque and minaret afar,
But round them fiercer radiance flash'd, from sword and scimitar;
For, round a rock-built citadel, a leaguering army stood,
And by its gates War raised his plume, and roll'd his purple flood.
Wild was the Allah shriek! while he, the chieftain of the Frank,
Sped, like the arrowy light of death, from wavering rank to rank;

And loud the shout, while, bathed in blood, beneath the crescent's glow,
A stern old warrior, grey with years, cheer'd on the tur-ban'd foe.
With thunder-crash of shot and shell, the wall in ruins burst,
And in the breach, 'mid smoke and flame, with malison
accurs,
Foe meets with foe! Now in advance, with victory's light upon her,
The eagle floats!—now onward gleam the Moslem blade and banner!
But what attracts the warrior's eye? what clouds the chieftain's brow?
Before the phantom's mournful gaze he feels his spirit bow:
An instant hovering near, it folds its plume across its breast,
Then sails, on melancholy wing, into the starry east.
The scene was changed!—Oh, brightly shine, within that pillar'd hall,
The pomp of chivalry, the gem of beauty's coronal!
There riches sheds on loveliness its incense and its bloom,
And pride of birth is tossing there its high ancestral plume;
But what, amid that courtly pomp, enthral's each look and tone?
A white-stoled priest is kneeling there—he kneels before a throne,
And vows a nation's loyalty, a nation's love, to him—
That sovereign prince whose brows are bound with empire's diadem.

To him, the proud unconquer'd chief, that bright-hair'd slumbering boy,
The champion of his island mate, his island mother's joy;
Oh, is he not the glorious youth he deems himself to be,
Who bade the conquest star of Greece burn o'er the Indian sea,
And wept to think that Ammen's son had not a mightier world
On which the flag of Macedon might be again unfurled!
He waked and dream'd again; but, ah! that after dream was long—
Week roll'd on week, and year on year, but still the spell was strong;
That slumberous spell that wrapt his soul in glory and in bliss,
Or steep'd it in the wormwood gloom—the gall of bitterness.
It conjured up the battle strife, and woke the warrior's joy;
The crown of empires lured his grasp—he deem'd the crown a toy.
It conjured up a vanquish'd world, and then strange sights were seen:
The eagle stoop'd where once its fierce, triumphant flight had been;
The hot simoom moan'd wildly by, and thousands gasp'd below;
The ice-fiend breathed, and thousands more lay stiffen'd on the snow.
A foeman's brand hath tamed the crest that once un-conquer'd shone,
And, prison'd on an ocean-crag, awoke—Napoleon. [C. P.]

SERJEANT TALFOURD'S COPYRIGHT BILL.

THE parties at issue on this question, are the holders of copyrights, whether authors or publishers, on the one side, and the public on the other. Printers, papermakers, and retail booksellers, have only a temporary interest in the matter; for, as long as these trades are open to free competition, the profits of the individuals engaged in them cannot be either permanently raised or depressed by enactments as to copyright, whether wise or absurd. The opposing interests are those of the monopolists, (we do not use the word in an invidious sense,) and those of the public.

On the part of the authors, a claim is set up of absolute property in their works, of the same nature, and equally sacred, as property in lands or houses. On the decision of this question of absolute property in the productions of mind, hangs the whole matter at issue. For, if it be decided in favour of the authors, they and their assignees are entitled to protection for not merely the long period proposed by Serjeant Talfourd's bill, but to the end of time. If copyright be really a species of natural property, it undoubtedly ought to be regarded as sacred. To violate such property, on account of public utility, is no more to be thought of than taking a man's estate from him, and dividing it among his destitute neighbours. Nay, more; if our British authors have a "sacred property" in their works, they are entitled to protection, not only from all invasion of that property at home, but abroad also. Our government is bound to afford British authors the same protection from foreign depredation, which our merchants enjoy. Grant that the author's right of property in his composition is as clear and sacred as the merchant's in his goods, and the consequence is undeniable.

This is not all. The representatives of authors long ago gathered to their fathers, are entitled to assume the "sacred right" which their ancestors had in their works. That they have long been unjustly deprived of it, is no reason against the resumption. Prescription cannot cut off the sacred right, however long it may have lain dormant. It is a rule of law, that a man cannot lose his property by the long prescription, unless some other person has, by the same prescription, acquired the property. It follows, that the heirs of Milton, Spenser, Pope, Dryden, Shakspeare, Richardson, even Chaucer, have only to prove their descent, and forthwith they are entitled to a monopoly, for ever, of the works of their great ancestors; a monopoly not confined to Britain, Ireland, and the British dependencies, but extending over the whole globe; at least wherever the British arms can secure justice to British subjects.

These consequences of the right of authors to the productions of their pen, are a little startling, and may well prompt those who take an interest in the diffusion of knowledge to a strict scrutiny of the right which has been perhaps too readily allowed to pass current as sacred.

We maintain that there is no analogy between the right of a man to his estate or his house, to his ox or his ass, and the right of an author to the exclusive printing and publishing of his works. Between the former class of rights and the right of an author to his own manuscript, or to the copies of it he has printed, the analogy is perfect. But there all resemblance of the two cases ends. It is true, as has been said, that, for the protection of property, as of copyright, resort may be had to the law. There is, however, this material difference between the two cases:—The owner of a house or an estate has a perfect right to exclude an intruder on his property by force, if he chooses and is able to do so; whereas the author has no right to seize, without recourse to law, copies of his book printed without his permission, or to stop what he would call the piratical press at work on his composition. If he were to attempt to do so, he would not be in the situation of the owner of lands or houses, expelling brevis manu the trespasser on his property; but would himself be the trespasser, and be liable to be treated as such. The truth is, that authors, musical composers, and painters, have no exclusive right to their ideas, when once they have published or promulgated them, except what is the creature of statute. Judge Yates, in the famous case of Miller versus Taylor, was quite right when he maintained, that "ideas cannot be the object of property; they are not visible, tangible, nor corporeal" and again—"A literary composition is undoubtedly the property of the writer so long as it remains in manuscript; but by the act of publishing, he gives it to the world; he lets the bird fly; his property is gone." Exactly analogous is the case of patents. He who discovers some new application of mechanical powers, has no right to prevent others from imitating the new process. With the operation of one man, another must not interfere: but he may go and do likewise, and resist by force any attempt to hinder him. Whatever one man does, another may do, in so far as natural right is concerned. He can only be prevented from imitation, or piracy, by express statute. And whether the original invention be a book, a tune, a painting, a speech, the cut of a coat or of a cap, a game at cards, a guard in self-defence, or a new mode of locomotion by the aid of wings or of a steam-engine, all men may copy the invention, may fly, paint, print, &c., as like the inventor as they please, until restrained by a law made for that purpose. But no law is required to prevent intrusion upon what is really the property of another; although the law may be called in to aid in punishing the transgressors, as it may to punish offences against property in copyright, after copyright has been made property by law.

There is no question as to the propriety of encouraging authors, musical composers, painters, and inventors of all kinds, by giving them, for a certain time, the exclusive benefit of their invention. That copyrights and patents should be the reward of authors and inventors, all are agreed. The question, in the case of copyright, is, how long it should endure? Having got rid of the idea of authors having a "sacred property" in their works, we are now at liberty to discuss the duration of copyright, and the other points of Serjeant Talfourd's Bill, upon the simple principle of public utility.

Fourteen years was the period first fixed by statute. Afterwards, copyright was extended for fourteen years more, if the author survived the first period; and, in 1814, twenty-eight years was the term allotted to all copyrights; with a prolongation, in the case of the author being alive at the end of the twenty-eight, for the remainder of his life. With this law, authors have been very generally satisfied; and so have publishers, who, in fact, have benefited far more than authors by the extension of the duration of copyright; and always will benefit more, unless the new law make a change which no one foresees—namely, place authors in easy circumstances before they become such, and make them provident afterwards. For, as is well known, almost every copyright that is worth purchasing, speedily becomes the property of publishers. From whatever cause it may arise, the fact is certain, that authors very rarely retain a copyright for which they can obtain money. It becomes, therefore, an important question, what number of years' sale do publishers generally contemplate, when making an author an offer for his copyright? Mr Murray, the great London publisher, on his examination before a Committee of the House of Commons, declared that he would not give more for a copyright, after the extension of the protection from fourteen to twenty-eight years, than before. Those who know anything of the publishing business, will agree with us, that even fourteen years is a much longer period than is embraced in the calculations of the purchasers of copyrights. Very seldom do such calculators take in more than from five to seven years' sale. If the book should sell for a longer time, the publisher considers that he has, by that time, paid enough to the author; that paper, print, and advertising, will be enough for him to encounter afterwards, from the diminished sale to be expected, the competition with other works, and the probable necessity of reducing the selling price. When copyrights are sold by the London booksellers to each other, they usually estimate their value at the profit of three or four years' sale of the books; and this in relation to books in regular demand, and the returns of which can be calculated upon with great precision. The copyright of Scott's novels, after every means of enhancing their value had been used, were bought back from Constable's creditors for £8,500, including the whole, from "Waverley" to "Quentin Durward;" while £8,000 had shortly before been given for "Woodstock" alone. If, then, our two positions be well-founded—the authors seldom retain a saleable copyright, and that publishers seldom reckon on more than from five to seven years' sale, in calculating the value of the copyright, rarely indeed look to fourteen years, and scarcely in any instance to twenty-eight; it follows, that the proposed extension of the monopoly to sixty years after the death of the author, may benefit publishers occasionally, but scarcely ever will be of the smallest advantage to authors. Benefit to publishers is not the object of the Bill—at least not the avowed object—although we have a shrewd suspicion that publishing influence has had something to do with the bill, and has suggested one very curious clause of it. Setting aside, then, all care for the interest of publishers, and looking to the question between the authors and the public—a question, be it remembered, of public utility, and not of "sacred right" exposed to spoliation—we ask, can there be one moment's hesitation as to what the decision ought to be? Is it possible that any impartial person can balance the small possible advantage to authors, probably to one out of five hundred at most, by extending the monopoly to sixty years, besides the author's life, against the loss to the public? The full extent of the public loss it is indeed difficult for any person to calculate. But that it would be great, and out of all proportion to the benefit to authors, must be evident to all. Even the advantage that would accrue to the publishers, who would be the real holders of the copyrights, although twenty times that which authors would reap, would be as nothing compared to the public loss. The best administered monopoly never serves the public like free trade. Not even the monopoly of printing Bibles and Prayer Books, held by the King's Printers, supplies the public so well and cheaply as free trade would do. This also has been proved by evidence before a House of Commons committee. And the Bible monopoly is a remarkably favourable specimen of the system—so favourable, indeed, that it was long doubted whether, from its excellent management, it was not an exception to the general rule, and a real benefit to the public. Few copyright books are managed so well as the Bible monopoly—few even, during the early years of the copyright. After these early years, copyrights that might be worked to advantage, are often carelessly attended to, or allowed to lie dormant. Newer copyrights, and the publications of the day, engross the publisher's attention; he advances in years, perhaps in wealth, and gradually loses his activity. New modes of publishing, to the advantage of the many and perhaps of the publisher too, are adopted by rising men; but the elderly holder of copyrights will not abandon his old ways, and adopt newfangled notions. If he live long, half his copyrights are buried before him, with slender chance of resurrection; and there is no certainty that his heir will be a better manager of monopolies than himself. The best hope for the public is, that the purchaser of many copyrights may die soon, or become bankrupt, or have a spendthrift heir; in which cases, the copyrights are likely to fall into young and active hands. Next to free trade, is to be desired, monopoly directed by activity and intelligence. Serjeant Talfourd's bill prevents the better system from coming into play for two generations after the author's death; and affords no security for well-conducted monopoly.

In our opinion, the present term of twenty-eight years is too long. Looking at the question as one of utility, and not forgetting that, in that view, authors ought to be encouraged and rewarded, fourteen years certain, and the remainder of the author's life, seems to us as long as the monopoly of publication should endure.

Thus decidedly opposed to the main object of Serjeant Talfourd's bill, we feel little inclined to notice the objectionable clauses of a less important nature, of which it contains many. Sufficient regard for the public interest, we trust, will be found in the British Legislature, to prevent so mischievous a bill from passing into a law. As specimens of the crude composition of this bill, we shall call attention, however, to one or two clauses. After, by clause 4, carefully securing the extended copyright to the author's representatives—who may be distant relatives whom he never saw, or with whom he was at feud—the bill goes on, by clause 5, to deprive the author's assignees of any right of printing, after twenty-eight years, a work, the entire copyright of which they had purchased. True, their copyright, so far as regarded the right of excluding others, does not extend beyond that period; but they have the right to go on printing, themselves; nay, they have an honorary copyright—not without considerable advantages by the custom of the London trade—of which the bill would deprive them. This clause is rank injustice to the holders of copyrights; and cannot be sustained, in any event.

Clause 8th is rather a mitigation of the injustice above-noted; but is eminently absurd, and inconsistent with other provisions of the bill. It enacts that, provided the assignee so to be deprived of his copyright, that it may revert to the author or his representatives, shall happen to have stereotyped the book, he may go on, ad infinitum, printing from the stereotype plates! So, after all, he is to retain his right to print, if he has had the luck or the sense to stereotype in time. This curious clause is surely the interpolation of some knowing publisher, who happens to be, as to stereotype plates, "in a concatenation accordingly."

By clause 9th, a ridiculous provision is made for the case of works not "kept up," as the phrase is, after twenty-eight years of the copyright have run, or the author's decease have occurred. The mischievous consequences of monopoly will scarcely be abated by enacting that, whenever five years shall elapse after the expiration of the twenty-eight years, or the author's death, without publication of any works out of print, any one may petition the Lord Chancellor, &c., for liberty to republish the same; and republish the same on such permission, (after waiting one year or two years more, according as the volume may contain more or less than 600 pages.)

What an incompetency for legislating on the subject of copyright does this clause manifest!

Of such crudities there are more: but we forbear prosecuting further the task of exposing the evils and absurdities of a bill which we cannot believe will be allowed to pass.

As to Mr Poulett Thompson's scheme of extending book monopoly over space, as Serjeant Talfourd's bill does over time, we shall not waste ten lines upon it. Foreign nations will never allow our monopolies to overspread their territories. Only a very few authors would derive any benefit from such an extension of their monopoly; and by these few alone has the scheme of international copyright been projected. Those who wish to see a specimen of the wailing of these few authors, at not being allowed to levy contributions from foreign nations, will find an excellent one in the Monthly Chronicle for April. There, also, it will be found that the fudge about international copyright, is not limited to this side of the Atlantic. A certain Mr William Clay's opposition, in Congress, to the emancipation of the Negroes, is only equalled, it seems, by his zeal for the emancipation of authors from the slavery of being confined, in the establishment of their monopolies, to one country. If Mr Clay would exert himself to get the heavy duty exacted by his government on the importation of all British books repealed, he would better promote the interest of the people of America and the authors of Britain, than by his balderdash about international copyright. Monopolies in favour of British authors the American Government will not and ought not to create; but it would act wisely for its own people by admitting to the American market the works of foreign authors, without duty or restriction.

TRAFALGAR.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CORN-LAW RHYMES."

ABOVE the howl of ocean
And frowning Trafalgar,
From bursting clouds went forth the voice
Of elemental war.

And, louder than the tempest,
From man, the insect, came,
Beneath the frown of Trafalgar,
His deadly voice of flame.

But, ere it rent the blackness
Which God's stern brow cast wide,
"Now, Victory or Westminster!"
Said Nelson, in his pride.

"My comrades, do your duty!
Or what will England say?"
"They shall!" cried accents from the deep,
Where dead men waltering lay.

Red horror tore the tempest;
Down stoop'd both sea and sky;
And, like a flood on Collingwood,
The clouds rush'd from on high.

Life pledg'd for life, arm'd thousands
Join'd then in horrid strife.
O Life, thou art an awful thing!—
For what is God but Life?

Shouts, groans, and man's dread thunder,
Made up one dismal cry:
The affrighted storm ask'd what it meant,
And Death made no reply.

But, on the grave of thousands,
A silent spirit trod;
He clasp'd them in the embrace of Death—
And what is Death but God?

He car'd not for their glory,
He ask'd not of their cause;
While, right or wrong, the weak and strong Obey'd alike his laws.

One tyrant lost his war-ships;
Worse tyrants summ'd their gains;
And toil-worn nations sang and danc'd
(As maniacs dance) in chains!

How like an empty bubble
The turmoil pass'd away!
"Where are the weak?" said sun and cloud—
"The mighty!—where are they?"

And birds of light and calmness—
Where dolphins gamboll'd free,
And heroes in their glory lay—
Flew over the smooth sea.

And, from his throne of silence,
The God of Peace look'd down,
Though sternly, on their bed of death,
With pity in his frown.

For Spaniard, Frank, and Briton,
All peaceful, in one grave,
Like babies in their nurse's arms,
Slept under the green wave.

Image of God! through horrors
"That make the angels weep,"
Why seek the gift that comes unought—
His boon of dreadful sleep?

TO ERIN.

DEAR isle of my fathers ! I love thee ! I love thee
With fervour that ne'er shall depart from my soul—
Whether blest land of quiet thy rulers may prove thee,
Or Discord the knell of thy brave ones may toll !

Yet there have been tyrants, who, callous and cruel,
Have tortured thee, smiling at every groan ;
And robbers were led, by the price of the jewel,
To plunder thy children, and make thee their own.

Oh, blessings to thee, lovely island ! were given
Beyond what the nations that wrong'd thee possess ;
Till, envying, they deem'd thee too favoured by Heaven,
And perverted to curses the gifts sent to bless.

Too much had been thine if dark discord ne'er entered,
And prompted thy sons to the warfare of crime ;
If Bigotry here her mad bands had not centred,
Thou wouldst seem like the Eden earth was in its prime.

The Godhead, to balance the gifts which he gave thee,
Permitted a miscreant horde to intrude ;
And, across the blue waters whose broad billows lave thee,
They came, and they fought thee, but never subdued !

They came—and a curse from their coming is dated ;
No freedom since then did thy children enjoy ;
And, for ages, with slaughter and suffering unsated,
They spurn'd thee, insulted, and strove to destroy.

But Hope—soothing Hope !—has at length come to cheer thee,
And wipe off the tear-drops that still wet thy cheek ;

And the cowards who scorn'd begin now to fear thee—
For thy friends are no longer the few and the weak !

Yet some of thy foemen e'en still are unyielding,
And strive, since thy Champion has blunted their swords,
To keep thee still groaning in fetters, by wielding
Hate's weapons, and using the bigot's foul words.

For the Faith which thy children preserv'd through all danger—
Which bloodshed and massacre fail'd to uproot—
Which they clung to the fonder the more that the stranger
Revil'd it—these bloodhounds would still persecute !

But bootless as should be a demon's endeavour
To extinguish the heaven-fixed lamp that has shone
From the "birth of creation," and will shine for ever,
Is the effort of malice their Faith to dethrone.

The glad days are coming—their "shadows before" them—
Of rejoicing and triumph, my country, to thee !
The last links are loosening—oh, too long we bore them !—
And soon shall thy children be rank'd with the Free !

Oh, Erin ! when thus, under Freedom's protection,
Thy friends may hope safety, and honour, and fame,
The change cannot deepen my heart's pure affection—
In gladness or grief, I will love thee the same.

Kilkenny, 1838.

TIME AND MEMORY.

TIME rolleth on ! and every laden hour
Of life's dull toil, which passeth slowly o'er,
Brings with it a renew'd embalming power,
To freshen and to fix the memory
More deeply of the scenes and friends of yore,
Which love had stamp'd upon the heart, before
It lost its softness with the lapse of years !

Time floweth on ! As rivers to the sea,
Its waters rush to join eternity,
And bear man with them, swollen with his tears !
But, 'mid the changing scenes he courseth through,
Though oft the future dream—the present view—
Employ his thought, his heart ne'er loseth one Remembrance of young joys whose sweets are gone !
Kilkenny, 1838.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT has been sitting for four months, and has only passed three public bills—the Civil List, Canada, and Slavery Act Amendment. Not a single measure regarding Scotland has become law ; and in very few of the Scotch bills has any considerable progress been made. Parliament will, in all probability, be prorogued by the middle of June, that there may be no interruption to the idle and expensive ceremony of the Coronation ; so that this session, like so many others of late, will pass over with little but talk. It is plain that there is something essentially defective in the constitution of Parliament, and that it is quite inadequate to get through the business of the country. One obvious mode of enabling Parliament to dispatch the public business, would be to relieve it of the immense and yearly increasing mass of private bills, which could much more cheaply and economically be managed by local parliaments than in London. In America, all private bills are passed by the state legislatures ; and the consequence is, that, instead of costing thousands of pounds, as in this country, a private act is generally procured for £40. As the Court of Session has now so little business, we do not see what is to prevent the preliminary investigations, on applications for private acts in Scotland, to be made by that Court, by which a report might be made to Parliament. We cannot help thinking that an investigation in a court of justice would be much more satisfactory than in a Committee of Parliament ; for no one, after the late disclosures, will suppose such committees impartial tribunals, or remarkable for adherence to strict justice.

SCOTLAND.

THE ESTABLISHMENT IN EDINBURGH.—As we anticipated when the agitation for church extension began, the result has been to show, that it was a mere political movement, in order that, by building additional churches, the supporters of Toryism might be increased, and the Dissenters driven out of the field—not by superior sanctity, zeal, or knowledge, on the part of the Establishment, but by a heavier purse. In Edinburgh, the thirteen city churches are becoming each year less numerously attended. This extraordinary fact is unquestionable. From the Town Council Returns, it appears that, comparing the number of seats let and unlet at 20th February 1837, and 20th February 1838, the following is the result at the latter date:—An increase in three churches of 315; a decrease in eight, of 495—leaving a net decrease of 180; of the total number of sittings—viz., 14,807, only 9,844 are let, and more than one third, or 4,963, unlet. So far from it being the fact, as was so confidently stated, that it was the high price of sittings which prevented them from letting, the proportion of unlet seats increases precisely in the ratio of their cheapness. Of seats at 40s., only 8 per cent. are unlet; of those at 2s., 69 per cent.; of seats from 3s. to 8s., 45; and so on. The clergy refused, some years ago, to accept from the Town Council £500 a-year of stipend, with ample security, or £9,000 for the eighteen ministers; the gross produce of the seat-rents this year is £6,925, being £207 less than last year. But from this gross sum have to be deducted, for precentors, cleaning, stoves, &c. £180 for each church, or about £2,400 in all, leaving a net receipt of £4,500 for eighteen clergymen out of the produce of their labours, or £250 for each, without taking anything into account for return on the original outlay on the erection of the churches, which cannot have been less than £150,000! Five of the churches do not pay the expense of precentors, repairs, &c., leaving nothing whatever for stipend! We have often heard it proposed, as a mode of settling the Annuity question, to give each Clergyman the church of which, at present, he is the incumbent, and to allow him to regulate the seat-rents in any way he thinks proper. Now, the return we have mentioned, shows that the result of such an arrangement would be, that stipends would be reduced to one-half of what the clergy have refused to accept. Were they, on the other hand, placed in the same situation as the Voluntaries—that is to say, obliged to defray, from the produce of the seat-rents, not only the whole expense of repairs, cleaning, lighting, precentors, beadsles, but also the interest on the original cost of the church—not only would the Edinburgh Clergy have no stipends at all, but there would be an annual deficiency of about £3000. We can now easily understand why the Established Clergy have so cordial a detestation of Voluntaries, and why they should be so eager to impoverish the Dissenting meeting-houses, by surrounding them with Established Churches, built by those who are conscious their coffers are filled with unexhausted tithes, the plunder of the Church, and in which the religious duties are proposed to be performed by tax-fed parsons.

UNEXHAUSTED TITHES.—We believe that few had any conception, before the publication of the recent report of the Church Commissioners, that the tithes in the hands of laymen in Scotland, held by them in trust for religious purposes, amounted to the enormous sum of £138,000 a-year. According to the law as it at present stands, three-fourths of the heritors of any parish in which there are such teinds, can apply them for the relief of such religious destitution as they conceive to exist in the parish. Whatever may be the result of the contemplated measures of the Ministry with regard to Church Extension, we can hardly believe that the people of Scotland will rest contented until this enormous mass of Church plunder is got out of the hands of those who have so long possessed it and made available for purposes of general utility. The old cry of vested interest has already been raised on this question, and will, we fear, prove much too powerful for the honesty of Parliament. It never seems to be considered that the people have any vested interest: otherwise it would be seen that they have, at least, as strong a right to resist the application of the Bishops' Teinds, as the landholders have to resist that of the teinds in their hands, to the extension of the church. What difference does it make, either in common sense or in law, that the one kind of teinds has been held for a century or two by private individuals in their own right, and the other sort by the Crown for an equal period—that is, by the State—for the public behoof?

BISHOPS' TEINDS are those which, during the times of Episcopacy, formed the livings of the bishops and dignified clergy. On the abolition of Episcopacy, they fell to the Crown, and became part of its hereditary revenues. For many reigns past, the sovereigns, and, in particular, her present Majesty, have uniformly surrendered their hereditary revenues to the nation, in exchange for the much more ample provision created by the Civil List; and the bishops' teinds are thus, in reality, at this moment, as much part of the general revenue of the country, as the land-tax or excise. It is, therefore, nothing but downright jugglery to pretend that there is any difference between endowing churches out of the bishops' teinds, and out of the consolidated fund. It is precisely the same thing, not only to the people of Scotland, but to the people of England and Ireland; and all the three countries should combine in resisting it. We are told the bishops' teinds are to go to endow churches in the Highlands; and this is not the first time the Highland proprietors have put their hands into the public purse for the benefit of their churches. We think, however, that, as they keep themselves carefully exempt from poor-rates, and contrive to make their southern neighbours maintain their worn-out dependents, they might club together to pay their ministers' stipends. Much money will not be wanted.

By an act passed in 1810, £10,000 are annually set aside for the augmentation of stipends under £150 a-year, the greater portion of which is expended in the Highlands; and numerous grants have, from time to time, been obtained from Parliament, for building churches in the same districts. This church extension scheme will, we doubt not, be a fertile cause of perplexity to the Ministry before it is settled. That the "landed interest" will permit such an alteration to be made on the act of the Scottish Parliament of 1707, as to allow any considerable proportion of the unexhausted teinds to be extorted from their grasp, no one can imagine, while the mere announcement of the intention has already created much alarm among such of the pious extensionists as happen to be landowners. The Dissenters, on the other hand, will be provoked at the grant of the bishops' teinds, for the purpose of aggrandizing their religious antagonists; while those who have contributed to church-building, in the proportion of a subscription of £50 to an annual revenue of £4,000 a-year of church plunder in their possession, will not find it very pleasant to be compelled to pay, for an indefinite period, the greater part, if not the whole of the stipends of the clergymen of these churches, which they have so charitably placed at the Dissenters' doors. The scheme has ended precisely in the manner those who originated it deserved.

But to return to bishops' teinds. It is unquestionable law, that the church has a claim upon them inferior to what she has upon teinds in the hands of the heritors. It is the settled practice of the Teind Court, where there are heritors' teinds and bishops' teinds in the same parish, to allocate the whole of the former in payment of the ministers' stipend, before any part of the latter is encroached on. Why, therefore, if teinds, not at present by law applicable to church extension, are to be laid hold of by Parliament, are heritors' teinds not to be seized before bishops' teinds? Simply because the Ministry can fleece the public with impunity, when they dare not touch a hair of the "landed interest."

THE THIRD REPORT OF THE LAW COMMISSIONERS is confined to the important subject of conveyancing. The Commissioners express a very decided opinion against abolishing the feudal system of our land rights; but they propose a great variety of alterations for abridging and simplifying the present forms of deeds, whereby much risk of error will be removed, and much expense saved. The report concludes with thirty-eight propositions, of which the following are the most important:—To commute the various rights of superiors either into a fixed annual payment, or to entitle the vassal to purchase them for a sum paid down; charters by progress, and precepts of clare constat, to be abolished, except when the vassal chooses to complete his title, as at present; provision to be made for the entry of vassals where the superior is unknown, or is unable or unwilling to act; instruments of sasine to be greatly curtailed, and the taking of the sasine on the ground, abolished; briefs from Chancery to be abolished, and the proceedings on inquests of all sorts simplified and regulated; heritable securities to be greatly facilitated, and their expense lessened, by striking out all the mere formal clauses from the bond or deed, by dispensing with the instrument of sasine—the bond itself being recorded—and by permitting transferences by a short assignment on the back of the deed, the assignment being recorded in the register of sasines. We believe that, were these, and the other suggestions of the Commissioners, carried into effect, they would be of the greatest advantage to proprietors of heritable. For example, a loan of £600, which at present costs upwards of £25, could be completed for £7 7s., of which £5 5s. would be outlay. But we have little doubt that the proposed reforms will meet with strenuous opposition from the great landed proprietors and their agents; the former fearing that their rights will be affected, and the latter that their emoluments will be diminished, by the changes proposed. Unless, therefore, an effort be made throughout the country, by petitioning Parliament and otherwise, no material improvements on our land-rights need be expected. And, as the proposed changes are fully as great as there is the least chance of carrying through the present Parliament, we think it would be injudicious to reject them because they do not go far enough. We regret, however, that no notice is taken, in the report, of the injurious effect the heavy stamp-duties on conveyances and securities have on heritable property, and the yearly diminution of that branch of the public revenue. In Scotland, it has fallen off one-half since 1816; and there can be little doubt that a reduction of the amount of stamp-duty would increase the revenue. The fees for recording deeds and for searches should also be reduced, they being at present more than three times what they ought to be; a great proportion being drawn by sinecurists, who perform no part of the duty, and add little or nothing to the security of the public. For example, the Right Hon. W. Dundas draws £3000 a-year from the Sasine-Office. The Dean of Faculty, as well as many other of the most respectable witnesses examined by the Commissioners, recommend a great reduction of those fees. In many transactions, one-half or two-thirds of the total expense arise from stamp-duties, and exorbitant fees for searches and recording; yet it is generally understood that the officers are not responsible for the grossest errors they may commit in a search, however serious the damage such errors may occasion! If it is really wished to secure the public against loss from mistakes and omissions, large salaries should not be given to officers who may be found to be bankrupt when a demand is made on them; but the method followed at Geneva should be adopted, and a small fee, in addition to the expense of recording the deed, levied, from which a fund would be formed for indemnifying those injured by the negligence of the keeper; he also paying a certain portion of the loss, to ensure his vigilance.

EDINBURGH AND GLASGOW RAILWAY.—The proposed capital of the Company is £900,000, divided into 18,000 shares of £50 each; and it is intended to take power by the act to raise £300,000 more by loan, or by the issue of additional shares. The income expected to arise from the conveyance of passengers is £88,312, and from goods £34,307. There are to be five short tunnels on the line; the longest, at Callender, 830 yards, nearly half a mile long. The length of the main line is within a few yards of forty-six miles, four miles longer than the present road. The estimated charge of the annual expenses of the railway, when completed, is £40,873 per annum. This is greater than the expense of keeping in repair the whole turnpike roads in the county of Edinburgh, the tolls of which produce £33,000 or £34,000 yearly. We believe that it is at present intended that the railway should terminate at the Haymarket; but we understand that it would not be difficult to bring it into the Grassmarket, there being few houses on the line, and those of the meanest description.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The accounts from the manufacturing districts continue very unfavourable; and the state of the Revenue shews that great suffering must have prevailed among the working classes during the year. It is certainly not a little alarming that, after a quarter of century of peace, the expenditure should exceed the income by £855,000; while, so far from anything like retrenchment being in contemplation, the expenditure of the current year, owing to the state of Canada, will greatly exceed that of the last. Whatever temporary expedients may be resorted to, we must shortly come either to the imposition of new taxes or to the contracting of more debt; and it is difficult to say which is the more hazardous experiment in the present state of matters.

AGRICULTURE

We are glad to observe that the question of the repeal of the Corn Laws is daily exciting more interest, and that it is now clearly seen that the people must accomplish this most important object by their own exertions, and not by relying on the wisdom of a parliament of landlords, blind to every interest except their own, and who have recently, by a majority of three to one, refused even to consider the question. The truth is, the landlords have an interest adverse to that of every other class of the community. It is the general interest of the community to have labour highly remunerated, and high profits for capital; it is the interest of the land-owners alone to have cheap labour and low profits. When labour is cheap and profits low, rents rise; when the reverse takes place, rents fall. Suppose, for example, the rate of profit is ten per cent., and a capital to the extent of £10,000 is to be employed, no one will engage in agriculture unless he can obtain £1000 a-year of profit on his capital. Suppose he pays for a farm an equal sum as rent, or £1,000 a-year, he must draw from the farm £2000 each year, after payment of expenses. Let it now be assumed that the ordinary rate of profit has fallen to five per cent.; then capital will be as profitably employed in agriculture, by giving £1,500 of rent for the farm we have mentioned, as by applying it in other pursuits; for the farmer will, in this way, draw five per cent. on his capital. Thus, it is undeniable, that the landlords are benefited by a low rate of profit. It must be superfluous to shew, that the less the tenant has to give his labourers, the more rent he can pay his landlord; and that the latter has thus an interest in labour being cheap. The capitalist, professional man, and labourer, have a direct interest in high profits; for, when they are high, interest is high, the remuneration of professional men is not grudged, and capital accumulating rapidly creates a great demand for labour, whence wages inevitably rise. To intrust, therefore, the welfare of the community, to a parliament consisting, by express regulation, almost entirely of landowners, is to hand over the sheep to the care of the wolves.

But, not content with the great combination they already possess in Parliament, the agricultural interest—meaning thereby the landowners, aided by a few of the most ignorant of their tenantry, who are so blind as not to see that they have the same interest as all classes of society, except the landowner, to have profits high, and labour and industry well remunerated—is organizing associations for the “protection” of agriculture in all parts of the kingdom. The “Central Agricultural Society of Great Britain and Ireland” have unanimously agreed to memorialise Government for the revival of the Board of Agriculture. Mr Martin, the secretary, made some statements at the meeting which are deserving of remark. He stated, that of the population of the United Kingdom, which he estimated at twenty-six millions, twenty millions were dependent on agriculture. It would have been better to have said that the whole population was dependent on agriculture; for, as no foreign food is allowed to be imported, the whole population must starve, if the tillage of our fields were neglected. But, in the same way, and with equal truth, it might be said, that the whole population depends upon our manufactures; for, were foreign clothing prohibited, the agriculturists must go naked if no manufactures were produced in this country. But, not to talk of those who are dependent on, but of those who are engaged in agriculture, the population returns shew that not more than one-third, or eight millions, are chiefly employed in agriculture; and this proportion is rapidly diminishing. Thus, between 1821 and 1831, the increase of population was least in the counties where the people were employed in agriculture, and greatest in the manufacturing districts. The increase in the shires of Berwick and Selkirk was two per cent.; in Bute, Haddington, Linlithgow, Perth, three per cent.; in Argyle, Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, Nairne, four per cent.; Inverness, Peebles, five per cent.; but in Renfrewshire it was nineteen per cent.; in Dumbarton, twenty-two per cent.; in Forfar, twenty-three per cent.; and in Lanark, thirty per cent. Taking the whole Scottish agricultural counties, and the whole manufacturing, the rate of increase was three times greater in the latter than in the former. How is it possible that this could have occurred, if four-fifths of the population were dependent on agriculture? But Mr Martin's statement refutes itself; for he goes on to state, that 3,000,000 of labourers are dependent on agriculture; 250,000 farmers, whose incomes average £900 each, and 30,000 landed proprietors, rental £1000 each; so that he appears to average eight farmers for each £1000 of rent, and twelve labourers to each farmer, or 100 labourers to produce £1000 of rent. We believe that, taking grazing and agricultural farms together, each labourer will produce nearly £100 instead of £10 of rent, it being usual to cultivate seventy acres of arable land yearly with a single plough; and 30s. an acre is but a low rent for arable ground. Mr Martin farther informed the Society, that "the reduction of one shilling a bushel on corn would sweep away the rents of all the landlords of the kingdom." His announcement, of course, excited much attention; but the Secretary did not think it worth while, in so favourable an audience, to give any proof of his assertions. Now, taking the whole kingdom, there is not the slightest reason to believe that rents have fallen, since the highest period of the war, twenty-five per cent. At that time, wheat was 15s. a bushel, and other grain in proportion. Now wheat is considerably under 7s.; so that it is somewhat difficult to see how, when a reduction of 8s. a bushel caused a fall of only one-fourth of the rent, a reduction of 1s. should sweep away the other three-fourths. But not only were rents but slightly affected by so serious a reduction of the price of grain—if rents can indeed be said to have been affected at all, since £75 is of more value at present than £100 during the time of war and of a depreciated currency, when a guinea sold currently for 38s.—but the population of the country was going on rapidly increasing, and even the persons actually employed in agriculture, were more numerous in 1831 than in 1811, though the proportion of persons so employed, as contrasted with the other classes, was smaller at the latter period than at the former. Thus, to take a strictly agricultural county, Berwickshire, the number of families employed in agriculture, in 1811, was 3,124; in 1831, 3,334 in Argyleshire, a pastoral county—the number so employed at the two periods, was 8,421, and 8,989; and so on, we believe, without a single exception. In no county in the United Kingdom, has the population diminished since the end of the war and of high prices—although many of them depend solely on agriculture or pasturage, so that it is tolerably clear that agriculture has not been in so depressed a condition as has constantly, for the last twenty-five years, been represented. But Mr Martin's statement is valuable, in shewing that, in the opinion of an expert statistic, and the secretary of a society where an erroneous statement on such a subject could not fail to be detected, the whole landed proprietors of the United Kingdom are only 30,000; and for this miserable fraction, 25,000,000 of people are sacrificed. Surely this fact, if it be one, should open the eyes of the people; for it is as indisputable as any proposition in mathematics, that every class but the landowners are injured by the Corn Laws; and we have great doubts whether even they are benefited by them, considering how large a proportion of their rent-rolls is expended on servants, horses, and dogs, and how much dear corn and dear animal food enhance the price of everything they purchase. Those, however, who live abroad in cheap countries, are unquestionably enriched by the Starvation Laws, for that is their proper name—corn being only one of the numerous articles of food prohibited to be imported.

It is amusing to hear any relaxation of the Corn Laws—such as that proposed, of grinding foreign grain in bond—called a "concession." The people do not demand the repeal of the Corn-Laws as a concession or favour, but as a right. It is not the people, but the landowners who require "concessions." Lord Lyttleton remarks, "that, if the privileges of the people be concessions from the Crown, is not the power of the Crown itself a concession from the people?" At a later period, the Marquis of Lansdowne thus expressed himself: "It was on the debate regarding Pitt's famous Regency Bill of 1788. The question was, whether the Prince of Wales had the right to assume the regency; a doctrine which was strongly urged by Fox, opposed by Pitt, and ultimately rejected by all parties. The Marquis said—"The People, my Lords, have rights, Kings and Princes [and, he might have added, nobles] have none. The people want neither precedents nor charters to prove their rights; for they are born with every man in every country, and exist in all countries alike, though some of them may have been lost. I wish, therefore, that the question of right to assume the Royal authority which has been claimed and asserted, may be decided, in order that those who suffer oppression under Governments the most despotic, may be taught their rights as men. They will then learn that, though their rights are not, like ours, secured by precedents and charters, yet, as soon as they assert their rights, they must be acknowledged." One of the most sacred rights "born with every man in every country," is that of labour—of enjoying the fruits of his industry. It is more sacred than the right of property itself. But, if a man is forced to pay a monopoly price for his food, double what he ought to pay, that the fortunate owner of land may luxuriate in idleness, how can it be said that the right of labour is protected? What right have the landowners to divide the whole land of the kingdom among them, and to keep it, but by the concession of the people? Were the seizure of the whole lands, and the enactment of the Corn-Laws, anything originally but encroachments on the people by the landowners? Is the long-existence of an abuse a reason that it should be rendered perpetual? The landowners should take care lest, in their zeal to protect rents, they cause an investigation into their titles to their estates. A good Tory,* in giving his evidence before the Scotch Law Commissioners, scouts the notion of an allodial system in land rights. "It supposes," he says, "that a man could be the owner of a particular piece of territory, as true and absolute proprietor out and out. Now, this is not consistent with the fact; no private individual holds property in land on that footing. The absolute right to the territory of a community belongs to the nation." Whatever right a man may have in a particular estate or piece of land, "still the nation is radically the owner, and the right of property in private individuals is still, after all, but a tenure, in some measure, by privilege." Let us not, therefore, hear again a repeal of the Corn-Laws talked of as a "concession;" and let not the landowners provoke further discussions, lest they be deprived of a "privilege" which, it is now generally seen, they are resolved to make a nuisance to those by whose concession they hold it.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

LIFE OF WILBERFORCE.*

We are far from being the blind worshippers of Mr Wilberforce. The generation of which he was an idol is fast passing away ; and the interval of his retirement from public life, with the five years which have elapsed since his decease, have afforded ample time for opinion to cool down, and to right itself. We are still, however, disposed to believe that his was, upon the whole, a healthful influence, if not in all its direct objects, yet in its general tendencies and in its source. Few men in England who have not directly administered public affairs, have ever, prior to the times of Mr Wilberforce, exercised the same powerful influence in Parliament, and especially on the formation and guidance of opinion among the respectable middle class, and what is termed the religious world, as that eminent and excellent person. Mr Wilberforce was, however, not infallible, and, as a public man, not remarkable for energy, nor for acting vigorously up to his own theories and conceptions. He was eminently cautious. To the innocence of the dove, he often added more than the due complement of the wisdom of the serpent ; and, in his views of policy, and still more in his conduct in Parliament, there was very generally, if not subservience or suppleness, yet studied and anxious complacency to the reigning powers, whosoever and whatsoever these might be. Upon theory, he considered it right to support every existing government ; and from intimacy and strong personal attachment, he was devoted to Pitt. Against this evident bias it is fair to set the strong fact, that his objects were not those of vulgar selfishness, for he sought neither title nor emolument ; and that his motives to deviate from the rigid rule of independence which he professed, and certainly desired to follow, were neither sordid nor ambitious. Place he does not seem to have coveted ; but neither does it appear to have been in his power. He was much more useful to the Tory government, as the affluent independent member for Yorkshire, and afterwards as the leader in the House of the compact and influential phalanx which came to be nicknamed The Saints, than if he had been in the Cabinet. Neither his talents, acquirements, nor desultory habits, fitted him for business ; though very inferior men, in all these respects, have often held office in his and in our day. We should imagine, however, that the circumstance of being more useful otherwise, and not possessing the highest capacities, nor even the industry necessary for place, proved as disqualifying as the apprehension of his stern, uncompromising independence and political integrity. It is at least certain, that successive cabinets were broken up and formed while Wilberforce was closely connected with the leading men, and that he was not without passing dreams of ambition; yet he was never once thought of as a member of the Government. Baron or Viscount he might have become at any time. More than half the English nobility are the mushroom growth of his own generation; but he had the solid good sense and true dignity to avoid the vulgar distinction. He placed his higher pride, the pride with which Cobbett used to taunt him, in being the member for Yorkshire and the prop of the Government—nor followed the vulgar herd in

—— “Bartering honest fame
To gain from Pitt a tawdry name,
To call their vixens by.”

This wise, proud humility was the cause of sincere thankfulness in after life, when he saw that title would have been the bane of his family.

But the personal history, which fills five thick volumes, compiled by two of Mr Wilberforce's sons, from his diaries, journals, and letters, and the “conversational memoranda” furnished by his friends, claims, in its narrative part, our first notice. We cannot pretend to think that the life is judiciously executed. It is often trite, and oftener tedious; and full of “vain repetitions,” gleaned from the religious contents of the private diaries. His penitential confessions, devotional breathings, and ejaculatory aspirations for divine aid and a better frame of mind, have naturally a sameness of tone and phrase, which, when so often repeated, come at last to the reader with little more effect than if the reverend biographers had duly entered, each day, at full length, their father's grace before meat, and thanksgiving after meals. With the utmost desire to preserve the mind in a sober and reverential frame, it is impossible for the most piously-disposed reader, to receive such crude and oft-repeated spiritual doses with edification.

It is not, be it observed, to the appearance of these things that we object, but to that unceasing recurrence of grave subjects, which, in the abrupt and desultory pages of these hurried diaries, come at last to have a painful, and we doubt not to some minds a ludicrous effect, from the strange mingling of the tone of the world and the conventicle—the close neighbourhood of the serious and the light.—But five volumes, of which at least the full half is superfluous, if not absolutely tiresome, still afford ample and rich materials for a few pages of narrative and remark.

Mr Wilberforce was born at Hull, on the 24th August 1759. He was an only son. His only surviving sister, first married to a clergyman in Hull named Clarke, became afterwards the wife of Mr Stephen. Their father, besides possessing some original patrimony, was engaged in the Baltic trade. Their mother was the daughter of Thomas Bird, Esq. of Barton, Oxon; and through her Wilberforce was connected with those wealthy commercial Smiths, now represented by Lord Carrington. He was sprung from a younger branch of an ancient though much decayed Yorkshire stock; and the twenty-four clear descents of the family of Wilberfoss, as it was first called, certainly swamp the pretensions of most of the new nobility. The humble dignities of his immediate ancestors, were being mayors of Hull and Beverley; and, upon the whole, the wealth of the family is as apparent as its rank. Their military prowess was not remarkable. In Marlborough's wars, his father, when abroad, was invited by that great commander to witness an approaching battle; but the offer was prudently declined by the grateful and cautious merchant. Wilberforce was a feeble child, and grew up of small stature, and with very weak eyes, of which he complained throughout life. In his ninth year, he lost his father, and was transferred to the care of his uncle, William Wilberforce of Wimbledon, who placed him at a very indifferent mercantile school, kept by a Mr Chalmers, a Scotchman, with Scotch ushers. He was disgusted with the coarse food, and probably not much delighted with the learning, which was of kindred quality. His aunt's brother was the late (and why should we not say, celebrated?) John Thornton, a man of princely munificence, though his liberality was not displayed in the usual manner of those “British princes who are merchants.” From this good man he received a much larger present of money, one day that they travelled together, than is usually given to schoolboys. The gift was intended to enforce the precept, that, where much is possessed, some should be given to the poor. The seed dropped by the way-side fell into good ground, for Mr Wilberforce was a truly generous and compassionate, as well as a charitable man. He was so from Christian principle as well as natural disposition; and he systematically expended a very considerable portion of his handsome income, either in alleviating distress or in promoting objects of usefulness. His Wimbledon aunt, the sister of Thornton, was a great admirer of Whitfield's preaching, and connected with the early Methodists, while his mother was what he humorously called “an Archbishop Tillotson Christian,” though, in the last years of her extreme old age, she became something more consonant to her son's ideas of a truly religious character. At twelve years of age, Wilberforce caught the fervant spirit of his aunt. He says—“How far these impressions were genuine I can hardly determine, but, at least, I may venture to say they were sincere;” and his religious letters, written from school when he was very young, were so much admired that leave was asked to publish them! He was, meanwhile, recalled from the hotbed of Methodism by the sensible and cool “Archbishop Tillotson Christian,” who, when his pious aunt protested against his removal from the means of grace, said, in caustic allusion to her tenets, “If it be a work of grace, you know it cannot fail.” His Hull grandfather remarked, “If Billy turn Methodist, he shall not have a sixpence of mine.”

We are rather at a loss to know what came to be Mr Wilberforce's ultimate opinion of this matter.

nal interference. First, he "is impressed with the dreadful effects of the efforts used but too successfully to wean me from all religion;" and again, he traces "the finger of God in his mother taking him away," as it had been the means of his being connected with political men, and becoming useful in life. "If I had staid with my uncle, I should probably have been a bigoted, despised Methodist." He, however, left his uncle and aunt with great regret. From this lady and her Methodist friends, he had probably first heard of the wickedness and enormities of the slave-trade, to which Granville Sharpe had already drawn public attention; and while at school after his return to Hull, he is said, on the testimony of an old schoolfellow, to have sent a letter to a York paper, condemning the odious traffic in human flesh. The fact seems to us obscure, although it were important. Wilberforce became a devoted abolitionist; but, in point of time, as of zeal, he was neither first nor second in that body of philanthropists. To reclaim him from fanaticism was the great object of his friends and family in Hull; or, as he says, "to charm away the serious spirit by self-indulgence and gaiety." In this they were but too successful. The habits of society in his native town were favourable to the design.

"It was then as gay a place as could be found out of London. The theatre, balls, great suppers, and card-parties, were the delight of the principal families in the town. The usual dinner hour was two o'clock, and at six they met at sumptuous suppers. This mode of life was at first distressing to me, but by degrees I acquired a relish for it, and became as thoughtless as the rest. As grandson to one of the principal inhabitants, I was everywhere invited and caressed: my voice and love of music made me still more acceptable. The religious impressions which I had gained at Wimbledon continued for a considerable time after my return to Hull, but my friends spared no pains to stifle them. I might almost say, that no pious parent ever laboured more to impress a beloved child with sentiments of piety than they did to give me a taste for the world and its diversions." The strength of principle they had to overcome was indeed remarkable. When first taken to a play, it was almost, he says, by force. At length, however, they succeeded; and the allurements of worldly pleasure led his youth away from all serious thought.

Wilberforce, always fond of society, and possessing, even in boyhood, many of the talents which enliven and embellish social intercourse—a good singer and a clever mimic—thus became a youth of the gay world, even before he went to the university.

At the age of seventeen, he went to Cambridge, not very well prepared by scholarship or habits of application; nor did he profit much by his University studies. The death of his grandfather and his uncle had already made him master of a large fortune; and his companions wisely said, "Why should a man of your wealth trouble himself with fagging?" The Fellows and flattering tutors, while he engaged in cards and amusement, would remark of the hard-reading, diligent lads, that "they were mere eeps—Wilberforce did all by force of talent." Altogether, he was in a hopeful school. "I was introduced," says he, "on the very first night of my arrival, to as licentious a set of men as can well be conceived. They drank hard, and their conversation was even worse than their lives. I lived among them for some time, though I never relished their society—often, indeed, horror-struck at their conduct." Where enlightened and firm principle was still wanting, natural delicacy happily interfered to protect his youth from the example of profligate excess set by his companions; and his early friends affirmed that his habits, thought not those of strict piety, were far from being dissolute, even in this perilous period. Through life he seems to have kept, in some sort, open house; and at the University, the frank and simple hospitality of later times already helped him to general popularity.

Amiable, animated, and hospitable, he was a universal favourite. "There was no one," says the Rev. T. Gisborne, "at all like him for powers of entertainment. Always fond of repartee and discussion, he seemed entirely free from conceit and vanity." He had already commenced the system of frank and simple hospitality which marked his London life. "There was always a great Yorkshire pie in his rooms, and all were welcome to partake of it. My rooms and his were back to back, and often when I was raking out my fire at ten o'clock, I heard his melodious voice calling aloud to me, to come and sit with him before I went to bed. It was a dangerous thing to do, for his amusing conversation was sure to keep me up so late that I was behind-hand the next morning."

His early ambition was to be in Parliament. He accordingly gave up the lucrative traffic carried on during his minority by a kinsman for his benefit; and on his twenty-first birth-day, an ox was roasted whole, to entertain the voters of Hull, by order of their gay, rich townsman, the intending candidate for their suffrages. He canvassed personally with great spirit; and he used to relate—

"When I first canvassed the town, there lived at Hull a fine athletic fellow, by trade a butcher, named John, or, as he was usually addressed, Johnny Bell. I rather shrunk from shaking hands with him, saying to one of my staunch supporters, that I thought it going rather too low for votes. 'O sir,' was his reply, 'he is a fine fellow if you come to bruising.'"

Bell accordingly offered to kill a man for him who had thrown a stone at the poll; but this was declined as too severe a punishment. At that time there were three hundred freemen of Hull residing in London, in the vicinity of the Thames; and these the young candidate harangued and treated with suppers in Wapping; thus gaining both votes and skill in popular oratory—an art which, we apprehend, must be learned young, if at all. He also took nightly lessons in public life in the gallery of the House of Commons, where a slight acquaintance with Pitt, formed at the University, ripened fast into intimacy. The foundation thus laid, he was elected in the face of the interest of Lord Rockingham, Sir George Saville, and the Government; but at the cost of £9000. How voters are rewarded in Hull under the Reform Bill, has scarcely been made sufficiently clear by the different reports of election committees; but, at that time, a resident elector got two guineas for his vote, or four for a plumper; and the outlying freemen about £10 a-piece, in name of travelling expenses. Mr Wilberforce came to think this practice not quite correct; but he never was a rash reformer.

The young member for Hull was thus launched into public life and fashionable society, with every advantage, save those of high birth and family connexion. He was, however, known to be possessed of a large independent fortune, and he was in Parliament. What more is required to give lustre to the most obscure, stupid, or worthless individual? He says—

"When I left the University, so little did I know of general society that I came up to London stored with arguments to prove the authenticity of Rowley's Poems; and now I was at once immersed in politics and fashion. The very first time I went to Boodle's I won twenty-five guineas of the Duke of Norfolk. I belonged at this time to five clubs—Miles and Evans's, Brookes's, Boodle's, White's, Goostree's. The first time I was at Brookes's, scarcely knowing any one, I joined from mere shyness in play at the faro table, where George Selwyn kept bank. A friend who knew my inexperience, and regarded me as a victim doomed out for sacrifice, called to me, 'What, Wilberforce, is that you?' Selwyn quite resented the interference, and, turning to him, said, in his most expressive tone, 'O sir, don't interrupt Mr Wilberforce—he could not be better employed.'"

At Goostree's, in his first winter, he met Pitt constantly, as the embryo minister supped there every night. He is declared "the wittiest man" that his friend Wilberforce ever knew; with, which is more admirable, "his wit at all times under his control." Pitt gamed on first entering life, but soon gave up at least games of chance; and Wilberforce, on happening one night to win £600, as banker, at the faro table, from men not very able to bear the loss, was happily weaned from his taste for deep play. He had already once or twice lost £100 at faro. He was in those days reckoned a tolerably active Member of Parliament, when compared with his predecessors—as perhaps the memory of Andrew Marvel had been forgotten. His first vote is divertingly characteristic of the future legislator. He had entered Parliament as an opponent of the American war, and of Lord North's administration; and his very first vote, on the choice of the Speaker, was given to the Ministry. Thirty years later, it came to be a standing joke, that Mr Wilberforce maintained his independence by generally giving his speech to the Opposition, and his vote to the Minister. So far as rearing and managing a Parliamentary reputation is concerned, there were few better tacticians than Wilberforce. From the very first, his sagacity and tact were remarkable. His advice to a young Member is invaluable.

"Attend to business," he said in later life, to a friend entering the House of Commons, "and do not seek occasions of display; if you have a turn for speaking, the proper time will come. Let speaking take care of itself. I never go out of the way to speak, but make myself acquainted with the business, and then, if the debate passes my door, I step out and join it."

At a period the most fertile of great Parliamentary orators, able debaters, and public men of transcendent capacity, Wilberforce was always listened to with attention and the profoundest respect, and often carried the House, if not by storm, yet by sapping. He did not all at once join with his friend Pitt against "the old fat fellow," Lord North; but his intimacy with the rising men, aided by fortunate circumstances, increased daily, and, while fancying himself neutral, he was imperceptibly linked to the Pitt-interests. He had come into the possession of his fortune, and

He was the only member of their set who owned a villa within reach of London. The house of his late uncle at Wimbledon gave him the command of eight or nine bedrooms; and here Pitt, to whom it was a luxury even to sleep in country air, took up not unfrequently his residence: their easy familiarity permitting him to ride down late at night, and occupy his rooms, even though the master of the house was kept in town. In one spring Pitt resided there four months.

Pitt thus came and went on the pleasantest terms.—Here is the course of young men's easy intercourse and friendships:—

Dined Pitt's, then Goostree's, where supped, Bed almost three o'clock. April 3d. Wimbledon, where Pitt, &c., dined and slept. Evening walk—bed a little past two. 4th. Delicious day—lounged morning at Wimbledon with friends, joining at night, and run about the garden for an hour or two. . . . We found one morning the fruits of Pitt's earlier rising, in the careful sowing of the garden beds, with the fragments of a dress hat, in which Ryder had overnight come down from the opera."

"Sunday, May 18th. To Wimbledon with Pitt and Eliot, at their persuasion—26th. House. Spoke. Dined at Lord Advocate's [Dundas]—Mr and Mrs Johnstone, Thurlow, Pepper, Pitt: after the rest went, we sat till six in the morning. Monday, June 30th. Supped at home, Ranelagh, Mrs Long there with Lord George Gordon. Sunday, July 6th. Wimbledon. Persuaded Pitt and Pepper to church. 11th. Fine hot day, went on water with Pitt and Eliot, fishing, came back, dined, walked evening. Eliot went home, Pitt staid." . . .

And he frequented other society.

His rare accomplishment in singing, tended to increase his danger. "Wilberforce, we must have you again, the Prince says he will come at any time to hear you sing," was the flattery which he received after his first meeting with the Prince of Wales, in 1782, at the luxurious soirees of Devonshire house.

He was also an admirable mimic, and, in particular, was able to set the table in a roar, by his perfect imitation of the "fat old fellow." Of this propensity, he was cured by Lord Camden, who was kind to him. When invited to witness the Member for Hull's performances in mimicry, his Lordship declined, saying, slightly, "It is but a vulgar accomplishment." It has, however, been told, we know not with what accuracy, that the powerful propensity to mimicry sometimes overcame Mr Wilberforce even in his grave latter years; though, after humorously imitating his friends or acquaintances, he would check the merry propensity, and pray for pardon of the unchristian and unbecoming levity.

In 1783, he made a visit to France with Pitt, and Mr Eliot, the husband of Lady Harriet Pitt. They proposed to stop at Rheims until they had attained some proficiency in the language, and went thither without any introductions. For these Wilberforce sent home, and they were recommended by Peter Thelluson to the commercial correspondent, who turned out to be a literal grocer, selling figs behind the counter with his own hands. The "son of the great Chatham," and his companions, were hence respected of being little better than swindlers, instead of "grands seigneurs;" and, when they reached Paris, their adventures, and Mr Pitt's "friend the grocer," became a jest to the Court. A most portentous union, which, had it taken place, must certainly have affected the destinies of Europe in some extraordinary way, is noticed here. It was hinted to Pitt, through Horace Walpole, that he might have Necker's daughter for the asking, with a fortune of £14,000 a-year. "I am wedded to my country," said the ungallant minister; and the lady became Madame de Stael.

The English philosophic statesman, who went abroad, not to see sights, but to study the people, repaired to Fontainebleau, dined and supped with the minister, and spent every evening in the Queen's circle. She is described as being of engaging manners; but poor Louis XVI.

"Is so strange a being, (of the hog kind,) that it is worth going a hundred miles for a sight of him, especially a bear hunting. They all, men and women, crowded round Pitt in shoals; and he behaved with great spirit, though he was sometimes a little bored when they talked to him about the Parliamentary Reform."

The next session of Parliament was one of great party interest. Wilberforce followed the fortunes of the rising statesmen, and revelled with the fashionable and the gay, fluttering from the catch club to the opera—flirting with Mrs Crewe, and supping with the Duchess of Portland. This, we think, is still a fair average picture of the life of a young M.P. favourably received in both hemispheres—those of politics and fashion.

"26th. No House. Dined Tom Pitt's—Mrs Crewe—charming woman—29th. Went to see Mrs Siddons—Mrs Crewe at play—30th. Dined Lord Chatham's—meeting. Wrote for ladies to go to the gallery, but disappointed—December 1st. House—late night. Home about five, immediately after debate. Fox spoke wonderfully—3d. Catch-club—Sandwich—then opera. Mrs Crewe there. Supped Lord George's. Lord John there—Mrs Crewe—Duchess of Portland—conversa. Mrs Crewe made the party [promise] to adjourn to Downing Street next night—3d. Dined Goostree's. Supped Duchess of Portland's, Downing street. Charles Fox came in—whispering over chair. Heavy evening—4th. House. Supped, tête-à-tête, Lord and Lady Chatham—6th. Dined Hamilton's—opera. Supped Burlington house—Mrs Crewe—Duchess of Portland. Mrs Sheridan sang old English songs angelically—promised her our votes—7th. Church—Lock—De Costegon—then Goostree's—8th. House sat till near four. Spoke ill—confused—16th. House—resolutions relative to King's interference. Home late—19th. Pitt, Lord Temple, Thurlow, accepted—20th. Morning Pitt's—31st. Pitt's—supped Lord Chatham's—22nd. Lord Temple resigned. No dissolution declared. Drove about for Pitt. "So your friend Mr Pitt means to come in," said Mrs Crewe: "well, he may do what he likes during the holidays, but it will only be a mince-pie administration, depend on it."—23d. Morning, Pitt's. Dined Sir C. Middleton's. Pitt nobly firm—Evening, Pitt's—Cabinet formed—We had a great meeting that night, of all Pitt's friends in Downing Street. . . . February 22d. Dined G. Hardinge's, Mrs Siddons; sung charmingly. 24th. Lady Howe's ball; danced till half-past four. 25th. They got off the horses by a trick. [Nothing new under the sun.] Address carried up; danced at Dundas's," &c. &c."

It is idle to follow the history of the Coalition Ministry, which Wilberforce took an active part in demolishing. He went down to Yorkshire, to attend a great county meeting, a trial of strength, between the parties, the issue of which might be regarded as deciding the struggle. The high aristocracy of the county were generally hostile to Pitt; but the party which addressed the King against the Coalition Ministry were respectable and numerous. Wilberforce made here his first memorable out-doors appearance. He harangued the multitude with signal effect. Boswell, who chanced to be at York, told Dundas in Edinburgh—

"I saw," said Boswell, "what seemed a mere shrimp mount upon the table; but, as I listened, he grew, and grew, until the shrimp became a whale."—"It is impossible," says one who heard him, "though at the distance of so many years, to forget his speech, or the effect which it produced. He arraigned with the utmost vigour the Coalition Ministry, and the India Bill, which they had proposed—a measure which he described as 'the offspring of that unnatural conjunction, marked with the features of both its parents, bearing token to the violence of the one and the corruption of the other.'"

This appearance, the opportune accession of his friend's ministry, and a series of lucky hits, opened to him the representation of Yorkshire, which he carried, as if by magic, over the head of the old, powerful interests, and long held with honour. Pitt wrote to congratulate him, and the victory in Yorkshire set that example which brought success in many other elections. The result of the elections left Mr Pitt so strong in the House of Commons that he might, says Wilberforce in a fit of candour, "if he had duly estimated his position, have cast off the corrupt machinery of influence, and formed his government upon independent principles." Pitt's worst errors, his perseverance in the war, and thirst for colonial acquisition and conquest, he attributed to the bad counsels of Dundas.

In the recess of Parliament, Wilberforce attended his mother and sister to Nice, accompanied by Isaac Milner, then in orders, and afterwards a lecturer at Cambridge, Dean of Carlisle, &c. He had invited this learned person to accompany him as an instructive friend. This journey was productive of important and lasting consequences. Milner was not then a man of religious life; but the theory had been instilled into a powerful and tenacious mind by his theological studies; and Wilberforce retained so much of his early religious impressions as to like discussion on such subjects. For this ample opportunity was afforded on their long journey, but a bustling Parliamentary session and fashionable gaieties intervened, and again lulled his awakening mind:—

He lived in a constant round of company and amusement, dining twice or three times a-week with Mr Pitt—joining in the festivities in which Dundas delighted at Wimbledon and Richmond; while "sitting up all night singing—shirking Duchess of Gordon, at Almack's—danced till five in the morning;" are fair samples of the common descriptions of his days.

In the following season, Milner and he rejoined Mrs and Miss Wilberforce at Genoa; and on the journey, their religious discussions were resumed with greater earnestness. Wilberforce had already been sensibly affected by the perusal of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion," which had accidentally fallen in his way. Altogether, such had been the effect of his discussions and meditations, that, when he reached Spa on the homeward route, Mrs Crewe was astonished to learn that he thought it sinful to go to the play, or to travel on Sunday. It is worthy of notice, at this particular time, when the fashion is revived, that both Wilberforce and Milner were operated upon at Nice by an animal magnetizer, whose manipulations affected them no more than if they had been made of shoe-leather; while another Englishman, Mr Frederick North, who was in feeble health, and very nervous, would fall down even on entering the scene of operations.

Wilberforce was now under very serious impressions of religion; and we are told he returned home "another man in his inner being, yet manifesting outwardly little of the hidden struggle."

It was early in November when he returned, and he remained at Wimbledon until Parliament met in February, reading the Bible and religious books, examining himself, and exercised in meditation and private devotion. Pascal, and Butler's "Analogy" were his chief studies. He began to have family prayers with his servants, and he longed to visit John Newton. He also opened the change his mind had undergone to his friends, and even wrote to Pitt, who, fancying him in a morbid state of mind, came to Wimbledon to talk with and cheer him.

"He tried to reason me out of my convictions, but soon found himself unable to combat their correctness, if Christianity were true. The fact is, he was so absorbed in politics, that he had never given himself time for due reflection on religion. But, amongst other things, he declared to me, that Bishop Butler's work raised in his mind more doubts than it had answered."

There was henceforth a truce between them on these grave topics. He visited Newton secretly, who gave him the judicious counsel, not hastily to form new connexions, nor yet to separate too widely from his former friends. So with this sort of dispensation, he went the same day to Holwood to Mr Pitt's—

"Sad work—I went there in fear, and for some time kept an awe on my mind—my feelings lessened in the evening, and I could scarce lift up myself in prayer to God at night.—7th, At Holwood—up early and prayed, but not with much warmth—then to the St John's at Beckenham. In chaise opened myself to —, who had felt much four years ago when very ill. He says that H. took off his then religious feelings—but query, what did he give him in the room of them? Rather tried to show off at the St John's, and completely forgot God—came away in a sad state to town, and was reduced almost to wish myself like others, when I saw the carriages and people going to town, &c. . . .

"At the leave," he says some weeks before this time, "and then dined at Pitt's—sort of cabinet dinner—was often thinking that pompous Thurlow, and elegant Carmarthen, would soon appear in the same row with the poor fellow who waited behind their chairs."

He was thus "exercised" for some months, studying the Scriptures, and attending Newton's preaching, which, however, did not long satisfy his mind.

John Thornton, at this crisis, proved a stay, and wise comforter, and Unwin a sensible and soothing friend. One day he writes:—

To Manly's; he earnestly busy about useful things, but all of this life—returned—dined and slept at Pitt's. January 11th. To town, and Woolwich—after church, brought Mr Newton down in chaise—dined and slept at Wimbledon—composure and happiness of a true Christian: he read the account of his poor niece's death, and shed tears of joy. 12th. Newton staid—Thornton and I surprised us together on the common in the evening. Expect to hear myself now universally given out to be a methodist: may God grant it may be said with truth!"

His mother was again alarmed on hearing of this new outbreak of methodism, and he wrote her a sensible and sober-minded explanatory letter. A visit to Unwin's vicarage proved highly beneficial to his spirits; and the sky was now brightening over him, never to be again so darkly overcast. In the spring of 1786, he returned to his duty in Parliament, an altered and a better man, with a modest exterior demeanour, and full of good and pious resolutions. One may smile to find him saying, thus early—"Though I told Pitt that I could not promise to him unqualified support, I was surprised to find how generally we agreed." After the first failure—if Pitt ever really wished to succeed—neither of them spoke any more of Parliamentary Reform; though Wilberforce attempted some useful minor measures, and, in particular, fought through a bill to extend the power of the judges in giving up the bodies of other executed criminals for dissection, besides those of murderers. This bill, he remarks, was defeated in the House of Lords, by a coalition of the King's friends and the Whig aristocracy. In spite of his good resolutions, he sometimes fell into what to his tender conscience seemed sinful lapses; but, though his offences might not have been considered very heinous by a less scrupulous judge, it is to be feared that he was too apt to expose himself to what he imagined temptation to evil. After a public breakfast, given at quitting his villa at Wimbledon, he says—

"In how sad a state is my soul to-day! Yesterday when I had company at Wimbledon, I gave the reins to [myself;] sometimes forgetting, at others acting in defiance of God. If Christ's promise, that he will hear those who call upon him, were less direct and general, I durst not plead for mercy, but should fall into despair; and from what I perceive of the actual workings of my soul, the next step would be an abandoning of myself to all impiety. But Christ has graciously promised that he will make unto us not redemption only, but sanctification. Oh! give me a new heart, and put a right spirit within me, that I may keep thy statutes and do them. This week has been sadly spent; I will keep a more strict watch over myself by God's grace.

"To endeavour from this moment," he says, June 21st, "to amend my plan for time, and to take account of it—to begin to-morrow. I hope to live more than heretofore to God's glory and my fellow-creatures' good, and to keep my heart more diligently. Books to be read—Locke's Essay—Marshall's Logic—Indian Reports. To keep a proposition book with an index—a friend's book"—(i. e., memoranda to render his intercourse with them more useful according to their characters and circumstances)—"a commonplace book, serious and profane—a Christian-duty paper. To try this plan for a fortnight, and then make alterations in it as I shall see fit.

When he next visited the north, he resolved that his cheerfulness, forbearance, and affectionate manner should commend his change of religious views to his mother; and he succeeded so well that a female friend said to her, "If this be madness, I hope he will bite us all." Reformed himself, his strongest desire was to reform others; and, for this end, he hoped to organize an association, "to resist the spread of immorality." This association was to be based upon a royal proclamation against vice! He canvassed the bishops, and set himself to the task with great zeal, and with the ordinary success which attends all such measures. Shortly afterwards, he was led to embark in what formed the chief glory, honour, and usefulness of his public life—the Abolition of the Slave Trade. With him, the question of slavery grew up gradually, and from small beginnings; many causes conspiring finally to concentrate his mind upon this great object. His affectionate biographers, warmly devoted to his memory, have raised an injudicious controversy about the relative amount of the claim of their father and other individuals in this glorious work. They would not only place Mr Wilberforce in his true station—the first in the rank of Parliamentary Abolitionists—but claim for him a predominance to which he never pretended. They must admit that, long before Mr Wilberforce had moved at all, Clarkson and the Quakers had been actively agitating. With Granville Sharpe, they had formed a Central Society, or Committee, of which, we may say, the sittings were permanent. Shortly afterwards, Mr Wilberforce, when the question was put to him by Bennet Langton, "in the shape of a delicate compliment," as Clarkson states, at a dinner where Clarkson and other abolitionists were assembled, with a view to discussion, he replied that he "had no objection to bring forward the measure in Parliament, when he was better prepared for it, and provided no person more proper were found." This is Clarkson's unquestioned statement. Mr Wilberforce must often previously have revolved a subject which occupied so much of the public attention. Some of his personal friends were already avowed champions of abolition. He had frequently seen Mr Ramsay—one of its early martyrs—at Sir Charles Middleton's; and Lady Middleton had sent the missionary Latrobe to enlighten him on West India slavery. Clarkson had importuned him many times. He now conversed with Pitt and Grenville upon it, and the former gave his important sanction, by thinking this a fit measure for Wilberforce to conduct. His biographers relate that, sitting under an oak tree at Holwood, he finally made up his mind to give notice, on a fit occasion, of a motion. He thus became, but certainly not spontaneously, far less rashly, and not even promptly, the Parliamentary leader of the abolition party. In arrogating too much for their venerable father, and detracting from the merits and unequalled services of Clarkson, the biographers will, we should imagine, neither increase his true glory, nor raise the reputation of their own work. Disputing for the supremacy of the different leading Abolitionists, is, however, like the fable of the head and the members. In Parliament, Mr Wilberforce may be justly considered the head of the party; but it is not in Parliament, nor yet in the bureaux of ministers, that such questions are prepared, nor such measures carried. Parliament merely ratifies—puts the seal to what the People have already decreed. Even carrying this formality of ratification, is often no easy achievement—and Wilberforce and Stephen found it so. If any man deserve more praise than another in working out this great and glorious human deliverance, it is undoubtedly Granville Sharpe, who, in England, was the true father of the Abolition of Slavery; if any body of abolitionists merit superiority, it is the society of Quakers. The Quakers had been born for generations hereditary foes to slavery. With the co-operation of the Friends, by the way, in schemes of philanthropy, Mr Wilberforce was sometimes dissatisfied. "The Quakers," he says, "are humane and active; but often obstinate, and occasionally absurd, from not knowing enough of the world, of the judgments likely to be formed by other men, and the impressions to be made on them." This observation is enough in that spirit of the world, which Mr Wilberforce was at other times very ready to repudiate, as unfit to profit a growing Christian. To return to the more immediate object of our remarks. In the summer of 1788, after passing some time at Bath for the benefit of his health, Mr Wilberforce made a long visit to Cambridge. While there, the most of his evenings were spent with his friend Milner. But college life no longer suited him; and he says of the learned persons he met, "They were not what I had expected; they had neither the solidity of judgment possessed by ordinary men of business, nor the refined feelings nor elevated principles which become a sequestered life." From Cambridge, he repaired to a villa which he had taken in Westmoreland, partly with a view to shew Mr Pitt his favourite lake scenery, when that great man should travel down to Scotland. This journey was never made by the minister; but a crowd of fashionable and worldly visitors flocked to the summer headquarters of the saintly legislator, and placed him in frequent perplexity. "Sadly taken up," he says, "on Sunday with company in the house. . . . The life I am now leading is unfavourable in all respects, both to mind and body; as little suitable to me, considered as an invalid, under all the peculiar circumstances of my situation, as it is unbecoming my character and profession as a Christian. . . . I am this week entering on the scene of great temptation—a perpetual round of dissipation, and my house overflowing with guests; it is the more necessary for me to live by the faith of the Son of God. Do thou then"—We stop short, wishing that much less of these serious but incongruous things had been published. While one set of guests came, and another went to the lake villa, and a whirl of what he considered dissipation broke in upon tranquil and sober-minded life, it is not to be forgotten that all this racket was quite voluntary on his part! He had great scruples of conscience about attending a jubilee at York, feeling a divided duty between heaven and his constituents. He accordingly laid the case before a clerical friend, fearing that at York it might be requisite for him to drink and sing as he used to do. "He deemed it, however, right to obey the summons," and dined at the tavern, and attended the ball at night—"the enemy grandees there"—without any more of those compunctious visitings, or straining at gnats. Like all persons of desultory habits, however mentally active, he was constantly laying down rules for conduct and the distribution of time; thus consuming much time in noting how far his rules had been broken.

In the session of 1789, the illness of the King, which produced violent party contention on the Regency question, drew him into Pitt's personal as well as his political clique. His rules could not be very strictly observed in the midst of such a racketing life as this:—

"Jan. 1st. Thursday. I hope to spend this year better than the preceding. Eliot breakfasted with me, and I went with him to the Lock—received the sacrament. Dined at home. Thought over future plan of conduct. Called at Pitt's.

"5th. House—chose Grenville Speaker, Sir Gilbert Elliot being opposed, 215 to 144. Dined Lord Camden's—Bayham, and Lady B. there. Afterwards called at Duchess of Gordon's: where an assembly grew on me.

"6th. Very much shattered. Evening, made calls.

"7th. Committee morning—sat till half-past five. Dined Pitt's: then friends at home till late. 8th. Committee till after five. Dined at home—Scott, Muncester, &c.: then committee till past one. Pitt and Dundas till three. 9th and 10th. Committee as before. Sunday, 11th. Very indifferent from late sitting—dreadfully severe weather all this time. Dined at Addington's—serious talk with him. . . . 17th. Dined Bishop of Salisbury's—then called Duchess of Gordon's, and Pitt's, where staid too late; but could not well get away—discussing with Dundas and Rose the Household business.

"21st. At dinner, and all night, till very late—Pitt, Mulgrave, Rydar, &c.—too dissipated.—22d. At Shooter's Hill. Resolved to go with Mulgrave in the morning. Montagu and his wife gave me excellent advice. God bless them.—24th. Called Duchess of Gordon's, and long discussion about Prince of Wales, &c.

"Feb. 24th. I called on John Wesley—a fine old fellow. The bustle and hurry of life sadly distract and destroy me. Alas, alas! I must mend.

"March 20th. Went to Holwood with Pitt, and there exceeded rules—Va, va! yet will I struggle and not give p the combat."

In the midst of this distracted life, hovering between Pitt and the Duchess of Gordon, and Scott's sermons at the Lock, he, however, frequently saw Clarkson and others on "slave business," and was anxiously, if not diligently, preparing for the grand debate. But what were, what could be his attention to this cause at this time, compared with that given by the men who dedicated their entire energies to the single office! He, however, went to the house of a friend in the country, and says—"I resolve to live with a view to health—slave business—attention to my rules—no waste of eye-sight—and may God bless the work; may my religion be more vital from this retirement." A new plan of employing time was made out; and, for three days, he applied eight or nine hours a-day to the "slave business."

Still attended by his satellite, Mr Ramsay, a clergyman, who had lived in the West Indies, and was one of the first and most devoted of the Abolitionists, he came to London; and, on the 19th May 1789, and full two years after his pledge was given at Mr Bennet Langton's, his first great speech was made, and was received by all the leading chiefs of both parties with warm eulogiums, Burke being of the number; and his sentiments were approved as warmly as his oratory was praised, by Burke, Pitt, and Fox. Evidence was allowed to be received, and great efforts were made by many friends to the cause to procure it, as the influence and terrors of the planters deterred witnesses from venturing forward. But before almost anything had been done, "the slave business" was, like so many other businesses of interest to universal humanity and justice, first "put off, because other things in the House;" and then put off till next year. It was now June; and, on the birth-day, Mr Wilberforce felt it indispensable to go to St James'. He says—

"4th. What doest thou here, Elijah?—Dined Pitt's afterwards; great party—sad waste of time.—17th. Dined Bankes's with Burgh—large party—Jekyll, &c. Evening, after seeing Milner went to Hampstead; Pitt, Grenville, Bayham, Eliot—saw children in bed. Dreadful fire at the Opera House. How unsuited are all these companies to one of my objects and aims!—23d. Slave business put off till next year. Dined Lord Chatham's—Duchess of Gordon, Lady Charlotte, Duke of Rutland, Graham, Pitt, Dundas, &c. How ill-suited is all this to me! how unnatural for one who professes himself a stranger and a pilgrim!

"July 1st. Dined up stairs with Addington, because Duke of Gordon's dinner likely to be delayed till late by the House. Went at night to D. of Gordon's—Lennox, Pitt, Bankes, Dundas, &c. there. Phipps in and out about what appeared afterwards to have been Lennox's challenge to Swift. Staid till twelve, and once more experienced how little these meetings are suited to me."

He was never altogether satisfied with his course of life—the service of God and the enjoyments of the gay world were felt incompatible; but his character was amiable rather than energetic; and he was incapable of that substitute for mental firmness, "dogged resolution;" and so went wavering on. On the 15th July, he is saying:—"Earlier hours: attention to health—bodily, mental, intellectual.—16th. Went to town, and dined with Lord Camden, who was very chatty and good-humoured. Exceeded rules, and will forfeit to M. Called to see Pitt, and lounged too long.—17th. Obligated to dine with S., to meet Duchess of Gordon, Chatham, and P. Arden. How ill these meetings suit my state of mind," &c. &c. His biographers say that, "charged as he perceived himself with a mission to his countrymen, which could be fulfilled only by his mingling much in social life, he was yet possessed by a growing conviction that the habits which he was compelled to form were injurious to his own mind." But was dining, to meet the Duchess of Gordon, and such like engagements, really the way in which his mission was to be best accomplished? About this time he became acquainted with Hannah More and her sisters, then residing at Cowslip

Green. Their friendship continued to the end of their lives. She was one of his most frequent correspondents, while he became one of her best supporters in her Cheddar schools. They were, in many respects, congenial spirits—as well in their virtues as in their weaknesses.

Mr Wilberforce was often accused of favouring sectarians, and of being a Methodist, and so forth. He was quite the reverse. His sons state that, in recommending one of "Wesley's wandering comets" to Hannah More, "he had no thoughts of encouraging dissent from the Church of England; for John Wesley was no Dissenter, nor were any of his preachers in his lifetime auferred to attempt to administer the sacraments." Once, and it was only once, Wilberforce received the sacrament in a dissenting meeting-house, from happening to be on a visit to a friend who attended there. He afterwards expressed regret at this compliance, and "he dissuaded a female relation, who complained that, in her place of residence she could find no religious instruction, from attending at the meeting-house." "Its individual benefits," he wrote, in answer to her letter of inquiry, "are no compensation for the general evils of dissent. The increase of Dissenters, which always follows from the institution of unsteeped places of worship, is highly injurious to the interests of religion in the long run." He strenuously opposed the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts while in Parliament; and he held a maxim sufficiently paradoxical, that "the Dissenters could do nothing, if it were not for the Established Church"—meaning, we presume, if anything is meant, save for the negligence of the Established Church, as the instance is drawn from Cheddar, a wild, neglected village and district in Somersetshire, "wretchedly poor and deficient in spiritual help;" yet within the bounds of a wealthy diocese, and affording a good living to a non-resident vicar, and a pittance to his journeyman curate, who, from a distance of nine miles, "visited the parish on Sundays only." Such was the preparation for the labours of dissenting preachers which the Church bestowed on Cheddar, when Hannah More undertook to reclaim this desolate nook.

Even the sojourn at Cowslip Green had not raised Mr Wilberforce to the high standard of religious life to which he aspired. We find him shortly afterwards, in Yorkshire, saying, "Off after breakfast for R—, where a large party at dinner. B., the philosopher, &c. Played at cards evening, and supped. S.—how little of St Paul! F., an old man. Alas! alas! sat up too late, and strong compunctions." After retiring to his room, he wrote upon a sheet of paper—"I have been acting a part this whole evening; and, whilst I have appeared easy and cheerful, my heart has been deeply troubled!" Many good resolutions follow; yet, we fear, that, while some may view these things as the stings of a tender conscience, others will regard them as indications of over-scrupulosity or mental imbecility. His scruples at attending balls, plays, and operas, never extended to reading. We find him often reading Shakespeare—not the "Family Edition"—and, even in old age, he seems to have been very fond of novels and books of entertainment. This was some times atoned, however, by severe condemnation of their character, as of "Pelham," which, having "looked at," he pronounces "most flippant, wicked, unfeeling delineations of life. To read such scenes without being shocked, must be injurious. I am sorry I read it. For very shame I would not have it read to me." This is surely straining at gnats.

Scott's romances he relished, and found "useful as the works of a master in general nature, and illustrative of past life."

A reader was, through life, a household appendage of Mr Wilberforce, on account of his weak eyes; but, with a gentlemanly taste for literature, he was not eminent either as a scholar or a devourer of books.

The last entries from his diaries, cited above, were written towards the close of 1789. His manner of living, then, is a tolerably fair picture of what it continued to be for many years of his public life. He was much in general society, and especially in the high society connected with his friend, the minister; and, although the slave-trade abolition was already his standing job, if not always his main business, he was immersed in the ordinary duties of an active and influential Member of Parliament, representing a very large constituency.

His house was continually open to an influx of men of all conditions. Pitt and his other parliamentary friends might be found there at "dinner before the House." So constant was their resort, that it was asserted, not a little to his disadvantage in Yorkshire, that he received a pension for entertaining the partisans of the minister. Once every week, the "Slave Committee" dined with him. Messrs Clarkson, Dickson, &c. jocosely named by Mr Pitt, his "white negroes," were his constant inmates; and were employed in classing, revising, and abridging evidence under his own eye. "I cannot invite you here," he writes to a friend who was about to visit London for advice, "for, during the sitting of Parliament, my house is a mere hotel." His breakfast table was thronged by those who came to him on business; or with whom, for any of his many plans of usefulness, he wished to become personally acquainted.

Clarkson had, however, already served a long and severe apprenticeship to this business.—In the spring of 1790, Mr Wilberforce was rather posed by the question of the repeal of the test act. Many of his constituents were Dissenters, and there was, if not positive trimming, yet wavering and something equivocal in his management. To a staunch Churchman, he rejoices that the measure had been defeated by a large majority; and he thus sagaciously notices what has since become a remarkable historical fact:—

The large majority by which the motion was this year rejected, marks the rising dread of French principles. "When I entered life," Mr Wilberforce has said, "it is astonishing how general was the disposition to seize upon church property. I mixed with very various circles, and I could hardly go into any company where there was not a clergyman present without hearing some such measure proposed. I am convinced that, if the public feeling had not been altered by our seeing how soon every other kind of plunder followed the destruction of the Temple in France; our clergy would by this time have lost their property."

The aristocracy now believe their interests closely identified with those of the clergy. He was now so firmly seated in the esteem of the great body of his constituents, that he ventured to cut the York races, where his horses had formerly run and won. He was convinced "that the tendency of races is immoral." He had already commenced his well-known work, the "View of Practical Christianity," which came out, at once a good book, and, from its authorship, a great literary curiosity, and had an immense success. A portion of many of his summers was delightfully and satisfactorily spent at Yoxall Lodge, the seat of his friend, the Rev. Mr. Gisborne. He was also, partly induced by considerations of health, a regular frequenter of the fashionable watering-places. In the country, his time was generally spent with the approbation of his conscience—divided between study, exercise, and sober social enjoyment; but no sooner was he back in London, than he was sucked into the vortex. Thus, he says, "Plunged at once into a dinner circle of Cabinet Ministers, how did I regret the innocent and edifying hilarity of the Lodge!" "Much talk about Burke's book. Lord Chatham, Pitt, and I seemed to agree, contra Grenville and Ryder. Kept up late, and unfit for prayer." Burke's book was the "Considerations on the French Revolution." "Kept up late. Oh, how I regret Yoxall Lodge! Gave Pitt a serious word or two. . . . Dec. 1st—Dined R. Smith's. Pitt, Long, Bayham, Dundas, Banks. Staid too long. Came home heart-sick." Sometimes he was afraid Pitt might think that, with all his professions of godliness, he was not very different from other men. Yet he was, at this time, a good deal occupied with the active abolitionists; and the rest of the Sabbath had already become a season of quiet and retirement. Some persons urge the sanctifying of the Sabbath from humanity to horses; but Mr Wilberforce would, among other reasons, have the seventh day set religiously apart from all secular pursuits, from consideration to overwrought ministers of state, and harassed public men. One day in seven set apart for retirement, devotion, and relaxation from secular business, would, he conceives, have helped to avert the dreadful catastrophe of Whitbread, Romilly, and Lord Castlereagh, and have protracted Canning's life. He was much shocked by the violent death of the former; and in lamenting that of Castlereagh, he reverts to Sir Samuel Romilly, who, it seems, would not concur in the propriety of giving up Sunday consultations. "If he (Castlereagh) had suffered his mind to enjoy such occasional remissions, it is highly probable these things would never have snapped as they did from over-tension." The Sunday drillings of volunteers in England, under terror of Bonaparte's threatened invasion, grieved him much; and he strongly disapproved of Sunday newspapers, forgetting that it is Monday newspapers which occasion Sunday work.

"Often in my visits to Holwood," he has said, "when I heard one or another speak of this man's place, or that man's peerage, I felt a rising inclination to pursue the same objects; but a Sunday in solitude never failed to restore me to myself.

"Dined Duchess of Gordon's—children's ball talked of—oh, what madness is all this! 4th. The quarrel between Burke and Fox, which I had endeavoured to prevent. 7th. Dined Duke of Montrose—a large party of our peculiar old friends—what a system are they on! 11th. Burke and Fox, further quarrel—much company this week also in Palace Yard. 22d. I thank God that this town season is nearly over. I hope the next will be better.

"Queen's birth-day—at St James's. Dined at Pitt's—sadly idle. What stuff such a day as this is! 21st. Went tête-à-tête with Pitt to Wimbledon—finance lecture on the way. A long discussion with Dundas after dinner—a most excellent man of business. Oh, what a pity that he is not alive to what is best! his diligence shames me."

His opinion of Dundas, of whom, at this time, he saw so much, was never very favourable. On the memorable investigation into his conduct, the member for Yorkshire was compelled by conscience, and not a little, we think, by policy, to take an open part against the northern friend of Pitt. Early in the Abolition struggle, his friend Milner, by this time Dean of Carlisle, wrote him—

"The worst circumstance is this Dundas—nobody thinks well of him—duplicité and artifice are esteemed parts of his character—he is judged to do what he does unwillingly and with design, in the worst sense. No graveris upon my making these observations on him. I know he says you have as pure a heart as ever inhabited a human breast. Such things you can withstand, but there is a stream of more delicate applause which is likely to have more effect, and against which it is more difficult to guard."

And Wilberforce returns—

"I rather believe, unless Dundas be forced to it, he will not name any specific time, but hold out the prospect of an accelerated or retarded Abolition, accordingly as the islands shall more or less cordially concur in his scheme, professing that, if they will not concur at all, he will next year consent to immediate Abolition."

Dundas soon declared off, and Wilberforce declares, on the East India Bill, "My clauses thrown out. Dundas most false and double; but, poor fellow! much to be pitied." Yet, in two days, this very placable senator says—

"Dined at E's—rout afterwards—what extreme folly is all this! yet much entertained; perhaps too volatile. 27th. Brought in Foreign Slave Bill. 28th. Pitt's birth-day, 34.—House till late, then dined Dundas's, and up too late.

"Dined one day at Dundas's. Lady—and great party. The conversation on natives of New South Wales, duels, &c. I felt strongly how little I was fit for these people, or they for me; ('What doest thou here, Elijah?') but I went upon Dowlin's affair."

This was an affair of benevolence.

In speaking of Pitt and Dundas, after the impeachment of the latter, he says—

"His connexion with Dundas was Pitt's great misfortune. Dundas was a loose man, and had been rather a disciple of the Edinburgh school in his youth, though it was not much known. Yet he was a fine fellow in some things. People have thought him a mean, intriguing creature; but he was in many respects a fine, warm-hearted fellow."

Paine was judged hollow, and sometimes even insincere in his support of the measure of his meek, acquiescing friend. From Scotland, an abolitionist missionary, Dr Dickson, wrote that the people had taken up the question in the view of religious duty, and that "from London to Inverness, Mr Pitt's sincerity is questioned; and, unless he can convince the nation of his cordiality in our cause, his popularity will greatly suffer." Mr Pitt was sincere in his convictions; but the King and the whole prominent Guelphs were arrayed against the measure, and Mr Pitt, loving place, had become weak and as another minister. The notion of Abolition and Jacobinism had become confounded in the King's mind; for many of the friends of the Africans were also avowed admirers of the destruction of the Bastille, and of the first grand aspects of the French Revolution. Wilberforce, a morbidly cautious man, thus got into fresh perplexity. The fervid, zealous, and enthusiastic travelling apostle of Abolition, Clarkson, who had devoted his youth, his fortune, and his health to the cause, did not limit his passion for universal freedom merely to "God's images carved in ebony," and his cautious coadjutor got alarmed.

"You will see Clarkson," writes Mr Wilberforce to Lord Manchester; "caution him against talking of the French Revolution: it will be ruin to our cause."—"Clarkson," writes Dr Milner, "would tell you that he had a long conversation with me. I wish him better health, and better notions in politics; no government can stand on such principles as he appeals to and maintains. I am very sorry for it, because I see plainly advantage is taken of such cases as his, in order to represent the friends of Abolition as levellers. This is not the only instance where the converse of a proposition does not hold: levellers certainly are friends of Abolition." Great mischief had already arisen to the cause. "What business had your friend Clarkson," asked Dundas, "to attend the Crown and Anchor last Thursday? He could not have done a more mischievous thing to the cause you have taken in hand."

The Diary states—"Clarkson called, and warned him about the French Revolution." "We have nothing to depend on," said Wilberforce, after Granville, Windham, all, had openly deserted them, "against the efforts of St James's and the Guelph family being against us; but that Pitt and all his connections and known supporters are warmly with us." But with all this support, the Abolitionists were baffled for twenty years, and the Whigs carried in a few months what the Tories were suspected of not wishing (as a party) to carry. There were gradual Abolitionists in those days, as there are now gradual Reformers. One day long afterwards, his temper was somewhat moved to see "four of the Guelphs" come to the House of Lords to vote against mercy and justice.

A good deal is seen of the rapid growth of alarm and hatred of French principles in this work, and we hear much of the growing disaffection among the lower orders. Dr Milner, living at Cambridge, is "sorry to find that Paley is as loose in his politics as in his religion," and indulged in conversation tending "to destroy all subordination, and bring rulers of every description into contempt." Fox, the very Reverend Dean supposed to have no principles of any kind, but to be ready for whatever turned up. He was, however, a far-seeing, sagacious person, this same well-endowed churchman. He remarks—

"The tide at present seems setting strongly in support of Government amongst all ranks. I believe this arises in great measure from the alarm of the moment; and when that is over or abates, I fear the democratic principles will be found to have firmer roots."

Paine's "wicked and mischievous book," "The Rights of Man," was now sold in Yorkshire for sixpence; and one merchant had distributed 200 copies at his own expense; and, though Tom Paine was shortly afterwards flogged in effigy through Leeds, and solemnly burned to the tune of "God Save the King," Mr Wilberforce was not wholly reassured. It was "a happy change," but he "did not build much on such hasty effusions." He thought of proposing to the Archbishop of Canterbury, a day of national fasting and humiliation, in consequence of the profligacy of the times, a remedy which was often adopted in subsequent years of the glorious war. The war he, however, at first disapproved, but he also believed that Pitt was secretly unfavourable to the system, which, at first, he probably was. In this instance, Mr Wilberforce, for a time, maintained his consistency. He disliked the war nearly as much as he detested the Revolution, but his Parliamentary opposition was never deadly. He afterwards came to see the war just and necessary; while, throughout the whole struggle, there was not, we think, a single Gagging Bill, Sedition Bill, Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, or bill to destroy the freedom of the Press, which he did not strenuously support. The Spy System was an honourable exception. He denounced it as immoral—at least in his diary. It is, by the way, remarkable, how opportunely Mr Wilberforce's little ailments often saved him the pain of giving votes on ticklish or testing questions, by sending him home before the division came. Those little illnesses were, perhaps, real, though so very opportune; for he was of so feeble an original constitution, that, before he was thirty, the principal physicians of London had decently dismissed him to Bath, to die, declaring that "he had not stamina to last a fortnight." The means by which he recovered his health, and to which he attributed his reaching a good old age, are peculiarly worthy of notice, since, from its abuses, a strong and unfounded prejudice still exists against the drug which, in his case proved specific.

His returning health was in a great measure the effect of a proper use of opium, a remedy to which even Dr Pitcairne's judgment could scarcely make him have recourse; yet it was to this medicine that he now owed his life, as well as the comparative vigour of his later years. So sparing was he always in its use, that, as a stimulant, he never knew its power, and as a remedy for this specific weakness, he had not to increase its quantity during the last twenty years he lived. "If I take," he would often say, "but a single glass of wine, I can feel its effect, but I never know when I have taken my dose of opium by my feeling." Its intermission was too soon perturbed by the recurrence of disorder.

At a very advanced age, he writes to a friend, confirming the utility of this medicine.

Grubbe was another remarkable instance of an individual to whom opium was of great benefit; but its manifest uses are, perhaps, not to be set against the chances of its abuse. Although Mr Wilberforce often contrived to eschew unpleasant votes, he gave some sound ones, which, though popular, required from him resolution. He generally voted against the full amount of those profligate grants of the public money, which were proposed by government for members of the Royal family. His principles were such that we apprehend he must have opposed the extravagant Whig civil list of Queen Victoria; and the enormous pension of the Duchess of Kent. If Pitt did not often encounter his opposition, it was felt the more pungently when it occurred. It was first openly given, in moving an amendment to the address at the opening of the Session of 1795, condemnatory of the warlike policy of the Government, as indicated in the King's Speech. "There were," it is here said, "but two events in Pitt's public life, which were able to disturb his sleep—the mutiny at the Nore, and the first open opposition of Mr Wilberforce." The latter was, however, in addition to disturbed friendship, a strong indication of how many of those felt on this subject, who had long and strenuously supported the Pitt administration. Wilberforce suffered too:—

"I felt queer, and all day out of spirits—wrong, but hurt by the idea of Pitt's alienation. 12th. Party of the old firm at the Speaker's; I not there."

Some of his former supporters were dissatisfied, and many of the warlike Tory ladies of Yorkshire, when he next went down, "would scarce speak to him." To make the matter worse, the democrats approved; while some politicians, Lord Thurlow of the number, imagined there was a secret understanding between him and Pitt. Before the next campaign opened, Pitt had won him round again. Mr Wilberforce, individually, was in no sense fitted for opposition; and, in his county, alarm was still increasing. He, therefore, supported the Sedition and Treason Bills, and helped to concoct the former bill. He says—

"A meeting at Pitt's about the Sedition Bill, after which supped with him and Mordaunt—my advice—Pitt's language, 'My head would be off in six months, were I to resign.' I see that he expects a civil broil. Never was a time when so loudly called on to prepare for the worst." "How vain now appears all successful ambition! Poor Pitt! I too am much an object of popular odium. Riot is expected from the Westminster meeting. The people, I hear, are much exasperated against me. The printers are all angry at the Sedition Bills. How fleeting is public favour! I greatly fear some civil war or embroilment; and with my weak health and bodily infirmities, my heart shrinks from its difficulties and dangers."

Many of his liberal constituents were dissatisfied; and the Dissenters had not forgiven his opposition to the repeal of the Test Act. Pitt sent him hurriedly off to face a county meeting, where the Tories managed to carry the victory. The Yorkshire towns were again a blaze of loyalty, and Mr Pitt was informed by express of the happy result of his friend's eloquence, and of all those other appliances and means by which multitudes were led or managed in the good old times. These valuable services did not produce reciprocity. Pitt becoming strong in the house, and, again growing in popularity with the nation, left "the slave business" to its fate, and a bill to abolish the trade was lost in a thin house, but by so small a majority that Wilberforce indignantly says, "Enough at the opera to have carried it!" But how were honourable Members to give up the first night of a new opera-singer for any measure relating to thousands or even millions of black wretches far across the Atlantic Sea? This defeat gave rise to an odd philippic from his friend Dr Burgh against several members of Parliament, but especially against Dundas. He writes—

"Sir William Young, by his insincerity, entitles himself to as much attention as may frustrate a shallow trick, but against Dundas I recommend, and will cultivate in myself, a propensity to direct hostilities. Reared as he has been in the small metaphysics of Scotland, and cramped by his country's imitative adoption of French philosophy, I can only see in the influence of such a man, the approaches of French morals, French politics, French atheism."

This is said of the Tory manager of all Scotland! Meanwhile, Wilberforce, the grand measure still pending, was going to small musical parties at the Duchess of Gordon's, and surprised to find them turn out very large. "People, surprised to see me there."

Bentham's penitentiary had just been contracted for by the projector; and the philosopher and philanthropist was involved in a very considerable expense, undertaken upon the faith of Government aid. Mr Pitt had sanctioned and Dundas encouraged him; but they had no more money to spare in experiments for the improvement of the system of punishments in 1796 than Lord John Russell has declared that he has in 1838.

Mr Wilberforce took up Bentham's cause with zeal, and applied, amongst others, to the Chapter of St Peter's, Westminster, in furtherance of his design. "I shall never forget Horsley's keen glance, when, in the course of our discussion, he asked me, 'Mr Wilberforce, do you think that Mr Pitt is in earnest in the business?' Never was any one worse used than Bentham. I have seen the tears run down the cheeks of that strong-minded man, through vexation at the pressing importunity of creditors, and the insolence of official underlings, when, day after day, he was begging at the Treasury, for what was, indeed, a mere matter of right. How indignant did I often feel, when I saw him thus treated by men infinitely his inferiors! I could have extinguished them."

At the age of thirty-six, in one of his periodical visits to Bath, Mr Wilberforce saw the lady who, so far as we are told, first made any impression upon his affections; and in May 1797 they were married. She was the eldest daughter of Isaac Spooner, Esq., of Elmton Hall, Warwickshire, commercially a banker in Birmingham. That his wife was not of the aristocracy, not a court lady, "not a Pavilion-monger, with daughters to bring out," was to him a frequent ground of thanksgiving. He became the father of four sons, and of two daughters, who predeceased him after attaining the years of womanhood. The honeymoon was spent at Gowslip Green.

We are diverted, by the way, with an extract from one of "Holy Hannah's" letters, written about the time of the marriage; yet her ultra-liberality afterwards kindled the zeal and anger of a numerous party of churchmen.

"The boasted liberality on which they value themselves in the conduct of the Bristol schools, is that relaxing toleration which enables them to combine Quakers and Presbyterians, 'the sprinkled and the dipped,' by insisting on no peculiar form of worship or religious instruction; so that I fear in this accommodating and comprehensive plan, Christianity slips through their fingers. I hope and believe they inculcate industry; but I never went to see them myself, because I think they are carried on in a way I could not commend, and which it might not be right to censure."

In the next page, Wilberforce is found saying—

"Heard of Lord Lonsdale's reformation through my book. Went to the School of Industry. Asked to subscribe to Jay's velvet cushion, but refused. Dr Fraser dined with us—he says that Mackintosh is grown anti-democratical."

One cannot help remarking how imperceptibly Mr Wilberforce, by the strength of his sympathies with Pitt, and others of that party, often veered round to their opinions. He was, for instance, at first opposed to the Irish Union, to which some of his friends in Parliament and in the Church—such as Mr Banks and Dr Burgh were decidedly hostile; but "his objections decreased;" and he made up his mind just in time to vote for it. He thought Pitt's speech in support of an income, instead of a property tax, and proving the injustice and impracticability of the latter, the most masterly piece of reasoning he ever heard; which was, to say the least, quite natural in the circumstances. A great part of his income arose from land, and he warmly, yet scarcely manfully, supported the Corn Bill throughout the terrible agitations of 1815, when the justly exasperated people were on the eve of rising to resist the barefaced iniquity of these selfish legislative landowners, who, in their own strong language, had thrust their greedy hands into their dish. Mr Wilberforce, in one place, charitably infers that Joseph Hume opposed slave emancipation, because his brother had an estate in Trinidad. We shall not say that, in 1815, he supported the bread-tax because he had an estate in Yorkshire. There is on this subject the following passage in his "Diaries," which we have read with regret, and something very like rising disgust:—

"Public discontent running high, Corn Bill cause. 6th. House. Corn Bill in committee—and rioting at night. Both doors of the carriage, which set down members, opened, and member pulled out. . . . Much pressed to speak on Corn Bill; and told Huskisson I would, if government would support the Register Bill.* It would not be right to change my opinion; but one may fairly take a more or less forward part from considerations of expediency. House—Report of Corn Bill, and tendency to riot. 9th. House. Some mobbing, and people savage and inveterate—Alas! alas!"

But he did speak, without the government having made any concession. For almost the first time, in his public life, he waxed bold, and it was in defence of the "things honest" for his household. There had been riots in London, and a sergeant, with a party of soldiers, were stationed in his house at Kensington Gore, for the protection of the family, while its head displayed in Parliament an unwonted intrepidity in the cause of landed privilege.

"At my prayers this morning," his Diary continues, "March 10th, I reflected seriously if it was not my duty, to declare my opinions in favour of the Corn Bill, on the principle of providing things honest in the sight of all men, and adorning the doctrine of God my Saviour in all things. I decided to do it. I see people wonder I do not speak one way or the other. It will be said, he professes to trust in God's protection, but he would not venture anything. Then I shall have religious questions and moral questions, to which my speaking will conciliate, and contra, my silence strongly indispose men. Besides, it is only fair to the Government, when I really think them right, to say so, as an independent man, not liable to the imputation of party bias, corrupt agreement with landed interest, &c.; so I prepared this morning and spoke, and, though I lost my notes, and forgot much I meant to say, I gave satisfaction."—"I am sure that in coming forward, I performed a very painful act of duty, from a desire to please God, and to serve the interests of religion, and I humbly trust God will protect me and my house and family. If not, His will be done."

So Mr Wilberforce thought "he was pleasing God and serving the interests of religion," when he did his best to inflict upon the poor of England, and the whole labouring class, the most impudent impost that ever was levied from a people fancying themselves freely represented in popular national assemblies! If all his public conduct had been of a piece with this, it could not have been said that it adorned the faith which he professed. This martyrdom—this cant—for it is no better—deserved to have been subjected to Cobbett's commentary. Gross injustice committed, gross betrayal of the people's interests, and Scripture to clinch it with! Though Mr Wilberforce, as a legislator, was, of course, much more anxious about the spiritual than the temporal welfare of the people, he was not without bowels for their extremest sufferings. During the famine of 1801-2, he sent considerable sums to be distributed in the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire; and he earnestly recommended that the Government should, by an extraordinary grant, relieve the worst cases, "deeming it hard to call on the land alone for the subsistence of the manufacturers, if they should be thrown out of employment for some months, by the continuance of hostilities." The Government were not quite so foolish. Wilberforce was, however, active and compassionate at this crisis; though not in the best way. He patronized George Rose's salt herrings, while Hannah More wrote receipts, we believe, for cooking them. The labouring classes have still to teach their benevolent legislators that they require nothing at their hands save justice.

Mr Wilberforce, as we have noticed, was frequently seized with opportune little illnesses, when it became necessary either to oppose the Minister, or endanger popularity with the nation. When the report of the Secret Committee was to be received, preliminary to passing a few of Castlereagh's gagging Bills, he says—

"I have just written to Lord Castlereagh, to express my concern at not being able to support him tonight in the House of Commons, and to the Duke of Gloucester, and the Duchess to be invited to dine at night." And a few days later, he declares, "It has been a very great mortification to me, or rather it would be, were it not for the reflection that all is in higher hands, that I cannot attend the House to support the measures which have been taken, and are still in progress, for preserving the public peace."

* A Slavery Amalgamation Bill.

He thought the House of Commons the most unfit place for inquiring into the conduct of the Manchester magistrates at the time of the "Massacre;" and, on another occasion, he says, in reference to Whitbread's charge against Lord Eldon and Sidmouth for unconstitutional conduct regarding the King's derangements—

"Did not hear one-third of Castlereagh's defence, so that I came away without voting. I know how unpopular this is in the House; but it was the path of duty and conscience, for it was in truth as if I had not been present. But very middling in health just now."

Mr Babington and Henry Thornton, who usually acted with him in supporting Government, had, on this occasion, voted with Whitbread. Upon a similar occasion, in 1812, he says—

"May 8th. House till about two, on Parliamentary Reform. I should have spoken but for Ryder's telling me he would have followed, saying, How shocking to throw such an apple amongst the factious in Yorkshire! I thought I had better be silent. I for Parliamentary Reform moderately."

"The state of the West Riding manufacturing districts is dreadful—next to rebellion, smouldering rebellion—great military force sent down, and now, but too late, vigorous measures taking. The aspect of affairs is very gloomy. Who shall say whether poor dear Perceval's death may indicate evil to come, or that a reversal of his counsels is needful for our safety?"

When public affairs seemed coming to a dangerous crisis—and he was very easily frightened—his favourite remedies were, first, a General Fast, and, next, a moderate change of the Ministry—letting in the Whigs for a time, to stop the gap through which the popular force appeared to be making way. The assault on the Danish fleet, which will long rankle in the heart of the Danish nation, was "shocking." "Alas, alas!" he remarks, "they must think us the most bullying despots. There is, however, the consolation of believing that our Government really conceived themselves to be acting justly. My friends [the saints] doubt about the Danish business. I own the policy doubtful; but our right clear, if self-defence clear. Oh, that nations!" &c. &c. He conceived it wrong, or, in his first view, sinful, to erase the name of Queen Caroline from the Liturgy, and sent his son "with an earnest letter" to the King, entreating him to restore it, lest the soldiers should take part with her, which he greatly dreaded; but afterwards, when urged to wait on the King and remonstrate, he positively refused. The step would have been unconstitutional, and the "contumacy" of the Queen soon made him waver in opinion as to the omission of her name. He had one of his ill-omens on the night the vote was taken on Lord Archibald Hamilton's motion regarding the omission of the Queen's name. He was personally thrown into great perplexity. He could not conscientiously approve of the course taken by Ministers, and he wanted courage to oppose it manfully. Cobbett pressed him hard, allowing no loop-hole for escape—"very clever," he writes of him, "but very mischievous, and full of falsehoods." Cobbett's friends, but, above all, impartial posterity, will object to the latter epithet, though they may not conclude Mr Wilberforce "the perfect rational" which he complains the public then thought him. His conduct was at least equivocal, even by his own account. He wished to mediate; he desired to stop that horrible and indecent investigation. He writes Samuel Roberts, Esq., that he frankly would have preferred the course of moving the restoration of the Queen's name to the liturgy; but yet, for a very poor reason, he did not move it; and, after voting against Lord A. Hamilton, he turned once more, and voted on the directly opposite side, with Mr A. Smith. A brilliant and able contemporary writer, has described Wilberforce as a double entendre, "far from being a hypocrite, but as fine a specimen of moral equivocation as can well be conceived,"—one "who rather patronizes honesty, than is a martyr to it"—one "who has two strings to his bow"—"the vanity of being popular, and the conceit of an approving conscience; reaping the credit of independence, without the obligation;" "not a party man, but the more looked up to on this account, but not with sufficient reason."

Much in these sharp remarks are borne out by the conduct of Mr Wilberforce on the Queen's trial. On Sunday the 9th June, he writes to his wife:—

"I fear lest it should please God to scourge the nation through the medium of this rupture between the King and Queen. If the soldiery should take up her cause, who knows what may happen—and is it very improbable? O Lord, deliver us! Then only canst, who hast the hearts of all at Thy disposal. Yet how gracious God is to me, giving me the acceptable service of putting off the discussion! I go to prayer, and, oh, may He have mercy on us and avert so great an evil, in answer to the prayers of many among us, who call upon His name, and set their hearts on Him!"

We make not one word of commentary on what follows from the diary, and other letters to Mrs Wilberforce, written one fortnight after the above.

"I talked with Lord Kenyon and Calthorpe, and rather agreed that nothing was to be done but to go on with the business, though I would embrace any creditable way of stopping it. Castlereagh moved to adjourn his proceeding for a fortnight. This gave Opposition an opportunity of moving its adjournment for six months. I and others voted against Opposition; not meaning to vote for a Secret Committee at all, much less specifically in a fortnight, but not being able at once to take a by-way of defeating a thing which might at any moment be revived."

Who the others may be we cannot guess; but, even while acting against the Opposition; and, consequently, against either delay, or for getting rid of what he justly terms "the painful and disgusting" inquiry; and while professing a strong feeling for the Queen's situation in early life, he is on perfectly good terms with himself, referring thus complacently to the moral degradation he was undergoing:—"The first pain, which I learned by heart lately, has been a great comfort to me. . . . Well, remember good old Bessy, in worse times, when assisted by her friends that could burn as well as write." "Oh, what a comfort it is to have to fly for refuge," &c. &c. These things are somewhat too much. To one of his female correspondents, "sweet Lady Olivia Sparrow," he quietly indulges in a little jocular sneering about the ladies who went to Queen Caroline's court. "How much you must regret that you being out of town could not accompany Lady Fitzwilliam, and the Duchess of Somerset, to congratulate her Majesty on her honourable acquittal!" He still wished to see a peaceful adjustment of the liturgy squabble, and, by a roundabout way, tried to reach the throne, in a letter addressed to some anonymous individual; who must have been in the King's confidence, or about his person. In that finessing epistle, there is one statement, one pious fraud, which must have required some straining of conscience. He says to his correspondent—"It is not that I, or any experienced man, ever supposed the bulk of the people would long feel acutely about the omission of the Queen's name, but that the omission would tend to produce an estimation (a most false one) of the King's mind and motives," &c. &c., thus leaving it to be inferred that the King's motives in ordering that omission, were believed by Mr Wilberforce to be those of conscience, piety, and duty. "Dear good Vansittart's proposition for new churches," is not quite so bad as this.

The opinions which Mr Wilberforce held of his more eminent or conspicuous contemporaries, become of interest, when his peculiar position in society is considered, hovering so long half-suspended between the political-fashionable, and the fashionable-evangelical world, and ultimately exercising no small influence upon opinion among a large class.

Of Castlereagh, whom he seems to have almost uniformly supported, he says, at one time, in relation to the slave trade, "What a cold-blooded creature!" Canning was not a great favourite. "Poor fellow, he had neither father nor mother to train him up. He was brought up partly, I believe, with Sheridan. I always wondered he was so pure." . . . "Canning clever, genius; but too often speaking, and too flippant and ambitious." . . . "Pitt too much encouraging Canning." It was not to be expected that he should like Sheridan; but he frequently complains that, while the reporters often did less than justice to his own speeches, they took pains and pleasure in patting good sense and eloquence into the mouth of Sheridan, whether drunk or sober.

Sheridan would, against the advice of all the Opposition friends, electrify the country on the Spanish business. He came down to the House, but the opportunity being delayed, he going up-stairs got so drunk as to make him manifestly and disgracefully belittled. Yet he seemed to remember a fair speech, for the topics were good; only he was like a man watching through a thick medium at the objects before him. . . . Ah! his most humiliating spectacle; yet the papers state him to have made a brilliant speech. . . . Sheridan's speech was tedious, and Fortescue's excellent, . . . a good and a total success.

Yet, as on the other evening, all the newspapers make a slight speech for Sheridan; and even his supporters.

"Our general impression of Sheridan was, that he came to the House with his flashes prepared and ready to let off. He avoided encountering Pitt in unforeseen debating, but when forced to it usually came off well."

The happy reply of old Major Cartwright to Mr Wilberforce, is well known: The veteran Reformer and he had been cordial friends in youth. After a long separation, they chanced to meet one day. Wilberforce was, of course, rejoiced, and expressed the hope that, though so long estranged on earth, they might yet meet in a better world. "Yes," replied the Reformer; "but I hope to make this one better first." The writer whom we have already quoted, says, with severity not unmixed with truth—"Wilberforce has no mercy on those who claim a property in negro slaves . . . but not a word has he to say, not a whisper does he breathe against the claims set up by the despots of the earth, over their Continental subjects, but does everything in his power to confirm and sanction it! He must give no offence. Mr Wilberforce's humanity will go all lengths that it can with safety and discretion, but it is not to be supposed that it should lose him his seat for Yorkshire, the smile of Majesty, or the countenance of the loyal and the pious. He is anxious to do all the good he can without hurting himself or his fair fame."

Although, on the accession of the Grey and Grenville cabinet, he thought it a duty to support his Majesty's Whig ministers, he could not support the grant to Maynooth College. The Rev. Sidney Smith wrote to him scolding—"I hope, now you have done with Africa, you will do something for Ireland. There is no man in England who, from activity, understanding, character, and neutrality, could do it so effectually as Mr Wilberforce. And when this country ceased, a century ago, an establishment to the Presbyterian Church, it is horrible to see four millions of Christians of another persuasion, instructed by ragged priests, and praising their Creator in wet ditches." On this subject he was obstinate; nor do we know how he got rid of Sidney Smith's argument, as he reprobated the Presbyterian or Calvinistic doctrines, and, as we have shewn, was an enemy to dissent in every shape. Of a celebrated book, Wutherspoon's "Essay on Justification," he says, "I have never read [it], but I am told it is decidedly Calvinistic; and, every year that I live, I become more impressed with the unscripural character of the Calvinistic system." Of a preacher, he says he "heard ——— twice; still very doctrinal and unprofitable, reconciling his Calvinism with practical religion. . . . Of Olney, I hear but a very melancholy account. It is, indeed, an awful instance of masses slighted and privileges abused. I suspect, also, from what I have heard, that some of the former ministers of the place, like my excellent friend Newton, not being quite enough on their guard respecting Dissenters and dissent, has not been unproductive of evil. His biographers state that his 'wardenship for the liturgy' grew manifestly with his years." He breaks out this winter (1825) in a letter to a friend, into a warm expression of his "delight in the principles of our various formularies." Though not a Calvinist, he was on terms of cordial friendship with Dr Chalmers, who has paid the very highest compliment to his "Practical View." When the northern star first rose on the horizon of London, he went, with all the world, to hear the new apostle of Presbytery, and even scrambled, with a stout gentlewoman, over the railings, to find a seat. "Chalmers," he says, "most awful on carnal and spiritual man. Home tired, and satisfied that I had better not have gone for edification." In private intercourse, he says—"Much pleased with Chalmers' simplicity—walked and talked in garden." On the death of another remarkable Scotsman, he remarks—

"Poor Beeswell! I once had some serious conversation with him; he was evidently low and depressed, and appeared to have many serious feelings. He told me that Dr Johnson had assured him he was never intimately acquainted with one religious clergyman. I was determined not to let him off; so I replied, 'That can only be because he never sought their acquaintance.'"

The only Parliamentary opponent whom Wilberforce seems to have personally disliked was Tierney, whose jeers, biting sarcasms, and rude and remorseless stripping away of pretences, often vexed him. At one period Tierney took a real delight in girding at him. He seemed studiously to have set himself to worry the leader of "the saints." The worst thing he has said of Tierney is, that, when Queen Caroline came to England, he was base enough to enter into a flirtation with the King for office on disgraceful terms; but, as nothing came of it, we hope this may not have been the case. Next in annoyance to Tierney in the House was Cobbett in The Register; but this was at a much later period. At one time, the more violent party journals on both sides attacked him; and he complains as bitterly of The John Bull as of Cobbett. From 1798, Wilberforce found an able auxiliary in the war against slavery, in Mr Stephen. That gentleman had spent a considerable time in the West Indies, and was personally familiar with the hideous aspects of the trade. He was a man of ardent temperament, and of great energy of character; and his services to the Abolition cause were invaluable, both by his pen and his activity in Parliament. The general pacification of 1816 appeared to the Anti-Slavery party a favourable crisis for the traffic being crashed and abolished for ever, not only by Great Britain, but by all the Continental states having American colonies. But when the Peace was concluded, amid general triumph and rejoicing, and those important interests were overlooked by Castlereagh, for which a noble band, in which had long been included Brougham, Babbington, Macaulay, and many others equal in zeal and in usefulness, had made the most strenuous exertions, Mr Stephen became utterly disgusted. He declared himself sick of private communications and private remonstrances. "I am quite, quite sick," he says, in a tone remarkably opposed to the timid style of Wilberforce, "of the West Indies as a field of labour in our cause; especially when that Augean stable has to be cleaned with a Government muck-fork. There is satisfaction in speaking to the public; the sympathies of congenial minds, the indignation of honest hearts, may be moved, and much solid ground in public opinion may be gained; but to load the shelves of a Minister with laboured memorials, to haunt him with conferences for years, and at last to be turned by the whisper that a governor stands well with great men, and must not have his toes trod upon, is beyond all patience, or, at least, beyond mine." We cite these opinions as peculiarly applicable to present times and newer ministers; and in vindication of the manly course which has been adopted by the Abolitionists of our own day. "I really think," concludes Mr Stephen, "that we shall do nothing essential to check colonial crimes till we blazon them to the English public, and arm ourselves with popular indignation." This must have been absolutely terrific to the mild and cautious Mr Wilberforce. "Even now," with provocation heaped up—with delay which seemed as endless as wilful—"even now," say his biographers, "Mr Wilberforce would not listen to these violent counsels;" and Mr Stephen finally threw up his seat in Parliament, and chose a wider and better field for his energetic labours. He, though the fervent admirer of Wilberforce, was not always satisfied with his excessive caution and timidity. Upon one occasion, he remonstrates—

"I still clearly think, that you have been improperly silent, and that when you see the Government leading the bloody altars of commerce, the idol of this Carthage, with an increase of human victims, and building new altars for the same execrable purpose, while the sword of Almighty vengeance seems uplifted over us for that very offence, you are bound by the situation wherein you have placed yourself to cry aloud against it. You are even the rather bound to do so, because those high priests of Moloch, Lord Liverpool and Mr Dundas, are your political, and Mr Pitt also your private friend."

It is to the praise of Wilberforce that he always seems to have taken frank dealing in good part. Mr Wilberforce, by the way, disapproved of female anti-slavery agitation, grounding his objection upon the Apostle's precept about woman not speaking in the Church. Another ground of his disapproval might be dislike of all innovation. In this last view, he especially regretted the increase of newspapers, and the taste the people were acquiring for reading them—"the morbid appetite for politics," requiring the constant diet of newspapers. A very bitter and mischievous, but clever one, had been established in Westmoreland, "cherishing the anti-aristocratic feelings in their full life and action." This, we presume, from the date, must have been after one of Mr Brougham's contests with the Lowthers. On the whole, he considered newspapers "among the very greatest, if not the greatest evil of the country." His cure, however, is a safe and right one, whether the evil exist or not:—

"Have you reflected," he asks Dr Chalmers, "on the effects produced in this country by the newspapers? They are almost incalculably great; and, on the whole, I fear, lively infirmity. It is my persuasion that our safety will hereafter be no adequate our people up to the newspapers, if I may so express myself. We must so much enlighten them that they may be armed against those delusions of which they are otherwise likely to become the victims."

So tender was he about publication, that we find him greatly scandalized at seeing in the Christian Observer the advertisement of Scott's "Final Perseverance Sermon," adjacent to the advertisement of his "Reply to the Bishop of Lincoln." The Christian Observer had been established, and was warmly patronised by himself and his friends.

Mr Wilberforce had, we have seen, the common taste of the unsanctified public for novels; though, after enjoying the pleasure of their perusal, he compromised with his conscience by passing, as in the instance of "Pelham," very severe censure on their tendency. Even Sir Walter Scott's works, though often admired, were sometimes condemned for the levity and the frivolity of ordinary novels. Miss Edgeworth wanted "religious feeling;" Mackenzie's "Man of Feeling" and "Man of the World" are declared "mischievously-principled works;" Byron's "Cain" was "blasphemous," (but, we believe, there is Chancery law for that judgment;) and the "Vicar of Wakefield," infinitely told though the tale is allowed to be, indicates "such an utter ignorance of true Christianity." At last, he came to complain of Scott's "fascinating volumes" having so little "moral or religious object."—"I would rather," he remarked, "go to render my account, at the last day, carrying up with me 'The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain,' than bearing the load of all those volumes, full as they are of genius." These critical opinions may safely be left to the judgment of the reader. We find Mr Wilberforce, upon one occasion, confessing that, such was his spirit's infirmity, that he found it much pleasanter to read the tittle-tattle of Boswell's Johnson, than engage in his private devotional duties; and, with his severity of censure upon the "Vicar of Wakefield," he reads Chesterfield's "Letters to his Son" in the family circle, without any mark of condemnation for their want of religious or moral principle. The concatenation of books is diverting:—

"Run over part of Gil Blas, in the afternoon and evening, when nothing more serious could be well done. It is useful for me to know these works, and I do not find them fascinate me as many talk; but how completely unchristian are they! Besides this, I have run through four-fifths of Captain Pausley's book, the Quarterly and British Reviews, a little Cecil, and am reading Isaiah with Lewth—a little poetry to the ladies at night, and sometimes Walter Scott and Lord Chesterfield's 'Letters to his Son.'"

In closing this work, we are constrained to say that we have seldom or never found so bulky and minute a record of the life of a man who, for above half a century, occupied so conspicuous a station in public affairs and in the religious world, so barren of interest or of solid material of any kind. Here there are few traces of the wisdom and sagacity for which Mr Wilberforce has obtained so much credit; and of the eloquence or power of persuasion with which he was said to be gifted—none whatever. Much of the beauty and effect of his speeches must, we presume, have consisted in the charm of delivery, and in a remarkably sweet, insinuating, and exquisitely-modulated voice; for they have not even borne well transplantation to the columns of the newspapers.

In 1812—after having sat for Yorkshire in six Parliaments, and carried his last election after a very extraordinary canvass—he withdrew from the representation; and, until 1825, when he retired from Parliament, he sat for the close borough of Bramber, as the nominee of his kinsman, Lord Carrington. From the time of his retirement, he lived principally at Highwood Hill—a house and small estate, "just beyond the disk of the metropolis." Here several of his declining years were spent rationally and happily; and, without engaging in any new public business, he did not lose sight of those philanthropic designs which he had formerly laboured to promote. About 1831, heavy losses, sustained through the commercial disappointment of his eldest son, compelled him, with his wife, to seek an asylum in the houses of two of his sons, who were in the Church. Nothing can be more amiable or more truly Christian than the spirit in which he sustained these strokes of adversity. A much more severe trial was the loss of his only surviving daughter, shortly after he had left Highwood Hill. He had not remained long with his son at the Rectory of Brighton, in the Isle of Wight, when another son was enabled to offer him another happy home in Kent. It does one's heart good to find him writing thus, in old age, to a friend, about an early and zealous coadjutor in the long-continued conflict of Abolition:—"You will join me, I am sure, in being thankful as well as rejoiced in my being able to inform you that Lord Brougham has given to my second son, (or rather, I may say, to me,) quite spontaneously, and very handsomely, the living of East Farleigh. The parsonage is very little above a mile from Barham Court; and there must be many pleasant circumstances in being so near the residence, library, and park of an old friend."

The record of his last years, spent in the parsonages of his sons, is, to us, the most delightful portion of the book. Wilberforce was especially formed to endear domestic intercourse, to cheer and brighten the fireside; and we see far too little of him in his happier element. It was now, when, like Lear, "a poor old man," that the full influence of his religious principles broke forth, with mild and steady effulgence, shedding cheerfulness and joy upon

"An old age, serene and bright,
And lovely as a Lapland night."

Though he had so long occupied an eminent place in the political world, it was not his native sphere. Parliament was not his congenial element, nor public business his vocation; and, great as his moral influence became, he never deserved the praise of being, even in the ordinary sense, a good man of affairs. His habits were desultory, his arrangements confused, and the greater haste he made the worse was his speed. High as the Abolition cause has carried his name, he was, at best, in all else a sorry reformer. He wanted the first grand requisites—courage, fortitude, and enthusiasm; while he had no taste whatever for being on the unpopular side of any great question. He compares himself, on one occasion, with the persecuted Luther; but, if the lion-hearted German—who declared that, if “all the devils in hell opposed him, he would go on”—had been of the mild, cautious, sweet temper of Mr Wilberforce, the Reformation would have halted for him. The true place of Wilberforce was tranquil private life. He should, for his own happiness, have been the inmate of a parsonage, or of some quiet rural mansion, mildly guiding and instructing his flock or his dependents, and enlivening and benefiting his neighbours.

Mr Wilberforce, as a public character, has not been treated by us as infallible—as little less than the angels; but, if we are not often compelled to bear testimony to his great public virtues, we cannot omit his singular exemption from the ordinary and vulgar vices of public men. He was neither ambitious nor covetous for himself, nor yet for his children. The sons of his more aspiring and religious friends are, several of them, high in office—rich in public emolument—while his sons occupy the obscure, if respectable, station of parish priests—that condition which the religious man, and the veteran in public life, regarded as safer and better. He wished none of his children to become politicians. He warned them from that dangerous path, and he bred none of them lawyers.

Before closing this notice, we would fain give our readers as clear an idea of the personalities, so to speak, of Wilberforce, as we are enabled to do by these reverential and filial volumes. Owing to delicacy of health, he wore prematurely the external marks of extreme old age, which, with a stoop which he had early contracted, lessened his apparent stature—and it had never been commanding; but, up to a late period, the agility of his step, the quickness of his sparkling eye, with the compass and beauty of his voice, were all at variance with these appearances of decay. A friend, who had first seen him when between fifty and sixty, remarks—

“Those who never saw him till within eight or ten years of his decease, when his figure had become a good deal bent, and his head depressed upon his chest, by the weight of years acting on an extremely delicate frame, cannot easily form a just idea of him, at the period to which I now refer. Some tendency to these infirmities, it is true, was already apparent; but the elasticity and spring of his movements, the comparative erectness of his figure, and the glow on his cheek, presented a strong contrast to the decrepitude which gradually stole upon him in his declining years. His frame was at all times extremely spare, and seemed to indicate that the ethereal inhabitant within, was burdened with as little as possible of corporeal encumbrance. . . . His eyes, though small, and singularly set, beamed with the expression of acute intelligence, and of comprehension quick as lightning, blended with that of cordial kindness and warmth of heart. A peculiar sweetness and playfulness marked his whole manner. There was not a single handsome feature—there was scarcely one that was not in itself plain; but the mingled emanations of imagination and intellect, of benevolence and vivacity, diffused over his countenance a sort of sunny radiance, which irresistibly acted as a powerful magnet on the hearts of all who approached him. At this time, and till within a very few years of his death, he wore powder; and his dress and appearance were those of a complete gentleman of the old school.”

When he was just sixty years of age, Count Pecchio remarked of him, “When Mr Wilberforce passes through the crowd on the day of the opening of Parliament, every one contemplates this little old man, worn with age, and his head sunk upon his shoulders, as a sacred relic—as the Washington of humanity.” “At the breakfast table, and again from the setting in of evening until midnight, were his gayest times; at the last, especially, all his faculties were in the fullest exercise.” In his long intercourse with society, he had mingled with all manner of strange and opposite characters, and with persons of all gradations of rank. In the same day, he might have, first, a very miscellaneous group to breakfast; then a minister to a tête-à-tête dinner for political talk; and afterwards a poor missionary going to the Namqua country, or an oddity who liked spiders better than roast beef. To the very close of life, Mr Wilberforce retained a keen relish of its best enjoyments. He liked the quiet of the country, and rural sights and sounds; he was fond of flowers, of simple music, of entertaining literature, and of the easy intercourse of lively and intelligent, rather than fine society. His own conversation must have been singularly fascinating; though, like his Parliamentary eloquence, it exhibits few results. It would, indeed, be difficult to collect few pages of his table-talk from these five volumes. His last illness was short and easy. He retained his faculties to the very last; and his cheerful piety, and warm, yet childlike feelings of devotion were never more beautifully displayed than on his death-bed.

Our opinion of Mr Wilberforce as a public character, has been sufficiently indicated. While acknowledging the value of his Parliamentary labours to the fullest extent, we are far from considering him the perfect model of either a great or a useful statesman. His faults were often more detrimental than those of his most corrupt contemporaries. His name and his influence, for many a long year, formed a sort of break-water to the minister of the day. If not always the advocate or apologist of oppression and abuse, he was their frequent abettor; and he must not be estimated alone by what he did, but by what he might have done, and omitted. In private life, his character, we think, stands much higher. His virtues were solid; his graces and dispositions the most endearing and amiable. We can scarcely imagine, by the fire-side, a person more free from faults, or possessed of so many gladdening and charming qualities; but we should vehemently desire, in all time coming, a very opposite sort of man for the representative of the West Riding.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES LAMB.—NO. II.

It was summer. The earth groaned under foliage and flowers—fruits I was going to say, but, as yet, fruits were not—and the heart of man under the burden of triumphant gratitude: man I say; for surely to man, and not to England only, belonged the glory and the harvest of that unequalled triumph.* Triumph, however, in the sense of military triumph, was lost and swallowed up in the vast overthrow of evil, and of the evil principle. All nations sympathized with England—with England, as the centre of this great resurrection; centre for the power; centre, most of all, for the moral principle at work. It was, in fact, on that ground, and because all Europe felt and acknowledged that England had put a soul into the resistance to Napoleon, wherever and in whatever corner manifested—therefore it was that now the crowned heads of Europe, “with all their peerage,” paid a visit to this marvellous England. It was a distinct act of homage from all the thrones of Europe, now present on our shores, actually or by representation. Certain it is, that these royal visits to England had no other ground than the astonishment felt for the moral grandeur of the country, which only, amongst all countries, had yielded nothing to fear—nothing to despondency; and also the astonishment felt, at any rate, by those incapable of higher emotions, for its enormous resources, which had been found adequate to the support, not only of its own colossal exertions, but of those made by almost half of Christendom besides. Never before in this world was there so large a congress of princes and illustrious leaders attracted together by the mere force of unwilling, and, in some instances, jealous admiration. I was in London during that fervent carnival of national enthusiasm; and naturally, though noseeker of spectacles, I saw—for nobody who walked the streets of western London could avoid seeing—the chief objects of public interest. I was passing from Hyde Park along Piccadilly, on the day when the Emperor of Russia was expected. Many scores of thousands had gone out of London over Blackfriars’ Bridge, expressly to meet him, on the understanding that he was to make his approach by that route. At the moment when I reached the steps of the Pultney Hotel, a single carriage, of plain appearance, followed by two clumsy Cossack small landaus, (or rather what used to be called sociables), approached at a rapid pace; so rapid that I had not time to pass before the waiters of the hotel had formed a line across the foot-pavement, intercepting the passage. In a moment, a cry arose—“The Czar! the Czar!”—and, before I could count six, I found myself in a crowd. The carriage door was opened, the steps let down, and one gentleman, unattended, stepped out. His purpose was to have passed through the avenue formed for him, in so rapid a way as to prevent any recognition of his person; but the cry in the street, the huzzas, and the trampling crowd, had brought to a front window on the drawing-room story a lady whom I had seen often before, and knew to be the Duchess of Oldenburg, the Emperor’s sister. Her white dress caught the traveller’s eye; and he stopped to kiss his hand to her. This action and attitude gave us all an admirable opportunity for scanning his features and whole personal appearance. There was nothing about it to impress one very favourably. His younger brother, the present Emperor, is described by all those who saw him, when travelling in Great Britain, as a man of dignified and impressive exterior. Not so with the Emperor Alexander: he was tall, and seemed likely to become corpulent as he advanced in life, (at that time he was not above thirty-seven;) and in his figure there seemed nothing particularly amiss. His dress, however, was unfortunate; it was a green surtout: now, it may be remarked, that men rarely assume this colour who have not something French in their taste. His was so in all things, as might be expected from his French education under the literary fribble, Monsieur La Harpe. But, waving his appearance in other respects, what instantly repelled all thoughts of an imperial presence, was his unfortunate face. It was a face wearing a northern fairness, and not perhaps unamiable in its expression; but it was overlaid with flesh, and expressed nothing at all; or, if anything, good humour, good nature, and considerable self-complacency. In fact, the only prominent feature in the Czar’s disposition was, an amiable, somewhat sentimental ostentation—amiable, I say, for it was not connected with a gloomy pride or repulsive arrogance, but with a bland and winning vanity. And this cast of character was so far fortunate, as it supplied impulses to exertion, and irritated into activity a weak mind, that would, else, by its natural tendencies, have sunk into torpor. His extensive travels, however, were judiciously fitted for rescuing him from that curse of apathetic courts; and his greatest enemy had also been his greatest benefactor, though unintentionally, through the tempestuous agitations of the Russian mind, and of Russian society, in all its strata, during that most portentous of all romances—not excepting any of the crusades, or the adventurous expeditions of Cortez and Pizarro, still less the Parthian invasions of Crassus or of Julian—viz., the anabasis of Napoleon. There can be no doubt, to any reflecting mind, that the happiest part of his reign, even to Charles I., was that which was also, in a political sense, the period of his misfortunes—viz., the seven years between 1641 and 1649; three of which were occupied in stormy but adventurous war; and the other four in romantic journeys, escapes, and attempts at escape, checkered, doubtless, with trepidations and anxieties, hope and fear, grief and exultation, which, however much tainted with distress, still threw him upon his own resources of every kind, bodily not less than moral and intellectual, which else the lethargy of a court would have left undeveloped and unsuspected even by himself. Such also had been the quality of the Russian Emperor's experience for some of his latter years; and such, probably, had been the result to his own comparative happiness. Yet it was said, that, about this time, the peace of Alexander's mind was beginning to give way. It is well known that a Russian emperor, lord of sixty million lives, is not lord of his own—not at any time. He sleeps always in the bosom of danger, secret, unfathomable, invisible. It is the inevitable condition of despotism and autocracy that he should do so. And the Russian Czar is, as to security, pretty nearly in the situation of the Roman Cæsar. He, however, who is always and consciously in danger, may be supposed to become partially reconciled to it. But, be that as it may, it was supposed that, at this time, Alexander became aware of some special conspiracies that were ripening at home against his own person. It was rumoured that, just about this time, in the very centre of exuberant jubulations, ascending from every people in Europe, he lost his serenity and cheerful temper. On this one occasion, in the moment of rejoining a sister, whom he was said to love with peculiar tenderness, he certainly looked happy; but, on several subsequent opportunities that I had of seeing him, he looked much otherwise; disturbed and thoughtful, and as if seeking to banish alarming images, by excess of turbulent gaiety, by dancing, or by any mode of distraction. Under this influence it was also, or was supposed to be, that he manifested unusual interest in religious speculations; diverting to these subjects, especially to those of a quietist character, (such as the doctrines of the English Quakers,) that enthusiasm which hitherto, for several years, he had dedicated to military studies and pursuits. Meantime, the most interesting feature belonging to the martial equipage which he drew after him, was the multitude of Tartar or other Asiatic objects, men, carriages, &c., prevailing in the crowd, and suggesting the enormous magnitude of the empire from whose remote provinces they came. There were also the European Tartars, the Cossacks, with their Hetman Platoff. He had his abode somewhere to the north of Oxford Street; and further illustrated the imperial grandeur, being himself a sovereign prince, and yet a vassal when he found himself in the presence of Alexander. This prince, who (as is well known) loved and honoured the English, as he afterwards testified by the most princely welcome to all of that nation who visited his territories, was, on his part, equally a favourite with the English. He had lost his gallant son in a cavalry skirmish; and his spirits had been much depressed by that calamity. But he so far commanded himself as to make his private feelings give way to his public enthusiasm; and he never withdrew himself from the clamorous applause of the mob, in which he took an undisguised pleasure. This was the man, amongst all the public visitors now claiming the hospitality of the English Regent, whom Lamb saw and talked of with most pleasure. His sublime ugliness was most delectable to him; and the Tartar propensities, some of which had been perhaps exaggerated by the newspapers, (such, for instance, as their drinking the oil out of the street lamps,) furnished him with a constant feu-de-joie of jests and playful fictions, at the expense of the Hetman; and in that way it was that he chiefly expressed his sympathy with this great festal display. Marshal Blucher, who still more powerfully converged upon himself the interest of the public, was lodged in a little quadrangle of St James' Palace, (that to the right of the clock-tower entrance.) So imperious and exacting was the general curiosity to see the features of the old soldier—this Marshal "Forwards," as he was always called in Germany, and who had exhibited the greater merit of an Abdol fidelity, on occasion of the mighty day of Jena,—that the court was filled from an early hour of every morning, until a late dinner hour, with a mob of all ranks, calling for him by his name, tout court, "Blucher! Blucher!" At short intervals, not longer in general than five minutes, the old warrior obeyed the summons throughout the day, unless when he was known to be absent on some public occasion. His slavery must have been most wearisome to his feelings. But he submitted with the utmost good nature, and allowed cheerfully for the enthusiasm which did so much honour to himself and to his country. In fact, this enthusiasm, on his first arrival in London, shewed itself in a way that astonished everybody, and was half calculated to alarm a stranger. He had directed the postilion to proceed straightway to Carlton House—his purpose being to present his duty in person to the Regent, before he rested upon English ground. This was his way of expressing his homage to the British nation, for upholding, through all fortune, that sacred cause of which he also had never despaired. Moreover, his hatred of France, and the very name French, was so intense, that upon that side also he cherished an ancient love towards England.

* It is a favourite doctrine with some of the Radical Reformers, (thanks be to God! not with all,) to vilify and disparage the war with France, from 1793 to 1815, not, (as might, perhaps, consistently be done, during some of its years,) but throughout and unconditionally—in its objects, its results, its principles. Even contemplating the extreme case of a conquest by France, some of the Radicals maintain, that we should not have suffered much; that the French were a civilized people; that, doubtless, they (here, however, it was forgotten that this “they” was not the French people, but the French army) would not have abused their power; even suppose them to have gained possession of London: Could we read Dunno’s account of the French reign in Rome; any account of Napoleon in Hamburg; any account of Janet in Lisbon.

As the carriage passed through the gateway of the House-Guards, the crowd, which had thus covered him, became enormous. When the garden or Park entrance to the palace was thrown open, to admit Blücher, the vast mob, for the first and the last time, carried the entrance as if by storm. All opposition from the porters, the police, the soldiers on duty, was vain; and many thousands of people accompanied the veteran prince, literally "hustling" his carriage, and, in a manner, carrying him in their arms to the steps of the palace door; on the top of which, waiting to receive him, stood the English Regent. The Regent himself smiled graciously and approvingly upon this outrage, which, on any minor occasion, would have struck him with consternation, perhaps, as well as disgust. Lamb, I believe, as well as myself, witnessed part of this scene; which was the most emphatic exhibition of an uncontrollable impulse—a perfect rapture of joy and exultation, possessing a vast multitude with entire unity of feeling, that I have ever witnessed, excepting, indeed, once besides, and that was a scene of the very same kind, or rather a reflection of the same scene. It occurred in Hyde Park, on the following Sunday: Prince Blücher and his master, the King of Prussia; the Metman of the Cossacks, with his master, the Czar; the Duke of Wellington, with some of the royal Dukes, and a vast cortege of civil and military dignities—in short, the élite of all the great names that had grown into distinction in the late wonderful campaigns—German, Spanish, French—rode into the Park, simultaneously. If there had been any division of their several suites and parties, this had vanished; and all were thrown into one splendid confusion, under a summer sun. The Park was, of course, floating with a sea of human heads. And, in particular, there was a dense mass of horsemen, amounting to six thousand at the least, (as I was told by a person accustomed to compute crowds,) following close in the rear. The van of this mighty body, composed of so many "princedom, dominations, virtues, powers," directed their course to Kensington Gardens—into these, as privileged guests, they were admitted—precursors, founded on the Carlton House experience, having been taken to exclude the ignoble vulgar who followed. The impulse, however, of the occasion, was too mighty for the case. The spectacle was absolutely sublime—of hurricane, instantaneous power, sweeping away, like an Alpine lake broken loose, all barriers almost before they were seen. The six thousand horsemen charged into the gardens; that being (as in the other case) the first and also the last intrusion of the kind. One thing in this popular festival of rejoicing was peculiarly pleasing to myself and to many others—the proof that was thus afforded to so many eminent foreigners of our liberality, and total freedom from a narrow or bigoted nationality. This is a grave theme, and one which, on account of the vast superstructure reared upon it, of calamitous insult to our national character, requires a separate discussion. Here it may be sufficient to say, that Marshal Blücher, at least, could have no reason to think us an arrogant people, or narrow in our national sensibilities to merit, wherever found. He could not but know that we had also great military names to shew—one or two greater than his own; for, in reality, his qualities were those of a mere fighting captain, with no great reach of capacity, and of slender accomplishments. Yet we—that is to say, even the street mob of London—glorified him as much as ever they did Lord Nelson, and more than they ever did the Duke of Wellington. In this crowd, on this memorable Sunday, by-the-by, rode Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, as yet obscure and poor, (not having £300 a year,) and seeing neither his future prosperity, nor its sudden blight, nor its resurrection. There also rode the Prince of Orange, and many another, who was to reap laurels in the coming year, but was yet dreaming not of Waterloo as a possibility. With respect to Blücher, however, it is painful to know that he, who was now so agreeably convinced of our national generosity, came afterwards to shew that jealousy of us which we had so loudly refused to feel of him, through the mere mortifications practised on his self-esteem, perhaps maliciously, by the French authorities, in passing by himself and addressing their applications to the Duke of Wellington.

Fouché, Chateaubriand de la Râche, and other writers, have recorded the maniacal rage of Prince Blücher, when dispatches from Paris passed through his camp—may, were forwarded to his headquarters, in order to gain—what? Audience from him? No. Sanction from him? No. Merely a counter-sign, or a passport for the messenger; some purely ministerial act of participation in the transit of the courier; the dispatches being uniformly for the Duke of Wellington. This, on the part of the French authorities, must have been, in some respects, a malicious act. Doubtless, the English general was known only in the character of a victor; whereas Blücher (and that the old testy hussar should have remembered) had never been known at Paris, for anything but defeats; and, within the week preceding, for a signal defeat, which many think might have been ripened into a smashing overthrow. But, still, there can be no doubt that deadly malice towards the Prussian name was the true ground of the act; for the Parisians bore, (and still bear,) a hatred to the Prussians, absolutely irrational and inexplicable. The battle of Rebach can hardly have been the reason, still less the Prussian resumption of the trophies then gathered from France, and subsequently carried off by Napoleon; for, as yet, they had not been resumed. The ground of this hatred must have lain in the famous manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick—for he, as a servant of the Prussian throne, and commanding a Prussian army, was looked upon as a Prussian. This change, however, in Blücher—this jealousy of England, within so short a time—astonished and grieved all who had seen him amongst ourselves.

Many a time I met him in the street; four or five times in streets where he could not have been looked for—the streets of the city; and always with a retinue of applauders, that spread like wildfire. Once only he seemed to have a chance for passing incognito. It was in Cheapside. He was riding, as he generally was, in the open carriage (on this occasion a curriole) of some gentleman with whom he was going to dine, at a villa near London. A brewer's waggon stopped the way for two minutes; in that space of time, twenty people crowded about who knew his features:—"Blucher! Blucher!" resounded through the street in a moment; an uproar rose to heaven; and the old Marshal's face relaxed from its gravity, or its sternness, (though, to say the truth, there was little of determinate expression in his features; and, if he had not been so memorable a person, one would have thought him a mere snuffy old German)—relaxing, however, from his habitual tom-cat gravity, he looked gracious and benign. Then, at least, he loved us English; then he had reason to love us; for we made a pet of him; and a pet in a cause which would yet make his bones stir in the grave—in the national cause of Prussia against France. I have often wondered that he did not go mad with the fumes of gratified vengeance. Revenge is a luxury, to those who can rejoice in it at all, so inebriating that possibly a man would be equally liable to madness, from the perfect gratification of his vindictive hatred or its perfect defeat. And, hence, it may have been that Blucher did not go mad. Few men have had so ample a vengeance as he, when holding Paris as a conqueror: and, yet, because he was but one of several who so held it, and because he was prevented from mining and blowing up the bridge of Jena, in that way, perhaps, the delirium of his vengeance became less intoxicating.

Now, returning to Lamb, I may remark that, at this memorable season, his wayward nature shewed itself more conspicuously than ever. One might have thought that, if he manifested no sympathy in a direct shape with the primary cause of the public emotion, still he would have sympathized, in a secondary way, with the delirious joy which every street, every alley, then manifested, to the ear as well as to the eye. But no! Still, like Diogenes, he threw upon us all a scoffing air, as of one who stands upon a pedestal of eternity, looking down upon those who share in the transitory feelings of their own age. How he felt in the following year, when the mighty drama was consummated by Waterloo, I cannot say, for I was not then in London; I guess, however, that he would have manifested pretty much the same cynical contempt for us children of the time, that he did in all former cases.

Not until 1821, and again in 1823, did I come to know Charles Lamb thoroughly. Politics, national enthusiasm, had then gone to sleep. I had come up to London in a case connected with my own private interest. In the same spirit of frankness that I have shewn on other occasions in these personal sketches, I shall here not scruple to mention, that certain pecuniary embarrassments had rendered it necessary that I should extricate myself by literary toils. I was ill at that time, and for years after—ill from the effects of opium upon the liver; and one primary indication of any illness felt in that organ, is peculiar depression of spirits. Hence arose a singular effect of reciprocal action, in maintaining a state of dejection. From the original physical depression caused by the derangement of the liver, arose a sympathetic depression of the mind, disposing me to believe that I never could extricate myself; and from this belief arose, by reaction, a thousand-fold increase of the physical depression. I began to view my unhappy London life—a life of literary toils, odious to my heart—as a permanent state of exile from my Westmoreland home. My three eldest children, at that time in the most interesting stages of childhood and infancy, were in Westmoreland; and so powerful was my feeling (derived merely from a deranged liver) of some long, never-ending separation from my family, that at length, in pure weakness of mind, I was obliged to relinquish my daily walks in Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, from the misery of seeing children in multitudes, that too forcibly recalled my own. The picture of Fox-ghyll, my Westmoreland abode, and the solitary fells about it, upon which those were roaming whom I could not see, was for ever before my eyes. And it must be remembered that distance—the mere amount of distance—has much to do in such a case. You are equally divided from those you love, it is very true, by 100 miles. But that, being a space which in England we often traverse in eight or ten hours, even without the benefit of railroads, has come to seem nothing at all. Fox-Ghyll, on the other hand, was 280 miles distant; and from the obstacles at the latter end of the journey, (cross roads and interruptions of all public communications,) it seemed twice as long. Meanwhile, it is very true that the labours I had to face would not, even to myself, in a state of good bodily health, have appeared alarming. Myself, I say—for, in any state of health, I do not write with rapidity. Under the influence of opium, however, when it reaches its maximum in disease, the liver and deranging the digestive functions, all exertion whatever is revolting in excess; intellectual exertion, above all, is connected habitually, when performed under opium influence, with a sense of disgust the most profound for the subject (no matter what) which detains the thoughts; all that morning freshness of animal spirits, which, under ordinary circumstances, consumes, as it were, and swallows up the interval between one's self and one's distant object, (consumes, that is, in the same sense as Virgil describes a high-blooded horse on the fret for starting, as traversing the ground with his eye, and devouring the distance in fancy before it is approached)—all that dewy freshness is exhaled and burnt off by the parching effects of opium on the animal economy. You feel like one of Swift's Strulbruggs, prematurely exhausted of life; and mole-hills are inevitably exaggerated by the feelings into mountains. Not that it was mole-hills exactly which I had then to surmount—they were moderate hills; but that made it all the worse in the result, since my judgment could not altogether refuse to go along with my feelings. I was, besides, and had been for some time, engaged in the task of unthreading the labyrinth by which I had reached, unawares, my present state of slavery to opium. I was descending the mighty ladder, stretching to the clouds as it seemed, by which I had imperceptibly attained my giddy altitude—that point from which it had seemed equally impossible to go forward or backward. To wean myself from opium, I had resolved inexorably; and, finally, I accomplished my vow. But the transition state was the worst state of all to support. All the pains of martyrdom were there: all the ravages in the economy of the great central organ, the stomach, which had been wrought by opium; the sickening disgust which attended each separate respiration; and the rooted depravation of the appetite and the digestion—all these must be weathered for months upon months, and without the stimulus (however false and treacherous,) which, for some part of each day, the old doses of laudanum would have supplied. These doses were to be continually diminished; and, under this difficult dilemma—if, as some people advised, the diminution were made by so trifling a quantity as to be imperceptible—in that case, the duration of the process was interminable and hopeless. Thirty years would not have sufficed to carry it through. On the other hand, if twenty-five to fifty drops were withdrawn on each day, (that is, from one to two grains of opium,) inevitably within three, four, or five days, the deduction began to tell grievously; and the effect was, to restore the craving for opium more keenly than ever. There was the collision of both evils—that from the laudanum, and that from the want of laudanum. The last was a state of distress perpetually increasing, the other was one which did not sensibly diminish—no, not for a long period of months. Irregular motions impressed by a potent agent upon the blood or other processes of life are slow to subside; they maintain themselves long after the exciting cause has been partially or even wholly withdrawn; and, in my case, they did not perfectly subside into the motion of tranquil health, for several years.

From all this it will be easy to understand the fact—though, after all, impossible, without a similar experience, to understand the amount—of my suffering and despondency in the daily task upon which circumstances had thrown me at this period—the task of writing and producing something for the journals, insita Minerva. Over and above the principal operation of my suffering state, as felt in the enormous difficulty with which it loaded every act of exertion, there was another secondary effect which always followed as a reaction from the first. And that this was no accident or peculiarity attached to my individual temperament, I may presume from the circumstance, that Mr Coleridge experienced the very same sensations, in the same situation, throughout his literary life, and has often noticed it to me with surprise and vexation. The sensation was that of powerful disgust with any subject upon which he had occupied his thoughts, or had exerted his powers of composition for any length of time, and an equal disgust with the result of his exertions—powerful abhorrence I may call it, absolute loathing, of all that he had produced. In Mr Coleridge's case, speaking at least of the time from 1807 to 1815, this effect was a most unhappy one; as it tended to check or even to suppress his attempts at writing for the press, in a degree which cannot but have been very injurious for all of us, who wished to benefit by his original intellect, then in the very pomp of its vigour. This effect was, indeed, more extensive than with myself: with Coleridge, even talking upon a subject, and throwing out his thoughts upon it liberally and generally, was an insurmountable bar to writing upon it with effect. In the same proportion in which he had been felicitous as a talker, did he come to loathe and recoil from the subject ever afterwards; or, at least, so long as any impressions remained behind of his own display. And so far did this go—so uniformly, and so notoriously to those about him—that Miss Hutchinson, a young lady in those days whom Coleridge greatly admired and loved as a sister, submitted at times to the trouble of taking down what fell from his lips, in the hope that it might serve as materials to be worked up at some future period, when the disgust should have subsided, or perhaps in spite of that disgust, when he should see the topics and their illustrations all collected for him, without the painful effort of recovering them by calling up loathsome trains of thought. It was even suggested, and at one time (I believe) formally proposed, by some of Coleridge's friends, that, to save from perishing the overflowing opulence of golden thoughts continually welling up and flowing to waste in the course of his ordinary conversation, some short-hand writer, having the suitable accomplishments of a learned education and habits of study, should be introduced as a domestic companion. But the scheme was dropped; perhaps from the feeling, in Coleridge himself, that he would not command his usual facility, or his natural power of thought, under the consciousness of an echo sitting by his side, and repeating to the world all the half-developed thoughts or half-expressed suggestions which he might happen to throw out. In the meantime, for the want of some such attendant, certain it is, that many valuable papers perished. In 1810, "The Friend" was in a course of publication by single sheets of sixteen pages. These, by the terms of the prospectus, should have appeared weekly. But if, at any time, it happened that Wordsworth, or anybody else interested in the theme, came into Coleridge's study whilst he was commencing his periodical lucubrations, and, naturally enough, led him into an oral disquisition upon it, then perished all obstacle for that week's fulfilment of the contract. Miss Hutchinson, who was aware of this, did her best to throw hindrances in the way of this catastrophe; but too often ineffectually: and, accordingly, to this cause, as a principal one amongst others, may be ascribed the very irregular intervals between the several numbers of "The Friend" in its first edition: and to this, also, perhaps, the abrupt termination of the whole at the twenty-ninth number. In after years, Coleridge assured me, that he never could read anything he had written without a sense of overpowering disgust. Reverting to my own case, which was pretty nearly the same as his, there was, however, this difference—that, at times, when I had slept at more regular hours for several nights consecutively, and had armed myself by a sudden increase of the opium for a few days running, I recovered, at times, a remarkable glow of jovial spirits. In some such artificial respites, it was, from my usual state of distress, and purchased at a heavy price of subsequent suffering, that I wrote the greater part of the Opium Confessions in the autumn of 1891. The introductory part, (i. e., the narrative part,) written for the double purpose of creating an interest in what followed, and of making it intelligible, since, without this narration, the dreams (which were the real object of the whole work) would have had no meaning, but would have been mere incoherences—this narrative part was written with singular rapidity: The rest might be said to have occupied an unusual length of time; since, though the mere penmanship might have been performed within moderate limits, (and in fact under some pressure from the printer,) the dreams had been composed slowly, and by separate efforts of thought, at wide intervals of time, according to the accidental prevalence, at any particular time, of the separate elements of such dream in my own real dream-experience. These circumstances I mention to account for my having written anything in a happy or genial state of mind; when I was in a general state so opposite, by my own description, to everything like enjoyment. That description, as a general one, states most truly the unhappy condition, and the somewhat extraordinary condition of feeling, to which opium had brought me. I, like Mr Coleridge, could not endure what I had written for some time after I had written it. I also shrunk from treating any subject which I had much considered; but more, I believe, as recoiling from the intricacy and the elaborateness which had been made known to me in the course of considering it, and on account of the difficulty or the tediousness, which might be fairly presumed from the mere fact that I had long considered it, or could have found it necessary to do so, than from any blind mechanical feeling: inevitably associated (as in Coleridge it was) with a second survey of the same subject. One other effect there was from the opium, and I believe it had some place in Coleridge's list of morbid affections caused by opium, and of disturbances extended even to the intellect—which was, that the judgment was for a time grievously impaired, sometimes even totally abolished; as applied to anything which I had recently written. Fresh from the labour of composition, I believe; indeed, that almost every man, unless he has had a very long and close experience in the practice of writing, finds himself a little dazzled and bewildered in comparing the effect, as it will appear to neutral eyes, of what he has produced. This result, from the hurry and effort of composition, doubtless we all experience, or at some time have experienced. But the incapacitation which I speak of here, as due to opium, is of another kind and another degree. It is more childish helplessness, or senile paralysis, of the judgment, which distresses the man in attempting to grasp the upshot and the total effect (the tout ensemble) of what he has himself so recently produced. There is the same imbecility in attempting to hold things steadily together, and to bring them under a comprehensive or unifying act of the judging faculty, as there is in the efforts of a drunken man to follow a chain of reasoning. Opium is said to have some specific effect of debilitation upon the memory;* that is, not merely the general one which might be supposed to accompany its morbid effects upon the bodily system, but some other, more direct, subtle, and exclusive; and this, of whatever nature, may possibly extend to the faculty of judging. Such, however, ever and above the more known and more obvious ill effects upon the spirits and the health, were some of the stronger and more subtle effects of opium in disturbing the intellectual system, as well as the animal, the functions of the will also no less than those of the intellect, from which both Coleridge and myself were suffering at the period to which I now refer (1891-5)—evils which found their fullest exemplification in the very act upon which circumstances had now thrown me as the cause-motif of my extrication from difficulties—viz.; the act of literary composition. This necessity, the fact of its being my one sole resource for the present, and the established experience which I now had of the peculiar embarrassments and counteracting forces which I should find in opium, but still more in the train of consequences left behind by past opium—strongly co-operated with the mere physical despondency arising out of the liver. And this state of partial unhappiness, amongst other outward indications, expressed itself by one mark, which some people are apt greatly to misapprehend, as if it were some result of a sentimental turn of feeling—I mean perpetual sighs. But medical men must very well know, that a certain state of the liver, mechanically, and without any co-operation of the will,

* The technical memory, or that which depends upon purely arbitrary links of connexion, and therefore more upon a ritus or separate activity of the mind—that memory, for instance, which recalls names—is undoubtedly affected, and most powerfully, by opium. On the other hand, the logical memory, or that which recalls facts that are connected by fixed relations, and where A being given, B must go before or after—historical memory, for instance—is not much if at all affected by opium.

expressed itself in sighs. I was, much too firm-minded, and too reasonable, to murmur or complain. I certainly suffered deeply, as one who finds himself a banished man from all that he loves, and who had not the consolations of hope; but feared too profoundly that all my efforts—efforts poisoned so sadly by opium—might be unavailing for the end. But still I endured in silence. The mechanical sighs, however, revealed, or seemed to reveal, what was present in my thoughts. Lamb doubtless remarked them; he knew the general outline of my situation; and, after this, he set himself, with all the kindness of a brother, Miss Lamb with the kindness of a sister, to relieve my gloom by the closest attentions. They absolutely persecuted me with hospitality; and, as it was by their fireside that I felt most cheered, and sometimes elevated into hope, it may be supposed that I did not neglect to avail myself of the golden hours thus benignantly interposed amongst my hours of solitude, dependency, and labour but partially effectual.

Thus then it arose, and at this period, that I had my first experience of Lamb's nature and peculiar powers. During one part of the time, I, whose lodgings were in York Street, Covent Garden, became near neighbour to the Lambs—who (with a view to the two great theatres, I believe) emigrated for some months from the Temple to Russell Street. With their usual delicacy, the Lambs seemed to guess that, in my frame of mind, society of a mixed character might not be acceptable to me. Accordingly, they did not ask me to their parties, unless where they happened to be small ones; but, as often as they were free of engagements themselves, they would take no denial—come I must, to dine with them and stay as late as I would. The very first time on which these dinner invitations began, a scene occurred with Charles Lamb, which so nearly resembled the Coleridge and "Ancient Mariner" mystification of years long past, that, perhaps, with all my knowledge of his character, I might have supposed him angry or offended in good earnest, had I not resorted to the lesson of that early introductory visit to the Temple. Some accident, or perhaps it was Lamb himself, had introduced the subject of Hazlitt. Aware of Lamb's regard for him, and of what I esteemed his exaggerated estimate of Hazlitt's powers, I fought shy of any opinion upon him. The fact is, somewhere about that time—but I am not sure whether this had yet happened—Hazlitt had published a little book which was universally laughed at, but which, in one view of it, greatly raised him in my opinion, by showing him to be capable of stronger and more agitating passions than I believed to be within the range of his nature. He had published his "Liber Amoris, or the Modern Pygmalion." And the circumstances of the case were these:—In a lodging-house, which was also, perhaps, a boarding-house, in the neighbourhood of Lincoln's Inn, Hazlitt had rooms. The young woman who waited on him, was a daughter of the master of the house. She is described by Hazlitt, whose eye had been long familiar with the beauty (real and ideal) of the painters, as a woman of bewitching features; though one thing, which he confesses in his book, or did confess in conversation, made much against it—viz., that she had a look of being somewhat jaded, as if she were unwell, or the freshness of the animal sensibilities gone by. This girl must evidently have been a mercenary person. Well, if she were not an intriguer in the worst sense—in the sense of a schemer, she certainly was. Hazlitt, however, for many weeks (months perhaps) paid her the most delicate attentions, attributing to her a refinement and purity of character to which he afterwards believed that she had no sort of pretensions. All this time—and here was the part of Hazlitt's conduct which extorted some sympathy and honour from me—he went up and down London, raving about this girl. Nothing else would he talk of. "Have you heard of Miss —?" And then, to the most indifferent stranger, he would hurry into a rapturous account of her beauty. For this he was abundantly laughed at. And, as he could not fail to know this—for the original vice of his character, was dark, sidelong suspicion, want of noble confidence in the nobilities of human nature, faith too infirm in what was good and great—this being so, I do maintain that a passion, capable of stifling and transcending what was so prominent in his own nature, was, and must have been (however erroneously planted) a noble affection, and justifying that sympathy which I so cordially yielded him. I must reverence a man, be he what he may otherwise, who shows himself capable of profound love. On this occasion, in consequence of something I said very much like what I am now saying, Hazlitt sent me a copy of his "Liber Amoris;" which, by the way, bore upon the title page an engraved copy of a female figure—by what painter I forget at this moment, but I think by Titian—which, as Hazlitt imagined, closely resembled the object of his present adoration. The issue for Hazlitt, the unhappy issue, of the tale, was as follows:—The girl was a heartless coquette; her father was an humble tradesman, (a tailor, I think;) but her sister had married very much above her rank; and she, who had the same or greater pretensions personally, now stood on so far better ground than her sister, as she could plead, which originally her sister could not, some good connexions. Partly, therefore, she acted in a spirit of manoeuvring as regarded Hazlitt: he might do as a pie aller, but she hoped to do better; partly also she acted on a more natural impulse. It happened that, amongst the gentleman-lodgers, was another, more favoured by nature, as to person, than ever Hazlitt had been; and Hazlitt was now somewhat withered by life and its cares. This stranger was her "fancy-man." Hazlitt suspected something of this for a long time; suspected, dated, and was again persuaded to abandon his suspicions; and yet he could not relish her long conversations with this gentleman. What could they have to say, unless their hearts furnished a subject? Probably the girl would have confessed at once a preference, which, perhaps, she might have no good reason for denying, had it not been that Hazlitt's lavish liberality induced him to overwhelm her with valuable presents. These she had no mind to renounce. And thus she went on, deceiving, and beguiling, and betraying poor Hazlitt, now half crazy with passion, until one fatal Sunday. On that day, (the time was evening, in the dusk,) with no particular object, but unhappy because he knew that she was gone out, and with some thought that, in the wilderness of London, he might, by chance, stumble upon her, Hazlitt went out; and not a half mile had he gone, when, all at once, he fancied that he saw her. A second and nearer glance shewed him that he was right. She it was, but hanging on the arm of the hated rival—of him whom she had a hundred times sworn that she never spoke to but upon the business of the house. Hazlitt saw, but was not seen. In the blindness of love, hatred, and despair, he followed them home; kept close behind them; was witness to the blandishments freely interchanged, and soon after he parted with her for ever. Even his works of criticism, this dissembling girl had accepted or asked for as presents, with what affectation and hypocrisy Hazlitt now fully understood. In his book, he, in a manner, "whistles her down the wind;" notwithstanding that, even at that time, "her jesses" were even yet "his heart-strings." There is, in the last apostrophe to her—"Poor weed!"—something which, though bitter and contemptuous, is yet tender and gentle; and, even from the book, but much more from the affair itself, as then reported with all its accessory circumstances, something which redeemed Hazlitt from the reproach (which till then he bore) of being open to no grand or profound enthusiasm—no overmastering passion. But now he shewed indeed—

Perhaps this furnished the occasion for our falling upon the subject of Hazlitt. What was said will better come in upon another occasion—(viz., that of Hazlitt.) Meantime that Lamb only counterfeited anger, appeared from this—that, after tea, he read me his own fine verses on "The Three Graces;" and, that I might not go off with the notion that he read only his own verses, afterwards he read, and read beautifully—for of all our poets Lamb only and Wordsworth read well—a most beautiful sonnet of Lord Thurlow, on "Lacken Water."

In answer to what I considered Lamb's extravagant estimate of Hazlitt, I had said, that the misanthropy which gives so unpleasant a tone to that writer's works, was, of itself, sufficient to disgust a reader whose feelings do not happen to flow in that channel; that it was, moreover, a crude misanthropy, not resting upon any consistent basis, representing no great principles good or bad, but simply the peevishness of a disappointed man. I admitted that such a passion as a noble misanthropy was possible; but that there was an ignoble misanthropy; or, (taking an illustration, which I knew would tell with Lamb better than all arguments,) on the one hand, there was the lofty, nay sublime, misanthropy of Timon; on the other, the low villainous misanthropy of Apemantus. Now, the cynicism of Hazlitt, as also of another writer, who, in our times, affected misanthropy, if not exactly that of Apemantus, was too much akin to it; not built on the wild indignation of a generous nature, outraged in its best feelings, but in the envy of a discontented one. Lamb paused a little; but at length said, that it was for the intellectual Hazlitt, not the moral Hazlitt, that he professed so much admiration. Now, as all people must admit the splendid originality of much that Hazlitt has done, here there might have been a ready means, by favour of the latitude allowed to general expressions, for one, like me, who disliked disputing, to effect a compromise with my opponent. But, unfortunately, Lamb chose to insinuate (whether sincerely and deliberately I cannot say) that Hazlitt was another Coleridge; and that, allowing for his want of poetic power, he was non tam impar quam dispar. This I could not stand. I, whose studies had been chiefly in the field of philosophy, could judge of that if I could judge of anything; and certainly I felt entitled to say that anything which Hazlitt might have attempted in philosophy—as his "Essay on the Principles of Human Action," and his polemic "Essay against the Hartleian Theory"—supposing even that these were not derived entirely from Coleridge (as C. used to assert)—could, at the best, be received only as evidences of ingenuity and a natural turn for philosophizing; but, for any systematic education or regular course of reading in philosophy, these little works are satisfactory proofs that Hazlitt had them not. The very language and terminology which belong to philosophy, and are indispensable to its free motion, do not seem to have been known to him. And, whatever gleams of wandering truth might flash at times upon his mind, he was at the mercy of every random impulse; had no principles upon any subject; was eminently one-sided; and viewed all things under the angle which chance circumstances presented, never from a central station. Something of this I said, not wishing or hoping to disturb Lamb's opinion, but piqued a little by what seemed to me not so much honour done to Hazlitt as wrong done to Coleridge. Lamb felt, or counterfeited a warmth, that for the moment looked like anger. "I know not," he said, "where you have been so lucky as to find finer thinkers than Hazlitt; for my part, I knew of none such. You live, I think, or have lived, in Grasmere. Well, I was once there. I was at Keswick, and all over that wild country; yet none such could I find there. But, stay, there are the caves in your neighbourhood, as well as the lakes; these we did not visit. No, Mary," turning to his sister, "you know we didn't visit the caves. So, perhaps, these great men live there. Oh! yes, doubtless, they live in the caves of Westmoreland. But you must allow for us poor Londoners. Hazlitt serves for our purposes. And in this poor, little, inconsiderable place of London, he is one of our very prime thinkers. But certainly I ought to have made an exception in behalf of the philosophers in the caves." And thus he ran on, until it was difficult to know whether to understand him in jest or earnest. However, if he felt any vexation, it was gone in a moment; and he shewed his perfect freedom from any relic of irritation, by reading to me one or two of his own beautiful compositions—particularly "The Three Graves." Lamb read remarkably well. There was rather a defect of vigour in his style of reading; and it was a style better suited to passages of tranquil or solemn movement, than to those of tumultuous passion. But his management of the pauses was judicious, his enunciation very distinct, his tones melodious and deep, and his cadences well executed. The book from which he read, was a folio manuscript, in which he had gathered together a number of gems, either his own, or picked up at random from any quarter, no matter how little in the sunshine of the world, that happened to strike his fancy. Amongst them was one which he delighted to read to his friends, as well on account of its real beauty, as because it came from one who had been unworthily treated and so far resembled himself. It was a sonnet of Lord Thurlow, a young poet of those days, who has, I believe, been long dead. I knew not whether there is anything besides of equal value amongst this noble writer's works; but assuredly the man who could have written this one sonnet, was no fair subject for the laughter which saluted him on his public appearance as an author. It was a sonnet on seeing some birds in a peculiar attitude by the side of Lacken Water. And the sentiment expressed was thankfulness to nature for her bounty in scattering instruction everywhere, and food for meditation, far transcending in value, as well as in extent, all the teaching of the schools. But the point of the whole, which peculiarly won Lamb's approbation, was the way in which the poet had contrived to praise the one fountain of knowledge without disparaging the other. Accordingly, Lamb used always to solicit the hearer's attention, by reading it twice over, to that passage—

"There need not schools, nor the Professor's chair, Though these be good, to"—

This sudden turning aside to disclaim any blame of the one power, because he was proclaiming the all-sufficiency of the other, delighted Lamb, as a peculiarly graceful way of expressing the Catholic charity which becomes a poet. For it is a maxim to which Lamb often gave utterance (see, for instance, his letters to Bernard Barton,) that the genial effect of praise or admiration is robbed of its music, and untuned, by founding it upon some blame or harsh disparagement of a kindred object. If blame be right and called for, then utter it boldly; but do not poison the gracious charities of intellectual love and reverence, when settling upon grand objects, nor sully the brightness of those objects, by forcing the mind into a remembrance of something that cannot be comprehended within the same genial feelings. No maxim could better display the delicacy and purity of Lamb's child-like spirit of love, to which it was a disturbance and a torture even to be reminded that there was anything existing that was legitimately a subject for a frown or a scowl.

About this time it was—the time, viz., from 1821 to 1825—that Lamb first, to my knowledge, fell into the habit of sleeping for half-an-hour or so after dinner. These occasions exhibited his countenance in its happiest aspect; his slumbers were as tranquil as those of the healthiest infant; and the serene benignity of his features became, in those moments, as I have heard many persons remark, absolutely angelic. That was the situation for an artist to have chosen, in order to convey an adequate impression of his countenance. The portrait of him, prefixed to Serjeant Talfour's book, is far from being a good likeness; it has the air of a Venetian senator, and far more resembles Mr Hamilton Reynolds, the distinguished wit, dressed for an evening party, than Charles Lamb. The whole-length sketch is better; but the nose appears to me much exaggerated in its curve.

With respect to Lamb's personal habits, much has been said of his intemperance; and his biographer justly remarks, that a false impression prevails upon this subject. In eating, he was peculiarly temperate; and, with respect to drinking, though his own admirable wit, (as in that delightful letter to Mr Carey, where he describes himself, when confided to the care of some youthful protector, as "an old reprobate Telemachus consigned to the guidance of a wise young Mentor")—though, I say, his own admirable wit has held up too bright a torch to the illumination of his own infirmities, so that no efforts of pious friendship could now avail to disguise the truth, yet it must not be forgotten—1st, That we are not to imagine Lamb's frailty in this respect habitual or deliberate—he made many powerful resistances to temptation; 2dly, He often succeeded for long seasons in practising entire abstinence; 3dly, When he did yield to the mingled temptation of wine, social pleasure, and the expansion of his own brotherly heart, that prompted him to entire sympathy with those around him, (and it cannot be denied that, for any one man to preserve an absolute sobriety amongst a jovial company, wears too much the churlish air of playing the spy upon the privileged extravagances of festive mirth)—whenever this did happen, Lamb never, to my knowledge, passed the bounds of an agreeable elevation. He was joyous, radiant with wit and frolic, mounting with the sudden motion of a rocket into the highest heaven of outrageous fun and absurdity; then bursting into a fiery shower of puns, chasing syllables with the agility of a squirrel bounding amongst the trees, or a cat pursuing its own tail ; but, in the midst of all this stormy gaiety, he never said or did anything that could by possibility wound or annoy. The most noticeable feature in his intoxication, was the suddenness with which it ascended to its meridian. Half-a-dozen glasses of wine taken during dinner—for everybody was encouraged, by his sunshiny kindness, to ask him to take wine—these, with perhaps one or two after dinner, sufficed to complete his inebriation to the crisis of sleep ; after awaking from which, so far as I know, he seldom recommenced drinking. This sudden consummation of the effects was not, perhaps, owing to a weaker, (as Serjeant Talfourd supposes,) but rather to a more delicate and irritable system, than is generally found amongst men. The sensibility of his organization was so exquisite, that effects which travel by separate stages with most other men, in him fled along the nerves with the velocity of light. He had great merit in his frequent trials of abstinence ; for the day lost its most golden zest, when he had not the genial evening on which to fasten his anticipations. True, his mornings were physically more comfortable upon this system ; but then, unfortunately, that mode of pleasure was all reaped and exhausted in the act of enjoyment, whilst the greater pleasure of anticipation, that (as he complained himself) was wanting unavoidably, because the morning unhappily comes at the wrong end of the day ; so that you may indeed look back to it as something which you have lost, through the other hours of the day ; but you can never look forward to it as something which is coming.

It is for ever to be regretted that so many of Lamb's jests, repartees, and pointed sayings, should have perished irrecoverably ; and from their fugitive brilliancy, (which, as Serjeant Talfourd remarks, often dazzled too much to allow of the memory coolly retracing them some hours afterwards ;) it is also to be regretted that many have been improperly reported. One, for instance, which had been but half told to his biographer, was more circumstantially and more effectually related thus, in my hearing, at Professor Wilson's, by Dr Bowring, soon after the occasion. It occurred at Mr Coleridge's weekly party at Highgate. Somebody had happened to mention that letter of Dr Pocke, upon the Arabic translation of Grotius De Veritate Fidelis Christ., in which he exposes the want of authority for the trite legend of Mahomet's pigeon, and justly insists upon the necessity of expunging a fable so certain to disgust learned Mussulmans, before the books were circulated in the East. This occasioned a conversation generally, upon the Mahometan creed, theology, and morals ; in the course of which, some young man, introduced by Edward Irving, had thought fit to pronounce a splendid declamatory eulogium upon Mahomet and all his doctrines. This, as a pleasant extravagance, had amused all present. Some hours after, when the party came to separate, this philo-Mahometan missed his hat, upon which, whilst a general search for it was going on, Lamb, turning to the stranger, said—"Hat, sir!—your hat! Don't you think you came in a turban?" The fact that the hat was missing, which could not have been anticipated by Lamb, shews his readiness, and so far improves the Serjeant's version of the story.

Finally, without attempting, in this place, any elaborate analysis of Lamb's merits, (which would be no easy task,) one word or two may be said generally, about the position he is entitled to hold in our literature, and, comparatively, in European literature. His biographer thinks that Lamb had more points of resemblance to Professor Wilson, than to any other eminent person of the day. It would be presumptuous to dismiss too hastily any opinion put forward by the author of "Ion;" otherwise, I confess, that, for my own part, knowing both parties most intimately, I cannot perceive much closer resemblance than what must always be found between two men of genius ; whilst the differences seem to me radical. To notice only two points, Professor Wilson's mind is, in its movement and style of feeling, eminently diffusive—Lamb's discontinuous and abrupt. Professor Wilson's humour is broad, overwhelming, riotously opulent—Lamb's is minute, delicate, and scintillating. In one feature, though otherwise as different as possible, Lamb resembles Sir Walter Scott—viz., in the dramatic character of his mind and taste. Both of them recoiled from the high ideality of such a mind as Milton's ; both loved the mixed standards of the world as it is—the dramatic standards in which good and evil are intermingled ; in short, that class of composition in which a human character is predominant. Hence, also, in the great national movements, and the revolutionary struggles, which, in our times, have gone on in so many interesting parts of the world, neither Sir Walter Scott nor Lamb much sympathized, nor much affected to sympathize, with the aspirations after some exaltation for human nature by means of liberty, or the purification of legal codes or of religious creeds. They were content with things as they are ; and, in the dramatic interest attached to these old realities, they found sufficient gratification for all their sensibilities. In one thing, upon consideration, there does strike me, some resemblance between Lamb and Professor Wilson—viz., in the absence of affectation, and the courageous sincerity which belong to both ; and also, perhaps, as Serjeant Talfourd has remarked, in the comprehensiveness of their liberality towards all, however opposed to themselves, who have any intellectual distinctions to recommend them.

But, recurring to the question I have suggested of Lamb's general place in literature, I shall content myself with indicating my own views of that point, without, however, pausing to defend them. In the literature of every nation, we are naturally disposed to place in the highest rank those who have produced some great and colossal work—a "Paradise Lost," a "Hamlet," a "Novum Organum"—which presupposes an effort of intellect, a comprehensive grasp, and a sustaining power, for its original conception, corresponding in grandeur to that effort, different in kind, which must preside in its execution. But, after this highest class, in which the power to conceive and the power to execute are upon the same scale of grandeur, there comes a second, in which brilliant powers of execution, applied to conceptions of a very inferior range, are allowed to establish a classical rank. Every literature possesses, besides its great national gallery, a cabinet of minor pieces, not less perfect in their polish, possibly more so. In reality, the characteristic of this class is elaborate perfection—the point of inferiority is not in the finishing, but in the compass and power of the original creation, which (however exquisite in its class) moves within a smaller sphere. To this class belong, for example, “The Rape of the Lock,” that finished jewel of English literature; “The Dunciad,” (a still more exquisite gem;) “The Vicar of Wakefield,” (in its earlier part;) in German, the “Luise” of Voos; in French—what? Omitting some others that might be named, above all others, the Fables of La Fontaine. He is the pet and darling, as it were, of the French literature. Now, I affirm that Charles Lamb occupies a corresponding station in his own literature. I am not speaking (it will be observed) of kinds, but of degrees in literary merit; and Lamb I hold to be, as with respect to English literature, that which La Fontaine is with respect to French. For, though there may be little resemblance otherwise, in this they agree, that both were wayward and eccentric humorists; both confined their efforts to short flights; and both, according to the standards of their several countries, were occasionally, and, in a lower key, poets. The brutal “Tales” of La Fontaine do not merit to be considered in such an estimate; for they are simply vulgar and obscene jokes thrown into a metrical version; and are never treated, as indeed they rarely could be treated, poetically. The “Fables”* are a work of more pretension; and throughout the works of La Fontaine there is an occasional felicity in the use of conversational phrases and conversational forms. But, if any reader would wish to see the difference between an inspired writer and a merely naïf writer of unusual cleverness—if he would wish to see the magical effects that may be produced upon the simplest incidents by a truly poetic treatment—I would recommend to his notice the fable of the oak and the broom, as told by Wordsworth, with one on the same subject by La Fontaine. In the one fable, such a soul is introduced beneath the ribs of what else are lifeless symbols, that, instead of a somewhat comic effect, the reader is not surprised to find a pensive morality breathing from the whole, and a genuine pathos attained, though couched in symbolic images. But in La Fontaine we find, as usual, levity in the treatment, levity in the result, and his highest attainment lying in the naïveté or picturesque raciness of his expressions. Wordsworth, however, it will be said, is not Lamb. No; but Lamb, although upon a lower scale, has something of the same difference in point of feeling; and his impulses, like those of Wordsworth, are derived from the depths of nature, not from the surfaces of manners. We need not, indeed, wonder at the profounder feeling, and the more intense, as well as consistent originality of Lamb, when we contrast his character, disposition, life, and general demeanour, as I have here endeavoured to sketch them, with what we know of La Fontaine, viewed under the same aspects. Not only was La Fontaine a vicious and heartless man, but it may be said of him, with perfect truth, that his whole life was a lie, and a piece of hollow masquerading. By some accident, he had gained the character of an absent man; and, for the sake of sustaining this distinction, with the poor result of making sport for his circle, he committed extravagances which argue equal defect of good sense and sincere feeling in him who was the actor, and in those who accredited them. A man who could seriously affect not to recognise his own son, and to put questions about him as about a stranger, must have been thoroughly wanting in truth of character. And we may be assured, that no depth of feeling in any walk of literature or poetry ever grew upon the basis of radical affectation. The very substratum of Lamb's character, as I have said before, lay in the most intense hostility to affectation. This, however, touches the quality of their social merits; and at present I am merely concerned with the degree; having selected La Fontaine as that one amongst the French classics who best expresses by analogy the true position and relative rank which the voice of posterity will assign to Charles Lamb in the literature of his own country. His works—I again utter my conviction—will be received as amongst the most elaborately finished gems of literature; as cabinet specimens which express the utmost delicacy, purity, and tenderness of the national intellect, together with the rarest felicity of finish and expression, although it may be the province of other modes of literature to exhibit the highest models in the grander and more impassioned forms of intellectual power. Such is my own intimate conviction; and, accordingly, I reckon it amongst the rarest accidents of good fortune which have gilded my literary experience, that, although residing too often at a vast distance from the metropolis to benefit by my opportunities so much as I desired, yet, by cultivating those which fell naturally in my way at various periods, but, most of all, at that period when I may consider my judgment to have been maturest, I reaped so much delight from that intercourse, and so far improved it into a fraternal familiarity, as to warrant me in assuming the honourable distinction of having been a friend of Charles Lamb.*

* By the way, it has been made a matter of some wonder in the annals of literature, why La Fontaine was amongst the very few eminent writers of that age who did not bask in the court sunshine; and La Harpe, with many others, fancies that his “Tales” excluded him. But there is no wonder at all to those who are acquainted with his “Fables.” The ludicrous picture which he constantly presents of courts, and courtiers, and royalty—in treating many of those fables which relate to the lion, &c.—must have confounded and mortified the pompous scion of Louis XIV. more than the most audacious acts of rebellion; and could not have been compensated by the hollow formality of a few stilted dedicatory addresses.

WEDDING SLIPPERS.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

ONE of the shortest and dreariest days in January was drawing to a close. Snow had fallen some days previously, and glared upon the roofs of the houses in the picturesque and irregular old town of Belford Regis, and lay mixed with ice, and trodden into a sort of wintry dust upon the highway; snow, too, was visibly hanging in the grey and gloomy sky, waiting only for milder weather—for the hour when the soft south-west should steal upon the bleak north-east—to come down in a world of white feathery flakes, and cover the earth with its bright, level, uniform beauty. The streets, although not yet lighted, were almost deserted of carriages and passengers—except, indeed, the well-wrapt little boys and girls, tripping rapidly home from school, with cheeks almost as red as their red comforters; and the noisier and merrier troop of happy, ill-clad urchins, who came frisking and shouting from the pond at the top of the hill, the great pond opposite the Queen's head, where they had been keeping the cold at bay, by sliding and tumbling upon the ice, and pelting each other with snowballs; making, as it were, a playmate of the frost; and, excepting also careful servant-maids, wending, with cautious speed, over the slippery pavement, laden with smoking dishes from the bake-houses; or hurrying pot-boys, or slower milkmen, rattling their jingling commodities against the icy steps of the doors, or the iron railing of the areas.

In a word, it was at the close of a winter's day, that, the morning influx of customers having intermitted, the shopmen and apprentices of Mr Morris, the greatest haberdasher of Belford, had retired to warm their fingers in their own apartment—preferring the bright fire of the open grate to the smoky heat of the stove—after returning to their shelves, nicely folded up, the numerous articles taken down to gratify the fastidiousness or the caprice of lady-purchasers, (for men, to do them justice, seldom do give this sort of trouble,) leaving in the dusky range of show-rooms, rendered tenfold more gloomy by the waving draperies which darkened the windows, and swayed to and fro in the dim twilight, only two individuals—a respectable-looking elderly man, who, mounted upon a high stool, was seated at a very business-looking railed-in desk, employed in writing, by the light of a single taper, in an equally business-like, tall, thick book, bound in calfskin; and a young man, particularly well-looking and gentlemanly, whose likeness to the former sufficiently marked their relationship, and who stood at his side, pretending to be occupied in arranging a drawer of rich satin ribbons, which he was rolling and unrolling, and doing unconsciously his very best to spoil, in the eagerness of his appeal to his father's feelings.

"Yes, sir, it is but too true—and a thousand times has she urged the fact upon me—that poor Elizabeth is only a servant maid in the family of our good rector, Mr Sumner. A servant she certainly is, but a most honoured and trusted one. Mrs Sumner was so struck by her intelligence and sweetness, above a dozen years ago, amongst the girls at the Green School, that she took her home to her own house, partly to attend and partly to play with her elder children. She shared their advantages of education—not indeed the accomplishments which were unfitted for her station, but those better and rarer advantages which regard the cultivation of the mind and the formation of the character; and Mr Sumner's opinion of her has been sufficiently proved, by his having, since the death of his excellent wife, and the marriage of his eldest daughter, committed the direction of his house and of his two younger children unreservedly to her charge. A servant she is, but one accustomed to the management of a large family, to the keeping of the most exact and elaborate accounts, to the prudent and careful expenditure of money—to everything, in short, that is most desirable in a tradesman's wife. I speak now merely in a worldly point of view, and say nothing of the beauty, the sweetness, the grace, and the modesty which make her an object of admiration wherever she appears."

* Among the prominent characteristics of Lamb, I know not how it is that I have omitted to notice the peculiar emphasis and depth of his courtesy. This quality was in him a really chivalrous feeling, springing from his heart, and cherished with the sanctity of a duty. He says somewhere, in speaking of himself, under the mask of a third person, whose character he is describing, that, in passing a servant girl even at a street crossing, he used to take off his hat. Now, the spirit of Lamb's gallantry would have prompted some such expression of homage, though the customs of the country would not allow it to be literally fulfilled, for the very reason that would prompt it—viz, in order to pay respect—since the girl would, in such a case, suppose a man laughing at her. But the instinct of his heart was—to think highly of female nature, and to pay a real homage (not the hollow demonstration of outward honour, which a Frenchman calls his "homage," and which is really a mask for contempt) to the sacred idea of pure and virtuous womanhood. The one sole case I remember in which Lamb was betrayed into—not discourtesy—no, that could not be—but into a necessity of publicly professing a hostile feeling, was in the letter (now we may say celebrated letter) to Mr Southey. To this, however, he was driven, not by any hostile feeling towards Southey, but simply by a feeling too animated of sympathy with those who happened to be on questions of public interest hostile to Southey. Lamb, it must be remembered, was—that is, he called himself—a dissenter. Was he such in reality?—Not at all. So far from adopting the distinctions of his religious party, he was not even thoroughly aware of them. But with Lamb it happened, as with many another man, though careless of the distinctions which bound him to a party, still he was in profession faithful to his party, as a principle of honour. I know many men at this day, who, if left to choose a form of religion—left unfettered by old family connexions—would much prefer connecting themselves with the Church of England. But they are restrained and kept loyal to their section of dissent, not by religious considerations, but by worldly honour; the appealing look of the clergyman, resting perhaps his influence one-half upon old household recollections—upon the father whom he counselled, the grandfather he prayed with. Such look, such recollections, who could resist—who ought to resist? The only plan is this: when the old minister dies—in the interregnum—whilst as yet the new minister is not—bolt, cut and run. Lamb's situation was difficult; Southey assures us that he knew himself to be wrong; he did not. Your penitent Lamb was for the ear of Southey—he never meant it for the world.

"She has no money," replied Mr Morris, suspending for a moment his pen over the book in which he had been apparently most sedulously engaged in making various entries during his son's harangue. "She has no money."

"Then her taste and skill in female apparel. You know, sir, how often you have said that, if my poor sisters had lived, you would have added millinery and dress-making to your business, and converted some part of our large premises up stairs into show-rooms. How often I have heard you say, that one branch of trade helped the other; and that our opposite neighbour, Mr Welsh, would not be able to keep his shop open against us if it were not for his wife's caps and bonnets. Now, Elizabeth's taste, and Mr Sumner's connexion"—

"She has no money, Edward—she has no money."

"Neither had she, sir, two years ago, when, in consequence of Master Arthur's rashly venturing upon ice too weak to bear his weight, I had first the happiness of being of use to her and her young charge. Mine is no love of yesterday; no concealed or clandestine attachment. We have met openly at the institution lectures; have walked together on summer evenings. Mr Sumner, without any verbal recognition of our engagement, has yet often, after church on a Sunday, virtually sanctioned it, by smiling and significant invitations to accompany Elizabeth and the children to his house; nay, even you yourself, by your manner of speaking to her and of her, have led me to believe that you considered her as a daughter. You are too keen an observer, too kind and careful a father, not to have seen the state of my affections; and I had thought you too wise and too liberal, to set a little paltry money in competition with the happiness of a whole life, or to wish me to break my plighted troth to one whom I dearly love—to one who loves me—and marry I know not whom, for the sake of adding needless pelf to our already flourishing fortunes. I had thought your only son was dearer to you than money. But I was mistaken—you hold my honour and my happiness at no higher price than this gaud." And he threw from him in bitterness of spirit the roll of ribbon which he had been so busily folding and unfolding.

The pen dropped from the father's hand.

"You are mistaken, Edward," said he, in a low voice, which was interrupted for a moment by a sound well known to the inhabitants of Belford—the deep hoarse cry of "Shoes! old shoes!—shoes! old shoes!" from beneath the window.

"You are mistaken, my dear son, not in my feelings, but in my circumstances. The fortunes of the poor half-starved wretch who is calling 'shoes' through the wintry snow, are more flourishing than mine. Without your aid I am a bankrupt."

Another hoarse deep cry of "Shoes! old shoes!—shoes to buy! shoes to sell!—shoes! old shoes!" gave to the agitated father the pause which his feelings required. His son was too much absorbed in astonishment and horror for speech; he could only listen in silent agony to a story which seemed to him rather like a frightful dream than a stern and waking reality. Mr Morris continued:—

"You were too young when your blessed mother died, to remember her distinctly; and your poor sisters, gentle and amiable as they were, inherited rather her delicacy of constitution than her vigour of mind. Far above me in birth, in education, and in cultivation, she was yet left destitute at the age of seventeen, by the improvidence and the sudden death of her father, a dignified clergyman; and I owed the blessing of her hand chiefly to her desire to procure for her twin brother a home and a protector. Before our marriage, she made me promise to treat William Arnot as my own younger brother, as my own eldest son; to be to him as a friend, a guardian, a father; and of this most solemn promise she requested the renewal upon her death-bed. Heaven and you, my son, pardon me if I have kept it but too faithfully! Let me make short work of this wretched matter. I placed him as clerk in a banking house in the city, where, as you know, he rose to be cashier. I and another friend of my family were his securities, and all seemed fair and prosperous. Three months ago, he came to me in an agony of guilt and despair. He had been speculating in the share-market. He had embezzled a large sum belonging to the firm, and, unless it were replaced by a certain day, his liberty, his character, his life—for never, he swore, would he survive the loss of reputation—were destroyed. Could I hesitate? Even had I abandoned him to his fate, I was equally ruined, since the house would have come upon me and upon the friend who, at my pressing instance, had joined me as his bondsman, to indemnify them for their loss. The sum was, to a man in my station, enormous, exceeding, by some thousands, the earnings and savings of the five-and-twenty years that I have passed in business. The deficiency was, however, raised for me, within the stipulated time, by our friendly solicitor, Mr Byrne, who happened to have, at the moment, a client, willing to lend the money upon my personal security, and this house, with the stock and furniture. I gave him a bill of sale on all my effects; and was considering whether or not to break the matter to you, or to go on upon credit, and leave the result to time, when Mr Byrne made me, two days ago, a most unexpected overture, from the friends of a young person with a portion of £5,000, who, although informed of my difficulties, was yet willing to marry her to you, willing to pay off the debt, requiring nothing but a settlement of the rest of the money, and such an arrangement as to partnership, as I should have been, under any circumstances, but too happy to enter into. I have not seen her—I do not even know her name; but she is, they tell me, young, well-educated, and amiable—a thoroughly good and exemplary girl."

"Oh, my father, do with me as you like! But, yet, Elizabeth!—dear, dear Elizabeth!"

"You would rather, then, be poor and happy with her whom you love. So be it, my dear son. Go to your Elizabeth. See if she be willing to share your poverty; willing to wait until some prospect may arise, that should, in some sort, authorize your union. The unhappy man whose imprudence has been our ruin, spoke of one whose defalcation had ruined him, and who might, who probably would hereafter make good the sums for which he was engaged. He has repeated this expectation in a letter which I received from him last week. But that hope is too vague to build upon. See Elizabeth. Disclose to her, unreservedly, the position of affairs—I feel that, with her, the confidence will be sacred—and then act as you see good. Put me out of the question. I am still strong and healthy, and capable of earning my bread as a shopman."

"O father! never! never!" interrupted Edward, with a sharp and sudden revulsion of feeling. "Even if I were so undutiful, so unnatural, she would not consent; I knew she would not. Often and often has she said that she felt that our marriage would never take place; that it never ought to take place; that your son, the son of the most respectable tradesman in Belford, ought not to be united to a poor girl from a charity school. And, now that that union can only be accomplished by depriving you of your home, by sending you in your old age to serve as a hireling—oh, she would never hear of it—would never bear the thought!"

"Go to Elizabeth," repeated Mr Morris, in a smothered voice, pressing his son's hands between his, with an energy that betokened the struggle of his feelings—"Go and consult with your Elizabeth." And, as the shopmen and apprentices came flocking in, and the lighted gas gave a glittering brilliancy to the rich and gaily decorated shop, radiant with shawls, and silks, and ribbons, of a hundred varied hues—and a group of customers, gay country ladies, who wished to choose an evening dress by candlelight, appeared at the door—he escaped into the street, with an instinctive desire for solitude, and, almost unconsciously, took the road to St Michael's Rectory.

The lamps in the streets and shops were now burning, and shewed, with a most striking effect of light and shadow, the fantastic outline of the picturesque old town—the tops of the houses covered with snow, the icicles hanging from the eaves, and the windows already covered with icy frost-work. The pavement was again alive with passengers—men and women hurrying to the Post-Office; flies and carriages gliding, with a sort of dull, rumbling sound, along the snowy road; a stage-coach emptying itself of its freezing passengers at the Red Lion; a man with periwinkles, and a woman with hot chestnuts, each so muffled, the man in a frieze cloak, and the woman in a dreadnaught coat, that it would have puzzled an Œdipus to decide betwixt the he and the she; one little girl lingering longingly in the wake of the periwinkles; two great boys burning their fingers in a bold attempt to filch the burning chestnuts; other children rushing aimlessly along, shouting and bellowing as if to scare the cold. Men were thumping their feet upon the ground, and busfetting their chest with their arms to restore the circulation; women were chattering, dogs barking, beggars begging, fiddles scraping, bells ringing, knookers tat-tat-ing—in short, all the noises of a wintry evening, in a country town, were in full activity.

From the High Bridge, where the broad, bright river, with its double line of wharfs and houses, crowded with people, its boats and its barges, forms so gay and pretty a moving picture, so full of bustle, and colour of light and of life—from the High Bridge, the Kennett now shewed, like a mirror, reflecting on its icy surface, with a peculiarly broad and bluish shine, the arch of lamps surmounting the graceful airy bridge, and the twinkling lights that glanced, here and there, from boat, or barge, or wharf, or from some uncurtained window that overhung the river. The snow lay in drifts upon either shore, marking the long perspective, and glanced upon the suburban cottages and the distant country, edging into the gentle uplands, hardly dearriving the name of hills, that closed the prospect, strongly relieved, at the present moment, by the dark and dusky sky. In spite of his distress and preoccupied mind, poor Edward, who had, probably without knowing it, much of those two rare gifts, the poet's feeling and the painter's eye, could not help stopping a moment, on the centre of the bridge, to contemplate so fine an effect of clair-obscur, so striking and beautiful a picture, composed almost without colour, by the nice contrast of light and shade.

While he stood admiring the scene, he was overtaken by the old man whom he had heard, a short while previously, crying "Shoes! shoes!" under the window of his father's shop; and whom he had passed just before, whilst engaged in chaffering for some of his commodities with an orange-woman, whose barrow was stationed at the end of the bridge.

This itinerant shoe-marchant was, as I have said, well-known to the inhabitants of Belford by the name of Old Isaac; and, from his name, his calling, his keenness at a bargain, as well as from his quick, black eye, aquiline nose, and a greater proportion of beard than is usually sufferred to adorn a Christian countenance, was commonly reputed to be a Jew. He was a spare old man, of the middle height, somewhat stooping, but with a picturesque and richly coloured head, surmounted by an old slouched hat. His patched and faded garments were well nigh hidden by two enormous bags, in which he carried the old shoes which he bought, and the new ones, or soi-disant new—for he was a great man at a rifacimento, and had the art to “gar auld shoon look ‘maist as guid’s the new”—which he sold.

“Nothing, this evening,” said Edward.

“Have ‘em a bargain, master,” persisted the man of shoes.

“I am not in want of any,” rejoined Edward, moving on.

“Wedding shoes, then?—wedding boots? Must buy somewhat,” continued the vender, pertinaciously keeping up with our friend’s rapid steps, and thrusting before his eyes the articles which he named.

“I tell you that I want neither wedding slippers nor wedding shoes, nor any of your commodities,” answered Edward, with some humour, endeavouring to escape from his pursuer.

“Don’t ye!” exclaimed Isaac, with a knowing twinkle of his keen black eye. “Don’t ye! Well, then, buy for the want that’s to come. I’ve set my heart upon having a bit of a deal with ye to-night, and shan’t mind bating a penny or two, rather than balk my fancy. You shall have ‘em under prime cost,” continued Isaac, coaxingly; “you shall have ‘em for next to nothing. Do ye have ‘em! We must have a deal. You’ll see that you’ll be married sooner than you think for. Your time’s coming. So you may as well buy the wedding slippers at once. What do ye bid for ‘em? Make an offer.”

“Not a farthing, Jew. I am in haste. You need not untie the bag. You have nothing that I would take if you would give it me. Let me pass on. I am not going to be married. I want nothing of you.”

“Don’t be too sure of that, Master Edward Morris. You and I may come to a deal yet. Jew, quotha! No more a Jew than yourself. If your eyes were not turned another way, you might see me in the aisle of St Michael’s Church every Sunday morning and afternoon, as regular as yourself. Jew! ‘Tis an extraordinary compliment you idle folk pay to that tramping race, that, whenever you meet a body who takes care of the main chance, and turns an honest penny, you call him a Jew. Well, Master Edward, you’ll see that you’ll come to me for your wedding slippers.” And, so saying, Isaac shouldered his bag again, and left the path free.

At another moment, Edward would have smiled at the old man’s acute observation of the direction of his glances in church, and at his persevering endeavour to attract a customer, founded upon that observation; but his thoughts were too painfully divided between his father and his mistress—his duty and his love; and, during his rapid walk to St Michael’s rectory, he could only resolve to be guided in all things by the judgment and the feeling of Elizabeth.

She received her lover with the gentle self-possession, the calm and serious sweetness, which characterised her manner, and which had been partly, perhaps, the cause, partly the result of the confidence placed in her by Mr Sumner. His father had, to suit his purpose, forced himself to advert to her situation and her origin in his conversation with his son; but Edward felt proudly that there was no trace of the charity school or of the servant’s hall in the lovely woman who stood before him with a simple and unaffected propriety—in a higher rank it would have been termed dignity—that would have become a palace. His distress was immediately visible to her, and her anxious inquiries served to introduce his story.

“We must part, Edward; as to that there can be neither doubt nor question,” said she, in a low, steady voice, whilst the tears trembled on the long fringes of her large black eyes, and the rich colour went and came on the finely-turned cheeks and lips, which a sculptor would have been proud to model. “We must part. I have always known that it would be so—always felt, without suspecting or dreaming of this obstacle, that Mr Morris would find an insuperable objection to receiving me into his family. I ought, perhaps, knowing that, to have forbidden your visits. But I was encouraged in my attachment by one whom I am bound to obey, and by whose orders I have acted in this business; and my own feelings led me but too readily into the error. Oh, if it were only for ourselves, this poverty would be nothing! Young, active, accustomed to exertion, it would be delightful to labour with you and for you—delightful to feel that there was no superiority on your side, except that of your respectable connexions, and your manly and vigorous character. But your father—your kind and excellent father!—to tear him from his home, to send him in his old age to serve as an hireling—he, so long accustomed to respect and consideration!—to banish him from his friends, his neighbours, his native town! We must not think of it. The sacrifice must be made. And you will find your happiness, dear Edward—we shall find our happiness—in his restored comfort, and in the consciousness of having done our duty.”

Affectionate son as Edward was, and determined as he had professed himself to abide by the decision of his mistress, he could not forbear from combating this resolution. She listened to him with sweet and mournful attention, as if willing to hear all that he had to say; but her determination was unshaken. She had just asked—

“Since we must part, dearest Edward, were it not wiser to shorten this pain?” when an odd-looking little note was delivered to her.

Elizabeth read the contents once, twice, thrice, and remained silent and perplexed, as if hardly comprehending the meaning.

"It is very strange!" exclaimed she, thinking aloud, and forgetting that she was not alone; "very strange! What can he want at this hour?"

"He!" exclaimed Edward, jealous (so strange a thing is a lover's heart) of her whom he was upon the very point of resigning. "He!—what he? From whom comes that note?"

"From one who must be apprised of this event."

"Not, surely, from Mr Sumner? No; from him it cannot be. But from whom? Who can have the power so to absorb your attention at such a moment?"

Elizabeth paused an instant, and then said, gently—"Come with me, and you shall know. Although we are doomed to part, to meet no more, you must always be amongst the most valued, the most cherished of my friends. I cannot afford to lose your good opinion. Come with me, and you shall know all."

She tied on her bonnet, wrapped herself in a large cloak, and they passed through the rectory garden into the churchyard. The fine old Gothic building, with its grey cloisters, its graceful porch, its towers, and its steeple, rose in sombre grandeur from the graveyard, covered with snow, by which it was surrounded, the summit almost lost in the frosty mists of the air; so that the imagination added to the actual height, gave a cathedral-like grandeur to the edifice. A few yews and cypresses were clustered in one corner, and a row of stately limes, their larger limbs partially covered with snow, which lay in long intersecting lines, defining the forms of the branches, led to an iron gate, which opened into a narrow lane, leading to one of the poorest and least populous suburbs of the town. Along this lane, Elizabeth passed, sedulously attended by Edward.

"I ought to have told you before," said she, in a low voice—"only he whom it most concerns forbade the disclosure, and Mr Sumner, I hardly know why, coincided in his desire—that, although a charity girl, I am not, as you have thought, an orphan. I have a father, a most fond and affectionate father, one whom I love dearly, and who dearly loves me. He is a poor but industrious man, following a mean occupation; not so poor but that he makes me frequent presents, and is most kind and generous to the widow in whose cottage he lives, and whom he mainly supports. Still, I have always felt that he was not fit to be your father, nor to be connected so closely with a man so intelligent, so well-educated, and so respectable in station as Mr Morris. I always felt that something would prevent our union. And so, alas! it has turned out."

By this time the clouds had so far cleared away as to admit glimpses of a keen and frosty moon, which shed a cold, pale, desolate light upon every object; dwelling with tenfold desolation on a small hovel, whose rugged thatch and windows stuffed with rags, as well as the broken-down state of the little gate, (ajar perforce, since, hanging by one hinge, it would neither shut nor open,) which led into the narrow front court, betokened the most sordid poverty.

Up this court Elizabeth passed; and, knocking, with, as it seemed, a forced resolution, at a low door, in little better condition than the gate which formed the outer barricade, was immediately admitted by an infirm old woman into a dark and dismal kitchen.

"I look for your father every minute, Miss Betsy," quoth the tottering crone, "for 'tis past his time o' coming in; and, if ye'll wait till I strike a light, ye may walk into his room, and I'll kindle ye a bit o' fire; for you tender lassies, that live in grand houses, can't bear the cold like us poor folk that be used to nothing better."

And, so saying, she fumbled out an old tinder-box, and having, with some difficulty, cherished a spark into a flame—for her old and withered hands, and feeble breath, seemed numbed and chilled by the cold which she defied so manfully—she lighted a wretched candle, led the way into the next apartment—and endeavoured, with a little damp straw, and a few dirty chips, that had evidently been long trodden under foot in some carpenter's yard, to produce, in a small rusty grate, from which the brickwork was breaking away, something as nearly approaching to a blaze as the state of the fireplace and the nature of the fuel would allow.

Edward, in the meanwhile, took a mournful survey of the sordid abode, contrasting so strongly with the appearance, the mind, and the manners of the lovely and graceful woman who stood beside him, the beloved of his heart. The hearth and its appointments—the bit of old iron that served as a poker, the broken dustpan that officiated as shovel, the pipkin upon two legs, and the lipless pint cup which did duty as kettle, pot, and saucepan—this niggard and beggarly hearth was but a type of the rugged and scanty plenishing of the comfortless chamber. A joint stool, a rickety table, and two tumble-down chairs, one of them garnished with a cushion, darned, patched, and mended, until mending was no longer possible, figured in the centre of the uneven, bricked floor; over the chimney, was a mug without a handle, a teapot curtailed of its fair proportions by the loss of half a spout, a teacup and saucer of different patterns, and two or three plates and basins, all more or less cracked, and repaired, not very artistically, with putty and white paint. In one corner was the inmate's humble bed—a chaff mattress, with one or two rugs or horse-clothes, much the worse for wear; in another, the little pile of straw, and chips, and rotten sticks, from whence the fuel now smoking rather than burning in the chimney had been selected; and, in a third, a dingy heap of old shoes.

The old woman, satisfied with her labour, retired to her part of the dwelling. Elizabeth was the first to break the pause which succeeded her departure.

"This, Edward, is the abode of my father—of a father whom, in spite of all that surrounds us, I have good cause to love. Does not the sight of such misery serve to reconcile you to the destiny that parts us? Such, at least, is the effect which it ought to have—which it has on me. I am not fit to belong to your family. Never should I have cherished such a thought. Strange that Mr Sumner, knowing as he did the whole truth, should have encouraged our attachment! Strange, most strange, that, till now, the name and the existence of my father should have remained a secret! Well! my presumption is fitly punished, and you will turn with a freer heart to one more worthy to share your home and possess your affections."

"Say not so, my own Elizabeth! Were it not for my paramount duty to my own most kind and excellent father, all that I see here would but supply a fresh motive for our union. All speaks of poverty and industry—nothing of crime. And, next to the joy of offering you a comfortable home, should I reckon that of rescuing one so near and dear to you from penury and toil. Oh! that I were now the free agent that I thought myself yesterday! Not another night should your father spend beneath this roof. If my wretched uncle, Arnott, could but know the misery that his wild spirit of speculation has brought upon us all!"

"If he could, Master Edward, I am minded that he'd rather cry old shoes than gamble in the share market," quoth our friend Isaac, advancing into the room; depositing, with considerable care, his two bags of shoes in their appropriate corner, and emptying, with equal readiness, divers rotten sticks, fir apples, and stumps of gorse, gathered during his day's travel—for apparently he had wended countryward—from the several pockets of his nondescript garments. "If these Stock-Exchange gamblers could but tell the sore hearts they cause to their friends and kindred, mayhap it might go nigh to reform 'em," pursued Isaac. "So here you be, Master Edward, come to make a deal, as I prophesied; and ye ha' brought Bess wi' ye, to clinch the bargain. So much the better. Gie me a kiss, Bess. So thou be'st come to help Master Edward to choose his wedding slippers—eh, my girl?" And the old man nodded his head, with a knowing wink, and chuckled—"Come to choose the wedding slippers!"

"Alas, my dear father, you little know"—began Elizabeth.

"Alack and alack, wench! No alacks for me. I do know all the story; ay, and a great deal besides, that neither of you know, wise as ye think yourselves. Come, my good boy and girl, sit ye down here by the fire. Bess looks as white as the snow on the house-top; and thou, Master Edward, art not much better. Sit down, and make yourselves comfortable. I'll tell you all about it." And the old shoe-merchant drew his two chairs to either side of his little fire, seated himself upon a stool in the middle, flung on fresh fuel, breaking the sticks with his withered hands, and did the honours of his small apartment with much hospitality. "Well, Master Morris, for all I cry old shoes about the streets, and my Bess (heaven bless her sweet face!) was brought up at a charity school, it ain't altogether for want of a bit of money. Many a year have I been scraping and scraping, and hoarding and hoarding, to save her a portion; and I told her and Mr Sumner not to let out that she had a father, just for the pleasure of the surprise like. So, in the meantime, comes this affair of Master Arnott. Ay, better cry old shoes than go gambling in shares. So I happened to have the money, waiting for a good security—nothing like turning an honest penny—just when Master Byrne was wanting it for your father. So I lets him have it. Here's the paper, see—the what-d'ye-call't?—the bill of sale. And I offered him my girl, with £5000 to her portion; not letting out who she was. And here I've just got a letter from him to Master Pyrne, saying as how 'twill break your heart to marry her; not thinking, mind, that she's she. And I s'pose as how you are come to say that you won't have her, 'cause o' your father—eh? So she's refused o' both hands—eh, Bess? Well! I love a good father, and I love a good son; he'll be sure to make a good husband. And, if Bess don't make thee a good wife, my lad, there's no faith in woman. So take her!—and take this bit o' paper; that's four thousand pounds: and there's one thousand that I promised," continued he, going to one of his corner heaps, and taking a couple of dirty bank-notes out of an old shoe; "and another that I give, 'cause of these two refusals. A good father makes a good son, and a good son 'll make a good husband. And I've heard to-day, from a real Jew, who knows a good deal of what goes on in 'Change, that Master Arnott is likely to get his money back again. So now off wi' ye to Master Morris, and tell him the news. And, hark ye, my boy, don't forget to come back for the Wedding Slippers!"

WOMAN'S LOVE.

How blest is he for whom the sigh
Of gentle woman oft is breathed!—
On whom is fix'd her wistful eye—
Around whose heart her hopes are wreathed!
Oh, priceless is her tender love!
'Tis th' only drop to mankind given,
From the bright bowl that's fill'd above,
From which they drink of bliss in Heaven!

But not for all does woman's heart
Yield up the feeling there implanted—
Alas! 'tis oft the bitter part
Of him to whom it ne'er is granted,
To prize it most. Thus are the fairest
And richest gems always the rarest!

PROGRESS OF POLITICAL CORRUPTION.—NO. III.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S CIVIL LIST — THE KENT ANNUITY — REVENUES OF THE DUCHIES OF CORNWALL AND LANCASTER—THE PENSION COMMITTEE.

"WHAT are three thousand livres to the King?" said the ladies of the court to M. Necker. "Ah!" replied the financier—"they are the taxation of a village."* "What is a royal expenditure of half-a-million," Mr Spring Rice, Sir R. Peel, or my Lord Stanley, may exclaim, "to this opulent and flourishing community?" Please you, Messieurs, it is the produce of last year's duties on newspapers and advertisements, which impeded the circulation of useful information to all classes of the people; it is more than the produce of all the taxes levied on corn, on cheese, on butter, skins, and hides, by which the price of bread and shoes has been enhanced to every consumer. Call you this nothing, gentlemen? It is a great deal to be improvidently granted by a Reformed Parliament, and for which every member ought to be called to strict account by his constituents. The value of money is relative—it has reference to its abundance—a penny to a beggar is more than a sovereign to a lord. If taxation touched only the superfluities, not the necessities of life—if it scotched only the rich—such trifles might pass unheeded; but, so long as the nation is told, in solemn phrase, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that his wants are so urgent that he cannot take his hands off the loaf of the poor man, the comforts of the middle-class man, nor the reasonable enjoyments of the wealthy, we say that the guardians of the public purse are wholly indefensible in wasting a shilling on the glare and trappings of royalty.

This is the pounds-and-pence view of the matter; the constitutional one is more important.

Lavish grants to the crown are lavish grants to the ministers. They may use them patriotically, or—and the temptation lies that way—they may pervert them to the fostering of pernicious power. There is, perhaps, little direct gross corruption in the state; but we are not entirely removed from danger. We are a commercial people: we have a commercial press—a commercial bar—a commercial House of Commons—a commercial, and, as respects many of them, a needy peerage. Place at our disposal a batch of over-paid places, a good round sum for pensions, a string of coronets and baronetcies, of garters and ribbons, and rods, and wands, and gold sticks, and we will undertake to give a hoist, in any direction that an epicurean Walpole or despotic Bute could desire, to the public policy of the empire. It is not the amount of the bribe, or the cost it entails on the community, that is of the greatest moment; it is the irresponsible hands in which it is placed, and the sinister uses to which it may be applied, in bolstering up the interests of the few, at the expense of the many, which renders it dangerous to the general weal.

"Keep your salaries low," said Jeremy Bentham to Mr Rush, the American minister. If you make the pay disproportionate to the service, you hold out baits for imbecility; you create a host of deputy-employés; you aggregate in the public administration all the fribbles—the Sir Charles Esays, Hon. Tom Shuffletons, and Lord Foppingtons of society—ephemera, who may be harmless in their places, but who ought never to be seen in the public offices, who work infinite mischief there, by negligence and incompetence, and are daily infringing Judge Ellenborough's libel law, by bringing into the "disesteem and contempt" of the Queen's lieges, her Majesty's government.

These precautions may be useful hereafter; at present, we fear, they will pass unheeded. Reform has evidently retrograded—the race now is backwards. Never more shall we say, except in bitter irony, "Reformed Parliament"—call it the trading, confiding, hoping, or collusive parliament. Members have got their leases signed, as they fondly think, for seven years, or as long as may gratify personal ambition or cupidity; and they, nearly one and all, snap their fingers at their landlords.

Our hope was to terminate the "Progress of Political Corruption" with the Georges; but the first month of Queen Victoria's first Parliament afforded ample materials for a supplementary chapter. The situation of the country is notorious: a hopeless debt hanging over us; profits and wages unusually low; and the poor—God's portion—reduced to that minimum of food, in quantity and quality, which, after an official trial, has been found indispensable to the support of life. Under these circumstances, what was the duty of the national representatives?—what did justice to the public creditor, and justice to their constituents, require? Most assuredly, a watchful and unsparing economy. Let us see how this obligation has been redeemed by the settlement of the Civil List.

George III. had his debts paid eight times. He had, like his predecessors since the Revolution, a Civil List granted him at the commencement of his reign, which the House of Commons deemed adequate to his wants; but his expenditure constantly exceeded his income, till at length Ministers, becoming ashamed of repeated applications to Parliament, determined, in 1804, to give him an allowance, formed on the basis of his highest expenditure during antecedent years. This arrangement subsisted till the Regency Government; when, the Prince of Wales being still more expensive than his father, the Civil List again fell enormously in arrears. At this time, Lord Castlereagh was Minister. His Lordship was no great economist, and readily followed the notable precedent of 1804, for averting future embarrassments in the royal household. In his Civil List Regulation Bill of 1816, he adopted, as the basis of his plan, the maximum expenditure of the first four years of the Regency. It was on this extravagant scale of estimate that the Civil List of George IV. continued through the whole of his reign. On his accession, the Civil List Act was passed, as Mr Creevy remarked at the time, with the entire approbation of "all parties;" that is, all parties concurred in making a permanent addition to the King's income, of a quarter of a million above that enjoyed by his predecessor.

On the accession of William IV., there was a shifting of weights, a transfer of charges from one fund to another, and reduction in the classes of payment; but no saving to the public. The allowances for the privy-purse and the royal household were the same as those for George IV. And it is on the same wasteful scale that a Reformed Parliament—without inquiry, without the examination of a single witness, or the calling for a single paper—has settled the Civil List of Queen Victoria. It is not formed on the basis of the somewhat lavish expenditure of the latter years of George III., who had a large family to support, and who was paid in a depreciated currency, but on the still more lavish scale of expense of the four first years of the Regency.

A word may be here premised of the principle on which these Civil List arrangements are concluded. They are considered a bargain with the sovereign—a contract entered into at the beginning of every reign, by which Parliament undertakes to pay a certain yearly sum, during the King's life, for his personal maintenance and dignity. But it is a bargain binding only on one side; therefore it is, in law and reason, no bargain at all. If the sum granted by Parliament is sufficient, the arrangement continues; if it exceeds the royal expenditure, the King pockets the surplus; if it falls short, Parliament makes up the deficiency. This was the practice during the long reign of George III. Parliament granted him a fixed allowance; but this being inadequate, they made it up by new grants. These applications becoming unpopular, it was determined to ascertain the utmost amount of money the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, and the Master of the Robes could possibly spend; and up to this amount the Civil List was augmented. The same course was adopted under the Regency. The Prince of Wales experimented for about three years. Having found the maximum of his disbursements in entertainments to the Allied Sovereigns, in Carleton House fêtes, and other outgoings, at this amount his income was fixed. The royal income having been stretched to the utmost limit of profusion, during the national intoxication of the battle of Waterloo, by the most voluptuous monarch that ever sat on the throne, it was, in homely phrase, nailed there—it was continued for his life and that of his successor, and now forms the basis of the Whig arrangement for the Queen, proving the verity of Lord Melbourne's remark on the non-niggardliness of Parliaments, whether reformed or boroughmongering.

The following comparative statement shews, at one view, the equality of the Parliamentary allowances for the three sovereigns, without regard to differences in the value of money, their habits, or personal circumstance; one being a maiden Queen, George IV. a noted rake, and William IV. a family man of wide ramifications.

	George IV.	William IV.	Victoria.

So much for the FIRST ACT of the first Parliament under the new reign. It is a job of the first magnitude, perpetrated in the most approved fashion of the school of Castlereagh, Canning, and Nicholas Vansittart; in which seminary the Chancellor of the Exchequer took early lessons of Parliamentary finesse. A Select Committee was appointed to "inquire into the income and expenditure of the Civil List, and its probable future charge." From this it might have been inferred that a general inquest would have been instituted into the past and future expense of this department of the public service. No such thing; the object was not to inquire, but to screen inquiry, to give the semblance of popular sanction to all the extravagant items that had been previously concocted in the recesses of the Treasury. That this was the scope of its functions, may be hence inferred. First, the committee was named by the Hon. Thomas Spring Rice himself, whose accounts and estimates were to be inquired into and tested. Secondly, the composition of the committee was such as to defeat its ostensible purpose: consisting, first, of Tories, who are bound by their principles to support regal profusion as well as prerogatives; secondly, of ministerial officials or expectants, whose discretion was fettered by their hopes, or the tenure of their offices; and, thirdly, of a small guidable minority of well-meaning persons, who seem to have been placed there to give a colourable appearance of impartiality to its proceedings. Though a committee of inquiry, it was precluded from all means of investigation; no power to send for papers, or to examine witnesses; all the work previously prepared, ready cut and dry, before the committee met or existed. "Here, gentlemen, are the accounts—take them or none; you are my judges, appointed by myself, and I am your chairman; I am the person on trial, and the only witness you will be allowed to examine. Be quick, gentlemen, in making up your minds; for this precious Civil List must be passed before the recess, that John Bull may pass it, and forget it with his Christmas cheer.

Go, expedite your proceedings. Here is one more document—the judgment or report you ought to agree to; sign it, and the business is done.” Exeunt omnes.

Thus, the order of the performances—and nothing better was ever done by Mr Yates or Mr Matthews—was as follows:—

Mr Spring Rice’s Civil List was to be tried.
Mr Spring Rice named a committee to try it.
Mr Spring Rice was chairman, while
Mr Spring Rice was being tried.

Mr Spring Rice selected all the evidence against himself.

Mr Spring Rice was the only witness against himself.

Mr Spring Rice drew up the report or judgment against himself.

Mr Spring Rice laid the judgment on the table of the House of Commons.

And, lastly, Mr Spring Rice made the longest speeches, as was natural, in defence of that judgment.

As a suitable tailpiece, Mr Hume proposed, in the committee room, to insert, at the end of the report, the following words:—“As the Committee have not had sufficient details before them to enable them to judge either as to the number of officers and servants in the departments of the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, and the Master of the Horse, or as to the tradesmen’s bills in those several departments, the Committee do not consider themselves called upon to offer any opinion as to the adequacy of the details of the estimate.” Question put, and negatived.

By whom was the amendment negatived? Who were present? It is possible the Honourable Member for Kilkenny was alone when he proposed his resolution, or had the benefit of the solitary and casting vote of Mr Chairman Rice. This would have only been an appropriate finish, and we incline to think such was the fact, as we remark, in the Appendix to the Report, that, in all the previous divisions, the names of the members who divided are given, but not in this.

Strange as the proceedings of the Civil List Committee may appear, there were men of worth and intelligence upon it; men whom the country is accustomed to confide in for useful sense, watchfulness, and perspicacity. Sir R. Peel and Mr Goulburn were following their wonted vocation; but how could Messrs Grote, Hawes, Strutt, George Evans, and Lord Ebrington lend themselves to such a hacknied delusion?—how could they continue to sit on a Committee of Inquiry, without the means of inquiry, without any detailed information to throw light on the lavish estimates which the Chancellor of the Exchequer called upon them to sanction? Could they know, without interrogating the parties themselves, whether the following were really necessary to the comfort and dignity of the sovereign; or mere sinecurists, that might be dismissed to more appropriate scenes, in Drury Lane or Bartholomew Fair:—

Lord Chamberlain,	£2,000
Vice-Chamberlain,	4

8 Lords in Waiting,	£5,616
8 Grooms in Waiting,	2,685
First Lady of the Bedchamber,	500
7 Ladies,	3,500
8 Maids of Honour,	2,400
8 Bedchamber Women,	2,400
Corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms,	5,129
Corps of Yeoman of the Guard,	7,100
Order of the Garter,	502
Order of the Bath,	419
Kings and Herald at Arms,	355
Sergeants-at-Arms and officers of Ceremonies,	1,556
The Lord Steward,	2,000

Master of the Household,	1,158
Master of the Horse,	2,500
Chief Equerry and Clerk Marshall,	1,000
4 Equerries,	3,000
4 Pages of Honour,	460
Secretary, Clerks of Stables in London, at Windsor and Brighton,	1,500

Or could they know the reasonableness of the following royal disbursements—

Modellers and Floor-Chalkers,	£137
Card Makers,	118
Washing,	3,014
Whips,	46
Chimney Sweepers,	150
Tailors,	25
Hatters,	14

Fruit and Confectionery,	1,741
Washing Table Linen,	3,150
Liqueurs, &c.	2,811
Board Wages to the Yeomen of the Guard,	2,230

There might be lavishness or stinginess in some of these items; but whether one or the other, the Committee knew nothing, save from the elucidatory glosses of Mr Chairman Rice.

Act II. of the new Parliament was the additional grant to the Duchesses of Kent. Grasping meanness excites more indignation than open wickedness; and whoever recommended the application was no wise friend of her Royal Highness, however well their “tongues may be attuned to courtly strains.” Was it worth while to peril the popularity of the young Queen before her coronation, and that of her mother, for a paltry £8000 a-year. Repeated fleecings have made the people very sore. It is the everlasting lusting after money, that has done more to damage royalty and aristocracy in Europe than their detestable wars. As to this particular case, never was one brought forward on more fragile grounds. It is weaker even than that of the late Duke of York, who received £10,000 a-year from the Tories, for officiating as custos to his afflicted parent.

Leaving this offensiveness, let us turn to the extraordinary proceedings in respect of the Duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall. This is an interesting subject ; it is historically curious, as connected with an ancient branch of the Crown revenues, and instructive, from the mode it has been dealt with, of the animus and competence of our middle-class representatives. As little seems to be known of the Duchies, we shall endeavour to give them a satisfactory elucidation.

The Parliamentary allowance for a Civil List has been always held forth, as an equivalent given to the sovereign for the surrender of the hereditary revenues or ancient patrimony of the Crown, whether arising from real or personal estate. This was the understanding, and the actual practice, at the Revolution of 1688. In the Civil List, introduced by the 9th and 10th of William III., the revenues of the Duchies were surrendered with the other branches of the hereditary revenues, and so continued on every new accession, till that of George III. In this reign, the small branches of the hereditary revenues first began not to be surrendered ; they were reserved for the King's private use—another anomaly, introduced on the establishment of a privy purse. This was quite an exotic, and never heard of till the time of the “good old King.” At first the sum set aside for the privy purse was £48,000 a-year ; but the King's family increasing, it was augmented to £60,000. Precisely the same sum has been set apart for our maiden Queen, by the economical Whigs. To what uses the privy purse is applied, can only be matter of conjecture. In the Civil List, every item of royal disbursement is provided for ; sums are voted for the household expenses ; for tradesmen's bills ; for the royal wardrobe ; for the master of the horse ; for salaries, pensions, and gratuities : there is no imaginable want of any kind, whether to eat, drink, wear, or give away, for which there is not a provision. For what end then can be this modern device of a privy purse ? In the case of George III., it was most likely the suggestion of some courtier, to gratify the monarch's avarice, or to enable him always to have a little loose money about him, to give to his children. In the case of Victoria, the royal pocket-money, however, can have no such destination. William IV. had his privy purse of £60,000, and no doubt many ways of using it ; as well as that of his consort, of £50,000. In this reign, the uses of the privy purse were extended ; it became a kind of dust-hole, into which was swept all redundancies, whether accruing from the duchy revenues, or from savings in the royal stables, household, kitchen, or pantry. “From the latter source alone, £22,731 accrued to the late King, and was paid into his privy purse.”—Civil List Report, App. p. 11.

Returning from this digression, we may remark, that the surrender of the hereditary revenues, about which there is always a flourish of trumpets on every new accession, has been, for the last three reigns, little more than a delusion—not to say fraud—on the nation. Sir R.

Inglis has intimated his intention to move for a return of the produce of the hereditary revenues for the last seventy years. Let him do so, and also of their application. He will find that, while nearly one hundred millions have been paid for the use of the royal family, little—very little indeed—has been paid out of the Crown revenues for the use of the public. The Admiralty droits have been the chief source of the hereditary income. They yield much during war—little or nothing during peace. How have they been appropriated ? Nominally, they formed part of the purchase-money of the Civil List allowance ; but, for the most part, they have been expended in the payment of royal debts and arrears, of furniture bills for the palaces, expenses of the King's journeys to Hanover and Scotland, and of the Princesses to Weymouth ; and in additional grants, beyond their Parliamentary allowances, to the younger branches of the Royal Family. It was the same with escheat and intestate property : hardly any found its way into the Treasury ; it was intercepted for decorating Brighton Pavilion, or other royal gewgaws. With these hints, we advise Sir R. Inglis to pursue his researches. Like many Tories, he has, we suspect, read only one side of the history of the Georges : let him turn to the other and more trust-worthy sources of intelligence. He will there find that this bubble-bargain of the Civil List settlement has been an imposition on the community—that the life-annuity has been granted to the Sovereign, on condition of receiving an equivalent, but that the equivalent has been shamefully withheld, or misapplied, by servile and trading ministers.

As to this Whig job of the Lancaster and Cornwall revenues, it is gross, palpable, and without extenuation. At the commencement of the reign of William IV., Lord Althorp distinctly stated, they were to be surrendered with the rest of the Crown revenues. Lord Brougham held the same language. Finding, however, the King wished to retain them, for reasons well known, these noble Lords altered their tone, and took shelter under some legal subterfuges. But now every obstacle is removed ; there is neither Prince of Wales nor illegitimate issue. “The Queen's Governors,” as the honourable M.P. for Leeds termed them, are truly independent. They are, if British ministers ever were, strictly responsible ; and let them mind what they are about. Lord John Russell told the House of Commons, that the revenues would be put under an improved system of management, and the accounts be annually laid before them. Is this all ? Are we to be simply allowed to look at the papers, not touch the cash ? For whose benefit will the improved management be, if we are not to share in the increased produce ? It can never be meant to sweep the entire into the dust-hole ? Ah ! my Lord, these tricks are bad policy ; they are foolish as well as mischievous. They might pass in boroughmongering times, but not when there are so many free pens and tongues to proclaim their “whereabout.” Digitized by Google

It is a ludicrous incident, that the wise gentlemen of the Civil List Committee actually made their report, assigning the Queen an income of £385,000, without once adverting to the Duchy revenues, whether they were to continue to form an addition, or be abstracted from the royal allowance. So completely do they appear to have been bewildered by some paltry savings, jangled in their ears by their adroit chairman, that they entirely overlooked a cool £100,000, lying directly in their pathway. It is possible some of them may have forgotten, or been unconscious of its existence; if so, it is proper they should, without delay, be made acquainted with the origin, amount, and tenure of these appanages of royalty; for we are quite sure, if Mr Rice has another Civil List to concoct, he will be very desirous to secure their reappointment, they managed his business so spaniel-like. Here, then, is a short unravelment of a story as old as Windsor Castle, and not less interesting.

John Plantagenet—styled of Gaunt*—married Blanch, sole heiress of Henry Plantagenet, Duke of Lancaster, and, by virtue of that marriage, succeeded to his vast possessions. He received a summons to Parliament, as Duke of Lancaster, Earl of Derby, Richmond, Lincoln, and Leicester. Lancaster became a county palatine, having a Treasury, Court of Chancery, and other royal franchises, which continue to this day. On the death of John of Gaunt, his eldest son, Henry, surnamed Bolingbroke, ascended the throne as Henry IV. He was well aware that he held the Duchy of Lancaster by a better title than the Crown, and he, therefore, held the title and revenues of the Duchy separate from his royal rights; but Edward IV., on his accession, annexed, by statute, the honours and revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster to the Crown; and, in the first year of Henry VII., it also was enacted, by statute, that all the lands of the Duchy of Lancaster, which had, during the wars, been alienated from that inheritance, should be reinvested in the King and his heirs. Henry VIII. greatly impaired the revenues; but, in the reign of Philip and Mary, the Duchy possessions were restored to their former extent by act of Parliament; which act, with those of Edward IV. and Henry VII., "must be considered," as Mr Wells remarks, "as completely establishing the doctrine of a resumption of grants by the Crown and Parliament." They also completely establish the futility of those intimations thrown out in the late debates, that the Duchy is private property of the Crown, with which Parliament has no right to meddle, and under shelter of which Mr Speaker Abercromby, with more zeal than learning, put an abrupt extinguisher on Mr Harvey's motion.

The county of Lancaster is not co-extensive with the duchy, which has estates in many other counties. About the year 1888, the following account was taken of the fees belonging to the duchy:—

Chancellor,	£288	18	4
Attorney,	68	5	4
Auditor for the North Parts,	68	13	4
Ditto for the South Parts,	68	13	4

Besides perquisites. The sum of all the payments to the officers amounted, in 1888, to £641 : 3 : 4.

The woods, forests, chases, and parks of the duchy, extended into thirteen counties. In Yorkshire, there were twelve parks, besides forests; in Staffordshire, seven parks; in Lancaster, four; in Leicester, five; in Essex, four; in Wiltshire, two, exclusive of Alberne chase; in Hampshire, two, and the chase of Holt; in Hertford, three; in Sussex, four, and the forest of Ashdown; in Chester, one; in Derbyshire, there were High Peak Forest, and six parks, one called Melbure Park, now corrupted into Melbourne Park.

It will naturally be asked, what has become of all those chases, forests, parks, and woods, forming part of the ancient landed possessions of the crown? Why, they must be sought in those vast caverns of plunder—the rent-rolls of the peerage. If the alienated domains of her Majesty were resumed, as appears to have been frequent formerly, there would, at the current price of land, be a fund amply sufficient to defray the charges of civil government, without stamps, customs, or excise duties.

In the year 1888, the whole revenues of the Duchy were estimated at £14,000 per annum. As the estates are let on fines, it is likely the rents reserved have been kept at the same amount. There are, however, valuable resources in the Duchy courts, whose emoluments arise from fees and perquisites. That of Chancellor has been retained at £4000 a-year, exclusive of patronage. It is now held by Lord Holland, and, in capacity of which, his Lordship is a Cabinet Minister. It was once held by the celebrated Dunning; and is a top always thrown to some one whose influence or aid the Minister of the day thinks worth securing.

Next, as to the Duchy of Cornwall, whose estates and rights were anciently very extensive. They were originally the possessions of the earls of that county; but, the earldom reverting to Edward III., he erected it into a dukedom, in favour of his son, (afterwards the Black Prince,) whom he invested with all the estates, tolls, and profits, which had formerly been enjoyed by the Earls. This grant was subsequently confirmed by Parliament; and the title and estates were settled in such a manner as that they should, in future, be enjoyed by every eldest son of the reigning king, and, in default of such son, should revert to the crown, to be held no longer than till the birth of an eldest son. Under this act, it has continued down to its last possessor, the Prince Regent, afterwards George IV.; it is now held in abeyance by the Crown, which receives its revenues. The charter is very peculiar, limiting the succession to the eldest son of the King. George II. was never Duke of Cornwall; nor was George III., because his father, the Prince of Wales, never became King of England. If Queen Victoria were to marry, and have a son, he never could become Duke of Cornwall. The original settlement of King Edward was, most likely, intended as a provision for the education and maintenance of the infant prince. If so, and this is Sir C. Lemon's opinion, there can be no distinction between it and the Civil List, which is granted for the support of the royal household. It could never have been intended that these revenues should accumulate during the minority of the Prince of Wales; and then, on his coming of age, be placed at his discretion. What better mode could be devised for making the prince a spend-thrift, than by placing at his uncontrolled disposal, £800,000 or £700,000, which it is probable the revenues would amount to, at their present value, by the time he attained his majority?

* Wells "Revenue and Expenditure of the United Kingdom." P. 290.

Mr Fox, Mr Burke, and other statesmen, always repudiated the idea of the Duchy revenues being the King's private property. They considered them part of the Civil List, which ought not to be transferred to swell the private resources of the Crown. Everything held by the present family, in right of the kingly office, is held by a parliamentary title. This was settled at the Revolution of 1688. The Plantagenets, or Tudors, might derive from prescription or inheritance; but the House of Brunswick derives from the bounty of the Lords and Commons, who called in William the Deliverer. It is monstrous inconsistency in a Whig Attorney-General, Whig Secretary of State, or Whig Speaker of the House of Commons, ever to have broached a contrary doctrine. But, if this argument does not settle the legal competence of Parliament to deal with the Cornwall revenue, we will add another, which seems quite conclusive.

The Duchy is settled by royal charter, confirmed by act of Parliament. Have royal charters always been held inviolate, even in recent times? Who swept away the municipal charters of England and Scotland, and now meditate a like reformation in Ireland? Verily, Lord John, Right Honourable James, and Honourable Sir John, Baron of Straddlealley, that is to be—you do strain at gnats and swallow camels in a wonderful manner.

The stake is too great to be left the prey of Ministerial jobbing. The present revenues of the Duke of Cornwall are supposed to amount to £30,000; but, with proper management, Mr Wells conjectures that they might be made to produce £90,000. The chief sources of this income are—first, the coinage duty, which is payable to the Duke, as lord of the stannaries, upon all white tin coined; second, the profits of manors, lands, and other property still attached to the Duchy; third, the profits of mines and mineral rights on the Duchy estates; fourth, fines, wrecks, estreats, &c. The first is the chief source of income, and consists of four shillings levied upon every hundred weight of white tin brought to be coined. Efforts are being made to get rid of this impost. It sometimes prevents the working of mines, thereby lessening employment, and is levied inconveniently, without adding to its produce. The coinage days are too few, and the miners are obliged to cast their tin in a particular shape, whatever the purpose for which it is wanted. The effect of these regulations is to make the pressure of the duty of four shillings on the smelter, equivalent to one of six shillings. But the consumer, in this, as in similar cases, pays all; for the smelters do not fail to represent the disadvantages under which they labour, to the government; and the duty on the import of foreign tin is kept high, to prevent competition. Thus remunerative prices are secured; and the aristocracy of the miners, like the aristocracy of the surface lords, is kept up by the monopoly of the home market.

The estates of the Duchy of Cornwall extend into the counties of Devon, Somerset, Wilts, Surrey, and to London, and yield a large revenue. Alienations have taken place to a great extent; but it is said that, in every case, the right to minerals is reserved. The lax administration of public property is mostly such, that encroachments are always going on, and vast quantities of land have been enclosed, and made private property, which, of right, belonged to the duchy. Lord Brougham related an instance, this session, of a man who had an estate which, in fifty years, had stretched, not by any natural means, but by some fraudulent proceedings, from forty-five acres to one hundred. When the worthy tenant was asked how it happened that an estate, containing originally but forty-five acres, could have, in so short period, grown into one hundred acres of good arable land, he replied that his grandfather had been exceedingly industrious, and was very good at hedging by candlelight! Lord de Dunstanville and Lewis Charles Dubuzerg, two of the chief bound-owners, and Mr Borlase, the steward of the stannaries, might be able to throw some, if not quite disinterested light on these dark operations.

Enormous fines have been taken for renewals of leases on putting in new lives. Between 1809 and 1813, no less a sum than £129,000 was received for fines alone, exclusive of all other sources of revenue. That valuable piece of ground on which the approaches to Waterloo Bridge were built, called the Prince's Meadow, paid a fine of £53,000. A part of Plymouth Harbour, called Sutton Pool, was let to the corporation, on a fine of £12,000; and, after 1841, a rent of £1000. The remaining fines, £62,000, received during five years, were obtained, not for renewals of long leases of ninety-nine years, but on lives which may drop in two or three years. As it is mining property, the value of which may be greatly improved by the application of capital and improved machinery, the fines may be raised from £62,000 to £90,000 or £100,000. There is an estate in the neighbourhood of London, and on which we happen to be writing—the Kennington estate—for which a fine of £100,000 was asked, but refused to be paid, within the last ten years. It was assessed by the valuation of the surveyor at that sum. But, though £100,000 was objected to, the party may be willing to pay £80,000 or £90,000; and which, in the course of a few months, (if they have not already done so,) her Majesty's Ministers may advise to be taken.

Here, then, is a round sum of near £200,000 upon the point of flowing into the Queen's Privy Purse, in addition to the £60,000 a-year set apart for that purpose. Surely the amount of these funds ought to have been investigated before the settlement of the Civil List. A life-annuity, exceeding that granted to the luxurious George IV., ought not to have been voted without first ascertaining the other sources of royal income. This, however, has been done. Without inquiry into the duchy revenues—without waiting for the report of the committee on pensions—the Civil List Act was hurried through Parliament before Christmas, with an indecent precipitancy and ignorance of its bearings never exceeded in the rampant times of Toryism; and the country saddled with the payment of £385,000 a-year during the sovereign's life—perhaps for the next fifty or sixty years to come.

Not only an easement of the Civil List might have been effected, but an important one in the internal administration of the empire, by bringing the duchies—the “two jewels of the crown,” as they used to be called—under Parliamentary control. In these, as well as in the counties palatine, there is kept up a parade of useless offices and courts sufficient for the government of a kingdom. There are courts of chancery, ecclesiastical courts, privy-councillors, registrars, auditors, cursitors, prothonotaries, and all the other mimicry of regal government. Monarchy is degraded by being clothed with petty jurisdictions: in some parts of her dominions, the Queen is trustee and receiver for the Prince of Wales, en possee; in others, she is Marquis of the Isle of Ely, (in late editions of the Peerage this part of the royal nomenclature has been dropped;) farther north, she is Duke of Lancaster, Count Palatine, or dwindles into the humble Earl of Chester. Some of the courts kept up are the most ancient, and, in virtue of their antiquity, the most rotten in the kingdom. The Stannary Court of Cornwall is an instance. It exists by immemorial custom, and was instituted for deciding disputes between miners, without the delay and expense of a journey to Westminster. A jury tries, and the Lord Warden, or his steward, or his deputy, presides. But the whole constitution is vile. The steward and the vice-warden are interested in the decision of the most important questions that come before them; and “justice,” as Mr Wells observes, “and the interests of the Crown and the People, require that the court should be altogether remodelled, or entirely abolished.” There is a right of appeal, from the decisions of the court, to the Lord Warden, who is the Marquis of Hertford, and who, for many years, has resided in Italy or in France, save a hurried trip to England, for the purpose of giving his annual fête champêtre, in Regent's Park, to the London fashionables; so that there is no possibility of bringing an appeal before him. The only appeal which has been lately made has been now nearly fourteen years without a decision.

Chancellor, receivers-general, and all the chief offices, are sinecures in which most of the revenues of both duchies are absorbed. A brother of Lord Dorset was, and we believe still is, assayer-master for tin in Cornwall, who never even visited the principality—the sinecure of his infancy, manhood, and maturity. The letting of the lands opens boundless scope for jobbing and favouritism. The officers of the Cornwall duchy are said to possess no map, ancient or modern, of the estates of the duchy. Hence that constant hedging by candle-light before alluded to, and which, ere long, must swallow up the entire property. Many very productive mines are already, to use the phrase of the county, “out of duchy,” while those which produce little are allowed to remain in it. The most valuable leases are not unusually obtained by the officers, or their relatives and connexions. The copper mines, which are the most valuable, were let on lease for thirty-one years, at a rent of £40, on the payment of a fine of £12,000. The lease was granted to the father-in-law of the Surveyor-General, and some officers of the duchy, as is supposed, upon a report of the Surveyor-General. The magnitude of this job may be estimated from the opinion which prevails in the county, among those who have the best means of judging, that, from one mine alone, the lessees received, as their profit, and this without any expense or trouble on their part, £20,000 a-year for seven years; and this, probably, did not constitute, at the time, a third of their gains. In our own locality, the manor of Kennington, we had an instance, within the last two years, of the influence constantly at work in the management of this sort of property. A gentleman, whose lease was nearly run out, sought a renewal; and, as tenant in possession, and according to usage, he had an undoubted claim to pre-emption. But our minister coveted Naboth's vineyard. He sought a mansion and grounds more eligible than his own. At first he tried to prevail upon the tenant to surrender his priority; but not succeeding, Lord Bexley, the church-building commissioner, was set to work at Somerset House; and the consequence was, that, when Mr Proctor applied for a renewal, he found, to his astonishment, that the lease had been granted over his head to his own orthodox pastor, and reverend Master of Arts.

Lord Althorp told the country that the Government had ceased to depend on patronage. How has this principle been worked out? What a field for reform is the Lancaster and Cornwall snuggeries! Absurdities of judicial administration and government—nests of sinecures—jobbing, foul and rapacious—why have they not all been swept away, and the pledge honestly redeemed, that was given on the accession of William IV.? What are they retained for, but this alleged repudiated patronage—patronage the most dangerous—baits for M.P.'s, in profitable leases, and offices of large emolument and no labour. This is the worst sign of the times. Ministers seek to strengthen themselves, not by the equity of their measures, but by the sophisms, evasions, and even pecuniary pabulum of their Tory predecessors.

The Parliamentary doings before Christmas have made the Royal Family, not the most expensive in Europe—for that it has always been—but that ever existed in England. Here are the items of charge. It will be seen that, whatever may be the advantages of the young Queen's reign, economy will not be of the number :—

NO. LIV.—VOL. V.

This is the "tottle of the whole" at present: our maiden Queen and family cost the nation £1,138,060 per annum. What may be impending in the distance, no man can tell. A trifle of a quarter of a million, or so, will most likely be called for by and by, for the coronation pageant. Next, probably, a marriage settlement of £100,000 per annum for another Prince George of Denmark. These swallowed, a little Royal Highness may be forthcoming. However, we shall stop; we are not of the class who meet troubles halfway. One observation may be made on these royal mutations—namely, that every change in the personal conditions of these great people, whether it be a marriage, a christening, or a burial, entails a blessing on the People, for which they ought to be truly thankful. In the first case, there is a grant for an outfit; in the second, a grant for maintenance and education; in the third and last, the expenses of interment to discharge, and a provision to be made for the family and servants of the deceased. Sovereigns are happily relieved from the cares and obligations of their lieges: they live rent-free, tax-free, and rate-free; and, if they travel, they pay no turnpikes.

Amidst these trials, is one consolation—the COURT PENSION LIST has been referred to a Committee of Inquiry. This is a popular triumph, but a triumph accompanied with serious drawbacks: first, that very dexterous master of arts, the Hon. Thomas Spring Rice, who acquitted himself so nimbly of his task before the holidays, is, as a matter of Parliamentary usage, the chairman of the committee; secondly, the gentlemen on the committee are mostly those who did their business so supinely, not to say collusively, on the Civil List committee; thirdly, Mr Harvey, whose question it peculiarly was, and who ought to have directed the inquiry, has been altogether excluded from an investigation which his eloquent and persevering appeals originated, on the ground that he had published in a newspaper, pending its sittings, the proceedings of the committee, last session, on the Poor-Law Act. This publication of evidence is the very thing the public is looking for; and it does seem strange that Whig ministers should be the first to object to any measure on the score of publicity. But this paper has already extended to considerable length, and, as there is still a hope that, by hook or crook, the crippled proceedings of the impending committee, mutilated of its right hand by the shameful trickery which has excluded Mr Harvey, will be made known, we defer farther observations on court pensions until we have the substance of the Report. If it turn out, as intended, a mere piece of jugglery, we shall not be surprised, as, to say truth, we expect no better.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM'S PATENT.—In a note to the editor, the Earl of Leitrim denies our statement regarding the sinecure which, at page 704 of our December number, he is said to have enjoyed. We regret the mistake, as we should have been happy, were it only for the rarity of such occurrences, to have announced that his Lordship, on coming to the title, had handsomely renounced his life-interest in the patent held by his father and elder brother. His Lordship never was searcher, packer, and gauger-in-chief in Dublin. In 1828, the new Earl of Leinster set an example to noble patentees and sinecurists, which we should rejoice to see Parliament compel the Schombergs, Ellenboroughs, Graftons, &c. &c. &c. to follow; if they, and many more, will not voluntarily "go and do likewise." After all, what are the few thousands a-year, disbursed among the few superannuated dowagers and spinsters of quality whom their noble and chivalrous relations throw upon the public alms, compared with the enormous hereditary pensions granted to our immortal Schombergs, Marlboroughs, and Wellingtons, who are sure, unlike other people, to have a line of descendants to which there is no end?

ADVICE TO CANADA.

BY AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

If Britain's just and peaceful reign
Be turn'd to cries of woe and pain,
Cries of her offspring tyrant-gored,
And Britain answer with a sword—
On! Canadians, on!

If Britain, then, the proud and free,
Who vaunts her far-famed liberty,
Stretch forth no parent hand to save,
But make her free-born child a slave—
On! Canadians, on!

If that child's rights be trampled down
By minions of a glittering crown;
If foul corruption walk abroad,
And rear her filthy head unawed—
On! Canadians, on!

If, Canada, thy gallant sons,
Who calmly look on British guns,
View the warm blood that fills their veins,
Converted into Britain's stains—
Canada! then, on!

If blood of which thou'rt justly proud
Still, still for vengeance cry aloud;
If genius, wit, and worth be lost,
And Britain answer for the cost—
Canada! then, on!

If courtly speech in specious guise,
And smooth, affected sympathies,
Be tendered with assurance rare,
For strict redress—for granted prayer—
Canada! then, on!

Think! liberty's thy right by birth;
Thy spacious tract of fertile earth
Was given entire at first to thee,
The wild, the lonely, and the free—
Think, Canada! the Free!

Thy giant forests heave above;
Beneath, their roaring tenants rove;
Canadian pine, by force upturned,
May laugh the British oak to scorn,
And Canada be free.

But, should a noble mind, well fraught
With precepts liberty hath taught,
Hold out redress—then, list! oh, list!
No longer, Canada, persist!
Pause, Canadians, pause!

If he a snow-white banner rears,
On which a fair young face appears,
Canadians, then, keep watch and ward;
Canadians, swear that flag to guard—
Swear, Canadians, swear!

LOVE RULES ALONE.

In boyhood's bright, untroubled days,
When body, mind, and heart were free,
And doubt ne'er came to dim the gaze
Into the soul's futurity,
I dream'd of Love, but knew him not;
I pictur'd to myself the boy,
For whom through many a scene I sought,
Led in the search by Hope and Joy.

As wild enthusiasts waste the hours
In seeking for the fabled Stone,
Possess'd, they say, of wondrous pow'rs,
Which soon they trust to call their own—
So sought I what I deem'd could give
Of Heaven's bliss a foretaste strong;
And make it ecstasy to live,
For aye, the things of earth among!

I search'd, and long the search was vain;
But I was doom'd at length to find
What I had sigh'd for oft—and then
A change was wrought within my mind:
I met thee, and the arrow sped—
I felt it quiver in my heart—
'Twas aim'd by Love, who, aiming, said,
"I come—let Peace and Joy depart!"

But, kindling, Joy refus'd to go—
Though Peace the tyrant's words obeyed;
Till Hope deserted, when the glow
Of Joy decreas'd, till Joy was dead!
Hope, Peace, and Joy have vanish'd now—
O'er this chang'd heart Love rules alone,
And, as beneath his yoke I bow,
I weep, and wish that he were gone!

ABEL O'HARA'S (OF THE O'HARA FAMILY) OWN TRIP TO DONNYBROOK;
IN A LETTER TO MR BARNES O'HARA, GRAY'S INN, LONDON.

MY DEAR BARNES,—'Tis some time since you issued against me your dictatorial fiat to go to Donnybrook Fair, and send you a careful sketch of the true "humours" of that classic ground. Your absence from Ireland, you said, made you long for a faithful copy—even though a matter-of-fact one—of the manners of a Dublin multitude upon a day of licensed festivity; and you added that the allusions to old Donnybrook in Anglo-Irish slang songs, gave you little or no idea of what such a scene ought to be. Besides, you wanted my painstaking report to contrast it with your own fresh observations of Greenwich Fair, whither you had been; that so you might keep up your notions of the differences of character existing between the people of England and Ireland, or rather of London and Dublin, on similar occasions.

Well, little hoping to satisfy your fastidious expectations, I went to Donnybrook last summer. But, first, I am in a Dublin street. "The whole an' sole humours o' Donnybrook fair"—Paddy Flaherty in his glory—"all goin' for one penny o' money!" I saw displayed to my view, a half sheet of coarse paper, on which were a series of flaming portraits, representing "Paddy" as was described—that is, first, in the act of making love; second, in the act of drinking alcohol; third, in the act of frolicking through a dance; fourth, in the act of fighting. Beneath each faithful portrait, appeared a metrical descendant on the merits of the hero in his different situations; and I observed that, in every change of character, he was attended by two inseparable companions—namely, his shillelah and his sweet-heart. While declaring his sentiments to the fair one, too much after the ardent fashion of poor Burns' songs, (for which the bard has lately been so severely criticised,) Pat's weapon was clutched in his disengaged hand, while he pressed her to "kiss the cup;" in the next picture, it was tucked under his arm; in the next, while he danced with her, it was flourished over his head; and, lastly, the oaken sapling was stoutly fulfilling its proper destiny in defence of its equally faithful mate, against some wight who had said that "black was the white of her eye."

This, then, was one of the days of Donnybrook Fair. I stood in about the centre of Grafton Street, and presently perceived that I was already on the way to it. Crowds of people, all in a hurry, tended in one direction. Carriages were more frequent; and "cars"—those peculiarly Irish vehicles—whirled past me in quick succession. I gained the entrance to Stephen's Green; and here the indications of the day became fully manifest.

A body of mounted police were stationed at this point, endeavouring to preserve order and to prevent accidents, by expostulation, by threat, and per force, throughout a scene which tasked their exertions to the utmost. In fact, although

I was still in Dublin, and some miles distant from Donnybrook, here Donnybrook Fair began, or its "humours," at least; and from Stephen's Green, along the road to the real ground of festivity, I am, therefore, bound to conduct you.

Hundreds of cars rolled backward and forward; some taking up, some setting down loads, and the drivers of all shouting out their claims for payment, or their solicitations for "fares," with an energy of lungs that mastered the rattle and clang of their vehicles, and the trampling of their horses.

The car-driver, his beast, and his machine, must be unique to all who have not visited Ireland. Dust of his own creation is the atmosphere in which he lives and exists. It seems to strengthen his lungs and clear his voice; and through the cloud of atoms which almost hides him from the view of others, his invigorated eye full keenly darts upon an expected customer. Standing up in his seat—his loose, outside garment in tatters, his battered hat covered with the dust of months, perhaps of years, and his face also encrusted with a mask of the same material—he glares fitfully around upon all comers. His whip is flourished over his head, and his parched and puddled lips are in endless motion to shape the words of vociferous yet sycophantic entreaty with which he hopes to fill his car. Human energy never excelled the variety of his gesticulations or the ardour of his address; and, amid a crowd of equally zealous competitors, the utmost he can do must never be called too much, considering his responsibility;—for his business does not consist merely in guiding his beast through the perils of a thronged road; he has to provide "full fare," upon a busy day like this, previous to starting—that is, to load his rickety machine with six human beings, three at a side, fat or lean, as they happen to come and clamber up—'tis nothing to him, nor, he avers, to his horse, however they may distress each other. Nay, the horse himself—the poor, jaded, shaggy, soiled, puffing horse—keeps his master's promise, while he exhibits, in many respects, his master's characteristics. At every moment of rest, indeed, he pokes down his head, and seems drooping into nonentity; but the instant his services are required, he starts into strength and energy, as if suddenly endowed with a wild recklessness, and with a power of motion little expected from his recent appearance. Even the vehicle he is attached to does wonders not to be hoped for at a glance. As clumsy and imperfect in construction, and as seemingly fragile in material, as it is shabby in general expression, yet it bears a burthen, and endures a ceaseless whirl, that would shake piecemeal the most tastefully-built and highly-ornamented phaeton.

"Whoo! whoo!" shouted a driver, upon whom I had fixed my eye, as I entered Stephen's Green,

"room for three!—room for three!—an' jest startin', by the whip in my hand!"

A respectable person got up at the empty side of his car; he moved forward a few paces, stopped suddenly, and—"Room for two! room for two!" he bawled, jumping from the seat to the shaft, and there standing upright, perfect master of his position.

Another "fare" seemed likely to be secured: he increased his vociferation, bent forward towards the invited object, and pointed his whip to the spaces he wished to have filled. I ascended.

"On with you, now!" urged his passengers.

"Ha! then, it's I that will! Now for running a-head! Paudheen, my jewel!" addressing his horse, "to the road wid you!"

And he cracked, cracked his whip, and shook his old reins, as if he would have flown. But his sixth seat was still vacant; and all this false promise ended in his allowing Paudheen to plunge a few yards forward, and then making him stand still again, while he looked before him and behind him, and over each shoulder, calling out—"Jest room for one!" and took not the least notice of the expostulations of the newly-disappointed "fares" he had already made sure of. A person caught his fiery glance some distance behind him. In a twinkling, he wheeled his horse's head from the Donnybrook road.

"Hollo! where are you going?"

He answered not; but whirled us onward—or rather backward—with a rapidity that prevented escape, steering his course amid scores of other cars, which rivalled his own in zeal and exertion. He reached the individual of whom he was in chase. The man had just taken his seat in another vehicle, fully freighted by his being added to the former number; and Jem's fuming passengers saw themselves distanced by a public conveyance, which, long ago, they had left behind them quite empty. They again raised their voices against his conduct.

"Well, then! now for id, in arnest!" he answered, at last turning his car with a magical celerity, and causing it to describe a circle incredibly and fearfully small. And again our horse's head was pointed in the proper direction, as if really bent upon his journey. To a renewed halt, however, he did come, and "Room for one! just one! Straight a-head! Step up, ladies! jump up, sir! On for id in no time!" he continued.

We became nearly as vociferous as he was himself, in our angry reprehensions; but to little purpose. Again, ay, and again, he banded us about, and to and fro, through the dangerous scene of contention, involving us amid the whirling mazes of his rivals, where wheel jarred against wheel, and shaft against shaft, with seemingly a total indifference to our limbs and lives, and yet with a skill and an ease which always escaped, by a hair's breadth space, from crash and injury. "Room jest for the one!" still he shouted, as a competitor at his side cried out, "Room for two!" Jem eyed the solitary passenger who was doomed to wait for two new comers, before he could hope to start, upon the rival car. The footboard of his own vehicle, at the side which required but a sixth person to complete his load, touched that of the other—"Here, sir!" he said, stooping down to whisper—"here's only one awantin'! Step over to me, an' you're on your road!" His chariot was filled; and, with mad shouts of earnest and real intent, he dashed forward, grinning over his shoulder, at the negligent man who had been cheated of his passenger, but who, nevertheless, took the matter in good part, as a tolerated prank, either of the craft or of the day.

Two hundred cars, at the least, plied their trade, which in a single instance I have endeavoured to exemplify, along one side of Stephen's Green; two hundred horses puffed, and trotted, and plunged, in every direction; the wheels of as many vehicles rattled; and the drivers of as many bawled, coaxed, gesticulated, and cracked their whips. And, with a fleet of about forty of that number, all fully freighted, I was now hurried on towards Donnybrook, with a velocity which more than once caused me to stoop forward, and ascertain if we were still really drawn by the same poor beast whose drooping neck and closing eye had appealed to my tenderest mercies and sympathies, when I first was guilty of the sin of adding my slight weight to the burden he now made so little of.

Once on the road, I found myself engaged in a scene of fresh excitement, and, to me, of great novelty. Among the drivers of the forty cars which left the Green together—carrying their two hundred and forty men, women, and children, boys and lads, of various ranks in society—there was a strife for precedence, arising out of the thirst of gain. The sooner any one of them could reach his destined point, the sooner he could return; and proportioned to the number of his visits to Donnybrook, during the day, would be, of course, his profits. And, stimulated by this reflection, every whip cracked, every charioteer shouted to his suddenly-inspired steed; and many passengers shouted, too, as they distanced their rivals, egotistically regarding the fleetness of their poor hack, as an honourable achievement in themselves. We overtook other vehicles which had started before us, or others, before which we had started, overtook us; full as many came against us, returning to town, as accompanied us, or preceded us, or followed us on our course; hackney coaches, private cars, gigs, and buggies, bearing the more wealthy of the city folk, and private carriages, in numbers, also filled the road—the elegance and finish of some of the latter, the beauty of their horses and their trappings, and the gaudy liveries of the coachmen and footmen, strangely contrasting with the dinginess and rudeness of our hired conveyances, with the wretched plight of our over-wrought steeds, and with the tattered costume of their be-dusted conductors. Equestrians of every grade further swelled the throng, from the flaming dandy and his prancing charger, down to the sober-faced cob of the citizen and the broken-kneed hack of the attorney's clerk; and the footpaths at either hand swarmed with trotting or ambling pedestrians, who could not or would not expend threepence for a ride to the fair.

The peculiar Irish tumult of this moving crowd baffles description. In the breasts and upon the faces of every creature that composed it, was an admission that humour was the business of the day, and that provocations for its indulgence were to be seized in whatever form they might present themselves; and this feeling set the spirits of every whirling or trotting votary agog, until, amid the general rush, and roll, and clatter, laugh encountered laugh, as car whirled by car; some clever remark or repartee, or else some practical joke, supplying cause for the sounds of hilarity, and the merriment still swelling, as we drove along, out of the very consciousness of all that they were engaged in a most fantastic tumult.

The vicinity of Dublin, through which the rout at first made way, had been watered, so that I could see what was passing about me unblinded by dust. But I had yet to encounter a new characteristic of the hurly-burly which had me in its vortex. At the termination of the provident distance to which the watering-cart was limited by city law, arose a cloud of pulverized stones and thrice-dried puddle, so dense that no eyes, save those of Jem and his gifted brethren, could penetrate its mystery; and cars and carriages, horses and men, as they plunged into its womb, were instantly lost to view. For my own part, I could not now see two yards of the way I was going, nor of the way I had come. Before me, and behind me, indeed, the extraordinary uproar, strangely intermixed with laughter, was still to be heard, like some of the invisible notes and screamings in Weber's celebrated opera; but, until the freighted cars drove by me from the fair, or until some of those in my rear came alongside the vehicle in which I had staked my life, each suddenly appearing within the length of my stick, I could not tell what was happening, or going to happen. And as our charioteers abated nothing of their speed, it seemed impossible but that cars, carriages, and horsemen, must have encountered at every step; but I found my apprehensions on this head groundless. Whether we were still steered by eye or ear—and I confess I know not which, in this crisis—the wheels and footboards of cars only rubbed against each other, grating or jarring quite harmlessly; or, if the sudden vision of a large vehicle, bursting out of the cloud of dust, appeared just ready to bear us down, and add us to that same cloud, it was avoided, or it avoided us, in a manner as miraculous as it seemed providential—and still we approached Donnybrook. I forgot to say that, before I left Stephen's Green, I had passed from one side of my car to the other. My present right hand neighbour, in consequence of this movement, was a man rather advanced in life, and, as I judged by his appearance, a comfortable mechanic. There was no modern stiffness in his neckcloth, and it puffed out, immediately below his chin, into a goodly rosette. His new hat was defended from the dust by a handkerchief, and a woman's shawl saved his decent black coat from injury. He wore the now exploded smallclothes, of strong kersymere, confined below his knees with buckles, and his legs were furnished with white cotton hose; altogether he belonged, in his class, to the old school.

The owner of the shawl which was spread over his shoulders, sat at his right elbow; a burly-shaped orderly dame, attired in the same style—making allowance for sex—as was her husband. At the opposite side of the vehicle, their backs to our backs, were a daughter and a son of the old couple; and in its centre—a little space, technically called “the well,” and on most occasions used for stowing away light baggage in, like the hold of a ship—two other sons, of about eight and ten, stood up.

At his starting, it was visibly my companion's impression that it was almost impossible he could complete his journey without broken limbs, and he appeared continually on the alert to save himself and family from the dangers by which they were encompassed; and yet this state of apprehension was checkered by an enjoyment of the enthusiasm and bustle of the surrounding scene, and by an anticipation of the more vivid pleasures awaiting him at Donnybrook itself. Meantime, in common with us all, he held his hand pressed close to his mouth, to prevent the ingress of the dust, and, when he spoke, only partially raised it to allow vent to his words.

“I'm tould, Margaret,” he said, addressing his wife, “that ould Donnybrook was never in greater glory than the year that's in id—and,” glancing round him, “this looks like id, surely”—and, again pressing its defence against his mouth, he nodded to every side. I could not catch Margaret's answer, as she spoke into his ear through her handkerchief.

“We'll shew the childer the whole ins an' outs of id, plaise God, Margaret.” And he quickly closed the opening again. Margaret assented by nodding her head.

“Many a frolicksome spree,* Margaret, did I see out in my young days—Good Lord! we're destroyed! up wid your legs, Margaret, or they'll rune us!”

This sudden break in his discourse was occasioned by the appearance of a crowded car, coming in the direction opposite to our course, which, as it seemed to him, must inevitably carry away his lower extremities; and there was example as well as precept in his exhortation to his wife; for, with exceeding agility, grasping the part of the vehicle against which his back rested, he flung himself backward on his loins, so as to present the soles of his shoes to the zenith. The object of his fears whisked harmlessly by; but, at the instant of its opposition to our car, advantage was taken of his tempting position, and he received a smart blow from a ratan, the surprise and pain of which quickly restored him to his sitting posture ; while shouts of laughter and clapping of hands continued to peal from the momentarily-seen opponents, long after they were out of sight.

"You are a parcel of rascals," shouted the insulted senior. "Pthru ! pthru ! I'm choked !" he sputtered, again covering his mouth ; and Margaret sputtered just as furiously, declaring that "her throat was full of id, for a dust."

"But it's all fair on the road to Donnybrook," resumed my neighbour, suddenly addressing me—his hand before his mouth, however: "I don't know, but I think I'd glory myself in getting a slap at a passer-by. Keep out, there ! keep out, there !"—jumping up in his seat, and pulling his wife's knees towards him, as a second car came so close that we all saved our toes, at least, with some difficulty. "I declare, now, a woman, ay, or a man either, isn't sure o' their legs a moment—see here again !" A fresh necessity for avoidance occurred ; and he called out to his daughter, at the opposite side—"Peggy, take a good care o' yourself, child, or you'll get broken bones !"

"I'm doing so, father," she answered ; but, in the same breath, screamed out in her shrillest key.

"Oh, what's the matter ?" asked the terrified father.

"Take care of your own self, or you're runed for ever !" exclaimed the wife, dragging her husband to her, while he was yet engaged, half-stretched across the car, in making inquiries concerning the cause of alarm at its opposite side.

And thus passed his time during the short journey to Donnybrook, now jumping up in his seat, and securing his wife from danger ; now crying out, "Take care o' yourself, Peggy ;" and anon jerking round to ascertain the nature of the peril from which Margaret would save himself. But he was a merry old fellow ; and, as soon as habit made his nerves familiar with the accidents which had at first so much shaken them, he began to take great delight in the unusual alertness acquired by twisting and springing out of harm's way, and he would perform his jump up with an affected drollery, and, as he turned his wife's knees along with him, cry out, "Waare toes, Peggy !" at which the whole family laughed merrily, as well as at the similar capers practised by people in the car flying past them, who dreaded as much the tearing away of their own members, by our footboard, as we could dread a like injury from theirs,

"Blood alive ! hand me that, sir !" he said of a sudden, snatching my walking stick from me ; and, quite as suddenly, as a new car-load drove past us, to Dublin, he applied it, with no light hand, to an individual of the unknown party, who happened to be exactly in the same position in which he had been when he received the blow from the ratan. And his shout was triumphant, and "Ha, ha ! take that, my shaver, whoever you are ! Ha ! ha ! Now, I b'lieve, Margaret, I'm out of of the other lad's debt !" And he and she laughed till the tears came into their eyes, and their throats filled with dust.

We reached the point outside the village of Donnybrook, where we were to descend from our car. A second squadron of horse police were here stationed, having more duty to perform than their comrades in Stephen's Green ; for, along with keeping every one and every thing in great order, they were bound to prevent the advance, beyond a certain line, of all vehicles in the service of the public : so, while private carriages, gigs, and so forth, poured onward, with their favoured freights, we, of the numbered and registered cars of Dublin city, were compelled to dismount, and thenceforward become pedestrians.

Amid a wild crowd of passengers who arrived with us, or just before us, or just after us, at the temporary barrier, Margaret, her husband, their children, and myself, stood wedged together. The good woman, so soon as we got down, set about dusting the long-cherished coat of her spouse, while he smoothed the fur of his new hat with the handkerchief that had covered it ; and then he elevated his head, and stood still before her, that she might insert her finger into the large knot of his cravat, and sufficiently crimp it into fresh order. This done, she, in turn, submitted her person to the inspection of her husband, and from his skill in what followed, I judged it was not the first occasion upon which he had played maid and mirror, at once, to his Margaret ; for he pulled her bonnet straight, rolled one or two of her half-grey curls over his finger, and secured several pins in different parts of her attire, with a dexterity which nothing but long practice could have conferred. His daughter, Peggy, and her grown brother, interchanged similar good offices ; the two little boys who had been drawn up out of the "well" of the car, were whiaked all over by them and by their parents, in an instant. I came in for unasked attentions of the same kind ; and at length all was ready : we saluted each other, and they started forward, determined to be merry, and I remained a short time where I was, to look around me.

Stephen's Green was the abode of peace and quietness, compared to the din at the barrier. Car after car arrived each half minute, all heavily laden. Others started back to town ; and the cries of the drivers, collecting their money, or advertising for new passengers, and the roaring of the police, while their horses clattered among the *mote*s of vehicles and people, and the chatter, chatter of everybody—while laughter arose above the whole riot, and distant strains of music now began to be heard—it was, English reader, a scene which you must witness in order to comprehend. The partial description already attempted begins to overpower you, I fear, with notions of rude pushing and scrambling, and scolding, and preparations for an Irish row, if not actual fighting ; but you mistake. True, there was no plodding forward to the forms of festivity, with faces of decent composure, and glances of caution ; and 'tis admitted that every creature was in a hurry to gain the "thick of the fun," and give full vent to long indulged anticipations : 'tis also conceded, that, at the first observation of your ears and eyes, you might well fancy yourself—inexperienced as you are—involved in an uproar which threatened your limbs, if not your life ; and yet, after a little more remark and patience, you would recognise nothing in all this but the downright joyousness of your brother Paddy's character. The high tones around you, and swelling in the air above you, would prove to be those of happy excitement, rather than of wrath and battle ; and, if the frequent laugh did not of itself convince you, the expression on the host of faces, and the good-humoured and not ill-mannered forbearance from selfish annoyance of his neighbour, often shown by the worst-clad candidate for the humours of Donnybrook, must soon have done so. Ten to one but you would feel your own heart enjoying the rant, after sufficient initiation. Nay, had old Care himself crept shivering among us, his step must have grown brisk ; his dim eye must have caught a spark of the universal happiness ; his bilious cheek must have flushed ; he must have forgotten—forsworn his identity.

Still, during my short pause at the barrier, I noticed some instances of passing affliction. Decent families, however select they might wish to be, did not often succeed in securing, in Stephen's Green, fit companions for the road. For example, a party consisted of four persons—husband, wife, and two grown daughters. Three occupied one side of a car. The fourth sat alone when she first mounted at its opposite side. Before starting, a mustached dandy, attracted, perhaps, by her handsome features, bounded up at her right hand, and—horrid to relate!—a hideous sweep secured the place at her left ; and, with a grin, most probably, at his ill-assorted load, off drove the charioteer. Along the road, Mustache was inclined to make too free, by half ; the offended girl, clad all in maiden white, had no resource but to move as far as possible away from him : the party landed at the barrier ; and deeply did I share in her evident sorrow and mortification, when, after descending to join her father, mother, and sister, she found nearly a fac-simile of her sooty companion impressed upon that side of her muslin which was next to her heart.

"Hould the child, Mickie !" said a woman to her husband at my elbow ; and Mickie, stretching out his arms, received a baby of a few months old, and began to dandle it so expertly that I concluded he had been somewhat used to nursing. The mother must have staid at home with the infant had she left it at home ; but, rather than that she should lose the pleasures of the fair, Mickie and she agreed to bear the little creature, alternately, through every peril.—"What am I about, at all, in this place !" she continued, stopping herself in the act of unpinning the bosom of her gown ; "an' what'll the poor child do for id, at all !" And there was evident upon her brow a conscientious regret that, fair or no fair, she had not remained in her quiet house to attend to the mother's duties.

"We may just as well turn our backs upon Donnybrook, Nelly," said a young mechanic, also addressing his wedded partner, a pretty girl.

"What ails you, Tom?" she inquired, in alarm, as Tom's blank face told a fearful tale. But, without answering her, he darted forward with great speed, after a car just starting back to town, and, along with which, and with a score of other vehicles and a crowd of other people, Tom quickly disappeared in an all-engulfing fog of dust, as if he had been whirled into chaos.

"I wondher what's the matther wid him. Oh, what ails him at all, I wondher !" wailed the young woman.

He reappeared, like a vision, from the cloud, and came up to her, still wearing a woful face.

"Every farthin' is gone, Nelly—the little purse and all," said Tom, in the slow words of disappointment. "I thought to overtake the car we came on ; but I missed id among the crowd." Her look became as blank as his own.

"Whisht ! stop !" he resumed, snatching off his hat, and, while his eyes danced, and while he jumped up in rapture, Tom shook the purse out on the road—"I have id ! I have id afther all ! Oh, then, aint I a fool o' the deevle to say I lost id ! Come along, Nelly !"

He flung his arm round her, and, before he hurried her off, his young wife, with tears in her eyes and smiles on her lips, modestly put up her pretty mouth to offer him a kiss of congratulation, which, not conscious of being observed, or not caring whether he was or no, the ecstatic Tom did not refuse ; and then they hurried away, arm in arm, to the real bustle and joy of the fair.

"'Twere a pity, Tom, had you lost your little purse," said I.

Almost immediately, I followed the happy pair. The little village of Donnybrook—still not the centre of attraction—lay before me, its streets crammed with people, and apparently holding out no promise of even standing-room to the fresh crowd along with whom I now made way. We entered it, however. Every house in the hamlet, no matter what had been its previous character, was transformed into a house of banqueting. Every door of every house was flung wide open, front and rear, to receive all comers. Every window was thrown up, and the sound of bagpipes or of fiddle screamed through each ; and not only all the houses, but the meanest cabins (there is a local distinction) and sheds pretended to be taverns, and mounted their signboards, flags, and other insignia of invitation to the thirsty or the patriotic. From the roof of one floated a bagner of white, having thereon, in green letters—(in 1798 he would have been hanged for either the sentiment or the colours)—

"James Meony, and Ireland for ever."

Another flag purported that an unswept, untidy house, of which the lower part was heaped with porter barrels, whisky jars, and bottles of various sizes, in glorious confusion, was

"The Ranelagh Tavern."

From a sooty hovel waved a board, announcing—

"Geoffrey Murphy, Peace and Plenty."

But I must pause at a particular placard. On a sheet of paper, affixed to a wall, was a device intended to represent a shamrock; three oval spots of dark green, surmounting a stalk, the lower extremity of which was twisted by the artist's pencil into such flourishes as Nature never equalled in all her vagaries; and underneath was printed—

"John O'Neil, and his shamrock so green."

I passed into the thatched hotel. It was clean—the clay-floor well swept, the walls newly painted. Upon temporary shelves, running all round the banquetting apartment, were jugs, mugs, tumblers, and glasses, in profusion; and, under the shelves, double rows of forms, before which stood small deal tables, at proper intervals; and, at many of these tables, sat separate parties—some eating, some drinking, and some eating and drinking together. A fiddler, scraping away incessantly, sat in the corner near the fire-place. His music served two purposes—amusing his company at once, and allowing them to converse freely under cover of its superior noise.

Crossing through this apartment, and also through another of the same kind, I entered the back yard. It was a small square enclosure, fenced round with bushes, and doubly barricaded by a fortification composed of all the usual articles of furniture of the house, which, upon this day, would have proved more than useless within doors. Two old oak tables, pointing their stout legs towards the adjoining premises, forbade the ingress of intruders; three dressers, dismantled of their culinary apparatus, served to continue the works; and two cradles also took their places in the formidable line of intrenchment. Within the square thus formed, rough planks, or large stones, served for seats; a table stood in each corner; and in the centre of the arena was the "dancing-board." I may mention that this is always contrived to spring under the foot, the ground beneath being hollowed for the purpose.

"Going the rounds of the Fair" kept the expected company from this ball-room at the early hour of my visit to it; and, in the absence of better exercise for its elasticity, the "dancing-board" now quivered under the hands of a serving-wench, who was scouring upon it knives and forks for the use of the guests within doors. And I judged that the cradles had not been mere ornamental appendages to the housekeeping of "John O'Neil, and his shamrock so green;" nay, the appearance of two "carriages for young Christians" (as the scouring-girl called them) led me to conjecture that his "shamrock so green" must have been a sufficiently prolific specimen of the national root. But there were now no offspring to be seen about the house; and I began to doubt my own talent for divination, when the knife-brightener informed me that I had been right at first; that, in truth, John and his shamrock (I would so interpret his signboard) were the proud father and mother of a goodly flock of future Irishmen and Irishwomen; but that "the childher were sent among their cousins, out o' harum's way, to let mashter and misthress have time to look after the customers durin' fair-time."

I have been particular in my sketch of this straw-covered auberge, as it will give a correct general notion of the economy of all the other houses of its stamp in the village;—all, I say; for even the smith's comfortless dwelling, including its forge, had been fitted up for the reception of guests: in the narrow space between his vice-bench and his furnace, forms and cap-sized tubs were placed; a piper sat enthroned on the anvil; and above the horse-shoe nailed over his door, which used to signify his previous calling, was an inscription, saying—

"James Sweeney sells good liquor."

But come. The real objects of the day are still waiting for us.

I cannot take upon me to state the extent of the village of Donnybrook; my attention was otherwise directed than to its topography. I wended through it—flowed through it, a part, a drop of the human current which incessantly filled, and yet incessantly was passing beyond it. Its main (if not only) street curved abruptly, so that an onward view was at first shut out. But the tumult of human voices, and of many other sounds, swelled louder as I advanced—peals of music, or of what was intended to be music, overmastering every other clamour. I gained the termination of the street. Loud expressions of admiration and delight escaped the hundreds who had gained the same point of view along with me; nor was my own tributary exclamation wanted, as Donnybrook Fair, in all its glory, burst upon us: and I tried to stand still a moment, in order duly to contemplate the first coup-d'œil of the celebrated scene I had hazarded limb and life to witness.

But I have used a bad word—contemplate. Such a calm operation of the mind was, in my position, and with my still Irish, though not heyday feelings, difficult. The variety of objects, and the simultaneous attraction of eye and, of course, mind, to different points of vivid interest, made it almost impossible to arrange in order the materials of the living picture; but I must do my best, Barnes, for half-English you, and your whole-English readers.

"The Fair" might have covered, as I judged, a space of about six Irish acres. The area of the ground it filled may be described as a four-sided figure of an irregular kind, its boundaries, to my right and left, running from the village, gradually narrowed, in the distance, almost to the apex of a triangle; so that, at one glance, I took in, en masse, the whole theatre of action. At a considerable distance to one side, the travelling-houses and bulks of the shows—some of the former on a scale of considerable magnitude—were ranged, to the amount of fifty or sixty, in line ; many brilliant in effect, and others only glaring to be sure, or else sharing that character with certain features of the fantastic and the outré. Taking them up at their termination, booths for entertainment and dancing, with their flags, sign-boards, and other ornaments or insignia, ran on in far perspective.

Fronting the shows, and at some distance from them, were gay jaunting-cars, gigs, and similar vehicles, filled generally with well-dressed females, standing up, on tiptoe, even in their vantage position, to scrutinize and delight in the sights all around them. The highroad from Dublin to Bray was a continuation of the village street I had cleared ; it divided the ground occupied by the carnival into two unequal portions, and ran parallel to the shows ; and it was crowded with still more brilliant equipages, bearing still more brilliant people—open carriages, new or newly painted, emblazoned with arms and crests, drawn by handsome horses, in fine harness, and attended by gaudily-liveried servants, and, in them, young, beautiful, and fashionable women, fitly squired, talking, smiling, laughing, and also standing up ; and, temporarily forgetful of the true aristocratic apathy towards all that is vulgarly exciting, also seeming to enjoy, in common with the pretty girls in the jaunting-car, the wonders and fun of Donnybrook. To the right of this public road, some distance from my present point of sight, was the entrance to an encampment—a town of pleasure-booths—innumerable flags, banners, and curious devices waving above them, before them, and around them ; and the view in this direction was pleasingly terminated by some rude attempts at castellated structures, whose imperfection, however, was not out of character with the objects to which they were remotely linked, particularly as from them, too, holiday banners were streaming. And, looking on straight before me, to the extreme point of the space filled by the Fair, a bridge was visible, over which vehicles and pedestrians came and went almost as numerously as they had done and were doing at the ingress from the village at my back.

And all this is but the outline of the picture. How can words fill it up ? How can I give you a notion, Barnes, of the crowds, and of the action, movement, and manners of the crowds that passed along and across, and from side to side, and from corner to corner of the arena of festivity ? My eye could find no foot of ground unoccupied by a human being—and all in motion. From the mouths of the booths at my right to the carriages on the public road ; and from them to the line of jaunting-cars at my left ; and from them to the line of wonderful shows ; and before the other booths continuing that line ; and on to the bridge ; and here, there, and everywhere, throngs pressed on throngs, some flowing one way, some another, yet all preserving a kind of ordained decorum in their separate channels, a kind of order amid seeming disorder. It was in vain, indeed, that I looked for a Donnybrook row ; good humour, and the true politeness of mutual and common forbearance and accommodation, appeared to reduce into happy rules all the impatient, headlong curiosity, all the exuberant animal spirits, of the vast multitude and of the festive occasion. Oh, they were truly a joyous host !—well dressed, if not showily dressed, too ; at all events, the small minority of rags and tatters were extinguished by the great majority of fine clothes. And what a buzz of hilarity !—a buzz, do I say ?—what a peal of hilarity rung out from them, chiming in with the bands of music far and near, as they hurried backward and forward from and to points of attraction of different kinds—up and down the entrance to the shows, and in and out of the booths, and so forth, and so forth—all bustling, all happy ! Truly, dear Barnes, such a scene of human enjoyment, on a scale of such magnitude, made my heart laugh.

As if wanting a moment's alight contrast to the almost rapturous hurly-burly before me, my eye wandered aside, and I got something like one—still it was not disagreeable. In a direction, leading away from the fair, ran a by-road, the commencement of an approach to a gentleman's country seat. It was silent, lonesome, deserted ; no foot turned that way ; and imagination could deem it the path to some dreary, banned dwelling, cut off, by common assent, from human neighbourhood—from human mirth at least. Dark-leaved old trees overshadowed it ; and a solitary rook cawed on the topmost branch of one of them. I elbowed my way through the crowds around me, and walked, I scarce know why, to the end of this sad avenue.

Even here, however, I discovered some adjuncts of the great scene of merry-making, though they continued to keep up, in a certain way, a contrast to its broad features. Before the entrance to the by-road, heaps of potatoes, cabbages, and other vegetables were arranged for sale ; the unfrequented spot being selected as favourable to such quiet traffic. Sitting on her heels, beside one of those heaps, was an old woman, wearing a ragged cotton gown and a huge old black silk bonnet. Placed on the very verge of holiday festivity, she seemed the only living creature careless of its attractions. She did not turn her faded eye towards the joyous varieties within its view, nor did her ear appear to catch the neighbouring sounds of mirth and music. As if in contempt of the vain self-enjoyment of her fellow-creatures, she was holding kindly communion with one whom she might have thought more worthy of her attentions and her sympathy—for her market donkey poked his head over her lap, drooping his long ears, and leisurely wagging his tale ; and, while she stroked his grizzled pate with one hand, he was rubbing with his lip the other, which rested on her knee.

"You seem to be old friends," I said, after I had for some time regarded the pair, unperceived, I believe.

I was at her back. She turned her head slowly round, and, at first, looked up at me with a creasexpression, as if fearful, I think, that some silly "Dublin jakeen" from the fair was mocking her; but it is to be hoped that the character of my features and manner admonished the good dame; for her glance changed in its severity, and she answered—

"We are very ould friends—the ouldest either has in the world, now, sir."

I began, in my usual foolish way, to speculate on the probable past fortunes of the solitary being; and I know not what scenes of bereavement of husband, children, friends, and prospects arose before my imagination; and I was about to ask some questions to assist my conclusions, when I saw that the old woman was weeping bitterly, though silently. This changed my philosophy; and, while I treated the donkey to a square of gingerbread, which a bolsterous young girl had forced me to purchase in the streets of the village, I confined myself to an inquiry concerning the success of her vegetable business during the fair. "It was considerable," she said, as she strove, under the shade of her pent-house of an old bonnet, to dry her tears without observation; "the Dublin people ate as well as drank a great deal, when they rolled out to see the humours of Donnybrook; a body would think they left home a purpose to get dhry an' hungry;" and she had abundance of call for cabbage, parsnips, and carrots to go along with the beef and mutton in the dinner pots, under the "tents." "God bless you, sir, for the mouthful of a thrate to my poor baste!" she added; "An' he's as thankful to you as I am, if he could only tell you so."

A louder swell of all the mingled sounds of mirth from the Fair, reminded me that I was becoming forgetful of the real day's business before me; and, interchanging farewells with the old ascetic and her only friend, I resumed my proper ground.

And now, Barnes, you must expect nothing more or less than my regular "rounds of the Fair," in my own way. I won't bate you a step; nor—under the rose be it said—do I care one farthing upon this occasion, for your half-foreign objections to my method. I know you will declaim against my penning down anything that is not locally peculiar; you have the shows and the tumbling everywhere, you will say; at Greenwich, and forty other places, as well as at Donnybrook. I don't care. I haven't them everywhere; nor, as you well know, have I ever had much of them, even in Ireland: so, you must let me enjoy them on this paper, as I enjoyed them in reality, along with all the other varieties of our great national carnival; for enjoy them I did, and am not afraid or ashamed to say so.

And with them do I begin my "rounds." Taking the lead of the long line of show-booths, in position, as well as in architectural attraction, was "the Theatre"—par excellence—a flaring structure; its front composed of lofty, gilt pillars, and otherwise ornamented with painting and drapery. The pillars rested on an extensive platform, raised considerably from the ground upon which the whole corps dramatique, perhaps thirty in number, decked in all the tinsel finery of the wardrobe, figured through the mazes of a very extraordinary dance, the band of music to which they moved seeming, to my ears, to shout, and bray, and roar, and scream forth the air that pretended to govern their motions. The frowning heroes, and the stately heroines of tragedy; the swaggering blades, and the giggling beldames of comedy; kings, queens, (query, wrong spelling here?) nobles, princesses, murderers, lackeys, "supernumeraries," male and female, gaudily bedizened; and Harlequin, too, with his Columbine, his Pantaloon, and his face-streaked Clown—passed each other in the changes of the figure; and loud laughed the gazing crowd, gentle and simple, young and old, at the unrivalled contortions of feature and limb incessantly kept by one of the last-mentioned personages.

Next in importance were "The Olympic Circus," and "The Theatre of Arts;" both of showy front, and both placarded with words importing their characters, of which the letters were sufficiently gigantic to be plainly deciphered at the distance of two or three hundred yards. And many others of inferior note were still attractive, by their paintings, flags, drapery, and divers ornaments, all along the extensive line; and musical instruments of one kind or another were made to do their loudest, if not their best, on the platforms of all—each band emitting a savage resemblance of some tune, different from that attempted by its neighbour, so that, from the whole effect of the minstrelsy, the bewildered ear in vain endeavoured to "untwist"

And with all this, circles of brass balls curveted in the air; and daggers, truly "air-drawn," glittered in the holiday sunshine; and polished basins twirled on rods; and boys and men were throwing somersets; and dancing girls displaying their attitudes; and buffoons writhing their persons, and turning their human faces into every expression but a "divine" one; and bears, sulkily making bows of invitation to the crowd; and monkeys, chattering and grinning mischief at them; and, above all, the proprietors of the different establishments, with bland and seductive address—while they occasionally affected to flog their merry-andrews, to elicit their jokes, or really flogged their poor bears or monkeys, to keep them in order—pointing to their painted or living wonders, and solemnly promising that all seen outside was but a faint indication of what awaited the curious inside the booth.

I elbowed my way to the "Theatre," and—"Entered it, Abel?" Yes, Barnes, I did. Up the gangway scrambled I, paid for a box ticket on the platform, and was ushered down a flight of steps, to take my place in the most honourable part of the house—which, in this establishment, was, however, the lowest; for, when I assumed my rightful position, I found that my feet rested on the sod. A canvass edifice of considerable extent—capable of containing, perhaps, between three and four hundred people—rose, however, above me; and when I turned round to look at my fellow-audience, I saw them gradually mounting to the very roof of the structure, and so closely packed that the place resounded with wailing expostulations from crushed women and children, and with angry expostulations from the male portion of the assembly. A short distance from the seat I occupied, was the stage, elevated some feet from the ground, and attainable by means of a step-ladder; and the extent of the dramatic boards might be about four feet, every way. And, as yet, the mysteries of the coming performance were hidden by the proper green curtain; though, indeed, the actors made no secret of their persons, but passed and repassed, men and women, in full costume, up and down the steps, from the platform without, and up and down the step-ladder by which the stage was gained, and thence behind the green curtain. Below the stage sat the orchestra; and to their right and left, were tables covered with whisky, bottles and glasses, porter pots, ginger beer, and biscuits, and presided over by two robust, red-armed, red-nosed women, who had little time to devote to anything but their customers; and of these, the corps-dramatique might be called the most constant. Many a time was the curtain pushed aside, and many a time did an actor or actress issue from it, to gain strength for their approaching efforts, by the agency of a dram or a draught of porter. A crowned king or queen did not think it beneath his or her dignity to hold fast, with one hand, the paper diadem on his or her brow, that, with the other, might be satisfactorily drained the invigorating potation. A sage-looking augur unceremoniously tossed off before the audience his glass of "raw;" and a fair young princess seemed to think it quite in character to imbibe, also en plein vue, her pint of "heavy wet." But there was one rogue in motley—a right doughty soul. He made his appearance almost every other moment, grinning his request at the half-silly Hebe of the deal-table, whom I could hear growl forth her doubts of payment; he always received his dram, however, by dint of his conciliating buffoonery; and, ever and anon, as this thirsty fool swallowed it, he would delight the audience, as well as his landlady, with distortions of his painted face, expressive of the internal satisfaction conferred by the cordial.

I grew egotistically apprehensive that I might be perhaps the only well-dressed person in "the boxes;" but a glance around undeceived me. Dandies were near me, puffing their cigars; some fashionable men, and women too, good-humouredly smiling at the strangeness of their position. I remember one young lady, in particular, a beautiful, gentle, and graceful creature, protected by her mamma, a certain low-sized beau, and two strapping livery servants; the glance of her eye still twinkles in the retina of mine. Nor, indeed, were the higher, though less aristocratic parts of the house, filled with disreputable-looking people; good clothes, and tolerably good manners, characterised the whole audience; and among even the remote goddesses, were many pretty girls, who did not shame, in a poetical sense, their present invidious appellation.

While looking round me, I felt a slight, though sly twitch at my elbow. It was given by a half-fuddled mechanic; who, as he smoothed down his close-cropped head with both hands, held it low that he might chuckle to himself stealthily.

"I ax your pardon," he said, glancing up at me—"I ax your pardon, undher an' over, an' every way: but I can't help laughin' at the joke, if the mouth o' me was to split across for id."

"And what is the joke, my lad?"

"Can you see three times once, wid them eyes o' yours, the same thing that I'd see but worst wid the eyes that's in my own face?"

I admitted my inability for the supposed feat.

"Your eyes seem good," I added.

"Ho, ho, ho!—that's the joke of id!—you paid, out o' your hand, for your sate, here, in the boxes, a shillin', and a sixpence over that again—didn't you, sir?"

I agreed to the fact.

"Ho, ho! that's the joke of id!—I laid down my little sixpence—divil a rap more—and down comes I, an' here I am, at your side; an' no one said to me, 'Come back, Tom Maher, and pay another shillin'—that's the joke of id!'"

I cannot take upon me to be certain as to the title of the play; but the green curtain rose; the performers strutted about, on the little space of stage, in a 'mimic pomp of character, with as much self-possession and as much self-importance, at least, as ever I had seen in any theatre. I am rather inclined to think that it had been vaguely proposed by them to represent the tragedy of "The Distressed Mother;" but they made quick work of it; it was gone through in two acts of about a quarter of an hour each. They made the most of their time, however; it was truly a tragic tragedy: for, before the fall of the curtain, not more than two of their whole band were in the dramatic land of the living. Some other peculiarities I must notice. The heroine of the piece, who wore on her head a turban of red glazed calico, went through her distressful situations in smiles that no mishap could darken; something behind the scenes had, I conjectured, excited her risibility; and twice did she pause in the remonstrance of wo, to laugh out her laugh heartily; and her good-humour became infectious—a frowning persecutor at her side roared out laughing, too. And this merry minion of tragedy afterwards reappeared, without alteration of dress, tossing brass balls—much to the comfort of a little girl at my elbow, whose blood had been curdled at the indiscriminate slaughter of the leading piece; but who, in consequence of this resuscitation, could now credit her father's previous assertions, to the effect of—

"My dear, don't be afraid—they're all alive and merry—sure, they didn't kill one another in earnest, my pet."

And her apprehensions were further alleviated by a second entrance of the hero of the dark drama, who, after slipping a smock-frock over his regal finery, tripped forward to sing "Betty Martin."

Nor was the tragical performance without its admirers. The higher grade of the audience—so considered with reference to their position in the house—had been rapturous in their plaudits, not sparing, however, an admixture of humorous comments. Upon a particular occasion, their applause—whether real or ironical, I could not well decide—rose to shouts. A prince in extreme agony swore, "Byyon sun!" with more propriety than ever Kean had sworn the same oath behind the lamps of Drury Lane or Covent Garden; for, at the moment, a ray of real sunlight broke through a hole in the canvass roof of the theatre, and struck upon his scowling brow, garishly displaying the hideous daubing of his cheeks, and shewing how unevenly had been described the cork-ashes mustaches of his upper lip; and thereupon swelled the sympathetic cheers I have spoken of.

Harlequin and Columbine terminated the entertainment for the time, still to the great satisfaction of the good-humoured audience, who soon after cleared the theatre—rushing up the ladder to the platform without, like demented creatures, and then—many of them—tumbling head over heels down its gangway, amid the laughter of the dense crowd in front of it.

Don't be afraid that I am going to make you spend as much time with me at the other shows, as you have done in my company in the canvass temple of "the regular drama;" still I must inform you that I left none of them unseen. In "The Theatre of Arts," I witnessed the wonders effected by the dancing puppets, particularly the rolling of their eyes, which, alternately, without change of movement, expressed anger or ecstasy, and the rattling of their timber jaws as they recited their parts; and I was contented to laugh with hundreds at the prescriptive humours of Scaramouch. With real admiration, however, I visited the "Olympic Theatre"—the manly skill of such an exhibition, even when it is not first-rate, always excites and gratifies me. The rope-dancing I cannot, however, enjoy, and did not upon this occasion; but, as to the jugglers, you know I would almost walk barefooted to see them, at any time, anywhere; so you may be sure I did not neglect them at Donnybrook; and I beheld the man born without hands write a letter, and shave himself, and drink his tea with his feet; and even "Treble Horn-pipes," Dancing Bears, the Monkey Joçko, and so forth, all had their separate attractions for me. With respect to the "Two Leopards," the man on the platform before their residence convinced me I ought not to pass that exhibition.

"Ye do be spendin'," quoth he, with a philosophical severity, "ye do be spendin' your money at make-games an' kitch-pennies—all o' them pridduced by the art o' man; bud here's two live leopards, nathral-born curiosities from the hands of their Maker; spots all over, from snout to tail, an' no two spots alike. Step in to see them, if any o' ye have sense or gumption." I stepped in accordingly.

I have noticed for you a row of booths, continuing that of the shows, in which those who had visited the latter might conveniently "see out" the contents of their holiday purses. Besides the enticing scream of fiddle or bagpipes issuing from each of these, very seductive sign-boards over them or pushed out from them appealed to the passenger—to say nothing of the goodly display of provisions, solid and fluid, which tempted him, a little inside their gaping, wide-open mouths. And metrical effusions, or graphic illustrations, or the joint efforts of pen and pencil, enriched those sign-boards—all characterised by the humour proverbially and prescriptively appertaining to the place and the occasion.

Upon one appeared the representation of a sturdy fellow, in a sky-blue coat and yellow small clothes; his hat placed rakishly over his right ear, and a shillelah flourished in his hand; and his motto was, "Phaugh a Vollagh!"—that is, "Clear the Way!" and beneath this favourite exhibition of Irish "glory" (by the way, the name given to themselves by the famous eighty-eighth regiment used to be the "Phaugh-a-vollagh Boys") was the following blank-verse distich—

"Give Pat but fair play, his sweetheart, and whisky, He'll die for old Ireland, his king, and his friend."

Another portrayed a good-humoured fellow, with a measure of liquor held at arm's length; and his action was thus descanted on in rhyme:—

"TO THE THIRSTY."

'Tis true that plants, and fruits, and flowers
Are spiled for want of moistening showers;
And man unmoistened—what is he
But a parched up, sapless, leafless tree?
Then stop, ye thirsty! pass not by,
Nor moisture want while here am I,

LARRY WHELAN."

And, after I had perused these lines, a glance through the opening of Laurence's tent assured me that he had sat for the portrait on his sign; and, moreover, that he was even then occupied in imitation of it—administering to "The Thirsty." Many other and similar masterpieces of the fine arts equally amused me in this quarter of the Fair.

(To be concluded in our next.)

POST-OFFICE REFORM.

It had long been suspected, by persons who had paid attention to the state of the public revenue, that there was something wrong in the administration of the Post-Office, on account of its revenue continuing stationary, while the wealth, population, and business of the country were in a state of rapid progression. Public attention, however, was not turned towards the subject, until the speeches of Mr Wallace of Kelly, in Parliament, and till the pamphlet of Mr Rowland Hill, maintaining the practicability of a reduction of all the different rates of postage to the uniform rate of one penny, whatever might be the distance the letter was carried, was published. This pamphlet naturally excited much attention throughout the country; and, on 23d November last, a Committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into the present rates of postage, with the view to such a reduction as may be made without injury to the revenue; and to examine Mr Hill's plan. Mr Wallace was appointed chairman of this Committee; and he appears to have discharged his duty with no ordinary ability and assiduity, having presided at every meeting of the Committee, twenty-four in number, held up to 2d April last, during which time forty-five witnesses were examined. The Committee has not yet concluded its labours, but has merely reported the evidence already taken.

Perhaps the most remarkable circumstance attending the investigation, is the overwhelming evidence it has afforded of the impotence of government—though armed with a most extensive and most rigorous code of laws, abounding in the severest penalties, and with a corps of officials to put the code in operation—to maintain a system hostile to the interests and feelings of the people. We find men of all classes, and of the most respectable character—merchants, medical men, booksellers, and men of science—acting in perfect defiance of the law, in full knowledge of the penalties detection would entail on them, and openly avowing their acts when examined by this Committee. And not only are individuals in the daily habit of infringing the Post-Office laws, but also associations of all sorts—mercantile, scientific, and religious. The British Association, as well as the Society for Spreading the Gospel, are to be found among the contrabandists, boldly acting in face of the clearest regulations of Post-Office law. Although the penalty for the illegal transmission of letters is £5 each, one moiety of which goes to the informer, prosecutions are extremely rare, though thousands of letters are, every day of the year, and in every district of the kingdom, liable to prosecution. Even the London common informers are unable or unwilling to sue for the penalties incurred by a breach of the Post-Office laws. This surely is not a safe state of things. How can it be expected that ill-informed working men can be convinced of the impropriety of entering into illegal combinations, with the view—however mistaken—of thereby raising wages, when they see the great body of the middle and upper classes in league against the Post-Office, for what must appear to them the comparatively paltry object of saving the postage of letters?

It appears, from Mr Hill's evidence, that, during the last twenty years, the Post-Office revenue has been stationary. In 1815, with a population of nineteen millions, it was a million and a half, (£1,557,291;) in 1835, with twenty-five millions of people, it was no more, (£1,540,300.) Had the revenue kept pace with the population, it would have exceeded two millions. But, as the wealth of the country, during that long period of peace, must—whatever may be alleged to the contrary—have proceeded in a greater ratio than the population, the Post-Office revenue should have increased at a much higher rate than that which we have assumed. For example, between 1815 and 1835, the stagecoach duty has increased from less than a quarter of a million (£217,671) to half a million, (£498,497,) or 128 per cent. on the revenue of 1815. Had the net revenue derived from the Post-Office increased at the same rate, instead of being a million and a half, it should be three millions and a half: so that the present defective system of management occasions an annual loss of two millions to the revenue. The cases seem strictly analogous; the demand for the conveyance of letters must have increased to the same extent as the demand for the conveyance of letters and parcels. What confirms this view is, that, in France and America, where postages are lower than in this country, a very great rise has taken place. Between 1815 and 1835, the gross produce of the revenue of the Post-Office of the United States of America has trebled: in the two years, 1835 to 1837, it increased thirty-eight per cent. In France, in the fourteen years—1821–1835—the gross produce rose from twenty-four millions to thirty-four millions of francs, or 54 per cent. It appears, from the evidence of Mr L. Fenwick de Porquet, and other witnesses, that the French Post-Office gives the greatest facilities for the conveyance of circulars, periodicals, and proof-sheets. 5000 circulars may be dispatched from Paris over all France, for a payment of two centimes. The French look to profit, not from the circulars, but from the postage of the numerous inquiries these circulars occasion. That our Post-Office revenue should be stationary, while that of our neighbours is rapidly increasing, is no more than was to be expected, when it is known that our tax on postage is much more than 1000 per cent. on the necessary cost of conveyance.

It has always appeared to us, that a tax on the conveyance of letters was the most indefensible of any kind of taxation. The window-duty—the tax upon light—appears, at first sight, equally preposterous; but it is, in truth, a tax upon property, or at least on income. The poorer classes are altogether exempt from the window-tax; and he who has a fine house and many windows, may be presumed to have a good income, and so to be a just object of taxation. At all events, if he find the tax oppressive, he has the means of avoiding it, by removing to a house suited to his means. It is, in truth, a recommendation of a tax, that its tendency is to repress extravagance and punish folly. But a postage, in as far as it exceeds the cost of conveyance, is a tax on the intercourse between man and man—it prevents the communication of thought—of new discoveries in the arts and sciences—it restricts the cultivation of the moral feelings, by rendering the most intimate friends and the nearest relations, strangers to each other after the separation of a few years, however limited may be the distance which divides them. It counteracts, in a great degree, education, by rendering writing useless to a large part of the community; and it retards, perhaps more than any single circumstance, the progressive advancement of the human race.* In the present tax-ground condition of this country, and under the necessity imposed on every one not to lose a moment of his time or a shilling of his money, visits of mere friendship are not to be thought of, except by the wealthiest persons, and by them only at distant intervals, and for the most limited periods. In these circumstances, a tax on written communications is nothing better than a tax on speech or on social intercourse.

It is, in truth, only in very recent times, that the Post-Office has been converted into an engine of taxation. The first regular Post-Office, on a model resembling the present establishment, was erected by Oliver Cromwell and his Parliament in 1657; and the preamble of the ordinance says nothing about raising money for the use of the State, but that the establishing of one General Post-Office, besides the benefit to commerce, and the convenience of conveying public dispatches, "will be the best means to discover and prevent many dangerous and wicked designs against the Commonwealth." The policy of having the correspondence of the kingdom under the inspection of the Government, is still continued; for, by a warrant from one of the principal Secretaries of State, letters may be detained and opened—a practice which was carried to a shameful extent in 1794 and 1795. The last report of the Commissioners of Post-Office Inquiry, commences thus:—"The safe and speedy conveyance of letters for the benefit of trade and commerce, was the primary consideration of the Government in the first establishment of a General Post-Office; the revenue, which it was expected would arise from the exclusive privilege conferred on the Postmaster-General, was held to be of minor importance. This principle is recognised in the preamble to the different postage acts, which were passed from the time of the Commonwealth, down to the time of Queen Anne, when the English and Scottish offices were united under one Postmaster-General." We regret, therefore, to find, that the Committee are ordered to report as to such reduction of postage "as may be made without injury to the revenue." We would rather that the Post-Office revenue were entirely annihilated, and some of the repealed taxes, such as those on beer or leather, oppressive on the poor as these taxes were, again imposed.

But, even with the reduction to an uniform rate of one penny, there appears to be no reason to fear any considerable diminution of the revenue. A great many of the witnesses examined, stated their willingness to enter into a contract with the Post-Office, to pay the same amount of postage as they do at present, so much do they count upon increasing their correspondence. Some of these witnesses stated, that, though they paid at present from £1000 to £2000 a-year of postage, their correspondence was much hampered by the present high rates.

Mr Hill's plan is shortly as follows:—Instead of complexity, delay, and expense, in the present arrangements of the Post-Office, arising chiefly from the great variety of charges for postage, he proposes to adopt one uniform rate, whatever may be the distance—one penny per half ounce, and the like charge for each half ounce additional. To relieve the Post-Office from all collection of money, and the complicated checks and accounts thereby occasioned, he proposes that the postage should be paid in advance, either by using for letters paper stamped in a similar manner to newspapers, keeping the stamp outside, or by stamped envelopes. The ease, simplicity, and dispatch, which such a plan would accomplish, is obvious. In delivering the letters, the postman would not need to ring the bell, wait for the postage, and give the change, but throw the letter into a box every one would have for receiving them. It appears at first unfair, that a letter conveyed a short distance should pay as much as one carried from one extremity of the kingdom to the other; but it must be kept in view what are the elements of the charge for postage. They consist, 1st, of the charge of providing receiving houses; 2d, For sorting and arranging the letters; 3d, For dispatching the bags; 4th, For the transit or carriage of the

* The manager of the extensive business of Messrs Leaf, Coles, & Leaf, states, that they have 140 young persons in their employment, mostly from Yorkshire, and that there are not, on the average, more than two in a day who receive post letters. He then says, in concluding his evidence—"I would particularly impress upon the Committee the unhappiness of the poor. I am sure the present postage amounts to tyranny in their cases. There are thousands and tens of thousands living separate from their children, who have no means of communicating with them, in consequence of the high rate of postage. Every feeling of philanthropy, as well as commerce, requires there should be a reduction of postage. I have seen much of the evils resulting from that in the young people of our establishment. I fear that the want of communication with their parents in that mode has led in some instances, to vice and profligacy, which might have been otherwise prevented."

letters; 5th, Providing houses for their reception; 6th, Again sorting for delivery; 7th, The actual delivery; 8th, A tax for revenue. Thus, out of the eight elements, only one is affected by the distance, and the least intellectual and simplest of the whole—that in which horses or steam, not men, are the chief agents. Mr Hill has estimated the expense of carrying a single letter from London to Edinburgh at the thirty-sixth part of a penny; and his calculation has been gone over and found correct by many of the witnesses examined. The Postmaster-General, on the other hand, maintains that the expense is $\frac{3}{4}$ d. for each letter—a very small sum, considering that the postage charged is 1s. 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. In the petition by the booksellers of London, it is stated that they could send 1000 letters, by steam-boats, to Edinburgh or Dundee, from London, for 1s. per 1000; this is eighty-three for a penny; and that the conveyance by railroads is equally cheap. Mr Dickinson, the paper-maker, states, that the conveyance from London to Edinburgh, by the steam-boats, is 2s. 6d. per cwt. This is about the weight of 6000 letters, taking them at 18 lbs. to the 1000. This calculation shews that the carriage of one letter is only 1-200th part of a penny; and it makes no difference whether the letter is to be carried to Leith, Dundee, Glasgow, or Aberdeen. From either of these places to London, the charge would only be one-half of what is above set down; or 400 would be carried for a penny. But, to take the highest authority—the Postmaster-General himself. The data from which he estimates the transit or conveyance of a letter from London to Edinburgh, at $\frac{3}{4}$ d., were obtained in the following manner:—He had the mail from London to Edinburgh examined one evening, and he found that the weight, upon that occasion, was 4 cwt., 2 qrs., 23 lb., 13 oz., made up as follows:—

	Cwt.	qrs.	lb.	oz.
The sacks and bags weigh	1	0	9	8
2296 newspapers . . .	2	2	3	8
2 stamp parcels . . .	0	1	12	0	viz. 492 15
484 franks . . .	0	1	19	15
1555 chargeable letters .	0	1	6	14	34 14
	4	2	23	13

The total expense of one trip of that mail is £5; and he then assumes that the chargeable letters should pay the whole expense—that is, that the 558 ounces of chargeable letters, should pay the carriage of 7887 ounces of newspapers, franks, stamped paper and bags. But it is obvious that the newspapers in reality pay for their own carriage, by the penny stamp-duty; and, were all postages reduced to one penny, franks might be abolished. It will be observed that the franks, though only about one-fourth of the chargeable letters in number, are thirteen pounds heavier in weight. The two stamp parcels weigh more than the whole chargeable letters; but neither ought they to be charged against the latter, because the Stamp-Office pays £500 a-year to the Post-Office, for the conveyance of stamps. We have seen that a mail, weighing 8445 ounces, is carried 400 miles for £5; and the simple question is, what ought 558 ounces of chargeable letters, be carried for? And the answer is, 6s. 7d. The number of letters carried 400 miles for this sum is set down at 1888; but, if we look to Mr Dickinson's calculation, we will find that there must have been among them many double or treble letters, so that we may, without fear of exaggeration, assume that the Edinburgh mail, on the above occasion, carried a weight of chargeable letters equal to 2000 single letters; and thus that the transit of each letter, according to the Postmaster-General's own shewing, cost only one twenty-fifth part of a penny. It is thus perfectly clear that the expense of the actual conveyance of letters, taking short distances with long, cannot possibly exceed Mr Hill's estimate.*

Mr Hill farther calculates that, if the present correspondence is increased between five and six-fold, there will be no great deficiency in the revenue. To this the Post-Office authorities answer, that it is perfectly impossible that the mails can carry such an additional quantity of letters. It will be remembered that precisely the same objection was made—and, certainly, with much greater plausibility—when the reduction of the duty on newspapers was under contemplation. The number conveyed by the mails is at present one-half greater than formerly, yet the same mails continue to carry them. Now, the above statement regarding the Edinburgh mail, is valuable, also, in this point of view:—though the number of newspapers and of letters (counting each single sheet as a letter) did not far differ, the newspapers were eight times heavier than the letters—a matter which will give no surprise, when it is considered that nearly all the newspapers are wet, have envelopes, and are now of a great size. Six times the weight of letters coming from London to Edinburgh, would weigh under 210 lbs., very little more than the weight of one ordinary passenger; and, considering that the mail ought to be relieved from carrying stamp paper, and that franks might be abolished, it is in vain to pretend that there is any impracticability in Mr Hill's plan.

The extent to which the carriage of letters, by post, would increase under a penny postage, is incalculable. The house of Morrison sends and receives upwards of 30,000 letters a-year; very few of which go by post. Warren the blacking manufacturer, issues 400 circulars per week, not more than one of which goes by post. He states that at present he sends out and receives 130 letters a-week; but shews, by a detailed statement, that a penny post would increase the number to 4,412.

* This shews the injustice of charging a letter, with a bill or proceeding-at-law inclosed, at double a single letter. It should only be double the transit charge—that is, at the highest estimate, $\frac{3}{4}$ d. additional; for, with the exception of weight, a double letter differs in no respect, and gives no more trouble to the Post-Office than a single letter. If letters were folded in such a manner as to shew a desire to conceal their contents, the Post-Office ought to be allowed to charge the full double rate, otherwise letters might be sent inclosed in each other.

The amount of the present illegal conveyance of letters, is perfectly extraordinary. Barings, Brothers, & Co.—perhaps the greatest mercantile house in Europe—are in the habit of sending 200 letters each week, in boxes, from London to Liverpool, to evade the inland postage. Many of the coffee-houses in London collect letters for the inland as well as foreign mails, for which 3d. each is paid, instead of the Post-Office charge, amounting, in many cases, to 3s. 2d. or 3s. 6d. The Post-Office authorities are perfectly aware of this practice, yet cannot stop it. It is quite usual for merchants and brokers openly to put up a bag for collecting letters in their counting-houses, when they have a ship sailing for a foreign port; and these letters are delivered as punctually and expeditiously as those sent by the Post-Office. A merchant engaged in the American trade, residing in one of the large English manufacturing towns, stated that his house had kept an account of their letters in the year 1836. Of 7929, only 2068 were transmitted by post, and upwards of 5,000 sent to places within twenty miles, by the carriers, the charge for calling for and delivering each letter never exceeding one penny. The letters are collected at the merchants' and brokers' counting-houses, on three evenings of the week, by old women and girls, who are paid by the carrier 2d. per 100 for their trouble. Many men get their entire living by this business; and some of the witnesses stated they were personally acquainted with as many as thirteen such carriers in one town. It is easy to see how it may be made a very profitable living. Suppose a man travels only 120 miles a-week—thrice to a town twenty miles distant, and thrice back—and that he carries 300 letters each trip. The weight is only six pounds. Then we have conveyed—

Another wholesale merchant states, that his house sends, in the manner we have described, from 100 to 150 letters a-week, and that many other houses, to his knowledge, send many more; and he thinks that, in a district with which he is acquainted, comprising a population of 300,000, fifteen, twenty letters, or more, are sent by the carrier for one that is sent through the Post-Office. This business has been carried on, openly and without fear, for upwards of thirty years; and there does not appear ever to have been a conviction obtained, or even an information given, against any of these carriers. Booksellers' parcels, parcels by stagecoaches, sending letters in bales among goods, and numerous other methods, are fallen on to avoid postage. There were two witnesses examined as to the illegal conveyance of letters in Scotland. Mr John Reid, now resident in London, but who says that he was formerly engaged in one of the most extensive publishing and bookselling trades in Glasgow, states, that they were in the practice of issuing daily, throughout the year, from twenty to twenty-five letters, including circulars. Hardly one of these went through the Post-Office. Once, out of 20,000 times of infringing the Post-Office laws, he was prosecuted by the Post-Office; but, on a representation to the House of Commons, the prosecution was abandoned. He used to receive about two or three letters per day by post, including the penny post, and rarely less than a dozen which had never passed through the Post-Office at all. Letters are conveyed from Glasgow to London, and delivered earlier than by the mail, for 2d. each. Every carrier that comes into Glasgow, brings an immense number of letters, sometimes three or four large pocket-books as full as they will hold, containing 200 or 300 letters, and they are delivered for a penny each. From what Mr Reid knows, he thinks the number of letters, carried by the Post-Office, would be increased fifteen fold, were the rate reduced to one penny. The whole intercourse between the workmen resident throughout the country, and the master manufacturers, is carried on without the intervention of the Post-Office. One of the persons who had formerly been engaged in the carrying of letters in the west of Scotland, was examined. He says that he keeps within bounds when he states that he, and other carriers on the station, used to deliver 500 letters daily. He averages the number he carried throughout the year at fifty a-day for six days of the week, or 15,000 in the year, and his remuneration was equal to 6s. or 7s. a-day. It appears, from the evidence of Dr Lardner and Mr R. Taylor, that the correspondence of literary and scientific men with their publishers or the editors of periodical publications, almost entirely evades the Post-Office. It is carried on, in a great measure, by means of franks, booksellers' parcels, &c., and the foreign correspondence through the embassies. It is stated that, were the conductors of most of the scientific journals to pay the postage on the correspondence in which they are necessarily engaged, their journals must be stopped. All the witnesses agree, that, if the postage was reduced to one uniform rate of a penny, all, or almost all, the modes of evading postages now resorted to, by all classes, to an incredible extent, would be discontinued. On the other hand, the Post-Office authorities, though they resist Mr Hill's plan by every argument they can devise, unanimously admit that the present rate of postage is too high. The Solicitor candidly states, that they have no means of checking the illicit conveyance of letters; and it is plain, from his evidence, as well as from that of the other officers, that they had no notion it was carried to anything like the extent which has been proved. It is obvious that the publication of the evidence collected by the Committee, will tend greatly to increase the illicit conveyance of letters; for it both points out the means, shows the profit to the carriers, the cheapness and certainty with which letters can be conveyed, and, in as far as the senders are concerned, the almost absolute freedom from risk of punishment. It is explained by many of the witnesses, that the cause of petitions for reduction of postage not having been sent from many towns, is that it is generally believed the reduction granted by the Government would not be sufficiently great, and that therefore they would still be obliged to resort to the present illicit modes of conveyance.

One of the most curious parts of the evidence, is that of Captain Bentham of the Fifty-Second regiment, regarding the correspondence of soldiers. It is provided by statute, that each single letter sent by, or addressed to, a soldier, shall be charged only 1d., provided the former is franked by the commanding officer of the regiment or detachment; and that, in either case, the penny is paid before the letter is posted. This privilege the soldiers value very highly; it is a great gratification to them to be able to correspond with their relations and friends; and it benefits them in numerous ways. Many of them, ignorant of writing when they join their regiments, seek eagerly to acquire it for the purpose of correspondence, and for that purpose zealously attend the regimental schools. Those soldiers who write the most letters, are the steadiest and best-behaved men, and, in every respect, the most valuable members of the regiment. In a regiment 750 strong, the commanding officer will frank more than sixteen letters daily; and Captain Bentham gives it as his opinion, that, were the ordinary rates of postage charged, not more than one would be written for twenty or thirty at present. All this correspondence is merely friendly; for what other sort can common soldiers have? Common sailors, in the merchant service, on the other hand, never write letters at all, not having the privilege of sending them through the Post-Office for a penny. Mr Pearson, a witness, who has 200 sailors in his employment, says—"I know they never think of writing to their friends. I know very well they would be very glad to do it, but they cannot afford it. The expense of a single letter to the North, is very nearly equal to the wages of a full seaman, and exceeds the wages of an apprentice."

It is remarkable that the only correspondence between friends passing through the Post-Office, should be between common soldiers and their relations, or each other; for all the witnesses agree that any friendly intercourse which passes through the Post-Office between any other class, is quite inconsiderable. Captain Bentham states, that, although two-thirds of the soldiers in a regiment are able to sign the regimental books, not more than one-fourth are able to write their own letters. One fourth of 750 is 187; so that each soldier who can write a letter, must dispatch one each nine or ten days, or say forty in the year. The common soldiers are certainly much worse educated than the general body of the people;—but assume that the adults in the United Kingdom amount to six millions and a-half; that one-half are able to write letters, and that they write as frequently as common soldiers—no very exaggerated supposition; and we have one hundred and thirty millions of letters that never would be written under the present system, yielding a gross return to the Post-Office, even at one penny a-piece, of considerably above half a million sterling, from a source—letters on friendship—which now yield nothing.

We need not point out how much a frequent intercourse, by written correspondence, would not only cultivate the moral feelings and advance the interests, but also improve the education of the lower classes. At present, we have no doubt that, in most of our country schools, the art of writing is sufficiently taught; but no practical use of it is attained, and the very rudiments of it are ultimately lost, from the impossibility of the exercise of the acquirement. How can ploughmen, labourers, or even artisans and mechanics, keep up a correspondence through the Post-Office? The postage of a single letter is very often equal to a day's wages. All, therefore, who wish to extend education, morality, and religion, and repress ignorance, vice, superstition, and bigotry of all shades, ought to join in one strenuous effort to obtain the reduction of postage to the uniform rate of one penny.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Poems, for the most part occasional. By John Kenyon, formerly of St Peter's College, Cambridge.

THERE must be a witchery, a hidden charm, in seeing one's verses in print, which ordinary prosaic mortals cannot pretend to understand. Here is a gentleman of refined feelings and cultivated taste, sending into the world a volume of graceful and classic poetry, possessing all appliances and means to please, external and intrinsic, yet sensitively aware of the many hazards of so perilous a step, and ingeniously inventing wit against himself for yielding to the soft seduction. The more remarkable fact seems, that, having resisted the allurements of publication in hot, impetuous youth, he has fallen into the snare at middle age; and now comes forward somewhat like an old and vowed bachelor bashfully producing a young and blooming bride. There is nothing, in such cases, to be ashamed of. The Muse, like the lady, will, in her charms, carry her admirer's apology. There is, in these chilling days of ours, something peculiarly gallant and magnanimous in the declaration set forth in the author's very modest preface, that, however frail his would-be memorials may prove, they will, at least, win for him the minor praise of having "aspired to the love of letters." It is, indeed, refreshing to meet with any man of elegant talents and accomplishments loving poetry for its own sake, and willing to prove his devotion even at the peril of anticipated neglect. Of that, we apprehend, there is, in this case, no likelihood; "an audience, though few," will be found for these polished and classic effusions, though they display few of the qualities which begot either an instantaneous, a wide, or a fervid and headlong popularity. Mr Kenyon is, in brief, rather of the school of Pope or Cowper than that of Byron. The first poem in the collection is entitled "Moonlight." It is very beautifully written, in blank verse; but we stop not for it. The most important production is entitled "Pretence," a satire—terse, and pointed, and highly finished; the thong not the least biting to the sinner's back for being delicately wrapped over with silken threads. A passage, contrasting the gross, open corruption of Walpole's period, leads to the more hypocritical, but equally profligate, age in which "Pretence" flourishes in the Senate, the Church, and the seats of learning, and to the career and fate of the least grovelling ambition which distinguishes our public men:—

"E'en loftiest natures, with ambition curst—
Hard penalty!—to lead, must follow first;
And when the rest, at length, the van concede,
Keep the old track, and only just precede;
On useful Knavery hold the bridle slack,
And, when seems useful, rein frank Honour back;
With falsehood, nay, with treachery, oft must mate;
And greatness lose in striving to be great.
Hence, if, at last, the struggling will thou bend,
And stoop to herd awhile for worthiest end,
Add thy proud venture to their vulgar wares,
Nor soon to let thy motives mix with theirs;
Yet, in disgust, thou oft shalt quit the band,
To take, like Abdiel, solitary stand;
Or, held impracticable and high-flown,
Left, if not leaving, find thyself alone.

In freedom reared, for treachery deemed too young,
A nation's hopes on high-born Cassius hung.
When stormy senates raised the stern debate,
Of power he seemed to save a sinking state;
And many a bold, confiding heart, I wile,
Had pledged its dearest, holiest hopes to his.
Gods!—how we felt, when, strong in honour's might,
For England's fame he rose, for England's right;
Hurled his proud threats, impeachment, and disgrace;
Flashed—flamed—then perorated—smug in place!
Greatness is goodness, else not worth a pin;
More talent's greatness stirs no chord within,
But, like keen razor plied the surface o'er,
Acts simply on the surface, and no more."

Did this gentleman require to be as very apprehensive of the indifference of the age to poetry? His fears are scarcely complimentary to the discernment and taste of "an enlightened public."

Our first specimen is taken from the Senate, for reasons of our own; the next, which more fairly exhibits the author's powers, shall be from the City. The Church and the Schools we leave to the general reader.

"Forth then we fare, and, no wide tract surveyed,
Pause where the Lombards plied their ancient trade;
Where still, 'mid tawny ledgers, loves to hold
His daily watch the Sacred Thirst of Gold,
And sniffs, by noon-lit lamp, in dusky lane,
The rich, rank odours steamed around from gain.
Yet these but breathe the City's morning air,
No vesper-star must see Sir Balaam there;
For Pride, long since, hath whispered in each ear,
That gold, at such a rate, were bought too dear.
Soon some vast tract reluctant Ceres yields,
The lake is wound, and parked a hundred fields,
And mannan huge, at Wealth's supreme command,
Like snowy mountain, glistens o'er the land;
And, clump-en circled, and plantation-bound,
Proud as its lord, seems all the country round;
While each excess luxurious city loves
Parades its pride, or riots through the groves.
There Taste, run mad, on high, like Muzesin, set,
Shouts o'er the roof from many a minaret,
Or shows, right happy, to the gaping clown
The Moorish front, and pillars upside down.
Antiques within—'tis so the broker calls—
And varnished Raphaels, vouched originals;
There books, unread, bedizened all and new,
Plant in the gold their writers never knew;
Puzzling the host, there sparkle hard-named wines,
Do Reyniers scarce might count the varying vines;
And there, while flatterers swirl in thirsty strife,
Capricious smiles or frowns the haughty wife.

"Are these, grave Whittington, respected Shade!
Are these thine ancient, simple sons of trade?"

"B.—I grant its luxury; yet the race who moil
May rightly claim remission from their toil;
And if excess unduly there be found,
'Tis but degree; and who shall fix the bound?"

"A.—And so shall Satire graduate each offence,
Nor treat Pretension as she treats Pretence;
Shall merely smile to mark the smaller spot,
But justly frown indignant on the blot.
She smiles when Balaam quits his old resort,
And city friends, to leave his card at court;
And smiles to see the new-bought blazonry
Far flaming from his chariot, flashing by.
She frowns on knavish show, that yet awhile
Tricks out some tottering credit, to beguile;
Then bursts, at once, in ruin wide and deep,
Whence orphans pine and widowed mothers weep.
She frowns on seals to broken contracts set,
And the long file that glooms the last Gazette,
Which honest Gripus reads with clenching fist,
Then sends his own pure name to swell the list.
She frowns on hollow scheme, on puffed-up share,
And that late gulf, fraud-scooped, in Gresham Square—
(The ravaging South Sea sowed not more profound,
A gulf not greedier o'ft Rome's forum ground)—
Round which, in gamewast strife, all England stood,
City and Court—and all for England's good!
Nor closed we saw it, till those jaws between Pride, Conscience, Honour, all were tumbled in;
All! for the chance some lucky hit affords
To strut a Croesus, and to herd with lords!"

We select the following lines, in a different and higher style:—the retired scholar in his library—in his place of refuge—surrounded by his oldest, dearest, and most unfailing friends:—

"Lo!—here around, the minds of every age, Pilgrim and bard, theologist and sage!"

But we cannot follow the golden catalogue, and so pass abruptly to this piece of description, which we are persuaded many elegant minds will not only admire, but sympathize with:—

"How oft, at evening, when the mind, o'erwrought,
Finds, in dim reverie, repose from thought,
Just at that hour when soft unboding day
Slants on the glimmering shelves its latest ray,
And pensive breeze, from dewy jessamin,
Through open casement, scarcely felt, steals in—
Along those darkling files I ponder slow,
And muse, how vast the debt to books we owe!"

"Yes!—friends they are!—and friends through life to last!"

Hopes for the future!—memories for the past!
With them, no fear of leisure unemployed;
Let come the leisure, they shall fill the void:
With them, no dread of joys that fade from view;
They stand beside us, and our youth renew—
Telling fond tales of that exalted time,
When love was bliss, and power was in its prime.
Come, then, delicious converse still to hold,
And still to teach, ye long-loved volumes old!

"Yet here commix, at will, the old and new,
Grave first editions and the last Review.
All sizes, as all ages, crowd the wall;
Sermons from Oxford, pamphlets from Whitehall;
Huge quarto tomes, that curve the groaning shelves,
Sedato octavos, petit-maitre twelves;
Here thick black hides some ancient sage enfold;
Here last year's wittings fade in green and gold."

"Yon folios, jerkined, clasped, in stout array,
Were all renowned polemics in their day;
Right fierce were they to argue or to rail,
Nor boded once yon spider's dusky veil.
But thou, polemic though thou wert, o'er thee,
Thou mild as learned, mired Jeremy!
If ever that dark spinner chance to stray,
With pious hand I brush the film away."

"More near, and often stirred with reverent hand,
No cobwebbed race, immortal poets stand.
Their leaves, by Time's own autumn tinted o'er,
Come turn we now, and fondly taste their lore;
With curious eye etc. pausing to survey
Where the shy worm hath worked his ancient way;
And, undisturbed then by fresh Review,
A hermit student went his volume through."

"Due honour to the stout-built Man-of-Prose; Reasoner on facts; who seems to feel, but knows not!"

Yet belittling, who love not less the true,
To lead, well-weighing bards ! my house with you ;
And sick, long since, of facts that falsify,
And reasonings that logically lie,
With you live o'er my wisely-credulous youth,
And in your fictions find life's only truth.

" And sweet 'twill be, or hope would so believe,
When close round life its fading tints of eve,
To turn again our early volumes o'er,
And love them then, because we loved before ;
And only bless the waning hour that brings
A will to lean once more on simple things.
If this be weakness, welcome life's decline !
If this be second childhood, be it mine !

Digression o'er, turn once again to see
These witnesses of many a century.
Yes ! ages—present, past—are mingling here ;
Yet, welcome elders ! still to me most dear.
As when along some gallery's pictured line
Frewa statesmen old, and modern beauties shine ;
Though Reynolds there bestow his breathing skill, Hard-featured Holbein holds the fancy still.

" Now, doubly sweet such refuge found with books !
To stray with mild Pileator up the brooks ;
With Cowley mused beneath the greenwood tree,
Or taste old Fuller's wise simplicity.
Or if his worthies, though removed their span,
Smack yet too strongly of the living man,
Then backward turn to question Homer o'er,
Or dream of storied ages rolled before ;
Faint-glimmering now, like far-off beacon light
O'er misty ocean scarcely read aright."

After enumerating more of his old favourites, the poet quits with reluctance the "genii bowers" of the wild and wondrous Thalaba, to return to the dull matter-of-fact world of his unhappy contemporaries :—

" To us the mere material world is all ;
Our pride, our tax, our pleasure, and our thrall.
Science, whom scarce the circling spheres may fold,
Chained to a desk we hire to scheme for gold ;
Drag from his height Imagination down,
To please, for daily bread, the modish town ;
And daintiest Art, the dreaming child of Grace,
Wake from her dream, to paint some idiot face.
Virtue herself, born guest of Heaven's high roof,
Gift of the Godhead—gift at once, and proof—
E'en Her, blind bigots of our planet birth,
E'en Her, we fain would fether down to earth ;
Just mark where Bat-Expedience flits at height,
And meanly, there, would bound her eagle-flight.
From such a world—all touch, all ear, all eye—
What marvel, then, if proud Abstraction fly ;
Amid Hercynian shades pursue his theme,
And leave the land of Locke to gold and steam ?"

There is much more which we should like to bring forward ; the writers and poets of the age of " Pretension" and " Pretence," the contrast of the happy olden time, free alike from authors and critics—the unscribbling age, and the revival of letters in Italy ; but we must remain content with this apostrophe to the inventor of the perilous art of printing,—that power of which it is questioned whether it be

" Upstart from hell to tempt, or dropt in love from Heaven."
The press-men have at least no doubts on the subject.
Thus finally closes that part of the poem of " Pretence," entitled " The Library :—

" Come back, long-tolling Faust ! come back and see
The produce of thy Good-and-Evil tree ;
Count o'er its mingled fruits of joy and pain,
Then say if thou wouldst plant it o'er again !
Thou too, wise Caliph Omar ! who art said
All Alexandria's ovens to have fed,
Visit our shelves once more. Where'er we look,
Pamphlet on pamphlet, book buds out on book ;
Turn whereso'er we will, new volumes sprout—
Some of fair promise, most lack clearing out.
Come then, thou critic Caliph—come again !
Nor decimate ; but take the same in ten."

In a lighter vein, there are many copies of elegant and classic verses ; some sweetly-tender, or pathetic ; others sparkling and fanciful. Among them the choice is so ample, but the quality, upon the whole, so equal, that our specimens must be determined rather by brevity than more legitimate causes of preference. This parlour-twilight "Reverie" reflects, we think favourably, one of the moods of a recluse scholar of soft and amiable feelings, and is, probably, a faithful transcript of real emotions :—

" Oh ! blest it is, by blazing hearth,
With many a well-loved friend beside,
With harp, and wine, and graceful mirth,
To mock December's stormy pride !

" And blest it is, by studious light,
The gusty wind unheard the while,
To cheat the fast-receding night
With poet's song or sage's toil.

" But I not less the hour may prize,
' When glowing embers through the room,'
And fitful flame that flaps and dies,
' Teach light to counterfeit a gloom."

" For then I sit and dream again
The visions of departed years ;
A winding road of joy and pain,
A varied view of smiles and tears.

" I think on days of youthful trust ;
On Love and Friendship's changeable will ;
On some—estranged, and some—in dust ;
And one or two that love me still.

" Then, if the bitter with the sweet
Too deeply mixed, bid Memory groan,
Yet Fancy lends her dear deceit
To mould a future of my own.

" I eul from forth her boundless scope
Whate'er of beautiful or rare
Had ever fed my youthful hope,
And build me fairy domes in air.

" While floating up, bright forms ideal,
Mistress or friend, around me stream,
Half sense-supplied, and half unreal,
Like music mingling with a dream.

" Yet, firm as faith of young romance,
These weave their spell within my breast ;
Till, buried in delicious trance,
' Twixt truth and falsehood I am blest.

" And hence it is the hour I prize,
' When glowing embers through the room,'
And fitful flame that flaps and dies,
' Teach light to counterfeit a gloom."

Many of the poems are of the same pensive and tender cast ; and they are all, whether grave or gay, versified with equal elegance ; so that, though the material may be of inferior worth, the delicate workmanship enhances the value, or gives a value of its own. We have been hesitating between some beautiful descriptive lines to " Izaak Walton," and the " Moorland Girl ;" but, leaving both, take, for the sake of the subject alone, this inscription for a vase which enclosed a lock of Washington's hair. The vase belonged to Thomas Poole, Esq., the friend of the author of this volume, and also the friend of Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Lamb, and De Quincey
—the cement of a very remarkable society.

" In elder Greece, where fostering liberty
Nursed kindling Genius to adventure high,
Some master-hand achieved this urn of grace,
Within whose storied orb we fondly place
One precious ringlet from the sacred head
Of him, to more than Grecian virtue bred,
Who for his straggling country freedom won—
Heroic, self-controlling Washington !
Stranger ! doth charm of art thy soul inspire ?
Yet, more—doth freedom's flame thy bosom fire ?
Then own that votary's hand did ne'er consign
A dearer relic to a worthier shrine."

Two of the most elegant poems in the volume appeared, we think, in " Finden's Tableaux" for 1838.
One of them, " Champagne Roég," has already been printed in this Magazine, among the extracts from that splendid annual. To the other, the " Shrine of the Virgin," many of our readers may have power to refer. These will, therefore, form sufficient specimens of a volume which, we are certain, cannot be received with coldness or neglect while any vestige of poetical feeling or classic taste lingers among us.

The Palmer's Last Lesson; and other Short Poems. By Calder Campbell, author of "Lays from the East," &c. &c.

The specimens of this gentleman's poetry, which have from time to time appeared in this Magazine, and in other periodical works, must have made his name and his modest muse familiar to all our poetical readers, and dear to many of them. All his effusions are distinguished by elegance and sweetness, and a tenderness almost feminine; while some of them discover considerable boldness and play of fancy. Of the numerous short pieces, we shall select one, which we conceive a fair example of the prevailing and finest mood of Major Campbell's poetry.

CHATEAUX EN ESPAGNE.

"I dream all day, I sit and dream
Of home which I no more may see—
The Highland hill, the Lowland stream,
The Saxon downs, the Scottish lea.
I raise my air-built fabric high,
And picture (exile-wandering o'er)
A cottage and tranquillity,
Upon an English shore!

"I love the hills and heaths that first Arose upon my early sight;
But they are gone or changed who sure'd
My early visions of delight!
I would not end where I began
The care-worn tissue of my years,
Nor pine a discontented man
Midst scenes so steeped in tears!

"Let me then seek on English ground
Some smiling, yet sequestered spot,
Where, 'mid the glee of nature round,
My early care may be forgot,
Or but remembered as a trial
That pained yet purified the spirit—
And dearer for the long denial
The quiet I inherit!

"And in my cot shall find a home
Thy legacy, my sister dead!
Thine orphan girls to me shall come
And toll no more for bitter bread.
By some sweet hamlet shall we bide,
Blest with our music, books, and flowers;
And let there be a stream to glide
Near that quiet hut of ours!

"Yet, let me see, in fancy's dream,
The joys that time may never bring:
The summer's sunshine on the stream;
The flower-engendering showers of spring;
The dewy eyes; the laughing morn;
The meads drest in their blossoming store;
When slimy snails pull in their horns,
To find the rain is o'er.

"The book enjoyed beneath the shade
Of arching boughs—Keats, Wordsworth, Scott—
The music of the wood-archade,
Where human minstrelsy is not;
Or winter, with its blazing fire
And cheerful parlour—while, without,
The distant church's humbler spire,
With frost is freaked about."

This languishing strain, inspired by home-sickness, is in a deeper vein of pathos.

A PLAINT IN INDIA.

"I pine for Home!—
Amongst the mountains, or beside the sea,
Where health-forsaken pilgrims love to roam,
To seek if there it be!

"Not in this land
Of tiresome sunshine and exhausting heat,
Can the sick heart its waning powers expand
To expectations sweet.

"Too long, too long
Hath desolation lain at my heart's core,
Chanting that wailing dirge—like the last song
Of sailors near the shore.

"They ne'er shall reach!—
My ship is full of rents—almost a wreck;
And, if it gains the spirit-wasted beach,
There—even there—'twill break!

"My mother's hand!—
Oh, that her tremulous fingers could but press
The natural medicine of their magic blood
In one—but one caress!

"But one caress
Upon these throbbing temples; once to say,
'My child, I do forgive thee, and I bless!'"

In the bold and imaginative mood, not frequent with this gentle bard, there is a wild poem, entitled "The Chimera," with which we have been struck; but it is too long for our columns, and will not bear mutilation. Our readers must search for themselves. We are not here critics, but indicators, flying before, to point to the hunters where the honey may be found.

Beauties of the Court of Charles II.

Part II. of Charles the Second's Beauties, with Mrs Jameson's Memoirs, presents to us Lady Denham, a brilliant character, who, having attracted the amorous attentions of the Duke of York, was believed to have been poisoned by her husband. At all events, her illness was sudden, violent, and critically timed. She died in her twenty-first year, just as her husband, a worn-out libertine, was tortured by the malicious congratulations of the courtiers, upon his wife being appointed lady of the bed-chamber to the Duchess of York, in spite of the opposition of that Princess. Sir John Denham became insane immediately after the death of his wife, and did not long survive her. The portrait, now first engraved from the original painting, is that of a magnificent beauty. Lady Denham shewed becoming pride in her high destinies. She declared, that she would not "be a mistress, to go up and down the privy stairs, but would be owned publicly;" and the Duke of York, in complaisance with her taste, visited her in state, attended by all the gentlemen of his household.——La Belle Hamilton, the Countess de Grammont upon completion—not on her husband's part—is a much greater favourite with Mrs Jameson than we think she deserves to be, from all that is known of her, either true or fabulous. In advanced life she became devout, according to the custom of the age, and had at last the satisfaction of converting her witty roué husband; who, at the age of eighty-six died, "très-dévoit." Death has not since been so baffled by any Frenchman of like type, till Talleyrand gave defiance to the grim spectre.——And here we have Nell Gwynn—"pretty, witty, merry, open-hearted Nelly." One would fancy her with sparkling eyes, pouting lips, and a petit nez retroussé. No such thing. The eyes are soft and sleepy: an emblem of sweetness if not of innocence; and she is carrying a lamb, and adorning it with flowers. Mrs Jameson is, everything considered, wonderfully charitable in her judgment of "Poor Nelly." On looking back to the female origin of the King Charles breed of the English high nobility, we really think the family of St Alban's have some reason to be vain of their ancestors. The tavern and the green-room were much less depraving to her sweet and ingenuous womanly nature, than the court proved to her high-born fellow courtesans. The manner in which Nell's descendants became enabled, is amusing and characteristic. Though the best humoured, and by far the most disinterested of the ladies of the royal harem, she felt piqued at the children of the rapacious and imperious Cleveland, and these of the Duchess of Portsmouth, being belorded and be-duked, while her offspring, which had at least as certainly sprung from the royal loins, remained with the only title which, by law, belonged to them. She took a very clever way of making her ideas of this slight known to her royal lover. One day when the King was with her, and while her eldest boy, afterwards Duke of St Alban's, was playing in the room, she called, in a petulant tone—"Come here, you little bastard!" The King was affronted and hurt, and reproved Mistress Nelly, who meekly replied, "that indeed she was sorry, but had no better name to give him, poor boy!" In a few days afterwards, the nameless young gentleman was created Baron of Heddington, and Earl of Barford; and afterwards Duke of St Albans, Grand Falconer of England, &c. &c. He married the daughter of the Earl of Oxford, the greatest heiress in wealth and descent in the three kingdoms. So much better is it to be born the bastard of one of the worst of Kings, than the legitimate son of the most virtuous philosopher that ever breathed! The portraits in the Third Part of this elegant book, are those of the Countess of Rochester; a Mrs Lawson, a placid, comely personage, about whose history there is some obscurity; the Countess of Chesterfield; and the Countess of Dorset.

Three Years' Practical Experience of a Settler in New South Wales.

This experience is detailed in a series of letters to the author's relations in Edinburgh. The amount of it is—young men in vigorous health, possessed of some capital, (say from £500 to £1,500,) who are indefatigable in exertion, and contented and cheerful in the midst of the privations of the bush, may, in the course of a few years, lay the foundation of prosperity in New South Wales; but as agriculturists and sheep-farmers only. Little hope is held out in any other line of enterprise. The colony is overstocked with merchants, lawyers, and professional men. The writer's representations appear strictly truthful; but still, there is about all emigrant letters, a touch of "The Fox" who had lost his tail. The pamphlet is, however, well worth the attention of persons revolving the mighty change, in addition to their other reading upon the state of the colony. The author partakes of the common jealousy which all the colonists seem to entertain of Van Diemen's Land. It is "a poor, miserable, expensive place, no more to be compared to New South Wales than Scotland is to England, as far as the natural fertility of the soil goes." He indicates one advantage possessed by Van Diemen's Land. It does not seem, even yet, that the range of temperature in New South Wales is accurately ascertained. In Goulburn plains, where it is much cooler than about Sydney, we hear of the thermometer, at 146 in the sun, and 95 in the shade!—yet, the climate is said to be agreeable, even in the heats; and in the interior there are no mosquitoes. In respect of climate, Van Diemen's Land has, we suspect, a very decided superiority.

Life in the bush, to a young and hardy settler, of vigorous out-door habits, must possess a certain charm. A few weeks of it would be delightful to any one; but when it is continued all the year round, it requires the principle of duty, the animation of hope, and the stimulus of interest, to make it at all endurable to educated men. As the pamphlet is not likely to reach our English and Irish readers, we shall select a few specimens of its rude, but lively and vigorous contents. But first, this piece of advice and statistics, given by a friendly settler, for the guidance of the writer:—

"The same opinion I would give to another, and the same I would take myself, were I in his situation. In the first place, I must acquaint you that £300 is but a drop in the bucket to commence settling with, even if he understood how to make the best of it; however, I think if he could not employ himself profitably in Sydney, it would do him a service to see the country; but, before he turns settler he must know how to work. By the by, I will explain how he may invest his capital profitably while he is seasoning his fingers. He must not be above soiling them—he must think it no degradation to load a dung cart, and drive a team of bullocks; in fact, he must be a perfect farmer, and he should and must learn, if he wishes to prosper in this country, to be industrious; he must plough his own ground, sow and reap, and afterwards not be above grinding it. When he can do all this, and be content that God has given him bodily strength sufficient for it, then he will become a rich man. In seven years' time, with his capital judiciously managed, he will be worth £1500 per annum. But in the first outset he must be frugal as well as industrious. He must do without grog—such a thing must never be known to be in his possession. He must be always content to live on corn, beef, and bread—his industry will give him vegetables; and, if he can indulge himself some months in the year with tea, he is a fortunate fellow. He will think this hard quarters; but he will find many better ways of laying out his cash than in living in luxury. He will have time enough to do so when his fortune is made. He must also be of a good disposition, to govern his men well; yet he must be determined, and he must live himself as they live—only at arm's length, and in their proper places of course. Now for my advice. Let him purchase 300 good sound ewes, and give them out to some honest man on the usual conditions—viz., thirds of increase and wool. In three years' time, he may begin for himself—he will by that time, if ever, be acquainted with the customs of the country, and probably the management of his own establishment. Now, let us see how our calculation will stand:—

1836 . . .	270 do. —	90

"You see, in three years from November 1834, which we will say is the time he will purchase, he will have 893 sheep, and £192:4s. returned to him for his £300. This is a moderate calculation, and is most likely to be exceeded; but you will not be able to trace it, as I have cut off for deaths, casualties, odd numbers, &c. &c."

The author of the letters first entered into the employment of a rich settler, as a superintendent, at a salary of £40 a-year, and provisions. He afterwards acted nearly upon the advice given above. While still a superintendent, he bought sheep and cows on his own account, and hired a man to take care of them upon some vacant Government ground. Squatters, or more properly rangers over unsold pasture-ground, appear quite common in the interior, leading their flocks and herds, in patriarchal fashion, into the wilds, wherever they choose, and can find pasture. Of his first stock, the emigrant says—

I engaged a squatter of the name of William Regan to take care of them and victual them; he gets wheat at 5s. per bushel, and beef, as required, at 14d. per lb. This Regan milks about sixty cows every morning. I'll get six rams from this estate, and also six cows with calf. I'll put them all there, and, besides the yearly income from them, I expect in two years to have 1200 sheep, and above twenty cattle. I'll then can go and set up for myself, when I please and where I please, for there is no necessity for buying land at all, till I want some place I can call my own. I can get a comfortable wooden house put up anywhere for £6 or £8. You can see from this, how easy it is in this country to make money. With my prospects here, I would not go to live in Sydney for £300 a-year; because, if I got an office in a public situation, there I would stick, with little hopes of advancement, as so many new comers with high recommendations step forward, and the last is always most thought of, and popped into any place that is vacant; besides, the expense of a Sydney life is very great. Now, my income should be a constantly increasing one; so you see the reasons of my choice. I cannot err in my calculations, for it is nothing but what all others who have got on here have gone through.

This letter was written in February 1835, and the result, as shewn by other letters, more than two years later in date, justifies his calculations. By that time he was settled in Gatton Park, a farm which he rented in Goulburn Plains, at a very moderate rate, we presume; but the sum is left blank. He describes himself, in July 1837, in this sort:—

I have a house of four rooms, a detached kitchen and stores; it is a large house for a family in this country; but, as for that, I could build as many rooms as I please in a month, quite complete from the day I first put the axe to the tree, without any expense but £1 for two windows, and 30s. for sawn timber for flooring boards.

I can sell as much poultry, butter, eggs, ham, &c., as I can raise, and all at Goulburn, where, twelve months ago, there was hardly a house. I send to Goulburn, twelve miles away, once a week, on Saturdays, 20 to 30 lbs. butter, and get 1s. 6d. and 1s. 8d. a-lb. for it. I will now tell you how a farm goes on here. I have six convict servants, one free shepherd, three with the sheep, two ploughmen, two bullock-drivers, one boy who looks after the cattle, and helps to milk, and one milkman, dairyman, overseer house-servant, and who sells the butter every week, a very honest faithful fellow he is, but, being a prisoner, I cannot use the authority I give him, for much. I send my wheat to Mr Kinghorn's mill to grind, at 1s. per bushel. I give the men 6 lbs. flour, and 8 lbs. beef per week, and as much skimmed milk as they fairly can use; and 1 lb. sugar and 2 oz. tea when at harder work, as splitting timber in the bush, &c. When I want meat, I kill a bullock or a sheep, &c., for I have hardly enough to keep me of beef; I salt it down into a cask, take the fat, sometimes 40 lbs., out of it, and melt it into a cask, and, having moulds, I make my candles as I want them. If I require a rope I take the hide to make one; but the head, tripe, heart, liver, &c., are eaten offal in most places, only I grudge to see the dogs eat so much. I have sixteen acres of wheat just coming up, and two acres of barley, twenty acres of oat hay, which has grown a crop in that same field every year, without ploughing or sowing for the last five years, at least half an acre of peas, and two acres getting ready to put in potatoes and turnips next September.

I have had to pay 10s. a-bushel for wheat for my establishment for this year; the money for the butter will just keep me in it. Next year I shall sell 300 bushels at 7s. or 8s., and have always a good stock; also about six or eight tons hay at £8, potatoes, barley, &c. If my harvest turn out anything good, as I trust in God it will, I shall owe no man anything, and have a little on hand to purchase what comes across me, and receive you all comfortably. As I am rather short of beef, I have fattened three pigs merely on the milk, that weighed 170 lbs. each, and next year I shall have a dozen to come in, and plenty waste wheat, barley, potatoes, &c., so that I expect never afterwards to buy beef as I have to do this year at 20s. per 100 lbs.; that is, I killed the beast, got the hide, offal, fat, &c., and paid for the remainder at that rate. I have some of my own; but they are not of good age till next year, so I thought it best to keep them till then. I intend to put in fifteen acres more wheat next season, as I have the ground all clear; if you require more, why then I must make it fifteen more the year after, for I can put in 200 if I like; when I want string, I go to the bush, about half a mile, and get as much as would last for 100 years, free, gratis, for nothing; as for grates, they are unknown in this wood-consuming country, so that actually what is there to buy for a family? 1 chest (64 lbs.) of tea, £5; 10s. 1s. 8½d. per lb.; 4 cwt. sugar, £5; 10s., 3d. per lb.; a little mustard, pepper, &c. Now, where is the expense. I would like to know?—only clothing, and that is not so dear as I thought it would be. If we cannot live, and live well with as much beef, flour, eggs, poultry, butter, cheese, vegetables, milk, fruit, &c., as we can possibly use, I do not know how we are to live at all. Land can be got as well now as ever, only one must go farther away for it; but civilization goes on in the bush so rapidly, that, before one could get himself turned over in his farm, he might find a town alongside of him.

There was only one house at Goulburn eighteen months ago, and now I am sure there are 300 inhabitants, and brick-houses rising like mushrooms.

To his mother, the settler continues the same details.

There is a church building at Goulburn, to which we could go every Sunday in a gig; for keeping ponies costs nothing here, and I have one which goes thither in a light cart with fresh butter every Saturday. Gigs are used in every family in the country; and, as brood mares are a very profitable stock to keep, it is only working one of them at any rate. What is there to buy here for use, except tea and sugar?—and these cost 1s. 8d. and 8d. per lb. I get land almost for nothing—men from government for nothing—no taxes—none of the thousand things that take away money continually at home. I have plenty of cattle and sheep to keep the farm in abundance; and as for wheat, I could grow 1000 bolls a-year, if there were people to eat it or to buy it. As for clothes, I have not spent £10 on them since I came to the colony: they are very little dearer than at home—nay, if you like, I can give you the wool, and you can make your own blankets and coarse woollens, as some farmers do.

The ceiling is generally made of bark laid on the tie beams, and whitewashed, or often no ceiling at all but the roof, where the fitches of bacon and ham hang to delight the eye. The common bedsteads are what are called stretchers, like camp-stools, but six and a half feet long. But, being ambitious, I cut down a sapling as thick as my arm, and made a four-legged bed, for posted I cannot call it, as posts it has none. Few houses have passages, only one sitting room, opening right out, with the bedrooms opening off it, though sometimes they have a back door, with a sort of passage, the kitchen almost always detached from the house; and as for the population, for the first two months after I came here, I had neither lock upon the door, nor bolt on window shutter, for I had no windows then, and with not a free man but myself in the place, yet I never missed a thing except a little tobacco, I put a chair at the back of the door when I went to bed, to keep the dogs from pushing it open during the night. Shew me the house in Edinburgh that you could do the like.

September, 1837.—I have just got my barn finished, and am busy planting potatoes, and other garden stuffs, to have plenty for you. I have just had about twenty new cows calved, and am making butter and cheese in lots; one of my swine has just had nine pigs, and I expect a brood of ducks out in three days more, so you see everything is making ready for you. Several people from Spencer's Gulf Colony, (South-west Coast,) have come here to buy cattle, and some of them are to stop here altogether. I see by the papers, the lamentable state of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland; if we had some twenty or thirty thousand of them, we could get on as fast again. A committee has been sitting here for some time, and upon the evidence given, it is stated, that 10,000 labourers are needed to fill up the present wants. Wages £20 to £30, and everything found them; mechanics, £50 to £60, and everything found. Several of the extensive settlers have sent home on their own account for farm servants and mechanics, principally from Scotland.

Keep yourselves as separate as possible at first on board when you come, for there are often some quarrelsome people among the passengers.

You will need some warm clothing for the voyage; for, except right under the line, the weather never feels very hot, and sometimes very cold. On this side of the line, you will feel it very cold, as our winter begins in May, and the transition from a vertical sun is a good deal felt; otherwise, it is as pleasant a life on board as one can desire.

In a new colony, the price of labour varies so rapidly that we would not advise any one to trust implicitly to these specified rates. Both the colonial newspapers and the settlers naturally like to present the brightest side of the picture. It has no really dark spot, save the convict population; and for that a remedy seems approaching, in the abandonment of the system of transportation. We believe that some of the relatives of the writer of those letters, have either joined him at Gatton Park, or are on their way. If some one, properly qualified, would write the previous history of the families of many of the better class of emigrants—if such things durst be done—it ought to be at least as instructive to the people of the old country, as the letters of settlers are likely to prove useful to emigrants to the new colony.

Strangers' Guide through the United States and Canada.

This is rather a sweeping title; but the Guide certainly contains a good deal of useful information about the city and State of New York, the leading routes into and through Canada and the New England States. It also contains the routes, by the lakes, to the west; tables of distances, with maps; and brief notices of a few of the principal Atlantic cities; with lists of the canals and railroads in the whole States, and the distances and stages upon them.

Humour and Pathos; or, Essays, Sketches, and Tales, &c. &c. By G. R. Baxter.

These are clever, sprightly, brief effusions, of the kind which, at present, captivate "the town," or a prominent section of that great nondescript. The humour is more apparent than the pathos. Some of the papers have, we are told in the preface, already appeared in The Original, The Metropolitan Journal, and Tait's Magazine. Modesty and truth compel us to state that our share in the imputed honour, has been very small indeed, amounting to a very few pages of the whole.

The Travels of Minna and Godfrey in Holland.

This is the first volume of what may, in all likelihood, form a series; and, if the others keep up to the same pitch, an admirable one. The children travel with their father and aunt; and in their progress through the Dutch towns, every variety of popular information is given about the customs, manners, and condition of the people, in an easy and familiar manner. The work is chiefly intended for the juveniles; but it really forms for the papas and all sorts of elder people, pleasanter and more instructive reading than we find in many formal books of travel. This book has one charming feature—spirited, small, lithograph engravings, illustrative of the styles of the great Dutch and Flemish painters. We can conscientiously recommend this volume to those who select for young people.

A Series of Practical Discourses. By the Rev.

James Maclean, Minister of Urquhart.

These discourses are ushered into the world by a very modest and brief preface. "They pretend to no peculiar excellence, either of manner or style;" but the author, who composed them with an anxious view to the improvement of his particular flock, hopes that they may prove more extensively useful, and thus he publishes them. The sermons have the merit of brevity and plainness, and avoid those long-winded doctrinal discussions which tend not to the edification of a simple flock.

A Letter to Sir Francis Burdett, Chairman of the Committee of the Hampden Club, &c. &c.

By R. R. Pearce, of York.

This letter is a clever production, though we cannot help thinking the writer's time ill-bestowed in pouring more water upon a drowned rat. We did not imagine there was one sensible man in the three kingdoms who would now take the trouble to bestow even a twopence worth of advice and admonition upon the venerable chairman of the Hampden Club—"England's pride, and Westminster's glory!" It must be rather in warning to waverers, and to open the eyes of purblind Tories of Yorkshire to the true character of their newly, than from any hope of making an impression upon the vainest and most conceited as well as the most barefaced of political renegades. Mr Pearce has rapidly traced the public career of Burdett; and cuttingly contrasted the violent demagogue of former periods—the martyr of the Tower—the fierce denouncer of those "bloody Neroses," the Manchester and Cheshire yeomanry—who, forty-two years since, went into Parliament for a Yorkshire town as a Radical Reformer, and now returns the fêted idol of the rabid Tories of Leeds, Manchester, and Liverpool; but all the while, as he affirms, the one and the same Burdett—the same vain, fickle, jealous, political coxcomb, and loose-principled individual, though passing through so many Proteus shapes—the self-same Burdett, who has, through life, mistaken notoriety for fame, and to whom, consequently, notoriety, no matter how obtained, is as the breath of life, and who will, in all probability, go to the grave under the delusion that he is almost as great a man as some of the alty Tories would make him believe.

A Treatise on Music. By G. F. Graham, Esq. 4to. A. & C. Black, Edinburgh.

This is the Article on Music in the new edition of The Encyclopædia Britannica, reprinted from that work, with large additions, in the shape of an Introduction and an Appendix. The article is the most valuable we have met with, on the subject of music, in any similar work.

It embodies the acquisitions of a life which has been in a great measure devoted to the study of musical science. Of the additions we cannot speak, having only received the treatise as we were going to press; but, from a cursory glance at their contents, they seem worthy of the principal work. In a future number, we hope to be able to bestow that extended notice on Mr Graham's book which its uncommon merit entitles it to receive.

A BATCH OF NEW NOVELS.

Apologies for novel-reading are no longer offered or sought. All the world reads the new novels, and a great portion of it with insatiable, devouring appetite. It, indeed, evinces no slight degree of self-control to close the fascinating, drab-coloured 12mo, at the proper hour at night, and not open it again till after breakfast and family prayers are over next morning. Those who eschew the theatre and the opera, the race-course and the hounds in full cry, are but the more likely to yield to the blandishments, the soft seduction, of the novel. Romances, at least since the days of Gray, are nowhere more diligently perused, though sometimes under the rose, than in the seats of learning. An English parsonage is the very place to meet with and enjoy a novel; nor do Dissenters altogether escape the prevailing epidemic. Novels have been heard of among the Baptists; they are making way among the Quakers. Mr Wilberforce was, in his day, a considerable novel reader. Robert Hall read novels; and they constituted, to the very worst of them, the daily bread of Crabbe. There wont to be shame, doubt, or an awkward bashfulness among the grave and the pious, suspected of this mode of amusement; and among the learned and philosophic, ineffable scorn of a frivolous and enervating pursuit. But strong is frail human nature, and will prevail: so, while "man is dear to man," and while human beings hope and fear, and plan and scheme, and build castles in the air, the whole race, each after his or her kind, will own the enchantment of these tableaux vivans, of many-coloured life. The power of the drama will fail before that of the novel; nor is the reason of this difficult or obscure.

Our present purpose, however, is, very briefly, to direct attention to a few of the more attractive of the recent novels. And, first, in right of ladyhood, were it no more, Mrs Hall's LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF IRISH LIFE. We consider the tales which bear this charmed title, the finest of Mrs Hall's productions, and every way superior to her historical romances. Here she knows her ground, and thus occupies it with ease and mastery. The bulk of the tales have already appeared in annuals and magazines; but they well deserve to be collected. The personages of the tales are generally of the lower class of Irish peasants or small farmers, beggars, servant girls, and the boys and maidens of the cabins. The stories are generally utilitarian in design; but they are not for that the less amusing; and the mere object of the authoress, even if it had not been so cleverly worked out, is entitled to hearty praise. It is to make the character of the Irish more extensively known and better understood; to excite a generous sympathy for their sufferings, a kind indulgence towards their faults, and a just appreciation of their virtues. The first volume of three is filled with an original tale—"The Groves of Blarney." It is not, however, equal in delineation of national character to the less pretending stories. Two English sisters, one grave, strongly-principled, and somewhat austere; and the other gay, saucy, and coquetish—are well depicted, especially the latter. So are their respective bachelors, both genuine Irishmen, though of very opposite characters.

Our next novel, THE COURTIER'S DAUGHTER, by Lady Stepany, we consider, a rather unfortunate cross, between the modern fashionable novel, and the linsey-wolsey commodity that wont to be so largely manufactured by the Minerva loom. It will, however, suit the green appetite of youth, always more keen than discriminating, perfectly well. Lady Stepmey seems to have but vague ideas of social morals, and even of poetic justice. Her lax and intriguing gouvernante, with her false, coquettish, and ambitious daughter, may pass among the quality; but they fall so immeasurably below the moral standard of reflecting persons of lower ranks, that they either merit final reprobation, or, at all events, corrective punishment.

NOURMAHAL, by Mr Quin, the author of "A Steam Voyage down the Danube," is an oriental, and partly an historical romance; gorgeous and brilliant, and admitting in its details of swelling descriptions, and all the pomp and pageantry of eastern life. Combined with those, and far more captivating, are charming pictures of the primitive simplicity of the pastoral state among the eastern tribes, mingled with the stir and vicissitude of predatory warfare. The author, who has some personal knowledge of Asiatic manners, has carefully investigated popular sources of information; and altogether he has produced, if not a vigorous, yet a brilliant romance, which will at once charm and instruct.

HOMEWARD BOUND is not, by many degrees, equal to the best of Cooper's achievements in nautical fiction, or in Yankee manners-painting. But it is a very readable work, notwithstanding it betokens that the author has nearly worked out his original vein.

LEILA is essentially a picture-book tale. Its author, Mr Bulwer, has become, if not the defeat—for the ladies beat him at the pretty fabrics—yet the most fashionable artist in the Bath-bound and gilt-paper toyshop of literature. "Leila" is a melo-dramatic tale, full of theatrical shifts and turns, signifying either Nothing, or his next brother, Shade. Even this rapid bolstering is better than those tales of the Fee-fa-fum school, to which Mr Bulwer has of late betaken himself—the Brummagen Melmoths and Manfreds.

OUTWARD BOUND. It is not a little provoking that while the author of "Rattlin the Reeler" displays in this novel more vigour and maturity of intellect, a wider range of thought, fancy, and imagery, he should have wilfully marred the effect of his obvious improvement, by the most dangerous and reprehensible error which a fictionist can commit. He has chosen to rest the main interest of his romance, or, at least, that interest which elings the most pertinaciously to the imagination of the reader, upon the secret struggles of an incestuous passion. The theme is far more revolting and not much more appropriate than would be the minute details of some loathsome, leprous disease, with which the hero might chance to be afflicted. The author has been seduced by the example of certain of the modern French novels; and, though he has not fallen into the grossness and depravity of that detestable school, he has sometimes contrived to be fully more disgusting. This is the more unfortunate, as the fault, which pervades but a small portion of the work, poisons the whole to the reader.

COUNT CAGLIOSTRA, OR THE CHARLATAN, is perhaps the most remarkable of the recent batch of novels for originality and vigour. It is a tale of France, in the years immediately preceding the Revolution; and the elements which led to that terrific moral explosion, are first seen quietly gathering, then gradually bursting into fierce contention, until the scene closes with that grand type of the annihilation of the ancient tyrannies—the demolition of the Bastille. "The Charlatan" is, however, only a sketch, a dashing outline; the material of two volumes having been, not spun out by the author, but, to speak technically, spaced out to three by the printer; thus making a very bad circulating-library-reader's pennyworth.

MEDICAL BOOKS.

An important work, which many have heard of and few have seen, has been reprinted by Dr Combe of Edinburgh, from the American edition, with notes, a preface, and concluding remarks. The work is Dr Beaumont's EXPERIMENTS AND OBSERVATIONS ON THE GASTRIC JUICE, AND THE PHYSIOLOGY OF DIGESTION, made in the course of his long attendance on Alexis St Martin, a young French Canadian, whose stomach was accidentally perforated by a musket-shot. The outlines of this singular case are known to all the medical men of Europe; but their knowledge of the details is still, we imagine, very imperfect. Dr Beaumont's observations were continued for eleven years. Even to non-professional readers, the detail of his processes and their results, is highly interesting; to professional men, they must form an anxious study. Dr Combe, in his work on the "Physiology of Digestion," proposed that means should be taken by some of our scientific societies, to induce St Martin to come over to this country, that the subject might be more fully investigated, under the inspection of a committee of their members. He says, truly, that an opportunity of this kind may never occur again, and that it would be cause of regret and reproach, if it were allowed to pass away without being improved. Dr Combe, however, passes the highest eulogiums on the zeal, integrity, and freedom from theoretical prejudice with which the American physician prosecuted his singular experiments.

Elements of Physiology. By Dr Thomas Johnstone Aitkin.

This work, like many of the best scientific treatises which have been lately published, is of an essentially popular character. As its subject is the physical constitution of man, the nature of his senses, and his various functions, it is written so as to be understood by all men. It contains little speculative disquisition, and numerous facts, an immense accumulation of information, well arranged and clearly expressed, but not, as it appears to us, much original knowledge; to display which is, however, not the object of the writer, who claims to be a popular expositor of results, not a discoverer in science. The moral of the treatise is, that, were mankind a little better informed than they generally are, of the constitution of their own bodies, they would be more careful to avoid the causes which derange animal functions, destroy their health, and shorten their lives; and few would become the dupes and victims of quacks.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE proceedings since the meeting of Parliament after the Easter recess, have excited little attention. On the 15th of May there was a trial of strength on the Irish Tithe Bill, when the Ministry was victorious, by a majority of 317 to 298. The appropriation clause, about which so much has been said for some years, has been omitted in the present bill; but whether the measure will be allowed by the Lords to become law, is very doubtful, although the Duke of Wellington expressed a wish, on 29th June last, to see bills for a reform of the Irish corporations, for a poor-law for Ireland, and for the settlement of the Irish Tithe Question, carried through. The Scotch bills, after numerous postponements, are moving slowly on; and the Court of Session Bill has passed the Commons. The Prisons Bill ought to be looked to with some care, for the principles of the assessment is quite erroneous. In the bill of last year, the assessment was imposed according to the population—the only true criterion; but this year population is combined with the amount of crime—an alteration which has the effect of increasing the assessment of the county of Edinburgh by fifty per cent. Large towns give shelter not only to their own criminals, but to those of the surrounding counties, which appear to be free of crime than they would be, were there no large towns for their criminals to harbour in.—Mr Baines has rather unexpectedly made some progress with a bill for augmenting the poorer livings of the Church of England, at the expense of the dignified clergy; but, of course, the bill will not be allowed to pass, for this is not a shape in which the piety of Members of Parliament delights to show itself. Notwithstanding the immense wealth of the English Church, it appears, from the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that there are 1912 livings under £100 a-year, 1692 between £100 and £150, and 1362 between £150 and £300. By the old law, the Crown was entitled to the first fruits and tenths of each benefice. By an act of Queen Anne, these were devoted to the augmentation of the smaller livings; but the intention of the legislature has been shamefully evaded by the higher clergy, who, instead of paying according to the present value of their benefices, adhere to an old valuation made several hundred years ago, and which was notoriously inadequate at the time. The annual value of the revenue liable to tenths and first fruits, is three millions. The tenths are £300,000; and the first fruits may be taken at £200,000; together, half a million; but instead of this sum being paid by the higher to the inferior clergy, the actual receipts from both sources are only £13,500 a-year. Mr Talfourd's Copyright Bill has got into committee by a majority of 119 to 52. The subject has led to much discussion, as to the nature of property; and, what is remarkable, land—which in reality belongs to the community—has been assumed as private property, the title to which is of the most perfect nature. An attempt was made by Mr Hume to stop the King of Hanover's pension, as Duke of Cumberland; but the Ministry, backed by the Tories, defeated the motion by 97 to 62—no fewer than 74 of the majority being Tories. Were the Duke to succeed to the throne of Britain, we doubt not he would become as popular as all our Kings and Queens have generally been; and we see by this vote, that it was merely for factious purposes that the Whigs abused the Duke of Cumberland during the elections.

ENGLAND.

THE CORN-LAWS.—Lord John Russell states that the chief object of the Reform Bill was to make the landowners dominant in Parliament; and the object has unquestionably been accomplished. No interest but their own ever appears to be thought worthy of consideration. Colonel Seale's bill for allowing foreign grain in the Queen's warehouses to be ground, has been rejected by 220 to 160. This, we think, is a matter not to be regretted, as the bill was a paltry measure; and its rejection shews distinctly there is no chance of any alleviation of the starvation laws until the people seriously take up the question, and concentrate their energies on this single subject. The Marquis of Chandos says the agriculturists want to be let alone. We are glad they have at last discovered that Parliament cannot do more than give them the monopoly of the home market; but they have been very long in making the discovery. But to be let alone is precisely what those who are not of the landed interest wish. They wish that the landowners should not prevent them consuming foreign food, if they prefer it to British. The price of wheat is now sixty shillings a-quarter, having risen rapidly for some time past; and the prospect of the coming crop is not by any means flattering. The accounts from the manufacturing districts are generally gloomy; and it appears that the Americans will not be able to take any large quantity of our manufactures for a year or two yet. A period of distress for the working classes may therefore be anticipated, in which the pressure of the Corn-Laws will be felt with unusual severity. One of the severest effects of these laws has not hitherto been prominently brought forward; we allude to an insufficient quantity of food predisposing to disease and increasing mortality. Mr Milne, in his able treatise on annuities, furnishes numerous tables, applicable both to this country and other states of Europe shewing that a high price of grain tends directly to an increase of mortality. The result of the information to be derived from these tables we give in his own words (p. 390.) "It will be observed that any material reduction of the price of wheat is almost always accompanied by an increase both of the marriages and conceptions, and by a decrease in the number of burials. Also that any material rise in the price of wheat is generally attended by a corresponding decrease in the marriages and conceptions, and by an increase in the burials." The following is part of his "Table No. 1, exhibiting the progress of the population of England and Wales, and the price of wheat from the year 1789 to 1810."

Year.	Marriages.	Burials.	Price of Wheat per Quarter.
1798	79,477	187,531	60s. 3d.
1799	77,557	189,586	67s. 6d.
1800	69,851	208,063	113s. 7d.
1801	67,228	204,434	118s. 3d.
1802	90,396	199,889	67s. 5d.
1803	94,379	203,728	56s. 6d.
1804	86,738	181,177	60s. 1d.
1805	79,586	181,240	87s. 10d.
1806	80,754	183,452	79s.
1807	83,923	195,867	73s. 8d.
1808	82,248	200,763	79s.
1809	83,369	191,471	95s. 7d.
1810	84,470	208,184	106s. 2d.

The immense increase of mortality in the two dear years, 1800 and 1801, over the previous years, will be observed; and also that the population was so weakened by the high price of food in those two years, that the deaths did not return to the standard of 1798-9 till 1804—all the weak individuals being killed by the diseases induced by an insufficient quantity of food. A rise of nearly fifty per cent. in the price of wheat had no very perceptible effect on the mortality that year, but shewed itself in the usual manner during the next two years; and matters having returned to their natural level, a rise of about ten per cent. in the price in 1810, was followed by a corresponding increase in the number of deaths. We believe that this shews the atrocity of the Corn-Laws in a new light. We hope the fair sex will attend to their effect upon marriages.

INEQUALITY OF TAXATION; AUCTION DUTIES.—We have often pointed out the unjust manner in which the taxation of this country is imposed, and shewn that the principle on which the Legislature appears to act, is to tax the poor and allow the rich to escape. An additional illustration of this principle is to be found in the "Law of Auctions," on which a practical Treatise has just been published,* which ought to be in the hands of every one conducting sales by auction. It seems not very comprehensible why lands or goods sold by auction should pay a duty, while those sold privately pay none; and the only explanation that can be given of this anomaly is, that it is the lands and goods of the poor or distressed which are disposed of in this way, with whom our rich legislators cannot be supposed to have any sympathy. In troops of wolves, wild dogs, or other beasts of prey, if any of them is wounded or disabled by disease or accident, all the rest fall upon him and quickly put an end to his troubles; and the man of fallen fortunes generally experiences the same sort of treatment in modern society. However respectable his character may have been held during his prosperity, it almost uniformly, however unjustly, suffers in public estimation when adversity approaches; and the legislature commonly steps in to give him a push in his downward career, by taking part of those means which are already inadequate for the demands upon them. But it is amusing to examine the manner in which the "Landed Interest" have looked to themselves in this branch of taxation. In general, to entitle one to act as an auctioneer, he must have a general license, which costs £5 a-year; and, if he sell any articles for the trading in which an Excise or Stamp-Office license is specially required, he must take out such license, in addition to his license as auctioneer. There are no fewer than nine sorts of these special licenses; and, to enable an auctioneer to sell all sorts of articles, he would require to take out ten licenses annually, at an expense of £40: 7s. But, whenever the interest of the landowners comes into play, any one may act as auctioneer without any license whatever. Among the exemptions from the license duty, we find—"Sales by auction of any goods distrained for rent, or for non-payment of tithes; any auction held on account of any lord or lady of any manor, for granting rights to lands, or for letting any estate; the sale of woods; produce of mines or quarries; sale of cattle, live or dead stock, corn, or the unmanufactured produce of land—provided such sale be on the land producing the articles sold, and by the owner of such land, or his steward, or agent." In this manner "the landed interest" has rid itself entirely of the tax imposed on the other classes of the community, in the shape of auctioneers' licenses. Then, as to the auction duty itself—it amounts, on sales of ordinary goods, to 1s. a pound; but, when any landed estate, plate, or jewels—that is property of an aristocratic nature—come to be sold, the duty falls to 7d. per pound; and sheep's wool, the produce of the united kingdom, only pays 2d. when sold the first time, for it is with that sale alone the landed interest have any concern. But farther, all sales of woods, minerals, agricultural produce, sales under distress for rent, and, in short, all articles which can be sold by any one without an auctioneer's license, as mentioned above, we find, are equally exempt from auction duty. It would hardly be supposed, that any set of men could have gone to work in so barefaced a manner, to exempt themselves from taxation at the expense of the unrepresented classes. Under such a system of taxation as that existing in this country, it is in vain to talk of any interest but the landed being represented in Parliament as at present constituted. The tax thus levied is far from inconsiderable. The sum raised by auction duties annually, within the United Kingdom, is about £250,000; and, by licenses of all sorts, (from which the "landed interest" are, of course, entirely exempted,) considerably above a million; so that we have here a beautiful instance of the principle on which our taxation is founded.

The "Law of Auctions" has appended to it copious appendices of forms in use in practice, and of statutes and reported cases relative to auctions; and contains, in short, all the information necessary to the correct management of the business of an auctioneer, and the avoidance of the heavy penalties any infringement of the excise regulations imposes.

NEWSPAPER TAXES.—The increase in the number of stamps sold, comparing the half year ending 15th September 1836, with that ending 15th March 1838, is from 35,576,000 to 53,284,000; that is, 50 per cent. on the former number. In the London press, the increase has been 50 per cent.; in the English provincial, 84 per cent.; and in Scotland, 67 per cent.: in Ireland, it has only been 2 per cent. Fifteen newspapers have been started in London, where there are now 86; 29 in the English provinces, where there are now 223; 12 in Scotland, where there are now 66; and there are 12 fewer in Ireland, where the total number is now 62. The reduction has caused a loss to the revenue of £200,000 per annum.

PUBLIC REVENUE.—The gross receipt for 1837 in Britain was £48,032,000
In Ireland, 4,531,000

The net income, £46,475,000

The expense of collection in Britain was £6:3—in Ireland, £12:7:4 per cent. Notwithstanding the repeal of taxes, the sums actually drawn from the people and the expenditure of Government are annually increasing. In the year 1835, the expenditure (including the expense of collecting the revenue) was £48,600,000; in 1836, £48,764,000; in 1837, upwards of £50,000,000; and in 1838, £51,318,000. In 1835, the surplus revenue was two millions; now there is a deficiency of £710,000; and the war in Canada will render the deficiency still greater in the current year. At the end of the 23d year of profound peace, our navy, army, and ordnance absorb twelve and three-quarter millions of our revenue—our debt nearly thirty—leaving not four millions for all the other expenses of the State. The revenue is principally raised by duties on five articles only—malt, four millions and a half; sugar, five and a quarter; tobacco, three and a half; tea, three and a half; spirits, nearly five; in all, twenty-three millions; and from duties falling under the management of the commissioners of stamps, nearly nine millions. This shows how effectual would be the plan of the Birmingham Union for obtaining a reform of abuses—viz., the abstaining from the use of articles which had paid the duties of customs and excise—could it be carried into effect. The expenditure exceeding the income last year, a reduction of 10 per cent. on the consumption of the five articles we have enumerated, would either force Parliament to yield to the People's demands, or to impose a property-tax. In either view, a great benefit would be gained by those who have nothing to depend on but their labour, hitherto nearly the exclusive object of taxation in this country; while property, and especially property in land, has almost solely been regarded by the laws as worthy of protection. The cause is obvious—a Parliament of landowners, to the exclusion of every other class; for even the representatives of the English and Irish boroughs are obliged to have £300 a-year in land as a qualification for a seat.

SCOTLAND.

THE CHURCH.—While so much clamour is made for additional endowments, and so many new churches are building, no attention seems to be paid to how the present incumbents perform their duties. It is pretty notorious, that, in many parishes, their duties are grossly neglected; and it would appear to be absolutely necessary that an officer should be appointed to attend to this matter, as the existing church judicatures do not exercise any effectual control. In Edinburgh, and other large towns, a large proportion of the clergy do not reside within their parishes, unless these parishes happen to comprise a fashionable part of the town; and some of them spend the greater part of the year at a distance of six or eight miles from town. But the manner in which the country clergy neglect their duties, could hardly be believed. Dr Cook stated, in the General Assembly, that, in Bracadale, and other parishes in the Isle of Skye, vigorous efforts were required, not merely to revive Christianity, but to Christianize the land; Principal Dewar said, that the Lord's Supper had not been dispensed in the parish for nineteen years; and Mr Carment remarked, "that, if he were not afraid of an action for libel, he could tell of cases much worse than this, both in the Highlands and Lowlands," and no one contradicted him. What security is there that the clergy, who are to receive the additional endowments, will perform their duties more efficiently than the present incumbents?

Dr CHALMERS has been lecturing in London for the purpose of maintaining the establishment of black Prebacy, at the rate of £50 a-lecture—the service of the Church of England being performed before the commencement of each lecture; and this proceeding appears to excite no animadversion from his clerical brethren. What would the heroes of Drumclog and Airmoos have thought of such conduct on the part of a professor of divinity? One of the topics which the doctor has been very eloquent on, is, the independence of the Kirk of Scotland—a Church which, he says, admits of no superior upon earth. But the Kirk is as much under the power of Parliament as any other body of men in the kingdom. At the Reformation, the Queen and Parliament abolished Popery, and established Presbyterianism, which it again abolished for Episcopacy; and the struggle between Episcopacy and Presbyterianism continued, with various success, until the Revolution of 1688. Neither is it in the mere external form of the Kirk that the Parliament has uniformly exercised control, but in the fundamental doctrines of religion themselves. The original Confession of Faith, was not held to have any obligatory force, till "red in the face of Parliament, and ratified by the Three Estates at Edinburgh, on 17th August, the zeir of God 1560 years." After the Revolution, the amended Confession of Faith was, by act 1690, c. 5, "ratified, established, and approved, as containing the sum and substance of the doctrine of the Reformed Churches;" and both confessions were copied at length into the statute book, that they might obtain the force of law. It is, indeed, vain to talk of independence, when it cannot be denied that Parliament might again substitute Episcopacy in the place of Presbyterianism, (a change which, we suspect, some of our clergy would not object to,) and as long as patronages—nearly a third of which are at the disposal of the Minister of the day—are allowed to exist. The Auchterarder case shows clearly the Kirk to be anything but independent.

MANUFACTURES AND AGRICULTURE.

It is a general notion in this part of the country, where we know nothing of large manufacturing establishments, that they tend greatly to the increase of vice and crime. This position might well have been doubted, considering the great provocations to vice and crime are idleness and want, both of which are, in a great measure, removed by the employment afforded to persons of all ages by manufactories. Mr Hill, in his Third Report on the state of Crime in Scotland, mentions that, among the most peaceable and honest places he visited, were Catrine and New Lanark, both seats of extensive cotton manufactories; while among those abounding in crime and disorder, were Biggar, Crieff, and Port-Patrick, all sequestered villages, where poets suppose that nothing but peace and happiness exist. The notion that manufacturing operatives are peculiarly addicted to crime, was indeed proved long ago to be false. By a Parliamentary return of the state of crime in Scotland in 1830, it was shewn that, while the proportion of thieves to the population was one in 1462 in the county of Edinburgh, it was only as one to 2097 in the manufacturing counties of Lanark and Renfrew. If more crime is found in towns than in the country, it is, in a great measure, because all the bad part of the country population resort to them. Mr Hill remarks, "that the same attention to the education, and generally to the happiness of the people of New Lanark, which existed when the mills were under the management of Mr Owen, appears to be paid by the present proprietor. And so successful is the system in preventing crime, that the procurator-fiscal for this ward of the county, who resides within a mile of New Lanark, told me that only two offences had come to his knowledge during the last six years. Catrine, in Ayrshire, is like New Lanark. It is a large country mill, in a picturesque situation, with the land all round belonging to one body of proprietors, who have the means, as they have also the wisdom and benevolence, to adopt such plans as are calculated to promote the real comfort and welfare of the people in their employment." "And," he adds, "notwithstanding what has been said on the subject of factories, I have no hesitation in declaring, that I believe that the work-people at Catrine, New Lanark, and other similar establishments, form some of the healthiest, happiest, and most moral communities in the world." Captain Williams, in his Second Report on the Prisons of England, corroborates Mr Hill's statement. He says—"The daily employment of children appears to be greatly influential in saving them from falling into crime. The annual number of this class of delinquents, in the New Bailey at Manchester, does not increase. In the House of Correction, at busy Preston, they are comparatively few. At Carlisle Jail, since the establishment of cotton manufactories, the chaplain has, from their diminution, found it unnecessary to continue them as a separate class of prisoners."

We believe that, if any one will take the trouble of examining for himself any of the large manufactories in Scotland, such as those at New Lanark, Catrine, or Deanston, near Doune, he will be convinced that the miseries of the factory system have been grossly exaggerated. He will find that the operatives, of all ages, are fully as healthy as those engaged in agricultural labour; he will be unable to discover the cases of distortion, of excessive labour, of suffering of any kind, so often talked of. He will, no doubt, regret to see children of ten years of age obliged to work at all, and that the hours of the adult operatives should be so long; but let him ask the cause of this, and consider who is to blame. Not the manufacturers, but the landowners, who, by their Corn-Laws, render the labour—and the long-continued labour—of every industrious man and child in this country a matter of imperious necessity, for the purpose of sustaining animal existence.

Let him, after examining the manufactories we have mentioned, and visiting the neat houses, gardens, and walks with which their masters have furnished the workmen, go into the counties of East Lothian, Berwick, and Roxburgh, so much boasted of for their advance in agriculture, and see how the ploughmen, the operatives of the landowners, are lodged. He will find each family in damp, dark, single apartments, unless it has been subdivided with wooden partitions at the occupant's own expense; the walls, in many instances, not plastered; and, in all, the floor consisting of nothing but the bare ground, and often below the level of the adjoining road, from which the rain water may be making its way into the interior of the hovel, which is lighted with one or two windows, consisting of four of the smallest panes of the coarsest glass. The windows are generally built in, so that it is impossible to open them for the purpose of airing the den. There is no such thing as a ceiling; nothing above them but the bare rafters and the thatched or tiled roof. Houses such as we describe are to be seen in all directions within five miles of Edinburgh. Though rents have increased fourfold within the last half century, the present labourers of the soil are lodged as indifferently as their grandfathers. Very little addition has been made to their wages; and any superior comforts they now possess—and they are very few and small, such as a cup of tea on Sunday—they owe entirely to the manufacturers, who have greatly reduced the price of cotton goods, the chief dress of agricultural labourers, male and female, and thus have enabled them to save something in the article of clothing. They have no books, except such as Boston's "Fourfold State," Ambrose's "Looking unto Jesus," "The Creak in the Loaf," and the Bible and Shorter Catechism; they never see a newspaper or periodical, to know what their fellow-men are doing or thinking; they have no society except the families on the farm. This state of seclusion becomes so hateful that they are glad to engage in any labour, however disagreeable, which removes them for a day from the farm; such as setting out at midnight, in the middle of winter, with grain to a distant market, &c. Their attendance at church is, in a great measure, for the purpose of hearing the news; and they generally assemble in the churchyard an hour before the commencement of service. Animal food, or malt liquor, the great body of the Scottish ploughmen never once taste, from one year's end to the other. Neither have they a sufficient quantity of fuel. The consequence is, that agricultural labourers are exhausted at a period of life when artisans are still in their vigour. A ploughman, in general, finishes his career at forty-five. No farmer then is willing to intrust him with a pair of horses. He must leave the farm on which, perhaps, he has been born, and every acre of which he has tilled for twenty successive years; retire to some village, and—after dragging out a miserable existence by breaking stones, or other odd jobs—working now, in his old age, by the piece, while, during the days of his vigour, he was hired by the year—if death does not relieve his woes, he has to become an applicant for parochial charity, and, if successful, he has grudgingly given him an allowance which would not keep a dog in health—1s. or 1s. 6d. a-week—and he, as well as all his connexions, are considered disgraced by the receipt of this miserable dole. The schools for the education of the children are, in many instances, no better than their parents' dens; and, as is well-known, no improvement has taken place in the mode of teaching for a century. The consequence is, that, from the want of books, and the bad modes of teaching, very few agricultural labourers can either read or write with facility. Some of our readers may think this statement of the condition of our agricultural labourers in our best counties—for it is of these counties alone we can speak from personal observation—is exaggerated; but we can assure them that there is not one ploughman out of ten who lives to the age of seventy, who does not follow out the course we have traced. Their treatment is perfectly disgraceful to all concerned. The horses and oxen are better lodged and better attended to, both in health and sickness. The farmer pays the horse's doctor; but the ploughman, if he chooses to have medical advice—and many die every year for the want of it—must pay for it as he best can, out of the produce of his own scanty earnings. Judge now whether agriculture, as practised among us, be more conducive to human happiness than manufactures.

POLITICAL POSTSCRIPT.

MONTH after month, and indeed ever since the commencement of the Session, we have, in relation to the Radical party, like Job's consolers, held reverential silence in presence of their sorrows, and waited with a patience which we call upon Mr O'Connell to laud, watching for any, even the faintest, indication of the Ministry he supports reconsidering the hostility to all important reforms boldly and arrogantly avowed by Lord John Russell in the opening debates, and since studiously confirmed by the sneers, as well as by the grave assertions of the Premier. It is scarcely necessary to say that we have waited in vain. We have not, however, to complain of disappointment. The Whigs have long ceased to delude any save willing dupes. Still we are resolved to wait silently, and as patiently and hopefully as the circumstances admit. Lord Durham's mediation may pacify Canada—the Whigs may do something for Ireland. We shall soon see. We do not wish to participate either in the utter despondency of some of the truest Reformers, or in the half-sullen, half-contemptuous feeling with which the great body of reflecting men of liberal opinions view a set of statesmen whom they regard as equally deficient in high principle and in capacity. Look to the late immense meetings for the abolition of slavery, and mark the language held in these assemblies by the purest-minded and most temperate Reformers, who were, till of late, the disinterested supporters of the Whig Administration. It is either that of condemnation and distrust, or of contempt and defiance. The political knowledge of the People has not more outgrown that of their rulers, than their moral feelings. Things cannot go on much longer in this way. The anomaly of the feeblest Government and the strongest Opposition ever known, with the great body of the People either coldly indifferent or hating the faction in opposition, while despising and distrusting the ruling one, cannot and ought not to exist much longer. The crash cannot be distant; and the Reformers can wait, if not for Whig improvement, then for Whig extinction. There is no medium. The first year of the new reign will speedily be rounded off by the pageant of the coronation. We shall have new Peers and new Representatives; and more party trials of strength, in and out of the House, will precede the prorogation of Parliament; and then comes the appropriate season for discussion. Then we may inquire what has really been done for Ireland, to compensate for the vital injuries which the party that Mr O'Connell patronises has inflicted upon the cause of freedom in England, Ireland, Scotland, and the Colonies, by their Conservative policy. Before many weeks elapse, the Reformers will be entitled to call upon the Irish Members, and all those professing Radical principles, to justify their support of the Government, by shewing what has been recently achieved for Ireland in particular, and what for the cause of general reform. Some one good measure will surely have been carried, which the Tories would not have granted, though we cannot guess its nature; some great and progressive principle of improvement will have been developed. We shall wait till every Irish question is settled, or cushioned for one more year; making the third in some cases, and the fourth and fifth in others. For us, Mr O'Connell shall this session, make the most possible of the Whigs, and that in his own way. His policy we do not consider the wisest any more than the most direct; but we shall judge it by its fruits; and, meanwhile, lay aside the great interests of the whole empire, Ireland included, as worthless immaterial things, so that the Whigs may be kept in place. Whether we shall first see the Whigs throw off Mr O'Connell and his allies, with as much scorn and heartier good-will than they have lately shewn in the case of the English Radicals, or the Irish reformed municipalities converted into close boroughs, to forward the great object of fortifying the Ministerial position, is not at present worth speculation. By the 1st of August, at the farthest, the problem will be solved. There will no longer be any remaining doubts concerning the motives which lead professing Reformers to support Lord Melbourne's Administration—nor will pretence or pretext be longer available.

The People must know why those calling themselves their friends uphold a party openly opposed to the general improvement of our institutions, and to every measure the most essential to their well-being; a party that gives them heavily-taxed food and a harsh Poor-Law as their best blessings; who consecrate the lash in the hands of the slave-owners; and practise with impunity, in Canada, what, if done at home, would raise the country in rebellion. Meanwhile, we are silent, having warned all professing Radical representatives to be prepared with their answers. Real, substantial measures will, we conceive, be the only effectual reply. The country will not accept of any other. A Government impotent for good, and borrowing strength from their Tory antagonists only to perpetrate mischief, to which it appears equally well-inclined, is the worst of all conceivable governments—intrinsically bad, and opposing insuperable obstacles to the accession of better men.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS OF M. DE TALLEYRAND PERIGORD.*

No statesman has lived more in the eye of Europe, for the last fifty years, than M. de Talleyrand. The wicked, the witty, the thoroughly selfish and conscienceless minister, the renegade aristocrat, the apostate priest—in one word, the Mephistopheles of modern diplomatists—might he be leathed, contemned, despised, or pitied; but he could not be forgotten. Talleyrand, though accidentally projected upon the new era by the explosion of the Revolution, belonged essentially to the ancien régime; and in him were combined the qualities of the most celebrated and of the worst statesmen of France for three centuries. To the duplicity of Richelieu, he united the cunning and rapacity of Mazarine; and the clear-headedness of Fleury, to the licentiousness of Dubois. His coolness and his penetration into the corrupt parts of human nature—his flexibility, pliancy, self-possession, and perfidiousness—wholly belonged to himself. In perfidy he had no rival: but then his predecessors had not been so tempted. It has been remarked, that this political Proteus, who is, at the same time, a perfectly consistent character, was never constant save to one principle—the interests of M. de Talleyrand. He died in possession of all that he had ever valued—immense wealth, the reputation of great talents, and the restorer of his family honours. He was certainly the most remarkable, as well as the most adroit waiter upon Providence that history records, though its pages blazon them of all shades and degrees of baseness. Yet even Talleyrand sometimes owed as much to chance, or what is vulgarly termed good luck, as to his foresight and finesse. As a hero of the Revolution, he necessarily had his share of hair-breadth 'scapes; and it was not until he had identified his security with the interests of his successive masters, that he was altogether safe. Long after there was no doubt left of his want of principle and perfidious character, he retained ascendancy, because he had made himself necessary. Neither the Directory, the First Consul, the Emperor in the plenitude of his power, nor the restored Bourbons, against all of whom he intrigued as soon as the time came when it served himself, could afford to dispense with his friendship. He had established a supremacy akin to witchcraft, and held more through the terrors than the hopes of those subjugated. How were the cabinets of Europe to be cajoled independently of him, who, singly, was more than a match for Pitt, Grenville, Castlereagh, Metternich, and Pozzo di Borgo? Metternich he pronounced the most promising of his pupils—the one who had done him most honour; and we can believe him. While Napoleon remained master of the Continent, Talleyrand might rather be called the political arbiter of Europe than the French Foreign Minister. He was the genius of Negotiation, as Bonaparte was the genius of War. It has been said that he followed Napoleon and the army as a surgeon goes to the field with duellists; and it cannot be doubted that he often gave good counsel in the circumstances. Moderation after victory, was the uniform policy of France, or what was called moderation. Had his counsels been followed, Napoleon might have died sovereign of France, and Talleyrand been spared a world of trouble, and the disgrace of triple treacheries. Little he cared what dynasty reigned in France, so that it worked well for M. de Talleyrand. There was thus an admirable simplicity in his views, and no complication in his motives of action. But with all his admitted capacity, the aims of Talleyrand's policy were as narrow as his path towards them was tortuous. He never seems to have looked beyond shifts for a few months or years. To consolidate the power of Napoleon, by a family alliance with Austria, to flatter the French People at all prices, and to preserve the balance of Europe according to his ideas of its proper adjustment, were the leading principles of his system—if a tissue of shifts deserve the name. The People, as a new, and by far the most important, element of society, never entered sufficiently into his calculations. He could deal with plenipotentiaries and outwit them, but he could not comprehend those new principles which move society in its depths. He could understand something of the turbulent and revolutionary tendencies of the populace of Paris or Lyons; but he never could comprehend, in its august grandeur and majestic bearings, that simple phrase—"The schoolmaster is abroad." The most Conservative statesmen of England outstripped him in the race, for they had started from loftier vantage ground. He forgot that to excite and to please an excitable people, and to govern them well, are very different things; and that the latter system alone can ensure permanent tranquillity, and place the social fabric on a broad and sure basis. His policy never held large discourse; nor is it improbable that the temper of his chief seldom allowed it to come fairly into play. Since the Revolution, the government of France has been chiefly guided, either by the Sovereign, as in the instance of Napoleon and Louis Philippe, or by bigots and favourites, as during the reign of Charles X. But a man so entirely devoted to self, was not likely to hazard anything with an imperious master, for the advancement of a principle. If Napoleon remained as long master of France as suited the purposes of Talleyrand, that was sufficient. If the Emperor sunk, he could swim with the Bourbons. If they were swamped in turn, he could save himself in the Orleans life-boat. This admirable master of shifts, subtleties, finesse, and diplomatic duplicity, besides the ordinary arts of flattery, exercised with no ordinary skill, could dexterously insinuate the advice which he perceived to be agreeable, and the political necessity of attaining an object from which conscience and feeling recoiled. He counselled the divorce with Josephine, as soon as he perceived it was desired by Bonaparte, as dexterously as he had done the assumption of the Consulate for life, and, finally, the imperial crown to which his master's ambition pointed. It has been justly said, that he never did anything without a motive of policy, and seldom committed a gratuitous crime, any more than a spontaneous act of benevolence. He was never a gratuitous traitor, and really displayed a magnanimous impartiality in adjusting the contending claims of the Napoleon and Bourbon dynasties, the scales only turning to the drachma's weight, which might be thrown in, of the personal interests of Talleyrand. He would, doubtless, have remained a Republican to his dying day, had the Convention and the Directory been able to support themselves. Yet is this cold, passionless, and thoroughly selfish man one more, and a very unnecessary proof, that an aristocrat by birth can never be ultimately depended upon as the friend of popular rights. This is a rule without a single exception. The man of caste may, for a season, act, like Egalité, the part of a ferocious Jacobin, or, like Burdett, that of a vain, arrogant, swaggering demagogue; but a steady and enlightened friend of the masses of mankind he never can become. The more deficient he is in moral sensibility, he may, for a time, recede the farther from the Order, upon which he is sure, if life be spared, to fall back, with all the rancour and debasement of the conscious renegade. Talleyrand Perigord, sprung from one of the most ancient of the noble families of France, became a flaming Republican; betrayed the Directory; paved the way to the ambitious career of the First Consul, of the First Consul for Life, and, finally, the Emperor; and, by his intrigues, almost effected the restoration of the Bourbons; while the dregs of his diplomacy, the lees of his fraud and guile, were expended in aiding the machinations of the younger branch of the house of Bourbon against the liberties of France. There is no traitor to freedom to be compared with the renegade aristocrat who has at one time professed Republican or Radical sentiments. There was but one principle more powerful in the mind of Talleyrand than the instincts of aristocracy: the intense love of self was, in his case, stronger than that feeling of caste, which is as powerful among the old nobility of Europe as among any of the superstitious tribes of India. This held him, in his peculiar circumstances, in the juste milieu, trimming dexterously on all sides; where a more generous knave would have marched back to his original banner, glorying in his desertion from the popular standard. Notwithstanding his constitutional philosophy, and his contempt of all the ordinary prejudices of religion and morality which influence men, the ex-bishop had his weak side. It was on the score of family; and his only feeling, not unmingledly selfish, was for the aggrandisement of his own branch of the illustrious house of Perigord. Cautious as he was, he could not always suppress a sneer at the mushroom nobility of the Empire, even when placed as Grand Chamberlain, on great occasions of State, behind the Emperor's chair. It was among his first requests, at the Restoration, to which he had contributed so effectually, that his nephew, Edmond Perigord, should be made first aid-de-camp to the King, and a duke as speedily as possible; while Madame Edmond was recommended, by her "good conduct and piety," to the place of Lady of the Palace. The memorial which embodies these modest, self-denying requests, is highly characteristic. For himself, Talleyrand asked nothing. "M. de Talleyrand considers it the highest honour to devote his whole life to the King's service. He demands nothing for himself. He thinks that his assistance is necessary to conduct the foreign affairs of the country, and requests that department."

Too cold for hatred, too passionless for revenge, though he could be malicious, he left it to fools to return either evil for evil, or gratitude for good, and saved himself a world of trouble by looking with a steady eye solely to his own advantage. This one predominating object could not be at all times opposed to the welfare of his country; and when self was not compromised, Talleyrand was not the enemy of France—while his interests bound him to fidelity to her successive governments as long as they were likely to exist, and, consequently, made him faithful, whether to Napoleon or the Bourbons, until altered circumstances made treachery to them fidelity to himself. No man has been more the butt of the press and the tongue, than the ex-bishop; and no one ever regarded calumnious attacks, whosoever originating, with more philosophic indifference. He was as imperturbable in temper as deficient in moral sensibility; and contempt of mankind inspired him with supreme indifference to the opinions of those he despised. To be moved and angry when loaded with imputations of the foulest kind, would have too much disturbed his epicurean repose, his love of ease and enjoyment;—and in his pleasures he was always a philosopher. A more hideous and revolting personification of cold-blooded selfishness, duplicity, and perfidy, cannot well be conceived; yet there were some redeeming traits in a character gracefully relieved by the charm of wit and subtilty of understanding; and, loathed as he is, pursued to the grave with the hootings and imprecations of nearly a whole nation, there is danger of not morally disapproving him enough. "In God's name, madam," said M. de Mortrand, one day to a respectable lady who reproached him with too strong an attachment to Talleyrand, "who can help liking him—he is so vicious!" He was of kin to that description of ladies of whom Pope says—

"And ne'er so sure our passion to create
As when they touch the brink of all we hate."

If friendly admirers are to be gained by pre-eminence in vice, Talleyrand ought to have had troops of friends.

No painter could ever seize the changeable, inexplicable features of Napoleon's flexible Grand Chamberlain, in which no form of expression was fixed or habitual, save the light sneer that constantly hovered on the lip; and it is quite as true that no writer has yet succeeded in portraying his duplex character. Exaggeration was not required in painting his vices of head, and heart, and flesh; and the egregious misrepresentations that have been sent abroad have actually lightened the obloquy which his memory deserves. A man to whom every form of duplicity was native, might almost be suspected of inventing some of the monstrous atrocities imputed to him, in order to divert attention from his real misdeeds, or to lessen them by comparison. It is of advantage to a man guilty of theft to be accused of a murder of which he is innocent.

A very short space may suffice to say all of this remarkable person which is likely to be of interest to our readers. He was, at best, an emblem of the old fraudulent diplomacy of Europe, which, we trust, may not long outlive him, though we see few symptoms of its decay. Talleyrand is dead—and his countrymen say that his last act was an attempt to cheat the Devil; but his genius is not extinct in France. He has dropped his mantle where it will fit to a hair.

Charles Maurice de Talleyrand Perigord was born in Paris early in 1754. He was born with deformed feet, and, in consequence, deprived, by parental tyranny, of his rights of birth, and destined to the church. His character unfolded very early. In boyhood, at a seminary called the College of Louis le Grand, he is described as displaying great acuteness of perception, a lazy or inactive disposition, and entire indifference to what was said or thought of him. The scandalous chronicle to which he furnished so many pages, represents him, even in boyhood, as utterly depraved, and stained with the blackest vices. While he was pursuing his theological studies in the theatres, and in still worse haunts, his father died, leaving scarcely any provision for his younger children; and Talleyrand was received into the family of his uncle, Count Perigord, to be educated along with his cousins. The future diplomatist began his career by mystifying his tutor and his cousins; filching their money, it is said, to gratify his vicious appetites; borrowing small sums from the servants; and even selling his tutor's books. Before he was sixteen, it is related (in the scandalous chronicle) that he had seduced three young girls, sisters. One of the girls died; another became mad; the third, whom the future bishop had secreted in an obscure lodging in the suburbs of Paris, was discovered with difficulty, and sent to a convent. Fanciful persons see in these three unfortunate young creatures, emblems of the Republic, the Empire, and the Bourbons, which successively received the vows of the man who victimized the one after the other. A family council sat upon the conduct of the delinquent, and a lettre de cachet was procured, which, for one year, consigned him to solitude and reflection. He had the art to persuade the chaplain of Vincennes of his sincere repentance and complete conversion; and Charles Maurice, who went into the state prison an utter profligate, came forth, in a year, a flaming saint, and, in two more, was the smart, lively Abbé Perigord. The first step in the ladder of the young priest's ambition, was the boudoir of Madame Du Barry, the mistress of Louis XV. Through her favour, who dispensed alike law preferments, military rank, and church livings, the witty Abbé of nineteen obtained two rich benefices or abbacies. He owed his success to his wit. In the course of the ordinary licentious conversation of the favourite's retreat, the gallants present began to relate in turn their banquet fortunes. The Abbé Boiteux alone remained silent, a smile of peculiar meaning mantling his visage. The Countess Du Barry pressed him to tell why he boasted of nothing. "Alas, madam!" he said, gravely, "I was giving way to a very sad reflection." "What is it?" "Alas, Madam! Paris is a place where it is much easier to obtain ladies' favours than church benefices." The saying of the smart, well-born, little Abbé tickled Louis XV., and the revenue of two abbacies rewarded the future underminer of the church. Among his early intrigues, we hear of a young lady, the wife of a judge, her step-daughter, and her sister-in-law, to whom he made love at the same time. His diplomacy failed here. The wife was separated from her husband, the sister-in-law was compelled to take the veil, and the daughter was married in haste to the father's secretary, while the young ecclesiastic retired for a few months to Autun. He was followed by the discarded wife, who found her place already occupied by a pretty Marquise. His innate talent for negotiation was first exercised in reconciling these rivals for his affections. They finally agreed at well that, when the fickle Abbé engaged in a love intrigue with the pretty hostess of the village inn, neglecting their patrician charms, they conspired against the new vulgar connexion, and ran off to Paris; and, in all the salons, denounced the scandal and shame attending such low intrigues. Other adventures with women, equally shameful and more malicious, led to his exile for two years to Autun; while his valet, who had been the instrument of his revenge, was sent for life to the Bicêtre, and only released by the Revolution. In exile, Talleyrand was converted a second time. This, however, did not in the least interfere, after his return to Paris, with those heartless and profligate connexions of gallantry, which characterised the French aristocracy before the Revolution, when depravity of morals in the higher circles had reached the last stage. Something resembling attachment marked his long connexion with a young lady of fifteen, married upon the principle which, in France, regulated such alliances, to a husband above fifty, whom she had never seen till the day of her wedding. The Abbé Perigord performed the marriage ceremony, and seduced the bride; and the husband, after some years of dissatisfaction, sagely reflecting that, if the Countess were deprived of her first lover, she must infallibly take a second, acquiesced like a well-bred, sensible French gentleman. Politics alternated with love in subsequent years; and, at twenty-six, the able and clever Abbé was appointed agent for the clergy—a place of honour and great importance, and of considerable emolument. Among his associates were Mirabeau, who thus early saw through his hollow, ambitious, and intriguing character. The Revolution approached; and, in the National Assembly, the Abbé Perigord adopted the popular side, joined the violent party led by the Duke of Orleans, and became an organizer and a member of the Revolutionary clubs. The little, flirting, rakish Abbé, buzzing about the drawing-rooms, had gradually grown into a man of thirty-four, as remarkable for sound judgment, acute perception, and self-possession, or sang froid, as for fascinating manners, brilliant powers of conversation, and the most insinuating flattery. He became Bishop of Autun; and, as “spiritual persons” were eligible as members of the States-General, he was appointed the democratic deputy of his diocese to the Assembly. His influence was immediately felt in affairs. The church, with its power and property, was the first offering he was ready to lay upon the altar of the country. No one was better qualified to unfold its insatiable rapacity and manifold abuses. When the federal compact was to be solemnly ratified on the Champs de Mars, at that national fête where the king swore fidelity to the new constitution, the imposing farce was opened by the Bishop of Autun celebrating high mass, and consecrating the tricoloured national banner, now first assumed as the Oriflamme of France, and afterwards the tricoloured banners of all the departments. Already had he gulped several of that long catalogue of oaths to all manner of persons, laws, and constitutions, which he at last swallowed as easily as his favourite beverage, Madeira. He was the only ecclesiastic of the rank of a bishop who apostatized and took the oaths which overturned the church with the monarchy. He was suspended from his functions by the Pope, and a threat of excommunication was held out. “You know the news,” he wrote to a friend. “Come and console me, come and sup with me. Everybody is going to refuse me fire and water; we shall, therefore, have nothing this evening but iced meats, and drink nothing but wine.” As the Revolution proceeded, the part of Talleyrand became more difficult and delicate. Its progress had far outgone his ideas and his control. The Republican party were in the ascendant; and Talleyrand, not feeling himself quite safe, came to London on a private mission, or rather as agent for the Duke of Orleans, and to reconnoitre. The recent death of Mirabeau had devolved new honours and responsibilities upon the other aristocratic democrat and the apostate priest. He was ill received at the court of St James, and strongly suspected by the Convention, where he was at last impeached. Under the provisions of the alien act, he was compelled to quit his refuge in Great Britain; and he went to the United States of America, where he remained until his friends in Paris, and especially the ladies, smoothed the way for his return. Madame de Staël was among the most active in these good offices. A formal decree of the Convention authorized his return. His arrival made a sensation, and he speedily insinuated himself into the good graces of all the Members of the Directory, save the stern, honest Republican, Carnot, who said of him—“That man brings all the vices of the old régime, without being able to acquire a single virtue of the new one. He possesses no fixed principles, but changes them as he does his linen—adopting them according to the fashion of the day. He was a philosopher when philosophy was in vogue; a Republican; now, because it is necessary to be so in order to become anything; to-morrow he would proclaim and uphold tyranny, if he could thereby serve his interest. I will not have him at any price, and, as long as I am at the helm of the State, he shall be nothing.” Carnot kept his word, so far as depended on himself. In the meanwhile, the ex-bishop was not idle; and, a vacancy in the government occurring, he was proposed as Minister for Foreign Affairs, and carried, in defiance of the opinion of the indignant Carnot. His official situation brought him into frequent contact with General Bonaparte. He read the man; and the fall of the Directory paved the way for his farther elevation. He became the second man in France, with almost the power of saying who should be the first. When Louis XVIII., at the Restoration, complimented him on his talents and influence, while modestly disclaiming the compliment, Talleyrand replied—“Yes, there is some inexplicable thing about me which prevents any government from prospering that attempts to do without me." This was at once a hint and a threat. It is said that he never in his life committed any imprudence, save marrying Madame Grandt; but even that step was a part of his policy; for the First Consul having resolved that his court should be a model of propriety and decorum, left him no option. After all, Madame Talleyrand, with Madame Tallien and other ladies, was forbidden the Consular Court. The intimate friend of Madame Beauharnois was not worthy a reception from Madame Bonaparte. Her reputation was doubtful, and she had also taken bribes from some Genoese merchants, who hoped to obtain commercial advantages through her husband's influence. The pride of Talleyrand was moved by this exclusion, though he took constant pleasure himself in ridiculing and quizzing his wife, a very beautiful, but a very silly woman. When once asked what attraction he found in the conversation of so silly a woman as Madame Grandt, he replied—"What would you have me say? It is a recreation for me." It was a relief from the overpowering brilliance of De Stael, and the other superlatively clever ladies. One day, in sailing about on the Seine in a small boat with these ladies, Madame de Stael asked him which of the two he would save, if she and Madame Grandt fell into the river. Sincere for once, and ever flattering, he replied—"Ah, Madame, you can swim." Madame Grandt was one day to preside at a dinner which Talleyrand, whose luxurious table gained the approbation of Careme himself, was to give to Denon, after the return of that sultan from Egypt. He previously told the lady that the expected guest was a very amiable man and an author, and that authors being fond of hearing their works quoted, he would send her the adventures of M. Denon. He sent her those of Robinson Crusoe. After the guests were seated at table, the lady began—"Ah, sir, I cannot express to you the pleasure I have had in reading your adventures."—"Madam, you are too good."—"Not at all, I assure you. Dear me, how horribly dull it must have been for you, all alone on a desert island! I was exceedingly interested in it; but what a droll figure you must have cut in your sugar-loaf cap!"—"Really, madam, I do not understand."—"Ah, yes; I felt for all your troubles after your shipwreck. How happy you must have been the day you found Friday!"

These were the sort of mystifying monkey-tricks which formed the delight of the Grand Chamberlain, upon whose lips a gentle sneer sat habitually. Talleyrand was, through life, addicted to gaming, and is thought to have spent more hours at whist than any man of his time. The stories of his gaming, as of his intrigues, are probably exaggerated; but he certainly gambled largely in the funds, and in different countries, and incurred the displeasure of Napoleon by the proceedings to which he owed a considerable part of his fortune. One day, a banker, with whom he was well acquainted, waited upon him to ascertain the truth of a rumour of the death of George III., which was expected to affect the funds. The banker, of course, anxiously apologized to the minister for the intrusion, and for the extraordinary nature of his request. "How?" exclaimed Talleyrand, with the imperturbable gravity peculiar to him. "There is no harm—no indiscretion whatever. I shall be delighted if the information I have to give is of any use to you." The banker was profuse of acknowledgments. "Well, now, I must tell you," continued Talleyrand, with an air of mysterious confidence. "Some say the King of England is dead, others that he is not dead; for my own part, I believe neither the one nor the other. I tell you this in confidence; but, for heaven's sake, do not commit me." When the First Consul one day inquired how he was so rich, he replied, by a dexterous compliment—"I bought stock the day before the 18th Brumaire, and sold it again next day." This was the date of Napoleon's first usurpation. Some of his compliments were still more delicately turned. Some one asked him the address of the Princess of Vaudemont. "Rue St Lazare," he replied. "But I have really forgotten the number. You have only to ask the first poor person you meet; they all know her house." His house was as well known to all under the Consulate, who affected refined manners, and society more polished than that of the rude era of citizenship. It became the boast of the rising young men of Napoleon's armies to have been at the balls of Talleyrand Perigord. Duroc and Eugene Beauharnois were among his constant evening guests; and he always seems to have enjoyed the society of intelligent young persons. In the return of the Court to the manners of the ancien régime, he led the way; and of the men of talents whom the Revolution had brought into notice, but who had not been able to cast off their early plebeian slough, his observation was—"It is easy to perceive that they have not long trod on carpets."

Talleyrand was often heard to say, "that more game might be shot from behind a tree, than on the chance of a rapid chase across a field." On this principle, he squared his conduct. In writing to Madame de Genlis from America, he says—"I bestow but little thought on my enemies. I occupy myself in re-establishing my fortune." This was the only duty from which he never swerved; and he employed the aptest means. He never gave himself the trouble to cherish or express resentment. A cousin of Talleyrand's—a Marquis of the old regime, and a genuine type of the royalist noble, who was quite own brother to the cavalier of Cromwell's time, or the Scotch Jacobite gentleman of the reigns of the first Georges—received a pension of a hundred louis a-year from his degenerate relative. The Marquis was a libertine, a gamester, and a bon vivant; but he would suffer nothing to be said in his presence against the king or the church. Every day, at his café, after the Restoration, he enlarged upon the course which the king ought to take in driving away all secoundrels. But he was most admirable when speaking of his cousin and his pension. "Yes," he would say, "I do receive it, and, in allowing it to me, Talleyrand does nothing but his duty; but to go to see the scoundrel! By heavens! I will never go. . . . He is a Jacobin, and a married priest; he has deserved to be hanged twenty times over." Talleyrand could afford to laugh at this bluster; and the pension was never the less punctually paid. His respectable mother had been deeply grieved by his apostasy; but, after his marriage, she would never even see him, and refused the pension he allowed her. That portion of society which assumed to be religious, could forgive his succession of mistresses, whether married women or single; but a married priest was beyond the pale. He laughed at his mother as at his cousin; but probably respected her scruples; and her pension also was punctually but secretly conveyed to her through the medium of a relative. His admirable good sense preserved him from the petty foibles of little minds. It was not worth his while to be angered with the pious old lady, or with the vapouring cousin, whose piety was on a par with that of Goldsmith's supporter of "our holy religion" against Papists and those who wore wooden shoes.

After the 18th Brumaire, when Talleyrand had made his fortune by the sudden rise of the funds, he suited his manner to the change of times. He wore padded boots, to conceal his cloven hoofs; took lessons in riding, and cut a good figure on horseback at the military spectacles. Another trait of his adroit flattery of Napoleon, is equal to the alleged cause of the rise of his fortune. The General returned one night from Egypt, to a small house in some street, the name of which we forget, which his wife had purchased from Talma, and awoke next morning in the Rue de la Victoire; the street having been re-christened in the night, it is said, by the good offices of the ex-bishop. It has been told, among the thousand and one fictions with which John Bull was baited during the war, that Talleyrand had a private bureau, in which all the clerks were foundlings, having no worldly connexions, who lived together, were liberally paid, but strictly watched; provided with mistresses, and everything judged necessary to their comfort; but not allowed to marry without the consent of their chief, who chose them wives among orphans and foundlings. It was among their principal duties to imitate the handwriting of sovereigns and ministers, for which purpose facsimiles were kept in the office, with a collection of the seals used at the different courts. From this manufactory in the Rue du Bac, expresses from all parts of Europe were said to be issued, directed to the Tuileries or St Cloud. Much of this is no doubt absurd exaggeration; but despatches, if not framed, were sometimes opened; and one day the Spanish ambassador complained to Talleyrand, that one of his had been unsealed. "Sir," returned the minister, who had listened with an air of profound gravity, "I will wager I can guess how the thing has happened. I am convinced that your despatch has been opened by some one who wished to know about what was inside." This was very satisfactory. M. Seguin, a very wealthy neighbour, near one of those country houses where the minister went to live for the season, was ambitious of entertaining him at dinner, that he might exhibit his enchanting gardens and luxurious residence. An officious gossiping physician was employed in the negotiation; and, after many delays, the invitation was at last accepted, on condition that there were to be only twelve guests, whom Talleyrand was to select. He gave his list to the doctor, who looked quite chafallen. "What is the matter, doctor?—Oh, I see how it is—perhaps it is because I have not asked you to dinner at Seguin's. No, I thought we saw each other often enough here; and consequently"—Upon another occasion, having gained a wager of a feed of oysters for twelve persons from the Duke de Laval, he caused careful inquiries to be made of the greatest oyster-enters in Paris, where this dainty is very high-priced. To his great satisfaction he found one who finished his fifty-fourth dozen. Such were the pastimes of the Minister.

Early in the Consulate, he obtained from the Pope a withdrawal of the excommunication under which he had lain for years, upon the easy penance of distributing alms for the relief of the poor of Autun. This was accompanied with liberty to assume the secular dress, and engage in secular affairs. It was then he married, as the deconies of the Consular Court required that he should either leave off publicly living with Madame Grandt, or marry her. Upon one occasion, Bonaparte nominated a person whom Talleyrand considered incompetent, on a mission to Berlin, and sent him to the Foreign Office for instructions. Talleyrand began one of his long mystifying speeches, signifying nothing. "You cannot set out too soon; you are aware of the importance of your mission. The affair must be kept a profound secret. I am delighted that the First Consul has made choice of you. As soon as you arrive at Berlin you will communicate with me. Go up to M. Campy, who will give you a key to the ciphers—you must use these in your correspondence with me. I have nothing more in particular to say to you—you know your ground. I am certain you will perfectly fulfil the First Consul's intentions."—"But what am I to say to Chancellor Hardenberg when I see him?"—"What are you to say to him? Well, but there is no difficulty in that—you will tell him—have you a good memory?"—"Yes, tolerably good."—"Oh, very well, that is enough. You will tell him. Do not then forget what I have told you. There is no reason why you should repeat it to him word for word." As the envoy charged with these lucid instructions moved off, Talleyrand called him back. "At the court of Berlin, do you see, you must keep up your dignity. Yes, yes, you understand me—you must hold up your head." This was the man who said—speech had been given to men to enable them to conceal their thoughts.

His hereditary vanity made him treat his new dignities, gained under the Empire, with affected, or probably real indifference. "Go to Madame de Talleyrand, and address your compliments to her. Women are always delighted at becoming Princesses." He had just been created Prince, or, his Most Serene Highness, Prince of Benevento. He prized more the ancient titles of his birthright than those he enjoyed in common with Napoleon's Generals. He had a clever way of dealing with the numerous authors who sent him their works. They were thanked on the instant, the formula being, that M. de Talleyrand anticipated as much pleasure in the perusal as he had done in receiving the book. Thus he escaped, he said, telling a lie of politeness, for he never meant to read the books.

The part which Talleyrand really acted in several important affairs, still remains doubtful. He has been charged with advising the murder of the Duke D'Enghien, and the invasion of Spain; while, on the other hand, he is stated to have said to Napoleon, at a public council, "that Spain was like a farm, which it was better to let out than cultivate it yourself." A close alliance with England became his favourite policy; which is enough to make the friends of liberty in France and Great Britain look with suspicion upon what he lived to accomplish under Louis Philippe. He wished to re-establish the kingdom of Poland, and at one time under the elder branch of the Bourbons. His opposition to the war in Spain was a probable cause of his disgrace; but one more important was the jealousy of Napoleon, who could not endure that any one should share his glory, and found that the merit of his treaties was imputed by Europe to his subtle Foreign Minister. The disasters of the Spanish war reacted favourably on the prospects of its opposer. When his office of Grand Chamberlain was taken from him, to be conferred upon another, he quietly observed—"What will be the consequence? That in future the coachmen will often take the way to the Faubourg St Germain than to the Faubourg St Honoré." When the fatal bulletin announcing the dreadful disasters of the Russian campaign was received in Paris, all the dignitaries of the empire attended the Empress Maria Louisa at the Tuileries, where the consternation was extreme. "The whole army was said to be annihilated—men, horses, and baggage. The Duke of Bassano arrived during the conference, and was announced to the Empress. "Only see how they exaggerate," said Talleyrand. "Here is Maret returned, and they said all the baggage was lost." Of the same individual he said, one day, to the Emperor—"I know of but one person in the world more stupid than M. Maret." "Eh!—and who is that, my Lord?"—"It is the Duke of Bassano."

The hopes of the Bourbon faction were at once raised to a high pitch by this disastrous intelligence from Russia; and Talleyrand, it is said, immediately began to correspond with his uncle, the Archbishop of Rheims, who had always lived with Louis XVIII. in England. When Talleyrand's letter—informing his uncle of his devoted attachment, and cautiously insinuating that his services might be obtained on certain conditions—was read, the King exclaimed, "God be praised!—Bonaparte must be near his fall; for I am convinced that, when the Directory was near its dissolution, your nephew wrote to the conqueror of Italy in exactly the same terms. If you answer him, say that I accept as an omen his amiable intentions."

When Louis Philippe swindled himself into the throne of France, the Russian Emperor could not resolve how to receive the envoy of the new potentate, who waited in uncertainty until the English newspapers announced that Talleyrand had gone to London as the ambassador of France. "Oh, then, there is good hope of the stability of the new government," said the Emperor; and Louis Philippe was recognised by Russia as King of France.

Napoleon had begun to alight his counsels while his fidelity was unimpeached, and he afterwards suffered for it; for Talleyrand knew the temper of France, and of the times, better than the falling Emperor. In St Helena, Bonaparte complained indeed, that Talleyrand was never either eloquent or persuasive with him, but continually harped on the same string. Besides, he was so dexterously evasive and discursive, that, after conversations of hours, he would take leave without communicating the information required from him. This is not likely. Napoleon was not a man to be so fooled; nor is it probable that Talleyrand would have deserted him had he listened to the only advice that would have saved him. The ex-bishop went over to the other side only when he saw no safety on that of the Emperor. He never committed a gratuitous treachery. When his perfidy became suspected, Napoleon loaded him with reproaches; and his arrest was only prevented by the entreaties and good offices of the Duke of Rovigo and Cambacérès. He sustained the passionate attacks of his banished old chief with wonderful fortitude. The defeat at Leipsic again encouraged the hopes of the Royalists. When his pale, ominous visage appeared at the first levee after the return of the Emperor, the latter exclaimed—"What come ye here for?—to exhibit your ingratitude? I have covered you with honours, that people might not see you were the most despicable wretch in my empire. You affect to be of the opposition. You think, if I fail, you will be at the head of the Regency! If I were dangerously ill, I solemnly declare to you that you should die before me." With all the grace and gentleness of a courtier receiving new favours, the Prince of Benevento replied—"Sir, I did not need this warning to address my most ardent prayers for the prolonging of your Majesty's days." It was Talleyrand of whom Lannes, Duke of Montebello, said, that, if he received a kick behind, those who looked him in the face could not discover it from any movement of his countenance. Office was afterwards offered him, but, on conditions, which he could not accept; and he had probably another game in view. One of the coarsest things he ever said was, when conducting the Duchess of Montebello, the lady in waiting of the Empress, to her carriage, when she came to inquire if he, as a member of the Council of Regency, was not to accompany Maria Louisa and her son to Blois exactly as the Allies entered Paris. The retreat of the Empress to Blois had been planned by himself, aware that the presence of the Empress and the King of Rome in the capital would prove a strong obstacle to the return of the Bourbons; but in Paris he wished to be, as anxiously as to have the Empress off. When the Duchess went to find him, he cried "Good heavens, I have settled nothing! Certainly it is my duty to join her Majesty. I will do so. But the roads are so much crowded to-day, and we shall be delayed for horses. Of one thing, my dear Duchess, you may be certain, the Emperor and Empress are the victims to the most odious machinations." With this he placed the lady in her carriage, and returned to see that everything was ready in the apartment which he had ordered to be prepared, in his own residence, for the Emperor Alexander. When he afterwards made a feint of following the Empress, his passports were demanded at a barrier of the now blockaded city. "It is the Prince Vice-Grand-Elector," cried his servants. "Oh, he may pass," said the officers on duty. "No," cried the intriguer, "I have no passport. The higher rank a man holds, the more respect ought he to shew to the law;" and he turned his horses' heads, and speedily rejoined the other traitors—Berthier, Bourienne, and the rest—assembled at his house, and became the principal person in the conferences immediately held with the chiefs and ministers of the Allies. What followed is well known. As President of the Provisional Government, he became, for a time, the actual sovereign of France. The Count d'Artois arrived, and the ex-bishop, who had so long before celebrated high mass at the grand national fête in the Champ de Mars, assured him, in name of the provisional government, that "Our happiness would be complete if your Royal Highness would graciously receive, with the divine goodness which characterises your family, the homage of our religious affection." He had his reward. The Bourbon princes could not give him their confidence, but they gave him an ample pension, which Louis Philippe continued.

Great Britain, after the Three Days, had the honour of receiving him as ambassador from the new government of the Tuileries. Of her many millions, revolutionized France had not one honest man to send to England. He continued to the last the confidential adviser of Louis Philippe. The pupil is worthy of the master. The King visited him several times on his deathbed, and almost his last breath was expended in expressing gratitude for the honour. It crowned the felicity of his life! To consummate his destiny, he died in the odour of hypocrisy, having gone through the farces of penitence and reconciliation to the Catholic Church, with what sincerity we leave the reader to judge. He is said to have left voluminous memoirs of himself and his times, which are not to be published for thirty years. If they exist at all, every one is aware how this prohibition is likely to be treated. Hollow in everything, it is believed that his great wealth is deceptive, and the large estates he had purchased, deeply mortgaged; for his luxury and profusion were equal to the rapacity which he was long, before his death, deprived of the means of gratifying. It must be allowed that he was, what Napoleon in anger called him, "the most despicable wretch in France;" but doubted whether, after all, if playing his part on the same grand stage, his countryman Vidocq might not have displayed greater talent and accomplishment.

To those who wish to know more of the history of this prince of intriguers, we would, in the meantime, recommend the translated memoirs published in London. They are written with good means of information, and in a calm and impartial spirit.

THE HONEST HATER.

A BERANGERISM.

I LOVE an honest hater—he Has no cream-visage smooth and seeming;
He cannot curb his eye to glee,
While there the light of wrath is gleaming;
No feigning smile or low salutation,
He brooks to bate his fervent "damn."

All creaminess of soul and look,
All envy's charitable sighs,
The crouch in slander's filthy nook,
The warming hypocrite's disguise—
Will curl his lip with scorn and sneer,
That smite a soulless thing with fear.

He flings his gauntlet to the foe
With bitter word and burning eye—
No bam—his heart is in the blow,
And in his heart sincerity.

But, for the foeman fallen in strife,
He'd risk his honour and his life.

Faith to the honest hater please
To give, and he will treasure 't up,
He'll greet you with a hearty squeeze,
And pledge you in a hearty cup:
In love and war, at word and blow,
Stanch to his faith, his friend, and foe.

But shun Iscariot—all may know
The fawning dastard's stealthy pace,
The Judas stamp is on his brow,
The lurking dagger in his face;
Strange meanings in Iscariot's eye,
His fulsome flattering lip belie.

ABEL O'HARA'S (OF THE O'HARA FAMILY) OWN TRIP TO DONNYBROOK.

IN A LETTER TO MR BARNES O'HARA, GRAY'S INN, LONDON.

But, urging my way with the progressing throng, or rather urged on by it, I crossed what should be called the Fair Green, if all appearance of verdure had not been trodden away from its surface, and, through a narrow passage, at the end of it farthest from the village, gained difficult ingress into the principal encampment of pleasure booths; for here was a long street of them—perhaps two hundred, at either hand, headed at their extremity verging on the country, by two of surpassing magnitude and display, draped with scarlet, prodigal in flags, and unrivalled in sign-boards. To one side of the entrances to all was, generally speaking, a kind of trellis-work, pointing out and wisely defining “the bar;” and behind this stood or sat a landlord or a landlady, surrounded by drinking glasses and tumblers, porter pots and pints, bottles and decanters, ranges of barrels, skewered fowls of all kinds, ready for broach or boiler, beef and mutton that might tempt Dr Kitchener, hams, sides of bacon, cheeses, and so forth; and before you, as you glanced down the booth, tables were laid out, always ready for customers, if not always occupied by them. And “Walk in and rest yourselves, ladies and gentlemen,” cried a landlord to the passers by, drowning, in the loudness of his voice, the music at the remote end of his hotel, though it, too, was relied upon as an attraction; or, “Dhry or hungry, you needn’t want here,” said another; or, “The hot weather wants the dhrop,” syllogized a third; or, “Wash the dust o’ Donnybrook out o’ your throattles, gentsels,” elegantly exhorted a fourth; while the perambulators were similarly played upon from the batteries of coaxing Bonifaces at the other side of the crowded street. And, the truth to say, scarce any person, man, woman, or child, passed by the ranges of these refectories without entering and consuming something, little or much, meat or drink, in one or other of them. Some seemed seduced by a showy establishment; some espied a friend or two already seated within, and joined them, with a hearty recognition on both sides; others chose the tent fullest of company, or most uproarious in fun and frolic; but the sound of the music and the echo of the dancing-board was quite sufficient for the greater number; and, as I before noted down among the galaxy of attractions, “the signs” at the other side of the Green, let me add a few here, which either pleased me or puzzled me, as I studiously observed them. A sailor was pointing, off one, to the booth beneath him, and asserting—“Within the ark, safe for ever.” Upon another was the very unwarrantable double entendre of “Let no man pay twice, at his peril.” Next appeared a board, with the simple inscription—“The Widow Byrne, from High Street;” and, taking a glance at the widow, who was of course busy within her bar, I was astrey to ascertain whether her recommendation of herself lay in her unprotected state, announced on the board, or, in our anticipations that those who had previously been in the habit of visiting her establishment in High Street, might follow up their practices at Donnybrook; at all events, she was truly a winsome dame, with little of the sickly grief of widowhood in her black eye or plump and rosy cheek. “Observe!” mutely exclaimed a sign opposite to hers; and below this challenging word was announced—

“This is Pat Murphy’s spa inn;
I am come here from Peter’s Hill—Gentle and simple, now walk in.”

Near at hand appeared a kind of joint-stock concern, not of the first class either—two very mediocre purses, I reckoned, shaken together; and the hopes of the proprietors seemed to rest upon the patronage of such of the passers by as might have a veneration for old times and real Irish descent—for they made themselves known as “Patt Higgins and Jerry Lynch, of the real old stock.”

The next sign-board I shall notice, I could not directly understand, as regarded its present position, unless that its designer deemed it clever and recherché in its subject, and, on these grounds alone, attractive. It represented, first, a kind of stage, of five steps or gradations. On the upper step, was a crowned king, with outstretched sceptre, and, above his head, the motto—“I rule all;” and he occupied the middle of the picture. A grade below him, and to his right, was a bold soldier, whirling his sword round his head, and his assertion was—“I fight all.” Beneath him, again, in gown and lappets, appeared a parson, saying—“I pray for all.” On the step below his Majesty, along with the soldier, but to the left, stood an honest-looking farmer, who averred—“I pay all;” and under his feet, Death, in his full grisly terrors, grinning forth—“I take all!” I stepped back from this piece of art, to note its effects on the passing crowd, and became assured that its author had, in imagining it, studied human nature; for many spectators agreed that so much intelligence and taste, on the outside of the establishment it adorned, must denote a corresponding superiority of some kind or other, within; and, accordingly, the booth was full of company.

But the poetical predominated at Donnybrook. Among the rest—

“James Farall is supplied
With good old spirits, Erin’s pride;
All so porter, ale, and beer,
With cordials swat, the ladies’ cheer.
If you should doubt, when passing by,
You’re welcome to step in and try.”

Again—

“May the thistle flourish, and be ever in cheer, Round the sprig of shillelah and shamrock so green.”

The popular Lord Lieutenant exhibited as the guardian deity of more than one tent. In one instance, he was mounted on a curvetting steed, having said for him, or saying for himself—"See the conquering hero comes!" In another, he stood in a dazzling uniform, with a drawn sword, the following distich eking out his appearance—

"Arragh, Paddy! come
New, my sweet boy,
And drink a health
To our noble viceroy MULLOWRY."

So that, but for the style of the figure above them, these musical lines might seem to refer to the bustling fellow inside the booth—Mr Mullowry.

Next door to him, Daniel O'Connell and (it was averred) Lord Stanley were shaking hands together—a benevolent, though somewhat Utopian anticipation of the artist, in his wishes for general unanimity, and good to Ireland. I cannot say how his Lordship generally dresses, having never yet had the honour of seeing him; but, with Dan's person I am pretty well acquainted; and certainly nothing could be less in character than the present paraphrase of the style of his toilet. To prevent jealousy on any account, however, both gentlemen were habited exactly alike—namely, in grass-green frock coats, which could never have fitted them so well without stays, and flowing white trousers; and, on the heads of each, was a profusion of light-brown hair. Still, as I have said, they shook hands joyously together, and had printed beneath their feet—"O'Connell, Stanley, and Erin-go-bragh!" I must find room for one or two other illustrated sign-boards. Two rustics leaned on their spades, and each had "a speech" coming out of his mouth. "Paddy," questioned one, "what is the meaning of M.P.?" "Don't you know, you fool," answered the other, "that it means 'Man of the People?'" But how this explanation was supposed to be of virtue to sell beer and spirits, I cannot venture to say. And some establishments were of but questionable character, if the bold assertions, or bold insinuations at least, over their entrances, might be credited. For instance, one dubbed itself the joint property of "Bryan Murphy and Tom the Devil." And, to enable readers in general duly to estimate Bryan's announcement of a partnership with, certainly, one of the imps of darkness, I will here give an idea of an Irish "Tom the Devil." I know, indeed, of no black deity of the heathen mythology exactly similar to him. Perhaps Bacchus most nearly resembled him. He is the instigator to all mad and untoward pranks; the director of all Hibernian "Tom-and-Jerry" adventures; endowing his votaries with a blind recklessness to consequences, no matter what wild vagary is to be gone through. His laugh is to be heard in the midst of rows and scrimmages; he glories in the crash of lamps, and in the pummelling of watchmen; in short, he is the prince of all humorous mischief, and is supposed never to be so busy as during the carnival of Dennybrook.

Great numbers having accepted the invitation to "drink a health to our noble Viceroy," I also stopped in to Mr Mullowry's booth.

Towards the entrance, I found all the company respectable; and, though they quaffed a little, like everybody else, contributing but scantily—except by their enjoyment of the scene—to the loud talking, loud laughing, loud singing, fiddling, and dancing going on at the other end of the tent. I advanced about midway down, and with some difficulty obtained a seat—the place was so crowded.

Around me was a mixed throng of male and female, and of every age, from eighty years to two months, all seemingly of a decent class in life. Generally, they conversed in parties; but now and then some piece of humour, a song, or an odd prank, incorporated them all in the common communion of mirth. In one far corner, I discerned a more doubtful kind of persons; deep toppers they appeared to be, having their noisy enjoyments peculiar to themselves; and there was a party of tall mustached horse soldiers, pledging the Lord Lieutenant's health, as I judged, pursuant to the request on the sign-board; and among them, many Irish were to be discovered, by their accent, and by the exuberance of their glee; though, indeed, their English companions seemed also inclined to get rid of their own national gravity.

Immediately near to me, I glanced at a group of seemingly young mechanics, who appeared bent upon exploring the bottom of their purses, but of whom a detailed description would lead me too far; but still, another Englishman attached to them, agreeably challenged my curiosity: a little thick-set fellow he was, clothed with all the comfortable snugness which characterises a certain class of his countrymen—one portion of his attire being a waistcoat of scarlet cloth; and this little Johnny's nationality had, indeed, completely flown; his eye sparkled; he was saying and doing odd things, and bandying his joke as briskly and as unguardedly as ever a Paddy around him; and a general feeling of good-will seemed to be awakened towards him, in gratitude, as it were, for his having learned to doff what his companions regarded as the surly gruffness of his climate. Almost at my elbow was the fiddler, and opposite to me was the dancing-board, and upon it, at this moment, two young lads, and their partners, engaged in the reel of four, were displaying their very best steps for the approval of all lookers-on. Barnes, do you remember the day you took me to an English country fair, to solace me with the amusements thereof? Upon that occasion, I saw ten men in smock frocks, and great hob-nail buskins, having only two of the fair sex amongst them, lazily lifting up their limbs, as if employed in breaking clods in a ploughed field, and going through the dull routine of some prescribed figure, with visages as sober and as solemn as if they had been at task-work, rather than at amusement; but here, Barnes, in Mr Mullowry's tent, at Dennybrook, it was evident that the surprising agility of the dancers was only a mode of expressing the joyousness of their hearts. Shortly after taking my seat, I recognized, close in my neighbourhood, my merry old companion on the ear from Stephen's Green. To his soul's content was he enjoying himself. He had an arm round Margaret's burly waist; a tumbler of punch was in his disengaged hand, one instant resting on his knee, and the next carried to his lips—(Margaret, too, sipped from a smaller tumbler;) one of his little boys stood between his legs, blowing a halfpenny trumpet; another leaned on his mother's lap, munching sugar-stick; and the elder boy and his sister sat below the good dame, he also holding his tiny measure, and pressing his coy companion to partake of it. Back and forward went the old fellow's head, timing the music, and loud was his plaudit when any of the performers on the dancing-board cut a caper extraordinary. The set engaged in the pastime had been a long time at work before I came in; with looks praying for pity upon their fatigue, the girls now courtseyed to their partners; their partners bowed to them, and the dance ceased for a moment.

"Come, Margaret, you're in for id now, by my conscience!" cried my old friend.

"Ah, then, Luke, are you taking lave of your senses?" demurred the modest matron.

"Taking lave of my senses?—nonsense, woman; don't think to get off that way; you know very well 'twas your dancing that wen me for you." And rather unceremoniously he clutched his wife by the shoulders; the little fellow stopped blowing his trumpet, but, instead of it, squeaked out in terror.

"Hould your tongue, you monkey!" cried his father, "and sit down there, and no noise wid you!" And, whisking off Margaret's shawl, that she might go lightly to work, he led her, with the ef and vigour of five-and-twenty, to the dancing board. Loud applauses rewarded his display of spirit, and he smiled in high excitement. At command, the fiddler supplied his merriest tune, and the old wondered at, and the young envied, the excellence of his performance. Nor did Margaret belie her husband's assertion, that it was by her dancing she had won him; and they smiled and smirked to each other, as if the days of courtship were returned. But, at length, Margaret prayed a truce, and her old bean conducted her back to her seat in great triumph.

"Take a dhrop afther that, my darlin," he said to her; "and you'll be the better of id till the humours of Donnybrook comes round again. —I'll take a dance wid you, Miss, if you please"—he now addressed his daughter.

"Ah, father!" gaped and drawled the girl.

"And, ah, daughter!" he replied—"Come on, and let me see that you're your father and mother's child."

He led her forward, and the plaudits were redoubled as they advanced.

"Hould that, neighbour," he continued, giving his hat to a looker on; and, as he stood uncovered, such, I thought, might have been the hoary head, and yet merry face, of the poet's friend, as he addressed him—

"My blessings on your frosty pow, John Anderson my Jo."

Luke had now to contend with youth; but he seemed to gain fresh vigour for the task; and it was a long contest; but the daughter at length courtseyed for cessation; and, as he gave his final caper,

"Every soul cried out, Well done!

As loud as he could bawl!"— and there was a general rapping against the tables, to which the sympathising glasses also danced merrily; and, with a crest of conscious merit, did my friend receive the honours paid to his masculine prowess.

The sensation produced by this piece of merriment had not subsided, when my attention was arrested by a new character. A young fellow, rather well dressed, entered the booth, singing out, with a compass of voice that drew all eyes towards him—

"Ho, ho! Paudheen O'Raferty!

Ho, ho! Paudheen O'Raferty!"

He stopped short at the entrance.

"How goes all here?" he cried. "Ha! by the piper, tell me, aint I glad to see you all at Donnybrook?" He was addressing those just at the opening.

"Why, then," answering his own question, "it's I that am; an', do ye hear? make much o' yourselves—and you have my lave and blessin, and that 'll do you no harm—nor much good either, I b'lieve; but, no matter—such as it is, it's at your service. How are you, misthress?"—turning to the landlady, who was hustling at her bar—"Misthress—what's your name, ma'am?"—and he popped out his head to look at the name on the sign-post—"oh, ay; Misthress Mallowry, how are you, every inch of you, as you stand? Whisper, ma'am"—and he gave her a ringing Petruchio salute. She looked ruffled, yet took the matter in good part. Mr Mallowry stopped his hand, as he brewed some punch, pouring it from one jug into another. The incident viably touched him sorely, and he seemed doubtful whether he should resent such an intrusion on his lawful privileges.

"Is it a greedy-gut you are, man?" questioned the other. "What's the reason he went to get a handsome wife, Mrs Mallowry"—(she held down her head to smile at the flattery)—"if he wanted to have her cherry-red lips all to himself?—isn't that true, ma'am? Here, man alive—I'll give you lave to kias her yourself, now, and so you'll have my kias and hers together. Make much of yourselves, ladies and gentlemen"—he readdressed the company at large; "make much of yourselves, as I told you afore"—and, again singing out—

"Ho! ho!—Paudheen O'Raferty,

Ho! ho!—Paudheen O'Raferty!"

he gave his hat a touch with the back of his hand, placing it rakishly to one side of his head, and then moved, in an affected amble, towards the bottom of the booth; and—"Hollo!"—he now cried—"is there any spree down here?"—

"Is it making a thral at courting you are, Ned, my deary?"

He addressed a young man, about his own age and appearance, who was employed whispering into the ear of a remarkably pretty girl; and she appeared to relish his confidence, for she smiled, stipped her cordial, and smiled again. The address to her admirer drew all eyes upon her, and she grew much confused.

"And a mighty bad hand at a courting-match you are, Ned Driscoll—isn't he, my darlin? Wouldn't you rather have myself sitting beside you? Stand up, Ned, and let me spake to my sweetheart." And he seized Ned by the arm, to force him from his place.

In her flurry, half-ashamed and half-pleased as she was at the ardour of her new admirer, the little dress-maker unintentionally emptied nearly the whole contents of her glass upon her old one's knees.

"Go mind your own affairs," said Ned Driscoll, sulkily, as he brushed the hot fluid from his white Russia-duck trowsers.

"My own affairs!—Isn't this my own affair? Aint I in love with you, over the crown of my hat, my darlin?"—turning again to the fair cause of contention. "Ay am I, this whole month back, and more than that, if I'd say it."

I could not hear the lady's answer.

"Yes, indeed," he continued; "by this lily-white hand—and whiter than the lily it is, sure enough—by this lily-white hand, you know well I am! Now, tell the thruth: didn't you promise, in the Park, last Sunday, that you'd meet me here, in Dennybrook, to-day, in Mallowry's tent?—and that you'd be down near the end of it, sitting on a furm, at the right-hand side of the fiddler, just as you are this blessed moment?"

"I never saw you before in my life," truly asserted the girl.

"Oh, murder! D'ye hear that, neighbours? Well, ye girls has the most treacherous memories!—and the handsomer ye are the worse ye are for calling things to mind, as I find to be your case, my duck. But come out of that, Ned Driscoll, I tell you, and I'll engage I'll make her remember the whole of it, in one moment of time."

"Go off, and play your thricks somewhere else, Tom Hannagan; or, if you won't, I'm the fellow that will make you," replied Ned Driscoll, giving the interloper a push backward.

"Ha!—is that what you're fer, my Dennybrook lad? Make me! Up here with you, and you'll get your face as nicely curried with a bunch of knuckles, as if Dan Danally was doing it for you."

While delivering this threat, Tom Hannagan doffed coat, waistcoat, hat, and cravat, and stood as fine a young fellow as the pretty cause of quarrel need have wished to contemplate. Up bounced his antagonist, and he too was ready for action in a twinkling. A rush took place on all sides, and a tumult of loud voices rose around the rivals—some endeavouring to reconcile them; others vociferating, with Compromis, "My voice is still for war;" others, still, officiously engaged themselves in forming a ring for the combat; and great were the general symptoms of commotion. Those who could not get near the centre of interest mounted on forms and tables; many of the females present, alarmed to the utmost, darted under the canvas partitions of their place of entertainment into neighbouring booths; while a number of persons, hitherto sitting quietly in those booths, but who now caught the sounds of the coming row, as vultures are said to scent an approaching battle, unceremoniously invaded Mr Mallowry's tent through the sally-ports by which the women had abandoned it. Mr Mallowry himself, his wife, and his waiters hastened down to the scene of alarm; she and her servants snatching, in every direction, at the drinking vessels, to bear them out of the reach of the threatened destruction—a tactique which caused loud demur among many guests, in the fear of losing their liquor. The musician, shuddering in consternation for the fate of his fiddle, hurriedly endeavoured to encase the precious instrument; while Mr Mallowry made way towards, and seized by the arms, the man who, a few moments previously, had kissed his wife before his face, and who now was certainly the promoter of the confusion that involved the best interests of his establishment. But Tom Hannagan quickly shook off his grasp, and took his ground, now faced by his opponent, on the decorated dancing-board. Every eye fixed on the pair, and each had his adherents; but betting ran ten to one on Tom Hannagan.

"Come, by the Saint of Clindinning!" he roared, squaring, and springing about; and smiting his thighs, and striking the palms of his hands together. "Here goes!—clear the way here! Are you ready, Ned Driscoll?"

A quick, but, as it seemed, a cogent, though mysterious, whisper passed between them.

"I am!—to be sure I am!" answered Ned. "What are you waitin' for?"

"Here's your man, then! But stop a bit.—Dick the fiddler! strike up the 'Humours o' Dennybrook,' man!—Throw me your hand, here, Ned. They thought we were goin to fight for their diversion, but we'll shew 'em the differ! Come, Dick the fiddler, scrape away!" And, as the Orpheus obeyed this command, the pitted rivals joined hands, and, with very absurd faces, began to prance and caper round each other.

A general shout of laughter attested the heart-felt satisfaction produced by this successful "Dennybrook trick;" and, as all hurried back to their places, each wished and strove to be the first seated, in order to escape the imputation of having been made a fool of. Order was soon restored; glasses, tumblers, jugs, pints, and quarts, were brought back, and replenished; and, while the two fellows, bareheaded, and stripped to their shirts, continued to dance away, roars of laughter still applauded their waggery.

At last—"Stop again, Ned!" said Tom Hannagan, himself suddenly standing still.—"Now that "I think of id, 't isn't nathral; men catures were never mowlded out for dancin' together. I must have a dance in the course o' nature."

"Fall to, my boy, with a heart and a half," assented Ned; and, as he took his seat beside his sweetheart, he remarked to those around him—"Never did I know Tom Hannagan bit out in a spree at Donnybrook or anywhere else."

Tom went peering round among the fair ones, and, as his merry eyes made their scrutiny, many a smiling invitation did they meet. "Ha, Miss Biddy!" he cried, at length, "I was lookin' for you. Will you be pleased to take a dance with me, Miss Biddy Murphy?"

Highly flattered by his choice, Miss Biddy bounced up with as much blandness as nature had enabled her to display, and stood quite prepared, smiling and curtsying.

Miss Biddy Murphy was not a very girlish maiden. Her face, moreover, was pitted with the smallpox; she had two great knitting brows, above whitish, jackdaw eyes; a large, lumpy nose; and a mouth which all her efforts could not assuage into a natural expression of good humour, though she now did her best in such a view for the sake of the gay and comely Tom Hannagan. For a moment, as Tom stood beside her on the dancing-board, she smoothed down the drapery round her stout, equally-shaped person; during which ceremony, he would, unseen by her, though well observed by the rest of the company, glance at her over his shoulder, throw up his eyes, and curve his mouth, to express the unpleasant effect produced by his critical survey.

"Hide your punch from her, Ned," he whispered to his comrade in the late ruse, "or she'll make vinegar of it, with her grin;" then aloud to her—"And what will you please to dance, Miss Biddy?"

Her head went bashfully to one side, as she answered, in a hideous simper—

"Anything pleasing to you, sir."

"Strike up the 'Ace of Hearts,' my boy! Won't that do between us, Miss Biddy?"

The performance commenced. Tom twisted his agile limbs into steps innumerable, and flourished through it, at a rate that drew admiration at every hand. He would sound a tatarara against the spring-board, in such perfect time to the rapid music that the most nimble-elbowed drummer could not have rolled it better—and this was the science of the thing; and he would then caper, and curvet, and swing his person, and smile graciously on his partner, till she hung her head for bashfulness—and this was the humour of his performance. Although Miss Biddy's knees were none of the most elastic, she made some efforts to follow the example given by her airy companion; but, in truth, she had never been formed to exhibit as a danceuse; for she stumped against the board out of all time; and twice had she been down, but that Tom restored her to her balance; and thrice did she extend her fat hands, in token that she wished the exercise at an end. Here, however, her cruel mate would not understand her; round, he whisked, to face her again, renewing his steps and capers with incredible vigour and velocity. Again and again she held forth her hands, but in vain; Tom danced away like a possessed creature; and for a full half hour did this scene continue, until Miss Biddy could scarcely raise her limbs, and perspiration streamed down her distorted visage: she was paying dearly for the enviable preference she had received and accepted. Finally, the fiddler came to the rescue. Adown his brow, also, the moisture poured in little torrents; he had been obliged long ago to give his shoulder to the bow, in order to assist his elbow; his fiddle-strings began to scream most discordantly, as the drop, drop fell upon them; and—

"Ah, fire and fury!" he now cried out—"fair play is bonny play, boys and girls—have ye a design on my life? Hands round, hands round, I say!" "Hands round" meant the finale of the dance. "Anything that mortal fiddler can do, I'll do it for ye; but there isn't that man from this to Dingleydooch could hould out, this way. Oh! hands round, hands round, and don't murder me!"

He shook his head, as would a restive horse, and, having great heavy lips to a very wide mouth, they shook also with the motion; and then again shook his purry jaws; and, as he continued to exclaim against the labour he endured, a curious quavering sound, none of the most harmonious, sympathetically escaped his fiddle. Nor did Tom Hannagan prove inexorable to his touching appeal. "Hands round" was gone through, and the Donnybrook wag led his half-alain Miss Biddy to a seat; declaring himself not at all satisfied with the fiddler for having parted them so soon.

"And sure you'll have a red dandy now, Miss Biddy?" he asked; Miss Biddy consented, and he went, dancing and singing to the bar at the entrance of the tent, where I could see Mrs Mullowry smiling upon him, notwithstanding all the alarm he had caused her.

"What does he call a red dandy?" I inquired of a person at my side.

"And you don't know yet what a red dandy is, sir?" And my neighbour eyed my person from top to toe, somewhat disparagingly. I persisted in my ignorance.

"I'll tell you then. You know them dandies that goes along Dame Street?" I assented. "Well, there isn't more than half a man about e'er a one of them; and so, them mimicking tumblers that houlds only the half a nathral tumbler, we call them dandies, too; and the red dandy punch is made from raspberry whisky. And maybe you know what you wanted to know now, sir!"

"I do, thank you."

"And I could tell you how the little tumblers is like dandies, overagain."

"De so, then, if you please."

"See—if you look about you—the women purtends to like a dandy; but that's only before people's faces, you know, because it don't look to have much harm in it; but I tell you what it is: they take a whole tumbler when nobody is looking, just as they'd rather have an honest fellow that wouldn't be a dandy, after all—I mane any of them that has any sense about her."

Expressing acknowledgments for this continued information, I left Tom Hannagan singing a song at the top of his lungs, and issued from Mr Mullooly's tent, to pursue my "rounds of the Fair." I have before spoken of certain buildings, indifferently imitative—upon a small scale, I now add—of castellated structures. Those at present lay to my right hand, bounding the Fair ground in that direction. They seemed fixtures for the annual festivities of Donnybrook, having "The Harp of Ireland," "Erin's Green Immortal Shamrock," and similar appropriate devices, emblazoned in the mason-work of their walls. But I concluded that, almost through the year round, excepting at the return of the time of merrymaking, they remained unused and untenanted; for, though they boasted sashed window frames, those frames enclosed no glass; and their roofs were out of repair, and their floors, inside, damaged. To-day, however, bedizened with their showy flags and streamers, these tenements failed not to attract crowds of temporary occupants; through their open windows and doors came music, the sound of beating feet, singing, laughing, and all the other indications of universal carousal and hilarity.

The public road to Bray, running onward from the village, was somewhat raised above the adjacent ground; and, concealed by its boundary wall, at the left hand side, I discovered a colony of booths, widely differing from those already noticed. They were, in truth, of a homely description, calculated to meet the circumstances of persons who "needs must" fare indifferently; measuring but a few paces in length, being scarce high enough to permit a man to stand erect on their sod floors, and having their frame-work contrived with bended wattles, over which was strained a patchwork of sooty canvass. The articles of invitation exhibited at their entrances consisted generally of a few bottles, a few mugs and broken glasses, and one beer barrel, together with a dark-coloured piece of beef or of bacon—both viands seldom seen together—some loaves, and a hillock of potatoes. Before each, a hole was scooped in the earth; and this was the fire-place, and here ceaselessly boiled the pot of all work; and from the congregated smoke emitted by all these pots, arose a hot fog which enveloped the whole encampment.

The women presiding over such humble caravansaries, were, begimmed from head to foot, and negligently attired; and, dimly seen now and then, through their own peculiar atmosphere, as they stooped over their caldrons, or brewed punch at the openings of their tents, looked like witches engaged in an incantation; while the ill-defined forms behind them, or in the recesses of the booths—the guests, namely, who awaited or enjoyed their services—might well enough represent the unamiable spirits conjured up by the spells of an enchantress. For, indeed, these smoke-disguised tarsms, notwithstanding their uninviting general appearance, and their scanty promise of eating and drinking, were, in common with the most fashionable tenements in the Fair, chokeful of eaters and drinkers; nay, (and it was matter of wonder to me whence came such a great number of pipers and fiddlers,) the merry notes of jigs and reels laughed out from every one of them; and you might catch, through the dull medium which, as has been said, veiled their mysteries, figures of men and women capering away as heartily as the richest patron of the carnival of Donnybrook; or as if they inhaled, not the thick vapour of Whitehaven coals or of Irish peat, but the perfumed atmosphere of a ball-room.

Nor did all vendors of the excitements to good humour on the fair-ground, offer, to their expected customers, the temptation of even such lowly roofs as I have here described. At different points, pots boiled on, with nothing but a contiguous table and form, a ham, and a jar of whisky, to compose the list of comforts attainable to a visiter. And, midway between the termination of the row of shows, and the thronged passage to the principal booths, a settlement of these sky-covered refectories was established. As just mentioned, a deal table and forms, very little space left around them, marked the boundaries of each proprietor, and upon one, now and then, might, indeed, be found wherewithal to satisfy hunger and thirst together, though by far the greater number exhibited edibles alone, or drinkables alone. And here again was an awful canopy of smoke, overhead and all around; and the fires flickered out of the earth, at every side, like the furnaces of Wolverhampton; and hampers, emptied of their contents, and capaisned, with straw, beer barrels, cabbages, carrots, parsnips, turnips, and heaps of potatoes, littered the trampled sod. I must add that the potatoes and other vegetables were out of all proportion to the economical supplies of animal food submitted to the expectant eye. The eaters, engaged at the different tables, seemed, however, to assent patiently to such an arrangement; if the cut of bad beef or ham—given and taken merely as a "relish," or as "kitchen," with the mass of less expensive food—was thin and scanty, why, their own purses were light, and their palates not of an epicurean order; and so, with contented and joyous faces, they dispatched their poor dinners, enjoying "the humours of Donnybrook" as keenly as the best-served of its visitors.

Before all these stalls of refreshment, women screamed, and men bellowed forth to the passers by, praises of the excellence of the entertainment awaiting them; and, if oratory had no effect upon the ear, there were ingenious signals of promise to cajole the eye. An inverted quart bottle was typical of the seductive fact, that the liquor it had contained was found to have been so surpassing as to cause it to be drained in a twinkling; and a large potato, inserted into the belly of its upturned bottom, proclaimed that plentiful eating might at will accompany or precede a scrouse. One very large bottle, the commander-in-chief of all I beheld, had a hole bored through its cork at the top, and into this hole was inserted a long osier wand, slit at its upright end; and the slit held a label, asserting the contents of the flagon to be, "Best royal whisky, ed. a-maggin." The proclamation of,

"Whisky in store,
And porter galore.
Sold by Bridget Casey,"

was the temptation to another table. It is needless to say that the humble frequenters of those establishments should needs regale themselves under the garish eyes of all spectators, as well as under that of the open day; and yet I could detect a few clumsily-curtained tables, at which persons of some respectability of appearance might avoid public observation, while they fared cheaply. I changed my ground of study. Have you in England, Barnes, at fairs and other merry-makings, all the kinds of "merry-go-rounds" I enjoyed at Donnybrook?—not merely those which whirl horizontally, composed of a succession of little wooden horses, vis-à-vis, mounted by boys—nay, even by men of mature age—girls, and women—but such as afford seats to the ambitious, in buckets, and giddily turn round with the motion of a water-wheel; or to which fun-lovers, of each sex and of all ages, are attached in sacks, tied securely round their necks, so that, when the machine is in full play, you can catch a sight of nothing human but a blind circle of laughing or of contorted faces? The expressions of the countenances I strove to contemplate among these happy or would-be-happy people, were, indeed, various; in those of thoughtless females, who found themselves hoisted up and hurled downward again with a velocity not to have been anticipated, terror was visible, and undisguisedly so; then, on the features of many of the men and boys, appeared the struggle between deadly fear, too, and the ambition to appear brave; others wore the squeamishness of sickness, caused by the motion; while eager enjoyment of the sport was evinced by a few to whom nature had been prodigal in the gifts of strong nerves and stout stomachs. "In human life," asked I of myself, "among its crowded competitors for exhibition, in every way—in rank, in place, in talent, in money-making, nay, even in the ball-room—are there no 'merry-go-rounds,' with as various results as I here observe produced upon the adventurous who mount them—ay, and merry-go-rounds just as ridiculous as these are—bobby-horses, buckets, sacks and all?" And my comparison was further assisted by the sounds which escaped the vain-glorious performers before me: a petition for stepping the machine being emitted by some, a command to send it on by others; and again, among the rest, the subdued squall of consternation, the groan of conscious failure, or the heart, though heartless shout of successful self-enjoyment.

"Which do you call the real merry-go-round?" inquired one bystander of another.

"The one that mounts 'em up and rouls 'em down again—that's the real merry-go-round," he was answered.

"Don't b'lieve him," interrupted a voice which I thought I should recollect to be Tom Hannagan's, "he's as wrong as e'er a fellow at the Fair; the one beyond there," pointing to the machine which revolved vertically, "is the merry-go-over, as you'll see by looking—and the other is the merry-go-round, all the world over; and, more betoken, I'll bet a shilling with either o' you that you don't tell me which of them chaps forment us is the first on the wheel." He alluded to the persons mounted on the wooden horses.

"No, nor yourself, neither, that pretends to know all about it," replied the man he had interrupted.

"Don't I, in troth? It's the very fellow, then—now, look at him well, and see if it isn't—the very fellow that's before the second fellow."

Before a reply could be given to this piece of Donnybrook smartness, the merry-go-round in question stopped short; and the travellers descended from it, staggering for some time before their heads became steady.

"Welcome back, boys and girls!" cried Tom. "You're riding this half hour without gaining an inch of ground. Come, Miss, Biddy, we'll have our journey round the Fair, too."

I found he was accompanied by his late ill-assorted partner in the dance. They mounted the whirling thing, and took their seats vis-à-vis. At the first round, Miss Biddy's maiden timidity became invaded; she was terrified from her propriety; she threw herself forward, in fact, into the protecting arms of her beau; and Tom leaned backward, merely that she might have the full benefit of his sustaining person; and he would stretch his arms wide open, and clasp them gently and protectingly round the fearful fair one, and repeat the action, as, wagging his head from side to side, he exclaimed—

"Poor soul! poor creature! The marcies pity id, poor creature!" And the sun, shedding the full glare of his scorching rays upon Tom's upturned visage, could scarce look upon a face of more unique humour. Turning my back to these sports, I glanced in succession upon the different contrivances of the numerous gamblers dispersed throughout the fair. Thimble-shufflers, knock-board spinners, dice-players, wheel-of-fortune and royal-lottery men—each and all aroused my spirit of remark, though not, indeed, of adventure. None of them, male or female, failed, of course, in eloquence, upon the subject of their own honesty, and of the absolute fairness of the chances they offered to all comers; and 'twas impossible not to admire the deep knowledge of human nature displayed by them, as individuals of different characters and dispositions staked their money. From the very timid they would patiently and contentedly draw only small sums; the cautious, yet enterprising, they allowed to win trifling prizes from time to time, until the stake became awfully augmented, and was lost by the adventurer "at one fell swoop;" and they would appeal to the courage and spirit of others, who, they cunningly and truly surmised, would prefer laying down their last halfpenny, rather than evince a mean cowardice before the lookers on; while the most daring were skilfully led into that maniac state of desperation which prompts the gambler in a more fashionable establishment to venture his last acre upon the turn of a card or a die. Why should a man be white-beaned into a St James' Street Club, in order to enable himself to become a student of human nature? I looked at one among the humble groups near me, who had been brought up to this pitch of daring. Having alternately lost and won during some minutes, he boldly accepted the sudden challenge of thimble-shuffler, to stake the whole contents of his pocket—and I watched the blanched cheek, the staring eye, and the eager quivering of his hand, as he stretched to raise the thimble, under which, to his own perfect satisfaction, his lynx-eye had certainly seen deposited the little red ball of sealing wax; and then I noted the shiver of disappointment, miserably attempted to be disguised by a poor effort at bravado: and his forced smile gave a ghastly expression to his countenance, which oozed at every pore with the cold moisture—and, strange to say, every looker on but the person most interested, could point to the true thimble, really covering the magic pellet. Before leaving these gambling gentlemen, I had the satisfaction of witnessing, in more than one instance, the overthrow, by an enraged loser, of the whole paraphernalia of cheatry.

I had now spent the greater part of the day in my "rounds" and my observations; and yet variety still surrounded me and excited me. The beaming and twinkling, without cessation, of young and bright eyes, formed no inconsiderable portion of my unexhausted stock of provocations to study; for, truly, the pretty girls of Dublin, dress-makers and those of that class, I concluded, did not seem to think that their beauty might be regarded as the least attractive matter in the Fair—nor, as certain little events proved, were they much mistaken in their calculations. Encountering, on their perambulating progress, the sprucely-attired youths of their city, expected compliments met their ears, as tempted glances reciprocated theirs; and then arose the little gleeish laughs, that denote innocent pleasure, and that penetrate even such serious ears as mine, like merry music.

Strings of dandies I encountered; exuberantly mustached, and otherwise professionally badged; and they, of course, braved through the crowds, talking loudly, and ostentatiously displaying the swagger of their tribe; and, in one instance, a chain of them was attended by an equal number of, seemingly, young mechanics, who grotesquely imitated their motions, accents, and grimaces, for their own amusement, and that of a good many others. And I might notice shoals of lads let loose from the lassitude of business, and predetermined on sport; and sober family groups, fully, though quietly enjoying everything—the delight of the father or the mother increased by the scream of rapture of the little fellow who clasped his or her neck, or who, trotting by his or her side, sounded his penny-trumpet, or blew his tiny horn, or rolled his toy drum, or flourished his shillelah of sugar-stick. And, alas for human nature! ever and anon I thought I detected among the joyous and unsuspecting multitude, characters of a less pleasing description. The fox-like glance of the pickpocket, for instance, made up of equal portions of caution, cunning, and daring, caught my remark, often encountering the cool, prying, business-like eye of the police-officer—and well, I thought, they knew each other; and the vacant stare of the drunkard, half conscious that he was at Donnybrook and in a crowd, but of distinct forms, events, or clear ideas, nothing certain; and the hacknied leer of the—but, no; I will not continue an enumeration of the taches which, in common with a holiday hurly-burly of human creatures in every quarter of the globe, intruded on my gay Donnybrook picture; I was and am looking at it for gratification of my pleasurable feelings, not for indulgence of my hypercritical ones;—and, even in such a view, let us like sensible people, continue our survey.

A little fatigued in my limbs, but not in my spirits, I sat down on a form belonging to an establishment of which the very curiously-bonnetted old proprietress sold "Plasing whisky, at 2d. a glass." All the principal features of the Fair were again under my view: the moving masses of people, intersecting each other in oppositely flowing streams; the flaring shows; the visitors of their wonders still hurrying, huddling, and tumbling up and down the gangways leading to them, with, if possible, increased ardour; the line of gigs and cars before them, and that of the aristocratic carriages on the Bray-road; the booths, the merry-go-rounds, the gamblers, everything. I was within a short distance of the tent of Laurence Whelan, whose invitation "To the Thirsty" I have before noticed; and from its mouth came the music, the singing, and the shouts of glee, mingling with the music, the singing, and the shouts of glee, on every hand; and thence, as well as from the entrances of other booths, also issued, occasionally, bands of youngsters, who, going beyond Lawrence's exhortation, and quenched their discretion as well as their throat, and now kicked up their heels, and ran straight a-head, in quest, or rather in the creation of adventures. And a party of some half-dozen of such young scamps, came close to my temporary resting-place. I saw a confused and noisy consultation held among them. It concluded, and its result was rapturously cheered. One of them placed himself in the van of the others. "Affix eyes on your leader!—folly (follow) your leader!"

was the cry. "Folly on, boys! folly on!" he shouted. And straight forward did he dart, doing whatever came first into his head, and, one by one, his liege merry men pursued him, and repeated his actions. Over forms, over tables, over caldrons, over gaming-boards, over men, over women, over everything, inert and breathing, which lay in their undeviating course, did the possessed rout leap, jump, vault, somersault, scramble, tumble, sprawl, or fall prostrate. Yet their failures were astonishingly few; their intrepidity and agility astounding. And their game seemed to be well understood at Donnybrook. Even at a distance, they were seen coming; and the prudent, the peaceable, or the money-making, ran sideways out of the line of their self-fated career.

After some time, however, the extreme labour of the nothing-hunt had its natural effect on the leader. He failed to clear, at a bound, one of the eating and drinking tables; crash it fell under him, with all its glasses, tumblers, porters, bottles, jugs, plates, and dishes. Upon the dinner-pot it came, overturning that utensil, and thereby causing to flow in a common stream, and mix in a common mass, beef, broth, and whisky and beer, meat, potatoes, cabbage, and all the shattered drinking vessels; and, headforemost into the chaos he had made, was precipitated "the leader." A second, a third, a fourth, his whole string of followers, in fact, loyally imitated his example, and, of course, shared his fate; and there the full party lay, huddled and kicking together. The excited crowd rushed towards the scene from all quarters. As the fallen jumpers regained their legs, the men and women whose property they had demolished, screamed out for remuneration. A vociferous, yet good-humoured argument, ensued as to the value of the matters destroyed; the lookers-on took different sides of the question, all laughingly urging it on; but the mischief-doers finally met, by joint contribution, a fair adjustment of the demand made against them; and then, only pausing to appoint a new leader, again started off, seemingly in the height of their glory, and, raising loud shouts, which every one around them echoed, to work out, in another direction, one of the "humours of Donnybrook."

The sensation created in my present neighbourhood by this occurrence, had not subsided, when another uproar, but of a very different character, attracted my attention, and that of all near me. We heard the shrill clamour of female voices, loud in dispute. I looked towards them, to discern the cause thereof, and discovered it to be an individual of the other sex. He was a stout-built fellow, of about forty—his attire of a character hanging half-way between tatters and contrivance; and he might be, as I judged, one of those providentially-watched creatures, who, like the poor sparrow, get up in the morning without exactly knowing where or how to provide for the necessities of the day; and yet, who placidly depend upon the keenness of their wits for taking advantage of any chance which offers for overreaching the rest of the human race. Both his hands were thrust into the bosom of his vest; he poked forward his chin, resting it upon his wrists; a smile of self-complacency played about his mouth, which was half-hidden by a beard of a fortnight's growth; his eyes seemed drowsily closing, yet the glance sent from beneath the masked battery of their lids, was sharp and penetrating: altogether, he had much the expression of a pet raven at roost, whose feathers are ruffled to keep him warm, and whose knavish propensities are not at rest even during his slumbers, but rather supply subjects for his dreams.

This hero seemed much amused with the contention going on about him. One of the argumentators was a briar, and rather a well-looking female, of that complexion vulgarly called sandy, and which is said to betoken a choleric temperament. Her drapery, being fancifully short, permitted to be seen almost to the knees a pair of well-chiselled and nimble limbs. She held, tightly wrapped up in her mantle, an infant, whose curly, carrotty head alone was visible; and, even in the yet unformed features of the little being, I caught an early character of keenness, and an inherited intellectual activity, of a peculiar kind. The other was a swarthy-looking girl, much younger than her rival, although wanting her comeliness of aspect and figure; yet, with the advantage of youth upon her side, I conjectured that the love of novelty, so prevalent among all classes and conditions of society, had tempted the object of dispute to honour her with some passing gallantries.

"What call have you to Nick, the husband of me, at all?" questioned the woman with the infant.

"I'd be goin' to ax you if it's knowledge you want, ma'am?" was the question put in return, asked out by a pinching tartness of visage and accent.

"Leave us alone, then, Missy, or maybe I'd loosen the eye in your head." And she hastily swung from her cloak her only disengaged arm.

"Only crooken a finger at me, an' I'll send that peeper of yours to the back of your carrotty nob." And she, in her turn, wriggled her neck with the fine fury of a vixen.

"Nick! heuld the child!" cried the insulted matron, turning quite confidentially to the cause of the argument.

But Nick, whose lips, by the previous turn of his mind, seemed to have been preparing for such an expression, gently puffed out his cheeks, laughed pithily, turned away, and walked quietly and in much good humour far from the scene of contest.

"Oh, Nick, you're a thraithre!" screamed after him his outraged better half; "but I'll make you sup sorrow for id all!" she continued, facing her enemy, and darting upon her with all the nimbleness previously promised by her tidy lower extremities.

"An' is this a taste of the sup you'll thraite to, ma'am?" retorted the vixen, dealing her a ringing blow on the jaw, with the awkward downward motion in which a woman's clenched fist will inflict such an injury. This was bravely returned; and spiteful, shopping thumps, or else open-handed, smacking slaps, followed upon either side, in quick succession. But the owner of the cunning-faced infant fought at woful odds, as she could, of course, use but one hand; and her antagonist, not being cautious or precise in her science, the poor urchin came in for a random hit or two, and consequently shouted out with might and main. As the gentle belligerents changed ground here and there, the motley crowd, who had gathered round them at the first onset, wavered also from side to side, much amused and edified; but the infant's cries now awoke general sympathy, and the fair ones were separated.

"Is there no good Christian crathur here, that'll hould the babby for me?" appealed the burdened woman to the spectators.

"By the saint o' Clindinning, an' it would be a sin if there wasn't! Give it here to me, my game-hen o' the roost!" And Tom Hannagan snatched the infant from its mother's arm. "By the hookies! if it's a he, 'twill be a warrior," he farther remarked, as he awkwardly clutched the squalling creature. "Oh! on my sweet conscience, if it was only ould enough to shut the fists this moment, it's a nate black eye 'twould give me. Whisht, Johnny, whisht!—sure I'm on your mother's side, my chap—so don't be grinning at me, so wicked."

With the young one upon one arm, and the other extended to keep away the crowd, and leave a clear stage for the renewed combat, Tom Hannagan seemed in his element. "You must have fair play, Missis Ginger," he promised, tapping his friend on the shoulder.

The fight, however, was not renewed; several of the bystanders, myself amongst the number, interfering to prevent it. Even Tom Hannagan, his perceptions once directed to the point, assisted our good endeavours for the honour of Donnybrook, leading his protégée in one direction, while Ned Driscoll did the same charitable office for her antagonist, and peace soon overspread the battle-field. But I could not find it in my heart, Barnes, even after all I have said in praise of the good manners of Donnybrook, to allow you to leave its celebrated ground, in my company, without witnessing one little scrimmage at least; nor shall I close the subject, without expressing a wish, for the sake of general morality, even in higher quarters, that, had the ladies further discussed the difference between them, the matron might have had the advantage.

It was now nearly six o'clock in the evening, when, with the intention of returning to Dublin, I endeavoured to force my way along the main street of booths. But this was no easy task. The metropolis had poured out additional crowds, to pay an after-dinner visit to the Fair; and the press became almost inconvenient. I turned into one of the principal booths, to avoid an extraordinary bustle at a particular point. No dancing nor pranks were going on here; it was rather a place of mere serious occupation. Narrow tables, of sufficient length to hold three at a side, ran, to my right and left, along the extent of the canvass tavern, just leaving a passage in its centre; and these tables were all nicely covered and laid out for dinnering, and full of company of the better class: the parer should be well furnished, indeed, that could afford refectation to its possessor in "The White Hart Hotel."

The cries of "Waiter, waiter, waiter!" resounded from a score of voices at the same moment, as I stepped in; and, while the corps of waiting servitors answered without sensation, "Here, sir! here, sir!" some half a dozen of them galloped backward and forward, to and from the place of cooking, which was gained through a slit in the side of the awning; and, as they bore to the guests the mouth-stopping provender, it would be hard to say whether it or they smoked most profusely. But, with all their efforts, they failed, in many instances, to appear time enough before their invokers with the precious fardel; and, upon these impatient occasions, I saw one or two hungry parties start up from their seats, dive through the aperture before-mentioned, gain the cook's premises, and, with flesh fork to his throat, compel him, half in jest and half in earnest, to surrender up the viands destined for other people; and, as two of these freebooters reappeared, the one carried a sirloin of roast beef, and the other a great ham.

"Hunger breaks through stone walls," cried the ringleader to his cheering friends, "and surely canvass never yet kept him out."

In the speaker I recognised an acquaintance; his eye caught mine at the same moment; I was pressed to join his party; and, feeling my appetite sharp, and judging favourably of the plunder in which I was invited to share, I gave up my previous intention of dining in a sober, commonplace way, in my Dublin hotel, and modestly accepted the proposal.

The great din in this place of feasting—occupied, I had forgotten to say, exclusively by male guests—sufficed, as effectually as stone walls could have done, to limit to each set his own confidential conversation. Awful was the clatter of knives and forks, plates and dishes, the uncerking of bottles went on like continued discharges of distant mucketry, and the loud laughing and talking mingled in one sublime chorus. We did full justice to our beef, and to the gigantic ham, which was now eked out, at the hands of a legitimate waiter, with about a dozen of capons and chickens, boiled and roasted; and we hobnobbed in good "sherris sack," interrupting ourselves, during the two processes, only by a joke or a laugh.

I found myself among an odd enough group. One was a young medical student from Edinburgh, who, had he been state physician under the government of the worthy Sancho Panza, would never have starved such of his patients as loved good cheer; among his present Donnybrook companions, at least, he certainly neither preached not practised extreme temperance. The second was "a family man," half crazed with the humours of the fair; the third might also be called "a man of charge," but he too had cast care and common sense to the winds, as attributes very unbecoming the region of Donnybrook; and the fourth was a youthful barrister, whom it was difficult to keep, upon all occasions, within legal and peaceable bounds; while the fifth was a tutor and Dr of T. C. D., upon whose visage now appeared no marks of the stern dogmatizing of his tribe, and whose eye, instead of the sagacious thoughtfulness which, I am bound to suppose, had erst characterised it amid the "dust of the schools," twinkled with all the merry diablerie of boyhood. I will say nothing of the sixth guest at our table; but I suppose I was as merry as I could be; though, indeed, I do not set up for the character of a leading spirit upon convivial occasions.

Our wine went briskly round; it was succeeded most necessarily by the native beverage; and, after a reasonable sitting, a ramble was proposed, and we six sallied forth.

We were all in high humour to enjoy the freaks and oddities of the place: so once more beheld me in the throng of the fair! Lavish compliments we paid to the young female perambulatores who passed us by; and we got smiles in return, or else repartees that left nothing due. And jests we passed, both practical and theoretical—that is, in deed as well as in word; and we were paid in kind, cleverly and good humouredly. In fact, through all the whirligig variety of the fair, did we zigzag, until at last, the tutor of college solemnly proclaimed his intention of purchasing a horse. All his companions, except myself, declared that they too should have a horse each; and so, away we set to the horse mart.

Leaving the great hurly-burly behind us, we encountered, in a comparatively retired situation, three elderly and orderly-looking women, seated on a little elevation, their heads bent towards each other, in close and sober chat. I suppose that, having seen all the novelties of the fair-ground, they were now comparing, in conclave, their opinions on the subject; and one held in her hand a suspicious-coloured bottle, from which she occasionally filled a diminutive teacup, and the little vessel then went round, from lip to lip. Suddenly, to my great astonishment, as well as to that of his other companions, the college-tutor sprang forward, and, taking the three gossipers in line, as they sat, cleared their heads at a bound. The good dames ducked their persons, clasped their hands, and squeaked in a panic; and—

"Well done, Dick!" cried the barrister; "but that was not the pace at which you crossed the College squares, before setting out for Donnybrook, this morning."

We reached the mart for horses. It lay contiguous to a muddy pool, formed by the waters of the dirty Dodder brook; altogether giving but a poor idea of the true purpose for which the Fair of Donnybrook had originally been held. Our horse-purchasers, none of whom, I need tell you, in reality wanted a steed, set the owners of different animals to trot, and canter, and leap them about, here and there; and then arose a prearranged disagreement about the price. In the midst of this scene, one of the married gentlemen of our party, having his ambition roused by the feat of the college-tutor, determined to exhibit his own activity. Some loose stones had been piled up for the purpose of shewing off the horses at a leap.

"Clear the way here!" he cried, squaring his arms, bending his back, and running mincingly to the heap; and, lo! he did, indeed, clear an obstruction of about two feet in height; which, recollecting his preparations, and also now taking into account his pride at the achievement, must have appeared, to his own eyes, six feet, at the very lowest calculation.

"A great leap, by gor!—that's the boy for id! Clear the way again for the gentleman!" cried the humbler-dressed wags in the crowd; and, thus cheered on, our short and stout little friend jumped over the few stones again and again, to the infinite merriment of the canaille of Donnybrook, who thus shewed that they could relish the ridiculous in those above them.

The Edinburgh medical student now, also, resolved that he should have his share in the honours of the evening.

"Wilt thou, Cassius,
Leap in with me into this angry flood,
And swim to yonder point?"

he spouted, addressing himself to the successful hero of the stone barrier.

"Not I, indeed, Cæsar," answered this gentleman, doubtless considering that any addition to his present fame was unnecessary.

"A pound that I do it!" cried the young Galen.

"All accoutred as you are?" stipulated the other.

The challenged man hesitated.

"Blood-alive!—down with the money, sir—take him at his word—he'll never do it!"—urged two of our attendant crowd, while all the rest pressed forward, fearful that the wager would not be accepted.

"Well, then, yes—all accoutred as I am," now assented the medical student.

"Done!" cried the leaper of the stones.

The money was staked in the hands of the college doctor. Two of his companions endeavoured to restrain the zeal of the aspirant for aquatic fame; but, bursting from all control, and sending forth a Donnybrook shout that would have done credit to any Pat in the fair, over head and ears plunged he into the puddly liquid. He could not swim, and he was beyond his depth; so that, after floundering about in it some time, it was with difficulty we drew him safely to land. And now, proud and upright he stood; dripping wet, indeed, but his lofty mettle nothing cooled. The applauding spectators rent the air with their acclamations; he had gained immortal honour amongst them; they respectfully petitioned to take his worthy hand; they declared him, notwithstanding his accent, a true son of Ireland and of Donnybrook; and, a hundred times over, swore that the thistle was full as brave a plant as the shamrock.

It was in vain that his more immediate friends advised a quick return to Dublin, that he might change his apparel, as well for the sake of appearances, as to prevent danger from taking cold. No! the evening he would see out in the trappings of his glory; and there was a second adjournment, thereupon, to a booth; and, as a very humble attaché indeed of this distinguished band, I still accompanied their movements. As we proceeded along, the achievement of our Scotch friend spread from mouth to mouth; and fame, making use of the lungs of the multitude that followed us, proclaimed it aloud—aloud, without speaking hyperbolically, I may truly say.

It was into the tent of Bryan Murphy, before honourably mentioned, that we happened to enter; and under its roof, his partner "Tom the Devil," seemed indeed to rule the evening. Nor had he among the whole concourse assembled in the booth, more promising subjects than my companions: they drank punch, they danced, they played pranks, they jested, they sang songs; the Edinburgh Esculapius giving us "Auld Langsyne," and the LL.D. of Trinity College, adding the "Sprig of Shillelah;" and both were joined, in their separate choruses, by not less than three hundred human voices.

And witching was the hour of the night, Barnes, when your brother, still faithful to his Donnybrook associates, at length really started for the road homeward to Dublin, and lingering was our look behind us. The Fair seemed more tempting than ever. The lights before the booths and the "standings," and particularly the great flare kept up at the shows, illuminated its whole area, banishing the idea of night altogether. Then, if the thronging company were not now as select as in the morning they had been, to our eyes, along with being quite as numerous, they seemed more attractive. But, alas! we forced our way from them, making our way with difficulty (and for more reasons than one) to the village. And here, too, the street was perfectly illuminated; candles burned in the windows of every house; and dancing, singing, and merriment—seemingly but in their spring—went on under the roof of each.

Arrived at the barrier, where the cars took up their loads for Dublin, I found its state of uproar to exceed even that which I have endeavoured to describe as characterising it in the morning. Our party fully freighted one car, and away we started for home, catching up the shouts which reached us from the Fair, and which were responded all around us; nay, along the road, each machine that accompanied us, or passed us, contained its band of shouters, or singers, or huzzaers—the choristers only heard indeed, not seen; and onward we all whirled, guided solely by the cat-eyes of the drivers through the clouds of choking dust, now rendered, by the additional gloom of night, still more obscure, if possible, than when at an earlier hour I had the hardihood to plunge into their womb. So, cave, Donnybrook!

A NORWEGIAN LYRIC.

BY DAVID VEDDER.

In dalliance with my mountain-harp
I spend the live-long day;—
Come, beauteous boys and rosy girls,
List to an old man's lay:
Song to his spirit solace brings—
His riches are the golden strings.
Young Harold, a poor warrior's son,
But honest, brave, and fair,
Loved Thoralille,* the loveliest maid
That breathed Norwegian air;—
He met her daily, vainly strove,
But never dared to tell his love.
One summer eve, with listless step,
He trod the daisied sward;
And, from the pine-fringed slope above,
An angel-voice he heard,
Singing a lay of loveliness,
Which breathed affection and distress.
Attracted by the magic sound,
He upward gazing stood;
Anon he saw a bright-haired maid
Encircled by the wood,
Who, like a bird upon a spray,
Poured forth her mountain-melody.
He listened to her song of love,
The verdant pines among:—
"Oh! dearest, best of Norway's sons,
And theme of many a song,
Couldst thou but know the agony
Of that which fondly throbs for thee?"

* Literally, "Little Thora."

And yet more near, and nearer still,
The anxious Harold crept,
And listened, till his straining eyes
Involuntary wept.
"My thought by night, my joy by day,
Ah! couldst thou hear my plaintive lay!"
Now, turned she to the mountain's base,
Where Harold stood amazed;
And in each other's glistening eyes
With love transcendent gazed:
"And didst thou, Thora, sing of me?"
"I own it, love—I sang of thee!"
She sank into his manly arms—
He pressed her to his breast;—
An age of happiness, of bliss,
Was in that hour compressed:
Their life was one continued spring,
Like dew on flowerets glistening.
Then dance away, sweet innocents,
Ye rosy girls and boys;
And dream of bliss and ecstasy,
And future loves and joys:
I'm Harold! once the young, the brave—
Ye're dancing now on Thora's grave!
In dalliance with my mountain harp,
I sit the live-long day:—
Then, gallant boys and lovely girls
List to my minstrel lay:
Song to my spirit solace brings—
My riches are the golden strings.

MINISTERIAL PATRONAGE IN SCOTLAND.

SCOTLAND, before the passing of the Reform Act, had long been remarkable for political servility, and the Macsycophants had furnished on the stage—and justly—objects of ridicule and contempt to the other parts of the Empire. The first elections under the new system led to the general belief that political subserviency was part of the national character of the higher classes alone, who had before 1832 held the whole political power of the kingdom in their hands; but the more recent elections shew that the present county constituencies are hardly more worthy of political confidence than their predecessors. At the first election under the Reform act, only eight of the Scotch counties returned Tory representatives. At the last election, there were eighteen, after deducting Stirlingshire. And of those which are represented by Whigs, the counties of Argyll, Ayr, Banff, Dumbarton, Mid-Lothian, and Roxburgh were carried by the narrowest majorities. The burghs, on the other hand, shew precisely the same proportion at both elections—twenty-two Liberals and one Tory; the burghs which returned a Tory at the first election being the Inverness district, and, at the last, the Kilmarnock district.

The causes of the political servility of Scotsmen, appear to be chiefly two. First, the habit of looking up with a sort of reverence and awe to all who, either by landed possessions, wealth, or office, are placed in a higher rank; and, secondly, the desire of obtaining employments under the Government, arising from the poverty of the country, and the consequent difficulty of providing for sons and dependents. The feudal system, which still remains in greater vigour in Scotland than in any country in the western part of Europe, and the respect that it inculcates for the fortunate descendants of the banditti who originally seized and partitioned the kingdom among them, is a fertile source of servility. In the Scotch counties, the land is everything—the People are nothing. The Lord Lieutenant, always one of the most extensive of the land-owners, is the potentate of the district, the head of the military force; and, with his deputy-lieutenants, the justices of the peace, and other land-owners, the administrator of the whole revenues of the county, and the dispenser, in a great measure, of the law—that is to say, if that sort of thing dealt out in a justice-of-peace court, can be called law. The Sheriff of the county—being appointed to his office, not for knowledge, firmness, impartiality, legal skill, or any one quality necessary in a judge, but for his thick-and-thin support of the faction in power at the time of his appointment, or from his connection with the aristocracy, and being, in every instance, where not approaching his dotage, non-resident—affords no check to the landed interest; while the Sheriff substitute—very generally a person of inferior rank in society, and almost always under-paid for his labour—has neither power nor inclination to set limits to the dominant influence. The law of patronage, at the same time, enables the land-owner to keep the priesthood in willing subordination; and the schoolmasters cannot avoid being their servants. The shopkeepers and professional men in the small towns depend upon them for the best part of their business; and, as to the farmers—the only other class, except the labourers—it is enough to say that, in all countries and in all ages, the cultivator of another man's land has practically been his slave. It is in vain to suppose that a farmer—whether he be a tenant-at-will or hold under a lease—will, for any length of time, oppose the political opinions of his landlord. It is, in truth, exceedingly doubtful whether a lease has not an opposite effect on the independence of the tenant, from what is generally supposed. A tenant for a year, if he be able to pay that year's rent, may be independent; but who can be sure—more especially considering the fluctuations which have taken place in the value of agricultural produce, during the last quarter of a century—that he will be able to pay nineteen years' rents? During that long period, how many favours may a landlord not confer on his tenant, and how many annoyances may he expose him to? At all events, since the passing of the Reform Act, the Scottish land-owners have shewn their determination not to allow their estates to be cultivated by men who venture to hold political opinions of their own. In East Lothian, for example, a decided preference has been shewn for men of inferior education and habits, to the present race of tenantry; and Tories, Whigs, and Radicals, whether their opinions are or are not in accordance with those of their landlords, are fast making way for men who do not trouble themselves with reading newspapers, or anything but the Bible, or of thinking for themselves; but who will unscrupulously do the bidding of their landlords.

If things, therefore, proceed in their present train for a very few years, the Scottish counties will be as remarkable for political subserviency, as they ever were in former times. We doubt even if the burghs will resist, for any great length of time, the powerful artillery of patronage and corruption constantly in operation against their political independence. The enthusiasm of the people when roused, as in May 1832, can at all times carry everything before it; and we believe that, had the aristocracy held out for a single week longer on that memorable occasion, the people of Scotland would have buckled on their claymores, as willingly as their ancestors ever did when an appeal to the sword was required. This appeared to be the feeling and expectation of the People of England, who do not forget how ready, during the last two centuries, the Scots have always been to resort to physical force, to attain the objects they had in view. But the enthusiasm of the People, and their abstraction from the ordinary pursuits by which they must earn their daily maintenance, is necessarily occasional and short-lived; while the power and influence of Government—the annual distribution of hundreds of thousands of public money, and the patronage of thousands of offices, suited for every class of society, high and low, educated and uneducated, rich and poor—is perpetual, and constantly operating, not only by giving present enjoyment, but by the expectation of future benefit which these sources of influence and corruption hold out, whereby thousands who never receive, during their whole lives, a single farthing from the Government, are kept, by mere hope, resting on the most dim, vague, and illusory grounds, in a convenient state of subserviency to the ruling powers.

It would be in vain for any single individual, whatever time and labour he might be willing to devote to the task, to expect to be able to give anything like an accurate and complete account of the sources and amount of the Government patronage in Scotland. It could not in truth be done without full access to, and a laborious investigation of documents which have never either been printed or published, and which are in possession of the numerous public officers of the Government alone. But, as a first attempt to lay open the great source of bad government, we shall give a rude sketch—and this is all our limits admit—of the corrupting influences. One of these, and perhaps the worst of them, is the connexion of Church and State, whereby the Clergy, instead of fulfilling their proper office of teaching truth and righteousness, and holding tyranny and corruption up to public detestation, are made the apologists of the ruling powers, and the preachers of submission to every exercise of authority, however wanton. Their stipends being paid in grain, give them a common interest with the landed interest, in the upholding of the murderous system of the Corn Laws; for it is nothing else than downright murder—disease and mortality, as we shewed in a late Number, increasing always with the price of grain, and decreasing as it falls.

We shall now proceed to enumerate some of the various sources of Government patronage.

Of which the sum of £70,000 is expended in paying judges and officials, for deciding about 1000 litigated cases in a year, or £70 for each! It may be well doubted whether the whole value annually in dispute amounts to this enormous expense.

The authorities from which the above list of the salaries and fees of the judges and officers of the Court of Session is made up, are mostly either acts of Parliament, or returns by the officers themselves, either to Parliament or to the law commissions which have sat in Scotland, with little intermission, since the commencement of this century. We are aware that many of the officials in the above list, as well as in the subsequent lists, are not appointed directly by Government, but indirectly by functionaries named by the Ministry; but we do not think the Government patronage is materially lessened on this account; and it has been the policy of the Ministry—both Whig and Tory—for many years past, to obtain the direct appointment to all offices, however subordinate.

4342 Individuals. Total annual emoluments, £749,165

To these have to be added a proportion of the army, navy, and ordnance—at least 12,000 men; and an annual expenditure of one million.

The total constituency of Scotland is 85,000, from which number at least 25,000 must be deducted for persons having votes in more than one electoral district, and for voters dead, or denuded of their qualifications, but not struck off the roll, leaving 60,000 to be operated upon by ministerial patronage. Supposing the military and naval force equal to 15 regiments of foot, of 700 men each, this gives about 700 commissioned officers; so that we have constantly operating upon the majority of the voters—say 35,000—5000 offices in the gift of the Ministry, and upwards of a million and a-half of annual salaries, fees, and emoluments of one sort or other. This immense patronage, and means of corruption, account for the little independence to be found in the Scottish constituencies generally, and the evident retrograde movement to the old system of political servility, which has taken place within the last two or three years.

THE WINDING UP OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY'S COMMERCIAL AFFAIRS.

"WHAT a glorious place to plunder!" exclaimed the Cossack who first visited London, as he viewed the almost boundless wealth and extent of that metropolis; and, however strange and revolting the expression may appear to us, it was most natural from one of his vocation, and it may be considered even complimentary when uttered by a Cossack. But, though the expression be unusual, the sentiment is participated in by thousands, who reduce it to practice, and make London, in reality, what the Cossack only wished it to become, a place to plunder. The professed thieves, who gain a precarious subsistence by robbery, are, perhaps, the least numerous, as they undoubtedly are the least criminal and dangerous of these systematic plunderers: they at least, act openly, and stake their lives against the chances of the game; the public is forewarned and forearmed against their depredations; and the losses sustained through them are seldom to a ruinous amount. The worst description of plunderers are they who assume the port of honourable men, and insinuate themselves into your confidence, that they may the more easily deceive and entrap their victims; and such are to be found in all ranks of life, from the noble lord who cheats with dignity at the fashionable club-house, to the costermonger ring-dropper who defrauds the humblest classes of their few shillings or pence. Between these two extremes, are the numerous sets of schemers and jobbers, who plunder wholesale—the commercial cheats, the money-lenders, and not a few of the joint-stock concerns, whose frauds are on so extensive a scale that they would engulf a world of wealth. Some of these schemes of plunder are so partially disguised that any one, possessing common observation and experience, can penetrate through the flimsy veil, and discover the cheat; others are more artfully concealed; and there are some yet more dangerous, which, having been commenced for legitimate purposes, have been afterwards perverted to the worst purposes; and the character, originally established, being made the foundation for some new fraud, gives currency to the schemes of plunder, and serves to spread the ruin wider. In illustration of this, we may refer to the infamous South-Sea bubble, and to Law's Mississippi scheme, both of which were commenced on sound principles, and for objects which were then deemed laudable and beneficial, but were afterwards perverted to the most nefarious purposes; and the chief actors in these plans of shameless robbery were not unknown adventurers, or needy villains, but men who stood high in rank and in the world's estimation. We have thought it necessary to premise thus much, not to prejudice the reader against the parties of whom we are about to speak, but to remove a prejudice—we mean the credulity which attaches undue weight to appearances and to outward circumstances, and which is so frequently extended to screen the guilty from the consequences of delinquencies clearly proved against them, especially when the delinquents happen to be persons of high rank, or possessing great wealth and influence.

The object of our present inquiry is to ascertain the result, in a pecuniary point of view, of the late arrangement with the East India Company, and to shew which of the two parties, the Company or the Indian Territory, has been benefited by the change which took place in April 1834. In performing this task, we take our facts entirely from the Company's accounts presented to Parliament; so far, then, the accuracy of the various sums cannot be disputed. It remains for us only to separate those items attaching to commerce, from the general mass; and, as we are perfectly aware that these statements will have to undergo a strict examination, not only in this country but also in India, (where those articles on India affairs, which occasionally appear in our pages, are republished and freely canvassed,) we shall explain the grounds of our proceedings as we go on, and be careful to advance nothing which will not pass the ordeal. We leave out of the account all transactions prior to April 1834, and will not stop to inquire whether, at that period, the Indian Territory was indebted to the Company, or the Company indebted to the Territory; right or wrong, it was then agreed, that all the property and effects, held or claimed by the Company, should, from that date, be assigned over to Territory, and that Territory should be liable for all the Company's debts and engagements, besides paying the proprietors' dividends and other demands. Commencing at this time, then, we proceed to inquire which of the two parties, the Company or the Indian Territory, has gained by this arrangement; and, in doing this, we enter upon the following questions:—

First, What is the amount received, or to be received, from the East India Company's effects?

Secondly, What payments have been made therefrom which belong to the commercial branch, and for which Territory was not chargeable prior to April 1834?

Thirdly, What is the net amount realized from the Company's effects, how has it been invested, and what is the annual revenue derived from it?

Fourthly, What additional payments and charges is the Indian Territory now liable for, under the new arrangement?

First, As to the amount received, or to be received, from the East India Company's effects.

During the investigation of the Company's affairs, 1830 to 1832, the commercial capital was stated to be above twenty-two millions sterling; but, deducting debts, and a questionable claim on the Indian Territory, there remained about seventeen millions of available assets. This was the value on paper; but it must have been foreseen that much time and expense would be required to turn these assets into cash; and that the amount actually realized, would fall very far short of the estimated value. So it has accordingly turned out; for the whole amount, realized in the period of three years, to April 1837, is under fourteen millions; while the assets unrealized, are valued at about one million more; making, in the whole, received and to be received, about fifteen millions sterling.

Secondly, The payments for the Commercial Branch, in the three years, 1834 to 1837, are as follows:—

Guarantee fund paid into the Bank of England, there to accumulate for the benefit of the proprietors of East India stock,	£2,000,000
Dividends paid to proprietors for three years,	1,890,000
Compensations to commercial servants and others,	450,000
Pensions and annuities to ditto for three years,	460,000
	£4,800,000
Deduct interest realized on balances, &c., &c.,	500,000
	£4,300,000

All these items are so decidedly of a commercial nature, that there cannot be the least room to dispute the propriety of deducting them from the assets, except as to the amount of each—and this is proved by the Company's accounts with regard to the first three items. As to the commercial pensions, it does not clearly appear what is their precise amount; but in 1830 they amounted to, £43,000 per annum,

And the new pensions granted, 1834 to 1837, amount to, 149,000 do.

Which would make the amount at present to be, £192,000 do.
Exclusive of the pensions granted between 1830 and 1834.

There are several other charges incurred, for which Territory was not liable previous to April 1834, and which properly come under this head; for example, the whole expenses of the India House, the colleges, and directors' salaries, are now charged to Territory, instead of a proportion, as was formerly the case; and the China establishment is entirely a new charge on Territory. We estimate these and similar charges at £20,000 to £30,000 a-year, and the commercial pensions at £180,000 to £190,000 a-year.

Thirdly, Deducting the above payments, £4,300,000, from the amount of assets realized to April 1837, the net amount realized is about £9,700,000; and there remaining about one million more to be realized, the whole will amount to about £10,700,000.

Of this amount, about eight millions have been invested in discharging India debt, which bore interest at from 3 to 6 per cent. per annum, and the remainder is either a cash balance, or it has been employed in some other way for the benefit of Indian Territory. In estimating the annual revenue derived from the investment of the commercial assets, we must not be bound by the rate of interest on any former loan, for the payment of which these assets have been applied; but, considering it as a new agreement between two independent parties, fix that rate of interest which, under the circumstances, it may be presumed the one would be willing to give, and the other to receive, for the loan of funds. The India loans were formerly raised at 10 and 12 per cent., and there is still a small part of the India debt which bears 10 per cent. interest; but, for many years past, the new loans were raised at greatly reduced rates; and, for some years previous to 1834, they were in the course of being reduced to 4 per cent., a considerable part of the 5 per cents. having been converted into 4 per cents. Those who invested their property in the India loans, might either purchase 4 per cent. paper at par, or 5 per cent. at a small premium, or 6 per cent. at a premium of 25 to 30 per cent. The 6 per cent. loan could not be paid off before April 1834; but, as it was generally understood that it would be paid off or reduced immediately after that time, its market price was kept down by the prospect of this event, otherwise the premium would have been much higher. It is very certain that the Indian Government, which had already converted a great part of the 5 per cents. into 4 per cents., would not have continued to pay 6 per cent. when at liberty to pay off that loan; nor is it likely that they would borrow fresh capital at 6 per cent., while they were able to raise loans at 4 per cent.; and, if fresh capital had been taken into the market, it could not be invested at more than 4 per cent. Thus the Indian Government would not have paid more, nor could the East India Company have obtained more than 4 per cent., if they had been left to act freely and independently in the investment of their commercial assets. At this rate, the annual revenue on £10,700,000 would be £428,000; but, as all the assets are not yet realized, the revenue, for the present, cannot be calculated at more than £388,000 per annum.

Fourthly, The additional payments and charges for which the Indian Territory is now rendered liable, in consequence of the commercial debts and engagements being transferred to it, are as follows:—

Dividend to proprietors of
East India stock,	£630,000	per annum,
Commercial pensions, &c.,
about	190,000	do.
Sundry charges,	20,000	do.
	£840,000

We thus find that the Indian territory is chargeable with, at the lowest computation, £840,000 per annum, for the East India Company, or the commercial branch, for which it will receive, when all the assets are realized, only £428,000, leaving a deficit of £412,000, to be paid out of the Indian revenues! That such a result as this was by no means contemplated by the British Government, is quite evident from the correspondence which took place between Mr C. Grant and the East India directors, in 1833. It is there expressly declared that the arrangement "involves no increase of Indian debt, or of charge on the Indian resources, but simply the substitution of one set of public creditors for another." This declaration is repeated several times in Mr Grant's letter of the 13th February 1833, where it is also stated that the intention of Government was, "to invest the proceeds of the Company's property in the purchase of the existing Indian debt, to the amount necessary to secure the promised dividend, and to place the East Indian stock-holders in the room of the creditors so purchased out." Had this been really done, there would be no reason to complain of the arrangement; but, instead of investing in the Indian debt the amount necessary to secure the dividends, there has been invested only eight millions, which produces little more than enough to pay half the dividends; and how are we to reconcile the declaration, that the plan would not impose any new burthen on the Indian resources, with the astounding fact that it has imposed a new burthen of above £400,000 a-year! Mr Grant, the President of the Board of Control, appears to have been so confident that the commercial assets were more than sufficient to secure the proprietors' dividends, that he made no provision to guard the Indian Territory from loss in any case. This was a fatal mistake, as it opened the door to those insatiable demands of the directors and proprietors which have frittered away the boasted commercial property to a comparative trifle, and left the Indian Territory burthened with this intolerable charge. The first proposals of Government were infinitely too favourable for the Company; yet the directors, instead of being satisfied with them, complained grievously of the China monopoly being taken from them, and then demanded a preference over all the other Indian creditors, and a separate guarantee fund, to be invested in England, for the exclusive benefit of the proprietors. Their demands being acceded to, the sum of two millions sterling was at once cut off from the commercial assets; and the directors and proprietors, having well secured themselves, began to consider how much more of the spoil they could divide amongst their friends. They had obtained permission to make suitable provision, out of their own property, for the numerous classes of their servants whose interests would be affected by the change of system—that is, by the cessation of their commercial affairs. There is a strange and not very intelligible account of their proceedings given by Mr Melville, in his examination before a Committee of the House of Commons. He says that the directors fixed the amount of compensation, first, at £304,000; then they increased it to £508,000; then the proprietors declared it should be £1,500,000; and, lastly, that the Board of Control reduced it to £750,000. There is enough here to show how the scramble went on, and how generous the proprietors could be when it cost them nothing; (indeed, many of the proprietors were voting other men's money into their own pockets;) but the largest amount here stated falls very far short of the sum actually expended in compensations to the commercial servants. The Company's accounts prove that the compensations, in three years, have amounted to £316,000 in fixed payments, and that pensions for life have been granted to the extent of £149,000 per annum. Mr Melville says that the recent compensations have been valued at two and a half millions, though he considers that to be an over-estimate. It allows, however, only fifteen years' purchase for the pensions; and, considering that annuitants are generally a long-lived race, it appears by no means excessive. Admitting it to be a correct valuation, we find that the compensation, originally intended by the directors not to exceed £304,000, has, by the clamour of the proprietors, been extended to two and a half millions; more than twelve times as much as the directors themselves at first awarded!—and yet they are far from being satisfied. It was stipulated and agreed to, by the directors, that the compensations were to be made out of the Company's own property—that they were to be confined to those servants whose interests were affected by the change of system—and that no fresh burden should be laid on the Indian resources; but, in the face of all these engagements, the most prodigal scale of compensation was adopted, without once considering how far the Company's own property was equal to meet this extravagant expenditure. Clerks and warehouse-keepers were pensioned for life at two-thirds or one-half the amount of their former high salaries and emoluments; even the common labourers received pensions for life, from 7s. 6d. to 11s. 6d. per week, as though they had suddenly been disabled from work; and many persons whose interests were not in the slightest degree affected by the change of system, were placed upon the list of pensioners, because, at some former period of their lives, they had happened to have been in the Company's service. The reckless profusion with which these grants were made, encouraged many parties to make claims for compensation which otherwise would never have been thought of: captains of ships, who had retired from the service for ten years and upwards, demanded compensation for the loss of employment; and those whose term of service had expired, demanded to be placed on the same footing with those who were actually employed. Some of these claims are yet depending, and it may, therefore, be useful to explain the merits of those connected with the naval service. The Company owned eight ships, and chartered about thirty-three more for a certain number of voyages—the commanders and officers of which were all persons in the Company's service. We will first consider the case of the eight Company's ships, and their commanders. It was one of the Company's regulations that no captain should command one of these ships for more than five voyages, after which they were obliged to retire, and make room for the promotion of the junior officers. This was no great hardship, as the average profits of a commander, for a single voyage, were from £10,000 to £15,000; and the command of one of these ships, for five voyages, was looked upon as a certain fortune. The captains thus retiring were, however, still eligible to command the chartered vessels—that is, if the owners of those vessels thought fit to appoint them to the command; but they could claim nothing from the Company—neither employment nor remuneration; and, in point of fact, there is no instance of a captain, after performing his five voyages in the Company's ships, engaging in the chartered service. Under these circumstances, then, what is the loss sustained by the captains of the Company's ships, in consequence of the trade being relinquished? Surely not more than the amount they might probably have gained in the course of completing their five voyages respectively; yet, over and above this amount, a further compensation has been granted to seven of these commanders, by life pensions of £200 per annum each, with remainder to their widows of £100 per annum, and further provision for their children! The only just claim to remuneration by pensions for life is where the engagement is for life, or, at least, where there is a strong probability that the engagement would continue for life; but, in the case of these captains, the engagement was only for a specified time, at the expiration of which they would be compelled to relinquish their commands; and, although they would still be at liberty to enter the inferior branch of the Company's service, that event depended on various contingencies, and it was so unlikely to be resorted to, that there is not an instance of a captain having entered it, after completing his five voyages. It was barely possible that they might return to the Company's service; they were eligible to it, just as they were eligible to be chosen directors—that is, if they could command the requisite support of other parties; and, on this bare possibility, compensation has been awarded to them, as if they had been deprived of employment which was to terminate only with their lives! But this was not all; besides these seven commanders who were in actual service, three others, who had completed their five voyages each, and who then held no employ whatever in the Company's service, applied for compensation; thus, with only eight ships, there were ten commanders claiming compensation for loss of employment; and, although the employment was either temporary, or had altogether ceased, the remuneration was to be for life! Such absurd claims would, in any other place, have been considered a satire on the extravagance with which other pensions had been granted; but the directors and proprietors decided, that the three unemployed commanders had as good a right to the pensions as the others, (and here they were not far wrong;) the Board of Control, however, refused to sanction them; and this excited such an outcry that the case was brought before Parliament, and a committee was appointed to investigate the claims. It came out, in the evidence, that both Mr C. Grant and the directors had been concussed by the proprietors, and had given way to many of their exorbitant demands; and Lord Ellenborough stated that, when he came into office in 1835, and found what had been done, he disapproved of the concessions, and he regretted it was not in his power to alter the regulations; for he thought them "contrary to equity, and a most severe burthen on the people of India." The committee, however, thought that, as so many other claimants, under similar circumstances, had been allowed pensions, it would be a great hardship on the three commanders to reject them; and they reported accordingly.

We now proceed to consider the case of the chartered ships commanded by officers in the Company's service. The number of these vessels taken up by the Company appears from the lists to be thirty-three; and, of course, there could not have been a greater number of commanders in employ at the time the trade was relinquished. If those only whose interests were to be compensated, the number of commanders could not exceed the number of ships, for only that number would be deprived of employment; but the directors thought proper to extend the compensation to all the commanders who had been in their service within five years, provided they would sign a declaration that they had intended to return to it. This was complied with by sixty commanders, who have all, accordingly, been placed on the pension-list; and thus, with only thirty-three ships, there are sixty commanders receiving pensions for loss of employment! All these commanders are pensioned for life; yet not one of them had a life interest in the employ, and, if called upon to prove specific loss or injury by the change of system, it is probable that not one of the whole number would be able to shew that they had any certainty of employ at all, after the completion of their respective voyages. The supernumerary mates and inferior officers have also received pensions and compensations with the same reckless profusion—the number of first mates being fifty-six, and of second mates, fifty-eight. The pensions to these officers are £128 and £112 each, and they are at full liberty to accept employment in any other way; whereas the pensions to lieutenants in the Royal Navy are only about £90, and this is liable to be withdrawn under certain circumstances. It was originally agreed, between Mr C. Grant and the directors, that each party claiming compensation should be called upon to prove his specific loss by the change of system; and this is the plan alluded to by Lord Ellenborough as being the only one to which he could have agreed; but this did not suit the views of the proprietors, who, by rejecting that rule plainly shewed that their object was, not indemnity for losses, but a license to plunder. There are other cases, in which persons who had been disabled for service, and were in consequence placed on the Poplar fund, (a compassionate fund,) have been admitted to the pension-list, as if they had lost their employment, or had suffered by the relinquishment of the Company's trade. But it is unnecessary to multiply instances, where all has been conducted on the system of wreckers and pirates. The directors resisted the abolition of the tea monopoly, on the ground that the profits derived from it were applied to the benefit of the Indian revenues, which they affirmed could not be equal to the expenditure without such assistance; yet, when this source of supply has been withdrawn, they do not scruple to add to the burthen on India for their own dividends, and to provide for their commercial servants and dependents. The people of India are already complaining that three millions sterling per annum are sent away from that country, to provide for charges in England, and that the Government there is in consequence so cramped, that improvements are checked at every turn, and the most important public works are neglected: they ask if all the expenses in England are indispensable, and how long India can bear up against the drain which is constantly going on to provide for them. If such be their present views, it may be conceived with what surprise and indignation they will learn that nearly half-a-million a-year more is to be abstracted from India, for which not one shilling value has been given in any shape, and which might therefore, with equal justice, be demanded from Canada or from the West Indies. Why, they will ask, was not the East India Company allowed to take their commercial effects, or all they claimed as such, into their own hands, and divide them amongst themselves and their servants as they pleased? Why should India maintain, besides its own Government, a twofold establishment in England? Why should the patronage of India, valued at half-a-million a-year, be given up to the directors of a joint-stock company in Leadenhall Street? And why should the dividends and pensions be paid out of the revenues of India? It will now be universally felt that the Leadenhall Street establishment weighs like a mill-stone on the neck of India; that it is not only useless but pernicious; that it is paid and supported by India for opposing good measures and for inflicting evil. The directors and proprietors, with the whole patronage of India in their hands, are too strong for the Board of Control; and, though a struggle is kept up for the ascendancy between the two parties, the former are victorious whenever they put forth their whole strength. In this case, India has been shamefully wronged, and the basis of the agreement—that no new burthen should be laid on its revenues—has been totally disregarded.

And who are the parties responsible for these acts? If we look to the East India Company, they will tell us that they act under the orders and by the sanction of the Board of Control ; and, if we bring home the charge to the latter, the President will say that he decides upon the representations of the directors, and that, therefore, they are the parties responsible.

MONTROSE AND THE COVENANTERS.*

AFTER Dr Chalmers has been lecturing in favour of Church Establishments to the High-Churchmen of London—with the appropriate introduction on each occasion of the Collect of the day—and when Lord Stanley has been giving forth that the Covenanting and the Prelatic Churches must unite to maintain each other's ascendancy, it is quite refreshing to get out of the way of such a mixed and undefinable atmosphere, into the pure air of real old Jacobite Episcopalian hatred of the "hypocritical and blasphemous" Covenanters, which is presented in this work. We have never seen so pure a revival of Laud and Heylyn as the present. The Presbyterian Church does occasionally produce a Rip Van Winkle, who, after snoring over his Guthries, and Pedens, and Rutherfords, and Cargills, shakes himself, and comes forth to the light of day, with all their opinions and feelings clinging to him, and wonders that the dapper, well-living, Tory Church of Scotland, as it passes by, stares with such a glance of sinister recognition at his austere eye and prayerful visage. Among the members of the Episcopal persuasion, however, we are not accustomed to meet with such living reminiscences of the 17th century. There is, on that side, more intercourse with the world, a greater adaptation to the habits of society, and more political flexibility. We may probably account for the peculiarity of the production before us, by the circumstance of the author being a Scottish Episcopalian, or, at any rate, endowed with the spirit of that sect. To the majority of the body, we believe, it still appears that the Episcopal Church is, by divine right, the Church of Scotland, though it is rudely thrust from its proper place by a usurping band of that inferior class of establishment which professes what Charles II. considered "not a religion for a gentleman," just as the said Charles, though King of Britain from the moment of his father's death, was kept out of his throne by the interference of one Oliver Cromwell. He who spoils my neighbour, is not so unconscionable a person as he who spoils me; and the same degree of political necessity which has made the Church of England take the usurping Presbyterians by the hand, has hardly been able to prevail on "the Church in Scotland," as one of its bishops termed it in a late history, to follow the charitable example.

We beg to cull, as a nosegay for the Rev. Dr

* Montrose and the Covenanters—their Character and Conduct, illustrated from private letters, and other original documents, hitherto unpublished, embracing the Times of Charles I., from the Rise of the Troubles in Scotland, to the death of Montrose. By Mark Napier, Esq., Advocate. London: James Duncan, 1838.

Chalmers, the Rev. Mr Begg, and all others whom it may concern, some of the flowers of rhetoric with which Mr Napier adorns the memory of "our Protestant ancestors."

Hardly one generous feeling, one Christian impulse, or one legitimate act, belongs to the real history of the Covenant.—(I. 71.)

Scotland was swarming with poor clergymen, who, for the most part, uncouth, unlearned, and unenlightened, and hopeless of becoming bishops, yet felt their passions and their lungs strong enough to afford them a chance, when the waters were troubled, of emulating the popularity of Knox.—(I. 100.)

If lawless designs and cruel deeds, perpetrated under a false, though specious, exterior of religion and patriotism, be sins, the Covenant was indeed very wicked.—(I. 113.)

The Covenant, that bond of faction and banner of rebellion.—(I. 146.)

The arts of insurgency had been so successful throughout the rest of Scotland, as to create a specious, but false appearance in favour of the Covenant. There, however, [in Aberdeen] all that was rational, well-ordered, and estimable, [viz., Episcopacy] was yet actually predominant. Blasphemy did not pass current for piety, nor the darkling and destructive ravings of fanaticism for the outpourings of gifted and enlightened minds.—(I. 173.)

We have not had far to wander for these specimens; and similar general attributes of "blasphemy," "ruffianism," "avarice," &c., will be found through the whole two volumes at similar intervals. These we pass over, that we may treat our High-Church Presbyterian readers, if we have any, with one which they will find truly exquisite; for it contains an allusion, evidently intended to liken "our Protestant ancestors" to no less a person than the mystery of iniquity himself—viz., Daniel O'Connell.

Then how terrible was the scourge of their combined domination as a court of law! Baillie appears not to have been aware of the commentary he suggested, when, from the many cross-lights of his bewildered brain, he threw out this:—"The commission from the General Assembly, which before was of small use, is like almost to become a constant judicatory, and very profitable, but of so high a strain that to some it is terrible already." And no wonder it was terrible; for the most conscientious and honourable opposition to the democratic movement it crushed with the thunders of excommunication, a sentence combining, in its unhallowed connexion with the secular power of Argyle, the pretensions of papal impy with the policy of the Irish savage, who significantly chalks a death's head and cross-bones upon the threshold of his enemy.—(II. 256.)

We intend to make some observations on the particular biographical subject of this book; but, before doing so, we shall give a few general remarks, conveying our views of the relative merits of the two parties in that conflict which shook the empire during the seventeenth century, and continues to influence party feeling at the present day.

He who attempts to prove that, during a civil war, one party has adopted a course purely and philosophically correct, and the other, one equally erroneous, will pursue a vain and foolish task; nor will he be much wiser, who, having fixed on certain abstract propositions, produced by the reflection, and founded on the experience of later times, casts the claims of both parties aside with contempt and aversion, because neither adapts itself to the minute accuracy of his model. Conflicting parties necessarily make an approach to each other in their character. The mercy of a virtuous party teaches the other forbearance, and the unscrupulous acts of sanguinary leaders are reflected by butcheries on the other side. That party which, judging of it by the state of philosophy of the period, displays the better ruling principle in its actions, is to be preferred and advocated; and it is in this view that we adopt the side of the Presbyterians.

There were, it is true, other and baser elements than either fanaticism or zeal in this celebrated contest. The nobles were stirred up by the threatened revocation of the grants of church lands; and there can be no doubt that they were in correspondence with parties in England and on the Continent, and prepared to take advantage of the first excitement. In other respects, however, the commencement of that brave struggle was but the natural revulsion of a high-spirited people against an attempt to chain their conscience. The universal energy of action infused into the people and their pastors, by one step beyond the safe limits of despotism, changed, for a period, the whole characteristic features of history, and shewed us plain blunt men, with simple and unhistorical names, stepping from the rustic glens, where otherwise they would have lived in unbroken obscurity, to take their places in the niches of history beside kings, statesmen, and warriors. There are certain difficulties in calculating the real merits of the religious parties at this period. The Presbyterians did not struggle for pure liberty of conscience, but for an establishment of their own. The proper merits of the parties are, as we have above noticed, ravelled and confused by those historians who will have one side always wrong; and the other doing what is abstractly right; so we content ourselves with the comparative merits of the parties;—and the Presbyterians, struggling against arbitrary power, and, in their own way, for freedom of conscience, appear, undoubtedly, the nobler of the two. In the case of Black, who was charged with seditious preaching, there is no doubt that the opposition of Melville and others tended to draw such matters within the jurisdiction of the church courts; and the argument of Dr M'Crie, that they were to be discussed only, in the first instance, before the church courts, is but a little specimen of clever sophistry. But what was the nature of the tribunal against which this rival was raised? It was the secret council—a court which was illegal, if anything in Scotland was adapted to that exceptive term. In a conflict between the powers of the Crown, exercised by a conclave of savage nobles, servile lawyers, and apostate prelates, and the jurisdiction of the republican and popular synod, what friend of freedom can fail to take the part of the latter, without nicely inquiring how these bold priests had calculated their principles for the service of more liberal and enlightened times? Peace to the memory of those brave and zealous men! Though their free principles were constrained by the narrow partisanship and vehement animosities of the times, we may easily believe that, could they have looked forward to the present age, their high spirit would never have stooped to countenance the paltry crew of sycophantic hypocrites who now carry on a petty persecution in their names. Those who bearded kings and soldiers, denouncing the Church of Rome, lest it should be imposed on their consciences by the arm of the prerogative—who hurled down Episcopacy from its high seat beside the throne, and laid bare the hypocrisy and vices of kings, at the risk of the dungeon and the gibbet—would have been the last men on earth to sanction the conduct of those who have become the submissive tools of a domineering aristocracy and a haughty hierarchy, for accomplishing the petty task of keeping an oppressed and persecuted sect from the privileges of other citizens. These sturdy dogmatists were not your ensnarers of hares and partridges—they were real lion-hunters. They made up their mind to fight with the mighty Babylon; and they marched to London, and preached and fought it down with an energy and determination that make all latter polemical conflicts look mean and despicable. Yet it was the consequence of the impure nature of the struggle for freedom, that the persecuted became tyrants in their turn, and left to the world its most melancholy record of the poisoning influence of religious exclusivism. When the Episcopal sect persecuted, the Presbyterian sect fought for itself, instead of for liberty; and when it had the better of its adversary, it followed the course natural to victors, and afforded a precedent for a bitter retaliation in the ensuing reign. The extension of any of the privileges they had gained to other sects, was never dreamed of by the Presbyterians in their day of triumph. They fought for their own hand, and they would use for their own advantage what they gained. Of the many intolerant manifestoes issued by them, the following is, we think, the most impressive: it is a protest by the ministers at London in the year 1645:—"We detest and abhor the much endeavoured toleration. Our bowels, our bowels are stirred within us, and we could even drown ourselves in tears, when we call to mind how long and sharp a travail this kingdom hath been in for many years together, to bring forth that blessed fruit of a pure and perfect reformation; and now, at last, after all our pangs, and labours, and expectations, this real and thorough reformation is in danger of being strangled in the birth, by a lawless toleration, that strives to be brought forth before." This is exceedingly expressive, and the humble dejection of the protesters cannot fail to affect all who read the doleful expressions in which they are conveyed. Should they occur to the mind of any worthy Presbyterian supporter of the M'Ghees and O'Sullivan, as an excuse for what he, perhaps, considers the mitigated assumption of the Church of Scotland at the present day, we beg of him still to recollect that these men were not the humble tools of the aristocracy, far less of the Church of England—that they acted for themselves alone, in the full bigotry of their own hearts, and had about them all that superiority which honest enthusiasm gives in comparison with sordid and hypocritical subserviency. It would be unfair to the memories of those zealous men to omit their reasons for not giving toleration; and, indeed, these deserve some notice, from the use they may be of at the present day. The following is a passage containing some of the most logical of them:—"A toleration would be putting a sword in a madman's hand; a cup of poison into the hand of a child; a letting loose of madmen with fire-brands in their hands, and appointing a city in men's consciences for the devil to fly to; a laying of a stumbling-block before the blind; a proclaiming liberty to the wolves to come into Christ's fold to prey upon the lambs." We never met with any reasons in the Standard or the Scottish Guardian half so sound.

Those who saw the Presbyterian Church bravely fighting with the prerogative, readily conceived an affection for the simple form of church government and the rational worship which could nourish so much firmness of character and disinterested enthusiasm. It was thus that it rallied round it the People of Scotland; when they saw the fearful Privy Council braved, and a tyrant's throne shaken, they did not ask if by supporting the system they would consolidate a power that might fight against the liberties of their descendants. The church obtained her power by struggling for free opinions. Even when she has changed her side, a portion of the moral influence which she so obtained, remains with her: but it will not long accompany her; and every act by which she furthers the interest of the aristocracy will but bring her nearer to her end.

There was a very remarkable peculiarity in the struggle against arbitrary power in Scotland during the reign of Charles I.—the Scottish aristocracy were on the side of the people. A very simple fact allays the astonishment which this circumstance naturally tends to produce. Among the other foolish councils which the evil genius of Laud infused into the mind of Charles, was a design to raise the temporal power of the clergy, by bringing back to them as much as might conveniently be obtained of those rich spoils of the Church which had fallen into the hands of the aristocracy. The effect produced on these half-tamed spirits cannot easily be imagined. When a revocation was first proposed, it was found that the long swords and daggers of the proprietors of Church lands were ready to settle the final fate of the bill in committee; and blind old Lord Belhaven caused himself to be seated at the Convention, beside one of the supporters of the measure, with his dagger ready to plunge into him when the proper time should arrive. The bishops met with little respect from the aristocracy in general. "Bishops I care not for," said Montrose, at the period of his execution. "I never intended to advance their interest." Old Kinnoull, the Chancellor, when the King begged that he would let the primate have precedence of him, if but for once, would not yield; and swore that never a stoled priest in Scotland should set his foot before him, so long as his blood was hot. So could pecuniary differences alienate an aristocracy from their natural ally, a gorgeous church establishment. Had the people at large been the only victims, history would have had a different tale to proclaim.

Whether James Graham, Marquis of Montrose, was one of those proprietors whose wealth would have been affected by the aggrandisement of the bishops, we have not inquired, and we leave to the next historian who shall take Mr Napier's work to pieces to decide. He makes his first appearance in history returning from France, young, accomplished, and talented, presenting himself at court, and slighted by the King. When Jenny Geddes had thrown her stool, and the menacing aspect of the multitude, and the zeal of the preachers, shewed materials for bold hands to work with, he came forward as the foremost and most unscrupulous supporter of the Covenant, headed the armies of the Church, and carried its banner triumphantly through the country. Young and inexperienced, however, his rank did not support him, where so difficult a task was to be pursued, against the claims of the veteran Leslie, who, from being his military counsellor, became his commander; and he changed his side. Had he left the army in which he still held command, he would have saved a portion of his reputation; but he played a deeper game, and corresponded with the enemy to accomplish the ruin of those in whose project he was embarked. Montrose has farther obtained, from both sides of history, the reputation of being a persecutor and an assassin. The prominent object of the two large volumes before us, is to prove that he was consistent, merciful, high-minded, incapable of an ignoble thought—a task in which, we are sorry to say, the author's success by no means corresponds to his exertions.

Montrose's correspondence with the enemy was the subject of a species of judicial inquiry in the Committee of Estates. The author complains that in many cases the procedure deviated from the strict rules of justice. We have no doubt that it did; but we will look in vain through history for men on one side of a question following principles of abstract justice, while those of the other are steeped in iniquity. The models on which the Covenanters had to proceed, were the Star Chamber, the High Commission, and the Scottish Secret Council. The last example set before them was the trial of Balmerinoch, who had been condemned to death for retaining a copy of a petition to the King, which had never been presented—an act, by the way, which Mr Napier vindicates, accusing Balmerinoch of ingratitude, in afterwards opposing the Court; because, instead of putting him to death, (which, in the temper of the times, they dared not do,) his persecutors were content with hanging the sentence over his head, and reluctantly pardoning him after a harassing imprisonment. But to return to Montrose, We have perused, with considerable attention, the various documents which Mr Napier has printed, in illustration of this inquiry. The task has not been an agreeable one; for they are endowed with all the dullness, without the precision, of very dry law papers. The result of the whole has very little effect on the question. By Montrose's account, and that of his friends, his object in corresponding with the King, was for his Majesty's interest and the good of the country. All men profess good motives on such occasions; but their word is not always taken on the subject. It is not necessary, however, to judge of Montrose's final views. He was a chief in the Covenanting army; and, to remain an active partizan with men whom he was secretly undermining, is an act which no code of morality can justify, however wicked might be their ultimate objects, and however pure his. One of the charges against him was the preparation of a bond, signed by himself and others, inimical to the interests of the Covenanters. The bond is produced, and is found to contain nothing traitorous to their cause; but, on the contrary, to profess the support of religion, laws, and liberty, &c. It is one of those documents common to the period, the mere object of which is to bind men together generally, for the accomplishment of purposes which it is not safe to commit to writing. If it had not some object beyond the simple meaning of its contents, it was useless, and Montrose and his friends were very idly employed in preparing it. Although, as we have said, it is impossible to discover Montrose's ultimate designs with reference to the country, what they were as to himself is very apparent. It was part of the secret agreement with the King, that the offices of State should not be disposed of till his visit to Scotland; or, as one witness stated, (but whose veracity Mr Napier calls in question,) that they should be given to Montrose and his friends of the bond. The two versions come exactly to the same thing, and illustrate the view of Clarendon—that Montrose joined the Covenant because he believed Argyle would adhere to the Court; but, finding his powerful rival overtopping him on the new field he had chosen, he found it expedient to look for another. The question as to Montrose's good faith, cannot be better put at rest than by a passage from the memoirs of his achievements, published during his lifetime, by his chaplain Wishart, as Mr Napier himself mentions, under Montrose's own auspices.

.. When Montrose returned to the army, as he found he could not prevent their resolution, he chose rather openly to approve it. He himself commanded in this army 2000 foot and 500 horse; and his most intimate friends and dependents, who had solemnly engaged to him to employ their services for the King's interest, commanded 5000 more; and, if the greatest part of these had not broke their engagements, he had either carried off the whole army with him to the King, or, at least, had easily disappointed the designs of the Covenanters. They pitched their camp at the river Tweed, upon the Borders; and the principal officers having cast lots, it fell to Montrose's share first to cross the river, which he executed immediately on foot, at the head of his own infantry, and with great readiness, the better to conceal his design, and to remove any suspicion of him; for his influence in the army, and his frank, honest disposition, were now so much dreaded by these conscious rebels, that they kept a strict watch over all his motions.*

To excuse Montrose for having ever joined the Covenanters, appears to be the most painful part of the author's duty, and it compels him to have recourse to unhappy expedients. He endeavours to persuade us that the bold and active chief was the dupe of a country clergyman; and, with a singular moral obliquity, tries to shew that he was indifferent to the cause. "Montrose," he says, "being no party to the covert designs of the faction, [this is a gratuitous assumption,] was but a blundering Covenanter, and, being upon this occasion left very much to his own devices in furthering the cause, was not only willing to accept of very equivocal converts, but, totally forgetting the importance of the magna charta of his party, now attempted to make Covenanters of Papists, by the ingenious device of waiving the Covenant itself; as the play of Hamlet was modified by the itinerant manager."—(I. 236.) The only effect of this passage is to remove the palliating circumstance of religious enthusiasm, and to deepen the blackness of his character.

The course of Montrose's deeds may be illustrated by his three visits to Aberdeen. The first was at the head of a deputation of precious divines, to have a brotherly communing with the perverse doctors of the north, touching the Covenant, and to force them to accept the same, in case of their malignant and schismatic refusal. Montrose's second visit was at the head of the Covenanting forces, who subjected Aberdeen to the miseries of a siege and capture. Mr Napier endeavours to prove that Montrose was less anxious for persecution than his clerical assistants—and the case is not unlikely; while at the head of the Covenanting forces, he does not appear to have been under so bloody a demon as afterwards possessed him. Having effected the subjugation of Aberdeen to the Covenanters, Montrose's third visit was to do business for another firm. He brought before the devoted city a wild mass of half-naked Irish and Highlanders. The citizens—inclined to the royal side, as the author maintains them to have been—were urged, by the horrible fate which the entrance of such a ghastly band must bring, to stand a siege. The town was quickly taken, and given up for several days to a course of rapine and plunder, the usual accompaniments of which seem to have reached the utmost that has ever been described in those various sacks of cities that blacken the annals of warfare. All this appears to us unreasonable conduct, on the part of Montrose, and not to be vindicated. Let us hear the simple description of the scene by the Cavalier annalist, Spalding.

The Lieutenant [viz. Montrose,] follows the chase into Aberdeen, his men hewing and cutting all manner of men they could overtake within the town, upon the streets, or in their houses, or round about the town, as our men were flying, with broadswords, without mercy or remead. Thir cruel Irishes, seeing a man well clad, would first turr him, to save his cloaths unspoiled, syne kill the man. We lost three pieces of cannon, with much good armour, besides the plundering of our town, houses, merchants' booths, and all which was pitiful to see! The Lord Burleigh, Mr Alexander Jaffray and his sons, Mr Robert Farquar, Walter Cochran, Mr James Baird, advocate in Edinburgh, and diverse other Covenanters, wan away. Montrose follows the chase into the town, leaving the body of his army standing close unbroken while his return, excepting such as fought the field. He had promised them the plundering of the town for their good service, but he stayed not, but returned back from Aberdeen, to the camp this samen Friday at night, leaving the Irishes killing, robbing, and plundering of this town at their pleasure, and nothing was heard but pitiful howling, crying, and weeping, and mourning through all the streets! Thus thir Irishes continued Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Monday. Some women they pressed to deflower, and others they took per force to serve them in the camp. It is lamentable to hear how thir Irishes, who had gotten the spoil of the town, did abuse the samen; the men they killed they would not suffer to be buried, but turred their cloaths off them, syne left the naked bodies lying above the ground. The wife durst not cry nor weep at her husband's slaughter before her eyes, nor the daughter for the father, which if they did and were heard, then they were presently slain also.

It appears that the immediate provoking cause in this case, was the slaughter, by some one or other, of the drummer who accompanied a flag of truce—a circumstance which would not have approached to a vindication, had this been but a solitary instance, and not merely an episode in a system of rapine, which would occupy volumes in its detail. But let us hear this author's peculiar remarks on Montrose's cruelties:—

We may believe this account of the slaughter committed by Montrose's excited and desultory soldiery, and the yet more hideous picture afforded by Spalding, of the cruel excesses they perpetrated against individual citizens, men and women, of that devoted town. But, unless it can be shewn that Montrose could have gained his victory, or prosecuted his enterprise, at less expense of human life and suffering, he stands as completely exonerated as any General under whose command blood ever flowed and misery followed. He had done his best to avert the calamity from Aberdeen; and, however the loyalists of that unhappy district may have suffered, it is upon their Covenanting rulers, and not upon his Majesty's Lieutenant, that the responsibility and the stain of those excesses must fall. Besides that the pillage of the town was the only mode afforded him of paying his precarious and unmanageable following, unless he had now determined to abandon the enterprise thus far victoriously prosecuted, some severity was indispensable, in order to sustain the royal authority in his person, which had been so grossly contemned, contrary to every rule of warfare, by the rebels having repeatedly refused to acknowledge the protection of his flag of truce, and by the extreme provocation of the cowardly slaughter of him who carried it upon the occasion in question. Spalding himself, from whom the picture of the cruelties imputed to the natural dispositions of Montrose is derived, completely exonerates our hero, and casts the stigma where it ought to rest. But his own dying declaration is more than sufficient to outweigh all the crude and unreflecting calumny poured out against him on this subject, both in his own times and the present. On the eve of his execution, his clerical tormentors accused him of having waged war by means of what they termed an army of Irish rebels and cut-throats. To this, Montrose replied—"It was no wonder that the King should take any of his subjects who would help him, when those who should have been his best subjects deserted and opposed him. 'We see,' said he, 'what a company David took to defend him in the time of his strait.' As to his men's spoiling and plundering the country, he answered, they know that soldiers who wanted pay could not be restrained from spoils, nor kept under such strict discipline as other regular forces but he did all that lay in him to keep them back from it; and for bloodshed, if it could have been prevented, he would rather it had all come out of his own veins."—(II. 334, 5.)

If these victories then were glorious, if their object was legitimate, we must not speak of their being sullied by severities, when, from the circumstances of his undertaking, from the military habits of his country and times, and from the peculiar nature of his military resources, it was absolutely impossible to have accomplished them on other terms.—(II. 383.)

This is the same horrible argument which has attached itself to the foulest deeds of the worst ages. It nerved the slaughterer's arm on the eve of St Bartholomew; it hung over the smoke of Smithfield; and presided in the Spanish inquisition. It professes the omniscience of the Almighty in distinguishing good from evil, and then tries to grasp his thunderbolts, to punish according to the presumptuous knowledge. Mr Napier was, doubtless, opposed to the Reform Bill—would he think half the lives of the country a fitting sacrifice to the repeal of that measure? If he be consistent, he must be opposed to Presbyterian Church extension—would he willingly gain his end by the slaughter of all the clergy who support it? Were we not assured that Mr Napier is an amiable and accomplished man, we would deem him, from his own words, to be a most dangerous member of society.

Clarendon, for whom the author shaws the fitting respect of a sound Tory, bluntly accuses Montrose of having made an offer to the King to assassinate Argyle and Hamilton. It is said that he came to the King and made the offer; but a personal interview, though possible, is not probable, as Montrose was at the time in prison. Mr Brodie suggested that the proposal was most probably made through William Murray, of the bed-chamber, one of those slimy things that crawl about a court; and the suppressed passages of Clarendon, lately brought to light, seem to confirm the supposition. Mr Napier has an ingenious and complicated theory for supposing that Clarendon made the accusation without full authority, while part of his work shews that he obtained his information, as to the transactions in Scotland at that time, from the King's own mouth. It is worthy of remark, that Clarendon commenced his "History" in Sicily after he had finally parted with the King, and when he knew all he could derive from that quarter. It is within the range of possibility, that a voluminous historian's only calumny is one against a political partisan; but the world is slow in believing such things, especially when there is no evidence. This is not the only similar charge brought by Clarendon against Montrose. When Dr Dorislaus, ambassador from the Parliament, was seated at table at the Hague, half-a-dozen ruffians burst into the room and slew him. "They kept not their own counsel so well," says Clarendon, "believing they had done a very heroic act, but that it was generally known they were all Scottishmen, and most of them servants or dependants upon the Marquis of Montrose;" so that the noble historian calmly bestows on the chivalrous chief the reputation of being a leader of cut-throats.

For all that has been said against Montrose, Mr Napier makes fierce retaliation on his opponents. Of some of these—Argyle and Warriston, for instance—we always had a doubtful opinion. Their path, through the history of these wild times, seemed cloudy, tortuous, and unsatisfactory. The author has had the merit of, in a great measure, clearing away these prejudices. After hearing his elaborate attack, we have the satisfaction of knowing, that every article of evidence against them has been collected, adjusted, and commented on with the most laborious and minute ingenuity—and the result is an acquittal. We thought it not unlikely, that some acts of assassination had been committed by the Covenanters, to balance the notorious murders on the other side; but the result of Mr Napier's endeavours to prove two, satisfies us that there was not one. One of his attempts is in the case of the slaughter of Kilpont, by Stewart of Ardvoirlich, the foundation of Scott's "Legend of Montrose." Stewart, having perpetrated the deed, fled to the Covenanters. Mr Napier having given the facts from tradition, and produced a pardon from the Covenanters, which proceeds on a very different narrative, makes the justification of the latter apply to the facts in the former. Ardvoirlich was, we have no doubt, one of the rough-handed men of the age; and, we dare say, the Covenanters made little inquiry as to his character. Had his documents been legitimately deposited in the Napier charter chest, this author would have, in fulfilment of his duty, proved him one of the noble army of martyrs. The other charge of assassination is founded on the death of a "malignant," on whose head a price was put, who was slain in resisting an attempt to capture him.

In other circumstances, we might have indulged in some display of the follies and vices of the Covenanting side. It is the result, however, of so violent a perversion of all common sense and historical evidence, as Mr Napier's book exhibits, to change the attitude of the impartial speculator into that of the defender of the attacked. We fear our readers will conclude that we think this a very dishonest book: we hasten to undeceive them. The deductions are so monstrously opposed to all the evidence, that no author having that perception of what is the right, which is necessary to the idea of dishonesty, would have ventured upon them. We have no doubt that the whole is the result of a firm and unhesitating faith in Montrose; and, farther, we feel assured that no evidence which history is capable of producing on any subject, would convince the author of the contrary. To explain this psychological curiosity, it must be known that circumstances have made a belief in Montrose's innocence a sacred duty with Mr Napier. In page 8, we hear of Montrose's "brother-in-law, Lord Napier, a nobleman many years his senior, and one of the most pious and irreproachable statesmen of the day;" and so frequently does the word "Napier" occur through the volumes, and so many are the circumstances of all kinds detailed of sundry Napiers, that we perceive the vindication of Montrose is only a small portion of the pious task of honouring our great-great-grandfathers in the land. It was Mr Napier's good fortune, in pursuance of a portion of this duty, to do a service to scientific biography, for which the world cannot be too grateful to him. It is not every Scotch charter chest that can furnish notices of such men as he who invented the logarithms. As for any other Napiers, we suspect no one is anxious for the disinterment of their celebrity, nor for the publication of various lengthy documents—one of which shews a strong and natural desire to protect a lease of certain taxes; and the other, an offer to govern the country with great probity and discrimination, if the King will be pleased to advance the writer to a high office about his person. We leave these volumes, in the confidence that they will prove a savoury prey to our historiographer-royal, when he resumes his favourite subject.

THERE'S MUSIC.

There's music in the breath of flowers,
(Fair gifts of the gladdening spring,)
 Which mock all other things of earth
In their bright apparelling.

There's music in the voice of streams,
Rushing on to the sounding sea,
As they silently glide on their fearless course,
With their faint, low melody.

There's music in the fitful tone
Of the balmy summer breeze,
As it scuds through the lonely, midnight air—
A sigh from the forest trees.

There's music in the tempest's voice,
And the moan of the pathless sea;
For they guide our thoughts from this work-day world
To dreams of eternity.

There's music in all things of earth;
And the silent stars of Heaven
Have a dream-like music of their own,
To the God of Creation given.

Through the boundless realms of viewless space, —
These choral symphonies rise, — natches
From the thousand spheres of the starry work
To the Maker of earth and skies.

THE PASTOR'S DEATHBED.

A SKETCH OF GERMAN LIFE.

FROM JEAN PAUL RICHTER.

"Give me," said Herder to his son, in the fevered exhaustion of sickness—"Give me a noble thought to refresh me withal!" But what is it that, for the most part, we are found giving to our sick fellow-mortals, when the shining dew on their life has become grey? Instead of bright pictures from the sky, to shine through the darkness of death, we accumulate a host of unfamiliar and unkindly images around the bed of sickness. When a man is healthy and strong, and able to endure much sorrow, we lay light burdens on his back; but, when he is weak, and sickly, and the nerve of his being is unstrung, we seem to expect that at such a moment he shall be best able to bear all our sorrows and all our lamentations; we behave as if it were the duty of the dying man to elevate us, not our duty rather to support him. In the confined sick-room there stands no soul that has strength sufficient to wake a passing smile upon that nerveless, colourless countenance; but only confessors, and lawyers, and physicians are there, giving instructions about everything; and friends and relations, who can do nothing but lament. There is no individual in this room that stands elevated above his own private cause of grief, upon a position from which he might irrigate the thirsty soul of the sick man with the fresh spring-waters of old reminiscences, and unite these with the flowings of ecstatic anticipation that sometimes open up to the dying the vista of a future life. But the bed of the sick man is made literally a coffin without a lid; or life is made to assume to the departing a false importance, by weeping lies of recovery, or loud voices of lamenting; and the bier is made to shew like a bloody scaffold; and into the ears which remain alive after the eyes are dead, the sharp discords only of life are sent—whereas, life ought rather to breathe itself away, amid the falling echo of ever deeper and ever sweeter tones. And yet there is this one good thing about men—that they rejoice more in one small good office done to the dying, than in twenty kindnesses shewn to the living; perhaps partly for this reason, because only in the latter case have they opportunity to eke out the measure of their defective benevolence; and yet we mortals ought daily to bear in mind, how easily every joy that is given or received may prove to be the last.

In this fashion, our exit out of life would, for the most part, prove even a more painful thing than our entry into it, did not good Mother Nature here, as in other things, smooth the way before us, by bearing her sleeping children in her arms, softly cradled from the one world into the other. For, in the hours that immediately follow death, she is wont to cover the dying vision of mail of indifference towards everything the occa-

they leave behind them upon earth; and when the critical moment approaches, (as the information of those who have been awakened from the semblance of death, and the gestures and tones of many dying persons, sufficiently testify,) she causes a flood of joyous waves to swim round the brain of the mortal, comparable to nothing on earth but those feelings of deep delight in which persons who have been magnetically dead bathe themselves, while convalescing.* But of these ecstasies of the dying we have only a fragmentary and imperfect knowledge; they may be far higher than we have any conception of. There is an important universal history yet to be written—the history of the dying; but upon this earth the rolls of that history will not be unfolded.

In the village of Helm, lived Gottfried Hartmann, with his aged father, a clergyman, whose wane of life he rendered happy, though the old man had lived long enough to survive all the common objects that tie our affections to their earthly existence. Gottfried was his assistant in the office of preaching; this, however, not so much because the hale old man stood in need of such aid, as that he might find a channel to give vent to his own high emotions, and, at the same time, afford the old man that peculiar joy which a wise father feels when he is taught by a wise son.

In Gottfried's breast a spirit was working and striving, that seeks to unfold itself in poetic blossoming. But he was not, like most poetic youths, a tuberous plant, that sends forth a few poetic flowers, and, when these have fallen away, grows only in coarse material fruits beneath the ground; but he was a tree that crowns its various blossoms with various fruits; and the shoots of that tree were now animated by the warmth of those poetical months with which Providence has in these latter times favoured us.

His father was also a born poet—but the time had not been so favourable for him; for, in the middle of the last century, every spirit that had wings was obliged to remain and fix itself upon the pulpit, or upon the schoolmaster's chair, or upon the seat of justice; for the Muses require to be tenderly nourished; and every honest burges could afford to feed his son better upon every meadow and upon every common, than upon the jagged ridge of Parnassus. But a truly poetic soul, when it cannot manifest its existence in those forms to which this world is accustomed to confine the name of poems, goes back upon itself with double energy, and adorns the chamber of the heart with wonderful flowers; the unexpressed feelings shape to themselves another mould, and the actions of that man are pictures. In this wise the poet is of equal duration with the man whose life he fashions. Thus, the delicate insect that has not brought forth its birth in the summer season, lives through the long hard winter, and dies not.

Something of this sort befell old Hartmann, but more beautiful; for the virgin soul of the poet could live in the pulpit, as in a vestal cell; and the twin sisters, Religion and Poetry, were the friends and helpmates of each other. How pure, how lovely is his situation who cares for souls! Everything good lies in friendly neighbourhood around him, while other professions build a hard crust, or weave a dark veil between human hearts and that which human hearts ought to reverence.

Son and father lived day by day, so to speak, deeper and more deep into one another's existence; and, instead of the relation of paternal love and filial duty, (with which a certain distance is often connected,) a friendship of a peculiar kind was developed; for not only with the regeneration of his own poetic youth did the presence of the son refresh him, but with the yet more lovely likeness of his own faith. There was a time known to us all, when an old clergyman who sent his son to study theology in the Universities, could expect him to come back nothing less than the Iconoclast and heaven-stormer of all that his paternal altar had taught him to hold in reverence. The son came home from his studies as an apostle of the heathens, or rather an antichrist, into his father's house.* There were griefs of fathers in those days, deeper doubtless, though more concealed, than even those of the mother: Now it is here and there a little better. Gottfried, though he had gone to the public schools not uninfected by that common wanton spirit of freethinking which is a sort of spiritual wild-oats of the soul, had come back to his home with the faith of his father, and his father's fathers, in his bosom; for the religious feelings of his nature had been kindly fanned by those better teachers who seek to preserve our spiritual vitality from the clearing, crystallizing influence of those who call themselves the illuminati—well knowing that human hearts, like plants, should only shew their leaves to the sun, and that he who uncovers the root is a fool.

Thus did the fond old father find again his Christian heart, in the breast of his son, beating with new pulsations; and with this he also found the justification at once of his own faith, and of his own love. If it is one of the greatest of woes to be obliged both to love and to contradict, and to turn away the head when the heart comes near, it is also one of the greatest bless-

* This is a touching allusion to the consequences of the Neological or Deistical doctrines so prevalent in the German Church during the latter half of the last century. From the passage which immediately follows, it appears that the present piece must have been written about the year 1816, for it was about that time that the reaction in favour of revealed religion commenced. The Liberation War mentioned in the sequel, had a great effect in this revival of devotional feeling.

ings to see our own and our father's faith propagated, untroubled, through another generation. Life, then, is as a beautiful starry night, when no well-known light goes down, without another, equally welcome, rising to supply its place.

Gottfried lived in a paradise; and his only business was to work as gardener for his father, and be to him wife, brother, friend, and all that one mortal can be to another.

Every Sunday brought him a new joy, and that was a new sermon to preach before his father. So much did this circumstance exert all his capabilities, and call forth his sleeping poetical powers, that he seemed to preach more for the purpose of moving and elevating his father's soul, than for the edification of the common people; although he was not certainly in the wrong when he imagined that the members of a congregation, like children, are the better of being taught somewhat above their understanding; for we learn to climb only by looking at the heights that we have not yet climbed. Then a tear would glisten in the eye of the old man, or he would join his hands suddenly, as to an unpremeditated prayer. This would make the whole Sunday a Feast of Ascension to Gottfried; and, in the silent, secluded parsonage, many scenes of joy were thus enacted, which no person saw, and many, though they had seen, would not have understood. He who looks upon all sermons necessarily (what, it must be confessed, too many of them are) as a dull, stale thing, will scarcely sympathize with the earnestness with which father and son were wont to speak over both the sermon that was, and the sermon that was to be, as if the criticism of a sermon had been a matter of as much importance as the criticism of a play.* The love and the approbation of such a strong, healthy old man as Hartmann—whose limbs, though standing on the cold height of years, were yet not stiff—must have worked wonderfully on a youth like Gottfried, who, being both bodily and spiritually of a more delicate and alim fabric, shot up with a higher and more excitable flame heavenward.

To this happy pair a third happy person was associated. Justa, an orphan, mistress of her own fortune and her own conduct, had sold her father's (a rich old merchant) magnificent house in the city, and lodged herself in the upper flat of one of the prettiest cottages of the neighbourhood, that she might enjoy the country—not half, as city gentry generally do, but wholly. Justa, indeed, was a person who, whatever she did, did it wholly; and some things she did even more than wholly—that is to say, when there was any room for magnanimity and generosity, she was apt to overshoot the mark. The first thing that she did in the village of Helm, after she had seen the mild Gottfried and his gentle poet's eyes, and heard four or five Easter homilies from him, was to surrender up to him her virtue-intoxicated heart, without further ceremony; reserving, however, her hand till the bond of their union could be sealed along with the bond of public peace in Europe. Justa was a person who, on all occasions, preferred what was difficult to what was easy. I wish this were the place to make a picture of the May-life that bloomed here under Justa's hands, in the humble parsonage beneath the humble church spire; the mornings when she left her own abode to arrange the course of every happy day in the parsonage; the evenings in the manse garden, that had not only twelve beds in it, but also a number of well-watered meads around it, not to speak of the far hills and the stars; the playing of three hearts into one another, of which none, in such a pure, secluded neighbourhood, could know or feel anything but what was most beautiful, and every one of which possessed goodness and cheerfulness as a daily atmosphere. Every seat in that house was a church seat, everything was spiritual, and the heaven itself was to them only one great cupola of a temple.

Doubtless, in many such humble homes, in many such humble villages, which the great ones of the earth never heard of, there lies concealed a true Eden; for joy is always wont to cover over with modest leaves her most delicate blossoms. Gottfried lived in such a poetic fullness of joy and love—of the reverend and the beautiful—of the past, and the present, and the future—that he felt secretly afraid to express his joy otherwise than by prayer. Only in prayer, thought he, may a man give expression to everything—his happiness and his misery. Truly the father enjoyed a warm old age; not a winter evening, but a summer evening, without darkness and frost, although the sun of his life had long been sinking behind the hill of the grave beneath which he had, some years ago, laid his wife.

There is nothing which in noble minds has such a tendency to raise up the idea of the last hours of life, as those very hours of our existence which are most lovely and most happy. When all the blossoms of joy were blooming together most brightly, and intermingling their fragrances in a union of bliss that happens to mortal man but once, if once, through the long seventy years of his pilgrimage—exactly in the dewy morning of life, and beneath the morning star—Gottfried was compelled to think that the same star must soon shine as the evening star. Then he said to himself—“Everything now stands so clear and so firm before me—the beauty and the blessedness of life—the splendour of the universe—the Creator—the worth and the greatness of the heart—the constellations of eternal truths—the whole starry heaven of ideas that beams on men, and attracts them, and sustains them. But when old age shall overtake me, and I shall lie in the feebleness of dissolution, will not, then, all things appear in a different light?—will not that which is now so full of luxuriant vitality, become cold, and grey, and stiff to my perception? For precisely in that moment when man is nearest to the heavens, towards which he has all his life been looking, Death holds his inverted telescope before our eyes, and we see nothing but a wide blank. But is this right and true? Do my blooming or my fading energies lay hold of reality more strongly and more truly? Shall I be more in the right then, when I only live, and think, and hope, with half a life; or am I more in the right now, when my whole heart is warm, my whole head clear, and all my faculties fresh? I feel that I am a more just reasoner now when my soul and body are in perfect health. Therefore I will live through this glorious daytime of truth, not carelessly, but with attention; and what I now see of the glory of existence, I will carry with me as a bright reminiscence, to illumine the dark lowering of my latter end.” In the loveliest May-hours of life, when Heaven, and earth, and his heart beat together in a perfect concord of joy, Gottfried gave his fiery feelings fiery words, and a permanent existence, under this title, “Reminiscences of the best Hours of Life, for the Last.” With these echoes of blessed hours, it was his intention to refresh his own ears on his death-bed, and to look from the evening red of existence back into the redness of morning.

Thus lived these three mortals, enjoying one another, and one another's happiness, always more and more inly, when, at length, the battle and the victor-cars of the Holy War* began to roll over the earth. At this signal, Gottfried became, all at once, a changed man. He was like a young bird of passage migrating for the first time, and following the train of his fellows in search of some change of climate, which he instinctively seeks after, but does not know. The active powers of his nature, that had hitherto sat as listeners to the poetico-rhetorical, rose up, and he felt as if the flames of enthusiasm—formerly, like the flames from a bed of naphtha, flickering aimless through the empty air—were now seeking some definite object to lay hold of. But he had not courage, at first, to declare his intention to his father; he only anguished and refreshed alternately his spirit, with the idea of going forth with the army of patriots, and doing the duty of a man. To Justa, however, he opened his heart; but from her he obtained no approval; for to leave the old man upon the brink of the grave in solitude, seemed too harsh. But the old man himself, who felt the enthusiasm of the war almost as much as his son, of his own accord gave him permission. “Go, my Gottfried,” says he, “where you have long wished to be, and where Germany expects all her sons to go. For a year I have strength enough to serve the altar, and thus I too am doing something for Fatherland.”

Gottfried flew away in full reliance on the healthy old harvest of his father's life. He became a common soldier, and acted as chaplain too, when occasion served. A new career renews all our activities, and every one marks his entrance into it with a surer step. This Gottfried felt; and, though fate refused him the wound that he would fain have brought with him from the wars, as a sort of focus wherein to collect all the warm rays of those days of enthusiasm, yet he too had fought in the great battles of the time, and, like an old republican, he knew the joy of striving nobly with a whole people for a common end.

When at length the loveliest May that ever Germany won with victories, was celebrated with feasts of peace and triumph, the young man did not feel inclined to celebrate these days of joy at a distance from those most dear to him, but he wished to double his joy by their presence. He journeyed to them. Many there were, before and after him, who made this journey through liberated lands out of a happy past into a happy present; but few saw, like Gottfried, such a blue heaven rest upon his native vales, in which also no old star was wanting, but every one shone brightly. Justa had sent him, from time to time, the small news of the parsonage, how she longed for his return, and how his father was working cheerily, and with what unction the old man preached twice every Sunday, and so forth; and how she herself was keeping yet more lovely secrets for his return; one of which secrets, perhaps, was one that he certainly had not forgotten—viz., her promise, that, after the peace, he should have her hand.

From the feast of Whitsuntide onwards, Gottfried had been feasting himself with these prospects, and he saw already before him the holy evening, when he should enter Heim, release the old man unexpectedly from his labours, and prepare days of peaceful festivity for himself.

As he thus painted to himself his meeting with his loved one, and the mountains of his native village stood clearly and more clearly outlined, his "Reminiscences of the Best Hours of Life, for the Last," began again to echo through his soul; and he could not restrain himself, among these reminiscences, from noting down the meeting of dear friends in this life, after long separation.

Behind him journeyed from the east, and followed him in his way, a dark cloud, with water more pregnant than with fire. The thunders of earth in the late campaign, had reconciled his heart to the milder manifestations of heavenly wrath, and he seemed to walk before that cloud, as a well-omened messenger; for the thirsty earth, the drooping flowers, and the sickly yellowness of the corn, had long panted for the warm blessings of the clouds. A pariahioner from Heim, who was plunging in a distant field, gave a sign to Gottfried, joyful that he and the rain were coming together.

The little spire of the church now began, as it were, to grow out of the earth, and he came into the region of the valley, where the parsonage lay, on which the redness of the evening sun was clearly shining. In every window he hoped to see his bride watching the sun's going down in glory, before the outbursting of the storm. As he came nearer, he hoped to find every window open, with Whitsuntide birches peeping out from the room—but he found nothing.

At length he arrived at the parsonage—all was silent—and opened the familiar door. The room was empty, but he heard a noise in the upper chamber. He ascended, and, when he opened the door, he saw Justa kneeling at the bed of his father, who was sitting half upright, with an emaciated but strong, bony face, in the light of the evening sun, that strongly lit up the paleness of death that was on him. Justa fell upon his neck, and this, with an exclamation of thankfulness to God, was the whole reception. But his father stretched out to him his dry, yellow hand, and said, with exhaustion—"You come just at the proper time"—leaving it undetermined, to Gottfried's understanding, whether he meant in time to preach for him, or in time to see him die.

Justa told Gottfried, in a few words, how the old man, worn out with too sedulous an attention to his pastoral duties, had suddenly sunk into a state of extreme weakness both of mind and body; how he had now ceased to take interest in anything, and yet was continually longing for sympathy, and was altogether as a helpless child, lying with clipped wings, on the ground, and praying some one to help him up. The old man was somewhat deaf, and Justa could tell all this without being heard.

Gottfried soon learned that all this was too true. He had come back with the reflection of the war-fire in his breast, and nothing would have been dearer to him than to have been able to bring the blazing signals of victory before the enthusiastic gaze of his old father; but the heart, once so strong, was now weak; and from the man who lately sympathised with all the warmth of the young warrior, not a question came, not a wish. The old man kept his eye fixed on the descending sun, till the storm had completely overflowed it. He seemed as little moved by the war in heaven, as by the war on earth; and through the thickening ice of death, the light of life shone more and more turbid. The dying man knows no present—past and future alone are before him.

Latterly, darkness covered the sky; not a breath of air moved, and the oppressed earth waited impatiently for the issue. The lightning had shot round the old man, and he looked up from the shock, changed and surprised—"I hear," said he, "the rain again—speak to me, children, for I must soon be gone."

Perhaps the shaking of the air and the thunder had opened the oppressed avenues of sensibility; and yet, more probably, the lightning, passing near him, had turned round his whole being like the poles of a magnet, and brought his body nearer to dissolution and his spirit nearer to perfection. Both the children embraced him—he was too weak to embrace them.

The warm medicinal waters of the clouds, were now bathing the sick earth, from the streaming tree to the smallest grass; the heavens began to shine through the storm, like a tear of joy, and only on the far hills did the thunder continue to war. Suddenly the old man rose, and, with his hand pointing upward, said—"Behold the glory of God ! Ah ! my son, feed my weary soul now, for the last time, with some spiritual consolation. But give me no litany of penances ; I have made my peace with God. Tell me something full of love of the Almighty and his works, as in your Easter sermons."

The tears began to flow in the eyes of the son ; for these words brought the thought into his mind, that the "Reminiscences" which he had written down for his own death-bed, might be read at the death-bed of his father. He explained this to the old man ; and he said—"Do this, my son ;" and the son began, with trembling voice—

"Think upon this in the dark hour of death : that the splendour of the universe once filled thy bosom, and that thou hast known how great a thing it is to be. Hast thou not looked forth by night upon the one-half of infinity—the starry heaven ; and by day hast thou not contemplated the other half ? Put out of thy view the nothingness of space, and the earth that blinds thy prospect, and thou art surrounded, as a centre, by worlds above thee, under thee, and around thee—a vault of unmeasured creation—all moving and being moved—glory in glory—grandeur thronging on grandeur—all suns pointing themselves around thee, towards one great universal sun. Turn thee wherethou wilt, thou seest no end, no exit into empty and dark space. Emptiness dwells only between the worlds, not around the world.

"Think upon this in the dark hour of death ; how many times there have been that thou hast prayed in ecstasy before God, and hast thought Him—the greatest thought of a finite being—the Infinite."

The old man folded his hands and prayed silently.

"Hast thou not acknowledged and felt the Being, whose infinitude consists not only in might, and wisdom, and eternity, but in love also and justice ? Canst thou forget the times when the blue heaven by day, and the blue heaven by night, opened themselves to thee as the blue eyes with which a kind father looked down upon thee ? Hast thou not felt the love of the Infinite One, when it concealed itself within its own reflection—in human hearts that loved ? as the sun casts her shining day, not only on our moon for the benefit of our nights, but on the morning and the evening star, and on the farthest starlets that wander in the neighbourhood of the earth.

"Think upon this in the dark hour of death : how, in the spring of thy life, the graves of the dead appeared to thee only as the mountain-peaks of a distant new world ; and how thou then, in the midst of the fulness of life, couldst recognise the value of death. Old age freezes us ; but there is a vital heat within the snow-hill, that warms us into a new existence. As a sailor voyaging through a cold, desert, wintry sea, suddenly comes upon a coast that is blooming in all the warmth and fulness of spring, thus also we land, by a single impulse of our ship, upon an eternal spring, which makes ample amends for our wintry voyage.

"Rejoice thyself in the dark hour of death, that thy life lives in the great wide life of the universe. This clod of earth, which we call our Earth, is inspired with the breath of Divinity. The world swarms with life, and every leaf of every tree is a land of souls. Every little individual life would freeze into nothing, were it not supported and warmed by waves of circumambient vitality. The sea of time, like our seas of space, is phosphorescent with innumerable living beings ; and death and life are only the fire-valleys and fire-mountains of the eternal billowy ocean of things that are. There is no such thing as a skeleton of the dead ; what we call so is only another body for the living. Without universal vitality, there were nothing but a wide, infinite death. We are mosses and lichens that cleave to the high Alps of Nature, and suck nourishment from the clouds. Man is a butterfly that flutters over Chimborazo, and high above us flutters the condor ; but, small or great, giant or child, we all wander free, through one great garden ; and the ephemeral fly can trace its long lineage through all the storms and battles of centuries, back to Paradise, where its ancestors sported in the sunbeams of the evening sun that shone upon the fows rivers. Never forget the thought that now spreads itself out so clearly before thee—that the *I of the soul endures through the most distracting griefs and the most glowing ecstasies of mind, while the body breaks down by corporeal suffering and excitement. Souls are like the wandering lights of a dark, starry night, that move about unextinguished by the buffeting of the wind or by the drenching of the rain.

"Canst thou forget, in the dark hour of death, that great men have been in the world, and that thou followest where they have gone before thee ? Lift thyself up to the element of those pure spirits that stood upon their own mountains, and felt the storms of life around them, but never above them. Call back to thy recollection the succession of sages and poets who have animated people after people, and spread a light upon dark places."

"Speak of our Saviour," said the father.

"Think upon Jesus Christ in the dark hour of death ; for he, too, felt the darkness of that hour. Think upon Jesus Christ, that mild Moon of the infinite Sun for human nights. Let life and death be holy to thee ; for Jesus shared them both in his humanity. May He look down upon thee, gentle through dignity ; and, amid the darkness of the last hour, shew to thee his Father !"

A soft thunder rolled over the light, loose

* The Ich or Ego, a common expression in German authors for what we commonly call the mind, as distinguished from matter. It is a pregnant phrase ; and includes in one single letter the whole philosophy of consciousness, and the whole refutation of materialism. Metaphysical language is part of the current coin of German literature, and we see it with pleasure. Style marks the mind of a nation as of a man.

clouds of the dispiriting tempest, and the evening sun broke through, and filled the clouds with a more beautiful fire.

"Think upon this in the dark hour of death: how the heart of a man can love. Canst thou forget the love wherewith one heart can compensate the hearts of millions, and one soul can through a whole life nourish itself on another; as the oak of a hundred years keeps hold of the same rock with its roots, and out of its hidden waters sucks up the new energies and the new blossoms of a hundred springs."

"Meanest thou me also?" said the father.

"Thou and my mother also," said the son.

Justa wept; for she felt that her beloved had treasured up the hours of her love for the thoughts of his death-bed rejoicing; and the father said softly, thinking on his wife—"To meet again, to meet again!"

"Then think upon this," continued he, "in thy last hours; how many hours of undying enjoyment thou canst number; how many immortal days, when life was beautiful and great; when thou didst weep blessed tears in spring-time; when thou lifted up thy soul in prayer, and God appeared unto thee; when thou didst find the first and the last hand of love in one;—think upon this, and shut thine eyes in peace."

Suddenly, the collected mass of storm split into two high black mountains, and the deep sun shone forth between them as out of a valley between two steep walls of rock, and looked upon the earth again with a loving, motherly eye,* glittering with joy.

"What lightnings!" said the old man.

"It is the evening sun, my father."

"Yes, I will see her again, and this very day!" continued the dying man; but he meant his dear wife, who had been long asleep.

The son was now so moved that he was no longer able to read to his father the blessedness of meeting again upon earth, which he had this morning felt and written, and to describe how the first sight of the beloved object loses itself in an undefined futurity, while the sight of the same object, after long absence, binds the blossoms of the future and the fruits of the past into one nosegay. How could Gottfried have undertaken to paint the happiness of an earthly meeting to one who already began to catch the far rays of the heavenly one?

Gottfried asked—"How art thou, father?"

"I think upon that in the last hour—yes, on this and on that; and death, also, is beautiful, and our falling asleep in Christ," murmured the old man to himself, and took hold of Gottfried's hand, but without squeezing it; for it was only the common flake-gathering of the dying. Yet still he imagined that he heard his son speaking; and said, always more transfigured and more entranced—"O thou, my all-good Creator!"

The accessory suns of life were now all extinguished, and only the great Sun itself stood in his soul—God!

Suddenly, he lifted himself up, and stretched out his arms, and said—"There stand the three beautiful rainbows over the evening sun. I must follow the sun, and where it goes, I must go also."

With this, he sank back, and all was over. At this moment, the evening sun set; and, as it set, its glory was reflected in a wide rainbow in the east.

"He has left us," said Gottfried, with a choked voice. "He has gone over to his God, amid great and pure joys—weep not for him, Justa."

But, as he said this, the long-restrained tears burst out from his eyes, and he pressed the hands of the dead man to his hot eyelids. The sky darkened; and a warm rain dropped softly upon the ground. Gottfried and Justa left the chamber of the dead, and wept quietly after the sun of their life, that out of the stormy clouds of life had now withdrawn itself with cheering splendour into the glory of a new day.

* In German, the sun is feminine. An English writer would scarcely speak of the sun's motherly eye.

Note by the Translator.

The Englishman loves the tale of character and incident; to the German, that of thought and feeling is more natural. The action and the bustle of outward life charm the one; the other delights in the mysteries of the inner man, and swims in the ocean of philosophy and religion. There is a wide gulf that only a very catholic taste can pass, between these two modes of existence; hence the great, for most minds, almost unquerable, antipathy between German and English literature. The present fashion of studying German does not make that antipathy less strong. Young people in this country are ready to do anything when it is fashionable, and will follow the Devil any length, so that he be dressed like a gentleman, and move in what is called "good society." Whether this sketch of Richter's that we have here translated, will please the general English taste or not, were hard to say. It is very German both in style and sentiment, not altogether free from bad taste, as, indeed, few German things are; but the man who can read it, without becoming, for the moment, at least, if not a wiser, at least a better man, must already have a heart of stone, callous to every delicate influence of poetry and religion. Richter is well known among our novel readers as a humourist and a wit of the first order; but it is in his calmer and diviner moods that we most relish him; there he seems peculiarly at home; there he is peculiarly what he always gloried to be—a German; there he discovers himself with all the artless openness of a child, and with all the calm unconscious strength of a Titan, to be a great good man—one of the best certainly and greatest, doubtless one of the most extraordinary and curiously organized, that ever walked forth from the bosom of the divine creativeness. We wish our German scholars may be induced to give themselves more and more to the writings of this man; compared with the vulgar productions of literature, they are a real "sermon on the mount;" and, if the present specimen of his genius fails to please those who have an "open sense" for such things, it must certainly be the fault of the translator, not of Jean Paul Richter.

SHAKSPEARE AND HIS FRIENDS.*

He be, i' faith, a monstrous bold man, this same Master Anonymous, author of "Shakspeare and his Friends"—a bold man, and, withal, a fortunate. He hath, moreover, some shrewd notions of the Age about which he writeth, and of its Men; a good judgment of dramatic and scenic effect; a sharp eye for picturesque circumstance; rare humour, and merry conceit; some learning; and, above all, a most famous and absolute courage, that never halts nor blanches. Faults he hath enow; but we think it to be but a sorry office, after having received many hours of right famous good entertainment from a merry work, to sit deliberately down to pull it to pieces, and carp at or rail against its faults. The faults in this book may be neither few nor small; yet is the work, notwithstanding, an excellent work, full of quaint devices, excellent good conceits, and most exquisitest fun.—To leave this bald imitation of our author's method of rendering the dialect of the age of Elizabeth, we may say, in sober earnest, that this romance possesses a certain vein of originality, and altogether very considerable merit. It is, more properly, a succession of dramatic scenes than a well-constructed or connected story. Characters of humour, costume, in the widest sense of the term, and description, form its strength, and are, indeed, its leading object. There are, however, many charming pictures of tenderness and sweet affection; and, if the author have little power to unlock the fountain of tears, he is so very apt at exciting smiles, that he sometimes trespasses too far, and pushes his mirth to a lame or melancholy conclusion. His greatest fault is never knowing when to have done, or how to let well alone. His minor transgressions are, violation of the proprieties of the age, and all manner of anachronisms. His gallants accomplish things in a jiffy, and "go it," exactly like modern men of the Fancy; and his poets lay when they should lie, like true Cockneys of the reign of Victoria. Instead of the round, mouth-filling oaths of our jovial ancestors, they "drat it." The adventures of Sir Walter Raleigh form a main branch of the storied interest of the volumes; and on his fortunes those of the hero, Master Francis, are grafted. We have said the author is a bold man. Having resolved to resuscitate Shakspeare, he makes no bones of the matter, but at once slap-dash precipitates him upon the stage, in this animated sort:—

It was a room of no extraordinary dimensions, yet was it not stinted to space. The ceiling was of a moderate height, and the sides of the chamber were of oak, the panels of which were adorned with a goodly show of delicate tracery, like unto the folds of linen; and round the chimney-piece was a most liberal display of carving, in fruit and foliage. A large vase of living flowers, that filled the chamber with a ravishing sweetness, stood beside the fire-dogs. One broad casement, composed of many little panes set into pieces of lead, looked out upon the river; and the centre part of it being open like a door, at divers times might be heard the mellow "ye ho!" of the bargeman working his oar, as he piloted his heavy craft towards the city wharfs; or, mayhap, softened in the distance, the burthen of a popular ballad, sung by a party of merry apprentices going a pleasuring on the water. At one end of the room there rested on the oak floor, a large heavy press of dark walnut-tree wood, ornamented with rude carvings of Adam and Eve, and the tree of knowledge; and, opposite, stood an ancient bookcase, the shelves of which supported a number of famous black-letter volumes, folios and others, cased in parchment or roan bindings. On several narrow, high-backed chairs of carved oak, might be seen different articles of apparel—a hat on one, a cloak on another, and, mayhap, a rapier resting against a third. In one corner were sundry swords and a matchlock, in another, divers pieces of old armour. An empty tankard, and the remains of the morning repast, stood upon a large table in the centre of the chamber; and near the window, before a smaller table covered with papers, and in an antique arm chair, sat its illustrious occupant.

Although his hose were ungartered, and his doublet had been left unbraced, his right noble countenance and worshipful bearing, left not the spectator opportunity to notice the negligence of his attire. His face, which was of a manly age—two years short of thirty—had been most providently fashioned—with a forehead of marvellous capacity—eyes mild, yet lively—a mouth impressed with a very amatory eloquence—and a beard of a perfect gravity. Nor were his limbs of a less favourable mould. In fact, he was a man of multitudinous good graces. I would there were more such. Many such there can never be—for, admirable as he was in person, he was still more estimable in mind; and the union of these excellencies in a like liberal proportion is of such rarity, that peradventure the example will last out the world.

Sometimes he would smile as he wrote, as if tickled with the creations of his own fancy; and once his humour seemed so touched with some palpable conceit, that he cast down the pen, and, throwing himself back in his chair, did laugh right heartily. At other times, when he appeared to have written passages of a graver purport, which gave him more than passable satisfaction, he took the paper in his hand, and did read aloud, with a rich voice and a most felicitous expression; and, of a verity, never was the air so filled with delectable thoughts. At this time there was heard a knocking at the door. "Come in!" exclaimed he; and thereupon entered one apparelled like a young gallant, with hat and feather of a goodly fashion, a delicate satin doublet, an excellent fine ruff, a cloak worn daintily on the shoulder, and a long rapier fastened to his side: trunks prettily cut and embroidered, with silk hose and ruffled boots.

This gallant is Dick Burbage, the player; and there is a lively skirmishing of wit, jest, clinch, and pun, before Master Burbage comes to the point of his visit, which was to solicit a sonnet from his friend, to present, as his own, to a beautiful girl, a mercer's daughter in Eastcheap, with whom he had fallen in love. Master Shakspeare refused point-black. "Nay, but, sweet Will,"

"What! not assist thy old friend and comrade?" asked the other, in the same bantering tone he had used from the first; "how often have I done thee a good turn that way? Dost remember, in merry Stratford, when we were both boys, yet with an intolerant inclination for the honour of manhood, how often I did lead Sir Thomas Lucy's gamekeeper in search of imaginary deer-stealers, whilst thou wert courting his niece in the shrubbery?"

"Ha! ha! thou hast me there, Dick," replied his friend, unable to refrain from laughing at the odd associations which came crowding to his memory, "thou hast me there of a surety. Ah, Kate! she was a delectable little gipsy, with a most enticing smile, and a smile that would thaw a six weeks' frost. But dost forget thine own tricks, old Memorandum? Hast forgot when thou wert laying siege to Barbara, the sexton's pretty daughter, behind the church, how I, with a sheet I had stolen for the nonce, and a turpin lantern and candle, did stalk through the churchyard, to keep the folks from disturbing thee—to the horror of the whole neighbourhood, and the near frightening to death of three ancient spinsters, two drunken ploughboys, and the parish constable?"

"Ha! ha! ha!" shouted the other, with an obstreperous fit of mirth, "'tis as true as life; I'm nothing better than a Turk, if ev'ry word isn't gospel."

While these merry companions joke, banter, and laugh together, enters Master Fletcher, who gives them the rare and welcome intelligence, that the Master of the Revels had announced the Queen's intention to honour the poor players with a visit at the Globe, attended by many honourable persons of the court. They departed to prepare for the reception of her Majesty at their theatre; and, Master Shakspeare having indited a complimentary letter to his patron, the Earl of Southampton, acknowledging a present of exquisite flowers, resumed his studies at one of those "famous plays," which did afterwards bring so much honour to his name. He had not been long so engaged, when a gentle knock was heard at the door, and a youth of seventeen entered—tall, slim, and elegant, and, though clad in homely russet, having a graceful bearing, and a mild, thoughtful countenance, that denoted much higher qualities than his poor apparel betokened. The youth had taken the boldness to send Master Shakspeare a tragedy entitled "Hero and Leander," which he had read, and now criticised. And, as the drama was a subject which he probably understood nearly as well as any subsequent editors or reviewers, we shall like to hear his ideas:—

"The time of mysteries and moralities hath gone by. People now will not listen to dialogues without an object, and plays without a plot. David hath ceased to abuse Goliath in a set speech an hour long, and Joseph lingereth no longer to preach a thrice tedious sermon to Potiphar's wife. If a play have no action, it must needs have but little interest; for, although something may occasionally be done in a narrative form, if the ball be not kept up—that is to say, if the dramatis personæ be doing of nothing—even if the sentences be proverbs of wisdom, then shall the play be a bad play. Again, if the characters who form the plot have no individuality or distinct features, in accordance with nature or probability, though they look like Alexanders and argue like Aristotles, shall the play be a bad play. Your tragedy, Master Francis, hath these particular defects."

At this, and more in the same strain, the youth was monstrously cast down; so

Master Shakspeare, observing, for the first time, that the lips of his visitor had lost their accustomed ruddiness, and that he did look most despairing and woe-begone, with that sweet sympathy which maketh the generous so fearful of giving pain to another, instantly began to turn over the leaves of Master Francis's play, and resumed his discourse. "But let me not cause you to imagine that I think naught of your tragedy, Master Francis. Far be it from me to say so. I do consider the blank verse very musical and eloquent, and full of right admirable conceits."

And Master Shakspeare read sundry bewatiful passages, and "opined" that they were admirable, and of great promise; and, accordingly, gave the youth much generous good advice, and pressed upon him the rites of hospitality, in a right frank and hearty sort, bringing, at the same time, forth of a recess in the chamber, a flask and two drinking horns. As they discoursed over their wine in a social, friendly sort, Master Francis told his story.

"I must," he said, "be going, or my uncle will be angered with me; and he is a man of a most ungracious humour."

"A murrain on him!" cried Master Shakspeare. "And, if I may make so free as to ask, who is he?"

"He is Gregory Vellum, the scrivener, of St Mary Axe," replied the youth; "and, though report say that he abounds in riches, one would suppose that he hath not sufficient to furnish a beggar's wallet."

"Have you no father living?" asked his host.

"It is uncertain," responded Mr Francis, more seriously.

Francis longed to quit his miserly uncle, and Master Shakspeare promised to befriend him, and afterwards amply redeemed his pledge. Before the new acquaintances parted, Shakspeare drew a cherished secret from the modest youth, and they pledged the wine cup to the beautiful Joanna, the same mercer's daughter of Eastcheap with whom all the gayest gallants of the court and the briskest prentices of the city were alike madly in love. Before Master Francis reached St Mary Axe, a little old man, meanly apparelled, was stumping

About with his stick in a gloomy room, that appeared from its deficiency in all furniture, save a desk with a tall stool, and several papers and parchments tied up and placed on shelves about the fire-place, that it was an office. "Francis! Francis, I say! A murrain on thee for a lazy varlet! thou art sure to give me the alip as soon as my back is turned. Francis!" he shouted again, and then muttered to himself—"a wasteful, idle, good-for-naught, that be always consuming my substance or mis-spending my time; I would I were well rid of him. Francis, I say! Here have I been bawling about the house for the better part of an hour, searching for him—the graceless vagrant. Francis!" Thus he went on, growling and grumbling, and poking into every hole and corner, with a physiognomy most unnaturally crabbed, and a voice feeble and shrewish. At last he sat himself down on the stool, laid aside his stick, and began examining the loose papers on the desk; first putting on a pair of cracked spectacles, to assist his sight. . . .

As he scrutinised the papers, he broke out into such vehement ejaculations as these:—

"This account not finished! Here's a villainous neglect of my interests! Here's a shameful contempt of my authority! Here's flat contradiction and horrible ingratitude! Oh, the abominable and most pestilent knave! while he eats me out of house and home—costs me a world and all in tailoring and other charges—he leaveth my business to take care of itself. But what have we here?" he exclaimed, as he commenced examining a paper that had evidently been concealed amongst the others. "Verres, or I'm a heathen!" cried he, in a tone of consternation. "Nay, if he takes to such evil courses, it must needs come to hanging." Whilst he was intent upon perusing with angry exclamations the contents of the object that had excited his displeasure, he suddenly felt a hand upon his shoulder, and, turning round with no small degree of alarm impressed upon his unamiable features, he observed a young female—by her dress probably of the middle ranks. She wore on the back of her head a small velvet hat, from under which escaped several long dark tresses, that, parted in the front, set off to great advantage a right comely face, of a very rich complexion, which was made infinitely more attractive by a pair of delicate dark hazel eyes, peculiarly seductive in their expression. Her age might be somewhat beyond twenty; for her form was fully rounded, and moulded into the most excellent proportions, which were admirably apparelled in a neat bodice and a dainty farthingale. In truth, she was a damsel possessed of all the perfections of womanhood.

"You sweet rogue, how you frightened me!" exclaimed the old man; the surprise and alarm he had exhibited in his countenance now giving place to pleasure and admiration, as he gazed upon the smiling beauty before him.

"But what hath so put your temper into vital jeopardy, good Gregory Vellum?" asked she, coaxingly, as she leaned over his shoulder, seemingly the better to observe the writing he held in his hand.

"Marry, matter enough, sweetest," replied he; "that ungodly and most hateful reprobate, my nephew—"

"Oh, the prodigal!" cried the other, as if marvelling greatly; but still stretching out her pretty neck to see what was written on the paper.

"I am glad to find that you regard his atrocious wickedness with a proper detestation," repeated the other. "But that be not the worst of his villainy. Only think of the pestilent varlet robbing me of these fine bits of candle, which, in my search for him a moment since, I found secreted away in his chamber!"

"What wonderful iniquity!" exclaimed she.

"Ay, that is it with a vengeance," replied the old man. "Now, he stealths these pieces of candle—a murrain on him for his abominable dishonesty—and burneth them when I, his too indulgent uncle, am fast asleep; and there he sits, wearing out the night in studying a most unprofitable lot of heathenish books. But take this trumpery and read it, Mistress Joanna, for he writes such an unnatural fine hand that my poor eyes ache with looking at it."

The fair Joanna read and applied the verses; and seemed lost in a maze of conflicting thoughts.

Her brow became dark, and her eye fixed; and so completely had she given herself up to her own reflections, that she heard not the question that had been put to her.

"What say you, sweetheart?" said he, familiarly, laying his hand upon her shoulder. "Doth not your half stand on end to see how he misuseth me? Why, he setteth me a matter of a great week for his dishonor he hath the appetite of two carriers—and then—the scoundrel! to be robbing me in this monstrous manner, when candles are threepence to the pound—and to be scribbling his preposterous atrocities when stationery is at so high a cost! By my troth, he hath no more virtue than an addled egg! But what think you of the verses?"

"Sad stuff, Master Vellum," she replied, having perfectly recovered from her confusion; "but be assured there is no harm in them. I think he ought not to be encouraged in these practices; so I will e'en take the paper with me, and tear it to pieces as I go along."

"Ah, do, good Joanna!"

"You are a woman of admirable discretion; and of a truly excellent fancy. Dost despise these raw youths; and couldst affect a man of more mature years?"

"Ay, marry, and why not?" inquired she, very innocently.

"You are a most excellent wench!" exclaimed he with unaffected delight, as he seemed to feast his eyes upon the graces of her countenance—"one of ten thousand. Think you, you could rest content with an old man—say, one not so old either—who would never be gadding from you like your young gallants, none of whom are ever to be trusted out of sight, but would murther you, and cherish you, and fondle you, and make much of you; and none but you; and make you mistress of all his gold, his house, and himself?"

"Ay, marry, why should I not?" repeated she in the same tone.

"Then you shall have me, sweetheart!" cried the old man in an ecstasy; and coming, by the unsteady movement of his hands, with great difficulty to refrain from throwing his arms round her neck:—"I have loved you for some months, sweetest! and all the little gifts I have bestowed upon you, were to show you how enamoured I was of your most blessed condition. And I will tell you a secret, my love! my dove! my angel! my paragon of womanhood!" continued he, adverting about, and glancing upon her with his look-justo eyes, as if he were bewitched. "Although I seem so poor—yet am I richer than I seem. Ay, am I. I have store of gold—bright yellow gold! Hush, there's no one listening, is there?" he all at once exclaimed, as, fearing he had said too much, he gave a restless glance around the room.

"Not a soul," replied Joanna, still retaining the same unmoved countenance.

We have been somewhat copious in extracts; but the love subsisting between Joanna and Master Francis we consider the finest and most original and passionate thing in the serious portion of the volumes; and we, therefore, wish to introduce the mercer's daughter in her full proportions, and with all her attributes and true womanly sensibilities—and all her frailties of womanly vanity, quite as true. In this well-drawn scene, Joanna contrives to wheedle the miser out of a certain Venetian gold chain; but, when he talks of naming the wedding day, she replies—

"We will talk of that anon; but the chain."

"I fly, sweetest," cried the old man, shuffling towards the door; but, just as he was about to open it, he came back hastily, with his eyes glistening, and his beaming countenance all of a glow, "we will spend all the yellow gold; we will live a right merry life. I faith you shall have all that heart can desire, you shall, you shall, you shall, my queen of beauty!"

"The chain, worthy Gregory Vellum," repeated his fair companion, as she eluded his eager advances.

"I am gone," said he, again hastening off; but, before he opened the door, he turned round, clasped his skinny hands together, and, turning up the whites of his eyes, exclaimed, "Indeed, I love thee infinitely."

"That for thy love," cried she, spitting on the floor, with every mark of indignation and disgust, as soon as she heard him rapidly ascending the stairs, "that for thy love, thou most abhorred and infamous old dotard; but I will use thee. For the sake of one whose little finger is dearer to me than thy old moth-eaten cat's paw, I will make thee bring out thy long-boarded gold, and squander it right liberally." Then, hearing a noise at the door which opened into the street, she looked to see who it was. The same modest youth entered to whom the reader hath been introduced, at Master Shakespeare's lodging, on the Bank side.

"What, Joanna!" he exclaimed, hastening towards her, with a most smiling countenance, "nay, this is a pleasure I dreamed not of."

"Tis I, Francis," she replied, allowing him to take her hand, which he passionately pressed to his lips; "but thy cheek is flushed, and thine eye unsteady. What ails thee?"

"Nothing, dearest," said he; "I have been detained, and I thought my uncle would be angered with me for stopping; for thou knowest how easy he is of provocation, so I ran all the way home."

"Thou hadst best make haste, and conceal thyself somewhere for the nonce," responded she, "for thy uncle hath just left me, meaning to return straight; and he is out of all temper with thee, for sundry offences which, he saith, thou hast committed. So, go thy ways, and let me see thee again, for I have much to say to thee."

"I will do thy bidding lovingly; yet, it is a most regretful thing to be obliged to leave thee," he said, as, with reluctant steps and slow, he made towards the door. Then, keeping his eyes upon her till the last moment, eloquent with a most impassioned tenderness, he left the room.

"Poor boy!" murmured she, as, with a countenance full of melancholy interest, she watched his departure; "poor boy! he little knoweth how many distasteful things I do for his dear sake."

At this moment, Gregory Vellum was heard upon the stairs. There was a marked difference betwixt his going and his returning; for, whereas, in the first instance, he had galloped like an ostrich, now he was heard descending, step by step, so slow that it would not be a great stretch of fancy to say, he might have fallen asleep between whiles. Presently he opened the door, and, instead of hastening towards Joanna, with enamoured looks and impatient gestures, as might have been expected from his previous behaviour, he advanced, at a laggard's pace, with his eyes fixed upon a glittering chain of gold, that he kept turning about in his hand, and with a face in which the demon of avarice had evidently got the better of the demon of sensuality.

We cannot give the rest of this scene, but Joanna finally obtains the chain; and the repentant and cheated miser is offered as payment a kiss of her hand:—

"Fool! dolt! idiot! madman!" cried he vehemently, as he beat his head with his clenched fists, "to be tricked, cozened, and imposed upon in this barefaced manner, by a woman. O Gregory Vellum, Gregory Vellum, what a very ass thou art! My chain of Venice gold is lost irretrievably, that I took for a debt of fifty crowns, and for which Master Ingot, the goldsmith, would have given me forty at any time. Oh, fool, that can only cozen boys and folks afar off, thou art cheated past all redemption!" Then he went and sat upon the stool, and leaned his head upon his hand, apparently in a monstrous melancholy humour. "Fifty crowns gone for nothing. Oh," exclaimed he frantically, beating his heels against the stool, and then wringing his hands, "what a poor, wretched, miserable lunatic am I, to think of scouring at my time of day. Such a brilliant chain! Oh, most preposterous idiot! fifty crowns! Oh, thou incomprehensible blockhead!"

While he ran on, lamenting his vanished chain, he was suddenly arrested by a voice—a rich, clear, mellifluous voice—which was heard singing the following words:—

"I gave my Love a posie gay,
Of all the sweetest flowers in May,
And bade her, till their leaves might die,
Upon her breast to let them lie.
" 'I faith,' quoth she,
'Are these for me!
Like thy sweet words, how sweet they be!
But, if thy maid
Thy love should aid,
Oh, bring her gifts that never fade!' "
"I gave my Love a ribbon rare,
To tie around her silken hair,
'Sweetheart,' quoth I, 'long may it grace
So brave, so proud a resting place! "
" 'Ah, me!' she cried,
And looked and sighed,
'In this bright gaud thy looks I've spied;
But see! 'twill fray
And wear away—
Oh! bring me gifts that last for aye.' "

"A pernicious varlet, will he never have done with his coxcomb singing!" cried Gregory Vellum. But the singer continued his song.

Many sketches of charming verse occur in the volumes; and, in the mottoes, the author has exhausted all the rare elder poets. The scene between the miser and his nephew may be imagined. In the office, Francis misses his verses from his desk, ruminates upon the exquisite Joanna, feels jealous of a certain Ralph Goshawk, a stage-struck coxcomb apprentice, and one of the many admirers of the bright-eyed damsel of Eastcheap:—

"If she doth affect that Ralph Goshawk," he exclaimed, in a sort of doubting yet inquiring tone, as if he knew not for certain, yet wanted to know something he feared would not be desirable to learn. Then, having passed some minutes in profound yet anxious reflection, he suddenly started up, saying, "But she is too good to be deceitful," he seemed at once to dismiss all his uncomfortable thoughts, and set himself to writing out some account, with a very cheerful and delighted countenance. At this he continued diligently, but ever and anon exclaiming, "O excellent Joanna!" or, with a like enthusiasm, "Dear, sweet, exquisite creature!" or, with a countenance that did witness for his sincerity, "Oh, I do love thee infinitely!" till there came a sudden turn in his humour, and, with a more thoughtful look, he put down his pen, and, folding his arms, asked himself the question—"But why doth she deny me the caresses she hath so often granted?" After which he again grew uneasy, (judging by the expression of his features,) and it did seem as if his reflections were hurrying him to very unsatisfactory conclusions; for he looked not at all pleased.

Francis was interrupted by some one opening the door:—

And, looking round, observed a very odd-looking boy in a leathern jerkin and woollen cap, such as were worn by the common people, advancing into the office, desperately intent upon picking a bone. He was somewhat short of stature, with a fair pair of bandy legs, and his face—none of the cleanest—was fat and freckled, having a noticeable huge mouth, then upon the stretch—a pug nose, and eyes squinting abominably. Without saying a word, he marched towards a corner of the room, and sat himself down on the floor, picking his bone—the which employment he varied by giving an occasional bite—which made a mark that placed beyond dispute his mouth's capacity—in a thick hunk of bread he drew from under his jerkin.

This figure proved to be the cock in Hamlet, otherwise Gib, the call-boy of the Globe Theatre, who is very cleverly hit off. He was the bearer of a letter from Master Shakspeare, inviting Francis to come to him at the playhouse. The youth was dispatched by his uncle to dun a merchant; and, scarcely knowing whither he went, he entered Eastcheap. We must give the following scene at some length, as we consider it one of the most delicately drawn in the whole work. In Eastcheap, the musing youth

Was stirred up into a very proper consciousness of where he was—his heart began to beat most disturbedly—the paleness of his cheek made way for a flush of crimson, and his eye had gained a lustrousness that gave unto his gentle countenance a truly eloquent expression.

Passing by shops of divers kinds, and even taking no heed of the barber-chirurgeon's over the way, where his true friend, Harry Daring, was apprenticed, he at last made for one that was a mercer's, where the owner, a somewhat lusty old man, with a lively roguish look, and an excellent jolly face, stood recommending to a customer sundry ells of three-piled velvet that lay before him, whom, seeing engaged, he stopped not to gossip with, but went on, as if it was his wont, to a little room at the back, where, finding no one, he opened a door, and proceeded up a little flight of stairs close upon it, at the top of which there was another door, whereat, with his heart in a greater flutter than ever, he did knock gently with his knuckles; and, hearing a voice, the soft tones of which he recognized with a most infinite delight, he uncovered and entered the room.

The chamber was rather low, and of a no great size, having a wainscot and floor of oak, with rafters very solid, running across the ceiling, and a window stretching out into the street. The furniture was substantial rather than elegant, such as might be seen in the houses of the better sort of citizens; yet was there a considerable show of taste in many things, which spoke as plain as could any words that a woman's graceful hand had had the ordering of them. There was no one therein but Joanna; who sat, or rather reclined, in an ample chair with arms, supporting her head by her hand. She wore an elegant dress of watchet colour, laced down the front, with a girdle of silver baudekin, at the which was a little pocket on one side. Her silken hair was artfully disposed, falling in a loose lock on her delicate shoulder, and bound at the top in a network caul of gold. Her well-shaped feet were cased in a pair of dainty white stockings and velvet slippers, projecting out of her petticoat, with the heel of one resting upon the instep of the other, to the manifest disclosure of a most exquisite ankle. In this position, the well-defined outline of the ripened beauties of her figure were seen to great advantage, especially as the low, tight boddicoe, then in the fashion, did excellently well display the full bust, and truly admirable neck and shoulder, the delicateness whereof have I not the cunning to describe, therefore will I leave it to the imagination of the courteous reader. She had evidently been a thinking; but whether pleasurable or otherwise, I have no means of knowing, except this be taken as a sign, that when Master Francis first beheld her at that time, there was a severity in the loveliness of her countenance, tempered with a very touching melancholy.

"Joanna!" exclaimed the youth, hastening delightedly to her side, "I am here at thy desire, and truly to mine own most infinite gratification. But what ailst thee?" he inquired suddenly, in a tone of affectionate interest, as he noticed that the pleasureableness expressed in his own features was not reflected in hers. At the question, she looked at him as with a careful scrutiny of his pale and thoughtful brow, but said never a word.

"Have I angered thee?" he asked, in a more subdued voice; and his gaze became as melancholy as her own. "Believe me I meant it not. In truth, I would rather die than anger thee."

"No!" replied she to his question, with impressive tones and eloquent emphasis. "Thou hast not angered me." And then the severity of her look much abating, added, with great stress on the words, "Thou hast never angered me."

"Indeed I hope not," said Master Francis, earnestly. "But who or what hath made thee look so unhappy?"

"Thou hast," she answered.

"I!" exclaimed the youth, with extreme surprise and sorrow. "What a wretch am I to have done it! and yet I know not how it could be; for gratitude for thy never-tiring kindness doth prompt me at all times to do the very reverse. Tell me how it was, and instantly will I seek to undo the unsought for mischief."

Joanna silently took from the little pocket at her girdle a paper that she gave into his hands—the which he instantly opened, designing to read it, as such seemed to him to be her wish; but, to his exceeding astonishment, he discovered it to be the very poem he had written and lost from off the desk in his uncle's office. He stood like one that is detected in wrong-doing, unable to say aught for himself; yet, though he saw that his expostulation had done him mischief, knew he not what offence there could be in it.

"What made thee think I had ceased to love thee?" asked she in a voice by no means angry, after she had watched for a sufficient time his downcast eyes and modest confusion of countenance, as he stood before her.

"It seemed to me that thou dost regard another," replied Master Francis, tremulously.

"Whom?" inquired Joanna, with more earnestness, fixing on him a somewhat anxious and penetrating look.

"Ralph Goshawk," answered he.

She remained silent for some few seconds, but a faint smile might have been observed about the corners of her beautiful mouth.

"In truth, I marvel thou couldst have entertained such a conception," said she at last.

"Dost thou not love him indeed?" asked the youth, most incredulously, as if were,

"Indeed I love him not," she replied.

"And dost regard me as kindly as thou wert used to?" he inquired more urgently, raising his eloquent eyes to her own.

"Most kindly quite as kindly," answered she.

"Dear, dear Joanna!" exclaimed Master Francis, as he knelt on one knee, and taking in his the disengaged hand that lay upon her lap, bowed his head till his lips rested thereon, and in that position remained. The melancholy expression of Joanna's countenance still was altered not; but there was now a tender interest in her dark eyes as she gazed upon her youthful lover. Presently she raised herself in her position, and took his hand in both hers, very affectionately.

"Yet am I much hurt that thou shouldst doubt me," said she. "I thought I had proved beyond question how much I regarded thee above all others—perhaps with more carelessness than did become me. But, knowing the innocency of mine intentions, and trusting in the modesty of thy disposition, I was content. Alack! 'tis a sad world!—we cannot do right when we wish; and when we are satisfied of our conduct, there cometh some malicious tongue to slander our doings. None knew the wickedness that exists—that poisons the air we breathe with a perpetual pestilence, and obliges us to do by craft what we cannot do by honesty. I have to endure many things that make me unhappy—very unhappy—I needed not such verses as thou hast written."

As she concluded the sentence, he raised his head, and saw that she was wiping with her handkerchief a tear that did tremble on her eyelid.

"Indeed, they shall trouble thee no more," cried the youth, as he disengaged his hand, and tore the paper into numberless small fragments; "and very heartily am I vexed that I should have given thee a moment's uneasiness. For what wonderful goodness hast thou exhibited towards me; the like of which surely was never known! Truly I must have behaved most unnaturally to have vexed thee in this manner; and I'll never forgive myself if thou wilt not forgive me." And then, most sorrowful in heart, he hid his face upon her lap.

"I have forgiven thee," said she, affectionately twining her fingers in the light curls of his chestnut hair; "but take no such fancies into thy head again; be content with the assurances thou art continually receiving of how much I regard thee, and think nothing of whatever else may seem of a different tendency. Nothing can be so sure as that, whilst thou art worthy, thou wilt be beloved."

Master Francis was too much enraptured to reply; and in this position they remained for some minutes—she bending over him, with her dark hazel eyes softened into tenderness; and he impressed so deeply with the subduing spirit of the moment, that he would not or cared to move from where he was.

Joanna having at last taken away her hands to enclasp his, he raised his head, and, looking into her face, very fondly, yet with a touch of regret, said—"But why hast thou denied me those sweet caresses thou didst use to grant?"

"Truly, I am not in the mood on all occasions," replied she, in rather a sad tone of voice; "there are remembrances I cannot obliterate when I would, that come upon me at times, and make me regardless of all except the discomfort they bring. It would be but a mockery to caress thee under such circumstances; and, indeed, though I may often seem gay-hearted—forgetting for a time the unpleasantness of the past, in the enjoyments of the present,—yet, when awakened to recollection—which is no difficult matter—there lives not a creature on this earth so truly wretched as am I. Be content, then, with the pleasure I can grant when I may be in the humour; and seek not, when the time is not auspicious, to increase my disquietude by ill-timed importunity."

"I will not," replied he. "But wilt thou do so ever again?" he asked, as if almost afraid to put the question.

"I will," she answered, with apparent unaffectedness.

"Dear Joanna, but wilt thou do so soon?" he inquired, more impressively.

"I will," said she.

"Exquisite Joanna!—but wilt thou do so now?" he asked, with still greater emphasis.

It would be unweaving the sweet mysteries of affection to describe the endearments that blessed the recondensation of those devoted lovers. There throbbeth not a heart in the wide world, that hath been touched by the generous influence of true love, but hath played its part in the same drama, and can, from the fond prompting of the memory, imagine the entrancing scene more vividly than could I describe the acting of it. Methinks, too, that the development of those delicious influences that make humanity angelic should be kept sacred from the vulgar eye; else might the selfish and the prodigal find matter in it for idle speculation, or licentious conjecture. . . .

The affection which existed betwixt Joanna and Master Francis had in it this peculiar feature, that the former had so much the seniority of her lover, it invested her with an evident controlling power over him. She appeared as though uniting in her behaviour the authority of a careful guardian with the fondness of a devoted woman, and sometimes it appeared as if some strange interest bound her to the youth, of so deep a tenderness, as was marvellously like unto that of a parent. In truth, it was a strange thing to behold a creature so exquisitely fashioned, having much the outward appearance of one existing only for, and in the enjoyment of the most passionate worship of the opposite sex, seeming, with a delicacy the purest nature could never have excelled, so virtuously to conduct herself, as proved all the sterling excellence of womanhood was manifest in her actions; whilst the enamoured youth that knelt before her, dumb with excess of modesty, and overpowered with the intensity of his admiration, regarded her with such an enthusiasm in his delighted gaze, tempered with so profound a respect, as plainly shewed he loved with the purity of heart and earnestness of purpose which belong only to that age and disposition that exist in the enjoyment of a perfect innocence.

"Dear heart," exclaimed he, after a long, yet very eloquent silence, "it seemeth to me exceeding strange that, when I sit me down to write of thee, all admirable thoughts, like the bees hastening to the sweet blossoms, come crowding to be penned; but when, with my lips, I would essay to breathe into thine ear ought of what rare pleasure I experience from the continual influence of thy unbounded goodness, such words as I have at command are so little to the purpose, that I am forced to a seeming ungrateful silence; yet am I most gratefully bound to thee. Thou art my guardian angel, and, in earnest truth, most exquisite Joanna, my heart ever yearneth to pour out its spirit in thanksgiving for thy unceasing kindness."

He received no reply, unless it was conveyed in a more evident pressure of the hands she held clasped in her own, or in a softer and more thrilling glance from the clear hazel of her lustrous eyes. He continued—

"My benefactress!—my!"

"Hush!" she exclaimed quickly, interrupting him. "Have I not told thee never to allude to what I have done for thy good?"

He remained silent, as if conscious he had committed an error.

"And now, pray thee, tell me how hast thou sped with thy tragedy?" she inquired.

"It will not do, dear Joanna," he replied.

"Despair not—thou wilt do better anon," she said, in an encouraging tone.

"But methinks I have found a friend," added Master Francis, more cheerfully.

"I am truly glad on't," said she.

"Hast heard of Master Shakspeare?"

This is a long extract; but justice to the author required it. After some comic adventures at the outskirts of the Globe, Master Francis reaches the shabby green-room of those days, where all the players were assembled, already dressed in character to play the Second Part of Henry the Fourth before Queen Elizabeth. The scene is animated, and shews considerable knowledge of the interior of a playhouse. Master Shakspeare discourses to his young friend about the characters around him—authors, actors, and such noble lovers and patrons of the drama as Southampton and Buckhurst. Between the acts, Burbage, who played the Prince of Wales, is asked how he had sped with the borrowed love verses; and he relates his adventures, though Francis is not led to suspect that the mistress of the player is the fair Joanna. When the mimic Prince of Wales was summoned by Stentor-Gib, the humorous call-boy, Master Shakspeare took his young friend to a nook whence he could have a full survey of the house, from the "groundlings" of the pit to the nobility of the lodgings, and the threepenny customers of the "scaffold." Lodgings and scaffold were then the names for the boxes and galleries. At the conclusion of the play, Master Shakspeare was hurried off by Raleigh to receive the compliments of Elizabeth, who, with great commendation of his wit, vouchsafed her gracious protection of the poor players, now grievously vexed by the sanctified city authorities. The Queen even vouchsafed her jewelled hand to kiss, and left the dramatist kneeling as she withdrew to the flourish of trumpets and kettle-drums—a right gallant show. Next day, Master Francis, who had obtained a kind though hurried reception from Sir Walter Raleigh on the introduction of Master Shakspeare, waited upon the accomplished adventurer at Durham House; and, to his infinite contentment, was appointed his private secretary. An assignation between Master Shakspeare and the slipperly Joanna—whom the gallant dramatist had admired at a meeting of archers in Finsbury—need not be strictly followed, though it helps to develop her mingled and highly dramatic character. Coquettish, fickle, vain, and inordinately fond of the admiration of the other sex, and yet a generous, tender woman, and a passionate lover—that mixture of delicacy and levity, purity and folly, named Joanna, contains much genuine nature, and great dramatic interest.

In the meanwhile, Master Francis goes far away from London and Joanna; sailing on the high seas with Raleigh, who proves to his young secretary more a father and an instructor than a master. We have not adverted to Raleigh's share of the story—his love passages, namely, and secret marriage with the beautiful Elizabeth Throckmorton. The terror of the devoted wife lest the discovery of their union should ruin the fortunes of her husband, by bringing upon him the displeasure of the Queen, gives rise to many beautiful and tender domestic scenes, which are well relieved by the lively prattle and saucy archness of Alice, the affectionate cousin and constant consoler of Dame Elizabeth, the confidant of the lovers before their marriage, and ever their watchful friend at Court. Their secret union had been discovered by the crafty Sir Robert Cecil—who dreaded his influence with the Queen—and certain other enemies of Raleigh; and an intrigue is set on foot at Court to effect his ruin. One agent in this plot is the Lady Howard of Walden, a woman of some beauty but of no principle, whose love Raleigh had slighted. The Queen had been prepared for the terrible explosion against her favourite, by chagrin at the tardiness and ill-success of his expedition; and when Lady Howard made the astounding communication, nothing could exceed her indignation.

There is, however, far too much of it, and we, besides, consider the author much less felicitous in these stormy royal scenes, than in those of calm tenderness, or in those of humour and jovial conviviality. He has, we think, hit Elizabeth better in her unbending moments, when the vanity of the woman, excited by adroit flattery, triumphs over the pride of the Queen, than in her wrath and fury. She appears often on the boards, and never more agreeably than when hearing read by Shakespeare that drama which she had commanded him to write—Falstaff in love, namely, or “The Merry Wives of Windsor.” When the fat knight was put into the buck-basket, she exclaimed, merrily—“In honest truth, Master Shakespeare that fat knight of yours is like to make our sides ache. Oh, the absolute villain! Oh, the monstrous rogue! I’faith, ’tis an excellent conceit. We are taken with the humour of it mightily. What say you, my Lord?” turning to Essex—“doth it not seem as ridiculous to you as heart could wish?” And when Falstaff is beaten as the fat woman of Brentford—“Better and better,” exclaimed the Queen, in evident delight. “These be merry wives, indeed! I’faith ’tis the difficultest thing possible, to say which serve they out the best—Master Jealous-pate the husband, or that huge piece of roguery, Sir John Falstaff. Is it not so, my Lord?” The Queen had been put into the finest humour possible, by the mirthful conclusion of the play, and had volunteered to attend on the first night of its representation. The courtiers would have divided the laurels of the dramatist with her Majesty, whose “most exquisite wit” had suggested the subject of the play; but this homage she at once took and disclaimed, giving, or affecting to give, the sole credit to Master Shakespeare, of whom she graciously inquired, if she could serve him in aught. “Speak what you would have,” said she; “and, if in modest bounds, it shall be granted.” He was so bold, or foolish in friendship, as to crave the pardon of Raleigh, now a prisoner in the Tower; and the Queen’s brows grew black on the sudden; while she sharply rebuked the bold advocate of the disgraced favourite.

Essex had the magnanimity to come to the rescue of Master Shakespeare, and also to speak in favour of his rival, Raleigh; so Shakespeare was graciously dismissed, while the Queen went the length of acknowledging that her captain of the guard, Raleigh, had many commendable qualities; and the courtiers were in ecstasy at the generosity of her gracious Majesty towards the man who had done her so grievous a wrong as to marry to please himself, without consulting the Princess, who chose, as one of her royal prerogatives, to engross the admiration of all the handsome young gallants of her court. History is followed with some fidelity in those adventures of Raleigh, which fiction cannot equal. Immediately on his return to England, he had been arrested and imprisoned in the Tower; and his arrival, arrest, and way of life in prison, are detailed in several charming domestic scenes, of which, as a specimen, we shall select the following:—

Sir Walter Raleigh sat at a table, on which were many books and papers, in a small chamber in the Tower; which, certes, was properly furnished enough, though everything therein was of an exceeding antique fashion; and the beautiful Dame Elizabeth, now looking with a very matronly dignity, sat as near as might be opposite to him, working of a baby’s cap, whilst close by her side was a cradle, in which slept a marvellous pretty infant. Now she would take her eyes from her work, and fix them on the slumbering child with such sweet and smiling looks as shewed her heart was delighted with what she gazed on; and anon she would turn them to where sat her husband, leaning of his head on his hand over a large book he seemed to be a studying of so intently that he could regard naught else; and there was then so tender a solicitude in her eyes as was quite moving to see. She seemed as though she would have spoke, and yet refrained from it for fear of disturbing him in his studies. Again she continued at her work, but not without stealing of an occasional glance at the babe or at Sir Walter. Yet was there ever a singular difference in the expression of her look to each. She still regarded her child with a fond and truly delicate smile, whilst upon her husband her gaze fell with an increasing melancholy, which at last became exceeding pathetic. It so happened that Sir Walter Raleigh, turning over a leaf, raised his head, and noticed the moving sadness of her looks.

“What makes thee look so woful, Bess?” inquired he, affectionately.

“Woful!—Surely I look not woful, dear Walter?” she replied, as if with an assumed cheerfulness. “I am content—I lack nothing. Thou art everything I could wish. For what should I look woful then? Indeed thou must have mistaken my countenance hugely, if thou hast gathered from it I be in any way out of heart.”

“In truth, sweetest, thou hadst but now so piteous a look, that I was moved at it,” said he.

“Then was it a false look, dear Walter; and therefore regard it not, I prythee!” exclaimed his beautiful wife, very earnestly. “Let it not move thee at all, for it must have been a villanous deceitful look if it hath given thee a moment’s uneasiness.”

“I have never yet seen aught in thee deceitful, dear Bess,” observed Sir Walter. “Therefore am I now loath to believe that thou couldst have to do with such. Have I said or done any such thing as might have made thee sad?”

“Nay, on my life, thou hast been to me the kindest, best creature fond woman ever loved!” replied Dame Elizabeth, with great eagerness. “I am not sad at all, dear Walter. I’faith! methinks I should be more merry than sad, seeing what bountiful good fortune is mine. Thou art with me. The Queen might have done me such ill office as to have kept us separate; yet hath she graciously allowed me the extreme happiness of being with thee. Then why should I be sad? Looked I less cheerful than ordinary, mayhap it was for fear such deep study as thou dost fall into may do thy health some hurt.”

“Fear not, sweet heart,” said he, with a most endearing smile. “There dwelleth such excellent good philosophy in these books, that the perusing of them maketh me forget I am here cribbed within stone walls a doing of nothing of any advantage to the world; but if it doth now afflict thee to see me so intent upon such labours, I will for the present leave them, and study a more alluring lesson—which is no other than thee, dear Bess.”

“Prythee do not, dear Walter!” exclaimed she, very kindly. "If these books are such as have taught thee to become so brave of soul, so good, so noble, so kind and generous as thou art—I would on no account have thee leave such excellent studies to regard one who can teach thee no one thing of any usefulness. But I like not to hear thee say that thou art doing of nothing of advantage to the world; for art thou not constantly writing upon such matters as I doubt not must be of great profit to all, and in after times will make thee as exceeding famous as thou well deservest to be?"

"'Twould be a right wonderful comfort could I think so," observed Sir Walter.

"Then such shouldst thou ever think," she replied. "I know that 'tis something too much to expect of thee to shew a cheerful heart at all times, when I reflect to what a doleful strait thy goodness to me hath brought thee to, the thought of which is enough, methinks, to make the most patient nature feel vast discomfort upon occasion; yet well assured am I that, whether thou art within stone walls a powerless prisoner, or aboard of a goodly ship, the leader of a gallant armament, thy noble mind would ever be devising of some greatness wherof all mankind might receive benefit. If thou art melancholy, let me sing to thee, dear Walter, and perchance thou shalt find some pleasure in it."

"Indeed, thy singing is of so sweet a sort that my spirit is enraptured when I hear thee," said he. "Sing, dear Bess! I do feel somewhat weary." 'Tis a little moment that thy virginals be not at hand; for thy voice doth discourse such delicate music as requireth no accompaniment to set it off."

Then placing of her work in her lap, she turned upon him a look full of most exquisite devotedness, and with such tuneful notes as were a marvel to hear, she presently did commence.

In a long and affectionate conversation the devoted wife of Raleigh urges her womanly scheme of mollifying the Queen; and, in truth, no historian has framed half so good an excuse for the meanness of humiliation to which Raleigh descended, in attempting to make his peace with Elizabeth, as this fictionist:—

"I," said Dame Elizabeth, "knowing her to be one with whom some pretty adulation will do anything, so that there be enough of it—would wager mine existence that, if thou wouldst but contrive some pleasant conceit, in which it shall appear that thou art gone distracted because of the impossibility of seeing her, and season it with such pretty tropes as thou knowest she most affects, thou shalt have thy liberty in a presently."

"I like it not, dear Dece," replied her husband—as if he entertained the proposal with some distaste. "I have played the courtier's and the lover's part with her already to such an extreme that it made her all the more enraged against me when she discovered my marriage with thee. She must be exceeding credulous if she would believe anything of the kind of me now. Besides, it is a fashion that, however oft I may have fallen into, I liked never; and, at the present time, am more than ever disinclined to."

Lady Raleigh calls her infant child to the aid of her pleading. She entreated that all the blame of what was past might be laid on her.

The amusements of the prisoners in the Tower, are, we think, right tender, natural, pleasant, and pretty; but we cannot stop for them. The real letters of history are introduced in this place, of which circumstance the author ought, perhaps, to have given intimation to his unlearned readers. No modern romance writer would have hazarded the effusions of extravagant flattery and hyperbolical praise by which Sir Walter recovered the good graces of the virgin Queen, and regained his freedom. There is, indeed, nothing more curious in the romance, nor anything half so exaggerated, as the authentic epistle addressed by Raleigh, the married man, to Cecil, in an affected paroxysm of despairing love for her Majesty. With one passage of it we must preface the scene:—

"My heart was never broken till this day, that I hear the Queen goes away so far off, whom I have followed so many years with so great love and desire in so many journeys, and am now left behind her in a dark prison all alone. While she was yet near at hand, that I might hear of her once in two or three days, my sorrows were the less; but even now my heart is cast into the depth of all misery. I that was wont to behold her riding like Alexander—hunting like Diana—walking like Venus; the gentle wind blowing her fair hair about her pure cheeks, like a nymph; sometime sitting in the shade like a goddess—sometime singing like an angel—sometime playing like Orpheus. Behold the sorrow of this world! once amiss hath bereaved me of all. O glory! that only shineth in misfortune, what is become of thy assurance? All wounds have scars, but that of fantasy; all affections their relenting, but that of womankind. Who is the judge of friendship, but adversity; or when is grace witnessed, but in offences? There were no divinity, but by reason of compassion; for revenges are brutish and mortal. All those times past, the loves, the sights, the sorrows, the desires—can they not weigh down one frail misfortune? Cannot one drop of gall be hidden in such great heaps of sweetness? I may then conclude aper et fortuna, valet! She is gone in whom I trusted; and of me hath not one thought of mercy, nor any respect of that that was. Do with me now, therefore, what you list. I am more weary of life than they are desirous that I should perish; which, if it had been for her, as it is by her, I had been too happily born."

It was a marvellous sight to observe the countenance of the Queen during the perusal of the foregoing. At the first few sentences she seemed moved to a great attention; when it came to the describing of her riding like Alexander, and the like gross flattery, the sudden flushing of her face shewed itself all through her cosmetics; and at her being likened unto a goddess, an angel, and Orpheus, she simpered famously, and shewed her teeth, which were none of the whitest. But when the writer began to make his dolorous moan, the which Sir Robert read with so pitiful an accent as if his heart was a breaking, her Majesty looked concerned, then piteous, then sorrowful, and, at the ending of the letter, she put up her handkerchief to her eyes; but whether there was any likelihood of tears, know I not.

"Odds pittikins! it be wonderful moving," exclaimed the Queen; "he hath suffered more than we thought of: he shall have some comfort straight. But read that passage again, Sir Robert, that beginneth concerning of our riding like Alexander."

Raleigh was forthwith released. That he should be so, forwarded an intrigue of Cecil's, though the Queen's gracious goodness to the false traitor obtained the sole praise of the benevolent deed.

On the night that Raleigh had arrived in the Thames with Master Francis and the expedition, that young gentleman repaired to his miserly uncle's dwelling, for the purpose of soliciting information concerning his birth. The obscurity and evil mystery of his parentage, were peculiarly galling to an aspiring and affectionate youth, fondly conscious that, by nature, he was of no ignoble strain. On the same night murderers and burglars chanced to have burst in upon the miser gloating over his money-bags. They quarrelled about the division of the spoils, and, fighting furiously, nearly killed each other, after a true bull-dog fashion; so that, when Master Francis entered, he found one mangled corpse on the floor, the other dying ruffian glaring round him in the death struggle, and his uncle still bound.

The youth, in a monstrous marvel at the whole scene, more especially at seeing such a store of precious things lying scattered about, as if of no sort of value, did presently cut with his own dagger the cords that bound his kinsman, thinking, at first, that he was dead as the others—but, in some minutes, after calling to him a bit, the old man opened his eyes very fearfully, and with a great wildness; but, they lighting only upon his nephew, who, very concernedly, was assuring him of his safety, he did grow more composed; and, upon looking about and seeing of his treasures so scattered, he started up with a suddenness that nearly upset Master Francis, and, as if ailing nothing, he began to gather up his riches.

"Oh, these devilish villains!" exclaimed he to the wondering youth. "They did break in upon me—having got entrance I know not how, and, after binding and threatening of me, proceeded to rife me of these valuables, which an honest friend hath left in my custody—for thou knowest they cannot be mine, seeing I be so exceeding poor; and then, falling out upon their division, did straightway go to murdering of each other."

"But, truly, thou seemest in very fine feather," continued Gregory Vellum, somewhat sarcastically, as he turned to notice the handsome apprelling of his youthful relative; "I warrant me thou wilt spend on thy back all that thou earnest. Well, I care not, so that thou comest not back on my hands."

"But I came to beg a favour of you, uncle," said Master Francis.

"Nay, ask of me nothing," hastily replied the old miser, as he left off counting the gold pieces into the old stocking; "I have scarce wherewith to live. I cannot let thee have a great."

This entreated favour of information about his parents, the miser would not give; but he assured the youth that he was illegitimate, and his father "a paltry fellow," and "a notorious villain;" and, very probably, one Holdfast, a famous, hypocritical, puritanic preacher. The unhappy youth went off with a woful heart; and, after a time, bethought him of visiting Joanna:—

Yet, when he came to think of the tone of her letters not coming up to his expectations, in the peculiar mood in which he then was, he straight began to have suspicions that she regarded him less than he would have her; but in a few minutes there came to his recollection numberless kindnesses she had done him, which to him were as positive proofs of the sincerity of her affection. The remembrance of these things did assure him somewhat, and became to him of such great comfort, that, for the time, it clean drove all unpleasant thoughts out of his head.

At this moment there came on a very smart shower of rain, and he, wishing to save his new doublet a wetting, hastened for shelter under a gateway close at hand. Passing beneath here, he spied an open door at one side, for which he made, but presently desisted of his purpose, on hearing voices that of a certainty came from it. He was about to content himself with the shelter of the gateway as far as might be from the door, when he recognised the voice of Joanna, that did at once fix him to the spot.

"Nay, nay, my Lord," said she, "it may please you to affirm this, but I doubt you affect me so much as you say."

"O' my life, adorable Joanna!" answered one, very urgently, whom Master Francis instantly knew, by the manner of speaking, to be my Lord Cobham, whom he had often heard. "I swear to you I do love you exceedingly. In truth, your infinite loveliness is of such a sort that never expect I to find aught so worthy of the steadfast and most perfect devotedness with which I do regard you."

Speech like this, it may be believed, Master Francis liked not at all.

"Methinks you are but trifling with me," observed the other.

"Nay—my heart's treasure! believe me, I never was in such earnest!" replied her companion. "Take this ring—'tis a ruby of great price; yet, should it be inestimable to come up with my estimation of your worthiness, exquisitely beautiful Joanna! Here—let me place it on your most delicate finger."

At this Master Francis began to be much troubled that she, whom he so loved, should accept gifts from one who, to his knowledge, was noted for his gallantries.

"I scarce think it be right of me to take your gift, my Lord," said Joanna. "Yet to refuse it might seem discourteous of me—so I will e'en accept of it."

"And grant of me in return but one precious favour," added the Lord Cobham, in an entreating voice, that did much increase the disturbance of Master Francis. "It be but to press that tempting lip, compared with which the ruby must seem but pale."

The price of the ring is the kiss, which madens the unseen lover. The scene now changes to the shop of Martin Lather, a barber-chirurgion, whose humour is to quote the Latin phrases which he has picked up from the daily conversation of Mister Tickletoby, the school-master, and translate them into a meaning diametrically opposite to the true one. Many of the subordinate characters, are indeed nothing more than the personification of a humour.—Harry Daring, the barber's apprentice, a madcap bent on all sorts of mischievous pranks, wild frolics, and practical jokes, but courageous as a lion's cub, and warmly attached to his old school-fellow, Master Francis, is a more original and meritorious invention. When Francis comes back, richly appressed, and wearing a sword, looking like one of the famous knights they had read of at old Tickletoby's, in the romance of "King Arthur," Harry aspired to be his squire, in virtue of an old agreement, and resolved to shew his indentures a fair pair of heels. In the meanwhile, he has no good accounts to communicate of the proceedings of the fair Joanna, yet he thought it the part of a true friend to tell what he had heard of her. On sundry occasions, a man muffled up had been cautiously let out of the dwelling of the mercer at daybreak; and Harry had ascertained to whom belonged the kirtle of the female figure who kept carefully back while she gave egress to the muffled cavalier:—

"Who's was it?" inquired Master Francis, who had listened with too much anxiety to hear the narration to the end.

"Joanna's," replied the boy.

"And like enough!" added the other with some sort of bitterness.

"But let it not move thee so, I pray thee," cried Harry Daring, noticing in great trouble the painful expression of his friend's countenance.

"And yet she hath done me great kindnesses!" exclaimed the youth, as if to himself.

"Though it look not well, mayhap there shall be no harm in it," observed the other, as if with a view of affording some consolation.

"But I have known that of her that hath harm in it!" exclaimed Master Francis, more disturbed than ever. "That, had it not come of mine own knowledge, would I not have believed—and now it be easy enough to credit almost any treachery. No! I will never allow myself to be bribed into a toleration of such villainous depaite!"

"Well—if she do play her jade's tricks, let her go hang!" said the young chirurgion, indignantly. "I tell thee, Master Francis, if that be it, she be not worth the caring for. Thou art as sweet a young gentleman as eye would wish to look on; therefore shalt thou easily meet with her betters at any time. I say again, let her go hang!"

"She hath done me many great kindnesses—the which I now wish she had never done, or that she had left unthought of that which I now know of her," observed the youth in extreme thoughtfulness; then, starting up suddenly, cried out, "But who was he she let out?"

Harry thought it might be that spouting piece of fustian, Ralph Goshawk.

Master Francis, in an agony of grief, doubt, and suspicion, proceeded to the dwelling of the mercer, to be at once resolved, and he encountered Marjory, the prating, ancient housekeeper, who confirmed his worst suspicions. As he listened to her tales of the unmaidenly behaviour of Joanna, the old woman suddenly exclaimed:—

"That be her foot on the stair; say not a word, I pray you; else shall I be ruined." No sooner, however, had Joanna entered at the door, which she then did—looking more beautiful than ever, dressed as if from a walk, than, with a smile, the old woman hastened up to her.

"Take these things and put them in my chamber," said the mercer's daughter to her, as she took off, and gave into her hands, her hat, muffler, and cloak.

During these few seconds the youth had been in a very agony of conflicting emotions. He seemed making up his mind what to do; and yet there was such a tumult in him, of rage, and jealousy, and indignation, that he looked as if he knew not what he was about.

"I can scarce think that the voyage hath done you good, Francis," observed Joanna, as she approached him, "for, in truth, you look not so well as you used."

"Like enough," replied he, bitterly.

"What ailth you?" she inquired, with much tenderness.

"Sick at heart!—sick at heart!" quickly answered Master Francis; "sick of the villainous deceipts that have been played upon me. Like enough, indeed, to look not so well as I was. I went in the extreme comfort of thinking myself beloved by one I imagined to be possessed of a goodly store of all honourable virtues; I return but to find that I have been the dupe of the very wickedest wanton that ever disgraced God's earth."

"What mean you by this?" asked the mercer's daughter, seemingly in great astonishment.

"What mean I?" exclaimed the youth, indignantly. "Hast done no ill thing? hast given me no provocation to quarrel since I have been away, by the infamousness of thy behaviour?"

"None!" replied she, with exceeding earnestness; "I have done no ill thing; I have done nothing that should give you provocation to quarrel."

"Ha! and indeed!" cried her companion, now still more incensed against her; "dost tell me that, and come straight from the kisses of my Lord Cobham?" At hearing this, the colour mounted into her cheek a little, of which he took speedy notice, and continued:—"I see nature will take no part in so monstrous a lie. Go to! you are a wanton." And, so saying, he turned away from her.

"I pray you, Francis, speak not in this way," said Joanna, in a very serious manner, and with a face somewhat troubled. "That my Lord Cobham hath caressed me, I acknowledge; but that I gave him any such return, is most untrue: and of aught worse than that done by me at any time, know I nothing."

"Dost think I can believe any such thing from you?" asked Master Francis, suddenly. "Dost think I know not more of such conduct?—even if 'twere not enough to condemn you by, as the stealing under a public gateway, with one, so noted; and going into hidden corners to be surprised by him. I tell you he be not the only one."

"Take heed," exclaimed the mercer's daughter, who, as she had listened, had become exceeding pale—her bosom heaved mightily—her brilliant eyes shot quick and uneasy glances, and, altogether, her appearance was that of one marvellously disturbed. "Take heed, Francis, I can bear much from you, but this—this I cannot bear."

"'Tis less than you have deserved," replied he. "And now I have done with you. There!" he cried, as, approaching her closely, he dashed at her feet the chain of gold she had of his uncle. "There lies one of the gifts with which you have sought to bribe me into a toleration of your infamous doings. And here!" he added, as he followed it with a purse that seemed tolerably well filled. "Here is that which will pay for the cost I have been to you in other things. Be assured it hath been honestly come by; and, not like your costly presents and generous supplying of my wants—the liberal wages of a more liberal iniquity."

To this she answered not save by a slight gasping as if for breath; but her brow became darker, and the expression of her eyes unnatural.

"I now take my leave of you," added Master Francis, in a voice somewhat tremulous. "I care not if I ever see you again. You have misjudged me hugely if you thought I was of such a nature as to tolerate, for a single moment, the infamy you have been about. Your judgment and your gifts have been equally misplaced. My heart is not one of so mean a sort as to be satisfied with the affections of a jilt; nor is my disposition so base as to suffer itself to be bribed by a"—

"Villain!" screamed Joanna, as she furiously clutched him by the throat with both her hands, before the offensive word had been spoken. "Dost think I can be maddened in this vile way, and bear it tamely?"

The youth sank in a swoon under her violence; and the frantic maiden, passing from the frenzy of anger to the extreme of tenderness, exclaimed:—

"Oh, what a wretch have I been if I have done thee any hurt. Francis!—dear, dear Francis!—I will forgive all the vile things thou hast said of me if thou wilt not look at me so horribly. Move but a limb—breathe—or let me feel but the beating of thy heart. No—all be as still as a stone. O God! he is dead—he is dead, and I have killed him!" So saying, she clasped him close to her breast with many piteous sobs, and with the saddest, wildest look eye ever beheld.

"Francis!—thou who hath ever been to me the gentlest, fondest, and best of creatures, and that I have loved more as a child of mine own than aught else. Oh, speak but a word, or my heart will break! Indeed, and on my life, and heart, and soul, and all things that be most sacred in this world—thou hast been most shamefully deceived in what thou didst say of me. I have done no such villainess. Alack! alack! He heeds me not!"

Presently his eyelids opened more, and he looked about him with a strange unconscious stare, and kept breathing as with some sort of difficulty. The blackness went from his face, leaving it exceeding pale, and his lips got a little more colour in them.

Seeing these things, Joanna grew so agitated that she was obliged gently to put his head again upon the ground whilst she stood up a bit.

In truth, she seemed in extreme perplexity as to how she should conduct herself. She knew not what to say, and scarce what to do.

Thus these lovers parted; and, when the sorrowful Joanna afterwards sent Francis a supplicatory and an explanatory letter, he returned it unopened. Joanna was now nigh unto death's door, seized with a violent frenzy, calling out so piteously on Master Francis, that Martin Lather, the barber-chirurgion, knew not how to treat so extraordinary a case. Her lover was pained by her condition, and determined in his mind to forget her as one unworthy of a thought ; but forget her he never did."

Raleigh was now upon the eve of a new voyage of discovery ; and, among those adventurous spirits who attended him in search of that famous El Dorado which occupied so much of the conversation of the court and the city, were Master Francis, and Harry Daring, the bold and mischievous apprentice of old Lather. Before the expedition sailed, the gentlemen adventurers met their friends at Raleigh's fair seat of Sherborne, and enjoyed themselves for a season in hunting, hawking, fishing, and rural sports. Among the goodly company assembled, were Master Shakspeare, and the merry Alice, the fair cousin of Lady Raleigh, attended by a bevy of suitors, whom it was the delight of the lively maiden to tease and ridicule. She often chose the obscure Master Francis, "the paltry secretary," for her partner in the dance ; and appeared greatly taken with him, while he paid her the attentions of a lover, though his sad heart was not interested. His thoughts still wandered back to the false and undone Joanna:—

"Lost, misguided creature!" exclaimed Master Francis, with great earnestness ; "how hath she fallen from that high opinion in which I once held her ! I do assure you, Master Shakspeare, that there was a time when she shewed to me as noble a heart as ever woman possessed. She did me many kindnesses—many great kindnesses, and I could not but love her, she appeared to me of so lovable a nature."

The eve of the departure of the expedition was celebrated by a solemn banquet, at which Master Shakspeare distinguished himself as a famous reveller, and flowery orator.

The voyage of discovery was prosecuted in the Lion's Whelp, with various fortunes. When it had been so far accomplished, Padre Bartolomé, a Jesuit priest, and the villain of the romance, attempted to betray Raleigh and his companions into the hands of the Spanish Governor of Trinidad, Don Antonio de Berrio. The evil schemes of the intriguing priest were, however, frustrated by the acuteness of Raleigh, and the zeal and courage of his shipmates. Harry Daring, in particular, the wild, runaway London apprentice, displayed the intelligence of a sage, and the bravery of a hero, in circumventing the cunning of the treacherous Spanish pilot, who, under direction of the Jesuit, was running the ship into the very jaws of the Spaniards. While these things were acting on board the Lion's Whelp, a very different scene was going forward on shore—one of less bustle and excitement, but of a more profound interest:—

In a handsome chamber of the Governor of Guiana, well lighted, and decked with such costly furniture as might become the dwelling of a sovereign prince, there sat a right beautiful woman, in a dress in the Spanish style, of exceeding rich materials. She was reclining on a silken couch, figured in with gold in a wonderful costly pattern, supporting herself by pillows of the same, and was leaning of her head back upon her hand, whilst her elbow rested on the cushions behind her. Her eyes were somewhat dark and marvellously lustrous, her face very lovely to look upon ; yet the expression on it was of so gloomy and disturbed a nature, mingling great grief with great anger, that there would be few so hazardous as to venture to gaze thereon with any sort of affection, notwithstanding of its great comeliness. Her form was truly beautiful, shewing she was a woman arrived at the very maturity of her attractions. The outline of her limbs was fully rounded, whilst her spreading shoulders and swelling bosom were of a corresponding character.

Doubtless was she wondrously moved by her own reflections ; for her breast heaved violently, and the glances that shot from her brilliant eyes were not such as betokened a mind at ease. After continuing to look more moodily every moment, and starting every now and then from her position with a half-stifled sob, she rose from her seat, and began pacing of the room with haughty strides. The whilst she was at this a door opened, and there entered a stately-looking man, habited in all the proud apparelling of a Spanish noble. His age might be somewhere about forty. He was well featured, yet had he in his countenance a sort of scornfulness that ever and anon gave his countenance an expression in no way amiable.

"Ah, my adored !" exclaimed the gentleman, as he advanced towards her with an easy carriage, and a face dressed in smiles. "I have hastened to thee from a thousand pressing duties ; but, when love beckons, all else may stay behind. How fares it with thee, senora ? Thy looks scarce welcome me. Is there aught I have neglected providing thee with ?—any one thing thou hast the desire of ? Nay, by the Virgin, thou assest me but unkindly if thou hast any wish ungratified !"

"I lack nothing, Don Antonio," said the senora, faintly, as she moved from him, as if to hide her feelings.

"Oh, my life ! 'tis but uncivil of thee to turn away," observed the Governor, as he went up to her and took her hand, gazing in her face all the time with very passionate admiration. "For art thou not the very light of mine eyes ? Do I not love thee, Dona ?"

"Love !" cried his fair companion, with a sort of sarcastic emphasis.

"Ay, love, Querida," replied De Berrio. "And well art thou worthy of such. Madre de Dios ! I shall think better of heretics for thy sake, and I shall ever hold the worthy Padre's piety in greater estimation, because he hath secured so delectable a sinner for the consoling of so good a Catholic as am I."

"Mention him not !" exclaimed the lady, somewhat fiercely. "I scorn, and loathe, and detest him, from out of the very depths of my heart."

"Give him not such hard words, I prythee," said Don Antonio, seemingly a little surprised at the earnestness with which she had spoke. "As times go, methinks him not so bad. For mine own part, I see nothing in him worse than shall be met with in most of our holy men. What hath he done amiss ?"

"What hath he done amiss ?" echoed the senora, in a voice and with a look that startled her companion. "But no matter."

"Indeed I cannot help but think thou hast taken a great prejudice against him," observed De Berrio. "I have found him well to be depended on, and do trust him most implicitly. Even now he hath gone on an adventure for me that hath great risk in it ; for 'tis no other than the endeavouring to entrap that notorious English pirate, Sir Walter Raleigh and his villainous followers, so that I may give them a complete overthrow."

"Sir Walter Raleigh ! said you."

"The same, Dona," replied the Governor. "He is now upon the coast with divers of his ships, intending to venture himself and the pitiful fools he hath induced to follow him, into the interior of Guiana, hoping for the discovery of El Dorado ; but, if I spoil not his voyage, then I am wonderfully mistaken."

"Are you sure 'tis Sir Walter Raleigh !" asked his fair companion, seemingly in a monstrous agitation.

"Sure !" cried Don Antonio, in some surprise. "What doubt can there be of it ? Did not Padre Bartolomé bring me certain intelligence of everything connected with the expedition ? I faith, no minute is my information, that I have with me a paper containing the names of every officer engaged upon it, and the exact number of the men and ships." And he produced a paper from his vest.

"Let me see it," said the senora, and she instantly snatched the paper from his hand, and began a reading of it."

"I will be bound for 'tis accurate to a letter," replied Don Antonio.

"Doubtless, you mean to take them prisoners if you can?" inquired his fair companion, seemingly as if perfectly unconcerned.

"By the Virgin! I mean to hang up every rascal of them as soon as ever I can get them in my power. But this delicious evening surely was never made to be wasted in idle talk concerning of such sorry rascals. Let us give the moments to love. Turn me those lustrous eyes this way, Dona, and smile on me thy delicatest smiles."

"Smile! I have lost all humour for smiling," replied the Senora.

Need we tell that this lady was the mercer's daughter of Eastcheap? She had been seduced by the infernal arts of the Jesuit, a spy of the Spanish government, who had stolen into her confidence by interesting her pity. Don Santiago, the name he assumed, represented himself an unhappy Spanish refugee, in great danger of his life from Elizabeth's cruel Protestant government. It was he was the muffled gallant, whom Harry Daring had seen stealing at daybreak from the mercer's dwelling, where, for personal safety, he had often been concealed by the confiding Joanna. It is impossible fully to develop the highly dramatic character of the mercer's daughter, without the same amplitude of detail which finds place in the original work. It is enough, that her generous self-devotion, her delicate but secret offices of love, saves her youthful lover, and only beloved, from imminent danger of the governor's deadly vengeance, and the priest's more malignant hate.

It was long after these events—and Joanna had, for once again, seen her lover in the Globe Theatre and at a distance, on the first representation of an admired tragedy, the production of his pen—that the expedition of Raleigh and Essex to Cadiz was undertaken. The animated picture of the English ships' attack on the rich Spanish galleons, the grandeur and interest of the great sea fight, and the bravery of the heroes, are, however, foreign to our purpose, as, whatever may be the degree of their literary merit, they would interfere with the unity of our selected specimens of the romance. We shall, therefore, take up Master Francis on shore, leading a force of fifty brave fellows, and having just carried, by assault, a building which proved to be a nunnery.

Upon his forcible entrance at the head of his men, he noticed the nuns flying before him, screaming and calling on the saints for assistance. Taking care that none such should be hurt, he followed on briskly till he came to the cloisters, and, greatly to his surprise, perceived at some little distance from him a man in the habit of an ecclesiastic, dragging along by the hair of her head a female in the dress of a novice.

"Turn, villain!" cried Master Francis, hurrying towards him with his sword drawn. "Thou art but a coward, to use a woman so. Let go thy hold, or I will cut thee to the chine."

"Ha!" exclaimed the man, turning towards him the well-known face of the Padre Bartolomé, looking more malignant than ever he had known it. "Art thou here, accursed heretic! Then this to thy heart, wanton!" In the same moment, to Master Francis' horror and surprise, he saw the Jesuit snatch a dagger from his vest, and bury it in the breast of his female companion, who sank with a scream at his feet; and then, with a scoldish laugh, was seeking to make off by a side passage; but the young officer was upon him too quickly.

Master Francis gently raised her from the ground, and, gazing upon her pallid face, beheld there the idealized features of the mercer's daughter of Eastcheap.

"Disturb not yourself, I pray you!" exclaimed Master Francis, earnestly, as he bent with an anxious countenance over the form of Joanna. She now reclined upon a pallet in a narrow cell, furnished only with a small table, on which appeared to be a missal or breviary, a rosary, and a crucifix; and he was sitting on a chair close beside her, holding of one of her hands. Her face looked marvellous pale—that settled pallor that betokeneth approaching dissolution; and her eyes, though still turned towards him with all the affectionate tenderness that had once dwelt in them, looked with wonderful languor and uneasiness, and lacked much of that extreme brilliancy by which they had used to be distinguished.

"The chirurgeon hath told me I have but a few hours to live," replied the mercer's daughter, in a low voice. "And I would fain devote such short time as is allowed me to make my peace with God and my conscience, by a confession which methinks be equally necessary for you to hear as for me to state."

"I trace all the evil that hath happened to me to the want of a mother's careful control in my bringing up. She died in my early childhood. I was thus left to the entire care, if care it might be called, of my other parent, who soon shewed how unfit he was for any such duty. Being considered a child of some comeliness, I was ever petted by him—the commendation I received of strangers making him proud of my appearance.

"As I grew towards womanhood, and my features and person began to assume something of that appearance they afterwards acquired, the admiration I excited became greater, and my vanity the more intense. I lacked not suitors; no girl could be more followed. I was the favourite of all the apprentices round about; and many an honest citizen's son vowed he loved me dearer than all the world beside. My father had early impressed me with a distaste for becoming a wife, drawing fearful pictures of the misery, drudgery, and insignificance of such women as married; and then, in more glowing colours, painting the consequence and happiness enjoyed by a girl of wit enough to draw plenty of fine gallants round her, all ready to be her slaves, that I thought only of how I might place myself in the enviable situation of the latter.

"The admiration of apprentices and young citizens soon ceased to content me. Many brave gallants and young noblemen coming to my father's shop, and getting sight of me, liked me, or professed to like me, with so monstrous an affection, that they were ever beseeging me with the sweetest of flatteries; and my father finding his advantage in it, afforded them every facility for seeing me when any of them had a mind.

"This continued till I knew you, and then my whole being seemed changed of a sudden; the barren rock seemed struck by some holy hand, and there gushed forth a stream of the purest and sweetest feeling. Before, everything was for myself—now, everything was for you. Although the love of admiration was implanted too deeply in my disposition to be readily eradicated, I made it subservient to the most generous purposes. I learned how you were situated with your miserly kinsman—I noticed your inability to supply that thirst for information which distinguished you. Love not only taught me liberality, but instructed me to use such delicacy in the application of it, as enabled me to supply all your wants after such a fashion as could be least objectionable to one of so modest and retiring a nature as I found you to be. You were then but a mere youth, and I a woman some six or seven years your senior; the delight I felt in affording you facilities for improving yourself in study, and the gratification that arose in me as I observed the rapid progress of your mental faculties in consequence, I am altogether unable to express; but the affection I felt was of so different a sort from anything I have heard or read, that I cannot fancy such was ever felt before.

"So absolute an effect had your youth and innocence of soul on my maturity and great knowingness, that, when enjoying such sweet endearments with you as I sometimes would allow, I have felt myself a different being—all selfishness, all vanity, all deceit, all cunning, seemed to have left me—I have wept like a child, and loved with all the entireness of a woman's devotion."

Here the mercer's daughter paused for a few seconds, as if her feelings would not allow her utterance.

More explanation follows. Joanna was usually employed by her father to dun Lord Cobham and his other gallant customers, with such results as we have seen. These explanations, if somewhat tedious to the reader, account for the impropriety of behaviour; for, beyond unpardonable coquettish levity, she had not gone until her honour was foully betrayed by the villainous priest. She says—

"I knew not the villain he was! I had no thought of the danger I was exposed to. All looked honour and sincerity of heart. All breathed of love and the very deepest respectfulness. Miserable degraded wretch that I became, little knew I with all my cunning, what monstrous craft was arrayed against me; or how soon it might come to pass, that she who had duped so many, should herself be the completest wretchedest dupe that ever breathed! I fell—the victim of such base treachery as I dreamed not the existence of.

"Not by any consent of mine own!" exclaimed Joanna more vehemently, as Mr Francis drew away his hand and averted his face. "I thought not—suspected not the nearness of such dishonour. 'Twas a vile trick—an unmanly stratagem—a very atrocious piece of villany!"

The scene is highly wrought; but we cannot pursue it farther than is needful for the mere understanding of the story. The innocent, boyish Francis was for ever lost to the unhappy Joanna, and she followed the fortunes of her destroyer, the pretended Don Santiago. She continues—

"We had not been out at sea many days, when the behaviour of Don Santiago towards me completely changed. From mild and respectful, he gradually became haughty and uncivil. He rated me for my melancholy as if it was a crime; and continually got into monstrous passions of jealousy, swearing I was ever thinking of you. One day he completely threw off the mask. He acknowledged he was no Don Santiago de Lux—he confessed that the ship was not bound for the Spanish coast, and bade me think not of marriage with him, for he was a jesuit. He was Padre Bartolomé."

"As soon as I knew him for what he was, I hated him with all my heart and soul, and the more earnestly for his throwing out mysterious hints of your speedy death, with such apparent satisfaction as none but so black a villain could have known. Wishing to be quit of such a wretch, I endeavoured to make a friend of Don Antonio de Berrie, in whose guardianship I had been left during a temporary absence of the Padre, and who quickly professed himself my lover. From him I learned the arrival of the expedition, and that you were of the party. On that very evening the city was taken by assault, and I found you were an inmate in the same house with me. The Padre had concealed himself in my apartment, vowing the horriblemest vengeance; and, believing him capable of doing any villany he had a mind, I kept a strict eye on his movements. I was fortunate enough to come upon him as he was about to stab you in your sleep, and quickly forced him to leave the room with his wickedness unperpetrated. Upon finding you once again before me, and in the great joy I felt at having rescued you from death, there was a sudden rush at my heart of such powerful sweet feelings, that you seemed to me again as we were once to each other; and I was just on the point of clasping you in my arms to pour out the fulness of my heart upon your breast, when I remembered the degraded thing I had become—I shrunk from you in the wretched belief that my touch would be pollution, and with a racking anguish turned away and left the room. Alack! alack! the misery I then felt, language hath no name for."

"I care not for having fallen by his dagger," continued Joanna, her voice getting fainter every moment. "'Twas a mercy rather than a punishment. I doubt much had I lived I should have done any credit to the holy community among whom I had taken refuge; for I found, though I strove ever so, I could not become so religious-minded as seemed necessary. My meditations were all of you—my prayers were all for you. Yet, in the solitary contemplation of my own unhappiness, I had ever one consolation. It was the belief that you were in the enjoyment of that prosperity your many excellencies deserved. Francis, this was indeed a pleasure! I could think of no other pleasant thing. Miserable and degraded as I was—an outcast and an alien—with a mind almost maddened, and a breaking heart—after wearing out the long night on my knees, beseeching every blessing might be showered upon you, Francis!—I felt the sweet conviction steal upon me that you would be—must be—happy; and it brought with it a comfort that left me nought to wish for but the grave."

Francis was in tears. He looked a moment irresolute; and then, as though the influence of old impressions were not to be resisted, suddenly bent down and caught her up in his arms. "Francis!—dear Francis!" she exclaimed in a faint voice. "Now I also am happy!"

Master Francis was too much moved to speak. Indeed, his feelings were of that tumultuous character that left him not even the ability to think. He was aware only that the heart of the being he had loved was beating against his breast, and remembered only the many noble things she had done in his behalf. For a few minutes he lost all sense of surrounding objects; and was first awakened to consciousness upon finding that Joanna's heart did not beat against his own. On unclosing of his arms, he saw at a glance he had embraced the dead!

Of Master Bacon, and the revels and justifications at the Mermaid; of Ben Jonson, Master Beaumont, Master Fletcher, Master Donne, Master Cotton, Master Carew, Master Shakspeare, and a long list, which makes the mouth water, of "the most famouset wits" of the time, we can afford to give no account whatever. Dame Cannikin, the landlady, her daughter Kate, and her drawer Barnaby, are each capital in their several ways—so is Barnaby Braddle, the constable, and his group of satellites; but neither can we advert to them, having exhausted our space with the tragic, which, after all, may not be the most popular part of an exceedingly attractive and entertaining work. As bound in honour, we must, however, inform the reader, that Master Francis found a father, after a strange fashion, in a certain swaggering, valiant Colonel Harquebus, who will not acknowledge "a paltry secretary," a poet, a student, a scholar for his son, until he has proved his valour and sonship by nearly running his choleric progenitor through the body; that merry, saucy Mistress Alice, the manscormer, falls desperately in love with Master Francis; and that Master Shakspeare performs the same good offices for the distressed damsel which he makes another accomplish for his own Beatrice. And all the bravest gallants, and the fairest dames of the court, and all the wits of the "Mermald," assembled at their wedding; and the Queen, whose right royal displeasure Francis had once incurred, by honestly acknowledging himself the devoted humble friend and secretary of the disgraced Sir Walter Raleigh, sent for him in haste, and commanded him to kneel, Master Francis knelt on one knee at the Queen's feet, in a strange tumult of proud and happy feelings. He felt something touch his shoulder, and her Majesty say, "Rise up, Sir Francis Harquebus!" and then followed some courteous speech from the Queen, and congratulations from the splendid circle around him.

Harry Daring said, he had always prophesied this famous knighthood. Harry immediately went in search of adventures to the Spanish main, and we wait to hear of them according to the author's promise. As the book opens with Master Shakespeare, so it closes with him wisely and merrily, by the Queen summoning him to her presence.

"We charge you, Master Shakespeare, with high treason!" exclaimed Queen Elizabeth, when he presented himself according to her bidding, whereupon he began to be somewhat alarmed, and others nigh unto the presence were exceeding curious to know what he had done to bring upon himself so weighty an accusation.

"Please your majesty, I"—

"The offence hath been proved to us," said the Queen, and then the courtiers looked marvellous serious. "You have drawn away divers of the subjects of this realm from their duty to their lawful sovereign, which is treason of the very greatest magnitude. Is it not so, Master Bacon?" inquired Queen Elizabeth, seeing that excellent fine lawyer in the circle before her.

"Please your Majesty, there can be no doubt of it," replied he, with a smile, for he saw into her Majesty's humour—though few of the others were so quickwitted.

"You have, by sundry sorts of jests, and other pointed weapons," continued the Queen, "very dangerous when not in discreet and lawful hands, excited numberless of our nobles and officers, besides others of lower quality, into violent disturbances against the peace of the realm. We charge you on your allegiance, confess what hath led you into this notorious misbehaving."

But we must now, rather abruptly, bid good-by to this "most famous and monstrous rare and curious romance," in which we do assure the reader that there is no lack of marvellous, witty, and right pleasant entertainment, else had we not introduced it to his courteous regards.

THE FIELD OF THE FAIRY RINGS.

A SCENE NEAR TAUNTON, SOMERSET.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

ACROSS the brook that turns our Mill of Trull,
And not twice forty paces from my door,
There is a field I love—a soft, green field
Of English sod: what other sod so soft,
What other grass so green? At evening, oft Forth do I saunter there, and stoop to cull
Autumnal flowers and fruits, for there are store
Of jetty berries, such as brambles yield:
Or, haply, seated by the stream, I pore
Upon its waters—showing glad though grey,
Through the o'erhanging foliage, as if they Told me of wanderings in meads remote,
By happy cottage homes, through pastures green
As these, where industry improves the soil
Which nature had already blest, ere brought
To such perfection by judicious toil—
Toil which, thus aided, makes a fertile scene
Of many a sterile spot!

But here, behold,
O'er this sweet field the numerous circles, traced
(As quaint traditions tell) by fairy feet;
When, in the nightwatch, bright assemblies meet
Of green-robed fays, with glistening locks of gold,
Dancing to airy music, wild, yet sweet,
From elfin harps among the green leaves placed!

Two stately trees of oak this field contains,
Apart, yet not far separate, like two friends
Divided by a temporary feud,
And longing for each other—yet withheld
By some ungenial feeling, which restrains
Their meeting. Shall they no more meet, compelled

To live asunder thus?—Yes, each forth sends
Some spreading shoot, by which may be renewed,
In future years, their union!

To the left (Here as we stand, our backs towards the mill, Upon the tiny bridge that spans the rill,)
O'er the next field, surrounded by its graves,
Shines the white village church; but more I love
The right-hand path, that leads through leafy lanes
To that romantic bridge,* where loudlier raves
The bustling brook; which many a chasm hath cleft,
Whence springs the hispid comfrey; and, above,
In rich exuberance, spotted ivy trains
A drapery o'er the loftier trees. Here glows
The crimson berry of the guelder-rose,
Whose vine-like leaves have caught a sanguine stain
From the October sun. Down in the grass,
And blushing through green blades, herb Robert fair
Would catch the eyes of pilgrims as they pass,
Who seek for rarer plants. The arum, there,
Now leafless, lifts its ruby sceptre—red
As coral rocks that stud the ocean's bed;
Pale agrimony scents the evening air
With a faint lemon odour; and around
The roseate mallow in profusion springs.
But dews fall heavily to drench the ground,
And I retrace my steps; the trees I pass,
I pass the mystic circles in the grass—
And, as I leave the scene, within my mind
A name (a name that will not last) I find,
And call that field, the FIELD OF THE FAIRY RINGS.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.*

For the first time, the curious, amusing, and, in some respects, really interesting doctrines of this perplexing and inexplicable science, if it deserve the name, have attracted the grave attention of intelligent medical practitioners in London; and, it seems, gained converts among them. Two medical professors in the London University have declared their belief in the phenomena they have witnessed; and one has become an adept in magnetizing. This gentleman, Dr Elliotson, carries his faith much farther than his colleague, Professor Mayo, who boggles at those wondrous faculties said to be developed in some individuals by the magnetic influence, and which are termed either lucidity, prevision, or clairvoyance—all three meaning nearly the same thing. The gift of prophecy, something equivalent to second-sight, and the singular power possessed by the patient, of taking internal cognizance of his own diseased organs, and those of others, and of prescribing remedies, and foretelling the issue and termination of disorders, are among those assumed faculties of magnetic patients, to which Professor Mayo demurs; nor is his scepticism surprising. It is to the pretensions of Animal Magnetism, among curative remedies in a numerous class of diseases, and as the soother, and, for the time, the suspender or annihilator of physical pain, that we would chiefly wish to draw attention; and this can only be done by recounting a few of its marvels. It will save many of our readers a world of trouble, if, at the outset of this paper, we recall to their recollection an article on Animal Magnetism, which appeared in a former number of this Magazine,† from the able, and on this subject—at once psychological and physiological—the congenial pen of Mr De Quincey. To that paper we refer, as a succinct history and perspicuous view of the Mesmeric doctrines, which make retrospection in some degree superfluous. In the interval, Animal Magnetism, as a subject of curious speculation, has had a revival in France, and has at last been able to engage the thoughts of scientific Englishmen. But “the mere account of foreign cases was not enough. The sober good sense of British practitioners required, that what was done at Paris or Vienna should be capable of repetition in London.” And surprising things have been repeated in London; though British patients, who may perhaps be incapable of those exalted or ultimate degrees of magnetizing which open the mouth in prophecy, and confer the gift of tongues, have not yet reached a condition of clairvoyance worth boasting about. It is undeniable that so much delusion, quackery, imbecile credulity, and absurdity of the most ludicrous kind, have been engrafted on the really extraordinary phenomena of Mesmerism as may form the apology of the most earnest and simple-minded seeker of truth, for indulging an unwelcome degree of scepticism. Yet the obstinate unbelief of well-attested facts, and of experiments subjected to the rigid scrutiny of crowds of acute and scientific sceptical spectators, does not argue a more philosophic state of mind than that of blind, unquestioning credulity.

But our object is not to discuss the principles of this mysterious science, nor, at present, to advert to the various theories which have been suggested for their explication, but to put on record, in a popular form, a few of the most recent and remarkable facts by which Mesmerism is practically elucidated; to check credulity and quackery, and to stimulate rational curiosity. It certainly does not make against these doctrines that their professors earnestly invite examination, and that they do not restrict the power and exercise of the magnetic influence to an initiated class. Every man and woman, it appears, may magnetize; but the number susceptible of the magnetic influence is much more limited. Every one may make the “passes;” but some mysterious or unexplained condition is necessary in order to imbibe the mysterious fluid. One patient will go into magnetic sleep in a minute or two; another will resist for hours; and the greatest adept in magnetizing will occasionally fail. To be susceptible of the magnetic influence at all, the presence of disease seems requisite, if we rightly comprehend the doctrines; and the debilitated, the nervous, but, above all, those suffering under palsy, or hysterical and epileptic disorders, or liable to convulsions and fainting fits, are the most susceptible of Mesmerism. All the late cases at the North London Hospital, (which, our readers are aware, is connected with the London University,) are of this nature; and the patients are generally either hysterical or epileptic youths and girls, of from twelve to seventeen or eighteen years.

M. Deleuze, a celebrated Mesmerian, and the historian of the whimsical science, asserts that women can magnetize as well as men; and he seems to consider it right that women only should magnetize females, or be placed en rapport with patients of the same sex. Dr Elliotson, the most noted of the London medical converts, lately closed his first lecture on Animal Magnetism, by gravely declaring, that he was “one of those who are satisfied that influence may be exerted by one animal, whether human or brute, upon another individual, independently of the individual who is affected being aware of the operation.”* The Mesmerians agree that all vertebrated animals may be magnetized. Horses have been magnetized;† and that the effects do not depend on imagination, has been proved by this circumstance. But have animals no faculties analogous to imagination? The phenomena of Mesmerism are evolved in a variety of ways, modified by the degree which the magnetizer desires to produce, or by the occult capacities of the magnetized. There are six different stages exhibited in magnetic somnambulism. The magnetic sleep, or coma, is the preliminary step to artificial somnambulism. This sleep, the entire insensibility of the patient during its continuance, the power of the magnetizer in producing it and regulating its duration, (occasional failures admitted,) are apparently, as the reader will see in the sequel, as fully established as any fact in natural science. It is the psychical phenomena of the somnambulist state which begets pregnant doubts in many more than Professor Mayo. According to M. Dupotet, the following are among the ostensible phenomena exhibited:—

1st, While the organs of the senses are in a state of complete insensibility, unexcitable by any external stimuli, they mentally take cognizance of the conditions and relations of surrounding objects through some other channel than the organs through which such impressions are usually conveyed.

2d, There is in many cases an obvious vicarious transference of the senses from their appropriate organs to other parts of the nervous system, as to the tips of the fingers, epigastrium, and other parts of the body.

3d, The lucidity of their vision penetrates through intervening opaque objects, and even takes cognizance of events passing at a distance.

4th, They possess the faculty of self-intuition—that is to say, a clear insight into the normal or abnormal condition of their own organization—and they perceive and describe with exactness the internal condition also of those with whom they may be en rapport.

5th, They appear endowed with a knowledge beyond that which they ordinarily possess, and prescribe for themselves, as well as for those with whom they are en rapport, remedies for such complaints as they may be afflicted with; and these are generally found successful.

6th, Their lucid vision often extends beyond the present existence, and they foretell, with circumstantial minuteness, events which will happen in connexion with their own organization; even the day and hour—the very moment—when such predictions will be verified is accurately specified.

Lastly, On recovering from their somnambulism, they remember nothing which occurred during the magnetic state; but when again thrown into somnambulism, the memory between the two magnetic states is continuous.

These may appear extraordinary assertions; but the apparent incredibility of the facts will be very much diminished when it is found that analogous, if not identical, phenomena are often developed in abnormal conditions of the human body.

The methods of magnetising, whether by the “passes,” actual contact, or manipulation, have been greatly simplified since the time when Mesmer exhibited the airs and tricks of a juggler. His magnetic operations were conducted with many of those preliminary flourishes of the astrologer or necromancer, which his followers have been compelled to repudiate. They also admit occasional, and we apprehend that they ought to admit many, failures, even when the cases are in the hands of the greatest adepts, and likewise the frequent appearance of phenomena which they are neither prepared to expect nor able to resolve. To resume, animal magnetism had attracted little serious attention in this practical business-like country, and had only elicited a few jokes on those palpable and laughable absurdities, from which it has not yet freed itself; when the article above referred to appeared in this magazine. Mr Colquhoun, a member of the Scottish Bar, and a confirmed believer, has since fully expounded the doctrines of Animal Magnetism; but the arrival of the Baron Dupotet in London, and his demonstrations at the North London Hospital, mark the true era of this equivocal science in Great Britain, where, we may venture to prophesy, without any pretensions to lucidity or clairvoyance, that the duration, if not the spread of its empire, will depend entirely on its truth and utility.

After the appearance of Deleuze's “Histoire Critique du Magnétisme Animal,” several eminent men of science in France thought themselves bound in justice to investigate anew the facts of a science of which La Place, Cuvier, and others, had expressed a favourable opinion. That these philosophers did so, is not improbable; but we have often before now noticed sanguine theorists draw strong conclusions of this sort from very slender premises. Dr Elliottson and Professor Mayo are avowed believers of certain phenomena which they have observed; but that they, and much less La Place, Humboldt, Cuvier, Dugald Stewart, Sprengel, Coleridge, and a host of eminent names, ever placed implicit faith in one-half of the marvellous stories recorded in the annals of Animal Magnetism, and cited by Baron Dupotet, is very questionable. To some of its facts, and those certainly not the most improbable, Cuvier and La Place had assented before M. Dupotet, in 1819, became a medical student in Paris, young, and a stranger to the prejudices of the profession, or of a former age. He says:—

I was yet ignorant that physical facts were to be rejected because they were inexplicable, or because they were contrary to received doctrines. On Animal Magnetism I had already thought and read much; and, never doubting but that truth would eventually be triumphant, I solicited permission to make experiments at the Hotel-Dieu. My request was granted, and the results published in a little brochure, entitled, “Exposé des Expériences de l'Hotel-Dieu,” which was translated into German and Italian, and passed through three French editions. It may be sufficient to state here that my success was complete. Among other cases which I treated was that of a girl who had been thirteen months in the hospital, suffering from hæmatemesis, (vomiting of blood from the stomach,) which had resisted the ordinary methods of medical treatment. In the presence of forty physicians I magnetised this patient, who received such decided and manifest benefit from the operation, that in twenty-seven days she left the Hotel-Dieu, perfectly cured. In this case, the vomiting of blood, which had immediately subsided on the first magnetisation, returned on its being suspended; and, on the second operation, again ceased, and did not afterwards recur. It may be added, that the magnetic treatment induced in this patient all the extraordinary phenomena of somnambulism; and every trial which incredulity and ingenuity could suggest was had recourse to with the view of ascertaining whether there could be any possible collusion.

This physician either assisted at or conducted cases in other places, with such results that the public began to reject the report of the commissioners of 1784—Lavolsier, Franklin, and Bailly. A new commission was appointed (after a keen debate) by the French Royal Academy of Medicine; eleven commissioners were named; and, after a delay of five years, their report, when given in, undeniably afforded a triumph for Mesmerism, rendered much more complete by the attempt of the great body of medical academicians to smother it. Having performed many extraordinary marvels in Paris—we call them so in no offensive sense—which are noticed in his volume, along with numerous other curious cases of magnetic influence, and having borne up against what he considers persecution and prejudice for twenty years, Baron Dupotet, zealous in propagating the faith, arrived in London in the summer of 1837, and vainly attempted to awaken the attention of the English savans to his favourite study. He made demonstrations at the North or London University Hospital, the results of which were detailed in the medical journals and newspapers. But, in familiar parlance, the thing “did not take.” Our physicians, who no doubt have their carriages to keep up, are tacitly charged, in his book, with being more occupied about fees than discoveries; and John Bull is never the most liberal or charitable of men in his judgment of “foreign quacks.” The Professor was on the point of abandoning the field when he found a patron in Earl Stanhope, and encouragement from the liberality and candour of a few practitioners who have made trial of his curative system. No English magnetizee that we have heard of, has yet got beyond the third or fourth stage, though Dr Elliotson’s patients are approaching to the exaltation of the fifth, in which the patient can see his own internal organization, the seat of his own diseases, and that of other persons, placed en rapport, or in magnetic connexion with him; and in which he becomes acquainted, by self-intuition, with the proper remedies, which he points out to his physician, who acts accordingly. A girl of twelve years of age, and epileptic, has been repeatedly thrown into three states—stupor, delirium, and somnambulism—by Dr Elliotson. She does not, however, appear half so knowing as many French patients, though she has said that she will have no more fits; and that, on the 14th June, she would be perfectly cured. This remains to be seen, and is besides not a little in the patient’s power. This faculty creates a new era in medicine. An artificial somnambule must henceforth become the physician’s familiar, a part of his apparatus more valuable than his library. A German lady mentioned in the work turned this power to sensible advantage. Having made her own report on her case while in a state of magnetic somnambulism, she afterwards magnetised her physician, and took his clairvoyant view of it; thus making assurance double sure.

Sceptics or infidels who doubt or despise Animal Magnetism, are sometimes caught in their own snare. They are like the ignorant utterers of a spell, who raise the devil unawares, or like the man, in one of Pittcairn’s reports of a witch-trial, who, hearing members of a midnight-witch assembly cry, “Horse and hattock!” repeated the words, and was straightway whisked through the air on a rag-weed charger, like the rest. A gentleman, an interne in the Hotel-Dieu, who was “Totally sceptical regarding the powers ascribed to this mysterious essence, this asserted magnetic fluid, formed, for amusement, the plan, with a brother interne, equally incredulous, of submitting this friend to the manoeuvres of the magnetiseurs. The passes were continued for about twenty minutes without any remarkable effect; but, at the expiration of that time the young man began to yawn, his eyelids grew heavy, and closed involuntarily; he attempted to shake off the torpor in vain; his respiration next became accelerated, his head fell on his shoulders, and he uttered a sardonic laugh of indescribable expression. “We thought,” continues M. Fillassier, “that he was amusing himself at our expense; but, in a little time, what was my horror when I saw his fingers turn blue, his head fall powerless forward—when I heard his respiration rattling like a dying man’s, and felt his skin as cold as death itself! I cannot find words to describe my sufferings. I knew not what to do. Meanwhile, all these horrid phenomena increased in intensity. I tremble at the recollection of what I saw: there lay my friend, my victim, devoid of the aspect of life, in a state of complete and terrible collapse. With his hand clasped in mine, in a state of agony no tongue could tell of, I laid him on a bed, and waited the result in a state of mind I never can forget. In a quarter of an hour he recovered, and exclaiming that, in the ecstasy, he had experienced sensations of extreme delight, begged me to recommence the passes. I did so with less apprehension, and again the somnolency proceeded. The collapse, however, was less profound and terrific, and in some minutes he suddenly awoke with the exclamation, ‘What happiness is this!’”

M. de S. C., a retired officer, having heard a vague report of Animal Magnetism, attempted to make the experiment upon his own daughter, although she complained of no illness. He merely wished to ascertain whether he could make her feel the magnetic sensations. With this view, and without being aware of the extent of mischief he was provoking, he laid his hand on the stomach of his daughter, and obeyed the magnetic injunctions. After a few moments of magnetisation, she experienced spasmodic attacks, which, far from alarming her father, only encouraged him to proceed. In a very short time, however, Mademoiselle de C. was seized with the most violent convulsions; and her father, now, not knowing the proper way to calm them, only increased their intensity. In much distress, he was obliged to leave his daughter in this state, and she spent the following night in incessant convulsions, and remained a whole week in this dangerous state.

Another case of this kind was transmitted to M. de Puysegur by M. Segrettier, landowner at Nantes. The following are the particulars:—“A young lady of distinguished birth, who seemed to enjoy most excellent health, happening to be on a visit to the chateau of her relative, the Marquis de B., was indulging, with the rest of the company, in passing sundry jokes upon magnetism. Her uncle, M. de B., who outstepped, by his sarcastic remarks, everybody present, and was gesticulating with great freedom, began to direct his pretended influence upon his niece, when they both set about magnetising each other as fast as they could. At first the young lady laughed very heartily, but it was soon discovered that this laughter was anything but natural; and the first surprise excited by this phenomenon soon gave way to unspeakable terror, when it was manifest that she was gradually losing her reason and the use of her senses. Indeed, she could no longer see, nor hear, nor speak; her eyes were immovably fixed; her neck outstretched, resembled a weaker magnet violently attracted by a stronger one; she followed her magnetiser everywhere, and yielded to his sole influence. The spectators attempted to separate them, but this only provoked dreadful convulsions. Her magnetiser, on his part, felt extraordinary sensations, which, in addition to the shock he had experienced by the alarming state of his niece, had entirely showed his features, which became extremely pale and dejected. In the course of a few hours, the crisis of the magnetised young lady gradually ceased, and she complained of acute pains in her stomach. The remainder of the day, and the following night, were passed alternately in convulsions and magnetic sleep; and this state lasted several days."

These awful cases should put tamperers and sceptics on their guard. The case of Paul Villagrando, and that of Pierre Cazot, both detailed in the paper in this Magazine for January 1834, and referred to in M. Dupotet's book, are certainly not so extraordinary as that of a girl named Arron, a natural somnambulist. Natural somnambulists "go the whole hog," as the Americans say, though magnetised patients follow hard on their heels; yet, natural somnambulists have not usually been imagined to possess the clairvoyance and prophetic powers of the girl Arron, who looks indeed to be a first-rate humbug. In September 1835, she was visited by a physician from Chartres, whose name is not given.

"On being introduced to her, in company with several other gentlemen, he questioned her, without being able to obtain an answer. Thinking that, if he were alone with her, she might perhaps be induced to speak, he requested the spectators to withdraw. When they were both in private, the following conversation took place:—

"Maria," said he, do you know me?" "Yes, sir."—"Who am I?" "You are a physician."—"Whence do I come?" "From Chartres."—"Where is my house at Chartres?" "In a small street running down a declivity."—"Can you see my house?" "Yes, sir."—"Is there any company in it?" "Yes, sir; four ladies, one old, two middle-aged, and one young lady."—"For what purpose have I come into this part of the country?" "To see a female patient."—"Where is her complaint?" (Here she pointed to the part affected, which we cannot just now recollect.)—"Where did I dine?" "At M.'s."—"Was there a good dinner?" "Yes, sir."—"Could you tell me what dishes we had?" "Certainly. (She names every dish and its particular place on the table.)—"What do I hold in my hand?" "A small wooden box."—"What does it contain?" "Sharp little iron tools."—"Now what have I in my hand?" "Some money."—"How much?" (She names the sum.)—"In what coins?" (She specifies the various coins.)—"Can you tell me my thought at this moment?" "Yes, sir."—"Say it." "I dare not; I must not tell you."—"Well, I will tell you: I think of giving you this money." "So you do, sir; but I could not say so." All these answers were perfectly correct. Other answers no less surprising than the preceding have been reported to us, but we shall confine ourselves to these.

We shall call from Baron Dupotet a few more of the wonders resulting from the artificial or magnetic transference of the senses:—

A cataleptic patient of Petetin distinguished in succession several cards which had been slipped under the bed-clothes, and laid upon her stomach; she told the hour of a watch held in the closed hand of an inquirer; and recognised, in like manner, an ancient medal grasped in the hand of one of the spectators. Another day the same patient recognised a letter placed under the waistcoat of M. Petetin, then a purse which had been slipped there by a sceptic; she also indicated the number of gold and silver coins contained in each end of the purse. After this experiment, she announced that she was about to tell successively what each person present possessed about him most remarkable, which she actually did. She also perceived, through a screen, that Madame Petetin on going out took her husband's cloak, and made him discover the mistake.

The first I address is taken from the Gazette de Santé, and recorded in the Journal de Paris of the 24th Brumaire, an. XIV.

"The public journals," says the editor, "are now reaching the prodigies of a female somnambule of Lyons, who, with her eyes shut, can read a sealed letter, tell the thoughts, and give an account of the sensations, &c., of another person. The most singular circumstance is, that this woman is of genteel extraction, and that, on account of her superior education and independent fortune, she is far above the suspicion of simulating those extraordinary scenes; in addition to which, the most eminent personages, the most learned physicians and scientific men of Lyons, appear perfectly convinced of the reality of these prodigies."

M. Deleuze, in his memoir on the Lucidity of Somnambules, gives the following relation:—

"A young patient had read to me, with great fluency, seven or eight lines, notwithstanding her eyes were so covered as to be of no use to her, after which she was obliged to stop, saying she felt much fatigued. Some days after, wishing to convince a few sceptics, whom he could not take with him to the somnambule's residence, he presented to her a box of pasteboard, perfectly shut, and in which were written these words—amié sans bonheur. She held the box in her hand for a long time, experienced much fatigue, and said that the first word was amié; but that she could not read the others. On being urged to make fresh attempts, she consented, and said, as she returned the box, 'I cannot see it plainly; however, I think that the next two words are boné, douceur.' She made a mistake in these two words; but, as we see, these words had a very great resemblance with those that were written."

We hear of another patient who could read the address of a letter in somebody's pocket; but, unfortunately, not the inside. This was a defect in the man, for much more may be accomplished; as in this case cited by Mr Chardet:—

"The somnambule having recovered her senses, (for she had just been seized by syncope,) called for some water; I went to take a decanter from the mantelpiece, but it was empty. I took it, for the purpose of filling it, into the dining-room, where I had observed a filtering tank; I turned the cock, but no water came; and yet the tank was full. I thought that the cock should first be unstopped, and I did it with a piece of wood which I split off; but still the water did not come out. I then supposed that the air-hole of the reservoir was obstructed, and, as it was very narrow, it was necessary again to split the piece of wood in order to introduce it; but I was not more successful than before. At last I resolved upon filling my decanter with unfiltered water. My somnambule was still in the same attitude in which I left her. She had seen me all the time, had followed all my movements, and detailed them to me without omitting a single circumstance, notwithstanding there was between her and me two walls and a parlour—and my actions included a number of minute details which nobody could have imagined.

M. Francour, a distinguished mathematician, read, in 1826, to the Société Philomatique, a memoir, wherein he stated that "He had been at Aix, in company with respectable physicians—namely, with Dr Despine, chief physician of the watering establishment, who informed him that he (Dr Despine) had witnessed, for months together, the singular phenomenon of the transference of the senses, and he thought he would serve the cause of truth by making it known to the Society."

In the first observation of this memoir, we read that the patient had the power of seeing, hearing, and smelling with her fingers. The second is much more curious; it was made on the daughter of a certain gentleman, who enjoys the esteem of the whole town of Grenoble, where he lives in retirement. He did all in his power to conceal the malady of his daughter, which gave him great pain—and constantly refused to admit visitors inquiring after her.

Among the various states presented by this malady, and minutely described by Dr Despine, he insists, in particular, on somnambulism; and I shall here transcribe, verbatim, the most positive passage on the transposition of the function of sight.

"Not only did our patient hear with the palms of her hands, but we saw her read without the help of her eyes; and with the extremities of her fingers, which she rapidly agitated over the page which she intended to read, and without touching it, as if to multiply the feeling surfaces; she thus read a whole page of a novel by Montholieu.

"At other times we saw her single out of a parcel containing upwards of thirty letters, one which had been pointed out to her; and read on the dial, and through the glass of a watch, the hour indicated by the hands; she also wrote several letters, corrected them by a second reading, marking the mistakes as she went on, and copied one of them, word for word. During all these operations, a thick pasteboard screen intercepted, in the most effectual manner, every visual ray that might have reached the eye.

"The same phenomenon took place at the sole of the feet, and at the epigastrium; and the patient seemed to experience a painful sensation when simply touched."

In the sixth degree of magnetising, the highest yet known, coming events, as we have seen, are clearly foreseen and predicted, and this faculty is limited neither by time nor space.

M. Dupotet has the power of magnetising, at a distance, those unconscious of his presence; and Dr Elliotson asserts his belief in the existence of this remote influence, which has never been tried in the North London Hospital.

Nothing in Animal Magnetism is so perfectly authenticated as the profound, unnatural sleep, the entire insensibility of the patient under it, and the impossibility of recovering him, save by magnetic influence, until a period of varied duration, elapses. All sorts of noises, tortures, and petty painful annoyances, have been tried in vain. The magnetic sleep cannot be broken. The case of the lady in Paris who had her breast-operated upon for cancer, while in a profound magnetic sleep, was mentioned in our article of 1834, and is cited here by the Baron Dupotet; and another case is given by him of a young farmer, in the department of the Gers, who consented to be thrown into a magnetic sleep, while a tumour of a very painful kind was removed from his thigh. He was magnetised by a Comte de Brivazac; remained motionless as a statue while the operation was going on; and, when brought out of the magnetic state, was asked whether he would submit to the operation, which he was astonished to learn was happily over. He had seen nothing, felt nothing, save in passing to stupor, M. de Brivazac laying the palm of his hand upon his forehead. Among M. Dupotet's patients in London was, or is, he says—

A young girl, or rather a child, for she is not twelve years of age, who is so susceptible of the magnetic influence that she almost instantly falls asleep; and the approximation of my fingers towards her causes a short and quick convulsive start, which seems to pervade her whole frame. In another case, a young lady, subjected to fits, experiences, under the magnetic action, convulsive motions of the shoulders and chest, which are, however, unattended with pain. A gentleman, also, who is to me a stranger, has recently attended at my rooms, to be magnetised for a paralysis of the left side of the face, which was caused by an abscess, which he suffered from five years ago. Under the magnetical action, the muscles of the face, especially those of the paralysed side, over which he has no command, are visibly contracted; the angles of his lips are drawn upwards, and his face assumes almost the character of a mask; and this effect is produced when the magnetic passes are made at a distance of ten or twelve feet from him, even though a screen, during the operation, be interposed between us.

A medical gentleman, who takes interest in Animal Magnetism, addressed a string of queries to the paralytic patient, who is stated to be a highly educated and intelligent gentleman named Wright. These replies strike us as among the most curious things in the book:—

Q. Are you, independent of the paralysis of the face, in sound health? Have you ever been affected with dyspepsia, palpitations of the heart, or any nervous affection? A. At present I am enjoying a very sound state of health. When my face was paralyzed, about five years ago, I had considerable mental anxiety, and great confinement, with a very high pulse, beating often 125 to 130 a minute.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet magnetised you for the first time, were you sensible of any immediate effect during the operation? A. Immediately upon the Baron Dupotet's commencing his manipulations, I felt physically affected by a stream of coldness.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet commences magnetising you, do you feel nervous, or possessed of any vague apprehension that some mysterious or unknown effect is likely to be produced? A. Having seen the effects produced on other patients, I was fully prepared to experience the same results, to which I attached notions of pleasure rather than of apprehension. The real effect was completely different from what I had expected.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet passes his hands to and fro before your face, does the monotonous movement before you induce any feeling of ennui or mental fatigue? A. No. The first marked physical sensation is an irritation of the diseased muscles of the face, and, almost at the same time, a convulsive closing of the eyes. Nearly the same results are experienced when I am magnetised upon the feet.—Q. During the operation, do you appear under an influence, which, independent of all such manipulations, sensibly affects you? A. Yes, entirely so.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet communicates this influence what effect has it on your physical sensations? Do you appear to acquire any new element or principle from without? A. I appear, as I have before said, to receive a coldness, which quickly operates to the expulsion of heat from the interior; being magnetised for some time, and all things being quiet, this heat is accompanied by great perspiration at all the extremities; for instance, the hands and the feet.—Q. During the operation, and while the paralyzed muscles of your face are contracting, are you perfectly conscious of everything which surrounds you? A. I am nearly as conscious as a man ordinarily is with his eyes closed. I cannot speak. Once or twice my consciousness has been much confined to myself and the magnetiser, having forgotten—I do not mean forgotten, but rather being abstracted from—all other objects.—Q. Do the objects and persons about you appear just the same as when you are under the magnetic influence; or do they appear as if seen through some different or new medium? A. I cannot answer this question experimentally. All I have to remark upon it is, that I can, for the most part, see, although dimly, the magnetiser's hand; this sight being rather that of feeling, than what we ordinarily term sight.—Q. During the operation, while under the magnetic influence, are you sensible of any exaltation of your mental faculties, either in respect to your perceptions or apprehensions of pleasure or pain? A. I know of no intellectual exaltation. I am quieted, and the longer the influence is continued, the more calm I become.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet magnetises you at a distance of six, eight, or twelve feet, or through a screen, is the effect which he produces equal in intensity to that which you experience when he is immediately before you? A. Yes. There seems to be no difference in the effects resulting either from distances or from interposed objects.—Q. When the Baron Dupotet, has established the magnetic influence, are you sensible of any loss of self-command? Do you feel in a manner subdued and passive under his control? A. Partially so. As I have said, I cannot speak, nor, when very powerfully influenced, have I been able to move. This is the physical influence. Intellectually I do not feel the magnetiser more powerful than myself. Morally, or feelingly, I am conscious of a sympathetic peacefulness being controlled, but not forcedly.—Q. You have heard of fascination, in the ordinary sense of the word? Does he rivet your attention so that you cannot escape from the influence? or do you intentionally yield yourself to it? A. The word fascination aptly describes the influence which the magnetiser exerts. With me it is not an intellectual fascination, but only physical and moral.—Q. Have you ever tried by a determined effort of will to resist the operation? and if so, what has been the result? A. Yes; and the result has been very painful; great exhaustion being produced, and prostration of the energies. The breathing was painfully affected, and a cold clammy sweat ejected from the extremities, very different from the glowing perspiration that I am ordinarily sensible of. I felt considerable agitation and loss of self-control, without finding any peaceful influence in its stead.—Q. How many times have you submitted to the operation? Do you think the effect of the magnetic influence increases with every successive sitting? A. Sixteen times, I think. The influence perceptibly increases, affecting me now more radically, while in the first instance my face was really pained by external contortions. The muscles are now more moved, but less apparently on the surface.—Q. Has the magnetic treatment at all affected your general health? Does it invigorate the system, or induce lassitude? A. I am not sensible of any difference in my general health. I have not slept very well for a few nights, but that might perhaps be attributable to other causes. My friends have remarked a degree of nervous irritation which is not altogether natural to me.—Q. Do you think the paralytic affection of your face better for the magnetic treatment you have undergone? A. Apparently there is but little difference. I seem to think there is a little more vitality in it.—Q. Has the operation of Animal Magnetism ever given rise to any unpleasant or disagreeable sensations? How do you feel after it has terminated? A. I am generally affected with a most comfortable perspiration. I am pleased to be magnetised rather than otherwise.

Independently of the natural influence of imagination in persons of an imaginative cast, placed in novel and singular circumstances, there really does not appear much in this. Probably Mr Wright never in his whole life before reflected so closely upon his own sensations, and the operations of his mind. The agency of the universal fluid has not been remarkable in him.

Second only to the father of the science, Mesmer, and in some respects before him, was his pupil, the Marquis de Puységur, who was the discoverer of the state of magnetic somnambulism. This gentleman's reputation for curing diseases by Animal Magnetism became so great among the peasantry of his own and the neighbouring estates, that, to save himself the trouble of going through the tedious and complicated evolutions of his master, which modern enlightened magnetisers have discarded, he magnetised an elm tree on his property, which, we believe, still retains its celebrity, if not its virtue. Ropes were hung to the branches; to these the peasants clung, and the desired effect was produced! M. Dupotet gives the following account of the discovery of the phenomena of magnetic somnambulism by Puységur.

It appears that, while magnetising his gardener, he observed him fall into a deep and tranquil sleep; and it then occurred to him that he would address some questions to him, as he might have done to a natural somnambulist. He did so; and the man immediately answered him with much intelligence and clearness, upon which he persevered in the magnetic operation, and soon found that he possessed an extraordinary psychical influence over him; that all further manual movements were unnecessary; and that, without speaking, he could mentally communicate with and control his ideas. "It is from this simple man," says he, "this tall and stout rustic, twenty-three years of age, enfeebled by disease, or rather, by sorrow, and, therefore, the more pre-disposed to be affected by any great natural agent—it is from this man, I repeat, that I derive instruction and knowledge. He is no longer, when in the magnetic state, a peasant, who can hardly utter a single sentence—he is a being to describe whom I cannot find a name. I need not speak, I have only to think before him, when he instantly hears and answers me. Should anybody come into the room, he sees him, if I desire it, and addresses him, and says what I wish him to say; not, indeed, exactly as I dictate to him, but as truth requires. When he wants to add more than I deem it prudent strangers should hear, I stop the flow of his ideas, and of his conversation, in the middle of a word, and give his thoughts quite a different turn." He then adds—"I know of no subject more profound, more lucid, than this peasant in his crisis. I have several patients approaching his state of lucidity, but none equal him." "If you do not come, my dear friend, you will not see my extraordinary man; for his health is almost quite restored. He has, however, told me, when in a crisis, that he should still need to be touched, and pointed out to me the days, Thursday, Saturday, and Monday, for the last time, &c. I continue to make use of the happy power which I owe to M. Mesmer; and every day I bless him, for I am very useful, and produce many salutary effects on all the sick in the neighbourhood. They flock round my tree; there were more than one hundred and thirty of them this morning. There is a continual procession in the country. I pass two hours at my tree every morning. It is the best baquet possible; not a leaf of it but communicates health; all feel more or less good effects from it. You will be delighted to see the picture of humanity which this presents. I have only one regret; it is, that I cannot touch all who come. But my man, or rather my intelligence, sets me at ease. He teaches me what conduct I should adopt. According to him, it is not necessary for me to touch every one: a look, a gesture, a wish, is sufficient; and it is one of the most limited peasants of the country that teaches me this. When he is in a crisis, I know nothing more profound, more prudent, and more clear-sighted (clairvoyant) than he."

According to the historian of the science, M. Deleuze, the somnambule, as we are glad to learn, is not under the absolute will of the magnetiser, but only in "Regard to everything that cannot hurt him, and that he does not feel contrary to his ideas of justice and truth.

"He feels the will of his magnetiser.

"He perceives the magnetic fluid.

"He sees, or rather he feels, the interior of his body, and that of others; but he commonly observes only those parts of it which are not in their natural state, and disturbs the harmony of the whole.

"He recovers the recollection of things he had forgot when awake.

"He has prophetic visions and sensations, which may be erroneous in some circumstances, and which are limited in their extent.

"He expresses himself with astonishing facility.

"He is not free from vanity.

"He becomes more perfect of his own accord for a certain time, if guided wisely. He wanders when he is ill directed.

"When he returns to the natural state, he entirely loses the recollection of all the sensations, and all the ideas which he has had in the state of somnambulism.

"The magnetic somnambule perceives innumerable relations in all objects; he perceives them with an extreme rapidity, and in one minute runs through a train of ideas which to us would require many hours. Time seems to vanish before him; he himself wonders at the variety and rapidity of his perceptions; he is inclined to ascribe them to the inspiration of another intelligence. He now sees this new being within himself; he considers himself, while in somnambulism, as a different being from himself when awake; he speaks of himself in the third person, as of somebody whom he knows, submits to his remarks—to whom he gives advice, and for whom he feels more or less sympathy. He now hears an intelligence, a soul speaking to him, and revealing what he wishes to know."

According to other hints, the charm will not work when anything impure or unholy is in presence; which may, perhaps, account for some of Dupotet's failures in London. It is to us not a little remarkable that self-intuition has never yet led to the discovery of any new medical remedy, though the uses of Jesuits' bark, calomel, tartar emetic, opium, and a hundred other medicaments, have been found out by men merely in their humble natural state; and it is shrewdly, though not, perhaps, justly remarked, that the lucid vision of the magnetic prophets never penetrates beyond their actual narrow experiences. The French peasant, "in prescribing, is lavish of small-soup, and ptisanes made of herbs, which have virtue in the eyes of his associates and gossips; the German takes to the popular pharmacopœia of fatherland; and we may venture to predict that Lucy Clarke, or any other English hierophant, will invest calomel, salts, rosemary, and peppermint, with all the virtues necessary to gull visitors." It is fair to state, that, however gullible visitors may be, no one has breathed a syllable of suspicion of wilful delusion, or collusion, as possible in any of the experiments witnessed in London. Lucy Clarke is the patient of Baron Dupotet, to whom she was taken by Mr George Denton, surgeon. She was treated magnetically, for convulsion fits, by her medical attendant; who, finding her so susceptible of the magnetic influence, was induced to place her under the care of the Baron. Mr Denton states:—

For some time I was constantly present while the Baron magnetised Lucy Clarke, and heard her repeatedly state, long before the 20th of October, that that was the day her æton should be removed, but that the Baron should continue to magnetise her until the 30th of November, and that then her fits would be cured. Accordingly, the æton was removed on the day above stated. In the month of November she received a very severe blow on the head, which she said would protract her cure one month.

The girl has had no fits since the day she was first magnetised, and, until this last month, has taken no medicines. The Baron still magnetises her once a week.

This statement is dated 5th May. The feats of Dr Elliotson have become as remarkable in inducing the earlier stages of magnetising as those of M. Dupotet. On the 2d June, in presence of a crowded audience, among whom were several specimens of the hereditary wisdom, with a sprinkling of Members of the Lower House, and several literary and scientific characters, he put two epileptic girls through the whole magnetic exercise. One of the girls is the same damsel who prophesied her own complete cure on the 14th June. While the professor was speaking, —(we quote from the Sun newspaper)—

Mr Wood, who, we understood, first drew Dr Elliotson's attention to the practicability of exercising the Mesmeric influence, moved his hands behind the backs of the girls, and they fell each into a state of profound sleep. They were then pinched, violently shaken, and pulled by the arms, not only by the Professor, but by several of the noblemen and gentlemen around, without manifesting the slightest degree of sensibility. But, by breathing upon their hands, they were instantly awakened, when they exhibited a delirious vivacity and boldness, in remarkable contrast to their gentleness in the natural state. In the elder girl, the contrast was most striking—she sang, whistled, and jested with Dr Elliotson and with Lords Wilton and Stanhope, with the familiarity of a playful and petted child amongst her own family, and she displayed not only great archness, but wit and humour. In the midst of her liveliest sallies, however, Dr Elliotson, suddenly pointed the fore-finger of one hand at her forehead, and on the instant she stood immovable as a statue, and evidently in a state of utter unconsciousness. He then pointed a finger at each upper eye-lid, and, as he raised the fingers (several inches from her face) the lids rose also, to the utmost extent, exposing the whole eye-ball—and so they remained fixed, the body standing motionless. In the same manner, pointing one finger opposite the upper lip, and another opposite the chin, he moved the one finger upwards and the other downwards, with a quick movement, and the mouth opened; and she stood still, in that posture, until he breathed upon her face; when she suddenly started into consciousness, and began to dance, sing, and jest as before.

She was afterwards repeatedly struck motionless, on the instant, in every variety of attitude which, in her delirious playfulness, she might happen to assume; and this was done not only by Dr E. himself, but frequently when he was not aware of it, and whilst she was talking to him—by a single movement of the hand, behind her back, by Lord Wilton, Lord Northland, and others, who seemed to enjoy the influence of their newly-discovered Mesmeric powers. When she was seated in the chair, and thrown into sleep, her hands lying in her lap, Dr E. extending his arms, placed a hand opposite each of hers, and then drawing his hands away, he raised them upwards and inwards towards his head. Her hands followed his until she had raised them to the level of her head, when, with a convulsive movement, she fell back in the chair, in a state of coma, or torpor, more profound than the previous sleep. We observed that this phenomenon followed every experiment in which she was caused to make any physical exertion. When she was seated and asleep, Mr Wood, being behind her, placed his hands near hers, and as he drew his away, hers followed them—as he raised his, she raised hers. In the same manner, as she sat asleep, her eyes being closed, Lord Wilton placed his left hand opposite to her right, and, as he drew his away, hers followed, as far as her arm would extend, apparently attracted, as a needle would follow a powerful magnet. Whilst she sat asleep, with her body leaning forward, Mr Wood, being still behind her, pointed his hand to the back of her head, but at a distance of three or four feet, and, as he retired further back, her head was raised slowly, and moved backwards, in the direction of his hand, as far as the top rail of the chair would allow, when she made a convulsive effort to rise, and sank into a state of lethargy. In the same manner when feet were pointed opposite to hers, and withdrawn, hers followed them; and this species of attraction was exercised upon her with the same effects by the surrounding spectators, as well as by the medical practitioners. Numerous other experiments were made to elicit similar phenomena, both with this patient and her sister.

Professor Mayo has, in the Medical Gazette, given a very lucid and minute account of the magnetic prowess of Dr Elliottson, in producing and alternating, as above described, magnetic sleep and magnetic somnambulism; or, as he terms these two states, the Mesmeric trance, one condition of which is analogous to natural sleep, and the other to natural somnambulism. He was an unbeliever, and avows that with him authority went for nothing. He is now the convert of his own senses. He does not, as we have stated, believe in clairvoyance; for of that he has had no evidence, no experience. Having advanced so far in belief in one six months, M. Dupotet conceives that the Professor dogmatizes too hastily, when he repudiates lucid vision, prevision, or prophecy in fact, and very gravely and deliberately affirms that "There is no fact in the whole history of the experimental sciences better and more clearly authenticated than the occurrence of clairvoyance. I have myself," he says, "repeatedly witnessed it; and I have no doubt that, as M. Mayo's experience increases, he will do so likewise. . . . The professors of Animal Magnetism do not pretend that clairvoyance is an ordinary phenomenon; on the contrary, they aver that it is only occasionally developed in the highest degree of the magnetic state." It is not surprising that the professors are unwilling to give up clairvoyance. It is, undoubtedly, the most attractive feature of the new doctrines, and that which will the most rapidly lead to their promulgation. It stimulates and supplies food to the imagination.

The practical advantages hitherto obtained in the curative art, from the Mesmeric influence, do not appear very remarkable. In difficult and painful surgical operations, there is a prospect of Mesmeric coma forming a useful ally of the operator, where the patient is nervous, or wants mental fortitude; but the occult power of clairvoyance opens up a new world to the psychologist, much more wonderful than that laid open to the physiologist by the experiments lately made at the North London Hospital, and sets wide the door to all manner of delusion and quackery.

To this curious subject, we must now bid a hasty and abrupt farewell, confessing great scepticism, and, on many points, total unbelief, but respectfully waiting for more well-authenticated facts.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Conder's View of all Religions.*

WE have given this work the true title. The view is emphatically Mr Josiah Conder's; and it is probable that the members of different religious denominations may complain that he has either mistaken or mistated their peculiar tenets. The Roman Catholics, the Unitarians, and the Quakers will be the most ready to complain. Mr Conder is himself eminently orthodox; and he conceives that, as the historian or expositor of the opinions of the many sects of Christendom, to conceal his own opinions would have been fruitless hypocrisy. He does not therefore pretend to be a merely neutral, nor, upon so momentous a subject as soundness of belief, even an impartial reporter. He has not, he avows, "attempted to speak of sects as sects, or heresies as heresies;" and whatever the great body of his readers may think of it, he vindicates the course he has chosen on grave and high grounds. Mr Conder makes out a strong case for the necessity of his work, from the many and great deficiencies of those previously written upon the subject. Of Evans' "Sketch of all Religions," he thinks meanly, and not much more favourably of its successors. Considerable pains and research have been bestowed on his work, which will be highly prized by the numerous body in whose religious opinions he participates, and which may be perused with advantage by those desirous of information, or who, accepting knowledge upon his authority, may yet, at their own judgment, either reject or accept the opinion of the writer. The obtrusion of these opinions will be considered either the cardinal virtue or the radical blemish of the book. To give a genuine and authentic history of all religions would require a cyclopaedia, to which able and trustworthy impartial persons of all the denominations should contribute. In the closing sentence of Mr Conder's preface, we can heartily concur—"No one need despair, with the Bible in his hands, of ascertaining for himself, under its various disguises, the genuine lineaments of true Christianity."

Southey's Collected Poems. Vols. VI. and VIII.

The Sixth Volume of Southey's collected Poems has appeared. It contains most of the smaller pieces—the humorous, the grotesque, and the legendary. We have also that popular favourite, the tragic Tale of "Mary the Maid of the Inn;" and, without a word of annotation, the "Battle of Blenheim," which, with the "March to Moscow," gives, in a narrow compass, nearly the whole philosophy of War and Glory. The eighth volume of the series gives us "The Curse of Kehama," that mythological Indian poem, so singularly and splendidly versified, from which the student will acquire a knowledge of the Hindoo faith, in the same felicitous way that Chatham learned English history from the dramas of Shakespeare.

St John's Masterpieces of English Prose Literature.

A new volume is devoted to the works of Sir Thomas Browne, and contains at least that philosopher's masterpieces—Religio Medici, namely, and the discourse on Urn Burial. The admiration of Coleridge and Lamb for this quaint, imaginative, and pregnant writer, has made his name familiar to many who know little more about him. These may now easily, if such be their desire, become more intimately acquainted with the English Montaigne. Mr St John, if less enthusiastic than some of Sir Thomas Browne's admirers appears to us more truly to appreciate his merits. One could wish that the knight of Norwich were alive now, to discuss learnedly of Mesmerism and phrenology.

Becket's Miscellanies.

Among the late reprints, are "Dramatic and Prose Miscellanies," by Andrew Becket, a veteran litterateur of ninety, who was "a pretty fellow in his day." The work is printed in two handsome volumes, and is kindly edited by Dr Beattie, who has prefixed an interesting memoir of a man whose life has been devoted to letters, and who, deprived of sight, and on the verge of ninety years, "still quotes his favourite authors, and converses on literary subjects with great point and vivacity." To be brief, a respectable and very aged gentleman, an accomplished critical scholar, and possessed of literary talents of no mean order, comes before the public as a candidate for fame, and a suitor for some useful portion of that pecuniary reward to which he is doubly entitled, by the claims of genius and of pecuniary distress, occasioned by no errors of his own.

China, its State and Prospects. By W. H. Medhurst of the London Missionary Society.*

Everything respecting that curious and oldest civilized branch of the human family, the three hundred mil-

None of our Chinese fellow creatures, seems to us so interesting that we had proposed to have analysed this missionary journal at some length. As we have not yet laid this design aside, we merely recommend the work in general terms, to those who take the same interest with ourselves in the most remarkable race on the eastern division of the face of the globe. It combines a general view of the social, moral, and religious condition of the Chinese people, with the traveller's personal narrative.

The Man about Town.

For the best of the Ephemerals, excerpting "Shakespeare and his Friends," we are indebted to our old and pleasant literary acquaintance, Mr Cornelius Webbe, who mellows and brightens as he goes along, and, in artist phrase, shows more breadth than in his earlier productions. His "Man about Town," a series of papers hovering between the styles of Leigh Hunt and Charles Lamb, yet marked by striking individuality, is just such a work as England alone can produce—a true or lineal successor of the humours of the Spectators and Tatlers, adapted to a later age. We were wrong to class those sketches with the ephemerals. They ought to last through a long day—an extended copyright. We are delighted with many of the humours of Mr Hippy, and Sampson Simpson, and take exceedingly to the Old Watchman, and Charley Stump. But why will Englishmen, Londoners especially, persist in perpetrating Scotch, making our sweet Doric hideous? There is but one Englishman can do it—and that is Hood. Mr Webbe's Scotch is atrocious, beyond benefit of clergy.

The Greenwich Pensioners.

More salt-water books! Had we not almost resolved to protest against our entertaining literature undergoing farther "sea-change," and often into things neither "rich nor rare," we might have relished those tight "yarns" of Lieutenant Hatchway, some of which have an air of strong reality about them, as if genuine bits of life. After all, those "who go down to the sea in ships," do require something to beguile the tedium of their lives, and the publishers are kind in providing for their mental wants. Where, formerly, with grog and tobacco, Dibdin's Songs and "Roderick Random" were the sole floating literary appointments, we may now see a respectable collection of amusing nautical fictions. And a selection of sea tales is certainly as necessary a preparation for a long voyage as any other means of harmless recreation. We are, therefore, pleased, on the whole, with the increase of salt-water books, when they keep to their proper element, though, like the great majority of landmen, we beg to be excused the reading of one half of them. "Greenwich Pensioners" is none of the worst.

The Perth and Dundee Steamboat Companion.

Is an unpretending, but a useful and amusing guide through much beautiful scenery, and embodies many interesting local traditions and family legends. The ingenious author has been peculiarly civil to the new-sprung houses included within the range of the banks of the Tay and Earn, and has not neglected the literature connected with the districts which he celebrates.

Fives' Introduction to the French Language.

Second Edition.

We pass over our general rule of not noticing elementary school-books in favour of this little work, which we consider a simple, well-arranged, and useful first-reading book, whether for schools or adult pupils. A dictionary containing the words used in the reading lessons is appended to them. All the lessons are selected from classic French authors, though some of them have been condensed by the compiler.

We notice a new edition of another standard school-book, BUTLER'S GEOGRAPHY OF THE GLOBE, revised and enlarged by J. Rowbotham. There is no book of the kind more accurate and comprehensive, or more deserving the attention of teachers.

A series of school-books, comprehending a Spelling-book, a Vocabulary, and an Instructive Reader, by Ingram Cobbin, A.M., is also worth the attention of teachers, who wish to combine for their pupils economy and utility.

Dr Brown on the Law of Christ respecting Civil Obedience, especially in the Payment of Tribute. Parts I. and II.

These valuable tracts have a personal and private history. Actuated by religious principle, Dr Brown, one of the leading Dissenting ministers of Edinburgh, refused, along with many of his fellow-citizens, payment of the obnoxious impost called Annuity Money—viz., the fund levied for the maintenance of the clergy of the Established Church of the town, from Catholics and Dissenters of all denominations, as well as from Jews, Infidels, and Mahomedans. His furniture was distrained; and this passive resistance was severely assailed and vituperated by Mr Robert Haldane, who himself had for forty years figured as a dissenter from the Church, and the founder of some new sect of, we believe, Baptists. This unlooked-for auxiliary came like a galewind to the clergy. The founder of a new sect of separatists defended the anomalous tribute, while very many persons in the bosom of the Church condemned the principle, and resisted payment. The letters of Mr Haldane were diligently circulated by those whom he had so materially aided in volunteering as the forlorn hope of the defenceless Annuitants. It left to themselves, Mr Haldane's effusions could have excited no feeling, save pity, and some astonishment that, in Edinburgh, in the middle of the 19th century, such puerile bigotry still lingered among a few of the survivors of a darker generation. The Church of Rome, in her most imperious mood, could not have required more blind and limitless submission to her secular demands than Mr Haldane declared incumbent upon Dr Brown and every professing Christian in the community, to the demands of the Established ministers of Edinburgh; for the obnoxious Annuitants is a local impost, and forms no part of the general constitution of the Scottish Kirk. In defending himself from the extraordinary attack of Mr Haldane, Dr Brown was necessarily led into the discussion of the whole question of the Scriptural doctrine of civil obedience; and the world thus remains an ungrateful debtor to Mr Haldane's indiscreet zeal for an able and luminous exposition of the law of Christ, in opposition to the law of State Churches, whether Catholic or Protestant. Dr Brown has, indeed, done much to shew, "that neither the doctrine nor the law of Christ has any affinity to slavish principle; and that it is equally the dictate of revealed truth, sound reason, and enlightened policy, that, of all things, religion should be the most free." His triumphant argument will remain in pristine vigour long after the unjust impost has been abolished, and the calumnious misrepresentations in which it originated have been forgotten.

Hazlitt's and Haydon's Dissertations on Painting and the Fine Arts.

These masterly essays are reprinted from the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," in a neat, cheap volume, which will be precious to artists and the lovers of art. Hazlitt's comprehensive and exquisite Dissertation—whether it be considered as an analysis of the principles of the Fine Arts, or as an illustrative criticism on their masterpieces—is unrivalled in the language. It condenses the spirit of a hundred discourses, while it displays a depth and glow of feeling, and a delicacy of perception and taste, which, notwithstanding some paradoxes and prejudices, no other critic on art has reached. Mr Haydon's Essay is nearly a history of painting from the earliest periods. He is the fervid admirer of Grecian art. His history is continued down to our own day through all the eminent schools and styles. His criticism is more general than that of Hazlitt, who deals only with the principles of art and their results as they are seen in the great works still extant. With some discrepancies of opinion on particular matters, they entirely agree in considering societies and academies, and all sorts of spurious patronage, as wasteful obstructions to the Arts, and innumerable objects to their refinement and progress. Their joint labours in this volume ought to warn the young artist to avoid the trammels of academical, while they will enlighten his understanding, and tend to purge his taste.

Translation of Azara's History of the Quadrupeds of Paraguay, and the River La Plata.
By W. Perceval Hunter, Esq.

Don Felix de Azara, a native of Spain, long resident in South America, is known to British naturalists only by name, or at most through a bad translation of his works published in France, many years ago, and now out of print. He is, however, considered an author of the highest authority and value; and Mr Hunter has done a good deed in rescuing from speedy oblivion a work likely to prove acceptable to naturalists, and entirely new to the rest of the world. The translation is from the original Spanish. One volume only is published, but another is promised. Azara was not a mere closet naturalist. He saw what he describes. He received the works of Buffon with the most favourable prepossession, and found them often vulgar, false, and erroneous. He did not, however, condemn Buffon, but those travellers and naturalists who had led him into error. The translated works, if valuable to the naturalist, are also not a little entertaining to the general reader. His translator has contributed many interesting notes; and, in what he terms additional notes, corrected mistakes, and brought up the work to the level of contemporary discovery. To accomplish this, he has freely and properly drawn upon tourists and travellers, and particularly on Audubon, to whom the translation is dedicated. These additional notes double the value of the work to modern students.

Prison Scenes and Narrative of Escape from France, &c. &c. By Seacombe Ellison.

These are the reminiscences of a detenu at Verdun, and the other places of parole, or the prisons, to which the clemency of Napoleon consigned the English either caught in France or upon the high seas. The latter was the situation of Mr Ellison, who was captured in the voyage homeward from the Bay of Honduras to Liverpool, his native place, some thirty-five years ago. He has now reluctantly yielded to the importunities of his friends, in relating his adventures and hair-breadth 'scapes. He was then, he says, a thoughtless, reckless seaman, wholly regardless of everything but the present moment. Now, he has become both wiser and better, in proof of which he refers to his work entitled "Raniam ovres Baptism," with which we have not the honour to be acquainted. He entertains, in particular, a most orthodox and English dialect of the French and all their ways; yet another compels him to relate many traits of kindness and real generosity found among those of that most un-English people with whom he came in contact when a stranger and a prisoner. Nor do his prepossessions affect the narrative of his adventures—which we have found exceedingly interesting, as all such narratives must be, when related with equal directness and simplicity. It is framed on Sterne's principle, "Take a single captive;" and, as the real story of a living man, is a happy illustration of the power of that principle.

The adventures of Peter Simple and his companion in a similar escape, are not more exciting than those of Ellison and his friends; and there are a few traits of good-heartedness, of genuine human sympathy, found especially among the honest Germans, which fiction cannot touch. As the author is, we presume, not in the habit of publishing a book every day, he has taken the opportunity of cramming a good many of his opinions and notions into an appendix, almost as large as the book itself. But, as these opinions are often sound and right, and refer to a life of which he has had considerable experience, though not quite germane to the matter of escape, they are perfectly welcome. From this extraneous source we take a picture of Liverpool while Mr Ellison was at his apprenticeship, and consequently not in the early ages. No town in the old world, and scarcely any one in America, has risen so rapidly. Mr Ellison's captain traded to Jamaica, calling at Madeira, the longest voyage then made out of the port, save to Africa. "Liverpool," he says, "was then comparatively in its infancy, and a foreign arrival was not an every-day occurrence. When the signal was made for one on Bidstone-bill, it was deemed all over the town, and the piers were crowded to see the stranger enter the Mersey; and, immediately her white sails were seen over the rock point, the old church bells struck up an exhilarating peal. As she touched the pier-head, the friends of the crew jumped on board to welcome them back again; and at night, at the hour the master was supposed to have gone to rest, a band of music regularly planted themselves at his door, to give him a serenade, in order to lull him to sleep, after the fatigues of his long voyage. Then the master of a foreigner was reckoned somebody in society, especially the master of a Guineaman, [as the slavers were then called,] who could vie with his employer in extravagance; to which dignity most of the sea-aspirants to riches looked." Mr Ellison does not disapprove of a little wholesome flogging for sailors; while for youthful offenders, and especially very young boys, whether afloat or on land, he considers moderate manual chastisement the best mode of corrective punishment. We can promise the reader an hour of genial interest in perusing this narrative, which is more than we could say for many works of far greater pretension.

Six Years in Biscay. By John Francis Bacon.

Those who take interest in the minute history of the interminable civil war in Spain, will peruse this work with profit, while the comprehensive introduction will probably be enough for the general reader. Some strange allegations are made against Louis Philippe, who is even accused of aiding the Prétender—i. e., Don Carlos—both by connivance and intrigue. The French jealousy of English commerce is set forth, and we are opportunely reminded, that, in the projected "commercial treaty" in favour of Great Britain, "the English minister will be particularly soft" if he allows himself to be gulled out of a single penny for the sake of such treaty. "Let the infamous slave-compact of 1817 be always borne in mind." By that treaty, Spain covenanted to abolish the slave-trade on receiving £400,000, another item to be added to the twenty millions. "Spain took the money which we were fools enough to give, and the trade went on as merrily as ever, and for all that the Spaniards did to prevent it." Mr Bacon places great hopes in the death of Don Carlos, whose life he declares not worth two years' purchase.

Memoirs of Sir William Knighton.

This book, if not quite a humbug, for it is authentic, will prove a provoking disappointment. What possible claim had Sir William Knighton on public attention, more than the thousand and one persons who fill the bills of mortality, save for his connexion with George the Fourth, in the King's latter years?—and on this sole subject of interest, the lips of the author of the Memoir are hermetically sealed. Sir William himself might have been prudently silent to his lady, who, according to modern usage, is his biographer. Those about the privacies of courts should have neither eyes, ears, nor tongues. Dr Knighton was a prudent, discreet, safe, getting-on town physician, who, by laudable perseverance, rather than anything like talent, raised himself from obscurity and poverty to wealth and distinction. He appears to have been faithful and assiduous to his royal master, who came to depend on, and confide in him, much as a worn-out peevish lady of quality, deserted by her friends, does on her confidential waiting-maid. He seems to have been worthy of his master's regard; and he did not come into his service until the King had few disgraceful confidences to make. The work is of the most meagre kind in every respect—but shews that Sir William was a good husband and father, and a respectable member of society. Among the letters published to the glory of the memory of the confidential attendant, are some from Sir Walter Scott, which Mr Lockhart may rightly have considered as not in the least ornamental, since none of them appear in Sir Walter's Life. In one of them, Sir Walter volunteers the rather equivocal office of transmitting, under the seal of strict security, information concerning the political or party condition of Scotland; not to the King's ministers, Tory though they were, but to the individual having the royal ear. We hope the King's confidant declined the offer in his master's name.

Union; or, The Divided Church made one. By the Rev. John Harris, author of "Mammon," &c.

The popularity of this writer is creditable to the age. He does not flatter it, he does not seek its approbation by vulgar arts; he neither menaces nor cajoles that great section of the public whom he more directly addresses, and who are supposed to be peculiarly susceptible to certain influences. We have not studied the volume sufficiently to ascertain the basis and limits of the author's principle—who are to be welcomed and who excluded in knitting up in the bonds of love the fractional parts of the disjointed Christian body. But, in dipping into the treatise here and there, we see so much to admire, that we, without delay, recommend what seems like oil poured in season on those heaving waters which never rose more furiously than now. Our readers may gather some notion of the loving and catholic spirit of the work, even from a few scattered sentences—as this on the intolerance of the Protestant Reformers:—"It might have been hoped that the Reformers, who had themselves been scourged by intolerance from the Church of Rome, would have jealously guarded against its intrusion into the new churches. But, alas! the demon possessed them. Love was the first sacrifice immolated on the altar of Truth. Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, and Knox protected their creeds, so far as they had power, with temporal penalties; and even some of those who were driven by intolerance from England to America, commenced a persecution against the Quakers, not less furious than that from which they themselves had fled. . . . Angels rejoice over one sinner that repenteth; but in every religious community, the spirit of intolerance exults more in a proselyte from another church, than a convert from the world. By 'the honour of Christ,' it [intolerance] still means the interest of its own party; by 'Christian charity,' the love of that party; and by 'Scriptural union,' the subjugation of Christendom to the cherished peculiarities of that party. . . . We do not ask the objector to sacrifice his opinions, but only his unchristian bigotry. We do not ask the Independent to become an Episcopalian, nor the Episcopalian to become an Independent; we do not ask the Calvinist to change sides with the Arminian, nor the Baptist with the Pædo-Baptist; but only to exchange the visible expressions of that love, which they ought mutually to cherish as heirs together of the grace of life. . . . 'I,' said Baxter, and the sentiment was worthy the inspired pen of the seraphic John, 'I can as willingly be a martyr for love as for any article of the creed.' But in his insatuated zeal for a punctilio or a party, the objector [to union] appears to forget that there is such an article as love in his creed, or such a doctrine as love in the Bible. He defends some little angle or ornament in the temple of Truth, at the expense of one of the pillars. He contends for the letter—or rather, perhaps, for a letter—of the truth in a way which tramples on the spirit which pervades the whole."

It is scarcely necessary to remark that there must still be Protestant sects excluded from this Christian union, while difference upon essential articles of faith takes place of other religious tests. While Dr Chalmers is sounding the trumpet ecclesiastic in the willing ears of Tory legislators, this passage comes so pat that we cannot resist it. "Even the political quiet of the country is disturbed by the broils of Christians; great civil interests are neglected; the organization of a system of National Education is delayed; the movements of the Legislature are thwarted and thrown into confusion; and important questions of humanity and good government are compelled to wait till the intended peace-makers of the world have adjusted their own quarrels, and agreed among themselves." The Legislature will, we fear, wait long enough if it wait for this millennial period; but not less is the merit of the author whose eloquent and Christian appeal would hasten it on.

Side by side with Mr Harris's excellent book, on our table, lies "The Report of the Central Education Society," in which we notice this description of an infant school at Stoke-Newington, which shows something like the germ of a genuine Christian union. "The children are all happy; loving and confiding in their kind, indulgent teachers; and affectionate, amiable, and sympathizing towards each other. But what afforded most pleasure in contemplating this school, was the fact, that in so small a number here assembled, some of the parents of the children are of the Church of England, some Quakers, some Independents, and some Unitarians. Yet the Christian religion is taught to all the children"—and now comes the miracle—"In a manner approved of by all the parents. There is then a common ground on which children of all denominations may meet, and learn Christianity and brotherly love at the same time." Is there no such common ground for all the parents?

The Christian Church considered in relation to Unity and Sobriety. By the Author of "Hearts of Thought."

The subject of this treatise is precisely similar to that of Mr Harris, noticed above. So is its spirit and tendency; which, on the whole, are praiseworthy, pure, and elevated. Yet, as people of the world, and seeing more with the world's keen eyes than those living apart from secular affairs, we would earnestly warn well-intentioned writers on this subject against anything which may excite suspicion that their exhortations to the Unity of the Church of Christ, "the holy Catholic Church," may not mean the organization of a formidable sectarian confederacy.

The Age of the Earth Considered Geologically and Historically. By William Rhind, Member of the Royal College of Surgeons, and Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh.

Perhaps it would be as well that men of science waited a little longer for more facts, more discoveries, and broader data, before they began to dogmatize, in any shape, on the subject of geology in its debatable phrases. Mr Rhind decidedly takes the orthodox side of the controversy. There is, indeed, much of this treatise which may rather be considered a pleading or argument, than an exposition of discovery, or a history of the science. This pleading has the merit of earnestness and apparent strong conviction in the author's own mind. Mr Rhind happens to be in good company. Dr Cockburn, the very Reverend Dean of York, has almost (simultaneously) published a short and pithy "Letter to the Learned and Reverend Professor Buckland," in which he takes the same side of the question, supporting it with even more zeal. We merely announce these publications, leaving their contents to the judgment of those who take interest in the controversy.

The Family Library, No. LXI. The Life of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden. By J. F. Hollings. Tegg & Son.

This memoir forms an interesting morsel of modern history. It is preceded by a brief but comprehensive view of the early annals of Sweden, which may serve all the purposes of ordinary readers. The author is candid and impartial; and, in tracing the career of a real hero, continually engaged in triumphant wars, he is not over-dazzled by the brilliancy of his achievements, which he describes impartially, retaining his philosophic composure undisturbed. These wars, if not the most stupendous, were certainly the most chivalrous and picturesque of modern times; the principal actors in them have become the personages of romance and poetry, and the arts have contributed to exalt their heroism and aggrandize their memory; yet the chronicler of the deeds of Gustavus and Wallenstein, and of their subordinate captains and chiefs, can, at the close, dispassionately say—

It should never be forgotten, and it is a truth which it may neither be inappropriate nor unnecessary to repeat, after the display of much adapted to excite the imagination and enlist he heart in favour of what is in itself pernicious, false, and hollow—that, imposing as may be fancied the real excellencies of the triumphant warrior, pursuing his course in the light of victory, amidst the acclamations of an applauding world, and armed with the thunder of physical power in defence of the violated rights and liberties of oppressed nations—there is a character which, when weighed in the balance whence everything calculated to dazzle and mislead the senses will be rigorously rejected, will be pronounced, by the evidence of heavenly truth itself, (if indeed the opposite character of each can admit of a momentary counterpoise,) of infinitely greater value—a character whose conquests are transient—whose victories, if uncelebrated by the voice of time, will assuredly be hailed by the blessings of eternity; and which, if unknown and unappreciated in a state of nature, is among the first fruits of that influence by which nature is adorned, and fitted for a better state of existence—which opposes meekness to persecution, blessing to reviling, and, separating the commissioned agent of evil from the trial of patience in which he is necessarily employed, is circumscribed in the exercise of its charity and beneficence but by the boundaries of human existence.

This is an admirable spirit in which to conclude the history of fierce wars for religion, attended by brilliant victories, and the grandest achievements of heroes. The author hopes "that the world is fast approaching that period in its destinies, when the name of war shall exist but among the reminiscences of things that are past, and when the array of nation against nation, and the desolation occasioned by licensed hatred and violence, shall be regarded as the geologist contemplates the terrible indications of past convulsions, which, during the course of unrecorded cycles, may have shaken to its centre the ponderous mass of the globe he inhabits, but have no longer a place in the list of existing phenomena." All that he hopes for his hero, "The bulwark of the Protestant religion," is that, while the heartless ambition of other great warriors excites indignation, the name of Gustavus Adolphus may awaken the softer feelings of pity.

Maxon has just published a neat, cheap edition of Rogers' "Italy," studded with wood-engraved vignettes and tail-pieces, consisting of classic groups and scenes, and gruesque cupids, roughly executed, but sketched with taste and spirit, by eminent artists. The volume makes a nice addition to, we shall not say the library, but what is more important, to the sitting-room collection.

PAMPHLETS AND TRACTS.

Mr Smith, of the Inner Temple, has, in a letter to a magistrate of Middlesex, pointed out what he considers means for removing the evils of the silent and separate system of prison discipline, and securing its advantages. He anticipates that, after the evidence given before the transportation committee last session, that mode of punishment must be abandoned. This gives the question much more importance. He is favourable to Bentham's plan of a Panopticon prison, which we believe was only abandoned without fair trial, from some pique conceived by George III. against the inventor. An engraving of this kind of inspecting prison is affixed to the letter—which we recommend to the perusal of those interested in the subject. It is one of vast interest to society at all times; and, if the transportation of criminals cease, one of urgent necessity; and, although Lord John Russell pleads poverty just now, the legislature may, perhaps, discover that a model prison is quite as important to the country as a new palace, or an extravagant Civil List.

An Historical Review of the Poor and Vagrant Laws, Displays considerable research, and brings forward much curious information. The writer is the determined enemy of the new Poor-Law.

Lecture on Education.

Mr T. W. Pigg, of Norwich, has published the substance of a sensible address to the Norwich Mechanics' Institution, on National Education and Lord Brougham's bill, which bill, "with a few minor exceptions," he considers worthy of acceptance. We notice this pamphlet, mainly to be enabled to repeat that the extracts from Mr Wyse's volume, cited in this Magazine, were correctly given; so that, if the author of the address believes Mr Wyse's plan objectionable on the authority of these extracts, he may rely on their authenticity. But let him refer to the original work, and see the good along with the evil of Mr Wyse's scheme. We hope that gentleman will himself, ere this, have seen reason to modify some of his opinions.

Reports of Lectures, delivered at the Chapel in South Place, Finsbury, by the Rev. W. J. Fox,

Are appearing from time to time in little pamphlets. The peculiar opinions and the abilities of the eloquent author are too well known to make remark necessary. The lectures—or such of them as we have seen—are on topics of vital interest; and they judiciously avoid sectarian tenets. One is on RIGHT and EXPEDIENCY, on which every enlightened Radical, whatsoever be his religious opinions, will find Mr Fox right orthodox. We are strongly tempted to quote the concluding pages of the lecture on The Three Ideas of Christianity; but what need borrowing from a sixpenny publication, only to exhibit an unfair, because mutilated view of the author's opinions?

Maternal Instructions on the Rite of Confirmation.

This little work is the production of a lady, who regrets that young persons are not sufficiently instructed in the important fact that the Church of England "acts in all her observances and functions, under the authority of a divine commission, derived from Christ himself; and evidenced by a strict adherence to the apostolical model of the Primitive Church." What more would people have?

Young Men; or, an Appeal to Society on their Behalf. By the Rev. Stephen Davis.

The graceless youths for whose benefit this work is meant, will, we fear, be apt to call some of it twaddle. Its aim is to make them more moral, more religious, better churchmen; and, perhaps, more submissive subjects. The appeal for juvenile improvement, is made to all classes: to the legislature, to magistrates, to ministers, to masters, to women. The author would have a British and Foreign Young Man's Society, organized like the Anti-Slavery or Bible Societies. He offers many useful hints; and one is compelled to respect his purpose, even while doubting of the full efficiency of some of the means he suggests. Others deserve unqualified approbation. The writer has assumed some appalling facts, and related some anecdotes, on what seems to us very questionable authority.

Hints for the Table,

Is an entertaining little commonplace book, in which, without any attempt at classification, the keeper has noted down all sorts of things, not exactly in apple-pie, but rather in sea-pie order; and then printed it in 167 pages.

The Young Lady's Book of Botany.

A nice and very pretty introduction to a fascinating science, illustrated by neatly-coloured engravings of favourite flowers, which, we doubt not, will be found a great recommendation to this little elementary treatise. The flowers are, indeed, as brilliantly coloured as in many high-priced works.

FINE ARTS.

Engraving of Harvey's Curls.

The talents of the Scottish painters, and the decided genius of a few of the countrymen of Wilkie, who have devoted themselves to art, are now, we believe, very generally acknowledged. Thomson, Fraser, Simsou, Macculloch, and a thick-coming host, whom we do not pretend to name, much less to class, already enjoy a European with a Transatlantic reputation. Among them is Harvey, the most national of the Scottish painters, while his genius is, we think, imbued with the highest moral feeling of any modern artist. It is not, however, his painting to which we draw attention, but to the engraving from it. The Curls has been engraved in Edinburgh by one whose name is, we believe, quite unknown to fame; yet this single plate of William Howison's will go far to raise the character of Scottish engravers to a corresponding level with that of Scottish painters. To say that it is the finest production of the graver that we have ever seen executed in Scotland may not be thought much; so we will at once put names and localities altogether out of the question, and claim notice to The Curlers as an admirable and even masterly engraving; and as marking, we fondly hope, a new era in the art in this quarter. There is no good reason why our engravers should not equal our poets and painters, or our engineers, brewers, and agriculturists, who are admitted to be the best in the world. One would require to be either purely Scottish, or a derivative of the land of "Honest men and bonny lasses"—one of the numerous off-shots and out-shots of old Scotland—thoroughly to appreciate the painting of The Curlers; but every person of taste, and every competent judge, will at once feel the surpassing beauty of the engraving. It is executed in line, boldly and freely; and the rough frozen herbage, and many of the minor details, such as the provision-basket, have absolutely the effect of bas-relief. Our southern friends ought to be informed, that Curling is an animating Scottish out-door winter pastime; a magnificent kind of billiards, where the table is a wide sheet of frozen water—a pond, a lake, or a river; and the balls huge stones, in the form of a blunted sphere, fitted with iron handles, by which they are propelled. This national game is well described in "Guy Mannering." Neighbours of every rank engage in it together; the resident laird with the cottar, the minister with the bedral. The rink, the field of contest, is, for the time, in point of equality, a sort of free-and-easy—a maison lodge; and the best Curler is the greatest man. Neighbouring parishes frequently challenge each other to a friendly bonspiel, and great is the interest excited, and keen the struggle for victory. We need not tell, that, at the close of a bright winter day, spent in this animating sport, beef and greens, and whisky punch are, by prescription, Curlers' fare. The Kirkcaldy Shepherd was an ardent Curler; and many worthy country clergymen love the sport, and excel in it. The curling season is a sort of decent Presbyterian saturnalia.

The Scotch have introduced curling into Canada, where it is keenly pursued on the lakes. Such is the subject of a painting, in which Mr Harvey has shown more freedom of handling, more of a merely artistical merit, than in some of his higher designs; and which forms the groundwork of, perhaps, the finest engraving which Scotland has yet produced. Our engravers may now almost venture to challenge England and Germany to a bonspiel.

Yarrell's British Birds. Part VI.

We place this series under the head of the fine arts, so exquisite are the wood-cuts of the birds, and many of the illustrative vignettes and tail-pieces. Two of the latter, the nest of the Black Redstart and that of the Reed Warbler, simple things though they be, one could never tire of contemplating.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

THE proceedings of Parliament have not been regarded with such entire indifference since the French Revolution of 1830. No one seems to expect any good measure to be passed, and few think it worth while to trouble themselves with what Parliament is doing. The Irish Poor-law Bill will receive many important modifications in its progress through the Lords, which will probably be acceded to by the Commons. Whether the Tithe Bill or Municipal Corporation Bill will pass, is doubtful. Mr Talfourd's Copyright Bill has, at last, been opposed by Lord John Russell, and it is generally expected, will be rejected or withdrawn. Mr Hume's County-Rate Bill has been rejected by 105 to 37. It was generally admitted that a more efficient control over the county expenditure than now exists, was required; but it was maintained that the present evils would be more than counterbalanced by those which the bill would create. Owing to gross mismanagement on the part of the Ministry, Sir Eardley Wilmot carried a resolution, by ninety-six to ninety-three, "that apprenticeship in the British colonies should immediately cease and determine." During the discussion, ministers, thinking their majority safe, and wishing to escape the responsibility and unpopularity of an open resistance to the motion, remained silent; but, when they found they were defeated, Lord John Russell was forced to come forward, and to declare the determination of Government strenuously to oppose any attempt to make the resolution of the House effectual. The Abolitionists immediately dispatched a quick sailing vessel to the West Indies with the news of their victory; and, as an insurrection of the slaves is anticipated, Government have been obliged to send out additional troops. Thus, as usual, the people pay for their rulers' blunders.

THE CORN LAWS.—We return to this subject, because we consider it the most important of any which now engages public attention; for the prosperity of the country depends upon the speedy repeal of these laws. Since the termination of the war in 1815, a great change has taken place in the state of Europe. We are no longer the manufacturers of the world; for every civilized state now produces the greater part of the articles consumed by her population, and Europe is yearly becoming less dependent on Britain. This is evinced by the alteration of the kind of our exports. Formerly, we exported the finished article—now we export either the raw material, or the material in an early state of preparation, as cotton twist, or woollen yarn, to be wrought up by the cheaply-fed artisans of the Continent. The repeal of the Corn-Laws cannot be delayed for a long period without imminent risk. In this question, the loss of a single day is injurious; for the manufacturing establishments of our rivals on the Continent of Europe and in America, are rapidly gaining strength, as well as increasing in numbers.

Mr Sharman Crawford and others, who have written on the Corn-Laws, anticipate a much greater fall on the price of grain than we think is at all likely, and have thus done harm by alarming the landed interest unnecessarily. We advocate the repeal of these laws, not merely because we think the repeal would give our operatives food at a lower rate, but because it would put our manufacturers on a level with their rivals on the Continent. Were this once accomplished, we have no fear but that our superior capital, industry, and enterprise, our local situation, our abundance of coal and iron, and the other advantages we possess, notwithstanding a grinding taxation, would place our manufactures on a basis which could not be shaken. To compare the price of grain in the shipping ports of the Continent with the price in London, tends to nothing but delusion. In London there is a demand greater than can be supplied; as Dantzig the warehouses are filled with grain, for which there is no demand whatever. Every one must have seen the effect of a glut or over-supply in an ordinary corn market. The article being bulky, and difficult to conceal even were it desired, the buyers, as well as sellers, soon get aware what is the average supply of the market; and if, by any chance, a much larger quantity is brought forward, both parties know that there is more than is likely to be sold, and act accordingly. The seller is eager to sell; but the buyer hangs back, and a sale is at length effected, only by the former submitting to a reduction in price. The mercantile men generally, and particularly Mr Tooke, the author of an excellent treatise on "High and Low Prices," who were examined before one of the committees on agriculture, gave it as their decided opinion, that an over-supply affects prices in a much greater ratio than the excess; for example, that an over-supply of one-tenth would reduce prices much more than ten per cent.

and so on. The effect on the continental prices, produced by the opening of the ports, was strikingly shown in September 1833, when the Ministry, under the apprehension that the oat crop was deficient, permitted some hundred thousand quarters of oats to be imported at a reduced rate of duty. Prices in less than ten days rose in the shipping ports of the Continent, fifty per cent.

But whatever might be the fall of the prices a repeal of the Corn Laws would occasion, it is easy to adjust the rent that should be paid under the new system by the tenantry. In East Lothian, and several of the other most important districts, the matter requires no adjustment. Instead of money, rents are now generally paid in so many quarters of wheat or other grain, convertible at the farm prices. This mode of payment would operate equally well after a repeal of the Corn-Laws as at present. Where, on the other hand, the rent is payable in money, all that would be required would be to ascertain how many quarters of the grain the usual produce of the farm, the money-rent would have purchased at the average prices of the last five or seven years, and to declare the rent to be the ascertained number of quarters in time coming, convertible yearly at the farm prices, like the existing corn rents. In England, the same method would equally apply, substituting the Corn-Law averages for the Scottish farms. But, in truth, we do not think the farmers have much to fear, though no such provision as that we have mentioned forms part of a bill for the utter repeal of the Corn-Laws. As to the landowners, we can hardly doubt that those laws are injurious to them. The value of land ultimately rests on nothing but population; for it will be found, that, where population has increased most rapidly, there the value of land has risen most. Now, it is only in the manufacturing districts that population is going on increasing at any considerable rate. If we compare a manufacturing and an agricultural county, we will find that the ratio of increase is from fifteen to twenty-fold in favour of the former. We therefore confidently assert, that, if by any mismanagement our manufactures retrograde, the rents and value of land will also sink.

ENGLAND.

THE REVENUE.—The great deficiency in the Revenue of last year appears to have alarmed Ministers, and the most active measures have been taken to make the taxes as productive as possible. Surveyors have been sent from London to Scotland, and already many persons have got notice of their presence, by having their window-duties increased; and in almost every newspaper of the kingdom the Government annuities are advertised. From this last source, however, little is likely to be obtained, as many of the insurance offices offer annuities on much more favourable terms. In such circumstances, were the Birmingham scheme, of abstaining from exciseable commodities, carried into effect, even to a small extent, the embarrassment of the Government would be extreme.

CANTERBURY RIOTS.—The deplorable state of ignorance of the English peasantry has been strikingly shown by these riots. Yet the place where, of all England, the clergy are in greatest force, is precisely where one might expect a spirit of fanaticism to be evinced. It is not merely education that is required, but education of the proper kind. A great part of the education of the people, both of England and Scotland, as at present conducted, is calculated to inspire bigotry and fanaticism; and it is only people who have, at one period or other of their lives, gone through the training of self-education, and allowed their reason to operate, free from the trammels of authority and tradition, that are free from these vices. It is perfectly true, as Mr Wynn stated, that the highest education, as at present conducted, is no protection against fanaticism. Without looking into history for the hundreds of examples of the truth of this position which it affords, we may only appeal to the followers of Joanna Southcott in England, or to the Rowites among ourselves. In both cases we see persons the most respectable in society—holders of the highest accomplishments, professional men, lawyers, and educated men of all classes—falling into the most absurd delusions, and without being considered insane, but conducting their ordinary business like other men, assuming attributes hardly inferior to those claimed by Sir William Courtenay himself.

THE COLONIES.

The recent revolt in Canada has had the good effect of directing public attention to our colonial system, and to the enormous expense it entails upon the people of Britain. Here, for example, is a table which professes to shew the expenditure for the military alone:—

Abstracts of the Commissaries' Accounts of the Payments from the several military chests in the following Colonies, from April 1, 1836, to March 31, 1837.

P. P. No. 381, of 1838.	Total Payments.
Canada,	£219,718
Nova Scotia and New Brunswick,	139,664
Newfoundland,	17,317
Bermuda,	48,734
Bahamas,	32,330
West Indies,	266,972
Jamaica,	423,231
Honduras,	16,910
Gibraltar,	116,958
Malta,	167,671
Ionian Islands,	132,104
Cape of Good Hope,	313,410
Mauritius,	97,410
Sierra Leone,	46,209
Gambia,	10,171
Ceylon,	94,184
New South Wales,	328,318
Van Diemen's Land,	167,607
Western Australia,	17,112
St Helena,	51,893
	£2,727,923
Estimated amount of payments at Western Australia, quarter ending March 31, 1837,	5,704
Total payments,	£2,733,627

But it is easy to shew that the expenditure is much greater than shown in this return; for the following was the distribution of our army on 1st January last:—

Great Britain,	22,878
Ireland,	19,766
India,	18,864
Other Colonies,	34,460
	95,968

Deducting the army in India, which is paid by the East India Company, nearly one half of our army is stationed in our colonies. If we consider the great expense their conveyance to and fro occasions, and the great mortality, we may be sure that the 52,000 men in the United Kingdom are maintained at less expense than the 34,000 in the colonies. Now, the total cost of the army, including the ordnance, is eight millions; so that, instead of less than three, the military protection of the colonies must cost four millions. During the war our navy cost annually about twenty millions, the greater proportion of the ships being employed in defending the colonies; and, since the peace in 1815, the expenditure has varied from nine to about four and a half millions. We may, therefore, add two millions more for this head, and, at least, another million for the maintenance of the civil establishments; so that the people of this country are annually taxed seven millions for the support of our colonies. Were war to break out—and colonies have always been the most fertile source of war—that expenditure would unquestionably be doubled. The average produce of the revenue of late years, after deducting the interest of the debt, has been about fifteen millions, one half of which is expended on our colonies. This is surely a state of matters which cannot long be submitted to.

Against all this expenditure what is to be set off? First, and almost solely, the patronage, which the governorships and other offices afford to the ministry of the day, and the means which the enormous salaries furnish for the replenishment of the purses of broken down members of the aristocracy. Then, we have a monopoly of the colonial trade; but we would have the trade at any rate, as the history of our commercial relations with our emancipated colonies—the United States of America—incontestably proves. But, in fact, the trade is not of such value as to warrant the continuance of the expense we have pointed out. Mr Montgomery Martin, in a petition presented to Parliament last December, estimates “the value of the maritime commerce of all our colonies” at thirty-five millions per annum. This is surely much exaggerated; but, assuming it to be correct, and that the profit upon it is as high as ten per cent., we give seven millions in peace, and twice or thrice seven millions during war, to gain three millions and a half! Although the Whigs professed, in 1832, to govern without patronage, we do not find that they have found it less useful than their predecessors. And, if they will agree to emancipate the colonies, we would be willing to increase the secret service-money—the wages of corruption—from a few thousands to two or three millions a-year. This, we presume, would compensate the loss of the colonial patronage; and the nation would evidently be great gainers by the arrangement. But we know that, on the subject of colonies, the greatest delusions prevail. They are generally considered as estates whence a great revenue is derived. Private individuals may certainly derive considerable revenues from it; but they receive nothing equivalent to the national loss. We see nothing, however, to prevent a colony being emancipated, and the proprietor of lands in it, who chooses to reside in this country, to receive his rents, or the proceeds of his property, as at present. A Frenchman, resident in London, has no difficulty in receiving the rents of his estate in France. What, therefore, would prevent a Jamaica proprietor, resident in Liverpool, receiving the rents or proceeds of his estate in Jamaica, as easily after Jamaica was declared independent as he does now? If the Jamaica Legislature were to attempt to seize and confiscate the property of British subjects, we would have the same remedy as we have in the case of foreign nations—a war to compel justice to be done.

CANADA.—We have received the first number of M'Kenzie's Gazette, published at New York on the 15th May. It is filled with accounts of the late rebellion in Upper Canada, from which we collect that nothing but the grossest mismanagement on the part either of M'Kenzie himself, or of Dr Rolph, prevented the capture of Toronto, which would probably have been followed by the independence of both the Canadas. Governor Head was totally unaware of the danger, and the 4000 muskets he had received had not been unpacked from the boxes when the rebels were within three miles of the seat of Government. From the extracts given from the Lower Canada papers of April, we observe that considerable alarm of another rising of the French Canadians prevails, and reviews of volunteers, sham fights, and other military exercises, seem to take place daily. On the 28th April, a civil list was voted, being the first for nearly five years. Nothing seems to be known of Papineau. Of the thirty persons for whose apprehension rewards are offered by Government, there are three Scotchmen, two Englishmen, one Irishman, and four Americans, the remainder being Canadians, or other North Americans.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

A new application of water power has been discovered, by which, as we understand it, the impetus of a fall of water may be conveyed without loss for miles.

Several machines on this principle are in operation in Lancashire, and have given much satisfaction; but the accounts of the principle we have seen are so obscure as to be unintelligible to us. It has often occurred to us that a very important addition might be made to our present means of propelling machinery, by forming artificial rivers descending from the hills to the sea, and so managed as to have the greatest number of falls for mill seats. In most districts of the kingdom, places could be found among the hills of moors which could be dammed up at little expense, so as to form large sheets of water during wet weather. The efflux of the water might be so regulated by sluices as to maintain an equal supply at all times, as at the Compensation Pond in the Pentland Hills. Something of this kind has, we believe, been done at Greenock. On the Water of Leith there are no fewer than seventy mills within ten miles of its embouchure; yet, as much water is wasted during seasons as would drive three times that number, if carefully collected, and a new course cut for the discharge of the superfluous water. There is an admirable space for a reservoir, on a grand scale, near Colston. Some years ago, a survey was made, and it was found that a new course could be made for this stream for less than £50,000, upon which an immense number of mills could be erected; and the project is well worthy of consideration in the present declining state of Edinburgh; for it is apparently only by the introduction of manufactures that its farther depopulation can be stopped. By this means also the city would be freed from the tyranny of the Water Company; for they have obtained the property of nearly the whole springs in the Pentlands. It has been found at Greenock, that the employing of the water to drive machinery does not render it unfit for drinking. At Catrine, in Ayrshire, the reservoir is at the head of Ayr Water, upwards of twenty miles from the works, the water flowing down the natural bed of the stream. Perhaps the most extensive application of water power in Scotland is at Deanston, near Doune, where are four wheels for propelling machinery for the manufacture of cotton-twist and weaving, having an aggregate power of 300 horses; and other four wheels are erecting, which will give an additional power of 400 horses. This work affords employment to 1100 persons, and the only power for propelling the machinery is water. The large water wheels are kept much more easily in order than steam engines, are less expensive at the outset, and save the large sums expended for coal.

AGRICULTURE.

The accounts of the appearance of the crops, both in England and Scotland, are contradictory; but, on the whole, we do not see that there is any reason to anticipate either a very late or a deficient harvest. We fairly confess, however, that though the crops turned out deficient, it should be no great source of lamentation; for nothing but a famine price of grain will effectually turn public attention to the Corn-Laws. Meanwhile, markets rise apace; for some weeks past the average price of wheat, calculated on six weeks' returns, has been rising from 1s. 6d. to 2s. 2d. per week, and it was in the week ending 1st June, 63s. 1d. per quarter. In the Scottish markets wheat has been sold as high as 72s. The price at Hamburg for grain of equal quality is 37s. 6d.; little more than one half. From a return lately made to Parliament, it appears that the total quantity of grain, of all kinds, remaining in warehouse on 1st January last, was 925,391 quarters, and 181,448 cwts. of meal and flour. Last year 210,254 quarters of foreign wheat were entered for home consumption at a duty of £395,706; 47,475 quarters of foreign barley, duty £21,573, and 333,932 foreign oats, duty £168,080. There were also entered about 200,000 quarters of foreign peas and beans.

SINCE the anticipated appearance of a new Waverley novel, in the pristine and palmy days of the Waverley novels, there has been nothing known in these northern regions to equal the buzz and flutter of expectation, which have harbingered the appearance of the collected speeches of Lord Brougham. Men of letters, journalists, lawyers, but, above all, politicians—those especially whose duty or interest it is to “support the Ministry”—are alike excited. They participate in the same anxiety and impatience which pervade the clubs of the metropolis, which have made a way into the courts of law and the universities; but which, doubtless, excite no curiosity whatever in the official bureaus, or the voluptuous boudoirs where it has become the fashion for the minister to perform those courtly and novel duties which were once well understood at Versailles and the Tuileries, and even at Whitehall, but which, since the reign of the Second Charles, have become almost unknown in sober England.

The collected speeches of the most eminent living orator and statesman, who has, for thirty years, exercised no ordinary influence over the growth and direction of public opinion and the prospects of mankind, could not, indeed, fail to excite the liveliest interest. They embody the history of the age, as it has been influenced by one of its highest intellects. In the meanwhile, however, and in the first blush of the business, there is more curiosity about the pithy adjuncts to these splendid effusions of intellectual power, experienced wisdom, and unrivalled oratorical accomplishment, than about their essential substance. Happy and proud is the man who has had a glimpse of a proof-sheet, or heard a passage distorted at second-hand, or even seen the favoured mortal who has viewed these oracles, or divined aright one sentence of their pungent contents. For it is not, we have said, at this early stage, the speeches alone for which the public appetite is whetted:—those powerful and impulsive specimens of the highest kind of modern eloquence remain for the study of leisure—for the delight and the admiration of posterity. The world is athirst to know what Lord Brougham has to say of his contemporaries, his political opponents, and his late colleagues in office; what of the prospects of the nation under the inauspicious rule of the Whig-Tory Ministry; what of the predicament in which he has been placed by their intrigues and circumvention; by their apprehension of his bold fearlessness, so often proved court-ward; and, above all, of his power with the People. To us the most remarkable feature in these historical Introductions, Notes, and Commentaries is, everything considered, their pervading tone of dignified forbearance. The conduct of the Melbourne Ministry to their illustrious colleague has been as palpably low in motive as it was treacherous to the public interest, identified with his capacity for business, and those qualifications for statesmanship which have been happily compared to the proboscis of the elephant, alike apt in turn to rend the mightiest trees of the forest, or to pick up a lady's needle.

Had it been possible for Lord Brougham to have remained insensible to the treatment he has received, he must have been less than man. The same line of conduct regarding him is still persisted in, and now without any attempt at disguise; so that it has become the duty of every Reformer, and of every enemy of slavery under its many disguises, to turn aside the blow aimed at their sacred cause through the side of the most redoubted of their champions. In relation to the Melbourne Government, Lord Brougham himself is placed in the condition of a man of honourable and delicate feelings, who perceives, too acutely, the ignoble character of the individuals to whom, in the unsuspecting confidence of a generous nature, he has given the power to betray him, to be able to stoop to resent their conduct. But the affair, to men of sense, becomes absolutely ludicrous, when the wrong-doers are found the first to cry out. From the open vituperation, and the whispered calumnies industriously circulated by the small adherents and accredited organs of the Ministry, it might be supposed that Lord Brougham had turned traitor to his good, easy, confiding, liberal, reforming colleagues; and had deserted them and the Reform banner under which he has fought all his life. And this system was begun when, having intrigued to expel him from the Cabinet, they were lying by, waiting the first safe opportunity to declare that his principles were expelled from the councils of the State, along with himself. Yet these men have the insanity to cry out—"Lord Brougham has deserted us!—he opposes our measures!—it is personal pique—it is spleen!" While the climax is wound up by the underlings—"He endangers the Government!—he will let in the Tories!"

This false and barefaced clamour probably makes some small way with the unthinking, from mere pertinacious iteration. The speech delivered by Lord Brougham at Liverpool, three years ago, ought of itself to stifle the designing reports raised by the worst enemies of Reform; those who, with the phrase on their lips while it suited their selfish purposes, have now unblushingly abandoned all their former professions, and even deny that they ever sought to deceive the Reformers. The attempts to fasten upon Lord Brougham that defection and political inconsistency of which they are themselves notoriously guilty, is one of those audacious humbugs which fail to excite indignation, because they overpower the bystanders with the sense of the ludicrous. "But," say the Ministerial adherents, "it must be true that Lord Brougham has deserted his principles; for do not Mr O'Connell and many stanch Radical Members support the Government quite as strenuously since they declared against all reform, as before they had explained their favourite line of policy? It must be true that Lord Brougham has deserted his principles; for there is the great Duke, that friend in extremity, supporting the Ministers as effectually by passiveness, or party tactics, as do the Irish Liberals by many speeches and every vote."

But it is more than time that we were engaged with the work before us, of which we are happy to think that our rough and imperfect sample may give many a foretaste. We do not profess to review Lord Brougham's collected Speeches. That is a task for leisure and reflection; nor are we yet in possession of the complete edition, with which the Edinburgh presses are still in travail; but we cannot allow a month to elapse without using all the means we possess to make known a work not more honourable to its eminent author, than important to every class of his fellow-subjects, as it will be to their children's children.

In the Introduction to a comparatively recent speech delivered in Parliament, in vindication of Lord Grey's Government, Lord Brougham mentions that it was he, who, when Earl Grey abruptly seceded from office in the summer of 1834, in a sort of pet because the nation would not uphold his Irish policy, disconcerted the King's secret purpose of bringing in the Tories, and, in fact, put the Melbourne Ministry in office, by his promptitude and statesmanship.

This he accomplished, by immediately declaring to the King that Lord Grey's colleagues were quite willing to remain; and repeating the same thing that night in the House of Lords. His Majesty was, of course, much chagrined at being thus out-manœuvred; and never forgave the delinquent, who thwarted his royal purpose. The death of Lord Spencer, by taking Lord Althorp from the House of Commons, afforded a hollow pretext for accomplishing in November what Lord Brougham had frustrated in June. In lamenting this step, Lord Brougham speaks with affection, and even respect, of the "excellent monarch" who lived to repent it. Lord Brougham then adverts to the cordial support which those whom he denominates the ultra-Radicals gave to the new Government. His Lordship has not changed his opinion of "the unhappy necessity which existed for the coercion bill for Ireland;" nor have we changed ours in one jot as to that fatal policy which first disunited the Reformers in Parliament. The effect of that damning measure, was to ruin the Grey Administration, and create the anomalous state of things which Lord Brougham deprecates. With all deference, there is about Lord Brougham, and especially on this one subject, a touch of the same infallibility which he ironically ascribes to Lord Melbourne. But, if he condemns the extravagant hopes entertained by the Ultra-Reformers in the first years of the Grey Administration, and their "ignorant impatience" of delay, he does ample justice to the hearty support they gave to the succeeding Government, and their anxiety to redeem what he considers an error. Frankly, to the utmost, and with no small degree of mortification, do we concede to him that, if the Grey Government did little, that of Melbourne has done nothing—or worse than nothing. After enumerating those improvements made by the Grey Government in two sessions, which have so often formed the theme of panegyric to Lord Brougham, he proceeds:—

They, the ultra-liberal party, plainly saw that they had been, by their clamour against the late Ministers, playing into the hands of the Court and the Tories. They were alarmed at what they had done; and joined heartily with the new Opposition—that is, the ousted Ministry—in measures which soon removed the new Government, restoring, with one or two exceptions, the Ministry of November, 1834. When this Ministry was thus re-appointed, those who had, by their impatience and opposition, driven them from the helm, were all at once found to be the most patient, the most reasonable, the most forbearing, the most tractable and considerate of men. The experience of November, 1834, had not been thrown away upon them; and all that they had before urged against the do-little or the do-nothing policy in England, and the coercive policy in Ireland, was now forgotten, or remembered only to draw invidious distinctions between the Government of Lord Grey, nay, the Government of Lord Melbourne himself, and the new Government of 1834.

The Liberals repented the opposition which enabled the King to turn out Lord Melbourne in November 1834; and, according to Lord Brougham, from that date ran into the opposite extreme. They imagined—

That the Lord Melbourne of November was not the Lord Melbourne of May; and they openly and unblushingly avowed; that they supported him in 1836 because he and his new Cabinet, composed of the former Cabinet, with the addition of Lord Grey's eldest son, were incapable of doing such things towards Ireland as he and that same Cabinet, and Lord Grey himself, with the hearty support of that son, had done in 1835. Assuredly, neither Lord Melbourne nor Lord Howick, nor, indeed, any of the other Ministers, ever gave countenance to so monstrous an absurdity—so gross and audacious a delusion. But their adherents in all places were most diligent and unremitting in the use of this topic; and it saved the new Government for, at least, one year, if not longer. Until the death of William IV., indeed, this formed the staple of the Ministerial defence, upon all occasions; not by themselves, but by their adherents, both in and out of Parliament. The most invidious distinctions were taken between Lord Grey's Government and Lord Melbourne's. "The latter" (said the Edinburgh Review) "looks more honest, and is more vigorous." "We have now a Ministry incapable of pursuing the atrocious policy of 1835," said all the Irish supporters of Lord Melbourne, who had been loudest in the outcry against Lord Grey. "At length, we possess the blessing of a Government, for the first time, willing to give Ireland justice, and the only Viceroy who ever gave Catholics their due." Such were the topics on which the Government lived out the rest of the late King's reign; disgusting as the food must have been to the palates of those who felt quite conscious of having been Lord Grey's hearty and zealous coadjutors in every one of the measures now most retiled, and his supporters in all the acts of feebleness which the Edinburgh Review discovered, for the first time, when the death of the noble Earl's power tolled. To these topics were added, of course, the most lavish promises on behalf of the Government, that sweeping reforms would at length be carried into all the departments of Church and of State.

Alas! alas! how are those mighty boasters fallen!—those fair hopes blighted! Three years have elapsed, and nothing, absolutely nothing, has been done, except to finish the Municipal Reform begun by Lord Grey. The adverse Court furnished a pretext for two of those three years; but, at length, the young Queen ascended the throne of her ancestors, and threw herself, absolutely, and without any kind of reserve, even as to the humblest attendant upon her Royal Person, into the hands of her Ministers.

This may be quite true, so far as the Irish Liberals are concerned, and a portion of those of Great Britain; but, however it may fare with the representatives, it has no proper application to the Radical party in Britain—to the men of Birmingham and Glasgow, and their coopers in every quarter. They, indeed, forced back the Melbourne Government on the Court—though they could not have calculated upon the exclusion of Lord Brougham—but quite as much, we are convinced, from disgust at the conduct of the King, as from increased confidence in the Ministers. There might be temporary delusion, a short-lived belief, in the gratitude of a set of pretended Reform Ministers, old Whigs, or converted Tories, who owed, at that time, as much to the People as they now do to the smiles of the court, a yielding aristocracy, and the unrestrained exercise of a prodigal patronage. Lord Brougham strains his charity for these Ministers too far, when he asserts that they gave no countenance to the popular belief of their increased liberality. The delusion was fostered, if not directly by themselves, in their little petulant displays of spirit, or by small threats, and smaller vague promises, yet most sedulously by their organs and adherents. They, poor gentlemen! were sadly trammelled by a hostile court. Their liberal designs were cruelly thwarted by the Lords. Only let the Reformers wait a while in patience for the golden opportunity, and they should see things to astonish them. We acknowledge that, long before that golden opportunity arrived, no Reformer who did not choose to shut his eyes, was deceived as to the true character of the Melbourne Government. The Ministers scarcely needed Lord Durham as the harbinger of their purposes. The contemptuous and insulting declarations of Lord Melbourne and Lord John Russell, might, and, by more sagacious statesmen, would have been spared. It was enough that their deeds spoke for them. Again we repeat, Lord Brougham strains charity too far when he states, that "neither Lord Melbourne, nor Lord Howick, nor, indeed, any of the other Ministers, ever gave countenance to so audacious a delusion." They, at least, long held silence; while their satellites, far and wide, deluded the country, and especially Ireland, with tales of their increased liberality and astonishing vigour. They would not succumb to the Tories; they would do justice to Ireland—Ireland, for the first time, well-governed, after centuries of misrule! &c. &c. &c. While this was resounding on every side, the Government received the implied compliment in silence. If not directly, yet passively, they countenanced the gross deception. And was there anything manly, anything honest—nay, was there not connivance in fraud, in not declaring, during the lifetime of the King, that contempt of Radical support, that hostility to farther reform, and that ready acquiescence in Tory-pled measures, which their chiefs seized the first opportunity to avow, after the remaining delusion had done for them all it could effect at the last general election?

Mr O'Connell and Mr Sheil must answer to what follows. Lord Melbourne has certainly never disavowed, at least when pressed, that he heartily supported the Irish Coercion Bill, and does not repent his conduct. For this degree of candour we give him small credit. As well might he deny that his name is William Lamb, under whose administration it first became the main duty of the Prime Minister of England to conduct the menu plaisirs, and manage the menu peuple of the Court. This is the passage which we recommend to the Irish Liberals.

But did no one ever assert, in the face of the Ministers, that the pretences on which they were supported were false and hollow? This was unquestionably done more than once. In 1836, Lord Grey drew from Lord Melbourne a distinct avowal, that he had heartily concurred in all that much-venerated Minister's policy towards Ireland. In November 1837, Lord Brougham appealed again to Lord Melbourne on the same point, both when Lord Cloncurry had incautiously said something which seemed to betoken an adoption of the false position that Lord Mulgrave was the first Viceroy who had done equal justice to the different parties in Ireland—and again, upon Lord Roden's motion, stating, in Lord Melbourne's presence, that he whom indiscreet advocates were representing as incapable of proposing such a measure as the Coercion

Bill, had heartily supported it—nay, “was primarily answerable for it, as the measure proceeded from his own office, as Secretary for Irish affairs.”* But still more recently, in the last stage of the Irish Poor Law Bill, June 9, 1838, Lord Melbourne admitted most distinctly, that no praise could be too high for the wise, just, and liberal administrations of Lord Wellesley and Lord Anglesey, (under both of whom he had himself served as Irish Secretary, and over both of whom he had also acted as Home Secretary,) and he only placed Lord Mulgrave's claims to favour upon the ground of his having continued to pursue the same sound and enlightened course with his predecessors. In this view, so fairly taken at length, by way of public disclaimer of the invidious defence now under discussion, and at all times so necessarily repudiated by the whole of the present Ministers, Lord Plunkett, the Irish Chancellor, cordially joined; so that there is an end, and for ever, to the distinction taken between the Grey and the Melbourne Cabinet, between the Wellesley and the Anglesey Viceroyalty and the Mulgrave, upon the grand questions connected with Irish affairs. Justice had also been rendered to Lord Grey in the Commons, by Lord John Russell, a few days before. When the Appropriation Clause was abandoned, upon the practicability of carrying which he and Lord John had differed, the latter admitted that he now found Lord Grey was right, and himself wrong. Men, after this, and indeed, after many other changes and surrenders lately witnessed, are prone to ask, why Lord Grey, and, indeed, Lord Stanley and Sir J. Graham, are no longer members of the Whig Cabinet? The Edinburgh Reviewer may also be now called upon to reconsider his period about “looking” and “being;” and to admit that Lord Grey's government not only looked, but was, to the very full, as honest as Lord Melbourne's, and no one whit less vigorous, either in appearance or in reality.

In the introduction to the admirable, and, to Reformers, most memorable Liverpool speech, the subject is renewed. The senseless, or rather the cunning clamour about his desertion of the Ministers, raised by their tools, required to be exposed and put down. On this head, Lord Brougham, from his singular position, and from the delicacy incident to an honourable mind, appears too susceptible. He recurs to it repeatedly. No one can be more fully experienced in the influence of misrepresentation and clamour with the unthinking multitude; and he may also feel, that to give full effect to his doctrines, the motives of the preacher should be above suspicion. He accordingly maintains the principle, so self-evident that it is astonishing to see it require enforcement, namely, that, if he had pursued any other course than the one he has taken, that alone, and not the path he has been compelled to pursue, would have betokened dereliction of duty, and the abandonment of the principles which had regulated his entire public life. “The senseless advocates of the Ministry have,” he says, “expressed surprise at his opposing them, even when they took a course infinitely beyond anything that in 1835 [when he delivered the speech referred to] could be imagined:”—

The senseless advocates of the Ministers have betokened much surprise at his gently and strenuously opposing them, when they took a course infinitely beyond anything that in 1835 could be imagined—when, as soon as the accession of the Queen threw the whole Court into their hands, they ostentatiously avowed themselves hostile to all improvement of the Reform Bill, even to the correction of its most manifest defects—when they made war upon the rights and liberties of the whole Canadian people, suspending their free constitution, and proclaiming a Dictatorship, because a revolt had broken out in the corner of one or two parishes, occasioned by acts of gross legislative violence and injustice—when they framed their new Civil List upon the most exploded and unreasonable principles, and without the least regard to the economy which the people have an unquestionable right to demand—finally, when they refused to comply with the voice of the whole People by emancipating the Slaves, encouraged even a revival of Slave Trading, and exercised their absolute control over the arrangements of the Queen's household, by dismissing Lord Charles Fitzroy from her Majesty's service, as a punishment for conscientiously voting against the continuance of Slavery. It is confidently believed, that no person of ordinary discernment, and the most limited portion of fairness, can read the notice so plainly given in the second Liverpool Speech, of the terms on which alone Lord Brougham could continue a supporter of Government, and say that he could now be found among their friends, without an utter abandonment of all the principles which he professed in 1835, and which were those of his whole public life. It is equally clear, from his supporting the Ministry in 1835—from his giving them no opposition in 1836—from his only opposing their Canada Bill in 1837—and from his beginning the opposition which he has given them during the present session (1838) as soon as they declared against Reform, and Emancipation, and also against economy—that their own conduct alone has caused the separation; and that no falsehood was ever uttered, even in the utmost heats of political discord, with so audacious a disregard of the most notorious facts, nay, of the most recent and best known dates themselves, as that inaccuracy which would connect his opposition with the fact of his not holding office in the present Ministry.

Lord Brougham enumerates the occasions on which he forbore to oppose them, even when they abandoned measures of improvement, which he had brought forward himself, such as the Plurality Bill. But what is more:—

He even abstained from attending in Parliament that Session, (1836,) because he was apprised by the Ministers his doing so would be fatal to the Government. In 1837, he pursued the same friendly course wherever he could, and only gave a reluctant opposition to the unconstitutional Bill for seizing the Canadian money. When, secure in Court favour, by the entire possession of the Queen's whole authority, they proceeded to abandon almost every one important ground on which he had ever agreed with them; then, and not before, his opposition began. If the Ministerial advocates have any proofs to give of political or party obligation—or, above all, any one single personal reason, arising from personal obligations of any sort whatever, why he should—not adhere to them—(for that would be to abandon his own opinions)—but mitigate the expression of his dissent from them—or in any way shew forbearance towards them personally—it will be far better to give those proofs, and facts, and reasons, than to persist in distorting plain well-known facts, and re-echo groundless and unintelligible complaints.

But these matters are personal and comparatively insignificant. Their interest, though intense, is transient; they occupy after times as little as they wholly engrossed attention at the moment; their contemplation leaves no trace but a sigh behind.

“O fallacem hominum spem, fragilemque fortunam, et inanes nostras contentiones!”

Surely this incontrovertible argument, this proud challenge, will for ever stifle the cunningly-devised clamour about Lord Brougham withdrawing his support from the Melbourne Administration. If there be any well-founded complaint against him at all, its expression should come from a very opposite quarter. Why was his opposition so tardy? Why did he keep silence so long? The delicacies of his personal position and old connexions were but too much regarded. His lengthened forbearance with those Ministers, verged upon neglect of the public duties to which his life has been devoted.

* Wilson's Delisting to the Home Department, which his Lordship then held.

But we do not wish to take Lord Brougham's defence against those worse than senseless, those cunning and selfish clamours, out of his own hands. We think he requires no defence; and so we are persuaded do nine-tenths of the nation, including those who, for their own sinister ends, raise the outcry. In the preface to the Speech upon the maltreatment of the American Colonies, Lord Brougham makes some remarks on the grievous complaints of the Premier, of the disapprobation which their late colleague—their circumvented, betrayed, meanly-sacrificed colleague—ventured to express of their Canadian policy. In a fine vein of irony, Lord Brougham remarks:—

He [Lord Melbourne] spoke with his usual ability, but with less than his accustomed success, because it was exceedingly difficult to perceive what right he had to complain of any one for differing with him in opinion; or what there is in the noble Viscount and his colleagues which should exempt them from the lot of all Ministers, to have their conduct discussed; or why Lord Brougham should be precluded from pursuing the course which he has all his life held, and defending his well-known principles, merely by the accident of his having once been Lord Melbourne's colleague, and afterwards Lord Melbourne's supporter, so long as his measures accorded with Lord Brougham's views of national policy and public justice. The noble Viscount omitted to give, in his able and ingenious speech, any reason in support of the proposition, which he did not indeed state, but, from the beginning to the end of his remarks, assumed to be undeniable, that whoever, having once found him and his present colleagues pursuing a sound policy for some years, shall refuse to change not only his own opinions upon that policy, but the whole opinions of his public life, at the bidding of the Cabinet, and to act thenceforth with them in opposition to all his own most cherished principles, must be actuated by some sinister motive, some feeling of a private or personal nature. Or the convenient or self-complacent proposition, thus assumed and acted upon by the noble Viscount, may be stated in other and fewer words. It is this: That no one can be influenced by justifiable motives, who does not agree with and support the present Cabinet through every change of principle, and more especially that portion of the Cabinet whose changes have been the most marked, and have been separated from each other by the shortest intervals of time. But to this assumption was added another, peculiarly adapted to the case of Lord Brougham. It was, that no man can ever honestly differ with Lord Melbourne, after once agreeing with him; nor, having supported him in one line of policy, can honestly refuse to support him in its opposite, unless he has some private feeling of spite or of interest to gratify.

A charge so unexpected naturally called forth from the object of it a peremptory and indignant denial—not indeed more peremptory, but possibly somewhat more indignant, than the very gross and notorious absurdity of the accusation might appear to warrant.

The satellites of the Government are understood to have been greatly edified and comforted by their leader's tone, marked as it was by more than ordinary animation, though with less than the usual provision of argument. It is respectfully asked of those zealous persons that they would have the goodness to offer some explanation of the grounds of his attack, should it be expecting too much to look for some proof of Lord Melbourne's assumptions, in behalf of which he offered no more argument than he did in behalf of the bill itself, or the conduct of Lord Glenelg, or the new morality recently discovered by Sir F. B. Head.

Allowing the full attributes of infallibility to the Prime Minister, together with those of "profuse royal favour, and much patronage combined with little power," his exalted station is admitted to exempt him from needing, like other responsible ministers, to render any reason for his opinions; but of his adherents, who may not be endowed with the same attributes, it is felicitously demanded:—

By what particular argument they mean to disprove Lord Brougham's right to hold in 1838, the same opinions which he held in 1837, and to pursue now the same line of conduct to which Lord Melbourne and others came over in 1831, most creditably to themselves, and most happily for the State, with a celerity that produced the most fortunate results to the country as well as to themselves? And if it be not taking too great a liberty, or taxing their invention too severely, they are also most humbly entreated to shew, why Lord Brougham has not as good a title to persevere in that course now, merely because the converts of 1831 have, very unfortunately for the state, though without any kind of reproach to themselves, abandoned it, and returned to their old opinions with a celerity as remarkable as that which marked their former conversion? When this shall be shewn, there will be laid a ground for charging Lord Brougham with personal motives in refusing to alter his conduct; and for believing that all mankind consider Lord Melbourne to be an old, consistent, and steady friend of liberal opinions. Lord Brougham, it may be observed, has never complained of any changes in the conduct and principles of others; he may therefore be the more easily forgiven for claiming the right of adhering to his own. Instead of asking if the conversion witnessed in 1831, of the most zealous enemies of Reform into wholesale, almost Radical Reformers, was quite unconnected with the maintenance of the Government they belonged to; and if the re-conversion of November 1837 had its origin in nothing like a notion that the Court had become more friendly, and was better worth a prudent statesman's regard than the People; he rested satisfied with assuring the Ministers that they might, any day or any hour, restore him to his position as their zealous defender against the Tory majority of their adversaries, by simply retracting the declarations against Reform, with which they unhappily ushered in the Session; or, without formally recanting, by merely bringing forward liberal and constitutional measures. They refuse to accept any such offer; they will not comply with that condition. Doubtless they are right—most probably Lord Brougham is wrong; but how he can be charged with falling into his error, great as it may be, through personal feelings, is not so easily perceived. On the same night, Lord Melbourne disclosed a secret, which is understood to have been, until then, locked up within his own breast. He has, it now appears, been for the last three years constantly expecting Lord Brougham to adopt the course into which he has of late been driven by the Government. Then, the observant bystander, who perceives that Lord Brougham never failed to support the Ministers most zealously until they changed their conduct, must be led to infer that this change of theirs was all the while foreseen and predetermined by the noble Viscount—though certainly concealed with some care, and with entire success, from all his followers. But, if it shall be said that the noble Viscount's constant expectation, his daily forebodings, of what he pleasantly called a change in Lord Brougham, without reflecting that it is an alteration in himself, was owing to some impression which he had respecting Lord Brougham's habits and character, it will follow that he must have given frequent indications of this mistrust, of this presentiment, both in public and in private, and must have explicitly ascribed the active support of 1835, the kind and considerate abstinence of 1836, and the partial and reluctant dissents of 1837, to their real, though still not very intelligible cause; and, at all events, that he never can have given Lord Brougham, or any common friends, the most distant ground for believing that he gave him the least credit for being influenced by the kindness of friendship, or the steadiness of principle, or the magnanimous sacrifice of personal considerations to either friendship or duty. It must, of course, be absolutely impossible that Lord Melbourne should have left his opinions and his expectations doubtful upon this head, or ever expressed any feelings of gratitude, much less any indications of being sensibly touched by Lord Brougham's conduct towards him and his Government, when he was all the while penetrated with the conviction that Lord Brougham was only waiting for an occasion to vent "his long-suppressed and thus exasperated animosity" against his former friends and colleagues. If, indeed, this should not have been the case—if the very opposite should turn out to have been more nearly the fact—it must be confessed that both these Lords have been placed in situations quite unprecedented, though the one of those situations will, perhaps, upon reflection, be felt to be somewhat less enviable than the other. It is only consistent with fairness and candour towards a man who certainly never on any former occasion got into such a position, that it should be observed, how likely it is, after all, that Lord Melbourne's boast of his foresight and perspicacity, should be like his Canadian friend's* discovery of the way to deal with revolt—an afterthought—and that, in the heat of the moment, he patented himself in unfavourable colours, by extolling his sagacity at the expense of far more important qualities.

The logic of this is as powerful as the sarcasm is keen. A pungent note is attached to this preface, explanatory of the late memorable fracas which took place in the House of Lords, when Lord Brougham chanced to stumble upon the phrase "Queen Mother," applied to the Duchess of Kent, and was corrected by Lord Melbourne with more haste than good speed. Lord Melbourne interrupted, "Not Queen-Mother—mother of the Queen." "His noble and learned friend," more nettled than he might have been upon a more important occasion, retorted rather sharply and sarcastically, admitting that, in the phraseology of Courts, Lord Melbourne must be much better versed than himself. This drew forth the quip modest from the courtly minister, which again provoked an eloquent and indignant denial of the arts of courtiership from Lord Brougham. The affair is thus alluded to by him.

Lord Brougham made a very harmless observation upon a most notorious circumstance, that of Lord Melbourne living so constantly at Court; which he, of course, does in virtue of his office—though certainly none of his predecessors ever devoted so much of their time to this branch of their public duties. The charge of courtiership thus ridiculously levelled at Lord Brougham, he at once repelled, by stating that Lord Melbourne, who had thoughtlessly made it, must better than most men know, if he gave himself a moment's time for reflection, how utterly groundless it was. Indeed, all the world knew this very well; none so well, however, as Lord Brougham's former colleagues and the present Royal Family. For he it was who, though honoured with the late Duke of Kent's friendship and co-operation upon the great question of Education, (as referred to in the Slavery speech, 20th February 1838,) had nevertheless refused to withhold his opposition to that Prince's Lottery Bill in 1818, and caused his Royal Highness to withdraw it; a step which, as the constant enemy of Lotteries, he felt reluctantly obliged to take, notwithstanding his Royal Highness' urgent application; and to which the Duke ever after ascribed his great pecuniary embarrassments. Lord Melbourne and his colleagues must have also well known, that Lord Brougham's falling into disfavour with King William IV. was entirely owing to his pressing upon that Monarch the immediate formation of the Government under Lord Melbourne himself, and his sudden declaration in his place, that this Government was ready to continue in office—a step which wholly prevented his Majesty from executing his design of changing his Ministers, as he had hoped to do, if they had expressed any kind of reluctance to go on after Lord Grey's resignation. The same individuals also well knew his Majesty's severe displeasure and disappointment at Lord Brougham's peremptory refusal to take the Government in May 1832, when his Majesty was desirous that it should be reconstructed by him of persons willing to carry the Reform Bill; for it is believed that they both knew of his intercourse with his Majesty, and of the written correspondence on Lord Brougham's positive refusal. All this little indicates courtier-like habits.

The Melbourne Administration clearly owe office to that prompt intervention of Lord Brougham, which drew upon him the displeasure of the King. His check-mate to the Court was at once effectual: the Ministry, brought to a stand by the pettish secession of Lord Grey, was restored to office by the energy and promptitude of Lord Brougham. Nothing else could have kept them in place; and verily in their good faith and gratitude he has had his reward. For the sake of the country, we can rejoice that an overruling Providence has brought good out of evil, and restored Lord Brougham to his true place, his highest dignity, that of leader of the People, whose affection and gratitude will make up to him tenfold whatever he may have lost in court favour, and in the hollow friendship of his former colleagues. No meaner or more paltry intrigue ever debased a Cabinet than that by which he was cautiously, and cunningly, and under every hollow pretence, excluded from the Government he had saved. Thus does Europe look upon that pitiful transaction; and thus will posterity judge it.

Thus triumphantly does Lord Brougham in this place conclude the explanation of his public conduct, and his defence against factious or splanetic opposition. It is a subject to which he often returns:—

It is admitted by Lord Melbourne, that his help was never withheld from the Government until they made war upon popular rights last March, and turned their back upon popular opinions last November. Nor is it denied that he has, ever since he ceased to hold office, given up almost his whole time to judicial duties in the House of Lords and the Privy Council, labouring as hard as most of the Judges labour in the discharge of their professional duties. Moreover, if Lord Melbourne had spoken with the least reflection, he would have been aware that the facts of the case, which he wholly overlooked, are irreconcilably opposed to the intimations of his alleged foresight and acuteness. What does he think, for example, of his leaving entirely out of view the somewhat remarkable circumstance, that Lord Brougham's most active and necessary exertions to defend and uphold the Government, (a task somewhat heavier than Lord Melbourne is perhaps aware of,) were made immediately after its formation, when, of course, if at any time, Lord Brougham's differences with his former colleagues must have been the widest, upon the opposition of his listening to personal considerations? Then, again, having left out of his view this fact respecting the beginning of the period, how comes the noble Viscount to have equally passed over another fact which signalized its close—the Ministerial declaration against Reform? No attempt is here made to blame that policy; but at least these become could justify me in any indifference, in wholly leaving it out of view, as if it could by no possibility be connected with the matter in question.

It is further worthy of notice, that no complaints are ever made of Lord Brougham during the last two or three years, in any quarter deserving notice. A few anonymous writers, acting upon a mistaken sense of duty and not upon an erroneous calculation of what would gratify their patrons—amused themselves with very bitter and somewhat heavy, though harmless investigations against Lord Brougham, while he was daily sustaining these patrons with all zeal in the House of Lords. But the party, especially the cabinet portion of it, were always abundantly loud, and apparently hearty, in expressing their thanks for his public support; their only complaint being that he persisted in withdrawing himself from the intercourse of their private society, a restraint which he must have considered necessary to maintain his independence, also he assuredly never could have subjected himself to what must prove a great loss of enjoyment to him, though it could prove little or none to them. This, however, was the only complaint ever heard, until the change of tone which marked the ministerial declarations at the opening of the new Parliament.

He then refers to his Liverpool speech, that renewed pledge given to Reformers three years ago, which is printed in this collection, and which was widely distributed at the cost of one penny by the Liverpool Reformers at the time. That speech, of all he ever delivered, pledged Lord Brougham the most deeply to the popular cause; and, above all, to strenuous opposition to a Government conducted upon the principles—or with the want of all fixed principles—avowed by the Melbourne Ministry. Of that Ministry he thus prophesies the future course and ultimate fate:—

That there is any great danger of the people suddenly deserting the Government, and opposing them, is little to be apprehended. The people are disappointed, disheartened, and disgruntled—they are becoming distrustful of all public men of the regular Whig party, as they are hostile to all of the adverse faction, although from the latter they never could have less of Constitutional Reform, and probably would have more of important practical improvements; and, at least, their restoration to place would give back to the Liberal side many of its best supporters, who are, at present, trammelled by official connexion, and other ties hard to loosen. But, although the People are thus flat and indifferent—although they may do nothing to destroy the existing Ministry—they will not stir a finger to help it; the first quarrel with the Court will seal its doom; and the Whigs, as a party, will have ceased to rule. The Ministers see none of these things; they hear the voice of the charmer only, whose accents, modulated to the key of the ear he wishes to tickle, pour out only the pleasing fallacy, the harmonious misrepresentation, the silver-toned strain of hope, the cheerful note of confidence—and whose especial object it is to suppress all unpleasant discords from unwelcome facts and unfavourable symptoms.—That the People are friendly while they remain passive and do not oppose; that the select circle of the occupants of place, who rival the serpent, if not in his wisdom yet in his tenacity of life, form the whole Whig party; and that, if it is as all necessary to consult the opinions of any others, it is needless to go further than the outer circle—the eager, ardent, impracticable, restless expectants of promotion, who have no opinions at all except of their own fitness for place, nor any principles at all except that whatever the Ministry does, or indeed can do, must be right, and that the whole duty of political men is comprised in the words—“Support the Ministry.”—Such are the bland sentiments which compose the dearest notes of “kindred sweetness long drawn out,” and which ever vibrate grateful, unrequited, on the Ministerial ear. But that they beguile the reason while they charm the sense—that they lull their victim to sleep in the midst of peril, and bring on a sad reverse, which they make more hard to bear by precluding all preparation for it—are truths attested by all experience of all public men. In the present case their worst effect remains to be told. The deceiver tempts his dupes to their ruin, by inducing a belief that nothing they can do will forfeit the support of staunch friends; and it is discovered, when too late, that there may happen a catastrophe foretold by Lord Brougham in one of the Civil List debates, when he said—“That the people would one day awake and ring such a peal in the ears of Ministers as would be remembered, not merely to the end of their official existence, but to the last hour of the public life of the youngest functionary among them.”

The Slavery Speeches form a splendid group. They are arranged in sequence, including the speeches in the case of the Demerara Missionary, Smith. They commence with the speech delivered in 1810, shortly after Mr Brougham went into Parliament, which introduced his motion for making the Slave-Trade a capital felony, and conclude with his exposure of the eastern Slave-Trade—that new era in crime, that recommencement of the iniquities and horrors of the Trade—which was delivered in March last, and which is to be considered as one of the most important speeches he ever delivered in Parliament. It is a strangling of the monster in the birth; for never, never, can the people of England lose sight of the eastern Slave-Trade, until they obtain every guarantee, that the enormous wickedness swept from one quarter of the world, after a struggle of a half century, shall not be revived by British subjects, in another, and under the immediate sanction of Great Britain.

Sketches of the more remarkable men among the friends of the Negroes, or rather of the first principles of eternal justice—for it is the same thing—are prefixed to this brilliant group of speeches. From these we select this account of the venerable Thomas Clarkson, which is recommended by its brevity:—

Granville Sharpe was followed in his bright course by Thomas Clarkson, of whom it has been justly said, (nor can higher praise be earned by man,) that to the great and good qualities of Las Casas—his benevolence—his unwearied perseverance—his inflexible determination of purpose—piety which would honour a saint—courage which would accomplish a martyr—he added the sound judgment and strict sense of justice which were wanting in the otherwise perfect character of the Spanish philanthropist. While pursuing his studies at Cambridge, he made the Slave Trade the subject of an Essay, which gained one of the University prizes, and this accident having called his special attention to the iniquity of that execrable commerce, he devoted his life to waging an implacable hostility with it. The evidence which he collected and brought before a committee formed to obtain its abolition, drew the attention of Mr Wilberforce, and secured at once the services of that great man as the leader in the cause.

It is an unhappy circumstance that Lord Brougham should be able to state, in his speeches on the Missionary Smith's case, that his late colleagues, Lord Palmerston, Mr William Lamb, now Lord Melbourne, and Mr Charles Grant, now Lord Glenelg, all of them then Members of the Tory government, should have opposed his motion of inquiry—“thus giving to the country, & he apostrophically remarks, “an early pledge of these principles so hostile to Colonial liberty, on which they have since acted." Lord Brougham's Speeches on Slavery, during the present session, have, if that be possible, exceeded in power and eloquence, depth and ardour of feeling, those of his earlier days; but, as the latter are fresh in every one's recollection, we shall go farther back for a short specimen. This occurs in the speech on the Missionary's case:—

The right honourable gentleman [Mr Canning] seems much disposed to quarrel with the title of martyr, which has been given him. For my own part, I have no fault to find with it; because I deem that man to deserve the name, as in former times he would have reaped the honours of martyrdom, who willingly suffers for conscience. Whether I agree with him or not in his tenets, I respect his sincerity, I admire his zeal; and when, through that zeal, a Christian minister has been brought to die the death, I would have his name honoured and holden in everlasting remembrance. His blood cries from the ground—but not for vengeance! He expired, not imprecating curses upon his enemies, but praying for those who had brought him to an untimely grave. It cries aloud for justice to his memory, and for protection to those who shall tread in his footsteps, and—tempering their enthusiasm by discretion; uniting with their zeal knowledge; forbearance with firmness; patience to avoid giving offence, with courage to meet oppression, and to resist when the powers of endurance are exhausted—shall prove themselves worthy to follow him, and worthy of the cause for which he suffered. If there is a holy duty, it is ours to shield them, in discharging it, from that injustice which has persecuted the living, and has sought to blot the memory of the dead.

The Ministry were hard pressed on this occasion; but that convenient and useful commodity, "The previous question," carried by a majority of about forty, saved them. The meaning of the previous question, as a defensive weapon, is, by the way, felicitously described in the sketch of Mr Creevey. At the Liverpool election of 1812, when Mr Brougham was invited to stand on the liberal interest, Creevey, in addressing the populace, observed:—"You often hear, when any of our irregular partisans have framed a motion against some public defaulter, that it is said to be got rid of by the Previous Question. Now, you may just as well know what this means. It is, that the whole House says, 'All these things are very true, and we have no answer to make; and, therefore, the less that is said about the matter the better.'" Mr Creevey, we are told, and may notice in this place, kept a minute journal of political as well as personal occurrences for thirty years; which Lord Brougham thinks is likely to contain more interesting materials for secret and general history than any collection ever made in this country.

From the earlier Slavery Speeches we shall cull another sentence or two. The orator is charging those engaged as merchants in the trade with murder, and he continues—

I must protest loudly against the abuse of language which allows such men to call themselves traders or merchants. It is not commerce, but crime that they are driving. I too well know, and too highly respect that right honourable and useful pursuit, that commerce whose province it is to humanize and pacify the world—so alien to its nature to violence and fraud—so formed to flourish in peace and in honesty—so inseparably connected with justice, and good will, and fair-dealing. I deem too highly of it, to endure that its name should, by a strange perversion, be prostituted to the use of men who live by treachery, rapine, torture, and murder, and are habitually practising the worst of crimes, for the basest of purposes. When I say murder, I speak literally and advisedly. I mean to use no figurative phrase; and I know I am guilty of no exaggeration. I am speaking of the worst form of that crime. For ordinary murders, there may even be some excuse. Revenge may have arisen from the excess of feelings honourable in themselves. A murder of hatred, or cruelty, or mere blood-thirstiness, can only be imputed to a deprivation of reason. But here we have to do with cool, deliberate, mercenary murder—nay, worse than this; for the ruffians who go on the highway, or the pirates who infest the sea, at least expose their persons, and, by their courage, throw a kind of false glare over their crimes. But these wretches dare not do this. They employ others as base as themselves, only that they are less cowardly; they set on men to rob and kill, in whose spoils they are willing to share, though not in their dangers. Traders, or merchants, do they presume to call themselves?—and in cities like London and Liverpool—the very creations of honest trade? I will give them the right name at length, and call them cowardly suborners of piracy and mercenary murder!

That gross delusion—those shameless attempts formerly made to deceive the country, by individuals in an honourable station, and enjoying the world's esteem, which are here recorded—ought to make us pause over the equally flattering and delusive accounts given of the blessed condition of the Hill Coolies of India when brought to our western colonies. The passage we are to quote occurs in the Slavery Speech of 1830, which, Lord Brougham says, contributed much to his election for Yorkshire.

I hold in my hand the evidence of Lord Rodney, who swore before the Privy Council, that he never saw an instance of cruel treatment; that, in all the islands, "and," said his Lordship, "I knew them all," the negroes were better off in clothing, lodging, and food, than the poor at home, and were never in any case at all overworked. Admiral Barrington, rising in ardour of expression as he advanced in knowledge, declares that he has often wished himself in the condition of the slaves. Neither would I take the gallant Admiral at his own word, sanctioned though it be by an oath. I would not punish his temerity so severely as to consign him to a station, compared with which he would in four-and-twenty hours have become reconciled to the hardest fire in the most crazy bark that ever rocked on the most perilous wave; or even to the lot which our English seamen are the least injured to—the most disastrous combat that ever lowered his flag in dishonour and disgrace. But these officers confined not their testimony to the condition of slavery; they cast its pompous around the Slave-trade itself. They were just as liberal in behalf of the Guineaman as of those whom his coils were destined to enrich. They gave just as Arabian picture of the slave's deck and hold, as of the enviable fields whither she was fraught with a cargo of happy creatures, designed, by their felicitous destiny, to become what are called the cultivators of those romantic regions. "The slaves on board are comfortably lodged," says one gallant officer, "in rooms fitted up for them." "They are amused with instruments of music: when tired of music, they then go to games of chance." Let the inhabitants, or the frequenters of our club-houses hear this and cry:—those "famous wits," to whom St James's parliament are "native or hospitable," let them cast a longing look on the superior felicity of their sable brethren on the middle passage. They toil not, neither do they spin, yet have they found for them all earthly indulgences: food and raiment for nothing; music to charm the sense; and when, satiated with such enjoyment, the mind seeks change, games of chance are kindly provided by benevolent stimulate the many appetite. "The slaves," adds the Admiralty, "are all indulged in all their little humours." Whether some of these caprices might be to have themselves tied up from time to time, and incarcerated with a scourge, he has omitted to mention. "He had frequently," he says, "seen them, and as happy as any of the crew, it being the interest of the officers and men to make them so." But it is Admiral Evans who puts the finishing stroke to this fairy picture. "The arrival of a Guineaman," he says, "is known in the West Indies by the dancing and singing of the negroes on board."

It is thus that these cargoes of merry, happy creatures, torn from their families, their native fields, and their cottages, celebrate their reaching the land of promise, and that their coming is distinguished from the dismal landing of free English seamen, out of West India traders, or other receptacles of cruelty and wretchedness. But, if all the deductions of philosophy, and all the general indications of fact, loudly prove the unalterable wretchedness of colonial slavery, where, may it be asked, are the particular instances of its existence? Alas! there is no want of these; but I will only call out a few, dealing purposely with the mass rather by sample than by breaking its solid bulk. I shall illustrate, by a few examples, the effects of slavery in communities to the exertions of which we are bid to look for the mitigation and final extinction of that horrid condition.

We forbear citing any of those flagrant cases; but are compelled to remark, that, if Lord Brougham had been more severe upon the naval service than Lord Minto—catching at anything which could be turned against one who no longer supported every act of the Ministry—has ventured to affirm, those respectable individuals in that service, who delivered the above testimony, certainly gave some ground for the prejudice which Lord Brougham denies entertaining.

As we cannot notice everything in these teeming volumes, we shall pass abruptly to the sketch of the character of Mr Bentham, which occurs in the Introduction to the speech on Law Reform. It is one with which, we should imagine, the most devoted disciple of that philosopher will declare himself satisfied.

The age of law reform and the age of Jeremy Bentham are one and the same. He is the father of the most important of all the branches of Reform, the leading and ruling department of human improvement. No one before him had ever seriously thought of exposing the defects in our English system of jurisprudence. All former students had confined themselves to learn its principles—to make themselves masters of its eminently technical and artificial rules; and all former writers had but expounded the doctrines handed down from age to age. Men, by common consent, had agreed in bending before the authority of former times as decisive upon every point; and confounding the question of, What is the law, which that authority alone could determine, with the question, What ought to be the law, which the wisdom of an early and an unenlightened age was manifestly unfit to solve, they had taken it for granted that the system was perfect because it was established, and had bestowed upon the produce of ignorance and inexperience their admiration in proportion as it was defective. He it was who first made the mighty step of trying the whole provisions of our jurisprudence by the test of expediency, fearlessly examining how far each part was connected with the rest; and, with a yet more undaunted courage, inquiring how far even its most consistent and symmetrical arrangements were framed according to the principle which should pervade a Code of Laws—their adaptation to the circumstances of society, to the wants of men, and to the promotion of human happiness.

Mr Bentham, professing to regard no existing law as of any value, unless it was one which ought to have been made, wholly unfettered himself from any deference to authority, bringing the foundations of principles, as well as the details of each legislative rule, to the test of reason alone—trying all by the criterion of their tendency to promote the happiness and improve the condition of mankind—not only shewing in detail the glaring inconsistencies and the radical imperfections of the English system, but carrying his bold and sagacious views to their amplest extent, investigated the principles upon which all human laws should be constructed, and shewed how their provisions should be framed for the better accomplishment of their great purpose—the well-being of civil society, both as regards the enjoyment of civil rights, the prevention of crimes, and the encouragement of virtue. The adaptation of these principles to the particular circumstances of any given state, can only be ascertained by a careful examination of those circumstances, and, above all, by an accurate attention to the laws already existing in the country, and which, how ill sever contrived in many respects, have always, more or less, arisen out of those very circumstances. This is the business of Codification, which consists in not only reducing to a system and method the existing laws, but in so amending them as to make them capable of accomplishing their cardinal object—the happiness of the community.

In thus assigning to Mr Bentham, not merely the first place among Legal Philosophers, but the glory of having founded the Sect, and been the first who deserved the name, it cannot be intended to deny that other writers preceded him, who wisely and fearlessly exposed the defects of existing systems. Voltaire, for example, great and original in whatever pursuit—whether of letters or of science, whether of gay or of grave composition—was enlightened by his extraordinary genius, had, with his characteristic vigour and sagacity, attacked many false principles that prevailed in the judicial systems of all nations. Rillancourt, who of all writers before Bentham comes nearest to the character of a Legal Philosopher, had exposed, with the happiest effect, the folly as well as cruelty of severe penal inflictions; Montesquieu, whose capacity as well as his learning, is unquestionable, notwithstanding his puerile love of epigram, and his determination to strain and force all facts within the scope of a fantastical theory, had discussed with success many important principles of general jurisprudence; and Mr Locke, a far more illustrious name, had treated with his wonted profundity and accurate reflection, many of the principles which bear upon the political branches of legislation. But none of these great men, nor any of the others through whose writings important and useful discussions of legislative principles are scattered, ever embraced the subject in its wider range, or attempted to reduce the whole of jurisprudence under the dominion of fixed and general rules. None ever, before Mr Bentham, took in the whole department of legislation. None before him can be said to have treated it as a science, and, by so treating, made it one. This is his pre-eminent distinction; to this praise he is most justly entitled; and it is as proud a title to fame as any philosopher ever possessed.

To the performance of the magnificent task which he had set before him, this great man brought a capacity, of which it is saying everything to affirm, that it was not inadequate to so mighty a labour.

After analyzing the higher qualities of Bentham's understanding, Lord Brougham proceeds:—

But he also excelled in the light works of fancy. An habitual displayer of eloquence, he was one of the most eloquent of men when it pleased him to write naturally, and before he had adopted that harsh style, full of involved periods and new-made words, which, how accurately soever it conveyed his ideas, was almost as hard to learn as a foreign language. Thus his earlier writings are models of force as well as of precision; but some of them are also highly rhetorical; nor are the justly celebrated "Defence of Uttery" and "Protest against Law Taxes," more finished models of moral eloquence, than the Address to the French Nation, and the Address to Colonial Emancipation is of an eloquence at once declamatory and argumentative.

After describing some of Bentham's habits and tastes, his dislike of conversation in which more than one took a part, and his low value for eloquence and poetry, Lord Brougham continues—and we think few persons qualified to judge will cavil at his statements, the result of intimate personal knowledge and close observation :—

The moral character of this eminent person was, in the most important particulars, perfect and unblemished. His honesty was unimpeachable; and his word might, upon any subject, be taken as absolutely conclusive, whatever motives he might have for distorting or exaggerating the truth. But he was, especially of late years, of a somewhat jealous disposition—betrayed impatience if to another was ascribed any part whatever of the improvements in jurisprudence, which all originated in his own labours, but to effect which different kinds of men were required—and even showed some disinclination to see any one interfere, although as a coadjutor, and for the furtherance of his own designs. It is said that he suffered a severe mortification in not being brought early in life into Parliament; although he must have felt that a worse service never could have been rendered to the cause he had most at heart, than to remove him from his own peculiar sphere to one in which, even if he had excelled, he yet never could have been nearly so useful to mankind. It is certain that he shewed, upon many occasions, a harshness as well as coldness of disposition towards individuals to whose unremitting friendship he owed great obligations; and his impatience to see the splendid reforms which his genius had projected, accomplished before his death, increasing as the time of his departure drew nigh, made him latterly regard even his most familiar friends only as instruments of reformation, and gave a very unamiable and indeed a revolting aspect of coolness to his feelings towards them. For the sudden and mournful death of one old and truly illustrious friend,* he felt, as he expressed, no pain at all; towards the person of a more recent friend, he never concealed his disrespect, because he disappointed some extravagant hopes which he had formed that the bulk of a large fortune, acquired by honest industry, would be expended in promoting Parliamentary influence to be used in furthering great political changes. Into all these unamiable features of his character, every furrow of which was deepened, and every shade darkened by increasing years, there entered nothing base or hypocritical. If he felt little for a friend, he pretended to no more than he felt. If his sentiments were tinged with asperity and edged with spite, he was the first himself to declare it; and no one formed a less favourable or a more just judgment of his weaknesses than he himself did, nor did any one pronounce such judgments with a severity that detected the confessions of his own candour. Upon the whole then, while, in his public capacity, he presented an object of admiration and of gratitude, in his private character he was formed rather to be respected and studied, than beloved.

From a character of Mr Mill, the disciple of Bentham, we select one short passage, as we are every day more and more convinced that its import lies at the foundation of all public virtue. The quality attributed to Mill is, indeed, if not the foundation of political independence, that vital principle without which it cannot long subsist :—

In all the relations of private life he was irreproachable; and he afforded a rare example of one born in humble circumstances, and struggling, during the greater part of his laborious life, with the inconveniences of restricted means, nobly maintaining an independence as absolute, in all respects, as that of the first subject in the land—an independence, indeed, which but few of the pampered children of rank and wealth are ever seen to enjoy. For he could at all times sustain his wishes within the limits of his resources; was firmly resolved that his own hands alone should ever minister to his wants; and would, at every period of his useful and virtuous life, have treated with indignation any project that should trammel his opinions or his conduct with the restraints which external influence, of whatever kind, could impose.

Sir James Mackintosh, like Lord Dudley, is one of the individuals whom those who have no means of judging them save by their writings and their public life—cool, but impartial readers—may fancy Lord Brougham has over-estimated; as we are inclined to think he has under-estimated Cobbett, and, perhaps, Major Cartwright. It was scarcely worth while to rake up the old Major's scanty Latinity. He entered the naval service a boy, and had, we presume, no pretensions to scholarship; but, as a public man of unimpeachable probity and unwavering fidelity to his principles, he might shame many a pure classic. Men of high intellect are sometimes not only apt to undervalue the less splendid qualities of honesty, sincerity, and boldness, but to underrate their influence. Yet, from the concluding sentence, it would not so seem of Lord Brougham :—

They alone who have experienced how much less easy it is to find unflinching supporters, than highly accomplished ones, for the People's cause, so often betrayed by the People's fickleness, can duly estimate the vast importance of such an advocate, and be fully aware how much more is to be hoped, in the conduct of great affairs, from dauntless courage and unwearied steadiness, than from the most brilliant gifts which nature can bestow, or culture improve.

In the subsequent part of the introduction to the Reform speech of 1831, Lord Brougham does ample justice, if not something more, to those individuals who in Parliament sustained the cause of Parliamentary Reform. We shall only notice Mr Lambton—Lord Durham—as it has been the cue of the Ministerial press, for some time back, to represent Lord Brougham as jealous of the Liberal Peer :—

After Lord Grey's removal to the Upper House, Sir Francis Burdett became the most unwearied* and powerful champion of reform; and the extensive influence which his station and abilities gave him with the people, had an incalculable effect in keeping alive their zeal for the question, at times when extraordinary efforts were required to prevent its total extinction. Mr Lambton's motion in 1821, though his plan was exposed to many serious objections, was of very great service to the question, supported as it was by the influence out of doors, as well as in debate, which his talents, his spirit, and his fortune gave to whatever cause he chose to espouse. But no one did more real and lasting service to the question than Lord John Russell, whose repeated motions, backed by the progress of the subject out of doors, had the effect of increasing the minority in its favour—inasmuch that, when he last brought it forward in 1826, Mr Canning, finding he could only defeat it by a comparatively small majority, pronounced the question substantially carried.

The faults of the Reform Bill, and the remedies suggested for its imperfections, are of far more consequence than the past services of aristocratic peers and renegade baronets, who, when

* We are rather at a loss to perceive how the splendid services of either Sir Francis Burdett or Mr Lambton—efforts few and long between—should be termed "unwearied."—E. T. M.

THEIR words were about to germinate into action, have always drawn back. This important passage also occurs in the Introduction to the Reform Speech:—

It is doubtful if the great feature of the Reform, and that which chiefly recommended it to the country, has not been carried too far. In November 1830, when Mr Brougham, then member for Yorkshire, in the redemption of the pledge given to his constituents, gave notice of a motion for Parliamentary Reform, which was to have come on the day that the Tory Ministry resigned, he announced to a meeting of members held in Lord Althorp's chambers, that he should propose to cut off, at the least, one member from every close borough, and to abolish some of these boroughs altogether; but that he greatly questioned the expediency of wholly abolishing this class of seats, regard being had to certain practical uses which they served. Their total extinction by the Bill may have been right; but then, provision has not been made for those practical uses thus lost. A public servant, as an Attorney-General, for instituting a necessary, though unpopular prosecution, or a Chancellor of Exchequer, for maintaining a requisite but odious tax, may lose their seats, and thus hamper an administration—nay, even occasion its dissolution. Since the bill passed, it has actually happened that, the Attorney-General being excluded from Parliament during a whole session, all the measures for reforming the law were stopped for a year. It is pretty certain that some changes in the distribution of office, which are now much called for, cannot be attempted, on account of the determination, probably a temporary determination, of some populous places, not to return the official persons who now represent them. To remedy this great defect, the giving seats without votes to certain members of the Government has often been proposed; and the subject was broached in the House of Lords, when the bill was under discussion. To enable a person to change his office without vacating his seat, would be a less violent change, and would answer some at least of the same purposes.

The number of small constituencies created by the Bill is yet a greater defect. There are now above a hundred members chosen by towns which have not above two hundred voters. The evils of this are enormous. Each such burgh is as bad as the worst class of the old burghs, and by far the most corrupt of all, with the single but great exception of non-resident voters being no longer empowered to vote—an exception which limits the expense of the elections, without at all limiting the bribery practised in the several places. To remedy this glaring defect, it is certain that all householders whatever should vote, which was the plan about to be proposed by Mr Brougham in November 1830. The restriction to ten-pound householders is in every respect objectionable; and in none more than this, that it is a perfectly different qualification in different places—that sum answering to a large house and a good income, in remote country towns, while, in the capital and neighbouring burghs, no house, even the meanest, and occupied by the poorest person, is rated under double the amount.

But the gross inequality of the distribution is still more to be reprobated. A million of persons and an enormous wealth, in one or two counties, have no greater wealth in the scale of Parliamentary influence than a few hundred poor persons in some obscure town. It is plain that while this inequality continues, little confidence can be given to the resolutions of the Commons as an indication of the public opinion.

The duration of Parliament is clearly far too long. Members chosen while the state of the Sovereign's life presents the prospect of a six or seven years' seat, never think of their constituents any more than if they had none. The most striking examples of this have been afforded during the past Session. No Minister could have obtained the very discreditable votes which the enemies of Negro emancipation, friends of the planters, have obtained, had a general election been at hand. But when five or six years must elapse before the day of reckoning arrives, men of feeble principles, and greedy of promoution, or eager to share in the disposition of public patronage, disregard the dissent and undrawn discipline of their constituents, and only seek to escape the more swift wrath of the Minister. Triennial Parliaments ought most certainly to be substituted for septennial.

The necessity of securing the electors by the plan of secret voting, seems, at length, to have forced itself on the minds of those formerly most reluctant to entertain the subject of the Ballot. To tenants this would assuredly afford no protection; it seems, however, clear that it would be some shelter to tradesmen; and the votes at the last general election appear to show that some such protection is necessary, if town elections are to be other than a farce.

But a large extension of the suffrage is the one thing needful; nor can any consistent Reformer feel very clearly in favour of the Ballot, while so few classes have the right to vote at all. The mere household qualification will clearly not suffice. That comprehends many of the least enlightened and least independent classes in society—persons always looking up to rank and fortune, and ever ready to square their conduct to the wishes of those who possess them; while it wholly excludes the better informed, more virtuous, and incomparably more independent, and less time-serving class of workmen, who have struggled to educate themselves, and are less beholden to their employers than these are to them. No one, however, can desire to let in any ignorant and profligate person, merely because he is twenty-one years of age, and not insane or convicted of a crime. Therefore an education qualification seems on every account to be the fittest. Lord Brougham's Education Bill provides for this in all votes respecting school affairs, not even there being conceived a reason why it should not be extended to Parliamentary elections.

How far all or any of these salutary and even necessary improvements may be introduced into our new Parliamentary constitution within a few years, there are no means of conjecturing. The existing Government have declared against all further change. Arragating to the authors of the Bill an infallibility never before ascribed to any men, and a power of foreseeing future events which no human being can be gifted with, they have decided that the unerring and prophetic wisdom of 1831 cannot be appealed from; and that all we now complain of must be endured, rather than alter a final measure, and charge its authors with the proneness to err which had heretofore been imagined to be the lot of man. This delusion will continue as long as Members of Parliament shall regard their own personal interest in promotion and patronage as of more value to them than the favour of their constituents, and the goodwill of the people at large. But, in the meantime, the confidence of the country is wholly alienated from its Government, and the representative body enjoys fully less of the public esteem and respect than those whom, a few years ago, men used to taunt with holding the power of making laws by an hereditary title. It would be well if their own election had bestowed a better spirit of conduct with a title supposed to be so much more valid.

In the general preface to the four volumes of collected speeches, Lord Brougham enunciates the true principle of all history which aspires to be more than an "old almanac," in stating that the most satisfactory, indeed the only accurate manner of giving the history of the times, must always be to give, as he has done, "an account of the persons who bore the chief part in their transactions. This is more or less true of all annals; but it is peculiarly so of political annals." He proceeds—"It is not, however, by those pieces of composition which abound in many histories, under the name of 'Characters,' that anything like this knowledge can be conveyed.

Without any regard to fine writing, measured and balanced periods, or neat and pointed antitheses, the personages must be described such as they really were, by a just mixture of general remarks, and references to particular passages in their lives." On these principles, which he has fully developed in the preface, Lord Brougham has described the most influential personages that have borne a conspicuous part in the political transactions of his own period. We are only left to regret that, as is said of those endowed with second-sight, he cannot see himself.

Among the individuals described, and, as we conceive, with favourable prepossessions, are Mr Creevey, Lord Dudley, Mr Wilberforce, Mr Stephens, Mr Roscoe, Mr Horner, and a few more. His general appreciation of character is generous as well as discriminating; and, if there be excess, it is on the side of indulgence and good-nature. With only one exception, which applies, we presume, to the Emperor Alexander, the Sketches are described "as the result of personal observation, and, in general, of intimate acquaintance; so that each individual may be said to have sat for his picture." The object of the publication, at this time, is stated explicitly. It is to fix public attention upon some of the subjects most important to mankind. This object, and the manner in which the delicate task has been executed, with total disregard to the relations of friendship or enmity, whether political or personal, introduces the following admirable observations:—

Party connexion is indeed beneficial as long as it only binds together those who, having formed their opinions for themselves, are desirous of giving them full effect. But so much abuse has generally attended such leagues, that reflecting men are now induced to reject them altogether. Their greatest evil certainly is the one most difficult to be shunned—their tendency to deliver over the many to the guidance of the few, in matters where no dominion ever should be exercised—to make the opinions adopted by leading men pass current, without any reflection, among their followers—to enfeeble and corrupt the public mind, by discouraging men from thinking for themselves—and to lead multitudes into courses which they have no kind of interest in pursuing, in order that some designing individuals may gain by their folly or their crimes. As society advances, such delusions will become more and more difficult to practise; and it may safely be affirmed, that hundreds now-a-days discharge the sacred duty to themselves and their country, of forming their own opinions upon reflection, for one that had disenfranchised himself thirty years ago.

The first speech in the collection, is that made in the case of John and Leigh Hunt, who had copied an article into the Examiner from Drakard's Stamford News, on military punishments. The alleged libel was written by the lamented John Scott, the editor of The Champion, whom Lord Brougham mentions with respect and commendation, as honourably distinguished by several literary works. The Hunts were acquitted; but Lord Brougham's other client, Mr Drakard, who refused to give up the author of the paragraph, was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment! So much more dangerous may a libel be, if published in Liverpool than in a widely circulated journal in London! Among the many topics discussed in these volumes is the existing law of libel, for the improvement of which many admirable suggestions are made. The great speech on the trial of Queen Caroline appears second in order, and is followed by the other cases which arose out of that trial. The recent publication of Lady Charlotte Bury's book, and Lord Brougham's late article in The Edinburgh Review, have, however, restored the recollection of that unequalled effort of the power of the advocate, and the skill and acuteness of the lawyer; besides, to understand the full merits of that speech, it would require to be read in connexion with the evidence. It remains among the very greatest efforts of human intellect; for it belongs to Lord Brougham's genius ever to rise with the magnitude of the occasion; and he spoke better than he had ever done before, because he felt more deeply and passionately the glorious part to which he was summoned, as the champion of justice and humanity. This was not alone the case of the Queen, but of all England, of all womanhood, of the most sacred rights of society, wantonly violated by the chief magistrate. But all this we pass for the present, save one clause in the Introduction. The clause we select contains a high, and probably deserved compliment to the sagacity of the Duke of Wellington.

The temper and disposition of the house on this memorable occasion, was observed to be anxiously watched by the King's friends; and the Duke of Wellington sat the whole night under the gallery, an attentive listener, and with frequent communications to and from those more immediately engaged in the conflict. All men now felt deep regret that this illustrious person had only of late betaken himself to the pursuits of civil life; for his penetrating sagacity, as well as his honourable feelings, would have been an ample security against suffering such a course as the King seemed bent upon pursuing, had his Grace been in a position to exercise his proper authority over his colleagues and his master, and to sway their councils as he has since done upon the most important occasions. Nor would the same security have been wanting for the country, had Lord Wellesley fortunately been in his appropriate position, at the helm of affairs. No one was calculated to have such influence over the royal mind; and no one would more certainly have exerted it in the direction which the best interests of the country, as well as the King's own honour, so plainly pointed out. But the counsels of inferior men prevailed; or rather, the resistance of inferior minds only was opposed to the vehemence of the royal will; and it was determined that a bill of pains and penalties should be introduced with all the influence of the crown, for the purpose of dissolving the marriage, and degrading the Queen-consort from her exalted station.

We are compelled to notice, that Lord Brougham is much too lenient in his judgment of the King's Ministers, and to every one nearly concerned, save Sir John Leach. Mr Denman, in supporting the Queen's petition to be heard by counsel, against a secret committee being appointed to examine her conduct in her absence, made a smart hit, which is thus alluded to:—

It was on this occasion that Mr Denman, in allusion to the well-known adviser of the Milan commission, Sir John Leach, whose counsels, so pleasing to the King, were supposed to be guided by the desire of supplanting Lord Eldon and obtaining the Great Seal, made that memorable quotation from Shakespeare which was so manifestly delightful to Lord Eldon, and certainly as distasteful to Sir John:—

"Some busy and bustling rogues,
Some coggling, cossening knave, to get some office
Hath devised this slander."

The Lords then appointed a secret committee, to whom papers, in a sealed green bag, were delivered.

Lord Brougham is warm in commendation of his coadjutor, Lord Denman, one of whose speeches on the trial is reported very fully. When he acknowledges that, merely to retain place, emolument, and favour, all the Government, and the Members of both Houses who really abhorred the measure, supported it, how severe is the implied condemnation!

All, with perhaps one exception, both of the Government and of both Houses, abhorred the measure; and, if they could have been sure that throwing it out immediately would not have occasioned a change of ministry, assuredly the bill never would have remained one hour in existence. But then, as in much later times, the great fear was of letting in the Opposition; and Tories were daily seen abandoning their whole principles, upon the pretence that they had no other way of preventing what, to their eyes, seemed the most formidable of all events—exactly as, in the present day, we have seen Whigs giving up their most sacred opinions, one after another, and attaching not the weight of a feather to retrenchment, and popular rights, and the progress of reform, and the rights of colonies, and the maintenance of peace, and the extinction of Slavery, and the prevention of the Slave Trade itself, when weighed in the balance against the one evil of a change which should let in their adversaries, and turn out their patrons from the dispensation of court favour.

One speech in the Queen's case was made by Mr Brougham, her Attorney-General, in the prosecution instituted against the Rev. Richard Blacow, for a most scurrilous and indecent libel delivered in a sermon from his own pulpit. The Queen was averse to prosecutions for libel. After the fiery trial she had sustained, tranquillity was the object of all her wishes. Her counsel complied with her desire; and "the consequence was that the press was polluted with a degree of malignity and impurity before wholly unknown." After alluding, at some length, to that black era in the annals of the public press, Lord Brougham relates that, in the flagrant case of Blacow, her Majesty's legal advisers resolved to prosecute. The occasion of that reverend person's slanderous sermon was the Queen going in procession to St Paul's to return public thanks for her providential deliverance from her enemies. This circumstance leads to the following striking passage:—

The wonderful spectacle which the great capital of the empire exhibited on that remarkable occasion, has never perhaps been adequately described. But it perhaps may be better understood if we add, that those who witnessed the extraordinary pomp of her present Majesty's visit to the Guildhall Banquet last November, and who also recollect the far more simple and unbought grandeur of the former occasion, treat any comparison between the two as altogether ridiculous. When Queen Caroline went to celebrate her triumph, and to thank God for "giving her the victory over all her enemies," the eye was met by no troops—no body-guards—no vain profusion of wealth—no costly equipages—no gorgeous attire—no heaping up of gold—no pride of heraldry—no pomp of power, except, indeed, the might that slumbered in the arms of myriads ready to die in her defence. But, in place of all this, there was that which the late solemnity wanted—a real occasion. It was the difference between make-believe and reality—between play and work—between representation and business—between the drama and the fact. When the young Queen moved through her subjects, she saw thousands of countenances lit up with hope, and beaming with good-will, and hundreds of thousands of faces animated with mere curiosity. Queen Caroline had been oftentimes seen by all who then beheld her; she had been long known to them; her whole life had but recently been the subject of relentless scrutiny; hope from her of any kind there was none. All that she was ever likely to do, she had already done; but she had been despitely used and persecuted; she had faced her enemies and defied their threats, dared them to the combat, and routed them with disgrace. In her person justice had triumphed; the People had stood by her, and had shared in her immortal victory. The solemnity of November 1820, was the celebration of that great event; and, although they who partook of it had no sordid interests to pursue, no selfish feeling of any kind to gratify; although they were doing an act that, instead of winning any smile from royalty, drew down the frowns of power, and were steering counter to the stream of court favour, adown which Englishmen, of all people in the world, are the most delighted to glide; yet the occasion was one of such real feeling, so much the commemoration of a real and a great event, and the display of practical and determined feelings, pointed to a precisely defined and important object, that its excitement baffles all description, and cannot be easily comprehended by those who only witnessed the comparatively tame and unmeaning pageant of November 1837.

A verdict was obtained against the reverend slanderer, who doubled his offence by the speech he delivered in Court when acting as his own counsel. He was sentenced—heavy penalty!—to three months' imprisonment! But then he was sentenced in the Court of King's Bench, which condemned the Hunts to two years' confinement, and a fine of £1000, for what Lord Brougham calls a far less slanderous attack on the Prince Regent, though many will be inclined to regard it merely as a piece of rather coarse pleasantry. Some years after the trial of Blacow, Mr Daniel Whittle Harvey and his printer were tried for a libel on George IV., published in a country paper. It was, in Lord Brougham's opinion, probably the worst case of libel ever brought before the Court; and we may guess the measure of punishment, save for the opportune interference of Mr Brougham, who, when sentence was about to be pronounced, suggested to Mr Harvey, that Blacow, for his scandalous sermon against the late Queen, had only been sentenced to three months' imprisonment. The Judges expressed much displeasure at Mr Brougham's interference, as he was not the counsel of either defendant; but they yet took shame to them, and let Mr Harvey off with the same term of imprisonment as Blacow. It is no unfair inference that at least twenty-one months were thus added to the free life of Mr Harvey.

Upon the death of "Caroline of Brunswick, the murdered Queen of England," the clergy of Durham gave orders that the customary practice, on the death of any member of the Royal Family, of tolling the bells of all cathedrals and churches, should be departed from. Mr Ambrose Williams, the editor of the Durham Chronicle, a Liberal newspaper, wrote and published some remarks on this spiteful and pitiful proceeding, which are admirable for their justice and spirit, and which, were they now attempted to be prosecuted as libellous, would only draw fresh libel cule upon the reverend plaintiffs. The case was argued in the King's Bench, and finally tried at the Durham assizes in August 1822—while the King was about to make a progress in Scotland. The ecclesiastical condition of that part of the island is alluded to in the speech in this felicitous strain:—

His Majesty, almost at the time in which I am speaking, is about to make a progress through the northern provinces of this island, accompanied by certain of his chosen counsellors, a portion of men who enjoy unenvied, and in an equal degree, the admiration of other countries, and the wonder of their own—and there the Prince will see much loyalty, great learning, some splendour, the remains of an ancient monarchy, and of the institutions which made it flourish. But one thing he will not see. Strange as it may seem, and to many who hear me incredible, from one end of the country to the other he will see no such thing as a bishop; not such a thing is to be found from the Tweed to John o' Groats; not a mitre; no, nor so much as a minor canon, or even a rural dean; and in all the land not one single curate, so entirely rude and barbarous are they in Scotland; in such utter darkness do they sit, that they support no cathedrals, maintain no pluralists, suffer no non-residence; nay, the poor benighted creatures are ignorant even of tithes. Not a sheep, or a lamb, or a pig, or the value of a plough-penny do the hapless mortals render from year's end to year's end! Piteous as their lot is, what makes it infinitely more touching, is to witness the return of good for evil in the demeanour of this wretched race. Under all this cruel neglect of their spiritual concerns, they are actually the most loyal, contented, moral, and religious people anywhere, perhaps, to be found in the world. Let us hope (many, indeed, there are, not afar off, who will with unfeigned devotion pray) that his Majesty may return safe from the dangers of his excursion into such a country—an excursion most perilous to a certain portion of the Church, should his royal mind be infected with a taste for cheap establishments, a working clergy, and a pious congregation.

But the compassion for our brethren in the north has drawn me aside from my purpose, which was merely to remind you how preposterous it is in a country of which the ecclesiastical polity is framed upon plans so discordant, and the religious tenets themselves are so various, to require any very measured expressions of men's opinions upon questions of church government. And if there is any part of England in which an ample license ought more especially to be admitted in handling such matters, I say without hesitation it is this very Bishopric, where, in the nineteenth century, you live under a Palestine Prince, the Lord of Durham; where the endowment of the hierarchy, I may not call it enormous, but I trust I shall be permitted without offence to term splendid; where the establishment I dare not whisper proves grinding to the people, but I will rather say is an incalculable, an inscrutable blessing—only it is prodigiously large; showered down in a profusion somewhat overpowering; and laying the inhabitants under a load of obligation overwhelming by its weight. It is in Durham where the Church is endowed with a splendour and a power unknown in monkish times and Popish countries, and the clergy swarm in every corner, an' it were the patrimony of St Peter—it is here where all manner of conflicts are at each moment inevitable between the people and the priests, that I feel myself warranted on their behalf, and for their protection—for the sake of the Establishment, and as the discreet advocate of that Church and that clergy—for the defence of their very existence—to demand the most unrestrained discussion for their title and their actings under it. For them in this age, to screen their conduct from investigation is to stand self-convicted; to shrink from the discussion of their title, is to confess a flaw; he must be the most shallow, the most blind of mortals, who does not at once perceive that if that title is protected only by the strong arm of the law, it becomes not worth the parchment on which it is engrossed; or the wax that dangles to it for a seal. I have hitherto all along assumed, that there is nothing impure in the practice under the system; I am admitting that every person engaged in its administration does every one act which he ought, and which the law expects him to do; I am supposing that up to this hour not one unworthy member has entered within its pale; I am even presuming that up to this moment not one of those individuals has stepped beyond the strict line of his sacred functions, or given the slightest offence or annoyance to any human being. I am taking it for granted that they all set the part of good shepherds, making the welfare of their flock their first care, and only occasionally bethinking them of shearing in order to prevent the too luxuriant growth of the fleece proving an encumbrance, or to eradicate disease. If however, these operations be so constant that the flock actually live under the knife; if the shepherds are so numerous, and employ so large a troop of the watchful and eager animals that attend them (some of them, too, with a cross of the fox, or even the wolf, in their breed) can it be wondered at, if the poor creatures, thus fleeced, and hunted, and barked at, and snapped at, and from time to time worried, should now and then bleat, dream of preferring the rot to the shears, and draw invidious, possibly disadvantageous comparisons between the wolf without and the shepherd within the fold—it cannot be helped; it is in the nature of things that suffering should beget complaint; but for those who have caused the pain to complain of the outcry, and seek to punish it—for those who have goaded to scourge and to gag—is the meanest of all injustice. It is, moreover, the most pitiful folly for the clergy to think of retaining their power, privileges, and enormous wealth, without allowing free vent for complaints against abuses in the Establishment, and delinquency in its members; and in this prosecution they have displayed that folly in its supreme degree. I will even put it that there has been an attack on the hierarchy itself; I do so for argument's sake only; denying all the while, that anything like such an attack is to be found within the four corners of this publication. But suppose it had been otherwise; I will shew you the sort of language in which the wisest and the best of our countrymen have spoken of that Establishment. I am about to read a passage in the immortal writings of one of the greatest men—I may say, indeed, the greatest genius, which this country, or Europe, has in modern times produced. You shall hear what the learned and pious Milton has said of prelacy.

Mr Brougham read the passage, which could not have been the least galling part of his address, and added—"If Mr Williams had dared to publish the tithe part of what I have just read—if anything in sentiment or in language approaching to it were to be found in his paper—I should not stand before you with the confidence I now feel." Mr Brougham strengthened his case by reading other extracts, from Bishop Burnet and from Hartley. Mr Scarlett, the Attorney-General and counsel of the Durham clergy, in the course of his speech affirmed that they had shewn all fitting respect for the Queen. This pretence drew forth this noble burst of withering sarcasm and indignant eloquence.

According to him they stand in a peculiarly unfortunate situation; they are, in truth, the most injured of men. They all, it seems, entertained the same generous sentiments with the rest of their countrymen, though they did not express them in the old, free, English manner, by openly condemning the proceedings against the late Queen; and after the course of unexampled injustice against which she victoriously struggled had been followed by the needless infliction of inhuman torture, to undermine a frame whose spirit no open hostility could daunt, and extinguish a life so long embittered by the same foul arts—after that great Princess had ceased to harass her enemies (if I may be allowed them to speak, applying, as they did, by the perversion of all language, those names to the victim which belong to the tormentor)—after her glorious but unhappy life had closed, and that Princely head was at last laid low by death, which, living, all oppression had only the more illustriously exalted—the venerable the Clergy of Durham, I am now told for the first time, though less forward in giving vent to their feelings than the rest of their fellow-citizens—though not so vehement in their indignation at the matchless and unmanly persecution of the Queen—though not so unbridled in their joy at her immortal triumph, nor so loud in their lamentations over her mournful and untimely end—did, nevertheless, in reality, all the while, deeply sympathize with her sufferings, in the bottom of their reverend hearts! When all the resources of the most ingenious cruelty hurried her to a fate without parallel—if not so clamorous as others, they did not feel the least of all the members of the community—their grief was in truth too deep for utterance—sorrow along round their bosoms, weighed upon their tongues, stifled every sound—and, when all the rest of mankind, of all sects and of all nations, freely gave vent to the feelings of our common nature, THEIR silence, the contrast which THEY displayed to the rest of their species, proceeded from the greater depth of their affliction; they said the less because they felt the more!—Oh! talk of hypocrisy after this! Most consummate of all the hypocrites! After instructing your chosen, official advocate to stand forward with such a defence—such an exposition of your motives—to dare utter the word hypocrisy, and complain of those who charged you with it! This is indeed to insult common sense, and outrage the feelings of the whole human race! If you were hypocrites before, you were downright, frank, honest hypocrites to what you have now made yourselves—and, surely, for all you have ever done, or ever been charged with, your worst enemies must be satisfied with the humiliation of this day, its just atonement, and ample retribution!

Gentlemen, if the country, as well as Mr Williams, has been all along so deceived, it must be admitted that it is not from the probabilities of the case. Judging before-hand, no doubt, any one must have expected the Durham clergy, of all men, to feel exactly as they are now, for the first time, ascertained to have felt. They are Christians; outwardly at least, they profess the gospel of charity and peace; they beheld oppression in its foulest shape; malignity and all uncharitableness putting on their most hideous forms; measures pursued to gratify prejudices in a particular quarter, in defiance of the wishes of the people, and the declared opinions of the soundest judges of each party; and all with the certain tendency to plunge the nation in civil discord. If for a moment they had been led away by a dislike of cruelty and of civil war, to express displeasure at such perilous doings, no man could have charged them with political meddling; and when they beheld truth and innocence triumph over power, they might, as Christian ministers, calling to mind the original of their own Church, have indulged without offence in some little appearance of gladness; a calm, placid satisfaction, on so happy an event, would not have been unbecoming their sacred station. When they found that her sufferings were to have no end; that new pains were inflicted in revenge for her escape from destruction, and new tortures devised to exhaust the vital powers of her whom open, lawless violence had failed to subdue—we might have expected some slight manifestation of disapproval from holy men who, professing to inculcate loving-kindness, tender mercy, and good will to all, offer up their daily prayers for those who are desolate and oppressed. When at last the scene closed, and there was an end of that persecution which death alone could stay; but when not even her unhappy fate could glut the revenge of her enemies; and they who had harassed her to death now exhausted their malice in reviling the memory of their victim; if among them had been found, during her life, some miscreant under the garb of a priest, who, to pay his court to power, had joined in trampling upon the defenceless; even such a one, bore he the form of a man, with a man's heart throbbing in his bosom, might have felt even his burning, scorching, emulating malignity assuaged by the hand of death; even he might have left the tomb to close upon the sufferings of the victim. All probability certainly favoured the supposition that the clergy of Durham would not take part against the injured, because the oppressor was powerful; and that the prospect of emolument would not make them witness with dry eyes and hardened hearts the close of a life which they had contributed to embitter and destroy. But I am compelled to say that their whole conduct has falsified those expectations. They sided openly, strenuously, forwardly, officiously, with power, in the oppression of a woman, whose wrongs this day they, for the first time, pretend to bewail in their attempt to cozen you out of a verdict, behind which they may skulk from the inquiring eyes of the people. Silent and subdued in their tone as they were on the demise of the unhappy Queen, they could make every bell in all their chimes peal when gain was to be expected by flattering present greatness. Then they could send up addresses, flock to public meetings, and load the press with their libels, and make the pulpit ring with their sycophancy, flinging up to the brim the measure of their adulation to the reigning monarch, Head of the Church and Disposer of its Patronage.

A dissertation on the law of libel and slander follows the case of the Durham clergy, to which we can merely refer the reader; and terminates a distinct group of speeches, connected with the prosecution of Queen Caroline.

Mr Brougham's speech, delivered in the House of Commons on January 1812, as counsel for the merchants and manufacturers of London, Liverpool, Manchester, &c. &c., in support of their petition against the Orders in Council, was, we believe, his first great appearance, and at once raised him to that station, both as a lawyer and in public business, which he has ever since held. Several weeks had been occupied in examining evidence at the bar, in which he was successfully assisted by Mr Baring, now Lord Ashburton, who has obtained a niche in Lord Brougham's Temple of Fame.

It is in this place that a sketch of Mr Stephen appears, of which we shall cite the conclusion, upon the same principle which dictated the selection of a paragraph referring to Mr Mill. Mr Stephens was a Tory, and a zealous supporter of the government of his personal friend, Perceval, who had brought him into Parliament. Three years after the death of Perceval—

He gave a memorable proof of his public virtue, by at once abandoning the Ministry, and resigning his seat in Parliament, because they pursued a course which he disapproved, upon the great subject of Colonial Slavery. He retired into private life, abandoned all the political questions in which he took so warm an interest, gave up the public business, in which he still had strength sufficient to bear a very active part, and relinquished without a struggle or a sigh all the advantages of promotion, both for himself and his family, although agreeing with the Government in every other part of their policy, because on that which he believed conscientiously to be the most important of all their practical views, they differed from his own. It would indeed be well if we had now and then instances of so rare a virtue; and they who looked down upon this eminent and excellent person, as not having answered the expectations formed of his Parliamentary career, or sneered at his enthusiastic zeal for opinions in his mind of paramount importance, would have done well to respect at a distance merit which they could not hope to imitate—perhaps could not well comprehend—merit beside which the lustre of the statesman's triumph and the orator's fame grows pale.

The liberal and manly section of the Whig Opposition of those times, as it is described in an able sketch of Mr Creevey, piteously dwarfs that liberal section of the ministerial party now. But, to be sure, in or out makes that small difference which a Reform Bill cannot obliterate. Mr Creevey was a very moderate Parliamentary Reformer. He fancied there might be things quite as bad as rotten or nomination boroughs that wore a fairer face—and he was not far wrong. Thus far he agreed with the Whigs of those days, on whom the glories of the Bill and the whole Bill! had not yet dawned.

But on other matters he had many wide differences with the regular leaders of his party. He despised the timidity which so often paralysed their movements; he disliked the jealousies, the personal predilections and prejudices which so frequently distracted their councils; he abhorred the spirit of intrigue, which not rarely gave some inferior man, or some busy meddling woman, probably unprincipled, a sway in the destiny of the party, fatal to its success, and all but fatal to its character; he held in utter ridicule the squeamishness both as to persons and things, which emasculated so many of the genuine, regular Whigs; and no considerations of interest—no relations of friendship—no regard for party discipline—(albeit, in other respects, a decided and professed party man, and one thoroughly sensible of the value of party concert)—could prevail with him to pursue that course so ruinous to the Whig opposition, of half-and-half resistance to the Government; marching to the attack with one eye turned to the Court, and one askance to the country, nor ever making war upon the Ministry without regarding the time when themselves might occupy the position now the object of assault.

This manly, straightforward view of things, not unaccompanied with expressions both as to men and measures, in which truth and strength seemed more studied than courtesy, gave no little offence to the patrician leaders of the party, who never could learn the difference between 1810 and 1780—still fancied they lived “in times before the flood” of the French Revolution, when the heads of a few great families could dispose of all matters according to their own good pleasure—and never could be made to understand how a feeble motion, prefaced by a feeble speech, if made by an elderly Lord, and seconded by a younger one, could fail to satisfy the country, and shake the Ministry. But Mr Creevey, and those who thought with him, such as Lord Folkestone (now Radnor) and General Ferguson, did not confine their dissidence to criticism, complaint, remonstrance. Their conduct kept pace with their language, and was framed upon the sentiments to which we have referred. Carefully avoiding any course that might give a victory to the common enemy, or retard the progress of their principles, they nevertheless often took a line of their own, bringing forward motions which were deemed too strong, as well as expressing opinions supposed to be too vehement, and opposing a resistance to many errors and abuses of the Government, which the more aristocratic portion of the Whig party were inclined either feebly to impugn, or altogether to pass over. On all that regarded the economy of the public money, still more on every instance of abuse, most of all on official corruption or delinquency of any kind, they were inexorable; nor did any sort of questions tend more to sow dissension between them and the party at large, than questions of this description, which involved considerations of economy and abuse, and of necessity led to personal charges, often against men in high rank and station. The inquiries respecting the Duke of York, and these cognate questions respecting public corruption, which grew out of that famous passage, first banded together this party, jocularly termed “The Mountain,” and drew a line of demarcation between them and the more regular portion of the Whigs.

What party in the Reformed Parliament, it may be asked, now represents these sturdy, independent partisans of the Whigs? We look for such in vain. Looking back upon periods when the enthusiasm of the People backed the patriotic Opposition in the House of Commons, and led to such grand results, his Lordship, in one of his Introductions, enters fully into the method by which the interests of the People were then successfully supported in Parliament.

Battle, then, for the People, was fought by the joint efforts of themselves out of doors, and of their supporters in the House of Commons, and by the mutual action and reaction of the House and the People upon each other. It is a battle which may always be renewed, and is always of certain success, on any ground naturally adapted to its movements—that is to say, wherever a great popular feeling can be excited and maintained, and wherever there are persons of firmness and spirit to set themselves at the head of the People, regardless of the frowns and threats of power. It is equally certain that such a fight never can be fought, with any chance of success, where the People are indifferent to the subject, and where they have no leaders in Parliament adequate to the occasion.

He details the means by which the Income Tax was abolished, and the tactics of the Government and of the Opposition in the Session of 1816; and proceeds thus emphatically, in a passage to which we crave the earnest attention of every Reformer:—

The same display which led to such important and even glorious success the cause of the People, in an un-reformed Parliament, is to the full as requisite now, and would produce, if possible, greater results. Neither Slavery, nor Limited Suffrage, nor Petty Constitutions, nor refusal of the Ballot would stand before it half a session. But unhappily it has seemed good to the Whig Government that they should adopt a course of proceeding which renders all the tactics of 1812 and 1816 impracticable. Forgetting what it was that raised them to power, the remote cause of the Tory downfall, the policy which produced all the triumphs of liberal opinions; forgetting, too, that, though now in office, they may to-morrow be restored to that Opposition from which the triumphs of 1812 and 1816 raised them—they have resolved that no petition shall now be discussed—that whoever presents it shall merely state its substance, after telling the body and the place it comes from—and that no other member shall make it the subject of any observation. To this plan for stifling the people's voice, and giving the Ministers of the day and their majority in Parliament an absolute control over the policy of the empire, disarming the Opposition of their main weapons, and shearing the People of their chief strength, the Speaker, Mr Abercromby, has unhappily lent the support of his authority, if he was not, indeed, the author of the scheme. It is of little moment to reflect that, but for the policy of former and better times, this distinguished and excellent person would now have been in the honourable but cheerless exile of an Edinburgh sinecure judgeship, as his ministerial coadjutors would have been doomed to exclusion from power on the benches of an eternal opposition. It is of more importance to remark, that, unless a speedy end is put to the present course of proceeding, the mainstay of English liberty, the only effectual safeguard against misgovernment and oppression, is taken from the people of these realms.

That valuable time may sometimes be wasted in discussing frivolous petitions, is unquestionable. Still the evil created is so infinitely greater than that abated by the innovating practice, that it ought not to be allowed another day's existence.

SISMONDI'S STUDIES OF FREE CONSTITUTIONS.*

OF all those prejudices which retard the progress of nations, and bias the elements of political opinion, there is one in particular whose effects have, to this day, been of so fatal a nature that we seize with delight an opportunity of attacking it. We refer to that crudity which substitutes individuals for principles, and grants to the former a degree of authority which belongs only to the latter; which merely requires of political characters a few demonstrations, a few guarantees of good intentions in the past, to yield them, with a blind confidence, the task of constructing the future, and confounds, at every instant, two things radically distinct—the intellectual power which has led the way to an idea of progression, a conception of reform, and the intellectual power which is to develop, to realize, and to apply it.

Movement is eternal. The developement of a people is accomplished progressively, according to a law of continuousness, whose action may be concealed to the eye, but cannot be destroyed or broken. The Present, child of the Past, is the parent of the Future, and cannot, without ingratitude and folly, reject the heritage of the ages which have gone before; but is bound to transmit it, augmented and improved, to the ages which shall follow, which, in their turn, will also augment and improve this heritage. The individual is a finite creature, limited in his faculties of realization and foresight. The human intellect, vast as it may be, cannot embrace and comprehend all. Thence it is, that association is the only instrument capable of accomplishing the task; thence it is that the People, an aggregation of every faculty and every agency, is the sole power, whence, in the last resort, springs progression. To the chain of labours a chain of labourers is required. In that complex action which is working itself out in human society, each man has his time, his part, and his function. More than this we cannot and ought not to require.

If every man would convince himself of a truth so simple as that which we have just enunciated; if every man would conform to this truth, his practical habits, his studies, his actions, his entire life; above all, if it were always in the recollection of those whom circumstances, the accident of their position, or their talents, may, for any period, advance to the political, intellectual, or social direction of their fellow-citizens; if they would repeat to themselves each day, as the presiding maxim of their career, that they are, after all, but the product, the echo of their time; that the life of the People forms, at least, two-thirds of themselves and all their ideas; that another age will come; that the People, their inspirer, will not die with them, will not remain motionless before their tombs, but will pursue an onward march, incessantly assimilating to new elements, new ideas, and new discoveries, and consequently having new rights to incorporate, new wants to supply, and new duties to discharge,—we should witness far more harmony, and far less jealousy, amongst political labourers. The first object of statesmen rightly viewed, being to leave the path of national progression in every respect open, there would be a common ground, a common bond, a point of contact for all thinkers. We should still have distinct shades, but not parties radically opposed; we should undergo changes imperceptibly linked and tranquilly successive, and not those violent and perilous shocks, which now, from time to time, perform their inevitable work in all States. Unhappily there is none of this feeling.

Whenever there is felt in the bosom of the State the want of change—that is, when institutions are found to be no longer in harmony with the wants and wishes of the community—men generally step forward, who, taking on themselves to be the interpreters of that feeling of uneasiness which is present in every breast, loudly proclaim the existing defects, and the necessity of an immediate remedy. These become chiefs; the People rally round them, and adopt them. Generally, too, these men are unequal to the ideas of the new order which is to succeed the one they are about to destroy; they have only the idea of the struggle. Brought up under the vicious system, and seeing and judging things through the troubled prism of the present, it is with great difficulty they can form a clear and complete conception of the future; they perceive the evil without exactly appreciating its nature or even comprehending its extent. The State suffers—there must be a change of position, and an advance. Obstacles interpose—they must be overturned or surmounted. But what beyond this? Of that they know nothing—that employs little of their thought; indeed, they have too much to do for that. Of all these obstacles, they choose the nearest, the most visible, the one easiest grappled with at the moment they appear on the arena. They call the public attention to it, and concentrate around and against it all their strength. At this juncture the People demand from them nothing beyond this. All that they ask of them is to lead in the attack, and maintain a constant struggle against those who deny the evil, or who affirm that, if the evil exists, it is our duty to bear it patiently, and expect a remedy from God or time. They triumph; they overturn the obstacle; drive the enemy from his position, and remain masters of the field of battle. So far all is well. But with victory everything is changed: the field of sight is enlarged on all points; hardly a glimpse was obtained, hardly a glance directed, when all were engrossed by the struggle; now the eye embraces the whole—can compare, can ponder, can explore. New ideas appear, new elements are revealed, and demand to be called into action; unthought of connexions are perceived, and call for consideration. The event has set aside the object of their efforts; another work has begun—the business of the past was to overturn, the business of to-day is to build up. In time past, men sought for implements of action; now they seek to know how, why, and to what end they should be employed. All this is natural; you have clambered one of the ridges of the mountain, and others start up before your eyes which were unsuspected. Each step changes the features of the traveller's horizon. A nation after a reform is not the same nation as before the reform; and this the leaders of the first movement are often unable to comprehend. They are aghast at a development of vitality for which they were unprepared; they are irritated at this perpetual call for movement, which may be to the benefit of generations unborn, but which few individuals find themselves competent to sustain. They are fatigued by the struggle, and deem it natural to rest. For themselves, they are satisfied as they are, and try to persuade the rest of the world to be equally contented. Complainants are taxed with indiscretion; ideas new to themselves are treated as dreams, or something worse; and to all the reasoning, all the arguments by which they are supported, they have but one to oppose, and this one they call their experience; and we find that their experience is but the knowledge of some forty, twenty, or ten years ago. Henceforward, murmuring, distrust, reaction; henceforward, also, an increasing sourness in these men, which soon degenerates into resistance. After this, the story is soon told. They find themselves in a position analogous to that of the men they overturned; they wish to keep themselves motionless, while all around them is progressing; harmony is destroyed, and for the short time this state of things is prolonged, the future once more belongs to revolution.

This is an old tale; and, if facts in support are demanded, we have only to look around us; never have proofs accumulated in such numbers, in a short space of time, as of late years. In France, agreeably to the order we have just sketched, the progress of liberty has no greater enemies than the men in opposition for fifteen years, now in power. In Switzerland, the Tscharners, the Schnells, the Tavels, the leaders, in Berne and elsewhere, of the revolutions of 1830 and 1831, are at present most ardent supporters of the statu quo, the most ardent enemies of all ulterior emancipation of the People. In Italy, the attempts at revolution, entirely national in their spirit, miscarried solely from the unskilfulness and cowardice of men placed at the head of the movement, by the youth, who judged them from a few antecedent demonstrations, and who persisted in adhering to the scheme of ten or twenty years before. It is hardly necessary to refer to Spain; and we leave to our readers the task of determining if something of the same kind be not going on amongst ourselves at the present hour.

When God commanded Moses to lead his people to the Land of Promise, he ordained that he, the guide, should not enter therein. It is not they who preside at the first movement of the People, who receive the mission and the power to bring them to the intended goal. For new aims, new men arise. It is not the skirmishers who decide the issue of the battle. They open the engagement, and then disappear before the main body of the army.

All that we have said of the men who have, by their actions, played a part in politics, perfectly applies to a class of political writers, whom, eight or ten years ago, we might have termed eclectics; but for whom, now that eclecticism is, to the sight and knowledge of all the world, a thing extinct, we are at a loss for a name, unless we frankly call them retrograders. They do for theory, what the men we have been describing do for practice. They made their début as revolutionists; they were in opposition all their youth—in opposition on all points, in all places, and at all risks; they have dwelt with feeling and emotion on all the complaints of the People, on every cry of discontent which arose from amidst the nations; these they took under their wing, under their responsibility; they wrote volumes on them, and built a reputation solely by becoming their echo. Their cry for movement was more than vociferous; and they chid the People, who marched too slowly for the credit of their foresight. But, as all that they did was but from simple opposition—that is to say, their actions, their theories, their books, were the fruit of no great general and social principle, of no extended historical views, of no philosophy of human nature, of no knowledge of the law of events, but solely from an incomplete perception of existing abuses, from a just but ineffectual reaction against present circumstances—that happened to them which is at this moment happening to the men who have carried out their political system. Intelligence keeps pace with events: uninterruptedly recruiting itself from all the rising talent, incessantly drawing new strength from all that happens, and from the progress of other branches of knowledge, more and more enlarging its horizon, from essay to essay, from error to error, from experience to experience, it has attained a point which these writers have not even suspected. It has traced abuses to their source, and isolated facts to their common law. Seeing long and painful struggles produce merely palliatives; wonderful revolutions ending, after a few years, in merely a change of men, not measures; and real miseries inexorably augmented throughout every mutation,—it has begun to suspect that the point to be settled in the present day, is no longer a mere political, but rather a social question; it has said within itself, that, perhaps, a new social principle once enthroned, abuses will fall of themselves; that the point is not to work such or such reform, and there stop, but rather to constitute and organise a progressive power which may freely discharge its functions in every direction that circumstances and necessity may require; and out of this the question of the People, the question of equality between the privileged and the unprivileged, the question of association perfecting that of liberty. The view of things thus changed, the writers of whom we are speaking were taken unawares, bewildered, and left behind. Partly from irritation at finding themselves so treated, partly from a real want of ability to do better, they have taken to protesting against this, as they pretend, exorbitant desire of innovation; their plan is to disown all they did not foresee at their début, all that they do not understand at the present day; they complain now that the pace is too quick, as they complained at the beginning it was too gentle. They would persuade us that all the world should carry crutches, because their own decrepitude requires their aid. To this class of writers belongs M. de Sismondi.

M. de Sismondi, the descendant of a family originally belonging to an ancient Tuscan republic, himself the citizen of a Swiss republic, began his career of authorship as a republican. He acquired a justly celebrated name, by writing the "History of the Italian Republics"—a work which, though not free from faults, procured him the respect and gratitude of the youth of Italy. In these pages he hallowed the name of the People, and preached emancipation for slaves, per fas aut nefas. At a later period, he qualified his language. Destitute of a true philosophy—a skillful opponent, but unequal to decidedly organic views—he was drawn into the circle of the Doctrines. Broglie, Guizot, Rosal, and others of the same calibre, became his friends, his heroes. The peaceful reign of the bourgeoisie was necessarily a grateful theme to him, a Genevese—that, is to say, a citizen of a state where the bourgeois, the bourgeois capitalist, is the centre key of the social edifice. He became, therefore, an apostle of the juste milieu. The influence of his early opinions and the recollections of his youth now and then peep out. Some of his tenets, as a political economist, must still be deemed rather unorthodox by the Parisian Doctrinaires. In politics, he is at all times ready to hail the dawning of brighter hopes, without stopping to inquire too minutely how they may square with his own system. The writer of these lines well recollects having heard him, at Geneva, in 1831, encourage, by his counsels, the project of a rising in Italy, and the preparation which the Italian exiles were organizing in the French territory. But he has duly expiated this revolutionary hankering. Three years afterwards, he poured the bitterest reproaches on those who continued to hold the same opinions that he had held in 1831. He it was who, by his pamphlet entitled Conseils aux Réfugiés, in some sort began that war of distrust against them, which, at a later period, and in hands less pure, brought about the persecutions of 1836, persecutions not sufficiently known or exposed. And in all this, M. Sismondi acts from conviction and sincerity. His character is, in all respects, honourable and spotless. Simply, his convictions come too much from without. They are modified by circumstances more than becomes an historian accustomed to comprehend long series of years at one view, and not to found his opinions on brief periods of transition. He has too much reverence for things established; but this is rather a foible of his political theory than of the man—his head bows to exterior circumstances, but his heart remains the same. Should to-morrow witness the People clamorous, aroused, and exhibiting their strength, M. De Sismondi will hail the revival with sincere joy; now, he sees them slumbering—perhaps they are pondering on men and things; he believes them weak, and therefore deserts them. He sees, or fancies he sees, Governments stronger than ever, and to them he addresses his supplications; from them he expects reforms; he is willing to purchase of them by concessions; he flatters and caresses them. Two years since, he would have had us believe that the King of Naples was exactly the man destined for the task of the regeneration of Italy. Latterly, he has discovered, in the cabinet of Vienna, some curiously-hidden talent for progression, which, if we do but have patience, promises mountains of miracles: and this is all to draw from them a petty scrap of enactment for primary tuition—a mean abatement of duty on some article of commerce. He would willingly surrender to the Quadruple Alliance the initiative of European civilisation, if the Quadruple Alliance would but be pleased to prevent Don Carlos from advancing too near Madrid.

We are willing to deal justly with men of good intentions; the day-dreams of a well-wisher to the human race are at least amiable; and we should be the last to disturb M. de Sismondi in his Eldorado, were it not that, in his vein for conceding, he too often lays down principles which, from his mouth, and backed by his reputation, may perpetuate fatal errors. He too frequently, in the prosecution of his Utopia of reforms to come from the powers above, permits himself to break into unjust accusations, and expressions of contempt worse than unjust, towards the People and all who plead their cause; so that we are eager to separate the political thinker from the historian, and, leaving his other merits untouched, to combat the dangerous influence which he may still exercise. It is a mournful employment thus to have always to point out the falling away of those who have preceded us in our career, though it be, perhaps, a sign of the times. Perhaps this breaking up of old associations may cause the line of demarcation to be more and more clearly defined, between the policy of the past, and that now stirring in the bosom of the present age.

M. Sismondi offers his "Studies on the Constitutions of Free Nations" as the definitive result of his long experience, as "a body of political doctrine, foreign to all parties, but which is yet not without basis, since it has resisted, during forty years, the shock of so many revolutions." To be independent of all parties is a very excellent thing when the parties are bad, but a very absurd one if applied to a party founded on justice and truth; neither are "the forty years," in our opinion, a better recommendation to the book. The forty years just ended have been so full of events, so fertile in new views, new lessons and experiences—they have pulled down so many things, brought into play so many new elements, and so greatly modified the position of things in Europe—that each of the old individual systems of political organization must, in their turn, undergo a similar modification. Besides, M. Sismondi does not present us opinions of forty years' standing, in the work before us. His opinions have varied in that interval. There is some distance between the "Studies" and the ideas thrown out here and there in the pages of his "History of the Italian Republics;" there is a distance between the doctrines exhibited in the "New Principles of Political Economy" of the year 1819, and reproduced in the present work, and those put forth, fifteen years ago, in the "Treatise on the Commercial Wealth of France," by the humble disciple of J. B. Say. Thus it is a doctrine, not of forty years' standing, but of forty years since, that M. Sismondi now publishes; it is a theory formed, perhaps some twenty-five years ago, under the eyes of Benjamin Constant; a return of the old man to the child of his youthful loves, offered, he tells us, to the Institute, and which the Institute has forgotten, we know not how. Be the book good or bad, we repudiate the inference which it is intended we should draw from its primitive date. In general terms, we may say that we think better of the steps people take forwards, than of those they make backwards; we prefer La Mennais, and the few eloquent pages—the only ones, perhaps, in the book—at the end of Chateaubriand's Essay on English literature, to M. Sismondi and his principles of nearly half a century ago.

What appears to have influenced these retrospective tendencies of M. Sismondi, and accords with the general idea we gave of him in a preceding page, is the actually existing state of men and things.

"The popular feeling," says he, at the beginning, "which appeared to be directed to liberty, has grown cold and abated. Doubt has taken place of that firm confidence which animated every people. . . . The friends of liberty are discouraged. . . . The revolutions which have done their work, have brought no profitable fruit. The principles they declare to have conquered, have had none of the beneficial consequences which were expected from them.

. . . The old Swiss republics have been, for the most part, overturned by recent revolutions; those who effected these revolutions, not content with their work, demand a constituency. . . . England has introduced an essential change into the popular part of her constitution; but, in place of thereby strengthening it, she has felt it shaken in every part from that time; more violent dissensions have been manifested. . . . All her ancient institutions have been menaced, and the friends of the country have had reason to fear that there would soon be nothing remaining of that constitution which had been so long their glory. . . . In Spain, two parties are fighting with unheard of ferocity, and both pretend to be the party of the People. . . . In America, the result (slavery) is found co-existent with democratic institutions in all their strength and all their purity. If the result is to be deplored, it is that the institutions are bad."

In the original, the tableau is complete—it embraces France, Portugal, and Italy; and we are far from denying its reality. But what does it all prove against the popular party?

We are now in the contest, and of that contest we are suffering all the evils. The popular party have proclaimed certain principles, and these principles have been nowhere applied in all their integrity and universality. The proclamation of these principles, and the trifling and partial successes they obtained, have laid bare every sore without effecting a cure; as men, in the first stages of illness, feel their malady and comprehend its extent, but no more. We are precisely at that critical period which, fluctuating between the past and the future, experiences all the inconveniences of the former, and presages the remedies which the latter is destined to afford, but, as yet, enjoys them not. We have gained some principles morally, but they are not arrived at a state of reality; their application is forbidden, or, perhaps, reflected on. Is there, then, anything surprising in the dissatisfaction of the People? Almost everywhere individuals have stepped forth to throw themselves into the midst of the movement, to thwart it, desirous of checking its progress and effects, seeking to divert to the profit of their own caste, of their own minority, that which was proclaimed by means of all, and for the good of all; and the contest has hence acquired a character of reaction and bitterness which has too often changed from a question of measures to a question of men. They have attempted to do in politics what the romanticist theorists of l'art pour l'art have done in literature: they have taken for the end that which was but a means; as a positive and final amelioration, that which was but an instrument of amelioration. On the other hand, the popular party have imprudently taken up the ground to which it was intended to seduce them; grand social questions have been too frequently suppressed by mere questions of form. Is it astonishing that the People have by degrees relapsed into misgivings and a sort of temporary inertness? Is it justice—is it, to speak plainly, good sense—to infer from this discouragement and want of confidence an argument against certain doctrines, when it is precisely the non-realization of these doctrines which produces both?

If there be dissatisfaction in Switzerland, it is:

because changes, brought about, in most of the States, with the greatest quietness and a perfect absence of destructiveness, have been wrested to their own purpose by certain influential persons of the towns, and have not fulfilled, to the rural districts, who performed all, one-half of the promises set forth in the programme. If the friends of liberty there now demand a constituent body, it is because, if harmony ought to exist in the political legislation of a country, it must be absurd, indeed, to change almost all the cantonal constitutions without touching in the least the federal; it is because, under the treaty imposed on the country in 1815 by the Holy Alliance, it is impossible to hope for the desired national development; it is because, three or four times since then, and even very recently, it has been proved to the Swiss patriots that it is altogether useless to devote themselves to the cause of freedom and cantonal reform, so long as the absence of a strong and active federal organization permits the intervention of every foreign power, so inclined, to destroy to-day the work of yesterday. If there be lukewarmness, inertness, and dejection in France, it is because there is much really discouraging in the spectacle of a revolution cheated of all its consequences, by a power which a few deluded individuals, now dead or repenting, raised on the buckler of their popularity. If the risings of 1831 did not call forth entire Italy, as might have been expected, it was because the only ideas which have power over her—the People and nationality—were from the first day not only omitted, but compromised and attacked by the brainless, heartless, and cowardly imbeciles, whom chance, local influence, or services under the Empire, placed at the head of the attempt; it is because enraged Italy shrank from the guilty cry which came from the lips of those who separated the cause of one city from that of another, and refused Italian co-operation only to accept that of foreigners. And so with the rest. We say nothing of our own country, for we confess we see nothing of that necessity for strengthening what is called our constitution, which M. de Sismondi imposes on the Reformers, nor for those strange fears by which he seems so powerfully affected. As regards America, if slavery still exists there, it would appear that her democratical institutions have not yet attained all their energy and purity, and, more especially, all their generalization. We know not what opinion M. de Sismondi may entertain of his readers; but to our own we are sure it would be a most unsatisfactory digression to prove that negro slavery is not an inevitable consequence of popular principles.

Whilst agreeing, then, with M. de Sismondi, in part at least, as to the reality of the tableau, we differ immensely as to the causes. He believes too much has been done—we maintain too little has been done. He pretends that the People are discouraged at seeing how little fruit liberty produces—we assert, on the contrary, that it arises from their not finding liberty the reward of the efforts they have made to obtain it. He wishes to deduce something against the revolutionary principle itself, because the revolutions hitherto brought into action have been abortive as to their effects. We ourselves draw thence one single axiom: that every revolution, every reform carried out, as in Italy in 1821, by a caste, or, as elsewhere, for the advantage of a single class, be it the patrician, the financial, or the shopkeepers, must infallibly miscarry, and die, in a short time, of inanition and sterility. Now, when this happens, after a great disappointment, the weak—those who are actuated only by vanity, a spirit of personality, or even by youthful and temporary enthusiasm—either quit the field, or give ground, like M. de Sismondi. The strong-minded stand fast. Their labours are inspirited by a truly religious feeling for the good of the People; they know that, if there be a God above, man here below has a mission—a task of emancipation and progressive perfection, which may be retarded, but cannot be destroyed; and they see in such a state of things only a new motive to redouble their means and their activity. They deny not the reality—nay, they reckon up their disappointments; they disguise none of the failings, none of the corruptions of humanity; they gain thence a further impulse to their self-devotion. Are they to become renegades because themselves and those around them are in a state of suffering? Are virtue and happiness at all times synonymous? Is the battle for ourselves, or is it not rather for eternal justice and for generations to come? And do we refuse to discharge a duty only on condition of finding fruition and immediate success in its fulfilment?

All this, however, is with M. de Sismondi but a mode of preparing his ground-work; that, the existence of which, viewed in a particular light, would suggest to him a doubt, he a little later reduces to a principle.

He states clearly the question between those two systems, to which all the manifestations of the spirit of the age, whether more or less liberal, do in reality belong, and which sufficiently distinguish the two great shades of the party styling itself progressive; the one which says—All for the People, but nothing through the People; the other—All for the People and through the People. M. de Sismondi inclines in favour of the first, and the whole book is but a refutation of the second.

When we say he inclines to the first, we are well aware M. de Sismondi would not admit our assertion. Faithful to the traditions of the juste milieu, he pretends to have a system of his own, lying between the two, and which may be thus translated:—Much for, and something through the People. But this system, the offspring of his former likings, is rather an affair of the heart or of instinct, than of reason and conviction. On a footing of principle it can never stand. Whenever the two definite propositions we have quoted are found in opposition to each other, M. de Sismondi must, of necessity, choose the first. The one and the other may have a basis, a logical source; his own cannot; its source is arbitrary; the determination of that something to be done through the People will always fall to the lot of the dominant party, or the personal feelings of individuals; it will change with every government, every cabinet, and every passing influence.

There are no RIGHTS for the People. This is the result, whether expressed or not, of the system of M. de Sismondi; and it is not his feeling in particular, but the feeling of a whole school. To them the People is a child destined to eternal pupilage. What can it do? what does it know? Work—work with its physical force; and care is to be taken that it shall never want work. As to leisure, as to moral, social, and political life, the enjoyment of these belongs not to the People: society is a body made up of men of sinews and men of intelligence; the lot of the first is bread and toil—the leisure is for the second. This is their creed as to abstract right. Still, as the followers of this school are men of some liberality—as they did, in time past, take for a motto, well or ill understood, the word, Progression—they are willing to grant something more. They admit that education is a good thing, and that it is good to disseminate a little of it through the masses; they would consent even to raise them towards their own level, from time to time, by allowing them to participate in a small fraction of power, but on condition that they by no means got rid of certain notions of superiority and the like; it would suit them that the People should possess no vitality but that doled out by their masters, and circumscribed within such limits as they might be pleased to assign. Thus all would go on well. There would be beneficent kings and grateful subjects—eclectics in office—no complaints, no disorders, and moderate food. What more can be wished?

Let us not be charged with exaggeration; we do but concentrate, in a few lines, sentiments plentifully scattered throughout the later writings of our author. The words may be ours, but the ideas are those of M. de Sismondi; the men of intelligence, and the men of sinews—mob, food for gunpowder—are his; the bread and toil, food and the lash, are his; and, if he sues for his something, if he entreats the rulers to grant to their subjects the small fraction of power we have spoken of, it is not because so much is the right of the People, but merely, that participation in power necessarily elevates the character and ennobles the soul; and, he reasons—it is not good to seek to deprive the mass of mankind of a powerful stimulant to virtue and high notions of honour, &c. The People are deaf, the People are blind, the People don't think. Give them a little of your thought; give them aims of a little of your loftiness, of your greatness of soul; thus be great and generous—do, my masters!—Date obolum Belisario. Vide p. 23, &c.

Now, our view of things is totally different. We believe there are RIGHTS inherent in the People: a right to physical comfort; a right to free and progressive moral development; a right to education; a right to be informed on their affairs, and, as far as possible, mediately or immediately, to direct their management. It appears to us that the question has been too often taken and considered on an unworthy basis—charity, benevolence, favour; and too seldom on its true basis—that of duty. Are there two races on the earth, or is there but one? Are there the descendants of Cain and the descendants of Abel, the accursed and the blessed, the Helots and the free?—or is there not rather a oneness of race in the human family, a unity of origin and aim in each nation? Here lies all the question. That which we term the People is the nation—it is you, he, ourselves, the whole world; and this People, like all that has existence, holds the right of development for all its faculties. When a celebrated lawyer of France said, Le droit c'est la vie, he uttered a phrase big with truth. All that has being has its law, and from that law derives its right. It is not only good but necessary that the People should ascend step by step the ladder of activity and power; necessary, because, as M. de Sismondi implicitly agrees, it is by action, by the discharge of function, that man acquires and develops the consciousness of his vocation, the feeling of his dignity, the power of his mind, and the practice of the higher virtues; necessary, because the well-being of the whole can never be settled in a regular and durable manner by any caste. Those who maintain the reverse—All through the People and for the People—maintain it precisely because they believe the People alone can accomplish all for the People. Any class, any minority, of which the care and duty of thinking for the welfare of all becomes a prerogative, ends, from the nature of things, in thinking solely of its own.

Do we then disavow the supremacy of intellect, and seek to impose an absurd level on those distinctions which come from God, and not from man? By no means.

Intelligence rules by a privilege endued with a widely different power from the privileges of conquest; its assistance is needed, and respect is paid to its desert; wherever there shall exist a sound electoral basis, intelligence will always be chosen to preside at the helm. The People are seldom either ungrateful or suspicious of virtuous intelligence; minorities almost always. Intelligence will always govern wherever the administrative power has not been infeoffed in a particular class. We ask no other proof, in modern times, than the consecutive ability that has been called to the Presidency of the United States. Intelligence will govern through the People and for the People. The People reinstated in the suffrage, will seek her out in all ranks and all circumstances, for in them all may she be found; and from the consecration of the People, she will be filled with a more profound feeling of her national duties than she possibly can whilst wanting the elevation and self-enhancement of the general mandate; whilst holding her power of the minority, she is compelled to use her functions for their interest. Our Through the People, or, in other words, our opinion in favour of an extension of the suffrage, is not then unfriendly to Intelligence—far from it; it is that we desire, and, in giving her the popular sanction, we merely seek, the means of harmonizing her with the general interest. With us the suffrage is the base on which Intelligence should be exalted; the school to which M. de Sismondi belongs inverts the pyramid, and pretends to fix it on its apex; we are for both, base and apex; we feel the importance of both to the general welfare. Thus, in page 24, we find M. de Sismondi exclaiming:—

All through the People! all through the People! But how are we satisfied that the People is fitted for all? Society, to attain its object—the greatest happiness of the greatest number—has need [mark this] of all its talent and all its virtue: how has it yet been demonstrated that the wisdom of the more enlightened will be adopted by the mass?—that we shall find in them unity of purpose, foresight, resoluteness, a spirited liberality in great things, and economy in detail, without which they themselves will soon be sufferers? Certainly not from theory, which teaches us in a proverb, that everybody's business is left to nobody's care; not from experience or the observation of facts—for every page of the history of free nations bears testimony to the prejudices, the inconstancy, the panic terrors, the rashness, the fickleness, the imprudence, the prodigality, and the meanness of the multitude.

"If the decision is to be left," he proceeds, (page 54,) "to patriotism, disinterestedness, and courage, is it expected to find a majority possessing the virtues of Regulus and Aristides? If it is to be left to extent of knowledge, will a majority of Montesquieus be more easily found? If to energy of purpose, is there a nation where the Napoleons compose the majority?"

Who is here refuted? Who is addressed? Who is spoken of? What is understood by "the People?" Why are "the People," "the mass," and "the multitude," here used as synonyms, in spite of the different meaning we are accustomed to attach to the words? When a man who is a thinker, a political authority, utters the phrase all through the People, what do we suppose he intends? What meaning do we impute? Does he suppose we were talking of the Catalines, or of the Canutes, of Lyon perchance? In talking of the suffrage, do we intend to enthrone Ignorance under popular auspices? So much confusion pervades the thoughts and language we have just quoted, that we are in doubt whether to refute or pass them unnoticed, under the idea that M. de Sismondi may be addressing himself exclusively to some sect unknown to us, anarchical, ignorant, and monstrous. No one of ourselves, no one of those who have openly and rationally advocated the cause of the extension of the suffrage, ever applied the term "People" in the base, intolerant, and unjust meaning which M. de Sismondi appears to intend. Why does he make the People a class, a caste opposed to others? By what right does he divide nations into two factions, placing ignorance on the one side, and intelligence on the other, and commanding us to choose? We protest against this mode of treating the question. Once more we repeat that "the People," in the language of the movement party, is the nation—the aggregate of the members of a society—Tories, Whigs, Radicals—Sir Robert Peel, Mr O'Connell, and M. de Sismondi, (were he a Briton;) we exclude no one—all ranks, all classes, all persons, are bound, in their utmost, to contribute to the national welfare. As M. de Sismondi has said, the nation requires all the talent and all the virtue.

This admitted, is not the problem to be solved, that of discovering a guarantee that every interest of the People of this nation shall be represented? What guarantee can you have but the expression of their will?—and how is this to be expressed unless by the suffrage? There exists in the constitution of the People a double series of interests, rights, and duties—individual interests, rights, and duties—social interests, rights, and duties; and the harmony of these two series is the sine qua non of the life of the State. Now, which do you take, which do you choose of two systems—one proceeding from a spirit of individuality and sectionism, the other from a spirit of association? You take the first: you must then represent all classes, all interests, all the men of science and letters, and the manufacturers, the labourers, and the proprietors, separately, one by one. You will have five, eight, ten chambers, or sections of a chamber; and, when you have done that, you will have broken into fractions, partitioned, disunited that nation which should be one; you will have sanctioned an hostility, a struggle, which it should have been the aim of your institutions to have destroyed; you will have established ten aristocracies in place of one. Or, proceed, if you are equal to it, in the spirit of association: but then you must claim to be possessed of the science of sociality in the highest possible degree; you must assert that you alone are in possession of the law governing the existence of the nation, the secret of its historical developement, its manners, tendencies, wants, vocations, its destiny in the world; you must assert that you sum up in yourself the entire life of the People you pretend to direct; for, without that, you will have no other rational conclusion, but to leave to the People themselves the care of exercising, by the suffrage, a certain initiative over its progress—a certain control over those who put themselves forward for the task of administration.

Now, M. de Sismondi is far from asserting this of himself, and those who share his views. To one-third of assurance, M. de Sismondi has two-thirds of scepticism. He knows "very few principles in politics which ought not to be submitted to a new examination." He declares "that we are not sufficiently advanced in the science of sociality to know if the powers be necessary that we see at present in existence." His whole book breathes doubt; he fears pulling down too much; he fears preserving too much; he has a boundless antipathy to all who are free from a like hesitation. How, then, with all this, does he reject the two or three simple and unpretending views of the defenders of the right of suffrage, to propose a difficult and complicated electoral system, which is neglected by its objects when called into action, and which ends, after all, in dividing the nation into bodies, having different interests, investing them all with a fraction of power, and leaving them to arrange matters amongst themselves as they best may—in short, a system of justaposition, and not of association?

The life of a People is a continuous and progressive development of its faculties. Speaking absolutely, it can be termed neither wise nor ignorant at a given time; it is not equal to all things from its beginning; but it is equal to all that the epoch requires. History very often shews us minorities deficient towards the People—hardly ever the People deficient to circumstances. Their progression is assured; but of this progression the People must be conscious—must do and suffer for its accomplishment; and learn the right path by sometimes attempting the wrong. Their education is the result of the various means, religious, political, and literary, which constitute civilization; but can be completed in a useful and durable manner only through the direction of their spontaneous choice—their liberty. The basis of liberty is individuality; and how is individuality to be asserted, if not by the suffrage?

When we talk of the suffrage, we mean the right of voting as electors; for, with all who maintain the maxim—all through the People—the question is reduced to that. M. de Sismondi may be assured that, the appreciation of virtue and patriotism excepted—a function, the exercise of which requires neither the vast erudition of Montesquieu, nor the active genius of Napoleon—not much will be left to the direct agency of the People. A man who may have done nothing all his life but plant cabbages, would not be selected for the task of a digest of the penal or civil code; for such a commission he would receive no votes. Neither, we can assure M. de Sismondi, should we go to the hustings to ask of the People the solution of an astronomical problem; we have no fears, though he seems to be alarmed, that universal suffrage should decree the motion of the sun round the earth. Although we maintain that the People are gifted with a moral sense, so much the more exquisite as it is generally disinterested—though we even suspect, in spite of the proverbial theory of M. de Sismondi, that the business of all the world can only be well done by all the world—we do not believe that the People, as a mass, are skilful astronomers. But, alas! were they men of the People who burnt Jordan Bruno, and compelled Galileo to retract?

Let us not be misunderstood: we are not discussing Universal Suffrage as a thing immediately and universally applicable. We are not considering its possible agency, but the question of right—the abstract principle. We may be told that here and there causes exist which render the substitution of one system for the other extremely dangerous; that there may exist, in a given People, an all-powerful influence, which must be undermined to its foundations before calling on them in mass to exercise the right of choosing their representatives. The question would then assume a different aspect, and our judgment would be modified in accordance. But with M. de Sismondi, the question turns on the principle as a whole; and his aim is to point out on what path, to what tendency, the labours of legislators and politicians should be directed; he seeks to determine whether their efforts at progression should have in view the approach of that moment when the entire People shall be emancipated, or whether, doing nothing to hasten that period, they should stand fixed at the existing statu quo, and leave the future to chance and “the working of events.” Exclusiveness does not belong to those who search out the principle of the future, that entire education may be directed to its aim; but to those who build a system on existing contingencies, and yet make immutability a part of that system; to those who falsify the question from the first, by placing on one side all the intelligence, and on the other all the ignorance; as if intelligence were limited to caste; as if, at the present day, intelligence were invariably the attribute of those who monopolize power; as if everything that was done, everything that was said in chambers, in cabinets, in publications, and in meetings, in countries where such exhibitions of feeling are permitted, did not teach us every day that the intelligence dispersed without the electoral body was not more than equiponderant to that within; as if property, or any other exclusive basis of the same kind, can be the effective mark, the unvarying thermometer of intelligence; as if, by enlarging the electoral sphere one degree, though preserving the same principle, we should cause, at the same day and hour, a diffusion of intelligence throughout all the individuals comprised in that degree. Above all, exclusiveness is chargeable on those who, obliged to resort to an obsolete law, founded on external endowments, for an electoral basis, unable to discern and select, nevertheless deem themselves authorized to deny the multitude all fitness, even of the heart, for aught of goodness or greatness.

During the last agonies of Poland, all that there was of virtue, all that there was of energy, in France and England, would have saved her at a cost of the greatest sacrifices. It may be said that France and England desired war; for the amount of energetic, reflective, and virtuous wills is, in truth, the will of the nation. But Universal Suffrage would have given us the amount of apathy, the amount of indifference, the amount of personal interests. The one body knew too little of Poland to will at all; the other, with too much selfishness, recoiled from the sacrifice of conscription and taxation. To consult the greatest number, is to attempt to arrive at a juste milieu.—P. 65.

When a man can write, as an argument against popular suffrage, sentences like these, which we are tempted to take for heartless irony, he must have reached a point that renders refutation useless. Since Universal Suffrage would have led us, in the Polish question, to a juste milieu, by what name will M. de Sismondi be pleased to designate the system which has been pursued under the regime of electoral privilege? Since the decision was not committed to the hands of the People, why was Poland not saved? And why, if the masses were opposed to war, was it necessary for the citizen-king to mystify, by a false report of a Polish victory, the people of Paris, engaged in celebrating the anniversary of the Days of July? We have too vivid a recollection of that disgraceful page of indifference and apathy of the history of Europe. Neither do we forget, so soon as M. de Sismondi, that it was an Intelligence, M. Sebastiani, which proclaimed, "Poland is destined to perish;" that it was another Intelligence, M. Dupin, that laid down the maxim, "Every man for himself, and every man to his home;" and that it is the class of parliamentary intelligence, estimated by shillings, which has, by its suffrages, supported M. Dupin and M. Sebastiani.

The same forgetfulness of facts, distorted by Doctrinaire prepossessions, is to be perceived throughout the whole work. Perhaps there is not a single fact of all those he alleges in favour of his thesis which may not be refuted, or which does not tend to give a false idea of the people to which it refers. The whole of the eighth essay—On the Excellence of Federative Government—is a real master-piece in this respect; and we are sorry that space will not permit us an analysis, that we might shew our readers to what a depth of historical misapprehension a great historian may fall, if labouring under the nightmare of a false theory. All the opinions he puts forth on the affairs of Switzerland, and the consolidation-projects of those he terms madmen, also appear to us singularly erroneous; his views are habitually those of a Genevese, hardly ever national. We shall perhaps have occasion to speak of them, and to oppose to his ideas those which we ourselves derive from a residence of some years in that country, in a future article on the actual state of Switzerland. Still more exclusive, incomplete, and defective is the manner in which, from his recollections of thirty or forty years since, he attempts the portraiture of Italy, as now existing.

The opinions of M. de Sismondi on Switzerland, Italy, &c., are, however, but a legitimate consequence of the general principles that govern his work. We meet, at every page of his book, a declared antipathy to the initiative coming from below, an almost superstitious respect for what is established, and a thoroughly defined resolution never to pass beyond the sphere of palliatives—to admit nothing which may touch the roots of the existing social organization, though an evil should be distinctly tracked there. A few extracts will suffice, for the appreciation of his theory of legislation:—

No science is so bound to modify itself to circumstances as that of the theory of constitutions; for the legislator is to act simply on the body-politic as given to him; he is not its creator. . . . The People exist, and they are not the legislators who gave them life; the People exist, and each people has a constitution, in the most extended sense of the word, by reason of that existence. The legislator is to touch this constitution only with the file, never with the axe. . . . He is never to forget that he may put out life, but cannot restore it; and this life may be attached to some one of those organs which he desires to reform or suppress. . . . The legislator is, above all, habitually to respect the life of the body politic such as it exists. He is a conservator, and not a creator. He is not to inquire whether a state of fedecacy be preferable to a state of oneness of power; whether royalty, the patricians, the titled, the clergy, popular assemblies, the towns with their privileges, and the rural communities, should or should not enter into the constitution which he has to work on. . . . He is to say to himself, that, for him, there are facts which each people presents under different conditions, and that the life of the People may be attached to these facts.—P. 25, &c.

Now for an application of the doctrine:—

The legislator is called on to combine the monarchical interest which he finds in the facts (or the realities existing) with the monarchical element which he finds in the science.—(P. 29.) . . . The aristocratic interest and principle present themselves to the legislator in like manner. . . . In almost every people, the observer meets with a titled or patrician body. . . . This is a circumstance which must be borne in mind. . . . The point is to combine it with the facts, so as to preserve as little as possible of the inconveniences of a nobility, and to ensure the utmost possible of the advantages of a senate. . . . Lastly, the democratic interest and principle offer themselves with the same necessity for conciliation. The part left to the People in the social power is that in which may be remarked the most irregularity and inconsistency. Whatever form of the popular interest may exist, so that it be still endowed with life, it is good, and to be respected. Even if it exist as no other than a recollection, than a vain image, it at least suffices to attest that what has been may be again. Probably it may yet reanimate itself.

Heaven be praised! we have here the functions of a legislator marvellously simplified.

A something has life in the nation at the moment you enter on your functions—is it good or ill? is it injurious or useful? Meddle not with that. Life is sacred; be good enough, therefore, to respect life. Take all the elements, all the influences, all the interests, as they meet your eye on the surface of the body social; arrange them all in the order of their number, one after another, one beside the other, like a museum. This collection is the grand national museum; these portions, these fragments, these substances, however heterogeneous, form, by way of mosaic, the grand national institution. Be on your guard, then, and close the doors, lest any one should have an idea of displacing something. But, amongst all those elements of fact, there are some which have completed their time; some are so posted as to prevent others being moved: the titled destroy equality; the clergy oppose education; there are existences that illegally usurp and monopolize the sources of the common life; and from the bosom of this People rise terrible moanings, cries of wretchedness, clamourings for rights long misunderstood, legitimate claims on the part of classes hitherto without life, not respectable from tradition, and who yet desire to begin to live. No matter: you can suppress nothing, reform nothing—for who can tell the consequences? This rust is so exceeding venerable! that abuse has existed so very long!

—who knows, perhaps, but it is one of the conditions of the life of the nation?

Possibly, on this point, we may know nothing; but one thing we do know—it is, that when an abuse, a disorder, an evil begins to be felt, it creates a contention among the elements of the body social, which goes on increasing, and will sooner or later find an issue; that murmurs by little and little take the character of protests; and complaints turn to threats: thus they swell more and more, till some fine day the huge wave surges, and overwhelms all that men were indisposed to correct. Then come the crash of ruin, convulsive overthrow, single nights sweeping off ages of privilege; a terrible reaction stalks on, torch in hand, and blindfold, striking to the right and left, and levelling with violence the ground which a continually progressive labour might have smoothed insensibly. This, not theory, but history teaches us.

So that, in fact, with this kind of legitimization of “whatever is,” under pretext that it makes part of the life of the nation, we arrive at the Oriental system. Fact reigns a tyrant; and it appears to us perfectly useless to write volumes on the social science. Should a People believe itself to have a right to a life very different from its present, rouse itself, destroy the old, and rebuild in its own fancy; in this way a fact would be accomplished that M. de Sismondi would hasten to recognise, still reserving to himself the right of recommencing his theory of immobility from the date of this new era. He recognises the fact of 1789; he recognises that of 1688: why will he not recognise others of the same bearing?

For all those who seek to avoid these violent shocks, by attaining their end in another manner, the part of a legislator is not that assigned by M. de Sismondi. The legislator is a being of foresight; he is to march at the head, and not in the rear of the army; his permitting it to pass him is an act of abdication. The legislator asks of the present, of the actual existence, the instruments that he requires to open the path of the future for the people he guides. The legislator never forgets that all that the People have done best and most useful in their history, has been in abrogation of ancient matters.* He knows that tradition is doubtless an essential element in his labours, a visible scale of progress in some sort; but he also knows that, even as the tradition of humanity is not to be measured by the tradition of an isolated people, so the tradition of a nation is not to be deduced from the acts of a minority, of a caste, of any power whatever, whose functions may very possibly have been discharged without regard to the interests and wishes of the nation; but is to be sought in the feeling of the nation itself, taken as a mass; in the degree of intelligence it possesses, in its wants, in its desires, in its history, viewed with regard to the national vocation.

* The same errors as to the pretended tradition—foundation of all reform—are to be found in D'Israeli's “Vindication of the English Constitution.”

Taken in this sense—and it is the only one rationally possible—the tradition of France, for example, was rather re-linked than broken by the Revolution. In the sense given to it by M. de Sismondi, Mr D'Israeli, and all the Conservatives of their stamp, tradition is a sophistry by means of which they hope to juggle a decision in favour of the exact point in question; it is the apotheosis of fact, but material, brutish, and inert fact. There is not, there cannot be but one sole tradition—that of the spirit.

Yes, the life of the People is sacred; but, if this is saying that all that exists amid the People is life of its life, it is also saying that the life of the People may not be falsified, turned from its true aim, gagged and bound. Let M. de Sismondi look around him in Europe, and tell us how many nations live a free life, a life of their choice. The hallowed life of the People consists not of the material existence of things, for such violence and corruption may impair; the satisfaction of their moral wants, the progress of their education, the liberty of proceeding to the accomplishment of the destiny traced out for each by their origin, their creed, their geography, their greater or less special aptitude—these are the signs of this life. But it is evident that there may exist prejudices, false creeds, opposed to the natural direction of a people. Are we to combat them, and direct education in this sense? or are we to respect them? It is evident that there may exist a vitiated power, a usurped influence, an exclusive element, swayed by egotism, no longer discharging functions in the sense of national agency. Are we to suppress it, and direct all the institutions in that sense?—or are we to respect it and assign it a place in the national edifice? Here is the question. Had M. de Sismondi confined himself to saying that whatever exists has had a reason for its life—that is to say, the developement of the People—we should have nothing to oppose to him. In a philosophic sense, the feudal seigneur, the Catholic priest, the absolute monarch, did accomplish something national in their time; but their time ended, the sphere of the People's agency enlarged. When these powers no longer represent anything, have ceased their development, are not susceptible of harmony with the general progress, discharge no functions, but, in a circle of mechanical operation, as it were, are useless or pernicious, do they live the sacred life, the life of the People? If, then, we find ten elements, ten powers existing in a nation, for which we are to accomplish a work of legislation, let us not take their existence as a title of legitimacy; rather let us examine the direction of their functions, compare it with the direction of the People—the sovereign element. Judge them by their works, and their works by their fruit; you will then know if it be possible or not to harmonize them with the collective life of the body social, or if you must needs labour to suppress them as pernicious, or useless; which comes to the same, for every useless wheel in the State machine must end in becoming pernicious.

Temporary necessity is one thing; the work of the future is another. It is one thing to submit to the fact provisionally—when we find it in being, we say not legitimate, but powerful; another to recognise it, legalize it, and organize it. Destroy not violently this fact, if the times be not ripe; but give it not a new sanction, more force, if you find that this fact is in opposition to the general object of all legislation, a progressive march, under all possible conditions of equality and liberty, towards the moral and physical amelioration of all. And fear not in this to outstep your epoch. Privilege is but of too usurping a nature. Wherever the education of the country has not been undermined, a large share of influence is assured to it. Wherever titles of nobility or wealth enjoy a great power on opinions—wherever labour is not yet emancipated, and landed property is considered above other kinds of property—be sure that these things will exercise their fair influence on the fact electoral. But the mission of the governing power is of another kind. The social institution is not to nourish its tendencies by partial and transitory facts, but rather from the general and eternally progressive fact. The functions of the governing power are for the entire nation. It should be especially occupied with looking to the interests and principles of those who are not represented: those who lean on custom and tradition are already sufficiently protected, without its aid.

Here we shall conclude. The little that we have said, and the extracts we have given, will suffice for an estimate of the political system which M. de Sismondi, in his last years, endeavours to support. We intended to have spoken at some length on the views exhibited in the work on political economy, quoted at the head of this article; but the politics have carried us to such a length that our space is now limited. We shall say, in a few words, that, if the subject is different, the ideas are the same. The first volume of the "Studies on Political Economy," composed of articles which have, in great part, appeared in various periodicals, is an exposition of doctrines already known by his book of 1819—"New Principles of Political Economy; or Wealth in its Relations to Population." But, in these new principles, the only thing novel, or, at least, not a part of the usual principles of the school of the presiding economy, the consideration of wealth, not abstractedly, not separated from the man, but in its relations to population, has remained for twenty years since then, and still remains, in a state of prospectus. This book does not treat of the rational relations, the relations which the march of things promises to the classes who have hitherto been the mere productive instruments of wealth; but of relations as established by the existing organisation, and apart from all anticipation. The legitimacy of established fact equally pervades this book; and, as M. de Sismondi was led in politics to touch only on pure questions of form, never to go to the bottom of things, he has been led in economy to treat only of secondary questions, which he in vain attempts to raise to the rank of a new science. The problem which has for some years agitated the working classes, why production is so little profitable to the classes from whom it proceeds, is scarcely ever glanced at. In the face of a repetition of commercial crises, in a frightful periodical recurrence, and under the most different circumstances, he can discover no other remedy than to lay restraint on competition. He maintains that there is an excess of production. The distribution of the social wealth is no part of his inquiry. There are the labourers and the receivers; the poor and the rich: so it will remain, so it must remain. Mankind have renounced all equality of right for the common good, &c. When an individual starts from principles like these, he has no claims to announce himself the founder of a new science.

Entire political economy is, with M. de Sismondi, a theory of equilibrium between production and profit. The science of war is that which teaches a society to defend, against all others, those rights which it has placed in common. Jurisprudence is the mode of defending the rights of each of its members. History is destined to represent the result of all the experience of passed societies; and so on. We know not if these definitions be the most complete that can be given at the present day; certainly they possess no novelty. Neither do we know if we are destined, in our days, to see a new science of economy spring up, which may teach us to stop the sources of physical misery, by a new distribution of the social wealth; a science of war which may teach us how to develop the rights of humanity all around us, and to open a path to European civilization, in countries still barbarous; a science of law which may teach us to make the administration of justice a progressive talent of society; a history which may put intelligence on the clue of the general law governing events and their results;—but we do know, at least, that such a discovery will rightly be named the new science; and we know, moreover, that they who shall be capable of producing such a science, will have decided principles, and a higher faith than that of the established-fact school, and will not own the axiom "of systematically lending the weight of their doctrine to that bucket of the scale which is opposed to the one which may, at the time, appear to them ready to sink"—("Political Studies," Introduction)—for they will recognise but two balances—the just and the unjust.

THE PATRIOT MARTYR OF OLD ENGLAND.

A CHRONICLE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DIVES AND LAZARUS."

THERE are certain epochs of history over which romance has delighted to fling a glittering veil, fatal to the interests of truth. The sparkling of spears, the neighing of war-horses, the bannered lists, the heroic chants of wandering troubadours, are made to shine and glow in the foreground, perplexing the observant eye and distracting its attention from the gloomier recesses of the picture: from cities razed, nations despoiled, and, above all, from the sufferings of the people, the squalid, scourged, dispirited people, ground into dust by the iron hand of oppression. Such was the reign of Richard "Cœur de Lion!" the most splendid name ever bequeathed to the annals of chivalry!

Yet, what a tale of rapine and tyranny is included in the life of this unnatural son and unpatriotic Sovereign, from the period when, approaching the dead body of his father, in the solemn aisles of Fontevault, blood gushed from the nostrils of the deceased Henry, in token that his murderer stood beside him—to that, when, attempting to wrest from the hands of a vassal his lawful treasure, he fell by an obscure hand, the victim of a pitiful cupidity! True to his darling vice, the Prince—whose first measure on his accession was to sell off the fiefs, towers, villages, and movables of the crown, in order to "put money in his purse"—at length gave up the ghost in besieging the Chateau de Chalus, for the sake of a few miserable sacks of silver crowns! Nay, ten years before, while Europe rang with the chivalrous feats of the crusading King of England, the royal plunderer had a narrow escape from lapidation in the island of Sicily; where, having "carried off" (why not stolen?) a falcon, in the environs of Messina, from the house of a peasant, to whom he refused payment for his bird, the multitude pursued, with sticks and stones, the thievish prince who so summarily levied contributions upon the loyal subjects of King Tancred!

But

"Strike up there!

Let not the Heavens hear these tell-tale scribblers Rail on the Lord's anointed!"

cries the courtiership of frail mankind.

Cœur de Lion was a King after the Lords'* own heart; a levier of taxes, a craver of benevolence, a grinder of the people's bones to make his bread. No scandal about Cœur de Lion! If we have writ our courtly annals true, Cœur de Lion is the Black Knight; the jolly boon companion of Robin of Sherwood; the brother poet of Bertrand de Boon; the generous antagonist of Saladin; the hapless prisoner of Linz; the "Richard, O mon roi!" of Blondel the minstrel! What if he tortured and despoiled the Rothschilds of his reign; what if he hanged on a gibbet the brave defender of Nottingham Castle; what if he engaged the Dauphin of Auvergne to rebel against his liege lord, King Philip, and then fled from France, leaving his unhappy ally to fight at uneven odds, and fall into the hands of his enemy—be it remembered that he excelled both Auvergne and his gallant cousin, the County Guy, in the composition of a Sirvente; and that not a troubadour of Provence could tinkle a lute more woefully than Richard of England.

Those were strange times, when—instead of petty squabbles of Excise and Post-Office between the mighty kingdoms of England and France, adjusted by an occasional visit of Colonel Maberley to Paris or Monsieur Pirou to London, or the passage of printed circulars between Thames Street and the Rue St Dennis—armed flotillas were perpetually labouring across the Channel; and Aquitaine and Brittany, Anjou and Poitou, were as much and firmly our own as the Canadas. But for the occasional representation of one of Shakspeare's historical plays, we should almost forget these marchings and counter-marchings upon Gallic ground; nor imagine it possible that "the men of Angers opened wide their gates" to admit, in the person of their lawful prince, an anointed sovereign of Great Britain.

Among the royal skirmishers of the olden time, who kept their English subjects in rags, and their cities collections of mud hovels and pestiferous hospitals, in order that they might add a chateau or two, in France, to the revenues of their civil list—none were more tyrannical and unpatriotic than Henry II. and his son. The roving and warlike propensities of Richard more especially opened the way for countless abuses at home. While the King of England became a marauder, Archbishops and Chancellors became Kings of England; and the iron despotism of the Normans ploughed, as with a burning share, the hearts of the people. The Greeks of our time, trembling under the cruel hands of their Turkish conquerors, were not more deserving pity than the Saxon race, martyred and insulted by the Norman tyrants, to whom they were subjugated by force of arms, and by whom they were kept in subjection, through the partialities of the throne.

It was in the summer of the year 1196, that Philip Augustus, having taken up his ground at a short distance from the town of Niost in Saintonge, awaited, with anxiety, an expected movement on the part of Richard of England whose army, consisting of Norman, English, Angerine, and Touraine troops, lay encamped, within the distance of half-a-mile, divided only by the current of a rapid river. Every hour the British forces were in expectation of instructions to advance; and Bertrand de Boon, the confidential friend of the King, was supposed to have somewhat overpassed the bounds of loyal respect in reviling the pitiful suspense in which they were held by ecclesiastical interference. For, day after day, processions of archbishops and bishops, with crozier and banner, and the chanted hymns of a train of abbots and gowmsmen of all orders, progressed from camp to camp, betwixt the belligerent powers, bearing as many proposals, and tergiversations, and protocols, as might do honour to the chicanery of any modern cabinet.

* House of—query!

One blessed evening in June, as King Richard lay in his tent, awaiting the reply of his brother potentate to a missive he had that morning despatched to the French headquarters, definitively refusing to do homage to the King of France as his liege vassal for the provinces of Guienne, Normandy, and Poitou, (recreating himself, between occasional draughts from a flask of choice Gascon wine, by stringing rhymes and tagging roundelays with his trusty Bertram,) an esquire of the presence appeared at the opening of the tent, which was drawn aside to disclose the delicious glories of the summer sky, announcing,

"An envoy."

"How is this?" said the King, starting up. "I heard no trumpets. What means King Philip, to despatch towards the King of England a herald so unceremonious?"

"The messenger, an't please your Grace, comes not from the French quarters," replied Sir Bryan Bloant, bowing profoundly. "'Tis a deputy from the Commons of England."

"Ha! from England? Why saidst not so before?" cried the impatient monarch. "To the presence with him! 'Tis doubtless an emissary from our trusty Grand Justiciary the Archbishop, touching the recent levy. The knave hath made a timely journey. Our men lack pay and accoutrements; and 'twas but yesterday there reached me an express from our curmudgeon cousin, the Duke of Austria, complaining that the last instalment of our royal ransom is still in arrear."

And, preparing himself to receive the salutation of one of those sleek and smooth-spoken sons of the church whom Hubert Walter of Canterbury was apt to render the interpreter of his measures to a royal master whose clerical scholarship lagged sadly behind the efforts of his poetical inspirations, Richard threw himself on the cushions wherewith his tent was garnished in guise of throne, assuming an air of royal authority and statesmanlike penetration. He expected to see the bending form of a monk glide, with humble obeisance, to the sublime feet of royalty.

But, lo! the envoy of the Commons of England stood erect in presence of the King. There was more majesty in his gait than in that of the anointed monarch. A long beard, depending nearly to the leathern belt gathering in his grey tunic, announced a Saxon—that is, an English subject of the Norman King; while staff in his hand proclaimed him to be an ignoble wayfairer.

"What news from our good Lord Archbishop?" demanded Richard, examining the messenger with surprise, but still mistaking his errand.

"From the so called Grand Justiciary of England, tidings bring I none!" replied the stranger. "I stand in the presence of King Richard, as the delegate of many voices—the witness of many grievances—the interpreter of his oppressed people of London, who sue for justice and redress."

"By the Holy Sepulchre, here's news indeed!" cried Richard. "The people treat with their prince as sovereign with sovereign."

"The sovereignty of the people is to that of the sovereignty of the throne, as the faith of the true vassal to its upright lord," replied the stranger, undismayed. "And it is even because your Grace's faithful English subjects look to your Majesty as a sure redresser of their injuries, that they have deputed me to bear to your feet the manifesto of their wrongs."

"And who art thou, knave, that dardest to thrust thy person and opinions into the presence of thy king?" cried Richard. "Knowest thou not that, as my rebellious subject, I may forthwith offer thee in example to my soldiers, hanging to the nearest tree?"

"I am William Longbeard,* Burgess of the city of London," replied the stranger—not deigning to notice the threat; "a man of honest descent and honourable purpose."

"And what braggart hath stirred thee to quit thy peaceful guild, and thwart thy lawful monarch in foreign lands with the murmurs of his ungrateful people?" demanded the King.

"Because the cry of the oppressed is great in the land," replied the august stranger, leaning firmly upon his staff—"because your Grace's name is polluted by the misgovernment it is made to sanction. Your people, O King! do lack and suffer hunger. As I sat by my peaceful hearth, the groans of the many reached unto me, and bade me arise, and gird up my loins, and seek out their sovereign prince, that he might relieve them from the cruelty of the men he hath put in authority over them."

"Ha! Presume to dispute my choice—to arraign the wisdom of my ministers?" cried the King, his cheek suffused with a choleric glow. "Have I traitors, then, in my hustings† of London?"

"Your Grace hath an official traitor in your exchequer, an official traitor in your mayor, and vile abettors in the aldermen, his council," replied William, calmly, "who, strong in their wealth, and the absence of the King, bear down upon your Grace's hapless English subjects; wresting from them their substance, under the name of levies and imposts, and exacting from the poorest citizen a tax equal in amount to that paid severally by themselves, whose coffers are overflowing, and whose princely merchantmen ride upon distant seas. Against these abuses of trust do I lift up my right hand before your royal face; trusting that the viceregent of God will deal justly with a people committed to his protection, by Him to whom the mightiest kings are accountable for the welfare of their subjects."

"This boldness passeth forgiveness!" cried Richard, striking his mailed arm upon the table beside him, till the Milan steel rang again. And as William, at that moment, advanced a pace towards the King, Bertrand de Boon again started forward, to interpose between his Majesty and one who might, after all, be a disguised emissary of Philip Augustus.

"Go to—go to! let him approach!" cried Richard, motioning aside his minion. "This is no assassin. I have dealt with such ere now. In the East I had frequent encounters with the people of the Old Man of the Mountain; and trust me, friend Bertrand, their faces were otherwise moulded than the features of this stalwart varlet."

For the first time, William bowed low and reverently, in gratitude for the fair interpretation of his sovereign.

"My people, sirrah, are then in open rebellion?" resumed Richard, sternly addressing him.

"Your Grace holds in small account the zeal of the Grand Justiciary, since you can imagine that Hubert Walter would leave such momentous tidings to be communicated by the devoted friend of the people," was the stout reply of Longbeard.

"No evasions, fellow! I ask thee in plain terms, are the citizens of London in revolt?"

"That they would fain avoid so extreme a measure," replied the envoy, "is proved by my pilgrimage to this place. As yet, they have been dealt with by subordinates. As yet, the anointed sovereign of England hath not withheld his ear from their petitions. Wherefore should they dispute the authority of him whom they still hold to be their friend? Your Grace's coronation oath pledged you to administer justice to your English as to your Norman subjects, and, if truth be in the breath of kings, wherefore should we suspect our Richard of the Lion Heart, of meditating an infraction of a covenant made at the altar of the Most High?"

"And what seek these factious rebels of their Prince?" demanded Richard, somewhat mollified.

"An equalization of the law. Let the same taxes affect Norman and Saxon. Let imposts be levied according to the means of the subject, not according to the caprice of minions and ministers. Let not the rich burghers be exempted from a tax which leaveth the hearth of the poor man without fuel, and his children without bread. Secure the liberties of the people; restrain the tyranny of those in authority. Do this, sire, and the nation shall bless you; a grateful people's prayers will more nobly embalm your memory than the extermination of the heathen, the extension of foreign conquests, or the vain renown of chivalry!"

The King remained doggedly silent. It was not often that so stern a voice had sounded in his ears; and the impression was as powerful as distasteful.

"You are the King of England," continued William, profiting by his silence—"the King of a country submitted by the sword of your ancestors, and governed by the sceptre of your power; a country, the hearts of whose children yearn with loyalty, and who would fain love as a father the good shepherd who foldeth their flock. Oh, let not such love and loyalty be embittered by mistrust! Be to us true as we would fain be to your gracious self! A portion of our substance is the portion of the King; and to Cæsar we gladly render the things that are Cæsar's. Enjoy, therefore, the greatness ordained for you—the ermine, the purple, the gauds, the splendours of royalty; for in the sight of these things do we rejoice, as emblems of your power, and tributes of the affection of your people. But be not such empty tokens your sole regard! Such toys as I see yonder," continued William, pointing to the King's harp, which lay upon a trophy of arms in the corner of the tent, "are for sport and recreation; and God forbid that the careful hours of royalty be denied their solace! But a prince hath sterner duties in his hand; moments of deep thought for the welfare of those for whose happiness he must account to God—even that jealous God in whose eyes kings upon their thrones are altogether vanity, and who of old reproved them by the mouths of his prophets, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and scattered their ashes upon the waters."

"Enough, enough of this!" cried Richard, starting up, as the sound of a distant trumpet announced the arrival, at the outposts of his camp, of the herald he was expecting from Philip Augustus. "This is no moment for trafficking with disaffected burghers, or listening to revilings against my men in authority. Thy purpose, varlet, is, I doubt not, good; albeit thy words are unseemly. Leave me. Return to those that sent thee, and say their complaints have reached the ears of their Prince, and shall be regarded in fitting season. I pledge my royal word that my first measure on returning to English ground, shall be to visit the city of London, and, in open hustings, redress the grievances to which I find it submitted. Meanwhile, as thy gown were poor defence against the sharp spears of King Philip's lances of Burgundy, or the bolts of his Flemish bowmen, make light thy heels towards the coast, and haste over seas to bear back my answer to my discontented commons."

Great was the joy at Paul's Cross when, on the eve of the feast of St Michael, William Longbeard, attired in his pilgrim's dress, presented himself to the view of the people as bearer of the gracious message of their sovereign; and proportionately great the indignation of the mayor and aldermen on learning how slightly they had been backed by their prince in the exactions suggested by his royal need.

In his palace at Lambeth, meanwhile, the Grand Justiciary of England sat smiling at the credulity of all parties. Hubert Walter had more intimate experience in the integrity of the royal word. He had weighed to a hair the levity of King Richard; and knew, to the value of an easterling, by what mode and measure of bribery his attention was to be diverted from the groans of a suffering people. It was but to administer liberally to his pastimes—(for, to a king, war is a thing of sport;) and the archbishop was as sure of obtaining double warrant of oppression against the Saxon population, as he was that Richard would return from France the victim of an inglorious truce.

But, though despising alike the King, his own dupe, and the good citizen, the dupe of the King, the Grand Justiciary was not the less indignant that an humble burgess should have presumed to bear to the ear of his royal master complaints against his administration; and, in order to secure himself against a repetition of the offence, a decree was issued, forbidding, under penalty of imprisonment, the departure of any citizen from the walls, without a passport from the hustings of the city; and certain merchants having presumed to infringe the ordinance, and proceed with their wares to the fair of Stamford,* were seized and cast into prison as traitors and malefactors.

The usual consequences ensued. Oppression begets revolt; and the open despotism of the few, the secret association of the many. Fifty thousand persons were soon united by a common bond against the aggressions of government; and William Longbeard became the heart and soul of the association. Already he had renounced all personal ties—his own people and his father's house—to instal himself champion of his suffering brethren of England. Renouncing every lighter social pleasure, and every profitable pursuit, he devoted his days and nights to the study of jurisprudence, till no Norman clerk was more learned in the law, or more eloquent in its exposition, than the Saxon citizen. William was no blustering demagogue; but the judicious advocate of the oppressed. The courts of justice were unable to resist those masterly pleadings by which the cause of the poor and needy was protected from the chicanery of office; and the courts of Westminster admitted that the ermined officials of the Grand Justiciary had their lesson to learn from the erudition of the self-taught jurist. William knew precisely how far he might proceed in defence of the liberties of the people, without endangering his own; and in those all powerful harangues (a mere fragment of which has reached our times†) he who was surnamed by the Saxons the advocate of the poor, touched scathless upon the most fiery topics, while addressing the populace of London in the fields by Ludgate, or in the churchyard of St Botolph's Priory.

Driven, however, at length to desperation by the prolonged absence of the king, and the unspeakable harshness of the measures perpetrated in his name, the Secret Association began to meditate active measures; and concealed arms were soon lodged, to an unexpected extent, in the dwellings of its members. Axes and hatchets, levers and iron bars, were amassed, as a last resource against the ferocity of the Norman officials; while William, in his zeal to animate the patriotism of his fellow-citizens, launched into the style of mystic oratory which had been so successful in raising the youth of Amsterdam into the frenzy of the crusades; converting to his purpose the language of the prophets—"Ho! every man that thirsteth, come ye to the waters!" exclaimed the orator, addressing the attentive multitude; "for behold my fountain is the fountain of liberty, pure and undefiled. And lo! I will filter drop from drop, and separate man from man—the meek man from the proud—the peaceful from him who is stained with blood-guiltiness—the elect from the condemned—the light from the darkness—till liberty is triumphant in the land."

But while the unguarded populace listened to his vague adjurations, the High Norman Court of Parliament, including the functionaries of the Crown, Archbishops, Bishops, and the Barons of the shires adjoining the metropolis, assembled at Westminster, and cited, before their august tribunal, the orator of the people.

Escorted by an immense multitude, who hailed him with acclamations on his way, as their saviour and their king, William obeyed the summons, till the pusillanimous Barons, shaken in their very seats by the shouts of the people, proposed to adjourn the Session till a future day—previous to which assemblies were convoked by the Magistrates of the Grand Justiciary, in divers parishes of London, wherein the weakness of the public mind was assailed by manifestoes of the power and prerogative of the Crown, and the determination of King Richard to deal summarily with all seditious citizens, adherents of William Longbeard.

To all this "the many-headed monster thing" listened with all its ears, and trembled in most of its members. "The King"—"the Crown"—"the Throne"—were, at that period, omnipotent words, to which the great charter of our liberties had as yet opposed no salutary balance; and when, profiting by their panic, the Grand Justiciary had the art to extract from the ring-leaders of the Association a child from every family, as hostages for their submission to the King's Government, William saw that the cause to which he had devoted himself was lost. The innocent hostages having been placed in security in the various forts surrounding London, for a time the public excitement abated. William felt that it were invidious to revive the struggle.

Such, however, was still the influence of the popular orator over the minds of those who, from timidity alone, receded from his banner, that the Grand Justiciary, who had not scrupled to separate infants from their parents, lacked courage to arrest William Longbeard.

Instruments of villany, however, are always at the disposal of authority ; and accredited spies were soon enlisted to follow every movement of the patriot, and report to the Archbishop his words and gestures. A Norman named Geoffrey, accompanied by a chosen band of mercenaries, contrived one morning to dog his footsteps as he proceeded into the country beyond Aldgate, to enjoy the free air with a company of friends ; and laid violent hands upon him, with a view to arrest. But William, drawing from his belt the knife with which, according to the custom of the times, every citizen went armed, laid the traitor dead at his feet ; and though the soldiers, who hurried forward to abet their leader, were secured, by coats of chain-mail, from the stroke of the poignard, William and his companions laid about them so stoutly as to escape unhurt to the sanctuary of a church within the walls, designated, in the Norman annals, as that of St Mary of the Arch. Here, having barred the doors, and barricaded themselves against attack, the armed men, their pursuers, were baffled for a time ; while the Grand Justiciary, alarmed by intelligence of the outrage, and not altogether reliant on the garrison of the tower of London, despatched messengers to the forts and strong castles along the river, to summon in forces for attack.

Who now shall describe the fermentation of London city ! The Mayor and Aldermen assembled in solemn husting at their Hall of Guild. The bell of Paul's Church tolled heavily, to summon the people to prayer. The shops were shut, and the apprentices were chidden within doors. The river-side became thronged with idlers, watching the arrival of the troops ; for every one felt convinced that a decisive popular movement in favour of William must take place. Every one exclaimed, that the besieged were entitled to the best support of their fellow-citizens ; and, while every one waited to ascertain his neighbour's intentions, the royal archers encircled the church, and reinforcements of troops took possession of the adjacent causeways.

Meanwhile, William Longbeard's experience of human nature had prepared his patience for the worst. "Hope not help from your fellow-citizens !" was his exhortation to his comrades in misfortune. "The catiffs at Westminster have the advantage of us. How is it to be expected that a single foot will budge in our behalf, or a single arm be uplifted, while the knives of the Justiciary's gaolers are at the throats of their innocent children ? Would I—would you—would any of us—give the signal for the slaughter of the babes of our bosoms, to secure the safety of strangers ? It is not the cause of Liberty that is at stake in our fate ; for Liberty is immortal, reviving, from century to century, like the fabled Phoenix from her ashes. 'Tis but the lives of nine human beings, their fellow-labourers in the vineyard, which might be preserved by the sacrifice of their helpless children ; and, for my part, I crave not their assistance."

Small, therefore, was their disappointment, on discovering that the inert and panic-struck multitude stirred not in their defence. Ascending to the belfry of the sacred edifice, the devoted men took up their post of observation. And, lo ! they beheld the people afar off, retiring to their homes ; they beheld the river alive with reinforcements ; they beheld the church itself, surrounded troop-deep with armed men ; and it was to these that, summoned by sound of trumpet, in the King's name, to surrender, they breathed fresh terms of defiance.

A pile of wood and resinous substances, seized from the yard of a neighbouring builder, was immediately formed, by command of the Archbishop, at the foot of the tower ; and, in a moment, the smoke and flame ascended ; and, overpowered by suffocation,* the besieged fled from the belfry, and, clinging to the pinnacles of the battlements, demanded quarter of their assailants. Already, the smouldering doors had given way ; and the son of the catiff Geoffrey (the enemy and victim of William Longbeard) was the first to ascend the tower, and plunge his retributive poignard into the body of the patriot.

"This for my father !" cried the infuriated youth.

"This for my country !" replied the noble-hearted Saxon, as he received the blow, and prayed that it might prove mortal.

But, although thus desperately wounded, the half-fainting William was seized and manacled, and, tied to a horse's tail, dragged ignominiously through the streets, a spectacle to the intimidated citizens. His nine companions, tied with cords, were pricked forward by the spearman as his escort, and it was in this humiliating guise they arrived at the gates of the White Tower of London, where the Grand Justiciary was holding his tribunal. Conveyed into the presence of the Archbishop, sentence of death was instantly pronounced against William and his associates. No trial was then available against the antipathies of a vindictive minister. No jury of his countrymen came betwixt a victim and the enmity of his judge. It was

"Off with his head !—So much for Buckingham !" when a monarch marked his man ; it was, "To the gibbet with the insolent varlet !" when the people's friend and advocate confronted the lawless dispenser of the laws.

"I go forth to death," were the last words of William, turning towards the multitude assembled round the gates of the hall. "For my own life have I scorned to plead. The King, who should be at his post to guard the liberties of his people, is vapouring in foreign climes. In the equity of Parliament, (that wordy liar !) no wise man ever yet put trust ; and even you, in whom I rashly confided, did desert me in my hour of need ! I fall, therefore, a prey to the oppressors. My country hath had my life : it shall have my death. I have given up all to my fellow-citizens—state, station, breath : I have nothing more to give them but my forgiveness ! And I say unto you, in presence of this proud prelate, and of his creatures, that the cry of the land hath gone forth to God ; that its wrongs are registered in the Book of Vengeance ; that, as he who smites with the sword shall perish by the sword, the lord your King shall die a violent and untimely death. But the land ye love shall endure ; and, watered with the blood of many martyrs, the tree of liberty take root, and flourish for evermore. And, lo ! as your children's children sit under shelter of its branches, let them name my name with joy, saying, ' Glory to him who died a martyr for the cause of many ! Peace to the ashes of the last Saxon who died for his country ! ' "

A burst of trumpets interrupted, by command of the Grand Marshal, the prisoner's harangue. Attached anew to the same horse which had dragged him to the spot, William was transferred to Tower Hill, where, at that period, a permanent gibbet was erected. Within an hour, William and his nine Saxon companions had given up the ghost !

As in every other case of popular injustice, a reaction soon became apparent. The citizens, who had been intimidated into the meanness of deserting the cause of their benefactor, no sooner learned that he had been submitted to an ignominious death, than they cried aloud against his Norman murderers, and sorrowed for him, saying, " Alas my brother ! " That night the gibbet on which he had suffered was torn down ; and, being divided among the fanatic multitude, every fragment was disputed as it were a sacred relique. The following day, every creature within the walls of the city visited the spot ; and, on the ensuing days, crowds of country people poured in, to look upon the death-place of William Longbeard. At first, the men in authority disdained to notice the posthumous influence of their enemy ; and, at length, they beheld, with amazement, pilgrims from every county in England repair to the spot, until it became excavated and worn away by footsteps innumerable.

The popular enthusiasm thus excited, the spot soon acquired preternatural sanctity. The patriot-martyr graduated into a saint ; and miracles were accomplished in his name. Throughout the country, many priests of English origin preached in honour of William the Saxon, just as, one hundred and twenty years before, their predecessors had chaunted the praise of Walthrof, the last chief of the Anglo-Saxons.

The sick were now brought on litters to the spot ; and, cured by the force of fashion and imagination, attributed their convalescence to the interposition of the departed patriot. Children were taught to lift up their little hands in prayer for his protection ; and the place finally became the rallying point of the disaffected and seditious.

At length, finding the memory of the dead William almost as fatal to his government as his living opposition, the Grand Justiciary, Hubert, stationed a company of spearmen on the spot, to disperse, with the point of the lance, the devotees of the English saint. Still, however, they persevered. Driven from their stand by day, they reassembled after nightfall,* and scattered flowers upon the place of execution. Every day, the palace at Lambeth was harassed with tidings of new honours rendered by the people to their departed friend. Wherever the Archbishop turned, he was haunted by the name of William Longbeard, William the Englishman, William the champion of liberty ! The discontented barons twitted him with it in council—the murmuring citizens sheltered themselves from further exactions, by citing the prophetic words of the martyr ; and formal ceremonies were at length performed over his place of martyrdom, consecrating it as the altar of liberty.

The Grand Justiciary was now compelled to coercive measures. Having caused the environs to be invested with troops, one night, when a vast multitude were solemnizing the anniversary of the death of the martyr, hundreds of offenders were taken captive and dragged off to prison. The women engaged in the affair were publicly scourged, the men imprisoned in different fortresses of the city ; while the place of execution, having been dug up and desecrated, was converted into a military station.

No miracle ensued. The man who had devoted his energies to the cause of liberty lay quiet in his grave, leaving it to the living to pursue his efforts, and thus, discredited as a saint, the popular fervour in his favour gradually subsided, and the Grand Justiciary of England pursued his oppressions unmolested.

It was not till, at the close of the struggles of the succeeding reign, that grand compromise occurred between King John and his nobles, which gave rise to the signing of Magna Charta, the people, finding their interests overlooked in a treaty so mistakingly described in history as the great charter of English liberty, began to murmur in their assemblies, that, were William Longbeard still surviving, the people would be as well secured against the encroachments of the privileged classes, as the privileged classes had contrived to secure themselves against the encroachments of the King. They called upon the memory of their dead—they reviled the ingratitude which had suffered their friend to be sacrificed before their eyes. They swore that the English nation did not deserve from Providence the blessing of a champion ; and more than one, emulating the prophetic genius of the departed, denounced, as doom to England, that henceforward, amid her struggles for liberty, no friend should arise to further her endeavours, comparable with the zealous, disinterested William, the first and greatest of her Patriot Martyrs.

NEW FASHIONABLE NOVELS.—THE WOMAN OF THE WORLD.*

THOUGH the brilliant authoress of this novel had nothing to recommend her save rapidity of invention, and an amazing fertility, her compositions would form a remarkable literary phenomenon. In mere production she distances the wondrous achievements of Sir Walter Scott, and surpasses the exhaustless German, La Fontaine. Her faculty of invention is, indeed, cribbed by the nature of the ground to which she is, as it were, staked; but she discovers its possession by the variety of forms and hues which she contrives to impart to her fashionable staple, from the dexterous and artist-like mode of handling and presenting it. She is like a skilful landscape gardener, who contrives to give the appearance of vast extent and variety to a narrow piece of pleasure ground; or rather like one of her own fashionable chefs, who, in a strait, can display his genius by furnishing entrées of fish, meat, volaille, and gibier, from the same pair of worn-out slippers. The fade and tawdry materials which it has been, we should apprehend, her task rather than her taste so often to fashion and re-fashion, could never have been so frequently produced to the same advantage, and with the same freshness and air of reality, by an inferior artist. Yet, what pity to see powers, if not wasted, yet so limited in their scope and range, which are capable of adorning a wider and higher sphere, abounding in purer and more genial elements. It is not enough to be at the head of a school, if that school be not the highest. It is, however, we are aware, very easy to talk the matter over sensibly and well. The author best knows his own case, his own duties and difficulties; and the true province of criticism is, not what he might have done, but what he has done. In this respect, "The Woman of the World," though it fully bears out its family resemblance, is not one of the most transcendently beautiful of the numerous literary progeny of the author of "The Hamiltons," "Mrs Armytage," "Stokeshill Place," "Pierre L'Ecrevissier," or "The Lettre de Cachet;" though it is by far the best merely fashionable novel of the season, as all proceeding from the same sprightly pen are out of sight the most brilliant. No romance writer ever united the substance and elasticity of native English fiction with the airy, shifting, fugitive graces of the brightest era of French fashionable literature, in so remarkable a degree. Hence her eminent distinction as a sketcher of the manners of a society which, in its tastes, predilections, and acquisitions, is become more Gallic than Anglian. Her style of narrative and her dialogue, a most flattering representation of that of the brilliant society she depicts, is indeed a continual bubbling and belling up of bright, sparkling, evanescent fancies—a perpetual jet d'eau—an incessant play of brilliant artificial fire. To the moralist, the author's great merit lies in incidentally exposing the hollowness, heartlessness, and contemptible frivolity of aristocratic life; the lowness of its aims, and the baseness of its means of pursuing them. No one ventures to say that she is an incompetent judge of the manners and morals of fashionable aristocracy; no one alleges that her pictures are overcharged. On the contrary, her parade of knowledge is sometimes censured, since, though correct, it is so sectional.—But we are quite aware that our readers will, in general, be better pleased to learn what the new fashionable romance is about, than to learn once more our opinion of the rare merits of a writer of whose talents they have long since made up their minds.

Sir William Helmsley, of Helmsley Abbey—a young Northamptonshire baronet, blessed with a good constitution, a good person, a good temper, a good estate, and a good reputation, and thrice blessed in a good and amiable wife, who never sighed for a house in May Fair—might have been esteemed among the happiest of English country gentlemen; though the great man of his family, his maternal uncle, Lord Shropshire, a whister at White's of thirty years' standing, never spoke of him but as a lost man, or as "that ambitionless ass, my nephew." Sir William would not involve his estate to get into Parliament; he would not be introduced to the Colebrookes, his neighbours, though Lord Colebrooke ranked among the first men in the kingdom, and, in consequence of a change of Ministry, was likely speedily to obtain some high office. It was in vain that Lord Shropshire set forth the advantages of such an acquaintance:—

"I have no ambition to become a placeman," replied Sir William, calmly. "Marcella and I are happy as we are. . . . My sphere is limited."

"The more reason that it should be extended! It was sufficient boast for the rulers of ancient times, that they found a city mud, and left it marble. A man in these days does some honour to his pedigree, who is born a baronet and dies a peer."

Sir William believed his public duties to be limited by the boundaries of his county and his estate; as was his happiness by the park palings of the Abbey. He was incorrigible! While his Lordship shrugged his shoulders in contemptuous pity, Lady Helmsley's quiet eye wandered from her work to the intelligent countenance of her husband, and thence to the well-stored bookshelves of the library in which they were sitting. Nothing could be more rational and happy than the way of life of the inmates of Helmsley Abbey. They led the retired rural life of English gentry,

"In all its joys and elegance."

Their happiness was not often invaded by the intrusion of titled relatives, or fashionable guests. They were left

To ride together, walk together, see with their own eyes and hear with their own ears the progress effected in the village by the fruition of their schemes of benevolence; return home for a stroll in the flower-garden, a game at billiards, or a duet of harp and flute, of which no carping philharmonic critic was at hand to detect the imperfections. Sir William gave an hour every morning to little Harry; and Mary passed more than three times that space of time on a little stool beside her mother's work-table. The days of the two idle people were, in short, very fully filled up. Lady Helmsley attended to her village school, while Sir William was busy in his plantations; and they met again after a few hours absence, with as much delight as if weeks had divided them from each other.

But there were tender claims upon Marcella's affection existing beyond the Abbey. She had been as a mother to her orphaned sister, Emma; while Sir William became at once the guardian and brother of Gerald Wroughton, her only brother. Gerald was now of age, in ill health; and expected home from Italy to settle at Wroughton Hall for life; and, shortly after the visit of Lord Shropshire, Emma returned from her London school to reside with her sister. There wanted but this to complete the domestic happiness of Marcella, whose cup of felicity was full. Emma found her sister looking, as she fancied, thin and ill. Consumption was in their family; and the doting, unsuspecting husband, roused at once from his dream of bliss to the most distracting anxiety, carried his sinking and angelic wife to London. From thence, as she gradually sank, she refused to go abroad:—

"If change be desirable for me, let it be back to the Abbey. It is my wish to die at home, to be buried at home." For worlds could not Helmsley have commanded the utterance of a word in contradiction to these forebodings! To hear them from the lips of his wife—his beloved, loving, heart in heart, soul in soul Marcella—was as if their meaning reached him for the first time. He felt that since she said it, it must be so. He was about to lose her. He was about to be alone!

Compassionating the frenzy of grief she had excited, Lady Helmsley lay silent on her sofa, her cold fingers entwining the throbbing convulsed hand of him who sat beside her, with his face concealed against the back of his chair. She did not reiterate her request. She did not repeat her forebodings. She lay speechless and patient; till at length, in hoarse and scarcely articulate accents, he replied—"We will return to Helmsley then, next week." Such was his mode of confirming the sentence she had passed upon herself!

This is one little passage of deep, silent, unobtrusive pathos; but the whole of the dying scenes are equally touching. Before they left London, a foreshadowing of future events is skilfully given. Lord Colebrooke, to whom Helmsley, the agonized husband, had been accidentally introduced, in a casual encounter on the street, had won his regard by the sincere tone of concern, the look of sympathy with which he listened while the despairing husband, his eyes filling with tears, replied to the decent inquiries of his worldly uncle, concerning the condition of the dying Marcella. Another day he was accidentally accosted by Lord Colebrooke with the kindest inquiries after the health of Lady Helmsley.

Lord Colebrooke had drawn up to make the inquiry; and, at a little distance, reining in a beautiful horse, apparently right proud of its most delicate rider, sat a young and lovely woman, with the most graceful figure and sent on horseback he had ever happened to behold. There was so much life, so much character, so much charm in the countenance of the stranger, as contrasted with the two female faces he was now in the habit of contemplating—the one so sick, the other so sorrowful—that it seemed as if all the impulses of youth, health, and intelligence were gathered there in marvellous combination.

This lady was the Lady Adelaide de Vere—the beautiful daughter of Colebrooke, the Fate of Gerald Wroughton and of Sir William Helmsley—THE WOMAN OF THE WORLD. Marcella, with all her love, well knew the weak points of her husband's character; and, though she had the utmost reliance on the strength of his affection for their children, the solicitude of the anxious dying mother dictated many requests concerning them.

"I trust Knowles will not be tempted to quit Mary, even after she is in the hands of a governess," said she, in a faint voice, one evening to Miss Wroughton. "Mary is delicate; and Knowles so thoroughly understands her constitution. Should Helmsley marry again, (as in all probability will be the case,) changes might arise. Promise me, my dear Emma, that you will do your utmost to keep that good woman about the children."

"Her own inclination will keep her there," replied Miss Wroughton, deeply affected by such a petition. "And Sir William will never replace the wife he loves so dearly."

"No man can answer for himself on such a point. And why should he? Why should I wish to perpetuate his regret, or prevent some other woman from enjoying the happiness I have enjoyed? A prudent remarriage would probably be the best thing that could befall the children. You are too young, my dear Emma, to remain here as their protectress. You will live here with Gerald—marry—become a mother. It will be a better thing for Mary than her father!"

She could not conclude the sentence; and Emma, aware how differently her sister had always expressed herself in the similar case of their own father, saw what violence she was doing to her feelings, in order to pre-assure excuses for any future measure to her husband.

Those who pronounce all novels, and especially fashionable novels, idle and frivolous, and false or unreal representations of life, may be tempted to reconsider their sweeping judgment on reading such passages as this which records Marcella's gradual decline.

Her decline was more tedious, more painful than she had anticipated; not that ethereal wasting, the delusive creation of poets and novelists, but the fearful struggle of the soul with decaying nature; the harassing efforts, the restlessness, the exhaustion, the momentary delirium followed by hours of inanition. Throughout all this, the husband watched and ministered with a fervour of patient affection as feminine almost as that of the sister. He would send the others to bed, and remain in secret by the bedside, watching long after the hireling watchers were outworn and at rest.

It was one of those nights, when he was alone with the sick, that what might be termed the agony of Marcella commenced. His hand was lying beside her own on the coverlet—not clasping it, lest the pressure should be too much for its wasted fingers; when of a sudden, with an unnatural accession of voice, she began to talk, as with the tongue of angels, of God, of immortality, of the rewards of the just. Those who have watched beside the dying, know how often this elevation of spirit consequent upon the disorganization of mortal nature, tends to soothe and dignify sufferings otherwise insupportable.

Having anxiously examined her face, which was flushed with hectic spots, Helmsley saw that the strain of triumph in which she was indulging, was the song of the dying swan; and, as if jealous that any but himself should listen to those words of heavenly exaltation, forbore to summon assistance. Marcella was beyond the reach of mortal succour; and, kneeling by her bedside, he gathered into his heart every look, every syllable, each one of which might prove the last.

In this attitude, were they found when morning dawned. But from the moment Miss Wroughton and the nurse busied themselves in administering remedies and suggesting aid, Marcella became silent.

No frantic sorrow, no passionate despair, ever equalled the violent and impetuous grief of the bereaved widower, which he long sought to cherish and keep alive by every perverted and selfish indulgence. The servants and the tenants said, "Poor master was quite broken-hearted; hastening fast after my lady." But Time wrought his usual miracle; and, though Sir William still persisted in refusing the invitations of his neighbours, it became more the consequence of the habit of seclusion and mauvaise honte than overpowering, unconquerable sorrow. The imperceptible but certain change is delicately traced. The menials had worn out their sables, the little children had been habited in their former gay attire. "Changes and improvements were going on. Nothing remained of Marcella save a certain stern gravity on the brow of Sir William, and pensive sadness occasionally overspreading the fair brow of the faithful sister." Gerald Wroughton partook of the constitutional delicacy of his family. He was again drooping, and was ordered to Italy to pass the winter, but experienced some reluctance to leave his brother-in-law.

"If I leave him shut up with Emma, the children, and aunt Margaret, he will turn hermit and let his beard grow before my return," mused the kind-hearted young man. "What if I could persuade him to bear me company?—He has never been abroad; the excitement of new scenes might be of service."

Conscious, however, of the weakness of the man with whom he had to deal, instead of proposing the tour to Helmsley as a matter of recreation, he suggested it as a sacrifice of good will towards himself.

And Helmsley reluctantly went, in compliance with the request of Marcella's only brother; and, before they reached Calais, his spirits were rising; and, on reaching Paris, he was ready to look about him and be amused; while, at Naples, pleasure was courted. Many fashionable English were residing there, and among others Lord Colebrooke and his enchanting daughter, both of whom, on a former visit, had graciously noticed Gerald Wroughton, the latter "as much as a beautiful woman of four-and-twenty ever notices a cubling squire." The brothers-in-law one day discussed, with the St Pauls, an English family residing at Naples, the rights, claims, and pretensions of Lady Adelaide, who had called at the St Pauls' door; but, as was conceived, on some caprice or overstrained point of etiquette, refused to enter the house, though invited, on being told English gentlemen were present.

"How English!" cried Mrs St Paul, vexed at her disappointment. "So much as Lady Adelaide has lived on the Continent, not to have laid aside the chain-mail of English formalities!"

"Would that of all her countrywomen one could say the same!" thought the three single men present.

"Our notions of politeness," continued Mrs St Paul, pettishly, "are all connected with laced buttonholes, and our best bib-and-tucker! We never fancy ourselves fine enough to do honour to ourselves and our friends."—Sir William, who was still sufficiently English to blush for his boots, experienced a twinge of conscience at the charge. Fortunately for his confusion, Dr Moorsom engaged in defence of Lady Adelaide. Of all earthly women, he said, she ought to be most indifferent to dress, her beauty being of an order beyond deriving the slightest advantage from such accessories. "Her attraction," observed the doctor, "consists in grace, ease, dignity, intelligence. She is charming in the simplest morning dress."

"And on horseback!" involuntarily added Sir William, half apart.

"True! Nothing can be more perfect than her seat on horseback!" chimed in Mr St Paul. "She reminds me of an Amazon in an antique bas-relief I once saw at Girdenti." While Wroughton could not refrain from exclaiming to Helmsley, "You have seen her, then! You never told me that you had seen her?"

Dr Moorsom was a worthy and benevolent elderly physician, the paternal friend of Gerald, and professionally engaged to attend the nervous, valetudinary Mrs St Paul, and her classical lord, upon a two years' residence abroad. Mrs St Paul, herself a beauty, was piqued by the praises poured forth upon the universal charmer. She ventured to think Lady Adelaide's independence of manners anything but pleasing.

"Yet they could not become more deprecating without hypocrisy," interposed Dr. Moorsom. "Age is not to be measured by years. Though scarcely five-and-twenty, Lady Adelaide has been at the head of her father's house from the age of fourteen, doing its honours to all the royalty and nobility of Europe. When Lord Colebrooke was ambassador at the Hague, I recollect his daughter presiding over his fêtes like a Reine de Seize Ans, or, rather like the Queen of Faery in person."

"Yes, we all know that she is a woman of the world!" cried Mrs St Paul, with a somewhat tremulous voice. "The spoiled child of the cleverest man and greatest romé in Europe! Well!—We shall see whether their united cleverness achieves the object they have now in view."

"And what may that be? To outblaze Venus at the approaching carnival?" inquired Gerald, with a smile.

"Outblaze!—Oh, dear, no. Lady Adelaide is superior to display. She only wants to catch Lord Portumna."

"Is Lord Portumna a great partie?" inquired Helmsley, addressing the question generally to the circle.

"A man of broken fortune and broken constitution—first-rate abilities and first-rate fashion!" replied Dr Moorsom.

Long before this Lady Adelaide had fascinated the ardent and enthusiastic Gerald Wroughton, the master of four or five thousand a-year, and no bad pis aller for the daughter of a bankrupt roué Peer, placed in the peculiar and singular circumstances of her Ladyship. In brief, Sir William Helmsley, in no long time, also felt the influence of the spell which made Lady Adelaide either adored or detested by all who approached her. He suffered himself to be the frequent guest of her father; and, imperceptibly, the despairing husband of the sainted Marcella became the blindly devoted lover of the accomplished WOMAN OF THE WORLD, the adored of his brother-in-law. The fine, delicate, and subtle strokes by which the nature of Lady Adelaide, and the enthrallment of the successive lovers whom her ambition or her cupidity made the subject of her artifices, cannot be given save in the complete scenes in which her character and position are developed. Nor can we at all advert to the minor satellites of the staff of the fashionable factions at Naples; the one headed by Lady Wycombe, the other by Lady Adelaide de Vere; nor yet to Lord Portumna the ambassador, or his attachés, Alexis Bagot, and Harry Harford, the heir expectant and nephew of a bachelor London millionaire. The retainers of the factions, their respective tails—Mrs Longman-Tompkinson, namely, with her everlasting country place of Stoke Park, and her house in Carlton Terrace, “let to the Brazilian ambassador for five years,” who stuck by Lady Adelaide; and the Schrams, a Yankee family of immense wealth, and an equivalent passion for European fashionable notoriety, who adhered to Lady Wycombe—are more original and racy than the magnates. The Schrams, in particular, amply deserved to have been brought to the West End of London. The outposts, the materiel, and the policy of the minor chieftainesses of the rival factions deserve a passing notice.

There was, in the first place, Mrs St Paul; who, like the bat in the fable, fought alternately on both sides; and occupied her idle mornings in carrying from one party to the other, hints, sneers, and misrepresentations.

Then came Mrs Longman-Tompkinson, conscious that the most golden of her gold would be insufficient to gild over, in the sight of the high and mighty countess, the looms from which Mr Longman-Tompkinson of Stoke Park derived his mansions in Buckinghamshire and Carlton Terrace, his plate, equipages, Parliamentary interest, and promise of a baronetcy; but trusting that the excellence of her professional concerts might bribe the presence of the dilettante Colebrookes, and the glitter of her diamonds procure an invitation in return. In Mrs Longman-Tompkinson, therefore, Lady Adelaide had the most vehement of partisans;—flying from house to house in a frenzy of enthusiasm for her wit, beauty, and accomplishments; and returning to deposit, at the feet of her lovely patroness, the bouquet of nettles she had gathered for her in the shape of a thousand traits of Lady Wycombe’s animosity.

The Darlings, with five daughters to marry, judiciously adhered to the Wycombe cause, as the safer side of the question. For Lady Wycombe was a woman congealed in the hardest frost of virtue.

Since the arrival of Helmsley and Wroughton, indeed, poor Lady Darling half repented her demonstrations in favour of the enemy; wisely remarking to a singularly coincident husband, “that people have no business to indulge in dislikes or partialities who have a family to provide for.”

The society of Naples, meanwhile, found its account in the feminine feud. Lady Wycombe, well instructed by London experience that popularity will not flourish except upon a diet of ices and lemonade, gave weekly soirées dansantes of considerable brilliancy. But balls are things of every-day occurrence during the carnival; and Lady Adelaide contrived, after the first two or three, to give the tone to a general disgust for the heat, noise, and fatigue of such entertainments, as a prelude to the exquisite weekly concerts which Lord Portumna was commencing on Lady Wycombe’s night at the Embassy.

Let a private individual, whatever his rank, lavish his utmost cost and care, he will never succeed in producing anything equal to a diplomatic fête. . . . The temper of no woman of fashion is proof against such a catastrophe. There remained but one resource. Lady Wycombe whispered to her intimates, that she only hoped Lord Portumna would marry poor Lady Adelaide de Vere! But even that usually successful hint, fell innocuous; even the conscientious Darlings, though they started at the implication, observed that however things might be, it was the duty of the English, in a foreign country, to attend the fêtes of their ambassador.

In vain did her Ladyship condescend to the most pitiful resources. She would have visited, nay, have honoured with her countenance at dinner, the Longman-Tompin-sons, for the sake of bribing away an adherent of her rival. But the Longman-Tompkinsons stood stanchly by the visited of royalty.

The Countess, at length, stooped to conquer, by despatching an invitation to her soirées dansantes, through Alexis Bagot, to Sir William Helmsley and Wroughton.

The Schrams had just blazed out in Naples to dazzle (Mrs St Paul told Helmsley)

“All eyes with the tinsel and gold-leaf which form the delight of rich Yankees and Bartholomew-Fair show-men.”

“And who are the Schrams?” inquired Sir William. “I never even heard of them.”

“You are fortunate, then, in having lived out of hearing of the tin-trumpets of newspaper puffery,” replied the lady. “The Schrams are New-York Newcomes, who have performed ko-too at the foot of all the thrones of Europe, saving that of England, where they know their pretensions would be weighed in the balance, and found wanting.”

“Americans perform ko-too?” cried Sir William. “Forbid it, shade of Washington!”

“The patriarch Schram is an empty, pompous fellow, bursting with the sense of his personal importance, yet unable to forgive himself for not having been born a lord; who throws away his money, not like a prince but like a parvenu,” added Mrs St Paul.

“Throw away the only thing that seems to have raised him in the world? But what brings these people to Naples?”

“A desire of smoking the calumet of peace with another aristocracy,” replied St Paul. “Paris is their meridian.”

“I wonder to whom they will accrocher themselves in Naples?—Lady Wycombe, of course, is out of the question. . . . It would be charity to afford a hint to Schram that he has only to declare war against Lady Adelaide de Vere, to be accepted as an ally of the Wycomites,” cried Mrs St Paul. “By the way, we met Lady Adelaide as we were driving to your house.”

“So early?”

“I fancy she had been to Santa Chiara, to see her little girl. I know she is only allowed to visit the child on appointed days.”

Sir William was too much astonished for utterance. He felt persuaded that he had misunderstood Mrs St Paul; but it was impossible to require the repetition of a lady’s words.

At an early age Lady Adelaide had married Lord Sherburne, to save her reputation from the consequences of a suspected liaison with Lord Portumna, and gratify her desire of independence; and soon afterwards brought such evidence of the mental imbecility, crimes, and cruelty of her husband, before Doctors’ Commons as enabled her to be completely independent. Sir William Helmsley, already her secret lover, even while considering her almost the affianced wife of his brother-in-law Gerald, was, on learning even this, relieved of a load of mortification:—

“The divorce proceeded, then, from no impropriety of conduct?”

“Impropriety, my dear fellow,” (cried his friend and old college chum, Sir Raymond Horten,) “is a vague term. Though all the world considered Lord Colebrooke justified in securing his daughter from the brutality of a madman, many people thought it a suspicious circumstance that a man so knowing as his lordship should have suffered his daughter to become the wife of a Roman Catholic peer, by the mere ceremonial of the Protestant Church, so as to leave her the possibility of divorce. The Sherburnes, you see, originally discountenanced the match, but left the poor fellow to his own devices; so that, though married according to the law of the land, the solemnization was nothing to him as a case of conscience. Altogether, there was something fouche in the business. . . . I only know that the child is to inherit, and that Lady Adelaide is at liberty to marry again whenever she shall hit upon her dupe."

Sir William Helmsley, ever striving to deceive himself, and fancying that he was actuated by the most exalted regard for Gerald, while his motives were alloyed by jealousy and rivalry, resolved to remonstrate with the youth, on his infatuation, and, if possible, to avert the calamity of his marriage with a woman so generally blamed and so painfully situated. A letter from Emma, in England, who had heard, with alarm and sorrow, of the entanglement of her brother, enforced his purpose. He accordingly informed Gerald of the marriage and divorce:—

"I am aware of every incident of her life," replied Wroughton, calmly.

"And you would carry back as your wife to Wroughton Hall, to be the protectress of your sister and the successor of your mother, a woman branded with suspicions of the most detestable nature? You would take to your bosom the mother of a child whose father is yet alive?—a woman haunted by disgraceful reminiscences—a woman who has figured before the tribunals of the country?"

"At present, I have made no engagement to marry Lady Adelaide de Vere," replied Gerald, startled but not convinced by the unwonted impetuosity of his brother-in-law. "If anything could hurry me into precipitate proposals, it would be to hear her character unjustly aspersed by my family. All that can be urged against her I know!"

Hitherto Lady Adelaide had coquetted with, or encouraged Gerald Wroughton, as one among the list of her eligible admirers; but there was more in the cards. Lord Shropshire, the uncle of Helmsley, was the father of an only son, Lord Bridgnorth—

One of the handsomest young men in England; a leading man at the leading clubs, and indispensable at every fashionable dinner-party; who gave exquisite fêtes at an exquisite villa, under the presidency of the most exquisite opera-dancer of the day; had fought a duel, caused a divorce, won a steeple chase, ruined a raw ensign in the guards at piquet; and was supposed to be able to distinguish himself in public life any rainy day, when, having nothing else to do, he should see fit to throw himself away upon politics!

Unluckily, during his interim of fine weather, the noble roué, to whom ordinary modes of life were becoming stale and unprofitable, grew bored on shore, and, like other dandies nautically inclined, mounted a yacht. The result was disastrous. Designing to pass the autumn in the Baltic, Lord Bridgnorth and a noble friend, who, being what is called "hard up," quartered himself on any one who was soft enough to feed, lodge, and bear with his inanity, landed one day in an obscure fishing-town, on the coast of Jutland; where, after treating themselves with schiedam, they saw fit to treat the natives with a specimen of the Great-British art of pugilism; till their Danish antagonists, provoked by the wantonness of an attack which they little supposed to be a scientific exhibition, retaliated so much in earnest, that the following day Lord Bridgnorth fell a victim to the contusions received while his blood was in a state of inflammation.

The heir of forty thousand a-year and an ancient English peerage, to die scarcely sober, wholly unattended, in a Jutland fishing-hovel! The humiliation was greater almost than the affliction; and the bereaved father, blind to the fact that his son had fallen a victim to his own vices, talked of nothing less than requiring from ministers a demand for vengeance on the murderers. . . . It was not enough that his only son, the finest young man in England, had been sacrificed; but the insolent newspapers had taken upon themselves to represent the event in a series of pitiful paragraphs, presuming to throw blame upon Lord Bridgnorth, and leave a doubt whether his death need be made a matter of national warfare.

Lord Shropshire was, in fact, almost as angry as afflicted at the loss of his son. It was such a mode to die—such a cruel want of consideration for his father—such a sinful disregard to his position in life—such an inattention to the demands of his own consequence! What business had he, a member of White's and the House of Commons—a peer expectant, whose bay filly was entered for the Derby two years following, whose name was honoured at Coutts's, and good at Crockford's, to "drink, and speak, parrot, equabble, swagger, swear," with a gang of Holstein skippers?—What business had he at all yachting in the Baltic?—Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère?

Nothing can exceed this vivacious sketch. Lord Shropshire died in turn, and Sir William Helmsley was heir to a clear fifty thousand a-year, and the dormant peerage of Monthermer. Of these circumstances, Lady Adelaide had, through her friend the Ambassador, obtained information some hours before the intelligence had reached the party more interested, but not more alive to the changed position of the Northamptonshire Baronet.

Mrs Longman-Tompkinson had, meanwhile, nobly resolved to astonish Naples, and mortify Lady Wycombe and the Schrams, by the splendour of a bal costumé. Her patroness, Lady Adelaide, had condescendingly consented to appear; and, by a series of graceful and well-managed artifices, the late melancholy widower, who had foresworn the Palazzo Balbi since he had heard the history of the fair inmate, was induced to perform Petrarch to her Laura, to the inexpressible delight of Gerald. The enamoured youth, totally unconscious of what Sir William struggled to conceal even from himself—the growing influence of the enchantress, the accomplished and exquisitely beautiful woman of the world, over his widowed heart—had found the repugnance of his brother-in-law and former guardian to his projected marriage, the greatest drawback upon his happiness. But the relative position of parties, and a good specimen of the work, is afforded by the following extract, which again reproduces our beloved Schrams. We never tire of the Schrams: we have far too little of the Schrams. We wish the authoress would oblige the new and old world with their history at length—their Anglo-Dutch parentage; their rise and progress from the log farm-house to the counting-house; their splendours in Broadway; their villa on the New-Jersey Coast; their sojourn at Saratoga Springs; their embarkation for Havre-de-Grace, on a five years' tour through Europe; their settlement and final route from the Chausse d'Antin and May Fair.

There was a dinner given at Lord Colebrooke's, at which were present, Dr Moorsom, his nervous patient, Mrs St Paul, and the English heroes:—

"How amazingly poor Princess Strada's will be out-blazed by the gaudy liveries of the Schrams!" said Mrs St Paul, who thought Lady Adelaide and her father extremely prosy. "I am told they raise the price of gold lace wherever they go."

"I thought the sturdy Americans despised such gaudy distinctions?" said Sir William.

"Not in Europe," replied Dr Moorsom. "Schrams found himself so often mistaken for one of the 'helps,' and the head help was so often spoken to for his master, that, in self-defence, he was obliged to hang out the ensigns of feudal life."

"Princess Stradalla (whose grand apartment they have hired) declares that, instead of having the carriage at the door at a certain hour, they have always a stand of carriages in waiting—open, shut, coaches, chariots, caleches, cabriolets—ready to answer their call, or that of their hangers-on; beside saddle horses, à discretion, for the use of their morning visitors," observed Mrs St. Paul.

"What pure philanthropy!" cried the doctor.

"Excellent policy in Paris, perhaps," observed Lord Colebrooke, "where the misfortunes and impoverishment of la haute noblesse have stripped the spunging system of a portion of its dishonour. The old emigrant Dukes and Marquesses, who, in their youth, gambled away the pocket money so splendidly allowed them by Lord Molra, do not blush to fawn and prey upon the Schrams. Here, people are of a different way of thinking. The Neapolitans will overreach brother Jonathan, if they can, in the sale of a picture or antique; but they will not stoop to pick up the crumbs that fall from his table."

"Let them overreach Schram if they can!" cried Dr Moorsom, laughing. "'They need ha' long spoons that sup wi' the de'il.' The old gentleman has still enough of the pettifoggery of the Broadway about him to be a sharp hand at a bargain."

"I confess it would give me no pain to find that he was overreached," observed Gerald Wroughton. "Wherever this man goes, he purchases whatever is most costly, not to gratify his individual taste, but to exhibit the length of his purse; and, when people bring their vanity into the market, with all the streamers of its ostentation flying, they mark themselves out for dupes."

During this chit-chat, the eyes of Monthermer were irresistibly attracted towards the table where Gerald and Lady Adelaide had established themselves at chess.

There was something domestic in their attitude which displeased him. Although placed so close beside the circle as to take a share in the conversation, they had means of addressing to each other by-words and comments, unheard by the rest of the party, and of interchanging glances more eloquent than words.

With her long hair simply parted on her forehead, and twisted into a knot—attired in a dress of dark velvet, which imparted a rich contrast to the dazzling whiteness of her shoulders and of the ungloved arm resting on the edge of the chess-table, without an ornament, without an affectation—Lady Adelaide presented a realization of the ideal of some poet's or artist's dream. It was beauty of the highest order—of form, of colour, of expression; it was beauty which caused the heart of Helmsley to sink within him, when he reflected how soon he might be brought within hourly peril of its charms; and at the cost to Gerald Wroughton, of what fearful hazard of happiness!

Short as was the period since he had shrunk from the self-avowal of a passion which he felt to be unhallowed and degrading, Helmsley now gave himself up to the consciousness of his enthrallment. So is it ever with a lover.

Both brothers were now equally under the spells of the enchantress, while with her, the fortune and title of Lord Monthermer had, in one moment, for ever quashed the pretensions of Gerald. Emma Wroughton—still hearing of the enthrallment and danger of Gerald, and dreading his alliance with Lady Adelaide de Vere as ruin and misery to himself, and as the severest possible calamity to his whole family—had again written to Sir William to save her brother. Alas! it was himself that more required the admonitions, the warnings, the harsh but necessary severity of friendship. Gerald's small fortune and untitled name were become his protection, when his claims were calmly weighed by the female Talleyrand in the balance, against those of her rich and ennobled dupe. In reply to Emma's sisterly fears and scruples, Sir William informed her that he had obtained a promise from his brother-in-law to form no final engagement for the limited period of two months; but he admitted, that no man, honoured by the smiles of Lord Colebrooke's daughter, was likely to withdraw his allegiance; and entreated that Emma and old Aunt Margaret would prepare themselves to form a more lenient judgment of their future relation. To relieve the perpetual irritation of his mind, Helmsley now plunged into the extravagant dissipation of the English in Naples; whither some of their gay country people had been attracted from Rome by the rumour of the rival fêtes of the Schrams and Longman-Tompkinsons. He found no relief in this hollow refuge. "Alone, with his conscience, he admitted, with varying complexion and hurried respiration, that he was no longer master of himself; that a spell had enthralled his destinies; that the tranquillity of his life was broken up for ever; that he existed but in the presence of Lady Adelaide de Vere."

If the insipidity of Lady Darling's daughters, and the languid inanity of Moorsom's fair hypochondriac, had enhanced the dignified simplicity and clear intelligence of Lady Adelaide, what far higher relief was now afforded to her merits, by contrast with the purse-proud fussiness of the Schrams, and the noisy frivolity of the flight of summer swallows which had migrated to twitter in their sunshine! Mrs Longman-Tompkinson, apprehensive of being outglittered in a single spangle, by the gilt gingerbread of the Broadway, was labouring like a recruiting-sergeant to increase her forces, with favours flying and beat of drum; while curiosity to ascertain whether the high mightinesses of the New World ate with their fingers, and dined their guests on pumpkin-pie, attracted the untravelled and unenlightened nobility of Naples to the balls and dinners of the Schrams, and policy engaged the corps diplomatique to fraternize with the transatlantic colony.

"We intend to stand by the Tompkinson woman," said Alexis Bagot to Helmsley, as they were riding home one day together from the Corso.

"By we, meaning the embassy?"

"Oh, dear no! I know nothing about school during play hours. Portumna, you know, is a sort of person to go anywhere he is likely to be amused—whether to laugh at or with his entertainers; and Harford, of course, follows Portumna, like the shadow of a shade. All three will become Schrammites. But we adhere to the Tompkinsons."

"I am to conclude, then, that to realize the number of your pronoun, you write yourself 'we, Alexis Bagot?'"

"No, I speak in the name of my set. Lady Wycombe cannot endure these half-horse, half-alligator monsters. Madame de la Chuchotterie comes to her every day, with proposals of alliance; undertaking that she shall make out the list for their next ball, and order them a dessert service at the royal manufactory, emblazoned with whatever coat of arms she chooses to assign them. But we are cruel. What do the Colebrooke party intend to do?" he continued, coming at length to his point.

"What has Lady Adelaide decided?"

"I have never inquired," replied Helmsley. "Conduct herself, I presume, with her usual judicious good-breeding; neither make a favour of going, nor a merit of staying away."

"The world, then, is right in its conjectures?" cried Bagot: "Wroughton is engaged to marry the fair divorcee?"

"From what do you draw your inference?" demanded Helmsley, striving to speak with composure.

"From the eagerness of your defence. I never heard you so strenuous before. You are pleading the cause of a sister-in-law."

"I am pleading the cause of a very charming woman."

"On second thoughts," interrupted Bagot, caring very little for the motives or opinions of his companion—"Lady Adelaide certainly will not coalesce with the Schrams. Portumna has taken them up as vehemently as he takes up all such showy novelties; and it is their cue just now, you know, to fight under different banners."

"Indeed, I know nothing about the matter," cried Helmsley, with rising indignation.

"Portumna is too much a man of the world to interfere with a lady's prospects; for, entre nous, old Celebrooke, who is wretchedly out at elbows, only waits to get rid of his daughter to break up his establishment. Portumna is not, by fortune or inheritance, a marrying man. It would be most unfair to stand in Lady Adelaide's light, being, as it is, her last glimmer. I must do Portumna the justice to say that he is the best bred man in Europe. . . . Do Wroughton's estates lie in a hunting country?"

"Within reach of two of the best packs in England," replied Helmsley, much surprised. "Why?"

"I was wondering whether there would be any apology for a long winter visit from his Excellency. We should not be sorry to have our next carnival here to ourselves."

Nettled by the flippancy of his companion, Helmsley seized the first pretext to ride on.

He could not outside the influence of Lady Adelaide. While smarting under the insinuations of his friend Horton, or listening to the light babble of such persons as Bagot, he often resolved to appeal anew to the good sense of Gerald; and, concealing his own feelings, implore him to renounce a connexion fraught with dishonour; but an hour spent in the saloons of the Palazzo Balbi sufficed to renew his irresolution; for he felt that, smiled upon, encouraged like Gerald, he should become the most infatuated of lovers.

The "Woman of the World," distinguished at all times by the gentle suavity of her address, appeared inspired by a yet more feminine softness by the attachment to which she was evidently giving way. Few women were likely to have received such attentions as those of Wroughton with indifference.

From his own box at St Carlos, Helmsley often tortured himself by watching the sympathy of silence with which the lovers listened together to the touching strains of the "Otello" and "Medea." They seemed perfectly to understand each other; they seemed already prepared for the heart-in-heart cohesion of a life of domestic happiness!

Sometimes, rousing himself from the reveries produced by such a picture, he would intrude upon their happiness, as if in vengeance; and it almost provoked him to observe with what courtesy his appearance was welcomed by Lady Adelaide, as if admitting his claim to be there as one of the nearest relatives of her future husband. She would invite him to the seat by her side; address him in her softest tones, with the utmost blandishment; defer to his opinions—draw out his conversational powers—applaud his sentiments—rejoice in his pleasures; talk to him of Northamptonshire—of his home, his children, his return to England—till her gracious interest almost tempted him to execrate her in return! He could not bear to know that he was indebted to Gerald for the melting glances that reposed with almost sisterly affection upon his face; for the graceful gesture that seemed prepared to admit conviction, or half his argument was unfolded; for the conciliatory expression, for the deprecating smile!

Disquieted and ill at ease, how often did he wish that he had never been tempted to visit Naples; that he had never been admitted to the companionship of Lady Adelaide!—"Had I known her only as Wroughton's wife," he would exclaim, in his solitary strolls amid the shrubby steep of Posuoli, "she would have produced no other impression on my mind than regret that a woman of doubtful reputation should have been forced upon the adoption of the family. But now—when—when will my better reason overcome the hateful enchantments with which she has stirred my spirit to this mood of madness!"

The fall of Helmsley, his gradual and hopeless enthrallment, are delicately touched; until we see him arrived at the fatal crisis when her Ladyship, having secretly learned from her friend Portumna, of Sir William's brilliant change of fortune, took more direct measures to secure the willing prize. On the day of Mrs Longman Tompkinson's fancy ball, he had received a letter from a friend in England, mentioning the serious illness of his uncle, Lord Shropshire. He knew that he ought to give up the ball, give up the happiness of sustaining the part of Petrarch to the Laura of Lady Adelaide, which her gentle and modest entreaties had induced him—her future brother-in-law—to accept. But could he disappoint her, and even the hospitable Tompkinsons? No one in Naples could know of his uncle's illness. It was not his business to proclaim it. He locked up the letter, went to the ball, and exulted in his determination when—

He beheld Lady Adelaide de Vere, to whom the elegant lightness of her costume imparted an almost girlish air of simplicity. The robe of pale straw colour, bodiced with violet-coloured velvet, the slight gauze hanging sleeves looped up to display the symmetrical beauty of her ungloved hands—the hair bound over her forehead, its braids half escaping from the net of gold and pearls so often described by her poet and lover—all was in strict accordance with the descriptions of Petrarch and the portrait of the Stradalla gallery. Lady Adelaide, slightly embarrassed, perhaps by the novelty of her position, looked paler and more delicately lovely than ever: and when Sir William, arrayed in his simple white tunic and crowned with the laurels of the capitol, approached to offer her his hand, her eyes involuntarily cast down to veil her confusion completing her resemblance to the well-known picture of Laura de Sades.

It was remarkable that all the other English destined to form part of the eventful group, were attempting to disguise their mauvaise honte, by laughing at themselves or each other—by affected buffoonery and clumsy irony. Even Gerald, who personated Boccaccio, was pretending to throw himself into attitudes at the feet of Mrs St Paul, while old Moorsom assumed the solemnity of demeanour becoming the sacred College. But Petrarch and Laura were apparently mutually engrossed. They had no eyes but for each other.

The fate of Helmsley was sealed. In the course of this evening, he learned incidentally, from the lips of the astonished Lady Adelaide, that there existed no engagement whatever between her and Gerald Wroughton; on her part, no attachment. She was aware that there was no limit to the absurd surmises of society, particularly in a place like Naples.

"Is there anything particularly absurd," said Sir William, almost seriously, "in attributing to a beautiful woman supreme influence over the feelings of a disengaged man—young, free, handsome, rich, in a position to look upon marriage as the crowning happiness of his prosperous destiny?"

"I spoke not with reference to your brother-in-law, I spoke selfishly. It is, I think, absurd to imagine that a woman who has suffered so bitterly as I have done from the consequences of an ill-advised marriage, would, in the more matured season of her experience, be tempted into a union with a man several years her junior in age—in character a hundred !”

It was now Sir William Helmsley's turn to start. “Am I to understand, then, that you would reject a proposal of marriage from Gerald Wroughton?”

“I know not by what right you interrogate me on so delicate a point,” replied Lady Adelaide, restored to composure, and attempting to resume her smiles.

Sir William ardently pressed his inquiries; he interrogated, he cross-questioned almost beyond the limits of good-breeding; and the “Woman of the World” came off clear. Her father and herself had, no doubt, on Gerald's first visit to Naples, been interested in the sickly boy, their young countryman, placed in circumstances so dispiriting, exiled from home in search of health. They had treated him as a son and a brother; and his return had been discourteous neglect. When they afterwards became his not-far-distant neighbours in Northamptonshire, he had not even made those common inquiries for Lord Colebrooke demanded by ordinary civility.

“How could I suppose,” said Lady Adelaide, “that one so cold and graceless was cherishing towards me the tenderness of a lover?”

Lady Adelaide paused for a reply; but Helmsley had not presence of mind to utter a syllable.

“At length casual report acquainted us,” continued the lovely Laura, “of the family distresses which, naturally enough, were estranging the mind of Gerald Wroughton from his friends. We grieved for him, for through him we had learned to feel familiar with the unknown members of his family; to respect his brother and guardian—to admire and love that guardian's angelic wife. We pitied, therefore, and forgave our truant friend.”

“You were indeed indulgently forgiving!” exclaimed Sir William; “since, on his arrival here this winter, you received him again, and with the same familiar confidence into your circle!”

“Sufficient evidence, were proof wanting, that he was regarded as a mere acquaintance both by my father and myself! It is easy to forgive the fault of an indifferent person; while the ingratitude of those we love is an unpardonable offence!”

“Am I plainly to conclude, then,” cried Helmsley, accelerating his explanations, on perceiving that, a supper-room having been opened at the lower extremity of the gallery, the crowd of dancers was hurrying forward so as to render conversation or confidence impossible; “am I to conclude that my brother is without hope of?”

“Lady Adelaide—Lady Adelaide de Vere—my dear Lady Adelaide! I have been looking for you in all directions!” panted Mrs Longman-Tompkinson. “There's the Prince of Capua waiting to take me in to supper,” &c. &c.

While Sir William was following, with admiring eyes and an intoxicated fancy, the peerless beauty whom Prince Leopold conducted to the supper-rooms, an express arrived for him from England. Hewas summoned to the deathbed of his uncle; and, as his heir, he accordingly went to England, buried Lord Shropshire, and took possession of his estates and his splendid seat. He visited his children—the children of his adored Marcalla. It was but for one night. There was at Wroughton Hall too much of his lost wife—too much of his former home, of his past life—to harmonize agreeably with his present consciousness. New tortures were in reserve for him in this brief visit. Emma requested a private conversation:—

“Is there any hope for us?” she demanded; “or must

I make up my mind to witness the disgrace and misery of my poor Gerald? Is he or is he not to marry Lord Colebrooke's daughter?”

“Had you inquired of me a month ago,” replied her brother-in-law, “I should not have hesitated to answer, ‘he is.’ I knew that it was his desire—I fancied that it was his destiny. Circumstances have induced me to alter my opinion. I have reason to suppose that Lady Adelaide's sentiments are less favourable to Gerald's views than he once induced me to believe.”

“Thank God!” interrupted Emma Wroughton; “whether proceeding from coldness or fickleness, heaven keep her to her opposition! There would have been an end to all the happiness of the family, had that woman consented to marry my brother.”

“You express yourself too vehemently—you pronounce too harshly!” cried Lord Monthermer, with a heightened complexion. “Lady Adelaide de Vere is one of the most charming and accomplished women in Europe.”

The conversation proceeded, until Lord Monthermer at last entered warmly, and even angrily, upon the defence of Lady Adelaide. Emma asserted, upon the authority of respectable country neighbours, that Lord Sherburne, the persecuted husband of Lady Adelaide, had been more sinned against than sinning; that he had actually been driven out of his senses by witnesses suborned to impute crimes to him, of which he had, in fact, been, not the perpetrator, but the victim. Such was the judgment of society.

“Society!—what sort of society?” exclaimed Monthermer. “The circle of squires and parsons' wives of a country neighbourhood!”

Emma Wroughton, excited in her turn, could no longer restrain herself from observing—“My opinion of these people has not been wholly formed upon the testimony of our good neighbour, Mr de Ligne; it was from my dear sister that”—

“Enough, enough!” cried the agitated Monthermer, unwilling to trust himself to hear further. “Entertain what opinions you think proper; but, before you select me to become your auditor, it is but just I should inform you that I have no friends I regard more highly than the Colebrookes; that there is not a woman on earth I more truly admire than Lady Adelaide de Vere.” Emma started, but uttered not another syllable. As she bent over the pillows of her little nephew and niece ere she retired to rest, silent tears fell from her eyes in attestation of the shock she had received, and the terrors that were entering into her soul; nor could all Mrs Knowles's ejaculations in honour of my lord her master, who had presented her with a £50 note, in acknowledgment of her zealous discharge of her duties to the children during his absence, induce Miss Wroughton to utter a single syllable of applause. She passed a sleepless night; the most disturbed, the most painful since that succeeding the loss of her irreplaceable friend, the much-loved sister of her youth!

In London, on his return, the new peer, possessed of fifty thousand a-year and two charming seats, and accredited for at least one hundred thousand, became acquainted, among other luminaries, with the Duchess of Havering, the sister of Lord Colebrooke, and, consequently, the aunt of Lady Adelaide—a Woman of the World, and a woman of the day.

A widow, as far as woman is widowed by the social death of a husband buried alive in the vast vault of public business, the Duchess of Havering, still handsome, and at all times lively and clever, preserved, even at the perilous age of two-and-forty, an unblemished reputation.

The risks of that age, the Duchess of Havering had escaped. Downing Street and Palace Yard denied her the society of her husband, and she consoled herself faute de mieux with whist. She was not a gambler. She played as a past-time, not as a kill-time; and her Grace's society being chiefly composed of whist-players, for the most part sagacious, able men, the Haverling coterie was far from contemptible.

The Duchess had just learned that her niece's marriage with Wroughton was broken off. Lord Monthermer, indeed, assured her Lady Adelaide had never entertained the slightest intention of giving her hand to his brother-in-law.

"And to whom, then, does she intend to give it?" cried the Duchess, almost with indignation. "This Mr Wroughton appears to have been a most unexceptionable match, and, according to report, attached to her for the last two years. Surely she does not intend to throw herself away on that ruined toué, Portumna?"

Her Grace recovered herself. Her niece, she said, had only encouraged Portumna to dangle after her, to torment the old Duchess of Kimbolton. Lady Adelaide was to be in town in May.

"Having (she added) no daughter, and she no mother, I have always treated her as a child of my own. It was I who wanted to make up that match for her with your cousin, Lord Bridgnorth, which, at one time, was all but settled. But they are calling me to order! My whist-table waits; and here, en attendant, (George, I want you!) allow me to present you to the Duke of Haverling." And the duke, who had just entered the room on his return from Windsor, bestowed ten minutes' attention upon the new peer, ere he quitted the house again, to pass the remainder of the night in the house of Drawbacks.

We would wish to make room for Sir Jacob Harford, the hoary, rich, shrewd, tolerably honest, Christian Jew; the banker, loan-contractor, stock-jobber, &c. &c., who, when encumbered with a blockhead of a nephew as his heir and successor, estimated his own vocation so much above statesmanship that he would not hear of bringing the young ass up to business; but despatched him to Eton to serve the preliminary apprenticeship, and be booked for a diplomat. We must, however, notice the millionaire thus slightly, to introduce another character:—

"Sir Jacob Harford has interest, then, with government?"

"Interest?—Why, he could buy a South American republic, anoint himself king, and treat en souverain, with the Foreign Office! Sir Jacob Harford commands anything of anybody that he chooses to ask for."

"Ay, ay?—I don't wonder, then," cried Lord Royston, "that Flaszaski has marked down the nephew for an intimate friend. I fancy poor Flash has been swimming out of his depth this long time past."

"I fancied Count Flaszaski was a man of family and fortune," said the naïf Monthermer.

"A man of tolerable connexions; but, from the times of the Chevalier de Grammont to our own, England has been the willing dupe of les aventuriers de bonne maison. John Bull is a lazy dog; he loves to be amused by his foreign guests; he loves to be taught to dress, eat his dinner, and behave himself, by any gay and graceful foreigner, more particularly when gifted, like Flaszaski, with mastery over his own temper and the frailties of other people."

"Ay! Flaszaski has them all hollow," cried Royston, stretching himself and yawning. "Artists, men of letters, men of fashion, press, populace—high, low, great, and small. Flash swears he has every editor in town in his pay, or in fear of his horsewhip. He has thrown dust or stuff in their eyes. A man who can ride, who is a crack shot, and a gastrophile, may do what he likes in England."

"Not altogether!" said Lord Carpynter, without raising his eyes from a new periodical. "Flaszaski has not yet found his way into good femelle society. Our ladies show their good taste; they admit him so very handsome—very talented—very showy; but he is Count Flaszaski—he is not a safe man."

Flaszaski's style of managing editors is one of his best points. One morning he visited Lord Monthermer, exactly as Sir Jacob Harford withdrew. The city baronet, in an unusual fit of philanthropy, had called to warn the son of his old and honoured patron, Sir Robert Helmsley, from the snares of Lady Adelaide De Vere. A marriage with her would, he said, "be bigamy, a dishonoured acceptance, not worth a pea-straw." Lord Monthermer assured him that the divorce was legal; and, moreover, that Lord Sherburne was on his death-bed, and not expected to survive a week.

"In that case I have nothing to urge on the score of bigamy," coolly replied the old gentleman; "but I will say to the son of my old and honoured friend that he is about to throw himself away. Colebrooke married that girl after a fortnight's acquaintance to poor Sherburne, notoriously more than half a lunatic, to save herself or her reputation out of the clutch of Lord Portumna; and now he's going to fust her off on you that he may break up his establishment and live on what friends he has left."

"Knew it was running my head against a stone wall to argue with a man in love," cried the banker—"can't help it—done my duty to the dead and living—pity they hadn't managed to marry her to young Bridgnorth—there she'd have been paired as well as matched."

"You were acquainted with my cousin?"

"Knew him as one knows the pillory—by its bad name—nothing more—curious genius young Bridgnorth—made a figure in trade if he'd been born a cit—contrived to turn even his vices to account—made money by play—made money by the turf—made money by horses, dogs, carriages—drove a tilbury and a bargain better than à la a young fellow on the stones—a thriving pedler spoiled when Lord Bridgnorth was born to a peerage."

"My relations obtain as little quarter as my friends!" said Lord Monthermer, dreading what might chance to follow. "I am more graciously disposed towards you. How is Harford? When does he return to Naples?"

"Never. Lord Portumna, who pretends to have taken a fancy to him—a frightened spec, unless I'm much mistaken—is going to Russia, and has applied to the Foreign Office for Master Dick to bear him company."

"And what is Harford doing in the interim?"

"Making an ape of himself somewhere hereabouts—expected to have news of him from you—don't often see him in the city—shouldn't be sorry to settle him in life out of the way of such leeches as your Colebrookes and Portumnas."

"I should imagine there would be little difficulty in obtaining a suitable match for your nephew."

"Such as he or you might fancy suitable. I'm old-fashioned enough to care for allying myself with the daughter of an honest man; but, as I find the mischief-mongering newspapers have set it about that Dick Harford's heir to a couple of millions—we shall soon be having sealed tenders sent in for his hand—hope he'll be in better luck than others whom I could mention. Good morning, sir."

"Bon jour, mon cher!—was delight to see you!" cried Count Flaszaski, sauntering into the room which, on Sir Jacob's deliberate departure, Lord Monthermer in his dressing-gown was hastening to quit. "Was stop at my friend Lynchwell (your neighbour) door, ven I see your apothecaire drive off. Ah! ce n'était pas l'apothicaire?—n'importe! Il en avait bien l'air—et mourri même de ses drogues. Vell! I tink I was never should see you again! D'abord que je vous fasse mon compliment. I see by the journals you about to change your estates."

"Indeed, I was not aware of it! Which of them?" inquired Monthermer, referring Flaszaski's observation to some advertisement or other, touching the Bridgworth property, issued by Messrs Cognovit.

"Vish? Your estates of solitary blessingness, as it was call in Inghiland. De morning papers assure you give de ball, becos you take de vife?"

"The morning papers! How annoying! how impertinent! What a curse is entailed by the officiousness of the newspapers in this country!"

"You give dem de liberty of de press, and dey take de liberties! Eh?—c'est ça je crois, n'est ce pas? But if dey bote you, vat more easily silence. I have got every journal of London in my pocket."

"The deuce you have!" exclaimed Monthermer, wondering how little the symmetry of the Count was distorted by so extensive a freight.

"I very well know how manage dem all. Some was de dirty éditeur, one should buy at so much per sheet. Some was de fashionab' éditeur, dont on graisse la patte vid oder things dan monies."

"With what?" demanded Monthermer, curious to learn the consistency of the last new-invented palm-oil.

"Mais avec Phélie de roses! I sake hand vid dem at de Opera—give dem de seat in my cab up St James' Street von rainy day, and tell dem chez Crockfor, dat de monstre vat I bearlead vas my banquier! De fashionab' éditeur vas love to hear it thought dey vas on de intimate foot' vid de fashionab' Graf von Flaszaski! L'animal veut faire adroire à son espèce qu'il sait oïre—qu'il est des nôtres—and so I make heem my own. I vas do vot I like vid de journalistes. De vorship my vit—my bon-ton—my bonne mine—my aimabilité—et s'il s'agissait de me trouver un beau jour moins aimable, ma foi, on en vient aux extrémités! Il y a toujours pour le coup, un coup de cravache!"

"You stand, I see, on no ceremony with your friends," said Monthermer, laughing at the gesture which Flaszaski suited to the word.

"Or dey would be vorse dan de enemy!" replied Flaszaski. "Will you dat I should arrange for you dis affair, pour que cela ne vous coûte rien?"

"Many thanks! The mischief is already done! Besides, the less one meddles in such matters, the less chance of dirtying one's fingers."

"Ah! you do not tink I would interfere personally? No! I vas have too many iron in de stove! I send vord to Monsieur l'éditeur, trough de great man of his partie—some ex-chancelier or lord of de trésorerie vot is to be. I got mein freind, Lor' Carpyntaire, to give his order to de Torie; I got mein freind, Lor' Loxley, give his ordaire to de Duke d'Esvering to give his ordaire to de Vig! Ah! I hav' mein iron every where in de stove!"

After endless balls, suppers, déjeûners, drawing-rooms, rides, operas, and also misadventures and contretemps, from which it requires all the wit and address of Lady Adelaide to extricate herself, Lord Monthermer is led to make his declaration in form; and the WOMAN OF THE WORLD, still keeping up her part, though graciously disposed, from those delicate scruples which enhance her purity and dignity of character with her lover, declines a positive engagement until the decease of "the unfortunate man whose name it was so painful for her to pronounce" should remove every legal obstacle to their union:—

"Why, then, expose me to sunyanets, when a few weeks, at most a few months, will annihilate them altogether?"

Lord Monthermer pressed in silence the beloved arm that was resting on his own.

"I bring you no fortune—I bring you nothing that the world accounts of value?"

"You bring me a treasure far, far beyond the estimation of vulgar minds!" interrupted Monthermer, with becoming spirit and magnanimity.

"I am not even so fortunate as to unite with yours a name undimmed by the reproaches of the world. The malice of society has fearfully avenged upon me the distinctions conferred by the homage of a chosen few. It is therefore doubly incumbent on me to secure you, to secure myself—(suffer me to say ourselves)—from a renewal of the attacks which have sunk only too deep into my soul."

A most tender and confidential conversation ensued between the lovers, who chanced to be together at a déjeûner given at a fashionable villa. Lord Monthermer would that night have laid his head on his pillow a perfectly happy man, had he not been stung by the insect attaché:—

"Where have you been dining?" drawled Harford; "your eyes are sparkling and your cheeks burning with champagne!"

"My eyes sparkle with joy, and my cheeks are merely sunburnt," replied Monthermer, "for I did not dine at all. After breakfasting at Lady Glenvillian's, I went to the French play, from whence I am just arrived."

"At Lady Glenvillian's! Oh! you went to Lady Glenvillian's! Was it worth the bore of the ride?"

"I did not even ride, since you force me to be so circumstantial. The déjeûner was the pleasantest I ever experienced."

"Pleasant, was it? I could have got there, if I liked. But Lady Adelaide told me she had particular reasons for not wishing me to be there. Is she coming to-night?"

"I put her Ladyship into the carriage to go home after the French play," replied Lord Monthermer, coldly.

"The Devil you did!" was Mr Harford's polite rejoinder. And there was something in his tone of giving utterance to that brief phrase, which sent Lord Monthermer home to drink Seltzer water after his dinner of cold tongue and anchovy sandwiches, preparatory to a night of physical and moral indigestion.

Emma Wroughton had long been aware of her brother-in-law's fatal attachment. It was now about to be acknowledged. Her brother, Gerald—ruined in health and broken in heart, by the perfidy of the false one—was wandering in Greece. She would be compelled to make over to the care of the heartless and unprincipled woman, who had already inflicted so much misery upon those dearest to her, the charge of her beloved sister's children. Lord Monthermer had only permitted her to retain them so long in pity to her devoted fondness, and in compliance with her earnest entreaties. But now they must be given up; and she was miserable.

The unambitious Emma had a lover;—he was Basil Hamilton, the college friend of her brother Gerald, a poor curate, though a spirited, amiable, and well-born gentleman. He had lately, by the unexpected kindness of a country friend of the Wroughtons, who knew of the attachment, obtained a living of a thousand a-year in the neighbourhood of the Hall. His own two hundred, and Emma's fortune, might make up a competent income; and he had just obtained the promise of the hand of the woman whose heart he had long possessed. Hamilton had already written for the approbation of his friend Gerald; and, in the interim, came to London, on a sort of family mission from Emma, to ascertain the plans of the father of her sister's children. He was much in good society, and saw Lady Adelaide with the enlightened eyes of the lover of Emma, and the friend of Gerald. Hamilton, though he would not travel on Sunday, had no objections to an opera on a Saturday night; and, on one occasion, he heard a party of noble loungers, whom he accompanied to the opera, talk thus of Emma's feeble-minded kinsman:—

"I vow to heaven!" cried Royston, "'tis too provoking to see such a good fellow as Monthermer so imposed upon! Now, do observe how he has taken up his post in her box, waiting till she condescends to make her appearance, that he may be on the spot to hand her to a seat! I never saw a man more devoted, or so thrown away."

Young Harford said nothing. A significant smile overspread his insipid features.

"She is certainly a splendid creature," added Sir William Willets, as the little attaché minced his steps away from them towards the staircase.

"Splendid!" ejaculated Flaszaski, who had his misgivings respecting the sable coat of their companion. "But I could no more lose such a woman, than I could eat a vaxen fruit. From de once a man convince himself of a woman's absolute corruptions, I can understand he give up to her everythings—except his time. But von's life is so precious to throw away!—and Monthermer, he pass his life at de feet of Lady Adelheid."

The group of roués now proceeded to canvass other beauties gracing the gay assemblage around them, with a degree of freedom revolting to the ears of their companions.

But he noticed also, that, free as was the mode of discussion among his new acquaintance, not a woman present, however notoriously lost in reputation, incurred the opprobrious epithets attached to Lady Adelaide de Vere. For the sentence pronounced upon the most offending of the unchaste, there was some qualifying clause:—"Lady A. was such a kind-hearted creature."—"Lady B. so friendly, so charitable."—"Mrs C. so unapt to indulge in ill-natured remarks."—"Lady D. such a good mother, or such an affectionate sister." But in Lady Adelaide's case, not a word of mitigation! Lady Adelaide they regarded as that monstrous thing—a woman without a heart:—

"Like to the apples on the Dead Sea shore, All ashes to the taste!"

a speculatress, an intrigante, a chevalière d'industrie in that worst species of gambling, which stakes every gift that ought to be held holy and precious among women, against a title and a marriage settlement!

Basil Hamilton was deeply grieved. He was almost sorry when the recommencement of the opera put an end to revelations which every moment tended to arm him with strong resolutions. Two days before, his great anxiety had been to conciliate the good-will of Monthermer, as guardian to Emma Wroughton. All he now desired was an opportunity to excite his overlasted displeasure, by warning him against the dangers of his connexion with Lady Adelaide de Vere.

Yet, even the sedate and enamoured Hamilton, the betrothed of Emma, could not look upon that radiantly-beautiful countenance, that graceful form, without owning the influence of the indelible charms of Lady Adelaide; and he accordingly, for the present, suppressed his purpose, and resolved to inquire farther. Lord Monthermer travelled down with him to Northamptonshire, to witness the marriage of Emma, and pave the way for his own by the removal of the children. He meditated liberal and gracious designs for Hamilton and his bride, but he beat about the bush on other topics. He could not, at once, say—"I am come to take the children of Marcella, and transfer them to the maternal care of Lady Adelaide de Vere." On visiting the family at Wroughton Hall, the day after his arrival, he found Hamilton seated between Emma and her aunt, under the shade of a group of fine beech trees. He announced his generous intentions for the young couple, approached the subject of his own projects, and hesitated:—

The appearance of Harry and his sister on the gravel-walk, with a wheelbarrow containing their gardening implements and the slouched straw hats intended to shade their little faces from the sun, suggested a text for his discourse; and after having, for the twentieth time, assured Miss Wroughton she had every prospect of being the happiest of women, he launched forth into a prophecy that, in the domestic joys of such a lot, she must necessarily lose sight of her adopted pupils.

"Never!" was Emma Wroughton's fervent reply; "that is," added she, in a qualifying tone, "never, so long as you wish me to retain the control of their education."

"Do you imagine me so unreasonable as to protract such an occupation, now?" demanded Monthermer, with a smile intended to disguise his agitation. "No, no, Emma! I know too well what reliance is to be placed on bridal resolutions. Hitherto, you have had no will but your own—henceforward you must submit yourself to that of Hamilton."

"In the present case, Hamilton's is hers," replied Basil, with a cordial, affectionate smile.

"Make no rash vows!" resumed her agitated brother-in-law. "Nay, my dear Emma, I had better at once remove your scruples of conscience, by avowing that the dear children are likely to receive such a compensation for their loss as will render it less important to their future happiness. They will soon, I trust, find an affectionate mother in Lady Adelaide de Vere; and my house a mistress delighting to welcome you to a roof which you must still regard as a second home."

Emma made two efforts to speak; but, without tears, it was impossible. Basil sat as silent from surprise, as Miss Wroughton from mortification; while Aunt Margaret, "frighted from her propriety," suddenly exploded, with—"Well, God's will be done! I always feared it would be so!—I am sure Lord Monthermer, I congratulate you with all my heart—that is, I mean, I heartily hope it may all turn out for your happiness."

"When is the event to take place?" was Emma's abrupt and sole inquiry.

It was strange! The announcement of her own match, and Basil's presence in the house, had created no embarrassment among the parties. So well did their characters assimilate, that it appeared as if he had been always a dweller among them—an offset from the family. But a mere hint from Monthermer that the children were likely to have a mother-in-law, seemed to raise up an iron barrier in the midst of the family!

Lord Monthermer was deeply mortified. However amiable his disposition, the frame of his mind was far from lofty; and he had flattered himself that it would be impossible for Emma and Aunt Margaret to hold out against his choice, at the moment he was securing to them so splendid a share of the good things of this world, in place of the modest competence they had anticipated. As if a few hundreds a year more or less could silence the suggestions of their plain good sense!

It was a glorious evening—one of those days of the English year which repay our many months of humidity and gloom, by snatches of atmospheric enjoyment unattainable in climates of better renown. They were pleased to hear Monthermer avow, that, even in Italy he had seen nothing so attractive, so venerable, so refreshing, as that unpretending woodland scene. They were glad to find that his taste was not thoroughly corrupted; that the interests of home were still potent over his feelings.

Instead of withdrawing, according to their custom, at the close of the desert, to the neighbouring saloon, Emma and aunt Margaret were about to step from the dining-room to the lawn, when the searching eye of the latter, suddenly directed from the threshold towards the long line of carriage-road winding through the domain, discerned that a carriage had entered the park.

"Some neighbourly visit! was the conclusion of the rest of the circle; and, on any other evening of the year, such an incident, at such an hour, would have been felt a tiresome interruption."

The visitor was Gerald, the dying Gerald!—who had hurried to England, that he might spend his latest breath in warning his infatuated brother-in-law, and that done die at home! He would listen to no remonstrance of his medical attendants. When seized with fainting-fits on the road, he still pressed forward in spite of them. "I may be yet in time," burst continually from his parched lips. Emma, dreading the agitating effects of an explanation to the sinking invalid, entreated, for the present, Lord Monthermer to avoid being alone with him:—

"Why should you imagine that he has anything important to communicate to me?" inquired Monthermer. But, in spite of his Lordship's assumed composure, there was no disguising the tremor of his voice or the quivering of his lips with which the inquiry was spoken. He was completely unhinged.

"I do not imagine it—I know it!" replied Emma. "The few broken sentences in which, last night, he alluded to his return and its motives, convince me (pardon me, it is a moment to speak plainly) that Gerald is dying a victim to his miserable attachment; and that he cannot expire in peace till he has confided to you the secret of his sufferings,—perhaps of his wrongs."

"In that case," said Monthermer, pale with conflicting emotions, "it will be better for me this moment to leave the house. I can listen to nothing, I will listen to nothing, even from Gerald, detrimental to her."

"Leave us?—at such a moment?" cried Emma, scarcely repressing her indignation. "Is the influence of such a woman, then, so fatal to every generous impulse, that your nature is already thus changed? Would you abandon my brother, who, at the risk of his few remaining hours, has travelled so many hundred miles to see you and to do you service? Gracious Heavens! is it the husband of my dear Marcella, who evinces so little consideration for those who are dear to her; those to whom she made him dear!"—Miss Wroughton burst from the room to hide her indignant tears, as she uttered these words of unusual bitterness; but it was a comfort to her to learn, when, an hour or two afterwards, she inquired for Lord Monthermer, that he had not yet quitted the house.

The explanation of the dying man was at length given. The proofs of Lady Adelaide's utter worthlessness were irrefragable. Lord Monthermer could not avoid listening to Gerald's dying words, but he had pre-determined not to believe them:—

Yet how to withhold his faith when the mild, broken voice of Gerald sounded in his ears—that voice which, even in sport, he had never heard utter an untruth! The accusations it conveyed were spoken in no exacerbation of spirit. He simply alluded to the blandishments with which he had been courted to Lord Colebrooke's house, to the flatteries lavished on him, the tokens of affection; and, as he pursued his patient narrative, Lord Monthermer's personal experience afforded painful confirmation that the siren's modes of fascination were habitual.

"Till the day of your quitting Naples," continued Gerald, wiping the cold dew from his forehead, "I received constant assurances of her attachment. Nothing but the formality of acceptance by her father was wanting to the ratification of our engagement. She knew that a lock of her hair was treasured next my heart: I now resign it to you, Monthermer, that you may restore it to her after my release from all earthly passions—all human engagements! She knew that her letters were valued as my dearest of earthly possessions; containing as they did such assurances of tenderness as one less inexperienced than myself in the hypocrisies of life might have received, as I did, with respect—with gratitude—with rapture. These also, my friend, restore to her in my name; and, having once seen them in your hands, Lady Adelaide de Vere will know that any future union between you becomes impossible."

"I will execute the commissions with which you see fit to intrust me," said Monthermer, when the pause occasioned by Gerald's physical exhaustion seemed to demand a reply; "but do not expect me to pledge myself by promises till I have heard her vindication. My honour is too deeply involved to admit of withdrawing from my engagements without positive proof of unworthiness. Admitting all your charges, to what do they amount? That she encouraged your addresses—accepted the offering of your affections—and bestowed a lock of her hair on him upon whom she intended to bestow her hand! A more intimate acquaintance, it seems, convinced her that such a marriage would be fatal to the happiness of both, and she withdrew her consent! She was wise enough to know that a greater injury would be inflicted on you by an ill-assorted marriage, than by a momentary disappointment; and, if sufficiently confident in your honour to leave unclaimed in your hands the tokens of former regard, entertained little apprehensions that they would be made instrumental in the destruction of her future happiness!"

"The reproach touches me not," replied Wroughton. "The gifts and letters of Lady Adelaide de Vere remained in my hands only because I resisted her attempts, backed by the insolence of Lord Portumna, to recall them to her possession. I told her I would resign them but with my life. Misunderstanding my declaration, her lover did not persevere in his demand at the risk of his own; and now I fulfil my promise, for with my life I am about to resign them!"

"Her lover?" cried Monthermer, with a start. "Would you infer that Lord Portumna is attached to Lady Adelaide de Vere?"

"Not sufficiently so, at least, to make her his wife. It was by him I was suggested to her as a weak, willing husband—a husband to be duped and wronged—a husband whose fortune would defray her debts, and whose hand establish her position in the eyes of the world."

"You admit, then, that Adelaide's feelings had at no time any influence in her engagement with you," demanded the infatuated Monthermer.

"I admit that, in accepting me, she acted wholly under the influence of Portumna; and I assert that it was also his worldly wisdom which, on your accession of fortune, determined her to break with me, and direct her arts of attraction towards yourself. I ask you in all candour, Monthermer, till that fatal ball, had you the slightest reason to doubt her regard for myself, or suspect her preference?"

Monthermer was silent.

"By Lord Portumna was the news of Lord Shropshire's death communicated to her, before it reached his heir. Such was the honourable prompting which suggested her conduct that night! What it has since been your observations can best determine. But enough!—I have done my duty, even at the risk of estranging your good-will at a period when I can little afford to part with the sustaining affection of a friend. My peace of conscience, dear Monthermer, must recompense me for all I am losing in your regard!"

"Bear with me!" replied Lord Monthermer, extending his hand towards Gerald, after a pause of deep emotion. "None better than yourself can estimate the difficulty of dismissing from the heart a deeply-cherished affection. You know the power of this woman. Bear with me!"

Lord Monthermer disappeared for many days. When he returned, he sought a private interview with Gerald, who still lingered on. What passed between them did not transpire to the family; but from that moment confidence was restored between the brothers during the short period that Gerald survived. But even to Emma, even to the dying man, Lord Monthermer had not been able to communicate the particulars of his reception from the WOMAN OF THE WORLD. When he appeared with Gerald's message—

The calm, well-bred, well-affected surprise expressed by Lady Adelaide at his blindness in "not discovering at their last interview the determination she had taken to decline a nearer engagement with one whom she found herself unable to requite with the affection indispensable to so solemn a contract," might have been mistaken for truth, had not Gerald's previous experience led him to see through the flimsy folds of such bitter irony. That she chose to anticipate his withdrawal, a withdrawal which honour alone had forbidden him to attempt, was sufficiently plain. But this, he fancied, afforded at least proof of her disinterestedness. She might have clung to the engagement; she might have asserted her claims. Her cold dignified rejection restored her in some degree to his esteem.

"Do not deceive yourself! She is incapable of a generous thought or action!" was Gerald's commentary on this implied commendation.

The sequel proved the truth of his opinion. Old Sir Jacob had died in the interval; and his heir, the little attaché, now Sir Harry Harford, was twice as rich as the discarded peer, who, moreover, had got his eyes opened. And soon—

Not a chit-chatter of fashion in Paris, not a scribbler of delicate scandals to delicate friends in Park Lane, but covered their reams of satin paper with envious details of the Harfords' acquisitions—the Harfords' fêtes—the Harfords' triumphs; and above all of the merits and charming manners of Lady Adelaide!—"she was such a delightful creature—such an ornament to society—so graceful, so gracious, so truly amiable!"

"I always knew you would find her so!" was the reply of the Duchess of Havering. "My niece has hitherto occupied a false position. But her true character will now be seen."—"So long as she remained with her father, she was sure to share the odium of his Lordship's embarrassments," said Mr Strangways, not reflecting on how many persons present the odium of embarrassed affairs might happen to be reflected.

"So long as she remained single, the world was always marrying her to some one or other, and getting up some idle story to account for the non-fulfilment of its prophecies," added Lady Mary Mitchell.

• • "They said she was to marry Lord Portunna."

"There never was any idea of the kind!" asserted the Duchess.

"Of course not! Portunna is what is called a rising man," observed St Leger Kerr; "and rising men are never marrying men."

"Why to what can Lord Portunna rise?" demanded Lady Mary. "You talk of him as if he were a political adventurer!"

"He may rise to a pension, an earldom, and the garter. —A poor Irish lord, and a hanger-on upon government —what is he but a political adventurer? It would have been ruin to him and her, had he allied himself with Lady Adelaide de Vere."

"Then there was that young Mr Wroughton at Naples," said Lady Mary; "he was really a charming person!"

"But so borné—so totally unfit for a woman of Adelaide's mind and sensibility!" interposed the Duchess.

"And, after all, a mere Northamptonshire squire!" echoed Lady Chertsey, who stood upon her countesship. "One could not expect Lady Adelaide de Vere to throw herself away on a Northamptonshire squire!"

"One did, however, expect to see her throw herself away on Lord Monthermer," said St Leger Kerr, with a significant smile.

"On Lord Monthermer?—Fie!—a total incompatibility of habits and pursuits," said the Duchess of Havering, in a confidential tone. "At one time I fancy Adelaide was really disposed to like Lord Monthermer. But on a more intimate acquaintance, we found him so susceptible—so jealous—so difficult to live with—that she was advised to give the preference to Sir Henry Harford, whose position in the world is equally brilliant, and whose character far more amiable.—I never saw a more amiable person than Sir Henry Harford! Monthermer will marry some neighbour's daughter; and London will not lose the attraction of a being so formed to become an ornament to society as my niece."

"She is certainly quite a woman of the world!" added Lady Mary Mitchell, intending to convey a compliment; "and a most charming creature!"

"The great test of merit is success," said St Leger Kerr. "Lady Adelaide has carried off the best match of the day—ergo, she is the most meritorious woman."

The world listened—and confirmed the decree!

Such is the world of fashion and its most meritorious women; and the silent moral is far more impressive than if the author had visited the heroine with strict poetic justice, and tagged a long homily to the end of her vivacious narrative.

SONNETS FROM THE ITALIAN OF ARIOSTO.

Su la Chioma Reclina.

ARE these the knots of gold, is this the hair,
Whether in curls or fillet, or entwined
With various gems and pearls, or unconfined
And scattered to the breeze, always so rare?
To spoil, the vermillion living there,
That living alabaster, who resigned?
Those brethren, left more fortunate behind?
That face, than every other face more fair?
Unlearned Physician, did thy science know
No aid, no remedy, but thus to sever
Such precious hair from so revered a head?
Yet say thy Phœbus willed it should be so;
That his own locks, when these were perished,
Before all else might rank themselves for ever.

What Indian ivory, or marble white
From Paros' isle, or ebony obscure,
What silver so refined, what gold so pure,
What crystal so transparent, amber bright,
What sculptor's hand, or skilful artist's sleight,
Shall form a vase, wherein laid up secure,
The hair, that was my Lady's, may endure,
Secured from her, its melancholy plight?

For, mindful of that lofty brow, and those Vermilion cheeks, those radiant eyes, those fair
And rosy lips, and every grace she shews,
It could not, though like Berenice's hair,
Among the stars received, to heaven it rose,
Find comfort or an end to sorrow there.

Whene'er I think upon that golden hair,
(Alas! a thousand, thousand times a-day!)
More by mistake from all those treasures rare,
Than needfully or wisely torn away,
My face is flushed with anger and despair;
And many tears adown my cheeks there stray
From hour to hour, and I die with care
To make those impious hands atonement pay.
That they should pass unpunished, Love, by thee,
Is shameful! Bacchus made the Thracian king
Pay very dear for every fallen tree:
And thou, greater than he, when wretches bring Spoil on thy treasures that most precious be,
Lookst on, composed and silent, wondering!

MECHANICS' INSTITUTIONS.

Not very many years have elapsed since it first began to be felt that some sort of education was essential, or might be advantageous, to the working classes of this country. It was not very clearly laid down what advantages were to follow the instruction of the People, nor what kind of education should be given. Many were altogether opposed to it; and others treated the proposal with indifference or neglect. Of those who were favourable to the education of the People, some, no doubt, thought it might be made a tub to amuse the whale, and distract its attention from state affairs. Some desired that the working classes should be made acquainted with the principles of their trades, that they might be better workmen, and thereby more useful to their employers. Others thought that, if workmen were educated, they would have a chance of improving their condition, by rising in their profession, forgetting that all could not rise, and that this would only aid those who would likely have risen without it. Another class thought that education would make the people more orderly, better members of society, and more disposed to be peaceable and obedient; and there were many who took a higher view of the objects of educating the masses, and promoted this great cause with the view of rendering the People more happy, in whatever condition they might be, more comfortable in their circumstances, and, by knowledge and mental culture, preparing them to appreciate the rights and better perform the duties of men and citizens. From the poverty and apathy of the working classes themselves, the indifference of the government and greater portion of the public, and the loose and confused notions which prevailed upon the subject, little was done for a very long period; and that little was not based on any comprehensive system, or on a clear view of the wants of the people, but doled out irregularly and in snatches, as circumstances happened to be favourable. Still, however, popular education advanced, and almost everywhere attempts have been made—and, in some instances, attended with a tolerable degree of success—to establish something like COLLEGES FOR THE PEOPLE, or, as they are generally termed, MECHANICS' INSTITUTIONS. These are the growth entirely of the present century—we may almost say, of the last twenty years; and, within the last few years, they have increased considerably. All large towns, and almost every village, has its MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, SCHOOL OF ARTS, ASSOCIATION FOR POPULAR LECTURES, or, in short, some institution in which lectures are delivered on various subjects, at hours and on terms which enable the working classes to attend, and generally having a library, to which those attending the lectures have free access. In most places where they have been established for a few years, they have taken firm root, and acquired considerable influence; and it is now apparent, from the hold they have obtained, that they may be made available for influencing in no small degree the character and habits of the mass of the People. We, therefore, propose here to inquire what they are doing for the People, whether they are doing all that they might do, in what they are deficient, what are the main obstacles impeding their usefulness, and how these obstacles may be removed, and their defects supplied.

We do not stop now to discuss the question, Shall the People be educated or not? That question is settled. Education of a certain kind they are getting, and of that more and more every day. Newspapers, cheap magazines, libraries, reading-rooms, lectures, addresses, unions and associations, and conversation, (if it were nothing else,) are educating the masses; and not merely giving them information in literature and science, but teaching them their political rights, shewing them the wrongs in their social condition and unfolding their causes, exciting them to procure redress by their own exertions, teaching them to combine and to act. And now, they will act, meet, consult, discuss everything that bears on their interests, address, petition, agitate, and in no small degree influence the affairs of the country. The whole question is, Can that education and that influence be directed, so as to give them the most salutary tendency?

1. What is taught at Mechanics' Institutions.

About the time when these Institutions were beginning to start up, there was literally a rage for the study of physical science. It had lately received some powerful impulses, was making rapid advances, and attaining a completeness which fitted it for being made a branch of popular instruction. A number of important discoveries, throwing light on the phenomena of nature and art, had recently been made; and all the world were excited about the wonders of geology, electricity, chemistry, &c. The arts and manufactures were at the same time making rapid strides, and the application of the principles of science to their improvement was looked to with the most sanguine expectations. Accordingly—physical science presenting the most complete and systematic body of knowledge possessed by man at the time, and great results being anticipated by making the operatives acquainted with the principles of their trades—when institutions were established for the education of the People, the experimental sciences occupied the chief place in the various courses of instruction, and their application to the arts was held out as a leading inducement to attract the working classes.

In the London Mechanics' Institution, the subjects taught, either by lecture or in private classes are, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Practical Mechanics, Chemistry, Natural History, Geography, Phrenology, Literature, English Grammar, Composition, Writing, Arithmetic and Algebra, Geometry, Drawing, Modelling, Music, French, Latin, Short-hand, and the Arts. There is a reading-room and a library.

In the MANCHESTER Mechanics' Institution, the subjects of instruction are, Natural Philosophy, Natural History, Chemistry, Geology, Arts and Manufactures, Literature, Physiology, Grammar, Elocution, Composition, Arithmetic, Algebra and Geometry, Music. There is a library and a school for the children of the members.

In the LIVERPOOL Mechanics' Institution, the leading courses of instruction are, on Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, Grammar and Composition, Writing and Arithmetic, Mathematics, Music, Drawing, Geography, French. There is a library, a reading-room, and a day-school.

In SHEFFIELD and BIRMINGHAM, the subjects of instruction are similar to the above, but the courses are not so complete.

In the EDINBURGH School of Arts, the stated branches of education are, Arithmetic and Mathematics, Drawing, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry; and there are occasional courses on Geology, Natural History, Physiology. There is also a library.

In the Andersonian Institution of GLASGOW, the stated classes are, Natural Philosophy, and Chemistry. In the Glasgow Mechanics' Institution, the only fixed subjects are, Natural Philosophy and Chemistry; but there are occasional courses on Botany, Natural History, Physiology, Phrenology, History, Political Economy. In the suburban Institutions of Glasgow, the leading branches of instruction are the same. To all there are libraries attached, and the Mechanics' Institution has also established a reading-room.

The above may be taken as a sample of the whole. They are in the principal towns, and are the oldest established, and most of the other institutions for popular instruction are founded on some of these as models. The standing dishes, or staple commodities, in them all, are, CHEMISTRY and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. There are occasional lectures on the other branches of science; instruction in some elementary branches, such as Writing, Drawing, Geometry, Composition; and, now and then, a course, or a few lectures, on PHYSIOLOGY and POLITICAL ECONOMY.

2. What that Instruction will do.

Such being the general course of instruction pursued at the only institutions where the People can acquire any education, we must next inquire what that instruction is capable of effecting. There are various kinds and degrees of knowledge, and the fruit to be gathered must depend upon the seed that is sown. The education given at Mechanics' Institutions will unquestionably tend to improve the People as operatives, to assist those whose talents and industry render them capable of rising above the station in which they have set out, and, by extending the knowledge of the principles of science, and their application to the arts among artisans, to promote the improvement and advance of the useful arts. In these respects alone, Mechanics' Institutions have been of great service, and, if they did nothing more, are entitled to public encouragement and support.

But the application of science to the arts is not the only object of scientific instruction. The study of the sciences has a value of another and a higher kind than the improvement of the arts, and ministering to the physical wants of mankind. By implanting a knowledge of the works of nature and art in the mind, we are supplying a want of human nature too much lost sight of—the means of agreeable, harmless, and rational recreation for leisure hours. In teaching men to derive pleasure from a knowledge of the beauties and wonders of nature, we furnish an attractive pursuit to direct the attention from other modes of spending leisure time, which are the bane of high and low, rich and poor, in this country. This is an object of very great importance: it is not during the hours of labour, but during those of recreation, that idle and pernicious habits are acquired; and to occupy our leisure hours in a rational and improving manner, is the surest mode of preventing the growth of those moral weeds that overrun every waste, uncultivated mind. It is universally felt that the pursuits of literature and science tend eminently to refine and civilise, to raise the standard of mind, elevate above greivelling pursuits, and impart dignity of character and self-respect. By the extension and completeness which it has now obtained, the many singular phenomena which it unfolds, and the beautiful general laws and relations which are daily developed, science is becoming more and more adapted for the noblest end of all study—to interest, excite, and develop the intellectual powers, and direct the mind to pleasures of a refined and elevated character. Science becomes peculiarly adapted for these ends when it rises from facts to principles, when its isolated phenomena gather into general laws. We cannot suppose that the great amount of scientific knowledge now acquired, has been designed merely to be applied to the arts and manufactures, to increase the quantity and improve the quality of goods! While we contemplate with satisfaction the progress of the useful arts, and the national prosperity as connected with that, let us not forget, as in this trading community we are too apt to do, that that is not the highest application of science; that these results are poor indeed, if they are not accompanied with moral and intellectual advancement; and that the cultivation of scientific pursuits is always found to have a beneficial effect on the temper and conduct, and will aid in no small degree in promoting the true end of all study—advancing mankind to a higher standard of thought, feeling, and action. And here, do not let us imagine that physical science, because it does not share directly upon the moral or intellectual faculties of man, is of little value for the improvement of the mind. This would be a narrow view indeed. When the thinking principle has been set in motion, no power can stop it. Any science or study whatever that leads a man to think—that furnishes him with the materials for the exercise of his intellectual powers, incites them to action, and keeps up for a time some degree of mental training—must improve these faculties, and render them more fit for exercise on any other topics to which his attention may be turned. It will aid in generating a habit of reflection; and, when that has once been formed, it will not be confined to the abstract science which gave it birth, or promoted its development, but will soon overleap this narrow boundary, and extend its range to his moral condition, and that of the world around him—to the study of living man, the materials for which are so constantly thrust upon his notice, and so important for him to be acquainted with.

We often hear knowledge and education recommended, that its possessors may have a chance of succeeding better in their worldly career—of rising in the world. This is one of the most common inducements held out to incite to the acquisition; and is generally illustrated by the instance of some individual who, by the aid of superior knowledge, has risen to a high estate from very small beginnings. But this is not the proper motive. This is connected with the low ambition of being above other people. This vulgar desire should be checked, or at least moderated. It is a mean motive for study. Besides, if all were educated, which should be the case, all would be on a par in this respect. There would be no advantage, no distinction, except that of natural talent, which exists independent of education. Though all, however, cannot be raised to wealth and dignity, all may, by knowledge, extend their sources of personal improvement and rational pleasure, and thus make themselves wiser, happier, better, in whatever condition they may be. That is the true end of education. The grand aim should be, not to teach a man how to be a richer or greater man than his neighbour, but how to render himself a more rational, happy, and better-conducted being than he himself was before. This end is attainable by all; and should be held out as the great prize, which every one may gain, who devotes some of his spare time to the cultivation of his mind in the delightful walks of literature and science.

We thus regard instruction in literature and physical science as of very great value to all classes of society. To the masses, it cannot but be beneficial, as a means of mental discipline, of exercising and improving the understanding, preparing for higher studies, and thereby rendering them more fit for the various complicated duties, as men and as citizens, which they may be called on to perform. By furnishing the mind of the workman with the materials for thinking, implanting the taste and giving the capacity for a vast field of delightful study in literature, science, history, &c., it will enable him and render him more likely to pass his leisure hours in an agreeable and rational manner, which must conduce to his improvement. How have the country gentry, the Squire Westerns, been reclaimed from the state of ferocious ignorance which characterised them in the last century? By the press—by literature and science. May not—nay, will not the same means produce a similar beneficial change, and elevate the condition of the people? This change is taking place, though slowly. Popular education is bearing good fruit, as is shewn in the well-known improvement in the characters of those who take advantage of the opportunities of education now held out.

3. What is left undone by Mechanics' Institutions.

While we willingly admit that the above institutions have done, and are doing, much to improve the character and condition of the people, and will lend a powerful aid in the advance of civilization, we cannot help thinking that they might do a great deal more. There can be no doubt that they must tend to stimulate thought, and improve the habits of those who avail themselves of the opportunities they afford. But the fullest instruction in physical science cannot avail much towards moral or social improvement. It may aid indirectly, by cultivating the mental powers, and furnishing to some minds a resource against idleness and the evils that follow in her train. These, however, are but negative and secondary in their action; and, unless something positive be done, to direct the attention of the industrious classes to the moral, physical, and social evils by which they are depressed, to furnish them with full and correct information on these, shew the constant and powerful influence they exert on their condition, point out their sources, and enforce the necessity, and give instruction on the means of correcting them, comparatively little improvement can be looked for. Physical science can never do this. It may sharpen the mental tools, but it does not furnish the materials upon which these must work to improve man's condition. It may make him a more reasonable and orderly being, better able for the exercise of his higher powers; but it does not furnish him with that knowledge which will direct him to the most important application of them.

In Mechanics' Institutions, everything seems to be taught. Inanimate nature, science, the useful arts, the fine arts, literature—all receive a plentiful share of the student's attention. There is one omission; but it is like the play of "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. There is one subject wanting. But, in importance, that one subject would outweigh all the others. That subject is MAN. The earth, the air, the heavens are explored; plants and the lower animals are elaborately explained; the phenomena of the various experimental sciences are exhibited, and their principles studied;—but MAN—his nature and relations, the action of the external world upon him, his condition in society, his physical constitution—are neglected, or only honoured with an occasional and trifling notice. This is a very serious defect. Every one knows and admits that, without knowledge of himself in his various and complex relations, no one can look for any rational or enduring happiness. "Know thyself," said the ancient sage. This is enforced by the poet in the well-known line—

"The proper study of mankind is man."

And SAMUEL JOHNSON, the great sage of modern times, remarks—"The knowledge of external nature, and the sciences which that knowledge requires or includes, are not the great or the frequent business of the human mind." "We are perpetually moralists, we are geometricians only by chance. Our intercourse with intellectual nature is necessary; our speculations upon matter are voluntary and at leisure. Physiological learning is of such rare emergence that one man may know another half his life, without being able to estimate his skill in hydrostatics or astronomy; but his moral and prudential character immediately appears." For example, what does it avail a man to know the size, distance, and motions of the sun and planets, if he is ignorant of his own physical constitution, of the ordinary circumstances of air, diet, regimen, &c., which affect his health, and of the means of avoiding or counteracting any noxious tendencies of external influences upon him? Of what service is it to him to know the longitude and latitude, climate, history, &c., of the Russian or Chinese empire, if he has not attended to the laws and institutions of his own country, if he has not studied the bearing of these upon his condition, the manner in which they might be rendered more equitable and advantageous for him, his position as a member of a community bound together in many complex relations, his rights, and the duties which devolve upon him? What benefit worth speaking of can he derive from curious descriptions of the structure, habits, &c., of the lower animals or plants, when he is ignorant of the nature of his own children, of their physical wants and feelings, their moral nature, the discipline proper for rearing them up so as to be useful members of society; not awake to the great truths, that the formation of their characters and habits is in his hands; that the education, be it good or bad, which influences them most, is his example? To teach him these, which affect his condition in so many ways, and enable him to reflect properly upon his situation, to give a method and fixedness to his system of conduct, render him less the victim of nursery prejudices, or the creature of momentary impulse and wild enthusiasm, impress him with a due sense of the importance of his rights and duties, something more is necessary than information on physical science.

"Not to know at large of things remote

From use, obscure, and subtle; but to know

That which before us lies in daily life,

Is the prime wisdom."

The want of such instruction as we have alluded to, is felt by the more intelligent and influential part of the labouring classes themselves. This is shewn by the character of the cheap magazines which circulate amongst them, and by the attempts lately made in many places, to establish working men's associations, having for their objects the enlightening of the people on these very points. Also, this is indirectly shewn by the fact that the great body of the people—the working classes—the artisans—do not frequent the Mechanics' Institutions. The halls of these places are filled by the middle classes, clerks, shopmen, warehousemen, merchants, manufacturers, students, and the youths of the middle and upper orders; not by the operatives, except in very small proportion. A mind, however, has been infused into the latter class. They feel that their situation is uncomfortable. They see (or suppose they see) certain causes conducing to their present depressed state. They think chiefly about how to remove these sources of distress and improve their condition; and, with these feelings, they cannot be expected to sit down quietly, and amuse themselves with chemistry or geology, botany or astronomy. Their minds are intent upon one study—how are they to better their circumstances. The great mass of the working classes live in the precarious state graphically termed—from hand to mouth. They are indifferently supplied with the comforts of life, and seldom reach any of its luxuries. A trifling depression of trade reduces a very large portion of them to destitution, or, at least, to a very meagre supply of the necessities of existence; and such depressions very frequently occur. If the obstacles to their happiness and comfort are caused by their own conduct solely, announce that to them, shew them wherein they err, teach them how to avoid the causes of these evils, and, if possible, aid them by such institutions as may be thought likely to have a good effect. Convince them that their miseries are all of their own creating, and explain to them, if it be so, that laws, modes of government, institutions, can be of no assistance. Reason and truth will surely prevail. But, if their distresses are in great part caused by harsh and unequal laws, by restrictions in the free exercise of their occupations, by the oppressive nature of some institutions, and the deficiency of others—if they have begun to perceive the unfavourable operation of these causes, have acquired the opinion that they may be removed, and see that their own efforts are necessary to remove them—it is not likely that their attention will be easily drawn from the sores under which they are smarting, and the means of relief, the great object on which they are intent, which they naturally look upon as the one thing needful for them. And institutions designed to convey useful knowledge to the great mass of working men, professing to be for their behoof, should not neglect, or pass by utterly without notice, the subjects in which those for whose benefit the institutions were designed have, or conceive they have, so deep an interest. They should be instructed that they are among, and content under admonition, and then they may take the benefit of the scientific instruction provided for them; or be assisted in procuring the knowledge they believe to be so essential to promote their interests. It may be said of institutions designed for the good of the people, which neglect these vital topics, that, when the people ask bread, they give them a stone.

4. Of the obstacles to the efficiency of Mechanics' Institutions.

In offering a few hints on the subject of Mechanics' Institutions, we cannot omit noticing several circumstances which oppose serious difficulties in their onward path, and are calculated to diminish very much their usefulness.

In the first place, the mass of the people are worked too hard. They continue too long at work daily, and in the evening are not in a condition to undertake any serious effort, mental or bodily. They are worn out by the severe and long-continued fatigue of the day, become unfit for any active exertion, and can only pass the evening doing nothing, in idle conversation, or derive entertainment from the excitement of the theatre or the public-house. In all classes of society—shopmen and clerks, tradesmen and operatives of every kind—the mind is too long every day closely intent upon business. The attention is too unremittingly exerted; and, in the evening, the mental powers are exhausted, incapable of any effort of reasoning, or even of keeping up a steady attention for any time. The mind and body become exhausted, even from doing nothing, from the passive exertion of being awake. Hence, with the present hours and habits of business, the evening's occupation cannot be study; it must be relaxation, light, amusing, requiring little active effort of attention, exciting; and no very substantial or permanent improvement can be expected. Until some arrangement is entered into, which shall send the artisan home from his work more fresh, and with a little more time to spare for amusement and improvement, we cannot hope that he will be enabled to take the full benefit of any opportunities of instruction placed within his reach.

It will be objected that it does not do to interfere between tradesmen and employers, and that, if the former has shorter hours, he must have less wages. We do not suggest any legal enactment to interfere between them. We wish it to be brought about voluntarily by the conviction of both parties that it will be for their interest. In almost all cases where the work done is in proportion to the energy and activity of the workman, it will be found that a small deduction from the time of work would not make a corresponding loss of work done. In two-thirds of the time, the workmen will do more than two-thirds of the work. This we know is the conviction from experience, when the workers were upon reduced time, of many manufacturers employing a considerable number of hands; and, from all we have heard, we have little doubt that, if the employed and employers of every kind could be awakened to the importance of the subject, they would find that it would make little difference in their pecuniary interests, were the hours of labour to be abridged a fifth or a sixth; and that would allow the labourer time for rest and recreation, and leave him not unfit for a little serious study, for his improvement.

There is another serious obstacle in the way of popular education—that is, education of the adult population. The people are not ready for it. That grown up persons may take an interest in and derive benefit from lectures, the mind must be prepared by some previous culture. The taste and capacity for intellectual pursuits cannot be acquired all at once by an adult, whose mind is a sort of tabula rasa, quite unused previously to habits of attention and study. Unless a taste for, and the means of, pursuing proper occupations for spare time, be implanted in early youth—when the mind is not pre-occupied, when it is ready to acquire the habit of learning, and may be easily bent by a gentle force—it will be difficult to eradicate the mental indolence and incapacity which must result from a long habit of not using the mental powers, and those pernicious tastes and habits which will infallibly take possession of that mind in which better seed has not been sown. Hence, the necessity for primary schools to qualify for study in maturer years. And every inducement, from cheapness, from the attractive nature of the courses, should be held out to invite attendance. The want of education and general mental cultivation is not felt. It is not like the want of food, attended by a gnawing pain. The people generally do not seem to be impressed with the uses and advantages of knowledge. The remedy must be found in instruction when young, and easy admission when advanced in years to the benefits of the Mechanics' Institutions.

We are sensible that many of the directors of the different Mechanics' Institutions are aware of the deficiencies in their course of instruction, and have made many attempts to improve it. But there has been one grand obstacle to every improvement—the WANT OF FUNDS. Do they wish to extend the library or apparatus; invite some eminent man, whose fame would draw out the people, to give them a course, or a few lectures; or to establish some course for which there may not be a sufficient demand to make it pay itself, but which, at a cheap rate might be well attended, and thus, knowledge be diffused among many, which would take root and spread—they are met at every turn by the want of pecuniary means. Hence, they are confined to those subjects of lecture which will draw classes, and support themselves. From the charge necessary to remunerate the lecturer and clear the expenses, the middle classes only can attend; it is frequently beyond the means of the mass of the operatives, and hence we find that the operatives form only about a fourth or fifth of the students at the Mechanics' Institutions; only the higher order and better paid operatives being able to pay the necessary fee—or, if able, these only considering the lectures worth the fee.

Here, we cannot but regret that the legislature has taken no interest whatever in these institutions; and, more particularly, that a government which has professed so much good-will to the cause of education, should not have endeavoured to assist institutions calculated to be of such service in promoting popular education. Large grants have been awarded to the colleges, the benefits of which are enjoyed by the gentry and richer of the middle orders; to say nothing of the immense sums squandered on mere trumpery. But no aid has been tendered to the colleges of the working classes. And, while these institutions, designed to assist the poor and hard-wrought artisan, open the advantages of education to his class, and which, from the limited means of those for whose use they are designed, specially need external assistance and encouragement, have been struggling with every difficulty, and even sometimes for existence, government has looked coldly on, apparently indifferent as to their fate. It is not easy to remedy this fundamental want. But the directors of these institutions have no small influence, and, by a strong appeal to the public, could do much to increase their resources; and, were several institutions combining, they could make out a very strong case to enforce an application to the legislature.

In order, therefore, to give to Mechanics' Institutions increased efficiency, and to render them really colleges for the working classes, giving instructions on easy terms on all those subjects on which the people need to be enlightened—we think the following points must be attended to.

1. The managers of these institutions should make a strong effort, either by an appeal to Parliament, or to the wealthier orders in each district, to procure additional funds to carry on the good work with spirit—to extend the library and apparatus, procure able lecturers, and lower the rate of admission. Cheapness is absolutely requisite to induce attendance on lectures, the subjects of which may not be recognised or generally felt as wants.

2. The directors of Mechanics' Institutions should use very strong endeavours to get the hours of labour shortened in manufactories, shops, warehouses, &c. This is a sine qua non to the success of these institutions; and addresses to the public on the subject from the directors would be attended with a very good effect. This is a subject, the importance of which, cannot be too highly estimated.

3. In every such institution, there should be a course for the MAN as well as for the artist or operative. This is essential. The course for the man should embrace.—1. His PHYSICAL CONSTITUTION, and the means of preserving health—knowledge on which subjects is very deficient among all classes, and will do much to promote temperate habits, and prolong life.—2. His MORAL CONSTITUTION, embracing the duties of the private relations of life, developed and enforced in a homely and practical manner; a course which might be rendered very attractive, and enlivened by biography and anecdote.—3. His SOCIAL CONSTITUTION, embracing his rights and duties as a citizen, and political economy. It may be objected that there will be insuperable obstacles to introducing the latter division in the present Mechanics' Institutions. It may be so; and, wherever this is the case, let others be set a-going to supply this fundamental want.

4. There should be, for general students, courses on History and Biography, Geography and Statistics, Literature, and Science treated popularly. And these lectures should be something more than that dry statement of facts which may answer well enough where students must attend, either for the information, or as qualifying for some corporate privilege. They must be in a style which will attract and keep up a sustained interest.

5. There should be a course for artisans, consisting as much as possible of practical lessons and examinations, embracing—

Grammar and Composition.

Arithmetic and Mathematics.

Drawing and Modelling.

Natural Philosophy.

Chemistry.

These are the bases of the useful arts and manufactures; and a DIPLOMA should be given to those who have attained such proficiency as to enable them to pass an examination on these subjects—wherever or however they may have acquired their knowledge.

6. Primary schools for the young must be instituted. It does not seem likely that national schools will be soon established. The education of the poor is to be all left to the voluntary system. The directors of several of the English Institutions have wisely instituted schools in connexion with their classes for adults, that the latter may have every facility for supplying their children with that elementary instruction they so much feel the want of. This is an excellent feature of these establishments, and we hope to see it imitated elsewhere.

We are perfectly aware that it is impossible for the Mechanics' Institutions to attain all these ends at once and without considerable difficulty. But, if those who desire to promote the usefulness of these institutions, keep these ends steadily in view, are impressed with a sense of their importance, and take every opportunity of attaining them, by however small instalments, these institutions will gradually form into truly useful Colleges for the People, acquire their affection and esteem, and, by so doing, exercise no small influence in bettering their condition.

HOWITT'S COLONIZATION AND CHRISTIANITY.*

THIS volume may not be the most entertaining or poetical of Mr Howitt's diversified works, but we have no hesitation in pronouncing it, in its object and scope, the most important and valuable of any that he has yet produced; not secondary to his earnest exposition of the teeming mischiefs of priestcraft, and well worthy of the spiritual descendant of George Fox and William Penn. How often must the humbling and painful idea, embodied in the opening sentences of this volume, have occurred to every reflecting mind, trained in the light of Revelation! How often must it have been said, in almost the same words employed by our author! "For eighteen hundred years the divine faith of Christianity has been the pretended guide of a large portion of the civilized world; for three centuries, British Protestants have possessed the heritage of the pure oracles of God, and asserted the right of private judgment in interpreting, each for himself, a body of doctrines and a system of morals so liquid that he who runs may read—and where are the practical results?" When we hear the happy and benign influences of Christianity upon society so loudly vaunted, we are often tempted to reverse the proposition, and express unfeigned and regretful astonishment, that, having for so many generations, pretended to live under the pure and sublime morality of the gospel of Jesus, Christendom differs in so shadowy or imperceptible a degree from Heathendom in following whatsoever things are pure, peaceful, lovely, and of good report. The facts which Mr Howitt has compiled, and on which he founds his earnest, and therefore eloquent denunciations of the blindness and complacent self-delusion of nations, arrogating to themselves the name of Christians, and acting for ages, from the era of the discoveries of Columbus down to the recent cruelties and injustice shewn by Englishmen to the aboriginal tribes of Van Dieman's Land and Caffreland—may well put Christendom to the blush, and give a triumph to pagan nations; who, if they want the boasted civilization of Europe, are also unstained by the wholesale and systematic depravity which has, in nearly every instance, attended colonization by Christian people—subjects of "Most Sacred or Most Christian kings," Defenders of the Christian Faith! It is, indeed, "high time," as our author asserts, that we look boldly into the real state of the question, and learn actually whether the mighty distance between our goodness and the moral depravity of other people really exists—"WHETHER, IN FACT, WE BE CHRISTIANS AT ALL." Looking to the code of their nominal religion on the one hand, and, on the other, to the conduct of those legalized banditti, who have planted Christian colonies in fraud, rapacity, blood, and demoniac cruelty, the question is easily determined. By their fruits ye shall know them. They are not Christians, nor do the communities which sanctioned or tolerated their injustice and manifold atrocities deserve the name of Christian, however many humble and sincere followers of the religion of Mercy and of Peace may have been comprehended in their population. But Mr Howitt does not rest alone upon the doings of former centuries, in distant quarters of the globe, whither Christians have gone forth with the cross in the one hand, and the sword in the other, to pillage and proselytize the heathen—initiating them into the mysteries of their holy faith, by a baptism of fire and blood. He seems to question whether we are much better Christians at home in Europe than in Asia and America, and other heathen lands, and concludes in a strain of accusation, which it were more desirable than easy to controvert:—

If ever there was a quarter of the globe distinguished by its quarrels, its jealousies, its everlasting wars and bloodshed, it is Europe. Since these soi-disant Christian nations have risen into any degree of strength, what single evidence of Christianity have they, as nations, exhibited? Eternal warfare!—is that Christianity? Yet that is the history of Christian Europe. The most subtle or absurd pretences to seize upon each other's possessions—the contempt of all faith in treaties—the basest policy—the most scandalous profligacy of public morals—the most abominable international laws!—are they Christianity? And yet they are the history of Europe. Nations of men selling themselves to do murder, that ruthless kings might ravish each other's crowns—nations of men, standing with jealous eyes on the perpetual watch against each other, with arms in their hands, oaths in their mouths, and curses in their hearts;—are those Christian? Yet there is not a man acquainted with the history of Europe that will ever attempt to deny that that is the history of Europe. It is very well to vaunt the title of Christian one to another—every nation knows in its own soul, it is a hollow pretence. While it boasts of the Christian name, it dare not for a moment throw itself upon a Christian faith in its neighbour. No! centuries of the most unremitted hatred—blood poured over every plain of Europe, and sprinkled on its very mountain tops, cry out too dreadfully, that it is a dismal cheat. Wars, the most savage and unprovoked; oppressions, the most desperate; tyrannies the most ruthless; massacres, the most horrible; death-fires, and tortures the most exquisite, perpetuated one on another, for the faith and in the very name of God; dungeons and inquisitions; the blood of the Vaudois, and the flaming homes of the Covenanters, are all in their memories, and give the lie to their professions. No! Poland rent in sunder; the iron heel of Austria on the prostrate neck of Italy; and invasions and aggressions without end, make Christian nations laugh with a hollow mockery in their hearts, in the very midst of their solemn professions of the Christian virtue and faith.

But I may be told that this character applies rather to past Europe than to the present. What! are all these things at an end? For what then are all these standing armies? What all these marching armies? What these men-of-war on the ocean? What these atrocities going on from year to year in Spain? Has any age or nation seen such battles waged as we have witnessed in our time? How many WATERLOOS can the annals of the earth reckon? What Timour, or Zenghis Khan, can be compared to the Napoleon of modern Europe? the greatest scourge of nations that ever abode on this planet; the most tremendous meteor that ever burnt along its surface! Have the multitude of those who deem themselves the philosophical and refined, as well as the Christians of Europe, ceased to admire this modern Meloch, and to forget in his individual and barbarous sufferings at St Helena, the countless agonies and the measureless ruin that he inflicted on innocent and even distant nations? While we retain a blind admiration of martial genius, wilfully shutting our senses and our minds to the crimes and the pangs that constitute its shadow, it is laughable to say that we have progressed beyond our fathers in Christian knowledge. At this moment all Europe stands armed to the teeth.

Well, then, may it be asked—"WHETHER, IN FACT, WE ARE CHRISTIANS AT ALL?"—whether, in few words, the Apostle Paul, were he now in the body, would have received the same reception among us, and at the Court of our young Queen, which has generously been accorded to our ancient and honourable foeman, Marshal Soult;—whether the Apostle or the warrior would have awakened the most chivalrous feelings, the proudest recollections! It is needless to travel so far abroad as Mr Howitt has frequently carried us, that we may inquire—Whether, in fact, we are Christians at all? Look, among hundreds of instances, to our prisons for petty debtors; to the tithe-battles of Ireland; to the cruelties practised or allowed by our Christian planters in the West Indies; to the neglected and perishing juvenile population of the streets of our great cities. If our Christianity be genuine at all, then, alas! how far is it from having accomplished its perfect work!—how lamentably slow is the progress which it has made in eighteen centuries!—how much still remains to be done!

But the immeasurable distance between the high standard of true Christianity and the very moderate attainments of the so-called Christian world, though not foreign to the design of this volume, is not its immediate object. That is, "to lay open to the public the most extensive and extraordinary system of crime which the world ever witnessed," in full operation for three hundred years, and continuing in unabated activity of evil. For this purpose, our author commences with the conquests and Christian colonizations of Columbus and Gama, and descends, through a revolting series, to the latest atrocities committed by our buccaneering Protestant seamen in New Zealand and the Islands of the Pacific Ocean. But Protestant and Catholic are Christian distinctions unknown beyond the Line or the boundaries of Europe; and English, Dutch, Spaniards, and Portuguese, may fairly divide the blood-stained laurel among them, the enormity of their guilt being limited only by their sphere of action, and the numbers of savages whom civilized Christians have found to plunder, torture, proselytize, enslave, or extirpate. In this good work, Protestants have vied with Catholics, if they have not rather, the world's progress considered, eclipsed their triumphs. The Reformed Dutch have emulated the bigoted and superstitious Portuguese; the Protestant English and Anglo-Americans, where Hindoes, Negroes, Red Indians, Caffres, or Hottentots, have been concerned, have not lagged one whit behind the Spaniards. Much of the spurious or falsified Christianity which has instigated, or formed the apology for the enormous crimes committed against Pagan humanity in three quarters of the globe, by the Christians of the fourth, are imputed, in part, to the lingering influence of the corrupt doctrines of the Romish Church, from which Protestant sects have not yet been wholly emancipated. How lamentably true is it, that, though "we have renounced mass, and the confessional, and the purchase of indulgences, we have tenaciously retained the mass of our tyrannous propensities. We practise our crimes without confessing them—we indulge our worst desires without even having the honesty to pay for it; and the old spurious morality and political barbarism of Rome, are as stanchly maintained by us as ever, while we claim to look back on Popery with horror, and on our present condition as the celestial light of the nineteenth century."

Mr Howitt speculates with enthusiasm upon what might have been had Reformed Protestants appeared in America and the Indies as Reformed Christians—if they had protested against the cruelties and aggressions of the Popish Spaniards and Portuguese, if they had reformed all their rapacious practices, and remedied their abuses, and shewn that they had really reverted to the genuine faith of Christ, and were come to these lands to seek honest benefit by honest means. But the Dutch and English might have been Papists, and Spaniards Reformed Protestants, for any difference which their practices revealed to the Heathen. The one did as foul disgrace to genuine Christianity as the other. Of both, it is too truly remarked—"From their deeds the natives, wherever they came, could only imagine their religion to be something especially odious and mischievous."

The cruelties of the Spaniards in America are tolerably well-known to the world, though Mr Howitt appears to think that they have never yet been sufficiently reprobated, and certainly not by the most eminent of the historians of the Americas, Robertson—a Christian philosopher, and a Protestant minister. Our author's statements shew, that, with yet greater rapidity, the Reformed Dutch displayed, in the Indian Islands, cruelty more cold-blooded, perfidy more deliberate, than their Popish forerunners.

A curious speculation is indulged on the probable judgment which the natives of these countries must have formed of their Christian visitors, if the Bible had previously been placed in their hands, and they had been assured that the strangers solemnly professed to walk by its dictates, which commanded not to kill, not to covet, not to steal, not to oppress; while the disciples of this code were seen to be the most murderous, greedy, and tyrannical of men. "But," says our author, "if the natives could have read the declaration of Christ—'By this shall men know that ye are my disciples, that ye love one another'—the wonder must have been tenfold, for never did men exhibit such an intensity of hatred, jealousy, and vengeance toward each other. Portuguese, Dutch, French, English, and Danes, coming together, or one after the other, fell on each other's facts, factories, and ships, with the most vindictive fury. They attacked each other by sea and land; propagated the most infamous stories of each other wherever they came, in order to supersede each other in the good graces of the people, who had valuable trading stations, or were in possession of gold or pearls, nutmegs or cinnamon, coffee or cotton cloth. They 'loved one another' to that degree, that they were ready to join the natives anywhere, in the most murderous attempts to massacre and drive away each other." The quiet sarcasm that follows, conveys not the lightest part of the censure:—"What must have seemed most extraordinary of all was, the English expelling with vigour those of their countrymen who ventured there without the sanction of the particular trading company who claimed a monopoly of Indian commerce. The rancour and pertinacity with which Englishmen expelled Englishmen was even more violent than that which they shewed to foreigners." As a specimen of the moral power of this work, in which, indeed, its great merit lies, we select the following remarks on the early Machiavelian policy of the Honourable East India Company, a body which has included many flaming saints, and more open, bold-faced sinners; but both alike ever steady to one object—selfish aggrandizement at almost any price.

From that period (1708) the East India Company commenced that career of steady grasping at dominion over the Indian territories, which has never been relaxed for a moment, but, while it has for ever worn the grave air of moderation, and has assumed the language of right, has gone on adding field to field and house to house—swallowing up state after state, and prince after prince, till it has finally found itself the sovereign of this vast and splendid empire, as it would fain persuade itself and the world, by the clearest claims, and the most undoubted justice. By the laws and principles of modern policy, it may be so; but by the eternal principles of Christianity, there never was a more thorough repetition of the hankering after Naboth's vineyard, of the "slaying and taking possession," exhibited to the world. It is true that, as the panegyrists of our Indian policy contend, it may be the design of Providence that the swarming millions of India should be placed under our care, that they may enjoy the blessings of English rule and of English knowledge; but Providence had no need that we should violate all his most righteous injunctions to enable Him to bring about his designs. Providence, the Scriptures tell us, intended that Jacob should supersede Esau in the heritage of Israel: but Providence had no need of the deception which Rebecca and Jacob practised—had no need of the mess of pottage and the kid-skins, to enable Him to effect his object. We are much too ready to run the wilful career of our own lusts and passions, and lay the charge at the door of Providence. It is true that English dominion is, or will become, far better to the Hindoos than that of the cruel and exacting Moguls; but who made us the judge and the ruler over these people? If the real object of our policy and exertions in India has been the achievement of wealth and power, as it undoubtedly has, it is pitiful and hypocritical to endeavour to clothe it with the pretence of working the will of Providence, and seeking the good of the natives. We shall soon see which objects have been most zealously and undeviatingly pursued, and by what means. If our desires have been, not to enrich and aggrandize ourselves, but to benefit the people and rescue them from the tyranny of bad rulers, heaven knows what wide realms are yet open to our benevolent exertions; what despots there are to pull down; what miserable millions to relieve from their oppressions;—and when we behold Englishmen levelling their vengeance against such tyrants, and visiting such unhappy people with their protective power, where neither gold nor precious merchandises are to be won at the same time, we may safely give the amplest credence and the profoundest admiration to their claims of disinterested philanthropy. If they present themselves as the champions of freedom and the apostles of social amelioration, we shall soon have opportunities of asking how far they have maintained these characters.

The mandates issued by the grave and Honourable Board of Directors, commanding their military and civil servants rigidly to respect the principles of justice in their dealings with the natives, he would seem to think much of the same nature as nearly similar orders hypocritically issued by the Court of Russia to Potemkin or Swaroff, staying their ruthless career of conquest, and which their experienced commanders, such as Hastings and Clive, considered that they best fulfilled by neglecting.

Seen in Mr Auber's pages, the Directors present themselves as a body of grave and honourable merchants, full of the most admirable spirit of moderation, integrity, and benevolence; and we may give them the utmost credit for sincerity in their professions and desires. But unfortunately, we all know what human nature is. Unfortunately the power, the wealth, and the patronage brought home to them by the very violation of their own wishes and maxims were of such an overwhelming and seducing nature, that it was in vain to resist them. Nay, in such colonies does the modern philosophy of conquest and diplomacy disguise the worst transactions between one state and another, that it is not for plain men very readily to penetrate to the naked enormity beneath. When all the world was applauding the success of Indian affairs—the extension of territory, the ability of their governors, the valour of their troops: and when they felt the flattering growth of their greatness, it required qualities far higher than mere mercantile probity and good intentions, to enable them to strip away the false glitter of their official transactions, and sternly assure themselves of the unholliness of their nature. We may, therefore, concede to the Directors of the East India Company, and to their governors and officers in general, the very best intentions, knowing as we do, the force of influences such as we have already alluded to, and the force also of modern diplomatic and military education, by which a policy and practices of the most dismal character become gradually to be regarded not merely as unexceptionable, but highly honourable. We may allow all this, and yet pronounce the mode by which the East India Company has possessed itself of Hindostan as the most revolting and unchristian that can possibly be conceived. The most masterly policy, regarded independent of its morals, and a valour more than Roman, have been exhibited by our governors-generals and armies on the plains of Hindostan: but if there ever was one system more Machiavelian—more appropriative of the show of justice where the basest injustice was attempted—more cold, cruel, haughty, and unrelenting than another—it is the system by which the government of the different states of India has been wrested from the hands of their respective princes and collected into the grasp of the British power. Incalculable gainers as we have been by this system, it is impossible to review it without feelings of the most poignant shame and the highest indignation. Whenever we talk to other nations of British faith and integrity, they may well point to India in derisive scorn. The system which, for more than a century, was steadily at work to strip the native princes of their dominions, and that too under the most sacred pleas of right and expediency, is a system of torture more exquisite than regal or spiritual tyranny ever before discovered; such as the world has nothing similar to show.

From the moment that the English felt that they had the power in India to "divide and conquer," they adopted the plan of doing it rather by plausible manoeuvres than by a bold avowal of their designs, and a more honest plea of the right of conquest—the ancient doctrine of the strong, which they began to perceive was not quite so much in vogue as formerly. Had they said at once, These Mahomedan princes are arbitrary, cruel, and perfidious—we will depose them, and assume the government ourselves—we pretend to no other authority for our act than our ability to do it, and no other excuse for our conduct than our determination to redress the evils of the people: that would have been a candid behaviour. It would have been so far in accordance with the ancient doctrine of nations that little would have been thought of it; and though as Christians we could not have applauded the “doing evil that good might come of it,” yet had the promised benefit to more than eighty millions of people followed, that glorious penance would have gone far in the most scrupulous mind to have justified the crime of usurpation. But the mischief has been, that, while the exactions and extortions on the people have been continued, and in many cases exaggerated, the means of usurpation have been those glozing and hypocritical arts, which are more dangerous from their subtlety than naked violence, and more detestable because wearing the face, and using the language, of friendship and justice. A fatal friendship, indeed, has that of the English been to all those princes that were allured by it. It has pulled them every one from their thrones, or has left them there the contemptible puppets of a power that works its arbitrary will through them. But, friendship or enmity, the result has been eventually the same to them. If they resisted alliance with the encroaching English, they were soon charged with evil intentions, fallen upon, and conquered; if they acquiesced in the proffered alliance, they soon became ensnared in these webs of diplomacy from which they never escaped without the loss of all honour and hereditary dominion—of everything, indeed, but the lot of prisoners where they had been kings.

This may not be palatable doctrine to many, but the question is, whether it be not true; and the truth is established by numerous flagrant instances, which must be familiar to many of our readers; with which, indeed, the modern history of India teems, even when the disgraceful tale is told by Englishmen, and with every possible extenuation. But the cruelty and tyranny of the Spaniards and Portuguese, and the worse cruelty and perfidy of the Dutch, are now become things comparatively ancient, foreign, and remote; and the chapter upon our own doings in India, in South Africa, and New Holland, up to the passing hour, form the more important and appropriate text of this impressive discourse. To South Africa we need not particularly revert, as the subject of Caffre Wrongs was lately animadverted upon in this Magazine, in noticing the generous and Christian appeal made by the friends of the Aborigines.

Mr Howitt expatiates in a rapturous strain upon what Christianity has done in the enchanting islands of the Pacific to render the scene of luxuriant natural beauty which he describes one of equal moral loveliness. He quotes largely from the Polyesian Researches of Mr Ellis, and the works of Mr Williams, both eminent labourers in these fair and fruitful fields. From the former writer we shall also borrow a few sentences, as his relation forms the vestibule to those of Mr Howitt's observations, which we wish to present to our readers in a striking light. Mr Ellis, after mentioning that the natives had built ships, carpenters, and blacksmiths, and were apt at learning all European trades; that they built neat and comfortable houses, and vessels of considerable burden—proceeds:—

“They have now wants; a number of articles of clothing and commerce are necessary to their comfort, and they cultivate the soil to supply them. At one island, where I was once fifteen months without seeing a single European excepting our own families, there were, I think, twenty-eight ships put in for provisions last year, and all obtained the supplies they wanted. Besides cultivating potatoes and yams, and raising stock, fowls and pigs, the cultivation, the spinning, and the weaving of the cotton has been introduced by missionary artisans; and there are some of the chiefs, and a number of the people, especially in one of the islands, who are now decently clothed in garments made after the European fashion, produced from cotton grown in their own gardens, spun by their own children, and woven in the island. One of the chiefs of the island of Rarotongo, as stated by the missionaries, never wears any other dress than that woven in the island. They have been taught also to cultivate the sugar-cane, which is indigenous, and to make sugar; and some of them have large plantations, employing, at times, forty men. They supply the ships with this useful article, and, at some of the islands, between fifty and sixty vessels touch in a single year. The natives of the islands send a considerable quantity away; I understand that one station sent as much as forty tons away last year. In November last, a vessel of ninety tons burthen, built in the islands, was sent to the colony of New South Wales, laden with Tahitian grown sugar. Besides the sugar they have been taught to cultivate, they prepare arrowroot, and they sent to England in one year, as I was informed by merchants in London, more than had been imported into this country for nearly twenty previous years. Cattle also have been introduced and preserved, chiefly by the missionaries; pigs, dogs, and rats were the only animals they had before, but the missionaries have introduced cattle among them. While they continued heathen, they disregarded, nay, destroyed some of those first landed among them: but since that time, they have highly prized them, and by their attention to them they are now so numerous as to enable the natives to supply ships with fresh beef at the rate of threepence a pound. The islanders have also been instructed by the missionaries in the manufacture of cocoa-nut oil, of which large quantities are exported. They have been taught to cultivate tobacco, and this would have been a valuable article of commerce had not the duty in New South Wales been so high as to exclude that grown in the islands from the market. The above are some of the proofs that Christianity prepares the way for, and necessarily leads to, the civilization of those by whom it is adopted. There are now in operation among a people who, when the missionaries arrived, were destitute of a written language, seventy-eight schools, which contain between 12,000 and 13,000 scholars. The Tahitians have also a simple, explicit, and wholesome code of laws, as the result of their imbibing the principles of Christianity. This code of laws is printed and circulated among them, understood by all, and acknowledged by all as the supreme rule of action for all classes in their civil and social relation. The laws have been productive of great benefits.”*

So far Mr Ellis; following whom, our author exclaims—

Here again they have far outstripped us in England. When shall we have a code of laws, so simple and compact that it may be “printed and circulated amongst us, and understood by all?” The benefits resulting from this intelligible and popular code, Mr Ellis tells us, have been great. No doubt of it. The benefits of such a code in England would be incalculable; but when will the lawyers, or our enlightened Parliament, let us have it? The whole scene of the reformation, and the happiness introduced by Christianity into the South-Sea

* This must be a mistake.—Ed.

"Islands," &c.; however, most delightful. Such a scene never was exhibited to the world since its foundation. Mr Williams' recent work, descriptive of these islands and the missionary labours there, is fascinating as Robinson Crusoe himself, and infinitely more important in its relations. If ever the idea of the age of gold was realized, it is here; or rather,

"Where none contest the fields, the woods, the streams—
The golden age, where gold disturbs no dreams."

Besides the benefits accruing from this improved state to the natives, great are the benefits that accrue from it to the Europeans. The benefit of commerce, from their use of European articles, is and must be considerable. They furnish, too, articles of commerce in no small quantities. Instead of European crews now, in case of wreck on their coasts, being murdered and devoured, they are rescued from the waves at the risk of the lives of the people themselves, and received, as the evidence and works of Ellis and Williams testify, in most remarkable instances, with the greatest hospitality.

But all this springing civilization—this young Christianity—this scene of beauty and peace—are endangered. The founders of a new and happier state, the pioneers and artificers of civilization, stand aghast at the ruin that threatens their labours—that threatens the welfare—say, the very existence of the simple islanders amongst whom they have wrought such miracles of love and order. And whence arises this danger? whence comes this threatened ruin? In some race of merciless savages about to burst in upon these interesting people, and destroy them? Yes, the same "irreclaimable and idiomitable savages" that have ravaged and oppressed every nation which they have conquered, "from China to Peru." The same savages that laid waste the West Indies; that massacred the South Americans; that have chased the North Americans to the "far west;" that shot the Caffres for their cattle; that have covered the coasts of Africa with the blood, and fires, and rancorous malice of the slave wars; that have exterminated millions of Hindus by famine, and hold a hundred millions of them, at this moment, in the most abject condition of poverty and oppression; the same savages that are at this moment also carrying the Hill Coolies from the East—as if they had not a scene of enormities there wide enough for their capacity of cruelty—to sacrifice them in the West, on the graves of millions of murdered negroes: the same savages are come hither also. The savages of Europe, the most heartless and merciless race that ever inhabited the earth—a race, for the range and continuance of its atrocities, without a parallel in this world, and, it may be safely believed, in any other, are busy in the South Sea Islands. A roving clan of sailors and runaway convicts have revived once more the crimes and character of the old bucaniers. They go from island to island, diffusing gin, debauchery, loathsome diseases, and murder, as freely as if they were the greatest blessings that Europe had to bestow. They are the restless and triumphant apostles of misery and destruction; and such are their achievements, that it is declared that, unless our government interpose some check to their progress, they will as completely annihilate the islanders, as the Caribs were annihilated in the West Indies.

It is not easy to gainsay this melancholy and lamentable statement. Mr Howitt has diligently collected many proofs of the cruelty shewn to the natives of these and other islands by the depraved characters who haunt them—runaway convicts or seamen, the vilest of the vile, but all nominal Christians. These iniquitous doings are not, however, sanctioned by authority; and it is to the exposure of the legalized oppression of the Aborigines of different countries, masked by hypocritical professions, and thinly-veiled injustice, that we are more powerfully attracted. Let us take a single and recent instance—the conduct of the Colonial Government and population to the lingering relics of the native population of Van Diemen's Land, to which Mr Howitt alludes in very brief terms. Solate as 1830, the Lieutenant Governor of the colony appointed a committee, consisting of colonists of course, to report upon the relations existing between the aboriginal natives, and the settlers. In a work on our table, written and published at Hobart Town, that report is given in substance. The writer has some sense of justice, some relings of humanity. After describing the natives as the civilized Christian man uniformly does the savage he desires to crush, he adds,

But it should be remembered that these Aborigines exhibit man as nature has made him; unwrought upon by civilization—unpolished by the influence of the arts and sciences—unformed, unmoulded, into anything like shape of mind. In this riot of wildness, favourable in its very existence to the display of our worst attributes, and to the concealment of our better ones, how have they been treated? Worse than dogs, or even beasts of prey—hunted from place to place—shot—their families torn away from them—the mother snatched from her children, to become the victim of the lust and cruelty of their civilized Christian neighbours! Every allowance should, therefore, be made for them, if, smarting under such treatment, they have adopted, and have shewn, an indiscriminate abhorrence of those at whose hands they have seldom received good, but very frequently much and aggravated evil.

The committee appointed by Lieutenant Governor Sorell confirms this statement, at least in as far as regarded the first white settlers, but their feelings are much more lenient towards such offenders than those of the military official. In how many histories of colonies may the same thing be remarked, the same disposition to palliate what it was impossible to overlook, and to find in the lawful natural resistance or aroused vengeance of the barbarian, the excuse of the Christian aggressor! When Colonel Sorell, from their own report of facts, drew up a proclamation denouncing the miscreants who had perpetrated the most barbarous atrocities upon the unhappy natives, and, in particular, had robbed them of their wives and children—

"The committee, while they lament to revive these imputations, apparently too well-founded, against the earlier colonists, are, however, not prepared to say, that the description given by Lieutenant-Governor Sorell of the passive and inoffensive character of the Aborigines, unless when previously attacked, is entirely supported by the evidence before them."

While a few specious words might suffice, these have rarely of late, since policy was more in favour than violence, been withheld—save indeed, in South Africa, where matters are carried with a high and open hand. A pretext has never been wanting, either to the diplomatic or the warlike to attain the greatest end, the possession, in the words of Mr Howitt, "of Naboth's vineyard." The Aborigines of Van Diemen's Land, were no doubt protected by vague unmeaning proclamations which no one even affected to regard, while the colonists were armed with the powers of martial law, and aided by the military, to knock them on the head like so many mad dogs, wherever they found them, upon any or no pretence. Among the best of the reasons alleged by the committee was this—that "It is manifest that they have lost the sense of the superiority of white men, and the dread of the effects of firearms which they formerly entertained, and have of late condensed their plans of aggression with such resolution as they were not heretofore thought to possess, and with a cunning and artifice which render it impossible to foresee or defeat their purposes. They continue to occupy and ravage beyond the reach of control, and in defiance of the orders and efforts of Government, those settled districts which they were prohibited from entering." Since the commencement of the present year, an unparalleled series of devastation has marked their passage through the country, as atrocities perpetrated by them will abundantly testify.

"After a careful comparison of the several statements they have received, the committee have no hesitation in expressing their persuasion, that a sentiment of alarm pervades the minds of the settlers throughout the island, and that the total ruin of every establishment is but too certainly to be apprehended, unless immediate means can be devised for suppressing the system of aggression, under which so many are in dread that they may themselves become the victims."

Thus, the decree went forth. The colony had been rapidly increasing by emigration, and the arrival of convicts; fresh settlements were in great demand—and how did the colonial government proceed? But first, let us read the closing paragraph of the report of the committee upon which their plan was founded. The committee, in conclusion,

"May venture to express a hope, that the experience of present transactions may be even rendered useful in the history of the world; and that, in all future attempts at colonisation, it may be steadily borne in mind how strict an obligation exists to exercise mercy and justice toward the unprotected savage, and how severe a retribution the neglect of those duties, even by individuals, may ultimately entail upon an entire, an unoffending community."

And now mark the sequel to these benevolent reflections, or Colonel Arthur's grand battus, or man-hunt.

Acting, in a great measure, upon the recommendations so offered, a degree of activity marked the movements of Government in regard to the Aborigines, shortly after the date of this report, which plainly denoted that they were in earnest in endeavouring to put an end to the unhappy state of affairs then existing between ourselves and the black inhabitants; and, as part of this, in September of the same year, a plan was originated, the object of which was to force the whole of the Aboriginal population into

"These were their hunting-grounds, and the waters where they fished, in all probability. An outrage charged upon the natives, who drove a settler from a hut he had erected, is thus spoken of—"It is the opinion of some persons who were then in the colony, that the displeasure of these people was excited only by finding this hut erected upon ground to which, as being favourably situated for water and hunting, they were in the habit of resorting, and on which they were preparing at this time to hold a general assembly, and that they had no more hostile intention than to remove this obstacle to their proceedings, while it is deposed, by one who was an eyewitness, that they did not even proceed to this act of aggression. Their having been accompanied by their women and children—whom, when engaged in expeditions of danger, they are known to be in the habit of leaving in a place of security—is a circumstance strongly in favour of the opinion that they had in view no other than a peaceful purpose, and that they were not the first assailants. But, whatever may have been the actual course of previous events, it is indisputable that a most lamentable encounter did at this time ensue, in which the numbers slain of men, women, and children, have been estimated as high as fifty." These poor people were literally massacred by a detachment of an English regiment.

one corner of the island, forming a peninsula with a very narrow isthmus, and which was thought capable of being easily rendered impassable to the natives when once enclosed within its limits. It is always unfair to judge by events; and, although the result of the scheme shewed it to have been undertaken upon insufficient grounds, it received the sanction, at the moment, of persons who were considered well informed upon the subject, and the manner in which it was carried into effect, by the simultaneous move of the whole of the inhabitants, deserves to be styled a splendid instance of patriotism, bearing an unflinching testimony of the estimation in which the Lieutenant-Governor was himself held upon the occasion.

By a Government order, the inhabitants were called upon to co-operate with the authorities towards accomplishing this design; and so well was the call answered, with so pure and disinterested a zeal was the whole population animated, that a force of no less than four thousand civilians was assembled on the day appointed, ready to undertake whatever duties were assigned them. This burst of patriotic feeling was even carried farther; for many of the inhabitants of Hobart Town and Launceston, who were unable, by age or other causes, to take the field, rendered equally good service by volunteering to perform the whole garrison duty of the two towns; thus placing at the disposal of the Government a number equal to themselves of soldiers, who accordingly proceeded to the more active duties of the campaign.

For a period of two months, or so long as the slightest chance remained of a favourable issue to the expedition, every sort of privation and hardship, necessarily incidental to field service in a wild and open country, was borne cheerfully, and with the most exemplary patience, by all parties; but, at this time, it became manifest that the scheme was not feasible—that there were impediments, alike arising from the nature of the country as from the habits and character of the foe with whom they were contending, which were insurmountable; and all the parties returned, therefore, to their homes, receiving a very gratifying expression of thanks for their services from the head of the Government, and enjoying the satisfaction of feeling that, although unsuccessful, the fault, if fault there was, was not attributable to themselves. At the moment, the expedition was certainly highly popular; and the majority of the expectations entertained with respect to it were of the most sanguine description. There was an excitement connected with it which reached far and wide. With one exception only, the press of the colony was loud in its commendations of the whole affair; and even this exception, although from the first sceptical as to the result, bore honourable testimony to the spirit and feeling by which all parties, from his Excellency Colonel Arthur to the humblest settler, were animated. Now, however, that public opinion is somewhat sobered, the illusion has passed away; and the surprise is less that failure was the result, than that anything else could have been ever contemplated. It may be proper here to mention that, immediately after the campaign was over, and during the heat of the qui vive feeling we have been describing, address upon address, from all quarters of the island, reached the Lieutenant-Governor, breathing a tone quite in character with the general excitation that then prevailed.

But, notwithstanding this failure of the expedition in respect to its grand or primary object, it has been attended by the very best consequence in the end, in many points of view—having led the Aborigines to a much more cautious as well as less offensive system of warfare than had previously characterised their movements, and having unquestionably paved the way to the successful termination of a mission of peace which was undertaken shortly afterwards. It is only a piece of justice to a very meritorious individual that, in speaking for a moment of this mission, and of the events that have sprung from it, a line that has been hitherto endeavoured to be followed should be departed from, and the name of the person be brought under the notice of the reader. In 1829, (when, with the laudable design of promoting their civilisation, an establishment for the reception of the Aborigines was formed at Bruny Island,) a Mr G. A. Robinson, who had previously been a thriving, industrious, master-mechanic, relinquished the certain advantages attendant upon such an occupation in a young colony, and volunteered to take charge of it, and otherwise to endeavour to effect an amicable relationship between the natives and ourselves. In some respects, even at this time, he was not unsuccessful; although, probably, the chief advantage then derived was the means presented of acquiring a knowledge of the language, habits, and other particulars of the blacks, which has since proved invaluable. After the expedition terminated in the manner we have stated, Mr Robinson proceeded to that part of the country most frequented by the natives, endeavouring to conciliate or to establish such a degree of confidence on their part as might induce them to regard us rather as friends than enemies; and, shortly afterwards, these benevolent labours were strengthened or aided by a party of the New South Wales Aborigines, perfectly civilized, who arrived here from the sister colony for that purpose, it having been presumed they would be more likely than ourselves to be viewed without distrust or suspicion by their sable neighbours of this colony. The result has proved of the happiest kind. Mr Robinson has succeeded in persuading a whole tribe to allow themselves to be removed to a neighbouring island, where they are to be protected, civilized, and instructed in those habits, pursuits, and enjoyments, which exalt human beings above the brutes that perish.

Was there ever so atrocious a proceeding related in the same calm, unconscious, self-complacent tone, as if this wholesale outrage upon the lingering wrecks of these poor people, God's creatures, lords of the soil, were some very meritorious action? The employment of the natives of New South Wales, to hunt down or enslave their brethren in Van Diemen's Land, was quite worthy of that European genius which directed Pizzaro to the employment of blood-hounds, or our own slave-owners to keep up corps of Maroons to hunt down their negroes. Having given the narrative of this labour of Colonel Arthur's Christian "love" at some length, and seen Van Diemen's Land cleared of the native race, in a manner which excited unbounded admiration within the colony, for its singular philanthropy, and the exalted and energetic character of the governor, we return to Mr Howitt's work. He closes it with the outrages recently committed against the New Zealanders by the white Christians, who visit them. These New Zealanders are incorrigible barbarians, and, too probably, cannibals. They kill men to eat them. Eating certainly does not enter into our many motives, in highly civilized society, for killing men. The captain of a whaler boasted that he had killed "about twenty of these black fellows." Thus, says Mr Howitt,

Those who have seen in shop-windows in London, dried heads of New Zealanders, may here learn how they came there, and to whom the phrenologists and curiers are indebted.

Mr Williams writes—

"Till lately, the tattooed heads of New Zealanders were sold at Sidney as objects of curiosity; and Mr Yate says he has known people give property to the chiefs for the purpose of getting them to kill their slaves, that they might have some heads to take to New South Wales.

"This degrading traffic was prohibited by General Darling, the governor, upon the following occasion:—In a representation made to Governor Darling, the Rev. Mr Marsden stated, that the captain of an English vessel being so harassed, harassed by some native women, set one tribe upon another to scourge his quarrel, and supplied them with arms and ammunition to fight.

"In the prosecution of the war thus excited, a party of forty-one Bay Islanders made an expedition against some tribes of the South. Forty of the former were sent off; and a few weeks after the slaughter, a Captain Jack went and purchased thirteen chiefs' heads, and, bringing them back to the Bay of Islands, emptied them out of a sack in the presence of their relations. The New Zealanders were, very properly, so much enraged that they told this captain they should take possession of the ship, and put the laws of their country into execution. When he found that they were in earnest, he cut his cable and left the harbour, and afterwards had a narrow escape from them at Tauranga. He afterwards reached Sidney, and it came to the knowledge of the governor, that he brought there ten of these heads for sale, on which discovery the practice was declared unlawful. Mr Yate mentions an instance of a captain going 800 miles from the Bay of Islands to East Cape, enticing twenty-five young men, sons of chiefs, on board his vessel, and delivering them to the Bay of Islanders, with whom they were at war, merely to gain the favour of the latter, and to obtain supplies for his vessel. The youths were afterwards redeemed from slavery by the missionaries, and restored to their friends. Mr Yate once took from the hand of a New Zealand chief a packet of corrosive sublimate, which a captain had given to the savage in order to enable him to poison his enemies."

"Such," continues Mr Howitt, commenting on this statement, "is the general system." Such, we trust, is not the general system, but such things beyond doubt have often occurred; nor can the mischief effected, the barbarities perpetrated, the contagion spread by our runaway convicts, and the worthless seamen who abscond from our trading ships be easily exaggerated.

With a few sentences from Mr Howitt's emphatic and eloquent peroration, we close these hasty remarks, earnestly hoping that his appeal may reach the hearts of tens of thousands, impressing them with the vital and mighty distinction which exists between the morality practised by Christian nations, and even by individuals rich in the world's esteem, fair and honourable, and worthy, and pious men, and the morality uniformly taught in the gospel, and solemnly enjoined by all its precepts, denunciations, and promises. It is high time that assent to the doctrines of Christianity were held to be nugatory, while its direct and lucid rules are either treated with neglect, or as frequently violated with impunity, and especially by pretended Christians in their collective and international relations.

We have now followed the Europeans to every region of the globe, and seen them planting colonies, and peopling new lands, and everywhere we have found them the same—a lawless and domineering race, seizing on the earth as if they were the first-born of creation, and having a presumptive right to murder and dispossess all other people. For more than three centuries we have glanced back at them in their courses, and everywhere they have had the word of God in their mouth, and the deeds of darkness in their hands. In the first dawn of discovery, forth they went singing the Te Deum, and declaring that they went to plant the cross amongst the heathen. As we have already observed, however, is turned out to be the cross of one of the two thieves, and a bitter cross of crucifixion it has proved to the natives where they have received it. It has stood the perpetual sign of plunder and extermination. The Spaniards were reckless in their carnage of the Indians, and all succeeding generations have expressed their horror of the Spaniards. The Dutch were cruel, and everybody adominated their cruelty. One would have thought that the world was grown merciful. Behold North America at this moment, with its disinherited Indians ! See Hindustan, that great and swarming region of usurpations and exactions ! Look at the Cape, and ask the Caffres whether the English are tender-hearted and just : ask the same question in New Holland ! ask it of the natives of Van Diemen's Land—men, transported from the island of their fathers. Ask the New Zealanders whether the warriors, whose tattooed heads stare us in the face in our museums, were not delicately treated by us. . . . Many are the evils that are done under the sun ; but there is and can be no evil like that monstrous and earth-encompassing evil, which the Europeans have committed against the Aborigines of every country in which they have settled. And in what country have they not settled ? It is often said as a very pretty speech—that the sun never sets on the dominions of our youthful Queen ; but who dares to tell us the far more horrible truth, that it never sets on the scenes of our injustice and oppressions ! . . . The slave-trade which one of our best informed philanthropists asserts is going on at this moment to the amount of 170,000 negroes a-year, is indeed the dreadful climax of our crimes against humanity. It was not enough that the lands of all newly discovered regions were seized on by fraud or violence ; it was not enough that their rightful inhabitants were murdered or enslaved ; that the odious vices of people styling themselves the followers of the purest of beings, should be poured like a pestilence into these new countries. It was not enough that millions on millions of peaceful beings were exterminated by fire, by sword, by heavy burdens, by base violence, by deleterious mines and unaccustomed severities—by dogs, by man-hunters, and by grief and despair—there yet wanted one crowning crime to place the deeds of Europeans beyond all rivalry in the cause of evil—and that unapproachable abomination was found in the slave-trade.

The mysteries of God's endurance, and of European audacity and hypocrisy are equally marvellous. Why, the very track across the deep seems to me blackened by this abominable traffic—there must be the dye of blood in the very ocean. One might surely trace these monsters by the smell of death, from their kidnapping haunts to the very sugar-mills of the west, where canes and human flesh are ground together. The ghosts of murdered millions were enough, one thinks, to lead the way without chart or compass ! The very bed of the ocean must be paved with bones ! and the accursed trade is still going on ! We are still strutting about in the borrowed plumes of Christianity, and daring to call God our father, though we are become the tormentors of the human race from China to Peru, and from one pole to the other.

The whole history of European colonization is of a piece. It is with grief and indignation, that, passing before my own mind the successive conquests and colonies of the Europeans amongst the native tribes of newly-discovered countries, I look in vain for a single instance of a nation styling itself Christian and civilized, acting towards a nation which it is pleased to term barbarous with Christian honesty and common feeling. The only opportunity which the aboriginal tribes have had of seeing Christianity in its real form and nature, has been from William Penn and the missionaries. But both Penn and the missionaries have, in every instance, found their efforts neutralized, and their hopes of permanent good to their fellow-creatures blasted, by the profligacy and the unprincipled rapacity of the Europeans as a race. Never was there a race at once so egotistical and so terrible !

*Spencer's Travels in the Western Caucasus ; including a Tour through Imeritia, Mingrelia, Turkey, Moldavia, Galicia, Silesia, and Moravia.

IN the continuation of Captain Spencer's travels, though they display favourably the copious and solid information and excellent understanding of the traveller, we miss the romance and charm of his earlier wanderings over the fresh soil of Circassia, whose rocky fastnesses—the refuge of the mountain nymph, sweet Liberty—he first threw open to admiring Europe. The first portion of the present volumes is devoted to the conclusion of his travels in the Western Caucasus. The traveller labours to prove that the friendship of Circassia—an independent state, threatened to be engulfed by the insatiable rapacity of Russia—might be of great advantage to England in a commercial point of view. Heartily sympathizing with the brave Circassians in their struggle to preserve national independence, we may confess that these promised advantages are not yet apparent, although Great Britain were not bound over to keep the peace with all the world, in a penalty of nine hundred millions. Mr Spencer speculates very rationally upon the internal condition and the prospects of Turkey. He gives that power up to destruction without much regret, and only laments that it should be from Russia and not England that she is destined to receive the elements of a higher civilization. He is unwilling to admit that this must be so. He deprecates the supine policy by which the statesmen of France, England, and Austria tacitly sanction the long-fostered ambitious designs of the Cabinet of St Petersburg, new near the accomplishment of the conquest of Circassia—a possession which he believes will at once ensure to Russia the real sovereignty of Persia and Turkey ; when, Colossus-like, with one foot planted in Europe and the other in Asia, she will dictate laws to the commerce of all the European powers, and command in their councils. The traveller does not sufficiently advert to the delicate nature of commerce. It may be fettered or alienated ; but to dictate its mode and channels is to destroy. The goose which lays the golden eggs can easily be killed ; but, if the wiser course be taken, the time and manner of producing its dropping contributions must be left to Nature. In reference to the rapacious greed of Russia for new conquests, and her consequent unprincipled policy, the traveller refers to the Lord Dictator of the Canadas. " Turkey had no clever ambassadors to cajole and deceive, no accomplished princesses to send intriguing from court to court, no brilliant crosses and jewelled orders to bestow on those who could advance her interest and aid her measures. . . . She was an alien among the nations, a prize to be divided among those whose cupidity might blind them to their future interest, in assisting in her spoliation. It is not so with Russia : that pretended supporter of thrones, may plunder, slay, imprison, confiscate, beard, and insult with impunity. Even in our own country, do we not see, with regret and astonishment, the representative of the freest nation in the world, the recognised chief of the liberal party, [Lord Durham, namely,] publicly lauding the acts and policy of a sovereign, who, however amiable he might be in private life, in his character of chief of the Russian empire, is compelled, &c. &c. The same courtly flattery that won our representative at St Petersburg seems to have travelled to our own land." There is but one opinion of the influence of Muscovite blandishments on the susceptible nature of Canning's peer; who, were he indeed, as he is not, "the recognised chief of the liberal party," would prove it to be in a more deplorable condition than we had surmised.

We regret to remark a discrepancy in the writer's opinions of the probability of the Circassians successfully resisting their invaders. At one time he boasts of their courage, their union, their glowing patriotism, and the impregnable nature of their country; but, at other times, we discern a tacit admission, that, however high the price of conquest to Russia in men and money, corruption and crime, it must ultimately be effected. The farther residence of the traveller among the Circassians, has not enabled him to add much to his former engaging details of their manners and condition; but whatever new information is obtained, confirms the previous favourable impression of this brave, manly, and primitive race, who display all those heroic virtues which would seem inherent in mountaineers.

The account of the different warlike and hospitable tribes of the Caucasus, among whom the traveller rambled, after leaving Circassia, is exceedingly interesting and amusing. From the clans inhabiting the western Circassian range, he passed into Imeritia, still in his assumed character of Hakim. Of Imeritia, Mingrelia, and Gourial, besides the traveller's personal narrative, there is an historical and a descriptive sketch. The plague was raging when he reached the Turkish dominions, and its aspects and ravages in Constantinople are graphically described. Plague is regarded by this traveller as an exceedingly malignant form of typhus; and certainly contagious, though many individuals are contagion proof. A melancholy chapter is devoted to the impending fate of Turkey.

Back again in Europe, but travelling through provinces internally little more known than the fastnesses of the Caucasus, the narrative moves at a brisker pace, and is both lively and entertaining. The traveller has a quick eye for the picturesque, and shows much taste in grouping his natives. The travels conclude at Vienna, in which capital, according to Mr Spencer, pungent epigrams now mitigate the despotism of the government; so that the Austrian constitution resembles that of France before the Revolution.

Travels in Palestine and Syria. By George Robinson, Esq.

This gentleman made a tour to Spain and Italy, some years ago, without meaning to go farther; but, once set adrift—by the temptation, and under the impulse which every one has experienced on some scale—he extended his travels; and the result is a work in two comprehensive volumes. After all that has been published on the same subject by recent travellers, his full, sensible, unpretending narrative will be duly appreciated by those who, in a book of travels, look rather for copious and minute information, conveyed in a plain and simple style, than poetical flights and learned disquisitions. His senses of hearing and seeing, his faculty of noting and remembering, have not been the fools of his imagination. He has produced a good book.

Six Years in the Bush; or, Extracts from the Journal of a Settler in Upper Canada.

Works of this kind are daily increasing in importance; and this plain volume is one of the most valuable

of its kind that we have seen. The author had graduated at Oxford with a view to entering upon one of the learned professions. He probably saw that they were already overstocked; and a strong desire seized him to try his fortune in Upper Canada. Thither he carried some capital, and many admirable pre-requisites to ensure success—good sense, clear-headedness, coolness, steadiness, perseverance, industry, self-denial, and hopefulness. To every young man the like success might be assured, were he possessed of the same qualities. He entered Upper Canada, via New York, in the summer of 1832. He spent several months in travelling and looking about him; and, early in 1833, completed the purchase of 3000 acres of wild forest land in Verulam township, for a dollar per acre, or £750 provincial currency; paying down one-fourth, the remainder to be paid in four equal instalments. Like the prudent man he is, he immediately left the expensive capital of Toronto, and repaired with all his effects on a sleigh to his estate, attended by his wolf-dog and one or two wood-cutters. His territory, part of which had been formerly possessed by a colony of beavers, and round which broken Indian tribes still hovered, was not reached without danger and difficulty, owing to the state of the road, or rather the want of anything like a road. Part of the progress was by water. Next morning, the new proprietor, who had slept, we presume, on the bosom of his mother earth, was up with the sun, to view his estate and fix on a site for his future abode. He says—

A beautiful lake, emptying its surplus waters over a ledge of limestone rock, into a broad river below, formed the boundary of the property in length; and in breadth it extended a considerable way into the forest, interspersed occasionally with broad meadows; the real lawns, or "saltus," as we used to be taught at school, of the ancient poets—

"Where the wild flock that never needs a fold"

were accustomed to take their pasture, and the scarce less wild Indian to pitch his summer camp, and breathe unconfined the pure air of heaven. These lawns or openings, in the otherwise changeless forest, are the workmanship of the beaver tribe; traces of whose ancient consequence are everywhere common, and not a little grateful to the eye in a land where all else is new.

One of these meadows on my property is upwards of 100 acres in extent, and will furnish an ample supply of hay for winter consumption. The land lay chiefly on a gentle slope, rising gradually from the lake shore; and timbered with pine and hemlock below, and oak and bass above. The lake, with the fall and river, formed a beautiful prospect; and I determined to pitch my first tent in the wilderness, so as to command a view of them. Meanwhile, I wandered on, forming plans for the future, and peeping the solitudes around me in my mind's eye, until the lengthening shades of evening warned me to rejoin my companions. A clear tall column of smoke, rising above the trees, marked their position; and a haunch of venison, bought of an Indian, as usual, which I found roasting at the fire, proved a welcome finish to the labours of the day. In the morning, after pointing out to the men the site I had fixed on for the erection of a shanty, and measuring a lot for them to commence felling upon, I took leave of my estate for the present, and getting into the boat, made the best of my way back to Peterboro', to superintend the removal of my effects.

April 17.—Having laid in a good store of axes and other necessities for the use of the men, I returned to the settlement. The sun was shining brightly on the lake as I crossed, and a number of Indian canoes gave it a very pretty and animated appearance. One of the squaws offered me some maple sugar for sale, which I purchased at about 4d. per lb., and had the satisfaction of hearing it pronounced by my men to be of an excellent quality. As I approached the settlement, the heavy fall of the axe gave notice that the work of demolition was going forward; several hemlock and other soft-wooded trees lay stretched along the shore; and I confess it was with a somewhat English feeling of sorrow for their fate that I stepped out amongst them. A glance at the Falls, however, and the clear blue lake beyond, through the opening, reassured me, and I soon entered into the exultant feelings of the shoppers, as one after another the noblest among these ancient lords of the soil groaned under the stroke of the axe, trembled for a few seconds, and fell.

28.—This evening I visited Cameron's Falls, (taking with me one of the woodmen,) a grand and most romantic cascade, by which the surplus waters of Lake Fenelon are discharged over a broad shelf of limestone rock, into a deep gulf fifty feet below; on either side, the shore was fringed with dwarf oaks, and covered with flowers and herbage, rendered more brilliant by ever-raising clouds of spray; above sloped a lofty hill, crowned with pines of giant growth, from the summit of which I beheld the broad expanse of the glassy lake, then lit by the evening sunbeams, and contrasting beautifully with the deep shade in which the mass of forest lay buried. I loitered on this lovely spot, probably the first white man of higher rank than a wood-chopper who had ever visited it, until the moon was risen, and then, rejoining my companion, who had busied himself with preparing torches of the birch bark for fish spearing, we re-embarked, and floated lazily down Lake Sturgeon, towards our clearing. Having lighted a torch and fastened it to the prow of the canoe, I posted myself there with a fish spear in my hand, while the woodman directed our progress and steadied the boat; the strong light threw a glare on the water, under which it was easy to distinguish the dark forms of the fish, as they rose to the light. I was a novice in the art of spearing; but, nevertheless, succeeded in capturing several fine maskalongy and bass. It was past two o'clock in the morning before we landed; but the fire was blazing cheerfully, and, wrapping myself in a blanket, I was soon asleep by the side of my choppers, who were all stretched before it.

The next few days were occupied in building a shanty, or rude hut, which an appearance of change in the weather seemed to render advisable. The month of May set in cold and wet; but I was obliged to go to Peterboro' to lay in fresh stores. The voyage was altogether miserable; and, in addition, I had the vexation to discover that my new boat was good for nothing: on returning, however, it was a great satisfaction to find my mansion finished, and ready for occupation. It consisted of one apartment fourteen feet by twelve feet in the clear, and contained, in the way of furniture, a camp bedstead, a chest of drawers, and a well-filled bookcase; it had also the somewhat unusual luxury of a chimney, pegs for the suspension of guns and fishing implements, and shelves for my scanty kitchen utensils: a hole in the planks served to admit light, and air found free entrance through numberless cracks and crevices; such as it was, however, it served my purpose well; and when the evening closed, I used to light my lamp and sit down to my books with a great feeling of comfort.

After lauding the advantages and delights of literary taste to the solitary man, the student, turned bushman, declares—

Such was my situation within doors—comfortless enough it may be thought—but when on a fine evening I sat at the open door or window, many admirers of nature might almost envy my lot. Placed on a gentle slope, crowned with a luxuriant growth of sugar maple, the house faces the broad expanse of the lake, just where it discharges its surplus waters over a ledge of limestone rock into a rapid river or torrent, which hurries them along to the sister lake below. On the bank are scattered huge masses of stone, covered with lichens, and fantastically wreathed with creepers and wild briars, while the stream itself is broken by a little group of islands, carpeted with spring flowers, and dwarf oak and bass, whose foliage affords an exquisite relief to the white foam occasioned by the fall of the waters. On the opposite bank rises a dark grove of pine, (unquestionably the queen of our forest trees,) which forms a natural and appropriate frame for the picture.

We have been so much pleased with the sylvan freshness of this Crusoe-like narrative, that we are tempted to transfer another portion of it to our pages.

May 25.—On calculating the price of my house, I found it to be (including the chimney) about $26.

26.—This morning I was surprised by a visit from two young Englishmen, who were going to explore the country; but the accommodations I had to offer were so little to their taste, that they took flight at the prospect before them, and determined to make the best of their way back to Toronto.

27. Sunday.—I crossed the lake to visit an English gentleman and lady, recently settled in the Bush, who had invited me to join their family worship on the Sabbath: the gentlemen read the service of the church and a sermon, and the day was passed (as were many succeeding Sundays) very satisfactorily in their society.

28.—Having observed a little fleet of canoes on the lake, I went out, and bargained with an Indian for one for a couple of dollars. The canoe is made of the bark of the birch tree, lined with thin cedar laths, sewn together with fibres drawn from the root of the tamarack, or larch. The length of my purchase was about fourteen feet, and it was so light that I could easily draw it from the water, and carry it on my back past rapids or other impediments in the river; while, at the same time, its buoyancy was so great, that I have crossed the lake on a stormy day with the carcasses of a couple of deer in it.

June 1.—Made a first essay of my canoe in a voyage to Peterboro': the wind being fair, I fastened a blanket to a pole and swept gaily across the lake: my return, however, was less propitious; and, after some hours buffeting against a headwind, I was obliged to go on shore, and trespass on the hospitality of an old rough settler, who lived in a small log house by the water side, surrounded with a growing family of half-Indian children. The two eldest were handsome, well-shaped girls, of sixteen or seventeen; these prepared the evening meal, while the old man related anecdotes of his early days in the wilds, and of the Indians with whom alone he used to associate. They were then unconverted, and had learned nothing from the white man, but to engraft his vices on their own; he described them as fierce, easily offended, implacable, addicted to drinking, even to madness, and capable, under its effects, of the most horrid excesses—even the murder of their wives and children. Thanks, however, to the missionaries, these poor men are now actuated by Christian principles; and are, for the most part, as mild and gentle, and patient of injury, as they formerly were the reverse. Our supper consisted of fried slices of venison, and wild duck stewed with potatoes; when it was concluded, my host pointed me out a corner, and then wrapping himself in his blanket, as did his children, we all disposed ourselves to sleep. On awaking with the first gleam of light, I found my pretty cooks already stirring, and busied in preparing breakfast; after which I took my leave of my host, and smiling farewell to his daughters, who could not utter one word of English, returned to my canoe.

The morning was very wet and chilly, and the wind in my teeth, so that I was nearly starved with hunger and cold before I reached my own clearing. Dry clothes and a good luncheon revived me, and I had just taken down a book, when I saw a noble buck crossing the lake, in front of my window. To seize a rifle and jump into the canoe was scarcely a minute's work; but long before I could get within shot, I had the mortification to see him reach the opposite shore, shake the water from his flanks, and trot majestically away. On returning, however, I was more fortunate, for I fell in with a bear, following on the same track; and, after some exertion, succeeded in placing my canoe in a position to enable me to send a ball through his head: this was a great feat, and very serviceable; for his skin was as welcome an addition to my wardrobe as the carcass to my larder.

15.—Purchased a mill seat, and went to Peterboro' to pick up information about it, and to hire labourers; on returning, with four men, in my canoe, we were all nearly swamped in the middle of Pigeon Lake, an event which I looked upon as a warning not to tempt Providence in future.

16.—My men having now chopped down a considerable quantity of trees, I help them to log—that is, to draw them together in lengths for burning. It is a most dirty and disagreeable business, and especially in wet weather; but, as it requires great strength both of men and oxen, all hands are put in requisition. I assisted at this work for some days, but a dip in the clear lake at sunset removed all external impurities; and when I sat down to my supper and book at the close of the day, I felt myself again a gentleman.

18.—Engaged in setting potatoes among the stumps, and fencing them against the incursions of strangers, whether human or savage.

19.—Crossed the lake to assist my opposite neighbour in looking for a stray yoke of oxen. These animals are suffered to roam at will through the forest, which affords them excellent pasture in summer, and soon fattens them, provided they are supplied with salt, for which they will generally return to their owner's clearing with the greatest regularity.

The settler was now becoming a man of consequence in his district. He was "of the quorum and rotulorum." He laid out a garden, and (all with his own hands) sowed seeds of melons, cucumbers, lettuce, &c. &c., and planted out potatoes, cabbages, and broccoli. It was now July, and the weather oppressively hot in the middle of the day, but cool in the mornings and evenings.

July 10.—My days were passed in the following manner:—I rose early, and worked in the garden until breakfast, then read for a couple of hours; afterwards chopped firewood in the shade until three o'clock, when I dined, and resumed my studies for an hour: the next two hours were passed with the woodmen in overlooking their work, and at six o'clock I took tea, and afterwards floated about the lake in my canoe, with or without a gun, until nine or ten o'clock, when I retired to bed, and slept most soundly: my health was very good, my spirits even, and I was well satisfied with my condition.

18.—The mosquitoes and black flies began to be excessively troublesome.

19.—A tremendous storm of thunder and lightning: several large trees were struck on the edge of my clearing; and the crash of shattered limbs in the forest was very appalling. The storm lasted six hours.

20.—The air much cooled and very pleasant. Some Indians crossed the lake in their canoes, one of whom brought me half a buck; I am now become acquainted with these aboriginals, and mutual attentions and civilities pass on both sides: they are honest and civil, and always ready to do me any service. On one point alone, that of hunting furs, they are said to be as tenacious as English landholders of their game.

Like Robinson Crusoe, he lost a day. In crossing the lake on Sunday to join the service of his neighbour in the opposite clearing, he found it was Monday!

August 20.—Went to Peterboro', where a rapid improvement had taken place during the summer; new houses had been built, new shops opened, and a large influx of inhabitants had arrived. I had been so many weeks absent, that I had forgotten to change my half-Indian costume before I left the woods, consequently my old acquaintance recognised me with difficulty, and especially as the sun had sadly changed my complexion; even the boys in the street hooted as I passed.

26.—Having now been some days alone, I began to look anxiously for the return of my men; about noon, four travellers arrived from Peterboro'; they were new to the Bush, and stared when I requested them to help me to prepare for their entertainment, but they soon entered into the spirit of the thing, and, as in the good old patriarchal days, one baked, another attended to the roast, while a third prepared the vegetables. In due time, I set before them a repast of the usual forest fare—fish, fowl, and venison—which my guests pronounced sumptuous, and enjoyed not the less on account of its novelty.

So passed the early part of the settler's sojourn in the wilderness. But new settlers were arriving; a site was fixed upon for a village; and, though his first Christmas day on his estate seemed very dreary and un-Christmas-like, the recollection of his many advantages and good prospects reconciled the settler to his lot. Clearing twenty acres, building a log-house, a root-house, a cellar, and a barn, purchasing a yoke of oxen and a cow, seeds of different kinds, and some furniture, cost him in all £212: 5s. But he soon saw that farming was not the most direct way to wealth, though "with a capital producing from sixty to a hundred pounds a year, independent of the farm, a gentleman of education and active business-like habits may live very comfortably;" "but, on the whole, the emigrant of this description ought not to go to Canada with the expectation of obtaining more than a comfortable independence." In the subsequent years, the settler, who is evidently a clear-headed, cautiously enterprising person, bought several pieces of wild land on speculation, let his farm and homestead to a respectable tenant, invested part of his capital in a saw-mill near the Rapids, and built there a new shanty.

July 3, 1834.—All the timbers having been pronounced ready to "fix" in their places, a "bee," or gathering of all the neighbours was summoned to raise the mill; they assembled in great force, and all worked together in great harmony and good will, notwithstanding their different stations in life. When the last rafter was fixed, a bottle of whisky was broken on the top, and sundry others having been distributed among the humbler members of the hive, the party separated, well satisfied with their day's work. The completion of the saw-mill was an event of vast interest to all the inhabitants of the settlement, who looked to exchange their rude shanties in a little time for neat frame houses.

A few days afterwards, the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir John Colborne, honoured him with a visit, which—

Put the whole settlement in a fever of loyalty and preparation. At the appointed time he arrived, and, after surveying the public works, and making himself acquainted with the condition and prospects of the settlement, assisted at my first dinner party in the Backwoods. There was a noble maskalony,* supported by the choice parts of a couple of bucks; then, for extremes, we had beaver tails, (a rare delicacy,) partridges, wild fowl, and squirrels. My garden supplied the dessert, which consisted of melons, raised from English seed, but far exceeding their parent stock in size and flavour, plums, strawberries, and apples; there were grapes, too, rich in hue and beautiful in appearance, but, unhappily, tasteless to the palate as the fabled fruit of the Dead Sea shore. The high-bush cranberry, by far the most delicate and admired of all our native fruits, was not yet ripe, but his Excellency was pleased highly to extol the entertainment, and to declare himself well satisfied with his reception. After dinner, he christened our infant village "Rokeby," a name which may one day make a figure, perhaps, on the charts of the Province.

The saw-mill being completed, a yard was formed and filled with logs, and Buck and Bright the twin oxen laboured in a new vocation, drawing logs. In addition to the saw-mill, as there was a constant influx of settlers requiring provisions, until they could raise their own, the sensible Oxford student laid in a store of flour and pork, which proved useful to his new neighbours, and profitable to himself; and in Canada, as in the United States, a gentleman may keep a store or shop without derogation of his dignity. The 8th of April 1835 was the fourth anniversary of his departure from England; and on that day the saw-mill, rendered idle by the frost, began to work afresh, to the general joy of the settlers, who were all in want of planks. The payment was in kind; half the planks being left for turning the logs brought to the mill into that form, or into deals. A saw-mill is the germ of a new settlement in the Bush.

At first, some one or two adventurers, possessed of a little capital, purchased a few acres of land on the bank of a river or stream, where, in the provincial idiom, there is good water power: two or three rude huts or shanties are erected, and a small clearing made in the forest; by degrees, others are attracted to the spot. The original settler, meanwhile, has turned a little money, and embarks it in a saw-mill; this induces many to come into the neighbourhood, from the facility its offers for building. Then, as the settlement increases, some bold man is persuaded to erect a grist or flour mill, which again serves as an attraction; a growing population requires the necessities of life at hand; stores are opened, a tavern licensed, and, in a few years, a thriving village, or, as in the case of Peterboro', an important town, springs up in the heart of the forest.

The settler, who had hitherto enjoyed excellent health, was this spring attacked with fever and ague, and obliged to remove to Peterboro' for medical assistance.

On returning (he says) I found the saw-mill working away in great force: on an average it cut daily full 2000

* The Indian name of a fine fish found in the lakes.

est of planks, which I obtained a ready sale for at 30s. a thousand feet. As it may be interesting to future emigrants, I will state the expenses and returns of the mill per day:—

Six logs, which cut 2000 feet, . . .	£0 15 0
One sawyer,	0 5 0
One labourer,	0 2 6

£1 2 6

Returns, 2000 feet at 30s. per 1000, . . .	£3 0 0
Cost, as before stated,	1 2 6

Profit, £1 17 6

This was in itself a very satisfactory return for the outlay expended upon the erection of the mill; but I had become so well acquainted with its management, that I could relieve the sawyer very often, and so work it beyond the usual hours, to my considerable advantage.

A neighbour offered to exchange a useful milch cow for 3000 feet of lumber, which I readily acceded to, and thought myself a gainer by the transaction. Having little else to do at this season, I took my turn at the mill regularly, until the yard was cleared out, and all the logs of the neighbours sawn up. The principal demand was for deals, though several oak, elm, and cedar logs, were cut up for furniture, and other domestic purposes.

This man must have thriven anywhere. In August he dispatched several rafts down the lake to market. In the following spring, the Bachelors of the new settlement gave a splendid ball at Peterboro'. A church was opened, and the infant members of the colony christened. There were also sundry "bees," such as "logging bees," "fixing bees," and "house-warming bees," where the favourite toast was, "British connexion and Sir John Colborne." Our settler has strong and decided Tory predilections, with which, however, we have no desire to quarrel. He seems to regret exceedingly that Sir J. Colborne was superseded by Sir Francis Head, in which he is not singular. In the fall of last year, the saw-mill being laid up for the season, its owner resolved to pass a few months with his friends in England. He travelled from Peterboro' to Albany for £2:15, and from thence to Liverpool by New York for £31:2:6. Many inquiries were made about his adventures, and he found the easiest way of gratifying a very reasonable curiosity, was to publish his journal. We need not recommend it. Those who have read our extracts will know its value. The author has long since gone back to the home of his adoption.

Southey's Collected Poems.

The ninth volume is completely filled with "Roderick, the Last of the Goths," and the copious notes of the learned author. This epic—notwithstanding an early penchant for the wild imagination and true nobility of "Thalaba," the heroic and lofty moral ardour of the pervading tone of "Joan d'Arc," and the lovely, primitive simplicity and sweetness of much of "Madoc"—we have ever felt as the first of Southey's sustained poetical efforts. Nor—notwithstanding Mr Jeffrey's unfavourable opinion, so innocently revealed by Hogg, in a letter of his printed by Mr Southey, in the preface to the volume—are we inclined to retract. The Shepherd, who had shortly before returned from a visit to Southey at Greta Hall, kindly wished to review the poem himself, and, it would seem, had even delicately proposed the thing to Mr Jeffrey, who replied—"For Southey I have, as well as you, great respect, and, when he will let me, great admiration; but he is a most provoking fellow, and, at least, as conceited as Wordsworth. I cannot just trust you with his 'Roderick,'" &c. Hogg afterwards discussed the subject with Jeffrey, who still found the poem heavy, although Mr Alison joined the Shepherd in upholding its merits. But the great northern critic had his vulnerable points. The Shepherd continues, in his epistle to the doubtless highly-diverted author of the poem:—"There was, at the same time, a Lady M—— joined us at the instant. Short as her remark was, it seemed to make more impression on Jeffrey than all our arguments:—'Oh, I do love Southey!' That was all." The pastoral innocence of what follows beats everything:—"I have no room to tell you more, but I beg that you will not do anything, nor publish anything, that will nettle Jeffrey for the present, knowing as you do how omnipotent he is with the fashionable world, and seemingly so well disposed towards you." The Shepherd seems himself to have deeply participated in that mysterious dread of the animal critic-monster which appears to us much akin to the fascination of the witches of old over their terror-struck and abject victims—a power which the critics, like the beldams, well knew how to enhance, and maliciously enjoy. Mr Southey remarks:—"The reader will be as much amused as I was with poor Hogg's earnest desire that I would not say anything which might tend to frustrate his friendly intentions.

'But what success the Shepherd met,
Is to the world a secret yet.'

There can be no reason, however, for withholding what was said, in my reply, of the crushing review which had been given to Wordsworth's great poem—'He crush 'The Excursion!' Tell him he might as easily crush Skiddaw.'" There was a time when, in the Parliament House, this would have been held flat blasphemy.

Edinburgh Cabinet Novels—The Medicaster.

The book with this mystical name is the First Part of an intended series of popular romances, which are to be published quarterly, and at a cheap rate—that is to say, relatively very cheap, for there are really cheaper publications. This part consists of a romance, the scene of which is laid in Scotland; and which, from incident, character, and description, we think exceedingly well suited to the taste particularly of juvenile novel-readers. It displays both natural ability and literary accomplishment of no mean order.

The Pedestrian's Guide through North Wales.

This is the lively and good-humoured narrative of a pedestrian tour, performed last year by Mr Bennett, which may while away an hour very agreeably to any one, and prove of considerable use to lounging travellers, bound on the same quests, over the same ground. The volume is illustrated by etchings of some of the more remarkable or picturesque scenes in the principality; and is throughout gossipy and pleasant. The pedestrian has picked up a great many Welsh traditions, fairy tales, and also stray tunes, which he has introduced into his book with good effect.

Railroadiana. A New History of England.

Railroad Guides, Railroad Directors, Maps of Railroads, &c. &c., are coming forth thick as the leaves in Valombrosa. One in which Mr Roscoe is concerned has unaccountably disappeared through our table; so we can, for the present, say nothing more about it, save that the preliminaries were somewhat lengthy, but promised to lead to something. Railroadiana is a description of the places and scenery through which the Railway between London and Birmingham proceeds, with a competent share of make-bulk in stories, anecdotes, and local traditions. It is furnished with a neat little coloured map, which it carries conveniently in its own pocket. A plain, accurate itinerary—if such a thing be practicable in the new era—would, we confess, have better met our ideas of a public want, than so much ancient lore and modern history. But the two are not incompatible.

The Natural History, Physiology, and Management of the Honey-Bee, by Dr Edward Bevan, is appropriately inscribed to VICTORIA, the Queen of the British hive, as is Christiana or rather Isabella of that of Spain, Donna Maria of that of Portugal, and Queen Pomare of the hive of Otaheite. The human hive of Madagascar also, we believe, enjoys a Queen at present; and how many more female sovereigns there may be, we cannot pretend to say, though it is certain that so many hives, governed by Queens, the world never before saw. Dr Bevan tells our British queen-bee, that the genius queen of the hive-bees is ever to be found in the enjoyment of the attachment of her people; ever most pleased when they have the fullest portion of remunerating occupation; that she is ever capable of rousing their most active energies for the promotion of the general weal, and of inducing them to flock round her person when the general weal is endangered. Dr Bevan should have mentioned that the workers are particularly attached to the queen. On the subject of bees, Dr Bevan is, we dare say, a very competent authority; and we are certain that his is an ample and comprehensive treatise, upon which, however, although it be written in a quite popular style, we do not feel qualified to pronounce.

Parlour Magic.

This is a description of entertaining and ingenious experiments of natural science—together with sleight-of-hand tricks, and tricks with cards, intended for the amusement of young persons by the winter's hearth or in a wet day, and which is well calculated to excite and exercise rational curiosity. We cannot pretend to admire a few of the sleights and subtleties, which are puerile enough, and a little pert withal in their wit; but we have no doubt, that "To bring a person down upon a feather," and "Go if you can," will produce roars of laughter, and be thought vastly clever. Then, why, in this dull world, quarrel with harmless mirth?

Campbell's Edition of Shakspeare.

Moxon has just published a complete edition of SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS, in one volume, which the reader may guess is not of the Slender family. By the aid of double columns, and a sharp, clear, open-faced type, the letterpress is, however, comfortably legible. A glossary and well-arranged index are added. But the distinguishing feature of the edition—its Falstaff girth and proportions apart—is the "Remarks on the Life and Writings" of the Great Dramatist, by Campbell the poet. Mr Campbell has told all that is already known, or that he has discovered and conjectured about the personal history of Shakspeare, in the racy and facetious style which forms a refreshing contrast to the solemnities of ordinary grave and pompous commentators. The conjectures about the Life are followed by remarks on the state of the stage in Shakspeare's days; and on each of his dramas, in the supposed order of their appearance. These remarks are necessarily brief, but they are pithy in proportion; "lively, audible, and full of vent." We are particularly delighted with the few observations on the "Midsommer's Night's Dream," "Cymbeline," and "Measure for Measure." In his strictures on the latter play, Hazlitt, the finest commentator on Shakspeare, made woful error—an error instinct with low feeling—

"That could six or seven winters more respect
Than a perpetual honour."

The plays are arranged in this volume, as in other editions, upon no principle that we can understand. It commences with the play supposed to be latest written, "The Tempest," and ends with "Hamlet."

The Wisdom and Genius of Shakspeare.

By the Rev. Thomas Price.

Most apropos to the unique single volume Edition of Shakspeare's Dramas, comes forth this neat small tome of Shaksperian essences and quintessences, which may either be viewed as an appendage or an abridgement. It is an Index of the best sort. First, we have about 130 pages of the philosophy of the Great Dramatist; which, well versed as we supposed ourselves in Shakspeare's works, present, in detached passages and sentences, a body of morals and ethics which surprise as much as they delight. It is like stumbling upon a new Shaksperian vein. Noble characters, ordinary characters, and depraved characters, are each classed; and then we have the exquisitely poetical passages arranged under the head Painting of Nature and the Passions. The pithy aphorisms, the homely wisdom, in which Shakspeare abounds, condensed into short single sentences, are arranged, perhaps, in better order than they could have been under the division Moral Philosophy to which many of them belong; and whatever could not be easily classified, is thrown into a chapter of Miscellanies. The idea of the book is not original; but the compiler and publisher have both improved upon former Shaksperian selectors, and produced a cheap, neat book—Shakspeare "cut out in little stars"—worth its weight in gold to the English reader.

Letters on the Natural History of the Insects mentioned in Shakspeare's Plays.

A man of talent and fancy may make a charming book upon anything. The subject of "The Task" was an old sofa; Swift wrote well on a broomstick; Erasmus in praise of Folly; and an amateur, whom Rousseau mentions, composed a volume on the nest of the lichen. Mr R. Paterson of Belfast has elaborated an agreeable little volume on the subject above named. He is the treasurer of the Natural History Society of his own town, and was under the agreeable necessity of contriving something to amuse the ladies on the Public Nights. An ordinary treasurer might have lectured upon insects; but he elevated and refined his "shard-borne beetles," "motes that people the sunbeam," and "worms i' the bud," into poetical existences, Shaksperian insects. We are informed, at page 257, nor are we surprised to hear it, that "an Orange-coloured gnat" frequently proves very destructive in Ireland.

Treatise on the Physical Education of Young Ladies. By A. M. Bureaud Riofrey.

This is a second edition enlarged, of one of the best books of its kind, and one which is well entitled to the attention of mothers, governesses, and all intelligent women, to whom the care of female infancy and youth is confided. We admire the work for its moderation of tone and practical good sense. Dr Riofrey admires gymnastics and proper exercise, but he would not convert all our young ladies into Amazons or Spartan virgins. He condemns tight-lacing, as ungraceful and hurtful, and injurious to health; and yet admits of stays; he goes farther—"All stays that do not prevent free breathing, circulation, digestion, an easy movement, will meet with our approbation ; and we recommend the use of them to ladies noted for their elegance, as well as those remarkable for the negligence of their persons."

The Young Lady's Equestrian Manual.

The example of Queen Victoria has set all the ladies a scampering and galloping, and trying to take the whip-hand ; and here comes an elegant small manual for their instruction, containing many embellishments and illustrations of the exercise of horsemanship, which, under royal auspices, is becoming so fashionable.

Life of Dr Jenner, with Selections from his Correspondence, and Illustrations of his Doctrines.

By John Baron, M.D.

The Memoirs of this eminent benefactor of his species, are written by a gentleman of his own profession, with whom Jenner was many years on terms of the most friendly intimacy. They convey to the reader the impression of a thoroughly good and amiable man, with all those attributes of simplicity, humility, and unconsciousness, which, we may say, almost uniformly characterise the truly great man. We regret that our limits do not at present admit of a more extended notice of this interesting biography, especially as we fear it is too long for popular readers.

Several new theological works are lying upon our table, which we can merely name, leaving their merits to be discussed in the proper quarters, the religious Journals and Reviews. One is, THE THEOLOGY OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, which is extracted and translated from the German of Bauer. The original formed the text-book of the learned author's academical lectures.

FINE ARTS.

FISHER & SON have published a splendid edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress," with a Life of Bunyan by Mr JOSEPH CONDER, which places his character in a new, and, as we apprehend, the true light. Bunyan never was the low, coarse, abandoned profligate, which tradition and even favourable but uninquiring biographers have delighted to represent him, as if to magnify his subsequent triumphs. The edition is tastefully and elegantly embellished with numerous engravings by eminent artists, and is enriched by the best portrait of Bunyan that we have seen. More than the formal designs do we admire the little wood-cuts embellishing the initial letters. They are more in harmony with the spirit of a book, which will form one of the most desirable additions to the family library which has yet appeared—a book more than worthy of the pains and cost which the spirited publishers have bestowed upon it.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

PARLIAMENT.

PUBLIC attention has been absorbed by the spectacle of the Coronation, and, at any rate, the proceedings in Parliament always get dull and uninteresting at this season. They were, however, enlivened by a motion of Lord Brougham's, relative to the manner the war in Spain has been carried on by our Government. He insisted it was in violation of the law of nations, and that it had a direct tendency to involve us in war with the great Continental Powers. His Lordship contends that the instructions sent out to the British cruisers to prevent neutral ships landing arms for the Carlists, are illegal, as there is no efficient blockade of the coast of Spain. The Duke of Wellington, though he concurred with Lord Brougham, left the House without voting, about forty Tory peers accompanying him ; but the remainder voted with Lord Brougham ; and on the division, there appeared fifty-seven to fifty-seven ; but there being no casting vote in the Lords, the motion, which was for the production of papers, was lost. The Irish Poor-Law Bill has passed the Lords, by ninety-three to sixty-two. Most of the Irish Peers, and we suppose the whole landed interest, are hostile to the bill ; for the good reason, that it will take money out of their pockets. The Earl of Mountcashel predicts, that, as passive resistance is better understood in Ireland than anywhere else, the bill will be totally inoperative ; and there can be little doubt of the fulfilment of the prediction, if the landlords, Tories, established clergy, priests, and peasantry, along with O'Connell, are, as he asserts, to combine against it. Lord Brougham also opposed the bill, and read letters he had received from Ireland, corroborating the statement of O'Connell, that Ireland was never in a more dangerous state. He maintained the necessity of abolishing the office of Lord Lieutenant, to make the Union more complete, and of paying the Catholic clergy, who, he said, notwithstanding all their protestations, would, in a few months, take the money which was voted for them. In the Committee on the Irish Tithe Bill, Mr O'Connell moved that the £840,000 advanced to the Irish clergy and tithe proprietors, out of the million loan, should be remitted. The proposition was, of course, eagerly laid hold of by Lord Stanley, Sir Robert Peel, and the Irish members, and Sir Robert seemed to think that the remainder of the million, or rather half a million in addition to what has been already advanced, should be given to the recalcitrant tithe payers. In this way, the people of this country are made to pay other people's debts. As to any chance of getting back the £840,000, it is hopeless ; so that it is as well to take the credit of making the land-owners a present of it ; but we see no reason for giving them more money. The Irish Corporation Bill, which Lord Lyndhurst has truly taken the management of in the Lords, and has altered as he thought proper, will no doubt pass, and probably also the Irish Tithe Bill, so that it is to be hoped the time of Parliament will not be taken up so much next Session, as it has been this, with mutilating Irish measures.

SIR W. RAE'S SMALL DEBT BILL, the professed object of which was to raise the jurisdiction of the Justices from £5 to £8 : 6 : 8, has been thrown out, on the third reading, by sixty-three to forty-five. We are glad of this ; for the real object of the bill was to increase the political influence of the Justices, and to raise the emoluments of certain political retainers who hold the office of Justice of Peace Clerk. The Small-debt jurisdiction of the Justices has again and again been denounced as a nuisance by the Judges of the Court of Session ; and now that the Sheriffs have a similar jurisdiction, it ought to be abolished. The English Justices have no such jurisdiction, although it would be more useful in England than in Scotland. The only thing that at present brings any small-debt cases before the Justices is, that the fees of this court are somewhat less than those of the Sheriff small-debt court. Were the fees of both made the same, hardly a single case would be brought before the Justices ; for, even at present, the whole cases, in some counties, are taken before the Sheriff.

An incidental discussion, but carried on with sufficient heat on both sides, took place on the Corn-Laws, on Earl Fitzwilliam presenting a petition from Glasgow for their repeal. His Lordship stated it as his opinion, that when, by the operation of the seasons, or by any political or other cause, the price of grain was raised to its greatest height, the people would call for this code of protection (as it is called) to the agricultural interest being entirely swept away. That it would come to this, he had not the slightest doubt. Lord Fortman was convinced, when he looked at the state of the markets, that this question must come before the House in a substantive form next Session, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and interest. On a question from the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord Melbourne stated, that he had no intention of meddling with the existing Corn-Laws, nor would he ever introduce any system of Corn-Laws founded on a different principle from the present, unless a decided opinion on the subject was expressed by a large majority of the people. He then talked of the impossibility of a country flourishing under a system of fluctuation, and "begged distinctly to state, that it was not his intention to propose any immediate alterations in the present Corn-Laws."

ENGLAND.

CORN-LAWS.—The late discussion in Parliament on this subject will, we hope, put the public on their guard; for, if the price of corn continues to rise as it has done during the last three months, and the average has risen 3s. 4d. within these four weeks, the price will be so high that the duty on wheat will fall to 1s. a quarter. This is the case when the average is at or above 73s. If any alteration is made in the Corn-Laws, and a fixed duty is resorted to, it will require the utmost effort to get it lower than 36s. per quarter for wheat; for even Earl Fitzwilliam talked of a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem. That is, almost precisely, the rate at the moment we are writing, the average price of wheat being 65s. 6d. and the duty 21s. 8d. But there is a great fallacy in the present system of averages. We have it from the best authority that wheat, fit for making even tolerable bread, can never be bought at the average price in England; and hence we find that with the general average there at 65s. 6d., wheat has brought in the Scotch markets 78s. 6d. and 80s. a quarter. If the duty fell much lower than at present, it requires no great foresight to prophesy that the "Landed Interest"—that is, the 50,000 noblemen and gentlemen to whose whims (for we do not believe that even they have any interest to keep food dear) twenty-six millions of people are sacrificed—will be the first to move for a repeal of the present Corn-Laws. Only think of foreign grain coming in at one shilling of duty, the home price being only 73s., when the agriculturists have proved to demonstration (so they tell us) that it cannot be grown in this be-taxed and be-pensioner-ridden country under 80s. We agree with Earl Fitzwilliam in thinking that we cannot expect to have so many plentiful harvests as we have had during the last ten years. If, therefore, anything like 30 per cent. of an ad valorem duty is to be imposed, matters had much better continue as they are.

One word as to fluctuations, from which Lord Melbourne thinks the present law has saved us. In the four years preceding the passing of the present law, the highest annual average price of wheat was 68s. 7d., the lowest 58s. 9d.—difference 9s. 10d. But in 1829, the year after the bill, the annual average was 66s. 8d.; in 1833, it was 62s. 11d.; in 1834, 46s. 2d.; in 1835, 39s. 4d.—difference 26s. 11d. On 25th December 1835, the general average was 36s.; in the first week of July 1836, 68s. 6d.—difference 29s. 6d. and before the next crop is reaped, the price will, we doubt not, be double what it was three years ago. The Premier calls the system which acts in this manner, one which prevents fluctuation!

A constantly reiterated argument against free trade in corn, is, that it would drive much of the inferior soils out of cultivation; but in answer, we repeat the question—Why, if a fall from 120s. at the end of the war, to 36s. in 1835, had not that effect, how is a fall of 6s. or 8s. to produce such a consequence? But Lord Melbourne tells us it works well for the interests of all parties. The evidence of this position we desiderate. The Corn-Laws, it is pretended, are necessary for the protection of the farmers. When were the farmers in a more wretched predicament than they have been since 1815, or were since 1828? When have their complaints been louder or more frequent? When have we had so many Committees, abortive as their labours have proved, on Agricultural Distress? Have the other classes—that is, the three-fourths of the population—ever expressed any other sentiment than that of detestation of a code of laws which we are told enriches the country by starving the people? We warn the landed interest to beware. Their short-sighted and self-interested policy is bringing serious danger around them. Let them take care how they raise discussions as to the nature of property in land. Let them look to their title-deeds, and consider what right their predecessors had to divide the whole land of the kingdom among the five hundred thousand part of the population, and reflect that the right to their estates rests upon no other title than prescription—a doctrine which, if one Parliament could make statute law, another unquestionably may repeal.

THE REVENUE.—The state of the Revenue is alarming. Comparing the year ending 5th July 1837, with that ending 5th July 1838, the deficiency in the produce of the taxes is no less than £1,331,208. On the customs the decrease is half a million; on the excise, three quarters of a million; on stamps, £76,791. We suspect it will puzzle the Chancellor of the Exchequer to find the ways and means, if the public expenditure is to be carried on at its present rate. The necessity of getting rid of some of our colonies will soon be seen.

EMIGRATION.—NEW ZEALAND.—The recent events in Canada, the disturbed state of the country, and the great probability of another outbreak, and of a war with the United States, have effectually checked emigration to that quarter. The favourite country for emigration at present is Australia. The accounts from that country are certainly very favourable, and the success of the new colony in South Australia is unprecedented. Without the least assistance from Government, and without a ship of war, or a single soldier, nearly 4000 people have been transported across the half of the globe, and placed in circumstances of present plenty and comfort, with the prospect of speedy future independence. In accomplishing this object, a debt of £60,000 has been incurred; but the colonial revenue is estimated at £5000 a year, and the proceeds from the sale of land this year will probably amount to £50,000. After payment of the debt, the price of the land is to be employed for encouraging emigration; so that the colony must rapidly increase. It appears, from a report recently made to the South Australian Company, and although this is only the second year of the settlement, that the land has increased greatly in value. The preliminary sections, of which the company had 162, (near 14,000 acres,) purchased at 12s. an acre, were bringing from 30s. to 40s. an acre. Their 168 town acres (102 of which cost 12s. and 66s.—about £5:5s. each) were worth from £30 to £100 each. The company were possessed of 150 horned cattle, and 8500 sheep. The first season of the whale fishery had produced 200 tons of oil, and ten tons of whalebone. This is the only colony or settlement, belonging to Britain, which costs the parent country nothing; and it is probably on this account, that it is looked on by the ministers and their Tory supporters with an evil eye.

Encouraged by the success of this colony, a number of noblemen and gentlemen have formed the project of colonising New Zealand. This country consists of two islands; the length of the northern is 436 miles, and its medium breadth 60; the southern 360 long, and, at an average, 100 broad. These are situated about 400 miles to the eastward of Van Diemen's Land; and, from their excellent climate, have been long pointed out by geographers as most favourable for the establishment of European colonies. They were discovered by Tasman, a Dutch navigator, in 1642, and were visited by Cook in 1779, who ascertained them to be islands; and not, as had been previously supposed, part of a great southern continent. Owing to the great height of the mountains, some of which are covered with snow the whole year, and must therefore probably reach 15,000 feet, there is at all seasons an abundant supply of water in the rivers, and refreshing showers; so that, although it is in the same parallel of latitude as Port Jackson in Australia, when the country around that settlement is parched up, New Zealand is covered with the most luxuriant trees, crops, and herbage. In the northern island, Cook did not find any frost in the middle of winter. The mountains abound in springs, and there are numerous rivers. The abundance of water so favourably contrasted with the aridity of Australia, is highly propitious to vegetation, and many of the vegetable productions of the islands are extremely valuable. The trees grow to an immense height and size, and are well adapted for ship building; potatoes, turnips, cabbage, Indian corn grow luxuriantly, and the climate seems very similar to that of Italy or Spain, with the incalculable advantage of greater moisture. The coast abounds with numerous sorts of fish—among which are to be found salmon, herring, mackarel, flounders, lobsters, mussels, and numerous other kinds of great value not known to Europeans. The natives are a fine, handsome, muscular race, with pleasing and intelligent countenances, and complexions little darker than those of Spaniards. They are most anxious for Europeans to settle among them, whose mechanical arts they are extremely anxious to learn. They are very tender and affectionate towards their relations, are exceedingly docile, shew considerable ingenuity, and their character altogether appears superior to that of any other barbarous tribe. When our government was first applied to give their concurrence to an act of Parliament for colonizing this interesting country, they encouraged the project; but, upon farther consideration, Ministers have changed their views, and the consequence has been that the bill was thrown out on the second reading by a majority of 92 to 32.

SCOTLAND.

CORONATION HONOURS.—The only Scotch Peers who have received dignities are Lord Dundas, who has been created Earl of Zetland, and the Earl of Kintore, who has obtained a British Peerage. We are not aware of the services which have entitled these noblemen to these honours. The Scotch Coronation Baronets are Mr MacPherson Grant, of Ballindalloch; Mr Dunlop, of Dunlop; Mr Forrest of Comiston, Lord Provost of this city; and Mr Stewart Menteith, of Closeburn.

CALEDONIAN CANAL.—After expending nearly a million and a quarter on this work, it has become a matter of serious consideration whether the navigation should not be discontinued altogether, and the work destroyed! On the 7th December last, the north-west recess wall of the lowest lock at Port Augustus gave way; and, though repaired in a temporary manner, is still in a state of great insecurity. Mr Walker, the engineer, has been employed by Government to examine the whole canal, and he has reported that, if the canal is to be kept open at all, there is "no doubt as to the propriety of doing the repairs and finishing, which will cost £129,317." But besides, as, at present, vessels take three, four, and five weeks to pass through the canal, which is only sixty miles long, five steam vessels to tug them would be needed, so that the total sum still required, is £150,000. The average tonnage of vessels passing through the canal is 25,000 tons per annum, being about 2½ per cent. of the whole trade going through the Pentland Frith, to avoid the navigation of which was the object in constructing the canal. It was intended to have been large enough for the navigation of frigates; but only the smallest class of merchantmen ever attempt the passage, only one so large as 240 tons burthen having passed through it within the last seven years. The gross annual receipts of the canal have not exceeded £2600, while the expense, repairs, and superintendence exceed £3000. If all the £150,000 were laid out on it, it seems very doubtful if the canal would be of much use; for it would still require some days to pass through it, even with the assistance of the five steam boats. On the other hand, it appears, that to destroy the works would require a sum which might equal the expense of a proper repair, from the precautions which would be required to prevent the country being inundated; and for the same reason the canal cannot be allowed to continue in its present state. For example, the valley of the Lochy is much under the general level of the canal, and there is a loch of 6000 acres ready to burst out on it, unless immediate precautions are taken.

We believe that this canal was begun without any proper estimate. The first sum granted for it was £20,000, in 1803; in 1804, £50,000 more was voted; and so it has gone on from time to time, till upwards of a million has been expended; and now there can be little doubt it ought to be abandoned, could it be done with safety to the neighbouring country.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

Leeds.—The markets at the Cloth Halls have been brisk for some weeks; and, although the quantity of goods brought in from the country has been unusually large, nearly the whole has been disposed of. Business is rather improving in the warehouses generally; and prices are a shade higher, though still below what goods can be made for at the present prices of wools. Huddersfield.—There is a considerable activity in the markets, and a fair amount of business is doing; but the manufacturers have in vain struggled for a rise of prices to compensate the increased cost of wool. Bradford.—The increased demand for yarn continues, and prices are firm, but without any advance. The demand for wool, especially for the finer sorts, is brisk, with, in some instances, a small advance in price. We have similar accounts from the other manufacturing districts.

AGRICULTURE.

The prospect of the harvest is by no means flattering, and in many districts the crop can hardly now amount to an average. Barley appears everywhere a weak crop, many fields of potatoes have been ploughed up, and the continued rains have greatly injured the turnips. In Scotland, wheat, however, promises fair; but, we presume, from the rise of the price, the prospect in England is less favourable. Oats have been benefited by the copious showers, for there is never too much rain for them. Markets continue steadily to rise. During the last four weeks, wheat has risen 3s. 4d., barley 8d., rye 2s. 3d., and beans 1s., per quarter on the general average.

We beg to call the attention of agriculturists to the valuable qualities of the most noxious weed with which they are annoyed, and which costs them more expense than any other to keep down, for the most careful cultivation does not eradicate it—we mean "couch grass." We are indebted for the information to Colonel Maccaroni's "Memoirs." In Italy the roots are carefully gathered by the peasantry, who often pay the farmers for the privilege, not to be burned, but to be used either as a decoction, instead of sarsaparilla, to which many medical men consider it superior, or for food to their horses. After being gathered, it is well washed, and then tied into bundles, two feet long, and six inches in diameter, and is afterwards kept in, or well sprinkled with water. Of this root, or of carrot, the Italians always give their horses in spring and summer, a few bunches at mid-day. Upwards of £40,000 worth of this root is annually sold by the peasantry to the inhabitants of Naples alone; and the horses fed upon it are kept in much better condition than those fed on the ordinary food. Considering the great quantity of couch grass in the fields in this neighbourhood, it might be desirable to try it as food for horses; and, if it is found to succeed, its collection will not only be of great benefit to the farmer, but afford our labouring poor an additional source of healthy employment throughout the year.

THIS long and glorious Session has come to an end; and—thanks to Lord Brougham's "restlessness," Lord Durham's Ordinances, O'Connell's pressing necessity for "native air," but, above all, the grouse-shooting—somewhat abruptly at last. Her Majesty, in person, graciously pro-rogued the Parliament, and the wires were touched to eloquence in general felicitation and gratitude to the faithful, munificent Commons.

A few of the topics of congratulation, which could not easily be brought within the compass of the royal speech, still remain untouched; and upon them, until opportunity arrives for a more careful retrospect of the business of the Session, we propose to add our hasty congratulations, as a sort of postscript, if we may venture the presumption, or as addenda, to the Royal speech, or Ministerial promptings.

Were we to puzzle our brains until Parliament meet again, it were impossible to hit upon a more satisfactory ground of gratulation to the Government and its dependents, than that mentioned with singular naïveté in a Ministerial journal:—"The same men who were in Downing Street at the opening of the Session, are in Downing Street still." Let them laugh who win. Q. E. D.

There may have been a few petty triumphs—such as the making of the Coronation Peers and ordering that pageant, and a few secondary considerations, such as bets gained on the point, or excisemen and commissioners made; but the great end, the all in all, is embraced in "the same men," all their dangers past, being still in office. Upon this, then, we especially congratulate her Majesty's Ministers. They have been "dry-nursed" and whipped by Sir Robert Peel, coddled by the Duke of Wellington, buffeted by Lord Lyndhurst, schooled and cowed by the high Tories, trampled in the dirt by Lord Brougham, and held up by every party in turn, to the derision, contempt, or pity of the nation, as men without substantial power, without business capacity, without any one consistent or intelligible principle of policy or of conduct; divided among themselves; existing but from hand to mouth upon make-shifts and expedients; hateful to the great body of the people, from their desertion of Reform; and having no certain supporters among any class, save a small remnant of the hereditary Whig aristocracy, and that increasing horde of dependents and expectants who ever cling to whatever men are still "in Downing Street," feeling it their dearest interest to keep them there. They are "still in office."

We have much more upon which to congratulate the Government; but, first, we would dutifully congratulate Mr O'Connell's "lovely little Queen," upon having; in the morn and dew of her youth, fallen upon such judicious guardians of her personal character, her crown and dignity, and the happiness of her subjects; upon men who have laboured so effectually, at the most delicate crisis of her life, to endear her to the affections of her people, and establish her in their loyal respect.

We would also respectfully congratulate her Majesty upon the zeal of her Ministers for the comfort and dignity of her "beloved" and "august" mother, whom they have made richer than any "mother of the Queen" ever before heard of in England, or even in Germany. But, especially, we would congratulate our youthful female sovereign upon that ample provision being secured by her devoted Ministers for the maintenance of her royal household, which makes her, at the age of nineteen, the envy of the oldest crowned heads in Europe—of those who, though they may have a good deal of their own way, have the handling of very little cash.

We heartily congratulate Lord Charles Fitzroy upon having been dismissed from his post in the Queen's household, for daring to vote according to his conscience, and against slavery; and the Messrs Buller, Mr Sheil, and other Liberals and patriots, English and Irish, whether they be the allies or only the kinsmen of Mr O'Connell, upon having obtained either a relishing foretaste of the sweets of office, or were it but a smell of the good things, and upon having, in consequence, grown with gourd-like rapidity in the saving virtue of political discretion.

We congratulate Ministers alike upon the courage which inspired them to dismiss Lord Charles Fitzroy, and the prudence which has all along guided them in retaining the Duke of Wellington's man at the head of the army.

We congratulate the whole empire upon getting rid of that egregious Whig humbug, the Irish Tithe Bill; and Lord Stanley and Sir James Graham, upon the Irish Patriots so ably assisting Ministers in driving that Tulcan lion out of the way of their return to office as soon as it may suit their convenience; or as soon as bland Lord Melbourne can prevail upon them by his fascinations and "winning ways."

Among many other lesser matters, we congratulate the Irish Church Reformers upon Mr O'Connell's return to his native air, laden like some rich argosie; or, at least, the harbinger of the booty wrung from the industry of the people of England, to solace the tithe-eaters of Ireland, and bolster up that monster Establishment which he and we have wanted words to paint black enough. We trust that, when the prey taken from us, Egyptians and Amalekites, the unrepresented or misrepresented people of Great Britain, comes to be divided, he may, at next Tribute-tide, feel the advantage. Without him, that million could not have been got; he, therefore, deserves a liberal per centage. That Appropriation Clause, which has helped so well to keep "the same men in Downing Street," and to turn out Sir Robert Peel and the Duke in 1833, is, we acknowledge, a mere shadowy thing, when compared with what his merry countrymen term "O'Connell's Appropriation Claws"—those which clutch a million of our taxes at a swoop, and for so holy a purpose. We also congratulate O'Connell upon the Tithe Bill on a private score:—

It may, at need, serve in his hands the purpose of the old caubeen of the roaring boy, the leader of a faction at a fair, who, when wishing to begin a fray, has only to toss it up. Upon the continued gullibility of his thinning audiences, we congratulate Mr O'Connell: though we would give him warning that the credulity and patience of his clever countrymen have been sorely tried of late; and that the actual dispensers of the loaves and fishes will ultimately obtain influence which they may not always choose to use by deputy. We cannot congratulate O'Connell upon his continued popularity in England and Scotland; his able slavery and tavern speeches notwithstanding. The four household votes of the O'Connells, right for once or twice in a session, while the Tail was permitted to whisk round, will scarcely do. We cannot congratulate him on voting against Mr Ward, or for mutilating the Municipal Bill, and fifty other things.

We must, above all, deeply condole with O'Connell for always finding these Whig Ministers so very "obstinate," while the Duke of Wellington and the Tories find them so complaisant and yielding. We very deeply condole with him upon having found the Whigs, as he told a meeting of anti-slavery delegates, invincible "to his screw." "He had tried the power of pressure himself, but they had always spurned at a threat." "They would sacrifice their lives for a principle they believed to be a true one!!!" We doubly condole with the "Liberator" in this predicament; as they yield fast enough to Lord Brougham's "screw," and when he threatens; and succumb at once to "that worst production of the Irish soil," the "stunted Corporal." To conclude, we congratulate Mr O'Connell on the wisdom of still thinking it right to support these men of unyielding principle, who spurn at his threats, though they have given way on every Liberal Irish measure. Are they not still in Downing Street?

But who, alas! will condole with us on our deep disappointment, our bitter mortification, at the line of conduct followed, for these last two sessions, by Mr O'Connell. Whither has vanished that vantage ground for Ireland, on which he stood, three years since, alone and unfettered by Whiggery, amidst the Radicals of Newcastle—on the Calton Hill of Edinburgh—in the Green of Glasgow—surrounded by tens of thousands of men animated by the warmest sympathy for the sufferings of their Irish fellow-citizens, and eager to "turn the screw." That ground has crumbled from beneath his feet. He is shorn of his strength. He is becoming weak, and as any other mere Whigling. He is to send out two hundred emissaries to rouse Great Britain with the story of Ireland's wrongs. He might much better have done it himself. We shall welcome the Irish missionaries when they appear, but we shall ascertain that they bear national, and not Ministerial credentials, counter-signed by O'Connell.

To come nearer home: We would congratulate the faithful Commons upon their labours in a Session extending to the period of gestation in the human animal, and producing so much—a Session which opened with metamorphosing the plenipotentiary to the Muscovite Court into the Dictator of the Canadas, and endowing him with powers, vague, vast, arbitrary, and of most dangerous precedent—and closed in hurrying through a very doubtful Bill of Indemnity for the abuse of those ill-defined, insidious powers.

We congratulate Ministers upon the manly and dignified figure which they made in the eyes of the nation, while poor Lord John Russell, who can talk such big words in the breach, cried mercy, and came in Peel's will for the Canada Bill; and while bland Lord Melbourne, railing against the Brougham-framed Bill of Indemnity, appeared all the while in an agony of apprehension lest it should be opposed, and he lose his place. We shall congratulate them more heartily, if Lord Durham does not virtually throw it back in their double-faces, by the indignant surrender of the Dictatorship before the year be out. If he does not, we greatly mistake the man, and shall sincerely condole with him, involved in that labyrinth of intrigue which may render it impossible to follow the dictates of his spirit. We lately condoled with him on his chivalrous feelings sending him so far from Court at a critical time, and entangling him in a most difficult embassy; but, in the present circumstances, we should congratulate Lord Durham, and also his friends in the Home Government, upon his reappointment to St Petersburg. His place as a public character, is no longer either Canada or Britain. Lord Melbourne might find his presence incesvenient at Court, and the Reformers can well spare him in Parliament, or in the country, for anything he has either said or done for some years. We shall, however, congratulate Lord Melbourne, in being able to keep off Lord Durham by any means, whether by the disgrace of Indemnity Bills, or honourable exile to Toronto, Lambton Castle, or Russia.*

We take leave to congratulate the Tories, and especially the House of Lords and the Duke of Wellington, upon their amended position in the country, in consequence of following the able and cautious policy—the Torres-Vedras tactics which we long since sagely predicted would be those followed by the Duke.—We congratulate them upon their sure, but steady advance to power, and on their successfully using the Whigs as cats-paws, to turn the chestnuts for them. We congratulate them, that, although the Court may be hostile, the Whig-Tories have so tarnished the lustre of the Crown, and so diminished its moral influence, that, though the People are as decidedly as ever opposed to Tory principles, they more and more despise their political rivals, and would not now move a finger to “keep out the Tories,” were there no better reason than “keeping in the Whigs.”

We, however, congratulate Lord Melbourne upon the decidedly favourable symptom, of her Majesty, both in proceeding to Westminster Abbey and in returning from it, turning the latter part of the royal person towards the Carlton Club House—a dignified mode of expressing contempt for the Tories and attachment to her Whig Ministers, worthy of a young Princess, the royal niece of that illustrious Prince, George IV., who first introduced the courtly practice of rumping into politics. This looks as if there were some solid foundation for Mr O’Connell’s assurance to the People of Dublin, that the Queen was with the Whigs—and, we doubt not, was an important fact, instantly communicated to country correspondents, by those maids of honour whose matrimonial prospects may be depending on “keeping in the Whigs.”

We congratulate Mr Spring Rice upon the court pensioners escaping almost uninjured through Mr Harvey’s intended fiery ordeal, by favour of his ingenious hocus-pocus and necromantic arts. Congratulations to him upon the Speakership might be somewhat premature.

We congratulate Sir John Campbell on excelling, at least in Parliament, in the proper functions of his office of Attorney-General, any Tory lawyer that has filled it within our memory. To specify instances would be superfluous.

We congratulate Sir William Molesworth, Mr Grote, Mr Harvey, Mr Warburton, Mr Ward, and the small knot of Radical members who have kept their garments unspotted by Whig contact during this contaminating session; and sincerely condole with Mr Hume on having the misfortune to be, though an English Radical, an O’Connell Member. We congratulate Mr Roebuck and the other Liberal members ousted at the last election, upon having been kept apart from those Whig-Tory snares and temptations, before which so much flaming hustings-liberalism has fallen—though we have fears for them.

The Reformers, the consistent, steady, and independent Reformers, of whom numbers are to be found in all grades of society, we especially congratulate upon the rash and indiscreet, if not absolutely infatuated declarations made and confirmed by the Whig leader of the House of Commons, Lord John Russell, against any and all farther Reform—against amending the Reform Bill—against Ballot—against Extension of the Suffrage—against the extinction of that form of Slavery called Negro Apprenticeship—and against all Church Reform that is not a cheat or a shadow. Verily, for Lord John’s candour, we congratulate the Reformers.

The labouring poor, the struggling millions, we congratulate, upon wheat being at from 72s. to 86s. per quarter, the four pound loaf at 10½d., and every article of prime necessity proportionably dear; while Lord Melbourne informs them that he will countenance no change in the Corn Laws, and weeks afterwards receives the farewell compliments of the Duke of Wellington thereupon. We congratulate them on this, while Lord John Russell manfully avows that the Reform Bill was intended and contrived to strengthen the agricultural interest in Parliament—that interest which has always in Parliament been so feeble! If the people are contented with these things, let them. We shall congratulate them upon their meek submission to the will of their highly-privileged natural lords.

But they are not content; and their discontent is rapidly increasing. It breaks forth at Birmingham or Glasgow; but it is smouldering everywhere, ready, on the first breath of agitation, to burst into a flame. The symptoms were never more alarming than at present. Wrath is treasured up against the day of wrath; and it is not by either keeping the Tories out, or the Whigs in, that the storm is to be arrested, but by enthroning, in place of those selfish factions and class interests which have so long borne sway, the eternal principles of political wisdom and justice.

We warmly congratulate the People, and our brother Reformers, wheresoever they may be found, upon the increase of knowledge, and the improved morality of the masses; upon their mutual intelligence, their peaceableness in their political demonstrations, or the periodical livinge, by which they intimate their grievances and their desires.

* It was ostentatiously set forth in the newspapers, at the time of Lord Durham’s acceptance of the appointment of Governor-General of North America, that he had done so only from chivalrous acquiescence in the desire personally urged by “the lovely young Queen.” The integrity of the empire, the peace of the North American colonies, and probably of England and the United States, and the happiness of some millions of his fellow-subjects, were certainly very trivial considerations, and unworthy of biasing his purpose; but the wish of the Queen was imperative upon Canning’s haughty and knightly Earl. In requital, the Queen could not do less than order that his appointment should be on the same scale of magnificence as those of Lord Mulgrave, the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

Upon their discipline and unity of purpose, we congratulate them. We congratulate them, above all, upon the sound principles on which they have based their claims of justice; upon their National Petition—the scroll of that new Great Charter, emanating from a purer source than the field of Runymede—coming from the workshops and foundries of Birmingham, and eagerly adopted throughout all the populous districts of the kingdom.

Finally, we would counsel Lord Melbourne to pray mightily to Ceres, and call in the aid of such of the Court chaplains as are looking forwards to golden prebends, deaneries, and mitres from the Whigs. Venus and the Graces have done much for him; and so have Mercury and Mammon; but they will never bring him through the black, hungry winter in prospect, if that bounteous goddess shall continue to frown, whose smiles are at present quite as needful as those of the Court.

And while the Premier prays, let the People work. The temper and the urgent necessities of this season are singularly propitious for a strong pull at the bread-tax. Universal Suffrage is good; Ballot is good; Annual Parliaments are most excellent and desirable; and these three claims are the legitimate means to all future good. But people never work so well as when they are hungry, and, consequently, half-angry. One thing at a time, is the rule of all good business-men; and the hardy smiters of Sheffield and Birmingham well know the value of "striking while the iron is hot." They may now make a fair trial to obtain the food of their children at a just price. If they are worth their salt, they will do it; concentrating all their energies upon that single object, until it is accomplished. No matter whether the Melbourne Parliament, or our own, freely chosen by Extended Suffrage, shall carry this measure, so that it be speedily carried.

OBSERVATIONS ON IRISH POLICY, ADDRESSED TO BRITISH REFORMERS.

Perhaps we may have damaged our own right of blaming the conduct of Mr O'Connell, by acting so long, in relation to him as he has done in relation to the Whig-Tory Ministers. We have probably forbore too long, though not to the extent which satisfied him.

Last year, when our dissatisfaction at his Parliamentary conduct had been expressed only in the most delicate and gentle manner, O'Connell, both in speeches and letters, complained that, along with everything British, even Tait's Magazine had turned against him. Still we were silent. We resolved to try him, as he tries the Whigs—for one more Session; and this year also we have been silent, even while we felt forbearance with O'Connell, for the sake of his country, verging upon betrayal of the common cause of Reform in Great Britain and Ireland. We have a score of our own to clear with "The Liberator." This Magazine was among the first, if not the very first of the British periodicals, that unreservedly and warmly advocated the civil and religious rights of the Irish people. We were among the humble but disinterested and zealous instruments, who, for the sake of Ireland and Reform, paved the way for the triumphant progress of O'Connell through the north of England and Scotland, and gave him power and influence in Great Britain, which we fondly hoped he was to employ for very different purposes than abetting or sheltering the Whigs in their desertion of Reform. Since then, Session after Session has passed, and we have looked with perplexity, apprehension, and, at length, with something of the suspicion avowed by all English Radicals, upon many parts of his public conduct. In this suspicion, many of his own countrymen participate. Yet we cannot go their length—we cannot doubt of O'Connell's fidelity to Ireland. He has been bred in a bad school. He finesses too much, he temporizes too much. What we consider far worse than his subservieney to the Whigs, is his obvious desire to keep asunder Irish and British Reformers; to keep alive distrust of us among the people of Ireland. For this there can be no good motive. He should remember Cobbett's lesson—"Ware this indifference and dislike even true—you, O'Connell, should be the last man to tell it." But we leave Mr O'Connell for the present in the hands of his patriotic countryman, Mr Sharman Crawford, to whose unimpeachable probity and singleness of mind, he has so often borne testimony. Having most reluctantly broken silence, we shall feel it a duty to continue to tell the Irish what the warmest friends of Ireland in Britain think of the conduct of O'Connell. To ourselves it is most painful and mortifying to think of him but as the firmest friend of his native land, and the able champion of liberty everywhere.

To the Editor of Tait's Magazine.

SIR,—At this important crisis in the cause of civil and religious freedom, not only as respects Ireland, but the British empire, I trust you will not deem me presumptuous in soliciting your permission to make use of your valuable and extensively-circulated periodical as the medium of addressing a few observations to the consideration of the Reformers of Great Britain.

The friends of liberty gained, by the Reform Act, the first outwork (but only the first outwork) of the intrenchments which political and religious monopolists had erected to secure the ascendancy of oligarchical power. Since that period, I ask, have they advanced one step? They have not; but, what is still worse, they are in danger of being forced to retreat from the position they had gained—desertion thins their ranks, and an active enemy steps in their front. How did they gain the first step? By bringing into play the power and energy of popular action, and depending upon that power as the moving principle. How has their farther advance been impeded? Because they have placed their dependence on the manoeuvres of a party, and based their cause on the support of that party, instead of on a steady adherence to the principles for which they were contending.

Does it not appear like an infatuation to continue to rely for the advancement of popular rights on leaders who have declared that no advance beyond the Reform Act ought to be made? They joined you in taking possession of the advanced posts of the enemy, but now they say, "Here we stand. If you push forward one step, we will desert to that enemy." And yet these are the men under whose banners the Reformers of Britain are content to rest in the trenches, whilst their enemies insult them with the menace of defiance, and are throwing up new works for the strengthening of their citadel.

These premises can hardly be denied—but I shall be told that Ireland was the cause. Ireland claimed your forbearance. I cannot deny that the Reformers of Britain have this plea, although I have the satisfaction of feeling that I never was a party to the call. But, as Ireland is made the plea, I shall solicit the attention of British Reformers, whilst I shall take a short review of the propositions, and the system of legislation, under which the Melbourne Ministry professed to do justice to Ireland.

The Charter principle by which the present Ministry expelled their predecessors, and obtained office for themselves, was that of the appropriation of the superfluous revenues of the Irish Established Church to national use—and the particular use pointed out by the resolution of the House of Commons, in 1835, was the education of the People, without distinction of religious persuasion.

Now, how did they propose to carry out this principle? I shall refer to their first bill, because the propositions of this bill may be considered the real index of their intentions, as they brought it forth unfettered by the excuse of former rejections. By a census made under the authority of Parliament, it appeared that the Established Church only amounted to about one-tenth of the population. The provisions of this bill professed to be founded on this census; and how did they abide by the census? The tithe composition amounted to about £515,000 yearly, and the surplus to be produced by the new system was only estimated at £58,000 yearly; and, in return for this partial appropriation to the People, a new security was to be given to the Church, by imposing the responsibility of the payment on the landlords, to whom three-tenths of the composition were to be remitted as a bonus. Thus the nation were to get about one-tenth, whilst the Church and the landlords together, were to get the other nine-tenths. The distribution of these revenues drawn from the People, was to be in the inverse proportion of the population—the nine-tenths of the people were only to get one-tenth of the revenue. This was the utmost extent of the justice proposed to Ireland, on this question, by the Melbourne Ministry, accompanied with the assertion of their determination to uphold the ascendancy of the Established Church. But it was to be accepted by Ireland as instalment justice!—so the O'Connellites said—whilst the Ministry offered it as a final and satisfactory settlement. This was rejected by the Lords—and what was the result? Did the Melbourne Ministry and the Irish leader give the Lords a practical lesson on the folly of resistance, by proposing a more extended measure of justice to the Irish people? No such thing. The next Session (1836) brought forth a proposition, which contained a more circumscribed modification of the already modified principle of appropriation. The Lords again resisted and rejected. The Bill of 1837 made further concessions; but this Bill, in consequence of the decease of the King, never reached the Lords. A new Parliament was afterwards summoned. The Melbourne Ministry boasted of retaining their majority. They boasted of enjoying the invigorating refreshment of the sunshine of royal favour. Did they then stand boldly on the ascription of religious liberty for Ireland? Did they stand upon the full and honest carrying out of the principle upon which their formation was based? No. This is the moment when they bring forth the project of a practical surrender of their own principle, and a full concession of ecclesiastical supremacy in all its disgusting integrity. They propose a measure, to give the new security to the Church, as already stated in my description of the first Bill, without one fragment of the appropriation principle; and, in this course, they were defended, supported, justified, and (I believe, I might say) prompted,—by whom? By O'Connell!—the Liberator of Ireland!—the Tithe-hater!—the Voluntary! Reformers of Britain! mark this winding up of the instalment policy!

When I pass to the Corporation Bill, I find this Ministry consistently pursuing their favourite system of delusion and concession. The first Bill was a good one—founded on the principle of British Legislation:—the subsequent Bills progressively deteriorated that principle, and diminished the number of towns eligible to corporations, till, in the last (that of 1838), the principle of British legislation could hardly be recognised, even if a five-pound franchise had been granted. Now, what is the real difference between the Whigs and Tories on this Bill?—It is not worth the value of one straw. The Whigs sent it up with a five-pound franchise—the Lords returned it with a nine-pound franchise—the Whigs conceded an eight-pound franchise—and the fact is, that either of these franchises, in the towns of Ireland, would annihilate popular representation, and secure the monopoly of oligarchical power; and yet, after the Whigs and the O'Connellites had virtually surrendered the substance, a sham-fight is to be kept up about a shadow, in order to continue in the hands of a faction a longer possession of the powers and emoluments of office! But good sometimes results from evil. By these conflicts of factions, the doom of Ireland may be respite—she may yet be saved!

Now, let me put it to British Reformers—(and I would wish also to Irish Reformers)—Who are the real promoters of resistance in the Lords? Who are the real insulters of Ireland? Will they not answer with me?—Those who have permitted the Lords to reap the benefit of resistance; those who permitted Ireland to be insulted, and then entered into a treaty with her insulters, compromised with her insulters, and surrendered to her insulters. Why are the Lords to be blamed, when we find the man who is the acknowledged leader of the Irish people—their paid advocate—himself voting, and bringing forward his party to vote, in the combined ranks of the Whigs and Tories, for the confirmation of compromises made in direct violation of declarations, of professions, of pledges, solemnly recognised both by the Ministry, and this leader, and the members of his party?—and yet this man turns round, not only upon the Lords, but he turns upon the British people, and says, You too are the refusers of justice to Ireland. It may be so; but I would say to him, First try the British people, by proving that the course which Ireland takes is worthy of British sympathy and British justice: and do not accuse the British people, to screen your own delinquencies.

I have now shortly reviewed the two clap-trap propositions; but there are other matters of no less importance to be noticed. British Reformers are not aware of the gigantic strides with which the power and patronage of the crown has been advanced in the local legislation of Ireland since the accession of the present Ministry. This has been the main object of every act which they have passed, or which they have attempted to pass. As one instance, I shall refer to the constabulary system, which has been newly organized by an act passed under the influence of the present Administration, with the aid of their O'Connell supporters. By this act, a new retinue of offices and officers is created. All control over the amount and regulation of the constabulary force is withdrawn from the fiscal bodies and magistracy of the counties, and vested solely in the executive. This body, under the constitutional appellation of constables, is armed, drilled, appointed, and disciplined as a standing army—not subject to the mutiny act—not subject to the control of Parliament—liable to be increased at the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant, without any effective limitation on that power; and the pay of this body is to be drawn by the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant, half from the consolidated fund, and half by imperative warrant from the county taxation. By the same act, an unlimited power is given of appointing stipendiary magistrates with large salaries; and, by the Coercion Act of the Melbourne Government, which was passed after the expiration of the Grey Coercion Act, the most arbitrary powers of Curfew-Law Legislation can be enforced in any district which makes itself offensive to the executive. By the Grand Jury Bills, which this Ministry have passed and proposed to pass, the system of imperative presentments (by the order of the Crown) has been enlarged, and all these things have been done by the aid and with the assent of the Irish O'Connell patriots. They have been done under cover, first, of the mild and popular administration of the executive in the hands of the Marquis of Normanby; and under cover, secondly, of the two fictitious and delusive measures, the Tithe and the Corporation Bills. The attention of the British public (and the Irish public) has been kept directed on these two fictions, as the primum mobile of every good to Ireland, whilst her leading patriots were setting themselves, or preparing to set themselves down, under the protection and emolument of those lucrative offices which this increased power and patronage of the Crown placed at the disposal of the executive.

British Reformers! I have endeavoured, in the preceding review of Irish policy, to rescue you from the claim—from the imputed obligation—to suspend your own efforts for freedom, to serve the purposes of a Ministry who have been represented to you as the saviours, as the guardian angels of Ireland, as the only instruments of justice to that ill-treated country; but, I trust, I have been able to shew you that no justice can be expected under a system of policy such as has been acted upon by that Ministry and their Irish adherents. If space permitted, I would desire to exhibit the various modes in which this policy has operated, and may operate to the detriment of the cause of political and religious liberty in the British empire; but I can only notice a few of them.

Previous to the time when the Irish leader and his party became the adherents of the Whig Ministry, you had the invariable and zealous support both of their voices and their votes in furtherance of the rights of the People—you are indebted to the Irish phalanx for some of your late noblest victories in the cause of British freedom: but can you now depend upon the support of the leader or his party, except that support can be given in consistence with the greater object of preserving the existence of the Melbourne Ministry? In proof of this position, I would refer to some of the divisions of the present session. Where was the Irish leader, and the Irish party which usually voted with him, when the liberties of Canada were to be contended for? Again, what was the position of those Irish members of the same class on that great question of liberty and humanity, on the occasion of Sir G. Strickland's and Sir E. Wilmot's motions for the Emancipation of the Negro Apprenticeship? There, indeed, we find Mr O'Connell voting in its favour, but deserted by his usual followers. Did he lose his influence over his party? Would they not hearken to the call of their black fellow-creatures? Did their leader make the call? Mark the excuse made by their leader on the day after Sir G. Strickland's motion:—"They abandoned the cause [why?] because they considered the resolutions of the delegates of the preceding day a direct attack upon the Government." Here is a pregnant sample of the operation of this policy. How did the Irish party divide on the Repeal of the Corn-Laws? Was the leader at his post? I do not find his name in the division, and only six Irish members in support of the motion. How did they divide on that question of British humanity, the Factory Question? O'Connell and his party are found voting in the Government majority. I could cite many other examples, if space permitted.

Again, do British Reformers apprehend no danger from the policy of increasing the arbitrary powers of the executive in Ireland by measures such as I have already described? May they not apprehend that those experiments, after being proved in Ireland, may be transferred to England and Scotland?—and that the Irish party, who sanctioned such measures for their own country, may be the ready assistants, at a future time, of this or some other administration, in giving the British people a sample of the infliction of curfew law and arbitrary Government?

If this system of compromise and submission is to be continued in Irish policy, will it not operate on the efforts of the British people for the advancement of their own rights? What is it that makes the Lords courageous and insolent? It is the courage and insolence produced by success. They find the House of Commons truckle to their resistance, and the British and Irish people tamely submit to the humiliation of their representatives; can it be expected, then, that this resistance, will not be continued, in opposition to every effort for the advance of British liberty? But, independently of this, it damps the energy of the People—it destroys their confidence in public men—it shows them the futility of making those sacrifices which a people must make whenever they attempt to oppose the power of either a landed or a moneyed aristocracy.

British Reformers! you have been deluded—you have been deluded by the cant phrases of Justice to Ireland, Justice by instalments, Justice by compromise. British Reformers! be deluded no longer; but boldly assert the common cause of British and Irish rights. Depend upon it, that Britain cannot have security for freedom if Ireland be a slave. Acknowledge no leader—acknowledge no party as the friends of liberty, who temporise with that great cause. Let the nation declare what they demand; and let them tell their representatives, You must stand by us in these demands.

I know I shall be answered with the old objection—This will let the Tories in. I do not wish the Tories to be let in; but I do not fear them. I ask, if even a temporary admission to office should be the result, is it more dangerous to let them have that temporary but responsible possession of power, than to let them rise to popular favour upon the inconsistencies and tergiversations of the professors of liberty, and to permit them to convert those very men into an engine by which to hold actual but irresponsible power?

I assert that their holding of office, if attained, must be temporary; because then they would cease to have the power of covering the deformity of their own principles, by the falling back of their opponents. The People of Britain would then have undisguised enemies to contend against; their efforts would not be paralysed by traitors in their own camp; a vigorous effort would be made; the Whigs would be again compelled to connect themselves with the popular movement, as their only engine to regain that which they had lost—office; and the Tories must then submit to concede the demands of the People, or else to surrender that post which it would be impossible for them otherwise to hold.

I lay it down as a principle sustained by all the evidence of history, that the united voice of the great body of the British People cannot be resisted. Why is this moral power irresistible? Because rulers must know that a continued resistance to this moral power would lead to the ultimate and effective application of physical power. Therefore, where the great mass of the People are united in a common object, the application of physical power will seldom or never be necessary; and, without this union, the application of physical power would be as useless as it would be unjustifiable; and I maintain that this union can only be accomplished by a firm adherence to principles, and a rejection of all the manoeuvres of party tactics which are inconsistent with these principles. I do not mean to say that the different classes of the People ought not to concede to each other. They must mutually concede in order to form a fixed bond of union among themselves; they must concede in order to decide upon fixed principles of action; but I say they ought not to concede to factions, and temporise with principles to answer the objects of these factions.

I have taken the liberty of addressing these observations to the Reformers of Great Britain, (provided you, sir, shall be kind enough to give space for their insertion,) because I conceive many are not acquainted with the real workings of Irish politics; and because I am persuaded that an effort is intended to be made to continue this system for another session; and by declaiming against the insolence of the Lords and the Tories, to cloak the rottenness of Whig professions, and to give time for the more ample compensation of the services of Irish patriots.

I then respectfully call on the Reformers of Great Britain and Ireland, to raise their united voices against this policy—to cast off the trammels of faction—and to rely upon that strength which honesty of purpose and steadiness of execution can alone confer.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

WILLIAM SHARMAN CRAWFORD
CRAWFORDSBURN, August 15, 1838.

THE PRINCIPLES OF PHRENOLOGY.*

BY SIDNEY SMITH.

MR SMITH, one of our Edinburgh phrenologists, and a popular lecturer on "the new science," has published a comprehensive treatise upon it, for the best of possible reasons—namely, that he is convinced "that there was both room and need for it." Phrenology has, he says, "left its original expounders at a great distance behind." The Institutes of Gall and Spurzheim, excellent as in many respects they are, have, their forward disciple thinks, "become, in many respects, almost obsolete." Mr Combe, it appears, differs materially, in many of his views, from those whom we had imagined his followers; or, what comes to nearly the same thing, they disagree with him. Mr Smith accordingly aims not only at expounding the faith that is in him, but at exposing what he considers the errors of the apostles of the sect. He differs from Spurzheim and Mr Combe as to the nature and functions of the organ of conscientiousness; and his work, indeed, displays a much larger endowment of this faculty than of No. 12. He speaks out what he believes to be the truth, and leaves phrenology to those inevitable ultimate consequences, foreseen, but concealed by the believers, of completely revolutionizing the entire system of society, and bringing in the reign of the Big-headed men. He attempts no compromise, and seeks no disguise. If phrenology should "teach materialism," what then? There is no help for it. If phrenology tend to fatalism, why, "Nature also is a fatalist;" and for this, likewise, there is no help. Our author neither blanches nor shirks; and we can approve his candour, without admiring his dogmatism.

Phrenology (says he) is an edge tool, which is not to be played with by a careless, any more than an unskilful artificer. Once recognised as a science—welded into the frame-work of human thought, and feeling, and action—registered in the chartulary of received and truth-fraught philosophy—it must overturn, or change, or reform the whole system of metaphysical inquiry—the entire statute-book of moral institutions—remodel the dogmata of theology—and substitute, in the whole theory and practice of legislation for an expediency which was only excusable on the ground of ignorance which could not be enlightened, the fixed standard of immutable truth, and that eternal justice which truth alone could ascertain.

To those who take interest in the investigation of phrenology, we would recommend the author's analysis of the faculties of the different organs, on which his views are in many respects different from those of former writers. He also takes an entirely original view of the doctrine of the Temperaments, and endeavours to prove, in opposition to Mr Combe, that the temperaments are the result of the size of particular organs; and that their modifications are determined entirely by the peculiar combinations in which the organs are developed. The exposition of the doctrine of the temperaments affords us this brief and abrupt specimen of the author's mode of combating what he considers the errors of other phrenological writers; and, moreover—

CONSOLATION TO OUR "FAT FRIENDS."

The round soft form of body, stated as indicative of the lymphatic constitution, has more frequently than otherwise characterised the most active-minded, brilliant and laborious men. Gibbon, who has written more, studied more, thought more acutely and deeply, and written more eloquently and ably than any of his contemporaries, was enormously fat, fair, and clear in the skin; and so soft and overgrown, that a French lady, at whose feet he threw himself, had, it is said, to ring the bell for the servants to raise him up. Dr Johnson was called the fat philosopher, whose mind was never at rest, and never knew fatigue. Napoleon was remarked for the feminine softness of his person, and a corpulency which, at St Helena, became excessive. Montaigne also was very fat; and Fox, one of the most laborious and active spirits of the age, was like a tun. A merchant in Dundee was pointed out to us, nineteen stone weight, the most active man of business in the town; and we know a case nearly similar in Edinburgh.

Of what are flesh and fat made? The answer is extremely obvious to any ordinary mind. They are composed of the blood; and the greater the quantity of the blood, the greater the tendency to change food into flesh. What temperament is characterised by the superabundance of blood? Clearly the sanguine. What temperament is least so? The lymphatic. Ergo, the sanguine temperament is most disposed to obesity, and the lymphatic least. Dr Thomas notices the herbivori as examples of this latter temperament; but never was there a more self-evident contradiction. One cow has as much blood in it as a dozen lions. We will stake the heat of that of the one against that of the other; we will engage that the chest of a bull shall be as deep, in proportion to his size, as that of the ourivori; and, were we on the turf, would peril something on his clearing a five-barred gate. The truth is, the strength and muscular power of the bull is three times that of the lion; and the statements of Dr Thomas only shew how far theory will tempt writers to overlook the most palpable facts.

To have done full justice to the above, we ought to have previously quoted a passage from Dr Andrew Combe; and now, take only the Doctor's illustration of one modification of the cranio-abdominal temperament—

A large brain again, with a large abdomen, and strong powers of nutrition, will constitute another modification of temperament, in which the vivacity and permanency of the mental functions will be subdued still more than by a large thorax; and, although the cerebral energy will still be felt, it will appear much more in fits of exertion than as a durable state; and, in our conceptions of the man, the abdomen will constitute a large proportion of the figure, and the animal appetites will be felt to consume at least as much of the nervous energy as the purely human or intellectual powers. Of this effect, the late Sir John Leslie was a remarkable example."

We do not pretend to receive what follows for gospel, nor do we imagine that the individuals specified were not continually surrounded by hundreds of men, with heads, or rather brains, quite as large as their own, who never made any figure in the world, or in any way surpassed their smaller-headed compeers. How many strapping fellows in the Guards, and members of the Legion of Honour, must there have been with much larger heads than those of Napoleon or Wellington! Two of the largest heads of modern times were, it seems, those of the negro Toussaint L'Ouverture, and of the Hindoo Rammohun Roy, whose brain weighed nearly four pounds.

* Tait, Edinburgh; Simpkin & Co., London.

BIG-HEADED MEN.

All men whose greatness has stood the test of ages—who put their stamp and impress on society—who are the leaders of mankind, and “wield the fierce democracy”—or whose personal character truly changes or impels the progress of political history, or of the human mind—all these point themselves out at once by nature's mark of a large head, indicative of a great soul. Such a head is Napoleon's, Wellington's, Scott's, Franklin's, Fox's, Cuvier's, Cromwell's, Bacon's, King Robert Bruce's, Charlemagne's, Shakpeare's. Such is that of Washington, Jackson, Burns, and Hampden.

Daniel O'Connell, who, without any political influence, in spite of political power, placed in the midst of every disadvantage, and by a sheer, moral, personal, and intellectual force of character, has become, by the suffrages of the willing hearts of his countrymen, the virtual sovereign of seven millions of people—has been called the Member, not for Dublin, but for Ireland—who has seventy-three Members of Parliament willingly at his command, without a pension to promise, or a place to offer—without a farthing to bribe, or patronage to bestow—who has been said, by the Duke of Wellington, to possess more power than has been in the hands of any man since the revolution—and who has been the first statesman having those wonderful powers for effecting the easy operation of combined political masses of Irishmen, which no one before him had ever been enabled to accomplish—this Daniel O'Connell has the largest head of any man in sound health in the kingdom. Joseph Hume has also an enormous head; and his energy and influence have produced a greater effect on the government of the country, and on its political aspect, than has been caused by almost any other man. Yet Sheil is a far more accomplished orator than O'Connell; and Jeffrey, as a speaker and writer, outshines Hume by a thousand degrees. Why has the former “no place” in the political race? and why did the latter sink, in the House of Commons, to utter insignificance? Because, possessed in large endowment with the development of those intellectual organs which shine in literature, and make the accomplished speaker, these gentlemen had brains of not nearly the same size as those of their contemporaries; and, in particular, were not endowed with an equal amount of those passions and sentiments, the great force of which producing moral and intellectual momentum, is the true secret of moving the masses of the community. They could do nothing in the shape of permanent influence with a mob, or a nation. Dr Chalmers, who may be called the O'Connell of the Church of Scotland, has also an exceedingly large head. Swift, the Dean of Saint Patrick's, had almost as much influence with the common people in Ireland, as Saint Patrick himself. His brain was greatly above average. Dr Johnson was equally singular for his large head, and his power of character. So of Captains Parry, Franklin, &c.

Men in no situation will be found to submit implicitly to the dominion of persons with heads below an average size. A judge appointed from interest, and not from merit, has, on this account, actually confined some of the bar for contempt of court. It is the same in college, in the army, the navy, the church—everywhere. An insensible impression of insignificance obliterates that instinct of subordination which is at once felt, under the command of large-brained men. Hence it was that the English could never permanently subjugate the bigger-headed Scotch—or the Germans the Swiss; while thirty or forty thousand British, command one hundred millions of Hindoos, with heads one-fourth less than their own, with the most perfect ease, and assisted by a spirit of willing subjection and subordination. Nature, however, is ever consistent with herself. A Brahmin of this small-headed and enslaved nation, renounced idolatry, studied Christianity, became a profound Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Sanscrit, Persian, and Arabic scholar, and obtained a mastery of the English language. In this tongue he has written seven works, singular for their elegance of style, erudition, and power of argument. He has beaten the Bishop of Calcutta in Biblical criticism, and converted an English missionary to Unitarianism, who had been sent out expressly for the purpose of making him a Calvinist. This great man—the Rajah Rammohun Roy—had a head twenty-five inches in circumference, being larger than that of any man perhaps in England; and had India possessed many such, Europe would have had more cause to tremble for Oriental invasion, than to send her conquests into the East. While the head of the African slave is much less than that of his white master, the cranium of Toussaint L'Ouverture—who, for a time, bade defiance to the whole power of Napoleon, and that too with means which, in the hands of the latter, would have been totally inadequate—who was a model of wisdom, of heroism, of romantic generosity, and the most exalted virtue—is one of the largest and most beautifully developed that we ever beheld.

The Charibs, New Hollanders, and New Zealanders, whose cerebral mass is about as great as that of Europeans, although developed in a different direction, have never been subdued, and contemplate strangers with neither fear nor respect. They may be killed, butchered, betrayed; but no influence hitherto discovered, has had power to subdue their hearts to the yoke of men like themselves. The Caffres and Ashantees, further advanced in civilization, and with heads also of large dimensions, have been indomitable, and have uniformly maintained a not unequal warfare with the better skilled and civilized Dutch and British settlers. The Chinese, with heads still larger, have never been subdued, and view Europeans with contempt.

Cromwell and Peter the Great, with no powers of oratory or pen, became by far the greatest men of their time, by very large brains. Linn, the Irish partridge, had an enormous head, developed chiefly in the animal region, and he ruled the whole common people of Belfast with a rod of iron.

These sort of proofs are multiplied. Some readers may think that Mr Smith has been somewhat incautious in the adoption of his facts in the above, and indeed in manifold instances, which it would be more easy than agreeable to us to point out. Size being the measure of power, it must be pleasant to the aristocracy to learn that in hats—

“Commencing with London, a perceptible difference will be observed betwixt the higher and lower classes of society. In the former, the majority are above the medium, while among the latter it is very rare to find a large head.” “Establishments at the west end of the town, confined exclusively to the service of the higher circles, require more large hats, in proportion, than other hatters, whose trade is confined to the middle ranks.

Again, we learn that the ten-pounders, or “middle ranks,” require larger hats than the scot-and-lot folks. The wound inflicted upon our Radical feelings by these statements, is, however, saved by this propitiation of national pride—

“The scale of measurement in furnishing a Scotch regiment, is larger than that required for an English regiment.” “I met with the following order, from a correspondent in the north, for 220 yeomanry caps:—‘Pray be particular in the sizes—let the majority be large. Once more I must tell you, not to send hats 6½, or 6¾, without orders. I have now more than I can sell for twelve months.’ Then follows a list of sizes, all above the English medium.” “A manufacturer,” he continues, “at Manchester, received an order from a London house, to send off immediately a particular quality of hats. Having the same description of order ready packed for Scotland, he sent off that package promptly, to oblige his London correspondent, without any regard to the sizes, to the Metropolis. To the mortification of the individual to whom they were invoiced, they proved to be perfectly unsaleable, from the whole of them being very large in size; the consequence has been, that nearly the number of hats sent from the extra size for the lower trade, remains to this day on hand." A Dundee wholesale dealer corroborates these statements; and another observes, "New blocks had to be made in France of a larger size for the British army; and it was some years after the peace, before Parisian hat-makers could fit English gentlemen who applied to them." A glance at the House of Commons, or the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, the members of which are either chosen by the people, or have risen to be their teachers by superior force of character and might of mind, will convince the spectator of the fact, that their heads are far above the average size.

Gratified by national superiority of head, over both the English and French, we are proud to confess that the reverend members of our Assembly of the Kirk have indeed very respectable-looking craniums, with every other adjunct in comfortable proportion. Yet are we not sure but that a convocation of the Durham clergy, or those of York, would beat them. Again, does Mr Smith know who in the House of Commons shews the largest head and best phrenological development? We refer him to that learned work, Random Recollections. The head is neither that of O'Connell, nor Hume, nor Harvey, nor yet the learned Member for Edinburgh, nor Sir Robert Peel, nor Lord Stanley, nor Mr Rice, but an honest country gentleman, not at all remarkable for intellectual endowments. Now, we do not mean to say that—laying organs altogether aside—there is nothing in the size of the brain, which is an opinion nearly as old as human experience; but that the modern sect are prone to push their opinions into absurdity.

We meet with the following extraordinary avowal in a note of this volume, which we cite as another instance of the writer's candour; as we believe that the Materializing phrenologists have no dealings with the Spiritualizing or Transcendental Mesmerians.

We feel convinced, that the rudiments of the science of Phrenology will be defective, until the astonishing facts, recorded in the annals of Animal Magnetism, are more carefully investigated, and reduced to some great common principles. There are phenomena in the science which forms the subject of this work, altogether unaccounted for; and yet the existence of which, until solved, forms a barrier in the way of successful progress. The causes which make light and heat such powerful elements in increasing all our mental susceptibilities, it is evidently of vast importance to ascertain.

After the following curious speculation, our author again buds and bourgeons out in pure phrenology.

How is it that a man, to excite rage, or fear, or pity in others, must frown, and tremble, and weep himself—that he may use all the same words, and in the same manner; but if he want his enthusiasm, his exertions will be abortive? How is it, that a man of a small brain may say the same thing much better, and with as intense feeling as he can command, than a man with a large brain, and that the former will, in a few sentences, not be attended to; while the latter will rivet every eye and every mind, as was well exemplified at the O'Connell banquet in Edinburgh? We see no such extravagant impossibility in the idea, that all this action by one mind, and will, and voice, on another—in the same way as play is cured by the action of wonder, or some other organ on the nerves of the individual system—is produced by some cerebral emanation, only capable of exciting the analogous organs in others, by the operator being in earnest himself; the larger his organs, the more intense being the shedding forth of the hidden principle. It may be thus that sympathy acts; and that the greater the number of brains animated by the same feeling, the greater will be the effect of their mutual action on the minds of each other. A man of small brain, however fine his language, his thoughts, his logic, may convince a being of larger brain; but will never, deposed upon it, carry him away and along with him in the tempest or whirlwind of passion, or the torrent of enthusiasm. A man of large brain, on the contrary, rules the passions of his more modern-headed audience with absolute sway, especially if there be plenty of light and sufficiency of heat, physical conditions of mental susceptibility, which only shew more powerfully the simple and material elements upon which the ideas and emotions depend. Electricity, magnetism, or whatever name that principle may assume, which pervades and animates all nature—which, in one shape, is seen in man and animals—in another, in plants—in a third, in the process of crystallization and stratification—and, in a fourth, in inorganic matter—is a wonder, which renders all things else credible and common.

We like this overleaping of the ring-fence of the organs, within which ordinary phrenologists would cramp and crib us. Mr Smith has collected many singular facts, without, we apprehend, taking much pains in sifting them, in support of the "plurality of organs and faculties." These he introduces, by this choice specimen of logic. "Partial insanity, or monomania, as it is called, is a phenomenon only to be solved by this doctrine [plurality of organs.] 'I am but mad,' says Hamlet, 'north-north-west; when the wind is southerly, I know a hawk from a heronshaw.' But," quoth our author, "had the brain been a single organ, he would have been mad at every point of the compass." Among the facts, are those—"A young physician, not remarkable for talents, whenever he became drunk, improvised Latin speeches, singular for elegance of diction and refinement of thought." We should have liked to see those speeches subjected to the test of a Times reporter. "A man remarkable for bad memory, fell from a considerable height on his head, and ever after could remember the most trifling circumstance." It would be desirable to know whereabouts this person's skull was struck, as also where the skull of Dr Priestley's son was fractured, which let in mental light upon a young man not before remarkable for lucidity. We do not, however, question this latter fact, but only its bearing upon the doctrine of the organs. With the truth of these doctrines, however, we have at present nothing to do; and of the organs—assuming their existence—we find the analysis exceedingly ingenious and interesting. Mr Combe finds veneration, (No. 14,) "large in the head of the genuine Tory"—not, we presume, the mere place-hunting Tory; "and smaller in that of the Whig or Republican;" while Mr Smith's observation leads him to infer—"That Radicalism, when a genuine feeling or sentiment, and not a mere philosophical principle, is always the result of only an average endowment of veneration with large self-esteem." Women, it seems, have a natural tendency to Toryism, from that superior concentrativeness (No. 3) "which seems the cause of the great constancy and solidness of female attachments." We would, therefore, advise every man to choose a wife with Tory tendencies—and, apropos, recur to Mr Smith for excellent counsel to young ladies in their choice of husbands. It would indeed have been desirable that he had previously made up his mind about Vimont's newly discovered organ of Marriage, which, if "established," will place a most useful test in the power of the ladies, and at once enable them, or their manipulating deputies, to distinguish the marrying men from the flirts and the danglers.

We say to every woman, never marry a rake. Let him be the most handsome, the richest, the most elegant, and pleasantest of men, he is a bad bargain, even with a coronet on his head, and a county in his rent-roll. After all, peace in the married state is only to be found in virtuous and healthy children; and if a wife would have exemplary sons, and happy, prudent, and heart-pure daughters, let her never look for that in the offspring of that man whose life, at the time when the mind, brain, and constitution are being formed, has been passed in the profligate debaucheries of modern society. Until women remember, when they are asked in marriage, that they are not only to become wives but mothers—that a poor, plain, sober, and virtuous man, possesses gifts which must produce far greater future happiness than all the wealth and rank of Crossus without these qualities, and that domestic felicity is to be found at the fireside, not in the carriage or ball-room, society will never advance in the direction best calculated to secure its ultimate improvement.

In all our former phrenological reading, we had never learned half so much of the newly discovered organ of Alimentiveness, (No. 0.) A formidable propensity it seems to be. Alimentiveness gives the desire of snuffing and smoking, and using opium, as well as of eating and drinking. Vimont found it in the skull of every child he examined, and enormous in the skulls of two women incurably addicted to drinking spirits. It is Alimentiveness acting upon its next-door neighbour Secretiveness, which, it seems, makes ladies, though not men, conceal their eating, and act the part of the "abstemious young lady." It is the self-same organ which leads one individual to devour any sort of garbage with inordinate voracity, and another to be particular only about the quality of his food and wine. Alimentiveness is thus alike the stimulant which makes the cad devour immense messes of cow-heel, and the gourmand at Crockford's pick daintily at one of Ude's most recondite made dishes; one man swill heavy-wet by gallons, and another be choise about his small glass of liqueur, or modicum of Port or Madeira. The aristocratic gourmand should insist for an organ to himself, for one of delicate gourmanderie, leaving another for vulgar brutal gluttony. The phrenologists often tax the organs too far, in condemning them to carry double, or even quadruple, and very heterogeneous loads. We are glad to find that Mr Smith entertains some small doubts, his brethren being in general so absolute in their conclusions, pronouncing the sweeping "Established!" as if there lay no appeal. He is not certain about either weight or colour, and he makes some very acute observations on the organ of Locality, and on those of Order and Time. One of his most ingenious sections, is that on Wit or Mirthfulness.

By an "unkindest cut" in examining the controversy between Mr Combe and Mr Jeffrey, about the principle or theory of Beauty, our author brings proofs from Phrenology to demonstrate that the phrenologist is in the wrong, and the anti-phrenologist in the right. He also differs from Mr Combe about the functions of the Reflective Organs; and, in particular, pulls Causality from the high place in which it has been enthroned. Who, however, could have guessed that Dame Quickley's detailed appeal to Falstaff for matrimonial justice should be "advisedly adduced" by Mr Smith, as a specimen of active Causality? We pretend to no skill in the rather complex functions of the organs, but we should have imagined that, instead of the pathetic appeal of the widow arising from pure or simple Causality, three or four different organs at least were brought into play.

Falstaff.—What is the gross sum that I owe thee?

Hostess.—Marry, if thou wert an honest man, thyself and the money too. (Adhesiveness and Acquisitiveness.) Thou didst swear to me upon a parcel-gilt goblet, sitting in my Dolphin chamber, at the round table, by a sea-coal fire, (Locality and Eventuality,) on Wednesday in Whitsun Week, (Time,) when the Prince broke thy head for likening his father to a singing man of Windsor. (Eventuality.) Thou didst swear to me then, as I was washing thy wound, to marry me, and make me my lady thy wife. (Love of Approbation.) Canst thou deny it? (Conscientiousness.) Did not Goodwife Keech, the butcher's wife, come in then, and call me Gossip Quickly, (Individuality,) coming in to borrow a mess of vinegar; telling us she had a good dish of prawns, whereby thou didst desire to eat some, (Alimentiveness;) whereby I told thee they were ill for a green wound. (Causality and Cautiousness.) And didst thou not, when she was gone down stairs, desire me be no more so familiarly with such poor people; saying, that ere long, they should call me Madam? And didst thou not kiss me, and bid me fetch thee thirty shillings? (Amativeness.) I put thee now to thy book-oath; deny it, if thou canst? (Causality and Conscientiousness.)

And Mr Smith would resolve all these complex feelings, agitating the bosom or brain of the injured Dame Quickly, into the simple operation of the ratiocinating faculty, or No. 36! Why, we should say in this case, that the whole citadel was in arms—that is, if we had pretension to understanding one iota of the subject. It seems the first condition of phrenology, that belief must precede understanding; hence our own and the general ignorance.

We fear that Mr Smith has injured his book with the fastidious, by its form and appearance, which are both ungainly, in consequence of his desire of cheaply diffusing the doctrines of Phrenology. This, however, ought to form a recommendation with all zealous phrenologists. The subject is illustrated by numerous heads of remarkable or eminent individuals, and, as the reader must perceive, even by our few extracts, is ingeniously handled.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

RECOLLECTIONS OF CHARLES LAMB.

New let me pass to a part of my London literary life, interesting in its circumstances; and a part it was which interested Charles Lamb, though I doubt whether he ever went so far in his interest as to look into the book which records my share in the affair. This affair had thus far a general interest, that it was undoubtedly the most complete hoax that ever can have been perpetrated. The circumstances are these:—After the Author of "Waverley" had for a considerable succession of years delighted the world with one or two novels annually, the demand for Waverley novels came to be felt as a periodical craving all over Europe; just as, in the case of Napoleon, some bloody battle by land or by sea was indispensable, after each few months' interval, to pacify the public taste for blood, long irritated by copious gratification. Now it happened in 1823 that no Waverley novel was in readiness, or likely to be in readiness for the Leipzig fair at Michaelmas. Upon which a cry arose amongst the German booksellers—Forge one! "Presumptuous enough that," the reader will say. Doubtless. However, the thing was done. A German, and (to better the case) a German of ultra-dulness, set to work upon a novel. He called it "Walladmor"—a name, by the way, to be accented not upon the penultimate, "Walládmor," but upon the antepenultimate or first syllable—viz., "Wálladmor," as appears from the old rhymes connected with the tale—e. g.

"When blackmen storm the outer door, Grief shall be over at Walladmor!"

where all would be spoiled, if the accent were thrown on the penultimate. Well, this book—this "Walladmor"—made its appearance in the German language, not as what it really was—a German novel, written by a German novelist—but as a translation from an English original of Sir Walter Scott. In this character it appeared at Leipzig; in this character it was instantly dispersed over the length and breadth of Germany; and in this character it crossed the sea to London. I must here stop to mention, that other tricks had been meditated upon Sir Walter: and I will venture to say, that, sooner or later, one of these tricks will be tried. In a country like England—where (by means of our exqu沿海 organization through newspapers, &c., and our consequent unity of feeling,) an author may acquire a more intense popularity, and more rapidly, than he ever can upon the continent—there will always be a motive for pirating such an author, or for counterfeiting him, beyond what is ever likely to exist upon the Continent. In Sir Walter Scott's case, it is true, there was a mystery which added greatly to the popularity. But still it strikes me, that, simply from the unifying powers at work amongst ourselves, more intense popularity will continually arise in this country than can elsewhere. The everlasting reverberation of a name from a dense population, furnished with the artificial means for prolonging and repeating the echoes, must lead to a result quite inconceivable amongst the non-conducting and frittered population of Germany. There will, therefore, arise in the course of the next century, continual temptations for repeating the trick of counterfeiting, and also that other trick meditated upon Sir Walter (or rather upon the house of Constable) which I am going to mention.—It had been much agitated* in Germany, and I believe also in France, whether—if a translation

* This was a question almost sure to be suggested, if it were only by the intense book-trade interest that had gradually connected itself with the priority of importation, and the priority of translation, on any occasion of a Waverley novel. Bribes were offered by commission for the furtive transmission of proof sheets from the Edinburgh press; expresses were kept sleeping in books and spurs, to forward the earliest copies; translators were preoccupied by retaining fees; for instance, Lindau, Methusalem, Muller, Dr Spiesker, Lots, Von Halem, and many others; and between these translators, the most furious races were run—all in order to ensure an earlier entrance into the market; for, though Leipzig, in its half-yearly fairs, was the general market, still, in a special call like this, there were extraordinary means of getting into circulation. Hence, and from a competition so burning, it may be readily supposed, that many errors would creep into the translations; and especially where imperfect parts of volumes happened to be transmitted; of which there is an amusing instance mentioned by the German author of "Walladmor," in his dedication to Sir Walter Scott—"Ah, Sir Walter! did you but know to what straits the poor German translator of a Walter-Scottish novel is reduced, you would pardon greater liberties than any I have taken. Ecoutez. First of all, comes the publisher, and cheapens a translator in the very cheapest market of translation-jobbers that can be supposed likely to do any justice to the work. Next come the sheets, dripping wet from the Edinburgh press, with or without sense and connexion, just as chance may order it. Nay, it happens not unfrequently that, if a sheet should chance to end with one or two syllables of an unfinished word, we Germans are obliged to translate this first instalment of a future meaning; and, by the time the next sheet arrives with the syllables in arrears, we first learn into what confounded scrapes we have fallen, by guessing and translating at hazard. Nomina sunt odiosa: else—but I shall content myself with reminding the public of the well-known and sad mishap which occurred in the translation of Kenilworth. This is sufficiently notorious. Another is more recent—I will relate it.—The sheet, as it was received from Edinburgh, closed unfortunately thus:—To save himself from these disasters, he became an agent of Smith; and we all translated.—Um sich aus diesen trübseligkeiten zu erretten wurde er agent bei einem Schmiedemeister; that is, he became foreman to a blacksmith.

were made of a Waverley novel into a foreign language, and afterwards that translation (German, suppose, or French) were translated back again into English by a person who had never seen the original, and who consequently would give a sufficient colouring of difference to the style—whether, I say, that retranslation might not be lawfully introduced into England, and lawfully sustain itself as a saleable commodity in the character of a foreign book.

Meantime, whilst this suggestion was under debate—a suggestion which applied entirely to the case of a true Waverley novel—one bookseller hit upon another more directly applying to the present case of September 1824, the unexpected case of no Waverley novel offering to appear. He, therefore—this enterprising bibliopole, Her Herbig of Berlin—resolved to have one forged; and without delay he hired the man that should forge it. Well, this forgery was perpetrated; and, the better to hoax the German public, in three volumes. London it reached on a certain day in the autumn of 1824, towards the close of September or of October—I really forget which; but this I remember, that there was barely a space of forty-eight hours for reading and reviewing the book, a book of a thousand pages, before the literary journals of the month would be closed of necessity against further contributions. One copy only had been received as yet in London; and this was bespoke for Sir Walter Scott. Somebody's interest, I know not whose, procured it for me, as a man who read German fluently: and within the time allowed, I had completed a tolerably long article for the London Magazine. It may be supposed that reading the book was quite out of the question, for one who had, in so brief a time, to write a long paper upon it. The course I pursued, therefore, was this:—I drew up a somewhat rhetorical account of the German hoax; explained the drift of it; and then gave a translation of such passages as had happened to strike me. To the best of my remembrance, I selected three: one, the opening chapter, which introduces the two heroes of the novel, as sole survivors of a steamer which had blown up in the Bristol Channel, swimming in company, then engaged in a murderous conflict for a barrel, and finally reconciled, by mutual acts of generosity, into giving each other all the assistance within their power. This was a truly German scene. The next was a snow storm amongst the mountains of Merionethshire, and not without some interest. The last described the committal of a principal person in the tale to an ancient castle, (Walladmor,) on a charge of treason. And, in this case, the incidents moved amongst picturesque circumstances of mountain scenery, with the adjuncts of storm and moonlight, not ill described. How it could have happened, I do not know, but it did happen, that I had stumbled by pure accident upon almost every passage in the whole course of the thousand pages which could be considered tolerable. Naturally enough, the publishers of the London Magazine were encouraged by these specimens to hope well of the book; and, at their request, I undertook to translate it. Confident in my powers of rapid translation, I undertook even to keep up with the printer; three sheets, or forty-eight pages, I made sure of producing daily; at which rate, a volume would be finished in a week, and three weeks might see the whole work ready for the public. Never was there such a disappointment, or such a perplexity. Not until the printing had actually commenced, with arrangements for keeping several compositors at work, did I come to understand the hopeless task I had undertaken. Such rubbish—such “almighty” nonsense, (to speak transatlantique)—no eye has ever beheld as 960, to say the very least, of these thousand pages. To translate them was perfectly out of the question; the very devils and runners of the press would have mutinied against being parties to such atrocious absurdities. What was to be done? Had there been any ready means for making the publishers aware of the case in its whole extent, probably I should have declined the engagement; but, as this could not be accomplished without reading half a volume to them, I thought it better to pursue the task; mending and retouching into something like common sense wherever that was possible; but far more frequently forging new materials, in pure despair of mending the old; and reconstructing, very nearly, the whole edifice from the foundation upwards. And hence arose this singular result: that, without any original intention to do so, I had been gradually led by circumstances, to build upon this German hoax a second and equally complete English hoax. The German “Walladmor” professed to be a translation from the English of Sir Walter Scott—my “Walladmor” professed to be a translation from the German; but, for the reasons I have given, it was no more a translation from the German than the German from the English. It must be supposed that writing into the framework of another man's story fearfully cramped the freedom of my movements. There were absurdities in the very conduct of the story and the development of the plot, which could not always be removed without more time than the press allowed me; for I kept the press moving, though slowly—namely, at the rate of half-a-sheet (eight pages) a day. In some instances, I let the incidents stand, and contented myself with rewriting

Now, and it is to tell what followed. We had dashed at it, and we waited in trembling hope for the result. Next morning's post arrived, and showed that all Germany had been basely betrayed by a catch-word of Mr Constable's. For the next sheet took up the imperfect catch-word thus:—“field matches, (i. e. Smithfield matches,) or marriages contracted for money?” and the German sentence should have been cobbled and put to rights as follows:—“Er negocierte, um sich aufzuhehlen, die sogenannten Smithfields heirathen, &c. Should have been, I say; but, wo is me, for all Germany! it was too late; the translated sheet had been already finished off with the blacksmith in it—Heaven confound him! And the blacksmith is there to this day, and cannot be ejected.”

every word of the ridiculous narration, and the still more ridiculous dialogues. In others, I recomposed even the incidents. In particular, I was obliged to put in a new catastrophe. Upon this it struck me, that certain casuistical doubts might arise, as to the relation which I held to my German principal, which doubts I thus expressed, in a dedication to that person:—"Having some intention, sir, of speaking rather freely of you and your German translation, in a postscript to the second volume of my English one, I am shy of sending a presentation copy to Berlin. Neither you nor your publisher might relish all that I may take it into my head to say. Yet, as books sometimes travel far, if you should ever happen to meet with mine knocking about the world, in Germany, I would wish you to know that I have endeavoured to make you what amends I could, for any little affront which I meditate in that postscript, by dedicating my English translation to yourself. You will be surprised to observe that your three corpulent German volumes, have collapsed into two English ones, of rather consumptive appearance. The English climate, you see, does not agree with them; and they have lost flesh as rapidly as Captain le Harneis, in chapter the eighth. We have a story in England, trite enough here, and a sort of philosophic commonplace, like Buridan's ass, but possibly unknown in Germany; and, as it is pertinent to the case between us, I will tell it, the more so as it involves a metaphysical question, and such questions, you know, go up from all parts of Europe, to you people in Germany, as 'the courts above.' Sir John Cutler had a pair of silk stockings, which his housekeeper, Dolly, darned for a long term of years with worsted; at the end of which time, the last gleam of silk had vanished, and Sir John's silk stockings were found to have degenerated into worsted. Now, upon this, a question arose amongst the metaphysicians, whether Sir John's stockings retained (or, if not, at what precise period they lost) their personal identity. The moralists again were anxious to know, whether Sir John's stockings could be considered the same 'accountable' stockings from first to last. The lawyers put the same question in another shape, by demanding whether any felony which Sir John's stockings could be supposed to have committed in youth, might legally be the subject of indictment against the same stockings when superannuated; whether a legacy left to the stockings in their first year, could be claimed by them in their last; and whether the worsted stockings could be sued for the debts of the silk stockings. Some such questions will arise, I apprehend, upon your German 'Walladmor,' as darned by myself. But here, my good sir, stop a moment. I must not have you interpret the precedent of Sir John and Dolly too strictly. Sir John's stockings were originally of silk, and darned with worsted; but don't you conceit that to be the case here. No, no! I flatter myself the case between us is just the other way. Your worsted stockings it is that I have darned with silk; and the relations which I and Dolly bear to you and Sir John are precisely inverted. What could induce you to dress good St. David in a threadbare suit, it passes my skill to guess—it is enough that I am sure it would give general disgust; and, therefore, I have not only made him a present of a new coat, but have also put a little embroidery upon it. And I really think I shall astonish the good folks in Merionethshire by my account of that saint's festival. In my young days, I wandered much in that beautiful shire, and other shires which lie contiguous; and many a kind thing was done to me in poor men's cottages, which, to my dying day, I shall never be able to repay individually. Hence, as occasions offer, I would seek to make my acknowledgments generally to the country. Upon Penmorfa sands, I once had an interesting adventure—and I have accordingly commemorated Penmorfa. To the little town of Machynleth, I am indebted for various hospitalities; and I think Machynleth will acknowledge itself indebted to me exclusively for its mayor and corporation. Others there are besides, in that neighbourhood, both towns and men, that, when they shall read my St. David's Day, will hardly know whether they are standing on their head or their heels. As to the Bishop of Bangor, of those same days, I owed his Lordship no particular favour, and, therefore, you will observe, I have now taken my vengeance on that see for ever, by making it do suit and service to the house of Walladmor. But enough of St David's Day. There are some other little changes which I have been obliged to make, in deference to the taste of this country. In the case of Captain le Harneis, it appears to me that, from imperfect knowledge of the English language, you have confounded the words 'sailor' and 'tailor'; for you make the Captain talk very much like the latter. There is, however, a great deal of difference in the habits of the two animals, according to our English naturalists; and, therefore, I have retouched the Captain, and curled his whiskers. I have also taken the liberty of curing Miss Walladmor of an hysterical affection. What purpose it answered, I believe you would find it hard to say; and I am sure she has enough to bear without that. Your geography, let me tell you, was none of the best, and I have brushed it up myself. Something the public will bear: topographical sins are venial in a romance; and no candid people look very sharply after the hydrography of a novel. But still, my dear sir, it did strike me, that the case of a man's swimming on his back from Bristol to the Isle of Anglesea, was a little beyond the privilege granted by the most maternal public. No, pardon me, that rather exceeds the public swallow. Besides, it would have exposed us both to illiberal attacks in the Quarterly Review, from Mr Barrow of the Admiralty, your weak point being his strong one; and particularly, because I had taken liberties with Mr Croker,* who is a colleague and old crony of his. Your chronology, by the way, was also damaged; but that has gone to the watchmaker's, and it is now regulated, so as to go as well as the Horse-Guards. Now, finally, 'Mine dear sars,' could you not translate me back into German, and darn me as I have darned you? But you must not 'sweat' me down in the same ratio that I have 'sweated' you; for, if you do that, I fear that my 'dimensions will become invisible to any thick sight' in Germany, and I shall 'present no mark' to the critical enemy. Darn me into two portly volumes; and, then, perhaps, I will translate you back again into English, and darn you with silk so hyper-lustrous, that, were Dolly and Professor Kant to rise from the dead, Dolly should grow jealous of me, and the professor confess himself more thoroughly puzzled and confounded, as to the matter of personal identity, by the final 'Walladmor,' than ever he had been by the Cutlerian stockings. Jusqu' au revoir, my dear principal, hoping that you will soon invest me with that character, in relation to yourself; and that you will then sign, as it is now my turn to sign—Your obedient (but not very faithful) Translator."

It will be observed that, in this dedication, I have not ventured to state the nature of my alterations, in their whole extent. This I could not do in prudence; for, though I should really have made myself a party to a gross fraud upon the public purse, by smuggling into circulation a load of hideous trash, under the momentary attraction of its connexion with Sir Walter Scott, (an attraction which might have sold one edition before its nature was discovered)—though I could not do this, and therefore took the only honourable course open to me in so strange a dilemma,—viz., that of substituting a readable, and, at all events, not dull novel, for the abortion I had been betrayed into sanctioning; yet it might too much have repelled readers, if I had frankly stated beforehand, the extent to which I had been compelled to recompose this German hoax. In a postscript, however, when the reader might be supposed to have finished the book, I spoke a little more plainly. And, as there will be some amusement to many readers in what I said—which (owing to the very imperfect publication* of the book) is, in reality, nearly "as good as manuscript"—I shall here quote a part of it:—"E quovis illo non fit Mercurius," or, to express this Roman proverb by our own homely one—"You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear.' Certainly it is difficult to do so, and none can speak to that more feelingly than myself: but not impossible, as I hope that my 'Walladmor' will shew compared with the original. This is a point which, on another account, demands a word or two of explanation, as the reader will also find it difficult to understand upon what principle of translation three thick-set German volumes can have shrunk into two English ones of somewhat meagre proportion."—I then went on to explain, that the German pseudo-Scott had chosen three, not because his matter naturally extended so far, but on the principle of exact imitation. "A Scotch novel from the Constable press, and not in three volumes, would have been detected in limine as a hoax and a counterfeit. Such a novel would be as ominous and prodigious as 'double Thebes;' as perverse as drinking a man's health with two times two, (which, in fact, would be an insult;) as palpably fraudulent as a subscription of £99:19s., (where it would be clear that some man had pocketed a shilling;) and as contrary to all natural history as that twenty-seven tailors should make either more or fewer than the cube-root of that number. What may be the occult law of the Constable press, which compels it into these three-headed births, might be hard to explain. Mr Kant himself, with all his subtlety, could never make up his mind in his Königsberg lectures on that subject—why it is that no man thinks of presenting a lady with a service of twenty-three cups and saucers, though evidently she is just as likely to have a party of twenty-three people as twenty-four. Nay, if the reader himself were to make such a present to an English grand jury, when the party never could be more than twenty-three, he would infallibly order a service of twenty-four, though he must, in his own conscience, be aware that the twenty-fourth cup and saucer was a mere Irish bull, and a disgusting pleonasm; a twenty-fourth grand-jury man being as entirely a chimera as the 'abstract lord mayor' of Scriblerus on a 30th of February. Not only without a reason therefore, but even against reason, people have a superstitious regard to certain numbers; and Mr Constable has a right to his superstition, which, after all, may be the classical one—that threes happens to be the number of the Graces." This compliment, by the way, was delicate enough to merit an acknowledgment from the Constable press. So much then being settled—that, as a prima facie step towards sustaining the hoax, three must be the number of the volumes—I then went on to say:—"But what if there was not time to complete so many volumes so as to appear at the Leipzig fair? In that case, two men must do what one could not. Yet, as the second man could not possibly know what his leader was about, he must, of necessity, produce his under stratum without the least earthly reference to the upper; his thorough bass without relation to the melody in the treble. This was awkward; and, to meet the difficulty, it appears to me, that the upper man said to the lower, 'Write me a huge ally and allies in his poem of "Talavera," more Hibernica, with the accent on the first syllable.

* The system of quack-puffing, applied to books, and, above all, the artifice of seducing a reader into the reading of paragraphs which else he would shun, by holding out false expectation in the heading—all this, in common with other literary men, I deem disgraceful to literature. Such practices lower an honourable profession to the level of a mechanic trade. But the system of soliciting public attention by plain unvarnished advertisements—that is rendered indispensable to the publication of a book. That wanting, (as in "Walladmor") the book is not published.

heap of speeches upon politics and Welsh genealogy, write me loads of rubbish, astrological, cosmological 'and diabolical,' (as Mrs Malaprop has it :) have these ready. I meantime have two characters (Sir Morgan and Mr Dulberry the Radical) upon whom I can hang all that you write. You make hooks enough—I'll make eyes; and, what between my men and your speeches, my eyes and your hooks, it's odds but we make a very pretty novel.' Such I conceive to have been the pleasant arrangement upon which the machinery was worked, so as to fetch up the way before the Michaelmas Fair began. And thus were two (perhaps three) men's labours dovetailed into one German romance. Aliter non fit, Avite, liber. When the rest of the rigging was complete, the politics, genealogy, astrology, &c., were mounted as 'royals' and 'sky-scrappers,' the ship weighed, and soon after made Leipsic and London under a press of sail." Then, having protested that this trash was absolutely beyond hope, and that I should have made myself a party to the author's folly or his knavery by translating it, I offered, however, in the case of my reader's complaining of these large retrenchments, to translate the whole for a "consideration;" to cast it upon the complainant's premises, and to shovel it into the coal-cellar, or any more appropriate place. But thus, I explained, did in fact arise the difference in size, as well as quality, between the German and the English "Walladmor." And henceforwards I shall think the better of the German author as well as myself so long as I live: of him for an unrivalled artist of sows' ears, and of myself for a very respectable manufacturer of silk purses. Thus much to account for my omissions; which, however, some readers may facetiously regard, far from needing apology, as my only merits; and that would be as cruel as Lessing's suggestion to an author for his table of errata—"Apropos of errata, suppose you were to put your whole book into the list of errata." More candid readers, I am inclined to hope, will blame me for not having made even larger alterations in the book; and that would be a flattering critique, as it must presume that I could have improved it; and compliment never wears so delightful an aspect as when it takes the shape of blame. The truth is, I have altered; yes, altered and altered, until I became alarmed. The ghost of Sir John Cutler, of Sir John's stockings, of Sir Francis Drake's ship—nay, of Jason's ship, and older ghosts even than these—all illustrating the same perplexing question, began to haunt me. Metaphysical doubts fell upon me; and I came to fear that, if to a new beginning and a new catastrophe, I were to add a new middle, possibly there might come some evil-minded person who might say that I also was a hoaxer, an English hoaxer building upon a German hoaxer. Then I paused. But still I have gone too far; for it is a most delicate operation to take work out of another man's loom and put work in; joinings and sections will sometimes appear; colours will not always match. In general I would request the reader to consider himself indebted to me for anything he may find particularly good; and, in any case, to load my unhappy "principal" with the blame of everything that is wrong. Coming upon any passage which he thinks superlatively bad, let him be assured that I had no hand in it. Should he change his opinion upon it, I may be disposed to reconsider whether I had not some hand in it. This will be the more reasonable in him, as the critics will "feel it their duty" (oh! of course, "their duty") to take the very opposite course. However, if he reads German, my German "Walladmor" is at his service, and he can judge for himself. Not reading German, let him take my word, when I apply to the English "Walladmor" the spirit of the old bull:—

"Had you seen but these roads before they were made,
You would lift up your eyes, and bless Marshal Wade."

Here closed my explanations; but, as a l'envoy or quod bene vortat to the whole concern, I added something—a alediction and an ave in the same breath—which, for the sake of the Spenserian allusion, many people will relish; and even yet I pique myself upon it as a felicitous passage. It began with a quotation; and this quotation, as pretty broadly I hinted, was from myself—myself as the reviewer in the London Magazine. Thus it was:—

"A friend of mine" (so we all say when we are looking out for some masquerade dress under which to praise ourselves, or to abuse some dear friend) "a friend of mine has written a very long review (or analysis rather) of the German 'Walladmor,' in a literary journal of the metropolis. He concludes with the following passage, which I choose to quote on account of the graceful allusion it contains, partly also because it gives me an opportunity for trying my hand at an allusion to the same romantic legend:—'Now, turning back from the hoaxer to the hoax,' we shall conclude with this proposition:—All readers of Spenser must know that the true Florimel lost her girdle, which, they will remember, was found by Sir Satyrane, and was adjudged by a whole assemblage of knights to the false Florimel, although it did not quite fit her. She—viz., the snowy or false Florimel—

"exceedingly did fret;
And, snatching from his hand half angrily
The belt again, about her body 'gan it tie.
Yet nathemore would it her body fit;
Yet nathless to her, as her due right,
It yielded was by them that judged it."

PEEPS INTO PARIS.

BY GRIMGIBBER.

NO. II.—THE HOUSEHOLD HOSPITAL.

In the present Malthusianism of the social system, when paupers are compelled to eat, like hunger, through stone walls, in order to take a peep at their wives, there is some comfort in the contemplation of an establishment where human nature in rags is still admitted to participate in the impulses and sensibilities of human nature in purple and fine linen.

Among the most painful pictures traced by the iron pencil of Crabbe, is his sketch of the Almshouse. Yet the portrait, now of thirty years' celebrity, wants a single gloomy shade to render it a still truthful representation. The grief of those whom God hath joined, put asunder by the hand of man, hath a sound almost as doleful as that of Rachel weeping for her children; and the forced widowhood of the poor, if a salutary, is truly an afflicting measure of modern jurisprudence.

It happened that, after perusing, the other day, in a French newspaper, the details of a revolt in the workhouse of one of our great manufacturing towns, (embellished by the translator till it might have been mistaken for a description of the Rape of the Sabines,) I set forth upon one of those daily saunterings which initiate me into much of Parisian life and manners, unknown to those who put their trust in chariots or in horsemen.

I was retarded, however, unexpectedly, on the threshold of my attic. The most independent of men is, in some trifling particular or other, dependent upon the ministry of his fellow-creatures; and even I, Grimgibber, though as little sophisticated as most members of civilized society, have still a point or two to descend or ascend, before I can pronounce myself superior to social ceremony. My "pomp" is not altogether of the nature which Lear counsels to "take physic;" but it might not be the worse for a saline draught. This is a long preamble, to apologise to myself and the world for employing a shoeblack! Servant have I none. I cannot say to this or that fellow in livery, "do this, and he doeth it;" but there is an honest drudge of all work appertaining to the house wherein I am one of seven-and-twenty lodgers, to whom I sometimes say, "Clean my shoes," and he cleans them—i.e., when he hath nothing else to do. Yet, let me not wrong my friend Jacques. Not being a man of wit and fashion about town, I need not sacrifice my friend for the sake of a jest; but boldly admit that, for the small gratuity of forty sols, or one shilling and eightpence, per week, Jacques performs as many little offices in my household, as the same sum, with a guinea added to it for board wages, would not purchase of an accomplished flunky. It is true the poor fellow makes his breakfast upon the scanty residue of mine; and succeeds to the poet's threadbare coats and darned hosen. But, as his customary suit is of blue basane, such as forms the costume in ordinary of the Auvergnat porters and water-carriers of Paris, his utmost gain from the Grimgibber défroque is the twopence-halfpenny he may be able to extort for them, from the fripier, or old-clothesman, at the door.

I dare not reflect upon the number of times per diem which, for this consideration, Jacques feels himself, in honour and duty, bound to mount five steep floors into my attic! 'Tis a good, affectionate creature—a florid, hard-featured young fellow of five-and-twenty—with iron muscles, a frame of adamant, and a heart—but the heart shall speak anon for itself. Though the slave of a dozen other individuals, at least as capricious and exacting as myself, Jacques never crosses my threshold out of humour. Like a lark, he wakes me with a song; and I could sometimes find it in my heart to break his head, when, in the act of delivering to my hand some "small account," the very sight of which sets my teeth on edge, he salutes my eyes and ears with his usual merry face and merry tune. One would think that care never came near him. Did he but know the gripe of such troubles, his sympathizing nature would render his countenance as glumphy as an undertaker's, when presenting me with these unwelcome missives.

It is now three years since I became the tenant of my aerial habitation, (which procures me the honour of being the first person to whom Phœbus makes his bow every morning when he rises upon Paris,) and, during the whole of the period, the assiduities of Jacques have been on the increase.

The grand apartments of the three lower stories of the house, probably furnish the drudge with greater gains; but in them he is bullied by upper servants, and exposed to the contumely of those jacks in office or in livery, who have no better mode of shewing their consequence than tyrannizing over their equals. In the Grimgibber garrets, on the contrary, he meets with small gains, but gentle entreatment. He comes with a sympathizing heart, to the abode of poverty; for he hath already learnt the secret, that in suffering persecution we learn mercy. He respects the poor author's threadbare coat, because it ensures consideration from the wearer towards his own fustian jacket; and, if the leathern straps of his porter's crochet have galled his own shoulders, he tacitly understands that the lodger in an attic, who breakfasts on a twopenny roll and a cup of milk, may have burthens of his own to bear, scarcely less galling.

Let it not be inferred that my friend Jacques presumes upon these philosophical speculations.

His address is as respectful to myself as to the rich Viscount who inhabits our ground-floor, or rather as to his valet-de-chambre, who is a far greater man than the Viscount. His "Monsieur a-t-il quelques choses à commander ?" is as deferentially phrased in the third person, as though "Monsieur" were one of those dainty Messieurs to whom Boivin charges five guineas for their cambric shirts, and Blin twice as much for their superfine coats. Sometimes when, of a winter's evening, he sees me coaxing up the embers of my seventy fire, and trying to throw as much light as possible from my solitary candle upon the sheet of paper I am scribbling, the poor fellow seems loath to leave me to my loneliness; makes excuses for lingering to turn down my bed, arrange my wardrobe, or place my cafetière of hot water on the hearth. Uneasy at seeing me so comfortless, it is only by increase of kindness he knows how to increase my stock of comforts.

With all this diligence, however, I have had occasion to regret, for some weeks past, that Jacques is beginning to be somewhat remiss in his duties. The cafetière, though still placed on the hearth, has sometimes been placed there without water; and a hole in the bottom (though mended without any appeal to my purse, by some tinkering Auvergnat cousin or friend of Jacques) bore a fatal accusation against the absence of mind of my poor errand-man. Though far from blind to his faults, my countenance towards him, on this trying occasion, was more in sorrow than in anger; for it was clear to me, that the poor fellow was in love; and, as I had more than once caught him philandering at the pump in the court-yard, or with his head inserted into the one-pane window of the lodge, discoursing with the porter's pretty daughter, Ma'mselle Effine, (an under nursery-maid in the neighbourhood, who visits her parents on Sundays and fête days,) I saw no hope of amendment, because no hope of a happy termination to his love affairs. A sous bonne, with wages of ten francs a month, and a commissionnaire gaining about four times as much by hard and incessant labour, have clearly no hope of laying by a sufficient provision for the fruits of an early marriage.

I sometimes longed to discuss the subject, and favour the young fellow with my advice. But when on the point of pronouncing the name of Mademoiselle Effine, or more properly "Josephine," (for Jacques alone is probably privileged to accost her by her pet-name of familiarity,) I found it impossible to proceed. I had not courage to hazard a lesson of prudence, which might, perhaps, put to silence those joyous songs upon his lips, or depress the cheerfulness of countenance, which gleams once or twice a-day, like sunshine, into my gloomy attic. I felt that it was my duty to speak, but it was my pleasure to forbear.

I once saw a superannuated pointer led out to be shot. Old Don, a splendid fellow in his day, was rheumatic in his loins, as well as infirm from age; and his master had begun to feel it an eyesore, when the faithful old beast trailed itself across the lawn to bask in the sunshine. A groom was bidden, therefore, to proceed to execution. But no sooner did poor Don behold the Manton and powder-flask brought forth, than the stanchness of old times revived in him. Uttering a cry of pleasure, he dragged himself towards the man, leaped up, and licked his hands, and displayed such vivid tokens of delight, that the poor fellow flung down the gun, and begged his master to take the trouble of shooting the dog himself. In like wise, the moment I pronounced to poor Jacques the name of the porter's daughter, such a brightness of joy beamed in his eye, such a flush of pleasure deepened his ruddy complexion, that it was impossible to say to him—"Friend Jacques! if thou art wise, thou wilt eschew the damsel's company for evermore." I could as soon have shot old Don as broken the heart of the commissionnaire.

Nevertheless, when my friend's sins of omission arrived at the point of leaving muddy at my door, till one o'clock of the afternoon, the boots deposited there at six on the day preceding, I made up my mind to be angry—to give not only advice, but a reprimand. The day was, luckily, fine; the night preceding had been sultry; and, thanks to the calcareous particles of which the Parisian soil is composed, that which was mud on Wednesday had on Thursday pulverised to dust. I was able to betake myself to my chamois shoes, with the resignation of a man whose stock of boots never places him under the grammatical necessity of deciding whether the noun pair does or does not take an s in the plural. There would be time enough in the evening to seek out Jacques, and remonstrate, and admonish.

Meanwhile, I directed my wandering steps toward the Faubourg St Germain—that many-coloured quarter of Paris, where, peeping through the archways of successive Portes Cochées, you may detect at one step an aristocratic palace; at the next, the atelier of a bookbinder; at the third, the Hotel of one of the Ministers, Home or War department; fourthly, a convent; fifthly, an hospital; sixthly, perhaps the Hotel de Cluny, (nearly in the same condition as when the sister of Henry VIII. and widow of Louis XII. spent her honeymoon with the Duke of Brandon, within its walls;) or, seventhly, the Palais des Thermes, the Lutetian residence of the Emperor Julian!—I love the old dingy Rue St Jacques, with its peaked roofs and historical reminiscences; I love the dismantled Sorbonne, with its one instructive tomb; the Scotch College, with its Jacobinical associations; St Germain des Pres, where the marble effigy of a pious King still offers up the sacrifice of his crown and sceptre to the Almighty; the gloomy Abbaye; the gay and rose-embudded Luxembourg; the Abbaye-aux-bois, and its living lively old women; the Carmelites, with their legends of lovely penitents of the Court of Louis XII;—but, above all, I love the Rue de Sèvres, the street where Religion wears its fairest aspect, under the garb of Benevolence.

Traverse the Rue de Sévres at what hour you may, you are sure to meet one or more Sisters of Charity, in their coarse woollen gowns and clean white guimpes, gliding along with the noiseless step acquired by habitual ministry in the chambers of the sick; bent either upon some pious errand between one hospital and another, or carrying succour to the afflicted, or commissioned by their superiors to inquire into the authenticity of some tale of woe. If young, (and many a face both young and fair may be found under shadow of the guimpe), the nun's countenance is usually cast down as she moves along; and, as she passes, her lips may be seen murmuring a prayer or paternoster. But, if middle-aged or more, she looks straight before her, her spirit being too much engrossed by the cares and duties of life to need forcible estrangement from the scene around. Then comes the grave-looking priest, pale with vigils and fasting, about to convey to the pillow of the sick and needy those spiritual consolations of which health and opulence have yet to learn the value. Unlike his spruce snug Reverence of the English Church, his form is spare, his eye fixed with inward meditation. "Nothing can touch him further" of the vanities of life. He has but one thought, one hope, one care—the folding of the flock—whereof he must render an account to the Lord of all Christian shepherds.

To this conventual quarter of the city did I direct the steps which the misdoings of Jacques (if my gentle dulness may be excused the pun) had rendered bootless. As Wordsworth sings—

"I wandered lonely as a cloud" along the Rue de Varennes, where a rich pursuer of the Yankee navy has usurped the place of royalty, by hiring from Madame Adelaide de France, the stately and historical Hotel de Biron, and where the splendid convent of the Sacré cœur de Jésus, with its hundreds of pretty pensionnaires of all nations, plays the part of the celebrated Panthéon of former times. When, lo! just as I had passed the lofty gateway of the convent, I was startled by a familiar sound—the voice of Jacques, expanding into the identical merry song with which it is his cruel practice to advise me of a morning that it is time to rise. The caitiff, after neglecting my boots, was doubtless on his road to the Barrière du Maine, that favoured domain of Bacchus, where some hundred or so of wine shops and public gardens attest the convenience of drinking your Burgundy or Bourdeaux, duty free, previous to its entrance within the boundary wall, sacred to the claims of the Octroi, of which, at the period of its erection, it was wittily written—

"Le mur murant Paris rend Paris mur-murant !"

A further examination of the case proved to me that I was mistaken. Instead of plodding along the causeway arm in arm with some boon companion, as I expected, I descried poor Jacques seated side by side with the driver of a small cart, loaded with a few articles of furniture, the plainish of a beggar's household—namely, a bed, two chairs, and a chest of drawers. The fellow was singing and laughing so heartily with his companion, that his errand was plainly one of choice. He was doing his own business. He was supervising the removal of his own mobilier; nay, the hilarity of his department convinced me, no less than the dual number of the chairs, that it was to no bachelor home he was conveying his belongings. There was evidently matrimony in the wind! My advice would come too late; the pretty Effie, the charming Ma'mselle Josephine, was about to become Madame Jacques.

If greetings in the market place are bad things, expostulations on the king's highway are worse. I determined, therefore, to follow Maitre Jacques and his bedstead towards some secluded spot, where the still, small voice of wisdom might be more distinctly audible; and, in pursuance of this determination, traversed in all their length the streets of Varennes and La Planche, (traversing that noisy thoroughfare, the Rue de Bae,) till the cart and the song of the poor Auvergnat stopped suddenly at a doorway, forming the angle of the Rue de la Chaise, which I refrain from calling porte cochère; since the only coach which ever passes through, is the hearse conveying to its last abode the reliques of the dead. I knew the place at once. It was the asylum known by the name of Household Hospital, or Hospice des Menages. After all, then, I was mistaken. Jacques and Josephine, in all the plenitude of youth, health, and vigour, could have no pretension to admission into an establishment, of which the male inmates must have attained seventy, and the female sixty years of age! The errand man was only professionally engaged in removing the goods of some person about to enter the hospice.

"So far from home, Jacques!" cried I, accosting him as, with his cap cocked gallantly over one eye, he leaped down from the cart.

"Dieu de dieu, Monsieur Graingibel !" ejaculated he, in like surprise. "Mon bon Monsieur, who would ever have expected such goodness of you!"

"It is true the season is scarcely sufficiently advanced for summer shoes," said I, looking down significantly on my dust-coloured chamois, and fancying that the Auvergnat was praising my forbearance in not reprimanding the neglects of his blackening-brush. "But never mind; you will make up for it to-morrow."

"Don't let's talk of to-morrow, on the happiest day of my life!" cried Jacques, with a reckless joyousness of tone, which sounded cheering as a marriage bell. "Aho ! not bourgeois—why didn't you warn me of your intentions of doing me this signal honour! I would have told you that three o'clock was the hour for admission. They won't be here till three. As soon as I have deposited the furniture demanded by the rules of the Hospice—not very splendid you see, but it will be easy to change the deal for walnut-wood, or even mahogany, who knows? if ~~there~~ go smooth with us—I am to go back for the old folks. 'Tis a good distance you know" (to the Faubourg du Roule, even for you, who, without compliment, step out like a mountaineer; and I shan't try more than a foot's pace over the rough pavement; for 'tis three years, you know, sir, since the old lady was over her threshold. But why didn't you tell me you were coming?"

Our mutual blunders were gradually cleared up; but, as it appeared that whatever might be the errand of Jacques, or whoever his employers, he was in a desperate hurry, I was careful not to be a hinderance to his movements; but waited patiently, while he and his companion, under sanction of the porter of the asylum, conveyed the furniture across the gardens, intersected by shady alleys of lofty trees, which occupy the vast area, once a lazaretto for sick children, next an hospital for insane persons and idiots, under the well-known name of "les petites maisons," and at present a refuge for the aged poor. While Jacques was carrying on his shoulders the wooden bedstead, I had leisure to remark that the small tenements surrounding the garden, from which arose the names of "les petites maisons" have given place to large, airy, uniform, buildings, well adapted to contain the eight hundred beds which form the complement of the establishment. The porter, during my poor commissionnaire's absence, took upon himself the task of explaining the rules, regulations, and system of the hospital; which, by the way, is one of the numerous public institutions for which France is indebted to the "Republique une et indivisible."

Not altogether eleemosynary in their condition, the inmates of the Household Hospital are admitted upon payment of a sum of £40, which secures them meat, drink, clothing, firing, pocket money, to the amount of seven shillings a-month, for the remainder of their days, and burial at the close. This payment, however, regards widows and widowers, and admits them only to the dormitories of the establishment. To obtain a double room, and set up a household apart, a further trifling gratuity is required; or rather, eighty of the best bed-rooms are thus appropriated, and the remaining eighty bestowed gratuitously on couples wholly destitute of resources. Nothing can be neater or cleaner than the chambers allotted to either class, opening from an airy corridor, several hundred feet long, having opposite to each door its locker, for wood and charcoal. The service of the whole establishment is conducted by forty nuns, Sœurs de Charité; and the exquisite and delicate neatness of their kitchens, laundry, and gallery of linen presses, do honour to their jurisdiction. Abundance of wholesome food—such as rice stewed in broth, meat, vegetables, and stewed fruit—are at all hours in preparation, in a cuisine, which has, nevertheless, the airiness and elegance of a varnished Dutch toy.

"Would Monsieur like to see the dormitories?" demanded the porter, perceiving how much I was interested in the details of the establishment; and immediately a door was opened into a ward containing more than one hundred clean white beds, beside which many of the female inmates sat knitting in their chairs, in groups of two or three, beguiling the remnant of their numbered days with harmless reminiscient gossip, which so fully occupied their attention that they took no note of our entrance. A few of even the bedridden had knitting needles in their hands, while some charitable neighbour sat by, reading or chatting for their entertainment. As the light of a lofty window fell upon one of these venerable groups, throwing into strong relief their pale, puckered visages, I longed for the pencil of Wilkie or Denner to commemorate the curious scene.

"What are you doing here, sir—what are you doing here?" cried Jacques, putting in his rough head, as I stood engaged in conversation with a white-headed old soul, who told me, with much dignity, that she was an old woman at the time of the first Revolution, and who appeared to be an object of especial regard to the old nun who was gliding about the dormitory. "It is not here that I have settled them. This is only the women's ward. You don't suppose that I would part them in their old age? Come with me to the other wing, the galerie des ménages, and I will soon shew you their room—the second best in the Hospice—I have had my eye upon it these two years. Old Mathieu, by whom it was occupied, was given over two winters ago; and I knew that, whenever he dropped, his widow, not liking to stay in't alone, would move to the dortoir des veuves. Come along with me!"

Directing a significant smile towards me, as if compassionating the excitement of my companion, the porter accompanied us towards the main body of the building; where, having ascended the first flight of stairs, he opened with a passé-partout the first door, and begged me to take a peep at one of their household chambers. I know not whether an especial selection was made of the show-room of the Hospice; but the apartment I entered was a study for an artist. Beside the hearth, sat a reverend elder, nearly ninety years of age, cozily niched into his easy chair, while the old wife (who, being twenty years his junior, he seemed to regard as a frisky young thing) sat near him with a book in her hand, from which she was reading aloud when we entered. Snatching a glance at the book, which I concluded to be of a devotional tendency, I saw a volume of Voltaire's plays!

Nothing could be more comfortable than the instalment. The furniture, though plain, was bright and shining with care. Two uncouth-looking family pictures were appended to the wall; a branch of box consecrated on Palm Sunday, was stuck into the tester of the bed; and, beside it, a small china benitier containing holy water. A cage with a pair of bullfinches, whose dingy plumage announced them to be old in proportion to the age of their master, stood on the top of a small secrétaire; and, on the table below, a China rose-tree in a case, from which the usual market covering of white paper was not yet removed. Beside the second window, I perceived a neatly-dressed young girl, who blushed and curtsied as her eyes met mine.

She was evidently a visitor—evidently a grand-daughter, or grand-niece, by whom the rose-tree had been brought as a token of affection to the venerable couple.

Muttering apologies for an intrusion, which appeared, however, to be considered a compliment and a welcome intrusion by the old man, I now retired from the little sanctum; and was surprised to find, from the air and ejaculations of Jacques, that he was vexed and piqued by the inspection forced upon me by the porter.

"Of course, Monsieur will not expect our little réduit to look as cosy and comfortable the first day as a ménage that has been going on, without interruption, these ten years past!" cried he. "We shall have our quilt on the bed, and bird cages and rose trees in time, like others. But at first the main object was to secure the articles of furniture demanded by the rules of the hospital. D'abord la stricte necessaire; la superflu viendra avec le temps."

So saying, he pressed me forward through an open door of the gallery into a chamber newly whitewashed, swept, and garnished, wherein was already arranged the little mobilier I had seen him remove from the cart. The place was neat and snug, though certainly displaying little of the superflu jealously adverted to by Jacques.

"I see to what Monsieur's eyes are directed!" cried the poor commissionnaire, glancing at an empty corner of the room. "Certainly that spot looks naked enough at present; but a couple of hours hence, matters will wear a very different aspect. That corner, sir, is kept for the two chests that contain their wearing apparel, and the rest of their little property. I have settled that father's shall stand next the window, and mother's next the door, because its a trifle smaller and will take less room."

"Your father's—your mother's?" cried I, in amazement. "Is it then for your parents, mon garçon, that you are taking all this trouble?"

"Trouble?" reiterated Jacques, in a stinging accent. "Tudieu! for five years past, the pleasure of fixing the old folks in peace and comfort for the rest of their lives, has been my dream by night, my care by day. "Trouble, sir?—ever since I chanced to be sent here on an errand by old Mathieu's grandson, I have kept saying to myself 'Jacques, mon gars! yonder is the place for the old folks. Manage to scrape together as much as will secure their old age an asylum in the Hospice des Ménages, and you may henceforward sleep in peace.' With that end in view, I have toiled early and late. A thousand francs is a trifle, when one looks back on the earning of it; but, when one looks forward, the task seems hopeless. Twice, too, I have been cruelly thrown back. I was blockhead enough to lend three hundred francs, two winters back, to a countryman—a brother Auvergnat—who had drawn a bad number for the conscription; and though, by working hard, he might have paid me the money twice over, the fellow made off from Paris a few weeks afterwards, and has been heard of no more—which was far from delicate of him, as the debt was a debt of honour, and regarded a brother-Auvergnat. Monsieur may, perhaps, recollect that he jeered me for being out of spirits the Carnival before last, and gave me a five-franc piece—pour fêter le Mardi Gras? That was the very time I lost my money; and that piece was the first I put, for lack's sake, into my new tire-lire.* And luck it brought me, sir—for the very next week, Monsieur le Vicomte threw me a double gold Napoleon, because he happened to drive his cabriolet over my foot, as I stood chopping wood in the courtyard. 'Tis true, I had a hard matter to hobble about for six weeks afterwards—the frost having got into the wound. But what was that to the good fortune of gaining forty francs at a stroke?"

"But, my good Jacques," cried I, much affected by the recollection of his hard labours, and their scanty reward, "why not apprise me of the object you had in view?"

"Because I knew Monsieur Graingibet's good heart might lead him to do more than was altogether convenient to him. You paid me well; sir, for my services; and to have hinted a wish for further gains would have been begging. And yet, about three months ago, sir, when I happened to meet Antoine, the great-grandson of old Mathieu, crying in the street, and heard from him that the vieux bon homme was not expected to get through the night; and I went straight home, and broke my tire-lire, and found only two hundred and thirty francs to add to the six hundred and forty registered to my name in the books of the Caisse d'Epargne, I own I had half a mind to implore of Monsieur the favour of a loan of the hundred and thirty wanting to make up my thousand, in case of poor old Mathieu being called away. By God's will, however, the old chap was spared to toddle on a few months longer, and, luckily, in the busiest time of the year! Bless your heart!—I have stayed up, night after night, this winter, calling coaches at the bals masqués, at the opera, or Musard's, till seven o'clock o' the morning; and seven o'clock in the morning is an ugly hour to look in the face when you've had no sight of a pillow, and the snow's too thick on the ground to admit of sleeping on one's crochet, at the corner of the street, during the daytime. However, there's an end to all things! All's over!—all's safe! Last night, my money was deposited, to the last halfpenny, with the bureau de l'administration; and there's yet left behind," quoth he, jingling his pockets, and glancing good-humouredly at the porter, "enough to afford a handsome bonne main to those who are about to have charge of the old folks."

My answer consisted in a hearty shake of the errandman's horny hand.

"Monsieur must perceive," faltered he, as if apologizing for not having appealed to my assistance, "that it will afford twice the pleasure,

* A savings' bank of earthenware, used by the poor.

both to the old people and myself, that this asylum is secured to them by my own industry, and not by the help of others. 'Tis a foolish thought, mon bon Monsieur, for the like of us; but, you see, poor as we are, and Christians, too, we're proud. This is not a common almshouse, sir. This Hospice des Ménages is a place where respectable folks are admitted for pay. I wouldn't have shovelled poor father and mother into the charity-ward any more than into St Lazare!—nor I wouldn't have liked to see them beholden to any but their own son, so long as he had arms to work for them. But all fear's at an end. Twenty cabriolets may drive over me now, or twenty choleras attack me. I've a right to be sick or sorry when I please. I've a right to sleep in my bed o' nights, and look the Vicomte's saucy chap of a groom in the face by day. The old folks are safe. Whatever may happen to me, here's their berth, with food, raiment, and pocket-money, so long as it pleases God to spare them. Crê Dieu!—'tis a mightier relief than people dream of, to be relieved from all further anxiety concerning one's father and mother." And Jacques wiped his forehead at the mere recollection of his past cares and present ease of mind.

"But all this time I'm forgetting the cart," cried Jacques. And having hurriedly arranged with the porter to meet him in the chamber at three o'clock, he entreated me to return at the same hour, and be witness of the old people's inauguration.

I was almost puzzled to decide in what manner to dispose of the hour and a half's leisure thus left upon my hands. I am familiar with the Faubourg St Germain as a devotee with her beads. I know its churches, its convents, its colleges, its Pays Latin, its debateable land, or Chambre des Débats. But, lo!—as I was about to quit the triangular garden of the Hospice, I noticed a hearse or corbillard standing at the gate; and, though there is nothing wonderful in such an appendage to an asylum containing eight hundred aged persons, I was glad that Jacques had already driven off. He might have construed it into a sinister omen.

The stone benches of the gardens were crowded with aged pensioners, who had tottered forth to bask in the sunshine; venerable and faded figures, all on the verge of the grave: and I was struck by the air of indifference with which they saw the deal coffin of their yesterday's comrade borne forth from the simple chapel, and placed in the hearse. The fall of one of the trees in the avenue would have created twice as great a sensation among the inmates of Les Ménages.

"Whom are they burying?" said I to an old man of intelligent countenance, who, propped on his crutch, stood gazing wistfully on the croque morts escorting the corpse.

"Est ce que je sais?" was his crabbed reply. "No doubt some one out of the infirmary. Since the influenza, they have been dying a dozen a-day in the infirmary. The administration had its private ends in getting the influenza introduced into the hospice! Sixty beds vacant since March—ay, ay!—the administration knows what it is about."

Provoked to have stumbled upon a malcontent, I noticed, as I reached the wicket, that the coffin was followed, as far as the hearse, by one of the Soeurs de Charité, and that, till out of sight, the good woman stood gazing mournfully on the procession.

"They are not allowed to follow the dead to the churchyard," said the porter, whom I found standing at the wicket. "The service of the hospice would not allow of their absenting themselves so frequently; and, besides, it is not the custom in France for women to attend funerals. However, I can see plainly, by Soeur Petronille's countenance, that she is loath to take leave of the body. I don't know who they are burying. But Soeur Pétronille is one of the infirmity nuns, and the most tender-hearted of them all. See, sir! she's crying her eyes out! I warrant she'd give them for leave to follow the hearse to the churchyard. But 'tis against rules."

"Ma Soeur," said I, accosting the weeping woman, hat in hand, "if I could be of any service in shewing the last respect to the object of your affliction"—

"It is my father," murmured the nun, labouring to speak with composure; "and I am afraid that, as I have not wherewithal to pay for a fosse à part, and he is to be laid in the fosse des pauvres, I shall not be able hereafter to recognise his grave! But, if Monsieur would have the great kindness, the great charity, to place this paper in a cleft stick at the head of the grave, I shall be able to commission a treillageur to place a cross and entourage."

"Where is the interment to take place?" cried I, the procession having already moved off; and, having eagerly accepted the small card, inscribed with the name of "François Xavier de Réthel," I hastened towards the Boulevard de Mont Parnasse, the eastern cemetery being the one appropriated to the use of the hospitals of Paris. Not having calculated upon the leisurely pace of the corbillard, I found myself at the gates of the cimetière some time before its arrival.

"In what part of the churchyard are the poor of the hospices interred?" I inquired of the official porter, who, possessing under his charge the tombs of the Duchesse de Geavres (the last descendant of the Connétable Du Guesclin) and a few other defunct notabilities of the aristocratic Faubourg St Germain—evidently fancied himself a prodigiously great man. And the answer sufficed to remind me, for the fiftieth time, of the distinction between the words hôpital and hospice, which I am always forgetting—viz., the former is devoted to the sick poor, the latter to the infirm and aged.

"The Hospital de La Charité has the privilege of burying its dead in the Cimetière du Mont Parnasse, which is its parish," replied the man, fancying me, perhaps, ignorant, as a foreigner, that the felons of Paris (Fieschi and Alibaud, the regicides, among the rest) are interred in the burying-ground of which he is so proud. "But the Hospices have a part of ground adjoining. The Hospices, sir, do not bury in our cemetery."

Following the direction of his finger, I passed, accordingly, through a turnstile, and a narrow walk overgrown with nettles, till I reached a spot enclosed by a range of shabby wooden palings, much resembling the melon ground or rubbish yard attached to a gentleman's kitchen garden. Lifting up the latch, the wicket opened, and I went in.

Most people who visit Paris, perform a pilgrimage to the fashionable cemetery of Pere la Chaise, a city of the dead, which comprises most of the illustrious of France, defunct during the last thirty years. Great names are there—fine monuments—rare exotics—all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of the varieties of this world. For my own part, the sentimental inscriptions and fiddle-faddle flower-gardens of the place, so thoroughly at variance with the simple grandeur of its object—the depositing of the husk of the grave, sown for immortality—invariably excite my disgust. Yet, disgusts of a very different nature assailed me on entering the hospital burying-ground. I missed the herbage, the vegetation, the cool green trees! The earth there was too earthy. The ever-disturbed soil (the space being too small for the purpose to which it is devoted) scarcely allows two years to the tenant of the grave to moulder away, ere the fosse des pauvres is reopened; and to its mouldering deal planks, and mouldering human bodies, wrapt in rags of sackcloth by way of shroud, new deal coffins and fresh human bodies are thrown in! It is true, at the further extremity stands a multitude of black wooden crosses, to mark the graves of individuals luxurious enough to repose for the space of five years in a fosse à part; and within the wooden entourages of these, a few flowers are here and there coaxed up into sickly growth. But the soil, the atmosphere, are uncongenial! Flowers have no business on the graves of those whose living hours have been labour and sorrow. Their blossoms spring from an Eden of immortality, which eye hath not seen; and glorious indeed should their brightness be, to yield repayment for the thorns of earth!

As these thoughts passed painfully through my mind, a man stumbled towards me, bearing on his back, like a pedler's pack, a rough deal coffin, which was instantly lowered into the loose earth of an adjoining trench, a hundred feet long, which I conjectured to be the fosse des pauvres, or common grave, from the disorderly manner in which the deal boxes were thrown there, side by side, the two last being still uncovered with earth. I inquired of a shabby-looking man in rusty black, wearing a cocked hat, who appeared to be in official attendance, whether the body were that of François

Xavier de Bethel; but he knew nothing on the subject, and evidently cared as little. "Was it the body of a pauper from the Hospice des Menages?" "Oui, oui, Monsieur!—from the Hospice," he replied. I accordingly bestowed a trifling gratuity on the grave-digger to induce him to deal decently with the dead, and saw the earth trodden in as firmly as could be done till the next pauper interment. All that remained was to fulfil my commission by placing the claff-stick and inscription.

"Monsieur perhaps intends to bestow a cross upon the deceased?" demanded the sexton; and ere I could reply, a card was placed in my hand, intimating that "At 9, Boulevard du Mont Parnasse, Perinelle, traillasseur, keeps a flower-garden of plantes funebres, undertakes monuments, crosses, entourages, et tout ce qui concerne son état." The cost of a cross and inscription, the sexton informed me, was but four francs; and even I, Grimgibbar, am able to secure the satisfaction of a fellow-creature at so small a cost. I issued orders accordingly, that the name on the card should have a more durable inscription; and the pious wishes of Soeur Petronille were fulfilled.

All this, however, took time. It was three o'clock within three minutes, when I returned through the Rue de Regard. On attaining the corner of the Rue de Sevres, the empty cart of my friend Jacques stood at the gateway of the Hospice.

"The old people are arrived, then?" said I to the porter, with the familiarity of an old acquaintance.

"Arrived! and, I fear, in some trouble," he replied; "for my wife, who helped to escort them, was seen running from the house just now to the infirmary, to fetch one of the nuns and some ether."

The odour of that powerful restorative reached me the moment I entered the gallery containing the little household-chamber of the new ménage. The door was ajar, the opposite window open. I heard the ominous sound of human sobs within.

My heart sank in my bosom. The joy of the old people had been too much for them. One of poor Jacques' parents had, perhaps, fallen a victim to the agitation and hurry of removal. Peeping anxiously in, I prepared myself for the sad spectacle of expiring age.

"He is better now," were the first words that struck my ear as I entered the room. When lo!—wonder of wonders!—I descried poor Jacques, with his bronzed cheeks as white as ashes, sitting propped in a chair! while the poor nun, Soeur Petronille, and a venerable looking peasant couple, administered to his aid. It was the strong man who had fainted. Overcome by the exquisite delight of installing his parents in their long-wished abode, consciousness had been for some minutes suspended in the Herculean frame of Jacques le Commissionnaire!

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.

For the last fifteen years, the British inhabitants of India have been making the most strenuous efforts to establish a communication with England by steam-vessels. These efforts have been seconded by the Indian governments; and, within the last five or six years, the subject has made such progress in this country that it has been taken up by, or rather forced on the consideration of Government and the Directors of the East India Company. In the infancy of steam navigation, it was a bold design, and perhaps premature, to attempt to carry steamers half the circumference of the globe, when the practicability of steam navigation had been demonstrated only for coasting voyages, or short trips of a few days, in Europe and America. Almost up to the present time, (though there is reason to hope it will not be the case longer,) there was no regular communication by steamers across the Atlantic, notwithstanding the vast amount of traffic with America, the skill and enterprise which exists on both sides, and the improvements which have been made in steam since the idea was first entertained of carrying steamers to the remote shores of India. This scheme was originally founded on the mistaken idea, that a single steam-vessel was capable of making the entire voyage to India without any further delay or hindrance than what would be required in calling at three or four intermediate ports for supplies of coals; and, with these trifling delays, it was supposed that the vessel would reach India by a direct course, at the usual rate of speed at which short trips were made in Europe. With these impressions, the British inhabitants of India entered into the scheme for establishing steam communication. Not aware of all the difficulties of the undertaking, they grasped at the immense advantages of conveying letters and passengers to and from England in the short space of two months, instead of five or six by sailing vessels. This was the grand object, and it was well worthy of their utmost exertions to secure; yet there were others connected with the introduction of steam-vessels to India, of scarcely inferior importance. The monsoons, or periodical winds, which prevail in the Indian sea, continuing for months together to blow from the same quarter, greatly impede navigation; and sailing vessels are frequently prevented from making their ports against these winds, or they are compelled to take a very circuitous course; the loss of time, and consequently the expense, being great in either case. Again, the navigation of the large rivers is impeded by the force of the stream; so that the usual way of ascending these rivers, for several hundred miles, is by the slow process of tracking, at the rate of ten or twelve miles a-day; and, at some seasons of the year, the current is so strong, even where the tides prevail, that ships are several weeks in getting from the mouth of the Hooghly to Calcutta—a distance of about eighty miles—in attempting which they are frequently driven on shore and lost. The benefits of steam navigation in political affairs would also be great. Troops could be removed in a few days to distant points, which it would require weeks to arrive at by any other means; and they would be fit for action the moment of their arrival, instead of being fatigued by long marches. In those parts of the Indian seas which are infested by pirates, steamers would be infinitely more serviceable than sailing vessels; and in the interior, by river navigation, troops and stores could be moved with dispatch; and treasure, which is now always accompanied by a strong military escort, might be sent unguarded, with celerity, and much less liable to accident than in the rudely constructed boats in general use. Lord William Bentinck has expressed his opinion, that, if there had been an establishment of steamers during the Burmese war, “many thousand lives, prodigious individual suffering, and millions of money, would have been saved to the State;” and that, with such an establishment, one-fourth of the present military establishment of India would be more efficient than the whole without it. Under these circumstances, the introduction of steam-vessels into the seas and rivers of India would prove more beneficial than even in Europe, where similar impediments to communication do not exist. But when the subject was first agitated in India, the political and commercial advantages of steam were not so well understood or appreciated as at present. The great and primary object was then to establish steam communication with England, for the transmission of letters and passengers; and in this, all classes of the European population were equally interested. For some time, public opinion was divided with regard to the best line of communication. The route by the Red Sea and Egypt was much shorter than that round the Cape of Good Hope; but it was feared that there might be obstructions and delays from the Pacha or the plague; there was a desert, without water, to be crossed, of eighty to a hundred and twenty miles in length; there were plundering Arabs, rapacious governors, and thievish servants, to be encountered. The navigation of the Red Sea was considered dangerous, if, indeed, practicable, for steamers; it was sometimes infested by pirates; and no supply of coals could be obtained there, except by sending them from England or India at a heavy expense. For these reasons, (the invalidity of which has been proved by further experience,) the longer route—by the Cape of Good Hope—was generally preferred. It was, however, seen that the attempt must be commenced in England, not only because steamers could be best provided there, but also on account of the superior knowledge of steam navigation, and of the measures to be adopted to secure success in this great and enterprising undertaking. To promote this object, it was considered that the best means would be to offer a handsome reward to those who should first accomplish the voyage to India by steam, leaving the parties at full liberty to make their own arrangements, and follow their own plans; and a subscription was accordingly opened, to raise the sum of £10,000 to be given to the first steam-vessel that should arrive at Calcutta within the space of seventy days after leaving England. The greater part of this sum was speedily contributed; the Bengal Government gave £2000; and subscriptions poured in so freely that the Government thought it necessary to warn the Committee against exceeding the above amount, lest the magnitude of the premium should lead to hasty and ill-arranged enterprises, which might occasion loss of property and lives. Captain Johnston, who had assisted in the plan formed at Calcutta, proceeded to England with the view of engaging with parties there to fit out a steamer, and secure the prize offered. On his arrival, a society was formed; and the Enterprise, a vessel of 470 tons, was purchased, and fitted out either for sailing or steaming, with engines of 120 horse power. She was loaded with coals for thirty-five or forty days' consumption, which is four times as much as she ought to have carried, and only one dépôt was provided—at the Cape of Good Hope—where she could obtain a farther supply, during the whole voyage. The consequence of these arrangements was, that, on leaving England, the Enterprise was brought so low in the water, that her progress was much retarded, and her coals were all expended long before she arrived at the Cape; the same thing happened again, on the passage from the Cape to the river Hooghly, where she arrived in December 1825, having been 113 days from England instead of 70. This was doing very little better than a sailing vessel; but one great point had been established—that the passage between England and India was quite safe and practicable for steamers; and the arrival of the Enterprise was therefore hailed with delight. The owners had failed in securing the prize of £10,000—the hopes of obtaining which had induced them to venture on the speculation—but, fortunately for them, the Burmese war was then carrying on, and Government, being desirous of having the means of communicating quickly with the army in the Burman empire, purchased the Enterprise for £40,000, which was about the amount she had cost, and dispatched her to Rangoon. Captain Johnston was rewarded by being continued in the command of the Enterprise; and, subsequently, he was otherwise employed by Government in promoting steam navigation in India; and he also received £2000 or £3000 from the steam fund, when it was found that no other claimant was likely to appear for the whole. The first voyage of the Enterprise to Rangoon and back to Calcutta, was performed in thirteen days, when she brought accounts of the treaty of peace several days previous to the arrival of H.M.S. Champion, which had left Rangoon a week before her. By this speedy communication, Government was saved an expense of £40,000, by arresting the march of troops from the upper provinces, the execution of new contracts for stores and provisions, and the hiring of transports; and thus the whole cost of the Enterprise was made up to Government within a few weeks of the purchase of that vessel.

The first steam-vessel that ever appeared in India was the Diana, built at Calcutta in 1823, and used for pleasure trips on the river; the Enterprise arrived in December 1825; and in 1827, Government launched the Irrawaddi and the Ganges, each of eighty horse power, and armed with eight guns. In 1828, two small steamers, of fifty horse power each, were built by Government for river navigation; and these proving very useful, the number has been since increased, and some iron steamers have been sent out from England. Captain Johnston was sent to England, in 1830, by the Bengal Government, to forward their views of promoting steam navigation in the rivers of India; and, notwithstanding the increased number of these vessels, they are still inadequate to transport, from place to place, the number of passengers and goods which are offered for conveyance. Steam has also been applied to flour mills in Calcutta; and at Port Gloster, about fifteen miles below, an extensive manufactory has been erected for spinning cotton, on the most approved principle of the steam-power mills in England. To the cotton mills is attached a foundry capable of supplying all the requisite machinery; and a paper mill has been added, which works up the refuse from the cotton works. The whole concern is stated to have cost more than £200,000 to the original proprietors; but it has lately become the property of a joint-stock company at a valuation of £80,000.

In the meantime, many attempts were made to form an Indian Steam-Navigation Company in England, and to induce the East India Company to establish steam communication. The subject was repeatedly brought to the notice of the Court of Directors, by the Bengal and Bombay Governments; but little or no notice seems to have been taken of these communications. Amongst individual efforts, those of Mr Waghorn deserve to be particularly noticed. For the last ten or twelve years, he has been indefatigable in his exertions to establish steam communication with India, having passed and repassed several times between the two countries, and been five times up and down the Red Sea, exploring the different harbours and proposed stations; in all which he received not the least assistance from Government, or from the Court of Directors, until 1837, when he was appointed superintendent of mails at Alexandria, and some trifling compensation was granted for his former services. Mr Waghorn first proposed to take a single steamer, with letters only, round the Cape to Calcutta, in eighty days, and another person offered to do the same in sixty days; but it became evident that one steamer could never accomplish the work satisfactorily, and that, to secure quick and regular communication, it would be necessary to have a line of steamers, each to perform a certain part of the voyage, from one thousand to two thousand miles. In 1829, Mr J. W. Taylor proceeded from England, by the way of Egypt and the Red Sea, to Bombay, for the purpose of engaging the Government there to sanction steam communication by that route. The Bombay Government did not consider itself authorized to comply with Mr Taylor's demands respecting the transmission of letters, and referred the business to the Court of Directors; at the same time expressing its decided opinion, that almost incalculable advantages might be anticipated from a well-established steam communication by the Red Sea. Early in 1830, Mr Waghorn arrived at Bombay from England, by the same route, and gave his opinion also that the route by the Red Sea was perfectly safe for steamers; that there was nothing to be apprehended in Egypt; and that, with steamers from Bombay to Suez, and others from Alexandria, the journey to England might be made in fifty to fifty-five days. About this time, the Hugh Lindsay steamer, of 400 tons, and 120 horse power, had been launched at Bombay; and her first voyage was to Suez, which she reached in thirty-three days—viz., twenty days' working, and thirteen days' stoppages for coals—the distance being above 3000 miles. These, with other corroborating circumstances, soon convinced most persons interested in the subject, that the route by the Red Sea and Egypt was the most eligible, and that every facility would be given to travellers by the Paoha, who was most anxious to draw the trade of India in transit through his dominions. It was thought that the Directors of the East India Company would have been the most cordial promoters of steam navigation, seeing the great benefits they would derive from quick communication at all times, and especially in times of war and other emergencies; and, for a considerable period, expectation was kept alive that an establishment of steamers would be formed, on public grounds, by the East India Company. As a department of the Post-Office, it is one of those few branches of trade which can be carried on more advantageously by a Government than by individuals; and, indeed, no individual or association could venture to establish steam communication with India without having the privilege of conveying the mail, from the profits of which a considerable part of the returns were calculated upon. The Directors, however, took no steps in the business; they gave no encouragement to the various plans which were, from time to time, laid before them; and, when the Bombay Government proposed to establish four steamers from thence to Suez, and an equal number to pass between England and Egypt, the Directors made no reply for two years, and then threw cold water on the plan, by exaggerating the expense and other difficulties. The President of the Board of Control having called their attention to this subject in 1831, the Directors contented themselves with sending copies of the letter and enclosures to India, desiring further information; and it came now to be perfectly understood that, so far from promoting steam communication with India, the Directors were decidedly opposed to it, and that they looked upon such an event as a misfortune rather than a benefit. Mr Peacock, an officer in the India House, has been put forward to give his evidence before several Committees of the House of Commons; and he may, therefore, be considered as representing the opinions of the Directors, as far as they dare openly avow them. So recently as June 1837, he says he does not know that there will be any great good in quick communication; in ordinary times, the Government does not require it, and it is only in times of war that it is valuable. He thinks commercial men require regularity more than dispatch; that rapid communication with India will induce many Europeans to go out there, which is not desirable, as it will have a bad effect on the morals and domestic happiness of the natives, &c. &c.; and that it is feared there will be many appeals for redress of grievances to the Court of Directors, if the means of coming to England are facilitated. From the whole, it appears that the Directors do not wish Europeans to go to India, nor natives of India to come to England; and, to prevent these deplorable consequences of steam navigation, they are willing to forego all the advantages they themselves, as well as the people of both countries, might derive from it.

The Hugh Lindsay made several voyages to Suez; and a complete survey of the Red Sea was made, by orders of the Bombay Government, in the three years, 1820 to 1832. It became also a common route for travellers going to or returning from India; and the facilities for steam navigation by the Red Sea being now well ascertained, it required only to provide the necessary steamers to secure a constant and regular communication with England. By this time, however, the steam fund collected in 1823 was well nigh exhausted; all hopes of the business being taken up by the East India Company had vanished; and, to do anything effectual, it was necessary to provide funds to an amount that would enable the Steam Committee either to commence the undertaking by themselves, or in conjunction with other parties. A second subscription was, accordingly, opened at all the Presidencies; and, in a short time, about £30,000 was raised; and it is not a little remarkable, that about one-half of this amount was contributed by natives of India, who, having experienced the benefits of steam communication on the rivers of India, were now as desirous of extending it to England as were the Europeans. Lord William Bentinck, the Governor-General, gave every encouragement to the Steam Committee of Calcutta, and was desirous of placing one of the Government steamers at their disposal for a certain time; but he did not think himself warranted to do this without the sanction of the Court of Directors. The Bishop of Calcutta was also most anxious to establish steam communication, which,

It was his opinion, would tend very much to the extension of Christianity; and the general improvement of India; and he took the chair at the public meetings for that purpose. The funds thus raised were under the directions of three separate committees, at the various Presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay; and they differed in their views as to their appropriation. The Bombay Committee wished the line of steamers to terminate there, and that all letters and passengers should go overland from that place to the other parts of India, as the expense of maintaining steamers to go round to Madras and Bengal would, in their opinion, be too great; but the other Committees, and particularly that of Bengal, strongly objected to this plan, which would reduce the benefits of steam communication, as it regarded them, to a mere transmission of letters, for passengers would seldom attempt to travel 1800 miles through a dangerous country, and by roads almost impassable, to join the steamers at Bombay. They contended also, that the conveyance of passengers would form the chief source of the profits of steamers; and, as there are but 600 passengers annually arriving at and departing from Bombay, while there are nearly 2500 from the other presidencies, besides those from Ceylon and ports to the eastward, it would be ruinous to the whole concern to stop the line at Bombay; and they therefore determined that it should be brought round Ceylon to Madras and Calcutta. In 1834, the Calcutta Committee fitted out the steamer Forbes to proceed to Suez with letters and passengers; but, unfortunately, her boiler cracked before she arrived at Madras, where it could not be repaired, and she was forced to return to Calcutta. In the same year a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to inquire into steam communication with India, which reported that, from the experiments already made, there was no doubt of its practicability, and that, by proper arrangements, the expense might be very materially reduced; the committee was also of opinion that the net charge of the establishment should be divided between his Majesty's Government and the East India Company, with whom it was left to determine whether the communication should be in the first instance from Bombay or Calcutta, or according to the combined plan suggested by the Bengal Steam Committee; and the committee resolved that it was expedient that measures should be immediately taken for the regular establishment of steam communication from India by the Red Sea.

These resolutions were passed in July, but nothing was done till November, when Wellington came into office; and he, instead of establishing steam communication by the Red Sea, as recommended by the Committee, and the practicability of which had been proved by numerous experiments, thought proper to try a new route by the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, which had also been recommended, though no Englishman had ever been the whole course of the Euphrates. The expedition, under the command of Colonel Chesney, with 4000 men, 1000 mules, and two iron steamers, left England on February 1835, and the debarkation began 6th April, on the coast of Syria, near to Antioch. From this place everything had to be carried overland to Bir, on the Euphrates, a distance of 120 miles, a work of extreme difficulty; and it was nearly twelve months before the steamers were fully equipped, and ready to commence the descent of the Euphrates. On the 16th March 1836, the vessels got under way; in two months they had not proceeded half-way to the mouth of the Euphrates, when, in a violent hurricane, one of the steamers was forced upon the bank, and upset, by which twenty persons were drowned. The other steamer was in danger of sharing the same fate, but happily escaped without any serious damage. After finding her way through a difficult navigation, and being engaged in hostilities with one of the Arabs, in which some lives were lost, she arrived at Basorah on the 19th June; but there being no facilities for naval repairs, of which she was much in want, she proceeded to Bushire, in the Persian Gulf, where they were with difficulty completed, and returned to Basorah on the 9th September. On the 15th September a mail arrived from Bombay, which the steamer took up the Tigris to Bagdad, where she arrived on the 30th, and from thence the mail was forwarded overland to England, the steamer returning to Korna, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. She left Korna again on the 18th October, with another mail from Bombay, ascending the Euphrates, and had proceeded about 150 miles in eleven days, when it was discovered that one of her engines was out of order, in consequence of which she returned to Basorah, the mail being forwarded over land. Colonel Chesney proceeded to Bombay, leaving Major Estcourt in charge of the expedition, who, in endeavouring to explore the channel of the Tigris, met with another accident; and before this could be repaired, the period allowed by Government for terminating the service (the 31st January) had nearly arrived. Major Estcourt, therefore, laid up the vessel, and, with his officers and crew, set out for Damascus, where they arrived in safety after a slight skirmish with some Arabs. Mr. Fitzjames, to whose charge the mail had been committed on the 30th October, was not so fortunate: two days after quitting the steamer, he and his party were plundered of everything except the mail, kept prisoners for a week, and were in danger of their lives. Quitting his companions, and travelling by stealth, he at length reached Damascus with the mail on the 18th December.

Such is the history of an expedition which has cost this country £40,000, and many valuable lives, several having fallen victims to fatigue and the climate, besides those who perished by the upsetting of the steamer. And what other result could have been anticipated from preferring an unknown line of communication, to one which had been for years passed over with ease and safety? Admitting the navigation of the Euphrates to be free from difficulty, (and this is very far from being the case,) the neighbourhood of so many lawless tribes of Arabs will always deter the general mass of travellers from proceeding by that route; and, with regard to correspondence, it is much better to take a safe route, though accompanied by a few day's delay, than to run the risk of having one mail a-year lost or detained. Strange to say, notwithstanding all these untoward events, the expedition appears to be considered by Colonel Chesney and his officers as a decidedly successful one. It may be so in a military and naval point of view; but there is little hope of passengers or letters taking the route of the Euphrates in preference to Egypt, until very different results shall be produced. In stating these opinions, we are at the same time desirous of doing full justice to the merits of Colonel Chesney, and the officers and men who served under him on this expedition; and we are by no means averse to the project of establishing steamers on the Euphrates, if it be undertaken separately, and without prejudice to the route which experience has proved to be not only practicable, but as free from every inconvenience as could be desired. We are, therefore, gratified at hearing that the Euphrates steamer has been fitted out by the Bombay government, for the purpose of making another attempt to ascend the river Euphrates. Besides the actual loss of men and money occasioned by the Euphrates expedition, it is also to be regretted as having delayed for some years the establishment of a regular steam communication with India—an event which has been so long and so ardently desired. Some partial arrangements were, however, made, in consequence of the report of the Committee in 1834, to facilitate the communication to India by way of Egypt; but they were on too limited a scale to secure regularity, without which dispatch would be of little advantage. Thus, a steam packet was established by Government, in 1835, to proceed from Malta to Alexandria; and the Court of Directors gave orders that the Hugh Lindsay should go from Bombay to Suez at stated periods. In two years, the Hugh Lindsay had made only four voyages; yet even these occasional trips were encouraging, and letters were carried from London to Bombay in forty-five to sixty-four days—a more rapid communication than had ever before been known. The Directors also contracted for the building of two new steamers, of not less than 600 tons and 200 horse power each, to be sent out to India, and serve either as war steamers, or as packets between Bombay and Suez; but these vessels were not completed before the beginning of 1837. In the meantime, an Indian Steam Navigation Company was at last formed in London, under the auspices of Major Head, who had, for several years, directed his attention to the subject. It was to have a capital of £400,000; and the Company proposed to dispatch, monthly, from England a steam vessel of competent power and size, to touch at Cadiz, Gibraltar, Malta, and Alexandria, taking to those places his Majesty's mail-bags, &c., and engaging to convey the letters and passengers across the isthmus of Suez, to meet the Company's steamers from Bombay, which were also to be dispatched monthly from that place up the Red Sea. To meet their outlay, the Company required to have the exclusive privilege of conveying all letters to and from India, at fixed rates of postage; and, for the conveyance of the Government dispatches and messengers, and also those of the East India Company, the Steam Company demanded of the former an annual contribution of £40,000, and of the latter £25,000, for a certain period of years. These proposals it was thought inadvisable to agree to, both by his Majesty's Government and the Court of Directors; and they were equally unacceptable to the Bengal Steam Committee, who would listen to no plan which did not carry the line of communication to all the presidencies. This scheme having been dismissed, the Board of Control and the Court of Directors agreed, in February 1837, to establish a monthly communication with India by way of Egypt, the letters to and from Alexandria to be conveyed by his Majesty's packets, and the expense of the establishment beyond that place to be equally divided between Government and the East India Company. On further explanation, it appeared that the Directors did not contemplate carrying the line beyond Bombay, from whence the letters were to be dispatched overland to Madras and Calcutta; and though Sir John Hebbhouse was desirous of extending the line to all parts of India, he thought it prudent not to insist upon that point, lest it might occasion farther delay. The arrangement being thus concluded, the Directors sent orders, in June 1837, that the two new steamers, the Atalanta and the Berenice, which had lately been sent out to India, should, alternately with the Hugh Lindsay, be dispatched from Bombay to Suez, to keep up a monthly communication with Egypt; which has since been effected, though not with all the regularity that could be desired. In consequence of the numerous petitions from India and places in England, and the extraordinary interest the subject had excited, another Committee of the House of Commons was appointed, in June 1837, to inquire into the best means of establishing a communication by steam with India, by means of the Red Sea; and the proceedings of this Committee are extremely interesting, not only as connected with the immediate subject of their inquiries, but also with regard to steam navigation generally. With all the improvements that have been made up to the present time, it would appear that we are yet on the threshold of knowledge in steam navigation. The most experienced and scientific men differ in their opinions as to the proper size and build of steamers, the description of the machinery, and the proportion of power to tonnage; and there are some extraordinary results of increased velocity, by means which, on every approved calculation, ought to produces the very contrary effect, and to account for which the most knowing are puzzled and non-plussed. Another fact worth recording is, that the French, who are generally considered to be far behind us in steam-navigation, have taken the start of us, and have obtained greater speed at sea than any we have to boast of. The French Government has an admirable organization of steam-packets, which leave Marseilles every ten days for Malta, Alexandria, and various ports in Turkey, Italy, and the Mediterranean; and, from the attention bestowed on this branch of the service, there can be no doubt that it is intended to promote steam-navigation as a political object of the first importance. Letters from England, by the way of Marseilles, will reach Alexandria from six to ten days sooner than by our own steam-packets. Passengers are conveyed at three different rates—viz., £7, £14, and £21; and there is less delay in performing quarantine, in consequence of the French steamers carrying a quarantine officer on board. These circumstances give an additional degree of importance to the scheme of establishing steam communication with India, and render it an object of national concern.

In alluding to the various plans which have been proposed for establishing a regular steam communication with India, it will be necessary only to give in detail that of Dr Lardner, which is drawn on the largest scale as to capacity of the vessels, and equally comprehensive with the others as to the line of communication. Dr Lardner recommends to have an establishment of three steamers, each of 800 to 700 tons burthen, and 160 to 200 horse power, to work between Falmouth and Alexandria; and six or seven steamers in India and the Red Sea, of 1000 tons burthen, and 250 horse power each, of which five would be constantly employed, and the other one or two kept in reserve. The first steamer would work between Calcutta, Madras, and Ceylon; the second would work between Ceylon and the island of Socotra; the third, between Bombay and Socotra, where she would meet the second; the fourth would carry on passengers and letters from Socotra to the island of Camaran in the Red Sea; and the fifth would work between Camaran and Suez; each steamer would thus have its own stage to perform, the longest of which would be, from Ceylon to Socotra, 1660 miles, and would occupy eight and a-half days. The most difficult part of this navigation is from Bombay to Socotra, during the south-west monsoon, from May to September, when the wind blows, with great violence, directly against a vessel making this passage. There is a vast difference of opinion amongst the witnesses as to the possibility of a steamer making the passage at this season of the year in anything like a direct course; and some consider that steamers of 600 to 700 tons would be better adapted for the undertaking than those of larger size; but Dr Lardner states, that it is the physical impediment of the south-west monsoon, that has mainly induced him to recommend vessels of larger tonnage and power, which, from experience, he finds will go the greatest distance with the least proportionate consumption of coals. In smooth water, the greater power will propel the vessel with greater speed; but, to overcome an adverse sea and bad weather, the larger the vessel the greater the speed, the power being equal; this opinion was confirmed by Captain Oliver, R. N., who has found that a large vessel will make better progress in bad weather than a smaller one of equal power, which he attributes to the greater resistance offered by its specific gravity. Dr Lardner's plan is based upon the principle admitted by the East India Company and the Parliamentary Committee of 1834—that, "if the measure were undertaken, it ought to be executed on a large and efficient scale; and that between doing it efficiently and not doing it at all, there is no advisable medium;" and he accordingly recommends, that steamers of great power should be employed in India, to correspond with each other in every respect, so that each shall be able to assist, or to perform the work of another; with spare steamers to replace any that may be injured; and that the line of communication shall extend to all the Presidencies." Whether the description of steamers he has recommended are the best adapted for the purpose, remains to be proved; but he is perfectly correct in guarding against a short-sighted economy, which, for a comparatively small saving, would risk the success of the whole undertaking; and it is equally true, that no plan which excludes Bengal, the most valuable and important of the Presidencies, and the seat of the Supreme Government, would ever give a fair trial to steam communication. The use of large steamers will have the advantage of providing increased accommodation for passengers and goods; and there is reason to believe that, with these facilities, our trade in the Red Sea will increase, and that goods of value and of small bulk will be brought to Europe by this route. The islands of Socotra and Camaran seem better adapted for depôts than Mocha and the other towns on the mainland, which have been recommended by Mr Waghorn and others; the harbours are better; and one great advantage is, that the steamers and establishments would be free from the petty annoyances and delays which are sometimes experienced from the authorities on the coast. From Suez to Cairo and Alexandria, every facility is granted to passengers and goods. The journey across the Desert to Cairo, is performed in two or three days, on camels or donkeys; a railroad has been projected, the line surveyed, and materials prepared, by the Pacha, at an expense of £200,000; the whole will cost £800,000 to £900,000; and, when completed, the journey may be performed in three or four hours. Another railroad is intended to communicate between Cairo and Alexandria, when the whole journey from Suez to Alexandria may be effected in thirty hours; at present it is done in six days. As for the plague, it seldom prevails in Egypt, except in the spring of the year; and it disappears sometimes for eight or ten years.

together. Mr Turton, who came from India through Egypt, with his wife and six children, in 1887, states that they intermingled freely with the natives, without the slightest precaution, though there were occasional cases of plague, and the vessel in which he left Alexandria had a foul bill of health. He considers the plague a mere bugbear, except at certain seasons. He has passed several times round the Cape of Good Hope, and finds the route through Egypt infinitely preferable, especially for ladies and children; there is no more difficulty than that which must attend the removal of a family in any part of the world; the hire of camels and donkeys is exceedingly reasonable; provisions are readily obtained, with the exception of water, which you must carry with you a great part of the way; you travel slowly, but the road is perfectly good and level—it might be made as good a carriage road as any in England at a very trifling expense—and there is not a danger of any kind on the whole road. Mr Turton landed at Cosseir, and crossed to Genah—a longer route through the Desert than from Suez to Cairo; and of the two roads the latter is considered the best. The Pacha's government is so strict that robbery is unknown; and, if an article was lost by a traveller, it would be restored to him. Such is the account given of the journey through Egypt by all the witnesses on these points. It is calculated that the time in which a regular line of steamers would communicate between Bombay and Suez, including stoppages, would be nineteen days; from Suez to Alexandria, six days; from Alexandria to Falmouth, sixteen days; from Falmouth to London, one and a-half days—making the whole time from Bombay to London, forty-two and a-half days. The time between Calcutta and Suez would be thirty and a-half days; and the whole time between Calcutta and London would, accordingly, be fifty-four days. These are considered by Dr Lardner to be average calculations throughout the year, the time taken in each voyage being likely to vary a few days, according to the season; and, if anything approaching this rapid communication can be obtained, the advantages will indeed be incalculable. We come now to the expense of the undertaking, the main point of the business, and the grand obstacle which has hitherto prevented the execution of the scheme. The expense of the steamers to be employed between England and Alexandria, can be pretty well ascertained, but in India the case is different; there are not the same facilities for repairing damage, especially in the machinery, the cost of coals is more uncertain, and the various depôts must be attended with a considerable expense. With regard to the three steamers to go between England and Alexandria, Dr Lardner has calculated the expense, on the supposition that they were to be vessels of 800 tons burthen, and 200 horse power, though he afterwards thought that steamers of a smaller size would suit the purpose. The annual expense and maintenance of these three vessels, including capital sunk, he estimates at £34,000, and the cost of 6,500 tons of coals at £4000, making the total £38,000. The steamers for India of 1000 tons burthen, and 250 horse power, complete for sea, would cost about £30,000 each, and would last about 15 years. For capital sunk, interest, and insurance, the annual expense of each would be £4,325; and for wages, provisions, stores, and repairs, about £6,500. The annual expense of six steam vessels would therefore be

Total, £128,900

This is the annual expense of the whole establishment, by Dr Lardner's estimate, exclusive of the agencies in India and the Red Sea. The most doubtful item is the charge for coals. Mr Peacock states, that the coals for the Hugh Lindsay have cost £7 per ton, or £5000 for each voyage from Bombay to Suez and back; and, although the expense might be reduced, he does not think it could be brought under £8: 10s. per ton. But the occasional trips of the Hugh Lindsay form no criterion for estimating the expense of a large and regular line of steamers; the arrangements were imperfect, and there was also bad management in providing the coals. Thus, coals were sent up the Red Sea to Suez, at an expense of £6 to £7 per ton, when they might have been brought overland from Cairo at £3: 16s. to £3: per ton; and, though Colonel Campbell, the Consul-General, and agent for the East India Company, wrote repeatedly, to say that he could lay in any quantity of coals at this reduced cost, no attention whatever was paid to his letters. It appears, also, that the whole quantity of coals required in the Red Sea, and at Socotra, would not exceed 8000 to 9000 tons, and that, in the ports of India, coals would not cost above 25s. to 40s. per ton, which would make the cost very near Dr Lardner's estimate. The returns for this outlay would arise from the conveyance of passengers, letters, parcels, and goods of value. The number of persons who now make the voyage annually to India and back, is 3,200; of these about 2,400 could be accommodated in the steamers. The cost of a passage round the Cape of Good Hope, is from £100 to £150; at the average of which, the steamers could convey passengers, making a profit on each of above £80, which would produce a revenue of £196,000 per annum. From letters and parcels, Dr Lardner calculates a revenue of £17,000, which would make the total revenue £213,000, exclusive of freight of goods, and the conveyance of Government and East India Company's dispatches and messengers. Mr Peacock, of the India House, differs materially from Dr Lardner in all his estimates. He considers that it will require five steamers to go between Bombay and Suez, with two additional steamers if the line is carried on to Bengal; that the expense of these vessels, of 600 tons and 200 horse power, would be £25,000 each in Europe, and considerably more in India. Allowing three more steamers to go between England and Alexandria, this would bring the expense of the whole line to at least £300,000 per annum, according to Mr Peacock's estimate. As for returns, he thinks that nothing whatever will be gained by passengers. He says that the Directors allowed the commanders of the Atalanta and Berenice to take out passengers on their own account, because they could not make any profit of them; that they had been annoyed by complaints of the passengers of the Hugh Lindsay; that it would not suit them to turn hotel-keepers, &c. But these are only additional proofs of bad management. In a country where provisions are cheap, passengers might be well provided for at ten shillings per diem each, which was the cost estimated by Major Head and other parties; and, allowing sixty days for the whole voyage, the cost of maintaining each passenger would amount only to £30, or, at the utmost, £40, and the greater part of the passage-money would therefore be clear profit. Passengers would not require to lay in those large stocks of linen, &c., which are requisite for a long voyage; and, besides the saving of time, there are few who would not choose the easy route of Egypt, in preference to the long and monotonous sea voyage round the Cape of Good Hope. It is a well established fact, that, whenever the facilities of communication are increased, even without a reduction of expense, there is always a corresponding increase of travellers and traffic; and it may safely be predicted, that a regular line of steamers to India will attract many persons there, who would not otherwise have undertaken the voyage. This line will also lead to the establishment of others to the Isle of France, and the Seychelles, to Singapore, the Eastern Islands, and China, and to New Holland. The merchants connected with Australia have, in anticipation, formed a Steam Company; and the steamers are already built, which it is intended shall work between New Holland and Ceylon, where they will meet the line of India steamers. Notwithstanding the vast outlay of money in establishing steam communication with India, there is therefore every reason to believe that it will yield an ample return, under proper management: to which may be added the benefits, political and commercial, it will bestow on our possessions in India and the East, and the rapidly increasing settlements in Australia. Lord William Bentinck is of opinion that the Bombay marine, the cost of which has lately been reduced from £180,000 to £100,000 a-year, might be advantageously converted into a steam establishment, consisting of five steamers, three of which would perform the duties of packets, and thus cover a great part of the expense. This is an important suggestion, and shews that the outlay for steamers would not be all an increase of expenditure, as a corresponding diminution might be made in other departments; and the plan has now been adopted by the East India Company. The promotion of steam navigation is undoubtedly an object of great national concern; and the establishment of the proposed line of steamers to India would be a prodigious stride in advance. With the means of communicating quickly with India, England would laugh at the threat of a Russian invasion; for, in two months, troops could reach Bombay; and it is now ascertained that the Indus is capable of being navigated by steamers for 1,000 miles up, which would enable us to have an army of European troops ready to receive the Russians on any part of the northern frontier of India. The Pacha of Egypt is desirous of drawing closer his political relations with England, and it is evidently his interest so to do. He requires to be supported against the designs of Turkey and Russia; and, with the naval power of England in the Mediterranean on one side, and in the Red Sea on the other, he must always be desirous of keeping on good terms with us, were there no other motive to it. It is also the interest of England to support the Pacha's government against the encroachments of Russia. Turkey and Persia have not the means of resistance, and are being devoured piecemeal; and how soon might not the Russian fleet in the Black Sea be brought to act against Egypt?

Since the arrival in India of the Atalanta and Berenice steamers, there has been a pretty regular monthly communication between Bombay and Suez, by which means letters pass between Bombay and London in about two months, and occasionally in only forty-eight days, and the post from Bombay reaches Calcutta in twelve or fourteen days more. The means of conveying passengers from Calcutta and Madras are, however, still wanting; and so great is the desire to come home by way of Egypt, that, in the absence of steamers, sailing vessels have been engaged at Calcutta to take passengers to Coosair in the Red Sea, for which the charge to each passenger is from £90 to £200. Exertions are still being made to have the line of steamers extended to all the presidencies, either by Government and the East India Company, or through a joint-stock company; and, as passengers are so eager to proceed by the way of Egypt, it cannot be doubted that, ere long, steamers will be provided. In the meantime, a new India Steam Company has been set on foot, the plan of which is to provide steamers of 1200 tons burthen, and to send them round the Cape of Good Hope. They are to take 600 tons of cargo, as well as passengers; and it is expected that they will reach Ceylon in fifty-five days after leaving England, with only one stoppage, at the Cape, to replenish coals. The success of this plan seems to depend on the advantages to be derived from some newly-invented condensers; for, in other respects, it is very similar to that of the Enterprise in 1825, the result of which has already been mentioned.

THE FEAST OF THE POETS, FOR SEPTEMBER 1888.

AWARE of the genial custom "honoured in the observance" in Tait's Magazine, our poetical contributors, "friends, countrymen, and lovers," have lavishly enriched our repositories of rhyme, previous to the anticipated annual exhibition. Are there those who believed the spirit of poetry either dead or dormant in the bosom of the land?—let them turn to our pages. Are there those who fancy it sickly, dwindling, and declining?—we hasten to relieve their despondency.

Reflecting minds, although the gods may not have made them metrical, will prize the poetic faculty wheresoever it may appear, and in whatever limited degree it is manifested. If the blossom of the wayside wilding should haply never ripen into fruit, shall we for that refuse to inhale its fragrance, or to joy in its hues? Are not the haping syllables of the babe's imperfect speech, though not so precious, more endearing than the brilliant periods of the rhetorician, or the loftiest orations of the patriot? Well said the poet-philosopher—

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

And in the rudest poetry there must be beauty. It is the one essential quality, the primary condition. Let it not, however, be imagined, that we wish to bespeak favour for our Poets. We think better of them, and more respect ourselves. Their works shall speak for them.

Have any of our readers seen a small volume published within the last three years, entitled "Oxford Prize Poems?"—the poems of our men of faculty and reputation for the last forty years—the productions of the "curled darlings" and lads of promise of that proud University; of the Peers and Ministers, and Judges and Bishops of the land. To these who have, and those who have not, we would fearlessly say, Examine, and compare the Feast of the Poets in our Magazine for three or four years, with this record of the University achievements for half-a-century, and let impartial judgment and taste award the victory. There is here no brag. We state a simple fact, and leave it to the proof. Let us now marshal a few of our proofs of the equality of the nameless or unregarded sons of song with the schoolmen, in the mere "accomplishment of verse." Their superiority in vigour and originality of thought, and depth, and tenderness, of sentiment, admit of no comparison.

Our first division shall consist of these:—

BREATHINGS OF THE YOUNG SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

THOUGHTS ON THINGS.

If ya any one of fortune's slaves,
As many slaves there be
Who worship naught beneath the sun
But rank and pedigree—
Pardon I—my 'Thoughts' wait for thee,
With intellect so mean,
Who think beneath the cottar's roof
No sunny joy is seen.

But, should ye be of gentle blood,
And love all human-kind;
In reading o'er a poor man's thoughts,
Some pleasure ye may find.

In my poor home no paintings hang,
Nor sculptur'd forms you see,
Nor music from a thousand strings
Breathing sweet melody.
Yet pleasures rich and rare have I,
Spread wide o'er hill and plain;
All nature blooms to please my eye,
And glad my teeming brain.

What artist ever hewed in stone,
Or on the canvass drew,
Such forms as I can feast upon,
With rapture ever new?
My wife like a Madonna sits,
A child upon her knee,
Whilst round her merry, happy elves
Are laughing jocosely.
Their grouping tells the artist's skill,
Though art can pleasure give
Where Chantrey's chisel wakes the stone,
And bids it look and live.

Enchanting music breathes to please
Me wheresoe'er I rove:
The swinging trees, the humming bees,
Speak harmony and love;
The streamlet o'er its pebbly way
Hums many a pleasant air;
And countless birds, to gladden my ear,
Are singing everywhere:
The storm-lashed sea, with boisterous glee,
As bass to me is given,
When lightnings gleam, and thunders seem
To rive the dome of heaven.

Though I am poor, I'm still content,
Whilst health upon me smiles;
I'm richer far than prince or king,
Or lord of many isles.
I breathe the richness of the air,
And like its course I'm free;
My thoughts as heaven exalted are,
And boundless as the sea:

Proud men! your titles are as naught;
Your riches are a curse,
Whene'er your minions spread like thought
Corruption with your purse.
Proud men! when thus ye panders are
To vilest prostitution,
Remember that a day will come—
A day of retribution.

The prostitution of the frame
Breeds sorrow to mankind,
But, oh! 'tis worse a thousand times
To prostitute the mind—
Then why debate the soul of man,
And soil his honour'd name?
Learn justice ere a million tongues
Shout shame upon ye!—shame!

While poor men dare to think and speak,
They also dare to do—
Whene'er their country needs their aid,
She'll find their hearts are true.
For this the king might yield his crown,
The lord his wide domain:
What think ye of a poor man's thoughts?
Perhaps we'll meet again.

FRANK.

A PASSING QUESTION.

By Alexander Hume.

To whom place you a statue there,
That giant slab of stone?
Methinks the virtues somewhat base
That lack mouth not their own,
To note and tell
The tears that fell,
At great Sir Cipher's funeral knell.

To whom place you a statue there?
Who loved and taught his kind?—
If fell not full unto his share,
A grasp of heart and mind,
Pile stone on stone—
His name hath flown
Before the maggots reach the bone.

How many in cathedrals be,
And all of marble white,
Appropriate to the purity
Of actions great and bright?—
Yet there behold
The greatness told,
Of mem'ries rotten, rank, and old.

The man full of mind's nobleness,
Who yearns to all of good,
And raises, through scorn and distress,
The human multitude—
In mem'ry thrives,
Still fresh survives,
Though statueless, a world of lives.

A MODERN ECOLOGUE.

"What a lovely scene!—the noontide beam
Is sparking on mead and mountain stream;
On the ivied church and whitewashed cot:
How happy must here be the peasant's lot!
And how must he love that hallow'd pile,
And the pastor who greets him with ready smile
When the Sabbath bells have called him there,
To offer to heaven his humble prayer!—
Come hither, thou bright-hair'd peasant boy,
With the ruddy cheek of health and joy.
Say, hast thou seen that reverend sage?
Doubtless he pores o'er the pious page,
By some lonely brook, in commune mild
With his Maker's works—hast seen him, child?"
"Seen him! no," said the boy, as he leerd
At the stranger; "no, but methoat I hear'd
A voice like his'n a-singin, down
Next door to the church, at the Mitre and Crown."

"The mitre and crown!—what I raised he the song,
That those earthly blessings might flourish long,
To guard our religion and liberty,
And preserve us the boasted land of the free,
And raised he it too in that holy place
Where so oft he invoketh the blessings of grace?
Methinks the strain would be one of joy,
Pure, though earthly: say, was it so, boy?
The boy seem'd puzzled, but answered soon,
"He wur musxy at sign of the Mitre and Crown;
And the song was jolly, ye weel may say,
For it sounded like 'Drive dull care away.'"

WHO WOULD BE A KING?

Oh, who would be a King?
How vainly he's deem'd great—
A powerless, paltry, tinsel'd thing
Trick'd out in robes of state.
He wears a golden crown;
A sceptre in his hand;
And sits upon a lofty throne,
While courtiers round him stand,
To flatter and caress,
And at his footstool bow;—
'Tis all unmeaning nothingness,
A vain and empty show.

He hath no friend sincere
On whom he may rely;
His minions false, when danger's near They'll be the first to fly.
Oh, who would be a King?

Oh, who would be a King,
When the rabble, raging loud,
Hiss, hoot, and groan, and missiles fling
Whene'er he's seen abroad?
When his conduct risks his neck,
His Guards are his defence;
Their bayonets and sabres check
The mob's rude insolence.
In the hearts of his subjects, then,
He hath no confidence,
Tho' he doth live, and move, and reign,
Kept up at their expense.
The sophist's law, that says,
A King can do no wrong,
It cannot gull us now-a-days,
When truth is waxing strong.
Oh, who would be a King?

Oh, who would be a King,
When his People from him turn?
His crown, alas! that gaudy thing,
Is then a crown of thorns.
Ten thousand jealous eyes
His slightest movements watch;
Surrounded by false friends and spies,
His words and plans they catch;
And give them all to Fame,
Who wide the tidings blows,
Till fiercely the long-smothered flame
Of popular fury glows;
Which naught will quench but blood.
Lo! History supplies
Warnings, I ween, which might do good,
If aught will make Kings wise.
Oh, who would be a King?

Who takes the name of King,
Which was not meant for man?
Vain fool! aside that title fling,
There is no King but One—
One King who reigns alone,
The Universe to bless;
The bulwarks of whose mighty Throne,
Are truth and righteousness.
Though worms, by sin defil'd,
His attributes assume,
"Sacred," and "High," and "Mighty," styl'd,
They all shall meet their doom.
His Wisdom cannot err,
Unbounded is His power;
Mortals, of impious pride beware,
And in the dust adore
The Great and only King.

MARENGO.

"Bonaparte se promenoit lentement a cheval, devant son troupier, penché, la tête baissée, courageux contre le danger plus que contre le malheur; n'essayant rien mais attendant la fortune."—Madame de Staël.

Why pauses he—why from his eye
Plucks now the glass away?
The Gallic eagle still bears high
His flight above the fray;
Against the breeze he struggles yet,
With eye of fire, and beak blood-red.

Why, therefore, checks the chief his steed,
Which, frantic to be free,
Flings the wild mane as rock-bound weed
Is by the chafing sea?
Why minks his head upon his breast,
The lightning of his eye suppress?

He sees the tide of battle set Against his valiant van—
He sees the balance waver yet,
He knows what bravery can;
But, far beyond, his prescient eye
Doth yet unknown defeat descry.

Is't death he dreads—the man who stood
On Lodi's bridge of fire;
Who victory sought amid the blood
That drenched Arcola's mire;
Who braved the East's pest-laden air,
And daggers of the won Brumaire?

He fears—but death he does not fear;
He raises now his eye:—
"Wilt thou desert me, Fortune, here,
Beneath Italia's sky—
This sunny sky which looked upon
My many fields of battle won?"

What was it flashed before his gaze?
A momentary star,
Oft seen before, amid the blaze
And eddying smoke of war.
(It hung on his returning prow,
And beacons high St Bernard's brow.)

See now, he springs from rank to rank,
His courser frets no more,
Nor, buried in the bloody flank,
The spur is dabbled o'er;
His words are hurried, brief—but these
That thrones and sceptres win or lose.

The order of the field is changed—
Troop after troop wheels round;
Sees Austria not the battle ranged Anew, on different ground?—
Beware! for now the sunbeams shine
Atheuwart yon bayoneted line.

She sees, too late—she hears the shout,
And coming heavy tread
Of eager thousands—now the rout
Of battle; and the dread
Dim smoke arises o'er the scene,
The sight from heaven's eye to screen.

They reel—recoil—the day is fixed!
See Kellerman the brave
Charge like a tempest—they are mixed
Together—naught can save;
They're scattered like the dust of June—
Marengo—Italy is won!

SONNET.

On reading the following passage in Haslitt's "Notes of a Journey through France and Italy."

"Books are the corrosive sublimates that eat out despotism and priestcraft; the artillery that batter down castle and dungeon walls; the ferrets that ferret out abuses; the lynx-eyed guardians that tear off disguises; the scales that weigh right and wrong; the thumping make-weights thrown into the balance, that make force and fraud, the sword and the cow, kick the beam; the dread of knaves, the scoff of fools; the salt of the earth; the future rulers of the world!"

There flashed the soul of thought!—there genius shone,
Tempered with feeling that made all its own
His fellow's wrongs!—there spake the mind
Whose purest, clearest emanations throw
O'er Shakespeare's brightest page a brighter hue;
That, casting interest, prejudice behind,
Could scale unscared the dizzy heights of thought.
Crowns, sceptres, coronets, he held as naught!
Like the proud eagle, he aspired to gaze,
With eye undazzled, on Truth's cloudless rays,
Which, halo-like, still seem to flicker o'er
The matchless page that, rich in varied lore,
Ardent with soul, oft glowed beneath his pen,
Fitted to raise the good, and shame the base 'mongst men.

SONNET TO BOOKS.

Truth's torchlights are ye, casting aye your glare
Into each deep and cavernous recess
Of the human heart; time-ridden wickedness
Ye can unveil, and lay the hidden bare.

'Mongst freedom's bulwarks ye are dearest, best;
From mind to fellow-mind a prized bequest,
Unchecked by dull conventional control,
Soul, poured on paper, communes free with soul;
Free as the winds that wave the mountain flower,
Careless as they of fixed opinion's power!
Stern despot he! that ices o'er thought's streams,
Narrowing the world to the shrunk space it seems,
Thwarting hope's aspirations as they rise,
With wizard wand turning her smiles to sighs.

POET'S POEMS.

What follows is more purely poetical, and perhaps better calculated to gain the general favour. Each of the poems is the production of a different gifted and cultivated mind; of individuals far apart in country, in habits, and pursuits, but united in the all-comprehensive, universal bond of lettered brotherhood. The Poet's Fatherland is not, however, an original poem. It is imitated in English by a young Dane, from the German of Körner.

AN ODE TO THOUGHT.

Whether ye make futurity your home,
Spirits of Thought,
Or past eternity, come to me, come,
For you have long been sought;
I've looked to meet you in the morning's dawn,
Often in vain;
I've followed to her haunts the wild young fawn,
Through sunshine and through rain—
I've waited long and fondly; surely you will come,
Familiarly as doves returning to their home.

Oh, I have need of you!—if ye forsake
My troubled mind,
Whence can it strength and consolation take,
Or peace and pleasure find?
For the great sake of the eternal spring
Of all your might,
Unto me, desolate, some comfort bring,
Unto me, dark, some light!
Come crowdingly and swift, that I may see
Upon your wings their native radiancy.

I know that ye must have a glorious dwelling,
Whether it rise,
Past mortal ken, where the old winds are swelling
Unbroken harmonies,
Whether, like eagles on some lunar mountain,
Ye fold your wings,
Or sport beside that clear and tranquil fountain
Whence rosy daylight springs.

I know your home is beautiful—and this belief
Brings glowing sunshine through the cloudiness of grief.
Bring not the softened echoes of the song
That gushes in your land;
But, as ye hear it, undisturbed and strong,
Pour it where now I stand.

These hanging cliffs shall make a rolling echo
With this great sea;
However far it float, my soul shall follow,
Mnd with its melody.

Will it not lead where I may clearly see
Countries whose law is love and peaceful liberty?
There is a noise within this tranquil heaven;
This ocean has a voice;
Through these tall trees a mighty tone is driven
That bids me to rejoice;
In the clear greenness of these tumbling waters
I see a face,
Exceeding far the look of man's pale daughters—
Bright, un-descriptive grace
Breaks from the brow, proclaiming heavenly glory,
Lighting the waves with foam and whiteness hoary.
Bold Thoughts, ye come, like stars down the dark night,
Boldly leaping;
I hear the solemn rushing of your flight,
Loud music keeping.

The unconcealed splendour of your speed
Is not more great
Than the songs intermingled, that exceed
All Nature can create.
Fill me with strength, that I may nobly tell
The wonders of your speech, that men may love me well.

THE POET'S EDUCATION.

Within a low mud village hut, one cold December morn,
Mid poverty, and want, and wo, poor Tom the bard was born;
His mother, from her hollow eye, just looked a mother's love,
Dropped a warm tear upon her babe, and then was called above.

His father, worn with fell disease, soon followed to the grave,
And Tom, in life's young morn, was left, life's bitter blasts to brave;
But Martha o' the Whinnyburn, a spinner poor and old,
Strove hard the little friendless boy to fend from want and cold.

A wild untoward imp he was, but full of kindly wiles;
And when he saw old Martha weep, he kissed her into smiles,
And up her aged knees would climb, to learn what she had seen
Of witch and wizard, ghost and fay, in times that once had been.

Tom's hose were sadly torn, yet he was blythe as blythe could be;
His curly locks were bonnetless, but never care had he;
He loved all bright and beauteous things, and oft, with bounding ball,
Would strive to catch the flickering beam that danced along the wall.

He nightly watched the glowing moon, and doubted much the tale,
That told, in that fair wandering isle, was prisoned wo and wail.

He gazed upon the shining stars with love, and yet with awe,
He wondered what they were—yet deemed his very thoughts they saw.

But more he loved the orb of day, and hailed his early beam
Come laughing o'er the eastern hill to gladden flower and stream;
And lonely, in a happy mood, he'd scan, for hours together,
The little crimson-breasted flower, that bloomed amid the heather.

And yet poor Tom was often sad, and Martha wondered why—

'Twas when a dark cloud wandered o'er the brightness of the sky,
That hung o'er all the happy life of earth a tint of sadness,
And shadowed in his loving soul the sunny spots of gladness.

But oh! with what fierce joy he'd climb old Martha's window sill,
When rushed, with wrathful howl, the storm, along the groaning hill,
And, when the fire-gleam arched the gloom, he raised his little hand,
And felt strange mystic impulses to grasp heaven's burning brand.

When Tom had come to riper years, he learned the weaving trade;
And in old Martha's garden-plot he wielded oft the spade;
To ply the bounding shuttle's speed, he spent day's sunny hour,
But early morn and dewy eve he'd dedicate to flowers.

He watched with joy the brightening tint upon the rose's crest,
The rich blue deepening upon the violet's lovely breast,
The opening bosom of the pink, and Martha's favourite
lily,
And—sweetest pledge of summer hours—the smiling daffodilly.

He gazed upon the dancing leaves as mute but living things,
In breeze and sunshine fluttering with glorious glancing wings;
For the pale snow-drop's early death he felt young friendship's grief,
And mourned an old acquaintance in sore autumn's faded leaf.

The Robin knew his gentle step, and feared no danger
nigh;
The grateful leveret looked on him with mild and fearless eye;
The blackbird and the linnet came obedient to his call—
He loved the bright, gay, fluttering things, and he was loved by all.

Then woke the echoes of the heart, and impulse high and strong
Burst from the fount of glorious thought in wild melodious song,
He sung not—for he scarce had heard—of conquests and of wars,
He sung of woods, and flowers, and streams, of sunshine, and of stars.

THE POET'S HOME.

It is not where Italian skies
Spread their blue dome o'er land and wave,
Not where fresh dwellings proudly rise,
O'er fallen Pompeii's grave;
Yet many a lovely spot around
Invites the wanderer's steps to roam,
And bee and bird, with murmuring sound,
Float o'er the Poet's Home.

It is not in Chamouni's vale,
Where rifted pines swing in the blast;
And Alpine shepherds tell their tale
Of avalanches past;
No mountains raise their summits high,
Beside the spot we hold so dear;
Yet the free breeze comes rushing by,
And heath-clad hills are near.

The heath-clad hills! more beautiful,
Because their paths have often been
The resting-place of him, our Bard;
And many a dell between,
Where flowers their fragrant leaves enwreath,
And moss and lichens deck the sod,
Hath heard the Poet humbly breathe
His prayer to Nature's God!

What reck's he of the marble floor,
Or radiance of the gay saloon?
That little nook beside the door,
Where he can watch the moon,
And view the radiant stars on high,
All shining o'er his lowly home,
Is dearer to the Poet's eye
Than earthly monarch's dome!

Ah, though his thrilling voice is stern,
To rouse th' oppressed and stumbling crowd,
Though thoughts within his bosom burn
Of vengeance 'gainst the proud;
Go, mark, around his glad fireside,
Youth's blooming cheek and childhood fair;
Nor deem kind heaven hath denied
Love's dearest blessing there!

WHERE IS THE MINSTREL'S FATHERLAND?

Where is the minstrel's fatherland?
 Where valour in each breast was flowing,
 Where wreaths for beauty's brow were blowing,
 Where every noble heart was glowing
 With all that was holy and grand:
 There was my fatherland!

How, then, was named the minstrel's land?
 Now, o'er the graves where her offspring sleeps,
 Oppressed 'neath a foreign yoke, she weeps.
 Once did oaks round her their vigils keep,
 Their own—the free—the German land:
 This was my fatherland!

Why weeps the minstrel's fatherland?
 That to a fierce despot's tyranny
 Her princes trembling bow the knee,
 Deaf to the call of the brave and free,
 Unmindful of her high command:
 This mourns my fatherland!

Whom calls the minstrel's fatherland?
 To the unheeding gods she calls on high,
 In the thunders of her agony—
 For her champions—for her liberty—
 For retribution's vengeful hand:
 These call my fatherland!

What would the minstrel's fatherland?
 Her oppressors she would lowly lay,
 Drive the fell blood-hound from his prey,
 And free her children as ocean's spray,
 Or tomb'd her barren sand:
 This would my fatherland!

And hopes the minstrel's fatherland?
 Ay! she hopes in the fair cause of right;
 Hopes her sons will rouse them to the fight;
 Trusts in the power of God's vengeful might,
 And looks for aid from his just hand:
 Thence hopes my fatherland!

THE THRUSHES.

By Douglas Jerrold.

One eve, in balmy, budding May,
 A simple peasant stood,
 Beholding the declining day
 Fast sinking in the wood.

Yet oftentimes, with restless look,
 He eyed a neighb'ring cot,
 A homestead in a bright, green nook,
 A happy, flow'ring spot.

And as he gaz'd on that sweet place,
 That home of love and rest,
 His little boy, with laughing face
 Ran up with thrush's nest.

A nest with four bare little things,
 (It irks the heart to tell,)
 With not a feather on their wings—
 Scarce two days from the shell.

The father cried, and seiz'd the prize—
 "Are you a son of mine?"
 And then two tears of mod'rate size
 Did glisten in his eyne.

"And you would cage each little thrush,
 Its mother's hope and joy?
 I vow it almost makes me blush
 To own you for my boy!

"What! shut them from the sun and breeze,
 The greenwood and the glade?
 Far, far away from flow'rs and trees,
 Within a prison's shade?

"Now, Thomas, should some giant strong
 Put you in dungeon deep,
 Sure, sure, you'd think it very wrong,
 And droop, and waste, and weep?

"And, therefore, child, 'tis bitter grief
 Your father's breast assails—
 Run, run, John Doe, the varmint thief,
 Is getting 'crows the pales."

And down the parent flung the birds,
 Then tow'rd the cottage ran—
 And who shall tell the joyful words,
 With which they "took their man?"

Now, may the gentle reader know
 Who Christian Tom did vex—
 The feeling soul was Richard Roe,
 Bailiff of Middlesex.

When certain folks set up to teach,
 Their words by deeds we'd test;
 And always think, when'er they preach,
 Of Roe and Thrush's Nest.

MY BROTHER.

By Major Calder Campbell.

Wake! the lark is up on high,
 Paying homage to the sky;
 Flowerets shake their dewy heads;
 Leverets leave their rushy beds;
 Lambkins chase each other;
 From its cage upon the wall,
 Hear'st thou not thy linnets' call?
 Waken, gentle brother!

Wake! thy playmates are abroad,
 Comrades miss thee on the road,
 Where the merry pastime seems
 Lighter for thy lengthened dreams—
 They can find no other
 Half so fit for boyish fun,
 Agile leap, or manly run—
 Waken, gentle brother.

Thou shalt never waken more!
 Sadly o'er our cottage door
 Droops the now-neglected vine,
 Taught by thee to twist and twine
 'Midst encircling roses;
 Suns are bright, and skies are blue,
 But their joy comes not unto
 The grave, where thy repose is!

Thy gun is on the wall; beside,
 With reel unclasp'd and lines untied,
 Thy fishing-rod hangs idle; mute
 Is now the music of thy flute—
 There it lies neglected!
 Books and drawings, once thy pride,
 Are for ever thrown aside—
 DEATH hath all rejected!

In that ISLE, "where no man died,"
 Thou hadst been its hope and pride,
 For thy intellect was fraught
 With the symmetry of thought;
 And no guile could smother,
 In thy true and noble heart,
 That which is man's better part—
 Thy holy love, my brother!

Hadst thou dwelt in DELOS' isle,
 Thou hadst won fond Nature's smile
 As her fairest, brightest child,
 With no stain of earth defiled,
 To shame such glorious mother;
 But thou wert mortal, and to death
 Hast resigned thy early breath—
 So, fare-thee-well, my brother!

POMPEII.

Couched on a mossy bank—the western ray
 Paling in front—my thoughts with the days of Eld—
 I winged the past with fancy, and beheld
 A city of Old Time. 'Twas middle day.
 Temple and tenement—a proud array—
 Blazed in the earnest sun; a river, filled
 With throngs of ships, majestic sweeping held
 By stately structures on its beauteous way;
 And, doubled by the imitating wave,
 Religious fane and lofty battle tower

Crowded their splendours on the dazzled sight.
It was a time of joy; master and slave
Alike were gay; and multitudes did pour
Along the ringing streets, lend with delight.

A day rolled by, methought. I looked again:
The spacious amphitheatre was filled.
I saw the lively Greek, of classic build—
The swart Egyptian—the bold Roman, vain
Of haughty looks. The gladiator, slain,
Was lying on the sand, his heart's blood spilled
For cruel sport. I saw the victims killed
By savage beasts; their bodies rent in twain.
But, ah, that shriek!—that hurrying to and fro!
What meant they? What portend that sudden gloom—
Those earthquakes, cinders, and that overthrow
Of tenement and fane?—The city's doom!
Vesuvius had roused him from his slumber,
Her gay career to close, her glittering days to number.

Ages were added to the past. The sun,
As he had wont, blazed in the southern sky;
The violet breezes idly sauntered by;
The lavish vines did o'er the grey rocks run;
Th' exhausted fount was "quiet as a nun."
But where had vanished arrogant Pompeii?
Forum and temple! tower and column high!
Where had her mansions, arches, sculptors gone?
All, all were buried in the darksome earth!
No more I heard the bustle of her streets,
Her sounds of industry and noisy mirth;
I saw no more her merchants and her fleets,
Her triumphs, sports, processions, gaudery—
But over her still grave, the grass grew rapidly.

I looked again, when ages more had fled.
A serf had struck his spade upon a stone.
The stone was raised; to learned men was shown—
To men of wealth and power—who, curious, sped,
And cleared away the soil. Once more was shed
Day's light in hall and court; but there it shone
O'er walls unpeopled, columns overthrown!
And there she stands, the "City of the Dead!"
Her streets are desolate and silent now!
No more the lawyer's eloquence is cheered
Within the Forum walls; no more the vow
Of piety in holy fane is heard.
Her greatness has departed all; for aye her glory fled.
Pompeii evermore must be the City of the Dead!

Our next division, is

SONNETS, AND OTHER SMALL, DAINTY INDITINGS.

The spring and summer months of the subjoined charming and truly English Rural Calen- der, kept in the midland counties, were published in a former Number.

AUGUST.

Throned on some lawn's hillock or cool height,
With many-coloured mosses, and deep,
Bedding a spot where posy might keep
A holiday from care, in want's despite,
And nurse her darling fancies for the light;—
Oh, beautiful the picture, from that steep,
Of fields of yellow corn that, ripening, sleep
In the warm sun, all golden with his light!
Gaze—as the month advances—gaze again
Upon that glowing landscape, and the crowd
Of white skirts gleaming in the ruddy grain—
How beautiful the scene!—And, oh! the loud
And spirit-stirring shout of "Harvest home!"
That peals upon the breeze whichever way we roam!

SEPTEMBER.

'Tis nutting time!—off where the hazels grow,
With book and satchel, with a bounding tread!
Off to the quiet of the wood and mead,
And tear rich clusters from the lavish bough!
Shades of my boyhood's years! amid the glow
Of ripened fruits my longing footsteps lead!

Haste to some sunny orchard plot, and plead—
Plead there with care for my enjoyment. Now,
Autumn has swept her pencil o'er the trees,
And left a golden stain. Hedge-rows are fair
(Fringing old lanes—round green and "cotted loam")
With hip and haw, the blackberry and sloe.
Lovely the moon, with bright flowers everywhere.
Sweet the new song of redbreast warbling low.

OCTOBER.

The swallow leaves us for a sunnier sky,
And birds that quit more northern climes appear;
Stock-doves are heard amid the beechwoods rare,
Voicing their quietude enchantingly;
Rooks to their nest-trees in the rookery
Return again; and, on the shining air,
That tiny aeronaut—the gossamer—
Launches his web, and journeys merrily.
Stroll down the leaf-strewn lane, and on some stile,
Hacked with the rustic's knife, sent ye awhile,
And watch the husbandman diffuse his seed
Over the ruddy field;—'tis sweet to me!
The berried hedge-row and the yellow tree,
Have charms as yet, though flowers and leaves be dead.

Our next specimens shall be feminine. Indeed, from the cheerful sweetness of the Song of the Bees, and the pathos and elegance of The Floweret, the reader will easily divine their feminine origin.

SONG OF THE BEES.

Away! for the heath-flowers' pendent bells
Are heavy with honied dew;
And the cowslip buds, in their sunny dells,
Are bright with a golden hue.
We spread to the breeze our gossamer wings,
And a busy task is ours,
To hover around in airy rings,
And sip from the sweetest flowers.
When weary, we lie on the fragrant breast
Of the rose, ere its charms decay;
And, cradled in beauty, one moment rest,
Then spread our light wings, and away!
We climb up the clover-bud's slender stem,
And o'er its sweet blossoms linger;
For the honey-dew lies like a precious gem
On a fair girl's taper finger.
Drowsily humming our cheerful song,
Till the air echoes back the measure,
O'er meadow and mountain we speed along,
To gather the golden treasure.
Were man's life as useful and gay as ours,
Oh, he would be bless'd indeed;
But whilst we are sipping the sweetest flowers,
He rests on a noisome weed.

LAVINIA.

THE FLOWERET.

Beside a little crystal stream
That gurgled through a dell,
An humble floweret raised its head,
And, oh, I loved it well.
It ne'er had been where gorgeous flowers
Exposed themselves to view;
But all unknown to vulgar pomp,
The little floweret grew.
With fond delight I gazed, as spring
Breathed o'er its tender form;
And dreamed of summer suns and skies,
Nor thought of blight and storm.
I gave it shelter from the blast;
I watched its beauties spread;
I watered it with tender care;
Removed each noxious weed.
But, ah, my tender floweret drooped
Ere spring's last month had flown;
I loved it more while languishing,
And made it all my own.

This, too, was vain ; and so was hope,
 Though thinking on the best.
 Decay has done his work—and now
 My floweret is at rest.
 No mark betrays its resting-place ;
 Its fate is known to few ;
 But dear to me is still the spot
 Where once my floweret grew.

TO THE EARLY SPEEDWELL.

Sweet little flower ! with deepest grief oppress,
 I still can bind thee to my aching breast ;
 And, though my heart be agonized with care,
 Still thou wilt find a ready welcome there.
 Hope of the summer, pride of early spring,
 May genial breezes ever round thee fling
 Their fragrances ! Though unnoticed, unconfest,
 Thou seem'st to me a joyous, heaven-born guest,
 Or the bright offspring of some fairy clime
 That mocks the self-destroying flight of Time.
 When wintry winds have ceased their fierce career,
 And life revives with the reviving year,
 The sprightly lark, on dew-bespangled wings,
 Mounts upon ether's balmy breast, and sings.
 Thou seem'st to me a charm from on high,
 To woo the spring from yon bright-beaming sky,
 To tell how coming summer's genial reign
 Shall deck the forests in their pride again.

In lyrical and popular poetry, we have wares for all tastes. Our wallet is as diversely stored as that of Autolychus ; but, as Yarrow is a name long consecrated to song, we shall give it precedence.

SONG.

Air—"The Dowie Dens o' Yarrow."

I've tried to sing the deeds o' war,
 Of Hieland feud and Border foray,
 And fain my feckless harp wad dare
 Sometimes to sound auld Scotland's glory.
 But Scotland needs nae harp like mine,
 To sing her houms and heights ae airy—
 Yet, grudge me not, you powers divine,
 One strain to please my artless Mary.

The corn waves rich on Lammas day ;
 Sweet flowers the thorn on Beltane morrow ;
 The rose bud scents the breeze o' May
 That sweeps the sunny dells o' Yarrow ;—
 But Mary's smile is sweeter far
 Than all that's fair, my muse can gather,
 Brighter than morning's dewy car,
 Or sunblink on the purple heather.

I pu'd the rose to deck her hair,
 The gleids o' dew shone on its blossom,
 I pu'd the snow-drop fresh and fair,
 To droop upon her heaving bosom.
 Oh, sing ! my harp, the charms o' love,
 While dreams o' bliss and youthie'd tarry !
 And grant me still, ye powers above,
 One strain to please my artless Mary !

J. MURRAY.

Here comes, next, a song of that plain, wholesome, unpretending English cast, which wont to gladden the hearts of our simple ancestors, in those middle ages after the old minstrel ballads had ceased to charm, and before Byron and Moore had smitten lyre and harp to loftier but not more natural or pathetic strains.

SONG.—MY OWN LITTLE OOT.

I have been in the field when the red blood was spilled,
 I have been at the feast when the red wine was filled ;
 But in camp and in hall I have never forgot
 The peaceful delights of my own little cot.

With my knapsack and gold I am hastening home,
 And deep thrilling thoughts o'er my glad bosom come ;
 For my heart still hath clung to that heaven-guarded spot,
 Like the woodbine that twines round my own little cot.

I have gazed on the dark eyes of southern climes ;
 But sweeter my Mary's blue melting eye shines ;
 And queens and queens' daughters I'll reckon as naught,
 When she welcomes me back to my own little cot.

And my children shall clasp me, and, lisping, implore,
 And I'll promise them too, that I'll wander no more ;
 And the meed of my perils, the gold I have brought,
 Will make the hearth smile in my own little cot.

D.

If our next song prove much less stirring than it might have done a quarter of a century since, it will, at least, to many give back an echo of what wont to set patriot hearts a-throbbing, and the table in a roar.

SONG.

Tune—"Lady Home's Jig."

CHORUS.

Oh, up wi' the thistle aae sturdy an' true,
 The harp o' green Erin, an' England's rose too,
 And ho ! for our lads wi' the kilts and cockades,
 And their braw plaided chiefs wi' their bonnets o' blue !

John Bull's a guld friend at your back ony day,
 Nane braver than Pat to encounter the fray,
 And Sawney gets dour when his back's at the wa',
 And Donald will fight while a plade she can traw.

Then up wi' the thistle, &c.

The Frenchmen thought weel to hae banged us laugeyne,
 And wee Bonapart's had made up his main'
 To treat us like slaves, and to cuff us at will ;
 But we drubbed his brigades, and we're free Britons still.

Then up wi' the thistle, &c.

The Bear o' the North wad right fain set his paw
 On our fine sugar plantins and islands aae braw,
 And Jonathan gins and throws jibes owre the main ;
 But we've cuffed them afore, and we'll cuff them again.

Then up wi' the thistle, &c.

The nations around us oft grumble awae,
 To see little Britain sit queen o' the sea ;
 But they daurna speak out—for they've tried us afore,
 And we proved ourselves victors the hale world o'er.

Then up wi' the thistle, &c.

The Frenchmen may sing owre their raisins and wine,
 The Germans may chant o' the Danube and Rhine,
 The Spaniards may snuff an' look proud as may be—
 But, oh, the blue bonnets o' Scotland for me !

Then up wi' the thistle aae sturdy and true,
 The harp o' green Erin, and England's rose too,
 And ho ! for our lads wi' the kilts and cockades,
 And their braw plaided chiefs wi' their bonnets o' blue !

JAMES MURRAY.

We cannot say much for the following song, save that it is in season. The author has, probably, been spoiled for a popular bard, by reading Horace and Theocritus in the original.

A HARVEST SONG.

Crown my board with blooming posies !

Crown it, all ye powers above !

Deck it round with heaps of roses !

Crown it too with happy love !

Let the generous wine go round—

Fill it to the very brim !

Welcome each warm heart around—

Here's a flowing health to him !

Crown my board with fruits in season—

With the luscious peach and pear !

Flow of soul and feast of reason—

May no jealous heart be here !

Let the generous wine go round—

Fill it to the very brim !

Welcome each warm heart around—

Here's a flowing health to him !

Crown my board with smoking dishes—
Smoking from a beechen fire!
Now the year has crowned our wishes—
Given us all our hearts' desire.
Let the generous wine go round—
Fill it to the very brim!
Welcome each warm heart around—
Here's a flowing health to him!

Crown my board with smiles and glances—
Glances from the fair one's eyes!—
Sure these eyes are love's own lances,
Causing lover's pains and sighs.
Let the generous wine go round—
Fill it to the very brim!
Welcome each warm heart around—
Here's a flowing health to him!

B.

Our next lyrics belong to the school of Tanna-hill and the Etterick Shepherd. The author of the first song is a young hand-loom weaver in the country, who has had little more education than appears to come to all Scottish rustics from the atmosphere of their hills and glens, and the genial influences of their cottage firesides.

EVENING'S DEWY HOUR.

Air—"Roslin Castle."

When rosy day far in the west has vanish'd frae the scene,
And gloamin spreads her mantle grey owre lake and mountain green;
When yet the darklin' shades o' mirk but ha'fens seem to lower—
How dear to love and beauty is the e'ning's dewy hour!

When down the burnie's wimpling course, amid the hazel shade,
The robin chants his vesper sang, the cushat seeks the glade;
When bats their drowsy vigils wheel round eldrich tree and tower—
Be't mine to meet the lass I lee at e'ning's dewy hour.

When owre the flower-beespangled sward the flocks have ceased to stray,
And maulkin steals across the lawn beneath the twilight grey—
Then, oh! how dear, frae men apart, in glen or woodland bower,
To meet the lass we dearly lee at e'ning's dewy hour!

The roddy morn has charms 'snew, when from the glewin sky,
The sun on rival beauties smiles wi' gladness in his eye;
But, oh! the softer shaded scene has magic in its power,
Which cheers the youthful lover's heart at e'ning's dewy hour.

SONG.—MUIRLAND PEGGY.

My Peggy dwalt in yonder howe
Whar grows the birk sae bonny, O;
And whar the burnie rins unseen,
An' scarcely heard by ony, O.

My Peggy she was young an' fair,
An' meek as ony lammy, O;
An' aye she toil'd, an' aye she span,
To keep her puir auld mammy, O.
When wintry winds were roarin' loud,
An' days sae cauld an' cloudy, O;
My tartan plaid I owre me threw,
An' cross'd the hill to Peggy, O.

But lanely now I cross the hill,
An' dowie rins my doggie, O;
He kens his master's heart is sair,
An' mourns wi' him for Peggy, O.

The cauld grave now is Peggy's bed,
Her curtains are the willow, O;
The green grass now her coverlet,
The granite grey her pillow, O.

These waters may come back again,
An' jaw up owre the craigs, O;
But ne'er, until my heart be still,
Will I forget my Peggy, O.

We shall close this division with

A JAMAICA CHANT.

Nigger was so berry glad
'Cos him de 'prentice;
Him tink him neber more make sad,
'Cos him de 'prentice.

Mama, him look berry glum,
'Cos make de 'prentice;
Say, no more tobac and rum,
'Cos he de 'prentice.

Den him soon great money come,
Pay for de 'prentice;
Mama laf; him cock him thoust,
Say teach de 'prentice.

Mama den make Sambo work,
'Cos him de 'prentice;
Call him scoundrel, say much lark,
Now him de 'prentice.

Make him do great, double ting,
'Cos him de 'prentice;
Give no eat, no dance, no sing,
'Cos him de 'prentice.

Ben him tlek, him leab him die,
'Cos him de prentice;
Dinah's pickaninies cry,
Now her de 'prentice.

Mama d—— em, him no care,
Dem not de 'prentice;
Dinah sorry; mama swear
No time de 'prentice.

Nigger come, him berry old,
Him learu de 'prentice.
Mama hate him, much him scold,
Send will' de prentice.

Nigger now him bow him down,
'Cos him de 'prentice;
Mama floggy, much him frown,
Make beas de 'prentice.

White man say, "Two year make free,"
Tell laf de 'prentice;
Nigger know him den dead be,
'Cos him de 'prentice.

It may be true, and we fervently trust it is, that negro-men will not need to sing to this tune much longer; but the above deserves to be recorded as a lay of the olden time, as we still keep in mind "the Jew's Daughter," though Jewesses no longer drown little Christian boys in draw-wells, or boil them in caldrons.

LOYAL POEMS; OR, CORONATION LAYS.

SONG.

Air—"Caledonia."

Scotland's hills are bonny hills, a' clad wi' heather bells,
And music warbles in the rills that sport adown her dells,
And there be glens in fair Scotland where foe hath never been,
And wild and free we'll keep them yet for our good Queen!

Oh, wad she cross the Tweed some day, our Scottish glens to view,
Our fairy lakes and streamlets grey, lone isles and mountains blue,
And see auld Scotland's goodly bands, wi' belt and buckle shen,
In proud array come forth to greet their fair young Queen!

* Treadwell.

For Scotland has her glensmen brave that bear the targe and brand,
Who'd spend their dearest blood to save their own romantic land;
And they would leave their hills of mist, and glens of lovely green,
To form a living bulwark round their fair young Queen.

And Scotland has her yeomen leal, and stalwart loons they be,
That whirl like willow wands their steel when mustered on the lea;
And should a foe invade our soil, no braver band I ween
Would fight beneath the banners broad of our young Queen.

And Scotland boasts her lovely ones—a beauteous train are they;
But much she mourns her tuneful sons, young bards and minstrels grey;
For those that waked her sweetest lyres sleep 'neath the turfs so green—
We've few to sing the welcome now of our young Queen.

We've heard of merry England's scenes, and trusty souls are there,
And Erin boasts her green demesnes, rich woods, and prospects fair;
But Scotland boasts her rugged hills where freemen aye have been—
Oh, come, and let us dote on thee, our fair young Queen.

MEPH. IN LONDON.

Mephistopheles perched on a pinnacle point,
On the 28th of June;

His cock-tail wriggled in every joint,
Like the wires of a fiddle in tune.

Half the point was enough for Meph;

A pickled-faced sprite on t'other half,

With a leering eye, and a sneering lip,

Stood side by side with his devilship.

And all around was a merry sound

Of laughter, shout, and singing;

The bells from a thousand spires around

Their joyous peals were flinging:

For the day when the Queen of our Isles was crowned,

Through time its flight was winging.

"Ha! Peri, my boy, d'ye hear, d'ye see,"

Quoth the fiend to the devil-eyed sprite,

"The buzz of a nation's mummery,

The waving bonnets, the looks of glee?"

Quoth the sprite—"Tis John Bull's loyalty—

"Twill pall on his stomach ere night."

The pomp is passing; the sunshine dancing

On stole, and plume, and diamond glancing;

And Peers from their well-bred eyes look out

With a gracious smile on the rabble rout;

And wondering Peereesses simper that thus

Such things as these can stare at "us;"

And aldermen smile that the lower class
Should ungrudgingly shout as their bellies pass;

And bishops smile such things to see

As the world's pomp wed to sanctity;

And ambassadors smile at Bull's meek eye,

As his bread-tax glitters in diamonds by.

Quoth Meph—"Now, shake your sides, my Lord,

Shade of the princely Perigord;"

"Yea lordling, beetle-browed, d'ye mark,

With an eye that looks, 'Let no dog bark!'

A legislator from the womb,

His dogs and he have common doom;

Though well his solemn bearing suits

With England's legislator grave,

One kennel might have served the brutes,

For all the difference Nature gave.

And mark yon round and gracious face,

Fat type of Oligarchic grace;

Lucullus of exhaustless board,

Vitellius of the greaning board;

He'd spurn the poor man shivering poor—
And never dried an orphan's tear;
Yet wears he condescension's smile
Upon his ready lip the while,
As myriads hail the bread-tax gold
Glistening amid his garments' fold;
And he, yon priest, incarnate God!
How meekly does he kiss the rod
That drives him, warm with holy love
And longings after worlds above,
To add one foam-bell to the tide
Of earthly pomp and heartless pride!"
Quoth Tally—"Oh, nothing can match his humility,
But his love for the poor, and mankind's gullibility."
The pomp hath passed. "Away, away,
To the chequered arch of the rich abbaye!
Where we may see, unscen the while,
The Bible and the holy oil,
And the saintly mummer, in mockery stand,
To pray amid the jewelled band,
And try, with solemn farce of face,
To make the Devil and God embrace."

CYRUS.

CORONATION SONNET.

The old roofs shook with the imperial peal
Of chant and music; and the haughty crowd
Of priests and peers in weakness rose up proud,
Shouting until the curved towers did reel.

I heeded not their feigned or frantic zeal:

The shade of Freedom o'er the pageant bow e'd

Blind with false glitter, deaf with uproar loud,

They saw not—but my inmost soul did feel

The beautiful contempt unflinchingly beaming

Over her pensive visage, when the air

Glistened, as all the coronets up-gleaming,

The nobles crowned themselves.—Oh, sad despair!

Paled the bright vision, vanishing at sight,

When the paid commoners base plaudits cried.

The materials of our varied Feast are still far from being exhausted; but we must change our hand and check our pride for the present. To Pan we offer apology for withholding his sylvan tribute. The Wood-god is, however, neither forgotten nor unappreciated. We are also compelled to defer some elegant and classic translations from the Italian and German, and also several poems which the countrymen of Burns, Allan Cunningham, and Sir Alexander Boswell, will still prize, although we regret to see the English public fast losing their Scottish tastes, no longer sustained by Sir Walter Scott and the temporary vogue of everything Caledonian. We shall, however, venture to try them with this production of the Scottish comic muse:—

HIGHLAND BIOGRAPHY.

NO. II.—BRUMMEL M'ROBY.

By David Vedder.

His honour the laird, in pursuit of an heiress,
Has squandered his money in London and Paris;
His creditors gloom, while the black-legs are laughin':
The Gauger's the mightiest man in the clachan!

Our worthy incumbent is wrinkled and auld,
And whiles takes a drapple to hand out the cauld;
Syne wraps himself round in his auld tartan rachan;
The Gauger's the mightiest man in the clachan!

The Dominie toils like a slave a' the week,
And, although he's a dungeon o' Latin an' Greek,
He hasna three stivers to clink in his splenchan:
The Gauger's the mightiest man in the clachan!

The Doctor's a generalman learned an' brow,
But his outlay is great, and his income is sma';
Disease is unknown in the parish of Strathgown:
The Gauger's the happiest man in the clachan!

* Our poet pronounces all French nouns as Charles Fox pronounced them, like an Englishman.

Auld Johnnie M'Nab was a bien bonnet-laird,
Six acres he had, wi' a house and a yard;
But now he's a dyvor, wi' bairling and vauchin':
The Gauger's the wealthiest man in the clachan!

The weel-scented barber, wha mell'd wi' the gentry,
The walking gazette for the half o' the kintre—
His jokes have grown stale, for they ne'er excite laughin':
The Gauger's the wittiest man in the clachan!

The drouthy auld Smith, with his jest and his jeer,
Has shrunk into naught since the Gauger came here;
The lang-gabbit Tailor's as mute as a maukin':
The Gauger's the stang o' the trump in the clachan!

On Sunday, the Gauger's sae trig an' sae dashin',
The model, the pink, an' the mirror o' fashion;
He cleeks wi' the minister's daughter, I trow;
An' they smirk i' the laft in a green-cushioned pew.

At meetings, whenever the Bailie is preses,
He takes his opinion in difficult cases;
The grey-headed elders invariably greet him;
And brewster-wives beck when they happen to meet him.

The Bedral, wha howffs up the best in the land,
Aye cracks to the Gauger wi' bonnet in hand—
Tho' cauld, wi' his asthma, is sair to be dreaded,
He will, in his presence, continue bare-headed.

At dregdies an' weddings, he's sure to be there,
And either is in, or sits near to the chair;
At rouns an' house-heatings, presides at the toddy,
An' drives hame at night in the factor's auld noddy.

At Yule, when the daft-days are fairly set in,
A play without him wadna be worth a pin;
He opens ilk ball wi' the toast o' the parish,
An' trips, like Narcissus, sae gaudy an' galrish.

An' when he's defunct, an' is laid i' the yird,
His banes maunna mix wi' the mere vulgar herd,
In the common kirk-yard; but be carried in style,
An' buried deep, deep in the choir, or the aisle.

There were GRANTS in the garden wi' Adam an' Eve;
Now, Brummel held this an' apocryphal bore—
But he traced up his fathers to Malcolm Canmore."

An' they had been warriors, an' chieftains, an' lairds,
An' they had been reivers, an' robbers, an' cairds;
They had filled every grade, from a chief to a vassal;
But MAC had been Borriisdale's ain dunniwassel.

The chief an' M'Rory had hunted together,
They had dined i' the Ha'house, an' lunched on the heather;

M'Rory had shaved him, an' pouthered his wig—
My certie! no wonder M'Rory was big!

When Borriisdale sported his jests after dinner,
M'Rory guffaw'd like a laughing "hyenar,"
An' thundered applause, an' was ready to swear
"Such peaufitl jesting ahe neffer did haar."

When Borriisdale raised a young regiment called "local,"
An' pibrochs an' fife made the mountains seem vocal,
M'Rory was aye at his post i' the raw,
An' was captain, an' sergeant, an' corpal an' a!

An' he drilled the recruits wi' his braw yellow stick,
Wi' the flat o' his sword he gied mony a lick;
An' in dressing the ranks he had never been chidden;
An' he dined wi' the Cornel whene'er he was bidden.

On his patron's estate he was principal actor,
Gamekeeper an' forester, bailie an' factor;
An' mony a poacher he pu'd by the lug,
An' mony a hemple he set i' the jounge!

But Borriisdale gaed to the land o' the leal,
An' his country was bought by a nabob frae Keel;
So they made Rory a Gauger, sae trig an' sae galrish—
An' now he's the mightiest man i' the parish!

SPEECHES OF LORD BROUGHAM.

BEFORE the critics have closed their learned remarks upon the four large volumes already collected, Lord Brougham will have furnished rich and ample materials for a fifth volume—and one in season. He will then have concluded the most brilliant and powerful, and, as true reformers and philanthropists must emphatically feel, the most useful session of his Parliamentary career. In this memorable Session, memorable not more for the imbecility of the Government, than for the supineness or wavering of many of the professed Liberal leaders, he has done much to annihilate slavery in the west, while, in the east, he alone has strangled the monster in its cradle. In relation to Canada, Lord Brougham has maintained those free principles which give the British Constitution all its value, and which have not found one other advocate among those claiming to be the political descendants of Chatham and Fox.

A supplementary volume, or the publication of the important speeches delivered during the present Session, in some form, becomes the more needful, from some of the conductors of the Ministerial journals having, with equal good faith and respect to the public, omitted all notice of those of Lord Brougham's addresses which, in exposing public evils, and denouncing whether the faults or the short-comings of Ministers, place their patrons or paymasters obviously in the wrong, and give the lie to their own predictions. The paltriness of this conduct in the guardians of the public press, surpasses, if possible, its dishonesty. Are orders issued from Downing Street that this or that speech or letter shall be smothered?—or is the matter quietly left to the servile instincts of those interested? It signifies little; Lord Brougham's voice in this country can no more be stifled than his intellect can be extinguished, or his good name and usefulness to the people whispered away, by pertinacious misrepresentation and calumny.

The chief object of our former article upon these speeches, was to shew in what manner, and upon what principle of difference, Lord Brougham had thrown down the gauntlet to his late official colleagues. His challenge to them to shew in what he had changed or swerved from his life-long opinions, has been, so far as we notice, prudently declined. The signal has probably been given, in some instances, to maintain a discreet silence; while we should hope that, in honest quarters, the advocates have thrown up the hopeless case. The Ed.

aminer alone has made a small nibble, with less than its accustomed ability, but, in compensation, with exceeding good-will to the office. Admitting that Lord Brougham were that inconsistent politician, that bitter-minded, vindictive man, wherever old principles abjured, and old friends deserted, are concerned, which The Examiner alleges, one would expect, at this particular juncture, and from that particular quarter, more sympathy, more congeniality, and, as it were, community of feeling, than is displayed towards a brother in change and in adversity. From the Government, or its openly accredited organs, the public did expect some attempt at vindication—some effort, either to explain, or, at all events, to deny, many of the preliminary statements in Lord Brougham's book. It would have stood the Ministry in good stead at this time to have been able to demonstrate to "the rude truculent democracy," that they were the same zealous Reformers in 1838, which they professed themselves to be, or allowed their heralds to proclaim them, in 1834; and that Lord Brougham, in deserting and opposing them throughout this, and partly in the last Session, had abandoned the cause of Reform and joined the Tories. The public conduct of Lord Brougham is, however, a matter of notoriety, of which every man who reads a newspaper can take cognizance; but upon the private transactions referred to in the prefaces to his speeches, the gratitude which he says was expressed to him by the Cabinet Ministers, while he either absented himself from Parliament in compliance with their request, or kept silence, where his speech would have been detection, exposure, contempt, and ruin—the public did expect explanation; a reason given, or a denial made. The fair assumption is, that no valid reason can be given; and, as denial is impossible, strict silence on those delicate Cabinet matters is the part of discretion, however repugnant it may be to the manly feelings of the noble parties concerned. We can also understand, that the Ministers have had their hands too full of Lord Brougham in Parliament, to have had opportunity or taste for adjusting old private scores. They may get time in a not improbably approaching season of leisure and retirement.

Lord Brougham's work, as we formerly intimated, opens rather abruptly with a short general preface, containing those valuable observations on the legitimate objects of party connexion quoted in our last Number. The first volume contains the speeches on the trials of the Hunts and Drakard; the whole of the speeches in the case of Queen Caroline, and those libel cases connected with it; those on Commerce and Manufactures, arising from Mr Brougham's opposition to the Orders in Council; and the speeches on Manufactures and Agricultural Distress, delivered in the severe times which followed the peace. The volume concludes with a History of the so-called Holy Alliance, and a sketch of Lord Castlereagh, and the Emperor Alexander, with which the speech against the unprincipled interference of the Holy Allies with the affairs of Spain is prefaced. Before coming to this remarkable oration, we shall take a short extract from a speech upon extravagant Army Estimates, made in support of an amendment moved by Mr Calcraft in 1816, to reduce the vote for the Household Troops, from the extravagant sum of £385,276 : 9 : 6 to £192,638 : 4 : 9.

I stand forward to take up the gauntlet which has thus been thrown down; and I affirm that the more minutely you scrutinize the several items of this bill brought in against the country, the more objectionable you will find them. I object, in the first place, altogether, to the large force of Guards which it is intended to keep up; and even protest, though that is a trifle in comparison, but I do protest against the new-fangled French name of Household Troops, under which they are designated—a name borrowed from countries where this portion of the national force is exclusively allotted to protect the Prince against a people in whom he cannot trust—is the appointed means given him to maintain his arbitrary power—is the very weapon put into his hands to arm him against the liberties of his country. However appropriate the appellation may be there, it cannot be endured in this nation, where the Sovereign ought never to have any reason for distrusting his subjects, and never can be entrusted with any force except that which the defence of his people requires. But the name is of far less importance than the thing. Has the noble Lord made out anything like a case for raising the amount of this force to more than double of what it was in 1791? It has indeed been said that 2400 of the Guards are destined for France, where I suppose the army of occupation is required, in order to demonstrate how tranquil our famous negotiators have left the whole Continent—how perfectly successful—how absolutely final—the grand settlement of all Europe is, upon which we so greatly plume ourselves, and upon which, above all, the political reputation of the noble Lord is built. But suppose I pass over this, and do not stop to ask what reason there can be for these 2400 men being Guards, and not simply troops of the line—those troops required to maintain our final and conclusive settlement, and enforce the profound tranquillity in which Europe is everywhere enwrapped; suppose I admit, for argument sake, and in my haste to get at the main question, that these 2400 Guards may be necessary—what is to be said of all the rest? There remain no less than 7600 to account for. What reason has been assigned, what attempt ever made by the noble Lord, to assign a reason why 3600 more Guards should be wanted more than in Mr Pitt's celebrated establishment in 1792? I desire, however, to have this explained—I demand the ground for this enormous augmentation of what you call your "Household Force"—I have a right to know why this increase is called for—I call for the reason of it, and the reason I will have. Deduct all you require, or say you require, for France; what has happened since Mr Pitt's time to justify you in nearly doubling the number of the Guards? That is the question, and it must be answered to Parliament and to the country—answered, not by vague generalities—by affected anxiety for discussion—by shallow pretences of desire to have the fullest investigation—by blustering defiance to us—and swaggering taunts that we dare not investigate. We do investigate—we do advance to the conflict—we do go into the details—we do enter upon the items one by one; and the first that meets us on the very threshold, and as soon as we have planted a foot upon it, is this doubling of the Guards. Then how do you defend that? Where is the ground for it? What is there to excuse it or to explain? Mr Pitt found 4000 enough in 1792—then what is there to make 7600 wanting now? Jacobinism, the bugbear of 1792, has for the past six years and more never been even named. I doubt if allusion to it has been made in this House, even in a debate upon a King's speech, since Mr Pitt's death. And to produce a Jacobin, or a specimen of any other kindred tribe, would, I verily believe, at this time of day, baffle the skill and the perseverance of the most industrious and most zealous collector of political curiosities, to be found in the whole kingdom. What, then, is the danger—what the speculation upon some possible and expected, but non-existing risk—which makes it necessary at this time to augment the force applied to preserve the peace of the metropolis? But I fear there are far other designs in this measure, than merely to preserve a peace which no man living can have the boldness to contend in any danger of being broken, and no man living can have the weakness really to be apprehensive about. Empty show, vain parade, will account for the array being acceptable in some high quarters; in others, the force may be recommended by its tending to increase the powers of the executive government, and extend the influence of the prerogative. In either light, it is most disgusting, most hateful to the eye of every friend of his country, and every one who loves the Constitution—all who have any regard for public liberty, and all who reflect on the burthens imposed upon the people.

In allusion to an argument employed by Lord Castlereagh for maintaining the whole force, Mr Brougham said—

I am now speaking the language of the noble Lord's argument, and not of my own. He holds it to be unfair towards the Guards that they should be reduced, after eminently meritorious service—he connects merit with the military state—disgrace, or at least slight, with the loss of this station. He holds the soldier to be preferred, rewarded, and distinguished, who is retained in the army—him to be neglected or ill-used, if not stigmatized, who is discharged. His view of the Constitution is, that the capacity of the soldier is more honourable and more excellent than that of the citizen. According to his view, therefore, the whole army has the same right to complain with the Guards. But his view is not my view; it is not the view of the Constitution; it is not the view which I can ever consent to assume as just, and to inculcate into the army by acting as if it were just. I never will suffer it to be held out as the principle of our free and popular government, that a man is exalted by being made a soldier, and degraded by being restored to the rank of a citizen. I never will allow it to be said, that, in a country blessed by having a civil and not a military government, by enjoying the exalted station of a constitutional monarchy, and not being degraded to that of a military despotism, there is any pre-eminence whatever in the class of citizens which bears arms, over the class which cultivates the arts of peace. When it suits the purpose of some argument in behalf of a soldiery who have exceeded the bounds of the law in attacking some assembled force of the people, how often are we told from that bench of office, from the Crown side of the Bar, nay, from the Bench of justice itself, that, by becoming soldiers, men cease not to be citizens, and that this is a glorious peculiarity of our free Constitution? Then what right can the noble Lord have to consider that the retaining men under arms and in the pay of the State, is an exaltation and a distinction, which they cease to enjoy if restored to the status of ordinary citizens? I read the Constitution in the very opposite sense to the noble Lord's gloss. I have not sojourned in Congresses with the military representatives of military powers—I have not frequented the courts, any more than I have followed the camps of these potentates—I have not lived in the company of crowned soldiers, all whose ideas are fashioned upon the rules of the drill and the articles of the fifteen manœuvres—all whose estimates of a country's value are framed on the number of troops it will raise—and who can no more sever the idea of a subject from that of a soldier, than if men were born into this world in complete armour, as Minerva started from Jupiter's head. My ideas are more humble and more civic; and the only language I know, or can speak, or can understand in this House, is the mother tongue of the old English Constitution. I will speak none other—I will suffer none other to be spoken in my presence. Addressing the soldier in that language—which alone above all other men, in the country he ought to know—to which alone it peculiarly behoves us that he, the armed man, should be accustomed—I tell him, "You have distinguished yourself—all that the noble Lord says of you is true—nay, under the truth—you have crowned yourself with the glories of the war. But chiefly you, the Guards, you have outshone all others, and won for yourselves a deathless fame. Now, then, advance and receive your reward. Partake of the benefits you have secured for your grateful country. None are better than you entitled to share in the blessings, the inestimable blessings of peace—than you whose valour has conquered it for us. Go back then to the rank of citizens, which, for a season, you quitted at the call of your country. Exalt her glory in peace whom you served in war; and enjoy the rich recompense of all your toils in the tranquil retreat from dangers, which her gratitude bestows upon you."—I know this to be the language of the Constitution, and time was when none other could be spoken, or would have been understood in this House. I still hope that no one will dare use any other in the country; and least of all can any other be endured as addressed to the soldiery in arms, treating them as if they were the hired partisans of the Prince, a caste set apart for his service, and distinguished from all the rest of their countrymen, not a class of the people devoting themselves for a season to carry arms in defence of the nation, and, when their services are wanted no more, retiring naturally to mix with and be lost in the mass of their fellow-citizens.

This oration, Lord Brougham mentions, obtained more applause than was then usually given to Parliamentary speeches. "Loud cheering from all sides of the House" was at that period rare. It is not, however, more entitled to applause than his late speech on the prodigal CIVIL LIST voted by the Melbourne Parliament to the young Queen. This, if not one of the worst acts of the Melbourne Government, is certainly the most indecent, and that which will the most effectually destroy whatever remaining degree of confidence the People placed in the Whigs. But some three short years since, the Whig-Tory ministers were out-bidding the Conservatives for the favour of the people; now, the two great factions are out-bidding each other for the smiles of the court. To Lord Brougham's twenty-two-years-old speech, it may be thought folly to recur, now when the country is familiarized with large standing armies, and when the wholesome old English jealousy of Household Troops—that device of the despotic Bourbons—is deemed a worn-out prejudice. Yet there are still many among us who have open ears and grateful hearts. The People will feel the force of this animated appeal.

The Estimate before you is £385,000, for the support of 8100 Guards. Adopt my honourable friend's amendment,* and you reduce them to about 4000, which is still somewhat above their number in the last peace.

Sir, I have done. I have discharged my duty to the country—I have accepted the challenge of the Ministers to discuss the question—I have met them fairly, and grappled with the body of the argument. I may very possibly have failed to convince the House that this establishment is enormous and unjustifiable, whether we regard the burthened condition of the country, or the tranquil state of its affairs at home, or the universal repose in which the world is lulled, or the experience of former times, or the mischievous tendency of large standing armies in a constitutional point of view, or the dangerous nature of the arguments urged in their support upon the present occasion. All this I feel very deeply; and I am also very sensible how likely it is that, on taking another view, you should come to an opposite determination. Be it so—I have done my duty—I have entered my protest. It cannot be laid to my charge that a force is to be maintained in profound and general peace, twice as great as was formerly deemed sufficient when all Europe was involved in domestic troubles, and war raged in some parts and was about to spread over the whole. It is not my fault that peace will have returned without its accustomed blessings—that our burthens are to remain undiminished—that our liberties are to be menaced by a standing army, without the pretence of necessity in any quarter to justify its continuance. The blame is not mine that a brilliant and costly army of household troops, of unprecedented numbers, is allowed to the Crown, without the shadow of use, unless it be to pumper a vicious appetite for military show, to gratify a passion for parade, childish and contemptible, unless, indeed, that nothing can be an object of contempt which is at once dangerous to the Constitution of the country, and burthensome to the resources of the people. I shall further record my resistance to this system by my vote; and never did I give my voice to any proposition with more hearty satisfaction than I now do to the amendment of my honourable friend.

The HOLY ALLIANCE, that hypocritical confederacy of crowned heads against the liberties of mankind, consecrated by solemn, if not rather blasphemous mockeries, could not escape the vigilance of the ever-alert guardian of freedom. The Holy Alliance forms the most curious interlude in the drama of modern international diplomacy. The royal conspirators might, in some degree, be self-deluded; but their secret designs were not the less wicked, that the circumstances of the world have rendered them abortive. The high contracting parties, the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and the King of Prussia, pledged themselves, not through their ministers, but personally, to this new apostleship, or brotherhood of Fathers of Nations.

Contrary to all the accustomed forms of diplomacy, the treaty was only signed by the three monarchs themselves, without any mention whatever being made of ambassadors, ministers, or other representatives, as engaged in the negotiation.

When this extraordinary transaction came to be known, it naturally excited great attention, and gave birth to many suspicions. That these powerful monarchs should make a treaty for no other purpose than to avow their religious fervour, and preach the Christian doctrine for the benefit of their subjects, and should form an alliance, having no other object than to profess together those doctrines, and in concert to practise them, seemed altogether unaccountable. This, of itself, would have been sufficient to awaken grave suspicions that much more was meant by this confederacy than met the eye. But to this was to be added the previous relations of alliance, offensive and defensive, which had subsisted between the same princes, and far from ending in sermons upon the duties of a Christian man, had brought into the field of battle above half a million of Christian men in full armour. There were indeed some parts of this curious document itself, which pointed pretty plainly at operations of the flesh rather than the spirit, and gave indications sufficiently manifest of the designs in which it originated, or, at any rate, of the proceedings to which it might lead. The first and fundamental article bound the parties to lead their armies in the spirit of fraternity, for the protection of religion, peace, and justice. Now, under a description so very vague and large as this, almost any objects might be comprehended; and men did not fail to remark, that there had hardly ever been a war of the most unjust aggression begun without lavish professions that its only design was to see justice done, and obtain a secure and honourable peace.

Against these very natural suspicions, nothing could be set except the pious language of the treaty, which, of course, went for little, and the peculiar character of the Emperor Alexander, its chief promoter, which went for not much more. This Prince was said to have lately become a convert to some sect of religious enthusiasts, a distinguished professor among whom was a certain Madame Krudener, one of those mystical devotees, half evangelical, half metaphysical, with which Germany abounds. The Alliance was represented as the result of this holy female's inspirations, and the first fruits of her influence over the Autocratic neophyte. The phrase was, and Lord Castlereagh, when questioned in Parliament, gave the matter this turn, that the whole was a mere innocent act, an amiable fancy of his Imperial Majesty, in which England and France were only prevented from joining, by the forms of their diplomacy excluding direct negotiation and treating by the Sovereign, but which, as it could not possibly lead to any practical consequences, was not worth objecting to, or commenting upon.

A full-length portrait of the Emperor Alexander follows these remarks. It is far too striking in resemblance to leave a favourable impression of the royal personage depicted. We can borrow but a single trait:—

His shallow vanity was displayed during the visit of the Princes to England. When, among other party leaders, Lord Grenville was presented to him, he thought it was hitting on an excellent improvement in the conduct of party concerns, to recommend that, instead of urging objections in Parliament to the Ministerial measures, the Opposition should seek private audiences of their adversaries from time to time, and confidentially offer their objections, or propose their amendments. Nor was this vain and superficial Prince made at all sensible of the folly he had committed, by the somewhat peremptory negative which a few characteristic words and gestures of the veteran party man suddenly put upon his shallow and ignorant scheme.

His reputation for honesty stood extremely low, even among persons of his pre-eminent station. Napoleon, who knew his imperial brother thoroughly, applied to him the uncourtly, and indeed rather unceremonious description of "faux, fin, et fourbe, comme un Grec du bas empire." His course was marked by no displays either of princely or of private virtues—of munificence, of magnanimity, of self-denial, of plain-dealing. Nor did the extraordinary pretences to religion, which marked his latter years, succeed in deceiving any one, but such as were, either from the adulation of the Court or the enthusiasm of the Conventicle, willing and even anxious to be deluded. Among such dupes he passed for somewhat more pious than his royal compeers; but few were, even in that class, found so charitable as to believe in his honesty, or to suppose that, under the professions of the Christian treaty, there lurked no hidden designs of a purely secular and strictly royal description.

Lord Castlereagh finds a niche in the same historical gallery. His few remaining admirers, and his friends, if ever he had one, will not, we think, quarrel with the truth of the likeness, especially when they find the fortuitous Premier placed, as he scarcely deserves, above later persons "of more obscure merit," who have since occupied the same high station.

Few men of more limited capacity, or more meagre acquirements than Lord Castlereagh possessed, had before his time ever risen to any station of eminence in our free country; fewer still have long retained it in a State where mere Court intrigue and princely favour have so little to do with men's advancement. But we have lived to see persons of more obscure merit than Lord Castlereagh rise to equal station in this country. Of sober and industrious habits, and became possessed of business-like talents by long experience. he was a person of the most common-place abilities. He had a reasonable quickness of apprehension and clearness of understanding, but nothing brilliant or in any way admirable marked either his conceptions or his elocution. Nay, to judge of his intellect by his eloquence, we should certainly have formed a very unfair estimate of its perspicacity. For, though it was hardly possible to underrate its extent or comprehensiveness, it was very far from being confused and perplexed in the proportion of its sentences; and the listener who knew how distinctly the speaker could form his plans, and how clearly his ideas were known to himself, might, comparing small things with great, be reminded of the prodigious contrast between the distinctness of Oliver Cromwell's understanding, and the hopeless confusion and obscurity of his speech. No man, besides, ever attained the station of a regular debater in our Parliament with such an entire want of all classical accomplishment, or indeed of all literary provision whatsoever. While he never shewed the least symptoms of an information extending beyond the more recent volumes of the "Parliamentary Debates," or possibly the files of the newspapers only, his diction set all imitation, perhaps all description, at defiance. It was with some amusement to beguile the tedious hours of their unavoidable attendance upon the poor, tawdry, ravelled thread of his sorry discourse, to collect a kind of ana from the fragments of mixed, incongruous, and disjointed images, that frequently appeared in it. "The features of the clause"—"the ignorant impatience of the relaxation of taxation"—"sets of circumstances coming up and circumstances going down"—"men turning their backs upon themselves"—"the honourable and learned gentlemen's wedge getting into the loyal feelings of the manufacturing classes"—"the constitutional principle wound up in the bowels of the monarchical principle"—"the Herculean labour of the honourable and learned member, who will find himself quite disappointed when he has at last brought forth his Hercules"—(by a slight confounding of the mother's labour, who produced that here, with his own exploits which gained him immortality)—these are but a few, and not the richest samples, by any means, of a rhetoric which often baffled alike the gravity of the Treasury Bench and the reporter, and left the wondering audience at a loss to conjecture how any one could ever exist endowed with humbler pretensions to the name of orator. Wherefore, when the Tory party, "having a devil," preferred him to Mr Canning for their leader, all men naturally expected that he would entirely fail to command even the attendance of the House while he addressed it; and that the benches, empty during his time, would only be replenished when his highly gifted competitor rose. They were greatly deceived; they underrated the effect of place and power; they forgot that the representative of a government speaks "as one having authority, and not as the scribes." But they also forgot that Lord Castlereagh had some qualities well-fitted to conciliate favour, and even to provoke admiration, in the absence of everything like eloquence. He was a bold and fearless man; the very courage with which he exposed himself unabashed to the most critical audience in the world, while incapable of uttering two sentences of anything but the meanest matter, in the most wretched language; the gallantry with which he faced the greatest difficulties of a question; the unflinching perseverance with which he went through a whole subject, leaving untouched not one of its points, whether he could grapple with it or no, and not one of the adverse arguments, however forcibly and felicitously they had been urged, neither daunted by recollecting the impression just made by his antagonist's brilliant display, nor damped by the consciousness of the very rage in which he now presented himself—all this made him, upon the whole, rather a favourite with the audience whose patience he was taxing mercilessly, and whose gravity he ever and anon put to a very severe trial. Nor can any one have forgotten the kind of pride that mounted on the fronts of the Tory phalanx, when, after being overwhelmed by the powerful fire of the Whig opposition, or galled by the fierce denunciations of the Mount, sin, or harrassed by the splendid displays of Mr Canning, their chosen leader stood forth, and, presenting the graces of his eminently patrician figure, flung open his coat, displayed an azure ribbon traversing a snow-white chest, and declared "his high satisfaction that he could now meet the charges against him face to face, and repel with indignation all that his adversaries had been bold and rash enough to advance."

Such he was in debate; in council he certainly had far more resources. He possessed a considerable fund of plain sense, not to be misled by any refinement of speculation, or clouded by any fanciful notions. He went straight to his point. He was brave politically as well as personally. . . . The complaints made of his Irish administration were perfectly well grounded as regarded the corruption of the Parliament, by which he accomplished the Union; but they were entirely unfounded as regarded the cruelties practised during and after the Rebellion. Far from partaking in these atrocities, he uniformly and strenuously set his face against them. He was of a cold temperament and determined character, but not of a cruel disposition; and to him, more than perhaps to any one else, was owing the termination of the system stained with blood.

His foreign administration was as destitute of all merit as possible. No enlarged views guided his conduct; no liberal principles claimed his regard; no generous sympathies, no grateful feelings for the people whose sufferings and whose valour had accomplished the restoration of their national independence, prompted his tongue, when he carried forth from the land of liberty that influence which she had a right to exercise—she who had made such vast sacrifices, and was never in return to reap any, the least selfish advantage. . . . He flung himself at once and for ever into the arms of the [foreign] sovereigns—seemed to take a vulgar pride in being suffered to become their associate—appeared desirous, with the vanity of an upstart elevated unexpectedly into higher circles, of forgetting what he had been, and qualifying himself for the company he now kept, by assuming their habits—and never pronounced any of those words so familiar with the English nation and with English statesmen, in the mother tongue of a limited monarchy, for fear he might be deemed low-bred, and unsuited to the society of crowned heads, in which he was living, and to which they might prove as distasteful as they were unaccustomed. . . . It is little to be wondered at, that those potentates found him ready enough with his defence of their Holy Alliance.

To the boldness and fearlessness which Lord Brougham commemorates—and which was rather the consequence of obtuse feeling than of calm, undaunted effrontery, or that "intrepidity of face" for which some of Lord Castlereagh's countrymen are famed—a more qualified epithet should be applied, than manly fearlessness. Self-possession and courage, in men of shallow understanding, and narrow or bad principles, are among the most pernicious qualities which a minister can possess. Had Lord Castlereagh not a right to despise and trample upon a nation with its leaders which could, for one day, tolerate him at the head of its affairs? To illustrate our meaning, the waspishness and petulance of temper displayed by Lord John Russell, are far less mischievous than the courtly imperturbability and halcyon repose generally enjoyed by Lord Melbourne, who, not fearing the Queen, knows no other fear.

* Is not this a very happy Irishism, especially when used by an Irishman of Irish Members? "The constitutional principle wound up in the bowels of the monarchical principle," and strangled accordingly, is we think, equally felicitous. Strangulation must be the consequence of all such intertwinings.—E. T. M.

The characters of Alexander and Lord Castlereagh are prefixed, as was mentioned, to an oration breathing the loftiest spirit of liberty. In alluding to the insolent diplomatic notes addressed by Austria and Russia to Spain, whose institutions were not such as despotic monarchs could approve, the orator breaks forth—

Monstrous, and insolent, and utterly unbearable, as all of them are, I consider that of Russia to be more monstrous, more insolent, and more prodigiously beyond all endurance, than the rest. It is difficult to determine which most to admire—the marvellous incongruity of her language and conduct now, with her former most solemn treaties—or the incredible presumption of her standing forward to lead the aggression upon the independence of all free and polished states. Gracious God! Russia!—Russia!—a power that is only half civilized—which, with all her colossal mass of physical strength, is still quite as much Asiatic as European—whose principles of policy, foreign and domestic, are completely despotic, and whose practices are almost altogether oriental and barbarous! In all these precious documents, there is, with a mighty number of general remarks, mixed up a wondrous affectation of honest principles—a great many words covering ideas that are not altogether clear and intelligible; or, if they happen to be so, only placing their own deformity in a more hideous and detestable light: but, for argument, or anything like it, there is none to be found from the beginning to the end of them. They reason not, but speak one plain language to Spain and to Europe, and this is its sum and substance:—“We have hundreds of thousands of hired mercenaries, and we will not stoop to reason with those whom we would insult and enslave.” I admire the equal frankness with which this haughty language had been met by the Spanish Government: the papers which it had sent forth are plain and laconic; and, borrowing for liberty, the ancient privilege of tyrants—to let their will stand in the place of argument—they bluntly speak this language:—“We are millions of freemen, and will not stoop to reason with those who threaten to enslave us.” They hurl back the menace upon the head from which it issued, little caring whether it came from Goth, or Hun, or Calmuck; with a frankness that outwitted the craft of the Bohemian, and a spirit that defied the ferocity of the Tartar, and a firmness that mocks the obstinacy of the Vandal. If they find leaguers against them the tyrants by whom the world is infested, they may console themselves with this reflection, that wherever there is an Englishman, either of the Old World or of the New—wherever there is a Frenchman, with the miserable exception of that little band which now, for a moment, sways the destinies of France in opposition to the wishes and interests of its gallant and liberal people—a people which, after enduring the miseries of the Revolution, and wading through its long and bloody wars, are entitled, Heaven knows, if ever any people were, to a long enjoyment of peace and liberty, so dearly and so honourably purchased—wherever there breathes an Englishman or a true-born Frenchman—wherever there beats a free heart or exists a virtuous mind—there Spain has a natural ally and an inalienable friend.

To the Austrian sovereign, the following passage is directed. Every one will sympathize in the emphatic reference to Napoleon; and will—especially at this time, with the probable fate of Turkey and Circassia in melancholy prospect—enjoy the knouting bestowed on the Russian Emperor, who, though he has gone the way of all Russian emperors, has left the hereditary policy in active operation.

I wish to know what could have been more natural—nay, if the doctrine of interference in the internal concerns of neighbouring nations be at all admitted—what could have been more rightful, in a free people, than to have asked him how it happened that his dangers were filled with all that was noble, and accomplished, and virtuous, and patriotic in the Milanese?—to have called on him to account for the innocent blood which he had shed in the north of Italy?—to have required at his hands satisfaction for the tortures inflicted in the vaults and caverns where the flower of his Italian subjects were now languishing?—to have demanded of him some explanation of that iron policy which has consigned fathers of families, the most virtuous and exalted in Europe, not to the relief of exile or death, but to a merciless imprisonment for ten, fifteen, and twenty years, nay, even for life, without a knowledge of the charge against them, or the crime for which they are punished? Even the Emperor Alexander himself, tender and sensitive as he is at the sight of blood flowing within the precincts of a royal palace—a sight so monstrous that, if his language could be credited, it had never before been seen in the history of the world—might have been reminded of passages in that history, calculated to lessen his astonishment at least, if not to soothe his feelings; for the Emperor Alexander, if the annals of Russian story may be trusted, however pure in himself, and however happy in always having agents equally innocent, is nevertheless descended from an illustrious line of ancestors, who have, with exemplary uniformity, dethroned, imprisoned, and slaughtered, husbands, brothers, and children. Not that I can dream of imputing those enormities to the parents, or sisters, or consorts; but it does happen that those exalted and near relations had never failed to reap the whole benefit of the atrocities, and had ever failed to bring the perpetrators to justice. In these circumstances, if I had had the honour of being in the confidence of his Majesty of all the Russias, I should have been the last person in the world to counsel my Imperial Master to touch upon so tender a topic—I should humbly have besought him to think twice or thrice, nay, even a third and a fourth time, before he ventured to allude to so delicate a subject—I should, with all imaginable deference, have requested him to meddle with any other topic—I should have directed him by preference to every other point of the compass—I should have implored him rather to try what he could say about Turkey, or Greece, or even Minorca, on which he has of late been casting many an amorous glance—in short, anything and everything, before he approached the subject of “blood flowing within the precincts of a royal palace,” and placed his allusion to it, like an artful rhetorician, upon the uppermost step of his climax. I find, likewise, in these self-same documents, a topic for which the Spanish Government had it been so inclined, might have administered to the Holy Alliance another severe lecture; I allude to the glib manner in which the three Potentates now talk of an individual, who, let his failings or even his crimes be what they may, must always be regarded as a great and a resplendent character—who, because he was now no longer either upon a throne or at liberty, or even in life, is described by them, not merely as an ambitious ruler, not merely as an arbitrary tyrant, but as an upstart and an usurper. This is not the language which those Potentates formerly employed, nor is it the language which they were now entitled to use regarding this astonishing individual. Whatever epithets England, for instance, or Spain, may have a right to apply to his conduct, the mouths of the allies at least are stopped: they can have no right to call him usurper—they who, in his usurpations, had been either most greedy accomplices or most willing tools. What entitles the King of Prussia to hold such language now?—he who followed his fortunes with the most shameless subserviency, after the thorough beating he received from him, when trampled upon and trodden down in the year 1806? Before he had risen again and recovered the upright attitude of a man, he fell upon his knees, and, still crouching before him who had made him crawl in the dust, kissed the blood-stained hand of Napoleon for leave to keep his Britannic Majesty’s foreign dominions, the Electorate of Hanover, which the Prussian had snatched off of while at peace with England. So the Emperor Alexander, after he had also undergone the like previous ceremony, did not disdain to lick up the crumbs which fell from the table of his more successful rival in usurpation. Little, it is true, was left by the edge of Gallic appetite; but rather than have nothing—rather than desert the true Russian principle of getting something on every occasion, either in Europe or in Asia, (and of late years they had even laid claim to an almost indefinite naval dominion in America)—rather than forego the Calmuck policy for the last century and a half, of always adding something, be it ever so little, to what was already acquired, be it ever so great—he condescended to receive from the hand of Buonaparte a few square leagues of territory, with an additional population of some two or three thousand serfs. The object was trifling indeed, but it served to keep alive the principle. The tender heart of the father, overflowing, as his Imperial grandmother had phrased it, with the milk of human kindness for all his children, could not be satisfied without receiving a further addition to their numbers; and therefore it is not surprising, that, on the next occasion, he should be ready to seize, in more effectual exemplification of the principle, a share of the booty, large in proportion as his former one had been small. The Emperor of Austria, too, who had entered before the others into the race for plunder, and, never weary in ill-doing, had continued in it till the very end—he who, if not an accomplice with the Jacobins of France in the spoliation of Venice, was at least a receiver of the stolen property—a felony, of which it was well said at the time in the House, that the receiver was as bad as the thief—that magnanimous Prince, who, after twenty years' alternation of truckling and vapouring—now the feeble enemy of Buonaparte, now his willing accomplice—constantly punished for his resistance, by the discipline invariably applied to those mighty Princes in the tenderest places, their capitals, from which they were successively driven—as constantly, after punishment, joining the persecutor, like the rest of them, in attacking and plundering his allies—ended, by craving the honour of giving Buonaparte his favourite daughter in marriage.

The second volume contains the whole of the Slavery speeches, extending over a period of nearly thirty years, from Mr Brougham's first going into Parliament until the present summer. His great and elaborate speech on Law Reform, and that on the introduction of his Local Courts' Bill, occupy a considerable part of the volume, and are each appropriately prefixed with characters of the memorable persons who have been Lord Brougham's fellow-labourers in the cause of human improvement. His friends have generally confined their philanthropic efforts to one field. He has been great and successful in many. A great orator, an orator in the grand and true sense—the champion of truth, the enlightener and guide of opinion, the stirrer and director of the finest sympathies of the human breast to the noblest ends, must be a man of elevated feelings and warm affections. It is the fiat of nature. The kindness of Lord Brougham's feelings is shewn occasionally, somewhat in excess, in the lavish praise which he bestows on those whom he had either loved in youth, like Mr Ward, (Lord Dudley,) or those with whom he had fought side by side, in many a hard-won field, such as Romilly or Wilberforce. He is, we think, more discriminating, and, though of course less affectionate, more just to his old political opponents, who have no longer power to be opponents, than to his personal friends, or party allies, whom he views through the most indulgent and, perhaps, partial medium. The high intellectual qualities which he ascribes to Lord Dudley, a man of perverted and unhealthy mind, we do not pretend to understand. It is enough that he was endeared to Lord Brougham by early friendship and long and intimate association. From his excessive eulogy upon Lord Rosalyn, whether as to his capacity or his public conduct, many will wholly dissent.

The character of Mr Huskisson we are led to select, not so much for its justice and exquisite discrimination, as for the clever back-handed blow which it gives to those sudden converts to Reform, of the Huskisson party, who held to their new faith exactly up to the period when the accession of Queen Victoria gave them the fairest opportunity to act upon it; and then publicly abjured it, doing open penance—though, “Marry, not in sackcloth and ashes, but in new satin and old sack.”

With these men was joined Mr Huskisson, than whom few have ever attained as great influence in this country, with so few of the advantages which are apt to captivate senates or to win popular applause, and, at the same time, with so few of the extrinsic qualities which in the noble and the wealthy can always make up for such natural deficiencies. He was not fluent of speech naturally, nor had much practice rendered him a ready speaker; he had none of the graces of diction, whether he prepared himself (if he ever did so) or trusted to the moment. His manner was peculiarly ungainly. His statements were calculated rather to excite distrust than to win confidence. Yet, with all this, he attained a station in the House of Commons, which made him as much listened to as the most consummate debaters; and upon the questions to which he, generally speaking, confined himself, the great matters of commerce and finance, he delivered himself with almost oracular certainty of effect. This success he owed to the thorough knowledge which he possessed of his subjects; the perfect clearness of his understanding; the keenness with which he could apply his information to the purpose of the debate; the acuteness with which he could unravel the argument, and expose an adversary's weakness, or expound his own doctrines. In respect of his political purity he did not stand very high with any party. He had the same intense love of office which was and is the vice of his whole party, and to which they have made such sacrifices, reducing indeed into a principle, what was only a most pernicious error, the source of all unworthy compliances, the cloak for every evil proceeding—that no one can effectually serve the State in a private station. One immediate result of this heresy was, to make Mr Huskisson, like his leader, mistake place for power, and cling to the possession of mere office when the authority to carry those measures which alone make office desirable to a patriot, was either withheld or removed for preferment's sake. Yet whoever has known either of these three great men, and casts his eye on those followers whom they have left behind, may be justified in heaving a sigh as he exclaims—“Eheu! quam multo minus est cum reliquis versari, quam meminisse tui!”

Such were the adversaries whom the Parliamentary Reformer had to contend with during the long struggle that began at the Walcheren vote, and only ended, if it indeed be yet ended, with the Bill of 1831-2. For, although Mr Canning's hostility to Reform had been the most often signalized, yet his death, in autumn 1827, in no degree relaxed the opposition of his surviving followers, all of whom remained united upon this point. They no doubt departed widely from his course, in other respects: and they so far deserted the ground which he had latterly taken, as even to join those with whom his hostility had become the most personal, evincing their habitual love of place by holding office with the Dukes of Wellington and Mr Peel, after their new Whig allies had been somewhat cavalierly ejected from office by the Court. Nor was it till the following summer that they received the reward due to such place-loving propensities.

by being rejected as unceremoniously as the Whigs had been before. Lord Dudley and Mr Huskisson, with the lesser members of the party, Lords Palmerston, Melbourne, and Glenelg, were once more in opposition, and gradually resumed the Whig connexion; but their hostility to Reform remained unabated. Nor is it one of the least remarkable events in their history, that to a Reform question they owed the last misfortune of losing their places in 1828. They had taken the long-headed, not to say crafty, view of their new leader, Mr Huskisson, that giving members to Birmingham on the disfranchisement of Retford for corruption, would tend more to prevent further mischief—that is, as he explained it—really effectual Reform, than merely opening the franchise to the adjoining hundreds. On this the Duke and Sir Robert Peel differed from them, possibly deeming it a poor stratagem, and conceiving it better to oppose Reform altogether in a fair and manly way, than by means of a trick. On this the parties quarrelled; and when the general question of Parliamentary Reform was debated in 1830, the remains of the Canning party gave it their unmitigated opposition, as they continued to do until, being in office with Lord Grey and other Reformers, they all at once became root-and-branch adversaries of the existing system, and wholesale proselytes to the Reforming creed.

The third volume commences with those speeches and writings which arose from Mr Brougham's memorable and most important inquiries into the abuses of charities, and the misappropriation of the large funds left in England for purposes of education. By that inquiry, Lord Brougham attacked many selfish small interests, and stirred up in a wide field that bitter animosity which is rankling against him to this hour. The Abuses in the Charities were advertised upon in a letter which he addressed to Sir Samuel Romilly. That letter gives occasion to introduce Romilly, and the most captivating of all Lord Brougham's historical pictures, whether we regard the beauty of the subject, or the delicacy and felicity of the masterly execution.

Few persons have ever attained celebrity of name and exalted station, in any country, or in any age, with such unsullied purity of character as this equally eminent and excellent person. His virtue was stern and inflexible—adjusted, indeed, rather to the rigorous standard of ancient morality than to the less ambitious and less elevated maxims of the modern code. But in this he very widely differed from the antique model upon which his character generally appeared to be framed, and also so very far surpassed it that there was nothing either affected or repulsive about him; and if ever a man existed who would, more than any other, have scorned the pitiful fopperies which disfigured the worth of Cato, or have shrunk from the harsher virtue of Brutus, Romilly was that man. He was, in truth, a person of the most natural and simple manners, and one in whom the kindest charities and warmest feelings of human nature were blended, in the largest measure, with that firmness of purpose and unrelaxed sincerity of principle, in almost all other men found to be little compatible with the attributes of a gentle nature and the feelings of a tender heart.

The observer who gazes upon the character of this great man is naturally struck, first of all, with its most prominent feature, and that is the rare excellence which we have now marked, so far above every gift of the understanding, and which throws the lustre of mere genius into the shade. But his capacity was of the highest order; an extraordinary reach of thought; great powers of attention, and of close reasoning; a memory quick and retentive; a fancy eminently brilliant, but kept in perfect discipline by his judgment and his taste, which was nice, cultivated, and severe, without any of the egotism which so fatal to vigour. These were the qualities which, under the guidance of the most persevering industry, and with the stimulus of a lofty ambition, rendered him unquestionably the first advocate and the most profound lawyer of the age he flourished in; placed him high among the ornaments of the Senate; and would, in all likelihood, have given him the foremost place among them all, had not the occupations of his laborious profession necessarily engrossed a disproportionate share of his attention, and made political pursuits fill a subordinate place in the scheme of his life. Jurisprudentiam disertissimus, disertorum vero jurisperitissimus. As his practice, so his authority at the bar and with the bench was unexampled; and his success in Parliament was great and progressive. Some of his speeches, both forensic and Parliamentary, are nearly unrivalled in excellence. The reply, even as reported in 11 Vesey junior, in the cause of Hugonin v. Beasley, where the legal matters chiefly were in question, may give no mean idea of his extraordinary powers. The last speech which he pronounced in the House of Commons, upon a bill respecting the law of naturalization, which gave him occasion to paint the misconduct of the expiring Parliament in severe and even dark colours, was generally regarded as unexampled among the efforts of his eloquence; nor can they who recollect its effects ever cease to lament, with tenfold bitterness of sorrow, the catastrophe which terminated his life, and extinguished his glory, when they reflect that the vast accession to his influence, from being chosen for Westminster, came at a time when his genius had reached its amplest display, and his authority in Parliament, unaided by station, had attained the highest eminence. The friend of public virtue, and the advocate of human improvement, will mourn still more sorrowfully over his urn than the admirers of genius, or those who are dazzled by political triumphs. For no one could know Romilly, and doubt that, as he only valued his own success and his own powers, in the belief that they might conduce to the good of mankind, so each augmentation of his authority, each step of his progress, must have been attended with some triumph in the cause of humanity and justice. True, he would at length, in the course of nature, have ceased to live; but then the bigot would have ceased to persecute—the despot to vex—the desolate poor to suffer—the slave to groan and tremble—the ignorant to commit crimes—and the ill-contrived law to engender criminality.

On these things all men are agreed; but, if a more distinct account be desired of his eloquence, it must be said that it united all the more severe graces of oratory, both as regards the manner and the substance. No man argued more closely when the understanding was to be addressed; no man declaimed more powerfully when indignation was to be aroused, or the feelings moved. His language was choice and pure; his powers of invective resembled rather the grave authority with which the judge puts down a contempt, or punishes an offender, than the attack of an advocate against his adversary and his equal. His imagination was the minister whose services were rarely required, and whose mastery was never for an instant admitted; his sarcasm was tremendous, nor always very sparingly employed; his manner was perfect, in voice, in figure, in a countenance of singular beauty and dignity; nor was anything in his oratory more striking or more effective than the heartfelt sincerity which it, throughout, displayed, in topic, in diction, in tone, in look, in gesture. “In Scauri oratione sapientis hourinis et recti, gravitas summa, et naturalis quædam inerat auctoritas, non ut causam, sed ut testimonium dicere putares. Significabat enim non prudentiam solum, sed, quod maxime rem continebat, fidem.”

Considering his exalted station at the bar, his pure and unsullied character, and the large space which he filled in the eye of the country, men naturally looked for his ascent to the highest station in the profession of which he was, during so many years, the ornament and the pride. Nor could any one question that he would have presented to the world the figure of a consummate judge. He alone felt any doubt upon the extent of his own judicial qualities; and he has recorded in his journal (the invaluable document in which he was wont to get down freely his sentiments on men and things) a modest opinion, expressing his approbation, should he ever be so tried, that men would say of him—"dignus imperio nisi impotens!" With this single exception, offering so rare an instance of impartial self-judgment, and tending of itself to its own refutation, all who had no interest in the elevation of others, have held his exaltation from the supreme place in the law, as one of the heaviest items in the price paid for the stately structure of our practical government.

In his private life and personal habits he exhibited a model for imitation, and an object of unqualified esteem. All his severity was reserved for the forum and the senate, when vice was to be lashed, or justice vindicated, the public delinquent exposed, or the national oppressor over-awed. In his family and in society, where it was his delight, and the only reward of his unremitting labours, to unbend, he was amiable, simple, natural, cheerful. The vast resources of his memory—the astonishing economy of time, by which he was enabled to read almost every work of interest that came from the press of either his hereditary or his native country, either France or England—the perfect correctness of his taste, refined to such a pitch that his pencil was one of no ordinary power, and his verses, when once or twice only he wrote poetry, were of great merit—his freedom from affectation—the wisdom of not being above doing ordinary things in the ordinary way—all conspired to render his society peculiarly attractive, and would have made it courted even had his eminence in higher matters been far less conspicuous. While it was the saying of one political adversary, the most experienced and correct observer* among all the parliamentary men of his time, that he never was out of his place while Romilly spoke without finding that he had cause to lament his absence—it was the confession of all who were admitted to his private society, that they forgot the lawyer, the orator, the patriot, and had never been aware, while gazing on him with admiration, how much more he really deserved that tribute than he appeared to do when seen from afar.

If defects are required to be thrown into such a sketch, and are deemed as necessary as the shades in a picture, or, at least, as the more subdued tones of some parts for giving relief to others, this portraiture of Romilly must be content to remain imperfect. For what is there on which to dwell for blame, if it be not a proneness to prejudice in favour of opinions resembling his own, a blindness to the defects of those who held them, and a prepossession against those who held them not? While there is so very little to censure, there is unhappily much to deplore. A morbid sensibility embittered many hours of his earlier life; and, when deprived of the wife whom he most tenderly and justly loved, contributed to bring on an inflammatory fever, in the paroxysm of which he untimely met his end.

The letter here printed was communicated in manuscript to him while attending the sick-bed of that excellent person whose loss brought on his own. It tended to beguile some of those sorrowful hours, the subject having long deeply engaged his attention; and it was the last thing that he read. His estimate of its merits was exceedingly low; at least he said he was sure no tract had ever been published on a more dry subject, or was likely to excite less attention. The interest of the subject, however, was much undervalued by him; for the letter ran through eight editions in the month of October.

The injunction to his friends contained in his will, was truly characteristic of the man. He particularly desired them, in determining whether or not the manuscripts should be published, only to regard the prospect there was of their being in any degree serviceable to mankind, and by no means to throw away a thought upon any injury which the appearance of such unfinished works might do to his literary character. Whoever knew him, indeed, was well persuaded that in all his exertions his personal gratification never was for a moment consulted, unless as far as whatever he did, or whatever he witnessed in others, had a relish for him exactly proportioned to its tendency towards the establishment of the principles which formed, as it were, a part of his nature, and towards the promotion of human happiness, the grand aim of all his views. This is that colleague and friend whose irreparable loss his surviving friends have had to deplore, through all their struggles for the good cause in which they had stood by his side; a loss which each succeeding day renders heavier; and harder to bear, when the misconduct of some, and the incapacity of others, so painfully recall the contrast of one whose premature end gave the first and the only pang that had ever come from him; and all his associates may justly exclaim, in the words of Tully regarding Hortensius—"Augebat etiam molestiam, quod magni sapientium civium bonorumque pœnariâ, vir egregius, conjunctissimusque mecum consiliorum omnium societas, alienatissimus reipublice tempore extinctus, et auctoritatis, et prudentiæ suæ triste nobis desiderium reliquerat: delehamque, quod non, ut plerique putabant, adversarium, aut obstrictorem laudum mearum, sed socium potius et consortem gloriæ laboris amiseram."

We have not ventured to mar the unity of this beautiful portrait, lengthened as the extract is. If in it there be anything either overdone or exaggerated, the sympathies of the reader are nevertheless disposed to go along with the artist; and we accept, with fit tenderness and homage, Romilly, as he appeared to the eyes of his affectionate friend—Romilly, the most perfect and estimable of men.

The speech on Scottish Burgh Reform—a measure which, with all its imperfections, now seen by himself, we owe to Lord Brougham—is prefaced with sketches of the more remarkable Scottish Reformers, in which he has done ample justice to one name, which may not have been heard of in the southern division of the Island, and which well deserved far wider fame. We are glad to see this just and hearty notice of the half-forgotten and ill-requited labours of Mr Fletcher, taking precedence of those of Lord Archibald Hamilton and others. It is quite as true among politicians as priests, that—

"A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn;" or one reforming Lord, equal, at any time, to half a dozen reforming Commoners.

Among these eminent patriots, the first place is due to Archibald Fletcher, a learned, experienced, and industrious lawyer, one of the most upright men that ever adorned the profession, and a man of such stern and resolute firmness in public principle, as is very rarely found united with the amiable character which endeared him to private society. Devoted from his earliest youth to the cause of civil liberty, his mind had become deeply imbued with a sense of the corruption which had crept into our constitution, and disfigured its original excellence. His zeal for the maintenance of these principles, and his anxiety for the renovation of British liberty, were, if possible, still further excited by the matrimonial union which he entered into with a lady of Whig family in Yorkshire, one of the most accomplished of her sex, who, with the utmost purity of life that can dignify and enhance female charms, combined the inflexible principles and deep political feeling of a Hutcheson or a Roland; and he devoted to the great work of reforming the Scottish elective system, both as regarded its parliamentary and its municipal branches, every hour which could be spared from the claims of his clients. The proceedings in the Convention of Royal Burghs, the bills introduced by the Crown lawyers for reforming the scheme of their accounting, the motions for Scotch reform made by Mr Sheridan, were all intimately connected with his unceasing and most useful labours. Nor could any thing but the alarm raised by the deplorable turn of French affairs, have prevented some important measures, at least of Burgh Reform, from being adopted nearly thirty years ago. Although his life was protracted to the end trance period of the years of man, he was not permitted to see the triumph of the cause to which his best days had been devoted, and for which his latest prayers were offered. Nor, on the other hand, was he, while deprived of this solace to his declining age, doomed to witness the painful sight of his early coadjutors corrupted by the love of place and patronage, forgetting the principles which had alone recommended them to popular favour, and had enabled them to obtain that power, the mere retaining of which, on any terms, has become the only object of their exertion, and the sole guide of their conduct; as if the fate of empire was bound up in their official existence.

* Mr Charles Long, afterwards Lord Farnborough.

After a warm panegyric upon Lord Archibald Hamilton, of the extent of whose services young Reformers are probably not aware, and who, like Mr Fletcher, was called away, before he could rejoice in the final triumph of the cause—"if," as Lord Brougham says somewhere, "it be final"—some general remarks are made upon the great value of the unfinished labours of early and steady Reformers, ere he thus proceeds:—

No good measure of legislation, Lord Coke has well said, was ever proposed, however little effect the suggestion might make at the time, "that in the end some good did not come therefrom." But he might have added, had he lived to the times of the Romillys, the Horners, the Hamiltons, the Fletchers, that, when the harvest of improvement is reaped by puny hands, and its profits treasured up in their own individual garner, there is far too general a disposition among men, even among those who benefit the most by it, to sink in oblivion the names of those whose nervous arms and generous toils prepared the reluctant soil, subdued its ungrateful nature, and scattered over its rugged surface the precious seed which their genius had elaborated, and which, with little further pains from their feeble successors, has since made the desert smile with flowers, and the fields wave with fruit. A yet less satisfactory event than even this forgetfulness, has been witnessed in our time. Converts of the eleventh hour—enemies of all reform whatever, until their places depended on professing themselves its friends—advocates of all old abuses, until the moment when they could no longer hold by them and live—have alone become the professing supporters of improvement, alone reap its personal advantages, alone enjoy the fruits of their predecessors' and adversaries' disinterested and unrequited labours. And, as might well be expected, the cause of Reform being thus placed in the alien hands of those who stand in a perfectly false position, it has for some time ceased to make any progress under such patronage;—its advancement has been found no longer necessary for retaining its pretended friends in place; and men have been seen, who, with the words of freedom on their lips, shew, by each act of their lives, that the securing to themselves and their adherents, of patronage, and especially of provincial patronage, is the thing next their hearts. Whoever has the distribution of that patronage is sure of their adhesion; and not even a retrograde movement of Reform would now either detach those sordid supporters, or shake the power of their patrons.

We leave all consistent Reformers, and especially Scottish Reformers, "old Edinburgh Whigs and something more," to ponder the above melancholy passage. In the eulogium on Lord Rosslyn* which follows, we can at least acquiesce in the admiration expressed for his conscientious scruples about the extent of the proposed Reform. His party friends of the Whig persuasion, in commencing their labours, flourished a long and powerful lever, but they took care that it should snap before it had done half its work.

The speech upon English Municipal Reform, or more correctly in defence of the absent Commissioners, violently attacked by the Tories, has no preface. It was spoken in August 1838, when his former colleagues were again in office, and while—they must have been secretly planning how they could with most safety to themselves, get rid of an associate so obnoxious to the Court, and so unmanageable in the Cabinet. The introduction to the speech on the Scotch Marriage and Divorce Bill, affords room for a curious portrait of Lord Stowell, a man, however, about whom few persons, not lawyers, will long concern themselves. It embodies these diverting anecdotes.

"Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike"—

To illustrate by examples his singularly refined and pungent wit in conversation, or the happy and unexpected quotations with which he embellished it, or the tersely told anecdotes with which he enlivened it, without for an instant fatiguing his audience, would be far less easy—because it is of the nature of the refined essence in which the spirit of the best society consists, not to keep. When some sudden and somewhat violent changes of opinion were imputed to a learned Judge, who was always jocosely termed Mrs —, "Varium et

* With some reluctance, we are compelled to protest against one of Lord Brougham's besetting, and perhaps "amiable weaknesses." He has a strong tendency, if not to the use of glistening words of courtesy, yet to butteraceousness. His estimate of the private or rather personal character of Lord Rosslyn, will not obtain the suffrages of the Radical weavers of Dymart, near neighbours and shrewd observers of him, whom, believing a political renegade, they scrupled not to call such. With these village Hampdens, the chivalrous Lord Rosslyn lived latterly in a succession of petty squabbles, originating in political animosity, which would have disgraced a man far meaner in station and in intellect. He might have received abundant provocation, but he should not have taken it. Conscience or consciousness daily sprinkled fresh fires over his Lordship's perpetual blister. Besides, the point of honour which compels a man to stick to a recent political ally, such as the Duke of Wellington was to Lord Rosslyn, at the expense of abandoning, with his old Whig associates, his professed Liberal principles, and the public interests bound up with them, is a point of honour which "operatives," "base mechanicals," do not understand, and we trust never will. That we may not need to recur to Lord Brougham's "amiable weakness," let us once for all own our nationality, be it no higher feeling, aggrieved by his clearing off the rich brush, as painter's say, applied to Peet Rogers, upon the back of our countryman, Mr Campbell. It is a matter of taste to be sure; but we think that Lord Brougham considerably lessens the value of his praise, when he speaks of an agreeable, a highly cultivated and elegant versifier, as "the greatest poet and finest prose writer this country has produced." It is certainly as rare as pleasing to learn, that, in the greatest of poets and prose-writers, "civil and religious liberty has one of the most uncompromising friends who have appeared in any age," though a misfortune that Mr Roger should hitherto so effectually have concealed his effulgence under mere Whig draperies. Campbell the whole world knows as the friend of Freedom in his lyrics and in his life. Nor can we think Lord Brougham happy in his specimen of "the finest prose writer," though the gem of Mr Roger may have been the admiration of the Whig coteries. On the whole, Lord Brougham is much more felicitous in a sharp hit than a delicately turned compliment, which he should leave to Mr Moore, (who can hit too,) and the ladies. When he follows his own warm and generous instincts, and heartily praises those whom he has loved and lost, then he is unarmoured. His praise of his juvenile friend Horner, for instance, touches the sympathies of those who may fancy this Whig-kid quite as truly characterised by Sir Walter Scott's clever, if somewhat indecent jests recorded by Mr Lockhart.

mutabile semper Femina," was Sir William Scott's remark. A celebrated physician having said, somewhat more flippantly than becometh the gravity of his cloth, "Oh, you know, Sir William, after forty a man is always either a fool or a physician!" "Mayn't he be both, Doctor?" was the arch rejoinder—with a most arch leer and insinuating voice half drawled out. "A vicar was once" (said his Lordship, presiding at the dinner of the Admiralty Sessions) "so wearied out with his parish-clerk confining himself entirely to the 100th Psalm, that he remonstrated, and insisted upon a variety, which the man promised; but, old habit proving too strong for him, the old words were as usual given out next Sunday, 'All people that on earth do dwell.' Upon this the vicar's temper could hold out no longer, and, jutting his head over the desk, he cried, 'Damn all people that on earth do dwell!'—a very compendious form of anathema!" added the learned chief of the Spiritual Court.

This eminent personage was in his opinions extremely narrow and confined; never seeming to have advanced beyond the times "before the flood" of light which the American War and the French Revolution had let in upon the world—times when he was a tutor in Oxford, and hoped to live and die in the unbroken quiet of her bowers, enjoying their shade variegated with no glare of importunate illumination. Of every change he was the enemy; of all improvement careless and even distrustful; of the least deviation from the most beaten track suspicious; of the remotest risks an acute prognosticator as by some natural instinct; of the slightest actual danger a terror-stricken spectator. As he could imagine nothing better than the existing state of any given thing, he could see only peril and hazard in the search for anything new; and with him it was quite enough, to characterise a measure as "a mere novelty," to deter him at once from entertaining it—a phrase of which Mr Speaker Abbot, with some humour, once took advantage to say, when asked by his friend what that mass of papers might be, pointing to the huge bundle of the acts of a single session—"Mere novelties, Sir William—mere novelties."

The anomalous state of the Marriage Laws in different parts of the empire, their bearing upon questions of legitimacy, and the rights and wrongs of both sexes, but especially those of women, are ably and acutely unfolded. They, however, excite little more interest than what arises from their inherent value. They are topics for the jurist and the moralist, rather than the orator. From the Poor-Law speeches, we shall take one brief extract, which can create no difference of opinion. On this most irritating subject, there have been on all sides more warmth, bad temper, misrepresentation, and prejudice, than on any other question lately discussed; nor has Lord Brougham, subjected to the natural provocation of the attacked party, kept free of the prevailing irritation. He cannot, however, be an out-and-out "cold-blooded economist" and "Malthusian," who laments the change of manners recorded below.

The evasion of the law of settlement began to be generally practised, I think, at the commencement of the French war, and it gradually led to the discontinuance of that laudable custom of boarding farm-servants in the house—a custom which was attended with the very best results, both to the moral character of the labourers, and to the comfort of the whole farm. They were on the kindest terms with the master; they formed part of the same family; the master was more like the head of a patriarchal family, and the labourers were like his children; they were treated as such; they dined at the same table, and slept under the same roof; and they worked together in the same field. I have frequently seen them in these habits; I have partaken of their fare, and better no one could desire to have set before him, whose appetites were unpampered and unvitiating. The whole household lived more comfortably, because better cheer could be afforded where so many were entertained together. There was a certain degree of domestic control; there was the parental superintendence exercised by the master over the men, and there was the moral sanction of the matron of the family over her maids. The master was the friend and counsellor of the men; the dame of the women. If one of either sex was about to contract an improvident marriage, their advice would be interposed. Although they never heard of the prudential check, nor knew anything of political economists even by name, yet, as the doctrines of those philosophers are only the dictates of prudence and common honesty, the farmer and his good wife would set before the young folks the imprudence and dishonesty of a man contracting a marriage before he could maintain a wife and children; she would tell him that which Mr Malthus is so much abused for saying at all, "Who would ever buy more horses than he could afford to pay for, or afford to keep? Then why should you marry when you have scarcely the means of supporting yourself, for the mere purpose of bringing into the world a number of miserable wretches for whom you have no bread." I will venture to say, that in those happier times, bastardy was not one-twentieth part so common as it is now.

The celebrated Liverpool Speech, delivered upwards of three years since, ought of itself to exonerate Lord Brougham from the senseless charge of inconsistency, and desertion of those who have themselves been the deserters. No human being, not even himself, can tell, what in office Lord Brougham might have done;—but we know what he has done; we note what he is doing; and see that his conduct and professions have been and are in strict harmony. Of the men of Liverpool, in July 1835, he inquired—

Have I not now, when out of office, practised exactly what I preached when in power? Have I confined my consistency to using the same language in and out? No such thing. I have acted towards this Government, whom these silly persons are endeavouring to serve, precisely as I asked others to act by myself last year. What were the measures I was then most anxious to see carried? The Local Courts Bill, to bring cheap justice home to every dwelling; and the Bill for at once abolishing the Pluralities and Non-residence of the Clergy. These great measures were ready prepared; they were, after infinite pains, digested in bills; those bills were even printed; all was ready for carrying them through Parliament; and my belief was, that this Government, which professed to approve them, could have passed them into laws. But I have carefully abstained from urging them forward, because I knew it would embarrass them in some quarters. I have never pressed the subject in any way, because I was satisfied with what the Ministers are now engaged in doing, or endeavouring to do; and which, backed by the people, and relying only on their support, I trust they will succeed in accomplishing—I mean Municipal Reform and the reformation of the Irish Church. Is not this demonstrative of the silly falsehood of that charge? Can anything more be wanting to show that my conduct in 1835, out of office, is exactly what I recommended while a Minister, in 1834? No, no, gentlemen; trust me, it is because my principles do not so very easily bend to circumstances and take their hue from situations, that we now meet on the same level, and that I no longer am in the service of the State.

"Sir William Scott was, during the latter years of his long-extended life, created a peer, by the title of Lord Stowell; but it is by his former name that he is known to the profession and to the world.

Moreover, I will fairly own that it must be, a very good and active Government which I will ever consent to join. Unless I see a prospect of governing with the power of really serving the people—unless I can find a Government strong to do so, and willing, my present position of absolute independence suits me best. It must be a Ministry of that kind, and which will do much, much, to relieve the intolerable burdens of this nation, and bless it with a very, very, very cheap Government, that shall tempt me to abandon my post with and in front of that people. Digest your measures well—be not rash, be not precipitate—be not impatient whilst you see that honest men have hold of the helm of the State, and that important measures are in progress under their auspices. Such now is and always was my advice. I, too, shall get impatient if I find that they flag—I, too, shall get suspicious if I find that they flinch; but, in the meantime, I shall be one of the humblest, perhaps the most superfluous, but certainly the most zealous of their defenders, in a House where defenders do not superabound. In the country, I happen to be better acquainted with the people than any of them; and I shall be, as I have been, their supporter out of doors as well as in Parliament, where I never decline to appear on any occasion, in office or in opposition. In all places I shall be their defender, till they give me cause to leave them; and when I do leave them, I believe I shall not alone quit them—I believe that, when I abandon them, it will be because they have abandoned the people; and whether the people will cling by me or cling by them, is a question which I will not delay a moment to ask or have answered.

I trust I have given offence to no one by stating that my opinions are now what they always were. But I never grudged any man the credit he might get by altering his opinions for the better; and I think it truly unfortunate that a disposition has lately sprung up among us to turn our backs on those men who were our adversaries, but are now willing to range themselves in the great class of Reformers. For my part, if any man, be his name what it will—Melbourne, Grey, Russell, Althorpe, Wellington, or Peel—will change bad opinions for good ones, coming over to us not for the lust of power, not to bolster up a falling Administration, but to help forward good measures, and give the people a chance of good government—I am the last man in the world to inquire what he did before. I say, "What do you now?" "God forbid that I should twit you with ever having been worse than you are now disposed to be." This has been, right or wrong, my constant principle. I am reminded of it by Liverpool, and all I see around me. Did I not here conflict for weeks with Mr Canning, in 1812? Yet did I not, after fifteen years, support a Cabinet at the head of which was Mr Canning, because he had taken up liberal opinions on foreign questions, as well as on matters of domestic policy? I said then—"You have changed to liberal politics; I should not have gone over to you, but you have come over to me, and I will support you." Did I not, in 1830, and did not Earl Grey and Lord Althorpe with me, do the self-same thing? Lord Melbourne, Lord Glenelg, then Mr Grant, Lord Goderich, formerly Mr Robinson, the Duke of Richmond, the enemy of Catholic emancipation, but one of the most honest, conscientious, and enlightened men, nevertheless, that I know—Lord Palmerston; every one of these five were supporters of Lord Castlereagh's Six Acts. Yet I sat in the same Cabinet with them, and I support three of them who are now in office, because they, in conformity with the improving spirit of the age, have come to be liberal.

We should like to learn from those persons who fancy that they may best befriend the Government, by calumniating Lord Brougham, what is the date of his desertion of Liberal principles, or of any Ministry that acted upon a Liberal policy? His creed of 1835, as revealed before the mechanics of Liverpool, we have just read in part. In what does it differ from that professed with equal eloquence but the other night in the House of Lords, when discussing that perennial Irish Tithe Bill, which takes some new form of efflorescence every year, but which never bears fruit. Lord Brougham, after speaking of the bitter feelings of the Irish people about this ill-starred Bill, and citing a happy and apposite historical anecdote, concluded with this splendid burst of eloquence and patriotism, which certain Ministerial journals have tried to burke.

These are my sentiments, and they have always been the guide of my conduct. The affections of the people I will never court at the expense of their interests; their delusions, their passing delusions, I will never share, though by thwarting their wishes I may incur their displeasure. But their deliberate opinions, their well-considered principles, those judgments which they form after long observation and much experience, we are bound to regard with profound respect; and I never will be deterred from supporting their sober and reasonable prayers by any senseless apprehension of wild and urgent demands succeeding. Never fear the people. Believe me, the safest rule is—trust that you may be trusted. The more you confide in them the more they will have confidence in you; the more you listen to their prayers, the less they will vex you with greedy encroachments and unreasonable demands. I now give you the result of all my observations—all my experience—all my intercourse with them—I have never feared them—citizen, senator, statesman, minister, I never for an instant feared the people. Why should I now? Liberty and popular rights are mixed up with our whole Constitution. Oppression, exclusive monopoly, oligarchy—any sacrifice of the many to the few, whether in State or in Church—is utterly alien to its whole nature. How often have we seen popular rights and liberal principles of Government almost prostrated, and oppression and intolerance bearing an unnatural sway! Even then I never despaired of the good old cause—I never turned away from the cap of Liberty, even when it hung upon a bush, or was nailed to the scaffold. Surely I will not now, when it should surmount the Crown—the Crown that was fabricated for its support and maintenance. I may stand alone, but I stand undimmed; I have honestly and fearlessly delivered my opinions, the opinions of my whole life, and upon which the public conduct of thirty years has been invariably framed. I stand among the ephemeral supporters of an ephemeral, though an enormous abuse. But the day is fast approaching, when their eyes will be unveiled; and my principles bear away—when truth, because it is truth, will prevail—and right, because it is right, triumph; for the principles which I have declared are founded in eternal justice, and adopted by the understandings, and engraved upon the hearts of twelve millions of the people.

The speech on NEUTRAL RIGHTS, delivered in the House of Lords only a few weeks back, finishes the third volume of the collection. In a note, Lord Brougham notices the singular dilemma from which a Government, seemingly divided against itself, was extricated by the Duke of Wellington, with much humanity, but little of that discretion or even fairness upon which Lord Brougham so often seeks occasion to compliment his Grace. The speech, however, carried its object. The rash and illegal instruction or Order of Lord Minto, disclaimed by his colleagues, and which might have led to such serious results, is, thanks to Lord Brougham's vigilance, as much a dead letter as that other quiet Order in Council, granted, with blameable facility, though we cannot believe with evil intention, for the accommodation of Mr Gladstone and those of his co-mates of Guiana, who require a market to be opened in the East, whence the human commodity might be obtained abundantly, and at a very cheap rate. The closing volume of the collected speeches opens with Irish Questions—those questions whose nature Lord Brougham, in his late tithe-bill speech, very happily illustrated by this lively quotation—"I recollect meeting in my reading a phrase which was used by Charles the First, which is most applicable to the present case. That monarch, in writing to his favourite, the Duke of Buckingham, said, 'Ireland is the only egg we have been sitting on for some years; but the shell of it is so hard that we have not hatched anything yet.'" Those diligent hatches who cackle so much and sit so little, are likely to find the egg addle as well as hard in the shell. It is becoming a moot point whether the Whig-Tory Ministry were not on the eve of doubling up O'Connell and his Tail, instead of the wily agitator being able, for his country's good, to coerce them. There can be no question that those who, as their adherents boast, fairly jockeyed the English Radicals in Parliament, are well disposed to try the same game with persons of as flexible honesty.

The stopping of the Irish Municipal Bill may give a temporary respite to those who wish to protract the delusion; but it cannot longer deceive the Irish nation. Fertile as Mr O'Connell is in expedients, daring and successful in the use of party tactics and popular arts, and strong as is the hold which he once had, and richly deserves to hold on the gratitude of his countrymen, there is a perplexing path before him. The fund of ignorance and prejudice, which subsists on both sides of the Channel, and that alienation of feeling, that jealousy and suspicion between the countries, which the native Irish leaders studiously inflame, cannot much longer delude the Irish people. If they do not make common cause with Great Britain, they at least warmly sympathise with Canada in the hour of extremity, deserted by, of all men—O'Connell!*

* The coldness and supineness of the British people towards Canada—for the indifference of the British Parliament does not surprise us, that being a matter of course—we consider one of the most untoward and discouraging symptoms of this sullen stagnant period. It is to be attributed, we believe, in no small degree, to the pressure of distress at home. Fretting under a load of taxation which cramps the enterprise of the middle class, and renders the utmost industry of the working class quite inadequate to the comfortable maintenance of their families, both descriptions of persons tacitly acquiesce in political injustice and the violation of law in the Colonies, with an indifference which the cause renders doubly lamentable. They believe that the grumbling colonists are relatively in a much better condition than themselves. They are better endowed with the vulgar, but most precious essentials of life—food and raiment. They are free from an intolerable burden of taxation; they know nothing of a grinding corn-law, nothing of tithes. They have an easy outlet for their superfluous numbers, and are thus relieved from the miseries of a bitter competition, descending to the lowest grades of society. Seeing the people in the colonies in so much better a social condition, they either fancy they ought to be contented, or in their misery can feel only for themselves, and the stern necessities of our common nature. Chill penury represses noble rage; a long-sighted view of the case is not taken, and deeper sympathy is felt, and not unnaturally, for the oppressed millions on the other side of St George's Channel, continually on the verge of poverty, and often suffering under absolute famine, than for the colonists, with their fantastic wrongs. The same sullen feeling extends to the black race. The Helots of England, those in the lowest depth, feel, and often express, indignant surprise, that so much interest should be taken about Negroes and Hindoos, Caffres and New Zealanders, while their sufferings beget no sympathy—that those who stir Heaven and earth to obtain fitting rations for the labourers of Guiana and Jamaica, never think of their taxed loaf and their half-starved children. Though Freedom is a noble thing, it is not all happiness. It may be the means of all, but that is a distant view, and hunger is near and pressing. We regret the apathy felt about the measures of the Government with respect to Canada, but are not surprised at it. "I watch their Irish policy," said an old Reformer, at a time when Ireland appeared as far off as Canada does now, and of a Government professing to be Liberal—"I watch their Irish policy, as mountaineers do the western hills, to see if the sun has risen." In this spirit should Reformers watch the policy of the Government in Canada, as well as in Ireland. Those who would violate the fundamental principles of all liberty, the security of life, the freedom of limb in Canada, would not hesitate to do the same in England if they durst. And why, by the way does Mr O'Connell, who is so fond of replying to everybody and nobody, never deign to answer Mr Roebuck's letters? The task might be difficult; but, unless he has entirely given up his old friends, the Radicals of Birmingham, Manchester, Newcastle, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, it is needful. Does he no longer care for the sympathy, or wish the co-operation of the hundreds of thousands of British Radical Reformers, who, three years since, for the sake of his country, and that alone, hailed the Representative of Ireland, the redresser of her wrongs, and the champion of her rights? These Whig-Tory ministers, are fatal to whoever places faith in them. The degree of Mr O'Connell's faith may not have been great; and he may have imagined that those who have tricked their own friends, and outwitted the English Radicals in Parliament, were yet no match for himself. That remains to be seen. They have already damaged O'Connell in Ireland, and nearly ruined his influence in Great Britain and America. Their last triumphant labour would be the destruction of his power in Ireland. This they seek in the new Poor-Law—in the project already put forth as a feeler, of taking the Catholic clergy into the pay of the State, and in studiously exhibiting the old denouncer of the "base, bloody, and brutal Whigs," as playing into their hands, at the expense of the cause of Reform, and to his own degradation. We repeat, the last triumphant labour of the Melbourne Government; after which, Lord Melbourne may say to himself, "Soul, take thine ease, peace and peace are laid up for thee for, at least, good five years: we have jockeyed the Radicals, won the Duke, and subverted the power of O'Connell. We have out-witted the Liberator."

Mr O'Connell will probably now try to be before-hand with his Whig friends, and to drown reflection upon his singular conduct in the renewed cry of the Repeal; or he may hope to be received in Ireland like an old Border chief, who was not troubled with impertinent questions, so that he returned from the enemy's land with a good prey. But this cannot last always. Mr O'Connell must feel that he is lowered in Ireland by truckling to the Ministers; that he occupies a very inferior position, even in strength, to that which he held when he returned, three years since, from his triumphant progress through Great Britain, the champion of his own country, but also the uncompromising friend of Reform in ours. The remainder of his life, though well employed, will scarcely redeem the damage which Whig contact has done his reputation and influence.

By Lord Brougham, Grattan is regarded as the most accomplished of Irish orators, the greatest of Irish statesmen, and, above all, the purest and most useful of Irish patriots. At a very critical time in the history of Ireland, Mr Grattan, and the leaders of the opposition party in the Irish Parliament, took a part which it remains for the leaders of the Radical party in the Imperial Parliament, including O'Connell and all those of his countrymen who vote with him, to consider now. They vacated their seats, finding they could do no good in Parliament, and left their constituents free to choose other delegates. Of Grattan, after many flattering remarks on his oratorical powers, Lord Brougham says—

From the faults of his country's eloquence he was, generally speaking, free. Occasionally an over fondness for vehement expression, an exaggeration of passion, or an offensive appeal to Heaven, might be noted; very rarely a loaded use of figures, and, more rarely still, of figures broken and mixed. But the perpetual striving after far-fetched quaintness; the disdaining to say any one thing in an easy and natural style; the contempt of that rule, as true in rhetoric as in conduct, that it is wise to do common things in the common way; the affectation of excessive feeling upon all things, without regard to their relative importance; the making any occasion, even the most fitted to rouse genuine and natural feeling, a mere matter of theatrical display—all these failings, by which so many oratorical reputations have been blighted among a people famous for their almost universal oratorical genius, were looked for in vain when Mr Grattan rose, whether in the senate of his native country, or in that to which he was transferred by the Union. And if he had some peculiarity of outward appearance, as a low and awkward person, in which he resembled the first of orators, and even of manner, in which he had not like him made the defects of nature yield to severe culture; so had he one excellence of the very highest order, in which he may be truly said to have left all the orators of modern times behind—the severe abstinence which rests satisfied with striking the decisive blow in a word or two, not weakening its effects by repetition and expansion—and another excellence higher still, in which no orator of any age is his equal, the easy and copious flow of most profound, sagacious, and original principles, enumerated in terse and striking, but appropriate language. To give a sample of this latter peculiarity would be less easy, and would occupy more space; but of the former, it may be truly said that Dante himself never conjured up a striking, a pathetic, and an appropriate image in fewer words than Mr Grattan employed to describe his relation towards Irish independence, when, alluding to its rise in 1782, and its fall twenty years later, he said, “I sat by its cradle—I followed its hearse.”

In private life he was without a stain, whether of temper or of principle; singularly amiable, as well as of unblemished purity in all the relations of family and of society; of manners as full of generosity as they were free from affectation; of conversation as much seasoned with spirit and impregnated with knowledge, as it was void of all harshness and gall.

Next in honour to Mr Grattan, as the deliverer of Ireland, Lord Brougham places Lord Grenville. The plan of the work forbids any direct reference to living statesmen; and perhaps it is quite as well—at least so far as Earl Grey is concerned. It is not easy to guess what may have been “the transcendent services and ample sacrifices which this nobleman made during the greater part of his political life to the rights and the interests of the Irish people.” Lord Grenville's services to Ireland are indeed great and intelligible, and fully warrant Lord Brougham in contrasting him with living Ministers. “Nor,” says he, after noticing that Lord Grenville had retired from power rather than bind himself not to press Catholic Emancipation—

Nor can it be doubted that the perseverance with which he abided by his declared opinions in favour of the Catholic Question alone prevented him from presiding over the councils of his country, during, at the least, twenty years of his life. They who have come to the aid of the liberal cause only when its success made an adhesion to it the road to Court favour, with all its accompaniments of profit and of power, have a very different account of mutual obligations to settle with their country from that which Lord Grenville could, at any time since his retirement, have presented, but disdained ever even to hint at. But they who—after his powerful advocacy, his inflexible integrity, his heavy sacrifices had all but carried the Irish question—have come forward to finish the good work, and have reaped every kind of gratification from doing their duty, instead of making a sacrifice of their interests, like him, would do well, while they usurp all the glory of these successes, to recollect the men whose labours, requited with proscription, led the way to comparatively insignificant exertions, still more beneficial to the individuals than advantageous to the community.

The speech to which these observations on Grattan and Grenville is prefixed, was delivered in 1823. It was upon The Administration of the Law in Ireland; of which kingdom, its own Lord Chancellor Redesdale had said, only a few weeks before—“I have been intimately connected with this ill-fated country for the last twenty years; and, I am sorry to say, that there exists in it two sorts of justice—the one for the rich, the other for the poor, both equally ill-administered.” Many singular facts regarding the mal-administration of justice are recorded in this speech; and many abuses are noticed which still remain to be removed full three years after Lord Mulgrave had, according to one party, introduced a millennial period. Every one has heard that the King's writ will not run in Connaught—that the law has never got across the Shannon; but when Lord Brougham delivered this speech, every Irish gentleman, save in Dublin and Cork, could ensure to himself the most valuable privilege of a member of Parliament, and set his creditors at defiance, by a payment to the Sheriff of a trifle a-year. The writ was issued—for that brought a fee; but the debtor was duly warned beforehand, in terms of the righteous covenant. As to poor debtors, the Sheriff not being paid for favour, shewed them none. Availing himself of the legitimate privilege of Parliament, Mr Brougham denounced, in forcible terms, those political judges with which Ireland was then cursed, and of which that unfortunate country has not yet got entirely free. It is indeed to be earnestly wished, that, in getting rid of this pest, the reverse of wrong may never be mistaken for right. If party is always to triumph over law and justice in Ireland, we really see little to choose in the long run between one faction and the other. After pointing out many of the existing abuses, and specifying facts, the revelation of which created as much indignation as was expressed by Lord Minto the other day, when his secret Orders were betrayed, Mr Brougham thus reverted to the general state of Ireland—

I can only go so much farther as to beg the House would remember, that matters in Ireland cannot rest as they are for ever. One day or other the time must come, and the House will have to give an account of its stewardship of that country. England possessing Ireland, is in the possession of that which ought to be her security in peace, and her sinew in war; and yet, in war, what has Ireland been but a strength to our enemies; what in peace but an eternal source of revolt, and rebellion, and strife with ourselves? Ireland, with a territory of immense extent, with a soil of almost unrivalled fertility, with a climate more genial than our own, with an immense population of strong-built hardy labourers—men suited alike to fill up the ranks of our armies in war, or for employment at home in the works of agriculture or manufactures;—Ireland, with all these blessings which Providence has so profusely showered into her lap, has been under our stewardship for the last hundred and twenty years; but our solicitude for her has appeared only in those hours of danger when we apprehended the possibility of her joining our enemies; or when, having no enemy abroad to contend with, she raised her standard, perhaps in despair, and we trembled for our own existence. It cannot be denied that the sole object of England has been to render Ireland a safe neighbour. We have been stewards over her for this long period of time. I repeat, that we shall one day have to give an account of our stewardship—a black account it will be, but it must be forthcoming. What have we done for the country which we are bound to aid, to protect, and to cherish? In our hands, her population seems a curse to her rather than a blessing. They are a wretched, suffering, degraded race—without a motive for exertion—starving in the midst of plenty. But, wretched as they are, they will not be content to remain so. They now demand justice. They call for it at your hands; and they are ready to prove their grievances. In fact, they have proved already the scandalous and unequal administration of the laws. In England, justice is delayed; but, thank Heaven, it can never be sold. In Ireland, it is sold to the rich, refused to the poor, delayed to all. It is in vain to disguise the fact; it is in vain to shun the disclosure of the truth. We stand, as regards Ireland, upon the brink of a precipice. Things cannot remain as they are. They must either get better or get worse. I hope—I trust—that such an interval may yet be granted, as will allow time for measures—and they must be sweeping ones—of reformation; but, if that interval is neglected, frightful indeed are the consequences which will ensue. I may be wrong in this prediction. But, if I am wrong, I do not stand alone. I am backed in what I say by the spirit of the wisest laws—by the opinions of the most famous men of former ages. If I err, I err in company with the best judgments of our own time; I err with the common sense of the whole world, with the very decrees of Providence to support me. We are driving six millions of people to despair, to madness. What results can reasonably be expected from such blind obstinacy and injustice? It will not do for honourable gentlemen to meet this case with their old flimsy defences and evasions. Excuse after excuse we have had, for refusing to do that unhappy country justice; but the old excuses will not do—they will apply no longer—they cannot any more be even tried. . . . To attempt any course with Ireland short of a complete redress of grievances, will be a mockery of the evils under which she is suffering; but the greatest mockery of all—the most intolerable insult—the course of peculiar exasperation—against which I chiefly caution the House, is the undertaking to cure the distress under which she labours, by anything in the shape of new penal enactments. It is in these enactments alone that we have shewn our liberality to Ireland. She has received penal laws from the hands of England, almost as plentifully as she has received blessings from the hands of Providence. What have these laws done? Checked her turbulence, but not stified it. The grievance remaining perpetual, the complaint can only be postponed. We may break her chains, but in doing so we shall not better her condition. By coercion, we may goad her on to fury, but by coercion we shall never break her spirit. She will rise up and break the fetters we impose, and arm herself for deadly violence with their fragments.

In the reply which followed the debate on Mr Brougham's motion, introduced by the above speech, he retorted, with great felicity, the charge of an unwarrantable use of private documents, and, by travelling out of the exact record, went deeper into the real heart of the matter. The memory of the trial of the Queen was still burning in the bosom of her fearless advocate; and the Irish people had made themselves nationally despicable in the eyes of the British people, by their frantic reception of that monarch, the first act of whose power, as Regent, had been the abandonment of the Catholic cause, with his desertion of the Whigs, and the destruction of the long-cherished hopes of the friends of emancipation. The extract which we make from this reply exemplifies a mode of Lord Brougham's power as a debater, quite distinct from anything shewn in our former extracts from his speeches. It is that species of sarcasm and invective which springs as much from the heart as the brain, and which has its source in the keen perception of injustice, in generous feelings, and a quick temperament. After noticing Mr Peel's remarks in his speech, Mr Brougham proceeded—

I have to return my thanks personally to the honourable Member for Galway,* for the exceedingly jocose notice which he was pleased to take of my former address to you. I never remember to have noticed a more successful piece of mimicry, if I may be allowed, technically speaking, to say so, "on these or any other boards;" and I cannot help congratulating the Right Honourable Secretary,† our new manager, on having been enabled to close his theatrical career for his first season, with presenting to the favour of an indulgent and discriminating public, so very eminent a performer as this actor from the Irish stage proves to be.

The Right Honourable gentleman,‡ in answering my statements respecting Lord Manners, has impeached my credit as an historian of facts, without attempting to discredit my reasonings. Let us see how this matter stands. I had stated the number of his Lordship's judgments reversed to be fifty in the hundred. He states them as eleven in twenty-two. Now, this is precisely, and to a unit, the same proportion with mine; being one-half of the whole number brought under review of the Superior Tribunal. If, indeed, I had seriously inferred from this statement, that, on an application to the Irish Court of Chancery, there was only an even chance of obtaining a right decision, I should have been guilty of exaggeration. This, however, is matter of inference from the admitted facts, not of controverted statement; as far as it required or admitted of exposure, it had been exposed on a former evening by the Solicitor-General; and I have now demonstrated irrefragably, that, in my account of the fact, which the right honourable gentleman thought fit, from an entire disregard of the particulars, to charge with inaccuracy, there was not the very slightest variation from his own statement. I might, with infinitely better reason, charge him with being ignorant of the most ordinary rules of arithmetic; but I content myself with accusing him of a total inattention to the argument he was handling, and an over anxiety to bring charges against his adversaries. I must, however, add, that, if I admit the inference against Irish justice to be somewhat exaggerated, from the equal number of affirmances and reversals, I can by no means allow that inferences in favour of Lord Mansfield's judicial capacity, which the right honourable gentleman draws from the equal proportion of right and of wrong judgments, when tried by the Court of Appeal. I freely acknowledge that I do not entertain the same profound respect for the noble Lord which he professes to feel. I speak the general opinion of the English bar, at least, when I say, that as a lawyer he was unknown among us before his elevation to the Bench. I have since heard him distinguish himself as a judge, a lawyer, and a politician, combined in one—a union always most inauspicious; and I confess, that if I testify so much less respect for him than I could wish, or than any kinsman of yours, sir, might have justly been deemed entitled to, it is from my recollection of his conduct on that great occasion, the Queen's case—conduct which excited indignation and disgust. Alone of all the assembled Peers, he thought it becoming to call that illustrious person "that woman," and in a tone, too, not easy to be forgotten. He followed up this treatment by delivering an opinion which exhibited him as a lawyer in colours not much more favourable, which raised the wonder and moved the pity of all the profession, and which drew from the learned and venerable Keeper of the Great Seal, a remark felt by every one present as a correction and a rebuke.*

There follows a defence of his severe remarks upon certain of the Irish Judges, and then he comes to Colonel Hutchinson, the member for Cork, one of the many Irish Tory members who had taken part in this debate.

Then comes the honourable Member for Cork, who has got into the most laudatory mood ever man was in, and has praised the whole administration of Irish justice in all its branches. He eulogized the twelve judges, the grand juries, the petty juries, the justices, the assistant barristers, in short, all the authorities connected with this portion of the civil government of Ireland. All were alike pure, and wise, and impartial, and just. Praise so wholesale, so unqualified, so indiscriminate, reminded me of a passage related in Mr Hargrave's life, when he was appointed Recorder of Liverpool. That extremely learned person was so pleased with his elevation, and so satisfied with his reception by the good people of the town when he went there to exercise his judicial functions, that he was flung into a fit of praise, like that of my honourable and gallant friend, and on his return he could never cease in his panegyrics. As for the magistrates, "Oh!" he would say, "they were all that could be desired, so kind, so humane, so considerate, so active, too, seeming to delight only in seizing every opportunity of being useful." Then the attorneys who practised before the worshipful bench, they, too, were a most worthy and respectable set of persons, deserving of a better fate, and well fitted to do honour to the wig and the gown. The juries, too—both grand and petty, (as the Member for Cork has it) they were most kind, attentive, and intelligent. And as for the suitors, they were so civil, and so candid—so grateful for the smallest portion of justice, that it really was a pleasure to administer it to them. "But the prisoners?" said one who had been listening to this laudatory statement. "What of them?" "Why, really," said Mr Hargrave, "for men in their situation, they were as worthy a set of people as I ever met with." Just so it is now in Cork, we find. The gallant representative of that community vies with the learned recorder of the other place, and exempts from his praise nor judge, nor juror, grand or petty, nor recorder, nor assessor, nor justice—all are sacred to panegyric in Cork and its neighbourhood. To be sure, there was one expression that crept into this eulogy, meant to be unqualified, which rather detracted from its value, and in a somewhat material part. "The twelve Judges," says my honourable friend, "are generally pure." In England, we are accustomed to think, quite as a matter of course, that all our twelve Judges are, without any exception, pure and incorrupt.

The one sarcasm which has to-night been resorted to, in allusion to some condemned tragedy* of a supposed party to the composition of this document, will rouse six millions of Catholics to rally round their two thousand leaders. I would advise this House not to criticise the petition with too severe a nicety. I would bid them look at the state of Ireland—such as now to raise fears in those who never feared before—such that, while yet I speak, she may be involved in serious peril.

Some notes on Irish affairs follow this speech, in which Lord Brougham broaches the ticklish subject of the State paying the Catholic clergy—a proposition which, we have no doubt, the Melbourne Government will be inclined to look upon with a favourable eye; and which the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, and all sensible moderate politicians, would regard with equal favour, were they untrammelled. Nor are we sure that a majority of the Established clergy might not in time be won to suffer the public to pay an annual premium to the Romish priests, to ensure their own quiet possession of tithes and church property. Lord Brougham mentions, that, among other good Irish measures, he had pointed out the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantancy—in other words, the annihilation of that pestilent little court, held in Dublin, which has ever been the nucleus of faction and intrigue, and ever will be. This was a measure contemplated by Mr Pitt, together with that of making provision by law for the Romish clergy; with which Catholic Emancipation ought perhaps to have been accompanied, thus consolidating the union of the kingdoms. It is too late now. Lord Brougham, however, confidently believes, that the Catholic clergy would cheerfully and thankfully acquiesce in any arrangement which was to secure them a comfortable well-paid provision. There is, we fear, no question of it. There would be some few, and probably, at the first, a very considerable number of recusants who would disdain state hire, especially as they are unburdened with those "tender pledges given to society" which operate among a marrying clergy. Yet we cannot before-hand presume a much higher average of virtue and disinterestedness among the parish priests of Munster than the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster. Lord Brougham states, that—

A story is current upon this subject, and of its truth there is no manner of doubt. One of the Catholic prelates being asked by a distinguished minister what the Romish clergy would do, were such a measure to be propounded, answered, "All without one exception would oppose it to the uttermost and to the last." But, upon a second question being put, "What would they do, were it carried?" the answer was as ready. "All without one exception would take the benefit of it, and be thankful."

Lord Brougham held even this to be insufficient. The grand abuse of the Irish Established Church—so incommensurate to the benefits it rendered the State—so grinding to those millions who disented from its worship—this master evil he regarded as the source of perennial discord, and as a thing of impossible duration. Nay, he foretold that hardly any who heard him were so aged that they might not expect to outlive so enormous an abuse as the gross disparity universally complained of.

* Lord Mansfield laid it down as a matter quite of course, that "agent or not agent, is always a question of law." Lord Eldon said, "he thought everybody had known that it is always a question of fact."

* Mr Peel having likened the composition of the petition to "the declamatory style of a condemned tragedy, rather than a grave representation to the Legislature," was supposed to refer to some dramatic efforts of Mr Shiel, a party concerned in its preparation.

We believe the prelate referred to is the late excellent and enlightened Dr Murray, who, with all the Romish Prelates, and nearly all the Romish clergy, was the strenuous advocate of a Poor-Law, which Lord Brougham, we know not on what grounds, says, "has been strenuously resisted by all parties and all sects in Ireland." There certainly have been just objections taken to many of the provisions of the law about to be introduced, and which promises to be quite as inefficacious as Mr O'Connell or its opponents could desire; but, if ever there was a single measure universally popular in Ireland, it was the introduction of well-considered Poor-Laws. Widely as the Irish must, on religious and political grounds, differ on the point of enrolling so numerous, active, and influential a body of clergy among the existing Black Household troops, an Poor-Laws there was never any difference of opinion, save with Mr O'Connell, and a few interested land-owners.

On the soil of Ireland fresh abuses have hitherto sprung up as fast as those existing were extirpated. The peculiar abuse complained of is not, however, of new growth, though it has been as zealously cultivated by the present Irish rulers as by their Tory or Orange predecessors. It is thus noticed, and we should not be in the least surprised if many persons in Ireland, fancying themselves Liberals, were as indignant at Lord Brougham wishing to set the law above the Executive as at Lord Lyndhurst's interference:—

There has occurred a disclosure upon the course pursued by the Irish Government in naming the Sheriffs of Counties, which any one interested in the great subject of the Irish judicial administration, must feel to be most important, and which connects itself closely with the topics discussed in the foregoing speech of 1823. It appears that the executive government habitually interferes with the choice of those important Ministers of the Law; does not, as in England, consider the lists given in by the judges to be at all binding; displaces without any scruple all the names so selected; and frequently appoints others without any communication from the Bench. This course of making pocket-sheriffs, or sheriffs without any judicial authority for their nomination, is found to have been followed no less than twenty-two or twenty-three times in three years. So grave a matter unavoidably called for the attention of Parliament, and it was ably and temperately submitted by Lord Lyndhurst to the House of Lords, as the especial guardian of the purity of our Judicial Establishment. A Committee was in consequence appointed to investigate the whole of this subject; and a more important inquiry has, perhaps, never been undertaken by either branch of the Legislature. It is hardly possible that results favourable to the cause of good government and popular rights should not follow from the Committee's labours. Certainly, had the things now known been disclosed before the debate in 1823, it would have been wholly impossible to resist the motion then made and rejected. For an habitual interference of the Crown with the appointment of an officer upon whom depends both the execution of all judicial orders and the return of all members to serve in Parliament, must at any rate be put a stop to, in whatever misapprehension of the law such an abuse may have had its origin.

One of the ablest of Lord Brougham's party speeches, if we may so term any of them, was made upon moving the address of thanks to the King soon after Sir Robert Peel's accession to the government at the opening of the session of 1835. After expounding the constitutional doctrine that every new Ministry is responsible for the removal of that which preceded it, and the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel consequently responsible for turning out the Melbourne Government, he sarcastically animadverts upon the sudden conversion of ex-Tories and Conservatives to the liberal policy professed by their predecessors in office, and exclaims—

When, I ask, did the reforming spirit come upon this Government? They are now for reform in Corporations—in the law—in the Church—in the State—in Tithes—and in the Law of Marriages. They are going to make marriage a civil contract, and to abolish all banns, for the sake of the Dissenters. All these things we are to have from those who, a few months ago, would not listen to any reform—who told us that, in proposing it, we were pulling down the Church about our ears—who inveighed against us as revolutionists—who challenged us as rebels—who exclaimed that we had either fools' heads on our shoulders, or traitors' hearts in our bosoms. Since when, I repeat, has this miraculous conversion taken place?—whence has it been derived? My Lords, I hope that my experience of men has not made me too distrustful of their good intentions, or induced me to entertain a worse opinion of the honesty of my fellow-creatures than I ought to cherish. I hope that, having lived so long in the world as I unfortunately have, I have not therefore arrived at an unkindly or uncharitable estimate of their honesty. It is, however, a result not more perhaps of reason and experience, than of a sort of instinct which I have in me—an instinct which I believe to be a property of our common nature—that I feel an invincible mistrust of sudden, unaccountable, miraculous conversions. . . .

. . . . In 1828, I was proceeding to say, I well recollect the speeches of two noble Lords against emancipation. The noble Duke's was far less violent against the measure; the noble and learned Lord was, in point of vehemence, complete: that both had equal success I will not assert. There is nothing of which I retain a livelier recollection than the inferior impression made by the noble and learned Lord. The opinions he then urged—the alarms he expressed—the fate he foretold to our Protestant Establishment from the grant of toleration, I well remember, drew forth the deepest expression of astonishment, unmingled with admiration, from all who heard him, and who had been taught to expect so different a result of his former liberal and enlightened principles. Even as samples of speaking and of reasoning, neither being remarkably excellent in argument, the Duke so entirely eclipsed the Chancellor, that I felt for the credit of our common profession at seeing the soldier outdo the lawyer in his own line. But whatever might be the relative success in resisting the question then, their conversion to it was equally complete a few months after. The noble and learned Lord was among the most nimble in that quick movement of a sudden transition. He vaulted in good company—a Right Honourable Baronet,* the nominal head of the present Ministry, as the noble Duke is its real chief, and a distinguished friend of his and of the Establishment,† had with others been long known for their unremitting efforts against the measure, proportioned to their ardent zeal in behalf of the Protestant cause, whose great champions they were admitted to be, and by whose support they had risen to power—all of them, noble dukes, learned lords, worthy barons, and honourable gentlemen—all came round, or rather rushed over at once, and not only agreed to the measure of Emancipation, not only withdrew their opposition, but tendered their services to carry it through, and very actually the men who did it. Now, this passage of their lives is what their friends appeal to with exultation and pride upon the present occasion, crying out—"Only see what men they are! Can you doubt they will reform by wholesale? What avail all their professions and pledges? True it is that no politicians ever pledged themselves so solemnly against all reform—true, that none ever so deeply committed themselves against all change—true, that none, at all times since the dawn of their public lives, ever thwarted so habitually, so pertinaciously, each measure of improvement, until beaten by majorities of the Commons. But never mind—don't doubt them—they are capable of doing again what they did before—by deserting all their old supporters, abandoning all their former principles, becoming converts in four-and-twenty hours to the faith of their adversaries, and carrying into execution, with the proverbial zeal of recent conversion, all the measures to resist which they had devoted their past lives."

It is always suspicious when people change their principles and gain something—although, certainly, it may be a proof, in some cases, of magnanimity and honest devotion to the public wellbeing. But that is a case which should occur only once in a statesman's life. A man may once get himself into that false position—he may once expose himself with impunity to such a load of suspicion; but he must beware of trying such an experiment a second time; for assuredly, no weight of reputation, no amount of public service, would ever enable any one with impunity to play the same game twice."

We have next a plain, sensible, business-like speech on the business of Parliament, delivered last year, and which in the House of Peers has led to manifest improvement. It does not, however, require any particular notice here; and, as to the series of powerful orations and pleadings on Canadian affairs, they seem only in the commencement. We cull from them but one passage, a commentary on certain gracious phrases in the despatch of the colonial secretary, who was charged with improperly delaying the vigorous measures necessary to restore the tranquillity of Canada:—

Are these things no matter of regret, when deep regret is expressed at merely continuing in the new reign the measures resolved upon towards the end of the old? The rose leaves on the Royal couch of the Young Queen must not, it seems, be ruffled by the discharge of painful, though necessary duties. But then was the death-bed of the aged monarch to be studded with thorns? If the mind of the successor must not be disturbed with the more painful cares of royalty, was the dying Prince to have his last moments harassed and vexed by measures of a severe and harsh aspect? Such, I presume, is the reason assigned for nothing having been done after the resolutions were passed in the beginning of May. My Lords, this is a delicate—a perilous argument. We are here treading slippery ground—we are dealing with very high matters. I affirm that I speak the language of the Constitution when I absolutely refuse my ear to all such reasons. They are resorted to for the defence of the Ministers at the expense of the Monarchy. I know nothing of the last hours of one reign—or the dawn of another—nothing in the change of Sovereigns which can lessen the responsibility of their servants, or excuse them from performing their duty to the Crown, be it of a stern and harsh nature, or be it gentle and kind. Beware, I say, how you give any countenance, ay, or any quarter, to topics of defence like these. They are so many arguments against a Monarchical Constitution, and in favour of some other form of Government. This is no discourse of mine. It is not I who am to blame for breaching this matter. You are they (to the Ministers)—you are they who have forced it into debate—and this dispatch—this dispatch is the text upon which, trust me, commentators will not be wanting!

The unqualified denial which Lord Brougham gives, in the introduction to these speeches, to the perpetual babble that he has deserted his party, was fully noticed in our last number. At the close of the above debate, the complaint made by Lord Melbourne on the "acerbity" of "his noble and learned friend's remarks," drew forth this unanswerable defence:—
