[A] Was the son of William Cavendish of Trimley St Martin. That ancient family derives its descent from the Gernons, whose ancestor Robert de Gernon came into England with William the Conqueror. Roger de Gernon was seated at Grimston-Hall in Suffolk, and died in 1318, the 11th of Edward II. having had to wife the daughter and heir of John Potton Lord of Cavendish in Suffolk, by whom he left issue four sons, who all took the name of Cavendish. Roger the second, married Alice, daughter of Geoffry de Stratton, with whom he had the manor of Stratton, and from him descended Sir Richard Cavendish, Captain and Governor of Blacknes, who was knighted in Scotland by the Earl of Hertford, Sept. 23. 1546, and by Inquisition the 6th of February 1552, the 6th of Edward VI, after the death of Henry Duke of Suffolk, (who died without issue, July 14, the 5th of Edward VI.) was found to be sixty years of age, and was one of his coheirs, viz. son of Richard Cavendish, son of Augustine Cavendish, who married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir William Brandon, Knight, grandfather of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk. This Sir Richard Cavendish had issue William Cavendish of Trimley St Martin, who died in 1572, possessed of the ancient inheritance of his ancestors; namely, Grimston, Stratton, and other manors, leaving Thomas his son and heir under age, whom we treat of in this article (1).

a town, with two little islands from it. On the first of November they went in between the island of St Sebastian and the main land, where carrying their things ashore, and erecting a forge, they built a pinnace, repaired what was out of order, and took in water; all which detained them 'till the 23d of that month. The 16th of December, they fell in with the coast of America in forty-seven degrees $\frac{1}{2}$ South Latitude, and ran along the shore 'till they came into forty-eight degrees, finding it a steep beach all along. They came to a harbour the next day, which Mr Cavendish named Port-Defire; and continued in it until the 28th following (e). On the 3d of January 1586-7, they fell in with a great cape in fifty-two degrees, forty-five minutes; from which there runneth a low beach about a league to the southward, that reaches to the opening of the Streights of Magellan. He was passing those Streights from the 6th of January to the 24th of February [B], tho' they are but about ninety leagues in length (f). Within them, in fifty-three degrees latitude, he named a place Port-Famine [C]; another, Muscle-Cove; and another, Elizabeth-Bay. The 24th of February they entered into the South-Sea; and the four first days of March met with a violent storm: during which, the Hugh Gallant had like to be lost, but the two other ships rid it out at the island of La Mocha. Here, some of the men going on shore, met with a warm reception from the Indians of Arauco, a country abounding with gold, and never conquered by the Spaniards. The 16th of the same month, they came to St Mary's island, and finding there large quantities of wheat and barley laid up in store-houses, for the use of the Spaniards, who are masters of that place, they took some of the corn, and likewise hogs, fowls, potatoes, and other provisions. They left this island on the 18th; and anchored under another called the Conception on the 19th; and on the 30th, came into the Bay of Quintero, which stands in thirty-three degrees, fifty minutes South Latitude. About fifty or sixty of the men landed the next day, and went up seven or eight miles into the country, well armed; but saw no human creature, tho' there were two hundred Spanish horsemen watching for them, who espied them out, but durst not attack them. The day following, being April 1, they took their opportunity, and came pouring down from the hills upon a few unprepared and unarmed English sailors, who were filling water. Some they killed, and took a few prisoners, about twelve being lost in all: the rest were rescued by fifteen soldiers, who obliged the enemy to retire with the loss of twenty-four men. The 5th day of April they sailed from this place, and on the 15th, came to an excellent harbour in twenty-three degrees and a half, called Morro Moreno [D]. Whilst they remained here, they took a small bark from Arica, which they kept, and called the George. They took also three other vessels (one of them laden with wine): two of which they burnt, and sunk the third (g). On the thirteenth of May they made themselves masters of a ship of three hundred tuns; and of two others, laden with fugar and provisions, of which one was valued at twenty thousand pounds: they took out what they wanted, and burnt the rest, with the ships. The 20th of the same month they came to Paita, in five degrees, four minutes South Latitude. Having driven the inhabitants up into the mountains, they pillaged the town (where they found twenty-five pounds weight of pieces of eight) and then set it on fire; with a bark that was riding in the road. The town contained two hundred houses. Sailing thence, they arrived on the 25th, at the island of Puna, in one degree South Latitude, where most of the cables in the South-Sea were made. They found in the harbour a ship of two hundred and fifty tuns, which they sunk: and also burnt

[B] He was passing those Streights from the 6th of January to the 24th of February.] The mouth of them, both on the eastern and western sides, lies between 52 and 53 degrees of latitude. But they are very winding; the southernmost point of them, called Cape Froward, standing in near 54 degrees of latitude. The best and most accurate description of them, is in Sir John Narbrough's Voyages. Lond. 1694, 8vo. reprinted since.

[C] He named a place Port-Famine.] By reason of above three hundred Spaniards having been famished, or starv'd to death, there. For one Don Sarmiento having pass'd through the Streights of Magellan from the South-sea, in the year 1579, did, at his return to Spain, persuade King Philip II. to send two colonies to plant in and fortify the Streights of Magellan, in order to prevent and obstruct the Navigations, Depredations, or Settlements of the English and Dutch in those parts (2). Accordingly four hundred Spaniards were sent thither in 1584, who built a town, which they called King Philip's city. But during the two years they were there, they could not get any thing to grow or thrive. And, on the other side, the Indians oftentimes preyed upon them; so that the stock of provisions they brought from Spain growing short, and having no means to renew it, they died for hunger in their houses, and even in their cloaths. At length the whole town being thereby tainted, and rendered unwholsome, the poor remains of the four hundred, which were now reduced to twenty one men and two women, forsook the place, and taking only a fowling-piece, and what little furniture they could carry, marched along the sea-side, and lived above a year upon muscles, limpets, roots, leaves, and sometimes a fowl they killed, or a deer. And in that miserable condition Mr Cavendish found them (3).

[D] Called Morro Moreno.] About thirty of the English went here on shore; and, at their landing, the natives of the place came down from the rocks to meet them, with fresh water and wood on their backs. The account they give of their Customs and Manners, is as follows, and may serve for a sample of the Manners of several American nations. 'They are in great awe of the Spaniards, and very simple people, and live in an extremely savage manner. They brought us to their abodes, about two miles from the harbour, where we saw their women and lodging, which is nothing but the skin of some beast laid upon the ground; and over them, instead of houses, is nothing but five or six sticks laid across, which stands upon two forks with sticks on the ground, and a few boughs laid on. Their diet is raw fish, which stinketh most vilely. And when any of them die, they bury their bows and arrows with them, with their canoe, and all that they have: for we opened one of their graves, and saw the order of them (4).

burnt a Church that was in that island, and brought the bells away. The Governor of the island, upon their approach, had sent his riches upon the Continent; and his furniture and other valuable effects, to a neighbouring isle; which last being discovered, the English took of them what they liked. But, on the 2d of June, they being carelessly dispersed about in getting provisions, a hundred Spanish soldiers and many Indians came down rushing upon them, killed five, took three prisoners, and four were otherwise destroyed; with the loss, however, of forty-six Spaniards and Indians (b). Going ashore again the same day, with seventy men, they met a hundred Spaniards armed with muskets, and two hundred Indians with bows and arrows, whom they put to flight; reduced their town to ashes, which had three hundred houses; made havock of their fields and gardens; and burnt four great ships, which were on the stocks. The 5th of June they quitted this place, and watered at Rio Dolce: and by that time had lost so many men, that they were obliged to sink their bark, called the Hugh Gallant, for want of hands to navigate it. They passed the Equinoctial Line on the 12th, and continued a northerly course all the rest of that month. The first of July they came within sight of the coast of New Spain, being then in ten degrees Northern Latitude: and, on the 9th of the same month, took a new ship of one hundred and twenty tuns, out of which taking the men, and what else they wanted, they set it on fire. The next day they seized an advice-boat, which they also burnt. On the 26th, they came to an anchor in the river of Copalita, in sixteen degrees Northern Latitude: from whence, the same night, thirty of them rowed in the pinnace to Aquatulco, that was two leagues off. Coming there, the next morning, July 27, by break of day, they landed, and burnt the town; with the church, and customhouse, in which were six hundred bags of anile to dye cloth, each bag worth forty crowns; and four hundred bags of cocoa, valued at ten crowns each. They were joined, the day following, by the rest of the fleet, which found it difficult to water at Copalita, and therefore proceeded for that purpose to the Bay of St Jago, in nineteen degrees, eighteen minutes Latitude. In the mean time Mr Cavendish went, on the 24th of August, in his pinnace, with thirty men, to Puerto de Natividad; and missing of a prize he expected to find there, he burnt the town, and two new ships of two hundred tuns each. The 3d of September they came into the Bay of Malacca, and going up into the country, burnt the town of Acatlan, which consisted of about thirty houses. Thence they proceeded to Chaccalla, and the isle of St Andrew; and, on the 24th, arrived at Massatlan, which stands under the Tropic of Cancer. The 27th, they went to an island near it, where they refitted, and furnished themselves with necessaries. Having stay'd there 'till the 9th of October, they departed for the Cape of St Lucar, on the South of the island of California; with which they fell in on the 14th, and lay near it 'till the 4th of November. On that day they met the St Anne, a ship of seven hundred tuns, being the Spanish Admiral of the South-Sea; which, after three sharp engagements, they made themselves masters of. It had in it an hundred and twenty thousand pezo's, or pieces of gold, each worth eight shillings, and great quantities of rich silks, and other valuable commodities, the chief of which they shared amongst themselves. After having put on shore (at Puerto Seguro) the whole crew, consisting of an hundred and ninety persons, they set fire to the ship, having five hundred tuns of goods in it, and saw it burnt down to the water, on the 19th of November (i). Thus did Mr Cavendish, and his company, ravage the coasts of Chili, Peru, and New Spain, from the middle of February to the middle of November 1587. But after his last great booty, he began to think of returning back to England, by the way of the East-Indies. Accordingly, he set sail from Puerto Seguro in California, November the 19th; and in forty-five days, namely, on the 3d of January 1587-8, came within sight of Guana, one of the Ladrone islands, in thirteen degrees $\frac{2}{3}$ of Northern Latitude. The 14th of the same month, they fell in with Cabo del Spirito Santo, a promontory of one of the Philippine islands, three hundred and ten leagues from Guana; and, the next day, arrived at Capul, where he staid nine days: during which, he exacted a tribute of provisions from the Caciques of this, and a hundred islands more. But, after having acquainted them, that he and his company were Englishmen, and enemies to the Spaniards; and made them promise, That they, and all the neighbouring islands, would assist him, whenever he should come again, to overcome the Spaniards; he returned them the value of their tribute in money (k). The 24th they left this place, and sailing between the islands of Panama (or Panay) and Negros, they coasted along Gilolo, and the adjoining clusters of islands, 'till the first of March; when having passed the streights of Java, they anchored South of that place, and took in fresh provisions. On the 16th of March, they sailed from hence for the Cape of Good Hope, which they made the 16th of May; having in nine weeks run about eighteen hundred and fifty leagues. They arrived at St Helena the 19th of June, where having refreshed themselves, and taken in necessaries, they set sail, on the 20th, for England. The 24th of August they came within sight of the Azores; and the 9th of September, after a terrible storm, which carried away most of their sails, arrived at Plymouth, from whence they first set out (l): having spent two years, one month, and nineteen days, in sailing round the globe. Mr Cavendish had been so fortunate in this voyage, that he undertook another in 1591, but with very different success. He set sail from Plymouth the 26th of August,

August, with three tall ships, and two barks [E]; and in about a month, came within sight of the Canary islands (m). But, under the Equinoctial Line, he had the misfortune to be becalmed for seven and twenty days together, driving to and fro without the least wind; in which time most of his men fell sick of the scurvy. At length, a North-west wind brought them, in twenty days (n), namely, on the 29th of November, to the Bay of Salvador, on the coast of Brasil. Here they took a small bark, laden with negroes, sugar, and Haberdashers-wares. A few days after, they came to Placentia, or Ilha Grande, where they rifled some houses inhabited by Portuguese; which they afterwards set on fire, together with a new ship: and left on shore the negroes they had taken in the Bay of Salvador (o). But the pleasure, or advantage, of having taken this place, was spoiled by unreasonable quarrels amongst Mr Cavendish's men [F]. The 11th of December, they quitted this place, and on the 14th, arrived at the isle of St Sebastian, five leagues from Santos; which last place they resolved to make themselves masters of, as being very proper to supply all their wants. Having agreed, that their long-boat, with one sloop, and a hundred men, were sufficient for the taking it; they accordingly watched their opportunity, early in the morning on the 24th of December, when the chief of the inhabitants were at high-mass [G], and with twenty-three men only seized the town (p). There they continued too long [H], which proved the ruin of their intended voyage. Nay, some were for wintering at that place, but Mr Cavendish would by no means agree to it. So, after having burnt the out-parts of the town, and set all the ships in the harbour on fire, they marched, on the 22d of January, by land to St Vincent, which they burnt to the ground (q). On the 24th of the same month, they set sail with a fair wind for the Streights of Magellan; but, in about thirty-seven degrees of southern Latitude, they had a most violent storm [I], which began the 7th of February, and lasted 'till the 9th, whereby the ships were separated and much damaged. The Desire and the Roe-buck, after having suffered great hardships, arrived together at Port-Desire, the general rendezvous, on the 6th of March. The 16th of the same month, the Black-pinnace came also thither; but Mr Gilbert's Bark, instead of proceeding so far, returned to England. As for the Galeon, commanded by Mr Cavendish, it did not arrive 'till the 18th (r). The Captain having in his passage been in continual danger from his ship's crew, which never ceased to mutiny against him (s). For that reason, he quitted his own ship, the Galeon, and went into the Desire. The 20th of March, they departed from Port-Desire; and on the 8th of April fell in with the Streights of Magellan, having suffered much by several violent storms. The 14th, they passed the first Streight; and on the 16th, the second, which was ten leagues distant from the first. The 18th, they doubled Cape Froward; but, three days after, were forced by the violence of the weather to put into a small bay, upon the South shore, where they remained 'till the 15th of May (t). In this place they endured inexpressible hardships, as well for want of provisions, as by the excessive cold [K]. And Mr Cavendish not being able to provide for the many sick men he had in the [E] With three tall ships, and two barks. Namely, The Galeon, wherein Mr Cavendish himself went as Admiral: The Roe-buck, Vice-Admiral, Capt. Cocke: The Desire, Rear-Admiral, Capt. John Davis: The Black Pinnace: And a Bark of Mr Adrian Gilbert, commanded by Capt. Randolph Cotton (5). To which add, The Dainty, that went volunteer, and returned to England, after the taking of Santos.

[F] By unreasonable quarrels amongst Mr Cavendish's men. One of them gives us this account (6). 'Here we had such disorder amongst ourselves, that if the Portuguese had been of any courage, they might have killed many of us; for our men would fight for their victuals as if they had been no Christians but Jews; and they that got the best, would get them into some hole, or into the wilderness under some tree, and there they would remain as long as they had meat. For mine own part, there was such sharking, I could in that place get neither meat nor money.'

[G] They watched their opportunity,—— when the chief of the inhabitants were at high-mass, and with 23 men only seized the town. Upon their landing, they marched directly to the church; where, besides women and children, there were three hundred men, whose swords they took from them without resistance. They kept them prisoners there, 'till the long-boat could come with more men, to their assistance. And then they plundered the town, where they found great store of gold, sugar, and cassavy-meal, of which they made very good bread. One of the sailors in particular met with a little chest, in a frier's cell, in which there were 1700 rials of eight, worth four shillings a-piece. The conductor in this expedition, was, Captain Cock: And as for the most convenient time for landing, they had the direction of a Portuguese pilot which they had on board. But by not watching carefully enough the inhabitants, most of them removed, with their best effects, up into the country. So that Mr Cavendish, and his company, did not make so much advantage by the taking of this place, as, with due care, they might otherwise have done (7).

[H] There they continued too long. Ant. Knivet says, that they continued two months at Santos (8): But by the journal of this voyage, written by John Jane (9), it appears, that they continued at Santos, only from the 15th of December to the 22d of January. However, by this unnecessary delay, they lost the proper season for pursuing their voyage into the South-sea.

[I] They had a most violent storm. 'Which indeed, [to use his own words] (10) I think to be such, as worser might not be indured.——Such was the furie of the west-south west, and south-west winds, as wee were driven from the shore four hundred leagues, and constrained to beate from fiftie degrees to the southward into fortie to the northward again, before we could recover nere the shore. In which time, we had a new shift of failes cleane blowne away, and our ship in danger to sinke in the sea three times: which with extremitie of mens labour we recovered. In this weaknesse wee departed for the Straits, being from that harbour eight leagues, and in eightene days wee got the straits.——And now we had been almost four moneths betweene the coast of Brasile and the Straits, being in distance not above six hundred leagues, which is commonly run in twentie or thirtie days: but such was the adverstnesse of our fortunes, that in coming thither wee spent the summer, and found in the Straits the beginning of a most extreme winter, not durable for Christians (11).' In this storm Mr Cavendish lost his boat with three men: The Roebuck likewise lost her boat with two men: And the Crow, a boat of twenty tun, sunk with twelve men and a boy (12).

[K] They endured inexpressible hardships, as well for want of provisions, as by the excessive cold. After the

the Galeon, ordered them to be put on shore; where they miserably perished with cold and famine. Having now not above 50 men in that ship fit for service (for 40 died in seven or eight days, and 70 fell sick) and perceiving that the frost and snow decayed his tackling, and was likely to last two months more, he found it absolutely impossible to stay longer in that miserable place, without utter ruin. Whereupon, he acquainted his company, That, finding it impracticable to pursue his voyage to China, as he intended, through the Streights of Magellan, he would go thither by the Cape of Good Hope. But they prevailed upon him to return to the coasts of Brasil, 'till a more favourable season; which he the more readily complied with, as he had not above four months provisions left, and wanted both ropes and sails (x). The 15th of May they set sail, and on the 18th were out of the Streights. The 20th, being over-against Port-Desire, in forty-seven degrees Southern Latitude, the Desire and the Black Pinnace left him [L] which proved the chief cause of his ensuing misfortunes (w). However, he held on his course for Brasil, together with the Roe-buck; which in Latitude thirty-six, was parted from him by a most violent storm [M]. Mr Cavendish arrived at length, with extreme difficulty and great danger, at Santos, and came to an anchor in the Bay of St Vincent. Here, twenty-five of his men going on shore to refresh themselves, got drunk, and were all cut to pieces by the Indians and Portuguese. To be revenged on the Portuguese, Mr Cavendish firmly resolved to go and beat Santos to the ground (having the Roe-buck in his company, which was now come in) but the river being too narrow, he only landed a little above the town, and plundered some farm-houses. He intended to have gone from thence to a small island, twenty leagues off, in order to furnish himself with necessaries; and then casting off the Roe-buck, whose wants he could not supply, to have returned again at a seasonable time for the Streights of Magellan (x). In the mean time, being advised by a Portuguese pilot to go to Spirito Santo, he rashly sent and attacked that place, before which he lost fourcore men, and forty were forely wounded. When he saw he could do no good there, he determined to go to the island of St Sebastian; and, after having burnt one of his ships for want of hands, to go back to the Streights of Magellan. But the Roe-buck's crew hearing of this his intention, ran away from him in the night [N], carrying off all his Surgeons, and leaving him full of sick men, and in a distressed condition (y). Thus forsaken, he made for St Sebastian's island, then two hundred leagues distant, where he arrived when he had but one cask of water left. There he set twenty sick men on shore. Having refitted and refreshed himself, he would fain have sailed back again the month of May was come in, there was 'nothing but such flights of snow, and extremities of frosts, as (saith he) in all the time of my life, I never saw any to be compared with them (13). The men were well in the morning, and by night frozen to death.' One of them, in particular, named Antony Knivet, going ashore to get some food, (for the allowance of their ship was little) and coming aboard again with his feet wet, and wanting shift of clothes, the next morning he was numbed, so that he could not stir his legs. All his feet were as black as foot: He had no feeling in them: And when he pulled off his stockings, his toes came with them. Another — Harris, a goldsmith, lost his nose; for going to blow it with his fingers, he cast it into the fire. In a word, out of Mr Cavendish's ship, there died eight or nine men with the cold every day. And as to provisions, they had not more than for four months; so that, to save their victuals, they were forced in a great measure to live upon sea-weeds, muscles, penguins, and the fruits of the country (14).

[L] The Desire and the Black Pinnace left him. This, Mr Cavendish imputed to the treachery of Capt. John Davis, commander of the Desire, of whom he speaks in the severest terms. 'And now, saith he, to come to that villain that hath been the death of me, and the decay of this whole action, I meane Davis, whose only treacherie in running from me, hath been an utter ruine of all. — As I since understood Davis's intention was ever to run away. This is God's will, that I should put him in trust, that should be the end of my life, and the decay of the whole action. For had not these two small ships parted from us, we would not have miscarried on the coast of Brasile; for the only decay of us was, that we could not get into their barred harbours. — The short of all is this, Davis his only intent was to overthrow me, which he hath well perform'd (15). In Hakluyt (16), there is a testimonial of the company of the Desire, touching their losing of their General, Mr Cavendish; wherein they declare, that it was utterly against their will. It is dated in Port-Desire, 2 June, 1592. and therein they 'protest they know not, whether they lost the others, or they them.'

However, they were as unfortunate as their General. Thrice they passed through the Streights of Magellan, and entered the South sea, and yet were forc'd back each time by bad weather. At length, after numberless misfortunes and distresses, their men being reduced to sixteen, and of them only five fit for service, they arrived the 11th of June 1593, at Bear-haven in Ireland. The Black Pinnace was lost in the South-sea (17).

[M] Was parted from him by a most violent storm 'The most grievous storm (as he saith himself) that ever any Christians endured upon the seas, to live (18).'

[N] But the Roebuck's crew hearing of this his intention, ran away from him in the night. Of which he gives the following account. 'They instantly desired nothing more, than to return home; all affirming, that it was pity such a ship [as the Roebuck] should be cast off. But in truth, it was not of any care of the ship, but only of a most cowardly mind of the master, and the chiefest of the company to return home. Now you shall understand, that the captain was very sick, and since the time that the ship lost her masts, she became the most laboursome ship that ever did swim on the sea, so as he was not able to endure in her, and at that present he lay aboard my ship, so as there was none of any trust, or account, left in her. But such was the case of that ship, being without sails, masts, or any manner of tackle, as in the sense and judgment of any man living, there did not live that desperate minded man in the world, which, in that case she was then in, would have ventur'd to have sailed in her, half so far as England. — These villains, having left in my ship all their hurt men, and having aboard of them both my surgeons, I having not one in mine own ship which knew how to lay a plaister to a wound, much less to cure any by salves; and further, having in their ship three times the proportion of my victuals, — as having in them, at their departure, but six and forty men, and carrying away with them the proportion for six months victuals of one hundred and twenty men at large; I leave you to consider of this part of theirs, and the miserable case I was left in (19).'

again for the Streights of Magellan. But his mutinous crew obliged him to sail for England, 'Tho' he rather desired to die in going forward, than basely in returning back again (x).' Several attempts he made to reach the isle of St Helena, and all to no purpose, being perpetually crossed by his own men, who were bent upon returning to England, tho' entirely against his own inclination (a). At length he died of a broken heart, and continual labour and vexation; but whether at sea or land is uncertain [O]. Such was the end of the unfortunate Thomas Cavendish: his first voyage was as full of glory, as this of unhappiness. No man ever compassed the globe in so little time; no man ever did greater things abroad, and returned to his country in greater pomp and triumph than he: and it is not unlikely, that he might have shone this last time as bright as he did the first, had not the ill humours of a company of base fellows interpolated and eclipsed him (b). We are informed, that 'he was of a delicate wit and personage (c).' [O] But, whether at sea or land, is uncertain.] We know for certain, that he came as far as eight degrees northern latitude in his way towards England: But that he came nearer, there is no evidence. He sent an account of his misfortunes to Sir Tristram Gorges, whom he appointed his executor: but doth not mention when, nor at what place, he writ it. Nor is it known how it was convey'd to England (20). By some passages therein, it appears, that he was very near death; for it begins thus. 'Most loving friend, there is nothing in this world, that makes a truer triall of friendship, than at death, to shew mindfulness of love and friendship, which now you shall make a perfect experience of: desiring you to hold my love as deare, dying poore, as if I had bene most infinitely rich. The success of this most unfortunate action, the bitter torments thereof lye so heavie upon mee, as with much paine am I able to write these few lines, much lesse to make discoverie unto you of all the adverse haps, that have befallen me in this voyage, the least whereof is my death (21).' And lower, he hath these expressions;—'But now I am growne so weake and faint, as I am scarce able to hold the penne in my hand; wherefore I must leave you to inquire of the rest of our most unhappy proceedings (22). And now by this, what with griefe for him, [the loss of his cousin John Lock,] and the continuall trouble I endured among such helldounds, [his ship's crew,] my spirits were cleane spent; wishing myself upon any desart place in the world, there to dye, rather than thus basely to return home againe: which course I had put in execution, had I found an island, which the charts make to be in eight degrees to the southward of the Line. I sweare to you, I fought it with all diligence, meaning (if I had found it) to have there ended my unfortunate life. But God suffered not such happiness to light upon me, for I could by no means find it, so as I was forced to go towards England; and having gotten eight degrees by north the Line, I lost my most dearest cousin.' He concludes the whole thus, 'Bears with this scribbling: for I protest, I am scarce able to hold a pen in my hand (23).' It is likely that he dyed at sea; and that this letter was brought by his ship, the Galeon, which, in all probability, reached England.

CAVENDISH (Sir WILLIAM) a great favourite and Privy-Counsellor of three Princes, viz. Henry VIII, Edward VI, and Queen Mary. He was the second son of Thomas Cavendish of Cavendish in the county of Suffolk, Clerk of the Pipe in the reign of Henry VIII (a), and was born about the year 1505, being descended of very ancient and honourable families both by his father and mother, as appears by unquestionable authorities [A]. He had a liberal education given him by his father, who settled upon him also certain lands in the county of Suffolk, but made a much better provision for him, by procuring him to be admitted into the family of the great Cardinal Wolsey, upon whose person he waited in quality of Gentleman-Usher of his chamber, at a time when he lived with all the state and dignity of a Prince, having a retinue of no less than eight hundred persons, and amongst them nine or ten Lords, who had each of them two at least if not three servants allowed them at the Cardinal's cost, and the Earl of Derby had no less than five (b). As Mr Cavendish was the Cardinal's countryman, and as he had a great kindness for his father, he took him early into his confidence, and shewed him, upon all occasions, very particular marks of kindness and respect. In 1527, he attended his master in his splendid embassy to France, where he arrived at Amiens in the

[A] As appears by unquestionable authorities.] The surname of this family was originally Gernon, and they descended lineally from Robert de Gernon, a Norman, who came over with the Conqueror (1); and whose descendant Roger Gernon of Grimston-Hall in the county of Suffolk, marrying the daughter and sole heiress of John Potton, Lord of Cavendish, or as it was anciently written Caundish, in the same county in the reign of Edward II, had by her four sons, John, Roger, Stephen, and Richard, who all took the name of Cavendish, as was usual enough in those times (2); from the eldest of these sons, John Cavendish, who was Chief Justice of the King's Bench (3), our Sir William Cavendish descended in a direct line; for the son of this Judge, Sir John Cavendish, who was knighted for killing Wat Tyler (4), had three sons, William, Robert, and Walter. William, the eldest of these, left behind him an only son, Thomas, who inherited both his father's and his uncle Robert's estate, who was a Serjeant at Law (5); he married Catharine Scudamore, and was stiled Thomas Cavendish of Cavendish and Posingford in the county of Suffolk; he departed this life in 1477, and left behind him an only son, Thomas Cavendish of Cavendish, the father of our Sir William (6). He applied himself to the study of the Laws, and by the interest of the Howard family, was brought into the Exchequer (7), where he became Clerk of the Pipe, as is mentioned in the text; he married Alice, the daughter and coheirs of John Smith of Padbrook-Hall, an old family, and in which there was a good estate (8). He had issue by her three sons, George, William, and Thomas; it appears by his last will, which is dated April 13, 1523, that he lived in the parish of St Alban's Wood-street, and that he had acquired an estate in Kent; it also appears by this will, that his two younger sons, Thomas and William, were under age (9); and from his naming Thomas before William, one would have judged he was the second son, but all the old genealogies of this family agree in making him the youngest; he became afterwards a Knight of Malta, and consequently left no family (10). As for the eldest son, George Cavendish, he was seated at Glemsford in Suffolk, and left issue William Cavendish, Esq; who had two sons, William and Ralph, who both died without issue; so that Sir William Cavendish of whom we are speaking, and his descendants, inherited all the estates of the family (11).

the month of August, and was present at that most magnificent entertainment, which was given by the French King to the Cardinal, and at all the following feasts that lasted for 14 days (c). He was from thence dispatched to Compeigne to prepare his master's lodgings, where one side of the castle was entirely assigned to the use of the Cardinal, and the other reserved for the King, and in like manner, the gallery which united the apartments was divided between them (d). He returned with that great Prelate into England, and served him with the utmost zeal and fidelity, as well in his disgrace, as when in the highest favour, and was one of the few servants that stuck close to him, when he had neither office nor salary to bestow upon them (e). This was so far from prejudicing him in the opinion of his Sovereign, that on this very account he took particular notice of him, and gave him singular intimations of his grace and favour; and after the Cardinal's death, upon whom Mr Cavendish waited to the last, and delayed going to Court 'till he had seen his body interred, the King took him into his own family and service [B]. He was also constituted one of the Commissioners for visiting and taking the surrenders of several religious houses; and in 1531, he took several surrenders in that capacity (g). In 1540 he was appointed one of the auditors of the Court of Augmentation (h), and soon after had a very considerable grant made him, of several lordships in the county of Hertford (i). In 1546 he was made Treasurer of the chamber to his Majesty, and on Easter-day the same year he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, and was soon after sworn of the Privy-Council (k). He continued to enjoy both these honours for the space of eleven years, in which time his estate was much increased, by the grants (l) he received from King Edward VI in seven several counties; nor does it appear that he was in less credit or favour with Queen Mary, under whose reign he died in the year 1557 (m). He married three wives, the first was Anne, daughter of Edmund Bostock, of Cheshire, Esq (n); by whom he had a son, who died young, and two daughters. His second wife was Margaret, daughter to Thomas Parker, of Polingford, in the county of Suffolk, Esq; who died June 16, 1540 (o). His third and last wife, who survived him, was the widow of Robert Barley, Esq; and was very justly considered as one of the most famous women of her time, and of whom therefore it is requisite that we should take particular notice (p) [C]. By her he had issue three sons, and as many

[B] The King took him into his own family and service. It was on the fourth of November 1530, that the Cardinal was arrested in his own palace at Cawood (12); and at that time, Sir Walter Welch told Mr Cavendish how good an opinion the King had of him, and that it was his Majesty's command he should remain about the person of the Cardinal, and have the chief direction of every thing, giving him certain directions in writing, which, when Mr Cavendish had read, he undertook to obey, and was thereupon sworn to the performance of them (13). In consequence of this, he went with his master to the Earl of Shrewsbury's at Sheffield-Park, where, when Sir William Kingston, whom the Cardinal always dreaded and hated, came to receive him in his custody, the Earl sent for Mr Cavendish, and addressed him thus: 'Forasmuch, as I have always perceived you to be a man in whom my Lord putteth great affiance, and I myself knowing you to be a man very honest (with many other words of commendations and praise) said further, Your Lord hath often desired me to write to the King, that he might answer his accusations before his enemies. And this day I have received letters from his Majesty, by Sir William Kingston, whereby I perceive, that the King hath him in good opinion, and upon my request hath sent for him by the said Sir William Kingston. Therefore, now I would have you play your part wifely with him, in such sort as he may take it quietly and in good part, for he is alway full of sorrow and much heaviness at my being with him, that I fear he would take it ill, if I bring him tidings thereof: and therein doth he not well, for I assure you, that the King is his very good Lord, and hath given me most hearty thanks for his entertainment: and therefore go your way to him, and persuade him I may find him in quiet at my coming, for I will not tarry long after you (14).' He performed this commission the best he could, but the sending of Sir William Kingston proved the death of the Cardinal, whom he carried as far as Leicester, and there he finished his days (15). When Mr Cavendish came to Court, he was introduced to the King by Sir Henry Norris, at that time Groom of the Stole, and after a long conference, his Majesty was pleased to tell him, that for his honesty and fidelity he should be servant in his chamber, in the same manner as he had been with his late master; adding at parting, 'Therefore, go your ways to Sir John Gage, our Vice-Chamberlain, to whom we have spoken already, to admit you our servant in our chamber; and then go to the Lord of Norfolk, and he shall pay you your whole year's wages, and a reward besides (16).' It is very remarkable, that of all the dependants upon the Cardinal, there were two that particularly distinguished themselves by a steady and close adherence to him; the first was Mr Thomas Cromwell, whom the King made afterwards Lord Cromwell, Earl of Essex, Knight of the Garter, and Prime Minister; the other was Mr William Cavendish, whom he immediately took into his own service, knighted him afterwards, made him Treasurer of his Chamber, and a Privy-Counsellor (17). What the nature of his office in the Household was at that time, will best appear by the following clause from an Act of Parliament, which is very remarkable. This act relates to the receivers of the King's revenue; and it is therein declared (18), 'That every person whom the King hereafter shall name and appoint to the room and office of Treasurer of his Chamber, be not acceptable in the Exchequer, for any such his or their receipt, or any part or parcel of the premises, but to the King's Highness or his heirs, or before such as his Grace shall thereunto limit and appoint. Also, that all such persons as have paid, or hereafter shall pay, any sum or sums of money to the King's use, to the hands of the Treasurer of his Chamber for the time being, and for the proof of the which payment, the said person or persons bring, or cause to be brought, the said bills into the King's Receipt of the Exchequer, that then immediately, upon sight of the said bill or bills, the Treasurer and Chamberlains of the said Exchequer, shall strike or cause to be stricken a tally or tallies for the discharge of the said person or persons, that so have paid their money to the said Treasurer of the King's Chamber, as if they had paid the said sum or sums of money in the Receipt before said, without any other warrant in that behalf to be obtained, and without any fine, fee, or reward, therefore to be taken.'

[C] That we should take particular notice. This Lady, as she was certainly one of the most remarkable persons of her time, so her memory is celebrated, and the most memorable passages of her life preserved, by several of our ablest Antiquaries, most considerable Historians, and most eminent Divines. Yet we hope, in the compass of this note, to give more remarkable facts relating to this wonderful woman, and that too with greater exactness than are any where to be met with in so narrow a compass Elizabeth Hardwick, for such was this Lady's name, was the daughter of John Hardwick many daughters, and of whom we say somewhat in the notes [D]. It was in the latter

Hardwick in the county of Derby, Esq; by Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Leeke of Loasland in the same county, Esq; and in process of time became coheirs of his fortune, by the death of her brother John Hardwick, Esq; without children (19). It is not easy to say in what year she was born, tho' the date of her death, and her age, both appear on her magnificent tombstone (20); the former indeed is certain, but the latter not so; for if it were, she would have been hardly twelve years old when her first husband died; by comparing of circumstances, however, it is highly probable, that she was born in 1516, and being extremely beautiful, and having the advantage of an excellent education, she captivated the heart of Robert Barley, of Barley, in the county of Derby, Esq; a young gentleman of a large estate, all of which he settled absolutely upon her on their marriage; which was celebrated when she was scarce fourteen. By this gentleman she had no issue; but by his death, which happened February 2, 1532 (21), she became a very rich widow, and remained so for about twelve years; when she married Mr Cavendish, by whom she had Henry Cavendish, Esq; who settled at Tutbury in Staffordshire, but had also considerable estates in Derbyshire; William Cavendish, of whom we shall speak in the next article; and Charles Cavendish, who was the ancestor of the Dukes of Newcastle of that name; and three daughters, Frances, who married Sir Henry Pierpoint, of Holm Pierpoint, in the county of Nottingham, from whom the Dukes of Kingston are descended (22). Elizabeth, who espoused Charles Stuart, Earl of Lenox, younger Brother of Henry King of Scots, father of King James I (23); and Mary, of whom we shall have occasion to speak afterwards. Some years after, she, by his death, was a second time a widow; she consented to become a third time a wife; and accordingly married Sir William St Lowe, Captain of the Guard to Queen Elizabeth, who was a man of plentiful fortune, and had a large estate in Gloucestershire; all which he settled upon her, excluding as well as his brothers, who were heirs male, as his own female issue by a former Lady (24). We are in the dark as to the time of this marriage, and of the death of this Sir William St Lowe; but it is certain, that the charms of this Lady's person and mind were of so lasting a nature, that in her third widowhood they made such an impression on the heart of George Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury, then one of the greatest subjects in the English nation, that he was very desirous of engaging her to alter the state of life she led for the fourth time; but before he could persuade her thereto, he was obliged to consent unto terms that were very advantageous for her family (25). Her Ladyship could not indeed insist that the estates of the family should be settled upon her, but she took care that they should be at all events enjoyed by her posterity, by causing the Earl to give his youngest daughter the Lady Grace, to her eldest son Henry Cavendish, Esq; and at the same time, married her youngest daughter Mary, to Gilbert the Earl's second son, who proved afterwards the heir of his honours and estates (26). The felicity of this last marriage seems to have been somewhat troubled by her Lord's having the custody of the Queen of Scots; for we are told by a certain author (27), that the Countess being at Court, and Queen Elizabeth demanding how that Princess did? She answered, Madam, she cannot do ill while she is with my husband, and I begin to grow jealous, they are so great together. We are likewise told by Mr Camden, that it was considered as a very high proof of the Earl's wisdom, that in such ambiguous times (this is our author's own word) he should be able to maintain his credit, notwithstanding the practices of his enemies, Court calumnies, and the disturbances given him by his second wife (28). All this taken together, rose so high as to become the subject of a publick prosecution (29). And in the inscription upon the Earl's tomb (30) it is asserted, that notwithstanding the scandalous report spread by malicious people, of his familiarity with the captive Queen, his conduct was entirely honourable and innocent. But these rumours gave occasion to the removing that unhappy Princess into the custody of Sir Amias Pawlet, with whom she remained 'till the time of her deplorable death (31). This noble Peer dying November 18th, 1590 (32), the Countess became a widow for the fourth time, and so continued for the remainder of her days. As her whole life was, with a very few interruptions, a continued series of prosperity, she was at liberty to discover the nobleness and magnificence of her nature, which she did in monuments as lasting as it was in the power of so prudent and discreet a person to contrive. She built three of the most elegant seats that were ever raised by one hand, within the same County, beyond example, Chatworth, Hardwick, and Oldcotes, all transmitted entire to the first Duke of Devonshire (33). At Hardwick she left the ancient seat of her family standing, and at a small distance, still adjoining to her new fabrick, as if she had a mind to preserve her cradle and set it by her bed of state. Which old house has one room in it, of such exact proportion, and such convenient light, that it has been thought fit for a pattern of measure and contrivance, of a room in the late Duke of Marlborough's noble house at Blenheim (34). Some memorials also are still preserved of the royal guest entertained here fifteen years; for the Queen of Scots chamber, and rooms of state, with her arms, and other ensigns of her dignity, are still remaining at Hardwick: Her bed was taken away for plunder in the Civil Wars. At Chatworth the new lodgings that answer the old are still called the Queen of Scots apartment; and an island plat, on the top of a square tower, built in a large pool, is still called the Queen of Scot's garden, and some of her own royal work is still preserved among the treasures of this family (35). A carpet embroidered with her needle, and particularly a suit of hangings now remaining in a chamber at Hardwick, wherein all the Virtues are represented in symbolical figures and allusive motto's; an ornament and a lecture. Neither was she unmindful, in the midst of so much abundance, of such of her fellow creatures, and fellow Christians, as by the permission of the same divine Providence, which dealt so bountifully with her, were left in all the bitterness of want, and therefore she endowed a noble Hospital at Derby, for the entertainment of twelve poor people, who have each about ten pounds a year for their subsistence (36). In this manner lived and died Elizabeth Countess Dowager of Shrewsbury, on the 13th of February, 1607, her body lying buried in the south isle of Allhallows Church in Derby, under a stately monument, which she took care to erect in her own life-time, on which her statue, curiously wrought, lies at full length (37). On this tomb there is also a large inscription, placed there many years after her death, wherein she is said to have been in her 87. h year, which must be a mistake, for reasons beforementioned, and which plainly show, that the must have been at least in the 91st year of her age. Her funeral sermon, with a large encomium on her many shining qualities, was preached by Dr Toby Mathew, Archbishop of York, who chose for his text, Prov. xxxi. 25. To the end of the chapter (38). Her memory was long after celebrated by another eloquent Prelate, who, after running through the principal passages of her life, sums up all in the following courtly phrases, 'A change of conditions that, perhaps, never fell to any one woman, to be four times a creditable and happy wife; to rise by every husband into greater wealth and higher honours; to have an unanimous issue by one husband only; to have all those children live; and all, by her advice, be honourably and creditably disposed of in her life-time; and, after all, to live seventeen years a widow in absolute power and plenty (39).'

[D] We shall say somewhat in the notes.] The names of Sir William Cavendish's children, by his last lady, we have already mentioned, and therefore here we shall take notice only of some particulars relating to his eldest and youngest sons; and to the youngest of his daughters, because they seem necessary to the right understanding several passages in the succeeding articles. Henry Cavendish, his eldest son, was elected one of the Knights of the Shire for the county of Derby, in the Parliament held in the 14th year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and served for the same county in five other succeeding parliaments (40). In 1578 he went over into the Low-Countries, and served there with great reputation (41). He had no issue by his Lady, who was the daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury; but having lived with universal reputation, died at Endfore, near Chatworth, in Derbyshire, Oct. 12, 1616, and was buried in the Church there, where we find an inscription latter part of his life, at the instance of the lady he last married, that Sir William Cavendish sold most of his estates in other parts of the kingdom, in order to purchase lands in Derbyshire, where her estates lay, and began to build a noble house at Chatsworth which he did not live to finish (q). He appears from his writings to have been a man of great honour and integrity, a good subject to his Prince, a true lover of his country, and one who preferred to the last, a very high reverence and esteem for his old master, and first patron, Cardinal Wolsey, whose Life he wrote in the latter part of his own, and there gives him a very high character, affirming, that in his judgment, he never saw the kingdom in better obedience and quiet, than during the time of his authority, or justice better administered (r). This work of his remained long in manuscript, and the original is, or at least was a few years ago, in the hands of the Duke of Kington (s). It had been seen and consulted by the Lord Herbert, when he wrote his History of the Reign of King Henry VIII, but he was either unacquainted with our author's christian name, or mistook him for his elder brother George Cavendish of Glemsford in the county of Suffolk, Esq; for by that name his Lordship calls him; but it appears plainly from what he says, that the History he made use of was our author's, and that he gave great credit to it, since in his character of Cardinal Wolsey he agrees entirely with him (t). Bishop Burnet also had seen and made use of our author's History (u), in relation to which there are some very curious remarks in a work of Mr Strype's, which deserve the reader's notice, and are therefore placed at the bottom of the page [E]. It might be of some use to the learned world, if, by collating the several manuscripts, that are still extant of this work, a new and correct edition of it was published, with notes, shewing wherein it differs from other Histories of that famous Cardinal.

tion to preserve his memory (42). His youngest brother, and the third son of Sir William Cavendish, seated himself at Welbeck in Nottinghamshire; and being knighted, was stiled Sir Charles Cavendish of Welbeck. He married Catharine, second daughter to Cuthbert Lord Ogle, and by that marriage acquired a large estate. He died in the month of June, 1617, and was buried at Bolesover, in the County of Derby (43). Mary, Countess of Shrewsbury, youngest Daughter of Sir William Cavendish, interceded herself deeply in the affairs of her niece, Lady Arabella Stuart, and thereby brought herself into very great troubles, as we have shewn in another place (44). And we take notice of it here, only to put the reader in mind, that this lady, who was so nearly allied to the Crown, was the granddaughter of our Sir William Cavendish.

Afterwards printed, Anno 1667, for Dornan Newman, entitled, The Life and Death of THOMAS WOLSEY Cardinal, once Archbishop of York and Lord Chancellor of England, containing, I. The Original of his Promotion, and the Way he took to obtain it. II. The Continuance in his Magnificence. III. His Negotiations concerning the Peace with France and the Netherlands. IV. His Fall, Death, and Burial. Wherein are things remarkable for those times. Written by one of his own servants, being his Gentleman Usher. An ancient MS. of this life, which seemed to be original, I once bought of Mr Woodward: which I afterwards parted with to Secretary Harley, afterwards Lord High-Treasurer and Earl of Oxford and Mortimer. The printed Book aforesaid was dedicated to Henry Lord Marquis of Dorset. By which Dedication, it seems, it was now newly reprinted. The Preface is of the Author's own writing, having these expressions: The Cardinal was my lord and master, whom, in his life-time, I served: And so remained with him in his fall continually, during the time of all his troubles, both in the south and north parts, until he died. In all which time I punctually observed all his demeanours, as also his great triumphs and glorious estate, &c. Nevertheless, whatsoever any man hath conceived of him in his life, or since his death, thus much I dare say, without offence of any, that in my judgment I never saw this realm in better obedience, and quiet, than it was in the time of his authority; nor justice better administered, without partiality, as I could justly prove, if I should not be taxed with too much affection. This Book is misprinted very much, as I have given a Specimen in my marginal Notes in the beginning of the Book. In the edition of it Anno 1667, I did in the beginning write as followeth. This Book was printed again, Anno 1706, with another title, viz. Memoirs of the great Favourite Cardinal Wolsey: With Remarks on his Rise and Fall, and other secret Transactions of his Ministry. Together with a Memorial presented to Queen Elizabeth by Will. Cecil, Lord Burghley, to prevent her Majesty's being engaged by any particular Favourite. But this can be none of the Lord Burghley's, as may be concluded by divers phrases and manners of speech that were not used in those times. Nor would that Lord have dared to write so plain and bold to the Queen; nor would she have bore it. It is plain this discourse was levelled at some of the Ministry in that time of Queen Anne, in order to make way for another Ministry. The original Book is not divided into chapters, as this is, but a continued discourse. It hath the very faults and misprintings of the former edition; as p. 2. Forest for Feast, and Sir James Parvlet for Sir Amyas. The Preface, which is called the Prologue in the Manuscript, varies and changes words, and leaves out, to make the language more suitable to the present age. But indeed, rather mars than mends the style.

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) second son of the former, and the first of this family raised to the dignity of Peerage. At the time of his father's decease he was very young, and but a child when his mother married the Earl of Shrewsbury, with whose children he was brought up, and by the care of the Earl had an excellent education (a). As he was his mother's favourite, she gave him in her life-time, and left him at her decease so plentifully, that he had a better estate than his elder brother (b). He was chosen member for Newport in the county of Cornwall, in the Parliament held in the thirty-first of Elizabeth (c); and it is probable that he sat in succeeding Parliaments, though we are not able to say for what place. He was very early, and very much considered in the Court of King James, so that in the month of May 1605, at the christening of the Princess Sophia, when his Majesty was pleased to advance some of the Nobility, and to create others, he was honoured with the title of Baron Cavendish of Hardwicke, in the county of Derby (d). It does not appear that he was desirous of places, or of Court preferments, but notwithstanding this, he was far from leading an inactive life, as is evident from his being among the first adventurers for settling the Bermudas Islands, one of which has the honour honour to bear his name, as a mark of the concern he had in the establishment of that flourishing plantation (e) [A]. He received, some years after this, a very great accession to his fortune, by the death of his eldest brother (f), which was followed on the second of August 1618, with an augmentation of honour, for being at that time in attendance upon the King on a progress, he was pleased to declare him, in the Bishop's palace at Salisbury, Earl of Devonshire, though his patent for that honour did not pass the seals 'till some days after (g). He enjoyed this honour about seven years, dying at his seat at Hardwicke, on the third of March 1625-6, with the character of being one of the worthiest Noblemen, and truest Patriots of his time (h). His Lordship was twice married, and had issue of both marriages, as the reader will see in the notes [B]. His corps was removed to the burying-place of the family at Endfore near Chatworth, where it was interred, and a monument erected for him with a suitable inscription (i) [C].

[A] Of that flourishing plantation.] The Bermudas islands are supposed to receive their Name from one John Bermudas (1), a Spaniard, who discovered them. They lie in the Latitude of 32 degrees 33 minutes north, and are equally remarkable for their being one of the most numerous Archipelago's hitherto discovered; and for their lying the farthest from any continent. There cannot well be a stronger proof of the former, than that their number was never ascertained. Some make them three, others five hundred, but the best writers agree, that there are upwards of four hundred. As to the latter, they lie three hundred leagues from the nearest point of Carolina, which yet is that part of the continent of America nearest them (2). One Henry May, an Englishman, was a shore here in 1593, and the account he gave of them first made them known in England. Sir George Somers being shipwrecked on them in 1609, procured them the name of the Summer Islands; and upon the report made by Captain Somers, Sir George's brother, a company was established for the settling of them, by a Grant from King James in 1612, in which this noble Peer, with the Earls of Northampton and Pembroke, the Lords Paget and Harrington, and many others, were concerned (3). They sent over a vessel with sixty persons the same year, and constituted Mr Richard Moor the first Governor, who performed his commission very successfully; and the same good fortune has attended this colony ever since, so that at present, though it be none of the richest, yet it is one of the fairest and most flourishing; to which we may add, that except Barbadoes, it is the best peopled of any of its size in America (4). The town of St George is one of the best built in that quarter of the world, the houses being all cedar, and the fortifications stone. The great island is divided into eight tribes, and the third in number, and middlemost in situation, is now called Devonshire-tribe, though, I apprehend, it was formerly called Cavendish. It is one of the two parishes, and has a neat church and a good library. There is besides a very small island between St George's and St David's, which has a little castle well fortified, that bears the name of Cavendish fort, in honour of this noble family (5).

[B] As the reader will see in the notes.] His Lordship married first Anne, daughter and heir to Henry Kightly, of Kightly (6) in the county of York, Esq; by whom he had three sons and three daughters; first Gilbert, who died in his youth, and left a very ingenious work, intitled, Horæ subsecivæ; Observations and Discourses, &c. it was published in 1620 (7). Second William, his heir and successor; third James, who died in his infancy; fourth Frances, married to Sir William Maynard; fifth and sixth Mary and Elizabeth, who both died young (8). His second wife was Elizabeth, daughter to Edward Boughton of Causton in the county of Warwick, Esquire, and widow of Sir Richard Wortly, of Wortly in the county of York, Knight, by whom he had issue Sir John Cavendish Knight of the Bath, at the creation of Charles Prince of Wales, Anno 1616, who departed this life on the 18th of January 1617 (9).

[C] With a suitable inscription.] The villages of Chatworth and Endfore stand opposite to each other, one on the east, the other on the west-side of the little river Darwent. At Chatworth is that noble palace, which is considered as the chief seat of the Devonshire family. At Endfore many of them lie interred; but, for all this, Hardwick is considered as the origin or birth-place, as it were, of this noble race, as well in consideration of it's being their first Barony, as for it's being the proper estate of Elizabeth Countess of Shrewsbury, whose fame is still fresh in these parts (10). It is in this light that we find Mr Camden considers things in his Britannia, where he speaks thus (11). 'On the very edge of the county, to the east, upon a rough ground stands Hardwick, which has given name to a famous family in this county, from whom is descended Elizabeth the present Countess of Shrewsbury, who has there laid the foundation of two stately houses almost joining to one another, which at a great distance appear very fair, by reason of their high situation. At present the title of this Barony is enjoyed by William Cavendish, her second son, who was lately advanced by King James to the honour of Baron Cavendish of Hardwick.' E

C A V E N D I S H (WILLIAM) son to the former, and the second Earl of Devonshire of this family. He was born in 1589, and very carefully educated in the house of his father (a), who, when he grew up to the age of nineteen, sent for Mr Thomas Hobbes, so well known to the world by the name of the Philosopher of Malmsbury, from Oxford, to be the director of his son's studies, tho' there was but a year's difference in their age (b). Mr Hobbes, from the time he came into the family, gained so much on the affections of his pupil, that he lived with him rather as a friend and companion, than as a Tutor, and thereby drew him to have a strong passion for History, Politicks, Antiquities, and other parts of polite learning (c). In the spring of the year 1609, Mr Cavendish received the honour of knighthood at Whitehall (d), which was with a view to a match intended for him, and after this he visited France and Italy in the company of Mr Hobbes, and on his return from his travels, the marriage beforementioned took effect, and Sir William Cavendish was thereupon established in the possession of a very considerable fortune (e) [A]. The nobleness and generosity of his temper, induced Sir William Cavendish

[A] Of a very considerable fortune.] There are some who tell us, that the honour of Knighthood was conferred upon Sir William Cavendish after his return from his travels (1), and immediately before his marriage; but besides various other reasons that might be alledged in disproof of this, it is sufficient to observe, that it is contradicted by Mr Hobbes's account of his own life, where he says expressly, that he did not travel with his pupil 'till 1610 (2). The match then proposed, and which afterwards took effect, was with the only daughter of Edward, Lord Bruce of Kinloss, for whom King James had a very particular esteem, as indeed it was very reasonable he should, for besides his noble descent from the male-line of that Royal family, dish to make a great figure at Court, and to live with much lustre in the country, even while he was a younger brother; but when, by the decease of Gilbert Lord Cavendish, he came to be considered as the heir apparent of his father's titles and fortunes, he carried his magnificence to such a height, that he was considered by King James, as a person who did honour to his country, more especially as he was one of the best bred, and best accomplished Nobleman of his time (f). When therefore Count Swartzenburgh came over in the month of April 1622, in quality of Embassador from the Emperor Ferdinand, Lord Cavendish was made choice of to conduct him to his publick audience (g), and was appointed in like manner to accompany Signior Valerissio, Embassador-Extraordinary from the Republick of Venice, and Mons. d'Arfennes and Joachimi, Joint-Embassadors of the States of the United Provinces (b). His Lordship and his Lady, in the year 1625, waited on King Charles I. to Canterbury, by his royal appointment, to be present at his nuptials with Maria Henrietta, second daughter to King Henry IV of France, who arrived at Dover the thirteenth of June, and came the same night to Canterbury, where the marriage was consummated (i). When he became Earl of Devonshire by the decease of his father, his desire of keeping up the dignity of the family, and living in a manner suitable to his quality both in town and country, brought him into such expence, as even his large fortune could not support, and as he was a person of the nicest honour, and one who had the strictest regard for justice, he made use of the favour in which he stood with his Prince, and his credit in Parliament, to procure an Act for sale of part of his estates for the payment of his debts, which was in those days a rare thing, and not to be obtained without difficulty (k). In his publick character he was truly a Patriot, for his loyalty to his Prince was without any tincture of ambition, and his zeal for the publick good had not the smallest intermixture of factious popularity. In his private life, he had all the qualities requisite to make him esteemed and beloved. His learning operated on his conduct, but was seldom shewn in his discourse. He was a kind husband, a tender father, a beneficent master, a friend to his neighbours, and a father to the poor. In fine, he deserved in every respect the character bestowed upon him by one who was best acquainted with him, that from his behaviour it might be easily perceived, that honour and honesty are but the same thing, in different degrees, of persons (l). But this great man, whose virtues added lustre to his titles, and who was justly esteemed the ornament of the Court, and the delight of his country, lived but a very short time to enjoy those honours which became him so well, for on the twentieth of June 1628, he departed this life at Devonshire-house near Bishopsgate, where the square of the same name is now seated, in the thirty-ninth year of his age (m), and was buried on the eleventh of July following (n), in the church of All-hallows at Derby, where a most stately monument, with his own statue in white marble upright in the midst of it, is erected to his memory, but without any inscription (o). This noble Earl was only once married to Christian, daughter of Edward Lord Bruce of Kinloss, sister to Thomas Earl of Elgin in Scotland, and aunt to Robert Earl of Aylesbury in England, a woman, whose great qualities, and greater virtues, have transmitted her fame with due praises to posterity (p) [B]. By her he left four children, as the

of which the Stuarts were descended, by females he had been highly instrumental by the secret correspondence he held with Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, in procuring the peaceable accession of his Master to the throne of England, for which he had been rewarded with a Peerage and a grant of lands in Scotland, and with the office of Master of the Rolls for life in England (3). But the King showed his kindness chiefly in the pains he took about this marriage, in which he was equally gracious to both parties. He made choice of Sir William Cavendish on account of his personal accomplishments as well as of his family; and he bestowed upon him the Lady as his kinswoman with whom he gave a fortune of ten thousand pounds; and that he might still do greater honour to the marriage, he gave her away with his own hand (4). In return for his Royal condescension, he solicited and prevailed upon the Lord Cavendish, of Hardwick, for he was not then Earl of Devonshire, or possessed of his elder brother's fortune, to make a great settlement on his second son; and his Lordship was so sensible of the honour done him, that he came up fully to his Majesty's expectations, and perhaps exceeded (5), what in that case he would otherwise have done.

[B] With due praises to posterity.] We have already given an account of this Lady's family; and therefore, we shall only observe, that as she lived in the utmost harmony with her Lord, for whom she had the sincerest affection; so in respect to his family she was another Countess of Shrewsbury, and employed the great powers vested in her by her husband for the benefit of his illustrious race, with the utmost prudence and fidelity. In the first place, she made a proper disposition of the money arising by sale of his estate; and in the next, she managed her large jointure of 5000 l. a year with such oeconomy and circumspection, that in the course of her long life, she added to it 4000 l. a year more of her own acquiring (6). Besides all this, she extricated the family from several tedious and perplexed law-suits, which she managed with such diligence, decency, and dexterity, and at the same time, with such sufficiency and success, that King Charles I. who, as his father King James had done, and his son King Charles II. did, conversed with her very familiarly, would some time merrily say, Madam, you have all my Judges at your disposal (7). There never was a woman more admired for her courtly and polite behaviour, at the same time that her virtue and piety made her looked upon as an example for all her sex. A certain witty writer drew her character in a few lines; The Countess of Devonshire (says he) is at once the best woman, and the best bred woman in the nation; she has all the complaisance of a Court, without the least affectation; and all the strictness of religion in her conduct, without the least pretence to it in her discourse (8). Another writer, from whom we have her life at large, gives us the following picture of her at full length (9). 'Prayers and pious readings were her first business, the remainders of the day were determined to her friends, in the entertainment of whom her conversation was so tempered with courtship and heartiness, her discourses so sweetened with the delicacies of expression, that such as did not well know the expence of her time, would have thought she had employed it all in address and dialogue: in both which she exceeded most Ladies, and yet never affected the title of a wit; carried no snares in her tongue, nor counterfeited friendships; and as she

the reader will be informed in the notes [C]; though he had not the happiness to see any of them arrive at the age of discretion, and most of them, at his death, were in their infancy.

' was never known to speak evil of any, so neither would she endure to hear of it from any of others, reckoning it not only a vice against good manners, but the greatest indecency also in the entertainment of friends; and therefore, always kept herself within the measures of civility and religion. Her gestures corresponded to her speech, being of a free, native, genuine, and graceful behaviour, as far from affected and extraordinary motions, as they from discretion. These admirable qualities drew to her house all the best company, towards whom she had so easy and such obliging addresses, without the least alloy of levity or disdain, that every one departed with the highest satisfaction; she ever distributing her respects according to the quality and merit of each, steering the same steady course in the country also, between which and the town she commonly divided the year.' We shall have frequent occasion to mention this Lady in the succeeding articles, and shall therefore add nothing farther here of her, except, that as she was steadily loyal to King Charles I. through all his troubles, she was no less faithful to the interest of his son in his exile, and was among the very few people to whom General Monk gave early intelligence of his good intention. Of these her constant and continual services, King Charles II. was so sensible, that after his Restoration, he frequently dined with her, sometimes in the company of the Queens, Dowager and Consort. She lived to the last with all that profuseness of English generosity, which was the characteristick of that age in which she passed her youth, and with all that dignity and magnificence by which the house of Devonshire has been always distinguished, 'till, full of years and glory, she departed this life on January 16, 1674, and was carried with great funeral pomp down to Derby, where she was interred, as we shall have occasion to mention elsewhere.

[C] In the notes.] His issue by Christian, Countess of Devonshire, were three sons and one daughter. 1. William, Lord Cavendish, of whom we shall speak in the next article. 2. Charles, of whom we shall likewise give an article. 3. Henry, who died young. 4. Lady Anne Cavendish, who married Robert, Lord Rich, son and heir of Robert, Earl of Warwick, she died early of an ague, and was a Lady of such distinguished perfections, that her loss was deplored by three of the worthiest men, and greatest wits, of that age in which there were so many, viz. the famous Viscount Falkland, the celebrated Mr Waller, and the ingenious Mr Godolphin, as well as by other writers of an inferior rank (10). This Lady had by the Lord Rich, only one son, Robert, who married Frances youngest daughter to Oliver Cromwell, and died in his father's life-time without issue; which is the rather mentioned, because Sir William Dugdale (11) makes her mother also of three daughters; whereas, they were the children of Robert Lord Rich by his second wife, the widow of Mr Rogers, and the daughter of Sir Thomas Cheeke of Pirgo in Essex. C A V E N D I S H (WILLIAM) son to the former, and third Earl of Devonshire of this family. He was at the time of his father's decease, as appears from the inquisition taken into the Court of Wards, ten years, eight months, and ten days old (a); so that he must have been born November 10, 1617. At the Coronation of King Charles I. in February 1625-6, he was made a Knight of the Bath (b). As a mark of his Majesty's regard for the family, the wardship of the young Earl of Devonshire, upon the demise of his father, was granted to his mother the Countess Dowager (c), who was equally careful in the management of the family estate, and providing for the education of the young Lord her son. It was with a view to this, that when he had reached the age of thirteen, his mother sent for Mr Hobbes from Paris, that she might put him under his care; and accordingly, after having instructed him in the learned languages and the principles of polite Literature at home for about three years, he, in 1633, attended his Lordship abroad, and having made the tour of Italy and France, and spent some time in Paris, his Lordship returned to England in 1637 (d). At that time, he was esteemed one of the handsomest young Noblemen in his person (e); and with respect to the qualities of his mind, one of the best accomplished in the kingdom; so that several noble families had him in their eye, and would willingly have drawn him into their alliance by marriage. Amongst the rest, the Countess of Leicester, for the Earl was at that time abroad, was inclined to have matched him with her daughter, the Lady Dorothea Sidney (f), whom Mr Waller has rendered immortal, by the name of Sacharissa; but however, that design did not take effect. When he came of age, his mother delivered up to him all the great houses in Derbyshire, compleatly furnished; and soon after, he married the Lady Elizabeth Cecil, second daughter to William, Earl of Salisbury (g). His Lordship discovered early, as he retained to the last, the loyal and virtuous principles of his illustrious ancestors. He distinguished himself in the House of Lords, by a noble and generous opposition to the bill for attainting the Earl of Strafford (h), and very steadily adhered to the constitution of his country, when he saw it attacked under the plausible pretence of improving liberty. When the King withdrew into the North, his Lordship followed him, and was one of the noble Peers that in June 1642 (i), subscribed the famous Declaration at York, which was so ill relished at Westminster, that by a resolution of the house of Lords, bearing date the 20th of July following, himself and eight other Peers were deprived of their right to sit or vote, excluded from all privilege of Parliament, and ordered to stand committed to the Tower (k). These and other acts of violence did not hinder him from persisting in his duty, or from supplying the King with all the money in his power, tho' his horror of the Civil War (l) was such, that he chose to retire out of the kingdom. This recess however, gave him little repose, for he was thrust in the number of the delinquents, his great estate sequestered, and when by the mediation of his friends, an ordinance was depending for his composition, an order was made October 23, 1645, for his return from beyond the seas by a day assigned, with which, by the persuasion, or rather at the command of his mother, he complied (m). He lived after his return, for the most part, at his seat called Latimers in Buckinghamshire, where he was with the Countess Dowager,

when the army hurried King Charles from place to place, suffered him to rest for a night or two there, when his Majesty had much private consultation with them on the state of his affairs, and at the same time expressed to them both, the grateful sense he had of the many faithful services they had done him (n). The suspicions and dangers of the succeeding times, obliged him to maintain a privacy, or rather obscurity, very little suited to the nobleness and generosity of his nature, which however, contributed very much to the restoring his private affairs, and to the making up those breaches in his fortune, which the severities he had formerly experienced had produced (o). But when better days came on, and the House of Lords was again permitted to sit, one of the first things they did, was, by an order of the 4th of May 1660, to reverse the judgment formerly given against him, as has been before mentioned (p). It being thought necessary, to preserve the public peace, that a Declaration should be made by the Nobility and Gentry that adhered to the Royal cause, of their not being implacable, but desirous of peace and quietness, ready to submit to the authority of the approaching Parliament, and willing to bury in oblivion all that was passed, as well as all the odious distinctions of names and parties, his Lordship was the third of twenty Noblemen that signed it (q). At his Majesty's return, he was received with all the kindness and respect due to his long and constant services, as well as his great sufferings; and August 20, 1660, he was constituted Lord Lieutenant of the county of Derby, as a mark of Royal confidence and esteem; for as to Court preferments, he never sought, or received them (r). He lived mostly in the country, and distinguished himself there by his hospitality and moderation. He was equally esteemed by his Prince, and beloved by his fellow-subjects; for no man's loyalty was clearer; and yet there was no man more firm to the true principles of liberty, than he (s). The religion of the Church of England, had not a more sincere friend, but at the same time he was an enemy to all persecution, of which he readily gave testimony, when any occasion fell in his way (t). It was his known character, and a character never called in question, that he was a man of as much conscience and honour, religion and virtue, prudence and goodness, as that age afforded; and as he lived, universally honoured and beloved, so he died, lamented and regretted, not only by his friends and neighbours, but by all who had the least knowledge of, or acquaintance with, him, November 23, 1684, at his seat at Roehampton in Surry, from whence his body was removed to Derby, and there interred with his ancestors (u). His posterity are taken notice of in the notes (w) [A]. As for his Countess, she survived him five years; and dying November 16, 1689, was on the 21st of the same month, interred in a vault under the east window of King Henry VIIIth's Chapel in Westminster-Abbey (x), with great funeral solemnity.

[A] In the notes.] His Lordship had only two sons and one daughter. Of his eldest son William Lord Cavendish, who, upon his decease, became Earl of Devonshire, and afterwards, by creation, Marquis of Hartington, and Duke of Devonshire, we shall speak in a subsequent article. His second son was the honourable Charles Cavendish, Esq; born October 5, 1655, and was a gentleman of most humane and courteous disposition, much addicted to privacy and retirement; and one, whose virtues rendered him as much esteemed and admired, as his high birth gained him respect. He died unmarried, March 3, 1670, and was buried in the family vault at Derby (1). His lordship's only daughter, Lady Anne Cavendish, was twice married, first to Charles Lord Rich, son to Charles Earl of Warwick (2), of whom, by the way, there is not the least notice taken in the account of that noble family which is given in the peerage, but, on the contrary, his father, Charles Earl of Warwick, is said to have died without issue by his Countess, Mary, daughter to the first Earl of Cork (3). Her second husband was John Earl of Exeter, whom she attended in two journeys to Rome, and was with him at the village of Issy near Paris, where he died, in his return home, August 29, 1700 (4). It may not be amiss to observe, that she lies buried with her Lord in a vault in St Martin's Church in Stamford, under a tomb made by the Earl's express direction at Rome, by many supposed to be the most elegant in this kingdom; of which the reader may find a very particular description in the book referred to in the margin (5). And the following character is given of her in the inscription placed thereon, for preserving the memory of her Lord, viz. 'He had for wife, and the companion of his virtues and travels, and, in a manner, of his studies, Anne, of the right noble house of Cavendish, daughter of William Earl of Devon; for the beauty of her body, ingenuity of her mind, and all those accomplishments which can any ways adorn a lady famous; of whom he begat five children; happy in his spouse; and happy in his off-spring! But, among all the things which make life more blessed, being ever mindful of mortality, when he was in Italy, whilst he thoroughly examined, and as curiously collected, the works of choicest art, there he caused this monument to be made, where it could be most exquisitely done, for himself, and the most dear comfort of his bed and travels, and of all his cares (6).'

C A V E N D I S H (WILLIAM) Baron Ogle, Viscount Mansfield, Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Newcastle, one of the most accomplished persons, as well as one of the most able Generals, and most distinguished patriots of the age. He was son of Sir Charles Cavendish, youngest son of Sir William Cavendish, and younger brother of the first Earl of Devonshire, by Catharine, daughter of Cuthbert, Lord Ogle (a). He was born in the year 1592 (b), and discovering, even in his infancy, the strongest marks of an extraordinary genius, his father was extremely careful in the cultivation of them, and took all imaginable pains to have him instructed, as well in sciences as in languages; so that at an age when most young gentlemen are but entering on knowledge, he might be truly said to have acquired a large stock of solid learning, which was adorned with an easy and polite behaviour, that, except on proper occasions, entirely concealed the scholar under the more taking appearance of the fine gentleman (c). It was in this light that he appeared and

and was taken notice of at the Court of King James I, where he was quickly distinguished by the King's favour; and in 1610, was made Knight of the Bath, at the creation of Henry, Prince of Wales (d). In 1617, his father died, by which he came to the possession of a very large estate; and having a great interest at Court, he was, by letters Patents dated November 3, 1620, raised to the dignity of a Peer of the Realm, by the title and title of Baron Ogle and (e) Viscount Mansfield; and having no less credit with King Charles I. than with his father King James, was, in the third year of the reign of that Prince, advanced to the higher title of Earl of Newcastle upon Tyne, and at the same time, he was created Baron Cavendish of Bolesover (f). Our Genealogists and Antiquaries give us but a very obscure account of these honours, or at least, of the Barony of Ogle, to which, in the inscription upon his own and his grandmother the Countess of Shrewsbury's tomb, he is said to have succeeded in right of his mother (g), a point, which shall be explained in the notes [A]. His attendance on the Court, tho' it procured him honour, brought him very early into difficulties; and there is some reason to believe, that he did not stand extremely well with the great Duke of Buckingham, who perhaps was apprehensive of the large share he had in his Master's favour (h). However, he did not suffer, even by that powerful favourite's displeasure, but remained in full credit with his Master, which was notwithstanding so far from being beneficial to him, that the services expected from him, and his constant waiting upon the King (i), plunged him very deeply in debt, tho' he had a very large estate, of which we find him complaining heavily in his letters, to his firm and steady friend, the Lord Viscount Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford (k). But these difficulties, tho' they sometimes put him upon thoughts of retirement, never in the least discouraged him from doing his duty, or from testifying his zeal and loyalty, when the King's service required it. This conduct, tho' it does not seem to have recommended him much to the great Ministers, yet maintained him so effectually in his Master's good opinion, that when, in 1638, it was thought requisite to take the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Charles II, out of the hands of the women, the King of his own motive made choice of the Earl of Newcastle, as the person in his kingdom most fit to have the tuition of his heir apparent, and accordingly declared him Governor to the Prince, which was certainly as high an act of confidence as a Sovereign could place in a subject (l). In the spring of the year 1639, the first troubles in Scotland broke out, which induced the King to assemble an army in the North; soon after which he went down thither to put himself at the head of it; and in his way, was most splendidly entertained by the Earl of Newcastle at his noble seat of Welbeck, as he had been some years before when he went into that kingdom to be crowned, which tho' in itself a very trivial matter, yet such was the magnificence of this noble Peer, that, from the circumstances attending them, both these entertainments have found a place in General Histories (m) [B]. But this was not the only manner

[A] Shall be explained in the notes.] Sir Charles Cavendish, this Nobleman's father, married Catharine, the younger daughter of Cuthbert Lord Ogle, her elder sister Jane being married to Edward Earl of Shrewsbury; and during the life-time of that Lady, who was this Nobleman's aunt, as well as during the life-time of his mother, he was raised to the rank of a Peer, by the title of Baron Ogle and Viscount Mansfield, by letters Patents dated the third of November in the 18th year of James I (1). It is true, that his Duchefs tells us, he was created Baron of Bolesover and Viscount Mansfield; but in that he appears to be mistaken; nor is it the only point of the kind in which there are mistakes in her book (2). King Charles I, by letters Patents dated the seventh of March, in the third year of his reign, created him Baron of Bolesover, and, at the same time, Earl of Newcastle, as is set forth in the text. But the year following, his mother's elder sister Jane, countess of Shrewsbury, dying without issue, the King was graciously pleased, by letters Patents dated the fourth of December, to declare Dame Catharine Cavendish, Baroness of Ogle; and to confirm that title to her and her heirs general (3). This shews why the Earl of Newcastle chose to have a new Barony created by Patent, and how he comes to be stiled Baron of Ogle, in right of his mother; for it seems, that he waived any right that he might have to that Barony by his first creation; that he might take it by descent, as an old Barony in fee, as he did upon his mother's decease, by which he likewise came to the possession of the family estate of Ogle, which was worth three thousand pounds a year, besides a personal estate of twenty thousand pounds, that his mother left him (4).

[B] These entertainments have found a place in General Histories.] The first of these royal dinners seems to have been a thing of mere accident. His Majesty was going down to Scotland to be crowned, and in his way came to Workop manor in Nottinghamshire, which being but two miles from his Lordship's house at Welbeck in the same county, he intreated his Majesty's visit to his house, and doing him the honour of dining there; which being accepted, he was entertained with such magnificence, that we are told it cost him between four and five thousand pounds (5). As to the second of these entertainments, there is some doubt about it, for we are told very positively, that it was given at the time the King marched against the rebels in Scotland (6); but in the account his duchefs has given of his life, he is very particular, and fixes it earlier by several years. For having given an account of the first, he says (7), 'That the King liked it so well, that a year after his return out of Scotland, he was pleased to send my Lord word, that her Majesty the Queen was resolved to make a progress into the Northern parts, desiring him to prepare the like entertainment for her as he had formerly done for him: which my Lord did, and endeavoured care it with all possible care and industry, sparing nothing that might add splendour to that feast, which both their Majesties were pleased to honour with their presence. Ben Johnson, he employed in fitting such scenes and speeches as he could best devise, and sent for all the gentry of the country to come and wait on their Majesties; and, in short, did all that ever he could imagine to render it great and worthy their Royal acceptance. This entertainment he made at Bolesover-castle in Derbyshire, some five miles distant from Welbeck, and resigned Welbeck for their Majesty's lodging, it cost him in all between fourteen and fifteen thousand pounds. Besides these two, there was another small entertainment, which my Lord had prepared for his late Majesty in his own park at Welbeck, when his Majesty came down with his two nephews, the now Prince Elector Palatine, and his brother Prince Rupert, into the forest

manner in which he expressed his warm affection for his Master. Such expeditions require great expences, and the King's treasury was but indifferently provided, for the supply of which, the Earl contributed ten thousand pounds (n), and also raised a troop of horse, consisting of about two hundred Knights and Gentlemen who served at their own charge; and this was honoured with the title of the Prince's troop (o). As much as these services might recommend him to the King, they rather heightened than lessened that envy borne to him by some great persons about the Court, of which the Earl of Holland, having given a stronger instance than his Lordship's patience could bear, he took notice of it in such a manner as contributed equally to sink his rival's reputation and to raise his own (p) [C]. The choice that had been made of his Lordship for the tuition of the Prince, which was at first so universally approved, began now to be called in question by those who meant very soon to call every thing in question, but the Earl was no sooner informed of it, than he very prudently resolved to do all that was in his power to prevent the King's having any trouble upon his account, and therefore desired to resign his office, which he did; and in June 1640 (q), it was given to the Marquis of Hertford. As his Lordship took this step from the knowledge he had of the ill-will borne him by the chief persons amongst the disaffected, so he thought he could not take a better method to avoid the effects of their resentment, than to retire into the country; which accordingly he did, and remained there quietly 'till he received his Majesty's orders to visit Hull; and tho' these came at twelve o'clock at night, his Lordship went immediately thither, tho' forty miles distant, and entered the place with only two or three servants, early the next morning (r). He offered his Majesty to have secured for him that important fortress, and all the magazines that were there; but instead of receiving such a command as he expected, his Majesty sent him instructions to obey whatever directions were sent him by the Parliament; upon the heels of which came their order for him to attend the service of the house; which he accordingly did, when a design was formed to have attacked him, but his general character was so good, that this scheme was let fall (s). The Earl of Newcastle upon this, retired again into the country, having little pleasure in being at Court, when all things were visibly tending to confusion. He did not long however enjoy the repose he so earnestly sought; for upon the King's coming to York, his Lordship was sent for thither; and in June 1642, his Majesty gave him directions to take upon him the care of the town of Newcastle, and the command of the four adjacent counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham; these orders were easily issued, but they were not so easily to be carried into execution; for at this time, the King had not either money, forces, or ammunition, and yet there never was more apparent necessity, for at that juncture his Majesty had not a single port open in his dominions; and if either the order had been delayed a few days, or had been sent to any other person, the design had certainly miscarried (t). But, as soon as he received his Majesty's commands, he repaired immediately to the place, and by his own interest there secured it, he raised also a troop of one hundred and twenty horse, and a good regiment of foot, which secured him from any sudden attempts (u). Soon after, the Queen who was retired out of the kingdom, sent a supply of arms and ammunition, which being designed for the troops under the King's command, the Earl took care they should be speedily and safely conducted to his Majesty under the escort of his only troop, which his Majesty kept, to the great prejudice of his own affairs in the North (w). The Parliament, in the mean time, had not forgot the Earl's behaviour towards them, but as a mark of their resentment excepted him by name, which was so far from discouraging, that it put his Lordship upon taking brisker measures; and having well considered his own influence

' of Sherwood, which cost him fifteen hundred pounds. And this I mention, not out of a vain-glory, but to declare the great love and duty my Lord had for his gracious King and Queen, and to correct the mistakes committed by some Historians, who not being rightly informed of those entertainments, make the world believe falsehood for truth.' The noble Historian also takes up this matter in very strong terms, for he represents the frequent banquets and feasts the King met with on his road to Scotland in 1633, as very detrimental to the manners of the nation; and having taken notice of the entertainment given by the Earl of Newcastle on that occasion, he subjoins immediately this very extraordinary remark (8). 'But when he passed through Nottinghamshire, both King and Court were received and entertained by the Earl of Newcastle, and at his own proper expence, in such a wonderful manner, and in such an excess of feasting, as had scarce ever before been known in England, and would be still thought very prodigious, if the same noble person had not within a year or two afterwards made the King and Queen a more stupendous entertainment, which (God be thanked) though possibly it might too much whet the appetite of others to excess, no man ever after in those days imitated.'

[C] To sink his rival's reputation and to raise his own.] The troop which the Earl of Newcastle raised, was composed of about two hundred gentlemen, some possessed of two thousand pounds a year, some of one, and many of five hundred. This troop was stiled the Prince's, but the Earl commanded it as Captain (9), and when the army drew near Berwick, he sent Sir William Carnaby to the Earl of Holland, then General of the Horse, to know where his troop should march. His answer was, next after the troops of the general officers. The Earl of Newcastle sent again to represent, that having the honour to march with the Prince's colours, he thought it not fit to march under any of the officers of the field (10); upon which the General of the Horse repeated his orders, and the Earl of Newcastle ordered the Prince's colours to be taken from the staff, and marched without any. When the service was over, the Earl sent Mr Francis Palmes with a challenge to the Earl of Holland, who consented to a place and hour of meeting; but when the Earl of Newcastle came thither, he found not his adversary but his second; the business having been disclosed to the King, by whose authority, says Clarendon, the matter was composed; but before that time, the Earl of Holland was never suspected to want courage.

fluence those parts, he offered to raise an army in the North, for his Majesty's service (x). In return to this, he received all that was in the King's power to give; which was a commission; constituting him General of all the forces raised North of Trent; and likewise General and Commander in Chief of such as might be raised in the counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, Lancaster, Chester, Leicester, Rutland, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex, with power to confer the honour of Knighthood, coin money, and to print and set forth such declarations as should seem to him expedient; of all which extensive powers, tho' freely conferred, and without reserve, his Lordship made a very sparing use (y). But with respect to the more material point of raising men, his Lordship prosecuted it with such diligence, that in less than three months, he had an army of eight thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, with which he marched directly into Yorkshire, and his forces having defeated the enemy at Peirce-Bridge, his Lordship advanced to York, where Sir Thomas Glenham, the Governor, presented him with the keys, and the Earl of Cumberland and many of the Nobility resorted thither to compliment and to assist his Lordship (z). He did not long remain there, but having placed a good garrison in the city, marched on towards Tadcaster, where the Parliament forces were very advantageously posted (a). The design which the Earl had formed, not only for reducing that place, but for making the troops that were there prisoners, failed, through the want of diligence in some of his officers; but notwithstanding this, his Lordship attacked the place so vigorously, that the enemy thought fit to retire, and leave him in possession of the best part of Yorkshire (b). This advantage he improved to the utmost, by establishing garrisons in proper places, particularly at Newark upon Trent, by which the greatest part of Nottinghamshire, and some parts of Lincolnshire were kept in obedience (c). Thus ended the year 1642, when the King's affairs, under the direction of this noble Peer in the North, were in a fair and flourishing condition (d). In the beginning of 1643, his Lordship gave orders for a great convoy of ammunition to be removed from Newcastle to York, under the escort of a body of horse, commanded by Lieutenant-General King, a Scotch officer, whom his Majesty had lately created Lord Ethyn (e). The Parliament forces attempted to intercept this convoy at Yarm-Bridge, but were beaten on the first of February, with a great loss (f). Soon after this, her Majesty landing at Burlington, the Earl drew his forces that way to cover her journey to York, where she safely arrived on the seventh of March (g), and having pressing occasions for money, his Lordship presented her with three thousand pounds, and furnished an escort of fifteen hundred men, under the command of Lord Piercy, to conduct a supply of arms and ammunition to the King at Oxford, where he kept them for his own service (h). Not long after, Sir Hugh Cholmondley and Captain Brown Bushel were prevailed upon to return to their duty, and give up the important port and castle of Scarborough (i). This was followed by the routing Sir Thomas Fairfax on Seacroft, or as some call it Bramham-Moor, by Lord George Goring, then General of the Horse under the Earl, when about eight hundred of the enemy were taken prisoners (k); and this again made way for another victory gained on Tankersly-Moor (l). In the month of April, the Earl marched to reduce Rotherham, which he took by storm, and soon after Sheffield (m); but in the mean time, Lord Goring and Sir Francis Mackworth were surprized on the 21st of May at Wakefield, where the former and most of his men were made prisoners, which was a great prejudice to the service (n). In the same month, her Majesty went from York to Pomfret under the escort of the Earl's forces; and from thence she continued her journey to Oxford, with a body of seven thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, detached for that service by the Earl; and those forces likewise, the King kept about him (o). In the month of June, the Earl reduced Howly-house by storm; and on the thirtieth, gained a complete victory over Sir Thomas Fairfax, tho' much superior to him in numbers on Adderton-Heath near Bradford, where the enemy had seven hundred men killed, and three thousand taken prisoners (p); and on the second of July following, Bradford surrendered (q). The Earl advanced next into Lincolnshire, where he took Gainborough and Lincoln, but was then recalled by the pressing solicitations of the gentlemen of Yorkshire into that county, where Beverley surrendered to him on the 28th of August (r); and in the next month, his Lordship was prevailed upon to besiege Hull, the only place of consequence then held for the Parliament in those parts. Notwithstanding these important successes obtained by an army raised, and in a great measure kept up by his Lordship's personal influence and expence, there have not been wanting censures upon his conduct (s) [D]; of which however, his Majesty had so just a sense, that by letters

[D] There have not been wanting censures upon his conduct. In such distracted times as these, when through private intrigues at Court, and the more open struggle of civil and religious factions in the nation, all things were thrown into confusion, it was no wonder, that let a man's character be what it would, he should be liable, either to groundless calumnies or to unjust reprehensions. It is said of this noble Peer (11), that he was a person who liked the title, power, splendour, attendance, and pomp, of a General and Commander in Chief; that he affected to render his army numerous by increasing the regiments, companies, and troops, of which it consisted, rather than by keeping a smaller number, and those substantial, which had been more advantageous for the service, as it would have been, if his garrisons had been fewer and stronger; that he was always jealous of his command, and equally afraid of it's being superfeded or divided, which made him unwilling to march southward on any condition, and hindered him from joining the King, that his glory might not be eclipsed by that of Prince Rupert; that he not only maintained but affected to show his absolute independence

Patents dated the twenty-seventh of October, he advanced him to the dignity of Marquis of Newcastle; and in the preamble of his Patent, all his services are mentioned with suitable encomiums. (t). That winter, the Earl marched into Derbyshire, and from thence to his own house at Welbeck in Nottinghamshire, where he received the news of the Scots intending to enter England, which brought him back into Yorkshire, from whence he sent Sir Thomas Glenham to Newcastle, and himself for some time successfully opposed the Scots in the Bishoprick of Durham (u); but the forces he left behind under the command of Lord Bellasis at Selby, being routed (w); the Marquis found himself obliged to retire, in order, if possible, to preserve York; and this he did with so much military prudence, that he arrived there safely in the month of April 1644, and retaining his infantry and artillery in that city, sent his horse to quarter in Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, and Leicestershire, for the sake of subsistence (x). The city was very soon blocked up by three armies, who quickly commenced a regular siege, and were once very near taking the place by storm; and at last, having lain before it three months, brought the garrison into great distress for want of provision; and if the Marquis had not very early had recourse to a settled and reasonable, but withal a slender, and a short allowance, had infallibly reduced it by famine (y). For tho' Sir Charles Lucas, who commanded the Marquis's horse, importuned the King for relief, yet it was the latter end of June before his Majesty could send a sufficient body, under the command of Prince Rupert, to join Sir Charles Lucas, and attempt the forcing the enemy to raise the siege; which however, upon their approach, they did, remaining on the West-side of the Ouse, with all their forces, while the King's army advanced on the East-side of the same river (z). By this quick and vigorous march, Prince Rupert had done his business, but, as is very well observed by a most judicious Historian of these times, he would needs over-do it, and not content with the honour of raising the siege of York by a confederate army much superior to his own, he was bent upon having the honour to beat that army also, and this brought on the fatal battle of Hefdom, or, as it is more generally called, Marston-Moor (a), which was fought July 2, 1644, against the consent of the Marquis of Newcastle, who seeing the King's affairs totally undone thereby, made the best of his way to Scarborough, and from thence, with a few of the principal officers of his army, took shipping for Hamburg (b). Thus the King's concerns in the North, that had prospered so well under the prudent conduct of the Marquis, were ruined in a day by an unaccountable fatality, which some ascribe to a slip of the Secretary's pen, and others, with greater appearance of truth, to the rashness of Prince Rupert (c) [E]. After staying about six months at Hamburg, he went by sea to Amsterdam, independence upon the Ministers and Privy Council at Oxford, by following intirely his own conceptions, and treating their commands with an indifference bordering on contempt; in fine, that there was somewhat romantic in his spirit, as appeared from his writings, his conversation, and the company he kept; that his courage was of the razor kind, and bore too thin and sharp an edge; and that, upon the whole, he was a very fortunate General, but either through indolence or want of skill did not make the most of his good fortune. These, so far as I can judge, are the principal strokes of censure, that have fallen upon this Nobleman's conduct; and after mentioning them, it seems to be a point of equity, to give the reader also some account of what the very same writers admit to have been fairly offered in his excuse, or rather in his justification. It is then allowed, that the noble person of whom we are speaking, was so far from seeking preferments, places, or power, that he declined all, and had retired into the country when the war broke out; and that he was drawn from this retirement by the respect that he thought due to his Master's positive commands, who sent him an extensive commission without his seeking it; and from these two weighty motives, first, that without a Commander in Chief acting by such a commission, the North could not be preserved; and secondly, that he had no subject in his dominions to whom this commission could be given, but this noble Lord to whom it was sent. That as he quitted his security, ease, and wonted course of life, and exposed his person, ruined his fortune, and engaged his family and friends from the mere principles of loyalty; so his own noble disposition lead him to believe, that such as professed the same sentiments that he did, would exert themselves in the same manner, which induced him to multiply corps, and to give out so many commissions; and tho' the consequence of this conduct might speak it impolitick, yet, his Lordship's condition considered, it was not at all imprudent; for if those whom he trusted had fulfilled their engagements, all had gone well; and considering the quality of the persons trusted, and their capacity of discharging their trusts, and the interest they had in discharging them, the errors they committed were such as he could not foresee, and for which therefore he ought not to be brought to account. That as the armed he commanded was entirely of his own raising, kept together chiefly by his influence, and not easy to be maintained in any quarters but those which he assigned them, it was very natural for him, more especially considering how necessary that army was to the defence of the North, to act as he did. We ought likewise to consider, that when he sent his only troop of horse to Oxford, it was kept there; when he sent an escort of fiftsen hundred men, they were likewise kept; as the army also was, which was sent to conduct the Queen with a train of artillery; so that he could not be said with truth to act upon a narrow plan, and perhaps it might be said with truth, that if he had kept the last mentioned body, it had been better both for himself and the King. That the Ministers at Oxford were very far from giving the King right advice, is generally allowed; that the orders sent to this Nobleman were inconsistent with the King's service in those parts where his Lordship acted, may be presumed; and therefore, that he did not hurt his Majesty's service by obeying them, ought not to be esteemed a crime. Lastly, as to his courage, it is fairly allowed, that upon several occasions, when all things seemed to be lost, they were retrieved by his signally exposing his person, and engaging others to imitate his example; and tho' this may be called romantic, by persons of a more phlegmatic temper, yet such as consider it attentively will hardly be brought to account it rashness.

[E] To the rashness of Prince Rupert.] The accounts we have of this battle from several authors are in many respects irreconcilable, and some of their principal circumstances contradictory to each other. We have not either room or leisure to treat the matter at large, and shall therefore content ourselves with representing clearly those circumstances that regard the Marquis. He had thrown himself into York, and thereby hazarded his person for the preservation of that important place, and did preserve it by taking this step, tho' besieged by three great armies, and those commanded by Generals of great reputation, viz. the Scots

Amsterdam, and from thence made a journey to Paris, where he continued for some time, and where, notwithstanding the vast estate he had when the Civil War broke out, his circumstances were now so bad, that himself and his young wife, were reduced to the pawning their cloaths for a dinner (d). He removed afterwards to Antwerp, that he might be nearer his own country; and there, though under very great difficulties, he resided for several years, while the Parliament in the mean time levied prodigious sums upon his estate; insomuch, that the computation of what he lost by the disorders of those times, though none of the particulars can be disproved, amount in the whole to a sum that is almost incredible (e) [F]. All these hardships and misfortunes never broke his spirit in the least, which was chiefly owing to his great foresight, for as he plainly perceived after the battle of Marston-Moor, that the affairs of Charles I. were irrecoverably undone; so he discerned through the thickest clouds of King Charles II's adversity, that he would be infallibly restored (f); and as he had predicted the Civil War to the father before it began, so he gave the strongest assurance to the son of his being called home, by addressing to him a treatise upon Government and the Interests of Great Britain, with respect to the other powers of Europe, which he wrote at a time, when the hopes of those about his Majesty scarce rose so high as the Marquis's expectations (g). During this long exile of eighteen years, in which he suffered so many and so great hardships, this worthy Nobleman wanted not some consolations, that were particularly such to one of his high and generous spirit. He was, notwithstanding his low and distressed circumstances, treated with the highest

Scots under Lesley, the Northern army under Fairfax, and the forces of the associated counties under Manchester, seconded by Cromwell (12). When assistance from the King was solicited by the Marquis of Newcastle, he was so far from having any disgust to the person of Prince Rupert, that the noble Historian tells us, he wrote to the King that he hoped his Majesty would not doubt his obeying the grandson of King James (13). When the city was relieved, Lord Clarendon tells us, that the Prince engaged the enemy without consulting the Marquis, but there is good reason to suspect, that he was misinformed. We are elsewhere told (14), that the Marquis repaired to the Prince and advised him not to fight, for two reasons, each of them so weighty, that, considered singly, they might have justified his Highness's taking that Lord's advice. The first was, that if he did not attempt beating the enemy into good humour with each other, they would infallibly break and retire several ways; the misunderstandings between their Generals being come to such a height, that nothing could save them from ruin but a battle. The second was, that his own troops having been so long shut up, were not in the best order for fighting, that within two days he expected Colonel Clavering with a reinforcement of three thousand men, and two thousand more that were to be collected from other garrisons; and farther still, that the enemy had all advantages of sun, wind, and ground. His Highness answered, that he had the King's positive command to fight the enemy, which therefore he would obey. In consequence of this, there was some discourse had with other officers, as to the order and disposition of the army; when these were adjusted, the Marquis asked his Highness where he would be pleased to have him charge; to which the Prince returned, that it was then too late to think of action, and that he would delay fighting till next morning, for which reason he advised the Marquis to go to his rest. He went accordingly to sleep in his coach, being exceedingly fatigued, but he had hardly composed himself a little, before he heard the thunder of cannon and small arms, the battle being begun, so that he had only time to put himself at the head of his own regiment, where it is agreed, that both he and his troops did wonders. Prince Rupert charged at the head of the left wing, where Newcastle's horse were under the command of Lord Goring, and they beat the Scots and Lord Fairfax's horse, and pursued them ten miles (15); but in the mean time, Prince Rupert's horse that were on the right of the King's army were beaten, and the Marquis's foot being thus uncovered, Cromwell with his reserve came down upon them, and tho' they stood like a wall, yet they were mowed down like a meadow, as my author has it (16). At last, the Marquis's foot threw themselves into a ring, and disclaiming all thoughts of safety, refused quarter, and having slain more than had fallen in the whole action beside, were themselves to a man destroyed (17). The noble Historian (18) seems to blame the Marquis for quitting the kingdom so precipitately, but it is to be observed, that he, or rather the Prince, had lost for him not a battle only but his army, for the Prince kept his horse, and all the foot were cut off. The enemies Generals were pretty well reconciled by the victory, which put them in possession of the open country, and soon after of the city of York. The Marquis's money was entirely exhausted, and the only thing he had in his power, was to escape with the Lord Ethyn, Lord Falconbridge, Sir Hugh Cholmondley, and others of his friends, whose circumstances had they been taken, would have been as desperate as his own (19). It seems therefore, that what the Marquis did was purely from necessity, and no man in a shipwreck was ever yet blamed for securing himself upon the first plank.

[F] To a sum that is almost incredible.] When one considers, that this noble person was the son of Sir William Cavendish's youngest son, and therefore inherited from his grandfather such an establishment only, as out of his fortune he could make for one child out of many, it will appear strange, and yet it is certainly true, that at the breaking out of the Civil War, the Earl of Newcastle had one of the best estates in England (20). His grandmother, the Countess of Shrewsbury, left him her third husband's Sir William St Lowe's estate, which amounted to above fifteen hundred pounds a year. His mother, the Lady Ogle, left him three thousand pounds a year, and twenty thousands pounds in money. His first wife was an heiress, and brought him two thousand four hundred pounds a year, besides a jointure of eight hundred pounds a year for her life. But without entering into farther particulars, it appears that his estates as they were let in the year 1641, in the counties of Nottingham, Lincoln, Derby, Stafford, Gloucester, Somerset, York, and Northumberland, produced twenty-two thousand three hundred and ninety-three pounds a year, besides which, by the death of his brother, he inherited an estate of two thousand pounds a year more. All these fell at once into the hands of the Parliament, and brought no profit whatsoever to him for the space of eighteen years, and in that time the Parliament took every method possible to make the most of them. They cut down woods upon seven of his estates to the value of forty-five thousand pounds. They took from his brother, Sir Charles Cavendish, by way of composition, five thousand pounds, after receiving all his rents for eight years; and in 1652, they disposed of the whole Newcastle estate at the rate of five years and a half's purchase, by which they raised 111,593*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* at once; besides this, all his houses were plundered and ruined, and the furniture either stolen or sold, his stock of corn, cattle, &c. which was of great value, went the same way, as did also his excellent breed of horses, which were his principal delight, and which were esteemed as good as any in Europe. His parks were treated in like manner, so that at his return there was hardly a deer or tree left in, nay, scarce a pale about them. But to cut this matter short, we shall only add, that from a computation of these particulars it is affirmed, that the loss sustained by his Grace was rather over than under 733,579*l.* (21).

He received the high compliment, of having the keys of the cities he passed through in the Spanish dominions offered him, he was visited by Don John of Austria, and by several Princes of Germany (i). But what comforted him most, was the company very frequently of his royal Master, who, in the midst of his sufferings, bestowed upon him the most noble Order of the Garter (k). At length this dark period came to an end, and as he shared his exile, so he shared in the blessings of his Majesty's Restoration (l). On his return to England, he was received with all the respect due to his unshaken fidelity and important services, and, as a mark of the royal favour, was constituted Chief Justice in Eyre of the counties north of Trent (m); and, by letters patents dated the sixteenth of March 1664, was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Ogle and Duke of Newcastle (n). He spent the remainder of his life, for the most part, in a country retirement, and in the pursuit of those studies which he most affected [G]. He also employed a great part of his time in repairing the injuries which his fortune had received from the malignity of the times, and, equally full of years and of glory, died in possession of the greatest honours and the fairest reputation, December 25, 1676, in the eighty-fourth year of his age (o). His Grace was twice married, but had issue only by his first Lady, of which the reader will find an account in the notes (p) [H]. His body lies interred, with that of his Duchefs, under a most

[G] And in the pursuit of those studies which he most affected. This noble person was celebrated for his love to the Muses from his youth, and tho' he thought so closely when he was disposed on the most serious subjects, that the famous Mr Hobbes, who was known to be not over fond of other men's notions, yet adopted some of his as his own, he was rather inclined to amuse himself with lighter topics, and was the great patron of the wits in the reign of King Charles I. This humour of his has drawn upon him the censure of some grave men; Lord Clarendon mentions this, yet with decency (22); but Sir Philip Warwick loses all patience, and thinks it sufficient to ruin this great General's character, that he appointed Sir William Davenant, a Poet, his Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance (23), as if it was not possible for a man to have a turn to poetry, and a capacity for any thing else at the same time. It is a wonder he did not point out another slip in this noble Lord's conduct of the same kind, I mean his making the Rev. Mr Hudson, Scout-Master General of the army, who yet was an excellent master of his trade and a very able Divine; besides (24), all the world knows Mr Chillingworth, in argument, battered the Papal Church with very great success, which however did not hinder his serving as an Engineer in the Royal army with great reputation (25). The truth is, that this worthy Nobleman living always magnificently, and having a great kindness for men of merit, never wanted them about him, and never failed to employ them the best he could. The famous Ben Johnson was one of his first favourites, and he addressed to him a very fine copy of verses, which may be seen in his works

(26) Mr Shadwell was one of the last, and he made his acknowledgments to his Grace in more than one Dedication (27). In the busy scenes of life, it doth not appear that this noble Lord suffered his thoughts to stray so far from his employments as to write any thing; but in his exile, resuming his old taste of breaking and managing horses, than which there could not be a more manly or martial exercise, he thought fit to give the world his sentiments upon a subject which nobody knew better, and if we may credit what the best writers (28) on this head have since delivered, there is no great danger of any body's ever understanding it better. His first treatise he published in French; his second near ten years after; their titles run thus:

La Methode nouvelle des Dresser les Chevaux avec Figures, i. e. The new Method for managing Horses with cuts. Antwerp 1658, in fol. This book was first written in English; and afterwards by his Lordship's directions translated into French by a Walloon; and was 'till within these few years very scarce and dear.

A new Method and extraordinary Invention to dress Horses, and work them according to Nature; as also to perfect Nature by the Subtlety of Art, fol. London, 1667. The latter, as the Duke informs his reader, 'Is neither a translation of the first, nor an absolute necessary addition to it; and may be of use without the other, as the other hath been hitherto, and still is, without this; but both together will questionless do best.' A noble edition of this work has been of late years printed in this kingdom.

In his exile, he wrote also two Comedies, viz.

The Country Captain, a Comedy. Printed at Antwerp 1649; afterwards presented by his Majesty's servants at Black Fryars, and very much commended by Mr Leigh.

Variety, a Comedy, presented by his Majesty's servants at Black-Fryars; and first printed in 1649, and generally bound with the Country Captain. It was also highly commended in a copy of verses by Mr Alexander Brome.

He has likewise written.

The Humorous Lovers, a Comedy, acted by his Royal Highness's servants. London 1677, 4to. This was received with great applause, and esteemed one of the best plays of that time.

The triumphant Widow: or, The medley of Humours, a Comedy acted by his Royal Highness's servants. London 1677, 4to. which pleased Mr Shadwell so well, that he transcribed a part of it into his Bury Fair, one of the most taking plays wrote by that Poet Laureat. His Grace wrote in Johnson's manner, and is allowed by the best judges not to have been inferior to his master. We have many other pieces written by this ingenious Nobleman scattered up and down in the poems of his Duchefs; all which seem to confirm the character given by Mr Shadwell; 'That he was the greatest master of wit, the most exact observer of mankind, and the most accurate judge of humour that ever he knew (29).'

[H] Will find an account in the notes] This noble Peer, as has been observed in the text, married two wives. The first was Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of William Bassett of Blore in the county of Stafford, Esq; widow of the Honourable Mr Henry Howard, younger son to Thomas, Earl of Suffolk (30), by whom his Lordship had three sons, and as many daughters, viz. William, who died young; Charles, Viscount Mansfield, who served under his father in the Civil War in quality of Master of the Ordnance, he married the daughter of Richard Rogers of Brianston in the county of Dorset, Esq; but died in his father's life-time without issue; Henry, Earl of Ogle, who survived his father and inherited his honours, and of whose posterity we shall speak in the next note. His Grace's daughters were these, Lady Jane, married to Charles Cheney of Chesham Boys in the county of Bucks, Esq; Lady Elizabeth, to John, Earl of Bridgewater; Lady Frances, to Oliver, Earl of Bolingbroke. His second wife was Margaret, daughter to Thomas Lucas of Colchester, Esq; and sister to John Lord Lucas, and to the famous Sir Charles Lucas, who was shot at Colchester for his fidelity to his Royal Master, by whom he had no issue (31). She lies buried with him at Westminster-Abbey, was the constant companion of his exile abroad, and of his retirement at home. She was a woman of great wit, and some learning, for besides the life of the Duke and her own, she wrote a great number of folio's, and published six and twenty plays; in several of which there are scenes and songs written by the Duke. It must be owned, that in many of these pieces there is much extravagance, and more of fancy than of judgment in them all; but at the same

a most noble monument at the entrance into Westminster-abbey, with an inscription suitable to his merits (g). His titles descended to his son Henry, Earl of Ogle, who was the last heir male of this family, and died July 26, 1691, in whom the title of Newcastle, in the line of Cavendish, extinguished. But his daughters married into some of the noblest families of this kingdom, as the reader will see at the bottom of this article [I].

same time it should be considered, that this was in a good measure owing to the humour of the age, and to her having lived so long abroad.

[I] Will see at the bottom of this article.] Henry Cavendish, Duke, Marquis, and Earl of Newcastle, &c. espoused Frances, eldest daughter to William Pierpoint of Thoresby in the county of Nottingham, second son to the Earl of Kingston, by whom he had one son, Henry, Earl of Ogle (32), who died in his father's life time, and five daughters, viz. Lady Elizabeth, married to Christopher Monk, Duke of

Albemarle; and secondly, to Ralph, Duke of Montagu; Lady Frances, married to John Campbell, then Lord Glenorchy, now Earl of Brodalbin; Lady Margaret, married to John Holles, Earl of Clare, afterwards Duke of Newcastle, by whom she left issue one sole daughter and heir, the Lady Henrietta Cavendish Holles, married to Edward, late Earl of Oxford; Lady Catharine, married to Thomas Tufton Earl of Thanet; Lady Arabella, youngest daughter, married to Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland (33). C A V E N D I S H (CHARLES) brother to William the third, and son to William the second, Earl of Devonshire. He was born at London May 20, 1620, and his Majesty being his godfather gave him the name of Charles (a). His genius being quick and lively; and at the same time very penetrating and solid, he was, according to the method established in this noble family, put into a strict and regular method of education; and when he was thoroughly seasoned with the principles of useful knowledge, he was sent abroad with a Governor about 1638, to polish the learning he had acquired at home, by seeing the world abroad (b). He went first to Paris, and that great city ringing at that time with the fame of the siege of Luxemburgh, which it was thought the French army might that place would make, the martial genius of our young traveller prompted him to steal thither, from whence his Governor, with some difficulty, brought him back to his studies in Paris (c). The next year he made the tour of Italy, when he visited and made some stay at Naples, Rome, and Venice, from which last city, in the spring of the next year, he embarked for Constantinople, leaving his Governor and English servants behind him. When he had satisfied his curiosity in viewing that famous capital of the Turkish empire, he made a journey by land through Natolia, and having seen whatever was worth seeing there, embarked for Alexandria, and travelled from thence to Grand Cairo. All the wonders of Egypt surveyed, he returned once more to Alexandria, took his passage in a ship bound for Malta, proceeded from thence by sea to Spain, then traversing part of that kingdom and of France, returned safely to Paris, and after some short stay there, came back to England in May 1641 (d). He appeared at Court with the greatest advantages possible; he had a fine person, a sprightly wit; a deep judgment, a generous spirit, a disinterested loyalty, and a nice sense of honour. These shining qualities made him equally the favourite of the King and Queen, and the darling of the people. He had a strong passion for arms, and his mother, the Countess Dowager of Devonshire, willing to gratify him, had thoughts of purchasing Lord Goring's regiment of foot, then in the Dutch service, and to qualify him for this command, he made the campaign that summer in the Prince of Orange's army, from whence he returned in the month of November (e). Upon his coming back, he found there was no necessity of seeking employment for his martial talents in strange climates, the hard necessity of the times having unhappily naturalized them to his own. He repaired to York, and offered his service to the King, in whose own troop he rode, under the command of Lord Bernard Stuart, brother to the Duke of Richmond, and a kinsman of his own, in which situation we find him, Octob. 23, 1642, at the battle of Edge-Hill. It was of this troop, and upon that occasion, that his Majesty said, That the fortunes of those who composed it, would buy the estates of the Lord Essex, and of all the officers in his army (f). So little it seems of property there was amongst those who made so much noise about it. In this battle Mr Cavendish so much distinguished himself, that the Lord Aubigny, who commanded the Duke of York's troop, being killed in the action, he was preferred to that post as the reward of his service (g). He did not continue long in that station, but laid hold of the first opportunity to convert his troop into a regiment for the King's service, and this brought him into the North, and under the command of his cousin the Marquis of Newcastle [A]. [A] Of his cousin the Marquis of Newcastle.] The best account we have of this matter occurs in the work of one of the Historians of this noble family, and therefore it will be proper to give it in the author's own words (1). 'This troop was soon after put into the Prince of Wales's regiment, wherein the superior officer put something on Captain Cavendish, which he thought an indignity, and therefore he desired his Majesty to assign him one thousand pounds (which his own brother the Earl of Devonshire had presented to the King) promising, that if his Majesty would be pleased to let him have the Duke of York's troop out of the Prince of Wales's regiment, he would go into the North, and raise the Duke a compleat regiment of horse before the army could take the field; to which the King consented, assuring him the honour of being Colonel of his new regiment. In order to compleat it, he accepted of Thomas Markham, Esq; to be his Lieutenant-Colonel, and Mr Tuke for the Captain of his first troop, and took his headquarters at Newark, keeping under many of the rebel garrisons at Nottingham, and other neighbouring parts, and by degrees became master of the whole country; so that the King's Commissioners for Lincolnshire and Nottinghamshire desired his leave to petition the King, that he might have the command the world he prospered greatly, and being informed that the Parliament garrison at Grantham very much incommoded the adjacent country, he marched thither, attacked, reduced it, made prisoners three hundred and fifty men with their officers, and then demolished it (b). Other actions he performed of less importance, and being declared Lieutenant-General of the horse; was employed by the Marquis of Newcastle, to escort the Queen in her journey to Newark, which with great credit he performed. Her Majesty recollected him at first sight, told him very graciously that she saw him last in Holland, and was glad to meet him again in England, and the first night, when Major Tuke came for the word, her Majesty was pleased to give CAVENDISH (i). At Dunnington he had some advantage over the Parliament's forces, and was very active on that side; but that he marched with her Majesty to Oxford, as most writers say, is hard to believe, her Majesty, in her own letter, affirming directly the contrary, and that, at the request of the gentry in the country, much against his own will, she left him behind, with two thousand foot, and twenty troops of horse (k). Upon his having this command, and being informed that a great body of the enemy's troops were at Gainborough, which they had surprized, and had made themselves masters of the Earl of Kington's person, Lieutenant-General Cavendish immediately marched that way, and in their passage had rescued the Earl of Kington, if an unfortunate shot, hastily fired, had not most unluckily killed him, in the cabin of the vessel, in which they were carrying him down the Trent to Hull (l). This seemed to be an omen of the misfortunes that quickly followed, for on July 30, 1643, General Cavendish attacked a great body of the Parliament forces under Cromwell, and being over-powered, was forced to retreat, which the Lieutenant-General covered with a small body of reserve, and made a noble defence, 'till, by the superiority of numbers, and weight of the enemy's cavalry, they were forced into a bog, and there, after quitting his horse, and dangerously wounded, this gallant man lost his life, throwing his blood in the faces of his enemies, as despising and disdainng quarter at their hands (m), though, by some writers, this is differently reported [B]. His body was carried to Newark, where

mand of all the forces of their two counties in quality of Colonel-General; which he complied with, and the King granted.

[B] Tho' by some writers this is differently reported. We have several accounts of this gentleman's death so little corresponding with each other, that it requires an extraordinary degree of attention to find out the truth. In Heath's Chronicle, the story is told at large, in these words (2): 'Some of Lord Willoughby's forces at Gainborough, had surprized the Earl of Kington, father to the Marquis of Dorchester, and brought him thither, whence for better security of his person, which was of great concernment to the King's affairs thereabout, they resolved to send him to Hull. In the way thither, Colonel Cavendish, brother to the Earl of Devonshire, with a party pursued the pinnace to a shallow, which it could not pass, and demanded her and the Earl's surrender; which being refused, a drake was discharged, which unhappily killed the said Earl and one of his servants, being placed on purpose on the deck to deter the Royalists from shooting, whereupon they presently struck sail and yielded, but with a just revenge were all sacrificed to the ghost of that most loyal and noble Peer. Notice of this party and their design being given to the garrison, a sufficient number under Col. White, a Lincolnshire gentleman, were hastened to relieve the boat, or recover it, if taken; who accordingly encountered with the Royalists, and being too many for them, this valiant personage was forced to take the Trent with his horse, which swam him safe to the other side, but there stuck in the owze and mud; and as soon as the Colonel had got ashore off his horse's back, the enemy was come round by the ford, and seeing him desperately wounded, offered him quarter; which he magnanimously refusing, and throwing his blood he wiped off his face among them, was killed out right upon the place.' Much to the same purpose is the story told us by Lloyd (3), only heightened a little by his declamatory way of delivering himself upon all occasions. The Duchess of Newcastle has a very exact and very succinct relation of this unfortunate accident (4), which I mention the rather because it shews the credit due to the facts set down in those Memoirs, which are more accurately related than is commonly imagined. 'The forces, says she, which my Lord had in the county of Lincoln commanded by the then Lieutenant-General of the horse Mr Charles Cavendish, second brother to the then Earl of Devonshire, though they had timely notice and orders from my Lord to make their retreat to the Lieutenant-General of the army, and not to fight the enemy, yet the said Lieutenant-General of horse being transported by his courage (he being a person of great valour and conduct) and having charged the enemy, unfortunately lost the field, and himself was slain in the charge, his horse lighting in a bog. Which news being brought to my Lord when he was on his march, he made all the haste he could, and was no sooner joined with his Lieutenant-General, but he fell upon the enemy and put them to flight.' After all, Cromwell's own letter to the Committee of the associated counties at Cambridge, dated from Huntington, July 31, 1643, to which place he had been driven by Newcastle, gives the fullest account of this matter, and which deserves most credit as being written by an eye-witness. After having related the manner in which he collected a body of troops for the relief of Gainborough, his arrival there, and beating the van-guard of this body of horse, he proceeds in these words (5): 'I perceiving this body, which was a reserve, standing still unbroken, kept back my Major Whaley from the chase, and with my own troop and the other of my regiment, in all being three troops, we got into a body: in this reserve stood General Cavendish, who one while faced me, another while faced four of the Lincoln troops, which was all of ours that stood upon the place, the rest being engaged in the chase. At last, General Cavendish charged the Lincolnners, and routed them; immediately I fell on his rear with my three troops, which did so astonish him, that he gave over the chase, and would fain have delivered himself from me, but I pressing on forced them down a hill, having good execution of them, and below the hill drove the General with some of his soldiers into a quagmire, where my Captain-Lieutenant stew him with a thrust under his short ribs, the rest of the body was wholly routed, not one man staying upon the place.' Another writer (6) assures us, that it was Colonel Bury who murdered this brave young gentleman in cold blood after quarter given, and that he made himself dear to Cromwell by this and some other acts of cruelty. We are told by some writers, that among the valuable papers collected by Dr Moor, Bishop of Ely, there were several of this gentleman's, which showed him to have very deep skill in some parts of the Mathematicks (7). But I doubt, there is a mistake in this, and that these papers did not belong to him, but to Sir Charles Cavendish, the Duke of Newcastle's younger brother, of whom the noble Historian (8) gives this character; That he was a man of the noblest and largest mind, though the least and most inconvenient body that lived, and of whose great skill in the Mathematicks, we are able to produce the people expressed their tenderness and concern for him, by keeping it above ground for several days, 'till they could give some vent to their grief, after which it was interred, and, thirty years after, upon his mother's death, removed to Derby, and buried under the same tomb with her (11). It was very remarkable, that, though at so great a distance of time, the lamentations of the people at Newark broke out a-fresh, and the whole town was in tears upon the removing of his corps, as if he had been but just dead (12). But, after all, the noblest tribute paid to the memory of this great and gallant young man, is the epitaph, or rather elegiac verses, of the celebrated Mr Waller (13), which the reader, without doubt, will be well pleased to find in the notes [C], more especially, as it plainly shews, how much Cromwell valued himself upon delivering his party from the arms of this hero, who, after a life short in duration, but full of glory, slept thus in the bed of honour.

produce more testimonies than one (9), which makes it probable that these papers were his.

On the death of Colonel Charles Cavendish.

Here lies CHARLES CA'NDISH: let the marble stone,
That hides his ashes, make his virtues known.
Beauty, and valour, did his short life grace;
The grief, and glory, of his noble race!
Early abroad he did the world survey,
As if he knew he had not long to stay:
Saw what great ALEXANDER in the East,
And mighty JULIUS conquer'd in the West.
Then, with a mind as great as theirs, he came To find at home occasion for his fame:
Where dark confusion did the nation hide;
And where the juster, was the weaker side.
Two loyal brothers took their Sov'reign's part,
Employ'd their wealth, their courage, and their art:

The elder did whole regiments afford;
The younger brought his conduct and his sword.
Born to command, a leader he begun,
And on the rebels lasting honour won:
The horse instructed by their General's worth,
Still made the King victorious in the North:
Where CA'ENDISH fought, the Royalists prevail'd;
Neither his courage, nor his judgment, fail'd;
The current of his victories found no stop,
'Till CROMWELL came, his party's chiefest prop.
Equal success had set these champions high,
And both resolve to conquer or to die:
Virtue with rage, fury with valour strove;
But, that must fall which is decreed above!
CROMWELL, with odds of number, and of fate,
Remov'd this bulwark of the Church and State:
Which the sad issue of the war declar'd,
And made his task, to ruin both, less hard.
So, when the bank neglected is o'erthrown,
The boundless torrent does the country drown.
Thus fell the young, the lovely, and the brave;
Strew bays, and flowers, upon his honour'd grave!

CAVENDISH (WILLIAM) the first Duke of Devonshire, one of the ablest Statesmen, and most distinguished Patriots of his time. He was born January 25, 1640, and educated with all the care due to his high birth, and the great hopes excited by the pregnancy of his parts (a). When he was of a fit age to make the tour of Europe, he was sent abroad under the care of Dr Killegrew, who was afterwards Master of the Savoy, a gentleman perfectly skilled in polite literature, who gave his noble pupil a true relish of the classic writers, and contributed in other respects to form that fine taste, for which this nobleman became afterwards distinguished (b). His Lordship was one of the four Peers eldest sons, that bore up King Charles II's train at his coronation in 1661 (c), and the same year he was elected one of the Knights for the county of Derby, and continued a member of that which was called the Long Parliament 'till it was dissolved (d). Sept. 21, 1663, he was created Master of Arts in the university of Oxford, by the special command of the Chancellor (e). In 1665 he went a volunteer, and exposed his person extremely in his attendance upon the Duke, who commanded the British navy that year (f). In the spring of the year 1669, he accompanied his intimate friend Mr Mountague in his embassy to France, and being accidentally at the Opera at Paris, met with an adventure, which, though it endangered his life, gained him a very high reputation (g) [A]. In 1677 he distinguished himself in the House of Commons, by a vigorous opposition of the Court measures; and, the year following, was very instrumental in forwarding an enquiry into the Popish plot, and was also of the Committee appointed to draw up articles of impeachment (h) against the Lord High-Treasurer Danby. He was chosen Knight of the shire for the county of Derby, in the Parliament which met in the spring of the year 1679 (i), and, together with his inseparable friend Lord Ruffel, he was named of that caught upon an iron spike, and was grievously torn. The officers were by the King's orders sent to prison, where they remained, 'till by his Lordship's intercession they were discharged. Sir William Temple wrote him a very handsome letter upon this occasion, dated July 18, 1669 (2), from the Hague, in which he compliments him highly upon his courage, and tells him, that the Dutch thought a thing of this kind could happen no where but in France, or at least would have been suffered no where else without the rest of the company's interposing, which is a severe but just remark upon that nation.

[A] Gained him a very high reputation. This accident, we are told, happened thus (1): Three officers of the French King's guard came full of wine upon the stage, and one of them coming up to him with a very insulting question, his Lordship gave him a smart stroke on the face; upon which they all drew, and pushed at him very hard. Lord Cavendish setting his back against one of the scenes, defended himself very stoutly, notwithstanding he had received several wounds, 'till at length a sturdy Swiss, belonging to the Lord Ambassador Mountague, caught him up in his arms and threw him over into the pit. In his fall, his arm

Privy Council of whom the King gave this character, That they were men whose known abilities, interests, and esteem, in the nation, rendered them above all suspicion of mistaking or betraying the true interest of the kingdom (k). He acted in this high station with the same firmness as in Parliament, 'till finding his attendance ineffectual, in conjunction with the Lord Russell, Sir Henry Capel, and Mr Powle, he desired leave to withdraw (l). He was again elected Knight of the shire for Derby, in that Parliament, which, after many prorogations, met upon the 21st of October, 1680 (m), and distinguished himself therein, by a firm adherence to those measures which he thought most conducive to the welfare of the nation, and the safety of the Protestant religion (n). In that session, he carried up to the Lords an impeachment against the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, for his arbitrary and illegal proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench, and made two famous speeches on the subject of the Exclusion Bill, to which he was a hearty friend (o). He represented the same county for which he had been chosen in three former Parliaments, in that held at Oxford (p), and behaved there with the same steadiness and zeal; but as his Lordship well understood the nature of our excellent constitution, so he was as careful in avoiding whatever might injure it, by overstraining the privileges of Parliament, as watchful over the encroachments of prerogative, and therefore, though no man spoke more freely in the House of Commons than he did, yet never any Member was more careful in avoiding any harshness or indecency (q). He was not afraid of meeting and conversing with his noble friends, even after Parliaments were laid aside; but though he was a hearty promoter of legal opposition, he sincerely abhorred whatever tended to sedition or confusion; and therefore, when at one of these meetings a very bold overture was made, he roundly declared He would never go among them more, and kept his word (r). His friendship to Lord Russell induced him to appear as a witness for him at his trial, and the testimony he gave will do lasting honour to both their memories (s) [B]. When his noble friend was under sentence of death, he sent him a message by Sir James Forbes, that he would come and change clothes with him in prison, if he thought it practicable to make his escape (t), but that unfortunate Lord being too generous to accept the proposal, he waited upon and assisted him to the last, did all in his power to alleviate the grief of his disconsolate Lady, and, to give the highest proof of his respect for his family, married his eldest son to the daughter of his friend (u). The same generous disposition led him to send a challenge to Count Koningsmark, who, though strongly suspected of being concerned in the assassination of Mr Thynne, had been acquitted by a jury, but it seems that was a method of trial the Count thought fit to decline (w). In 1684, he became, by the decease of his father, Earl of Devonshire, and persevering in the same generous principles, an attempt was made, in the reign of King James, to fright him, by giving out that one positive witness was to be found, who would charge him with rebellious practices, but he put a stop to this scheme by desiring to confront him (x). The Court however gained one advantage over him by a prosecution in the Court of King's-Bench, for striking a gentleman in the verge of the Court, for which he was fined thirty thousand pounds (y) [C]. It is no wonder, that after such treatment as this, he chose to retire into the country, and that he might find some employment there worthy of his active and excellent genius, he pulled down the south side of his house at Chatsworth, and rebuilt it with a front to his gardens, in so just, so regular, and noble a taste, that it looked like a model of what might be done in after ages (z). But

[B] Will do lasting honour to both their memories.

It appears from the trial, that Lord Russell thought proper in his defence to call some persons of Quality, with whom he had been well acquainted and conversed much, that they might speak from their knowledge of his former behaviour, whether they could think him guilty of a thing of the nature he was charged with. The answer given by the Lord Cavendish, was conceived in these words (3); 'I had the honour to be acquainted with my Lord Russell a long time. I always thought him a man of great honour, and too prudent and wary a man to be concerned in so vile and desperate a design as this, and from which he would receive so little advantage. I can say nothing more, but that two or three days since the discovery of this plot, upon discourse about Colonel Rumsey, my Lord Russell did express something as if he had a very ill opinion of the man, and therefore, it is not likely he would entrust him with such a secret.'

[C] For which he was fined thirty thousand pounds.

It seems, that the Earl of Devonshire having received an affront from Colonel Culpepper, within the verge of the Court, so far restrained his resentment, as not to take any satisfaction upon the spot; and afterwards thought fit, tho' the insult was very rude, to compromise it upon the Colonel's promise never to appear again at White-hall (4). But after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, the Colonel was encouraged to slight the obligation he was under, and to come publicly to Court as usual, where he was rising into some degree of favour. This occasioned a second quarrel, for the Earl of Devonshire meeting him in the King's presence-chamber, and receiving from him as he thought an insulting look, he took him by the nose, led him out of the room, and gave him some disdainful blows with the head of his cane. For this bold act, the Earl was prosecuted in the King's-Bench upon an information, and had an exorbitant fine of 30,000*l.* imposed upon him, and was committed, tho' a Peer, to the King's-Bench prison, 'till he should make payment of it. He was never able to bear any confinement that he could break from, and therefore, he escaped only to go home to his seat at Chatsworth. Upon the news of his being there, the Sheriff of Derbyshire had a precept to apprehend him and bring him with his posse to town. But he invited the Sheriff, and kept him a prisoner of honour, 'till he had compounded for his own liberty, by giving bond to pay the full sum of thirty thousand pounds; which bond had this providential discharge, that it was found among the papers of King James, and given up by King William; we are told, that the Countess Dowager, his mother, being uneasy to see him under so great a hardship, waited on the King to beg her son's pardon; and for discharge of the fine, did humbly desire, that his Majesty would accept of her delivering up bonds, and other acknowledgments for above 60,000*l.* lent by her husband and his mother to his Royal father and brother, in their greatest extremities. But it seems, the Popish party then thought, the Earl had forfeited all title to gratitude and equity (5).

(5) This judgment was afterwards declared illegal by the House of Lords, as the reader is told in the text.

But neither the hazards he had run, the disappointments he had met with, or the pleasures of his retirement, could hinder him from contriving in his mind such methods as seemed to him practicable, for the relief of his country; and therefore, with infinite danger to himself, he ventured to concert, with some noble friends, a plan for their common deliverance (a) [D]. When the Prince of Orange landed, he was one of the first who declared for him, secured the county town of Derby, and from thence marched to Nottingham, where he had the honour of receiving the Princess Anne, whom he lodged in the Castle, from which it's noble owner, Henry Duke of Newcastle, thought fit at that time to retire, and afterwards conducted her to Oxford, to her consort Prince George of Denmark (b). He then came up to London, and was one of that assembly of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who joined in an address to the Prince of Orange to take upon him the administration, 'till the Convention then summoned should meet (c). In the Convention also, he was very active, argued strenuously in support of the resolution of the House of Commons, that King James had abdicated, and that the throne was vacant; which being once carried, he found himself at the head of a great majority, on the final resolution, that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen of England (d). As the just reward of these his arduous and important services, he was on the 14th of February following, sworn of the Privy-Council; and not long after, named Lord Steward of their Majesties Household (e); and on April 3, 1689, he was chosen one of the Knight's companions of the most noble Order of the Garter; and was installed on the 14th of May following, with great solemnity (f). At their Majesties coronation, he acted as Lord High-Steward of England (g); and in the first session of Parliament afterwards, procured a resolution of the House of Lords, as to the illegality of the judgment given against him in the former reign, and a vote, that no Peer ought to be committed for non-payment of a fine to the Crown (h). Neither was he less solicitous to procure redress, as far as was possible, for others, who had been injured in the course of that and the former reign, and even in favour of the representatives of such as were deceased (i). In January 1691, he attended King William to the Congress at the Hague, where he lived in the utmost state and magnificence, and had the honour to entertain several sovereign Princes at his table, the King himself being present incognito; after which he waited upon the King to the camp, and having been present at the siege of Mons, returned to England with his Majesty in April following (k). On the 12th of May 1694, he was created Marquis of Hartington and Duke of Devonshire; and in the preamble of his Patent, the highest justice was done to his patriotism in the late reigns, and to his services in this (l). Indeed, higher honours could hardly be done, or greater rewards conferred upon a subject, for besides his Garter and White Staff, he was intrusted with the county of Derby as Lord Lieutenant; and Custos Rotulorum, and was constituted also Lord Justice in Eyre (m). He showed his gratitude to, and affection for that excellent Princess Queen Mary, by writing a pindaric poem on her death, which, in the judgment of Mr Dryden, was the best that appeared upon that melancholy subject (n). The decease of the Queen making it necessary for his Majesty to appoint Lords Justices at such times as the affairs of Europe required his presence on the Continent, his Grace had the signal honour of being the only temporal Peer that was in every one of these commissions (o). But notwithstanding all these honours and preferences, his Grace's conduct in Parliament was never governed by other dictates than those of his conscience, as appeared eminently in the case of Sir John Fenwick (p), and of the bill for the resumption of the forfeited estates in Ireland; and in the latter, he not only voted but spoke against it, with his usual freedom and eloquence (q). At the funeral of King William, his Grace and the present Duke of Somerset, supported Prince George of Denmark, as chief mourner (r). He was confirmed in all his offices by Queen Anne (s), whom he dutifully served; and was, on the other hand, treated by her Majesty with all imaginable marks of esteem and confidence. In April 1705, he attended her Majesty to Cambridge,

[D] A plan for their common deliverance. We are told by the Historians of this family, that this noble Earl concerted measures with the Earl of Danby, Sir Scroop How, and others, previous to the Revolution (6). A very late author, whose account, I presume is taken from the tradition in that part of the country, gives us the following account (7); 'At Whittington, says he, a village on the edge of Scarfale in Derbyshire, the Earls of Devonshire and Danby, with the Lord Delamere, privately concerted the plan of the Revolution. The house in which they met, is at present a farm-house, and the country people distinguished the room where they sat, by the name of the plotting-parlour.' We have a larger and more authentick account of this whole transaction from a most noble pen: I mean, that of the late Duke of Leeds, who at the time of this transaction was Earl of Danby, and who in a book, which he published to justify his own character, and to shew, that the best men who were concerned in the prosecution against him under the reign of King Charles II, afterwards changed their sentiments, has this passage, in relation to the noble person, who is the subject of this article (8), viz. The Duke of Devonshire also, when we were partners in the secret trait about the Revolution, and who did meet me and Mr John D'Arcy for that purpose, at a town called Whittington in Derbyshire, did, in the presence of the said Mr D'Arcy, make a voluntary acknowledgment of the great mistakes he had been led into about me, and said, that both he and most others were entirely convinced of their error. And he came to Sir Henry Goodrick's house in Yorkshire, purposely to meet me there again, in order to concert the times and methods by which he should act at Nottingham (which was to be his post), and I at York (which was to be mine); and we agreed, that I should first attempt to surprize York, because there was a small garrison with a Governor there, whereas Nottingham was but an open town, and might give alarm to York, if he should appear in arms before I had made my attempt upon York: which was done accordingly, but is mistaken in divers relations of it.

Cambridge, and was there created Doctor in Law (t). In 1706, himself and his son, the Marquis of Hartington were in the number of the English Peers, appointed Commissioners for treating and concluding a union between the kingdoms of England and Scotland (u). This was the last of his publick employments, for being seized with a severe illness, which yielded not to the art of the best Physicians, he departed this life, August 18, 1707, about nine in the morning at Devonshire-house in Piccadilly in the sixty-seventh year of his age (w). His Grace's character is too well known, and has been drawn by pens too eminent for us to hope to give any addition, either to the lustre or the extent of his fame. He was a Nobleman no less distinguished by his virtues than by his titles, and which also derives honour to his memory, by the solidity of his abilities, and the brilliancy of his parts. He was not only a Statesman and a Patriot, but a Poet too, and, which is more, an excellent Poet, as his writings shew [E]. He was a critick also, and so good a one, that Lord Roscommon, whose verses will live as long as our language, submitted them to the revision of this severe, but candid judge (x). He was only once married, which was to the Lady Mary, daughter of James, Duke of Ormond (y), and their issue, will be seen in the notes [F]. His corps was interred with his ancestors in the Church of Allhallows in Derby, and his Duchess surviving him 'till the 31st of July 1710, deceased then in the sixty-eighth year of her age; and on the 6th of August following, was interred in Westminster-Abbey (z). Thus we have collected, digested, and transmitted to posterity, the memoirs of some of the most eminent and celebrated persons of this truly noble and illustrious family, and this, with such regard to their descents, as might preserve, as near as possible, the natural and chronological order of reading, and at the same time, leave as little of deficiency or obscurity as the necessity of keeping within reasonable bounds would permit, that there were many more of this line which deserved to be remembered, we very well knew; but, as on the one hand, the nature of our design restrained us from mentioning any but the most distinguished; we were conscious, on the other, that the titles with which the merits of the house of Cavendish have been justly honoured by our Princes, have secured some memorials of their actions and fortunes, so that there is no danger, oblivion should ever overspread their memories, or hide from succeeding ages the glories of a house peculiarly remarkable for producing great men in almost every sense of the word, and those too, as good as they were great.

[E] As his writings shew.] It is a very difficult matter to describe, and that within the narrow compass of a note, the great abilities of this Nobleman, who was the friend and companion, and at the same time the equal, of Ormond, Dorset, Roscommon, and all the noble ornaments of that reign of wit, in which he passed his youth. It is however to his honour extremely, that he preserved his publick principles from being either tinged with slavish submission or an enthusiastic fondness, for that sort of anarchy, which some call liberty. His frequent discourse was to commend the constitution and laws of this kingdom, and to affirm, That as he always had, so he ever would endeavour to defend and preserve them. He seemed to be made for a Patriot: his mien and aspect were engaging and commanding: his address and conversation were civil and courteous in the highest manner. He judged right in the Supreme Court, and on any important affair, his speeches were smooth and weighty. As a Statesman, his whole deportment came up to his noble birth and his eminent stations: nor did he want any of what the world calls accomplishments. He had great skill in languages, was a true judge in History, a critick in Poetry, and had a fine hand in Music. He had an elegant taste in Painting, and all politer arts, with a spirit that was continually improving his judgment in them; and in Architecture had a genius, skill, and experience, beyond any one person of his age, his house at Chatworth being a monument of beauty and magnificence, that perhaps is not exceeded by any palace in Europe. *It was of this fine house, that Marshal Tallard, who was a more successful courtier than he was a General, is reported to have said a very fine thing after being invited thither by the noble owner. His compliment at his departure, was conceived in these terms; My Lord, when I come hereafter to compute the time of my captivity in England, I shall leave out the days of my enjoyment at Chatworth (9). His Grace's genius for Poetry shewed itself, particularly in two pieces that are published, and are allowed by the criticks to be written with equal spirit, dignity, and delicacy.

II. An Allusion to the Bishop of Cambray's Supplement to Homer.

he ordered to be placed on his monument, as it is an equal testimony of both,

William, late Duke of Devonshire, was a Nobleman of unblemished character and unspotted integrity, enjoyed under the reigns in which he lived the highest employments, with the fairest reputation, and died June 4, 1729 (11). He married the Lady Rachael Russel, daughter of William Lord Russel, and sister to the Duke of Bedford, by whom he had issue. 1. William, now Duke of Devonshire. 2. Lord James Cavendish. 3. CAWTON (THOMAS) a very learned Minister among the Nonconformists in the XVIIth Century. He was the son of the Reverend Mr Thomas Cawton, a worthy and truly religious Puritan, who was banished for his loyalty (a) [A]. As for our author, he was born at Wivenhoe, near Colchester, in Essex, about the year 1637, his father being then Minister of the place. The first rudiments of learning he received from his father, whom he attended in his banishment, and lived with him several years in Holland, where he studied the Oriental languages under Mr Robert Sheringham at Rotterdam with equal diligence and success (b). About the year 1656, he was sent to the University of Utrecht, where he distinguished himself by his extraordinary skill in the Oriental languages, in such a manner as did honour to his country (c). On the 14th of December, 1657, he maintained a Thesis in relation to the Syriac Version of the New Testament, and printed his discourse, as he did some time after another dissertation on the usefulness of the Hebrew language in the study of Theoretick Philosophy, which treatises sufficiently shew both the extent of his learning and the solidity of his judgment (d) [B]. When he left Utrecht,

(d) These treatises were both printed in Latin at Utrecht, in 4to. 1657.

[A] Banished for his loyalty. Mr Thomas Cawton, senior, was Minister of St Bartholomew's behind the Royal Exchange, and had an exceeding fair character in the city. This occasioned his being called to preach before the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London at Mercers-Chapel, Febr. 25, 1648, when he delivered himself in such plain terms against the canting hypocrisy of their governors, that he was first sent for to Westminster, and then committed to the Gatehouse (1). This served only to raise his character among the loyal Presbyterians, who, when King Charles II. had thoughts of entering England and asserting his right, intrusted him, with Mr Christopher Love, and some other worthy persons, with the money raised by them for his Majesty's service, for which, when Mr Love was imprisoned, and afterwards executed, Mr Cawton betook himself to a voluntary exile, and retiring to Rotterdam, became Minister of the English Church there, spending the remainder of his days in peace and honour (2). His son took care to preserve a just account of his merits and sufferings, by writing his life as is mentioned in the text, the title of it ran thus, The Life and Death of that Holy and Reverend Man of God, Mr Thomas Cawton, some time Minister of St Bartholomew, &c. to which is added, his Father's Sermon, intitled, God's Rule for a godly Life, from Philippians iv. 27. which is the sermon for the preaching of which he was imprisoned, London 1662, 8vo.

[B] Solidity of his judgment. The title of the first of these pieces, runs thus, Disputatio de Versione Syriaca Vet. & Novi Testamenti, Ato. 1657. i. e. A Discourse on the Syriac Version of the Old and New Testament. It is in some measure a reproach on our nation; that while many of our countrymen are admired for their parts abroad, their names are scarce known at home; and for this reason it seems necessary to give some account of this learned Tract, which it does not appear any of our Biographers have ever seen. Our author speaks, first of the Syriac Version of the Old Testament (3); and in respect to this he observes, there may be four questions moved, I. Whence this Syriac Version was made? in answer to which he tells us, that there were anciently two, one from the Septuagint, and the other from the original Hebrew; but that the latter only was in use among the Maronites, Nestorians, and Jacobites, of which the famous Primate Usher obtained a copy from the Patriarch of Antioch, which is printed in the English Polyglot. II. Who composed this Version? Mr Cawton shews, that this is absolutely uncertain. III. When were either of these Syriac Versions made? He says, the Maronites pretend, that it was made from the Hebrew under the reigns of Solomon and Hiram; but this he observes is carrying the thing too high, though, from various authorities, he is convinced it is a very ancient Version, and inclines to fix it about the time of the Apostles. IV. Whether the Syriac Version of the Old Testament be of any moment? He answers in the affirmative, and gives his reasons, shewing also abundance of places wherein it varies from the Hebrew original. He comes next to the Syriac Version of the New Testament, as to which he says, there may be five questions moved. I. By whom and when was this Version made? in answer to which he cites the Preface of Jacobus Martinus, in which it is asserted, that this is the oldest of all Versions, and that it was either made by one of the Apostles themselves, or by some of their Disciples with their assistance. Our author does not however seem to give entire credit to this, and much less to what has been reported on the credit of William Postell, that it was made by St Mark the Evangelist, which notion he refutes by very solid reasons. He mentions last of all, the sentiments of Dr Rainolds, who thought it might be made about the IIIrd or IVth Century, and seems inclined to place it higher, chiefly for this reason, that in most of the copies of the Syriac Version, there are wanting the second Epistle of St Peter, the second and third Epistles of St John, the Epistle of St Jude, and the Revelation, which argue it to have been made before those Scriptures were generally received by the Church. II. By whom this Version has been published? He acquaints us, that it has gone through many editions; in some of which, for want of Syriac, they have been forced to make use of Hebrew types. It was thus printed by Christopher Plantin at Antwerp in 1575, but without vowels: In like manner by Elias Hutter at Noremberg, in his Bible of twelve Languages 1599, but there, though printed in Hebrew characters it is pointed. Since these editions it has been published in the Syriac character, particularly in the English Polyglot. In most of these editions, the story of the adulteress in the eighth Chapter of St John, is wanting, as well as the several pieces beforementioned, but in the edition of Hutter and the English Polyglot they are found. In many, there are no points at all; in some, they are marked only here and there; but in Hutter and the English Polyglot, they are marked throughout. But of all the editions, that published by Gubirius, Professor of Divinity at Hamburg, which was printed in a pocket volume 1663, is the best. III. Whether the Syriac Version is of any moment, or has any utility? He answers in the affirmative, and for this very good reason, that Syriac being the language in which our blessed Saviour and the Apostles spoke, their thoughts appear more clearly therein, than in any other; so that texts, which are very obscure in the Greek, become plain and easy when we consult the Syriac Version. Of this he gives several instances, particularly, 1 Cor. x. 2. And were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea, where the sense is far from being clear, in the Syriac it is, by the hand of Moses, which is perfectly plain. He farther adds, that many words in the New Testament are absolutely Syriac, tho' written in Greek characters, such as Raka, Aeldama, Abba, so that without the knowledge of this tongue it is impossible to apprehend perfectly the force and energy of the Divine Writings. IV. By what name is this language called in the New Testament, and where is it now the vulgar tongue? This language, says he, is called the Aramite, from Aram the ancient name of the country in which it was spoken, as it is Syrian from Syria the more modern. In the New Testament it is frequently called the Hebrew, because Syriac was a dialect of the Hebrew; at present, the Syriac is scarce any where the mother-tongue, except in a few villages about Mount Libanus, but throughout all Asia and Africk it passes for the learned language among the Christians. V. Which was the first translation of this Syriac Version into Latin? He tells us in answer to this, that Henry Stephens printed in 1569, the Latin Version of Tremellius; that about two years afterwards, there appeared another Latin Version by Boderianus. But some dispute has arisen, whether one of these translations was not stolen from the other. The second piece published by our author is intitled, Dissertatio de Usu Linguae Hebraicae in Philosophia Theoretica, printed at Utrecht in 1657.

the famous Professor Leusden subscribed an ample testimonial in his favour, wherein he expresses a great regard for his person, as well as a just sense of his parts (c) [C]. On his return to England he went to Oxford, and was entered there of Merton-College for the sake of Mr Samuel Clark, famous for his thorough knowledge of the Oriental languages (f). Our author shewed his loyalty by writing a copy of Hebrew verses on his Majesty's Restauration, having been pretty early in the year 1660 (g), admitted to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, at which time Professor Leusden's Certificate was read publicly (b). In 1661, he was ordained by the Bishop of Oxford (i); and in 1662, he published the Life of his Father (k). In all probability, he might have obtained very considerable preferment, if his principles had not led him to Nonconformity. When he retired from the University, he was taken into the family of Sir Anthony Irbys of Lincolnshire, where he officiated for some years as Chaplain; but the air of that country disagreeing with him, and the family going down thither on account of the plague in 1665 (l), he was obliged to quit it, and lived afterwards with the Lady Armin till about the year 1670, when he gathered a congregation of Dissenters in the city of Westminster, to whom he preached, with some interruption from the severities of the government, for about seven years, till falling into a bad state of health, he died of a gradual decay, April 10, 1677 (m), being then about forty years of age. He was buried in the New Church in Torchil-streer, Westminster, at which time his friend and Fellow-collegian, Mr Henry Hurst, preached his funeral sermon, as did also Mr Nath. Vincent in another place (n). He was a man, who, as his learning rendered him admired, so his virtues made him beloved by all parties. Anthony Wood speaking of the praises bestowed upon him by Mr Hurst in his discourse, gives them also his sanction, they were, says he, deservedly spoken (o). His congregation followed the advice he gave them on his death-bed, for he told them, that he knew none so proper to be his successor, as a certain Northamptonshire Minister, who wrote against Dr Sherlock. This was Mr Vincent Alfop, whom they accordingly chose (p).

This dissertation on the use of the Hebrew language in the study of Philosophy, is likewise a very curious piece, but as it is written upon a more abstruse subject, and as this note is already of an extraordinary length, we forbear entering more particularly into its contents.

[C] As well as a just sense of his parts.—In this certificate he observes, that Mr Cawton had with infinite labour studied and acquired a perfect knowledge of the principal languages of the East, that he had established a deserved reputation by publishing the treatises beforementioned, and that he was in all respects a person of quick wit, piercing judgment, and deep erudition; but it may not be amiss to cite part of the certificate (4). 'Totum vetus Testamentum Hebraicum partim punctatum, partim non punctatum perlegit & explicit — Regulas Grammaticæ & Syntacticæ Hebraicæ optime perdidicit. Deinde in Lingua Chaldaica Danielis & Paraphrasibus Chaldaicis, in lingua Syriacâ Novi Test. & in Lingua Arabica, & Commentariis Rabbiorum strenuè se exercuit. Denique quæstiones Philologico-Hebraicas circa vetus Test. Hebræum moveri solitas, ita perdidicit, ut summo cum honore duas disputationes philologicas publicè defenderit, priorem de Versione Syriacæ veteris & novi Test. posteriorem vero, de Usu Linguae Hebraicæ in Philosophia Theoretica, illius fuit Respondens, hujus vero Author & Respondens. Certe in Disputatione hac componenda, & in eisdem strenua Defensione, ingenium & eruditionem suam omnibus palam fecit, &c. 18 Maii 1659, Joh. Leusden.'—In all probability, our author would have afforded his country more conspicuous marks of his skill in these matters, if the taste for that kind of learning had not begun to decay, and his own troubles for Nonconformity come on. All that he afterwards published, was a sermon bearing the title of BALAAM'S WISH, or the Vanity of desiring, without endeavouring, to obtain the Death of the Upright. London, 1670, 8vo. and again, in 1675 (5). This is a very grave, solid, and judicious discourse, and is at once a proof of the deep learning and sincere piety of its author. I have seen a letter written by one Mr Bruce, who studied at Utrecht, to a relation of his in Scotland, which is dated in June 1682, in which speaking of his countrymen and other British subjects that had studied in that university, he gives a very high character to our author in the following words; 'Besides the late Dr Nicholas Shepherd, who was Minister of the English Church at Middleburgh, Mr Thomas Cawton, who died but a few years ago, and was a man very eminent among the Nonconformists, laid the foundation of his great knowledge in the Oriental languages here, and it is wonderful how fresh the memory of his proficiency in those studies remains in this place. The Professor has a particular regard for those of our nation, and takes a great pleasure in speaking of such of them as have been under his care, but I never heard him mention any with greater respect than this gentleman, who was not only eminent for his knowledge in the Hebrew, but in the Syriac also, and other Eastern tongues, and wrote a treatise to show the usefulness of this kind of learning, not in Divinity only, but in the study also of Philosophy, in which he was a very great Master. That Tract of his is become very scarce, so that it was with some difficulty that I procured it, and I am afraid I shall meet with many such obstacles in my design of making a collection of all the pieces of that kind that have been printed in this country by the natives of Great Britain; and which according to the computation I have been able to make, will not fall very far short of three score. I doubt, whether any encouragement could be had for reprinting them, which might be done in three volumes in quarto; but if I am able to compleat such a collection, I think it would be an acceptable present to one of our universities, and with this view I shall take some pains both here and at Leyden, and shall endeavour to procure the characters of the principal persons at least, from the several Professors who were acquainted with them, and are still living, &c.'

CAXTON (WILLIAM) the first who introduced, practised, and communicated, the most useful and instructive art or mystery of Printing, in England. He was born about the latter end of King Henry the IVth's reign, who died in the year 1412, and, as himself acquaints us, in the Weald, or woody part of Kent (a); therefore not in the town that bears his name in Cambridgeshire, as Dr Fuller was misled to believe (b). His father, Mr William Caxton, who resided with him at Westminster when he was in the height of his business there, must have lived to a good old age, according to the memorial we have of his death (c). Whether Matilda Caxton, who founded a chantry in Walbrook ward in the city of London, and had a monument in St Swithin's church there after the repair of it in 1420, was any relation of his, my author does not intimate (d). The custom which had long prevailed of imposing that badge of Norman slavery, the French language, upon our children at the grammar-schools, as is very particularly observed by Ranulphus Higden, and John de Trevisa [A], being, in the younger years of Caxton, much worn off, and the neglect of it accounted no deficiency in education; he was, by the care of his prudent mother, so well instructed and qualified at home in reading and writing (e), as served his occasions very commendably, when he was put out to a genteel trade. But afterwards, by his diligent application, he arrived to a considerable proficiency, not only in writing, after a very clear, free, and dexterous manner, that strong hand which was then in most request, as may be seen in some copies of his books to this day, but in attaining both a competent knowledge of the Latin tongue, and to a good perfection in the French, when he was preferred to a considerable charge abroad by his Prince, and to very honourable patronage, in the latter part of that long course of time he continued there. He might be about the age of fifteen or sixteen, when he was put apprentice to Mr Robert Large, a Mercer of such eminence in London, that he was elected one of the Sheriffs in the year 1430, and, nine years after, Lord Mayor of this city (f). The said Magistrate held his mayoralty in that which had been the mansion-house of Robert Fitzwalter, anciently called the Jew's Synagogue, at the north-corner of the Old Jewry, which was in the place where now, says my author, stands the Grocers-Hall; and here Caxton appears to have resided with his said master till his death, which happened on the twenty-fourth of April 1441, as by the Latin inscription that was cut on the brazen-plated stone in the south isle of the parish-church of St Olave Jewry appears; to the reparation of which church he gave two hundred pounds (g), and in his last will he bequeathed also to this his said servant, thirty-four marks; a considerable legacy in those times, and a creditable, as well as early testimony, of Master Caxton's good behaviour and great integrity (h). He mentions himself afterwards, how much he was obliged to the city, and that company, of which he was a sworn freeman; and a man of such reputable character he now was; of such probity, abilities, and expertness in his business, that when he went to settle abroad, in the same year his master died, as he also informs us himself (i), 'tis agreed on, by those writers who have best acquainted themselves with his story, that he was deputed and entrusted by the Mercers company, to be their Agent or Factor in Holland, Zealand, Flanders, &c. to establish and enlarge their correspondence, negotiate the consumption of our own, and importation of foreign manufactures, and otherwise promote the advantage of the said corporation, in their respective merchandize, &c. (k). It seems that he spent about twenty-three years in those countries, upon this, and such like employments, before we can hear of him again; but he had then acquired such an eminent character for his knowledge and experience, his diligence and fidelity therein, that we see him joined with Richard Whetehill, Esq; in a very honourable commission, granted to them by King Edward IV, in the year 1464, to continue and confirm the Treaty of Trade and Commerce, between his Majesty and Philip Duke of Burgundy; or, if they found it necessary, to make a new one; and it also gives both, or either of them, full power to transact and conclude the same. They are stiled Ambassadors and Special Deputies, &c. in the said commission; as, for the satisfaction of the curious, may appear in the transcript annexed [B]. There were afterwards, several other treaties between these two powers, for the communication communication of their merchandize, fishery, &c. in which, other Ambassadors or Agents were after the like manner employed (l); and these, with other views of mutual advantage, produced a near alliance between them in the marriage of King Edward's sister, the Lady Margaret of York, with the Duke's son Charles, in July 1468, he being then Duke of Burgundy, &c. (m). When this Lady Margaret arrived at the Duke's Court at Bruges, she was very magnificently attended, and Master Caxton appears then to have been of her retinue. He was either now one of her household, or held some constant post or office under her; because, as he says, he received of her yearly fee or salary, besides many other good and great benefits (n); which also demonstrates that he was very serviceable to her, or much in her favour. Being a man expert in penmanship and languages, as well as matters of commerce; and by his long conversation abroad with ingenious men, also in matters of literature; which were now grown the fashionable discourse of those parts more than ever, thro' the surprizing communication thereof by the new invention of Printing, of which Caxton must have heard the progress, from it's very birth, it is highly probable that he was employed by the Duchess in some literary way; which indeed soon appeared, by her encouraging him in the practice of the said new invention. It is evident he had partly attained this mystery of Printing, and, as he says himself, with great expence (o) before he was thus apparently established in her service, because he no sooner appears in it, but we see him employed by her, in translating out of French, a large volume, and then in printing it himself, as we shall presently more particularly specify. Yet 'tis not likely that his first essay in this art should be upon a book of that bulk, which now appears to be the first he printed; nor even another, which he is well attested to have also printed in Latin abroad, though, as it seems, before the other, because this is rather more voluminous than that. However, as this, which is named Bartholomeus, de Proprietatibus Rerum, may possibly have been his earliest performance of the two, we shall here first speak more largely of it. The said Latin edition of this book, which Caxton is affirmed to have been concerned in at the press, seems to have been, either that fair one, in which there is no mention made by whom, where, or when, it was printed; or another that was printed at Cologne in the year 1470 [C]. And his engagement upon this larger work, might be the reason, that

[C] Either that fair one — or another that was printed at Cologne in the year 1470.] Of these two books, the late Mr John Lewis gives us the following account: — 'In the library of Bennet College in Cambridge, is an edition of this book in Latin, in a large folio. It is an exceeding fair book; the types are very ancient, but well cut; and it is printed without any signatures, date, or name of the place or Printer (5). Of the other Latin edition, he says: 'We have an account, that it was printed at Cologne, in the year 1470, by John Koelhof: and, as this might be while Mr Caxton was at Cologne, learning and practising the Art of Printing, he might possibly be assisting in printing this book, or in the expence of it; and so be remembered by De Worde as the Printer (6). This authority for Caxton's being the Printer of a Latin edition of that book, being so good, it deserves to be a little more amply considered; for this was Wynkin de Worde, whom Caxton probably knew at this time there, and whom he either brought with him into England, or sent for him when he was settled here; the same who wrought under him 'till he died, and succeeded him with great reputation in his business, for above forty years, before he died himself. This Printer, who, by his long practice, greatly advanced and improved the Art among us, perceiving that author, whose name was Bartholomew Glanvill, a Franciscan Friar (descended of the Earl of Suffolk's family) who flourished about the year 1360 (7), was well accepted of abroad, (inasmuch that there was another Latin edition of him published under the same Koelhof's name, who styles himself de Lubeck, Colonia Civem, folio 1481) thought that a translation of him would be no less acceptable to us; seeing the work was a Natural History, of such variety; gathered mostly from the Ancients, and some Moderns, who lived nearer the author's own time; explaining more especially the nature and properties of Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Stones, &c. that are mentioned in Scripture; and there being such an English translation made, by John de Trevisa beforementioned, in the year 1398, at the command of his Patron, Thomas Lord Berkeley, which might be recommended to Caxton in his life-time; it was printed, tho' the edition is not dated, soon after his death, by Wynkin de Worde, at the prayer and desire of Roger Thorney, Mercer; as De Worde informs us, in his poetical Proem to the said work; wherein, having said, there is no pleasure comparable to the reading and understanding of wise books, with respect more especially to those persons who, for the propagation of knowledge and virtue, delight in the making, reviving, or otherwise exhibiting them to the world, he proceeds in these words, though he began the other at the command of Lady Margaret, not very long after she arrived at Bruges, he did not finish it in three years, but laid it by, being a little discouraged at some difficulties or fatigues in it (p), and 'till he had inured himself, probably upon some other work, the better to accomplish this; but then being, by his said patroness, prompted to bring it to a conclusion, he stuck painfully to it, 'till he brought it forth under the title of The Recuyell of the Historys of Troye, &c. which is the first book, at least in being, or which we now know of, that was ever printed in the English tongue [D]. In the year last mentioned,

From which it is reasonably enough inferred, that he had a hand in composing, at the press, one of those two former editions abovementioned; for the latter was printed when he was in England. There are three more lines that follow those, to make up the stanza, which are also so remarkable, that they must not be here omitted;

By which we are at once informed, that this English edition of Bartholomeus, printed by Wynkin de Worde, is the first book for any thing we yet know to the contrary, that was printed in England, upon paper that was made in England; and that John Tate the younger, first caused that paper to be made here, or was at the expence of introducing the art of that manufacture, so highly serviceable for the preservation of all kinds of literature, among us. The paper of this book is softer, smother, and thinner, than that of Caxton's books: it might be also a fairer or whiter paper, could we behold it without the disadvantage of age; nor is there to be seen in any of his, the same paper mark; which is, as I remember, in the midst of every other leaf, or half sheet, somewhat resembling a Catharine-wheel, or Star of eight Rays, enclosed in a double circle; which is different from the marks in any paper which Caxton printed on; therefore his might more probably be imported from Holland, and that in this book, may be the earliest specimen of English-made writing-paper now in being; tho' we had the use of such paper in England long before. The registers made of paper which Dean Prideaux mentions (10), as instances of its great antiquity, being but as old as King Edward III's reign, do not approach near to its primitive invention. For we certainly have Grants, Conveyances, and other Deeds and Evidences in England, or at least have had, and especially among the very ancient collections of Richard Gascoyne, Esq; that able Antiquary, who died about the time of the Restoration, written upon paper that was as old as the Conquest; and it is not improbable, but those Quaternions of leaves stitched together, whereof King Alfred so long before, made his little hand books (11), were also of paper, rather than parchment, or vellum; a book or tract no broader than a quarter of a sheet of paper, answering that description better, as being more contracted, pliable, and handy for use, than one as wide as a quarter of a skin of parchment, &c. We are told by one of the Antiquaries in Queen Elizabeth's reign, that the first Paper-Mill we had in England was erected at Ware in Hertfordshire, as I remember (12), but have forgot whether he mentions that John Tate the younger, was concerned therein; and in the same reign, we had a Poet who writ a pamphlet upon the same subject (13), with the setting forth of a Paper-Mill, built near Darthford, by a High German, called Mr Spilman, Jeweller to the Queen. It is written in verse, and tho' it might be forth-coming at Oxford in Anthony Wood's time; upon a late search, it was not to be found there. Who that John Tate the younger was, we cannot be positive; but in the list of our Lord Mayors of London, we find Sir John Tate, Mercer, son of John Tate, to have been elected, anno 1473. And John Tate, called the younger, son of Thomas Tate of Coventry, also elected in 1496, being eight years after his brother Sir Robert Tate, Mercer, was dignified with the same office (14); which John Tate the younger, we take to be the very man to whom we owe the art of making this most useful commodity; and Joye mote hem broke say I again, for the same, as honest Wynkin heartily said before; by which, and this rare device of Printing, the most remote transactions, intelligence, and inventions of past times, are both made present, and transmitted to posterity; by which, as from a fountain with innumerable conduits, knowledge and instruction are raised out of the deepest sources of antiquity, and diffused through many parts at once; by which, the press will dispatch as much in a day, as the pen in a twelve month; as it is expressed in the epigram made upon Ulric Han, who first carried it to Rome.

Ingenio, haud nocetas, omnia vincit homo.

Or, to pass over many other advantageous lights, in which the art might be celebrated, to consider it only in its renovating property, we need go no farther than Master Wynkin again; if by way of novelty, we can bear once more with his ancient phrase,

For yf one thyng myght laste a thousand yere,

But lyke as Phobus, with his bemes clere,

[D] The first book we now know of, that was ever printed in the English tongue. In the title page of this book, we read as follows: — 'Here begynneth the volume, intituled, and named, The Recuyell of the Historys of Troye: composed and drawn out of dyverse bookes of Latyn into Frensch, by the Right Venerable persone and Worshipfull man, Raoul le Feure, Prest, and Chapelayn unto the Right Noble Glorious and Myghty Prynce in his tyme, Phillip, Duc of Bourgoyne, of Brabant, &c. in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord God, a thousand four hundred sixty and foure, and translated and drawn out of Frensch into English by William Caxton, Mercer of the cyte of London, at the commaundement of the Right Hye Myghty and Vertuouse Princesse, his redoubtyd Lady Margarete, by the Grace of God, Duchesse of Burgoyne, &c. (15). Whiche said translation and werke was begonne in Brugis in the countee of Flaunders, the fyrst day of March, the year of the Incarnation of our said Lord God, a thousand foure hundred sixty and eight, and ended and synysht in the holy cyte of Colen the six day of Septembre, the year of our sayd Lord God, a thousand four hundred sixty and enleven.' The said title page (to distinguish this from subsequent editions) is printed, as well as some other principal parts in the book, with red ink; and it is said to be printed with the same letter as the original edition was in 1464; but the French edition has two wooden cuts in it, and no name mentioned of the person who printed it: but this Printer is conjectured to have been an instructor of Master Caxton in his art (16). The reason why this book was recommended to him before any other, might be in compliment to the Duke of Burgundy's Chaplain the author; and possibly to gratify the disposition there was at this time in the English or British nation, to derive their original from Brutus and his Trojans. Caxton's great modesty, diffidence, and humble opinion of his abilities, appears in this, as well as all others of his books, very much to his commendation; it having been observed out of the Prologue before it. 'That he thought himself so unqualified on account of his unperfectness in both languages, having never been in France, and lived out of England near thirty years, that he was fully in wyll to have leste it, and accordingly laid it aside for two years after he had begun it, or 'till 1470; when it fortun'd, his ryght redoubted mentioned, King Edward was driven over to his brother-in-law, the Duke of Burgundy's court, to seek succour against his rebellious subjects, where Caxton no doubt paid his obedience to him (q), and received his Majesty's approbation for his engagement in this new art, but the King returned to England without any great enforcement, before Caxton completed his said work. He wrought some time upon it at Ghent, but he finished it at Cologne in the year 1471. Then he returned to Bruges, and presented his performance to the Lady Margaret, who very graciously accepted, and liberally rewarded him for it; he also then dispatched his copies to his other friends and encouragers, who had been impatient for the same; and no doubt some of them he sent into England, if he did not then bring them over himself. And hence it is, from this transmission, or introduction, of the said specimens or products of the art, that John Stow, and others of our Chronologists, have dated Master Caxton's first introducing the art itself among us, in or about that year (r). Though indeed, we cannot now find that the art was practised in England by him 'till at least three years after, much less by any body else; however, a certain writer, very superficially acquainted with our literary antiquities, yet moved by private interest, near two hundred years after, did, by a blind unauthorised story, insinuate, that a foreigner practised the art of Printing in England, six years before Master Caxton [E]. After he published

'redoubted Lady sent for him, to enquire it seems, what progress he had made in this translation. And when she had seen, or read, five or six quires (or parcels) of it, she found a defaute in the English, but commanded him to amande, and make an end of the residue: Accordingly he proceeded in his translation; which he tells us, he begun in Bruges, the 1st of March, in the Year 1468, continued in Gaunt, and finished in Colen, the 19th of September 1471.' Having thus finished the translation of this book, he next says, 'He deliberated in himself to take the labour in hand of printing it, together with the third book of the De-struction of Troy (17) translated of late by John Lydgate, a Monk of Burye, in English rithme.' Of this, Mr Caxton gives us the following account, full of complaints of the painfulness of it to him. — 'Thus, says he, end I this booke — and for as moche as in wrtyng the same, my penne is worne, myne hand wery, and myn eyen demmed, with overmoch lokyng on the white paper, — and that age creepeth on me daily, and feebleth all the body — and also, because I have promysid to dyverce gentilmen, and to my frendes to adreds to hem as hastily as I might this said booke; therefore, I have praystified and lerned at my grete charge and dispenche, to ordyne this sayde booke in prynte, after the manner and forme as ye may here see; and is not wreten with penne and ynke as other bokes ben, to thende that all men may have them attones; for all the bookes of this storye, named, THE RECVLE OF THE HISTOIRYS OF TROYES thus emprynted as ye here see, were begonne in oon day, and also fynished in oon day (18).' Thus it is observed of Faut and Schæffer, the very first practisers of this art of Printing, That they used to advertise the publick, at the end of their first printed works from Mentz, that they were non atramento, plumali canna neque æra, not written with a pen and ink, as all other books had been before, but made by a new art or invention of Printing, or stamping them with characters, or types of metal, set in forms, whereby the several sheets were done all at once, and not line by line, as when they were written (19). The same notice was given by other Printers in the first books that were printed by them in other towns and cities, as Dr Middleton has truly observed (20).

[E] That a foreigner practised the art of Printing in England, six years before Master Caxton. This is asserted by one Richard Atkyns; who, in the time of our Civil Wars, having reduced his fortune in the service of the Crown, fought to repair it after the Restoration, by endeavouring to entitle the Crown to one of the most valuable privileges of the people. And, after having been at the expence of above a thousand pounds in Chancery, and other Law Courts, for near twenty-four years, to prove the right of the King's Grant in Printing of Law-books (21), he published a pamphlet, in which he tells an unknown improbable tale, to prove the Art of Printing was a Royal purchase, and thereby to insinuate that it was a Royal prerogative, in order to get himself made a Patentee for the Printing of books in that Science, which it is said he afterwards did; not heeding therein how slavishly for a little private and pecuniary advantage, he undermined the liberties of his countrymen; how rancorously he vilified the Stationers, as a swarm of drones, who lived upon the labours of the painful Printers; or how unwarrantably he robbed Master Caxton of the honour wherewith he had long been by the suffrage of all learned men, undeniably invested, of first introducing and practising this most scientific invention among us. Indeed, as a Poet may have licence to make use of any incidents, or arguments, that are plausible, or conducive to his purpose, there need be little exception made to a speech in Shakespeare, where Jack Cade charges the Lord Say, who was put to death by his rebellious authority, in 1450, with the following unpardonable crimes: 'Thou hast most traiterously corrupted the youth of the Realm, in erecting a Grammar-School! and whereas before, our fore-fathers had no other books but the score and the tally, thou hast caused PRINTING to be used! and contrary to the King, his Crown and Dignity, thou hast built a PAPER-MILL (22)!' If this Lord Say did really put these things in practice but a few years before he died, he might be set up for the first inventor of Printing himself; the earliest Epocha of any thing considerable in that art even abroad hardly appearing older. This is nothing in a poetical writer; and a critical one will not severely censure an Anachronism in him, which he will allow in the greatest Poets among the Ancients; and seeing, this our Poet has been less extravagant in Chronology, or the Æra of Printing, than one of our most professed Historians. For Dr Fuller, under the year 1400, says (23) that 'Over into England, about this time, first came the Mystery of Printing.' But the author we are here more particularly to produce, Mr Atkyns, where he undertakes to play also the Historian, as well as Shakespeare upon this subject, tho' he may not digress so much in point of time, yet in other circumstances, will prove I am afraid, more a Poet of the two. His first business is, to set our Historians aside; though he never read what one, of the greatest intelligence among them, who was Librarian to King Henry VIII, has said, where he calls Caxton, Angliæ Prototypographus, 'The first Printer of England (24),' and only cites John Stow; whose words are these under the year 1459, 'The noble Science of Printing was about this time found in Germany at Magunche by one John Cuthemburgus a Knight; and William Caxton of London, Mercer, brought it into England about the year 1471, and first practised the same in the Abbey of St Peter at Westminster (25).' Whereunto he adds the concurrence of Sir Richard Baker (26) and Mr James Howel (27). In the next place, those words are to be wilfully misunderstood, or quibbled out of their meaning, then a strange story is to be put in their room; as follows. 'Historians must of necessity take many things upon trust; they cannot with their own, but with the eyes of others, see what things were done before they themselves were; Bernardus non vidit omnia: it is not then impossible, they should mistake. I shall now make it appear they have done so, from their own, as well as from other arguments. Mr Stow's expressions are very dubious, and the matter expressed very improbable. He saith, Printing, was first found in Magunche, which presupposes it was practised somewhere else before, and lost; and further, That it was found in the reign of King Henry VI, Anno Dom. 1459, and not brought into England

lished The Book of Troy, he proceeded it seems in printing others; and if he had before no hand

England till eleven years in the succeeding reign of Edward IV, being twelve years after; as if it had been lost again. If this be true, there was as little reality as expedition in obtaining it, the age of twelve years time having intervened; and so indeed, it might be the act of a Mercer, rather than a more eminent person. But, when I consider what great advantage the kingdom in general receives by it, I could not but think a publique person, and publique purse, must needs be concerned in so publique a good. The more I considered of this, the more inquisitive I was, to find out the truth of it. At last, a book came to my hands, printed at Oxon, Anno Dom. 1468 (28), which was three years before any of the recited authors would allow it to be in England; which gave me some reward for my curiosity, and encouragement to proceed further: and in prosecution of this discovery, the same most worthy person, who trusted me with the aforesaid book, did also present me with the copy of a Record and manuscript in Lambeth house, heretofore in his custody, belonging to the See, and not to any particular Archbishop of Canterbury; the substance whereof was this, tho' I hope, for publique satisfaction, the Record itself, in it's due time, will appear. — Thomas Bouchier, Archbishop of Canterbury moved the then King, Henry VI, to use all possible means for procuring a Printing-mold, for so it was there called, to be brought into this kingdom; the King, a good man, and much given to works of this nature, readily hearkened to the motion; and taking private advice how to effect his design, concluded it could not be brought about without great secrecy, and a considerable sum of money given to such person or persons, as would draw off some of the workmen from Harlem in Holland, where John Cuthenberg had newly invented it, and was himself personally at work. It was resolved, that less than one thousand marks would not produce the desired effect; towards which sum, the said Archbishop presented the King with three hundred marks. The money being now prepared, the management of the design was committed to Mr Robert Turnour, who then was of the robes to the King, and a person most in favour with him, of any of his condition. Mr Turnour took to his assistance Mr Caxton, a citizen of good abilities, who trading much into Holland, might be a creditable pretence, as well for his going, as staying in the Low-Countries. Mr Turnour was in disguise, his beard and hair shaven quite off, but Mr Caxton appeared known and publique. They having received the sum of one thousand marks, went first to Amsterdam, then to Leyden, not daring to enter Harlem itself; for the town was very jealous; having imprisoned and apprehended divers persons, who came from other parts for the same purpose. They staid till they had spent the whole one thousand marks in gifts and expences. So as the King was fain to send five hundred marks more; Mr Turnour having written to the King, that he had almost done his work; a bargain, as he said, being struck between him and two Hollanders for bringing off one of the workmen, who should sufficiently discover and teach this new art. At last, with much ado, they got off one of the under-workmen, whose name was Frederick Corfells, or rather Corfellis; who late one night stole from his fellows in disguise, into a vessel prepared before for that purpose; and so the wind, favouring the design, brought him safe to London. It was not thought so prudent to set him on work at London, but by the Archbishop's means, who had been Vice-Chancellor, and afterwards Chancellor of the Univerfity of Oxon, Corfellis was carried with a guard to Oxon; which constantly watched to prevent Corfellis from any possible escape, till he had made good his promise, in teaching how to print. So that at Oxford, Printing was first set up in England; which was, before there was any Printing-Prefs, or Printer in France, Spain, Italy, or Germany; except the city of Mentz, which claims seniority, as to Printing, even of Harlem itself; calling her city Urbem Maguntinam Artis Typographice Inventricem primam, tho' it is known to be otherwise; that city gaining that art by the brother of one of the workmen of Harlem, who had learnt it at home of his brother, and after set up for himself at Mentz. This press at Oxon, was at least ten years before there was any printing in Europe, except at Harlem and Mentz, where also it was but new born. This press at Oxford, was afterwards found inconvenient, to be the sole Printing-place of England, as being too far from London, and the sea; whereupon the King set up a press at St Albans, and another in the Abbey of Wehminster; where they printed several books of Divinity and Physick, for the King, for reasons best known to himself and Council, permitted then no Law-Books to be printed; nor did any Printer exercise that Art, but only such as were the King's sworn servants; the King himself having the price and emolument for printed books (29). Many objections have been made to this Narrative of that Record and Manuscript, as it is called, for in nothing so bulky or conspicuous as a Chronicle is it pretended to be preserved; and many incoherencies with matters of fact detected therein. It is observed, I. That neither Mr Atkins, nor his anonymous friend, do any ways pretend to have seen the original of such a Record, &c. much less to have compared the copy therewith. II. They give no account when, where, or by whom the same was written; nor by what means it came into, or by whose it was communicated out of, the Lambeth library. III. No author before, none besides Mr Atkins, and those who have taken it upon trust from him, have ever mentioned this Record, or ever saw any substance or abstract of it, tho' he pretends to wish the Record itself in due time may appear. IV. No such Record was to be found at Lambeth by the person who was particularly employed to search after it by the late Earl of Pembroke. V. That manifest inconsistencies in this Narrative, with the most confirmed authorities we have now attained concerning the discovery of the Art abroad, have also raised many exceptions (30), and might so many more, with respect to the practice of it in England, as would sufficiently distinguish, if thoroughly sifted, the whole to have been a chain of inventions, hung upon two or three noted names, and the slight support of a book printed at Oxford, without any Printer's name to it, and with a date at the end of it, which is attested to be false by the workmanship on every foregoing leaf in it, and many other corroborating circumstances. Dr Middleton having examined this relation of that pretended Record, makes several remarks upon it, from whence he concludes it to be a meer forgery (31); and thinks Mr Atkins, a bold vain man, might be the inventor of it; having an interest in imposing upon the world, to confirm his argument, that Printing was of the Prerogative Royal, in opposition to the Stationers; against whom he was engaged in expensive law-suits, in defence of the King's Patents, under which he claimed some exclusive powers of Printing. As for the book aforesaid, which, for it's date of M.CCCC.LXVIII, would take place, as senior by six years, of all other books, that have been the issue of any English press, it is a suspected date; and is very reasonably taken by the said Doctor, and others, to have been falsified originally by the Printer, either through design or mistake; and an X to have been dropped or omitted in the age of it's impression (32): an error so common in Printing, especially of numerals, that there are few readers, who have been much conversant in books, but have met with instances of it. Master Caxton himself, will afford some examples; and, I have seen others in books so far antedated, that, if the dates alone were to carry it, or might satisfy us of the years in which they were really printed, they would entitle London to the invention of Printing, perhaps before any other place in Europe; but, if you were to inspect, or examine them, the novelty of their subject-matter, of more modern manner of Printing, would contradict their pretended antiquity: just as the case is here; where the neatness of the letter, and the regularity of the page; but above all, the use of signatures, or letters and figures at the bottom, for the greater convenience of gathering the sheets in order, and folding them in binding, being an improvement in the art, not used so early as the pretended date of that book, brings it to a certainty, that it is erroneous (33). And hand in that edition of Bartholomæus, printed as abovementioned at Cologne, he might now in the other undated one; and of the next book which he is better known to have printed, I mean The Game of Chess, it appears by an undated edition, that he made some small impression while he resided in the Court at Bruges. In these employments, upon those, with other like works perhaps; and the time required to provide himself with presses, types, and all other printing materials, in order to practise and establish the art in his own country; being now arrived at the evening of life, and naturally inclining homeward, he might pass those three years; 'till he appears, by the edition of that book of Chess dated in 1474, to be settled in England; which book is reputed to be the first (s) that what further confirms it is, that there was not any other book printed for ten or eleven years after at Oxford. If Frederick Corfellis was brought thither at such expence according to the Record, to practise the art, how comes it that he never printed any thing in all that while, or that his name appeared not to that one book, if he did print it? If he came to teach the Art there, how comes it that no body learnt it? If he was discouraged, or met with any inconvenience there, he would have been acceptable at Cambridge; that University being boasted to have a power to print within the same, Omnes & Omnimodos Libros, which the University of Oxford hath not (34); and yet we hear of no printing there, 'till long after there was at Oxford; and then, some of the earliest printing for their use, appears to have been executed by Wynkin de Worde, in the year 1510 (35). But it was some seven years after that, before Sibert, their University Printer, brought the Myllery to any tolerable perfection; and then indeed, he fairly set forth Erasmus his book, De Conseribendis Epistolis; the author at the same time living in Cambridge, who may be presumed curious in supervising the impression (36); and if there was such a man as Corfellis at Oxford, who printed nothing but one book in eleven years, why might not he have been as well employed by the University of Cambridge, as were afterwards, the said Wynkin and Sibert? If it was inconvenient to have the only press so remote from London, and the sea, as at Oxford or Cambridge; and therefore presses were set up at Westminster and St Albans, according to Mr Atkyns; Corfellis, if he was the only first performer of the art, must have been heard of there, to have wrought at one, or other of them; and then, being a Foreigner, it would probably have been upon Latin books: but where, among us, do we hear of any so early printed, that suspected one beforementioned excepted, as some of the English ones, that were set forth by Caxton? If the King, for reasons best known to himself and Council, permitted no Law-books to be printed; and, if no Printers exercised that art, but only such as were the King's sworn servants, as Mr Atkyns also above asserts; how came John Lettou and Will. de Machlinia, two foreign Printers in London, who were no sworn servants of the King, to print Judge Littleton's book of Tenures about the time of, or not long after, his death? Lastly, if Master Caxton was thirty years absent from England, as Bale, Pits, and many other authors have allowed from his own words, then, how could he be within that time sent from hence, with Mr Turnour, to lie at Amsterdam and Leyden in Holland, in order to spirit over a Printer from Harlem; when he was at that very time waiting upon the Duchefs of Burgundy, translating and actually printing a book himself by her command, at Bruges in Flanders? In short, the more I consider Mr Atkyns his Record or account of it, the more it appears a fiction or romance; whereas, if we admit of Dr Middleton's conjecture, as what is most obvious and probable about the date of that book, all the repugnance will be reconciled, all the obscurity cleared up; a numerical letter in the date being only restored therein, makes it M.CCCC.LXXVIII. Then, the book appearing printed in the same manner, and with the same letter, as two more, the next two oldest books at Oxford were printed the next year; we may presume, by another also printed not long after them at the same place, with the name of it's Printers, that the same hands printed them all; and then there will be no room to allow of any such man as Corfellis to have been before there; nor need, to submit to such contradictions, as we have observed must occur, by his introduction at the time and in the manner aforesaid. If then it be granted, that the book of St Jerom in dispute above cited, was printed at Oxford in the year last mentioned, the press will appear to be kept going some time there; for the next year it also produced Leonard Arctin's translation of Aristotle's Ethics (37). And though the name of it's Printer is not mentioned therein, there will appear good reason to believe, that no person named Corfellis had any hand in it; that both were printed with the same Types, and that these were set by the same Compositor. The same press also brought forth another performance the same Year, printed after the same manner. This, like the first, is a religious treatise upon Original Sin, composed by Egidio Romano (38). Of all these three books, the Oxford Antiquarian says, Perspicuis magis et pulcherrimis, quam recentiores nonnulli; that they are more distinctly printed, and more beautiful, than some of later date. Which similitude or congruity of workmanship in them, very much implies, that they were not done by different hands. And, indeed, so few there were then in England, that but four years after these books were printed, an Act of Parliament was passed, whereby leave was given to 'any artificer, or merchant stranger, of what nation or country he was, 'or should be of, to bring into the Realme, and sell ' by retails, or otherwise, any book, written or printed (39). And the reason hereof, is said, by another act, to have been, that there were then, 'But ' few printers within the Realme, which could well ' exercise and occupie the science and crafte of Printing (40). Which would not be expected, if so great a Master of it was purchased over, and guarded here, to teach it us so long before, as fifteen years. But the whole mystery of this first printing at Oxford, seems to be cleared up in the annals of the Art the following year, and that Frederick Corfellis, of whom we have hitherto seen nothing but the name, seems to be turned at last into Thomas Hunte, who is commemorated in some Latin verses, printed by (41) his partner Theodor Rood, at the end of Arctin's Latin translation of Phalaris his Epistles, for having printed the first Latin books at Oxford, as Nic. Jenfon had done among the Venetians; these must be those books beforementioned, with, perhaps, others now lost, or then transported, if my said author computes right, that Hunte printed at Oxford, so soon as four years after Caxton began to print at Westminster (42). That Rood was a native of Cologne in Germany, where possibly Caxton might know him, and from whence he might probably draw him, after he was himself settled at Westminster, to assist Hunte at Oxford, as he did from 1480 to 1485, and how long after is not observed. It is further added, 'That the English had then a good relish of, and ' were well pleased with, the Latin tongue; and, that ' Hunte and Rood printed so many books, as to export, or send them abroad; or at least, so sufficiently to supply all demands for books in that language ' at home, that there was no occasion for the Venetians to send any of their printed books hither, as they ' were before wont to do (43). And lastly, it is to be further remarked, That as the care and diligence of the most curious and inquisitive Literati, have hitherto been able to find no more than four books printed, by those two Printers; so it makes it the more probable, that Hunte was the Printer of the three books beforementioned, which are dated in 1463 and 1479. So that, in the whole, of the first printing at Oxford, and the story of Corfellis, it may in effect be made out, partly by this Hunte, who first printed there, and partly by that Rood, who was introduced from Cologne (by Turnour and Caxton, if you please, but let it be after the Art was in action at Westminster) and might have, for ought we know, some assistant with him; whom I would rather suppose to be that Corfellis himself, than give the least displeasure to any person who may be living, by totally discrediting any late inscription upon a monument of the dead.

that was ever printed in this kingdom [F]. Though we do not meet with any books of Caxton's printing that bear date 'till three years after this, it is very probable that a few of his undated books, especially some written by Chaucer, Lydgate, &c. as they bear the aspect of his earliest performances, were printed in this interval, of which, such as cannot be adjusted under their proper years, shall be mentioned at the end, after those which are dated have been spoken of. John Stow, and others following him, have not only said that Printing was introduced by Caxton, about three years sooner than that year last mentioned, but he expressly says, 'That in the Eleemosynary, or Almonry (at Westminster-Abbey) now corruptly called the Ambry (t), for that the alms of the abbey were there distributed to the poor, John Islip, Abbot of Westminster, erected the first press of book printing that ever was in England; and Caxton was the first that practised it in the said abbey (u).' Whoever authorised him, it is certain he did, there, at the entrance of the abbey, exercise the art; from whence a printing-room is to this day called a Chapel. But Stow and his followers are all mistaken in the Abbot's name; for if Islip was Abbot of Westminster as early as he makes him, he must have been so above threescore years, according to the account of his death and funeral which is still in being (w). 'Tis certain, that Dr Thomas Milling was Abbot in the year above spoken of; a learned man, celebrated by John Leland for his knowledge in the Greek tongue; a rarity in those days among the Monks. He was, in the said year when that book was printed, made Bishop of Hereford; when he seems to have held this Abbey in commendam. He out-lived Mr Caxton, was buried in the abbey, and then was succeeded by the bountiful John Estney; by whose monumental inscription also in the said abbey it appears, as transcribed by Mr Camden, that he survived Caxton seven years (x) before John Islip succeeded him; so that, if Islip was at any charge in settling Mr Caxton in his business, it must have been about twenty-four years before he had this preferment in the said abbey. As for what Mr Hearne mentions of Abbot Islip's knowing Mr Caxton before, and employing him to transcribe and translate several old pieces for his use, though it may not be altogether improbable, yet there is no other authority for it, than John Bagford's short and inaccurate account

[F] Which book is reputed to be the first that was ever printed in this kingdom.] Mr Lewis, out of the Preface of the second Edition of this book, printed without any date, or name of the place at which it was printed, makes a citation of Caxton's; where, expressing how commendable it is in those who will take pains, to instruct the unlearned and ignorant in wisdom and virtue, he adds, 'Emonge whom, there was an excellent Doctour of Dyvynyte in the Royame of Fraunce, of the Order of thospital of Saynt John's of Jherusalem, which entended the fame, and hath made a booke of the Cheffe moralysed; whiche at suche tyme as I was resident in Brugys, in the Counte of Flaunders, cam into my Handes; whiche when I had redde and overseen, me semed ful necessarye for to be had in Englishe; and in eschewing of ydleness, and to thende, that somme which have not sene it, ne understonde Frensh ne Latyn, I delybered in my self to translate it unto our maternal Tongue. And when I so had achede the said Translacion, I dyde doo sette in enprynte a certeyn nombre of theym, which anone were depesched and folde. Wherefore bycause thys sayd Booke is ful of holsom wysedom, and requysyte unto every astate and degree, I have purposed to enprynte it, shewyn therin, the figures of such perones as longen to the play (44).' By this it should appear, that the former edition was without figures; and those in this are very rudely cut; of which Mr Lewis further observes, 'That those of the Alphines, which are directed to be formed in manner of judges setting in a chair, with a book open before their eyes; and of the Rookes, which ben Vycarys and Legates of the Kynge, have such caps, or hoods, on their heads, as Mr Caxton's picture has (45).' And, indeed, it has been presumed, that the Prints which have been made of Caxton were invented from some of these Figures. The edition of this book, which we have seen, is a small folio, and that which is dated, as above; and the Title is as follows, The Game and Play of the Cheffe; in which Thauortories, Dites, and Stories of ancient Doctours, Philosophers, Poetes, and of other wysse men ben recounted, and applied unto the Moralitie of the publique Wele, as well of the nobles, as of the comyn people. Translated out of French and imprinted by William Caxton, fynysid of, the last day of Marche, the yere of our Lord God, a thousand four hundred and LXXXIII. Our typographical Antiquaries all allow this book to have been printed in England, though no place is mentioned in it; also, to have been the first specimen of the Art among us; and as such it has been so valued, that it is said, the late Earl of Pembroke, for a fair copy thereof, which was given him by Mr Granger, presented him with a purse of forty guineas. It is dedicated by Caxton to the King's brother, George Duke of Clarence; who being about four years afterwards sentenced to death for treason, made his end, according to his choice, in the Tower of London, in a butt of Malmsey. And 'tis justly observed, to those who doubt of it's being printed in England, that by Caxton's telling the Duke, he made this Booke in the name and under the shadeve of his noble Protection, it is very strongly imply'd that he was in England; since how could he be under his protection out of it (46). Further, as a memorial that printing was first practised in England this year 1474, it is presumed that Caxton afterwards used at the end of his books, that Cypher or Device, complicating the two latter figures of that date in a knot, between the initial letters of his name, which we shall more particularly express in it's due place. The book was originally writ in Latin; and the author of it has been called Jacobus de Thessalonica, of the order of preaching Friars (47). But Antonius Senensis, in his chronicle of the said order, calls him Jacobus de Cezolis; and says, he flourish'd about the year 1295. Lambecius observ'd, That his true name was Cafulis, from the city of Cafali in Italy, where he was born; which corrupted to Thessalis, and ridiculously to Thessalonica. He agrees with the former author, as to the age of the writer; but L'Ab é removes him backward near a century. Du Fresne supposes Jac. de Cessulis, and Jac. de Thessalonica, to be two different men of the same order; the first living about the time aforesaid, and the last about 1410. And the same learned writer thinks this game of Chesse to have been an Arabian, or Persian game, since he derives the Title de ludo Schaccorum, from the word Schach, which in Arabick signifies a King, who is the principal person in the Game. This book having been rendered out of Latin into French, was now translated by Master Caxton from thence, into English. Others have written upon the subject; namely, one Simon Ailward, an English Poet, who lived in the year 1456, and wrote a book of Latin Monkish Rymes upon this game; some of which may be seen in my author (48). We have a little book or two in English prose, one in 4to, the other in 8vo, upon the same subject; but whether written upon the same plan with those before-mentioned, and with respect to any moral, or political application, I do not now remember.

account of Caxton's Life, annexed to the Proposals he published for printing an Historical Account of the Art of Typography (y). Caxton, in one of his books, having enumerated some of those he had before printed (z), mentions, after the former two, The History of Jason, which, though undated, we shall therefore next give some account of [G]. It is thought this book was printed by him in the year 1475, as we have observed in the note, or at furthest the year after. But of the time when he printed his next book, and the place where, we can speak with greater certainty, because he mentions them both in it: it is properly a book of Apophthegms collected out of the works of the Ancients, and first compiled in Latin, which was afterwards translated into the French tongue, and from thence into English by a Nobleman of great merit and renown, who was the Queen's brother; a man no less famous for arms than literature. This book, which is intitled, The Dicts and Sayings of the Philosophers, was printed by Caxton at Westminster in 1477. Of which, together with a short Collection of Proverbs in verse, which he printed the same year, we shall here refer to some farther particulars [H]. Between the month of May in the [G] Which we shall next give some account of.] It is entitled, The Historie of Jason; towching the Conqueste of the Golden Fleese: Translated from the French, and printed by William Caxton, in a thin folio, without date. By the order in which Mr Caxton mentions it in his Golden Legend, as we observed, it should be the next book he printed. 'Tis with a type different from the former two, and wherewith he printed several others. It was written in French by the old Duke of Burgundy's chaplain, author of The Recuyel before-mentioned, and by him dedicated to the said Duke Philip, surnamed the Good, who, in memory of Jason's expedition, founded the order of the Golden Fleece: It was newly compiled from all the histories of Jason, especially what Dares Frigijs had written (49), and Guido de Columpny upon that subject (50). This translation was entered by Caxton, as he says, in his prologue, 'For the honour and worship of King Edward IV, who had been elected Knight of the said order in the first Chapter held by his brother-in-law Charles Duke of Burgundy, May 8, 1468. Caxton also mentions a stately chamber in the old Duke's castle at Hesdin in Artois, finely adorned with the paintings of this story, and some other curious embellishments of art, in these words. 'Well wote I, that the noble Duc Philippe, first founder of this said order, did doo make a chambre in the castell of Hesdyn, wherein was craftyly and curiously depeynted the conqueste of the Golden Fleese by the said Jason. In which chambre I have ben, and seen the sayd historie so depeynted; and in remembrance of Medea, and her cunning and science, he had doo make in the sayd chambre by subtyll engyne, that, when he wold, it shulde seem, that it lightned, and after thondre, snowe and rayne, and all within the sayd chambre, as aft tymes, and when it shulde please him, which was all made for his singular pleasure [51]. 'Tis probable that all these fine ornaments were destroyed when that town and castle were demolished by Philibert Emanuel Duke of Savoy, and General to the Emperor Charles V. in 1553. But afterwards, by the advice of John German Bishop of Nevers, the first Chancellor of this order, Jason's Fleece was changed for Gideon's, and his story was wrought into rich hangings of gold and silver, which were remaining in the court at Brussels in the year 1652, when Chiflet published his book of this order (52). Hence some people misconceived the foundation of the order, as Caxton well observes, where he says, in the said prologue, 'Howe well some persones affirme and saye, that the sayde ordre hath taken his original of the Fleese of Gideon, I will not dispute.' He also says, that he presumed not to present it to the King, because he did not doubt but he had it in French; But intended, through his licence, and the supportation of the Queen, to present it to his most redoubted young Lord the Prince of Wales, to the intent he might begin to learn to read English. It has been reckoned, that the said Prince was then about five years old (53), which, if a right computation, will prove this book to have been printed in 1475. There was a book printed upon the same subject a few years after abroad, but whether a new edition of this, or a different work, we know not (54).

[H] We shall here refer to some further particulars.] The former of these two pieces, named The Dicts and Sayings of the Philosophers, translated out of French by Antoine Erle Ryuyers, &c. and Enprinted by William Caxton at Westmestre, Folio 1477, consists of seventy-five leaves. This translator was Anthony Wydeville, Earl Rivers, Lord Scales, and of Newfells, a man renowned in his time for his literary, as well as warlike accomplishments. He was the son of Sir Richard Wydeville, the first Earl Rivers, by Jaquetta his wife, relict of John Duke of Bedford, and daughter to Peter of Luxemburg, Earl of St Paul. The said Anthony Wydeville was, when about seventeen years of age, with the Earl his father, stolen or forced away at Sandwich, and carried to France; as may be read in a memorandum of William de Wyncestre's, which is quoted in these words, 'Cito post dictum festum nativitate Domini 1459, Johannes Denbam, cum alijs de Calefia, secreta intravit Sandwyceum, ac ibidem cepit Dominum de Revery, et Antonium Widvele filium ejus, cum multis magnis navibus, et adduxit Calisæ, Comitibus Marchie et Warrenici et Sarum, Calisæ existentibus (55). Elizabeth, the sister of this Anthony, a beautiful lady, the relict of Sir John Gray of Grooby, was married to King Edward IV, in 1464. She lived to see her sons, two hopeful princes, murdered, besides her father, and this her worthy brother afore said; and died herself dispoiled of all, in restraint, at the monastery of Bermondsey in Southwark (56). A few years after, the said Anthony Lord Scales, became much renowned far and near, for the most magnificent feats of chivalry in Smithfield, that were, perhaps, ever performed there; whereof, having some years since been possessed of a very ancient and curious history, in manuscript, containing the whole ceremony, which is, probably, the most copious and exact account of any such martial solemnity now in being, a transient view of it's contents, by the heads thereof, in some parts enlarged a little out of the chapters themselves, may not be here unacceptable. This great and solemn encounter at the tilt or tournament, &c. was performed between the said Anthony Lord Scales, and Anthony the natural son of old Duke Philip before-mentioned; therefore called The Bastard of Burgundy, more often, and as a more honourable title (*), than by that of his Earldom, Count de la Roche, or other lordships, that he had. He was a man no less famous for his wit and courage than the Lord Scales, was the challenger himself to fight him on horseback and foot, and there were granted letters by his Majesty of safe conduct to the bastard and his train, it seems upon this occasion, which are preserved among our records (57). The capital title in that old manuscript history of those feats of chivalry between these two champions, is as follows, The Asies of the full honorable and knightly Armes doon betwene the right noble Lords, Sir Antony Wodeville, Lord Scales and of Newfelles, brother to the most high and excellent Princes, the Queen of Englonde, and of Fraunce, and Lady of Irlande, Chalenger; and Sir Anton, the Bastarde of Bourgoine, Earl of Roche, and Lord of Bener and Benereffe, afore the most Christian and victorious Prince, Edward IV. the King of England, and of Fraunce, and Lord of Irland; the eleventh and twelfth daies of Junye, in the seventh yeere of his Reigne, Defender: The Erle of Worceltre, the grete Constable of Englonde (58); in Smythfeilde. Then follow the distinct narratives of the whole proceedings therein, in twenty four chapters; but as there are also three or four more of them, which precede that title, and relate to others following it, being, perhaps, inadvertently omitted, or not timely enough received to be entered in their proper order, we think it more regular and comprehensible to mention them with those whereunto they relate, than to speak

The King forbids the perilous Spears that were brought for them, it being but an act of Sport. The whole Issue of the Combat; in which the Lord Scales appearing again too hard for the Bastard, and the King perceiving they were growing in earnest, and into a cruel assault, gave the signal to part them (65); commanding them to shake hands and respect one another, as brothers in arms; which they did, in the middle of the field, and so departed. These are the heads of that ancient manuscript. As to the particulars of the combat, further than are mentioned in the margin, we refer to the Chronicles; only, if the date of the year that these Justes were performed in, is rightly here mentioned, then it should seem rather to be upon celebrating the Coronation of the Lord Scales his sister Queen Elizabeth. And if the King's letters of safe conduct for the bastard beforementioned are rightly dated in Rymer, that is in October the next year, they may import a new permission for another trial of skill in the 6th of K. Edward, which he calls 1466. But if this should be 1467, then we may with Stow fix the combat upon the conclusion of the marriage between King Edward's sister and the Duke of Burgundy's son, in the year 1468 (66). As for what further concerns the story of this noble author, the Lord Scales, we shall only mention, that in these times of the Civil Wars, between the Houses of York and Lancaster, his father Richard, the first Earl Rivers, with John his son, were in the year 1469 taken in the forest of Dean, and, by the faction at Northampton, with others beheaded, at the command of George, Duke of Clarence, and the Earl of Warwick. And as for this his surviving son, Anthony, now Earl Rivers, who was afterwards countessor and governor of the young Prince Edward; and of whom Sir Thomas More says, Vir haud facile discernas manere, aut consilio preceptor (67): He was a man of such abilities, that it was difficult to distinguish whether he was more able to advise, or to execute in affairs of state: As soon as King Edward died in 1483, he was sent for from Ludlow, with his Royal Pupil, by the Protector Richard, seized at Stoney Stratford, conveyed to Pontefract, and there, with others, beheaded the same day, in the Month of June, that the Lord Chamberlain Hastings, was at London (68), being aged about forty one years, as it may be computed from the account of his age at the death of his mother, Jacquet Duchesse of Bedford, in 1472, as it stand upon record in the Escheats. With what superior splendor he shines among the illustrious, and, as it were, peerless, among peers, may be read in the general chronicles, the particular accounts of his family (69), and the memorials or testimonies of his merit that have been preserved in the works of several heraldical Antiquaries (70). Of the books he published, this containing The Sayenges of the Philosophers was the first, printed by Caxton at Westminster in 1477, containing seventy-five leaves. The Earl, in his preface, observes, That every human creature is subject to the storms of fortune, and perplexed with worldly adversity, of which he had largely had his part; but having been relieved by the goodness of God, he was exhorted to dispose his recovered life to his service. And understanding that there was to be a jubilee and pardon at St James's in Spain, Anno 1473, he determined upon a voyage thither. So in July, the same year, he set sail from Southampton; when a worshipful gentleman in his company, named Lowys de Bretaylles, lent him, to pass over the time, this book of the Sayings of the Philosophers, in French, which had been translated from the Latin by Messieur Johan de Teonville, Provost of Paris (71). The Earl was very much taken with the wholesome and sweet sayings of the Paymens; and finding how, 'It speaketh universally of the example, weel, and doctrine of alle Kynges, Prynces, and to people of every estate; lawdes vertue and science, blames vices and ignorance;' though he could not then, nor in all that pilgrimage, oversee it well at his pleasure, through the dispositions that belong to the taker of a jubilee and pardon, and the Caxton at Westminster, who has been taken for the father of our Printer (a), as we before observed. And the same year, 1478, he printed another book, which was translated by the said Anthony Earl Rivers beforementioned. This is intituled The Cordyal, and it's double title seems to have occasioned some mistakes [I]. We have already spoken of great acquaintance he found there of worshipful folks, he intended at a more convenient time to be better acquainted with it. Remaining in this opinion, after the King commanded him to attend upon the Prince, and having then leisure, he translated it into English, which had not been before done. But as there were divers copies of this book, differing from each other, he concludes with intimating his hopes, that he shall not be censur'd for that which he has follow'd, or his translation be judg'd of by those which vary from him. The work itself opens with the Sayings of Sedechias; so goes on with those of many eminent ancients; as Homer, Solon, Hyppocrates, Pythagoras, Diogenes, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Alexander, Ptolomy, Seneca, St Gregory, Galen, and some others, who are each of them allow'd a chapter for his sayings, but the last is more miscellaneous. A taste of these Apophthegms may be read in the account of this book that has been before given, and is here, in some parts, made use of

(72) The British Librarian, 320, 1738, p. 65.

(72) At the end of the translation of this work there is a remarkable chapter added, of three leaves (which concludes the whole volume) written by William Caxton, or the Earl in his name. For, as it contains a translation from the French, of those Sarcastims of Socrates against the fair sex, which our noble translator of the rest had purposely passed over, in the proper place, under the chapter of that philosopher; the reader is left to judge, if the said Earl seriously intended to favour the fair, by such an omission in the middle of his book, whether his Printer would probably make so free as to publish it of his own accord, though in his own name, more conspicuously at the end of it. If it is a piece of finesse, it is artfully enough conducted, whether by translator or printer, to expose them more notoriously, under the notion of forbearing to do it at all. We know not that it has been so interpreted, nor can declare in what vein Master Caxton's apology for the said addition was written, or is to be read; but shall leave it to the reader, to decide whether there is not something of a droll humour, or delicate air of raillery, in the following expressions, ' I fynde that my sayd Lord hath left out certayn and dyverse conclusions towchyng women! wherein I mervaylle that my sayd Lord hath not wretton them, ne what hath mevyd him so to do, ne what cause he hadde at that time: But I suppose that some fair Lady hath desired hym to leve it out of his booke; or ellys he was amorous on somme noble Lady, for whos love he would not sette it in his booke; or ellys, for the very affectyon, love, and good wyllle that he hath unto alle Ladies and Gentyllwomen, he thought that Socrates spared the sothe, and wrote of women more than trouth. For if he had made sawte in writing of women, he ought not, ne shold not be belevyd in his other Dyctes and Sayings. But I apperceyve that my said Lord knoweth verily, that suche defautes ben not had ne founden in the women born and dwelling in these parties, ne regions of the world Socrates was a Greke, boren in a ferre contree from hens, whyche contree is alle of othere condicions than this is; and men and women of other nature than they ben here in this contree; for I wote wel, of whatsomever condicion women ben in Grece, the women of this contree ben right good, wise, playfant, humble, discrete, sobre, chasty, obedient to their husbandis, trewe, secreete, stedfast, ever busy, and never idle; temperat in speaking, and vertuous in alle their workis; or at least sholde be soo. For which causes so evydent, my sayd Lord, as I suppose, thoughte it was not of necessity to sette in his booke the saingis of his auctor Socrates, touchyng women. But for as much as I had commandement of my sayd Lord to correct and amende, whereas I sholde fynde sawte; and other fynde I none, sauf that he hath left out these Dictes and Sayings of the women of Grece; therefore in accomplishing his commandement, for as moche as I am not in certayn whether it was in my Lord's cople or not (73); or ellis peradventure that the winde had blowe over the leef at the tyme of translation of his booke, I purpose to wryte the same Saynges of that Greke, Socrates, which wrote of the women of Grece, and nothyng of them of this Royame, whom, I suppose, he never knewe; for if he had, I dar plainly saye, that he wold have reserved them in especiall, in his said dictes. Alway not presumyng to put and fette them in my sayd Lordes booke, but in the ende, aparte, in the herfayll of the workis; humbly requyryng all of them that shal rede this lityl reherfayll, that, yf they fynde ony faulte, tarrette it to Socrates, and not to me, &c. Thus much may suffice both of this apology, and for an example of the pleasant and ironical style, or manner of expression in those times. As for the Typographical remarks that have been made of this earliest product of the press, at Westminster, that is expressly mentioned to have been printed there, they may be read in the book before quoted (74). And, we shall only observe further here, that there is a beautiful manuscript of it in being, written in as fair, regular, and even a Roman hand, as if it was printed; and having before it an illumination or painting in miniature, representing King Edward and his Queen, the Duke of Clarence and his children, and Earl Rivers in his Surcoat of Arms, making a presentation of his book (75).

(73) My Lord's words are, under the Chapter of Socrates — And the said Socrates had many saynges agens women, whiche is not translated.

(74) The Brit. Libr. p. 63.

The other piece, which the said Earl translated, and Caxton also printed the same year, as is above in the text observed, was The Morale Proverbes of Chryssyne of Pyse. They consist of two sheets in folio, are composed in distichs or couplets of English verse, and are usually bound with the former book. One of the said proverbes, is as follows:

That Lady was an Italian born at Pisa: but her father removing to Bologne in France, she wrote her book in the language of that contry (76), and flourished about the year 1400. At the end of this version, Caxton has some rhymes informing us by whom it was written, and translated, and declaring his own exactness in printing the same. This he mentions in two stanzas, whereof part of the last, contains these words:

[I] This is intituled the Cordyal, and it's double title seems to have occasioned some mistakes.] That is, in speaking of it as two books, when it is but one (78). There is a pious Preface before it, written by the said Earl Rivers, as it seems, and at the end of the author's Prologue ensuing it appears, that it is called, The Cordyal, from the reasons urging, that the four important articles treated of therein, death, judgment, hell, and heaven, should be cordially imprinted in our hearts. But the first words of the book are, Memorare Novissima, & in Eternum non peccabis, from Ecclesiasticus; whence it is often titled from those two first words. This book, like The Dictes and Sayings, has no numbers of the pages at top, nor signatures or catch words at bottom. The three or four lines of every chapter are hortned, to leave room toward the margin for the initial letter, which is always a small one, only to direct the Painter of the capitals, which are here in red colour; having yet not capitals large enough of metal to print such initials. The beginnings of the chapters are also adorned with red, and many of the smaller capitals of the Printing that began to make its appearance at Oxford in 1479, and about this time, Caxton seems to have had an increase of hands to carry on his business more expeditiously at Westminster; for henceforward we shall find his presses more fruitful, and that he printed more books for the generality in a year, than he did in the beginning. Thus he is observed to have set forth three books more in 1480, which therefore may be spoken of in one note together [K]. It seems that about this time there was another printing capitals that begin the periods, with yellow. In the Type, there are several combined letters, and some marks of abbreviation: In the Orthography, words not always spelled alike; and as to Pointing, the only stops, are a little square one, like a cross, and little oblique dashes. The Epilogue or Conclusion is written by Caxton, wherein he says, 'This book is thus translated out of Frenshe into our maternal tongue, by the Noble and Virtuouse Lord Anthoine, Erle Ryviers, Lord Scales, and of the Isle of Wight; Defenseur and Directeur of the causes Apostolique for our holy Fader the Pope in this Royame of Englonde (79); Uncle and Governour to my Lorde Prince of Wales. Which book was delivered to me William Caxton by my saide noble Lorde Ryviers, on the day of Purification of our blessed Lady, falling the Twelfth day the secunde day of the month of Fevver in the year of our Lord M.CCCC.LXXVIII, for to be emprinted, and so multiplied to goe abroad among the people, that thereby more surely myght be remembered, The Four last Things undoubtedly comyng. And it is to be noted, that sythe the tyme of the grette tribulation and adversite of my saide Lorde, he hath been full vertuously occupied; as in goyng to Pylgremagis to Saint James in Galice, to Rome, to Saint Bartylmew, to Saint Andrew, to Saint Mathew, in the Royalme of Naples; and to Saint Nicholas de Bar in Puyle, and other divers holy places. Also hath procured and gotten of our holy Fader the Pope, a greet and large indulgence, and grace unto the chapel of our Lady of the Piewe, by Saint Stephens at Wellmeitre, for the relief and helpe of Cristen fowles passed out of this transitorie world; which grace is of the like vertue to thindulgence of Scala Celi. And notwithstanding the grette labours and charges that he hath had in the service of the Kyng and of my saide Lord Prince, as well in Wales as in Englonde, which hath be to him no litle thought and besynes, bothe in spirite and body, as the fruit thereof, experimentally sheweth; yet over that, tenriche his vertuous disposicion, he hath put him in devoyr at all tymes when he might have a leyser, whiche was but statermele, to translate diverse bookes out of Frensh into English. Among other, passed thurgh myn hande, the booke of the Wise Sayings, or Distes of Philosophers, and the wise and holfom Proverbis of Cristine of Pyse, set in metre. Over that, hath made diverse Balades against the seven deadly Synnes (80). Furthermore it seemeth, that he conceiveth wel the mutabilitie and the unstableness of this present lys, and that he desireth with a greet zeal and spirituall love our goodley help and perpetuel salvation, and that we shal abhorre and utterly forsake ttabhominable and dampnable synnes, which comunly be used now dayes; as pride, perjurye, terrible swering, thefte, murdre, and many other. Wherefore, he took upon him the translating of this present werke, named Cordayle; trusting, that bothe the reders and the herars the rof sholde knowe them self herafter the better, and amende thairlyvyng, or they departe, and lose this tyme of grace to the recouvre of their salvacion. Which translating, in my judgement is a noble and a meritorious dede. Wherefor, he is worthy to be gretly commended, and also singularly remembered with our goodde prayers. For certaynely, as well the reders as the herers, well conceyvyng in their hertes, the forsayd Four last Things, may thereby gretly be provoked and called from sinne to the gret and plentiuouse mercy of our blessed Saveour; which mercy is above all his werkis. And no man beyng contrite and confessed, nedeth to fear thobteyning thereof; as in the Preface of my saide Lordes booke, made by hym, more playnly it appeareth. Then in obeyng, and following my saide Lordes commandement, in which I am bounden so to do, for the manifold benefetes and large rewardes of hym had and receyved of me undeservid, I have put me in devoyr to accomplish she his saide desir and comaundement; whom, I beseeche Almighty God to kepe and mayntene in his vertuous and laudable actes and werkis, and fende hym thaccomplishment of his noble and joyous desirs and playfirs in this worlde; and after this short dangerous and transitory lys, everlasting permanence in heven: Amen. Which werke present, I began the morn after the saide Purification of our blessed Lady; whiche was the daye of Sainte Blase, Bisshop and Martir, and finished on the even of thAnnunciation of our saide blessed Lady, falling on the Wednesday, the xxiii daye of Marche, in the six year of Kyng Edward the Fourthe.

[K] Which therefore may be spoken of in one note together.] These three books are named, The Image of the World, Ovid's Metamorphoses, and The Chronicles; with a Description of England. The Ymage, or Myrrour of the World, was, as it appears in the Prologue, translated out of Latin into French, by the direction of John Duke of Berry and Auvergne, anno 1245; and now translated out of French into English by W. Caxton; at the request and expence of the Honourable and Worshipful man, Hugh Brice, Alderman, and Citizen of London (81); with intent to present the same to the Vertuous, Noble, and Puissant William, Lord Hastings, Lord Chamberlain to King Edward the fourth, and Lieutenant of the Town of Calais, and the Marches there; whom he humbly beseecheth to receive in gree and thank. Which book containeth in all seventy-seven chapters and twenty-seven figures; without which it may not easily be understood. The copy here followed, was engrossed, and in all points ordained by chapters and figures in French, in the town of Bruges in June 1464; and undertaken by him to be translated into English, the second day of January 1480, in the Abbey of Westminster. And in his Epilogue, at the end, having beseeched the Lord Chamberlain to pardon his rude and simple translation; and yf ther be faulte in mesuryng of the firmament, sunne, mone, or of the earth, or in any other marvaylles herein conteyned, I beseeche you not tarette the defaulte in me, but in hym that made the cople. So having repeated the time when he began to translate the same, as before, he adds, that he finished it the eighth day of March, the same year, the twenty-first year (+) of King Edward IV. The first edition of this book is printed upon a thicker and better paper than the others; it has also no large capitals printed at the beginning of the chapters; they being still painted or drawn out with a pencil in vermilion or red ink, but there are signatures at the bottom of every other four leaves. The figures are simple, and but thinly shaped; and some of them keep a litle up to the drefs of the times, especially in the long beaked shoes. In some copies, the pages at top are numbered, and the figures of the celestial and terrestrial spheres are explained in writing by Caxton himself. There was afterwards another edition of this book printed on a different letter, tho' it might be Caxton's, with a different wooden cut to the second chapter. It has also large initials printed before each of them, and at the end, there is this addition — Caxton me fieri fecit, which in the first edition is wanting, and shews it to have been that which Mr Lewis describes (82). He says, that 'At the end of this book, is printed an Epilogue, with Mr Caxton's cypher, which shews he used it not above six years after he has supposed him to have first printed in England; though it is not unlikely that he used it sooner, only, as is very common with other old books, this leaf has been torn out (83);' and so it might be with the copy of this edition we have seen; no such cypher appearing at the end thereof. This copy had been in the possession of the late Reverend Mr Thomas Baker of St John's College Cambridge; who in the short account he has drawn out from the Prologue, in one of the blank leaves before it, has these words — 'It was then valued for the matter it contains, is now valuable for the print, and is yet a present for a Lord.' Indeed, there there are some marvellous reports in this book, which would persuade us there have been performed, through great knowledge in some of the Sciences, no less surprising miracles by the Antients, than have been ascribed, through religion, to some of the legendary Saints. But of Virgil in particular, there are such extraordinary performances here specified, as surpass any thing of his own heroes, and would send the most profound magicians to school. The Artificial Dove of old, or the more modern Iron Fly, were nothing to compare with Virgil's copper Fly in this book, which could chase all other Flies, for such a space from his presence. And Virgil's Brazen Horse, is here such a Doctor among the species, that the most diseased of those animals was presently cured by looking only upon it. These rarities, with the spacious city he built upon an egg, were to be seen, as precious or profitable reliques at Naples, when this book was first written; and doubtless that great Lady's tinderbox, at which he obliged all the citizens of Rome to light their candles, who would rekindle the fires he had extinguished throughout that city, would have been as great a curiosity, had it been deposited among the rest. But such an artist he was, in building the wonderful bridge here described; which how performed, no man knew, but all men could pass safely over, as might make us wish him now alive at Westminster; and Friar Bacon's Brazen Head seems to have been but a loggerhead in comparison of that here affirmed to be of Virgil's making; which was endowed with so much brains, as to answer all questions, and foretell all events, and those with such true Oracular Amphibology, that it proved too hard for it's maker; who, unable rightly to interpret one of it's responses, fell a sacrifice to his own art; which, with other such like curious particulars, here mentioned of him, have escaped some of his most considerable editors; and may in the whole, suggest to us, the extensive assiduity of Popish imposture and avarice, in raising profit and admiration from the ignorant, out of miracles and reliques, in every other science, as well as the districts of sanctity; out of Heathen as well as Christian examples, and wherever they think any name of Antiquity is venerable enough to solemnize their absurdities and impositions, as well in profane as sacred story (84). This book seems to have been very attractive in it's time, and had other editions after this; one of them, to make it the more amusing, was adorned with many more wooden cuts than either of these; tho' several of them have no reference to any thing mentioned in the book. There is an abridgment of Caxton's Prologue at the beginning, but his name as the translator is ungratefully sunk by one of his own profession; so early did they begin to be unfaithful in reprinting of books, or transmitting them unimpaired and complete to posterity (85).

Next after this, is mentioned by Caxton himself in his Golden Legend, as translated out of French, and printed by him, 'The XV books of Metamorphoses, in which ben' contained the Fables of Ovid.' This book is placed by Oudin under this year, where he says, Libri XV. Metamorphoseon Ovidii in Anglicam prosam per Caxtonum conversi, A. D. 1480. And after him, Mr Lewis mentions it in the same year; but John Bagford dates it a year before. In Mr Samuel Pepys his library at Magdalen-Coll. in Cambridge, there is a MS. copy of part of this book, intitled, A Prose translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, beginning at the tenth book; and at the end, this colophon; 'Thus endeth Ovyde his booke of Metamorphose, translated and fynished by me William Caxton at Westmestre, the xxii day of Apryll, in the yere of our Lord M. IIII. LXXX, and the xx year of the regne of Kyng Edward the fourth.'

The third book printed by Mr Caxton this year, was The Chronicles of England; to which is added, The Description of England, Wales, and Scotland, and also Yrland, in folio. Many authors have fallen into errors and mistakes about this book; and many have censured Caxton, as the compiler, who was but the Printer of it. He says himself, that he endeavoured to imprint the same at the requeste of divers gentlemen, and only ordeyned a table of the matters shortly compiled and chapitred, that every man may find more readily what he pleases to rede. Which booke begynth at Albany, and endeth at the begynnyng of the regne of Kyng Edward the IIIIth (86). The title of the first chapter is, The Names of this Londe, which begins thus — In the noble Londe of Sirrie, there was a noble Kyng and myghty — At the end, Caxton says it was emprinted by him in th'Abbey at Westmyner. Fynishid and accomplyshid the x day of Juyn the yere of th'Incarnation of our Lord God M CCCC. LXXX, and in the xx yere of the regne of Kyng Edward the fourth. Upon the misapprehension of Caxton's being the author of this Chronicle, many reflexions have been made on him. John Major, the Scottish Historian, (87) charges him with improbabilites and inconsistencies, and says, the invective against Robert and David Bruce, contains as many fallshoods as words, when he should have accused the author from whom he printed. Yet, as he incorporates the English and the Scotch History together, he takes the greatest part of what relates to his own country from the English writers (88), as Bede, Froissart, and Caxton; which last, he owns he often literally translates; and chuses to follow his History, at the same time that he is quarrelling about the truth of it; especially, where it asserts the dependency of the Crown of Scotland upon that of England. But Bishop Nicholson, in his reflexions on Caxton, as encouraging his readers, by the opportunity he had of being acquainted with the Court transactions of his own time, in the reign of King Edward IV, to hope for great matters from him, when his fancy only led him into an undertaking above his strength (89); has therein most severely reflected on himself, by falling into the censure of that which was beyond his knowledge; for if he had read these Chronicles, he would have found at the very entrance, as it has been observed, that they conclude at the beginning, and not at the end of the said King Edward's reign. In these Chronicles it is reported, that King John was poisoned at the Abbey of Swinshed near Lincoln by a Monk of that house, for which Caxton has been ignorantly censured, as the first broacher of that story, at least in English History. He was the first Printer of it, it is true; but it was faithfully, from an old English manuscript, which was the original of this whole Chronicle (90), so that it is no otherwise to be called his, than as it passed his press; and so those who know how to speak of it, do distinguish; as John Stow, where he says — The English Chronicle, printed by William Caxton, and therefore, called Caxton's Chronicle (91), &c. yet Robert Parsons the Jesuit, who was not enough acquainted with this Chronicle to make such distinction, charges Caxton with being the first author of this story (92), and a late writer of notes on Rapin's History of England, as the first who mentions it in English (93). Withal adding, that it is not mentioned by any Historian who lived within sixty years of King John's death, or before 1276; when his being poisoned is mentioned in the Chronicle of John abbot of Peterburgh, which ends in 1259. How can Caxton, John Fox, or Sir Francis Hastings, be accused justly of malice or forgery in displaying this story, when there are more ancient Historians, who have so circumstantially and positively vouched the same (94), that even succeeding writers, who have been friends to Monckery, have made no scruple to believe it? And why should they not? says the learned and judicious Dr John Barkham in the life of this King, since an author, more ancient and unexceptionable than all the rest, even King John's son and successor in his kingdoms averred it, when the Prior of Clerkenwell saucily told him, being in that house, 'That, as soon as he ceased to do justice towards his Prelates, he should cease to be a King.' To which his Majesty enraged with his traitorous threat, replied, 'What I mean you to turn me out of my kingdom, and afterwards to murder me, as my father was dealt with (95).'

With these Chronicles of England is usually joined, The Description of England, Wales, and Scotland, and also Yrland; which was fynished the 18th day of August the yere of our Lord God 1480, and the 20th yere of the regne of King Edward IV. This was printed from John de Trevisa's English translation of Ranulph Higden, author of the Polychronicon, and afterwards reprinted with the Fructus Temporum, &c. This the abbey, and the first, if not the only Printer there, in a chapel within the limits of that monastery, as we are informed by Mr Bagford; who adds, that Caxton and he held a close correspondence (b). 'Tis thought that Caxton furnished him with a set of the types he could best spare; and those indeed which he did use, do much resemble such of Caxton's as were rudest or most worn: 'Tis presumed also, that Caxton taught him his art of Printing, as well as furnished him with materials to exercise the same (c). There was also a little practice of the art, about the same time, in the city of London. Of the few books that were printed there, as well as at St Albans, and especially the chief of them, a Chronicle, comprehending the substance of Caxton's in the note last mentioned, which, for want of proper distinction, has occasioned some confusion in the citation thereof, we shall give a short account below [L]; and so proceed to enquire after

This Description consists of twenty-nine chapters. It has been observed, 'That from the Conquest down to the reign of King Henry VIII. our English Geographers, have either been very few, or the want of Printing has occasioned the loss of most of them, and that this of Caxton's is the only thing in it's kind which we have (96).' And yet it is certain, as another author truly observes, this is not Caxton's but Higden's Description, and only printed by him from Trevisa's translation of it into English, as has been hinted before (97).

[L] We shall give a short account below.] The most ancient book printed at either of these places, that has been taken notice of, was a Treatise of Rhetoric; and according to the printed catalogue of the choice library of the late Dr John More, Bishop of Ely, set forth at St Albans in 1480 (98). Though it is said, the copy of this book, which is in Bennet College Library, has neither at the beginning or end, any account of the Printer's name, or of the place or time, where or when it was printed. The next in course of time was Jacobus de Valentia's book on the Psalms, printed in the city of London by John Lettou, the next year (99). This printer was in all probability a Frenchman, or a German, who was then allowed to practice that art in this city. And at the same time there was another foreign printer in the said city, William of Machlin, who printed another religious book in Latin, called The Christian's Mirror, at the expence of a Dutch Merchant, who is named in the title thereof, as it is here likewise exhibited in the Margin (100). These two foreigners also printed in conjunction, as well as apart, but neither was their letter so fair or clear, nor their composing so regular as Caxton's. They set forth Sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures, in a thin folio, soon after the others, as we before observed; and in the Latin Colophon at the end, mention that book to have been newly imprinted by them, in the city of London, near the Church of All Saints, or All Hallows; but which church they meant of that name is not now very distinguishable. There was one John Laton, who was Autumn Reader of the Inner Temple, in the sixteenth and seventeenth years; Double Reader in Lent, the twenty-fourth; and Treasurer of the said society the twenty-sixth of King Henry the VIIIth, whom some have imagined to be either the printer of those Tenures; or, as an eminent lawyer, had such respect for that book, and the merits of it's author, that it was, at least, by his procurement and expence, the said Machlin printed the same; but therein they are as erroneous as Sir William Dugdale is, in the account he gives of the said book (101); for if that Lettou had been this Laton, and was at the charge of printing that work, he would have been distinguished in like manner as the other benefactors to their other impressions were. Besides, one of the two religious books above was printed by Lettou himself, without any assistance of Machlin; which shews that he was a professor of the art; but where do we see any eminent Lawyers, even in our days, when that art is much better known, and more generally practised in this city, than it was then, employing their time in printing of Psalm-books, or any other? But the book which has nearest relation to any of Caxton's, and was printed not long after these, was that chronicle abovementioned in the text, said to have been printed at St Alban's, and is therefore often titled The Book of St Albans, and The Chronicle of St Albans; it is entituled, The Chronicle of Englonde, with the Frute of Tymes, printed in a thick short folio 1483. Which part, relating to the latter title, being translated or gathered mostly from foreign authors, chiefly concerning Scripture, and foreign history, the book is improperly quoted thereby as Caxton's (102), tho' his chronicle printed three years before, and relating chiefly to the affairs of England, or the MS. he followed, is involved therein: In the prologue, the said Chronicle and Fruit of Times, are said to be compiled together at Saynt Albons, in the year aforesaid; but it is not mentioned to be printed at St Albons, nor even compiled, or printed by the school-master there; much less by John Insonuch; a name surely that was never ascribed to the compiler or printer of this book, till it appear'd in Sir Henry Chaunty, where he is giving an account of the first printing at that monastery (103). Indeed Wynken de Worde, at the end of his edition of this book in 1497 says, 'That Chronicle, with the Frute of Tymes, was compiled in a Booke, and emprinted by one some time school-master of St Albans.' If there was any such flaw or obscurity about those words, one some time in Sir Henry's copy of that impression, as might tempt any body who thought they could restore the true reading, to suppose it should be, and therefore made out of it that name, Sir Henry might have some colour of authority for his assertion; but it is rather believed the first word of the book itself, which is Insonuch, ran in his head for the name of the author. This work is divided into seven parts; the last part makes half the book, and begins at the Conquest. Not only the initials of every chapter, but many other capitals in every chapter are drawn or painted with red ink. The leaves are not paged at top, nor have they any words of direction from page to page at bottom; but they have signatures. There are three simple wooden prints in some of the leaves towards the beginning, of the Tower of Babel, the City of London, and that of Rome, with some few others. This author proposes in the prologue, that the seventh or last part of these chronicles should be continued, 'from the Normans, to oure tyme, which is, under the regne of Kynge Edward the fourth, 23 yere, whosof noble Cronycles, by custome, may not be seen.' Yet, in the beginning of the seventh part of the table, it is added again, 'Continuynge to our daies, that is to say, to the regne of King Edward the IV. the twenty-third yere.' But at the end of the chronicle, this compiler does not descend so low by near a dozen years, being as it is thought cut off by death, for the last paragraph ends with the popedom of Sixtus IV, who was chosen 1471; and is yet, at the making of this bokc, said he; concluding that, 'John abbot of Habingdon was this Popy's Legate in Englonde, to dispose of the tresour of the church, to withstand the mysbylevabull Turke, &c.' In a copy of this first edition, which I have seen, there are several crafements with a pen, either by the examiners of heretical passages in such old books, or some zealous bigot to Popery, of some passages, which were thought not very consistent with the polity of holy Church; and as he all along interlaces the histories of Emperors and Popes in this work, so where he speaks of one of them, it gave such offence, that the words were entirely crossed over with a pen in that manner; but being not indiscernable, I could read them to be as follows, 'Jobannes Anglicus of the nacion of Magantynne, about this tyme was Pope, and she was a woman, arrayed in manny's garmentys: Bot she profetid so in holy Scripture, that ther wos founden none lyke hir. Then she wos chosen Popc; bot afterward, she wos with childe; and when she shuld have gone opynly in procession, she traveled and deceffid: And this is the sixt pope the whiche, to this tyme, had the nam of Holynesse, and were vecius: And this person, as other cursed popis wer, was punyshed of God; nor she wos not nombred in thee boke of Popis (104).'

Yet

after the next off-spring of W. Caxton's press; which seems to have been intitled,

The

Yet was there no English chronicle in these popish times so generally read, nor any for above an hundred and fifty years after, so often reprinted, as this was, by Wynkin de Worde, Richard Pynson, Julyan Notary, &c. even to five or six impressions in the space of thirty years. I have seen a remark, written in one of Pynson's copies, printed 1510, upon the last leaf but one, after the words, havyng Posselsson of all the Realme, that here ends Caxtons Chronicle. These later editions of this Fruit of Times and Chronicle, have annexed to them The Description of England, &c. beforementioned, which Caxton reprinted from Trevisa's Polychronicon, though both their names are omitted in Pynson's edition; which concludes with a short Latin epilogue, briefly enumerating the Kings of England from the Conquest; which we find not in the others. They all are embellished with wooden cuts, different from one another; and the last edition has most of them in number. But the next most famous book that was printed at St Albans, and this being, also printed, it seems, with Caxton's letter, is all we shall here take notice of, as the off-spring in these early times of that press; and the rather not to be omitted, because of divers mistakes that have been made, concerning both it, and it's author. This book treats of Hunting, Hawking, and Heraldry; and is ascrib'd to an illustrious and heroic Lady, of great gifts in body and mind; a second Minerva in her studies, and another Diana in her diversions; in short, an ingenious Virago, as Bale and Pits call her, who lived about 1460, and yet she was no less than an Abbess, as Sir Henry Chauncy, or Priores, as Dr Middleton files her, of the strict and mortified Nunnery at Sopwell in Hertfordshire; who says also, that she was sister to Richard Lord Berners of Essex (†). But that the said Juliana Barnes was such a religious Lady, and so nobly descended, no author, as yet, has attempted to prove. As for the book in question, it has been sometimes called The Gentleman's Recreation, and The Gentleman's Academy, or book of St Albans. But of the original edition now before us, there is a colophon comprehending the true title, in these words, Here, in this booke afore, ar contenyd the bokys of Haukyng and Huntynge, with other plesuris dyverse, as in the boke apperis: and also of Coot Armuris, a nobull werke. And here now endyth The boke of Blasyng of Armys, translatyt and compylt togedyr at Seynt Albons, the yere from the Incarnacion of ourre Lorde Jhu Cryst M.CCCC.LXXXVI. In the last leaf, there is a kind of coat or feutcheon, stamp from a wooden print in colours, representing Gules, a Saltire, in a bordure, Or, within a rundel; out of which arises a kind of double cross having a bar above and below, argent. There is this inscription at top, Hic finis diversorum Generosius valde utilium, ut inventibus patebit: and at bottom, Sanctus Albanus. The first paragraph of the book sufficiently expresses the contents of the first treatise, which begins with the same word as the Chronicle of St Albans did, as follows, 'Infomoch, that gentillmen and honest persones have grete delite in Haukyng, and desire to have the maner to take Haukys: and also how, and in waat wyse, they shulde gyde theym ordynateli: and to know the gentill termys in communynge of theyr Haukys; and to understande theyr sekeneffs, and enfermitees: and also to knowe medecines for theym according; and mony notabull termys that been usid in Haukyng, both of their Haukys and of the Fowles, that their Haukys shall sle: therefore, this book followyng, in a cew forme, shewys veri knowlege of fuche plesure to gentillmen and personys disposed to se itt.' To particularize the chapters, and all the terms that were used in this sport, and of the birds of prey that were kept to make it, whereof so many volumes have, with so much unprofitable industry been written, were enough both to furnish out a Dictionary of the jargon, mostly derived from the French, and expose the immoderate application of our ancestors at the same time, in making such a profound science of it. A sport, unknown to the Romans (105), nor mentioned 'till about the time of Alaricus the Goth, by Julius Firmicus. From the Turks and other Barbarians, the Europeans, and the English especially, ap'd it in great extravagance down to the last century, tho' perhaps to little more benefit or importance, than the Persians did, who trained up their sparrows to hawk after butterflies (106); it appearing in the last chapter of this book before us, that there were Hawks appropriated to all degrees of the people, from an Emperor, down to the holy-water Clerk, and poor man, or the beggar: so true it is, that he was accounted nobody, who in those ages, wherein the indulgence of falconry so licentiously reigned, had not an hawk on his fist; especially, as I said among us; seeing that, even by foreigners, who have practised these bewildering diversions themselves with excess, our English Nobility have been reproached as more inordinately addicted to them. And, as if they had nothing better in them, or depended on nothing more noble to prove their gentility, than Hawking and Hunting (107). Nay, these sports have been maintained as the most preferable accomplishments by some of our Nobility themselves, in those of their own rank; as may be seen in the wise speech of that lordly scorner of Literature, who said, It was enough for Noblemens sons to winde their horn, and carry their hawk fair, and leave study and learning to the children of mean people: To whom, the learned Secretary of King Henry VIII, reply'd, Then you and other Noblemen must be content that your children may winde their hornes, and keep their hawks, while the children of mean people manage affairs of State (108). How deep would the Mad Doc or in Poggius have soufed this sportman in his pit, for the restoring him to his senses? especially, if it were considered, that from such as he, so much trespassing of one neighbour upon another, has been occasioned; so much litigiousness and enmity towards one another; and so much expence, not only in law-suits, but in accommodations for the sport itself; so far exceeding the example produced by that facetious Florentine, of one who expended four hundred crowns per annum, to kill five or ten crowns worth of birds, that among the instances of greater prodigality in our nation, we have it recorded of Sir Thomas Monson, who was a very expert Falconer, that he was at a thousand pounds charge in goshawks, only for one flight (†): All which considered, it is no wonder the diversion at length dwindled away to that moderation in which it deserves, as well as all other sports, to be exercised. This treatise of Haukyng, which is written in prose, and has no author's name ascribed to it, consists of fifty-one pages; where it is shown to be at an end, by the word explicit. The next leaf begins thus — Lykerwys, as in the booke of Hawkyng, afore sayd are writyn and noted the termys of plesure belongyng to gentillmen havyng delite therein: in the same maner this booke followyng sheweth to sich gentill personys, The maner of Huntynge for all maner of Beestys, wether thay be Beestys of Venery, or of Chace, or Rascall. And also it sheweth all the termys convenient, as well to the Howndys as to the Beestys afore sayd, &c. This treatise of Hunting is written in verse, divided into several chapters; and the whole poem contained in twenty-three pages. It seems in general to consist of two parts, and the readers are addressed throughout the first, in the person of a woman, who begins the work, with distinguishing the beasts of Venery; and having advised, whereforever you are, in wood or in field, to give heed to what Tristram says, or informs you of; she also adds, if you will listen, you shall learn of your dame, which kinds those beasts of Venery are; so names the Hart, the Hare, the Boar, and the Wolf; then proceeds to the Beasts of the Chace, &c. And in several other parts, speaks to her sons of Venery, and bids them

Say childe where you goo, youvre dame taght you so.

In the chapter of Hunting the hare, there are many French terms used, as the fashionable phrase in that sport at those times. What we call the second part, is a kind of dialogue in several chapters, between the Master Hunter and his Man. At the end of the whole poem we read these words, 'Explicit Dam Julyans Barnes, in her booke of Huntynge.' In the next page, there are three or four short chapters distinguishing, which are Beasts of the Chace; of the Sweet, and Stinking Foot: The various names of Hounds: The Properties of a Grayhound; and how to he trained, or what he is fit for every year. After which we have a long list in two leaves, of the proper terms, by which any companies of beasts and fowls, as well as several bodies bodies or societies of men and women are to be called in the Sportman's Dialect; among which, there are some, one would scarcely expect to meet with from a Lady of that holy calling and character which are ascribed to the writer of these pieces; as, an Uncredibility of Cocoldis; abominable sight of Monks; a rage of Mydenys; a superfluyte of Nunys, &c. which however true, those distinctions might be, are not very consistent with a woman in that character. But indeed, there are words so blunt and indecent, both in the treatise of Hawking (110), and in this poem on Hunting (111), as were very unbecoming a woman, in any character. There is another list in the next page, of the terms or phrases then used in carving, or, as it is called, of breekyng or dressing divers Beestis, Fowlis, and Fyshes. Lastly, there is a table in another page, of all the Shyreys and Byshopyches in the Realme of Englonde: but what congruity it bears with any thing in the foregoing treatises we perceive not. Thus all we see of Juliana Barnes is, that she verified a tract upon Hunting written by Sir Tritram, whom Mr John Manwood of Lincoln's-Inn, in his treatise of Forreft Law, calls a Monk and an old Forrester, and always in quoting it ascribes it to him, and never to her (†).

The next treatise printed in this book, tho' of a martial nature, and perhaps less likely to engage the studies of a religious woman, is yet by authors ascribed also to this Lady, tho' her name appears neither before nor after it. Beginning thus, *In thys booke following is determyned, The Lynage of Cote Armuris, and how Gentilmen shall be knowen for ungentill Men; and how Bondeage began, first in Aungell, and after succeeded in Mankynde; as it is shewede in processe, bothe in the childer of Adam and also of Noe, and how Noe derydyed the worlde in thre partes to his thre sonnys. Also there be shewyd the nine Colowris in Armys, figured by the nine Orderis of Aungelis; and it is shewyd by the forsaide Colowris, wch ben Worthy, and wch ben Royall; and of Ryalities, whiche ben Noble, and wch ben Excellent. And ther ben here the Virtuous of Chyvalry, and many other notable and famous Thynge, to the Pleasure of noble Personys, shall be shewyd, as the werkyes followyng wittnesse, whosoever likyth to se thaim and rede thaim, wch were to long now to rebere: and after theys notable Thynge aforesayde, followeth, The Blasynge of all maner Armys in Latyn, French, and Englysh: so it begins with, Incept Liber Armorum. Some fabulous Antiquities, Application, and Allusions, in this part of the said work, seem to have been gathered from another of much the like complexion (112), which informs us, the beginning of these laws of arms were before the ten commandments of God. It is here also observed, that Christ was a gentleman, by his mother's side; and Prince of Cote Armure. After this part, intituled, The Lynage, &c. consisting of twenty-two pages, follows the last part, concerning The Blasynge of Armys; in which there are a hundred and seventeen coats or scutcheons printed from wood, coloured, and blazoned in Latin, French, and English. The example of highest Antiquity here produced, is that of King Arthur; who is said to have changed his Three Dragons, and his other Shield of Three Crowns, for a Crofs of Silver, in a Field of Vert; with the Image of our Lady on the right, and her son in her arm. A little further it is observed of the Arms of France, which were, 'Three Flowris in maner of Swerdis, in a Felde of Asure, that they were given (from heaven) to the Kyng of Fraunce, in sygne of everlastyng trowbull, and that he and his successaries, allway with bataill and swerddys shulde be punyshid.' A little further, speaking of a coat consisting of a corded cross, the author says, 'The which cross I se bott late, in the Armys of a Nobull Man; the wich in very deed was summe tyme a crafty man, a Roper, as he hym selfe sayd.' Where the quartering of the Arms of France and Englonde is spoken of it is thus accounted for, that those of France appear first. 'It shall not be tedious to no man, that Fraunce is put before Englonde in blasynge; bot the cause is this, for thArmys of Fraunce, in armys to be put afore, and we have a generall rule, that whensoever in armys be two colouris, or moo, in the poynt of the Shelde, then ye shall not begyn at the poynt to blase them, bot in the right parte, or side, of those armys: that same* coloure, ther founde, in the right side of the Shelde, is nott the Felde of thArmys; for it may be fortune, it is not the greatest coloure in thArmys asof sayd, but les, or with othir equal; and never the les ye shall begyn to blase ther.' Another remarkable quartering is observed in the Arms of Queen Anne; the wife of King Richard II, who bare 'ThArmys of Englonde, Fraunce, and thEmperor of Almayn quartil, and in twenty one partes: that is to say, in the right side of the Shelde, in the first quarter, she bare thArmys of Fraunce, Thre Flore Delucis of Golde, in a Felde of Asure; and in the second quarter, Thre Libartis of Golde, in a Felde of Gowles; and in the third quarter, An Egle splayd with two Neckis; and in the fourth, A black Lyon rampyng, in a Felde of Silver; and so changeably she bare these Armys, in twenty one quarteris, the which feldyn is seen in Armys.' Further, on treating of Bordures Gobonated, it is said, 'This same Bordure baare that nobull Prynce the Duke of Gloucestyr, brothyr to that nobull weriowre Kyng Henri the fifth; the wich Royall Duke bare in his Armys, The hool Armys of Fraunce and Englonde quartly, with a Bordure Gobonated of Silver and Sable.' And after having discussed a nice point upon the Arms of Roger Mertemor Earl of Marche, whether they should be called Bordured or not, there is mention made, in another chapter, 'Of certain Nobles who bore Fusils in their Arms; of the number of which, fais our author, my Lord of Gloucestur that nobull Prince, uncle to King Henry the sext, was: adding, 'That he bore Three Fusils in a bar, in his Arms (but they are wrong blazoned in the text, or coloured in the scutcheon here) by the reason of certain Londes belongyng to the Mounte.' This seems to be one of the latest instances taken notice of in these examples of Blazonry, except that of the noble Roper at first mentioned, and the notice taken of Duke Humphrey's arms. And this last part consists of fifty-six pages, besides that which contains the Arms of St Albans at the end, beforementioned. Thus have we passed through this whole book; and it is a more ample description, or account of it, than has been yet given; the scarcity whereof has occasioned many erroneous assertions. Tho' no name is ascribed to this last part or book of Arms, yet has it been appropriated like the others to the pious Lady aforesaid. The author was apparently conversant abroad in the world, often among courtiers, and men of quality. And how likely such a person, such a criticke in the doctrine and laws of Chivalry, a science so full of ostentation to the world, was to have any superintendency over a Nunnery of religious votaries, trained to strict abstinence, sanctity, and retirement from the world, is not easy to resolve. But in short, this very treatise is said to be abstracted from that part of Dr Nicholas Upton's book of Military Affairs, which treats De Insignibus Anglorum Nobilium (113), who died in 1457, ten years after his patron Duke Humphrey, beforementioned, in the said treatise; to whom it was originally dedicated: And how inconsistent with the character and decorum that must have been expected in a Lady so religiously devoted, the other tracts in this book are, has partly before appeared. It seems not, that Bale or Pits ever saw this original edition, because they also mention with it, a book of Fishing, as of this Lady's writing; which is not to be met with, but in the second edition of these tracts, printed by Wynkin de Worde at Westminster, in folio, 1496; and therein it is neither ascribed to her, nor any body else; but only printed in this larger volume of those subjects relating to the Gentry and Nobility; that every idle and ordinary person might not be able to purchase it, as they would if it had been published in a little pamphlet by itself. And in the Preface to that Treatyse of Fysshynge wch an Angle, there is expressed some intentions also of publishing a Treatise of Fowling. But nothing more of Juliana Barnes appears, than her name at the end of the said doctrine of Hunting, as was before observed; from whence such high characters have been drawn of her, with such noble alliance, and such holy profession imputed to her, as are beforementioned. In that second edition, it has been noted, that she proposed in her said poem on Hunting, as her model, A Description of the Myribes of Huntynge by the Duke of

The same year also, he translated out of the Dutch tongue and printed, a political discourse called Reynard the Fox; besides two books of Cicero's, and two orations of Banatusius Magnomontanus (d), which are commonly bound in one volume together; of which three books, or six discourses, since the reader may expect some distinct account, as hath been given of the others, we shall in like manner draw together some description or memorials of them at the bottom of the page [M]. Tork, Master of the Game; and he might feign himself to appear in the character of the old Tristram beforementioned, or it might be the name of his principal Huntman or Forester. However that was, when the book appeared afterwards in a later edition, published, not improbably, by Gervase Markham, he says expressly in the title page, that the book of Hunting, Hawking, and Armory, were all compiled by Juliana Barnes in the year 1486 (114). And yet in the first paragraph of the treatise of Hunting which is here all reduced to prose, he says, These, and none other be the ancient laws of Sir Tristram; hence, Mr Manwood, in his Forest-Laws, as was said afore, always quotes Sir Tristram, and never Mrs Barnes; and not only gives him the title of Knighthood, but makes him a Monk withal. Sir Henry Chauncey never saw the edition printed at St Albans of this book, nor perhaps any other, because he calls it by a wrong title; The Gentleman's Recreation, &c. and makes the press delivered of it in 1481, five years before it's time

(115) But he contradicts himself in calling her Abbess of Sopwell, when he has a distinct chapter upon the religious foundation there, and only calls it a Priory; but mentions nothing of Juliana Barnes, in that place. The first person I have met with, who calls her Lady Prioress of that Nunnery, is the author of the printed catalogue of Bishop More's library, where he is giving a title of this book; and as for what has been more lately advanced (†), that Mrs Barnes was sister to Richard Lord Berners of Essex; in none of the pedigrees we have seen of this name, neither that in Sir Henry Chauncey's History last quoted, nor that, more copious, drawn up by the late Mr Peter Le Neve, Norroy King of Arms (116), nor that lately published in the History of the county of Essex (117) does any such Lady Abbess, or Lady Prioress, or any other Lady, of one name, or the other, appear, like those of her in question. And indeed, such a contrast of characters in one person, is apt to raise very contending ideas. One cannot reconcile the notions those subjects inspire, of their authors being so expert and familiarly practised in those robust and masculine exercises, with the character of such a sedate, grave, pious, matron-like Lady, as the Prioress of a Nunnery is imagined to be; a conjunction of such extremes, seeming quite unnatural. Indeed, we have, and so we may have had, your romping, roaring hoydens, that will be for horsing and hunting after the wildest game, in the most giddy company; but to join so much of these rough and impetuous diversions, as is required to obtain the proficiency afore-said, with the most serene and solemn profession of a mortified and spiritual life in herself, and the charge or care of training it in others, must make an unaccountable mixture. In that light, there appears such a motley masquerade, such an indistinction of petticoat and breeches, such a problem and concorporation of sexes, according to the image that arises out of the several representations of this religious Sportswoman or Virago, that one can scarcely consider it, without thinking Sir Tristram, the old Monkish Forester, and Juliana, the Matron of the Nuns, had united to confirm John Cleveland's Canonical Hermaphrodite (118): but other examples of the like inconsistencies being also united to dress up one character, might make this appear the less extraordinary, if there was any need to instance them.

[M] Description or memorials of them at the bottom of the page.] The first of these here mentioned, is intitled, The Siege and Conquest of Jerusalem, with many other Histories therein comprised: and of the Miseries of the Christen men in the holy Land; and of their Relief, &c. and how Godfrey of Boleyne was first King of the Iatyns in that Royamme; and of his Death: translated and reduced out of Frenshe into English, by me sylvester person William Caxton; being begun the 12th of Marche, sylvester the 7th of Juyn, and enprinted the 20th of Novembre, fol. 1481. The design of this work, as we said was, that every Christian man might be the better encouraged to enterprize war for the defence of Christendom, and to recover the said city of Jerusalem also, that Christians may go thither with strong hand to expel the Saracens and Turks out of the same, that our Lord might be there served, &c (119). Matters of fact seem to have been the chief pursuit of the author in this History, and tho' some merveilleux works do occur in it, yet it seems not so over-run with enthusiastick romance, as some other Histories of this age, on that subject are. Our translator says, he presents this book to King Edward IV. which very presentation book was sold in the auction of Mr Richard Smith's library (120). That expedition was incited by Pope Gregory VII. and it was reported, that no less than two hundred thousand Christians were confederated therein, old and young, rich and poor, went without any pressing or compulsion. Besides Godfrey of Boleyne, there were other chief leaders, as Bemon, Duke of Naples; and Hugh, the King of France's brother: and this passage was made by the Vyfyon of our Lady, as Master Caxton informs us in another book (121). The next work, intitled, Thystrorie of Reynard, or Reynart the Fox, in 4to, was looked upon by the late Mr Thomas Hearne, the Antiquary of Oxford, to be an admirable piece, written with a good design to represent a wise and politic government. In the first page of it, as Mr Lewis informs us, for this is one of Caxton's pieces we have never seen; there is his cypher, before spoken of (122), printed in this manner, but larger; in memory, as it is presumed, of the year in which, and the person by whom, the art of Printing was first practised among us. We are by the same author informed, that Caxton says there is in this book, 'Wreton the parable of good Leryng, &c. for an example to the people.' And that he says further, 'I have not added ne mynyshed, but have followed, as nigh as I can my copi, whiche was in Dutche; and by me Wylyyam Caxton, translated into this rude and symple Englyshe, in the Abbaye of Westmestre the vi day of Juyn in the yere of our Lord M.CCCC.LXXXI, and in the xxi yere of the reigne of Kyng Edward III.' The third volume he printed this year, is intitled, — Tullius his book of Old AGE; whereunto is added, his book of FRIENDSHIP; and the Declaracyon, shewing wherein HONOUR sholde reste: emprinted by William Caxton, fol. 1481. He does not mention who was the translator of the first part of this work, which is Tully de Senectute, as Leland has also observed: but a late author informs us of a memorial of Wylyyam de Wyrcestre, alias Botaner, which he has entred against the year 1473, by which it appears that he was the translator of this piece; in which memorandum it is said, 'On the 20th of August, I presented to Wylyyam Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester, the book of Tully of Old Age, translated by me into English (123).'

This Wylyyam Wyrcestre was an Antiquary and Physician, from whence he had the name perhaps of Botaner or Herbalist; and also an Astronomer of great abilities for the age he lived in. He was born in the city of Bristol, anno 1415, and was sometime servaunte and soget, or subject, with his reverent master John Fastolf Chevalier, and exercised in the werres continually above 44 yeres, (†) and in so great favour he was with Sir John, that he left him one of the executors of his last will, which is dated a little while before his death on the third of December 1459. In faithful and cordial affection to the memory of his said renowned master, he wrote a book of the Life and Actions of the said Sir John Fastolf, which we hear is in being, and likely to be published. That account of his being the translator of this book is further confirmed by what Caxton says in his Preface before it, 'That it was translated and thystrories openly declared by the ordennance and desyre of the noble aunyent Knyght of Caxton's preſs, was a copious body of Hiſtory in the year 1482, intituled Polychronicon, according to the Engliſh translation of John de Treviſa, from the Latin of Ranulphus Higden, the Monk of Cheſter. Upon this Hiſtory, Caxton beſtowed ſome extraordinary pains; not only in tranſcribing it intirely over, to modernize, and render the obſolete ſtyle more conformable to the phraſe or language of his own time, but he compiled and added alſo a Continuation thereof, down to the beginning of the King's reign under whom he then lived; and after that, he was at the trouble of collecting, and writing into the margins of his impreſſion, the ſeries of Chronology, which was wanting in the copy he followed. And yet here, as in all other of his books, he ſpeaks of his moſt toiliſome endeavours with ſo much diffidence and humility, as if he feared they would prove more offenſive than acceptable, and procure him rather the cenſure than approbation of his readers; as may appear in the abſtract of his own account of the ſaid Hiſtory ſubjoined, and the obſervations which others have made thereon [N]. less than six books, said to be of his printing, extant, if not one or two more also printed in the same year, that are undated. served (126); however Archbishop Uther, and Bishop Nicholson after him, among other mistakes, say, those interpolations were not made by Trevisa, but the editor (127). But as Mr Lewis rightly observes, out of the old manuscript of this translation, it was ended by Trevisa in 1387; which will comprehend the latest date mentioned by him in those notes. After the said seven books, we have one more compiled by Caxton himself, which continues the history down to 1460, 'and the first year of King Edward IV. which amounts 'to an hundred and three years,' says he, in his epilogue, at the end of the book; which exactly corresponds with the year in which Higden concluded his Chronicle. But in respect to the edition Caxton has made, he complains for want of those advantages which printing, had it been in use in that period, might have afforded, by the intelligence or communication of historical materials for his purpose; that few writers could be heard of in those days, who preserved in their registers the occurrences of the times; so that he could meet with no other authorities than a book entitled, Fasciculus Temporum (128); and another, called Aureus de Universo, which yet contributed but little to his undertaking. Indeed the fifteenth century has not been accounted very fruitful in eminent writers, especially of history: And it has been observed, particularly of the reign of Edward IV, that even the favourers of justice and his cause, have not known what account to give of the times (129), or how to form a regular history out of such an heap of confusion. Yet there were authors in that age who might have been assiduous to Caxton, could he have arrived at the knowledge of them; but their writings remaining in manuscript, and, as it were locked up in obscure confinement, till they were set at liberty by the press, are come to be better known in our times, than when they were written (130). We shall only observe further of Trevisa's translation, that the chronological tables, wherewith Higden says he charged his margins, in double and treble columns, were omitted in the copy that Caxton followed, or at least left unprinted by him; wherefore in some of the printed copies, those tables are written throughout with red ink, and probably with his own hand. And all we shall further add of Ralph Higden, the reputed author, is, that by a comparison which has been made of some old MS. copies of this Polychronicon, with the Polyeratica Temporum of Roger Cestrensis, a Benedictine Monk also of St Werberg, that are reputed in the Harleian Library, there have been some reasons found to believe, that our Ralph of Chester did endeavour to appropriate Roger of Chester's labours to himself; and particularly by a crotchet used in the initial letters of the several chapters, wher he begin his Polychronicon, out of which it has been observed there may be read these words, Præsentem Chronicam compilavit frater Ranulphus Monachus Cestrensis. But this was a whimsey used by other historians of those times, as an author before cited has observed (131).

[O] They may all be comprehended under one note.] Yet that we may speak distinctly of them, we shall begin with that which is called, The Pilgrimage of the Soule; translated out of Frenshe into Englishhe: Full of devout maters touching the soule, and many questions assayed, to cause a man to lyve the better in this world, &c. It was printed by Caxton at Westminster, and finished the sixth day of June, fol. 1483. 'and the first' yere of the regne of Kynge Edward the Fyfte (132). This Pilgrimage is related in the manner of a dream. The author was a man of copious imagination; and this version out of French, with somewhat of additions, as it is said at the end, was made in the year of our Lord 1413. Mr Maittaire says it was written in French by Antoine Gerard, and entitled by him Le Pelerinage de l'Amé, and printed at Paris 1480. (133). As for the translator, it does not directly appear who he was, but among the additions abovementioned to be made, some, if not all of the poetry, seems to be a part; and much of that, written in the stile and stanzas of John

Lydgate. This is remarkable, that the thirty-fourth chapter of that poet's Life of the Virgin Mary, which is a digression in praise of Chaucer, and the author's lamentation for the loss of him, who used to correct his works, he being then newly dead; and that, the thirty-fourth chapter of the second book of this Pilgrimage should be the same poem; which being unsuitable for any body to repeat, to whom Chaucer had not done such services, offers some probabilities that this translation was made by Lydgate (134). The next he this year printed is entitled,

Liber Festivalis: or Directions for keeping Fast all the year. 'Tis said to be printed at Westmynstyre by William Caxton the last day of Jun, Anno Domini 1483, in quarto (135). It consists of short discourses or sermons on the principal sundays and holy days in the year. There have been many editions of this book. We never saw this of Caxton's; but one printed, though without the printer's name, by Wynkin de Worde in 1496, we have seen, and others. Those sermons on the principal Fasts and Feasts, &c. are interlarded with historical narratives out of the legends; that the clerks who excused themselves for default of books, might have this to teach their parishioners therein, and shew them, what the saints suffered and did for God's sake. Mr Hearne observes, 'That this 'book consists of a course of homilies, in which are 'many odd stories: That it goes by no other name 'but that of Festivalis, among curious men, who are 'very inquisitive after copies of it (136).' It may be further observed, that some of those odd stories are such, that the Papists are now ashamed of them. Mr Lewis speaks of four sermons more added to this edition, which were also of Caxton's printing, as he says, and which, we, as well as Mr Palmer, have seen in a separate book; but printed also by Wynkin de Worde, though his name is not mentioned therein; yet visibly his performance, as well by his type, as his custom of registering at the end, the number of his signatures. This English book, printed at Westminster the same year as the other, 1496, has a Latin title, and is called Quatuor Sermones, though it is not very distinctly divided into four sermons; but the two first seem to be comprehended under certain topics, by which we are instructed how to attain the knowledge of God. As the articles of the Lord's Prayer, Creed, and Commandments (137), the seven Sacraments, the seven Deeds of Mercy, the seven deadly Sins, and the nine Torments of Hell. The third sermon treats of the three parts of Penance; contrition, confession, and satisfaction: And that which seems to be the last sermon is called the General Sentences, or Church Curses; which were read to the congregation quarterly; some of which are singularly observable; ending very expressly against the with-holders of Tythes. After which follows the Modus Fubnandi Sententiam, in Latin; wherein all the violators of any articles mentioned in the said general sentence, are excommunicated, anathematis'd, given up to the Devil, and damn'd by hety Church, to all intents and purposes; wherever they are, in whatever doing, unless they repent and make satisfaction; after which sentence the lights were extinguished ad Terrorem, and all the bells set a jangling (138). This quarterly custom of cursing and damning the people, was begun, it seems, by Archbishop Langton, in the year 1222; of which constitution, and the exposition of John Wicliff thereupon, more may be read in one of the authors before quoted (139). We are in doubt, whether there be any older editions of the Liber Festivalis, and the Quatuor Sermones, in English, than those here mentioned, however they have been ascribed to Caxton, under the year aforesaid; and if there is not, they should be referred to Wynkin de Worde.

The next book he printed this year, is entitled, Confessio Amantis: That is to saye in Englishhe, The Confession of the Lover; made and compiled by Johan Gower; squyre, borne in Walys, in the Tyme of King Richard the second. Which book tretteth, how he was confessid

And at the end we read as follows, Emprynted at Westmestre, by me Wyllyam Caxton, and fynished the 2d day of Septembre, the fyrst yere of the regne of King Richard the Third, the yere of our Lord a Thousand CCCCLXXXIII. which, to agree with that year of the said King, must manifestly be a figure of X too much; like the error of setting one too few, in the early printed book, beforementioned, at Oxford. The very Title of this original edition may serve to correct several errors; and among others, even in so eminent an Antiquary as Leland; who says, as Fuller also does, and every body else after him, that Gower was born in Yorkshire (140), whereas he appears, in the very front of this book, to have been a Wellhman: Then again, they have made him of the knightly order, and called him Sir John Gower, after Bale, &c. But here we see he is called no more than a squire. The same author would also make him Poet Laureat, from the little band or fillet, with four roses, or white quarter-foyles, that were carved about the head of his monumental effigies in St Mary Overy's church, as if it had been a wreath of bays; and Fuller, from the same, would think him a Judge (141), though that, with the collar of SS. carved round his breast, and a white swan at the end of it, were no other than the cognizances of Henry Earl of Darby; afterwards King Henry IV. which his esquires, or some of his officers wore; as may hereafter more particularly appear elsewhere.

(141) Fuller's Worthies in Yorkshire.

But there is an error in Mr Mattaire, of misspelling his name, which Mr Lewis has fallen into (142), and which could proceed from nothing else, but the mistaking one letter in his name, as it appears in that old print, for two; where the first stem of the w appearing so much longer than the others, they have taken it for an l and a v, so instead of Gower they have called him Golver. This work he begun at the encouragement of King Richard the second, as his own words inform us (143), and in the sixteenth year of his Majesty's reign. When, as he more particularly tells us, meeting that King upon the river of Thames, his Majesty call'd him into his own barge, and among other discourses, enjoined him to undertake some new work for his own entertainment. Therefore he resolv'd upon such a performance as might neither be void of prudence for the wife, nor matter of diversion for those who were gallantly dispos'd. And because few men then wrote in English, as he tells us, in his second prologue (144), 'he determined to write this book in our own tongue, for the general use of his countrymen.'

(142) Life of Caxton, p. 80.

Thus we see his motive for writing this book, the matter it treats of, and the time when he began it; but through the frequent interruptions of sickness and natural infirmities of old age, it seems he did not finish it long before the said King was murdered in Pontefract Castle in Yorkshire. And about that time he address'd it by the second prologue to that Prince's successor, Henry of Lancaster, aforesaid. This last prologue, only, was printed with this first edition of Gower; but from such an imperfect copy, as 'tis said, that it wanted in several places, not only leaves, but whole columns and pages; which, together with the changing of words, and transposing of sentences, made this easy author unintelligible, as the next editor, Tho Barthelette, pretends (145), who was printer to King Henry VIII, dedicated his edition of this book to the said Prince, and in his preface thereto restores the original prologue. Chaucer and he us'd to submit their works to each other's correction; and he wrote many other books, besides this, both in verse and in prose; and one or more of them is in being, though none besides was ever printed. He was blind some time before he died, if after he was so, he presented his song in Praise of Peace, to King Richard aforesaid; and it is not unlikely but he survived Chaucer some few years, though the time of his death is not distinctly agreed on.

The next product of Caxton's press, in the same year was, The Golden Legend: wherein ben conteyned alle the hygh and grete Festys of our Lord; the Festys of our blessyd Lady; the Lyves, Passyons, and Myracles of many other Sayntes; and other Hystories and Actes.

(144) Printed in this first edition.

Fynished at Westmestre, by Wyllyam Caxton 1483. This is the first edition of the Golden Legend in English; it is printed in double columns on a spacious form, and that copy which we have seen, is perhaps the largest and most pompous of Caxton's printing; adorned with many wooden cuts, different from those in the following editions; with the initial letters in red ink. At the end, whence the title above is extracted, we also read these words; 'Whych werke I have accomplished at the commandement and requeste of the noble and puyssaunte Erle, and my speycal good Lord Wylliam, Erle of Arondel.' There is but one preface to this edition; but to his next, in a smaller size, there is also another; expressing, that as the work would be over-chargeable to him, he began to despair of going through with it; till the said Earl sent a gentleman to him, named John Stauncy, who solicited him, in no wise to leave off, and promised that the said Lord during his life 'Shold geve, says he, and graunt to me a yerely fee; that is, to wete, a bucke in fommer, and a doo in wynter; with whych fee I hold me wel contente, &c.' It is an error in Bishop Nicholson, where he says, That Cassgrave's Legenda Sanctorum Angliæ was translated into English by Caxton, and first printed in the year 1516 (146). Tho' indeed, he does, as he is charged by that author in the Legend of St Ursula, add 15,000 men to the martyrdom of the 11,000 virgins, from what he had heard at Cologne. But after all the monstrous improbabilities of that story, how rationally the said 26,000, may be reduced to two persons, may appear in a modern French Historiographer, who is of Father Sirmont's opinion about this Legend, that those who first broached it, finding, in some old martyrological MSS. St Ursula, & Undecimilla V. M. that is, St Ursula & Undecimilla, Martyrs; and imagining that Undecimilla with the V. and M. which followed, was an abbreviation for Undecem Millia Martyrum Virginum; did thence out of two virgins, make eleven thousand (147). The truth is, of this whole volume, it is no translation from any one author; for Caxton tells us, he had by him a Legend in French; that we suppose, called La Legend d'Oree, and another in Latin, and a third in English, which varied in divers places; and also that many Histories were comprised in the two other books, which were not in the English one: therefore, says he, 'I have wryton one oute of the sayd thre bookes; which I have orderyd otherwyse than the sayd English Legendis, which was so tofore made (†).'

(145) T. Barthelette's Preface to his edition of Gower, as before.

The following editions have several of the Lives and Histories differently dispos'd. For this begins with the Advent, Nativity, &c. of our Lord: and this edition has at the end, The noble History of the Exposition of the Mass, and the Twelve Articles of our Faith, which are wanting in the following editions; but it concludes with the life of St Erasmus, the holy Bishop, as they do (148). Besides another edition of this book, printed by Caxton, the same year, as Mr Richard Smith has reported, in the copy he had thereof in his library (149), there was another printed by Julyan Notary; who has suppress'd Caxton's name at the end, as his custom was in reprinting his books (150); and afterwards there was another impression made of it by Wynkin de Worde; who at the end thereof says, that it hath been diligently amended in divers places, where it was requisite (151). The reason why it was called the Golden Legend, is therein given to be, 'That as gold pass'd all other metalls in value, so this Legend excelled all other books.' Yet an ingenious Spaniard has described it by a comparison of it's author to metals of a much inferior value (152), which indeed, in relation to several of the Monkish miracles in it, are more suitable thereto. The next he printed this year was,

The boke said or called Cathon, translated out of Frensch into English, in th'Abbaye of Westmestre 23 of Decembre 1483. It contains Cato's Distichs or Precepts in Latin, with a Version and Comment in English. And he tells us, it had been translated out of Latin into English by Master Benet Burgh, late Archdeacon of Colchester (153), and High Canon of St Stephen's at Westminster; but because there had lately fallen into his hands this book in French, which rehearsed many fair instructions, he had translated that into English;

There is but one preface to this edition; but to his next, in a smaller size, there is also another; expressing, that as the work would be over-chargeable to him, he began to despair of going through with it; till the said Earl sent a gentleman to him, named John Stauncy, who solicited him, in no wise to leave off, and promised that the said Lord during his life 'Shold geve, says he, and graunt to me a yerely fee; that is, to wete, a bucke in fommer, and a doo in wynter; with whych fee I hold me wel contente, &c.'

same year; but as we find not that they have any dates to them, whereby they can be positively fixed under this year, that which we have to say of them may be mentioned apart [P]. The next year, 1484, we meet with no more than a single specimen of his performance, unless that mentioned in the last note was printed the same year. Or this, and three more which we find of his printing the next year, 1485, it may be expected we should give some description, as of the rest [Q]. There has been a lish; which he presented to the city of London, and most gratefully tenders his service thereto; where he calls himself a Conjuror, or sworn citizen of the same, of the fraternity and fellowship of Mercury; and says, he owes of right his service and good-will to it, being in duty naturally bound to assist and counsel her as far as he can, even as to his mother, of whom he received his nouriture and living; and that he shall pray for the prosperity and policy of the same during his life.

The last we meet with of his, dated this year, is, The booke of Thenseignementes (154) and Techinge that the Knyght of the Toure made to his daughters, and speketh to many fayre Ensamplis. Enprinted at Westmestre, fol. the last day of Janyver, 1 Richard III. This he translated, he says, into our maternal English, at the request of a noble Lady, who had brought forth many fair daughters, for the love she always had towards them, and a desire to increase their knowledge in virtue; wherefore he entreats those who should learn any thing therein, 'By which they should ben wyfer and better, that they should give laud and thankyng to the sayd Ladyes good grace, &c.'

[P] That which we have to say of them, may be mentioned apart.] These two books Mr Lewis mentions as printed by Caxton under the year aforesaid, 1483, tho' there appears no date into them. The first, he named, The Fables of Æsop, Avian, Alphonfus, and Poggius: translated out of Frenshe into Englysh, at Westmestre. 'The leaves of this book, he says, are numbered, I^o. II^o. III^o. and it has the signatures, but not the direction, or catch-word; nor any date (155).' As we remember not to have met with it, we can speak no more of it. The other is intitled,

(155) Life of Caxton, p. 79.

The booke of the Ordre of Chyvalry or Knyghthode: translated out of the Frenshe, and imprinted by William Caxton, 4to, without date. Mr Lewis (156) has, by some mistake, inserted the year 1483, in that part of Caxton's Reherfal, at the end of this book, which he transcribes. We remember no other volume of so small a size of Caxton's printing. It consists of about an hundred pages, and is perhaps one of the scarcest of his performances that are now in being: Tho' no date of the year when it was printed is expressed, it may be guessed at within a year, over or under, by supposing it in 1484, from the short reign of that Prince to whom it is inscribed at the end, as we shall see. There are large initial letters used at the beginning of the chapters, and only one sort of points which are oblique or sloping dashes; there are also some double or united types, as in his other books; also signatures, but no catch-words at the bottom of the leaves, nor any numbers at top. It is divided into eight chapters. The I. shews how a Knight, who was an Hermit, bestowed this rule or order of Chivalry upon a squire. The II. treats of the original of Chivalry or Knighthood. III. Of the Office of Chivalry. IV. Of the Examination that ought to be made of the Esquyre, when he enters into the Order. V. In what manner the Squire ought to receive Chivalry. VI. Of the Signefyaunce of the Arms belonging to a Knight. VII. Of the Customs that appertain to a Knight: and VIII. Of the Honours that ought to be done to a Knight. By all which it will appear, how different the Honour, the Profession, and the Qualifications required in Knights anciently were, from those for which they have been created in latter days (157). At the end, we have Caxton's Epilogue or Reherfal; in which he says, this translation was made by him at the request of a genteel and noble Squire, according to the copy he delivered him; which book, he says, was not fit for ordinary persons, but only those noble gentlemen, who by their virtue intend to enter into the order of Chivalry; which had not been exercised as in ancient times, when the noble acts of the Knights of England were renowned through the universe, such, as before the days of Christ, were Brenius and Belinus; who from Britain, now called England, even to Rome, and beyond, conquered many realms; whose noble acts remain in the

Histories of the Romans. And since the Incarnation, behold, says he, that noble King of Britain, King Arthur, with all the brave Knights of the Round Table, whose deeds of Chivalry, fill to many volumes, as is incredible to believe. 'O ye Knyghts of England! where is the custom and usage of noble Chyvalry, that was used in tho dayes? What do you now, but go the baynes (*), and playe at dyse? And some not well advised use not honest and good rule, ageyn all ordre of Knyghthode. Leve this, leve it; and rede the noble volumes of Saynt Grael, of Lancelot, of Galaad, of Tristram, of Perseforest, of Percyval, of Gawayn, and many mo: there shalle ye see manhode, curtoyse, and gentleness. And loke in latter days of the noble actes syth the Conquest; as in Kyng Richard's dayes, Cuer du Lyon; Edward I, and the III, and his noble sones; Syre Robert Knolles, Syr John Hawkewode, Sir Johan Chaundos, and Syre Gaultier Manny: rede Froisfart (†). And also behold that victorious and noble Kynge Harry the Fyfte, and the Captrayns under hym; his noble brethren; therle of Salysbury, Montagu, and many other, whoos names thynge gloriously by their virtuous noblestes and actes that they did in thonour of thordre of Chyvalry. Allas! what do ye, but slepe, and take ease, and ar all disordered fro Chivalry. I wold demaunde a question, yf I should not displeafe. How many Knightes ben there now in England, that have thuse and thercerveye of a Knyght? That is, to wete, that he knoweth his hors, and his hors him? That is to saye, he beyngedy at a poynt, to have all thyng that longeth to a Knyght; an hors, that is accordyng, and broken after his hand; his armures and harnoyes mete and fyttyng, and so forth. I suppose, and a due serche shold be made, ther shold be many founden that lacke; the more the pyte is. I wold it pleasyd our soverayne Lord, that twyes or thryes in a yere, or at left ones, he wold do crye Justes of Pees, to thend that every Knyght should have hors and harneys, and also the use and crafte of a Knyght, and also to tornoye one ageynste one, or two ageynst two, and the best to have a prys, a dyamond, or jewel, such as shold please the Prynce. This shold cause gentylmen to resorte to thauncyent customs of Chyvalry, to grete fame and renowmee; and also to be alwey redy to serve theyr Prynce, when he shalle calle them, or have nede. Tenne late every man that is come of noble blood, and entendeth to come to the noble ordre of Chyvalry, rede this hyyl booke, and doo therafter, in keeping the lore and commaundements therin comprysed: and thene I doubt not he shall atteyn to thordre of Chyvalry, &c. cetera.' So he presents the said booke to his dread sovereign Lord King Richard, King of England and France, that he may command the same to be read to the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen within his Realm; that the said noble order of Chivalry may be hereafter better practised and honoured, than it had been of late times. So praying for his Majesty's welfare, and after this life, for one everlasting, he concludes (158).

[Q] It may be expected we should give some description, as of the rest.] The first of these four is called, The Ryal booke: or booke for a Kyng. In which is comprised, The Ten Commandments: The Twelve Articles of Faith: The seven deadly Sins: The Seven Petitions of the Pater-Noster: The Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost: The Seven Virtues, &c. It was compiled, as Caxton says, at the request of Philip le Belle of France 1279, and was reduced by himself out of French into English at the request of a singular friend, a worshipful Merchant and Mercer of London, for a special booke, to know all vices and branches thereof, and also all virtues; which for the great substance comprised therein, ought above all others to be called The Royal booke: or booke of a King; every man being such, as the Scripture calls him, who can wisely and perfectly govern himself according to virtue: and also

(158) Reherfal to the Booke of Chivalry.

Book of Homilies ascribed to him the same year, though it seems to be no other than the Liber Festivalis before mentioned, which my author has, among other errors, multiplied into two books more (e); and also entitles him to another in 1486, from Mr Bagford, which neither of them we believe ever saw (f). It is better attested, that in the year following he printed The Book of Good Manners in folio, which was compiled by Jaques le Graunt, an Augustine Friar, from the Scriptures, Holy Fathers, &c. It was delivered, as Caxton says, to him, by his special friend, who was a Mercer of London, named William Praat, and translated by him out of Frenshe, finished the eighth of June, the year last mentioned, and emprynted the 11th of May after, 1487. The year after this, we meet not with any books that are expressly mentioned to have been printed by him; whether he was interrupted by any sickness, as he was now grown very aged, and probably infirm; or the books he printed this year happen to be lost; or whether they were some of those he printed without dates, we cannot now determine. Indeed Mr Palmer ascribes one to him in this year, 1488, but erroneously; for it appears not to have been printed 'till after his death (g). In the year 1489, we meet with two books appropriated to him; an account of which may appear in the note referred to [R]. And two more of his

because it was composed at the request of that noble King Philip. It was printed the 2d of Richard III. fol. with figures (159).

The next is intituled, Thy storye of the noble, right, valyant, and worthy knyght, Parys, and of the fayr Vyenne, the Dauphyns Daughter of Viennoys; the whyche suffered many Adversitees, by cause of theyr true Love, or they coude enjoye the Effect thereof of eche other: translated out of Frenshe into Englyshe by William Caxton, at Westmestre, &c. Emprynted, fol. 1485. That Dauphin is here named, Sir Godfrey of Alaunson, kinsman to Charles, King of France in 1271. The story ends, after all their disappointments, with the Marriage of that Constant Pair. It does not appear, in Dr Middleton's catalogue of those books printed by Caxton, which are preserved in the publick library at Cambridge, that there is any copy of it there.

But what was accounted his capital work this year, is a large thick volume, intituled, The Byrth, Lyf, and Actes of King Arthur; of his noble knyghtes of the Round Table, their marvellous Enquestes and Adventures; the Acheyving of the Sang real; and in the end, Le Morte D'Arthur; with the dolorous Deth and Departing out of this World of them Al. Whiche book was reduced to the Englyshe by Syr Thomas Malory, knyght, and by me (William Caxton) devyded into twenty one bookes; chaptred, and emprynted and fynysht in th' Abbey Westmestre, the last day of July, the yere of our Lord 1485. That Sir Thomas Malory seems to have drawn this voluminous romance out of several manuscripts, written in the French and Welsh tongues, of the faine King Arthur and his Knights; and to be conversant in the adventures of such redoubted champions, Caxton thought would inspire a noble spirit of valour in our gentry, which made him recommend it to them, as was before observed (160). If this Sir Thomas Malory was a Welshman, as Leland, and others after him assert, he was probably a Welsh Priest; as appears not only by the legendary vein which runs through all the stories he has thus extracted and wove together, but by his conclusion of the work itself, in these words: 'Praye for me, whyle I am on lyve, that God sende me good delyverance; and when I am deed, I praye you all, praye for my soule; for this booke was ended the 9th yere of the reynge of Kyng Edward the Fourth, by Syr Thomas Malore, knyght, as Jesu helpe him for his grete myght as he is the servaunte of Jesu, bothe day and nyght.'

As the author has not made his heroes any great commanders of their passions in their amours, nor rigorously confined them to honour and decorum, in point of fidelity and continence, his book became a great favourite with some persons of the highest distinction for a long time. It had two or three impressions afterwards, and seems to have been kept up in print, for the entertainment of the lighter and more insouled readers, down to the reign of King Charles I (161), though Mr Ascham had long before passed such a censure upon it, as might have put it out of continuance upon his remembering, at what time, and in what place, it had supplanted all others; where he observes that, in our forefathers time, when Papistry, as a standing pool, covered and overflowed all England, few books were read in our tongue, saving certain books of Chivalry, as they said for pastime and pleasure; which, as some say, were made in Monasteries, by idle Monks, or wanton

Canons; as one, for example, MORTE ARTHUR; the whole pleasure of which book standeth in two special pointes; in open man-laughter and bold bawdry. In which book, those be counted the noblest Knights that kill most men without any quarrel, and commit foulest adulteries by subtilt shifts; as Sir Lancelot, with the wife of King Arthur, his master; Sir Triltram, with the wife of King Mark, his uncle; Sir Lamerock, with the wife of King Lote, that was his own aunte. This is good stuff for wise men to laugh at, or honest men to take pleasure in! Yet, says he, I know when God's Bible was banished the Court, and MORTE ARTHUR received into the Prince's chamber (162).

The third book we meet with of his printing this year, bears the title of Thy story and Lyf of the most noble and Crysten Prince, Charles the Grete, Kyng of Fraunce, and Emperour of Rome: reduced out of Frenshe, by William Caxton, and by him emprynted the first day of Decembre, fol. 1485. This work, through its great scarceness, has not been sufficiently described in the Histories of our first printed books. Dr Middleton, by not mentioning it, implies, that they have it not in the publick library at Cambridge; and Mr Lewis mentions it in such a cursory manner, as if he had never seen it (163). Though it was originally compiled mostly to the honour of Frenchmen, yet, as our translator observes, it is for the profit of every man. Herein, besides the History of Charlemain himself, the reader will find that of Richard of Normandy, with the feats of Rowland and Oliver, and several others of his champions. Much of that vein which was in the spiritual inspirers of Invasions against the Turks, Saracens, and other Miscreants, as they were called, under the title of the Holy War, appears in this book. It was first gathered together by our translator, at the incitement of Henry Bolounyer, Channon of Laufanne, the whole three parts out of two French Books; that is to say, The first and third part, out of an old authentick book, named (†), Myrrour Hystorial (a fine copy whereof was in Isaac Vossius his library) and the second part out of an old romance; and at the request of some singular friends, especially Mr William Daubeny, one of the Treasurers of King Edward IV. Jewels, translated into English, and printed as above. Whether that treatise of the Actions and Manners of the Emperor Charles, which is said to have been written by Christiana of Pifa before mentioned in French, and finished on the last day of November 1404 (164), was serviceable in the compiling of this, we know not, having never seen it.

[R] An account of which may appear in the note referred to.] The first of these books is intituled, The Doctrine of Sapience. It is a collection of discourses upon moral and divine subjects, illustrated with examples and parables; and divided into eighty-three chapters. The two last whereof are, 'First, The Excuse of hym that made thys booke.' And the other, 'The Complaint of hym that made thys boke.' In the former of these, we find that the same was first made in the year of our Lord 1388, by the Rev. Father in God, Guy de Roy, Archbishop of Sens; but the year after, a religious brother of the Order of Clugny, reading it diligently over, and finding it deficient in examples and authorities, he supplied it therewith; preserving, however, all convenient brevity; because, in matters of devotion, the world

The one a profaick translation of Virgil, or History drawn out of his poem of Æneas; and the other, a book of necessary instructions or preparations for death; a doctrine he now very wisely took to the learning of, since he was so near putting it in practice. These are the two last books we have met with of his printing that are dated; and as there are always some historical memorials, or other remarkable particulars, in the proems or postscripts of his other books, that are worthy of preservation or revival, so there are in these; which therefore deserve some extract to be made of them, like the rest [S]. Others have entitled him to the printing of several books beyond was then so moderate, as to be satisfied with a little, and preferred short masses, but long meals. It was translated by Caxton, out of French at Westmestre, and finished the 7th of May 1489. One of the authors who have written of Caxton, mentions this as the first book he had seen with Caxton's cypher printed at the end of it; but it is to be found, as we have observed, in some, much earlier. If he did not use it so early as to the book of Chefs, it might be found taken out of another book, and bound up with it, and so answer Mr Palmer's account, that it did appear therein; but it is wanting in many of his books, wherein it was first printed, because being printed often on the last or spare leaf, at the end, it has, as a picture, been torn out by children (165). Not that it is always a proof the book was printed by Caxton, wherein it does appear; for it is well known to those who have been conversant in our first printed books, that Wynkin de Worde used Caxton's cypher to many books by him printed several years after Caxton's death, which has occasioned frequent mistakes in our catalogues, and multiplied the list of Caxton's books, far beyond the number he printed.

The other work printed by Mr Caxton the same year is called, The book of the Fayttes of Armes and of Chyvalrye: made and drawn out of several authors, by Chryssyne of Pyse, in Frensch: translated into English, and printed by William Caxton, fol. 1489. This Lady was born at Pifa in Italy; but removing with her father to Bologne in France, she wrote her book in the language of that country, and flourished about the year 1400. In her Prologue to this book, she apologizes for herself, to those who would object, that the handling of her distaff and spinning-wheel might have better become her, than meddling with those warlike subjects, according to the example of Minerva; by answering, that the invention and even use of arms, were owing to that Goddess, as well as arts. Her work, divided into four parts, is gathered out of Frontinus, Vegetius, and Tharve of Batayllis; with many other thynges sett into the same, requisite to Werre, &c. There are some chapters towards the end, treating of that final Trial of Right, &c. by single combat, within the lists, as it was allowed and ordained by the Imperial and Lombard laws; which have been esteemed the most curious part of the book. What opinion King Henry VII. had of it, may appear by Caxton's own words at the end, where he says, 'It was delivered to him by that King in his Palais of Westmestre the 23 of January in the 4th year of his regne; who desired and wylled him to translate it into English and put it into print, that every gentleman born to arms, and all manner of men of warre, &c. should have knowledge how to behave themselves in feats of war, &c.' Accordingly the translation was finished the 8th of July the said year, and emprinted the 14 day of July next following, and full finished (166).

[S] Some extract to be made of them, like the rest.] The first of these two books is intituled, The Booke of Eneydos; compiled by Vyrgyle: which hath he translated out of Latine into Frensch, and out of Frensch, reduced into Englyshe, by me William Caxton, the 22 day of Juny, the Yere of our Lorde 1490; in a thin folio. This reduction of that epic poem to an historical narrative in prose, was then a very acceptable and much approved work, to familiarize ingenious men to the contents thereof, and attract them to a better acquaintance with the original. As to the author, he seems to be that person, whose book in French, upon the same subject, was printed seven years before (167). This work begins so high as the building of Troy by Priamus, and is continued beyond the slaughter of Turnus by Æneas, to the succession of his son Ascanius, and two or three successions beyond. In the sixth chapter the author has some digressory animadversions upon Boccace, for relating the story of Dido, in his Fall of Princes, differently from Virgil; and recites his account, as well as that of his author. And in chapter 33, he passes over Æneas's descent into hell, because 'tis feign'd, and not to be believed; as if several other parts of this story, which he has repeated, were not as incredible as that. But to pass to the Translator and Printer; we observe his style to be more ornate, as he terms it, or dressed up in superfluous words, especially of the French extract, than we believe it would have been, had he not submitted it to such correction as he gratefully owns was done by him. There appear also some improvements in the printing of this book, beyond what may be observed in some of those before spoken of, by a greater regard to regularity in the page, and not running out, but keeping the lines all even at the end. There are also here large initials at the beginning of every chapter, and besides commas and periods, also colons and semicolons, or what might be designed as such, though not always printed perhaps to answer the purpose of them (168). Our Translator, in his preface, which is near two leaves, informs us, that sitting in his study, where lay divers paussettis and books, this work in French happened to come to hand; in reading whereof he took great pleasure, for it's judicious and eloquent style; for which, as well as the subject matter, he thought it would be very proper for the instruction of young Noblemen, as it had long since been learned daily in schools, especially in Italy and other places; so he undertook to translate it. But when he saw and considered the fine and strange terms to be used therein, he doubted whether it would please some gentlemen, who had lately objected, that in his translations he had adopted some over-curious terms, which could not be understood by the common people, and desired him to make use of old and homely termes in his translations; that is, long-accustomed and native, not new-fangled and foreign words; and he wishes he could satisfy every body; so he took an old book and read in it, but he found the English so rude and broad that he could not well understand it. And the Lord Abbot of Westminster (†) shewed him certain evidences written in old English, for him to reduce into the then current language, and he found them so written, that, he says, they approached nearer Dutch than English, and he could not make them plainly understood. And certainly, says he, our language, now used, varyeth ferre from that which was used and spoken when I was born; for we Englysh men ben borne under the domynacyon of the mone, which is never stedfaste, but ever waverynge; wexyng one season, and waneth and dyscreaseth another season; and that comyng Englyshe that is spoked in one shyre varyeth from another. In so muche, that in my dayes happened, that certaine merchautes were in a ship in Yansye, for to have sayled over the see into Zelande, and for lacke of wynde, they taryed atte Forland, and went to lande, for to refreshe them; and one of them, named Sheffelde, a Mercer, came into an hows, and axed for mete, and specially he axed for eggs, and the goode wyfe answered, that she coude speke no Frenshe; and the marchaunt was angry, for he also coude speke no Frenshe, but wolde have hadde eggis, and she understode hym not. And thenne at laste another sayd, that he wolde have eyren; then the good wyf sayd, that she understod him wel. Loo, what sholde a man in thyse days wryte, eggis, or eyren? Certainly it is harde to playse every man, by cause of diversite and change of language. For in these days, every man, that is in any reputacyon in his countre, will utter his communicacyon and matters in such manners and termes, that fewe men shall understonde them; and som honest and grete Clerkes have ben wyth me, and beyond this year, 1490; but their mis-reckonings, with the causes thereof, may manifestly appear. Indeed, besides all those books abovementioned, which are ranged in their annual order, according to the direction of their dates, we find that he printed also several others, which are undated; therefore cannot be distinctly remitted to the years under which they first appeared. And some there are, which neither mention the time when, the place where, nor the person's name by whom, they were printed; yet were probably set forth by him, though not after the year aforesaid, nor all of them, that have been ascribed to him; because both his type and his cypher, having been sometimes used by his successor, as hath been observed, have misguided some; as an erroneous opinion that he lived three or four years longer than he did, has others, to father performances upon him in which he could have no hand. Of all these undated books we shall make the clearest distinction we can, and speak in the best order our intelligence has enabled us, under one more head or division [T]; and then, all that remains more to be observed is, that and desired me to wryte the moste curyous termes that I coude fynde: and thus, between playn, rude, and curious I stand abashed. But in my judgmente, the comyn termes that be dayli used ben lyghter to be underfonde than the old auycent Englyshe. And for as moche as this present booke is not for a rude uplondyssh man to labour therein, ne rede it, but only a Clerk and a noble gentleman, that feleth and understandeth in faytes of armes, in love, and in noble Chyvalry; therfor in meane betwene bothe, I have reduced and translated this sayd booke into our Englyshe; not over-rude, ne curyous; but in such termes as shall be understanden, by Goddys grace accordyng to my cople. And yf ony man wyll entermete in redyng of hit, and fyndeth suche termes that he cannot understande, late hym goo rede and lerne Vyrgyll, or the Pytles of Ovyde; and ther he shall see, and understande lightly all, yf he have a good redar and enformer; for this booke is not for every rude and unconnyng man to see, but Clerky's and very gentylnen that understands gentylnes and scyence. Then I praye alle them that shall rede in this lytyl treatys, to holde me for excused for the traslatinge of hit; for I knowleche my selfe ignorant of connyng to expwyse on me so hie and noble a worke. But I praye Mayster John Skelton, late created Poete Laureate in the Unyversite of Oxenforde, to oversee and correcte thys sayd booke; and taddresse and expowne where as shall be founde faulte, to thym that shall requyre it: for hym I knowe for suffycient to expowne and Englyshe every dyfficulte that is therein: for he hath late translated the Epytles of Tulle, and the booke of Dyodorus Scyculus (+), and dyverse other workes oute Latyn into Englyshe, not in rude and olde langage, but in polyshed and ornate termes craftely; as he that hath redde Vyrgyle, Ovyde, Tullye, and all the other Poets, and Oratours, to me unknown: and also he hath redde the ix Muses, and understands their muscalle Scyences, and to whom of them eche Scyence is appropred: I suppose he hath drunken of Elycon's Well. Then I praye hym, and such other, to correcte, adde, or mynyshe, whereas he, or they, shall fynde faulte; for I have but folowed my cople in Frenshe, as nygh as me is possible. And yf ony worde be sayd therein well, I am glad; and yf otherwyse, I submytte my sayd boke to theyr correctyon; which boke I presente unto the hie born my tocomyng naturell and soverayne Lord Arthur, by the Grace of God, Prynce of Walys, Duc of Cornewayll, and Erle of Chester, fyrst begoten sone and heyer unto our most dradde, naturall, and soverayn Lorde, and most Crytten Kyng Henry the VII, by the Grace of God, Lorde Kyng of Englonde, and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Ireland; by sechyn his noble Grace to recyve it in thanke of me his most humble subget and servaunte: and I shall praye unto Almighty God for his prosperous encreasyng in vertue, wysdom, and humanyte; that he may be egal with the most renoued of alle his noble progenytours; and so to lyve in this present lyf, that after this transitorye lyf, he, and we all, may come to everlastyng lyf in heaven; Amen. We read in Mr Lewis, That the bright and accurate author of the Dunciad tells us, Caxton translated into prose Virgil's Aeneis as an History; and that he speaks of it in a very singular manner, as of a book hardly known. But this censure, says my author, is confuted by the very copy of Caxton's Preface to this book, which even this ingenious writer has printed in his appendix. So he extracts some particulars before recited; and concludes, with, How easy a matter it is to make dunces at this rate (169)!

The other book he set forth the same year is called A Lityll Treatise, shorte and abredged, spekyng of the arte and craste to knowe well to Dye: translated oute of Frenshe into Englyshe, by William Caxton, the xxv day of Juny, and printed by him, folio, 1490. This important subject, of such universal behoof, was prudently undertaken by Mr Caxton at the age he was now advanced to, and under the decay he now perhaps felt approaching, which put an end to his laudable labours by then he was about a twelvemonth older. It is the more to be regarded, in that he chose, by this work to set himself the example of that doctrine which is therein recommended. It is divided into six parts; treating Of the Praife of Death, and how we ought to die gladly; Of the Temptations we are under at the Point of Death; Of the Questions that ought to be made at that Time; Of the Instrucons that ought to be given; Of the remembrance of God's Dooings and Sufferings for us; and Of certain devout Prayers that ought to be said by, or for, the dying Person. From all which articles it may evidently appear, as the author concludes, That to every person who would die well, it is necessary that he learn to die, before death comes, and prevents him (170).

[T] And speak in the best order our intelligence has enabled us, under one more head or division.] And first of those who are thought to have been among some of his earliest productions. Among these, as he had a singular respect for Chaucer, so after he had it in his power to extend his renown, by the publication of his works, he seems to have no longer deferred this justice to them, than he could procure the manuscripts that would inspire him to pay it. From thence he printed, I. Boecius de Consolatione Philosophie, in folio, without date, or place where printed; without capital initials to the chapters, signatures, catch words at bottom, or numbering of pages at top. In his postscript at the end, he says, that forasmuch as the style is difficult to be understood by simple persons; Therefore, the worshipful Fader and first foundeur and embellisher of ornate eloquence in our English; I mene Maister Geffery Chaucer hath translated this sayd worke oute of Latyn, into oure usual and moder tonge; folowynge the Latyn as neygh as is possible to be understande; wherein, in myne oppynyon, he hath deserved a perpetuall lawde and thanke of all this noble Royame of Englonde; and in especial of them that shall rede and understande it. Then he tells us further, that because this translation was not dispersed, nor known; att the requete, says he, of a singuler friende and gossib of myne, I William Caxton have done my debuoir and payne tenprynte it, in form, as is here afore made, in hopyng that it shal prouffit moche peple, to the wele and helth of their soules, and for to lerne to have and kepe the better pacience in adversitees. And furthermore, I desir and require you, that of your charite ye wold praye for the soule of the sayd worshipful man, Geffery Chaucer, first translatur of this sayde boke into English, and embellisher, in making the sayde language ornate and fayr, which shal endure perpetuall, and therefore he ought eternally to be remembrid; of whom the body and corps lieth buried in th'Abbey of Westmeistre beside London to fore the chapele of Seynte

Benet, by whos sepulture is wretton on a table hanging on a pylere, his epitaphye maad by a Poete Laureat, whereof the cople foloweth, &c.' This epitaph, consisting of thirty-four lines in Latin, was composed by Stephen Surigon, Poet-Laureate of Milan, at the cost and instance of Mr Caxton; and may be seen in several editions of Chaucer's works (171). It is not improbable, but Chaucer himself was under some such tribulation, when he translated this book, as the author was, when he wrote it: but of that, we have no room to expatiate here. Another part of the same author, Caxton also printed, as we are informed, which was, II. A Collection of Chaucers and Lydgates Poems, quarto. This book is without any signatures, date, or name of place, or printer, and contains fourteen pieces of theirs and John Skogan's writing, as they are enumerated by Mr Lewis (172). That this collection was of Caxton's printing, we cannot affirm, having never seen it. But others of Chaucer's works are well known to have been first set forth by him, as III. The Canterbury Tales; tho' it doth not appear, that any of our Typographical Historians have seen a perfect copy of his edition, because they have quoted nothing from the proem, or epilogue of it. That which we have seen in the Harleian library was imperfect, so is another that Mr Samuel Pepys was possessed of, which is preserved with his other books, in Magdalen College Cambridge. The contents thereof were transmitted by Dr Daniel Waterland, Master of the said college, to my author, when he was writing upon this subject, and he has printed the same (173); wherein it appears, that the number of Prologues and Tales in the said copy amounts to fifty; besides, as it seems, Chaucer's tract of Repentance or Retraction for writing his Parson's Tale; which, in some following editions, was rejected as spurious, and an imposition upon his name, contrived by some of the Priests, in revenge for his having exposed them. We have been informed, that Caxton published two editions of Chaucer's *Canterbury Tales, but some have observed, that he could not get such complete copies as have since been discovered, and that therefore his editions have fallen into such neglect and decay. We have seen some other little pieces of Chaucer's that were also printed by him, as IV. His Troilus and Creseyde, folio, without date; and V. The Book of Fame, made by Geoffrey Chaucer, emprinted by Wylliam Caxton, fol. without date. This poem is in three books, and towards the end of the second, there is, in a note written upon the margin of the copy that was in the Harleian Library, in a modern hand, these words, 'Here all other editions are imperfect; and there are some lines in others which are not here, and therefore are to be suspected.' Caxton, at the conclusion of this work, has given a great encomium of Chaucer (174). These two pieces are printed in a less character than the edition beforementioned of the Canterbury Tales, which we have seen; but it might be of the same size with that of the other edition that is spoken of; and so Caxton might by degrees, as he could meet with the manuscripts design a compleat and uniform edition of Chaucer; but we think he never did proceed much forward towards the same, than what we have spoken of. But to the other Poet lately mentioned with him, we have seen entitled, VI. The Lyf of our most bleffyd Lady, Mayde, Wyf, and Moder of our Lord Ihesu Cryste: Compiled by Dan. John Lydgate, Monke of Burye, at the Excitation and Styrring of the Noble and Victorious Prince, King Harry the fyrste. Emprinted by Wylliam Caxton. Folio, without date. This is a poem, divided into eighty-two chapters, three of which are concerning the Virgin's Midwives; and therein are to be found, which is more than every body knows, the names of them. In the conclusion we have some of Master Caxton's poetry, with two ballads, as he calls them, in Latin and English (175). There is another work of the same author printed also by him under the title of VII. The Laborous and most Merveylous Werkes of Sapience; a thin folio, without date. Though neither the Author's nor Printer's name appears to this poem, it was visibly enough printed by Caxton, and composed by Lydgate, had we not the authority of John Stow for it, in the catalogue of his writings. The author tells us it was written at the command of his Sovereign, perhaps King Henry V. and it seems to be one of the scarcest of his pieces extant. It is not mentioned, as we remember, by any writer who has undertaken to enumerate Caxton's works. There seems to be more invention in it, and variety of matter, than in most other of his compositions; displaying, after a copious debate between Mercy and Truth, Justice and Peace, a distinct survey throughout the palace and domains of Sapience, of all the products of Nature, Arts, and Sciences, in several chapters; with his further references at the end of each, to the authors who have written upon them (176). We have also VIII. his book named, Speculum Vitæ Christi: or, The Myrrour of the bleffyd Lyf of Cryste: Compiled from the Latin Booke of Dr Bonaventure, De Meditatione Vitæ Ihesu Cristi. Together with a short Treatise of the byhest and most worthy Sacramente of Crystes bleffid Body, and the Merveylles thereof, &c. folio. Imprinted by William Caxton, without date. This book is divided into seven parts, according to the seven days of the week; and in the Latiu Proem before it we are informed, that whatever is translated therein from the work ascribed to Bonaventure, is distinguished in the margin by a B, and all the rest, which is interlaced by the Translator, is signified by an N. It is further said in that Proem, that, about the year 1410, the Compiler presented the said translation and additions, to Archbishop Arundell, for his inspection and examination, before it was published; who singularly approved of it, and exerted his Metropolitan authority in recommending it to the publick, for the edification of the Faithful, and the confutation of the Lollards. It is adorned with many wooden cuts; and the first of them, printed before the said Proem, represents the Translator presenting his book to the said Archbishop of Canterbury (177). The reason given for the title of this book, as Mr Lewis observes, or it's being called The Myrrour of the bleffyd Lyf of Ihesu Cryste, is because the Life of Christ may not be fully described, as the Lives of other Saints, but in a manner of likeness; as the image of a man's face is shewed in the Mirror, or looking glasse (178). The next that occurs, is IX. Three Ecclesiastical pieces in Latin, intituled, Directorium Sacerdotum: seu Ordinale Secundum Usum Sarum; una cum Defensorio ejusdem Directorii: Item Tractatus qui dicitur Crede Mihi, fol. without date. To this book is prefixed a Calendar; at the end of which is Caxton's cypher; and in the Prologue that follows, it appears, that the said Ordinal was written by Clement Maydestone, Priest, the same, we take it, who was a learned Carmelite, and wrote the History of Archbishop Scroop's Martyrdom (179), besides other things. At the end of the Defensorium Directorii, there is a colophon, expressing, That Directory and Defence of it to have been printed by William Caxton at Westminster near London. After which follows the Crede Mihi, which was so named, because it might be depended upon, as the true and approved form or rule of the church of Sarum (180). These three are said to be the only tracts we have of Caxton's printing in Latin; though there is a good deal of Latin text mix'd with several of the translations he published; as Cato, Boëtius, and two or three more; which are proofs sufficient that he did not confine himself only to the printing of English books. X. The Chastysing of Goddes Chylidren, a book proffittable for manne's soule, and ryght comfortable to the body; and specially in advertise, fol. without date (+), or any appearance of the Printer, further than by Caxton's cypher. There is a copy of it in Secretary Pepys's library. XI. A booke composed of divers Gostly Matters; of which the first is named Oraculum Sapientie: shewing seven points of true love of everlasting wisdom. At Westmire, folio. This name was given it, because the subject of it was communicated to the author in a vision, under the figure of a Fair Orloge, adorned with roses, and cymbals sweetly sounding. There is besides in this book, 2. The Twelve Prouffytes of Tribulation, and 3. The Holy Rule of Saynt Benet. Printed also at Westmire, at the desire of certain worshipful persons, perhaps rather at Caxton's press than by him, as the Latin lines by my author quoted seem to imply (181). XII. The Curiale of Aleyn Charetier, translated out of French into English, and printed in a very thin folio, strength of intellects in the advanced years he was now arrived at, that he kept preparing folio, by W Caxton, without date. This is the copy of a letter he wrote to his brother, who desired to come and live at Court (182). That Charetier was a famous French Poet and Historian, and Secretary to Charles VI and VII, Kings of France. He was a great refiner of the French language, and died in 1458 (183). By which it may be computed, that his poem called La Belle Dame sans Mercy, could never be translated by Chaucer, though an old translation of it is printed in his works. XIII. The Lyf of the Holy and blessed Vyrgyn Saynt Wenefryde. It is a very thin folio, of fifteen leaves only, without date, but, at the end of the Life is this colophon, 'Thus endeth the Decolacion, the Lyf alter, and the Translacion of Saynte Wenefrede Virgyn and Martir, whiche was reysed, after that her Hede had been smyton of the space of 15 Yere; reduced into English by me William Caxton.' Then follow the Offices of the Popish Church, in Latin, upon the day of her passion, her translation, &c (184). Whether this is a translation of that religious Romance from the Epitome of her Legend in Friar Capgrave, or from his original, written more at large by Robert prior of Shrewsbury, we have not leisure to examine; but from a copy of this prior's Life of her, there was an English translation published above an hundred years since (185), which being reprinted towards the latter end of Queen Anne's reign, with additions, by it's Popish editor, of several miraculous cures performed at Winifred's Well in Wales, there was another impression given of it the next year by Dr William Fleetwood, then Bishop of St Asaph, with such learned and judicious notes annexed thereto (186), as may serve to reduce the zeal of her Pilgrims to a due temper, and correct the jesuitical dose of miracles, to the satisfaction of all readers, having either affection for the reasonableness of our Established Faith, or aversion for the dotages of Popery.

* One of these editions might be only supervised or corrected by Caxton: for Richard Pynfon, in the Proheme to his edition of the Tales, styling Caxton his worshipful Master, says, that, 'This booke had bin diligently over-seene, and duely examined, by his Politike Reason, and Oversight.'

There are still some other books, which have been thrust into the lists of Caxton's Works, which we have met with no certainty that he ever printed: such as, 1. The Siege of Rhodes, in prose; written, and dedicated to King Edward IV, by John Kay his humble Poet Laureat. 2. The Spousage of a Virgin. 3. The Book of Arts and Sciences. 4. De Fide et Cantu Famule sue. 5. The goodly Narration, how St Augustine, the Apostle of England, raised two dead Bodies at Long Compton: Collected out of divers authors; translated by Jhon Lidgate Monk of Bury. This ridiculous miracle is pretended to have been performed upon the corps of a patron of the church there, who had been excommunicated an hundred and seventy years before, and on the corps of the Priest who had so expelled, to confront him, because he had refused to pay the said Priest his tythes (187). Of this fiction, which betrays it's own inconsistency with the age it pretends to concern, there is also a MS. in the Cottonian Library; and such a tract, with the aforesaid title, was printed in quarto about the year 1525, but no body has produced, or pretended to hear of one, printed so early as Caxton's time. There has been likewise 6. The Life of St Edward the Confessor, ascribed to him in Mr Bagford's Catalogue of his Works, which is all the authority others also seem to have had for repeating it in theirs. Some books he might print no further than in part, and leave them unfinished, which might be completed by his successor; others he might recommend, or leave in charge, to be printed after his death. Hence, perhaps, we may some how account for that different expression at the end of some books which are reputed his, Caxton me feri fecit. In one of those cases, the leaving of a book behind him, which he had not quite printed, or composed at the press, we are told there is an example in 7. The Lyff of that glorious Vyrgyn and Martyr Saynt Katheryn off Sene: With the Revelacions of Saynt Elyzabeth, the Kynges Daughter of Hungarye. Emprynted at Westmynstire, by Wynkyn de Worde; fol. without date. It is thought that Caxton translated this book, and printed the greatest part of it; being visibly with his type, all but the last page, and two or three leaves besides in the book, which are said to be printed with Wynkin's letter; if the difference in that book which occasioned this observation, was not owing to the taking some leaves out of one impression to compleat the said copy, which might be of another. As for Caxton's cypher at the end of it, it has been said before, that Wynkin used it to several books he printed entirely himself after Caxton's death; yet perhaps with some regard or distinction to such only, as Caxton might have some hand in, design of printing, or desire to have printed. That remarkable Legend was compiled by Fryar Reymond, of the Order of St Domyne, Doctor of Divinity, and Confessor to this Holy Virgin. He says the truth of what is here written may be proved by the writings of her Confessors, and also the witnesses he propoies to cite at the end of each chapter; and they were doubtless thought needful; here being many miracles fastened upon her, as well after, as before her death, which happened on the twenty-sixth of April, 1380. As for St Elizabeth, who ended her life in 1261, she declared she had so great certainty of all her Revelacions, that 'She wolde rather suffre Deth, thenne 'doubte ony lytyll part of theim, that they were not 'trewe (188).' As for that St Katherine, the said Wynkin also printed afterwards a book of her Revelacions, in which she is called the New Seraphical Spouse of Christ, and she concludes her work with begging of him 'That she may renne in the dedly 'way, with the lyghte of Holy Faythe; with the 'whiche lyghte me seemeth, thou haste made me now 'lately, Ghoslye Druke (189).' The work is said to have been written as she indited, in her mother tongue, was translated into English by Dane James, and printed at the cost of Richard Sutton, Esq; Steward of the monastery of Syon. The copy, whence these observations were made on it, had belonged to the Lady Elizabeth Strickland, a sister of that monastery, and is still in being. The last book we shall take notice of that has been ascribed to Master Caxton, is intitled, 8. Vitas Patrum: The right Devoute, moche lowable, and recommendable Lyff of the ould auncient holy Faders Hermytes; late translated out of Latyn into Frenshe, and diligently corrected in the City of Lyon, the Yere of our Lord 1486, upon that which hath be wrytten, and also translated out of Greke into Latyn, by the blessed and holy Saynt, Saynt Jerom, &c. and other solitary religyous Persones after him; and after, in the Yere of our Lorde 1491 reduced into Englyshe; following the Copy, alwaye under Correcceyon of Doctors of the Chirche. Emprynted in Westmynstire by Wynken de Worde, folio, with several wooden cuts, 1495. The said Wynkin, in his colophon at the end of those Lives of the Hermits, or Holy Faders havyng in Deserte, informs us, it was translated out of Frenshe into Englyshe by Wyllyam Caxton of Westmynstire, late deed, and that he synysbed it at the laste Daye of his Lyff. Had these particulars been duly regarded, they might have prevented those errors, which have been the consequence of stretching his life two or three years beyond that in which he died. There have been other mistakes made about this book, as if it were only a different edition of the Golden Legend before mentioned. But it is indeed a different book from any already spoken of, and may properly enough be admitted into the Catalogue of Caxton's Works, in his character as a Translator, though not as the Printer thereof (190).

This is all we have here to say of Caxton's Works in particular; some more pieces there are, we might be thought tedious to speak any further of, which have, in certain Catalogues, been attributed to him; wherein through ignorance, or craft to advance their value, his name is often joined to old black-lettered books, which he did neither translate or print; as others, which he did, may have been lost, before their antiquity rendered them rarities, and desirable to be preserved in the libraries of the curious. His judgment in the choice of those authors or arguments upon which he did bestow his time and labour, is rarely to be called in question; because, as we have often observed, the subjects were commonly pitched upon, and he enjoined and encouraged by others, persons of the highest rank and authority, to set them forth. As for the choice or form of his type or letter, his, like that of the other first Printers, must have been taken from the most established, and best known writing then in use; for had they used any new invented character, men must have gone to school again to have read it. As for other distinctions, in the mechanism of his work, or his improvements in the art of Printing, than we have incidentally spoken of, we shall refer our paring copy for the press to the very last. And indeed, that a man should, for twenty years together, after age had crept over, and begun to make impressions upon him, when others naturally covet a cessation from labour, especially of the brain; that he should still, after he had given between fifty and threescore testimonies of his indefatigable diligence, in the publications he had made, which are computed to have amounted to that number; and now, as he could be little less than fourscore years of age, that he should be desirous of giving still fresh and further instances of his zeal to promote or disperse the most virtuous examples and pious instructions among his countrymen; these, as they are no ordinary proofs of the painful services he bestowed upon them, so they have deserved no common acknowledgments. 'Tis easy to recollect, from what has been said, that the novelty and usefulness of his art, recommended him to the special notice and encouragement of three crowned heads, and their royal families, besides some of the greatest Noblemen in their reigns. And surely, as he justly merited those honours, he has also, praises that might be equal to them. It was the least then that Bale could bestow upon him, and yet some ignorant or ungrateful Translators have made it still less, where he says that he was Vir non omnino stupidus, aut ignavia torpens; a man by no means dull, or benumbed with sloth: Sed propaganda suae Gentis Memoriae studiosus admodum; but exceedingly intent upon spreading abroad the History of his country (b), and such other topicks, as we have seen, that he thought would most effectually inculcate religion, virtue, and good manners; to promote which, his great age seems not to have any ways abated his constant application; for he was now assiduously engaged in translating from the French, a large volume of the Holy Lives of the Fathers Hermets living in the Deserts; a work that still, from the examples of quiet and solemn retirement therein set forth, might further serve to wean his mind from all worldly attachments, exalt it above the sollicitudes of this life, and inure him to that repose and tranquillity, with which he seems to have resigned it. For we are informed by Wynkin de Worde, that this book was translated in the year 1491, by William Caxton, and that he finished it the last day of his life, as we have before observed in the preceding note. So that, nothing can be plainer, than that he finished his life and translation together, on the same day in that year; which, though others had also read, who have spoken of his death, yet has it been mistaken by most of them, because the book was not printed by the said Wynkin 'till four years after, in 1495; which date, and the expression of it's being translated by W. Caxton, late deed, they regarding more than the date of the translation, have concluded that he either died that year (i), or the year before (k). But Wynkin's account of his master's death is so true, that it agrees with the memorandum in being, of some expences at his funeral in St Margaret's church at Westminster, where, between the twenty-seventh of May 1490, and the third of June 1492, in the second year of this account, viz. 1491 (l), it appears, in the Warden's account-book of the said parish, that six shillings and eight pence were charged for four torches, and six-pence for tolling the bell (m), at the burying of the said William Caxton; and further, in the same book, among the receipts six years after, that he had left (we suppose in his last Will, though it is not to be found in the Prerogative Office) thirteen copies of his Golden Legend; and by another book, preserved also in the same place, being a Register of many particulars relating to the Abbey, that his executors gave to it, thirteen years after his death, two copies of The Life of St Katherine, and two of The Birth of Our Lady.

readers to Mr Palmer's remarks, who was a good judge, being a good Printer himself; and to the observations that may be made by an attentive inspection of Caxton's own books for that purpose. If any ask, How it came to pass that he printed none of the Greek or Roman Classics? we may answer, by another question, How came it that none of them were printed in those days at either of the Universities? why, it was not the taste of that age; it was not the reading in fashion: no, the Heathen and Profane examples in those old Greek and Roman Poets and Historians, were not so relishable to Mother Church, as Ordinals, Confessionals, and such books as would inspire pious contributions, and enlarge ecclesiastical revenues; or such as would instruct them in Holy Knight Errantry, in Pilgrimages or Sainterings to the Holy Land, or the brave attempts of Military Christianity, to ravish it out of the hands of it's Miscreant Professors by Holy Wars. As for his not printing any of the English translations of the Old or New Testament, as Trevisa's, and others there were, besides Wycliff's in his time, as well as some more early and less liable to objection; the danger of such an undertaking may appear in the words of Sir Thomas More, where he says, 'That on account of the penalties ordered by Archbishop Arundel's Constitution' (which were the same with those of being the Fators of Heresy, viz. the greater excommunication and death (191) 'though the old translations that were before Wycliff's days remained lawful, and were in some folkis handys had and red, yet he thought no Prynter would lyghtly be so hote to put any Byble in prent at hys own charge, and then hange upon a doubtfull tryall, whyther the first cople of hys translacyon was made before Wycliff's dayes, or synnis: for yff yt were made synnys, yt must be approved byfore the prynting.' But such an approbation, my author intimates, was not then to be obtained (192). In short, how much this new ART of PRINTING alarmed the Prelacy, and how much they feared it would uncloke the mysteries in which they had involved religion, so produce the Reformation which ensued, cannot better appear than in a letter of Cardinal Wolsey's to the Pope, where he says, That his Holiness could not be ignorant what divers effects the new invention of Printing had produced; for as it had brought in, and restored books and learning, so together it had been the occasion of these sects and schisms which daily appeared in the world, but chiefly in Germany; where men begin now to call in question the present faith and tenets of the Church, and to examine how far religion is departed from it's primitive institution. And that which was particularly to be most lamented, they had exhorted lay and ordinary men to read the Scriptures, and to pray in their Vulgar Tongue. That if this were suffered, besides all other dangers, the common people at last might come to believe, that there was not so much use of the Clergy: for if men were persuaded once, they could make their own way to God, and the prayers in their native and ordinary language, might pierce Heaven as well as in Latin; How much would the authority thority of the Moss fall? How prejudicial might this prove to all Ecclesiastical Orders (193)? However, Mr Caxton cannot be charged with any design, in establishing the Art among us, but what was very laudable: He had no thought of disturbing the faith, or tenets of the Church: He made choice of such books to print, as had a tendency to promote religion, and encourage virtue and good manners; or 'Books, in which he found many good enfeignments, and learnynge, and good ensamples for all maner of people in generally: special books to know all vyces and branchis

CECIL (WILLIAM) Baron of Burghley, Burleigh, or Burly, Secretary of State in the reigns of Edward VI and Queen Elizabeth, and afterwards Lord High-Treasurer of England; one of the ablest Statesmen, and one of the worthiest Ministers, that this, or perhaps any other, nation, has produced (a). There is no doubt that he was descended of a very antient and honourable house, and therefore there was no need that he should be flattered with a fabulous descent from an old Roman family. He was himself very knowing in genealogies, and made many of those collections, which have enabled such as have considered this matter since, to trace his pedigree with great perspicuity and exactness (b) [A]. His father was Richard Cecil, Esq; Master of the Robes to King Henry VIII, and his mother Jane, daughter and heiress of William Hickinton of Bourn, in the county of Lincoln, Esq; both persons of very great character and worth (c), and for whose memories their son testified the highest respect, even in his most exalted fortune [B]. He was born in the house of his grandfather David Cecil, Esq; at Bourn in Lincolnshire,

(c) Life of William Lord Burleigh by one of his Domesticks, MS. differing in some particulars from that published.

[A] With great perspicuity and exactness.] It is justly observed, by a very judicious author, that surnames in our country were a long time before they took any settled form, and that how well soever the descent of a family might be proved, there would be still great variations in the manner of spelling the name by which it was distinguished (1). As for instance, in the present case; Sitfild, Sicelt, Seycil, Seifeld, after which it came to be wrote Cycele, then Cycyl, as it stands in many of the old manuscripts of the reigns of King Henry VIII and Edward VI; last of all, it came to be spelt Cecil, as we write it now (2); and the reader will forgive me if I tell him, what I think he will not meet with any where else, that this new orthography seems to have been the invention of Polydore Virgil, at least the first time I have met with it, appears in a letter of his addressed to the noble person who is the subject of this article (3). From hence some took occasion to suggest, the descent of this family from a Patrician stock of the same name amongst the Romans, and a certain writer upon our Antiquities speaks of this very seriously (4): 'Of the families of the Camber Britons, says he, otherwise called Welshmen, or of such as being issued from Wales, do now remain in England, I shall not need to speak, considering their surnames are easily known, by being commonly according to their own most ancient custom. With this people it is not to be doubted, but that during the space of about five hundred years that they were subject to the Romans, divers of the Romans settled and mixed themselves among them, whose posterity bath since remained in account, as being of the ancient families of Wales, and I do find very probable reason to induce me to think, that, among others, the honourable family of the Cecils being issued from Wales, is originally descended from the Romans.'

But the truth of the matter is, that this surname is as little Welsh as Roman, for the best Genealogists agree, that Robert Sitfild, an assistant to Robert Fitz Hamon in the conquest of Glamorganshire, in the fourth year of King William Rufus, anno 1091, was the ancestor of the family (5); which Robert was rewarded with lands by the said Robert Fitz Hamon, for his services, and afterwards by marriage had Alterrennes in that part of Herefordshire called Ewyas land, with other lands in Herefordshire and Gloucestershire (6). From this Robert Sitfild the founder, the family is very clearly traced down to Philip Sifelt, who married Maud, daughter and heir of William

Philip Vaughan of Tilliglaste, by whom he had two sons, Philip, who enjoyed the estate of Alterrennes in the parish of Walterston, in the county of Hereford; and David, who was the grandfather of William Cecil, Lord Burleigh, of whom we are speaking (7).

This David Sifelt having purchased a fair estate in Lincolnshire, founded, 22 Hen. VII, a chantry in St George's in Stamford (8), and in 3 Hen. VIII, was constituted Water Bayliff of Witlesey-mere in the county of Huntingdon, and also Keeper of the Swans there, and throughout all the waters and fens in Huntingdon, Cambridge, Lincoln, and Northamptonshire, for the term of thirty years (9). Also in 5 Hen. VIII. he was made one of the King's Sergeants at Arms, and having this employment at Court, obtained, for Richard his son and heir, the office of a Page of the Crown (10). Likewise in 8 Hen. VIII, he obtained a grant for himself and son, of the Keepership of Clifford Park in the county of Northampton (11). And in 15 Hen. VIII, continuing still Serjeant at Arms, he was constituted Steward of the King's Lordship of Coly Weston in that county, and was Escheator of the county of Lincoln from 15 November 21 Hen. VIII, to 15 November 22 Hen. VIII (12). In 23 Hen. VIII, on the death of Sir William Spencer, Knt. he was constituted Sheriff of Northamptonshire for the remaining part of that year, and was also Sheriff the next ensuing year (13). And having been three times Alderman of Stamford, departed this life in the year 1541, the 32d of Hen. VIII, as should seem by the probate of his last Will and Testament, which bears date that year (14). It is very remarkable, that in this Testament, he is stiled David Cysfell of Stamford in the county of Lincoln, Esq; and that it appears he left behind him two sons, Richard and David, and a daughter Joan. His body, according to his directions, was interred in the parish-church of St George at Stamford (15), and it was at this gentleman's house, that the great man of whom we are speaking was born, as is mentioned above in the text; so that there was no kind of reason for recurring to art or contrivance, much less to fiction or forgeries, to entitle him to an ancient and honourable descent.

[B] Even in his most exalted fortunes.] It is requisite that we should here give some account of the parents of Lord Burleigh; and first then of his father, who, as we have shewn, was the eldest son of David Cysfell of Stamford in the county of Lincoln, Esq; and his own name Richard. By the interest of his father at Court, he was preferred, in the eighth year

Lincolnshire, September 13, 1520 (d), and received the first tincture of letters in the grammar-school at Grantham, from whence he afterwards removed to Stamford (e). About the year 1535 he was removed to the university of Cambridge, and entered of St John's college, where he distinguished himself by the regularity of his life, and a very strict, indeed a very surprizing, application to his studies (f) [C]. When he had laid a solid foundation of sound and useful learning, according to the laudable custom of that age, his father thought fit to send for him up to London, and about the year 1541 placed him at Gray's Inn (g), with an intention to have bred him in the profession of the Law, which, though his fortunes afterwards took another turn, was a circumstance very happy for him, as it led him to a perfect acquaintance with the constitution of his country, of which he was always a passionate admirer, and in every station of life zealous in it's defence and protection. While he was thus employed, an accident introduced him to the knowledge and favour of his Sovereign. It fell out, that O-Neil, a famous Irish Chief, being at Court, brought with him two of his Chaplains, who were very great bigots, not only to the faith, but to the power of the Roman Pontiff, with whom Mr Cecil, coming to see his father, chanced to have a very warm dispute, which was managed in the Latin tongue, with so great skill and vivacity on the part of Cecil, that the two Priests, finding their deficiency in point of argument, fell into a downright passion. This being reported to the King, who, whatever failings he might have, was certainly one of the most learned Princes of his time, he had the curiosity to see the young man, and after a long conversation was so much taken with his abilities, that he directed his father to find out a place for him, but as there was nothing vacant, the old old gentleman asked the reversion of the Custos Brevium, which was readily granted, and some years afterwards came into his possession (h). This early introduction at Court gave a new bias to Mr Cecil's inclinations, and induced him to think of pushing his fortune in that road which he had so happily entered.

of Henry VIII, to be one of the Pages of the Crown (16). In 12 Hen. VIII, he waited on the King at that famous interview with the King of France, between Calais and Guiennes; and in 22 Hen. VIII, being Groom of the Robes to that King, obtained a grant of the office of Constable of Warwick-castle, then in the Crown (17). In 27 Hen. VIII, being one of the Grooms of the Wardrobe, he had a grant of the office of Bayliff of the King's water called Wittlefeymere, and the custody of the swans, and of those waters called Great Crick and Merys, in the counties of Cambridge, Lincoln, Huntingdon, and Northampton, for the term of thirty years, after the expiration of the term granted to David Cysfell his father (18). In 31 Hen. VIII, he was Sheriff of Rutlandshire (19). In 32 Hen. VIII, being wrote Richard Cecyll of Burley in the county of Northampton, Esq; he had a grant to him, his heirs and assigns for ever, of the site of St Michael's priory near Stamford, and the church, and 299 acres of arable land, lying in the parish of St Martin's in Stamford, in the county of Northampton (20). In 34 Hen. VIII, being then Yeoman of the Wardrobe, he was made Yeoman of the King's manors of Naffington, Yarwel, and Upton, in the county of Northampton, for life (21). In 36 Hen. VIII, he purchased the manor of Efyngdon in the county of Rutland, then also in the Crown, as a parcel of the Earl of Warwick's lands (22). In 37 Hen. VIII, he surrendered his custody of Warwick castle (23). He remained Yeoman of the Robes to King Edward VI to the last day of his life, which was the nineteenth of May 1552 (24), and dying at Court, his body was interred in the parish church of St Margaret's Westminster. In the month of April, 1553, a commission was issued to Sir Richard Cotton, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir Walter Mildmay, Knights, together with Edmund Pidgeon, Clerk of the Wardrobes, any three or two of them, to take an account of Jane Cecil, and Sir William Cecil, Knt. Administrators of the Testament of Richard Cecil, for certain robes, apparel, and jewels of the King, in the custody of the said Richard (25). As for his widow, who was the daughter of William Hickington of Bourn in the county of Lincoln, she survived, and remained his widow thirty-five years, and was a very grave, religious, and virtuous Lady, delighting much in works of piety and charity, as well in her life-time as at her decease, and she had the comfort of seeing her children, and her childrens children, to the fourth and fifth generation, departing this life March 10, 1587, when she had lived seven years above fourscore. Besides the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, these worthy persons had three more children, all daughters, viz. Margaret, who married first Roger Cave of Stamford, Esq; and after his decease, Ambrose Smith of Bosworth, Esquire; Elizabeth, married first to Robert Wingfield of Upton, Esq; afterwards to Hugh Allington, Esq; and Anne, who was married to Thomas Whyte of Tucksford, Esq (26); The Lord-Treasurer Burleigh caused to be erected at the upper end of the north chancel in St Martin's church at Stamford, a noble monument to the memory of his parents, and by it is his own.

[C] Indeed a very surprizing application to his studies.] He was entered of St John's college May 27, 1535 (27), and finding several persons of distinguished parts then students there, this inspired him with such a thirst for learning, that he made an agreement with the Bell ringer to call him up at four o'clock every morning, applying himself with such vigour to his studies, that with much fitting a humour fell into his legs, of which, not without difficulty, he was cured, though his Physicians considered it as one of the principal causes of that inveterate gout with which he was tormented in the latter part of his life (28). Dr Nicholas Medcalfe, who was at this time Master of the college, was his great patron, and frequently gave him money to encourage him (29), but the strong passion he had to excel his contemporaries, and to distinguish himself early in the university, was the chief spur to his endeavours. At sixteen he read a Sophistry Lecture, and at nineteen a Greek Lecture, not for any pay or salary, but as a Gentleman for his pleasure, which was the more remarkable at that time, as there were but few who were masters of Greek, either in that college or in the university; but though he applied himself with so much assiduity to Greek literature, yet he always affected a general knowledge, as never intending to tie himself up to the study of any single branch of science (30). He pursued the same method when at Gray's-Inn, and took the assistance of conversation as well as books in both places, delighting very much in free disputes upon all sorts of subjects, by which he became very early both a copious and correct speaker. He was very happy in two qualities which rarely meet, for he had a strong memory and a sound judgment. He assisted both, by an indefatigable application, by recording every thing with his pen that occurred either in reading or from observation, and this in the most methodical manner, as is evident from the vast collections he left behind him upon a great variety of subjects (31). He addicted himself particularly to the Antiquities of his own country, and to the Histories of the great families, which he understood better than most men of his time; neither did he forsake his studies when he came into great employments, but was perpetually reviewing and adding to his notes, which gave him that admirable facility of writing, in which he surpassed most in his time, and was hardly excelled by any (32).

entered. In all probability he was encouraged to this by the family to which he became allied by marriage; for having espoused Mary, the sister of Sir John Cheeke, a gentleman of fair character and great learning, which seems to have happened about this time (i) [D], he was by him recommended to the favour of the Earl of Hertford, uncle to his royal pupil, so well known afterwards by the title of Duke of Somerset (k). In the beginning of the reign of Edward VI, he came into the possession of his office of Custos Brevium, which brought him in two hundred and forty pounds a year (l); and having married to his second wife Mildred, daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, the Director of the King's studies, he found himself as well supported in his pretensions at Court as he could desire (m). In 1547, his noble patron, the Protector, gave him at once a great proof of his favour, and a high mark of his confidence, by appointing him Master of Requests, an office, not of distinction only, but of great trust (n). He was quickly after favoured with another mark of the Protector's kindness, who took him with him in his expedition into Scotland, where he was present in the battle of Mulsburgh, Sept. 10, in the same year (o), and his life was very narrowly saved there by the tendernefs of one of his friends, who in pushing him out of the level of a cannon, had his arm shattered to pieces by that shot, which otherwise had dispatched Mr Cecil (p). Upon his return to Court he grew into such favour with his excellent master, that in 1548, he was advanced to the high post of Secretary, which he enjoyed twice in that reign, and for want of distinguishing this, some eminent writers have fallen into great confusion (q) [E]. But as there is no course of life so subject to sudden turns of fortune as that in a Court, so it was not long before Mr Cecil learned this from experience; for the very year after, a strong party being formed against the Lord Protector, many of whom were members of the Privy-Council, they assembled at London, while the King and the Lord Protector with his friends were at Hampton-Court, and finding themselves supported by the city of London, they sent a bold charge to the King, against the Duke of Somerset, to Windsor-castle, whither he was then removed, which produced all that they expected; for that noble person being of a mild and gentle disposition, and above all things apprehensive of a civil war, suffered himself not only to be divested of his power, but also to be made prisoner (r). At the same time, his friends, Sir Michael Stanhope, Sir John Thynne, Edward Wolfe, and William Cecil, Esqs; were committed to custody; and though it is asserted by some great Historians, that when the rest were sent to the Tower, Mr Cecil was discharged (s), yet we find in his own Diary that he was sent to that prison in November 1549, and we are also told, that he continued there about the space of three months (t). His behaviour however having been always just and moderate, had procured him many friends, and these

[D] To have happened about this time.] The author of his Life tells us, that on the 8th of August, 33 Henry VIII, he took to wife Mary Cheeke, sister of Sir John Cheeke, Knight, who lived with him not above a year and a quarter, by whom he had his first son Thomas. The same writer farther observes, that this was after he had spent some time at the Inns of Court (33). This does not very well agree with what Camden tells us, for he says expressly, that he married this lady in the twentieth year of his age, while he was at St John's; that he lived with him a year or two, and that after he came to Gray's Inn, he married his second lady (34). The truth of the matter is, that the former writer is somewhat, but Mr Camden is almost in every particular, mistaken. Lord Burleigh, in his manuscript diary, has set down the day of his birth, Sept. 13th, 1520. Mr Camden places his birth in the year 1521. Lord Burleigh, in his diary, sets down the time of his coming to Gray's Inn thus, May 6th, 1541, I came to Gray's Inn, when in my twenty-first year; and he marks the time of his marriage thus, August 8th, 1541, I married Mary Cheke at Cambridge; so that it is plain he married his first wife after he was at the Inns of Court, as the writer of his life says. In Lord Burleigh's diary we find, that his eldest son Thomas was born May 5, 1542, and that his first lady died Feb. 22, 1543, at two in the morning, so that she must have lived longer with him than the writer of his life mentions.

[E] Some great writers have fallen into much confusion.] It does not appear that any of our historians had the least intimation of Mr Cecil's being Secretary of State so early. The writer of his life says, that in the second year of King Edward VI. he was committed to the Tower about the Duke of Somerset's first calling to the Tower, that he remained there a quarter of a year, and was then enlarged, he then proceeds thus, The Duke of Somerset perceiving the King's great liking to Mr Cecil about the third year of the King's reign, preferred him to be Secretary of State, being but twenty-five years old, and Anno 5 Ed. VI. he was made a Knight (35). All which is equally confused and incorrect, for Mr Cecil was much older than he speaks of when King Edward came to the Crown, and it was not in the third, but in the second year of his reign, that Mr Cecil was made Secretary of State, the first time; which we learn from his own diary, where he entered it thus — Sept 1548. cooptatus sum in Officium Secretarii, i e. I was admitted to the office of Secretary in Sept. 1548. It appears from Bishop Burnet, that when the great disturbance happened in October, 1549, Sir William Petre and Sir Thomas Smith were Secretaries (36), but as we hear nothing of his removal, it is very probable that Mr Cecil was Secretary likewise, since as the reader will observe in the text, there were afterwards three Secretaries in this reign. It is plain, that Bishop Burnet was mistaken in affirming, that Mr Cecil was discharged at Windsor, and not committed with the rest to the Tower, since both himself and the writers of his life positively say the contrary (37). King Edward, in his Journal, makes no mention at all of Mr Cecil's being removed from his post, or of his being sent to the Tower; but he takes notice, that Dr Wotton was made Secretary of State at this time (38); and though Bishop Burnet is clear, that it was in the room of Sir Thomas Smith, yet it might as well be in the room of Mr Cecil, for Mr Camden, who mentions Sir Thomas Smith's being Secretary in this reign, says, that he was made so when Cecil was the other Secretary, and from thence it is not possible to distinguish when he was made (39). It appears from King Edward's Journal, that Mr Cecil did not long continue in disgrace, but was very soon brought into business again, though he was not restored to his office (40). When this happened we learn from those words in the King's Journal, Sept. 6th (1550) Mr Wotton gave up his Secretaryship, and Mr Cecil got it of him (41). In the month of October following the King granted him an annuity of one hundred pounds, in consideration of his said office, during his Majesty's pleasure, to be paid from the augmentation from the Michaelmas preceding (42). And thus we have done all in our power to clear up this matter.

these taking advantage of the King's personal regard for him, not only procured his liberty, but brought him again to Court, where his abilities were found so useful, that the Duke of Northumberland, who had now the greatest credit, was willing that he should be restored to his office, and accordingly, by the resignation of Dr Wotton, this was brought about (u). There are many writers who fix this promotion to the eleventh of October 1551, but his own Diary assures us it was in the month of September, and it appears from King Edward's Journal of his own reign, that it was upon the sixth of that month (w). But it is true, that on the eleventh of October he was knighted, and sworn of the Privy-Council (x). His credit and favour was now greater than ever, and his interest with his Royal Master such, that he was believed to have a great share in those productions that were said to fall from the King's pen; for when a letter from his Majesty, in relation to her perverseness in religion, was presented to the Princess Mary, she could not help crying out, Ab! Mr Cecil's pen took great pains here (y). He steered with all the caution and circumspection that those critical times required, and was particularly careful to avoid taking any share in the Court quarrels that were so frequent during that short reign. Yet it was not possible for him, with all his skill and diligence, to escape falling under some difficulties, more especially in that fatal business of the death of the Duke of Somerset, towards whom he is by some charged with much unkindness, for which, however, there is no visible foundation (z) [F]. The Duke himself was a man, though of a tender nature, sometimes intemperate in speech, and there is reason to doubt, that some who were pretty near him, might take occasion to excite and draw from him those unguarded expressions, which were afterwards made use of as a pretence, though a very poor pretence it was, to take away his life (a). Sir William Cecil did indeed keep his ground at Court, when his noble patron fell, but this was not owing to the Duke of Northumberland's favour, but to several other causes (b). In the first place, his abilities were wanted, and his moderation esteemed, the Duke of Northumberland being no enemy to men of capacity who did not oppose him. Sir William Cecil stood extremely well with the King, had his ear very much, and was the person to whom his Majesty confided his most secret thoughts; so that, without some apparent offence in him, no wife man would ever entertain a thought of his removal; add to all this, that he lived in strict friendship with the most eminent and worthy persons about the Court, and more especially with those who were immediately about the King's person, and we shall easily discern, why Northumberland himself, with all his power and his peevishness, chose rather to use the Secretary with the utmost civility, than to aim at giving him any uneasiness (c). Neither is there any necessity of recurring to any sinister motives, to account for that high regard shown by this powerful favourite to our rising Statesman, since, while all the rest of the

[F] For which however there is no visible foundation.] After what has been said in the former notes, and the variety of authorities alledged in support of the facts laid down in them, we may safely trust the reader with a piece of libel which was transmitted to the Lord Burleigh himself, when he was High-Treasurer of England, by one of his agents abroad, who extracted it from a Latin treatise, written and published by the Papists on purpose to defame him, in which there is collected all that had ever been whispered by his enemies to his prejudice, in regard to the first scenes of his life, thus it runs, 'Of the Lord Treasurer's pedigree they write in this manner; Cecil his father, groom of the Wardrobe, was never called master but in jest; and his mother would never suffer herself to be called mistress but when her son was made Baron of Burleigh. His grandfather, one of the King's guard, kept the best Inn in Stamford, himself first of all bell ringer in St John's College in Cambridge, and after grew by learning and cunning, by the help and favour of Sir John Cheeke, and Sir Anthony Cooke, to be Secretary to the Duke of Somerset, Protector, to whom he was a stickler, to set him against his own brother, the Admiral, for pleasing the Duchefs, and to cut off his head, as he did; the principal instrument to bring in Father Latimer to be an agent, as he was in that tragedy, and for this service, by the Duchefs of Somerset's procurement to her husband, Mr Cecil was made Secretary to King Edward VI. After seeing Dudley Earl of Warwick more cunning and potent than the Duke of Somerset, his master, he secretly forsok him, and betrayed him, and gave matter of overthrow to Warwick against him; for which service Mr Cecil was set up by Warwick, and brought into the King's favour and council again, and he followed that man's fortune so long as he stood in prosperity, even to the deprivation of all King Henry VIII. his children, and penned the proclamation and oaths that the Duke of Northumberland and Suffolk set forth against them, and could have been content to have dispatched them with his own hand, if Northumberland would have put him to it (43). As to his descent, and the estates of his family, when this noble person was born, they have been so fully set out from records, that no doubts can be entertained about them. As to the Lord Admiral, it is very probable, that in his post of Secretary of State Mr Cecil might draw some of the proceedings against him; but that either he or the Duke were instigated by the Duchefs to put that great man to death, is a vulgar calumny, since it is certain his own crimes made it necessary, and there are very few acts of attainder that can be so well justified as that by which he fell. He endeavoured to supplant his brother the Duke of Somerset, in the first year of his nephew's reign; he aimed at marrying the Lady Elizabeth, but being defeated in that, he privately espoused the dowager Queen Catherine, who it was strongly suspected he poisoned. He then renewed his addresses to the Lady Elizabeth, engaged the master of the Mint to cheat the King of ten thousand pounds a month, to enable him to raise a rebellion; and the very last words he spoke before his execution were, to direct his servant to carry two letters which he had written, to excite the Ladies Mary and Elizabeth to revenge his death upon the Protector. It was his own knowledge of this man's crimes, and not Mr Cecil's insinuations, that induced the pious martyr Latimer to speak against him in his Sermons (44). As for Mr Cecil's attachment to the Duke of Somerset, he lost his liberty and his office for him; and before his last troubles began, the Duke was so far from suspecting Cecil, that he sent for, and communicated his fears to him, upon which he made him this answer (45), That if he was innocent, he might trust to that, and if he was otherwise, he could but pity him, which does indeed prove the Secretary's prudence, but without the least prejudice to his integrity. As for the latter part of this libel, it will be cleared up by considering what is said in the text of his dislike to the whole proceeding, with regard to King Edward's will, founded upon inconceivable authorities.

[G] Which

Courtiers almost were involved in factions and intrigues, he constantly attended the business of his office. He was appointed one of the Commissioners for establishing a new body of Ecclesiastical Laws, and though Sir John Hayward affirms that this came to nothing (e), yet in that, as well as in many other things, he was mistaken (f). Secretary Cecil was also very assiduous in settling the debts of the Crown (g), and in contriving ways and means for their discharge, and, which must appear somewhat strange, considering the confusion of the times, he, at this juncture, framed a scheme for the benefit of trade, which ought to render his memory immortal [G]. It appears plainly, that notwithstanding the great favour the Secretary stood in with his master, and the court that was paid him upon this account by the greatest men, yet he neither made private advantages to himself by grants, nor would he hinder in any manner the fortunes of other men, as is clear from his consenting to the appointment of Sir John Cheeke, Third Secretary, with Sir William Petre and himself, and as that gentleman was his brother-in-law, it is very probable that he was instrumental in his promotion (h). On the 12th of April, 1553, Sir William Cecil was made Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, with an annual fee of an hundred marks, a very moderate reward surely for his many and great services (i). In reference to the disposition of the Crown, made by the King his master to the Lady Jane Grey, eldest daughter to Frances Duchefs of Suffolk, who was also the eldest daughter of Mary, Queen-Dowager of France, and Duchefs of Suffolk, younger sister to Henry VIII, it was an affair in contriving of which he had no concern, but, on the contrary, when he discovered it in agitation, he made such a disposition of his effects as he thought proper for their security, in case he was imprisoned, or obliged to leave the kingdom (k). A certain author indeed charges him with having a great hand in it, and with drawing most of the papers relating to that settlement, but without any colour of justice, for the instrument was drawn by the Judges, who thought to secure themselves from being answerable for what they did by taking out the King's pardon (l). Sir William Cecil, when he was desired to sign this instrument, as a Privy-Counsellor, by the King himself, refused to do it, but, at his Majesty's earnest entreaty, subscribed simply as a witness of the King's signing (m). After the decease of King Edward, the Duke of Northumberland would have had him draw the Proclamation of his daughter-in-law, declaring her title, and shewing the legality of it; but Sir William very judiciously observed, that this was entirely out of his province, and so transferred it upon the Attorney and Solicitor-General, as better skilled in the Law. The Duke would afterwards have put him upon writing a letter in justification of the Lady Jane's title, in which Queen Mary was to be treated as a bastard, but he plainly refused him, and his example being followed by every body else, the Duke was forced to draw it himself (n.) All this time the Privy-Counsellors were in the Tower, and looked upon themselves as little better than prisoners, which put Sir William upon contriving means for their escape, which was effected after the Duke of Northumberland's march into Cambridgeshire, by assembling the Privy-Council at the Earl of Pembroke's house, called Baynard Castle, where most of those who met declared for Queen Mary, the Earl of Arundel and Lord Paget going off to her that very night, and Sir William Cecil followed the next day, and though some attempts had been made to prejudice

[G] Which ought to render his memory immortal.] It was at this juncture that the liberties of the Merchants of the Steel-yard were seized into the hands of the Crown, from whence we may date all the beneficial trade of this kingdom (46). It is true, that our commodities and manufactures were exported before, and it is likewise true, that corporations multiplied apace; that new trades were continually springing up, and that a spirit of industry began to diffuse itself through the nation. Yet our commerce was in a bad situation; we had hardly any shipping, the staple of our woollen trade was at Antwerp, the Italians remitted our money, and the Germans and Flemings carried on the whole trade of export and import; so that while we were in this wretched situation, the people laboured and sweated, and the strangers ran away with all. A very few English merchants there were, and they took abundance of pains to give the government some light into this affair, and Sir William Cecil comprehending what they said, supported their cause so well in council, that they carried their point against the foreign merchants, by which I may venture to say the commerce of this island was set free; not that I concur in the common opinion, of there being little or no traffick before the reign of Queen Elizabeth, but because I am satisfied, from a very laborious enquiry into this matter, that though the trade of England was very considerable even then, yet the trade of the English was very insignificant, and must have continued so, if it had not been for this bold step, which shows how much good statesmen may do to their country, when they really mean it well, and take pains to inform themselves how it's welfare may be promoted. But besides this, Sir William Cecil was the patron of another project, which though it was not brought to bear, yet plainly shews how indefatigable he was in consulting the publick good. This project consisted in abolishing the staple at Antwerp, and opening two free ports in England, viz. Southampton and Hull. There is still extant a paper, containing the whole of this scheme, digested in the clearest method possible, showing upon what motives the staple at Antwerp ought to be suppressed, how far that conjuncture was favourable to such a design, the reasons why Southampton and Hull were made choice of in preference to other parts, the favourable consequences that might be expected from such establishments, and the danger and difficulties that were to be apprehended in making this attempt, with their remedies. We may from hence discern, that Sir William Cecil was none of those hasty ministers, who after taking a scheme into their heads, or having it proposed to them, proceed all at once to carry it into execution, without weighing or considering it's consequences; but a wife and prudent manager, who took care to examine every undertaking to the bottom, by viewing it in all the lights possible. The troubles and perplexities of that reign arising from factions at home, and the unsettled state of things abroad, prevented him at this time from performing, what, upon mature deliberation, he judged beneficial for the nation; but he never lost sight of his design, or abandoned his care of trade, 'till by degrees, and as occasions offered, he delivered it from most of those difficulties and embarrassments with which, 'till his time, it had been encumbered; and therefore we had reason to say in the text, that his conduct in this respect ought, amongst a wise, free, and grateful people, to render his memory immortal.

prejudice him in her Majesty's favour, yet he was very graciously received, and with very good reason (o) [H.] But as he very well knew that he had many powerful enemies, and foresaw the complexion of the ensuing reign, he made use of this early favour to obtain a general pardon (p). It is scarce to be doubted, that if he would have changed his religion, he might have continued in his office, but he chose to lose this that he might keep that. He did not however apprehend, that his having no share in the ministry, obliged him either to oppose those who had, or to forget the personal friendship and great intimacy in which he had lived with many of them, which therefore he kept up, and being well acquainted with the moderate and mild disposition of Cardinal Pole, he consented to go with the Lord Paget and Mr Hastings to invite him to England, which he accordingly did, and returned with him November 23, 1554 (q), in hopes that he might ballance the power of Dr Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, Lord High-Chancellor, and Prime-Minister to Queen Mary, a Prelate of great abilities, but very zealous for the religion and power of the Church of Rome, though he had not been always of that opinion (r). In the month of May 1555, he attended the Cardinal, with other Lords commissioned to treat of a peace, and remained beyond the seas two months (s). After his return, a Parliament being summoned to meet the twenty-first of October following, he was chosen Knight of the Shire for the county of Lincoln, and behaved in the House of Commons, not only with great freedom and firmness, but with much spirit and vivacity, having a large share in a debate which produced the rejecting of a bill from the House of Lords, for confiscating the estates of such as had quitted the kingdom on the score of religion (t). This behaviour, as it might be naturally expected, created him some trouble, out of which however he extricated himself by his great address, without the loss either of liberty or of reputation (u) [I]. He was again chosen to represent the county of Lincoln in the last

[H] And with very good reason.] There is something very singular in the account which a celebrated historian has been pleased to give us of Sir William Cecil's behaviour, for after telling us, that he waited upon the Queen, was graciously received, and might have kept this employment, if he would have complied so far as to have declared himself of her Majesty's religion, he closes these matters of fact with the following remark (47), 'He was nevertheless exposed to no persecution on account of his religion, whether his artful behaviour gave no advantages against him, or his particular merit procured him a distinction above all other Protestants.' As to the artfulness of his behaviour, it will best appear from the answer he gave to those honourable persons, who by command of the Queen communed with him on this subject, to whom he declared, 'That he thought himself bound to serve God first, and next the Queen, but if her service should put him out of God's service, he hoped her Majesty would give him leave to chuse an everlasting, rather than a momentary service; and as for the Queen, she had been his so gracious Lady, that he would ever serve and pray for her in his heart, and with his body and goods be as ready to serve in her defence as any of her loyal subjects, so she would please to grant him leave to use his conscience to himself, and serve her at large as a private man, which he chose rather than to be her greatest counsellor (48).' The Queen took him at his word, and this was all the art Sir William used to procure liberty of conscience for himself, unless we should call it art that he behaved himself with much prudence and circumspection afterwards. We may add to this however, that the remark is false in fact, as well as capable of being taken in a sinister sense, for there were many other Protestants treated with the like indulgence, such as Sir Thomas Smith, who had been also Secretary of State, and who had treated both Gardiner and Bonner roughly enough in the days of King Edward, and yet was not only suffered to live in peace, but also had a pension given him of one hundred pounds per annum (49). The famous Roger Ascham also, who had been Latin Secretary to King Edward, enjoyed both his freedom and his employment, and this by the favour of Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, as is plain from the letter he wrote that prelate, to desire his favour (50). It is therefore not unkind barely, but unjust, to represent Sir William Cecil as the only Protestant unpersecuted under the reign of Queen Mary, and as particularly distinguished in that respect, whereas others shared the same liberty, and were even better treated than he.

[I] Without the loss either of liberty or of reputation.] The business particularly mentioned in the text was occasioned by Sir William's opposition to the bill, for confiscating Protestants' estates, and some warm speeches

the same day on other subjects, but more especially in relation to a money-bill, in all which Sir William Cecil delivered himself frankly against the conduct of the administration. One day, says the author of his life, when he had spoken with more than ordinary applause, Sir Anthony Kingston, Sir William Courtney, Sir John Pollard, and several other members, invited themselves to dinner with him. Sir William said they should be welcome, provided they said nothing at table of parliamentary affairs, to which they agreed. At dinner, however, some of them talked a little too freely, for which Sir William reproved them, and charged them with breach of promise. The Privy-Council had intelligence of all that passed, and sending for the knights and gentlemen, committed them all, reserving Sir William Cecil to be last examined. As soon as he came into the room, and had paid his obedience to the Council, he made it his humble request, that they would not treat him as they had done the rest, which he owned he thought was a little severe, viz. in committing them first, that they might hear them afterwards, whereas it was his suit, to be heard first, and if then there should appear just cause, he was content to be committed. 'You speak, Sir William, said Lord Paget, like a man of experience, go on.' Sir William making use of this licence, proceeded to set the affair in such a light, that by the consent of all the Council he was discharged (51). But neither the risk he run upon this occasion, or the violent counsels that prevailed in the latter part of Queen Mary's reign, could deter him from rendering his country service in that station in which he had alone power to act, since Popery became again the established religion. His own account of this matter, set down by way of remark in his diary, will at once show the situation he was in, and his sentiments on that situation, and therefore I shall transcribe it, as more satisfactory than any thing that could be offered on this head by another pen (52). xxi Octobris 1555 comitia erant celebrata Westmonasterio in quibus ego interfui, aliquo cum periculo. Nam quamquam invitatus electus fueram, ut eques consularis pro Lincolnensi provincia, tamen in illo consensu libere sententiam dixi, unde odium mihi peperit. Sed melius fuit obedire Deo quam hominibus. 'On the 21st of October the parliament met at Westminster, in which, not without some danger, I discharged my duty as a member. For though I fought it not, yet being returned knight for the county of Lincoln, I spoke my mind freely, whereby I incurred some displeasure. But better it is to obey God than men.' It may not be amiss to observe here, that this voluntary choice of Sir William Cecil for the county of Lincoln, both in this and in the succeeding parliament, which was the last of that reign, does equal honour to him, and to those who chose him, for even at that time of day the court exerted both art and power in order

last Parliament of this reign, in which he observed the same steady conduct, and while he was thus employed in the service of his country openly, he entertained a private correspondence with the Lady Elizabeth, the presumptive heir of the Crown, to whom he gave such notices from time to time, as were highly useful to her in her distressed circumstances (w). As this could not be done without danger to himself, so it was very gratefully as well as graciously acknowledged by that Princess on her accession to the throne, November 16, 1558 (x). The first service that he rendered her was, upon the very day that she became Queen, by presenting her with a paper, consisting of twelve particulars which were necessary for her to dispatch immediately (y). At the time of her sister's decease, Queen Elizabeth was at her manor of Hatfield, whither before it was long, most of the great men repaired to her, and on the twentieth of the same month her Council was formed, when Sir William Cecil was first sworn Privy-Counsellor and Secretary of State, and as he entered thus early into his Sovereign's favour, so he continued in it as long as he lived, which if in one sense it does honour to the abilities and services of Cecil, it was in another no less glorious to the Queen his mistress, who, in this respect, did not act from any spirit of partiality or of prepossession, but with that wisdom and prudence which directed her judgment in all things (z). She saw plainly that Sir William Cecil's interests were interwoven with her own, and she very judiciously discerned, that he was fittest to be her Counsellor, whose private safety must depend upon the success of the counsel he gave. It was necessary to make these remarks, because it shews the reader the true state in which he stood with his mistress; for though there were other persons, who were sometimes as great or greater favourites than Cecil, yet he was the only Minister whom she always consulted, and whose advice she very rarely rejected (a). The very first thing he advised was to call a Parliament, and the first thing he proposed to be done there was the settlement of religion, in reference to which he caused a plan of Reformation to be drawn, with equal circumspection and moderation; for though no man was a more sincere Protestant, yet he had no vindictive prejudices against Papists, nor did he, on the other hand, lay any greater weight upon indifferent things, than he judged absolutely necessary for preserving decency and order; for he very well knew, that without an Established Church the State could not at that time subsist; and whoever considers the share he had in establishing it, and has a just veneration for that wise and excellent establishment, cannot but allow, that the most grateful reverence is due to his memory (b) [K]. The constant and daily business of his office, which, to have dispatched in the manner he did, would have taken up all another man's time, and actually took up a very large porportion of his, did not, however, hinder him from interposing in all the great affairs that related to the service of the Crown and the welfare of the Nation. order to carry it's point in parliament, and it plainly appears, from the collections of state papers (53), and private letters relating to those times, that both the influence of ministers, and downright corruption, were employed to gain the members to compliance, as also to engage the people to choose members that would comply (54). The proceeding therefore of so great a country as Lincoln in such a case, was a clear proof, that the men of property therein had escaped the contagious, and that these uncorrupt persons should without any sollicitation, or even application, of Sir William Cecil, fix upon him to be knight for their shire, is a noble testimony of his merit, as it very clearly proves that he was thought a man of the greatest candour and courage by those who knew him best, and who, as they were incorruptible themselves, would most certainly take care in their choice to have such a representative as they thought above corruption.

[K] The most grateful reverence is due to his memory. We have an account from Camden of the wisdom and prudence of this reformation, and he gives a succinct account of the heads of that famous paper which was drawn up for the management of it (55). This paper is also mentioned by Burnet in his History of the Reformation (56), and is actually inserted in his collection of records (57), and there is another copy of it printed by Strype (58), but it is not yet agreed who was the author of this paper: some think it was John Hales, others ascribe it to Mr Beale, Clerk of the Council; but Strype is rather inclined to think it was penned by Sir Thomas Smith; the title of it is, The Device for the alteration of religion in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, offered to Secretary Cecil. It consists of seven questions, all of them very short, propounding the principal things to be done towards a Reformation, with their answers, at large. Two things are certain with regard to this paper, first, that it was the basis of all that was afterwards done in parliament; and secondly, that it was offered to the Queen, and some of her principal ministers, by Secretary Cecil.

To me, I must confess, it is very apparent, that it was either written by, or under the direction of, Sir William Cecil himself, though he took the necessary precaution of making it pass for a thing proposed to him, that he might not seem to assume, and that he might not be obliged to enter into the defence of every particular in it, if the Queen or her ministers, had thought proper to vary it in any respect. In parliament he argued for every part of it learnedly, and clearly, and it was his advice that all such as were affected to Popery, might be allowed too speak freely upon that occasion, which they did, and fiercely too, but with very little weight; so that all that was done had not only the outward form and appearance of a legal and constitutional sanction, but really and truly received it, without any interposition of force, of influence, or of corruption (59). This great statesman himself, in a treatise upon the Felicities of the Queen his Mistress's reign, sets down, as one of the first, her settlement of religion, of which he speaks with great modesty, and moderation, affirming, that the Queen ever declined the title of Head of the Church, though she desired to be esteemed, what of right she was, the sovereign of all her subjects, ecclesiastical as well as civil. Of his own concern in this business he is altogether silent; but it appears from the most authentick papers, that he was the principal manager of it, both in respect of matter, and manner (60). He was the promoter of all things in the House of Commons; by his direction bills were proposed in the House of Peers; he thought of Dr Parker for Archbishop of Canterbury; and upon the whole, Strype had reason to say as he does, 'There was indeed great opposition made to the reformation of religion by many men at court; and had it not been for Cecil's diligence, wisdom, and interest with the Queen, in all likelihood, it had not proceeded with that roundness it did.' This, says he, I set down here as a debt of gratitude, owing from this Church to his memory (61).

mongst these he very justly reckoned the regulation of the coin, which had been debased in the reign of Henry VIII, had been also practised upon in that of Edward VI to such a degree, as to be thought past restoring, and an attempt being made for that purpose which miscarried in the reign of Queen Mary, the impossibility of doing any good in it, passed, at this time, for a thing certain (c). But it was Cecil's maxim that whatever was necessary must be expedient, and therefore he persuaded the Queen to set about it without delay, which she did, and though the design was not immediately brought to perfection, yet the success that attended this first step gave very great hopes, and at last his scheme took effect entirely, which, to those who are proper judges, will not only appear a great felicity, but one of the most important in this reign [L]. As he contributed by this step very much to the settling affairs at home, by removing many of the difficulties, which, though they were severely felt, had never been understood, or their true cause discovered, so he was very far from neglecting affairs abroad, which were also excessively embroiled, Spain being already a secret, and France a declared, enemy, with the advantage of having Scotland much in her power, and a very plausible pretence from the Queen of Scotland's marriage to have it wholly, so by Cecil's advice the Queen looked closely to what was nearest, and took those under her protection which stood up for the Reformed Religion in Scotland, well knowing that she had it in her power to support her friends there with much less trouble and expence than the French, and in the mean time suffered the business of a general peace to proceed in the slow way of a negotiation, in which Spain pretended to have the Queen's concerns at heart, but with little sincerity (d). When the French found that the opposition in Scotland was not to be got over by any force that they could spare, they began to try another method, and their Ambassador at London was directed to propose to Queen Elizabeth the yielding up of Calais. The loss of this town was said to have broke Queen Mary's heart, the restitution had been vigorously insisted upon by Queen Elizabeth, and the Spaniards themselves, to keep up a shew of good intention, for some time supported her instances upon this head; yet now, when she might have had it without any obligation to the Spaniard, she answered very steadily and wisely, That she would not desert her friends for a paltry fishing town (e). The French, upon this, finding she would not go their way were obliged to go her's, and to offer a negotiation in Scotland for restoring the peace of that kingdom. This was very readily accepted, Sir William Cecil and other Commissioners were dispatched into that country, and by concluding the convention of Leith, and the treaty of Edinburgh, raised their mistress's reputation, and secured the peace of the kingdom on that side (f). Upon his return he was received with great marks of esteem by his Sovereign, who, upon the death of her good servant and faithful Counsellor Sir Thomas Perry, bestowed his place of Master of the Wards; Jan. 10, 1561, on Sir William Cecil. As there never was a Princess more frugal of honours or slower in preferences than Queen Elizabeth, so the examples of pluralities under her reign were so very few, that it is not at all surprizing they were attended with much envy (g). Sir William had his share of this while he was Secretary only, but when he was also made Master of the Wards the clamour grew louder, but without much affecting him, for having enough to do with the Queen's business and his own, he troubled not himself with peoples speeches. His new office brought upon him fresh cares and an additional load of business, which however he went through with patience and diligence, and discharged it to the satisfaction of all, but those who were resolved not to be satisfied (h) [M]. It is generally agreed, that Parliaments in this reign were very different from

We are told by the author of his life, that it was a common saying of this great man, That a kingdom cannot be rich while it's coin is base (62). He had indeed extraordinary judgment in things of this kind; and even in King Edward's time he had considered the matter very maturely, for it was with a view to this that he engaged his learned and worthy friend, Sir Thomas Smith, to write a treatise on the value of Roman money, which he accordingly did, and addressed it to Sir William Cecil (63). The truth of the matter was, that the coin had been scandalously debased, for the shilling, which in the first of Henry VIII contained one hundred and eighteen grains of fine silver, was in the latter part of his reign reduced to forty, and in the reign of Edward VI it was brought down to twenty grains (64). And this was the true cause of the supposed dearth of most commodities, which though in reality very little raised in their value, were however in appearance sold for four or five times as much money as in former times. But this alteration, like every other measure of which he had the direction, was not brought about hastily, and with violence, but in so easy, and so gentle a manner, that while both the Crown and people bore a share in the burthen of the reformation, yet they eased one another so much, that the load was hardly felt. By proclamation (65)

the value of base money was reduced, though not so low as it's intrinsic worth. At this rate, which was sufficient to encourage the subject to bring it in, the Queen received it at her mint, and from thence issued again sterling silver, for during the whole course of her Majesty's reign, gold and silver only were coined, and the money of England, from being as bad as any, became very soon the fairest and finest in Europe (66). This having opened a passage, and made such a thing practicable, the prices of most necessaries were reduced, that the publick might reap the advantage of so wise a regulation. There was likewise due care taken, that soldiers, servants, and day-labourers, should be justly and regularly paid, and have a short and secure remedy against any that might attempt to oppress them. As to the first, it was a common saying in the army, during her whole reign, and it was surely a saying that did honour to her administration, viz. The Queen pays bountifully, though she rewards sparingly (67).

[M] Who were resolved not to be satisfied] His enemies were in hopes that this preference would have been fatal to him. The post of Master of the Wards had been always executed by a Lawyer, and because Sir William Cecil professed himself none, they were ready to take him at his word, and flattered themselves they should soon find him tripping. Their hopes were much increased upon his first coming into the court, where from what they have been since, and that great points of State were seldom suffered to come under the consideration of the House of Commons. There wanted not, however, some busy spirits then as well as in succeeding times, who flattered themselves with the hopes of becoming considerable, either by pretending to an extraordinary degree of loyalty, or a flaming zeal for their country; and these gave the Queen and her Ministers no small trouble, more especially with regard to the succession, a point of which they were very tender, and with very good reason, for the Queen being the last of her family, and unmarried, there wanted not some who were desirous to press the change of her condition upon their mistress, under a colour of love and respect, and others again were very solicitous to have the succession provisionally settled, as a thing equally necessary for the Queen's security, and the tranquillity of her subjects (i). But Elizabeth was too wise to conceive very highly of the fidelity of either of these parties, and therefore made it her constant study to quiet both, having very substantial reasons against declaring in favour of either (k). This too was her Minister's point, which, though he managed in the House of Commons with great dexterity, and, generally speaking, with good effect, yet, he raised himself thereby many warm enemies amongst both parties, who persecuted him with all the bitterness and venom imaginable, by defaming him both to his Sovereign and to the people. Sir William Cecil was very sensible of this, and yet he was very far from retorting this usage on his enemies; on the contrary, he was very courteous to men of all parties, received whatever informations or complaints were addressed to him, and did what he could towards giving every body satisfaction, meddling as little as it was possible in Court intrigues, and neglecting nothing that fell properly under his care, as a Secretary of State or Privy-Counsellor (l) [N]. It was early discovered, that, notwithstanding all his fair pretences, King Philip II. of Spain was very far from being sincerely well-affected to Queen Elizabeth, nor was that Princess apprised of it earlier by any body than by her Secretary, Cecil, who from time to time laid before her the discoveries that were made of his Catholick Majesty's practices, and the reasons she had to apprehend, that he meant to do her still worse offices than those he had done already. Yet the Secretary constantly advised the Queen not to break with that Monarch, but to dissemble her sense of his ill usage, and at the same time proposed sending the Lord Viscount Montacute at the head of an embassy into Spain, that from time to time she might find new pretences for negotiations, rather than be obliged to commit hostilities (m). This the enemies of Cecil represented as the effects of a weak and timorous disposition, detrimental to the Queen's credit abroad, and injurious to the glory of the nation. But in regard to the French, Sir William Cecil pursued quite another conduct, for he had advised the Queen to listen to the proposals made by the Protestants in that kingdom, and to assist them with ships, men, and ammunition, as well as money, which she accordingly did, and this proved the cause of new clamours, for those who before held him fearful and pusillanimous, charged him now with rashness and disregard of the publick safety, whereas, in fact, he acted very consistently in both businesses (n). He thought the power of the King of Spain too great to be disputed with 'till that of his

where it is allowed that he turned all things upside down; for finding the forms and practice very different from, or rather directly opposite to, the rules prescribed by former masters, he first considered them, and finding they were just and right, he obliged the practisers to conform to them (68). They struggled vehemently at the beginning, and talked loudly of the known forms, but Sir William Cecil told them, they must stick to the known rules, for that these would regulate both his conduct and theirs. Whereas by the other method they were parties, practisers, and judges, all at once, which for his own dignity, the ease of the suitors, and the credit of the court, he could not allow (69). His method was, to hear patiently all that could be alledged without hastily declaring his own opinion; but he held the Lawyers to the point, and would not let them digress to show their eloquence, or their wit. His decrees were short and plain, which he delivered first slowly, and with much solemnity, and then in a clear and regular method, he delivered the reasons of his decree, from point to point, and would always have the latter entered with the former. He raised the Queen's revenue, and reformed many abuses, but without bearing hard upon the subject, or making his court odious to the nobility. Contempts of the court, which before had been regarded as matters of practice, he treated seriously and severely; for he said, that even those who could not do, were under no necessity of declining justice, and that, as he did not sit there to oppress, so he would not be trifled with, or suffer the Queen's authority to be despised. He kept also the sheriffs, and all the officers of the court, in great awe; and as he was very exact himself, so he loved and expected punctuality in others (70). He willingly heard the Lawyers argue in any court where he sat, and would often argue himself, with great weight and perspicuity. Yet his skill in the Law served, in his private capacity, to no other purpose, than to keep clear of it; for it is said, that in his whole life-time he never sued or was sued (71). So exact was his regard to justice, and so extensive his patience.

[N] As a Secretary of State, or a Privy-Counsellor. It might be imagined, that the great reserve which Sir William Cecil constantly kept upon the subject of the succession, might possibly arise from his complaisance, or deference, for the behaviour of the Queen his mistress; but it seems more likely, that his advice influenced her behaviour, in reference to this ticklish point. There were no less than three claimants publickly mentioned, viz. the Queen of Scots, the family of Hastings, and the family of Suffolk; and the partizans of each of these were equally vehement and loud (72). The Queen observed a kind of neutrality, but still in such a manner, as sufficiently intimated she favoured the first title, or rather looked upon it as the best, notwithstanding the jealousies she had of her presumptive successor. This appeared by her confining John Hales, who wrote a book in defence of the Suffolk line (73), and by imprisoning one Thornton, upon the complaint of the Queen of Scots (74), for writing against her title. The Secretary kept himself clear of these businesses, and never gave the least intimation of his own sentiments, farther than that he wished the question of the succession might rest during the Queen's life, or 'till she thought proper to determine it in a legal way; for thus much we find delivered in some of his discourses, all, or most of which, I suppose, to have been brought to the Queen's ear or eye, as being calculated entirely for her service (75).

Mistress was better established, but he judged otherwise of the state of the French, and was willing that the English troops should gain experience, and the navy strength, at the expence of a foreign power, that for many years had been practising against the safety of his country (o). It is very probable, that the most potent of his enemies were well enough apprized of the reasons by which he supported the advices he gave to the Queen, but, as parties are very seldom guided by any principle, when they found themselves, as they thought, strong enough, they made no scruple of attacking him with all the violence imaginable; in order to which, they represented the state of publick affairs as very dangerous, and in a manner desperate, and charged him with being the author of all the measures by which they became so; but the Queen was too wise to be deceived by such stories, and a Princess of too great spirit, to give up a Minister who had served her faithfully, to resentments which he had drawn upon himself by his fidelity in her service (p) [O]. One would have imagined, that this would have secured Sir William Cecil from any future attacks of the like kind, but it was very far from having this effect, for as it shewed the Queen's high esteem of his person and counsels, so it raised the malice and jealousy of the Earl of Leicester, his principal competitor, to the utmost height, and therefore he was a constant spy upon all his actions, and left no method untried to bring about his disgrace. Some years after, another opportunity presented itself, which Leicester determined to make use of (q). Some Spanish ships, having great treasure on board, put into the English ports to secure it from the French, and afterwards landed it, the Queen's officers assisting, the Spanish Ambassador solemnly affirming it was his master's money, and that he was sending it into the Netherlands for the pay of his army. The Secretary, in the mean time, received advice, that not one piece of eight belonged to the King of Spain, but that it was the money of some Genoese Bankers, who were in the greatest terror, lest the Duke of Alva should convert the same to his Master's use, in order to carry on some great design, which the Court of Spain kept as an impenetrable secret. Sir William Cecil therefore advised the Queen to take the money herself, and give the Genoese security for it, by which method he shewed her, that she would greatly advantage her own affairs, distress the Spaniards, relieve the Netherlands, and wrong no body (r). The Queen took his advice; upon which the Duke of Alva seized the effects of the English in the Netherlands, the Queen made reprisals, and out of them immediately indemnified her own merchants. The Spanish Ambassador at London kept no measures upon this occasion. He gave Secretary Cecil ill language at the Council-Table, and libelled the Queen, by appealing to the people against their Sovereign's administration (s). This produced a great deal of disturbance, and Leicester and his party took care to have it published every where, that Cecil was the sole author of this counsel. While things were in this ferment, Leicester held a private consultation with the Lords he had drawn to his interest, wherein he proposed that they should take this occasion of removing a man, whom they unanimously hated. Some of the Lords enquiring How this could be done? Sir Nicholas Throgmorton answered, 'Let him be charged with some matter or other in Council when the Queen is not present, commit him to the Tower thereupon, and when he is once in prison, we shall find things enough against him (t).' It so happened, that about this time a flagrant libel was published against the Nobility; Lord Leicester caused Cecil to be charged before the Council, with either being the author of it, or it's patron, of which he offered no other proof than this, that it had been seen on Cecil's table. This the Secretary readily confessed, but insisted that he looked upon it in the same light they did, as a most scandalous investive; in support of which he produced his own copy with notes on the margin, affirming that he had caused a strict enquiry to be made after the author and publisher of the work (u). All this however would have been but of little use to him, if the Queen had not had private notice of their design. While therefore the Secretary was defending himself, she (little expected, and less wished for) entered the Council-Room, and having in few words expressed her dislike of such cabals, preserved her Minister, and shewed even Leicester himself that he could not be overthrown: another singular instance of the Minister's good fortune, and of the Queen's firmness (w) [P]. The affair of the Duke of Norfolk's ruin followed, ledged was directly false, that he had never dissembled his religion, and that the motives to his conduct were very different from those which were suggested, she readily guessed at the true sources of these intrigues, and gave her favourites to understand, that she was mistress of her own resolutions, and would keep, or remove, her Ministers, as she thought proper (76).

[O] By his fidelity in her service.] It is not a little uncertain when this first attempt was made against Sir William Cecil, but in all probability, as it arose on the score of the succours and money which the Queen sent to France, it might be in the year 1553, when that matter was upon the carpet, for at that time there were abundance of stories spread about to the Secretary's disadvantage; and this not only without regard to truth, but even with manifest contempt of probability; as for instance, that he had changed his religion in Queen Mary's time, and laboured to be Secretary, if that Princess would have consented; and that, being disappointed of his hopes, he corresponded with the Princess Elizabeth, and was new modelling the Court entirely to his own mind. These stories were circulated by his enemies at home and abroad, to justify the attempts that were to be made to drive him out of the Queen's favour; and as she knew better than any body, that what was al-

[P] And of the Queen's firmness.] This second scheme, which was carried to a much greater length than the former, or than any of the former; for Camden intimates, that there was more than one designed before this against Cecil (77), was concerted by the greatest men in the kingdom, and may be truly considered as the strongest attack that was ever made upon a Minister without bringing him to ruin. The best way of representing facts of this nature is, from original writers, who lived in the times when they happened, and of these I shall produce two; the first is a Popish followed, not long after he had been embarked in the faction against Cecil, and therefore we find this Minister sometimes charged, though very unjustly, with being the author of his misfortunes, a calumny from which he vindicated himself with candour, clearness, and vivacity (x), as equally abhorring the thoughts of revenge, and hazarding the publick safety, to facilitate his private advantage. The truth of the matter is, that Cecil had no greater share in the Duke's misfortune, than was necessarily imposed upon him by his office of Secretary, and which consequently it was not in his power to avoid; to which we may add, that the Duke himself was in some measure accessory thereto, by acting under the delusive influence of his capital enemy as well as Cecil's (y) [Q]. In the mean time that furious rebellion broke out in the North, which in part justified the truth of what he suggested to have been the real design of his enemies, when they laid that deep plot for his destruction (z), and he returned the Queen his mistress the kindnesses she had shown him in preserving him from so powerful a confederacy, by confounding the devices of his and her enemies, and extinguishing the flame of rebellion, though powerfully fomented from abroad, and secretly abetted by numbers at home, almost as soon as it blazed (a), and this, rather by the assistance afforded by his intelligence, for he was then sole Secretary, and by the wise discourses he penned, for he delighted in showing the nation that they were governed by reason, and not by the Queen's will or that of her Ministers, than by the troops that were employed, which were militia, whose cause rather than discipline was better than that of the rebels. Thus the prudence of Cecil prevailed more than arms, and hindered that defection from becoming general, which the Earl of Westmoreland's influence in the North made dangerous enough in every particular (b) [R]. After so glorious pish writer, who sets down the matter thus, 'Cecil being rejected by Queen Mary got to serve the Lady Elizabeth, and entered with her when she came to the crown, to the change of religion, &c. the Earl of Arundel was cozened by him, and Bacon with hopes of having the Queen in marriage, &c. These proceedings of Cecil and Bacon seeming intolerable to the ancient nobility of the realm, they joined in the old Lord Treafer's house to pull them both from her Majesty by violence, and to hang them at the Court gate; but Cecil escaped, by abusing the Duke of Norfolk with weeping and fair promises, and paid him afterwards with cutting off his head, &c. (78).'

The other account I shall mention is from Camden, who, very probably, spoke from his own knowledge, he says the pretence was, the advising the Queen to seize the money that was going to the Low-Countries; but that the true reason was, that the great men who were concerned in this business looked upon him as a favourer of the house of Suffolk. These great men were the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Treafer; the Duke of Norfolk, the Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Westmorland, Pembroke, Leicester, and others, and that at a secret council held by them, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton gave it as his advice, to clap the Secretary into the Tower (79), and when he was once in prison they should find matter enough against him; but that the Queen coming in suddenly upon them spoiled all their projects, and protected her Minister from their intended malice. The writer of his life makes this to have arisen from a seditious book that was published at that time, in which most of the Ministers, and many of the nobility were traduced; and because he had it very early in his closet his enemies would have suggested, that either by his direction, or at least with his privacy, it was written, whereas in fact he procured the book only with an intent to answer it; upon this, he says, he was called before the Council, with an intention to commit him whatever defence he might make; but that the Secretary being informed of this wrote to the Queen, who thereupon sent orders that nothing should be done to him without her knowledge, which prevented his being sent to the Tower (80). As to the book, it is very probable, they knew more of it than he, for it was a libel penned by the Spanish Ambassador under the feigned name of Amadis Oriana, and contained abundance of scandalous reflections upon the Queen herself. It is most likely, that the Secretary escaped this dangerous contrivance, by discovering to the Queen what was at the bottom of it, and that was the proclaiming the Queen of Scots heir to the crown, which he well knew was a thing she could not bear (81). The writer of his life says, that he had another, and narrower escape soon after, for a person being hired to sit at the bottom of the stairs that led from the Queen's closet, and to stab him as he came down from thence, he had notice of it barely time enough to save himself, by going another way (82). Such were the perilous times in which this statesman lived, and such the desperate politicks of those who were his enemies.

[Q] Of his capital enemy as well as Cecil's. This Duke of Norfolk, then the only man of that quality in England, was a person as much admired for his virtues; and beloved for his amiable qualities, as respected for his high birth, and the great influence his rank, and large fortune, gave him (83). He was not, however, without his failings, and certainly he made but an indifferent judgment of men, who trusted Leicester and suspected Cecil, which he did to such a degree, that his marriage to the Queen of Scots being spoke of in the presence of the Secretary, the Duke bid him go prattle that in the Queen's ears; to which Sir William Cecil mildly answered, That though he was no tale-bearer, yet he should be ready at any time to carry what might render him service, for whom he had as great a regard as for any nobleman in the kingdom (84). The Duke, who was naturally a worthy and well-natured man, took this kindly, and explained himself freely, upon which Sir William Cecil advised him to open himself to the Queen, and he procured him an opportunity for that purpose, which if he had taken, Leicester's schemes had been overturned, and the Duke had very probably saved his own head, and that of the Queen of Scots (85). But he was fatally blinded, and betrayed by Leicester. Nor did his once getting out of the Tower, and procuring the Queen's pardon, in which Cecil had a great share, prevent his dipping again into the same dangerous practices, which in the end brought him to the scaffold in 1572 (86). In several papers written long after the Duke's death, the Lord Burleigh lamented his fate, and professed the sincerity of his affection towards him so far, as consisted with the care of the publick, and his duty to his sovereign (87).

[R] Made dangerous enough in every particular. It has been said, and that from incontestible authorities, that in the suppressing of the rebellion Sir William Cecil exerted his abilities to the utmost, in three different methods, all of which were extremely well calculated for extinguishing this dangerous flame, and for securing the publick peace (88), viz. I. By procuring intelligence of the manner in which these northern Lords intended to proceed, and of the foreign aids they hoped for, whereby their own measures were baffled, and the arrival of foreign troops prevented, as also the Queen's forces easier raised, and better posted, than they could otherwise have been. II. By the publication of honest and pathetick writings, addressed to the Commons of England, wherein they were shewn the folly and danger of such wicked proceedings, the wretched characters those men had on whom they depended, and the miserable condition they would be in when their attempts should be overthrown, whereby numbers who were inclined to the party were restrained within the bounds of their duty, and glorious an instance, not of his zeal and ability only, but of his success in her service, the Queen could not well avoid rewarding him, how sparing soever she might be in conferring honours, and therefore in February 1571, she created him Baron of Burleigh, with the universal approbation of her subjects (c). At this time, as it appeared that he stood firm in the Queen's favour, of which none had interest enough to dispossess him, many who had been formerly either secretly or openly his enemies, shewed an earnest desire of being reconciled, and living for the future upon good terms with him, which, as he was a man of a benevolent disposition, and a great lover of peace, must have given him peculiar satisfaction (d). Amongst these was Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, of all his adversaries, the Earl of Leicester excepted, the most able and the most active; but this step is said to have cost that gentleman dear, for he died not long after suddenly, and some say violently also (e). But notwithstanding this, our great Statesman was very far from being safe, since, within a very short time after his being raised to the title of Lord Burleigh, another conspiracy against his life was discovered by one of the accomplices, which made a very great noise, on account of the share that the Spanish Ambassador had in it, upon whom the two assassins, Barney and Mather, charged it at their execution (f). For this, and other offences, the said Ambassador was ordered to depart the kingdom. To comfort the Lord Burleigh under the sense he must have of his danger, as well as to reward him for his diligence and fidelity, the Queen, in the month of June 1572, made him Knight of the Garter (g); and in the month of September following, upon the death of the Marquis of Winchester, Lord High-Treasurer, Lord Burleigh was raised to that great office (h), which brought with it a new accession of cares, and an additional load of business, which however he went through with so much prudence and patience, as amazed that age, and will hardly be believed in this (i) [S]. If we should particularly take notice of all the great transactions in which he had a principal share, this article would swell into a history, but it is sufficient for our purpose to observe, that though few Princes shewed a greater jealousy than Queen Elizabeth did of her authority, yet there hardly ever was a Minister in this kingdom that had a larger share of power than the Lord Treasurer Burleigh (k). It was by his advice that all foreign affairs were transacted, except the sending over the Earl of Leicester into Holland, which was the pure effect of that Nobleman's own contrivance (l). In all affairs of the Church he was applied to as it's steady friend and constant protector, which was very probably the reason, that his competitor Leicester set himself at the head of the Puritans (m). As Chancellor of the university of Cambridge, the Lord Treasurer had a large province under his peculiar inspection, and the respect which he had for that learned body, shewed itself by a diligence in promoting their interests, composing their differences, and preferring their members in such a degree, that upon the perusal of the addresses made to him on this head only, one cannot help admiring, how he could find time to take such constant and particular notice of them as he did (n). Besides all this, the business of the Treasury was done with the utmost strictness and punctuality; the disbursements from thence were made with the greatest exactness, so that every body who had any thing to do with the Crown, was secure of justice, as well as obliged to do justice (o). His Lordship heard causes also in the Exchequer and in the Star-Chamber, assisted constantly at the Privy-Council, and in the time of Parliament managed the business of the Crown in the House of Peers (p). The discharge of such a variety of duties must have been very fatiguing, and yet they were much heightened by other difficulties he had to struggle with. The Popish and Spanish emissaries, but more especially the Jesuits, were his mortal enemies, and not contented with aspersing and defaming him at home, published voluminous libels abroad, of which he had constant intelligence, and

and inclined rather to keep their lives and estates in peace, than to hazard both in other folks quarrels. These pieces are yet extant, and shew clearly what sort of writings are best suited to the minds of the English nation, as well as what may be expected from an honest explanation of measures well designed. III. The Secretary exerted a skill in politicks unknown to any other man or times. He laid hold of the information from various counties of strollers, vagabonds, and idle persons, and directing a private search on a day certain throughout the kingdom, he shut up some thousands of disorderly people, and thereby preserved the publick peace, and the prisoners themselves. It was by these wise, legal, and gentle methods, that he extricated the Queen and the nation, from the terrors of this publick calamity, which if it recommended him to his sovereign's favour, procured also the people's applause.

[S] And will hardly be believed in this. We will state at once the facts themselves, and the evidence by which they are supported, and this by citing what is said by the writer of his life, who spoke only of what he saw and knew. This then is his account (89):
 'The reputation of his justice, and of his integrity, drew upon him such a multitude of suits as was incredible, except to us who saw it. For besides all

'business in Council, or other weighty causes, and such as were answered by word of mouth, there was not a day in Term wherein he received not three, four, or a hundred petitions, which he commonly read that night, and gave every man an answer the next morning as he went to the hall. Whence the excellence of his memory was greatly admired, for when any of these petitioners told him their names, or what countrymen they were, he presently entered into the merit of his request, and having discussed it, gave him his answer. Nor was this his practice towards persons of condition only, but he would answer the poorest soul in the world by word of mouth: and when at any time he was forced to keep his chamber, or his bed, he took order that poor suitors should send in their petitions sealed. Upon every petition he caused his answer to be written on the backside, and subscribed it with his own name. Thus he held on his course like himself, prayed for by the poor, honoured by the rich, feared by the bad, and loved by the good. To his Prince, and country, loyal, and to the subjects most pleasing. For wondering at his great wisdom and gravity, praising his justice and integrity, most men honoured him with the title of Father of the Commonwealth.'

to which he never failed to give sober and suitable answers, and in them defended not only his own cause, but the causes of other Ministers, and of his Queen and country also (q) [T]. At Court likewise, he was for many years in a state of continual apprehension, having to do with men that stuck at nothing to serve their purposes, who as soon as one scheme was detected, invented another, and when their old instruments were either punished, or deserted their service, always knew where to find out others (r). By their intrigues and opposition, the Treasurer found himself often in such perillous circumstances; that he had thoughts of resigning, and seeking in privacy and retirement that peace, which, from experience he learned, was incompatible with power. But the Queen hindered him from this, and was so far from listening to any proposals of that sort when he made them, that she was wont to treat them as the effects of low spirits and the spleen, upon which she sometimes wrote him letters (s) with great vivacity and freedom [U]. But his disquietudes were

[T] And of his Queen and country also. There never was a Minister, that with so much power as Lord Burleigh had, picqued himself so much upon acting always according to reason. We have already mentioned his declaring constantly in the Court of Wards, in the Court of Exchequer, and in the Star-Chamber, the motives of his decrees; and whenever his publick actions were questioned, he was no less ready to justify himself in respect to them. In general, there came out nothing abroad, there was nothing translated sent over privately, and dispersed here at home, to the discredit of the Queen's government, or might contribute to heighten the spirit of disaffection amongst her subjects, but he presently wrote, or caused to be wrote, an answer to it, in which every point was distinctly considered, and either fully justified, or clearly refuted. Of these there are many extant in print, some known to be his, others not; but there are others which now remain only in manuscript, though I suppose that these were printed and dispersed, but being small pieces, were very quickly lost, so that nothing but the originals remain. As for instance, upon the coming out of a large Latin libel abroad, the Lord Burleigh wrote a short and clear answer to it, which I have now lying before me, and I take it to be the very libel from whence the reader has already seen some extracts. The title of his lordship's answer (90), for though the libel was printed whilst he was Secretary, yet it did not appear 'till he was Lord Treasurer, run in these words, 'Slanders and lies, maliciously, grossly, and impudently, vomited out, in certain traitorous books and pamphlets, concerning two counsellors, Sir Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and Sir William Cecil, Principal Secretary of State to her Majesty.' He then states, in few words, the amount of what is asserted, under the title of objections; and that the reader may the better conceive the nature of his lordship's design, we will mention these objections in his own words. I. That they are of base degree, and the first gentlemen of their genealogy. In answer to this he remarks, on behalf of Sir William Cecil, that there were very few gentlemen capable of proving a better descent than he; for as he observes, when King Edward III. was in Scotland, there arose a dispute between Sir John Stirling and Sir William Fakenham about their arms, upon which a duel would have ensued, if the King had not forbid it, and left the decision to the Lord Mowbray, and another Lord; who, upon a fair hearing, certified under their hands, that Sir John Stirling was lineally descended from James Stirling, Baron of Beauport, who was slain at the siege of Wallingford castle, in the reign of King Stephen; that from this John Stirling, Sir William Cecil lineally descended, not indeed of the elder line, for the grandfather of the said Sir William was the younger brother of Richard Cecil of Alterennes in Hertfordshire, and fled to Henry VII in Brittany, when he was only Earl of Richmond, and for his service there was rewarded, by that prince, with certain lands in Lincolnshire, in fee-farm, which lands are now, by descent, in possession of Sir William Cecil. This David Cecil, his grandfather, married an heiress, and so did his son Richard, which lady, mother of Sir William Cecil, is living, and proofs are in the hands of the family of three hundred years old, not to mention the Welch books, wherein they are recorded to be of the stock of the ancient Britons, so far is he from being the first gentleman of his family. II. They abase the Nobility of this realm. It is said in answer to this, that these two counsellors act in conjunction with many of the nobility, from whom, upon all occasions, they have received the highest assurances of friendship and good will, which would never have happened had this been true, that neither of these counsellors have, or ever sought to have, Lands, Houses, or Goods, of any nobleman attained; nor do they enjoy any of the offices by such formerly possessed. If any of the noblemen, who have brought themselves to disasters, who were formerly their friends, had followed their advice and counsels, they had undoubtedly avoided their ill fate, as some have confessed; and that those mentioned in the libel, and advised to be wary of these counsellors, have publickly declared, that they are ready to defend the integrity of the said two counsellors, to the Queen and state, with their tongues and swords, against whoever shall defame them. III. They two attempt to alter the succession of the Crown, and to set up the house of Suffolk, with whom they are allied, and their children incorporated. It is asserted, in disproof of this, that both these counsellors laboured heartily, and sincerely, to persuade her Majesty to marriage, that the dominions of her royal ancestors might descend to the issue of her body; and that none were so much prejudiced by her Majesty's rejecting that advice, as these two counsellors. That as to the house of Suffolk, it is a strange reason given for their partiality, that they are allied to it, because no allowance is made for their alliance to the Duke of Norfolk; though the daughter of one of these counsellors married the cousin-german of this Duke, and the Duke left his son, the Earl of Surry, at the time of his decease, to the care of one of these counsellors. That in regard to the house of Suffolk, neither of them had interfered for the preservation of the Earl of Hertford, or of the Lady Catharine, who was the immediate heir of that house; the former lying in prison many years, and the latter 'till she was released by death, the marriage between them dissolved by sentence, and the Earl himself fined twenty thousand pounds for his offence; from all which it is very clear, that either these counsellors have not that power, which in this libel they are suggested to have, or else far from showing their attachment, they have given no great proofs of their goodwill to the house of Suffolk.

[U] With great vivacity and freedom. At such a distance of time as this, it is almost impossible to guess what were the particular causes that made the Lord Treasurer, at this time, so very uneasy; and yet, considering the vast number of histories, annals, memoirs, and political treatises, relating to that reign, this should seem but an indifferent excuse. We will therefore use our endeavours to give the reader some hints of what might probably create in the Lord Treasurer a design of retiring (91). In the first place, the Spanish and Popish faction clamoured against him loudly at home and abroad, representing him as the sole author of their persecution in England; and the Puritans also were very little satisfied, because of his great regard for the Bishops, his preserving the revenues, and supporting the authority of the Church upon all occasions. In the next place, there was a strong party against him in the Queen's council, who made false and malicious comments upon every thing he advanced, or approved; which party he began now to fear, more especially as the Earl of Leicester had set himself openly at their head; and lastly, he thought the Queen herself did not sustain him in things of very great importance, but on the contrary affected to stand neuter, and even to endure a behaviour which he thought injurious to her authority; and besides all this, we have some hints of other uneasinesses in the spring of 1583, for while he was railed at abroad as the enemy, his mistress sometimes affected to suspect him of a secret friendship for, were confined to his hours of privacy, he never suffered them to break in upon the publick business, nor is there a single mark of timidity visible in the long course of his administration. On the contrary, his counsels were remarkably vigorous, for he maturely weighed things before he came himself to any settled determination; but when that was once fixed, he was against delays, and laboured for a brisk and speedy execution (1). He was no dissembler himself, and he hated those that were, as appears by the plainness with which he wrote his mind to the potent Earl of Leicester, when he thought he had evidence of his treating him in an unfriendly manner (u). Neither was he deterred from doing whatever he thought became him in his offices, by any consideration of the consequences, as is most evident from his conduct in the most critical service in which he ever engaged, viz. the trial, condemnation, and execution of the Queen of Scots. It is certain that this measure was very strongly promoted, if not originally proposed, by the Lord Treasurer (v), after the discovery of that called Babington's conspiracy; from a persuasion, that the Queen his mistress could never be safe in her person and government, while her competitor was living. It was from him that Popham, the Queen's Attorney-General, received his instructions, as to the method of forming the commission, and of drawing the indictment, as well as every other step that was of particular weight or moment in that whole transaction (x). He assisted also at her trial in quality of one of the Lords Commissioners (y); and it is plain enough from what passed upon that occasion, that the Queen of Scots looked upon him as one of the principal instruments of her destruction (z) [W]. There was a considerable interval between the time of passing the sentence and the putting it in execution, during which, several applications were made to Queen Elizabeth that the sentence might take effect; to which her Majesty, either through prudence, pity, or an affectation of clemency, seemed always very averse, and frequently intimated, that some other way should be taken for the security of her own person, than this, of publickly executing a Lady of her own blood, whom she had so often honoured with the appellation of sister (a).

and intelligence with, the Queen of Scots (92); in the same manner as before she had hinted at his great affection for the Duke of Norfolk, and yet, after that Nobleman was beheaded, placed that to his account, as we shall hereafter see he did the Queen of Scots; so that reflecting on the dangers and difficulties past, finding himself in present trouble, and foreseeing new perils that were to come, he solicited his mistress for leave to resign in the month of April, upon which she wrote him the following letter, which it appears, by an endorsement in his own hand-writing, he received on the 8th of May (93). It is impossible to give any key to the particular expressions in it, or why she calls him Spirit, which in the manuscript is wrote Sprite; and I cannot help thinking, the Queen used it in the same sense as we do the word Ghost, alluding to the vulgar opinion, that there is no touching or striking a ghost; but this I leave to the reader's decision, when he has read the letter, which runs thus (94).

‘ Sir Spirit,
I Doubt I do nickname you: For those of your kind, they say, have no sense; but I have of late seen an Ecce signum, that if an ass kick you, you feel it soon. I will recant you from being Spirit, if ever I perceive that you disdain not such a feeling. Serve God, fear the King, and be a good fellow to the rest. Let never care appear in you for such a rumour, but let them well know, that you rather desire the righting of such wrong, by making known their error, than you to be so silly a soul as to fore-slow that you ought to do, or not freely deliver what you think meetest, and pass of no man so much as not to regard her trust, who putteth it in you.

‘ God bless you, and long may you last omnino.’

E. R.

[W] As one of the principal instruments of her destruction. It will be requisite, in order to render what is said in the text absolutely perspicuous, to give here a succinct account of the principal steps taken in this mysterious affair. In the first place, after the general association for the defence of Queen Elizabeth's person, the same was confirmed by an Act of Parliament in the 27th of that Queen's reign, Anno Domini 1585, intituled, An Act for the security of the Queen's royal person, and the continuance of the realm in peace. By which law her Majesty was enabled, in case any person pretending title to the Crown after her decease, should compass or imagine any thing to the hurt of her Majesty's person; or if any other should compass or imagine such a design, with the privy of a person so claiming, to issue a commission under her Great Seal, to the Lords of her Privy-Council, and other Lords of Parliament, to the number of twenty-four at least, who, with the assistance of the Judges, should have power to examine all the offences aforesaid, and circumstances thereof, and thereupon to give sentence, or judgment, as upon good proof to them should appear, and after such sentence and declaration thereof, published by proclamation under the Great Seal, all persons against whom such sentence should be given, were disabled for ever to have or claim the Crown; and thereupon her Highness's subjects may lawfully, by virtue of this act, and her Majesty's direction, pursue to death, by all possible means, every such wicked persons (95). On the 14th of Sept. 1586, Anthony Babington was condemned, and on the 20th of the same month executed for a conspiracy against the Queen, to which the Queen of Scots was supposed to be privy (96). In the month of October following, the Queen granted a commission for the trial of the Queen of Scots, directed to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Bromley, Knight, Chancellor of England, William Lord Burleigh, Lord Treasurer, &c. (97). In pursuance of that statute, and on the 11th of October the Commissioners came to Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire, before whom the Queen was brought, and a long charge exhibited against her, at which time the Lord Treasurer delivered himself in very strong terms, and particularly said, Many things you have propounded time after time concerning your liberty, that they have failed of success is along of you or the Scots, and not of the Queen. For the Lords of Scotland actually refused to deliver the King as an hostage, and when the last treaty was held concerning your liberty, Parry was sent privately by Morgan, a dependant of your's, to murder the Queen. At these words the Queen of Scots cried out, Ah! you are my adversary To whom the Lord Treasurer answered, Yea, I am adversary to Queen Elizabeth's adversaries. At the same time the Lord Treasurer mentioned her intention to convey her title to the Spaniard, and then took occasion to shew, that the kingdom of England could not be conveyed (98). The Court was then prorogued to the twenty-fifth of October. at the Star-chamber at Westminster, and on that day sentence was given against the Queen of Scots agreeable to the statute before-mentioned. Upon this, in the ensuing Parliament, applications were made to the Queen both by the Lords and Commons, that the sentence might be published and executed, which she declined; but afterwards, in the month of December, it was proclaimed by the Queen's orders as the Act of Parliament directed (99), and in the February following it was executed.

At last however, she, of her own inotive, sent for Davison, who was Secretary of State, and directed him, to prepare a warrant, which was to be carried to the Chancellor; that the mandate for her execution might pass the Great Seal (b). This was accordingly done, and she signed it, and Davison thereupon acquainted the Lords of the Privy-Council, of whom the Lord Treasurer was the chief, and by their direction it was sent to Fotheringay-castle, where the Queen was actually put to death (c), Feb. 8, 1586-7. It is impossible to say what were the real sentiments of Queen Elizabeth in reference to this affair, for when she first heard it she showed excessive concern, broke out into tears, put on mourning, and in her letters to King James, solemnly and positively denied her giving orders for his mother's execution, or that she had it at all in her intention (d); adding, however, that the thing was just, and that therefore if she had commanded, she would have avowed it. To give the greater colour of truth to what she affirmed, she directed Secretary Davison to be prosecuted, as he was, in the Star-Chamber (e); forbid Lord Burleigh's appearing in her presence; and behaved towards him in other respects with such severity, as seemed calculated to prove, that she was truly much offended at what he had done; nor was it without great difficulty, and many submissions, that he recovered her favour, and this very slowly, and as it were with reluctance (f) [X]. After this storm was blown over, he had the same credit and power as ever, and was the person to whom almost all kind of intelligence was addressed, and by whom all matters of importance, of what nature soever, were commonly dispatched; and though his strength began to decline, and his constitution was greatly impaired by such a series of continual labours, yet he was to the full as careful and assiduous as ever, drawing most of the State-papers of importance with his own hand, and giving constant attendance both at the Council and in the Star-Chamber (g). All these high employments and arduous cares, did not, however, hinder him from entering with the utmost tenderness into the duties of private life, so that we find him deeply affected with the death of his mother, which happened March 10, 1587, upon which the Queen

[X] And as it were with reluctance.] In order to apprehend clearly what share the Lord Treasurer Burleigh had in this transaction, and what reason her Majesty might derive from thence to be offended with him, it will be necessary to look upon Secretary Davison's Apology, in which there is the best and most authentick account of this matter any where extant (100). The Queen (says he) after the departure of the French and Scottish Ambassadors, of her own motion, commanded me to deliver her the warrant, for executing the sentence against the Queen of Scots; when I had delivered it, she signed it readily with her own hand; when she had so done, she commanded it to be sealed with the Great Seal of England, and, in a jesting manner, said, Go tell all this to Walsingham, who is now sick, although I fear he will die for sorrow when he hears it. She adding also the reasons of deferring it so long, namely, lest she might seem to have been violently or maliciously drawn thereto, whereas, in the mean time, she was not ignorant how necessary it was. Moreover she blamed Powlet and Drury that they had not eased her of this care, and wished that Walsingham would feel their pulses touching this matter. The next day, after it was under the Great Seal, she commanded me, by Killigrew, that it should not be done; and when I had informed her that it was done already, she found fault with such great haste, telling me, that in the judgment of some wise men another course might be taken. I answered, that that course was always best and safest which was most just. But fearing lest she would lay the fault upon me (as she had laid the putting of the Duke of Norfolk to death upon the Lord Burleigh) I acquainted Hatton with the whole matter, protesting that I would not plunge myself any deeper in so great a business. He presently imparted it to the Lord Burleigh, and the Lord Burleigh to the rest of the Council, who all consented to have the execution hastened, and every one of them vowed to bear an equal share in the blame, and sent Beale away with the warrant and letters. The third day after, when, by a dream which she told of the Queen of Scots death, I perceived that she wavered in her resolution, I asked her, Whether she had changed her mind? she answered, No, but another course (said she) might have been devised; and wistful she asked me, Whether I had received any answer from Powlet? whose letter, when I had shewed her (101), wherein he flatly refused to undertake that which stood not with honour and justice, she, waxing angry, accused him and others (who had bound themselves by the association) of perjury, and breach of their vow, as those that had promised great matters for their Prince's safety, but would perform nothing. Yet there are (said she) who will do it for my sake. But I shewed her how dishonourable and unjust a thing this would be; and wistful, into how great danger she would bring Powlet and Drury by it. For if she approved the fact, she would draw upon herself both danger and dishonour, not without censure of injustice; and if she disallowed it, she would utterly undo men of great desert, and their whole posterity. And afterwards she gave me a light check, the same day that the Queen of Scots was executed, because she was not yet put to death. It seems from hence, that the Lord Burleigh was to bear only his share of this offence, the whole load of which however devolved solely upon him. So that he was a fortnight restrained from Court and from the Queen's presence, notwithstanding that in that space he wrote several letters to the Queen, some parts of which have been published, and show them to be very submissive at least, if not something more (102). At last, upon his coming to Court, he was very strangely treated, so that he thought fit of himself to refrain coming to the Council-Table, and, to justify his behaviour in that point, he wrote a paper which he sent to the Vice-Chamberlain, dated March 15, beginning with these words (103): 'I am so wounded in the heart, with the late sharp and piercing speeches of her Majesty to myself, in the hearing of my Lord of Leicester and Mr Secretary Walsingham, expressing therewith her indignation, at such time as I was called to her presence for matters of the Low-Countries, myself giving no occasion by any speech of the matter of the Queen of Scots, until her Majesty did charge me therewith; as since regarding in great anguish of heart the weight of her Majesty's displeasure so settled and increased, as I then deeply conceived, and mine own humility not being able to abide the continuance of such her displeasure, I am therefore most careful how by any means possible I may shun all increase of the weight thereof; knowing it very true, that was said by the most wise King, Indignatio Principis Mors est. And though my conscience doth certainly bear witness with me in the sight of God, that I never had thought, nor did ever any act, with mind to offend her Majesty. But now finding this heavy burthen of her Majesty's displeasure in mine old years, so long faithfully, painfully, and dangerously spent only for her service, to be lately rather increased, since her Majesty's princely compassion permitted me to her presence, a few days past, I have great cause to fear, that this increase groweth more by means of some secret enemies to myself, than of any influence of her own princely nature.'

Queen sent to condole with him, but being at the same time mindful of her own affairs; advised him to seek relief from his melancholy, not by shutting himself up, but by engaging more earnestly in public business (b). In the succeeding troublesome year, when the Spanish invasion threatened the kingdom with a dangerous war at home, the Lord Treasurer drew up those schemes for the defence of England, that were followed with so great success, and his eldest son Thomas, by his own choice, as well as his father's command, ventured his life freely in that fleet, which, under the command of the Lord High-Admiral Howard, gloriously defeated that, which had been so falsely, as well as foolishly, stiled the Invincible Armada (i). It was not long after this, the Lord Treasurer met with the severest stroke in his family that he had ever yet felt, by the death of his beloved wife, April 4, 1589, after they had lived together in the sincerest harmony and affection for three and forty years (k). She is allowed to have been one of the most extraordinary women of her time, in point of piety, learning, and prudence, of which posterity has received many, and those too unexceptionable testimonies, of which, in the note, some notice shall be taken (l) [Z]. The loss of her affected the Treasurer to a great degree, as appears plainly by many of his writings, and made a great alteration in his temper; so that, notwithstanding the death of some whom he took to be his adversaries, by which undoubtedly his authority was augmented, and the promotion of his son Robert who grew daily more and more into the Queen's favour, he became very thoughtful and melancholy, and, about two years after, was very earnest and solicitous for leave to quit his employments, that he might spend the remainder of his days in quiet (m). But the Queen who saw no decay in his abilities, and who, though she willingly granted all the indulgencies possible to his infirmities, would by no means consent to that; on the contrary, as she had formerly rallied him out of a design of the same kind, so she had now recourse again to the like method, and by a paper written with great wit and spirit, diverted him absolutely from this serious purpose (n) [Z]. The remaining part of his life was spent in the discharge of his high and painful office, with all the care and diligence, all the study and application possible; nor do we find that he gave himself any relaxations, even in his last days, beyond what the weakness of his body, and the diseases he laboured under, absolutely

[Y] Some notice shall be taken.] This Lady, who was the daughter of Sir Anthony Cook, died in the sixty-third year of her age, having been the faithful companion of her husband in all his fortunes, from the first rise of them in the reign of Henry VIII, to their completion under Queen Elizabeth (104). She was wonderfully learned, especially in the Greek tongue, as appears from the testimony of the Lord Burleigh himself, and of several other great men, and of which she left clear evidence, in a letter penned by her in that language to the university of Cambridge, upon her sending thither a Hebrew Bible, by way of present to the Library (105). She had read most of the Greek Fathers with great diligence and critical accuracy, and was one of the greatest patronesses of her time, maintaining for many years two scholars at St John's College in Cambridge, and before her death rendered this perpetual, by procuring lands to be bought in the name of the Dean of Westminster, and by him assigned to the college. She likewise gave the Haberdashers company in London, a sum to enable them to lend to six poor men twenty pounds a-piece every two years; and a charity of the like kind of twenty marks, to six poor people at Waltham and Chestnut in Hertfordshire. Four times every year she relieved all the poor prisoners in London, and many other acts of benevolence she did, with as great secrecy as generosity; so that she seems to have well deserved all the praises that have been, by different writers, bestowed upon her memory (106).

[Z] From this serious purpose.] It would be a very difficult, perhaps an impracticable, task, should one endeavour to write a commentary capable of explaining the following singular piece, and therefore we shall leave it entirely to the contemplation of the reader; observing only, that it is a strong piece of irony throughout, in which the Queen seems to rally the pains taken by her Minister, in the more vigorous part of his life, to adorn and beautify his villa for the sake of recreation, and when older, and wanting that recreation most, wished to turn it into a gloomy retreat, where he might wear away his lonesome hours in brooding over his cares (107).

lutely required (o). In the year 1592, besides all the great pains he took in the Treasury and in the Privy-Council, he was also charged with the management of the Queen's concerns in the House of Peers, more especially with a view to obtain such a supply from Parliament, as her Majesty's occasions at that time necessarily required, in furtherance of which we have a copy of the speech he made in the Upper House; in which there is a very large, distinct, and curious detail, of the general state of affairs in Europe at that time, and which affords us a much better notion of the state of things at that season, than almost any of the Histories that are extant (p) [AA]. In the next year we find him extremely occupied, as well in providing for the success of his Mistress's arms abroad, as for preserving the peace and tranquillity of the nation at home; in reference to which there are many papers of his still preserved, which, at the same time that they show he really occupied the post of Prime-Minister, and directed whatever was undertaken in almost every branch of the administration, demonstrate also, that he did this with equal diligence and exactness, considering every head by itself, setting down under it the several points to be provided for, and the means by which they might be provided (q). To him we find all degrees of people addressing themselves to the very last; the Bishops and Clergy, some for encouragement, some for protection, and many for preferment; the Puritans and Sectaries, for favourable treatment and compassion; many of the fugitives abroad for pardon, in consideration of the intelligence they gave him of the designs of the King of Spain, and of others the Queen's enemies; the Lieutenants of several counties for instructions and advice; the Lord High-Admiral for assistance and supplies; the great Sir

[AA] Of the histories that are extant] It cannot but afford some satisfaction to the modern reader, to see in what manner the great business of the State was transacted in those times, of the wisdom of which fame speaks so loudly. The speech mentioned in the text was delivered in that Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, which met November the 19th, 1592, and was dissolved April 10th, 1593 (105), and in all probability in the beginning of it. At the entrance of his speech the Lord High-Treasurer takes notice (106), of the many injuries, and acts of injustice, done by the King of Spain, and those acting under him, to the Queen his Sovereign, and her subjects, but not to fatigue their lordships with too long a detail, he is content to pass by all particulars preceding the year 1588, and alleges, that what he has to offer from that time is not at all to lead or to direct their opinions, but purely to obtain the assistance of their counsels in aid of an old man broken with age, feeble with infirmities, and oppressed with a load of business; he then explains the nature of the King of Spain's designs, and of the wars into which he entered, which, he says, were not like those of former times, for strong fortresses, or for convenient provinces, but for whole kingdoms. That Philip II. had already usurped Portugal, and all the dominions of that crown, both in the East and West Indies. That by fomenting a barbarous and bloody rebellion in France, he had at this juncture a great part of that kingdom at his devotion, more especially the provinces of Brittany and Normandy, by which he was become a frontier enemy to all the West of England; and to all the South parts, such as the counties of Suffex, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight; and by his interest in St Maloes a very dangerous neighbour to the islands of Jersey and Guernsey. That by this means he had a vast additional force arising from his power in France, of which he meant to make himself King, or to make his daughter Queen, and appoint her a husband to be his vassal. That these vast designs alone ought sufficiently to alarm the English nation, even if he had not discovered any formal intention to invade them. That however this was so far from being the case, that the chief aim of this ambitious Prince, for the two last years, was to prepare every thing necessary for such an invasion; in order to which he had built a great number of ships of War, of the size and strength of English ships, that they might be the fitter to navigate the narrow seas; that he had a strong fleet of galleys on the coast of Brittany, which he intended to send this summer to Newhaven; that for two years past he had bought and built many great ships in the East Countries, and that by the corruption of our faint and covetous neighbours in Holland, he had recovered, with silver hooks, mariners, ships, cordage, and provisions; that all these preparations must be necessarily against England, for having already the whole sea-coast of France at his devotion, he could have no need of a naval force to prosecute his designs against that kingdom. That a farther proof of his intention was the inexplicable diligence he used to secure to himself a party in this kingdom to second his invasion; and he was sorry to say, this was not without effect. That however, there was yet behind a stronger and clearer proof, which was his intrigues in Scotland, into which he had promised to send twenty-five thousand men, upon a promise of some discontented Lords to join them with ten thousand; that of these, thirty thousand were to march into England, and the five thousand Spaniards were to remain in that kingdom, to assist the Papists in deposing their King. That this information came from no ordinary hand, and was attended with the most extraordinary proofs, that King James himself was the discoverer, that he had seized the messenger, intrusted with the bonds of the Earls of Errol, Huntley, and Angus, to the King of Spain, for the performance of their engagements; that these Lords were fled into the Western Islands, in hopes of being supported there from Spain; that the King was gone in person in pursuit of them; and, that the very day before he marched with what forces he could raise, he had caused one Fentry, a man of good family, and great estate, to be hanged, for the share he had in this conspiracy. This very long speech he concluded with these words, ' Thus far have I observed my purpose, to shew the danger; and to give counsel to the remedy, Hoc opus hic labor est. And I would most gladly have some company, of whom I might have some light how to find out the darkness of the question: Wherein when time shall serve I will not be silent, but deliver mine own opinion, and reform it upon good ground.'

But this was not all that our statesman did upon this important occasion, for having taken so much pains to set before the House of Lords the true state of the nation in this perilous conjuncture, he was no less careful that the House of Commons should be acquainted therewith, and that all the circumstances and particulars of the account given there, should perfectly agree with what he had already set forth in the upper house. It was with this view that he drew up a paper, which is still remaining in his own hand-writing, consisting of fourteen separate heads, made up, for the most part, of matters of fact, and the substance of the intelligence which the Queen, the Privy-Council, and himself, had received. The meaning and intent of this paper, the reader will easily perceive by the title, which runs thus (107), Instructions for the Speaker's speech: Drawn up in several articles by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, Feb. 13th 1592. To render this note as complete as it is possible, it may be proper to shew, what the effects were of all this diligence, and how these wise and wary methods conducted to the end proposed by them (108). To this there is nothing more requisite, than to inform the reader, that the Clergy in 1593 granted to the Queen two subsidies, of four shillings in the pound, to be paid in two years; and the Temporality three subsidies, and six fifteenths and tenths, by which seasonable supply her Majesty was enabled to defeat all the designs of her enemies, and to defray the expences of a war, both by sea and land, without having recourse again to her subjects for upwards of four years.

Sir Walter Raleigh in publick and private concerns, sometimes for favour, sometimes for justice; the principal officers in the Cadiz expedition, with accounts of its execution and success; in a word, to him was addressed whatever regarded the State, and it appears by his indorsements upon some papers, and short marginal notes upon others, that nobody addressed him in vain, or without notice; so that it is not easy to conceive, how he could possibly find time to go through such a variety of extraordinary business, besides what belonged to his post, at all, much less in the cautious and circumstantial manner he did; so that every thing that came before him seems to have been considered with as much leisure and attention, as if he had no other thing in view, agreeable to his own favourite and excellent maxim, That the shortest way to do many things, was to do only one thing at once (r). The last memorable act of his life, was to endeavour the giving a peace to his country, when reasonable terms might have been obtained from Spain. This was vehemently opposed by the Earl of Essex, who, as Camden says, having been bred to the sword, and gained some reputation by it, was unwilling to sheathe it. The arguments he made use of were, the implacable hatred of the Spaniards to the English, their being bigotted Papists, and a people naturally both obstinate and subtle; in speaking to these, he delivered himself in such terms, that the Treasurer was moved to say, He seemed intent upon nothing but blood and slaughter. At the close of the debate Lord Burleigh pulled out a Prayer-Book, and without speaking, pointed to the following words, Men of blood shall not live out half their days (s). This shews that our Statesman preserved his courage and integrity to the very verge of life, for at this time it was more dangerous to be a friend to peace at home, than to share in the war abroad. As this was his last effort in Council, so when confined to his bed by his last sickness, he settled a new treaty between the Queen and the States, whereby the nation was eased of an expence of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds per annum (t). As to his end, it was conformable to his life, easy, natural, in the midst of his family, full of years and of glory. In a word, he died possessed of the favour of his Prince, the love of the people, the respect even of his enemies. He had also, what he often sought to resign, the greatest and most honourable offices in the kingdom, besides a large estate, and dutiful and excellent children. Thus blessed with all that a man could desire, on the fourth of August 1598, about four in the morning, in the presence of twenty, children, friends, and servants, he yielded up the ghost with wonderful serenity, being upwards of seventy-seven years of age (u). It would be a very unnecessary, indeed a very needless, attempt, should we proceed to swell this article with the character of this great person, which has been already drawn so fully; we will conclude therefore with a very few observations, that will enable us to give the reader some useful and curious particulars in the notes. His exterior form was very answerable to the disposition of his mind, and it might be truly said, that no man's temper suited better with the ease and gratefulness of his person than his did [B B]. In reference to his manner of living, it was suitable to the high rank he held, and the custom of the times in which he lived; for though he was a man distinguished both for his virtue and learning, as well as by his exemplary probity, yet he did not think that any of these, or all taken together, could justify a singular and reserved behaviour, or the passing through life in a manner altogether inconsistent with that, which others have led when in his station. It was from these reasons, and not from vanity or ostentation, that he kept up an extraordinary degree of splendor and

[B B] Than his did.] We learn from the author of his life, and from other contemporary writers (109), that though he was not remarkably tall, nor eminently handsome, yet his person was always agreeable, and became more and more so, as he grew in years, age becoming him better than youth. The hair of his head and beard grew perfectly white, and he preserved almost to his dying day a fine and florid complexion. His temper contributed much towards making him generally beloved, for he was always serene and cheerful; so perfect a master of his looks and words, that what passed in his mind was never discoverable from either; patient in hearing, ready in answering, yet without any quickness, and in a stile suited to the understanding of him to whom he spoke. Idleness was his aversion; and though from twenty-five years of age, at which he was sworn a Privy-Counsellor, being then the youngest, as at his death the oldest in Europe, he laboured under a great weight of publick business; yet when he had any vacant moments, he spent them not in trifles, or in pursuit of sensual pleasures, but in reading, meditating, or writing. He had a perfect knowledge, not only of foreign countries, but of foreign courts, knew the genius of every Prince in Europe, his counsellors and favourites. At home he kept exact lists of all the great officers, and particularly of the sages in the Law. He was acquainted with the course of every court of judicature in England, knew its rise, jurisdiction, and proper sphere of action; within which he took care that it should act with vigour, and was no less careful that it should not exceed its bounds. He wrote not only elegant Latin in prose, but also very good verse in that, and in the English language. He understood Greek as well as most men in that age; and was so learned in Divinity, that Divines of all persuasions were desirous of submitting to his judgment. His peculiar diversions were the study of the state of England, and the pedigrees of its nobility and gentry; of these last he drew whole books with his own hand, so that he was better versed in descents and families, than most of the Heralds; and would often surprize persons of distinction at his table, by appearing better acquainted with their manors, parks, woods, &c. than they were themselves. To this continual application, and to his genius, naturally comprehensive, was owing that fund of knowledge, which made him never at a loss in any company, or upon any subject. It was also owing to this, that he spoke with such wonderful weight on all publick occasions, generally at the end of the debate, but without repetition of what was said before, stating the matter clearly, showing the convenience sought, the inconveniences feared; the means of attaining the former, and the methods by which the latter might be avoided, with a succinctness and accuracy which, perhaps, hardly ever fell to any other man's share. But what was still more surprizing, was the great facility with which he did this, for he required no preparation, no time for his most laboured speeches, nor ever turned a book for his most learned writings, but thought and spoke, digested and dictated, without any hesitation, with the greatest perspicuity of sentiment, and the utmost fulness of diction.

and magnificence in his houses, gardens, and every thing belonging to him [CC]. Yet he was in other respects a man of strict œconomy, and showed very plainly from his constant practice in private life, that he was very little attached to the pleasures of sense or show, but was wholly bent upon enjoyments of the mind, and preserving that peace which is the inseparable attendant of a clear conscience, and of a soul superior to ordinary gratifications [DD]. It was with great reason therefore, that Mr Camden concluded his character with this observation, ‘ That he was one of those few who lived and died with equal glory. Such a man, as while others regard with admiration, I, after the antient manner, am rather inclined to contemplate with the sacred applause of silent veneration.’

[CC] And every thing belonging to him.] He had, during Queen Elizabeth’s reign, four places of residence; his lodgings at court, his house in the Strand, his family seat at Burleigh, and his own favourite seat at Theobalds (109). At his house in London he had fourcore persons in family, exclusive of those who attended him at court. His expences there, as we have it from a person who lived many years in his family, were thirty pounds a week in his absence, and between forty and fifty when present. At Theobalds he had thirty persons in family; and besides a constant allowance in charity, he directed ten pounds a week to be laid out in keeping the poor at work in his gardens, &c. The expence of his stables were a thousand marks a year: So that as he had a great income, and left a good estate to his children, he was not afraid of keeping up also a post suited to his offices, though it provoked the envy of his enemies, and did, as it will always do, engage many mouths to murmur at him, because they were not fed by him. He carried things still farther: He kept a standing table for gentlemen, and two other tables for persons of meaner condition, which were always served alike, whether he were in town or out of town. About his person he had people of great distinction, insomuch that our author tells us, that while in his service he could reckon up twenty gentlemen retainers, who had each a thousand pounds a year; and as many among his ordinary servants, who were worth from 1000 l. to 3, 5, 10, and 20,000. Twelve times he entertained the Queen at his house for several weeks together, at the expence of 2 or 3000 l. each time. Three fine houses he built, one in London, another at Burleigh, and the third at Theobalds: All of which were less remarkable for their largeness and magnificence, than for their neatness, and excellent contrivance. Yet with all this mighty expence, it was the opinion of competent judges, that an avaricious man would have made more of his offices in seven years, than he did in forty. At his death he left about 4000 l. a year in land, 11000 l. in money, and in valuable effects about 14000 l. I crave leave to add to this note, a few very curious particulars from a private letter of Lord Burleigh’s to an intimate friend, written in the month of August 1585 (110), on account of some calumnies, that the person to whom this letter was addressed acquainted him, flew about, as to his power and fortune. ‘ They that say in a rash and malicious mockery, that England is become Regnum Cœcilianum, may please their own cankered humour with such a device; but if my actions be considered, if there be any cause given by me of such a nickname, there may be found out in many other juster causes to attribute other names than mine. If my buildings create dislike in them, I confess my folly in the expences, because some of my houses are to come, if God so please, to them that shall not have land to maintain them; I mean my house at Theobalds, which was begun by me with a mean measure, but increas’d by occasion of her Majesty’s often coming; whom to please, I never would omit to strain myself to more charges than is that of my building. And yet not without some special direction of her Majesty, upon fault found with the small measure of her chamber, which was in good measure for me, I was forced to enlarge a room for a larger chamber, which need not be envied of any for riches in it, more than the shew of old oaks, and such trees, with painted leaves and fruit. I thank God I owe nothing to these backbiters, though indeed much to many honest persons; whom I mind to pay without bribery or villainy. For my house in Westminster, I think it so old as it should not stir any, many having of later times built larger by far, both in city and country. And yet the building, alterations, and repairs thereof, cost me the sale of lands worth 100 l. a year in Staffordshire, that I had of

‘ good King Edward. My house of Burghley is of my mother’s inheritance, who liveth, and is the owner thereof; and I but a farmer. And for the building there, I have set my walls upon the old foundation. Indeed I have made the rough stone walls to be of square, and yet one side remaineth as my father left it me. I trust my son shall be able to maintain it, considering there are in that shire a dozen larger houses of men under my degree.’ In the postscript to this letter he adds, ‘ For myself, I have not made nor obtained any suit from her Majesty these ten years. In my whole time I have not, for these twenty-six years, been benefited from her Majesty, so much as I was within four years of King Edward. I have sold as much land in value as ever I had of gift of her Majesty. I am at charges by attendance in court, and by keeping of my household, especially in Term times, by resort of suitors, at more than any counsellor in England. My fee, for the Treasurership, is no more than it hath been these thirty years. Whereas the Chancellor, and others, have been doubly augmented within these few years. And this I do affirm, that my fees of my Treasurership do not answer to my charge of my stable, I mean not my table. And in my household I do seldom feed less than an hundred persons. And for that purpose I buy in London my bread, my drink, my achates, my fewel. And in the country I buy my grain, my beef, my mutton, and all achates; and for my stable, I buy my hay for the greatest part; my oats, my straw totally. For my servants, I keep none to whom I pay not wages, and give liveries; which I know many do not.’

[DD] And of a soul superior to ordinary gratifications.] In regard to his private life, he was considered as the best parent of his time, for he had all his children, and their descendants, constantly at his table; and in their conversation lay the greatest pleasure of his life, more especially while his mother lived, who was able to see the fifth descent from herself, there being no degree of relation, or consanguinity, which at festival times were not to be found at Lord Burleigh’s table (111). It was there that, laying aside all thoughts of business, he was so affable, easy, and merry, that he seemed never to have thought of any, and yet this was the only part of his life which was entirely free therefrom; and his frankness and familiarity brought such, and so many, persons of high rank to his house, as did him great credit and service. In respect to his friends, he was always easy, cheerful, and kind; and whatever their condition was, he talked to them, as if they had been his equals in every respect; yet it is said, that he was held a better enemy than friend; and that this was so well known, that some opposed him from a view of interest. It is certain, that those who were most intimate with him, had no sort of influence over him, and did not care to ask him for any thing, because he did not readily grant, and was little pleased with such sort of suits. One reason of this was, that most of those whom he preferred became his enemies, because he would not gratify them in farther pretensions. His secrets he trusted with none, indulged a general conversation, and would not suffer affairs of state to be canvassed in mixed company, or when friends were met to divert themselves. With respect to his enemies, he never said any thing harsh of them, furthered on every occasion their reasonable requests, and was so far from seeking, that he neglected all opportunities of revenge, always professing, that he never went to bed out of charity with any man; and frequently saying, that patience, and a calm bearing of aspersions, and injuries, had wrought him more good than his own abilities. He was far, however, from being an ungrateful man, for without intreaty he would serve his friends as far as it was just; and for his servants, and those about him, he was very careful of their welfare, mostly at his own expence.

' veneration.' We have so many accounts of the manner in which his funeral was performed, that they have created some doubts about where he lies interred. There is no doubt that a very solemn funeral was performed for him at Westminster, on the 29th of August 1598, after which we are told that his body was privately conveyed to Stamford, and placed in the vault under that magnificent tomb erected to his memory (x). Yet in the parish-register it is expressly said, that William Lord Burleigh was buried there (y), August 29, 1598, from whence one would imagine, that his body was not conveyed to Westminster at all, but rather sent immediately to Stamford. As in other things he was happier than most great Ministers, so particularly in this, that his descendants have continued, for a long series of years, in the quiet possession of high titles and large estates; and the female branches of this family have intermarried with the noblest houses in this island, which were blessings, that, of all others, this noble and venerable person most esteemed [EE]. Besides, his fame hath not only triumphed over the envy of his contemporaries, and the calumnies that were spread by his adversaries, who were also those of this nation, over all Europe, but lives fresh in the memory of good men, and is recorded with the highest strains of praise in the most authentick of our Histories; so that it may safely, and without the least exaggeration, be affirmed, that his fortune, in all respects, is the fairest reward that can be proposed, in order to move future Ministers to follow his example.

expenditure. He never raised his own rents, or displaced his tenants; and as the rent was when he bought land, so it stood, inasmuch, that some enjoyed for twenty pounds a year, during his whole life, what might have been let for two hundred: Yet in his publick character he was very severe; and as he never meddled with the Queen's Treasure himself, so he would see that it was not embezzled by others; for it was his saying, that whoever cheated the Crown oppressed the people. In the midst of all his grandeur he was ever easy of access, free from pride, and alike complaisant to all degrees of people: For as he was grave in council, exact in courts of justice, familiar towards his friends, outwardly and inwardly fond of his children, so when he went into the country he would converse with all his servants as kindly as if he had been their equal; talk to country people in their own stile and manner, and would even condescend to foot little children in their sports and plays; so gentle his temper, and so abundant his good-nature. At Theobalds he had fine gardens, which cost him a great deal of money, and which were laid out according to his own directions. He had a little mule, upon which he rode up and down the walks; sometimes he would look on those who were shooting with arrows, or playing with bowls; but as for himself, he never took any diversion, taking that word in it's usual sense. He had two or three friends, who were constantly at his table, because he liked their company; but in all his life he never had one favourite, or suffered any body to get an ascendant over him. His equipage, his great house-keeping, his numerous dependance, were the effects of his sense, and not at all of his passions, for he delighted little in any of them; and whenever he had any time to spare, he fled, as his expression was, to Theobalds, and buried himself in privacy.

[EE] This noble and venerable person most esteemed. We have already shewn, that he had by his first wife, Mary Cheke, daughter of Peter Cheke, Esq; and sister of Sir John Cheke, his eldest son Thomas, a nobleman of great courage, and of unblemished probity, who in the last year of Queen Elizabeth's reign was honoured with the Garter; in the third year of King James he was created Earl of Exeter, which was in those days thought a very extraordinary favour, since it was the first instance, where the title of a county town, was given to one family, while the title of the county remained in another, as it then did, in Mountjoy Earl of Devonshire (112). His Lordship married first Dorothy, one of the daughters and co-heiresses of John Lord Latimer, by whom he had issue five sons and eight daughters. His second wife was Frances, daughter to the Lord Chandois, by whom he had only one daughter, who died in her infancy. He died February 7th, 1621, and was buried in St John's chapel (113), in the collegiate church of St Peter at Westminster. By his second wife, Mildreda, eldest daughter of Sir Anthony Coke, of Giddy-Hall, in Essex, the Lord Burleigh had issue one son and two daughters, viz. Robert, who succeeded him gradually in his employments, and of whom at large in the next article. Anne was married to Edward Earl of Oxford, who, when he could not prevail upon his father-in-law to save his friend, the Duke of Norfolk's life, told him in great wrath, He would do all he could to ruin his daughter, and he kept his word, for he deserted her bed, spent most of his own great estate, and by a series of ill usage broke her heart (114). Elizabeth, who married William Wentworth, Esq; Both these ladies his lordship out-lived, and by his will provided generously for the children of the former. As for the latter, her husband died before her, and by him she had no issue (115). By his will the Lord Burleigh constituted Dr Gabriel Goodman, Dean of Westminster, his old faithful friend, and Thomas Bellot, his Steward, who had lived long in his family, his executors (116), and left them a very large sum of money to be distributed in charitable uses, which was most punctually and faithfully performed (117). By the care of these two diligent and faithful persons, his college at Stamford was duly settled; and many other things, according to that worthy person's desire, who was yet so far from affecting to appear charitable in his last moments, or to dispose of what he could no longer keep, that he left nothing to be done then which it was before in his power to do, for he raised the commons of the students at St John's College in Cambridge, a third in his life-time, as I have seen in a letter of his to his son, Sir Robert Cecil, wherein he mentions it as a reason, why the Queen should allow him more freely to intercede for that college. It was also by his procurement, that his kind master, King Edward VI. left also a legacy to that college, but whether it was complied with, or not, does not appear. By the fidelity also of his lordship's executors, his real and personal estate was preserved intire and untouched, though a very exact account of it was taken of it by Queen Elizabeth's order, who, very probably, might have a notion, that being so long in her service he died in her debt. In this respect she had been remarkably exact, or rather severe; she caused the Earl of Leicester's goods to be sold for the money due to her, though he had stood so high in her favour; she is said to have broke Chancellor Hatton's heart, by demanding of him suddenly an old debt; and though at the request of the Lord Treasurer she granted Sir John Perrot's estate, who died under sentence, to his son, yet after that son's death she resumed the forfeiture, though it was upon very good grounds believed, that old Sir John Perrot was her brother. But Lord Burleigh knew her disposition so well, that he took care to guard against it, by keeping the accounts in the Treasury in constant order, never paying any thing without her express warrant, and never touching a penny of publick money for his private use, during his whole administration, though it had been the custom of his predecessors to borrow money out of the Treasury, and pay it again. But he was too wise to follow any example of so dangerous a nature; and by this caution, and the great integrity of his executors, who were perfectly acquainted with his management, there was no room left so much as for a suspicion that any of the Queen's money was in his hands, and therefore the inspection into the estates and effects of which he died possessed, the record of which is still extant, turned only to the benefit of his heirs and his family, and to heighten that high reputation which for prudence and probity he had acquired while living; so that in private, as well as in publick life, after, as well as before his decease, all researches into his conduct brought nothing to light, but what added to the general esteem for his person, or to that veneration which was borne, and will be ever borne to his memory, so long as regard is paid to unspotted virtue, exalted abilities, and unparalleled application. CECIL, or CECYLL (ROBERT) the first Earl of Salisbury, and one of the ablest Statesmen in Europe, in the end of the sixteenth, and beginning of the seventeenth Century; was the son of William Lord Burleigh, by his second Lady, Mildred, eldest daughter of Sir Anthony Cook (a). He was born about the year 1550 [A], and being of a weakly constitution, was tenderly brought up by his mother. Afterwards, he was educated by a careful and excellent Tutor, under whom he very much improved in every branch of Learning (b). For his further improvement, he was sent to St John's College, Cambridge, the same in which his father the great Lord Burleigh had received his education. He there took, or had conferred upon him, the degree of Master of Arts: for he was incorporated in the same at Oxford, August 30, 1605 (c). But his greatest advantage, was, that he was a Courtier from his cradle; and being trained under his excellent father, became a very great proficient in the knowledge of all State-affairs. As he was the inheritor of the Lord Burleigh's wisdom, so by degrees he succeeded him in his places and favour at Court. For, living in those times, when Queen Elizabeth had most need of the ablest persons, and being such an one himself, she employed him in affairs and negotiations of the highest consequence (d). Having conferred on him the honour of Knight-hood, she sent him assistant to the Earl of Derby, Ambassador to the King of France. At his return, she made him, in 1596, second Secretary of State with Sir Francis Walsingham; after whose decease he continued Principal, as long as he lived (e). Whilst he continued in that office, he was, as one expresses it (f), a Craftmaster in foreign intelligence, which he had from all parts of the world; holding, at his own charge, a correspondence with all Embassadors, and neighbouring States (g): By which means he discovered Queen Elizabeth's enemies abroad, and private conspiracies at home. For this the Queen extremely valued him, and the Papiests hated him as much [B]. He was one of the chief instruments in the disgrace and fall of Robert, Earl of Essex, who had all along opposed his promotion (h). In 1597, he was constituted Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (i), and was also Lord Privy-Seal (k). In 1598, he was one of the Commissioners (l) sent into France, to negotiate a peace between that Crown and Spain (m): and in 1599, succeeded his father, the Lord Burleigh, in the office of Master of the Wards [C]; for which he resigned a better place, that of Chancellor of the Duchy (n). He succeeded him also in the high post of Prime Minister, and from that time the publick affairs seem to have been entirely under his direction; which he conducted with a capacity worthy of his Prince and Country, and an integrity so firm and constant, as more than once exposed his life to the implacable malice of the Spaniards and Jesuits, as will presently appear. During the last years of the reign of his glorious Mistress, he supported her declining age with that vigour and prudence, as at once enabled her to assist her allies the States, when they were ingloriously abandoned by France, and to baffle a dangerous Rebellion in Ireland, fomented and cherished by a strong assistance from Spain (o). Tho' he was a faithful servant to his Mistress Queen Elizabeth, yet, like many others, he adored the rising Sun, and kept a correspondence with her Successor King James I (p). At one time, he was very near being discovered [D], but by uncommon presence of mind he avoided the danger (q). His private services to that Monarch, or else the interest of Sir George Hume (r), so effectually recommended him to King James, that he took him into the highest degree of favour [E], and continued him in his office of Prime-Minister

[A] He was born about the year 1550. We have not been able to discover any where the exact time of his birth; but have reason to conjecture it was about the year specified here. For his father married Mildred Cooke, December 21, 1546: Robert was the second child by her, and therefore born about 1549, or 1550 (1). He was one of the young Nobility, that went on board the English fleet against the Spanish Armada (†): and was one of the Representatives in Parliament for the county of Hertford, 34 and 39 Elizabethæ (‡).

[B] The Papiests hated him. And vented their malice against him in several libels, both printed and manuscript: reflecting in them, very grossly, upon his birth and honour; and threatening to murder him. He returned an answer to some of them, both in English and Latin, intitled, Adversus Perduelles; wherein he declares, That he despised all their threats, for the service of so good a cause as he was engaged in; namely, that of his Religion and Country (2).

[C] He succeeded his father ——— in the office of Master of the Wards. In which he was so restrained by new Orders, that he was a Ward himself; as he expresses it (3).

[D] At one time he was very near being discovered. For, as the Queen was taking the air upon Blackheath near Greenwich, a Post riding by, her Majesty enquired from whence it came; and being told, 'From Scotland,' she stopped her coach to receive the packet. Sir Robert Cecil, who was in the coach with her, fearful lest some of his secret conveyances should be discovered; having a ready wit, calls for a knife suddenly to open it, that delays and puts-off might not heget suspicion. When he came to cut it open, he told the Queen, It looked and smelt very ill, coming out of many nasty hudgets; so that it was proper to open and air it before she saw what it contained. Now, the Queen having an extreme aversion to ill-fcents, that sudden thought of the Secretary's hindred her from smelling out his under-hand contrivances (4). After the Queen's decease, it was he who first publickly read her Will, and proclaimed King James (5).

[E] His private services, ——— or else the interest of Sir George Hume (afterwards Earl of Dunbar) recommended him to King James. One author, if he deserves credit (6), relates the following story. 'Sir George Hume being the only man that was the guider of the King, and his affairs, all the wiser sort of English made their addresses unto him; amongst those Sir Robert Cecil, a very wise man, but much hated in England, by reason of the fresh bleeding of that universally beloved Earle of Essex, and for that was clouded also in the King's favour. He came to Yorke, but lay close, unseene, or scarce known to be in the city, untill he knew what entertainment he should receive from the King; for he was in his owne, and all men's opinions, so under the hatches, as not ever to appear above-board againe (nor did any of the counter-faction to Essex, besides himselfe, ever attaine to the King's favour); but those friends raised by his wit, and purse, did so co-operate (of which

Minister (j). And though, in that reign, the publick affairs were not carried on with the same spirit as in the last, the fault cannot, with justice, be charged on this great Minister, but on the King; who, being of a fearful and unenterprising temper, was resolved to have peace with all the world, and especially with Spain, at any rate (t). But, notwithstanding Sir Robert Cecil was far from approving in his heart the measures taken for obtaining that inglorious peace, yet he so far ingratiated himself with his Sovereign, that he was raised by him to great honours. For, on the 13th of May 1603, he was created Baron of Essenden in Rutlandshire; on the 20th of August 1604, Viscount Cranborne in Dorsetshire (being the first of that degree that ever used a Coronet); and, on the 4th of May 1605, Earl of the city of Salisbury (u) [F]; August 30, 1605, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, as he stood at Cambridge (w). And also was Chancellor of the University of Cambridge (x), and May 20, 1605, installed Knight of the Garter (y). He shewed himself all along a true Servant to his Prince, but without neglecting at the same time the real Interest and Advantage of his Country. As an instance of which, he never heartily espoused the Spanish Interest; though it was the only one countenanced by King James; and some of our Courtiers, by encouraging it, got immense riches [G]. The Court of Spain were so sensible of his little inclination, or rather extreme aversion, to them [H], that they endeavoured to alienate the King his Master's favour from him, by means of the Queen (z); and it was moved there in Council, to send complaints to England of his malignant humour, or enmity, to the Spanish nation: upon which, if he did not alter his conduct, then a shorter course should be taken with him; that is, they would destroy him (a). Afterwards, they came to have great hopes of him, and resolved to omit no means to gain him over to their side (b). But when all the Popish designs happened to be blasted; by the discovery of the Gunpowder-plot; a plot in the discovery whereof this Lord was very active; so enraged thereupon was the body of the Roman Catholics, that some of them formed a combination against him (c). That however taking no effect, they attempted to ruin him in the King's favour, by reporting he had a pension of forty thousand Crowns from the States of the United Provinces, for being their special favourer, friend, supporter, and patron (d). Moreover, they branded him with the appellation of a Puritan [I], a name very odious to King James (e). Finally, they plotted to murder him, by a musket, shot out of the Savoy, or some other house near, as he should be going by water to Court (f). But all their wicked machinations proved unsuccessful [K]. In the Parliament, which met at Westminster, November 9, 1605, he got much reputation, love, and honour, for the zeal he then expressed for the Protestant religion (g). In the year 1606, he entertained King James, and the King of Denmark, who was then in England, ‘ which Sir Roger Aston, that plaine man was principal, for which he lost not his labour) That Sir Geo. Hume, and Sir Robert Cecil had many secret meetings, and did so comply, that Sir Robert Cecil, to the admiration of all, did appeare, and come out of his chamber like a giant, to run his race for honour, and fortune; and who in such deareness and privacy with the King, as Sir Robert Cecil: as if he had been his faithful servant many years before.’

(7) Page 51.

But Dr Goodinan, author of Aulicus Coquinaria (7), thinks, That Sir Robert Cecil's merit; his perpetual correspondence by emissaries of his own into Scotland; and the great want King James had of his advice and directions, how to render himself most acceptable to his new subjects; were recommendation enough with that Monarch, without any need of Sir George Hume's interest or interposition.

[F] Earl of the city of Salisbury. He, and his elder brother, Thomas, Earl of Exeter, were both created Earls in one day; but Sir Robert was created first, and by that means had the precedence: which, it seems, occasioned for some time great uneasiness between those two noble families.

[G] Some of our Courtiers, by encouraging it, got immense riches. We are told (8), ‘ That there was not one Courtier of note, who tasted not of Spain's bounty, either in gold or jewels; and, among them, not any in so large a proportion as the Countess of Suffolk, who shared in her Lord's interest, being then a potent man, and in that interest which she had, in being mistress to that little great Secretary (9) (little in body and stature, but great in wit and policy) the sole manager of state-affairs.’

[H] The Court of Spain were sensible of his little inclination, or rather aversion, to them. He received intimations of it, from Sir Charles Cornwallis, Embassador in Spain: who thus writes to him: —

‘ Great doubt they [the Spaniards] make of your Lordship's disposition towards them: but, I have so well resolved them, as they seem to shew more confidence; yet more they desire, if by any means

‘ they might obtain it. I tell them, that the best advice is, Amare & amari. I assure them such to be your Lordship's noble disposition, as where you find a soundness in good will to the King and your Country, you need not be sollicit for your affection (9) — And elsewhere — This State, though admiring your worth, and setting the true esteem upon your abilities, yet rests settled in a prejudicate opinion of your affection to them. For myne own parte, — I have travelled to myne uttermost to persuade them the truth, viz. That your onely Blancke is the honor and safety of your King and Country, not passion or partial inclination (10).’

[I] They branded him with the appellation of a Puritan. But Sir Charles Cornwallis fully resolved them to the contrary, ‘ Giving them (to use his own words to his Lordship) to understand your noble temper and integrity in all your actions: — ending with these words, That God having blessed you with so great wisdom, soe highe a place in your Prince's favours, and so happy an estate; might alsoe, being a meane of a peace to the universall Church, lay a perpetuall foundation to your House and Fame (11).’ The answer his Lordship made with regard to these and the like calumnies, was every way worthy of his noble mind. ‘ I have learned to despise the malicious stinge of evill tongues, which I hate me for my Religion, and my Countrey (12).’

[K] All their wicked machinations proved unsuccessful. They had not made an end, even in the year 1609. For in June that year, Sir Ch Cornwallis advised his Lordship, ‘ That four Jesuits lately sent into England, had in charge for one of their especial Commissions, to acquaint themselves with some neere attendants to my Lords of Chamberburie and Salisbury; and whatsoever it should cost to draw them by payson or other private means or practice to make an end of those two Lords, as the greatest obstacles and enemies to the holy Catholique Cause in England (13).’

England, four days together, at his seat at Theobalds (b). Upon the death of Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorset, Lord High-Treasurer of England, in April 1608, he succeeded him in that most eminent office, on the 4th of May (i): and the choice the King made of him for that place was universally applauded; a great reformation being expected from him in the Exchequer (k): which he accordingly effected. And finding it almost totally exhausted, he devised these several means to replenish it with money, namely, by causing the Royal Manors to be surveyed, which before were but very imperfectly known: by reviving the custody of Crown lands, by commissions of Assizes: by taking care to have the King's woods and timber viewed, numbered, marked, and valued: by having an exact survey made of the Copyhold lands held of the Crown, which he ordered to be printed: by compounding with the Copyholder of inheritance, and the possessors of Wastes and Commons originally appertaining to the King: by appointing Commissioners, to gather in the fines arising from penal laws, and such as accrued from the King's manors; and also to survey the estates that were extorted, or seized, for debts to the Crown: by improving the customs, from eighty-six thousand, to one hundred and twenty thousand, and afterwards to an hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds per ann. by bargaining, for the New-River water to be conveyed to London, which brought a great yearly revenue: by surrendering up his patent of Master of the Wards to the King, for his benefit and advantage (l): and likewise by Privy-Seals; and by selling some of the Crown-Lands (m). While he thus studied his Master's advantage, he did not, at the same time, neglect his own, but got a considerable estate for himself [L], and exchanged his seat of Theobalds with the King, for the noble manor of Hatfield in Hertfordshire (n). However, this just commendation is due to him, That he consulted in general the interest of the nation, more than most Prime Ministers, before or since him, have done. For, he always encouraged industry and manufactures: as the home-making of Allom; salt by the Sun; buffes for fishing; salt upon salt, by new fires and inventions; copper and copperas of iron and steel; that the subjects at home might be kept on work, and the small treasure of the nation hindred from going abroad. He likewise took great care of improving Ireland; by plantations there, and transplantations of the natives, to advance the customs, and to abate the charges of the garrisons: and introduced an universal course of law and justice, in the most barbarous and remote parts of that nation (o). In 1609, he asserted the prerogative of the Crown of England, in restraining foreigners from fishing upon our coasts (p). The same year, he made a remarkable speech in Parliament, wherein he demanded a yearly revenue of two hundred thousand pounds for his Majesty [M]. The House of Commons desiring to know, before they made any answer to that demand, what return the King would make them for the same? were checked for it by the Lord Treasurer, as guilty of want of respect (q). This Lord's extreme and indefatigable application to business threw him at length into a consumption of the lungs. After having for some time been in a declining condition, he was attacked, in the beginning of the year 1612, with a tertian ague, which turned to a complication of dropsy and scurvy (r). Being advised to go to the Bath, for the recovery of his health, he set out for that place the 27th of April, and continued there 'till [L] Got a considerable estate for himself. We are told (14), that he flouted off the cream of the King's manors in many counties, not any two lying in any one county; and made choice of most in the remotest counties: moreover (15), that he had one trick to get the kernel, and leave the Scots but the shell, yet cast all the envy on them. He would make them buy books of Fee-farms, some one hundred pounds per annum, some one hundred marks, and then would compound with them for a thousand pounds; which they were willing to embrace, because they were sure to have them pass without any controul or charge, and one thousand pounds appeared to them that never saw ten pounds before, an inexhaustible treasure: then would he fill up this book with such prime land, as should be worth ten or twenty thousand pounds, which was easy for him to do, being Treasurer. By this means his Lordship enriched himself infinitely, yet cast the envy on the Scots, in whose names these books appeared, and are still upon record to all posterity; though they had but part of the wax, and the Earl of Salisbury the honey. The same author observes further (16), That the advantage the Lord Treasurer had, in exchanging Theobalds with the King, was as great, as if he had sold his Majesty Theobalds for fifty years purchase. And also, that he had reserved to himself and his posterity the being perpetual keepers of the house and parks adjacent. Finally, that, to satisfy his revenge upon some neighbour gentlemen, that formerly would not sell him some convenient parcels of land bordering on Theobalds, he put the King on enlarging the Park, walling and storing it with red Deer.

[M] He made a speech in Parliament, wherein he demanded a yearly revenue of 200,000*l.* for his Majesty.

[By] Amongst other reasons and inducements which he used then, he alledged this; That at the time of his coming into the office of High-Treasurer, he found the King indebted thirteen hundred thousand pounds, whereof part grew in the late Queen's time, for supplying of the wars of Ireland under the Earls of Essex and Devonshire, and the rest since the King's coming to the crown; specifying particularly the manner and occasions of the expence. That since the said time there had been nine hundred thousand pounds of the said debts acquitted, so that there remained yet four hundred thousand pounds to discharge. He shewed moreover, that the ordinary expence of the King amounted to eighty one thousand pounds yearly more than his whole revenue, besides the incidents of extraordinaries; which he said there is no man but in the supputation of his private accounts did commonly find to amount to the fourth part of his ordinary charges. So that both for the discharging of the remainder of the King's debts, and the due supplying hereafter of his expences (whereof he did not omit to represent the new increase coming upon him by the installation and emancipating of the Prince) his conclusion and demand was, That the House would yield a yearly and perpetual Grant, and that without necessity of new consents and assemblies, of two hundred thousand pounds for a subvention to his Majesty's charges. And the better to incline and encourage the House to the granting this high and extraordinary demand, he willed every one of them to bring and proffer freely any such griefs as they had, and promised in the King's name, that his Majesty would redress the same, and give them all satisfaction therein, as far as should lye in his power (17).

the 21ſt of May following (s). The King viſited him before his departure (t), and expreſſed the utmoſt value for him [N]. But the Bath not doing him the ſervice that was expected, he ſet out again for London on the 21ſt of May: however he did not live to reach that city; for he died, in Mr Daniel's houſe at St Margaret's in Marleburgh [O], on Sunday the 24th of May 1612 (u). His body being embalmed was brought to Hatfield in Hertfordſhire, where it was magnificently buried (w): and a ſumptuous monument was ſome time after erected to his memory [P]. By his Lady, Elizabeth, daughter of William Brooke Lord Cobham, he had William, who ſucceeded him in his honours and dignities; and a daughter named Frances, married to Henry Lord Clifford, ſon and heir apparent to Francis, Earl of Cumberland (x). As to Robert Earl of Salifbury's perſon, and character: for the firſt he was not much beholden to nature, for he was very much crooked. But he had a good face, which indeed was the beſt part of his outſide. What he wanted in ſhape was amply made up in prudence, and exquisite good ſenſe; in which reſpect he was his father's own ſon. For, as one expreſſes it (y), upon his little crooked body he carried a head, and a head-piece of a vaſt content. And therein it ſeems nature was ſo diligent to compleat one and the beſt part about him; as that, beſides the perfection of his memory, ſhe took care alſo of his ſenſes, and gave him very quick and ſharp eyes. In his temper, he was of a ſweet diſpoſition, full of mildneſs, courteſy, honeſt mirth, bounty, kindneſs, and gratitude (z): but, in what he found to touch the honour and intereſt of his Sovereign, it was his cuſtom to ſpeak roundly and plainly (a). In his political capacity, he was the moſt ſufficient and able Counſellor that ever King was ſerved with (b), of noble endowments of mind, of a great genius, and perfectly acquainted with the ſtate and intereſt of this nation (c): a perſon of great dexterity, ſincerity, and judgment, in the diſpatch of publick affairs (d). This is abundantly evident not only from his whole conduct, but alſo from his many Letters to our Ambaſſadors abroad [Q]; in which he expreſſes himſelf like a perſon of great abilities, and like an honeſt man, and a good Chriſtian. But ſince, as all other officers of State, he hath had a double character, it will therefore be proper to ſee what hath been ſaid to his diſadvantage. He is charged by ſome (e), with having done ill offices to this nation, in diſcovering the nature of the people; and ſhowing the King the way, how to enhance his prerogative ſo above the laws, that he might inflave the nation: which, though it took well then, yet hath been of ſad and dangerous conſequence in after-times. For, firſt, he cauſed a whole cart-load of Parliament-precedents, that ſpoke the ſubjects liberty to be burnt (f). Next, he raiſed two hundred thouſand pounds for making two hundred Baronets; telling the King, 'He ſhould find his Engliſh ſubjects like aſſes, on whom he might lay any burden, and ſhould need neither bit nor bridle, but their aſſes ears.' And when the King ſaid, 'It would diſcontent the generality of the gentry;' he replied, 'Tush, Sir, [N] The King viſited him before his departure, &c. His Maſteſty viſited him twice, ſoon after the beginning of his illneſs, and gave charge to the Phyſicians upon their heads to be careful of him; and commanded all men for four days to forbear ſpeaking to him upon any buſineſs (18). Immediately before his departure, his Maſteſty viſited him again at Salifbury-houſe, and with tears, at parting, proteſted to the Lords attending, his great loſs of the wiſeſt counſellor and beſt ſervant, that any Prince in Chriſtendom could parallel (19). And when a report came from Bath, of his being likely to recover, the King ſent purpoſely the Lord Hay to him, with a token, which was, a fair diamond, ſet, or rather hung, ſquare in a gold ring without a ſoil, and this meſſage, 'That the favour and affection he bore him, was, and ſhould be ever, as the form and matter of that Ring, 'endleſs, pure, and moſt perfect.' From the Queen he received by the ſame hand another gracious meſſage, and a token; and at the ſame time the like remembrance from the Prince delivered by Sir John Hollis: All which were comforts and confirmations of his never otherwiſe than moſt faithful and beſt deſerving ſervice (20). And this by the ſeems to be a ſufficient confirmation of the ſtory told by Sir Anthony Weldon (21), That the Duke of Bouillon, who was then in England, about the overture of that unfortunate match between the Palgrave and the Lady Elizabeth, had ſo done the Lord Treasurer's errand, and diſcovered his juggling; that it is moſt certain, he had been ſtript of all his great places, if he had lived to return to Court.

[O] He died at Mr Daniel's houſe at St Margaret's in Marleburgh. Some authors of very ſlender credit, and much given to detraction, give the following account of his death. That he died of the Herodian diſeaſe [vermin]; and, for all his great honours and poſſeſſions, and ſtately houſes, found no place but the top of a mole-hill (22), near Marleborough, to end his miſerable life; ſo that it might be ſaid of him, and truly, he died of a moſt loathſome diſeaſe, without houſe, without pity, without the favour of that maſter that had raiſed him to ſo high an eſtate (23). — The other writer here referred to (24), ſpeaks thus — 'Nor was his death, by prejudice, looked upon as Herod's, nor the place it attacked him on, viz. Salifbury-plaine in his Coach, nor Po his Phyſician then preſent (a mere empirick, and celebrated for no ſkill but in the cure of the —) ſmall inducement to the reports which followed: — Moreover, his body burſt the lead it was wrapped in, with ſo much noiſe and ſtrench as affrighted the by-ſtanders; which his calumniators eſteemed an effect of God's vengeance.' But, beſides that theſe accounts vary in ſeveral material circumſtances from the text above, which is taken from very authentick writers; it is certain, there is not the leaſt hint of what is aſſerted by theſe two ſcandalous authors, in the relation of this Lord's laſt moments, minutely given in a letter by his domeſtick Chaplain Dr Bowles (25); and by Mr Fynett, who was one of his conſtant attendants (26). One author ſuſpects (27), that his Lordſhip died not without ſuſpicion of poiſon from Sir Robert Carr.

[P] A monument was ſome time after erected to his memory. It is in a Chapel, built by this Lord, on the North-ſide of the Chancel. The monument, is, a table of black marble, with his Lordſhip's effigies in white marble, lying upon it with his ſtaff. This is ſupported by the four cardinal virtues, in virgin-habits, on their knees, carved in white marble, each with her proper emblem. Underneath is another table of black marble, upon which lies the ſkeleton of the Earl curiouſly carved (28).

‘ Sir, you want the money that will do you good, the honour will do them very little.’ And by these courses he raised himself, friends, and family, to offices, honours, and great possessions. He is also accused (g), of having sold great quantities of Crown-timber. But, the person who brings this accusation, does in a great measure discharge the Lord Treasurer from it; by observing, that millions of oaks were felled and sold at vile prices, not only during the life of the Earl of Salisbury, but all the reign of King James. He is likewise blamed, for having raised money by several means which were looked upon as oppressive. But in reality the blame of this must be laid upon the extravagance, and, in consequence of that, upon the indigence, of his master King James. Whenever he had an opportunity, he endeavoured to curb his Majesty’s extreme profuseness [R]. His greatest blemish, was, the being a promoter of the unfortunate Sir Walter Raleigh’s fall (b). And, before that, his sharp proceedings against the Earl of Essex; and his inclosures of Hatfield-chace; had created such a hatred for him in the generality, that the black cloud of detraction fell upon all he said or did: to which the misfortunes accompanying him from his birth did not add a little. Upon all these accounts he hath been reviled and libelled. But, how many soever his faults were, he is universally allowed, even by his enemies, to have been of an incomparable prudence: and is highly extolled for other excellencies by his friends [S]. Coming so near such an unadvised scatterer as King James, he might have enriched his family better than he did, but that he looked upon low things with contempt, leaving much to the gleanings of his servants. What was said of Gregory the Great in another case, was not improperly applicable to him. ‘ That he was the first ill treasurer, and the last good, since Queen Elizabeth’s days;’ he not standing charged with any grosser bribery or corruption, than what lay inclusive under the ceremony of new-years-gifts, or his own, or servants, sharing with such as by importunity, rather than merit, had obtained debentures out of the Exchequer (i). In a word, by the confession of all parties, he had great parts, was very wise, full of honour and bounty, a great lover and rewarder of virtue, and able parts in others, so as they did not aspire too high in places, or look too narrowly into his actions (k). Besides his book against the Papists, and his letters and dispatches already mentioned; he was author of several speeches in Parliament (l), and of some notes on Dr John Dee’s Discourse about the reformation of the Calendar (m).

[R] He endeavoured to curb his Majesty’s extreme profuseness. Particularily once, the King having given a peremptory warrant to Sir Robert Carr, afterwards Earl of Somerset, for twenty thousand pounds (29), the Lord Treasurer (who, in his exquisite prudence, found that not only the Exchequer, but the Indies themselves would want fluency to feed so immense a prodigality, and not without reason apprehending, that the King was ignorant of the value of the gift he had made to his favourite) caused the sum abovementioned, all in silver, to be laid upon the ground (30), in a room through which his Majesty was to pass, being invited to dinner at Salisbury house. The King amazed at the quantity, and probably having never seen the like before, asked the Treasurer, ‘ Whose money it was?’ He replied, ‘ Your Majesty’s, before you gave it away.’ Whereupon the King fell into a passion, and protested he was abused, never intending such a gift: and casting himself upon the heap, scrawled out the quantity of two or three hundred pounds, and swore Carr should have no more. However it being the King’s minion, Cecil durst not provoke him farther, than by permitting him only to have the half of that sum (31).

[S] And is highly extolled for other excellencies by his friends. Sir Charles Cornwallis writes to his Lordship from Spain in the following words. — ‘ Well may your Lordship’s hearte be comforted in this, That the infallible testimonies you have given of your love to truth and temper, your watchfull eye over the Master you serve, and your incessant cares and travailes for the safety of your countrye, cannot but breed you favour with God, love and respect with the King, and make you deare to as many of your countrye as have eyther eyes or judgment to discern your true and rare deservings (32). And in another place (33), — ‘ That my Lord of Salisbury was so compleate and perfect a servante and lover of his King and countrye, as there were no meanes upon earth to draw him to encline to any the least poynte that should not soundly agree with their honor and security.’

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) a gallant Soldier, an able Statesman, and a very learned Writer in the XVIIth century. He was descended from a good family in Wales, and born at London about the year 1515 (a). His quick parts discovered themselves even in his infancy, so that his family, to promote that passionate desire of knowledge for which he was so early distinguished, sent him to the university of Cambridge, where he remained some years, and obtained great credit, as well by the pregnancy of his wit, as his constant and diligent application, but more especially by his happy turn for Latin Poetry, in which he exceeded most of his contemporaries (b). Upon his removing from college, he came up to Court; and being taken notice of there for his extraordinary abilities and excellent behaviour, which recommended him to the esteem of the best, and the friendship of the greatest men, about it, he was soon sent abroad into Germany with Sir Henry Knevet, as the custom was in the reign of Henry VIII, when young men of great hopes were frequently employed in the service of Ambassadors, that they might at once improve and polish themselves by travel, and gain some experience in business (c). He was so well received at the Court of the Emperor Charles V, and so highly pleased with the noble and generous spirit of that great Monarch, that he attended him in his journeys, and also in his wars, particularly in that fatal expedition against Algiers, which cost the lives of so many brave men, and was very near cutting short the thread of Mr Chaloner’s, for in that great tempest by which the Emperor’s fleet was shattered on the coast of Barbary in 1541, the vessel on board of which he was suffered shipwreck, and Mr Chaloner having quite wearied and exhausted himself by swimming, and that too in the dark, at length beat his head against a cable, of which laying hold with his teeth, he was providentially drawn up into the ship to which it belonged, though with the loss of some of them (d). He returned soon after into England, and as a reward of his learning and services, was promoted to the office of First Clerk of the Council, in which post he served during the remainder of that reign (e). In the beginning of the next he came into great favour with the Duke of Somerset, whom he attended into Scotland, and was in the battle of Mulsburgh, where he distinguished himself so remarkably in the presence of the Duke, that he conferred upon him the honour of knighthood 28 Sept. 1547, and after his return to Court, the Dukes of Somerset presented him with a rich jewel (f). The first cloud that darkened his patron's fortune, proved fatal to Sir Thomas Chaloner's pretensions, for being a man of a warm and open temper, and conceiving the obligation he was under to the Duke, as a tie that hindered his making court to his adversary, a stop was put to his preferment, and a vigilant eye kept upon his actions; but his loyalty to his Prince, and his exact discharge of his duty, secured him from any farther danger; so that he had leisure to apply himself to his studies, and to cultivate his acquaintance with the worthiest men of that Court, particularly Sir John Cheke, Sir Anthony Coke, Sir Thomas Smith, and more especially Sir William Cecil, with whom he always lived in the strictest intimacy (g). Under the reign of Queen Mary he passed his time, tho' safely, yet very unpleasantly, for being a zealous Protestant, he could not practise any part of that complaisance, which procured some of his friends an easier life. He interested himself extremely in the affair of Sir John Cheke, and did him all the service he was able, both before and after his confinement. This had like to have brought Sir Thomas himself into trouble, if the civilities he had shewn in King Edward's reign, when they were in a state of humiliation, to some of those who had the greatest power under Queen Mary, had not moved them, from a principle of gratitude, to protect him. Indeed it appears from his own writings, that, as he was very honest in his own friendships, so he was particularly happy in them, and as he was never wanting to his friends, when he had power, he never felt the want of them, when he had it not, and, which he esteemed the greatest blessing of his life, he lived to return those kindnesses to some who had been useful to him in that dangerous season (b) [A]. Upon the demise of Queen Mary, and the accession of Elizabeth, he appeared at Court with his former lustre, and it must afford us a very high opinion of his character, as well as his capacity, that he was the first Ambassador named by that wise Prince's, and that also to the first Prince in Europe, Ferdinand I. Emperor of Germany (i). In this negotiation, which was of equal importance and delicacy, he acquitted himself with great reputation, and not only did all that was expected

[A] Who had been useful to him in that dangerous season.] It is a very great pity, that more care has not been taken to preserve the personal and literary History of this truly great man, the rather because such diligence seemed to be in a peculiar manner due to his memory, on account of that constant respect he shewed for the characters of others, whether distinguished by their extraordinary merit towards the publick, or recommended by the more immediate connection of private friendship (1), so that a certain writer, in his short character of him, had reason to say, that 'a true friend was the best picture of this gentleman's mind, since his love knew no bounds, could not be diverted by any danger, or divorced even by death itself.' Of this he gave variety of instances, by the tribute he paid to the fame of those he either esteemed or loved, that were far enough from being happy in their fortunes; but because we have not much room to spare, and therefore cannot dwell upon a variety of instances, we will content ourselves with the mention only of one, as being of all others the most proper for our purpose. He wrote then a long and beautiful poem upon the tragical death of that most excellent person, the Lady Jane Gray, in which are contained a multitude of curious and instructive passages, so that it is very hard to say, whether it is more valuable for the matter or manner of it's composition. But surely it is a noble testimony of the virtue and honesty, and at the same time of the tenderness of it's author's disposition (2). He opens it with a most admirable description of the elegant form of this fair victim to the ambition of others, and having painted in the brightest colours the beauties of her person, he celebrates her great learning and wisdom, which, considering she was scarce eighteen when she died, nothing but the unimpeached sincerity of the author could induce us to credit; he observes, that besides her mother-tongue, she was not superficially, but perfectly well skilled in seven languages, viz. Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabick, Italian, and French. She wrote a very fine hand, and with incomparable facility upon all subjects, possessing the Philosophy of Plato perfectly, and having a happy tincture of the eloquence of Demosthenes. Her natural abilities were very great, and they were heightened by an application so assiduous, that, her sex and quality considered, we may safely say was unequalled. She played admirably on several instruments of musick, and, if we may add to such accomplishments one that may seem trivial, she was excellent at her needle. Yet with all these rare endowments, all these high and extraordinary qualities, she was of a mild, an humble, and a modest spirit, and never discovered any thing of the height and grandeur of her mind, but in the last act of her life, a fearless and noble, though at the same time a pious, and a Christian-like, contempt of death. Our author very justly observes, that, considering all that had the colour of crime in her conduct was cast upon her by others, it gave no great idea of the Queen's justice, that sparing some who were deeply guilty, she suffered the full weight of punishment to fall upon this Innocent. To this, in a high strain of poetick justice, he attributes the shortness and the uneasiness of Queen Mary's reign, her long and languishing sickness, her disturbed government, and her distraction of mind, occasioned chiefly by shedding this poor Lady's blood. He likewise takes in the chief authors of this dire counsel, and shows, that notwithstanding their seeming escape in this world, they were nevertheless severely and justly punished, few of them surviving long, and most of them undergoing more painful deaths than they had inflicted upon her; one sinking under the pressure of a dropsy, another brought to his end by the excruciating torments of the stone, a third by the slow progress of an incurable consumption, and others by diseases equally cruel in their kind, and fatal in their events. A great part of this admirable Latin poem has been re-published as an Appendix to the History of that reign under which this unfortunate Lady suffered, and it is really a great pity that it has not been translated, for the information as well as satisfaction of the English reader, very few things of the kind deserving it so well (3).

pected from him but much more, which his Mistress very gratefully acknowledged (k) [B]. After his return from this embassy, he was very soon thought of for another, which was that of Spain, and though it is certain the Queen could not give a stronger proof than this of her confidence in his abilities, yet he was very far from thinking that it was any mark of her kindness, more especially considering the terms upon which she then stood with King Philip, and the usage his predecessor Chamberlain had met with at that Court (l). But he knew the Queen would be obeyed, and therefore undertook the business with the best grace he could, and embarked for Spain in 1561. On his first arrival he met with such a piece of rudeness, as made him weary of the country before he was well in it. This was the searching of all his trunks and cabinets, of which he complained loudly; for having been treated at the Court of the Emperor with the utmost respect, he could not bear such an act of insolence, which he thought equally injurious to himself as a gentleman, and to his character as a publick Minister (m). His complaints however were fruitless, for at that time there is great probability that his Catholick Majesty was not over desirous of having an English Minister, and more especially one of Sir Thomas's disposition, at his Court, and therefore gave him no satisfaction. Upon this Sir Thomas Chaloner wrote home, set out the affront that he had received in the strongest terms possible, and was very earnest to be re-called; but the Queen his Mistress contented herself with letting him know, that it was the duty of every person who bore a publick character, to bear with patience what happened to them, provided no personal indignity was offered to the Prince from whom they came (n.) Yet for all this, the searching Sir Thomas Chaloner's trunks, was, many years afterwards, put into that publick Charge which the Queen exhibited against his Catholick Majesty, of injuries done to her before she intermeddled with the affairs of the Low-Countries (o) But notwithstanding this he kept up his spirit, and shewed the Spanish Ministers, and even that haughty Monarch himself, that the Queen could not have entrusted her affairs in better hands than his. There were some persons of very good families in England, who, for the sake of their religion,

(o) As appears from several papers amongst the M.S. of Lord Burleigh.

[B] Which his Mistress very gratefully acknowledged.] It was very natural, as well as necessary, at the beginning of a new reign, and especially in the circumstances the Queen was in at the entrance of hers, to think of preserving a good correspondence with all the Princes of Europe, but more especially with the Emperor, for various reasons; she therefore charged Sir Thomas Chaloner with a letter to him, the substance (4) of which was to the following effect: 'That her sister was dead, and that through the goodness of God, and in virtue of her own hereditary right, and the people's consent, she was now invested in the succession, and that she desired nothing more than the preservation and improvement of that ancient friendship, which had been so long kept up between the Crown of England and the House of Austria.' The great service that he did in this embassy, was to divide the views of the Emperor and King Philip, by hinting the possibility of a marriage between the Archduke of Austria and Queen Elizabeth, which at that juncture was a very great and important service, since there was nothing the Queen wanted so much as to gain time, and to prevent the Popish powers from associating against her before she was well fixed upon the throne, or the kingdom thoroughly settled. How dexterously he managed this, and how well he secured the confidence of the Emperor and his Ministers, will best appear from the following passage in an author who took what he wrote from the papers of the great Lord Burleigh (5). 'George van Helfenstein, Baron of Gundelfingen, was in England with the Queen, soon after her first coming to the Crown, in quality of Agent or Ambassador from the Emperor. Then there happened communication between him and Sir Thomas Chaloner about the Queen's marriage, which Chaloner and all good men then had their thoughts much bent upon. They talked together of the Emperor's son, the Archduke of Austria. And now Van Helfenstein being departed and at Brussels, wrote, Mar. 21, 1558, to Chaloner, and sent him the picture of that Duke, which he might shew as he should think most convenient. This representation of him shewed him to be a most comely person, but his mind and inward abilities exceeded his person,' as the noble German told Chaloner in his letter. 'That if the most virtuous and gallant endowment of his soul were known as well to him as they were to himself and others, he would soon acknowledge, they did by many degrees surpass the beauty of his body. But that picture receiving some damage by the waggon in which it was brought, he promised to send Chaloner another of

'the Duke's whole body, and of his brother also; wishing that he might have a sight of them both alive, without the help of paint and colour. He told him all the report at Brussels was, that the King of Spain was to marry the Queen, although, as he subjoined, men of great authority, when he was in England, seemed to misdoubt it. But he prayed Chaloner, out of their great friendship, to give some account of that whole matter. For that indeed was the very reason, why the Emperor, who intended to offer to the Queen either of his sons, did forbear at present to do it, because he would not any ways disoblige one so nearly related. But if the King's suit succeeded not, he then requested his friend, the said Sir Thomas Chaloner, to give him with all secrecy an account of it, and then would the Emperor put in strongly for one of his sons; and so he did afterwards.' But this was not all. He so well understood the Queen's mind, the advantages that might be gained by managing and keeping up this treaty, of which there was not the least shadow of success or reality, for the Queen disliked the person of this German Prince as much as she slighted his pretensions, that when he had made as much of it as was possible in one shape, he very artfully shifted the scene, and made no less of it in another. We will give this part of the story in the words of the learned Camden, who had his information from the same source as Mr Strype; that is, from the memoirs and papers of the Lord Treasurer: 'The King of Spain having cast off all pretensions to Elizabeth, and being upon his marriage with the French King's daughter, was not however a little perplexed about England, which he had no mind to see united to the Crown of France. And the better to retain the honour of so considerable a kingdom in his own family, he persuaded the Emperor Ferdinand, his uncle, to offer one of his sons in marriage to Queen Elizabeth; which he did, by letters full of respect, and pressed the affair very closely by Gaspar Preinor, Free-Baron in Stibing; and the King of Spain himself offers her Majesty his best and heartiest offices to bring it about, whilst she, in return, has both her ships and ports at his service, to facilitate his intended voyage into Spain; and pays him other services and compliments, by the hands of Sir Thomas Chaloner.' This introduced our statesman to an acquaintance with the Spanish Ministry, and his having succeeded so happily in negotiating with both branches of the house of Austria upon so tender a point, looked like a demonstration, that nothing could be too hard for him, and brought upon him his Spanish journey.

religion, and no doubt out of regard to the interest to which they had devoted themselves, desired to have leave from Queen Elizabeth to reside in the Low-Countries or elsewhere, and King Philip and his Ministers made it a point to support their suit. Upon this, when a Conference was held with Sir Thomas Chaloner, he answered very roundly, that the thing in itself was of very little importance, since it was no great matter where the persons who made this request spent the remainder of their days, but that considering the rank and condition of the Princes interested in this business, it was neither fit for the one to ask, nor for the other to grant (p). It appeared that he spoke the sense of his Court, for Queen Elizabeth would never be brought to hearken to the proposal. In other respects however he was very grateful and agreeable to the principal persons of the Spanish Court, who could not help admiring his talents as a Minister, his bravery as a Soldier, with which in former times they were well acquainted, his general learning and admirable skill in Latin poetry, of which he gave them many proofs in several elegant performances, written during his stay in their country (q). It was here, at a time when, as himself says in the Preface, he spent the winter in a stove, and the summer in a barn, that he composed his great work of The Right Ordering of the ENGLISH REPUBLICK, and thus endeavoured to sooth his cares, and dispel his melancholy, by his conversations with the Muses. But though these might in some measure alleviate his chagrin, yet they were far enough from expelling it, so that by degrees it broke his constitution, and he fell into a very grievous fit of sickness, which brought him so low that his Physicians despaired of his life (r). In this condition he addressed his Sovereign in an elegy after the manner of Ovid, setting forth his earnest desire to quit Spain and return to his native country, before care and sickness forced him upon a longer journey (s). The Queen granted his petition, and having named Dr Man his successor in his negotiation, at length gave him leave to return home from an embassy, in which he had so long sacrificed his private quiet to the publick conveniency (t) [C]. He accordingly returned to London in the latter end of the year 1564, and published the first five books of his large work beforementioned, which he dedicated to his good friend Sir William Cecil, but the remaining five books were not published as I apprehend in his life-time, which I gather from what Camden has left us concerning this worthy person, who particularly mentions this great work, and speaks of it as containing five books and no more (u). He resided in a fair large house of his own building in Clerkenwell-Close, over-against the decayed nunnery, and a very industrious person has preserved from oblivion an elegant fancy of his, which was penciled on the frontispiece of his dwelling (w) [D]. Whether it was the disease he contracted in Spain that hung about

[C] To the publick conveniency.] It is very certain, that a man could hardly pass his days less at ease than Sir Thomas Chaloner did, while he continued in Spain. He had been in that country many years before, and disliked it, so that he went thither with the utmost regret (6). The insult offered to him on his first arrival, gave him great displeasure, which was far from being removed by the Queen's giving him to understand, that there he was to stay. He very well knew, that the Bishop of Aquila, the Spanish Ambassador at London, was daily drawing upon himself deserved ill usage for his intrigues with the Papists and Malecontents, and he found by experience, that much of the ill treatment this ecclesiastick suffered was revenged upon him (7). When the Queen sent forces over to assist the Protestants in France, Sir Thomas Chaloner was ordered to give that matter the best face it could receive at the Court of Spain, which he did; but King Philip answered him plainly, that if the Queen, his mistress, meant no more, than to keep Havre de Grace 'till Calais was restored, he was content; but that, if under colour of opposing the Guises, and providing for her own safety, she meant to begin a religious war, and to become the head of a Protestant League, he should find himself obliged to defend the old religion, and to take part with the monarch of France (8). But all this time, the great and important business of the trade between England and the Low-Countries remained suspended; nor could any method that hitherto had been contrived, engage the governors of the Low-Countries to recall the prohibition of English commodities, tho' several attempts had been made for that purpose, by particular applications to those who had authority there; but Sir Thomas Chaloner perceiving that his Catholick Majesty's favourite, the famous Roderick Gomez, was at the head of a faction directly opposite to that of the Duke of Alva, he very artfully procured some of the correspondents of the latter in Spain, to represent to him, that the enmity expressed by Gomez towards the English, did not at all arise, as he gave out, from their being hereticks, and having views different from those of his master, but from an apprehension, that if the intercourse between England and the Low-Countries were revived, it would produce a brisk circulation of money throughout all the cities in those provinces, and thereby facilitate his motions, which he desired to retard. The Duke of Alva having considered this, soon saw, or thought he saw, sufficient evidence to prove it, and thereupon changed the whole of his conduct, discouraging often of the old friendship subsisting between the house of Burgundy and the Kings of England, affecting a particular regard for the nation, and at length opening a free trade provisionally, 'till contrary orders should be received from Spain (9). These, and other things of a like nature and importance, employed the thoughts, and exercised the industry, of our able and indefatigable Minister, while he remained in Spain, and therefore it is an idle and ridiculous suggestion of a certain writer, that he made it his business to amuse King Philip with the hopes of marrying Queen Elizabeth (10), which, as we have shewn, was a thing given up on both sides, and impracticable, before he was sent to Spain. But when men write from fancy, and without respect to authorities, they easily fall into such mistakes as these.

[D] On the frontispiece of his dwelling.] The priority of Clerkenwell belonged to Nuns, who from their habit were called Black Nuns, and was founded by one Jordan Briset: it was a very fair and handsome house, and had revenues to the amount of near three hundred pounds a year at the time of the dissolution (11). I cannot find that Sir Thomas Chaloner had any grant, either of the lands belonging to this nunnery, or to the adjacent hospital, of the order of St John of Jerusalem; and therefore, I presume, he had a lease from the Cavendish family, who were in possession of the site of the dissolved nunnery, upon which he erected this new house, directly opposite to the ruins of the old building, to which the inscription he placed thereon manifestly referred. His lines were these:

Castra fides superest, velatae tecta sorores
Ista relegatae, deseruere licet:
Nam venerandus Hymen, hic vota jugalia servat;
Vestalemque focem mente fovere studet.

about him, or that after living so long in a warm country, his body was less able to endure the inclemency of our moister air, so it was, that on the seventh day of October, 1565, he yielded to nature (x), to the regret of the best and greatest men of his time. His body was soon after buried in the cathedral church of St Paul with great funeral solemnity, Sir William Cecil, then Principal Secretary of State, assisting (y) thereat as chief mourner, who also honoured his memory with a very fine copy of Latin verses, in which he observes, that the most lively imagination, the most solid judgment, the quickest parts, and the most unblemished probity, which are commonly the lot of different men, and when so dispersed frequently create great characters, were, which very rarely happens, all united in Sir Thomas Chaloner, justly therefore reputed one of the greatest men of his time (z). But this was not all, he encouraged Mr William Malim, formerly Fellow of King's-college in Cambridge, and then Master of St Paul's school (a), to collect and publish a correct edition of our author's poetical Works, which he accordingly did, and addressed it in an epistle from St Paul's school, dated 1 August 1579, to that noble person now become Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treasurer of England, &c. But of this and his other works, the reader will receive some farther account in the notes [E]. Sir Thomas Chaloner married Ethelreda, daughter of Edward Frodsham of Elton in the County Palatine of Chester, Esq; (b) by whom he had issue his only son Thomas, of whom briefly in the next article. This Lady, not long after Sir Thomas's decease, married Sir * * * Brockett, notwithstanding which the Lord Burleigh continued his kindness to her, out of respect to that friendship which he had for her first husband (c). We cannot conclude this short Life of so worthy a man better, than by adding his epitaph, written by one of the best Latin Poets of that age, Dr Walter Haddon, Master of Requests to Queen Elizabeth (d).

[E] Some farther account in the notes.] He begun very early to employ his pen for the service of the publick; and indeed there is scarce an author who has written in our language, to whom we may justly ascribe a larger degree of this noble disposition, than to Sir Thomas Chaloner, who from first to last employed his abilities, either in serving his country, or in celebrating the praises of those who had served it, that this might prove an encouragement to others. All that can now be discovered of his writings are these, viz.

I. A little Dictionary for children. This is mentioned by the industrious Bale (12), and seems to have been the first thing our author published. In his preface to it he shows the utility of such a work, and from thence infers, that no learned man need be ashamed of undertaking it, because employing learning for the promoting of learning, is discharging the duty of a man of letters; and whatever is a man's duty must be honourable.

II. The Office of servants. Translated from the Latin of Gilbert Cognatus, London, 1543, 8°. This book he dedicated to his honourable patron Sir Henry Knevet (13), whom he attended in his Embassy to the Emperor Charles V. and whose death he afterwards celebrated, which is preserved amongst the rest of his poems of the same nature (14).

III. Moriæ Encomium, i. e. The Praise of Folly. Translated from Erasmus, and printed at London, 1549, in 4° (15). It is not impossible that he may be the author also of some other translations, or little treatises relating to morals, but of these we find no account, nor at this distance of time has tradition transmitted to us the titles of any of his pieces.

IV. In laudem Henrici octavi, Regis Angliæ, præstantissimi carmen panegyricum. i. e. In praise of Henry VIII. the most worthy King of England, a Panegyrick. This poem was addressed to Queen Elizabeth, in the beginning of her reign (16), but was not published 'till many years after the author's decease, by the care of the same worthy person who was the editor of the rest of his poetical works.

V. De Rep. Anglorum instauranda, libri decem. i. e. Of the reforming or restoring the English Republick, in ten books. Lond. 1579, 4°. This edition is most correctly and elegantly printed by the famous Thomas Vautroller. There is prefixed to it the Lord Treasurer Burleigh's poem on the work, and it's author, with other commendatory verses. We are told by the editor, that he was encouraged to the undertaking by the Lord Burleigh, who was very desirous that this noble work, of his deceased friend, might appear in a manner suitable to it's worth, and to the high respect he bore his memory. We have already told the reader, when and how it was composed, but it may not be amiss to add, Sir Thomas Chaloner's account in his own words, by which it appears, that it was begun on Christmas-Day 1562, and finished the 21st of July 1564, which he remembered, in the first leaf of the manuscript, in the following terms.

Deo auspice, Thomas Chalonerus, Londinensis, Equæstris, ordinis vir, serenissimæ Angliæ &c. Reginae Elizabethæ, ad potentissimum Hispaniarum Regem Philippum legatus, animi recreandi, cum otio abundaret, causa, libros hosce decem de Repub. Anglorum instauranda incepit 25 die Decembris, Anno Domini 1562, successit verò 21 die Julii 1564, quum horis tantum successivis, idque ferè ante lucanis, ad componenda carmina se conferret. Atque hunc archetypum manu propria conscripsit.

VI. De illustrium quorundam encomiis miscellanea cum epigrammatis ac epitaphiis nonnullis. This collection of panegyricks, epigrams, and epitaphs, is printed with the book beforementioned, and contains many testimonies of his loyalty and friendship, as well as of his great genius and extensive learning. We have already mentioned several of the pieces that are inserted in this collection, and shall only take notice here, amongst others, that he has celebrated the memory of his friend, Sir John Cheke, of his old patrons Sir Thomas Parrye, and Lord Paget; of Dr Thomas Phayer, a learned Physician, and some foreigners. Thus we have endeavoured to recover, as far as it was in our power, the memory of so great a man from oblivion, who, in the judgment of his contemporaries, joined to the quickest wit, and the most solid learning, the politest manners, and the most inflexible probity. As to religion, he was a zealous Protestant, which, as he never dissembled in the days of Queen Mary, so in the dawn of Queen Elizabeth's government, he very earnestly pressed the publick owning of the Reformation, as a thing safest, as well as most honourable for the State (17); and the same principles he constantly and warmly recommended in all his writings.

CHALONER (Sir THOMAS) the younger, the son of the former by his wife Ethelreda, daughter of Mr Frodsham of Elton in Cheshire (a). He was born some time in the year 1559 (b), and being very young at the time of his father's decease, and his mother soon after marrying a second husband, he owed his education chiefly to the care and protection of the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, by whom he was first put under the care of Dr Malin Master of St Paul's school, and afterwards removed to Magdalen-college in Oxford, where he closely pursued his studies at such times as his father's poetical works were published, and as a proof of his veneration for his father's friend, and gratitude for the many kindnesses himself had received, he prefixed a dedication to this work to his patron the Lord Burleigh (c). He left the college before he took any degree, but not before he had acquired a great reputation for parts and learning. He had, like his father, a great talent for poetry, which he wrote with much facility both in English and in Latin, and it is said that he had a particular inclination for Pastoral (d), but it does not appear that he published any thing of this, or indeed of any kind before he left England, which, from a comparison of circumstances, seems to have been about the year 1580. He visited several parts of Europe, but made the longest stay in Italy, where he addicted himself to the conversation of the gravest and wisest men in that country, and being naturally of a very serious temper, agreed with them so well; that they very readily imparted to him their most important discoveries in Natural Philosophy, for which he had always a great affection, studied it with much diligence, and, by the quickness of his apprehension, wonderful penetration, and great solidity of judgment, gained a very deep insight into the operations of nature (e), which he continually augmented by a variety of experiments. At his return home, which was some time before 1584, he appeared very much at Court, and was esteemed and caressed by the greatest men there, as well on account of his great learning as his polite behaviour. About this time he married his first wife, who was the daughter of his father's old friend Sir William Fleetwood, Recorder of London, by whom he had several children (f). In the year 1591 he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him, as well in regard to his own personal merit as the great services of his father (g), and some years after, the first alum mines that were ever known to be in this kingdom, were discovered, by his great sagacity, not far from Gisborough in Yorkshire, where he had a very fair estate. It was with infinite difficulty and trouble, attended with a very large expence, that these mines were wrought as to become valuable, and then, by some extraordinary stretch of Law, he was deprived of them; of all these circumstances, so far as we have been able to inform ourselves, the reader will have an account in the notes (h) [A]. In the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, Sir Thomas

[A] Will have an account in the notes.] We propose to give the reader here a succinct account of this gentleman's great abilities, as a Naturalist, his happy discovery of the art of making alum from the stone, and the consequences of that discovery, of which hitherto there is no connected relation any where to be met with. It is very certain, that in his travels he addicted himself very much to philosophical enquiries, and that with the noblest view of rendering them beneficial to mankind; of which he gave a specimen in a small work of his, the only one, I believe, he ever published, bearing the following title:

The virtue of Nitre, wherein is declared the sundry cures by the same effected. Lond. 1584. 4°. In which he discovers largely of the nature, production, and uses of nitre; and discovers a very singular acquaintance with minerals, and their component parts, from whence he deduces all their natural properties, and shows, how they may be applied medicinally by the assistance of the Chymists.

This discovers the temper and disposition of our author's mind, always attentive, always meditating, and always contriving, to carry that knowledge he acquired by attention and meditation into practice. Amongst the other places he had visited in Italy, he spent some time at Puzzoli, or, as some write it, Puteoli (1), where he saw after what manner they made alum, and to how great an account it turned. On the Solfatara near that place they collect a kind of saltish flour or dust that covers the surface in the summer-time; this, when thus collected, they throw into large vessels full of water, which are set in the earth, and being placed over certain subterraneous spiracles, the water being evaporated by the heat, the alum is left behind. How well he observed the nature of the soil, and its effects upon the vegetables produced in the neighbourhood, will

Thomas Chaloner made a journey into Scotland, whether out of curiosity, with a view to preferment, or by the direction of Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury, who was his great friend, is not now to be discovered; but this is very certain, that he soon grew into such credit with King James, that the most considerable persons in England addressed themselves to him for his favour and recommendation. Amongst the rest, Sir Francis Bacon, afterwards Chancellor, wrote him a very warm letter, which is still extant, which he sent him by his friend Mr Mathews, who was also charged with another to the King, a copy of which was sent to Sir Thomas Chaloner, and Mr Mathews was directed to deliver him the original, if he would undertake to present it (i). He accompanied the King in his journey to England, and by his extensive learning, pleasant conversation, and admirable address, fixed himself so effectually in that Monarch's good graces, that as one of the highest marks he could give him of his kindness and confidence, he thought fit to intrust him with the care of Prince Henry's education, August 17, 1603 (k) [B]. He enjoyed this honour under several denominations during the life-time of that excellent Prince; will best appear from the learned Camden's account of the discovery (2), made by him in England, which we shall give in that great man's own words, in as much as they afford at the same time the clearest relation, and carry with them the most incontestable authority.

Four miles from the mouth of the Tees stands Gisborough, upon a rising ground, at present a small town. While it was in it's prime, it was very much graced by a beautiful and rich monastery, built about the year 1119 by Robert de Brus, lord of the town. It has been the common burial-place for all the nobility of these parts, and has produced Walter de Hemmingford, no unlearned Historian. The place is really fine, and may, for pleasantness, a curious variety, and the natural advantages of it, compare with Puteoli in Italy; and then for a healthful and agreeable situation, it certainly far surpasses it. The coldness of the air, which the sea occasions, is qualified and broken by the hills between; the soil is fruitful, and produces grass and fine flowers a great part of the year; it richly abounds with veins of metal and alum earth of several colours, (but especially with those of ochre and murray) from which they now begin to extract the best sort of alum and copperas in great plenty. This was first discovered a few years since by the admirable sagacity of that learned Naturalist Sir Thomas Chaloner, Knight (to whose tuition his present Majesty has committed the delight and glory of Britain, his son Prince Henry) by observing, that the leaves of trees were of a more weakly sort of green here than in other places; that the oaks shot forth their roots very broad, but not deep, and that these had much strength, but little sap in them; that the soil was a white clay speckled with several colours, namely, white, yellowish, and blue, that it never froze, and, that in a pretty clear night it shin'd and sparkled like glass upon the road side. Next Ounesbery Topping, a steep mountain, and all over green, riseth so high, that it appears at a great distance, and it is the land-mark that directs sailors, and a prognostick to the neighbours hereabouts; for when it's top begins to be darkened with clouds, rain generally follows. Near the top of it a fountain issues from a great stone, very good for fore eyes; and from hence the valleys round it, the grassy hills, green meadows, rich pastures, fruitful corn fields, fishy rivers, and the creekly mouth of the Tees, low and open shores, yet free from inundation, and the sea with the ships in it, render the prospect very delicate.

The time when this discovery was made is not fixed in this account, but from a comparison of circumstances it appears to have been about 1600, or perhaps a little earlier (3). But the invention, and the perfection of this art, were at some distance, and very considerable sums of money were spent before the project was brought to bear, which, probably, was owing to the difference of climates, and that different manner of working, which this rendered necessary; but at length by the bringing over privately Lambert Ruifel, a Wallloon, and two other workmen, employed in this business at Rochelle in France, the matter was completed, but very little to the profit of the proprietors, since upon this it was adjudged to be a mine royal, and so came into the hands of the Crown (4). It was then granted to Sir Paul Pindar, under the following rent, viz. twelve thousand five hundred pounds a year to the King, one thousand six hundred and forty pounds a year to the Earl of Mulgrave, and six hundred pounds a year to Sir William Pennyman. But notwithstanding these high rents, and that not less than eight hundred persons were employed in the manufacture at a time, the farm of the alum mines produced a vast profit to Sir Paul Pindar, who kept up the commodity at the rate of twenty-six pounds a ton (5). The Long-Parliament voted this a monopoly, and restored the alum works to their original proprietors. About the time of the Restoration we find there were five works carried on, viz. one at Sands-End, another at Ash-Holme, both belonging to the Earl of Mulgrave; a third at Slapy-Wash, then belonging to the D'Arcies, formerly to the Pennymans; the fourth at Dunfry, which was Mr Fairfax's; the last at Whitby, belonging to Sir Hugh Cholmley. By thus opening different works, and that emulation that it naturally occasioned, the commodity sunk in value, for the proprietors underdold one another, till the price of alum was brought down to thirteen pounds a ton (6). In the end, the last of these works, by the conveniency of it's situation, triumphed over the rest, so that the original mines at Gisborough fell into disuse, but the present consumption of alum is at least as great, if not greater, than ever (7). It is considered as a drug, and from it's alstringent quality is much used in physick, and enters into the composition of various medicines; but the great vent of it arises from it's prodigious utility in fixing colours, and in preparing stuffs for dying, which makes it a valuable commodity to Clothiers, Glovers, Dyers, and many other artificers (8). The Roman alum is looked upon as rather better than ours, but ours much exceeds other alums, and more especially that of Sweden, which of late years great pains has been taken to improve, and some persons (9), as I have been informed, were not many years ago sent over hither on purpose to look into the management of our alum works, and if possible to steal the secret.

[B] Of Prince Henry's education, August 17th, 1603.] In most of our historians Sir Thomas Chaloner is generally called Prince Henry's tutor, but that is a very improper appellation, for one who was absolutely intrusted with the care of that young Prince's education, and of his household, so that he was rather his governor, though it does not appear that he ever had this title. But that he was by no means his tutor, is evident from Mr Newton's holding that office for several years, who was afterwards Dean of Durham, though a layman, and created a Baronet (10), and then John Wilkinfon, Master of Arts (11), and others, though Sir Thomas Chaloner remained in his charge all the while; and it was out of respect to him, that when Prince Henry was matriculated at Oxford, he chose to enter as a member of Magdalen-college. To put this matter out of dispute, we shall give the reader a clause out of the patent, by which Sir Thomas held his office (12), which will fully explain it's nature.

For the good proof we have long had of your singular affection to our person, and for the trust we repose in you, as well in regard of your zeal to religion, as also for your discretion, we have made choice of you to have the principal charge and custody, as well of the person of our said son, as also the oversight of all his household and family attending him, who being to us so dear a jewel as he is, the charge is likewise of great weight and care to you. Wherefore we have thought good to accompany so great a burthen with sufficient authority to you, for the execution and discharge thereof, and do therefore direct these our letters patents to you, under our

Prince, whom he attended in 1605 to Oxford, and upon that occasion was honoured with the degree of Master of Arts, as many other persons of distinction were (l). I cannot find that he had any grants of lands, or gifts in money, from the Crown, in consideration of his services, though Sir Adam Newton, who was Preceptor to Prince Henry, appears, from a list that I have seen, to have received at several times the sum of four thousand pounds by way of free gift (m). Sir Thomas Chaloner had likewise very great interest with Queen Anne, and appears to have been employed by her in her private affairs, and in the settlement of that small estate which she enjoyed (n). What relation he had to the Court, after the death of his gracious Master Prince Henry, does no where appear, but it is not at all likely that he was laid aside (o). He married some years before his death his second wife Judith, daughter to Mr William Blount of London, and by this lady also he had children, to whom, if my author does not mislead me (p), he left a considerable estate, which he had at Steeple-Claydon in the county of Buckingham. All we know of him farther is, that he died on the 17th of November, 1615, and was buried in the parish-church of Chifwick, in the county of Middlesex. His eldest son William Chaloner, Esq; was, by letters patents dated July 20, in the 18th of King James I, A. D. 1620, created a Baronet, by the title of William Chaloner of Gisborough in the county of York, Esq; (q) which title I find was extinct in 1681 (r). Yet the posterity of some of the younger brothers of this Baronet are still remaining in that county, and are possessed of the family estate at Gisborough (s), as the reader will be informed in the notes [C]. It was judged necessary to give as full and distinct an account of this worthy person as possible, because few or none, either of our Historians or Biographers, Anthony Wood (t) excepted, have taken any notice of him, though he was so considerable a benefactor to this nation, by discovering the alum mines, which have produced vast sums of money, and still continue to be wrought with very great profit, though, as I am informed, this family have long since lost the benefit of them (u). We shall have a better notion of this matter, I mean the advantage which this nation has gained by making and vending alum, if we reflect, that in the first place it is a commodity of great use in various manufactures, so that we must have had it from abroad whatever it cost, and therefore all that is consumed at home, is so much clear gains to this nation as the value of it amounts to. On the other hand, the quality of our alum putting it in our power to set a very high price upon it, this was also very beneficial to the nation, inasmuch as every ounce of it exported, added so much as it was worth to the general ballance of our trade, whence it appears, that we both saved and got by this discovery. But then, thirdly, the reader will be told in the notes, how great a number of persons have been at one time employed in these works (w), which will enable us to form some sort of estimate, of the many families that in so long a tract of time have been maintained, and some of them enriched, by the same means. Taking therefore all things together, it must appear highly just to celebrate the memory of every man who is thus useful to his country, and it would have been no disgrace to our Historians, if, in this respect, they had followed the example of honest John Stowe, and his Continuator Edward Howes, who have very carefully collected, and very faithfully set down, many instances of the like nature (x), and have also given a very particular account of this discovery, tho' it does not altogether agree with what is met with in other authors, for it seems to make King James an encourager of this work, and mentions his prohibiting the importation of alum from abroad, that it might turn to better account in the hands of Sir Thomas Chaloner and his associates (y).

Great Seal of England, whereby we do give you power and authority for the better execution of this charge committed to you, to command, rule, and direct, as well all persons, which shall be of ordinary attendance about our son the Prince, in his house, in all things that may concern the safety of his person, or the observation of good rule in his house, as also all Justices of Peace, Mayors, Bailiffs, Headboroughs, Constables, &c.

[C] Will be informed in the notes.] We have already spoken in the text of Sir Thomas Chaloner's eldest son, Sir William Chaloner of Gisborough, in the county of York, and therefore here we are to speak of his younger children only. His second son Edward was educated in the same college where his father had been formerly bred at Oxford, and entering into holy orders, became Doctor in Divinity, Principal of St Alban's Hall, Chaplain to King Charles the First, and one of the most eminent preachers of his time, though he died at the age of thirty-four, being carried off by the plague that then raged at Oxford, July 26th, 1625 (13).

Thomas Chaloner was younger brother to Edward, but whether the next to him we cannot determine; he was also sent to Oxford, and spent some time there at Exeter College, after which he went abroad, and having travelled through France and Italy, returned home a very well-accomplished gentleman, being much distinguished for the vivacity of his wit, and his extensive knowledge in all kinds of polite literature; but having contracted a prejudice to the royal family, on the score of the alum mines, of which his father had been deprived, he struck in with the malecontents, and being elected member for Aldborough in the county of York, became an active member of the Long-Parliament (14). He sat as one of the King's judges, and was elected one of the members of the Council of State. Upon a prospect of the King's return he printed a paper, entitled, A Speech, containing a Plea for Monarchy (15), in which he hinted at some limitations and restrictions. He soon after thought fit to retire to Holland, in which he acted prudently, for he was excepted (16) out of the Act of Oblivion, and very soon after died at Middleburg in Zealand.

James Chaloner, younger brother to Thomas, was a Commoner of Brazen-Nose-College in Oxford, and afterwards studied in the Inns of Court. He was a man of great learning, and distinguished himself as an Antiquary, as also by writing the history of the Isle of Man, a manuscript copy of which was in the valuable Museum of Mr Thoresby of Leeds, but it has been also printed (17). He was likewise a member of the Long-Parliament, deep in the transactions of those times, and one of the King's judges, for which, at the Restoration, he was excepted from the benefit of his estate, but his life spared; and this distinction seems to have been owing to his not having signed the warrant for the King's murder, which his brother Thomas did (18). He married Ursula, daughter of Sir William Fairfax of Steeton in the county of York, and dying in the year 1661, was succeeded in his estate by his only son Edmund (19).

CHAMBER or CHAMBRE (JOHN) a learned Physician in the XVIth century, noted chiefly for being one of the founders of the College of Physicians London (a), was educated in Merton-college in Oxford, of which he was Fellow (b). He took his degree of Master of Arts about the year 1502; after which travelling into Italy, he studied Physick at Padua, and there took the degree of Doctor in that Faculty. After his return, he became Physician to King Henry VIII; and, with Thomas Linacre, Fernandes de Victoria, Nicolas Halfewell, John Fraunces, and Robert Yaxley, Doctors of Physick, founded the College of Physicians [A]. Being in Holy Orders, he became, in 1510, Canon of Windsor, and in 1524 Archdeacon of Bedford, and was likewise Prebendary of Comb and Harnham in the cathedral church of Sarum (c). In 1525 he was elected Warden of Merton-college (d); and, about the same time, was made Dean of the Royal Chapel and College adjoining to Westminster-Hall, dedicated to the Virgin Mary and St Stephen (e). He built to it a very curious cloyster (f), and gave the Canons of that Chapel some lands, which he saw, upon the dissolution of the monasteries, taken into the King's hands. Afterwards he was made Treasurer of Wells cathedral, beneficed in Somersetshire and Yorkshire, and probably had other dignities and preferments (g). October 29, 1531, he was incorporated Doctor of Physick at Oxford (b). In May 1543 he resigned his Treasurership of Wells; and his Wardenship of Merton-college in 1545. He died in 1549 (i). He never published any thing.

[A] Founded the College of Physicians.] Henry the VIIIth's charter, for the foundation of this College, bears date at Westminster September 23, 1518, and is said to have been obtained at the request of Dr John Chamber, Thomas Linacre, Fernandez de Victoria, his Physicians; and of Nicolas Halfewell, John Fraunces, and Robert Yaxley of the same Faculty: but especially through the intercession and interest of Cardinal Wolsey. The first College of this Society was in Knights Riders-street, being the gift of Dr Linacre. Afterwards they removed to Amen-

corner, where they bought an house and ground: But the house being burnt down in 1666, the Fellows purchased with their own money a large piece of ground in Warwick-lane, whereon they erected the present College. The number of Fellows at first was but thirty. King Charles II, at their request, augmented the number to forty. And King James II, in their new charter, was pleased to increase the number to eighty, and not to exceed. To the College belongs at present, a President, four Censors, and twelve Electors (1).

CHAMBERLAYNE (EDWARD) author of The Present State of England, was descended from an eminent and ancient family [A], and born at Odington in Gloucestershire on the 13th of December 1616 (a). He had his first education at Gloucester (b); and in Michaelmas-term 1634 became a Commoner of St Edmund-Hall in Oxford (c). On the 20th of April 1638, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d); and that of Master in 1641, and was appointed Rhetorick Reader of the university for part of that and the year following (e). During the Civil Wars, he travelled into France, Spain, Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Germany, the Low-Countries, Denmark, and Sweden (f). In 1658 he married Susannah, only daughter of Richard Clifford, Esq; descended from the ancient and noble family of the Cliffords, Lords of Frampton in the county of Gloucester (g). After the Restoration of King Charles II he became Fellow of the Royal Society; and in 1669 Secretary to Charles Earl of Carlisle, when he was sent to Stockholm, to carry the Order of the Garter to the King of Sweden. In January 1670 he had the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law conferred on him at Cambridge; and on the 22d of June 1672, was incorporated in the same at Oxford (b). About the year 1679 he was appointed Tutor to Henry Duke of Grafton, one of the natural sons of King Charles II. Afterwards, he became instructor in the English tongue to Prince George of Denmark (i). In the latter part of his life he lived at Chelsey near London; where he died in the year 1703. He was buried in a vault in the church-yard of that parish, where a monument was soon after erected to his memory [B]. He was a learned and

[A] Descended from an eminent and ancient family.] His father, Thomas Chamberlayne, Esq; was son of Sir Thomas Chamberlayne, Knt. some time Ambassador in Flanders, where he married a Lady of the house of Nassau. The family derive their descent from the Counts, or at least Barons of Tanquerville in Normandy. And John Count of Tankerville being made Chamberlain to the King of England above four hundred years ago, his descendants thence took the surname of Chamberlayne. They branched out into the several houses of Sherborne-castle in Oxfordshire lately extinct, and of Preilbury, Mangerbury, and Odington in Gloucestershire; from the latter of which, Edward, whom we are speaking of, was descended (1).

What is historical in this epitaph is included in the text, and for that reason we have not thought necessary to translate it. Only we shall take notice of one remarkable particular mentioned therein; namely 'That he [Dr Chamberlayne] was so very desirous of doing good to all, and even to posterity, that he ordered some books of his own composition covered over with wax, to be buried with him, which may possibly be of use to future ages (2).'*

Vol. I. comprising the Events related in the Books of Moses. To which are added Chronological Tables, fixing the Date of each Event, and connecting the several Dispositions together.' Fol. 1723. He likewise was Fellow of the Royal Society, and communicated three pieces, which are inserted in The Philosophical Transactions. One, concerning the Effects of Thunder and Lightning at Sampford-Courtney in Devonshire, October 7, 1711 (c). The second, is an account of the funk-islands in the Humber, recovered from the sea (d). And the third, contains remarks on the Plague at Copenhagen in 1711 (e). It was said of him, that he understood sixteen languages; but it is certain, that he was master of the Greek, Latin, French, High and Low Dutch, Portuguese, and Italian. Though he was well qualified for employment, he had none, but that of Gentleman-Usher to George Prince of Denmark. After a useful and well-spent life, he died in the year 1724. He was a very pious and good man, and earnest in promoting the advancement of religion, and the interest of true Christianity: for which purpose, he kept a large correspondence abroad.

CHAPPEL (WILLIAM) Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, in the kingdom of Ireland, a most learned, pious, and eloquent Prelate in the last century. He was descended, as himself tells us, from parents that were but in narrow circumstances, born at Lexington in Nottinghamshire, December 10, 1582, and was very near dying of the small-pox when in the second year of his age (a). He was afterwards sent to Mansfield in the same county to a grammar-school, where he was very early taken notice of for his singular gravity, the meekness of his temper, and his close application to his studies (b). This induced his family, though their circumstances were but indifferent, to send him as they did to the university of Cambridge, where he was entered of Christ's-college at the age of seventeen (c). His modesty, diligence, and capacity, gained him a great interest in his college, so that after having taken two degrees, he was, in the year 1607, at a time when he did not well know what course to steer, elected Fellow, as we learn from himself, in a stile equally humble and elegant (d), which was perhaps peculiar to our author [A]. When he had acquired this preferment, he seems to have been fully satisfied, and applied himself with great diligence to the education of youth, for which he was particularly fitted; by the uniting in his disposition two very different qualities, sweetness of temper and severity of manners; so that it is allowed there was no tutor in the university in those days, that either bred more, or more famous pupils than he did (e). He was also very remarkable for his great abilities as a disputant, which gained him much reputation, and in respect to which there happened a singular accident, with which the reader cannot but be well pleased to have an account (f) [B]. In this situation of life he would in all probability have passed his time in ease and quiet (g), if he had not been attacked by the malicious calumnies of some, who envied him the great reputation in which he stood with the most considerable persons in the university, and this had such an effect upon his spirit, that it broke and afflicted him exceedingly (h). When things were in this situation, he received an unexpected offer from Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, of the deanery of Cashel in Ireland, which was become void by the promotion of Dean Jones to the bishoprick of Killaloe (i). It seems, this promotion was not altogether agreeable to Mr Chappel, he had no inclination to go to Ireland, and was not at all ambitious of dignity in the Church; however, after consulting his relations, he determined to accept the offer, went over to Ireland accordingly, and was installed Dean of Cashel by virtue of the King's Mandate, August 20, 1633 (k). He had not been long in Ireland, before his kind patron, who sent him thither, found out a new and more suitable employment for him, for Dr Robert Usher, who was Provost of Trinity-college at Dublin, being promoted to the See of Kildare, Dr Laud, now become Archbishop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of the university of Dublin, was desirous of putting it under the care of Dean Chappel, which, however, he would willingly have declined (l). In order to this he returned to England in May, 1634, and laboured as much as man could do, to be excused from undertaking this new charge, the burthen of which he apprehended too heavy for his shoulders, but it was in vain; a resolution had been taken to give a new form to the university, and he was looked upon as the properest person to settle the establishment that was proposed (m). Upon this he went down to Cambridge and resigned his fellowship, which to him, as himself expresses it, was the sweetest of earthly preferments, after he had held it for twenty-seven years (n). He also visited his native country, and took his last leave of his

[A] Which was perhaps peculiar to our author.]

This life of Bishop Chappel, written by himself in Latin, and, as it plainly appears, as an exercise of penitence, thanksgiving, and devotion, has been now twice printed; first, from a manuscript in the hands of Sir Philip Sydenham, Bart. by the industrious Mr Hearne (1), and a second time by the reverend Mr Peck, from a manuscript which is still preserved in Trinity-Hall, Cambridge (2). In this life he has set down the principal steps of his fortunes and misfortunes, with short and significant reflections and meditations; as for instance, in reference to his going to the University, his studying there, and his being elected fellow of his college, he writes thus (3):

Septendecim annos natus eo Cantabrigiam,
Pembrokiam parens, avunculus domum
Christi elegit, Christoque duce figo hic pedem.
Christus tuetur, & scholarem me facit.
Binos gradus suspicio. Verum quid agerem
Incertus hæsi: monet abire tenuitas

Sodalitii, & anno sequenti perfecit.
Mihi fausta Julii dies penultima
Aperuit angustum hunc locum pauperculo;
Non clave munerum aut potentum litteris, Sed (gratia Christi) statutorum via.
Ætatis annus hic erat vigesimus

Et quintus, annusque Domini Jesu mei
Post mille sextiesque centum septimus.

[B] To have an account.] In the spring of the year 1624 King James visited the University of Cambridge, lodged in Trinity-College, and was entertained with a Philosophical Act, and other academical performances (4). At these exercises Dr Roberts of Trinity-College was respondent at St Mary's, and Mr Chappel pushed him so hard, that feeling himself unable to sustain the controversy, he fainted. Upon this King James, who valued himself much upon his capacity in such matters, undertook to maintain the theses, but with no better fortune than the doctor, for Chappel was so much too hard for him at these logical weapons, that his Majesty openly professed he was glad that a man of great talents was so good a subject. Many years after this, Sir William St Leger riding to Cork with the Popish titular Dean of that city, it fell out that Mr Chappel, then Dean of Cashel, and Provost of Dublin, accidentally overtook them, upon which Sir William, who was then President of Munster, proposed, that the two Deans should dispute, which, though Mr Chappel was not forward to accept, yet he did not at any ways decline. But the Popish Dean, with equal dexterity and address, extricated himself from this dilemma, by saying, Excuse me, Sir, I don't care to dispute with a man who is wont to kill his respondent (5).

his antient and pious mother. In the month of August he returned to Ireland, and was elected Provost of Dublin, and had the care of it committed to him, though he was not sworn into that office until June 5, 1637 (o), the reason of which the reader will be told in the notes [C]. He applied himself to his new charge with that zeal and diligence, for which he was always distinguished in every office that he filled; he was perfectly learned in Casuistical Divinity, had a clear understanding, sound judgment, and was universally applauded for his discretion. His temper for government was suitable to his knowledge, in which he was highly eminent, as appeared in the mildness and regularity of his administration, and in the most perfect obedience of the scholars to the rules and statutes of the house (p). That he might mix something of the pleasant with the profitable, and that young minds might not be oppressed with the unrelaxed severity of their studies, he instituted amongst the juniors a Roman Commonwealth, which continued during the Christmas vacation, and in which they had their Dictators, Consuls, and Censors, and other officers of the Roman State, in great splendour (q). While he was thus worthily and usefully employed, his patrons, the Lord Wentworth and the Archbishop of Canterbury, upon the promotion of Dr Richard Boyle to the archbishoprick of Tuam, advanced Dean Chappel to the bishopricks of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross, and he was accordingly consecrated November 11, 1638, in St Patrick's at Dublin, though he had done all he could to decline this preferment (r). The King commanded that he should still continue in his provostship, which for some time he did, and at last resigned it July 20, 1640, before which time he was very earnest in endeavouring to obtain a small bishoprick in England, that he might return to his native country, and die in peace (s). His endeavours however were fruitless, and he was left in Ireland to feel all the fury of that storm which he had long foreseen. He was attacked in the House of Commons with great bitterness and resentment, by those who were not so much enemies to him as to the great men by whom he was preferred (t). This obliged him to come to Dublin from Cork, and he was compelled to put in sureties for his appearance. In the month of June, 1641, articles of impeachment were exhibited against him to the House of Peers, consisting of fourteen, though the substance of them was reduced to two, the first perjury, on a supposed breach of his oath as Provost; the second malice towards the Irish, founded on the discontinuing, during the time he was Provost, of an Irish lecture (u). These articles were pressed by a very severe speech made by one Mr Robert Bisse, a famous Lawyer of those times, to which the Bishop made a reply, which however did not give satisfaction. The Lord Primate Usher, and Dr Anthony Martin, Bishop of Meath, were the fiercest of his adversaries, and the prosecution against him was driven on with unexampled violence. The true cause of all this fury, was the vigour and activity he had shewn in enforcing uniformity and strict Church discipline in the college, in opposition to the schism and fanaticism of those times (w). He was in his whole conduct one of the evenest and most constant men that ever lived, and yet; such was the temper of the age in which he flourished, that he lay under a continual load of calumny. At Cambridge he was thought a Puritan from the strictness of his morals; in Ireland they represented him as a Papist, from the fervency of his devotion, and his great exactness with respect to the ceremonies of the Church (x). While he laboured under so many and so great troubles, he was exposed to still greater, by the breaking out of the most execrable rebellion in the latter end of that year. He was under a kind of confinement at Dublin, on account of the impeachment which was still depending, but at length, after much application, and with no small difficulty, he was allowed to embark for England, that from thence he might return to Cork, which from Dublin,

[C] Will be told in the notes.] There were at this time considerable heats among the clergy in Ireland, many of them being inclined to those that were then styled Puritan opinions, which the Lord-Deputy Wentworth, and his great friend Laud, wished to see rooted out, as appears very plainly from their letters (6). Amongst other methods taken for this purpose, one that was judged very necessary was, the introduction of a new charter into Trinity-College; and the history of this matter we will give in the words of a very intelligent and very impartial author (7). 'By the first charter, granted to the University in March 1591, the election of a Provost was placed in the Fellows, and so continued, until the vacancy made by the promotion of Dr Usher, as aforesaid. Archbishop Laud, who was then Chancellor of the University, thought proper to introduce a new set of statutes, which vested the nomination of the Provost in the Crown. This project took some time in ripening; for the concurrence of the Fellows to this change was necessary, and they were induced to consent to a surrender of their old charter, upon making them tenants for life in their offices under the new statutes, whereas before they held their fellowships but for seven years, from the time they commenced master of arts; and so to gain estates for life in a small share of ' the government to themselves, and their successors, ' they parted with a more absolute authority, which ' was temporary, and submitted to a more unlimited ' power in their superior. For these new statutes ' were not so indulgent to the Fellows, and placed a ' more sovereign authority in the Provosts, than they ' were entrusted with by the old charter, from whence ' hath flowed the negative voice of the Provosts in the ' election of Fellows, and other very ample powers. ' While this project was moulding, and bringing to ' perfection, it was thought necessary to keep the ' place unfilled, that the scheme might be at once carried into execution by the King's nomination, and in ' the mean time Dean Chappel was placed over the ' college, although without the title of Provost.' A certain author, who does not seem to be at all partial in favour of our Dean, after giving a succinct relation of his becoming Provost of Trinity-College, and his behaviour in that office, concludes his account thus (8). ' Yet certainly the exercises of the University were ' never stricter looked to, or discipline (if it were not ' too ceremonious) better observed than in his time; ' only the lecture for teaching Irish (whether through ' indulgence merely, or enjoyed by statute, I am uncertain) was, after his admission, wholly waved.'

Dublin, as things then stood, he could not safely do (y). He embarked accordingly on the 26th of December 1641, and the next day landed at Milford-haven, after a double escape, as himself phrases it, from the Irish wolves, and from the Irish seas (z). He went from Milford-haven to Pembroke, and from Pembroke to Tenby, a little miserable place, where, being detained for some time by the inclemency of the weather, an ill-natured fellow gave an information against him to the Mayor, who committed him to goal upon the 25th of January, for coming over from Ireland without licence (a). In this sad condition he continued seven weeks, till Sir Hugh Owen, who was a Member of Parliament, coming to his seat in that neighbourhood, caused him to be set at liberty, upon his giving bond in a thousand pounds for his appearance, and on the sixteenth of March he was discharged and set out for Bristol (b); where, upon his arrival, he had another unwelcome piece of news, which was that the ship, on board of which were a great part of his effects, embarked by a friend of his at Cork for England, was lost near Minehead, and therein, amongst other things, perished his choice collection of books (c). What small matters could be saved were sent to Chester, from whence, though they had fallen into bad hands, he safely received them, by the kind interposition and great diligence used by his friends. After such a series of misfortunes as served only to endear to him his religion and his country, he withdrew to his native soil, and spun out there the remainder of his life in a contemplative and pious, but withal not idle, retirement (d). He resigned his soul to his Creator at Derby, where he had some time resided, upon Whitfunday 1649 (e). In the last seven years of his life he had struggled with many and great difficulties, and for some time, probably at the beginning of that period, he derived his subsistence from the charitable contributions of others. At the time of his decease however, he was either in possession of some fortune, or had a reasonable expectation that it might be recovered, since he directed by his Will, that his estate, such as it was, should be divided between his family and the poor, for as he lived so he died, a good man and a good Christian (f). As for his works, and more especially as to the notion that has prevailed with some people, of his being the concealed author of that excellent treatise The Whole Duty of Man, we shall give the reader all the lights we are able in the notes (g) [D]. Some years after his decease, a monument

[D] We are able in the notes.] There is no reason to wonder, that a person of Bishop Chappel's pious and primitive disposition, should, however well qualified in respect to parts and learning, decline the publication of his works in his life-time, more especially when we consider the misfortunes he had run through, and the ill usage he had met with from different parts. Accordingly we find, that in his whole life he published but one book, and that in Latin, about a year before his death; and perhaps he was induced to this, from his having formerly communicated it to his intimate friends, or possibly to his pupils, so that it would have been impossible for him to have concealed his being the author of it, had he been ever so desirous of doing it. The title of this work was,

I. Methodus Concionandi; London, 1648. 8°. that is, The method of preaching. Which for it's usefulness was also translated into English. Our author, it seems, was not at all of Alstedius's opinion, who judged, that the concealing the method used in preaching best secured the hearer's attention. Bishop Chappel founded his theory on his practice, and being convinced by experience, that the way he used had the greatest effect upon a general audience, he, for that reason, recommended it to others. It was his manner to raise doctrinal propositions from the words of his text, which he powerfully confirmed and enforced. And when a point of controversy started, he did not endeavour to shew his eloquence on both sides of the question, but his abilities in establishing the truth, beyond all opposition or doubt. — A certain author speaks of this prelate and his book in the following terms (9). 'Bishop Chappel was a man of a very strict method, being an incomparable logician, and of a very strict life, being an excellent man; famous for his many and eminent pupils, more for the eminent preachers made so by his admirable method, for the theory and praxis upon 2 Tim. iii. 16. for the practice of preaching. So good a disputant, as to be able to maintain any thing, but so honest a man that he was willing to maintain only, as he would call them, sober truths. Harassed between the rebellions in Ireland and England, where it was imputed to Bishop Laud as a crime, that he preferred Bishop Chappel; and to him, that he was preferred by him, being thought a Puritan before his preferment, and a Papist afterwards, though he was the same godly and orthodox man always.'

II. The use of Holy Scripture. Lond. 1653. 8°. printed after his decease.

V O L. II. No. CIX.

III. The true method of Preaching. Lond. 1656. This is no other than the English translation of his first mentioned work.

There are some variations in the two copies that have been published, of the manuscript he left behind him of his own life in Latin. The reverend Mr Peck adds, by way of note, upon his edition, the following extract of a Letter from Mr Beaupre Bell (10). 'This certain The whole Duty of Man was written by one who suffered by the troubles in Ireland, and some lines in this piece, give great grounds to conjecture that Bishop Chappel was the author, 3 March 1734.' It would have been more satisfactory, if this gentleman had been pleased to point out the passages in the book he mentions, and those in the life of Bishop Chappel, which induced him to be of that opinion; but, as he has not, it may be the more excusable to add a very few remarks upon this subject.

At the close of Mr Peck's edition of Bishop Chappel's Latin life there are two lines, which are wanting in the edition published by Mr Hearne, and which are a direct proof, that this pious Prelate passed the last seven years of his life in revising his writings, the lines are these (11).

Reviso, quæ antè scripseram. Et septennium
Attexo, quod tunc fluxerat, prioribus.

The Whole Duty of Man was published in 1657, or rather, I think, in 1658, but it appears plainly from Dr Hammond's letter to Mr Garthwaite the bookseller prefixed to it, that it had been ready for the press some time before, and from various passages in the book, as well as from the prayer at the end of it, it is very plain that it was written before the death of King Charles the First. So that in this respect it might very well be written by Bishop Chappel. There is another circumstance, much more favourable than this, to the opinion of his being the author of it; and that is the method of the book, which is perfectly agreeable to our Prelate's manner of writing. I may also add the fervency of the ejaculations, more especially in the prayers for the Church, and for the peace of the Church, which are very suitable to the strong and lively strokes in his little work upon his own life. That if he had been the author of that, and other works, he might have desired to conceal it, very clearly appears from the inscription on his monument, drawn up by Archbishop Sterne (12).

ment was erected to his memory in the parish church of Bilstorp in Nottinghamshire, where he was buried by the pious care of Dr Richard Sterne, Archbishop of York; and because there is something very singular, and very well deserving the reader's notice in the inscription upon that monument, we judged it necessary to insert it at the bottom of the page (b) [E.] It is hoped that the pains taken here to do justice to so learned, so pious, and so worthy a Prelate, whose virtues and whose sufferings were alike extraordinary, will give peculiar satisfaction to the publick; for to write the lives of men highly eminent, and whose great and good actions have been justly celebrated, is a task rather pleasant than hard; but to collect the scattered remembrances of such as wished to live concealed, and were content to be great and good in secret, is a labour equally difficult and laudable; as it can have no other intention than that of doing them justice, and contributing to the information of the world, in matters that might otherwise be for ever over-spread with oblivion, into which it has been observed that the weightiest things most easily sink, while the lightest, for that very reason, swim upon the surface, and escape the deluge.

On the other hand, as a work of his was actually published with his name after his death, and his method of preaching translated and sent abroad in English the very year before the Whole Duty of Man was published, it is not easy to see the reason, why, if he had written the Whole Duty of Man, it should have been suppressed in the title page, because it would have added credit to the work, and done him no hurt. Some people have attributed the Whole Duty of Man to Mr Abraham Woodhead (13), and others to Mr Obadiah Walker (14), both of whom became Papists; but most apparent it is, that book was written by a true and sincere member of the Church of England, and one who held that to be the Catholic Church. It has been very positively said, that Lady Packington (15) was the author, and that the manuscript of it in her own hand-writing, is in the possession of the family, which one may presume, is the authority relied on to justify the placing this as an indubitable fact in a monumental inscription to her memory. It is indeed very remarkable, that Dr Hammond, in his letter to Mr Garthwaite, has not a single pronoun that determines the word author either to the masculine or feminine gender; but then, it seems, that either he did not, or would not, seem to know, who was the author, though, if it was the Lady Packington, he could hardly be ignorant of it, in as much as he lived long, and at last died at her house.

[E] At the bottom of the page.] It is no small honour to the memory of this good man, that so excellent a Prelate as Bishop Sterne, showed so great affection for his remains; and it gives us also an opportunity of seeing his character drawn at large by the pen, or at least by the direction, of so great a person, and so true a judge of mankind. After mentioning those particulars of his life, which have been more fully insisted upon in this article, he proceeds thus, 'The excellent graces which (if any other did) he received in a plentiful measure from God, he administered, with a singular fidelity and success, to his glory, and to the publick emolument of the Church. He was a strenuous assertor of justice, wisdom, and divine grace. By his love to God, and charity to men, as well friends as enemies, according to the law and example of Christ, he became to us both an example and law; he gave up his temporal goods, partly for Christ, partly to Christ, as to be hid from the world was always his greatest desire, so he never was able to compass it, nor can he now. In his sixty-seventh year he calmly surrendered his soul to his Saviour on Whitsunday 1649, and is here deposited, near his venerable mother, expecting our Lord Christ, whom he enjoys. He had a younger brother (while he lived) named John Chappel, who was also a very eminent divine, and born for the pulpit. But he went to Heaven before him, and his remains are buried in the church of Mansfield Woodhouse.' Charismata, quæ (si quis alius) plurima atque eximia à Domino acceperat, singulari tum fide tum felicitate, ad ejus gloriam publicumque ecclesie commodum administravit. Sapientiæ, justitiæ, gratiæ, divinæ, strenuus assertor. Charitate in Deum ac hominem, amicos atque inimicos, ad Christi legem, & exemplum factus nobis exemplum & lex. Bona temporalia, partim pro Christo, partim Christo reliquit, &c. E

CHARLETON (WALTER) a very learned Physician and copious writer, from the middle of the last, to the beginning of the present century, was descended from a very antient and worthy family of that name in the West of England, and the son of the Reverend Walter Charleton, M. A. some time Vicar of Ilminster, and afterwards Rector of Shepton Mallet in the county of Somerset (a). He was born at Shepton Mallet in the parsonage house of his father, February 2, 1619 (b), and received the first rudiments of learning, not in a country grammar-school, but by the care and industry of his parent, who was a man of extensive capacity, though but indifferently furnished with the goods of fortune. He made it his business however to qualify his son Walter for the university, and when he found him fit for it, which was about the age of sixteen, he sent him to Oxford, where he was entered of Magdalen-hall (c) in Lent term 1635. It was no small happiness for him, that he became the pupil of the famous Dr John Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, under whom he made a progress in Logick and Philosophy very far superior to any thing that could be expected from one of his years (d). His parts were very brisk and lively, but he was rather more conspicuous on the score of his application, and of his extensive capacity, which enabled him to form very just notions of the connection that subsists between the Sciences, and encouraged him to aim at making himself an universal scholar (e). As his circumstances would not allow him to pursue Science at large, but on the contrary obliged him to think of some particular profession, which might be useful to him in his subsistence, as well as contribute to his reputation in passing through life; he addicted himself very early to Physick (f), and in a short time made as great a progress therein as he had done in his former studies. The breaking out of the Civil War, as it brought the Royal Prefence to Oxford, was, in that respect, favourable to Mr Charleton, who had in himself so much real merit, and knew so well how to display it, that by the favour of the King he had the degree of Doctor of Physick conferred upon him in February 1642 (g), and was soon after made one of the Physicians in ordinary to his his Majesty, at which time he was looked upon as a very extraordinary genius; and, as such, became very early the object of that envy and resentment, of which he could never get the better as long as he lived (b) [A]. Upon the declension of the royal cause; he came up to London, was admitted of the College of Physicians, came into considerable practice, and lived in much esteem with the ablest and most learned men of the profession, such as the celebrated Sir Francis Prujean, the learned and penetrating Sir George Ent, the glory of that college, and the honour of this nation, Dr William Harvey, and others, by whom he was much assisted, and towards whom he behaved with the utmost gratitude and respect (i). In the space of ten years before the Restoration, he wrote and published several very ingenious and learned treatises, as well on physical as other subjects, by which he gained great reputation, and very deservedly, considering the times in which they were written, and that many of those discoveries were then in their infancy; which have been since prosecuted with the most happy effect. By these books his name became known abroad, as well as at home, and though they are now less regarded than perhaps they deserve, yet they were then received with almost universal approbation (k) [B]. as [A] As long as he lived. If we consider the state of learning at this time, in the University of Oxford, and what a number of men of more than ordinary capacities there were in every faculty, one must be sufficiently convinced that the gentleman, who is the subject of the present article, must have distinguished himself in a very surprizing manner to obtain the honour of a Doctor's degree in Physick at the age of twenty-two (1), as is very justly observed in his commendation by Anthony Wood, who affirms, that he received this honour, as well by the favour of the King, as from the grace of the University of Oxford; adding, that he was beyond all doubt a very learned man, and one, who made a shining figure in his profession. Vir proculdubio doctus, & in sua facultate clarus (2). He thought fit afterwards to alter this character a little, and to represent poor Dr Charleton as a man exceedingly learned in his own opinion (3). But, as is observed in the text, this spirit of envy began to shew itself early against Dr Charleton, so that after the decease of his royal Master, he would have found his admission into the College of Physicians, a thing of very great difficulty, if he had not been supported by some of the principal members of that learned body, more especially Dr Prujean, who was then President; and who, with as great a reputation as most, raised a greater estate than any physician of his own time. To this worthy man he not only stood indebted for this favour, but for many others, which we learn from himself, such as defending his character, when attacked by such as disliked his civil and religious principles, for the Doctor professed himself a Royalist and a Churchman, when there was neither King nor Church, which, no doubt, increased the number, and at the same time added to the boldness of such as envied, and would willingly have run down his abilities. The same kind person revised, corrected, and improved, his writings, and this Dr Charleton openly as well as gratefully acknowledges, which, by the way, is no great sign of his entertaining so high an opinion of his own learning. Besides all this, he likewise owed his life to Dr Prujean, who recovered him from an epidemic Dysentery, by which he was brought to death's door in the year 1650, which he acknowledged in this epigram (4).

Auxiliis Prujan, anima hæc moribunda revixit;
Ut vigil infusâ Pallade, flamma solet.
*Snatch'd from the Grave by Prujan's help I live,
As waisting lamps by oil supply'd revive.*

We may from hence collect the reasons why this gentleman stood exposed to so many assaults, and yet while his health, vigour, and friends lasted, got the better of them all. He came into the world early, and with vast expectations, this naturally excited envy. He was for many years of a declining party, which opened the mouths of the malicious. He was very fond of Chemistry, and a friend to the new discoveries in Physick, which of course exposed him to the resentment of those who laboured to decry and explode both. It must however be allowed, that he had his failings, and indeed, who has them not? He was a bold and lively writer, and supported his sentiments with a flow of spirit, and of language, that had a great air of confidence: and in his English writings especially, his stile was a little crabbed, too much loaded with hard words, and now and then interspersed with new terms of his own devising. From all this we find him very kindly defended by Dr Clement Barkisdale, in a copy of verses prefixed to one of Dr Charleton's books, from which, tho' none of the best, I will venture to quote a few lines (5).

(5) These are also prefixed to the book last cited.

*'Tis fit that censure wait on all that's done;

This book is generally known by the shorter title of Diatriba de Lithiasis; or, 'A discourse upon the Stone.' There are in this book of our author's, and indeed in almost every piece he wrote, many singular, curious, and judicious observations, and as such they have been transcribed, though sometimes without the least mention of this gentleman's name, by other writers of considerable figure, both at home and abroad, which was a fault never committed by Dr Charleton, who was very careful in bestowing on every man his due praises, and by constantly owning to whom he was obliged, drew upon himself the unkind and unjust censure, of compiling his books from those of other men; but it would have saved abundance of controversy amongst the members of the republick of letters, if great authors had never suffered themselves to be misled by this false shame, of being thought compilers, which Dr Charleton very justly despised.

Amongst others his kind patrons and intimate friends, was that worthy Royalist, and generous Nobleman, William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle; whose Life Dr Charleton translated into Latin in a very clear and elegant style (3). He was also well acquainted with, and a sincere friend to, the famous Philosopher of Malmesbury, Thomas Hobbes (4), which, together with his avowed respect for the Epicurean Philosophy, drew some suspicions upon him in regard to his religion, notwithstanding the pains he had taken to distinguish the religious and philosophical opinions of that famous Greek, in his own writings against infidelity. Yet how much soever he might suffer by these calumnies in the opinions of some, this made no impression upon his spirit, but he continued with the same vigour and diligence to prosecute his studies, and to oblige the Republick of Letters with new productions, which were generally well received, and some of them have been often re-printed (5) [C]. He had the misfortune to draw upon himself a new load of envy, by venturing to differ in opinion from the celebrated Inigo Jones, who, for the satisfaction of his Royal Master, had written a discourse upon Stonehenge, in which he attributed that celebrated pile to the Romans, and asserted it to be no other, than a temple dedicated by them to the God CÆLUS or CÆLUM (6), which opinion of his Dr Charleton could not confide in, but thought rather that this antiquity belonged to later and

To this work there is prefixed a Dedication in Latin to Dr Francis Prujean, dated the 11th of August, 1651, though in the printed copies it is, by mistake, 1641. There is as much learning, and reading, in this book, as, perhaps, in any of its size in our language; and those parts of it that seem to fall most within the compass of a Physician's knowledge, are treated with the utmost skill and exactness, more especially that famous question, whether the term of man's life be mutable or fixed. Upon this occasion he tells us a very remarkable story of a godly physician in the Parliament's army, who being a rigid Fatalist, gave out his prescriptions by lot, and so left his patients to take their chance, though he took his fees (6), which is a proof, that absurd opinions in Divinity may have dreadful effects on mens practice.

This work of his is divided into thirty-one chapters, and in these he fully treats all the principles of the Epicurean Philosophy, digested under their proper heads, tending to prove, that, considering the state of the heathen world, the morals of Epicurus were as good as any, as in a former work he had shewn, that his philosophick opinions were the best of any, or at least capable of being explained in such a manner, as that they might become so in the hands of a modern philosopher (7). To this book there is prefixed a succinct apology for Epicurus, which I make no scruple of asserting to be the most sensible, as well as the most learned and curious, that is any where extant, and very far exceeding some that have been writ in other languages, and while this is forgot, are in the present possession of the world's applause.

The design of that epistle is to acquaint the reader, that this learned person, who was justly esteemed one of the ablest Physicians of his age, had perused and approved it. It is dedicated to Thomas Viscount Falconbridge, the author's great patron, and seems to have been written at his request. The Dedication is dated March the 25th, 1659, that is, according to the English computation, and supposing that to be the first day of the year. The title of this book sufficiently shews the design of it, and whoever considers the distribution of the chapters, will very easily conceive, that it was from it, a modern writer of the first rank amongst our neighbours, took his plan of a work of the same kind, and published very nearly under the same title. To the last edition of our author's work in Holland is joined Dr William Cole's Dissertation upon Animal Secretion.

The reader will easily discern the relation that our author's works have to each other; and how, after having first explained the philosophy of atoms, in a sober and solid manner, so as to render it fit to give his reader a clear notion of the mechanical superstructures he meant to raise upon it, he proceeded next to the animal oconomy, and having considered the human body as a curious, and wonderful machine, suited to various purposes, by a vast variety of contrivances, which, by the help of the new discoveries, he explained in the best manner possible at that time, goes on from thence to the view of this curious machine, when disturbed, and out of order, shows how, and whence, those disorders arise, the signs with which they are attended, by which they may be known, and when known, by what methods they may be removed. After rendering these services to physick, he stopped a little, and turned his thoughts, as the reader will see in the next note, to other subjects, which he handled with equal learning and ingenuity.

and more barbarous times. Upon this it is said that he transmitted Jones's book, which was not published till after it's author's death, to Olaus Wormius, or caused it to be transmitted to that learned Danish Antiquary, who thereupon wrote him several letters tending to fortify him in his own sentiment, by proving that this work ought rather to be attributed to his countrymen the Danes (r). With the assistance of these materials Dr Charlton undertook to set this matter in a clear light, and in a treatise wrote expressly upon that subject, offered many strong arguments to shew, that this could not be a Roman temple, and several plausible reasons why it ought rather to be considered as a Danish monument (s). This book of his, though in itself very learned, and enriched with a great variety of curious observations, was but indifferently received by the many, and though approved was but coldly defended by the few, which however does not at all lessen it's merit with posterity [D]. To this book there was an angry answer written by Mr Jones's (t) son-in-law,

[D] Lessen it's merit with posterity. As the whole of this work of our author is very curious and learned, and as it will afford us an opportunity of giving a succinct account of the several opinions that have been maintained, and the principal treatises that have been wrote, in relation to Stone-Henge, the most famous antiquity in our country, it will be first of all requisite to give the title of our author's work at large, which run thus :

XIV. Chorea Gigantum : Or, The most famous Antiquity of Great Britain, STONE-HENGE, standing on Salisbury Plain, restored to the Danes. By Walter Charlton, M. D. and Physician in ordinary to his Majesty. Lond 1663. 4to.

This book was dedicated to his Royal Master, and in the Dedication there is contained a very memorable piece of History. ' I have had the honour to hear, ' from that oracle of truth and wisdom, your Majesty's ' own mouth, you were pleased to visit that monument, and for many hours together entertain yourself, with the delightful view thereof, when, after ' the defeat of your loyal army at Worcester, Almighty God, in infinite mercy to your three kingdoms, ' miraculously delivered you out of the bloody jaws of ' those monsters of sin and cruelty.' In respect to the different opinions that have been advanced as to this famous monument, we are first to consider the matter of which it is composed, and next the manner, in which it was erected. As to the former it is agreed, that there are three rows of great stones, some of which are twenty-eight feet high, and seven broad, that stand almost in the form of a crown; and over some of them other stones are laid, with tenons and mortises. But then it is enquired, whether these stones be natural or factitious? Dr Childrey holds the first (9), as also, that they actually grew in this place; and he thinks the argument brought to prove the contrary, from the want of stones, either little or big, in that neighbourhood, makes rather for his opinion, because nature could not provide itself of lapidifick matter otherwise, than by robbing the adjacent parts to compose these huge stones. He thinks it also no small confirmation of this notion, that upon the Downs about Marlborough, not above twenty miles from Stone-Henge, there are found abundance of such great stones, commonly called by the country people the Grey Weathers; and at Aubery, in an orchard, there are half a dozen, or half a score stones little inferior in size to those of Stone-Henge, some standing upright, and some lying flat upon the ground, and the country thereabouts affording scarce a stone beside. On the other hand, Mr Camden (10), and many other sensible people, have thought them artificial, composed of stone dust, or sand, held together by some petrifying juice. They were led to this opinion by observing, that in this country there are no such stones, indeed hardly any stones; and next, that the size of these stones render it very improbable that they were brought thither by land-carriage; to which they add, that Pliny (11), and other authors, very positively mention such factitious stones as an invention common in their days, which, to them, puts the thing out of doubt. But, however, later experience has fully decided this question in favour of the former notion, for that these very stones are natural, and no composition, is a point now out of dispute. The sentiments of learned men in relation to the work itself, are still very much divided; but to bring them within the compass of a note, we may range them under seven heads. (I.) A certain author would persuade us, that Stone-Henge ought to be ascribed to the Phœnicians (12). But,

however, that has not much prevailed; and till we have better arguments than any he has produced, very few will think it part of true history, that the Phœnicians performed any great exploits in this island. (II.) The celebrated Inigo Jones (13) would have this a Roman work, and, as we have said in the text, a temple to the god Cœlum; but therein his imagination and learning got the better of his judgment, and even of his senses, for he describes Stone-Henge not as it is, but as it should be, to make it consistent with what he has delivered; he makes a regular hexagon of what is rather an octagon, or, to speak with still greater propriety, a polygon, altogether irregular. But for all this, his book is highly valuable, and the number of fine things there are in it, very fully atone for any mistakes that it may contain. (III.) Our author, in his treatise upon this subject, will have it to be a Danish monument (14), and he grounds his opinion chiefly on the mistake, which he supposes to have been made in relation to it's ancient name, for he asserts, that instead of the Giants Dance, which is the name it bears in our ancient writers, it ought to have been stiled, the Assembly of the Chiefs, or Nobles; and in support of this, he says, a great deal that is very well worth reading, nor the less so, for the informations he received from the learned Olaus Wormius. Yet after all, he was as much deceived in his opinions, as the writer whom he opposed, for, beyond a question, the Danes could not be the founders of this monument, since we find it mentioned by Nennius (15), a writer who flourished two hundred years before the Danes came into England. (IV.) It has been asserted in general terms, that this was a temple of the Druids, erected long before the Romans came into Britain; and in defence of this Mr John Aubrey, a very knowing Antiquary, and one particularly well acquainted with all the ancient monuments in Wiltshire, has written an express treatise (16), which has had it's weight with the most studious persons in this kind of learning, who have inclined to think him, if not exactly right, yet much nearer the truth than any of the rest. (V.) Another author, whose name at present is, and in all probability will continue, a secret, has advanced a notion more singular and extraordinary than any of these (17). He says, that this was a temple erected to the honour of Anarauth, the goddess of victory; and that in this place the illustrious Steynings, a famous giant, having defeated Divitiacus and his Belgæ, sacrificed the captives and spoils to the idol beforementioned, upon her altar here. It is not, however, very probable, notwithstanding the pains this gentleman has taken, that this story of his will ever grow into any great credit. (VI.) The most ingenious Edward Dolton, Esq; who was a very learned Antiquary, as well as an excellent Historian, gives us a hint that it was a monument raised to the memory of Queen Boadicea (18), his great heroine, by her subjects the Britons. But though the conjecture is certainly not amiss, yet, perhaps, the proof might be found very difficult. (VII.) The last and most common notion is, that it was the burial place of Arthur Pendragon, Constantine, Ambrosius, and other British Princes; or, that it was a monument erected by Ambrosius in memory of a multitude of Britons here basely slain by the Saxons (19); and in support of this it is alleged, that in very ancient manuscripts, and those of the best authority, this famous monument is called Stan-Hengist, for which different reasons are assigned. We will conclude this long, tho' we hope not tedious, note, with a short quotation from a copy of commendatory verses prefixed to this work of our author by John Dryden, Esq; (20), not barely on who was the editor also of that work which had occasioned this dispute. In short, there was a great clamour raised against it, and many liberties were taken with Dr Charleton's character upon account of this performance, and this, notwithstanding Sir William Dugdale, and some other of the most eminent Antiquaries in the Kingdom, owned themselves to be of our author's opinion (u). However, all the noise and envy of his enemies could not hinder him from rising to the highest honour of his profession, or from being celebrated, even in his life-time, as one of its greatest ornaments, to which his Anatomical Prelections in the College Theatre, in the spring of the year 1683 (w), did not a little contribute, as well as his full and satisfactory Defence of the immortal Hervey's claim to the discovery of the circulation of the blood, against the pretence that was set up in favour of Father Paul (x), which our author clearly confuted. This certainly ought to be remembered in honour to his memory, not only as it is a very strong proof of his great capacity and extensive learning, and as it was in some measure a vindication of the honour of this nation, but also as a generous testimony of his esteem and gratitude to his deceased friend, qualities not over common in modern times, and for which therefore it would be barbarous to deny him that applause he so justly merits. It was from these motives, that in 1689 (y), he was chosen President of the College of Physicians, in which office he continued to the year 1691. A little after this his circumstances becoming narrow, he found himself under the necessity of seeking a retreat in the Island of Jersey, where he resided at the time that Anthony Wood took some very extraordinary liberties with his character, representing it in a light very different from that, in which, during the Doctor's prosperity, he had thought fit to place it (z). It is not easy to say what the causes were of our learned Physician's misfortunes, except it may be the death of his friends and patrons, and those changes to which all things in this world are subject, together with the fashion of following such Physicians as are in vogue, though not more learned or more successful than their predecessors. That it was not any decay of parts, or loss of understanding, is very apparent from hence, that the very last of his books was, in point of various learning equal to any that he had formerly published, more exact in its method, more correct in its style, and in every circumstance more highly finished than any of his former (a). Of this, as well as of his other performances, some account will be given in a note [E]. We have not on account of the beauty of the verses, and the harmony of his numbers, or their containing the praise of our author and his writings; but for the sake of the history contained in them, and his fine description of the past, and at that time present state of learning in England.

Among th' asserters of free reason's claim,
Our nation's not the least in worth or fame.
The world to Bacon does not only owe
It's present knowledge, but it's future too.
Gilbert shall live, 'till loadstones cease to draw,
Or British fleets the boundless ocean awe.
And noble Boyle, not less in nature seen,
Than his great brother read in states and men.
The circling streams once thought but pools of blood
(Whether life's fuel, or the body's food)
From dark oblivion Harvey's name shall save;
While Ent keeps all the honour that he gave.
Nor are you, learned friend, the least renown'd;
Whose fame, not circumscrib'd with English ground,
Flies like the nimble journeys of the light;
And is, like that, unspent too in it's flight.
Whatever truths have been, by art, or chance,
Redeem'd from error, or from ignorance,
Thin in their authors (like rich veins of ore)
Your works unite and still discover more.
Such is the healing virtue of your pen,
To perfect cures on books, as well as men.
Nor is this work the least: You well may give
To men new vigour, who make stones to live.
Through you, the Danes, (their short dominion lost)
A longer conquest than the Saxons boast.
STONE HENCE, once thought a Temple, you have found
A Throne where Kings, our earthly gods, were crown'd;
Where by their wond'ring subjects they were seen,
And here be chose again to rule the land.

These ruins shelter'd once his sacred head,
When He from Worcester's fatal battle fled;

Watch'd by the genius of this Royal place,
And mighty visions of the Danish race.
His refuge, then, was for a Temple shown:
But, He restor'd, 'tis now become a Throne.

[E] Some account will be given in a note.] We are here, according to the promise made in the text, to speak of the remainder of our learned author's works, and this we shall do as clearly and as concisely as it is possible.

XV. Disquisitiones duæ Anatomico-Physicæ: altera Anatomie pueri de cælo tacta, altera de proprietatibus cerebri humani, Londini 1664, 8°. That is, Two Anatomico-Physical Dissertations; the first, concerning a boy killed by lightning; the second, of the properties of the human brain. In the former of these, he discourses largely of the nature and effects of thunder and lightning; explodes the vulgar error, concerning persons being killed with thunder-bolts; and inserts occasionally many other curious observations and reflections, as well in regard to Natural Philosophy, as Anatomy and Physick. In the latter also, he gives a great many singular, and in those days new discoveries, and treats the subject with much learning and perspicuity (21).

XVI. Gulielmi Ducis Novicæstræ Vita. Londini 1668, in fol. That is, The Life of William Duke of Newcastle. This, as has been observed in the text, is no other than a translation of the life of that eminent Statesman, and great Captain, written originally by his consort, Margaret Duchess of Newcastle; and the reader may find a copious account of it in another article of this work (22).

XVII. Onomasticon Zoicon plerorumque Animalium differentias & nomina propria pluribus linguis exponens. Cui accedunt mantissa Anatomices, & quedam de variis Fossilium generibus. not been able to discover how long he continued in that kind of voluntary exile, or whether he returned afterwards to London; but it is beyond all doubt, that those writers are much mistaken, who have asserted that he died soon after he retired thither, for, as much as we are in the dark as to other circumstances, we are very clear as to the time of his death, which happened in the latter end of the year 1707, and in the eighty-eighth year of his age (b). He was, as the many books he has written very fully shew, a man of very solid and extensive learning, and as he distinguished himself very early by his great abilities, so for the space of five and thirty years, he continued a very useful and assiduous Member of the Republick of Letters. He was a very sincere lover of the constitution in Church and State, and had so warm an affection for his country, that though he was strongly sollicit to accept a Professor's chair in the university of Padua, yet he absolutely refused it (c). He was a person of great candour and generosity, ready upon all occasions to acknowledge and to commend the merit of others, and as in his youth he was honoured with the protection of the most considerable men for learning and quality in this kingdom, more especially those of his own profession, so he continued happy in their esteem and friendship to the last. In his junior years he dedicated much of his time to the study of Philosophy and polite literature, and was as well read in the Greek and Roman authors as any man of his time. He learned very early from his excellent tutor Bishop Wilkins, the art of digesting his knowledge in such a manner as to command it readily and fully when occasion required. It is doubtful whether in Natural or in Moral Philosophy he was the greater man; that he wrote very accurately upon both is however certain; and he who would see the dark and disjointed notions of the Antients concerning the Anima Mundi set in a clear light, and thoroughly reconciled, must have recourse to his works, since it would be hard to meet with it any where else (d). In every branch of his own profession he has left testimonies of his diligence and his capacity, and whoever considers the plainness and perspicuity of his language, the pains he has taken to collect and produce the opinions of the old Physicians in order to compare them with the Moderns, the just remarks with which these collections and comparisons are attended, the succinctness with which all this is dispatched, and the great accuracy of that method in which his books are written, will readily agree with me, that he was equal to most of the writers in this faculty who were his contemporaries, and that if he has been surpassed by any of the Moderns, his example ing the mystery of Vintners; or, A Discourse of the various sicknesses of Wines, and their respective Remedies at this day commonly used, &c. Lond. 1668, 1675, 1692. 8°. This some have thought a little below the character of our author, and much inferior to his other writings. In all probability it was composed from observations set down in his common-place books, without any intention of publishing them originally; and it is very likely that he was persuaded to send them abroad, either by some of his friends, or by some bookseller, to whom they might be useful. In this he had the same misfortune with other great writers, who have been too ready to commit to the press those pieces that were only fit for their closets, from a notion, that their bare names may support any thing; whereas the greatest writer runs the hazard of his reputation, every time he ventures to submit a new work to the publick view.

XIX. De Scorbuto liber singularis; cui accessit Epiphonema in Medicastro. Londini 1671, in 8°. Id. Lugd. Bat. 1672, in 12^m°. That is, Of the Scurvy a single book; to which is added, an Excursion against Quacks. The very learned father Niceron (23) observes very justly, that there is great variety of curious matter contained in this book. The very same thing may be justly said of most of our author's writings, since we find in them not only the fruits of general reading, and extensive learning, but also the effects of his experimental knowledge, and of his enquiries, and conversations, with other learned persons of the Faculty; so that one has, generally speaking, in a very narrow view, all that could be expected on the subject he handles, and even more, because the circle of his knowledge is commonly wider than that of his reader's, which contributes not a little to the value of his books.

XX. Natural History of the Passions. Lond. 1674. 8°. This is also a very curious and instructive treatise, suitable to the philosophick spirit that reigned at that time, when it was fashionable for men of parts and learning to employ their time in endeavouring thoroughly to understand human nature; towards which we may, without flattery affirm, that none afforded greater helps than our author, who has written almost upon every subject that can be held justly necessary to this purpose, and with great industry laboured to give us the history both of the body and of the mind.

XXI. Enquiries into human Nature, in six Anatomy Profections, in the new Theatre of the Royal College of Physicians in London. London, 1680. 4°.

XXII. Oratio anniversaria habita in Theatro inclyti Collegii Medicorum. Lond. 5 Aug. 1680. in commemorationem beneficiorum a Doctore Harvey, aliisque, &c. præfitorum Lond 1680. 4°. That is, An Anniversary Oration delivered in the Theatre of the College of Physicians at London, Aug. 5. 1680. in commemoration of the benefits received from Dr Harvey, and other worthy persons. There could be nothing more agreeable to our author's disposition than such a performance as this, as well in regard to the love he had for his profession, as the high esteem, and true affection, which he bore to the memory of Dr Harvey, which, upon many occasions, while living, he expressed for his person; and of which we shall have occasion to say something more hereafter.

XXIII. The Harmony of natural and positive divine Laws. Lond. 1680. 8°. In this treatise our author endeavours to shew, that the supreme good, or ultimate happiness of man, is not a thing either uncertain or chimerical, but that it is settled by the will of God, in the disposition of all things, and of man himself, as a free and rational being; so that what he has been pleased to discover to mankind in an extraordinary way, as a legislator, and what he has left it in their own power to discover by the light of reason, concerning him as their Creator, is so far from being contradictory, or repugnant, that in fact these laws help each other; and afford a joint proof of their respective authorities. This scheme of the book shews, that it was very well suited to those times; but, perhaps, it would be no easy thing to prove, that it is at all less suitable to ours. Several of our author's treatises are now grown out of date, being superseded by other and fresher discoveries; but this is not liable to that fate, as the subject is like to continue the same for ever.

XXIV. Three Anatomy Lectures, concerning, 1. The motion of the Blood through the veins and arteries. 2. The organic structure of the Heart. 3. The efficient cause of the Heart's pulsation. Read on the 19th, 20th, and 21st days of March, 1682. in the Anatomical Theatre of his Majesty's Royal College of Physicians in London. Lond. 1683. 4°. I know none of our author's works that have been more, indeed, I think, hardly any so much, applauded, as these lectures, which shews the gradual improvements has been in a great measure the occasion of it, many of the best received books in the present age, being, as to method and form, at least, very like his. He was also a very curious and judicious Antiquary, had taken much pains in perusing our ancient Historians, and in observing their excellencies, as well as their defects, the latter of which seem to have occupied chiefly the thoughts of modern Criticks. But, above all, he was very studious of connecting the Sciences with each other, and thereby rendering them severally more perfect, in which, if he did not absolutely succeed himself, he had at least the satisfaction of opening the way to others, of showing the true road to perfection, and pointing out the means of applying and making those discoveries useful, which have been made in succeeding times. There is also good reason to believe, that tho' we have few or none of his writings extant that were composed during the last twenty years of his life, yet he was not idle during that space, but committed many things to paper, as materials at least for other works that he designed. This, I say, may be well concluded from the natural industry of this learned person, as well as from some volumes of Collections that are, or at least lately were, in being, and have passed from hand to hand under his name (e). The accounts that have been hitherto given of him and of his works in our language, have been very slender and sparing, no ways suitable to his deserts, or to the reputation that he very justly acquired amongst foreigners (f), which led us to take so much care in this article, that it may appear to have a true concern for the honour of all our countrymen, who have done credit to this nation, by promoting solid and useful knowledge of every kind.

(e) These Collections were formerly in the hands of the Millington family.

improvements that were made in this sort of useful knowledge, of which Dr Charleton was both a faithful register, and a great promoter. It was in these lectures that he clearly and effectually refuted the pretence, that Dr Harvey had borrowed his doctrine, of the Circulation of the Blood, from Father Paul of Venice (24). It is, indeed, true, that Father Paul had written upon the use of the valves in the veins, which he is thought to have first discovered; and in like manner Servetus (25), Columbus (26), and Andreas Cæsalpinus (27), has delivered various things concerning the motion of the Blood, which was not unknown even to Hippocrates himself; but as a system from which the whole animal œconomy might be explained, was first known to Dr Harvey, and by him discovered, described, and demonstrated. The learned Boërhaave therefore, in his Institutes delivers this point clearly, and in a manner which fully shews, that he was convinced, that the rights of our countryman were beyond all controversy supported, and established (28). At length, says he, the immortal Harvey, by the discoveries which he demonstrated, overturned the whole theory of the Antients, and founded Physick upon a new and more certain basis, upon which it at present rests. It will not be amiss, before we quit this subject, to observe, that it was no small advantage to Dr Harvey's noble discovery, that, on the one hand, he lived long enough to establish the certainty of it; and to triumph over all the numerous efforts that were made from a disingenuous spirit of envy, and contradiction; and that on the other, his intimate friendship with several learned men of his own country, and profession, secured after his decease, the glory due to his memory, from being tarnished by the many malicious attempts to show, that it was no discovery at all; or, that if it was, it did not belong to him, but to others. If these pretences had not been refuted in time, and before they had taken root in the minds of men, it might have been found much more difficult to eradicate them; and, perhaps, also many of the testimonies that were urged by his friends, might, in process of time, have been lost; or, at least, the circumstances that render them most convincing buried in oblivion. But the learning and spirit of the Doctor's friends, more especially Dr Peter Barwick, and our author, rendered every thing of this kind impracticable, for as soon as any hint was given abroad, or even suspicion dropped in any literary dissertation, or in prefaces before ancient authors, or epistolary essays of the moderns, to the prejudice of Dr Harvey's system, his title to it, or the claim of any other, they were ready to take up the dispute, and were such able masters of it, both in regard to the Doctor's manner of finding and publishing his discovery, and of the nature of it, and it's distinctness from what others had written, about the motion of the blood, that nothing could gain ground during their life-times, contrary to the truth; and as they were both very long lived men, they survived that spirit of rancour which so long followed this invention. By which concurrence of happy circumstances we may justly attribute that general sense the learned world now has, of the merit of this great discovery, and of the great benefits thereby derived to Physick by it's illustrious author, which may justly be esteemed a singular credit to the Faculty, and a very high honour to this nation.

XXV. The Life of Marcellus, translated from the Greek. This is to be found in that noble treasury of English learning, the translation of Plutarch's Lives, by various hands (29). In this he has given the world a testimony of his perfect acquaintance with the Greek learning, as well as language, for it is illustrated throughout with concise explanatory notes. The stile of this piece is excellent, and as different from that which our author used in his junior years, as can be imagined. His periods are short, his diction easy, natural, and perspicuous, inasmuch that one perceives nothing in it of that stiffness and want of vigour which is generally complained of in translations. In short, he gives the sense of Plutarch with the same freedom as if it was his own, enters into the spirit of his author, and from the perfect knowledge he has of the subject, becomes, as it were, an original writer.

XXVI. Inquisitio Physica, de Causis Catameniorum, & Uteri Rheumatismo; in qua probatur, sanguinem in animali fermentescere nunquam. Lond. 1685. 8°. That is, A physical Dissertation on the Causes of certain feminine Disorders, and of the Rheumatism in the Womb; in which it is proved, that there is no such thing as Fermentation in the Blood. This little book, divided into eight chapters, besides the conclusion, is written in a very clear and correct Latin style; in a method perfectly exact, in which the sentiments of the most eminent professors of the Art, Ancients as well as Moderns, are clearly stated, and freely examined; in short, as this is the last work that he published, so it seems to be the most finished; and it ends with so much affection to his Faculty, that it looks like taking his farewell of them, and the publick. The approbation prefixed informs us, that in the judgment of those who subscribe it, this physical enquiry of their most friendly member and colleague might be very useful, when printed, and the underwritten names are, Sir Thomas Witherley, Knight, and President; Dr Samuel Collins, Registrar; Dr Thomas Burwell, Dr Peter Barwick, Sir Thomas Millington, and Dr Humphry Brooke, Censors of the Royal College of Physicians.

XXVII. Of human Felicity and Infelicity; a Discourse by way of similitude or parable. This was never printed; but there are several copies of it handed about in manuscript, under the name of our author; but whether it be really his, or not, I am not able to say. Thus, as succinctly as might be, and as near as it was possible, in the order of time when they came abroad, the reader has a true catalogue of this learned Physician's writings: and as to his character, it has been attempted in the text, if not with success, at least with candour, and with an honest desire of doing justice to his memory, and to truth.

CHAUCER (GEOFFREY) the Father of our English Poets, and the first great improver and reformer of our language. He flourished in the XIVth century, and as he justly obtained the highest admiration amongst his contemporaries, so his memory has ever since been highly honoured (a). One would imagine from this, that every historical circumstance relating to him, or at least those of the greatest moment, should be well preserved, and be perfectly clear, which however is so far from being the case, that nothing can hitherto be certainly determined concerning his descent, or so much as who was his father. One says that he was of a noble stock (b), another that he was the son of a Knight, (c), a third that his father was a Vintner (d), a fourth that he was a Merchant (e), and the fifth and last opinion, which is the best, is, that nothing can be said (f) with any tolerable assurance of his family at all, but that there is somewhat more probability of his being the son of a gentleman, rather than of a tradesman [A]. The place of his birth is as much disputed, but however may be determined with greater appearance of truth, for though some say he was a Berkshire man (g), and others would entitle Oxfordshire (h) to his birth, yet if we may rely upon what he tells us himself, it is much more likely that he drew his first breath in the City of London (i), and that he had a great interest amongst it's inhabitants, is a thing as certain as that it drew upon him many misfortunes, notwithstanding which, his having that interest seems to be a corroborating proof of his being a citizen's son [B]. The time of his birth is pretty well fixed, for most of

[A] Rather than of a tradesman.] It is a point well agreed amongst our ancient authors, that the French surname of this family, which was variously written; as for instance, Chaucier, Chaucieris, Chaucier, Chausir, &c. signified a Shoemaker (1), but notwithstanding this, it is very well known, that the founder of this family in England was a Norman Chief that came over with William the Conqueror, as appears by the roll of Battle-Abbey (2); and in succeeding times there were several persons of note of this name mentioned in our records. In the reign of King John there was one le Chausir (3), as appears by the records in the Tower; and in the reign of Henry III. one Elias Chaucer, who in the reign following, viz. Edward I. had a grant of ten shillings from the Treasury (4). There was also one John Chaucer, of whom King Edward I. heard a complaint for a thousand pounds (5); but all this gives us no kind of certainty in respect to our author's family at all. Leland contents himself with hinting, that he was of genteel extraction, nobili loco natus (6), are his words; and it is said, that he is faithfully copied by Bale; but this is to be understood of the later editions of his book, for in the first he calls him Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, Knight, and says nothing of his family at all (7), afterwards he met with Leland's book, and abridged his account of him. John Pits is very clear, that he was of an exceeding good family, and not only a Knight himself, but his father a knight before him (8): but his authority goes for little, more especially with those that know him best. Mr Speght is of opinion, that one Richard Chaucer was his father, who was a Vintner at the corner of Kirton-Lane, and dying in 1348, left his house, tavern, and stock, to the church of St Mary Aldermay (9), where he was buried. This passed currently with Fuller; and, perhaps the better, because it furnished him with a very silly jest. 'His father, says he, was a Vintner in London; and I have heard his arms quarrelled at being argent and gules strangely contrived, and hard to be blazoned. 'Some more wits have made it the dashing of white and red wine (the parents of our ordinary claret) as nicking his father's profession.' Against this opinion, however, there lie two exceptions, that solid heads than his have not been able to get over; the first is, that there was something very unnatural in this Vintner's leaving all his estate to the Church, while his son was at the University; and the second, that Chaucer should never complain of this, or, for any thing that we can discover, feel the effects of it, since it is evident enough, that in his youth he lived at a rate that could not have been supported without a fortune. The industrious Mr Hearne thinks it probable, his father was a Merchant of London (10); but the last writer of his life thinking that father not good enough for him, hath found him out a better, one Sir John Chaucer, for which he has no other evidence, than that such a man lived at a time (11) when our Poet might possibly have been his son. I must confess, I think, he was of a good family, and that for various reasons, which, because I do not know they have been taken notice of before, I will mention as briefly as I can. First then, his education speaks him a gentleman bred at both the Universities, travelled through several countries, and at last a student in the Temple, where, it is reported, that he was fined two shillings for beating a Fryar in Fleetstreet. Next, his post at court shews him to have been a gentleman, for birth was much stood upon in those days, and young men of the best quality were the King's Pages. Thirdly, this is confirmed by his marriage, which so proud a man as John of Gaunt would not have admitted, if he had been of a mean descent, much less have recommended him to his wife, and thereby made him the uncle-in-law of his own children. Fourthly, his writings shew him a gentleman, for they are all written with such freedom and spirit as must have exposed him to great envy, if he had not been a gentleman, and which he would probably have appeased by some reasonable apology. Lastly, the company he kept, and the respect that was constantly paid him, seem the clearest testimonies of this, which, with the rest, I submit to the decision of the intelligent reader.

[B] Of his being a citizen's son.] It seems to have been a doubt with Leland, whether Oxfordshire or Berkshire produced this great man; but he thought he had reason to think, that he was born in one of those counties (12). If Berkshire was to be preferred, then Dunnington (13) would bid the fairest for it, which was certainly Chaucer's seat; but then it seems to be no less certain, that he purchased it from Sir Richard Adderbury. Pits affirms roundly, that he was born at Woodstock (14), and Camden speaking of that place, says, that having nothing in it else remarkable, it boasts of having produced our English Homer, Geoffrey Chaucer (15), but he was too knowing a man to credit this. He knew the reason of it to be, that Chaucer had a house there, and Ewelme and Hocknorton in the same county, were also belonging to his family, and might therefore, with as much justice as Woodstock, put in a claim to his birth. But Chaucer himself seems to have determined the point, as clearly as man could do, for, speaking of the troubles that had happened in this place, he says (16), The city of London, that is to me so dear and sweet, in which I was forth-grown, and more kindly love, have I to that place, than any other on earth, as every kindly creature hath full appetite to that place of his kindly engendrer, &c. And therefore Camden very justly takes occasion, speaking of another Poet, to affirm, that London (17) was our author's birth-place. 'Edmund Spencer, says he, a Londoner, was so smiled on by the Muses at his birth, that he excelled all the English Poets that went before him, if, we except only his fellow-citizen, 'Chaucer.' It may seem a little difficult to reconcile what is said in this note, to what has been advanced in the former, and yet it may be done tolerably well, for though we now consider a citizen of London as a trader of course, yet in the times when Chaucer lived, men of great quality and distinction resided in the city, where the Court was also kept, and therefore he might very well be in this sense the son of an inhabitant of London, and still his father might not be either Merchant or Vintner, but in some post about the Court, and the writers who mention it agree, that it was in the second year of Edward III, A. D. 1328 (k). Here again we fall into the dark, for as to his earlier years we know not where or how they were spent, but as soon as he was fit for academical studies, he was sent to Cambridge, where he gave early testimonies of his abilities by several élèges and sonnets, as well as by a poem called the Court of Love, which he composed when he was about eighteen (l), and which carries in it very pregnant proofs of skill and learning, as well as quickness of wit and great strength of genius [C]. It is not by any means certain in what college or hall of that university he studied, but it is conjectured, and not without some shew of reason, that it might be in Solere's Hall, which he has so particularly and humorously described in his story of the Miller of Trompington (m). He removed from thence, for reasons which we find no where assigned, to the university of Oxford, and completed his studies there, some say at Canterbury-college (n) which however is improbable, since it was not founded 'till Chaucer was thirty-five years of age; others in Merton-college, which is more likely, for though his name does not appear among the celebrated members of it at that time, yet we find most of his contemporaries, as Strode, Occleve, &c (o), were of that college. After a considerable stay here, and a strict application to the publick Lectures of the university, he became, as Leland tells us, a ready Logician, a smooth Rhetorician, a pleasant Poet, a grave Philosopher, an ingenious Mathematician, and a holy Divine (p). That he was a great master in Astronomy is plain from his Discourses of the Astrolabe; that he was versed in the Hermetick Philosophy, appears by his Tale of the Chanon's Yeoman; his knowledge in Divinity is evident from his Parson's Tale; and his Philosophy from the Testament of Love. After he left this university, he travelled abroad through France and the Low-Countries, in order to see the world, and to improve the knowledge which he had acquired from books; but when he went abroad, or what time he returned, are circumstances not easy to be determined.

this in so dark a matter, and which has employed so many learned pens, without letting in much light upon it, seems the most probable account of the matter. For in that discourse in which he speaks of London as his birth-place, he very clearly confesses, that he had been but too deeply engaged in the popular disturbances that happened there, through his attachment to his patron the Duke of Lancaster, which shows the interest he had among the people; and yet he affirms, that in what he did he had no evil intention, much less meant to throw all things into confusion; and offers it as a reason why he should be believed in declaring this, that he was a native of London, and loved it better than any place upon earth, as every creature naturally does the place from which it springs. After clearing up these points as far as possible, we shall be more brief in our remarks upon other points of this History, though a large and full Life of Chaucer seems to be a work still wanting to the learned world, after all the pains that has been hitherto taken about it.

[C] And great strength of genius] The most certain accounts we have of Chaucer are those taken from his own writings, in which there are a great variety of circumstances that occur not in any of the ancient relations of his life, in so much that it is very doubtful whether we should ever have heard any thing of his being a student at Cambridge, if he had not left us that particular himself. In like manner it might have been presumed, but it could hardly have been proved, that his Court of Love was not his first performance; or, at least, his first performance that made any great figure. But from the perusal of this poem, we learn from himself, that he had written many things before in honour of the deity of love. Indeed, the poem itself speaks it probable, for though we have a very high idea of the natural genius of Chaucer, yet it would be impossible to persuade any judge of Poetry, that this was his first essay, for not only the structure of the poem manifests an extraordinary skill in that kind of writing, but the harmony of his numbers, even at this distance of time, sufficiently shew that they could not fall from the pen of an unpractised Poet. It is generally believed, upon the credit I apprehend of the Rubrick placed at the head of this performance, that it was written in imitation of the Romant of the Rose (18), but I must confess I am not very well satisfied of that, and should rather be of opinion, that our author composed it after the manner of those Italian Poems that were then so generally esteemed, and for which the famous Francis Petrarch had been crowned some years before with great solemnity at Rome (19). The honours which that celebrated Poet acquired, and which he had never acquired but in an age of the greatest gallantry, excited all who had any turn that way, to emulate his performances. We may very plainly perceive in this work of Chaucer's, that he meant to make his entrance by it into the region of Parnassus, and boldly resolved, on the strength of his own judgment as well as of his genius, to declare himself a Poet, and put himself that way into the road to fame. If this had not been his intention, he would have scarce written the Court of Love, the ground of which Poem is to shew, that it was a tribunal to which every man owed obedience, which sooner or later he was obliged to pay. As for himself, he professes that he was summoned to do suit and service at the age of eighteen, which affords him an opportunity of describing the Court, the manner of it's proceedings, and the Statutes of Love by which those proceedings are regulated, and in doing this he gives the following account of himself in three stanzas (20):

(20) Chaucer's Works, p. 567.

In art of Love I write and songis make,
That maie be song in honour of the King
And Queen of Love; and then I undirtake
He that is fadde shall then full merry syng,
And daungerous not ben in every thyng:
Beseche I you but seen my will and rede,
And let your answeere put me out of drede.

What is your name? reherse it here I praie;
Of whens and where, of what condicion
That ye ben of? let me se come of and saie
Fain would I know your disposicion;
Ye have put on your old entencion.
But whate ye mene, to serve me I ne wote,
Savfe that ye saie, ye love me woundir hote.

My name, alas! my herte why makes thou strange,
Philogenet I call'd am ferre and nere,
Of Cambridge, Clerke, that never thinke to change
Fro you, that with your heavenly fremis clere
Ravishe myne herte, and ghost, and all in fere,
Since at the first I write my bill for grace,
Methinke I se some mercie in your face.

This poem is very long, consisting of upwards of four-teen hundred verses, and concludes with the Festival of Love, which with great elegance our Poet fixes upon the first of May, and makes it celebrated by the birds: yet this part of the Poem is the most exceptionable of any, and shows what a strange taste prevailed in that age, for in this festival not only the Hymns of the Church, but the Psalms themselves, are very scandalously prophaned, and applied to the God of Love and his Mother, which shows the bad consequences that naturally flow from superstitious devotion.

determined (q). Yet sure there is a probability that he spent not many years out of his own country, since the best writers seem to be well satisfied, that after his return he entered himself of the Middle-Temple, and became a student there of the Municipal Laws of this land (r). Of this learning having received some tincture, he betook himself to the Court, which was indeed the place in the world fittest for a man of his accomplishments to thrive in. His first employment there was in quality of the King's Page (s), in those times a very honourable office, as it gave near and frequent access to the Royal Presence; but one would imagine this was not a post to which any but a young man could be advanced upon his coming to Court, and therefore it seems most consistent with truth to believe, that Geoffrey Chaucer could not at his admittance exceed thirty [D]. At this time the English Court was the most gay and splendid in Europe. Edward III, a Prince equally distinguished by civil and martial virtues, sat then upon the throne, blessed with an illustrious Consort, by whom he had a numerous posterity (t). His many victories had rendered him famous abroad, and his moderation and clemency, his reverence for the laws, and his kindness for his people, made him beloved at home, so that our Chronicles boast of few reigns so glorious, and of none brighter, than his. Among other great qualities with which this famous Monarch was endowed, his love of learning and learned men was not the least conspicuous, and therefore we need not wonder that our author, who was continually giving some specimen or other of the vivacity of his parts, wrought himself into high favour, insomuch, that it appears that he was a constant attendant on the Court, and when it was at Woodstock resided at a square stone house near the Park-gate, which still retains his name (u), and well indeed it may, since, being consecrated in his Poems, the whole country round about is become, in respect to Englishmen, a kind of classick ground [E]. But besides his employment about the person of his Prince, our Poet took pains to advance his fortune, by attaching himself to the service of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, by whom, and by his Duchess Blanch, a lady equally remarkable for her wit and virtue, he was exceedingly beloved, nor was it long before he became part of their family also (w). It happened thus: this Duchess entertained in her service one Catharine Rouet, daughter of Sir Payne or Pagan Rouet, a native of Hainault, and Guien King at Arms for that country, who was afterwards married to Sir Hugh Swynford, a Knight of Lincoln. He lived not long after their marriage, and upon his decease this lady returned into

[D] Could not at that time exceed thirty.] We have intimated in the text, that our author seems to have owed his admittance into the King's service in quality of Page, which in the Latin of those times was called Valetus or Valectus, an honour that young Noblemen of the first rank were glad to accept, to the favour of the King's son John of Gaunt, afterwards Duke of Lancaster, of which no notice is taken by any of those who have hitherto collected the Memoirs of his Life. Yet we do not assert this without authority, for it appears by a poem of his called Chaucer's Dream (21), first printed in the year 1597, that he was very deep in this young Prince's amorous secrets, for that poem is an Allegorical History of the Loves of John of Gaunt and Blanch of Lancaster, daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaster, which, from this very poem it appears, were managed with the utmost secrecy, 'till, by a long train of intrigues and solicitations, all the obstacles in the way of this match were got over, and with the help of the King's consent and the Pope's dispensation, they were married in May 1359 (22), which, as it was the first introduction to John of Gaunt's vast power and greatness, so it seems to have been the beginning of our author's fortunes at Court; at least it is certain, that the knowledge he had of this affair, was what made him equally the favourite of the Duke of Lancaster and of the Duchess Blanch, who, as the highest testimony of her friendship, gave him the sister of her favourite Lady in marriage, which is also intimated at the close of this poem. But this is quite a different thing from another under the same title, that in the old manuscripts is, and ought to be, intitled, the Book of the Duchess (23), written, not upon her marriage but upon her death, and this being wrote in the manner of a vision, and the other not being discovered, came to be called Chaucer's Dream, because that title appeared in some old lists of his Works. As the credit of the Duke of Lancaster increased with his father, Chaucer's also rose in a like proportion, for he continued steady to his patron to the last hour of that Duke's life, and indeed, considering his alliance as well as his obligations, we need not at all wonder that he did. But after saying all this it will be very proper to add, that, notwithstanding his fidelity to his patron, he did not go all lengths with him, but kept exactly within the bounds of loyalty to his Prince, as well as those of duty to his benefactor.

[E] A kind of classick ground.] In order to justify this, we need only observe, that many of the rural descriptions that occur in his works, are taken from Woodstock Park; of which he tells us, that it was a park walled with green stone (24), that being the first park walled in England, and not many years before his time. In most of his pieces where he designs an imaginary scene, he certainly copies it from a real landscape: so in his Cuckow and Nightingale, the morning walk he takes was such, as at this day may be traced from his house through part of the park, and down by the brook into the vale, under Blenheim-Castle (25), as certainly as we may assert, that Maples instead of Phylireas were the ornaments round the bower; which place he likewise describes in his Dream as a white castle (6), standing upon a hill; the scene in that poem being laid in Woodstock-Park. When disengaged from publick affairs, his time was entirely spent in study and walking: so agreeable to him was this exercise, that he says, he preferred it to all other sports and diversions. He lived within himself, neither desirous to hear, nor busy to concern himself with the affairs of his neighbours. His course of living was temperate and regular, he went to rest with the sun, and rose before it; and by that means enjoyed the pleasures of the better part of the day, his morning walk and fresh contemplations. This gave him the advantage of describing the morning in so lively a manner, as he does every where in his works: the springing sun glows warm in his lines, and the fragrant air blows cool in his descriptions; we smell the sweets of the bloomy haws, and hear the music of the feather'd choir, whenever we take a forest walk with him. The hour of the day is not easier to be discovered, from the reflexion of the sun in Titian's paintings, than in Chaucer's morning landscapes. 'Tis true, those descriptions are sometimes too long, and as it is before observed, when he takes those early rambles, he almost tires his reader with following him; and seldom knows how to get out of a forest, when once entered into it: but how advantageous this beautiful extravagance is, most of his successors well know, who have very plentifully lopt off his exuberant beauties, and placed them as the chief ornaments of their own writings.

- into the Duke's family, and was appointed Governess of his children (x). She had a sister whose name was Philippa, a great favourite likewise with the Duke and Duchefs, and by them therefore, as a mark of their great esteem, recommended to Chaucer for a wife (y). He married her about the year 1360, when he was in the flower of his age, and, as appears from a picture of him taken about that time, one of the handsomest persons about the Court (z). Of a complexion fair and beautiful, his lips very red and full, his size of a just proportion, his air very graceful and majestic. We live at too great a distance of time to be able to penetrate with certainty into the true motives of our author's match; but sure there is a great probability, that he was not unacquainted with the tenderness which his patron the Duke of Lancaster had for the Lady Swynford, by whom he had several children, who were afterwards legitimated by Act of Parliament (a). Yet this alliance was not the only tie he had upon that Prince, one of the most ambitious and artful men of his time, and always embarked in some State-intrigue or other, and therefore above all things fond of having men of parts and literature about him, of whom he might make use as occasion offered, and in which capacity as there was none more able, so it appears there were none did him greater service, than Chaucer (b). Being thus supported, we need not wonder that his fortunes made a very quick progress at Court, and accordingly we find very many marks of his Master King Edward's kindness towards him. As for instance, in the forty-first year of his reign, he granted him an annuity of twenty marks per annum out of the Exchequer (c). How mean soever such a pension may seem now, it was then very considerable, and in Chaucer's case was still the more valuable, as being an earnest of future favours. For not long after we find him Gentleman of the King's Privy-Chamber, and by that title the King granted to him, by Letters Patents dated in the forty-fifth year of his reign, the further sum of twenty marks per annum during his life (d). In this station he did not long continue, being next year made Shield-Bearer (e) to the King, a title at that time, though now extinct, of great honour, such persons being always next the King's person, and generally upon signal victories, rewarded with military honours. Neither were these all the instances he received of the King's attention to, and confidence in, him, for in the very same year, and by the same title, we find him commissioned, in conjunction with other persons, to treat with the Republick of Genoa (f); and accordingly thither he went, and actually managed a negotiation, concerning the subject of which, those who have written our author's Life make not the least mention, but seem to treat it as a matter, at this distance of time, altogether inexplicable. But it may from the History of that Prince's reign be very probably inferred, that Chaucer was sent to Genoa to hire ships for the King's navy; for in those times, though we frequently made great naval armaments, yet we had but very few ships of our own, and this defect was supplied, by hiring them from the free States either in Germany or Italy (g). In this negotiation our author succeeded so well, that upon his return home he received new marks of his Royal Master's favour, for, by letters patents dated at Windsor the 23d of April in the 48th year of his reign, his Majesty granted him a pitcher of wine daily in the Port of London, to be delivered by the Butler of England (h); and very soon after he was made Comptroller of the Customs in the Port of London, for wool, wool-fells, and hides, with a proviso that he should personally execute that office, and keep the accounts of it with his own hand (i). As this was a very lucrative, so it was a very reputable employment likewise, and as Chaucer was enriched by the profits of his post, so his reputation was very much increased by that diligence and integrity with which he discharged it. He values himself, as he had reason to do, very much upon his conduct in this office, which he affirms was never liable to any kind of imputation (k). And indeed it is highly probable that what he has delivered upon this subject is strictly true, for in the latter end of King Edward's reign there were great frauds and embezzlements committed in the customs, which by prosecutions were brought to publick view, but we do not find that in these Chaucer's name was so much as mentioned (l). About a year after he was in possession of this office, the King made him a grant of the lands and body of Sir Edmund Staplegate, son of Sir Edmund Staplegate of Kent, in ward, for which he received one hundred and four pounds (m), and other pecuniary advantages he had, which enabled him to raise altogether an income of one thousand pounds per annum, which was in those days a prodigious sum, and might well enable him to live, as he says he did, with dignity in office, and with good will amongst his neighbours (n). But as all these benefits arose chiefly from the favour in which he stood with the potent and ambitious Duke of Lancaster, so he became daily more and more involved in the political intrigues of that active and ambitious Prince. It is suggested by many of our Historians, that this Duke had cast a longing eye upon the Crown, and it is attributed to this, that about the time our author was sent to Genoa, the King declared in full Parliament, the young Prince Richard, the only surviving son of Edward the Black Prince, heir apparent to the Crown (o). But there seems to be a plainer and more natural reason for the King's taking this step, in which none more readily concurred than the Duke of Lancaster, and that was his own and his son's going abroad to carry on the war in France, upon which occasion it was requisite that the succession should be settled, and therefore the young Prince Richard was not only declared heir apparent, but the government of the kingdom was, nominally at least, entrusted with him, during the absence of his grandfather, his father, and uncles (p). But what seems to be a stronger proof proof of the Duke of Lancaster's innocence in this respect, was, his marrying, upon the decease of his Duchess Blanch, the Lady Constantia, daughter of Peter the Cruel, King of Castile and Leon, in whose right, upon the decease of her father, he assumed those royal titles (q). This must be allowed to be a mark of his ambition, and of his inclination to be a King, but at the same time it is a proof that he had another crown in view than that of England, and therefore to this we may well ascribe that device of his, of an eagle endeavouring with his bill to undo a footlock, which many of our writers, with more malignity than judgment, have construed, into a kind of treason (r). It is however true, that after the decease of his eldest brother Edward, the Black Prince, he was associated by his father in the government, and had the principal direction of publick affairs, which, considering his age, his experience, and his very near relation to the Crown (s), may be looked upon as a thing, rather natural than extraordinary. In this happy season of his life, when he enjoyed all the blessings this world could afford, Chaucer composed most of those gay and lively pieces, which were so much adapted to the humour of these times, and to that romantick spirit of love and fighting, which in those days was so much in vogue, and by which he acquired so great and so extensive a reputation for his wit, and for his capacity in writing (t) [F]. But it was not long before he found himself obliged to turn his thoughts to graver subjects, for his Patron, the Duke of Lancaster, having espoused the cause of Wickliffe, whom the Clergy considered as a heretick, Chaucer inclined the same way, and turned the edge of his satire against lazy Monks, ignorant Priests, and the insolence of such as belonged to Ecclesiastical Courts, with extraordinary success (u): Yet it does not at all appear, that he was an enemy to religion, or even to that of the Church of Rome; but rather the contrary, for he speaks very submissively of her doctrines; and bestows high characters upon such of the Clergy, as acted suitably to their calling; so that it was the ill men, who brought religion into contempt, and prostituted their own function in the vilest manner, that felt the severity of Chaucer's Muse, and not Priests in general, or the Christian Faith; for the former, he highly revered; and the latter, he firmly believed (w), as his writings plainly shew [G]. But how much soever Wickliffe's doctrines

[F] And for his capacity in writing.] We have already mentioned some of the performances of our author while a very young man, and also some of those pieces that he wrote to compliment the Duke of Lancaster and his Duchess. We will here take an opportunity of giving an account of some other pieces of his, that were wrote within the time of his greatest prosperity. The Complaint of Mary Magdalen, taken from Origen (27); was translated either before, or soon after his coming to Court; perhaps to oblige some pious lady of those times, as he wrote that which is called Chaucer's A. B. C. for the use of the Duchess Blanch. The Complaint of the Black Knight, was penned in honour of John of Gaunt's courtship of that lady, and is as elegant and harmonious a poem, as any of our author's composition; so that it is reasonable to believe, he took extraordinary pains about it; and perhaps it would be no unreasonable conjecture, if we should suppose, that it was written upon his first admission to the intimacy of that great Prince who is represented under the character of the Black Knight (28). The House of Fame is also a most admirable performance, as well in the construction of the fable, as in the ease and happiness of it's execution; of which there cannot be a higher testimony, than Mr Pope's borrowing from thence the model of his Temple of Fame; which will probably be esteemed, as long as there is either Taste or Poetry in this nation. The Assembly of Fowls was written while he was at Court, and before the death of King Edward's Queen, Philippa (29); and so was his Tale of the Cuckow and the Nightingale, in which, as was observed in the preceding note, the scene is visibly laid Woodstock-Park. He likewise wrote abundance of Elegies, Poems, or Ballads, in honour of Margaret Countess of Pembroke, and other Ladies of the Court; and as it is natural to suppose, that he was not the only person who wrote things of this kind; so by an accident common enough to great men, all of those pieces which have survived the injuries of time, are come down to us under the name of Chaucer, though it might be very easily proved that they are none of his. The Poem of Troilus and Creseide (30), was written in the former part of his life, and translated, as he says, from Lollius, an Historiographer of Urbano in Italy. He did not however content himself with making a close translation of his author, but, on the contrary, added many things of his own, and borrowed also from others, more especially his friend Petrarch, whatever he judged might render it acceptable to his reader.

That discourse of Predestination, which he has inserted in the fourth book is entirely his own; and from it, and from what he has delivered upon the same subject in the Nun's Priest's Tale, the very learned Sir Henry Savile thought, that he was no stranger to Archbishop Bradwardine's learned book de Causa Dei, published at that time (31). Sir Francis Knafton, who translated this poem into Latin rhimes, in his manuscript notes upon it, says, that it was not improbably conjectured, that Chaucer in writing the Lives and Loves of Troilus and Creseide, glanced at some private persons in the Court of King Edward III, and (32) did not follow Homer, Dares, Dictys, or any Historian of those times. However (says he) Chaucer has taken the liberty of his own inventions; he hath made an admirable and inimitable Epick Poem, describing in Troilus a compleat Knight in arms and courtship, and a faithful and constant lover; and in Creseide, a most beautiful and coy Lady, which being once overcome, yields to the frailty of her sex (33). We shall have occasion hereafter to speak more largely of this worthy person's performance, and of the pains he took to illustrate Chaucer, in which he equalled at least, if not exceeded, all, who have spent their time in doing justice to this great Poet.

[G] As his writings plainly shew.] The true design of our author, was not to expose or abuse the Clergy, from a dislike to their order, but quite the contrary, to amend and to reform them; and it was with this view, that he wrote many pieces, and translated others, that they might plainly perceive how much religion suffered by the monstrous irregularities in their behaviour. As for instance, the ROMAUNT of the ROSE, is a translation from the French. This poem was begun by William de Lorris, and continued by John Meung, commonly called Cloppinel, both famous French Poets in their time. It seems to have been translated by Chaucer while he was at Court, and about the time of the rise of Wickliffe's opinions, it consisting of violent invectives against the religious orders (34). It is left imperfect at the end, and there are some lacuna's in other places of it. It may not be amiss to observe here, that the original author of this work, William de Lorris, died in the year 1260, at the age of twenty-six, and advanced no great way therein; but forty years afterwards it was finished and published by John de Meung, when he was in his twenty-fourth year. He was a man of sense and learning, well versed in Divinity, Philosophy, Chemistry, Astronomy, and other sciences, but was a violent might prevail, or Chaucer's writings please among the better sort of people, and in the country; they were far enough from making a general impression on the minds of people in London, where the meaner sort of citizens, where so warmly attached to the Church, that upon the Duke of Lancaster's attending Wickliffe, when he was summoned before the Bishop of London, and treating that Prelate a little roughly, they made a kind of insurrection, and marching down into the Strand in a body, entered into and rifled the Savoy, which was the Duke of Lancaster's palace, built by himself, and at that time esteemed one of the finest houses in Europe, destroyed his goods, abused his servants, and turned his arms upside down, as if he had been a traitor; but by the care of the King, and the interposition of some of the principal Nobility, this quarrel was compromised, and the Duke and the Citizens reconciled, at least, in appearance (). In the last year of King Edward, the French having infringed the truce which that Monarch had concluded with them, Commissioners were sent over to expostulate that matter before the Pope's Legates; and of these, Chaucer was one. This negotiation of theirs was not very successful, only it produced some mention of a marriage between Richard, Prince of Wales (y), and the Lady Mary, daughter to the French King; and thereby made way for a new treaty, in which Sir Guiscard Dangle, Knight of the Garter, Sir Richard Sturrey, a great Wickliffite, and in high favour with the King, together with Geoffrey Chaucer, Esq; were Commissioners (z); and this seems to have been the last publick employment that our author bore, tho' from a gold chain about his neck, in that original picture of his, still remaining as is beforementioned, it has been not without some shew of reason conjectured, that he was honoured with some other dignity, than from any records we have been able to trace; for it can hardly be supposed, that he wore this ornament on account of his office in the Customs (a). June 21, 1377, the young Prince of Wales succeeded his grandfather, by the title of Richard II; and his uncle, the Duke of Lancaster considering the incapacity of the King, who was then but eleven years of age, was intrusted with the chief share of the administration; and therefore to ingratiate himself with the populace, he resolved to solemnize the new Monarch's Coronation with greater pomp and magnificence, than had been ever seen in this kingdom; previous to which, a Court of Claims was established, to settle the demands of those who should pretend to have a right to assist upon this occasion, and among these we find Geoffrey Chaucer (b) [H]. It appears plainly, that lent enemy to bad priests and bad women; he is supposed to have died about the year 1365 (35). This work is still much esteemed in France, where it has run through many editions; but the best which was published in Holland, is of a very fresh date (). Besides this, Chaucer is affirmed by Leland (36), and other ancient writers, to have been the author of the Plowman's Tale, which bears very hard upon the vices of the Clergy, both secular and regulars; and the satire under the title of Jack Upland (37), is also attributed to him upon very good authority; notwithstanding which, there want not many, who, under colour of veneration for Chaucer's memory, are desirous of imputing these pieces to others; and yet this would be of little use, for in many other works that are undoubtedly his, we find sentiments of the same nature. On the other hand, the venerable John Fox thinks the labour of our author in this respect, worthy the highest commendation; and even attributes the preservation of his works, to a particular providence. Let us hear him (38). 'I marvel to consider this, says he, how that the Bishops condemning and abolishing all manner of English books and treatises, which might bring the people to any light of knowledge, did yet authorize the works of Chaucer, to remain still and be occupied; who no doubt saw in religion, as much almost as ever we do now, and uttereth in his works no less; and seemeth to be a right Wicklevian, or else there was never any; and that all his works almost, if they be thoroughly advised will testify; (albeit it be done in mirth and covertly) and especially the latter end of his third book of the Testament of Love: for there purely he toucheth the highest matter, that is, the Communion; wherein, except a man be altogether blind, he may espy him at the full. Although in the same book (as in all other he useth to do) under shadows covertly, as under a vizor, he suborneth truth in such sort, as both privily she may profit the godly-minded, and yet not be espied of the crafty adversary. And therefore the Bishops belike, taking his words but for jests and toys, in condemning other books, yet permitted his books to be read. So it pleased God then to blind the eyes of them for the more commodity of his people, to the intent that through the reading of his treatises, some fruit might redound thereof to his Church, as no doubt it did to many. As also I am partly informed of certain which knew the parties, which to them reported, that by reading Chaucer's works they were brought to the true knowledge of religion: and not unlike to be true; for to omit the other parts of his volume, whereof some are more fabulous than other, what tale can be more plainly told, than the Tale of the Ploughman? &c.'

[H] And amongst these we find Geoffrey Chaucer.] The claim made upon this occasion, was in right of his ward, who was possessed of the manor of Bilsington in Kent (39); which was held of the Crown, by the service of presenting to the King three maple cups on the day of his coronation. This manor had been purchased by Sir Edmond Staplegate the father; of Richard Fitz-Allen, Earl of Arundel, whose family had been in long possession of it; and it was set forth in Chaucer's petition, that the manor was held by Grand Serjeantry, by the owner's discharging the office of Chief Butler at the King's coronation (40). But Richard Earl of Arundel controverted this claim, and by his petition and plea set forth, that the office of Chief Butler belonged to his family, and was never annexed to this manor, his ancestors having enjoyed it both before they held that manor, and since they parted with it, and therefore he demanded it as his proper right (41). The issue of this business was, that the Earl so far carried his point before John Duke of Lancaster, then acting as Lord High-Steward, as to be allowed to officiate for that time with a jaboo jure, that it should not infringe the right of Edmond Staplegate, or any who should pretend title for the future (42). This ward of our author died about thirteen years after, but the manor continued in the family till the beginning of the reign of Hen. VI. when it passed into that of the Cheyneys, who in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, sold it to Sir Francis Barham of London, and his grandson Mr Robert Barham was in possession of it at the coronation of King Charles II; when Mr Erasmus Smith, on the behalf of the said Mr Barham, assisted at the coronation, and presented the three maple cups (43). This manor has since passed into other families.

that the Duke of Lancaster, who was now in the zenith of power, let slip no opportunity of serving so firm a friend, and so useful a dependant, as our author was; for in the very beginning of this reign it appears, that by letters Patents, dated March 23, 1377, the King confirmed his grandfather's grant of twenty marks a year (c); and by other letters Patents, dated the 18th of April following, he likewise confirmed the other grant of a pitcher of wine daily (d); but whether Chaucer remained in his office of Comptroller of the Customs, is not so clear; tho' the contrary seems to be most probable, for in a short time after his affairs were in such confusion, that we find in the second year of King Richard, he was obliged to have recourse to the King's protection (e), in order to screen him from his creditors; but how he came to fall into these difficulties, and whether they were temporary only, or of a long continuance, is a point, that at this distance, it is not possible to ascertain; but from a comparison of circumstances, it seems to be most likely, that it was from some sudden accident he fell under this misfortune, and that he had recourse to the King's protection, merely to gain time to settle his concerns. One may be the more confirmed in this, by comparing his circumstances at this juncture, with those of his family soon after (f). We have no direct historical lights indeed, but methinks, tho' it be a new, it is still a probable conjecture, that about this time, he conveyed all his estates to his eldest son Thomas Chaucer; and the facts that seem to strengthen this conjecture, shall be submitted to the reader's judgment at the bottom of the page (g) [I]. In the fourth year of King Richard the II's reign, he procured a confirmation of the grants, that had been formerly made to himself, and to Philippa his wife (h), which is a proof, that he had a great personal interest in this Court; since at the time of his obtaining this grant, the power and influence of the Duke of Lancaster was very much sunk, as from a train of sinister accidents waiting upon his conduct, he was become equally suspected by the King, and disliked by the people. The great encouragement and support he had afforded to Mr Wickliffe, was attended with consequences, that he did not in the least expect, and yet found it not in his power to hinder; for without doubt, the Duke's great view in supporting this party, was to weaken the power of the Clergy, and to hinder them from taking so large a share, as they did in the management of all temporal affairs; but some great men of his party mistaking his view, pushed things to extremities, and by countenancing itinerant preachers, without either learning or sound principles, made way for a sudden turn, which had very near subverted the Constitution, and thrown all things into confusion (i). For the common people thus encouraged to shake off the yoke of the Clergy, began to think that of the government also too heavy; and taking occasion from some taxes lately imposed, rose up in arms under the conduct of Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and such kind of leaders, with a wild intention of freeing themselves from whatever these wise leaders taught them to look upon as oppressions (k). Their resentment was chiefly directed against the Clergy, as appears by their beheading the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Prior of St John's by Smithfield, who was Lord Treasurer; and by their burning that stately Priory, and plundering the Abbies of St Alban's, Bury, and several others (l). As soon as this rebellion was somewhat abated, the Parliament began to enquire into the cause of it, nor were there wanting enemies of Wickliffe, who charged him and his followers with being the encouragers of it. But that is unlikely to be

[I] At the bottom of the page.] All who have hitherto attempted to give any account of Chaucer's life, have been very much at a loss about this circumstance, of his having recourse to the King's protection; which shows, that in the very beginning of this reign, his affairs were in great disorder; and yet it is very plain, that himself and his patron flourished in the full possession of power and plenty, as long as King Edward the III'd lived (44). A certain writer hints, that Chaucer exhausted his fortune in his foreign embassies (45); but a later writer observes with greater probability, that he made his fortune by them; yet as he very justly remarks, this by no means solves the doubt how he should come to be so very poor in so short a time, after his possessing so great wealth (46); for which amongst others, we have his own authority (47). Now this riddle I think, may be very probably explained thus. Our author, Chaucer, about this time, found out a very considerable match for his eldest son Thomas Chaucer, and this was Maud, the second daughter of Sir John Burghershe, a man of very considerable rank, but by no means brother to Sir Bartholomew Burghershe, Knight of the Garter, and of Dr Henry Burghershe, Bishop of Lincoln, Chancellor and Treasurer of England, as a certain writer very confidently asserts (48), but rather, if I guess right, the nephew of those great men, and the son of Sir John Burghershe, who was truly their brother; and this I am led to believe, because it appears upon record, that the custody of this John Burghershe, the father of Maud, was granted in his nonage to the daughter of Sir Bartholomew Burghershe beforementioned (49). A great fortune she was without doubt, but not the only daughter or sole heiress of her family, as has been represented, or at least not so at the time she married Thomas Chaucer, though she might be, and indeed was so afterwards. Neither are we to believe what we are told, of her being a ward to the crown (50), for her father was then living, and lived many years after, that is, to the nineteenth of Richard II. when he left behind him two daughters; Margaret the eldest, first married to Sir John Grenville, Knight, and then to John Arundel, Esq; and this Maud (51). Now my supposition is, that Geoffrey Chaucer, for obtaining this great match, settled all his land estate upon his son; and that his doing this might bring upon him those demands, which put him under the necessity of obtaining the King's protection. As to the several facts upon which this conjecture is built, I think they are supported by as good authorities as can be desired; nor can any great difficulty arise from the age of this young gentleman, as may appear thus. Chaucer married his wife Philippa Rouet about the year 1360, and if he had this son the next year, he might be of full age in the latter end of the fourth year of Richard II. when this marriage took place; and before which, in all probability, the father might make this settlement (52). We shall have occasion hereafter to say more of this gentleman, who became a much greater man than his father, to whom he was a support in his declining years.

be true; for had the rebels been Wickliffe's friends, they would never have burnt the Savoy, the palace of his Patron, the Duke of Lancaster. However, some of his followers gave too much cause for such a surmise, as Dr Hereford, who asserted, that Archbishop Sudbury deserved that death he found; and the King the year following impowered the Bishops to arrest Wickliffe, and forbid his subjects to encourage any of that persuasion. Yet Wickliffe appeared, and seemed partly to satisfy the Bishops with his opinion (m). It is commonly said by most of our Historians, that from this time forward the Duke of Lancaster disowned the Wicklevites, and charging the late disturbances upon them, stiled their opinions, the Doctrine of Devils. The writers also of our author's life give into this opinion, and seem to think, that he likewise began to temporize, and did not speak his sentiments so freely as formerly; but the truth is otherwise, for the Duke of Lancaster did not condemn Wickliffe's doctrine, but the doctrines of Dr Hereford, and other followers of Wickliffe, who had now deserted him, and propagated many dangerous tenets, which he disclaimed (n). As for Chaucer, he was so far from abandoning his former notions, that he exerted himself to the utmost in 1382, in the support of John Comberton, generally stiled John of Northampton, Mayor of London, in his endeavours, to reform the city, according to the advice given by Wickliffe, which was so much resented by the Clergy (o), that rather than they would let this Reformation proceed, they had recourse to the most violent methods; and in order to prevent Comberton's being rechosen Mayor of London, excited such disturbances as bordered upon a rebellion. The King making use of force upon this occasion, sent Sir Robert Knolles to London, who committed great severities, put some to death, made the late Mayor Comberton prisoner, and used his utmost endeavours to apprehend Chaucer (p) [K]. But our author, having an early foresight of his danger, made his escape into Hainault; and from thence went to France, where finding himself not so safe as he expected, he withdrew into Zealand, and there concealed himself for some time, with several other Londoners, who had fled upon the same account, and whom he generously subsisted out of his own private fortune (q). But while he was in this distress, most of those with whom he had been engaged at home, had found ways and means to make their peace; and far from considering the calamities to which Chaucer had exposed himself for their sakes, took no care to supply him; and, which was much worse, endeavoured to hinder the remittances that might have been made him out of his own fortune; and this, in hopes that he might perish in his banishment, and by his death put them out of all fear. Such base and barbarous ingratitude, tho' it extremely afflicted him, yet it did not put our author upon taking any measures to be revenged; on the contrary, he came over privately into England, to avoid starving in a strange country; but had not been long here before, either through the vigilance of the government's enquiries, or the treachery of some whom he trusted, he was discovered, seized, and sent to prison, where he was treated at first, with great rigour and severity, but in the end, promised the King's pardon, and his liberty, if he would disclose all he knew, and put it in the power of the government to restore the peace of the city; which, at length he did. It does not appear, what the consequences were of his confession, with respect to others; but with regard to himself, they brought upon him an inexpressible load of calumnies and slanders. All these circumstances, we learn from himself, in that most excellent treatise of his, intituled, the Testament of Love; which he wrote on purpose to vent his sorrow, and to console himself under the heavy burthen

(q) These circumstances are all collected from our author's Testament of Love.

[K] His utmost endeavours to apprehend Chaucer. It is very certain, that in this whole matter our author suffered for his attachment to his party; but this is so darkly represented by such as have written his life, that it is a very difficult thing to discover their meaning (53); and yet after all, the fact is no more than this. There were at that time two powerful factions in the city; and as very seldom any thing of this kind happens, but religion is drawn into the quarrel, so the one was supposed to be well affected to the Church, and the other inclined to a reformation. Dr Courtney, formerly Bishop of London, and now Archbishop of Canterbury, was protector of the one, and John Duke of Lancaster was esteemed to be the head of the other; and the leading man in his interest was this John Comberton, or John of Northampton, Citizen and Draper; on whose account all this disturbance happened, for which some lives were lost; and this unfortunate person being carried to Reading, was there tried and convicted, and had judgment given against him to be imprisoned for life, and to have his goods seized, which we find was accordingly done: and so strong the current ran at that time, that he with some other citizens of his party, were excepted out of a pardon which the King granted; and all this was then understood, to be done in spite and contempt of the Duke of Lancaster, to whom Comberton steadily adhered, and called him his Lord at his trial (54). But for all this, things came about again not long after, and Mr Comberton had the honour to have his sentence reversed, at the prayer of the Commons of England in Parliament assembled (55). We may from all this infer, that how warm and indiscreet soever our author Chaucer might be, in supporting that party to which he had attached himself, yet beyond all question there was nothing of disloyalty in this, but quite the contrary; for those who had then the management of the King's affairs, and run him into all these warm and violent measures, were the very same persons, who by their evil counsels brought him at last into that distressed condition, which cost him first his crown, and then his life. It is therefore no discredit to Chaucer, that he was a friend to Wickliffe, or that he espoused this party in the city, however some of our historians may have represented, or rather misrepresented it; for it is a thing well enough known to all who are conversant in the English history, that many base and black calumnies are thrown upon the Duke of Lancaster and his party, merely on account of their opposing the pride and power of the Prelates (56) of those times; who under colour of maintaining the King's prerogative, really sacrificed him to their own interests, which at the same time also they very ill understood; since a reasonable compliance had both saved him, and done themselves much more good (57).

this great man, that in whatever light he is considered, he seems always to merit our esteem as well as to claim our admiration. In his publick character, if we consider the time in which he lived, we must acknowledge that he shewed as great steadiness, and adhered as firmly to his principles as could be expected; and as to his gratitude towards, and affection for, his patron, the great Duke of Lancaster, it stands in no need of apology. His conduct in the last part of his life was full of prudence, and that calm contempt for an ungrateful world, which, though it is easy for a man of parts to conceive, yet to persist in it, is a very difficult task. In private life he was a fine gentleman, a learned writer, and an agreeable companion. In his youth he was gay, and loved pleasure, for which he might not only plead the usual excuses of his age and constitution, but the custom also of the times, since he lived in the most gallant reign from the Conquest. But in his maturer state of life his manners altered, and his behaviour was modest and grave to a degree of excess, for which he was rallied by his patroness the Countess of Pembroke, who told him his absence created more mirth than his conversation, for he was very bashful and reserved in company, notwithstanding that life and spirit which appears in his writings. If we look upon him as an author, he may be truly stiled the Father of English Poetry, and perhaps the Prince of it, for except the unavoidable defects of language, his works have still all the beauties that can be wished for or expected, in every kind of composition (x). He was not unacquainted with the antient rules of Poetry, nor was he incapable of writing up to them, as very clearly appears by the Knight's Tale, which, as Mr Dryden very justly says, is a finished Epick Poem, but he did not always judge this exactness necessary, and perhaps he thought his genius set him above those restraints that ought to limit, because they improve, the works of meaner Poets. He was deeply versed in Moral and Natural Philosophy, and as perhaps no man understood human nature better, so it may be truly said that no writer in any language has either painted it with greater force, exactness, or judgment. His reading was deep and extensive, and his learning both specious and solid; for he knew how to expose those parts of it to view that are most apt to attract publick applause, and yet leave a sense concealed, that might at once employ and satisfy the most inquisitive understandings (y). It would draw this article into too great a length, should we persist in exhibiting every part of his accomplished character, and therefore we will in the notes give the best account we may of his merit in general as a Poet, in all the different kinds of writing by which he distinguished himself in that capacity [R]; and next we will give the reader the clearest account we may of his largest work, peculiar in it's kind, and as it was almost without example, so hitherto above the reach of imitation, I mean his

Edward III. which contradicts all the records, and is in every respect a most glaring absurdity; whereas, the other date agrees with them exactly, and therefore, there can be no doubt of it's truth.

[R] By which he distinguished himself in that capacity. We may safely affirm, that of Chaucer, which can be hardly said of any other general Poet, ancient or modern, that he excelled in all the different kinds of verse, in which he wrote. In his Sonnets, or Love Songs, when he was but a very boy, there is not only fire and judgment, but great elegance of thought and neatness of composition. It is very true, that he did not always stand upon his own ground, but chose rather to translate from the Italian or French; yet he chose his authors judiciously, and used them freely; so that this, instead of sinking, serves really to heighten his character. That in the elegiack Poetry, he was a compleat master, appears plainly by his Complaint of the Black Knight, the Poem called, La belle Dame sans Mercy, and several of his songs. He was an excellent master of Love Poetry, having studied that passion in all it's turns and appearances; and Mr Dryden prefers him upon that account to Ovid. His Troilus and Cresseide is one of the most beautiful Poems of that kind, in which love is curiously and naturally described in it's early appearance, it's hopes and fears, it's application, fruition, and despair in disappointment. How great a master he was in satire, we shall have occasion to show in the next note; but his great proficiency in this, did not at all hinder his discharging himself most happily, in a far more difficult way of writing, that of panegyrick. The praises of Chaucer are easy, natural, and delicate, such as must give equal pleasure to the person commended and to the peruser, and have always the true air of a courtier, without the meanness of a flatterer. His moral Poems are grave and weighty, full of good sense and of fine sentiments. In a word, he deserves all that is said of him by Mr Dryden, who was scarce a better Poet than a Critick; let us hear him then a little upon this subject. 'As he is the Father of English Poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer, or the Romans Virgil: he is a perpetual fountain of good sense, learned in all sciences, and therefore speaks properly on all subjects: as he knew what to say, so he knows also when to leave off, a continence which is practised by few writers, and scarcely by any of the Ancients, excepting Virgil and Horace. — Chaucer followed nature every where, but was never so bold to go beyond her: and there is a great difference of being Poëta & nimis Poëta, if we may believe Catullus, as much as betwixt a modest behaviour and affectation. The verse of Chaucer, I confess, is not harmonious to us, but it is like the eloquence of one whom Tacitus commends, it was auribus istius temporis accommodata: they who lived with him, and some time after him, thought it musical, and it continues so even in our judgment, if compared with the numbers of Lidgate and Gower, his contemporaries: there is the rude sweetness of a Scotch tune in it, which is natural and pleasing, tho' not perfect. It is true, I cannot go so far as he who published the last edition of him, for he would make us believe, the fault is in our ears, and that there are really ten syllables in a verse, where we find but nine; but this opinion is not worth confuting; it is so gross and obvious an error, that common sense (which is a rule in every thing but matters of faith and revelation) must convince the reader, that equality of numbers in every verse, which we call heroick, was either not known or not always practised in Chaucer's age: it were an easy matter to produce some thousands of his verses, which are lame for want of half a foot, and some times a whole one, and which no pronunciation can make otherwise. We can only say, that he lived in the infancy of our Poetry, and that nothing is brought to perfection at the first. We must be children before we grow men. There was an Ennius; and in process of time, a Lucilius; and a Lucretius before Virgil and Horace; even after Chaucer, there was a Spenser, a Harrington, a Fairfax, before Waller and Denham were in being: and our numbers were in their nonage, 'till these last appeared.'

(z) Mr Dryden, in the Preface to his Fables.

CANTERBURY TALES (z) [S]. We have already, in the course of his memoirs, spoken of most of his Patrons, who were the greatest, as well as ablest, men, of those times. The circle of his friends was also very large, and his communicative disposition made him as much beloved by his contemporaries, as he was admired both by them and by posterity. He appears to have been useful to them in every manner that was in his power, and it was this disposition in all probability that kept them so firm to his interest while he was living, and taught them to have so high a respect for his memory after his decease. It is no difficult thing to compile a list of them from his writings, in which he has mentioned them with all the marks of kindness and esteem possible, a circumstance favourable to himself and to them, for in this Poets have the advantage even of Princes, the latter how great soever can confer only temporary benefits, but the former can bestow immortality, and therefore Princes themselves have courted, not perhaps without political reasons, the good will of these favourites of the Muses. But we are apt to suspect their praises, when applied to their Patrons of high rank, more than their commendations of private friends. The former is commonly dictated by the head, whereas the latter flows from the heart, and this consideration alone makes it reasonable, that we should insist more particularly on those whom our author has thus consigned to fame. But in order to spare the reader's time, we shall mention only a very few of Chaucer's intimate friends and contemporaries, at the bottom of the page [T]. That general applause with which his writings were received in his life-

[S] I mean his Canterbury Tales. The scheme of this work is in every respect very extraordinary, and of so vast an extent, that at first sight, one would be apt to pronounce it absolutely impracticable, from a persuasion that it must surpass the powers of any single mind to paint the different lineaments, and call out to view the various faculties of every mind. The truth, as well as meaning of this sentiment, will best appear from a short representation of the author's design, which is this: Chaucer pretends, that intending to pay his devotions to the shrine of Thomas à Becket: he set up his horse at the Tarbard Inn in Southwark. That he found in the Inn a number of Pilgrims, who severally proposed the same journey; and that they all agreed to sup together, and to set out the next morning on the same party. The supper being finished, the landlord, a fellow of sense and drollery, conformable to his character and calling, makes them no disagreeable proposal: That to divert them on their journey, each of them should be obliged to tell two stories, one going, the other coming back, and that whoever in the judgment of the company should succeed best in this art of tale-telling, by way of recompence, at their return to his inn, should be intitled to a good supper at the common cost; which proposal assented to, he promises to be their Governor and Guide. At the entrance of the Poem, the characters of all the Pilgrims are distinctly drawn, and a plan of the Comedy, in which they stand for the Dramatis Personæ. Besides this, every Tale has it's Prologue, and a kind of Epilogue too, which serves by way of transition to the next; and to the honour of our author be it spoken, so far as his plan is executed, every part of it is performed with equal justice and spirit; and above all, the character of the Host, who acts as a kind of Chorus in the ancient Drama, is most admirably kept up, and the same wit, spirit, and humour, is preserved through the whole journey, that strikes and astonishes the reader so much at the very beginning, where the original character of this incomparable person is drawn at full length. A stronger argument in support of this character of the Canterbury Tales, cannot well be brought, than arises from the authority of three great Poets, who have judged them worthy of imitation and revival, I mean Spenser, Dryden, and Pope, to whom we may add, Mr Betterton, who translated many of the characters of Chaucer, and must have been allowed to have been as fit a judge of them, as any of the foregoing. But the reader will receive the fullest satisfaction on this head, from the critical remarks of Mr Dryden, who, as he perfectly understood, so he has very freely given us his sentiments on this master-piece of our author's. 'He must, says he, have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because, as it has been truly observed of him, he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury Tales, the various manners and humours, as we now call them, of the whole English nation in his age. Not a single character had escaped him. All his Pilgrims are severally distinguished from each other, and not only in their inclinations, but in their very physiognomies and persons. Baptista Porta could not have described their natures better, than by the marks which the Poet gives them. The matter and manner of their tales and of their telling, are so suited to their different educations, humours, and callings, that each of them would be improper in any other mouth. Even the grave and serious characters are distinguished by their several sorts of gravity; their discourses are such as belong to their age, their calling, and their breeding; such as are becoming of them, and of them only. Some of his persons are vicious, and some virtuous; some are unlearned (or as Chaucer calls them) lewd, and some are learned. Even the ribaldry of the low characters is different: the Reeve, the Miller, and the Cook, are several men, and distinguished from each other, as much as the miming Lady Priores and the broad speaking gap-tooth'd wife of Bath. But enough of this: there is such a variety of game springing up before me, that I am distracted in my choice, and know not which to follow. It is sufficient to say, according to the proverb, that here is God's plenty. We have our forefathers and great grand-dames all before us, as they were in Chaucer's days; their general characters are still remaining in mankind, and even in England, though they are called by other names, than those of Monks and Friars, of Chanons, and Lady Abbesses, and Nuns: for mankind is ever the same, and nothing lost out of nature, tho' every thing is altered.' — Boccace lived in the same age with Chaucer, had the same genius, and followed the same studies: both writ novels, and each of them cultivated his mother tongue.' — In the serious part of Poetry, the advantage is wholly on Chaucer's side, for tho' the Englishman has borrowed many tales from the Italian, yet it appears, that those of Boccace were not generally of his own making, but taken from authors of former ages, and by him only modelled; so that what was of invention in either of them, may be judged equal. But Chaucer has refined on Boccace, and has mended the stories, which he has borrowed in his way of telling, tho' prose allows more liberty of thought, and the expression is more easy, when unconfined by numbers. Our countryman carries weight, and yet wins the race at disadvantage.'

[T] At the bottom of the page. Amongst the earliest of Chaucer's friends, and also directors of his studies, were Nicholas of Lynne and John Some (74), both Carmelite Monks, and extremely well versed in Mathematical sciences, the former more especially, who left behind him several learned books, and is commended by Leland as having excelled in Astronomy all that went before him (75). We have before mentioned Ralph Strode, who was both a celebrated Poet and Philosopher of Merton college in Oxford, where it seems our author was intimately acquainted with him, and had a great veneration for his abilities (76). It is a strange error which the author of the Life of Chaucer, prefixed to Mr Urry's edition, has fallen into, with regard to Strode, who, he says, was a great follower of Wickliffe (77), which is so far from being true, that he was one of the warmest writers against him, for which he is heavily censured by Bale (78), and as highly commended by Pits (79). It is very probable that life-time, and the high honours that were paid him by such as took a pride in stiling themselves his disciples, after his death, stamped such a mark of authority upon his Works (a), as saved at least the greatest part of them from that oblivion, which has covered the performances even of the most celebrated authors of his time. In spite of that spirit of envy which his free and severe satires excited in the Clergy, in spite of his own retraction (whether genuine or fictitious (b) is uncertain), in spite of that authority which the Church afterwards acquired, not of censuring only, but of condemning and prohibiting what books they pleased, his writings have escaped, and not barely escaped, but have been held in the greatest honour, and transmitted to posterity with such care and circumspection, and by the united labours of so many eminent persons (c), as will do lasting honour to his memory, and plainly prove, that true genius, extensive learning, and a free spirit, are capable of commanding reverence through all ages, and preserving that transcendent esteem, which is and ought to be the peculiar reward of superior merit [U]. We are not however to suppose, that with all these great qualifications, Chaucer could entirely escape the fury of false Criticks, neither would it have been very much perhaps to his honour if he had, inasmuch as all great Poets, ancient and modern, have been so generally infested by these cavillers, that they seem to be the necessary attendants of an exalted reputation, and, like the slaves in a Roman triumph, make unwillingly an addition to that glory they meant to shade. Those who have attacked Chaucer have not presumed to question his wit, for of this perhaps no writer of our nation ever had more, neither have they disputed his poetical abilities, which certainly set his on a level with the greatest names in antiquity; nor have they dared to throw any aspersion on his learning, the extent of which is not greater than the masterly degree of propriety with which it is every where applied: but the point to which they object, is his changing, debasing, or corrupting our language (d), by introducing foreign words, as if the worth of all languages did not arise from their being thus enlarged and compounded, or as if Chaucer could have hurt the jargon of his time, which was not either that Wickliffe and Chaucer were very good friends, as they both owed the eminence of their respective stations to the same Patron, John Duke of Lancaster (80). Sir John Gower, an eminent Lawyer, Poet, and Philosopher, was also Chaucer's intimate companion, as appears from both their writings; the former was blind before the latter died, and survived him only two years (81). But Thomas Occleve, or Hockliffe, a very ingenious man, and a celebrated writer, was a great favourite of our author's, and imitated him in his manner of writing. We are indebted to him for preserving Chaucer's picture, which he caused to be drawn in his book, de Regimine Principis, and which he dedicated to King Henry V, and it is very evident from the verses which refer to that picture, that Chaucer had been a long time dead before he composed that work (82). Another scholar of his was the famous John Lydgate, a Monk of Bury, who celebrates our author's memory and writings in many of his pieces (83), and who outlived him forty years. Schogan also, who distinguished himself by his sarcastical wit, was a professed admirer and imitator of Chaucer; but, as Leland observes, if Chaucer, who sometimes stiles Gower his Master, excelled him in the spirit and elegance of his verses, Schogan, who acknowledged Chaucer for his Master (84), was so far from doing the like that he fell much below him. Yet such in all ages has been the proneness of mankind to encourage even the coarsest sort of satire, that Schogan wanted not his admirers, how little soever he resembled Chaucer. It is believed that he was personally acquainted with the celebrated Petrarch (85), but that he was perfectly master of his writings, and those of Boccace, is incontestible.

[U] And ought to be the peculiar reward of superior merit.] It must be allowed by all who are proper judges, that the excellence attributed to Chaucer's writings by such Poets as came nearest his own times, did not arise in any degree either from custom or complaisance, but, on the contrary, was equally well founded in reason and on matter of fact; so that if we examine the sentiments we shall find them more noble, shall discover a greater compass in his learning, and, above all, an harmonious sweetness in his verse, far beyond any thing that is to be met with in any poetical compositions for a whole century after his time. This is very candidly acknowledged by a stranger, who had as good a right as any to dispute it, I mean that excellent old Poet of Scotland (86) Gawin Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld. Indeed Chaucer's reputation was as well established in Scotland as in England, and I will take upon me to say, that he was as much the Father of Poetry in that country as in this. It would render this note tedious to attempt giving a detail of the several printed editions of our author's Works, it will be sufficient to refer the reader to a place where this may be found (87). Caxton, the Father of English Printers, first printed many of Chaucer's Works, and printed them several times. In the reign of Henry VIII, William Botteville, alias Thynne, Esq; was the editor of a new edition of Chaucer, which, in a very elegant discourse, he addressed to King Henry VIII (88). In the same reign the industrious and learned Leland, was a studious reader, and a most zealous admirer, of the Works of Chaucer, in whose honour he wrote not one only, but three copies of commendatory verses (89). The same tribute of praise was bestowed upon our author, by that excellent writer, and great judge of elegance in all kind of writing, Roger Ascham (90), to whom we may add Sir Philip Sidney (91), who very judiciously observes, that it was equally strange to him, that Chaucer should see so clearly in so milky a time, and that in brighter ages men should go to stumblingly after him. About this time Mr Speght, by the assistance of the inoffensive John Stowe, published a new edition of our author's Works (92), which were dedicated to Sir Robert Cecil, afterwards Earl of Salisbury; and another still more complete edition was promised by Mr Francis Thynne, which never appeared. We have mentioned the commendations given him by the laborious John Fox (93), and the most learned Camden (94). We must add to these the numerous testimonies of the immortal Spenser (95), and the judicious Apology of the supposed levities in Chaucer's Works, by Mr Francis Beaumont (96). The celebrated Sir Henry Savile (97), mentions him with the highest respect; and the great Mr Selden (98) has given us a noble specimen of that profound learning of which he was master, in justifying an epithet of our author's. Sir Francis Kynaston of Otely of Shropshire, published the first and second books of a Latin version of Troilus and Creseide, and completed his translation of, and notes upon, the other three; and from some specimens that are extant in the Glossary at the end of Mr Urry's edition, the world may well perceive, how valuable a performance we are deprived of, by the loss or concealment of his manuscript (99). It would be needless to swell this note with other particulars, but if some able hand would resume the design of the late ingenious Mr Ogle, and give us his Canterbury Tales in modern English, with a proper body of notes, there is no doubt that it would meet with a favourable reception.

Saxon, Norman, or French, but a mixture of all, by introducing words derived from the sweetest and smoothest language then used throughout Europe, I mean the Provencal (e). It is however just to observe, that this reflection never made any great impression, and that with the best and most elegant writers in our tongue, Chaucer passes not only for a great improver, but for the very Father and Founder of it; and it is not a little to his honour, that amongst those who are of this opinion we may reckon one of the soundest of our Criticks (f), and one of the correctest writers in our language (g). So wide the difference is between the narrow notions of false Wits, and the fair and candid judgments that are given by the true [W]. We cannot close this article better, than by giving a succinct detail of our author's family, or, to speak with greater propriety, of his eldest son, for as to his second son Lewis, we have no account in what station he lived, or where he died. But as to Thomas Chaucer, the office of Chief Butler to the King, granted to him in the last year of Richard II, was afterwards given him for life by Letters Patents from King Henry IV (b), and confirmed by Henry VI. In the second year of Henry IV, we find him Speaker of the House of Commons, Sheriff of Oxfordshire and of Berkshire, and Constable of Wallingford-castle, and of Knareborough-castle, during life. In the fourth year of the same reign the King directed an order to him, as Chief Butler, to deliver one hundred tons of wine to the Duke of Burgundy. In the sixth year of the same Prince he was sent Ambassador into France, and the year following he went beyond the seas, joined in commission with the King's brother, and Geoffry Chaucer's nephew, Henry Beaufort Bishop of Winchester. In the ninth year of the same reign, on Tuesday the twenty-fifth of October, the Commons presented him their Speaker; as they did likewise in the eleventh year, on Wednesday the twenty-eighth of January. In the twelfth year of that reign, Queen Jane granted to him, for his good service, the manors of Woodtock, Hannebrough, Wotton, and Stantesfield, during life; and in the thirteenth year, on the fifth of November, he was again presented Speaker, as he was in the second of Henry V, on Wednesday the second day of Parliament. And in the same year he was sent by the King, in joint commission with Hugh Mortimer, to treat of a marriage with Katharine, daughter to the Duke of Burgundy. He was likewise Ambassador in the fifth and sixth years of the same reign, with Walter Hungerford, Steward of the Household, in the same affair; and again in the sixth year of the same reign, he was Ambassador for peace with France; and he passed through several other publick stations, as appears by Records (i). He resided chiefly at Ewelme in Oxfordshire, which came to him by marriage, and there he died on the twenty-eighth of April 1434, and was buried in that parish-church under a black marble tomb (k). By his wife Maud, or Matilda, who survived him two years, he had one daughter named Alice, who was thrice married, first to Sir John Philips, Knt. and afterwards to Thomas Montacute Earl of Salisbury, who dying, left her very rich. Her third husband was the famous William de la Pole, Earl, and afterwards Duke of Suffolk, who was first secretly married to the Countess of Hainault, by whom he had one daughter, but procuring a divorce from her, he married this Alice by whom he had one son, John Duke of Suffolk (l). Duke William lived chiefly at Dunnington and Ewelme, at the first of which Stowe says he built an Hospital; but he seems to mistake it for that founded by Adderbury, as beforementioned, for Dugdale takes no notice of any other, but at Ewelme he founded one called God's House. He was an instance of the danger of a Prince's favour, and the envy that attends it; for, influencing the notions and the will of his Master Henry VI too much, and abusing the power he had over that easy Prince, he enraged the Commons to that degree, that nothing less than his banishment could appease them, which being agreed to, the Yorkists, fearful of his return, seized him on his passage in Dover-Road, and cut off his head upon the side of a cock-boat, and his body was buried at the Charter-House at Hull (m). The Duchess survived him several years, and, after an honourable life, died at Ewelme in the year 1475. Their son John had issue, according to Leland (n), John Earl of Lincoln, Edmund, afterwards Duke of Suffolk; Richard, William, and a fifth son, who was a scholar in Gonvil-Hall in Cambridge. Edmund de la Pole, the last of that name Duke of Suffolk, for being in treason against Henry VII, for which he had been once pardoned, forfeited his life to the Crown, and was beheaded in the seventh year of that King's reign, whereby the estates which Chaucer's family was possessed of came to the Crown, and particularly the Hospital of Ewelme, which was by King James I. bestowed on the Physick Professor at Oxford, who is always Master thereof in virtue of his office (o).

[W] And the fair and candid judgments that are given by the true.] The first writer that ventured to fall upon our author was himself more than half a foreigner, and very far from being correct with respect to sentiment or stile. His very charge in the present case will prove what I have advanced (100). 'The Poet, Geoffry Chaucer (says he) writing his Poesies in English, is of some called the first Illuminator of the English tongue. Of their opinion I am not, tho' I reverence Chaucer as an excellent Poet for his time. He was indeed a great mingler of English with French, unto which language (by like, for that he was descended of French, or rather Walloon race) he carried a great affection.' But Dr Skinner (101), in a very elegant Latin style, has attacked our author with much more spirit and force; I shall give his words in English: 'The Poet Chaucer set the worst example, who by bringing whole shoals of French words into our language, which was but too much adulterated before, through the effects of the Norman conquest, deprived it almost wholly of it's native grace and splendor, laying on paint over it's pure complexion, and for a beautiful face, substituted a downright mask.'

burden of his afflictions [L]. This load, which was already almost too heavy for him, received however some very considerable additions from the concurrence of other untoward accidents; such as the Duke of Lancaster's losing much of his credit at Court; and Chaucer, not a little of his interest with the Duke, who finding his reputation very much injured by the liberties taken with his character, on account of his amours with the Lady Swynford, he came, tho' very unwillingly, to a full resolution of parting with her; which he accordingly did: and this, for a time, affected the concerns of our author extremely, who finding himself strongly pushed on one side, by such as meant him ill; and little, if at all, supported on the other, by such as had been formerly his friends, was so much depressed thereby in his mind, and distressed in his fortune, as to resolve upon disposing of his pensions beforementioned, which he had obtained in the former, and had been confirmed to him in the present reign; and this he actually did, to one John Scalby, as appears by a licence obtained for this purpose, on record (r). In this unexpected and terrible reverse of fortune, he very wisely resolved to quit that busy scene of life, in which he had met with so many troubles, and to seek in retirement, that happiness, which from experience he knew was not to be met with in Courts. The place he chose for his retreat was Woodstock, which had been the sweet scene of so much satisfaction to him in the days of his prosperity, and there he employed part of his time in revising and correcting his writings, totally secluded from the world, and taking only those calm and solid pleasures, which are the result of a wise man's reflections on the vicissitudes of human life (s). By this means he became well prepared for a new alteration in his condition, and as unexpected a change in his affairs as he had hitherto met with, for the absence of the great Duke of Lancaster, which had cost him so dear, gave him the better title to hope his favour and his protection upon his return, which happened towards the end of the year 1389 (t). He had made an expedition into Spain, in order to recover the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, of which, in right of his wife, he had assumed the title, and though his success in war was at first various, and at last disastrous, yet so wise and prudent a Prince he was, that after dismissing his army, and seeming to relinquish that great design, for the accomplishment of which he had spent so much, he had notwithstanding so great address, as to be able to extract, even from his disappointment, almost as much as he could have expected from victory, for though he could not make himself a King, yet he made two of his daughters Queens, one of Castile, and the other of Portugal, bringing home with him also a vast treasure in ready money, having, at the time he landed in England, as one of our Historians tells us, as many chests of gold as loaded forty-seven mules (u). Upon his return in so good circumstances, his party began to revive, and the Duke recovered his credit at Court, inasmuch that the King, in full Parliament, created him Duke of Aquitaine, and sent him over to take possession of that noble principality (w). His old affection for the Lady Catharine Swynford, sister to Chaucer's wife, revived with his fortune, and under colour of rewarding the care she had taken in the education of his daughters, he made her very large grants in the nature of pensions (x) [M]. We have no particular account

[L] Under the heavy burthen of his afflictions.] There cannot be a better account given of this, which is the most important of our author's works in prose, than by transcribing the Rubrick that stands before it, and which runs thus (58):

' This book is an imitation of Boccius de Consolatione Philosophice. I. In the first part whereof Love, by way of legacy, bequeaths to all them that follow her instructions, the knowledge of truth from error, whereby they may rightly judge of the causes that cross fortune. and such adversities as befall them, whether in their suits of Love, or otherwise, and so in the end obtain their wished desires. II. In the second part she teacheth the knowledge of one very God our Creator, as also the state of Grace, and the state of Glory, all which good things are figured by a Margarite Pearl. Chaucer compiled this book as a comfort to himself, after great griefs conceived for some rash attempts of the Commons, with whom he had joined, and thereby was in fear to lose the favour of his best friends, and also therein to set an end to all his writing, being commanded by Venus (as appears by Gower at the end of the eighth book, intituled Confessio Amantis) so to do, as one that was Venus Clerk; even as Gower had made his Confessio Amantis, his last work and shrift of his former offences.' As one of the great excellencies of all our author's compositions in verse or prose, is, an easy, natural, and unaffected manner of writing, allowing for the usage of the times in which he lived, which in all ages has been beld a kind of law even to the best and ablest authors; so in this work these qualities are very remarkable, for one plainly sees a great Philosopher broken by misfortunes, deserted by companions, and exposed to the censures of an evil world, delivering himself in a prison with freedom and spirit, though in a melancholy mood, and in the language of sorrow; painting in the boldest colours his own mistakes, as well as those of others, and pointing out the sole remedies that are left, when a man is abandoned by fortune and by friends. Such is the nature of this performance, in which we have a clear and perfect representation of his condition, and may enter as fully into all the causes of his private griefs, which were also those of the public disorders of his time, as if we actually sat by him in the prison, and heard him utter those complaints, which, with equal force or fancy, and elegance of expression, he has committed to the perusal of posterity, and thereby transmitted the fairest evidence of a spirit, which, though calamity might tame, yet it could not injure, thuch less destroy.

[M] He made her very large grants in the nature of pensions.] The colour given by the Duke of Lancaster to these grants made in favour of the Lady Swynford, was the care she had taken of his two daughters Philippa and Elizabeth, as appears by the words of the grant of the wardship of Bertam de Sanbys's heir, and of an annuity of two hundred marks per annum, payable out of his honour of Tickhill, which words are these (59):

' For the good and agreeable service which our thrice dear and most beloved Lady Catharine Swynford, the mistress of our most beloved daughters, hath rendered to our said children; we have given and granted, &c.' but no doubt the true reason was for his special affection towards her on account of the children he had had by her, to whom he gave the name of Beaufort, in Latin de bello forte, from a castle so called in Anjou, which came into his family by the Lady Blanch of Artois, Queen of Navarre (60). These children were four, viz. John Beaufort, afterwards Earl of Somerset; Henry Beaufort, afterwards Cardinal Bishop of Winchester, and Chancellor of England;

account of the benefits that accrued to Chaucer from this turn in the Duke's affairs, but notwithstanding this we have no reason to doubt, that he felt the effects of his patron's prosperity, who had suffered so deeply by the declension of his influence. But it seems his distaste to Courts was grown so strong, that nothing could tempt him to quit his rural retirement, or to launch again into that sea of business where he had been so lately shipwrecked (y). His mind however being more at rest, he undertook and finished a new work, which has established his reputation, with respect to learning, upon as firm a basis, as his former labours had fixed his fame for wit and genius. This new work plainly appears to be wrote in the year 1391, and was intended for the use of his younger son Lewis, then no more than ten years of age, and yet so forward in his learning, as to be desirous of having his father's instructions in acquiring the principles of Astronomy. This gave birth to his Treatise on the ASTROLABE (z), which not only shows the skill of it's author, but likewise incontestably proves, useful science was not at near so low an ebb in those times as it is generally represented (a). Neither will the case be at all altered, if what some writers have suggested should really prove true, and this discourse of Chaucer's appear to be no more than a translation, or, which seems to be still a more probable opinion, a Collection from other authors, who had written before him upon the same subject (b) [N]. About four years after this, while her husband was in France, Constance, Duchess of Lancaster, died (c), and was buried with great solemnity at Leicester, and the Duke coming over into England at the close of the year, and not meeting with quite so kind a reception at Court as he expected, went suddenly to Lincoln, where his old mistress Lady Catharine Swynford resided, and to the great surprize of the world, now, when she had not either youth or beauty to recommend her, married her (d). This gave great discontent to the Duchess of Gloucester, the Countess of Derby, the Countess of Arundel, and other Ladies descended of the Royal Family, because she became by this marriage the second person in the realm, and from being no fit companion for any, was now suddenly to take place of them all; but she behaved with so much discretion and humility, that these disputes were quickly composed (e), and in a short time she gained such an ascendancy over the King, that he carried her, as well as the Duke her husband, with him the year after their marriage into France, at which time he espoused Isabel, the French King's daughter, then very young, and who was put under the care of the Duchess of Lancaster (f). After the ceremony of this marriage, and the return of the Royal Family to England, we find a very singular instance of the advantage that Chaucer received from this alliance, for now, by Letters Patents, the King granted him an annuity of twenty marks per annum (g), in lieu of that given him by his grandfather, and which, in the time of his distress, he had been compelled to dispose of for his subsistence. Soon after this he granted him his protection by other Letters Patents, dated the fourth of England; Thomas Beaufort, Earl of Dorset, afterwards Duke of Exeter; and Joan, first married to Sir Robert Ferrers of Overly, and afterwards to Ralph Earl of Westmoreland (61). We have mentioned this more particularly, because of the near relation between the descendants of our author and those of this Lady by the Duke of Lancaster, of which we find it remembered by a very curious and circumspcct writer (62) in the time of King Charles I, that there had been eight Kings, four Queens, and five Princes of England; six Kings, and three Queens of Scotland; two Cardinals, upwards of twenty Dukes, almost as many Duchesses of England, several Dukes of Scotland, besides many potent Princes, and eminent Nobility in foreign parts.

[N] Upon the same subject.] The title of this piece, as it stands in our author's works, is, The Conclusion of the Astrolabe (63), in the introduction to which, addressed to his son, he remarks, that it was with great pleasure he observed his growing capacity and earnest passion for learning, which very willingly induced him to yield to his request, of teaching him the use of this instrument. He then proceeds to inform him, that his intention was not to discourse of all, but on the most useful, and those too the most easy, operations that might be performed by this curious instrument, as being the fittest for the apprehension of a child of ten years old. He adds, that for the very same reason he wrote them in English and not in Latin, as conceiving it too much to put so young a person upon learning things unknown in a tongue of which he had little or no knowledge, and which also he held unnecessary, since the science was the same in whatever language taught, and the practice too had been the same in other nations; for the Greeks wrote their books of Astronomy in Greek, the Arabians in Arabic, the Jews in Hebrew, and those to whom the Latin language was familiar in Latin; for assuredly, says he, those who wrote in Latin had the knowledge of which they wrote, out of other tongues. He would not therefore have him believe, that he knew the less for not gaining his knowledge from that learned language; because, continues he, different tongues lead to the same science, as by many different roads men go to the same city, as for instance to Rome. He adds likewise, that he has written it in a very plain stile, out of regard to the tenderness of his understanding, and that he judged it better to use more words to make the propositions clear, than by studying a correct stile, to render his work more difficult to a child, though more perfect in the eyes of scholars; and also puts him in mind, that he pretends not to deliver any thing of his own, but only to compile and to translate from the Astronomers in several languages, what, with more accuracy, but less perspicuity, they had delivered concerning this matter; and with this sword, says he, (meaning this explication of his design) shall I slay envy. The work itself is unquestionably a master-piece in it's kind, and agrees in every respect to what it appears the author proposed to make it, for there can be nothing better disposed, more clearly written, or delivered in a way more suitable to please and satisfy the appetite of a young scholar. In a very fine MS. of this treatise, belonging formerly to Dr Henry Moore, Bishop of Ely, there is a note which signifies, that Lewis Chaucer was at this time under the tuition of his father's friend Nicholas Strode, Leland (64), Bale (65), and Wood (66), call him Ralph Strode of Merton-college, in Oxford, one of the deepest Philosophers, and most esteemed Poets of his time, which, considering the youth of Lewis Chaucer, seems not a little strange. The note referred to at the end of the book before-mentioned runs thus: 'Explicit Tractatus de Conclusionibus Astrolabii, compilat. per Galfredum Chauciers, ad filium suum Ludewicum scholarem tunc temporis Oxoniae, ac sub tutela illius nobilissimi Philosophi Magistri N. Strode.'

of May in the twenty-first year of his reign, for two years, signifying, that for that space he had occasion to employ him in his service (b). Neither was this the last or greatest instance afforded him of royal favour, since we find that by Letters Patents dated the thirteenth of October in the following year, he had a pipe of wine annually granted him out of the customs of the Port of London (i), which was to be delivered him by the chief Butler, and to this office his son Thomas Chaucer was now raised (k). But if these benefits cheered and comforted his decayed spirits in the decline of life, he had however the mortification to lose, about the same time, his noble patron, his constant friend, and kind brother, the Duke of Lancaster, by whom he was first brought to Court, and through whose favour he never wanted either countenance or support, when it was in his power to bestow (l). This loss very probably afflicted him deeply, as we may gather from his retiring about this time to Dunnington-castle, where he spent most of his days during the last two years of his life, indulging his grave thoughts in the solitude of that sweet retreat (m) [O]. In this situation he was, when that great revolution happened, which placed Henry of Lancaster, the son of his brother-in-law, upon the throne, in which as Chaucer had no hand (though certainly it could not displease him) so we do not find that he was at all eager in paying his compliments to the new King, much less that he triumphed in the misfortunes of his late kind master and gracious benefactor, as others, and particularly Gower, who had been more obliged to that unfortunate Prince, and who at that time was both old and blind, most shamefully did (n). He did not however slight the advantages offered him by this revolution, but having accidentally lost the two last grants of an annuity, and of the pipe of wine by King Richard, he obtained a confirmation of them in the first year of Henry IV, by an exemplification of his former Letters Patents (o). Neither was this the only favour he received from the new King, who, out of regard to the ancient friendship and near alliance between the Prince his father and our author, granted him, during the first year of his reign, an annuity of forty marks per annum for the term of his life (p). It is true indeed, that a very great writer, a sincere admirer of our author, and most deservedly a Poet-Laureat himself, informs us, that Chaucer enjoyed this honour under three Kings, Edward III, Richard II, and Henry IV (q), but this is a mistake, for in truth there was no such office in those days, or, if we may trust to the authority of the learned Selden, before the reign of Edward IV (r). If we take this in a more extensive sense, for an eminent Poet who celebrated these Princes, it may be justly applied to Chaucer in regard to the two first, but we find nothing in his Works relating to the last, nor indeed is his name so much as mentioned in any of our author's writings. The small time he lived after the accession of this King, was chiefly employed in regulating his private affairs, which had suffered by the publick disorders, for all the publick Acts of the deposed King Richard, in the twenty-first year of his reign being declared void, Chaucer was forced to quit his retirement, to come up to town to solicit his causes, and beginning now to bend under the weight of years (s), this unlucky accession of business, which obliged him to alter his usual way of living, might very possibly hasten his end, the near approach of which he bore with Roman constancy, or rather with Christian patience; for there is still extant a kind of Ode that he is said to have composed in last agonies, which very plainly proves that his senses were perfectly sound, and the faculties of his mind not in the least impaired (t) [P]. He died October 25, 1400, in the full possession

[O] Of that sweet retreat.] It is not very clear at what time our author quitted his beloved house at Woodstock, in order to go to Dunnington-castle, where he spent the last two years of his life; but as this was his final retreat, and became very remarkable for being so, an account of it cannot be unacceptable to the reader. It was in Mr Camden's time (67) (when in it's glory) a small but neat castle, situate upon the brow of a rising hill, having an agreeable prospect, very light with windows on all sides, said to be built by Sir Richard Adderbury, Knt. who likewise founded an hospital beneath it, called God's House; it was afterwards the seat of Chaucer, then of the De la Poles, and in our father's memory the dwelling of Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolk. At the beginning of the rebellion in the reign of King Charles I, it was a garrison for the King under the valiant Sir John Boys, which commanded the western road and town of Newberry, and was therefore of great advantage to the Royal Party as a safe retreat, and the cannon playing from it much annoyed the Parliament forces. This place his Majesty honoured by lying one night in it, but after a rough assault, and as bold a resistance, during which several of the towers were battered down, it was surrendered upon honourable conditions. This was the ancient state, and the occasion of the late ruin of that pleasant structure. At present there is nothing to be seen of it but what raises horror and concern, a battered gateway with two towers, and some small part of the shattered walls, being all that remains thereof. The ground about it, and the ruins of it, are choaked with brambles and over-run with ivy; but left the place of it's situation should in a few years more be forgot (68), I shall as plainly as I can describe it. It lies half a mile to the right of Spinham-land, (the antient Spina of Antoninus) and a mile beyond Newbury on the same side; as you go from London you pass over the river Kennet to the village of Dunnington, from which there is a pretty steep but pleasant ascent through a lane to a hill under the castle, where stands a seat formerly belonging to the Countess of Sandwich. From hence arises the Castle-hill, very steep, and not unlike that whereon the Observatory stands at Greenwich, and from this hill there is a very fine prospect of several counties. On the back of the castle are level grounds, woodlands, and enclosures. The castle itself stands in a pleasant park, in which there was a famous oak called Chaucer's Oak, under which, as tradition taught, he wrote several Poems. Mr Evelyn (69) gives a particular account of this tree, and says there were three of them planted by Chaucer, the King's Oak, the Queen's Oak, and Chaucer's Oak.

[P] And the faculties of his mind not in the least impaired.] This Sonnet or Ode consists of no more than three stanza's, and as well for the beauty of the piece, as for the extraordinary occasion on which it was written, I think it very well deserves a place here (70).

of that high reputation (u) which his writings had deservedly acquired, and was buried in Westminster-abbey, in the great south cross-isle. Some writers have affirmed that he was first buried in the cloister, and lay there 'till some years after, but this is a mistake, for Caxton, in his edition of Chaucer (which was long before the time of his removal) as they place it, says that he was buried in the Abbey-church of Westminster before the Chapel of St Bennet. And it is very probable he lay beneath a large stone of grey marble in the pavement, where the monument of Mr Dryden now stands, which is in the front of that chapel, upon the erecting of which this stone was taken up, and sawed in pieces to make good the pavement; at least this seems best to answer the description of the place given by Caxton (w). As to the alterations that have happened since, and the inscription now visible on his tomb, an account will be given in the notes [2]. We may justly affirm of this

I.

Fly from the crowd, and be to virtue true,
Content with what thou hast, tho' it be small,
To hoard brings hate; nor lofty thoughts pursue,
He who climbs high, endangers many a fall.
Envy's a shade that ever waits on fame,
And oft the sun that raises it will hide;
Trace not in life a vast expansive scheme,
But be thy wishes to thy state ally'd.
Be mild to others, to thyself severe;
So truth shall shield thee or from hurt or fear.

II.

Think not of bending all things to thy will,
Nor vainly hope that fortune shall befriend;
Inconstant she, but be thou constant still,
Whate'er betide unto an honest end.
Yet needless dangers never madly brave,
Kick not thy naked foot against a nail;
Or from experience the solution crave,
If wall and pitcher strive which shall prevail;
Be in thy cause as in thy neighbour's clear,
So truth shall shield thee or from hurt or fear.

III.

Whatever happens, happy in thy mind
Be thou, nor at thy lot in life repine,
He 'scapes all ill, whose bosom is resign'd,
Nor way nor weather will be always fine.
Beside, thy home's not here, a journey this,
A pilgrim thou, then bie thee on thy way;
Look up to GOD, intent on heavenly blifs,
Take what the road affords, and praises pay;
Shun brutal lusts, and seek thy soul's high sphere;
So truth shall shield thee or from hurt or fear.

[2] In the notes. We are told by Speght and other authors, that the following lines stood anciently upon Chaucer's tombstone,

Galfridus Chaucer, vates & fama Poësis

Maternæ, hæc sacrâ sum tumulatus humo.

This anciently must refer only to the time of Caxton, who procured a long epitaph to be written in honour of our author by Stephanus Surigonus, Poet-Laureat of Milan, which was hung upon a pillar over-against Chaucer's grave stone, towards the end of which epitaph these two lines occur (71). But about the year 1555, as a very exact author reports; or in 1556, as Wood will have it, Mr Nicholas Brigham, a Gentleman of Oxford, who exercised his Muse much in Poetry, and took great delight in Chaucer's works, and honoured his memory, at his own charge, erected a handsome monument for him not far from the said chapel; for in the same place, he could not then conveniently erect it, by reason of the cancelli which the late Duke of Buckingham obtained leave to remove to make room for Mr Dryden's tomb. Upon that monument, Mr Brigham caused Chaucer's picture to be painted from that which was in Ocleve's book, together with the following inscription, which still remains.

Galfridus Chaucer conditur hoc tumulo:
Annus si quæras Domini, si tempora vitæ,
Ecce notæ subsunt quæ tibi cuncta notant.

25 Octobris 1400.

Ærumnarum requies mors.

N. Brigham hos fecit Musarum nomine sumptus.

In English thus:

*Of English bards who sang the sweetest strains, Old Geoffrey Chaucer now this tomb contains:
For his death's date if reader thou should'st call,
Look but beneath, and it will tell thee all.
25th of October 1400.*

Of cruel cares, the certain cure, is death.

N. Brigham placed these, in the name of the Muses, at his own expence. 1556.

About the ledge of the tomb, we are told, the following verses were written, that are now worn out; but it is more probable, that they were inscribed upon a ledge of brass, that is taken away, for there is not the least sign of any letters upon the stone itself.

Si rogites quis eram, forsan te fama docebit;
Quod si fama negat, mundi quia gloria transit,
Hæc monumenta lege.

*If who I was you ask, fame shall declare;
If fame denies, since frail all glories are,
These stones shall speak inscrib'd with pious care.*

It may not be amiss to observe, that this date of his death is preserved by several writers; who also inform us, that he was then seventy-two. Some indeed have questioned it, because of a piece, intitled, Cupid's Letter, printed with Chaucer's works (72), and dated in 1402; but that was written by Thomas Ocleve his Scholar, and was intended to do honour to his works and memory. The Rev. Mr Collier fixes his death in 1440 (73), which was the nineteenth of Henry VI; and if so, Chaucer was but ten years old at the death of King Edward

CHAUNCY (Sir HENRY) Knight, author of The Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire, was descended from a family which came into England with William the Conqueror [A]. He was educated in grammar-learning at Bishop's-Stortford-school under Mr Thomas Leigh (a): and in the year 1647 admitted in Gonvil and Caius college in Cambridge (b). He removed in 1649 to the Middle-Temple; and in 1656 was called to the Barr. In 1661, he was constituted a Justice of Peace for the county of Hertford: made one of the Benchers of the Middle-Temple in 1675, and Steward of the Burgh-court in Hertford; and likewise in 1680 appointed, by charter, Recorder of that place. In 1681 he was elected Reader of the Middle-Temple, and on the 4th of June the same year, received the honour of knighthood at Windsor-castle from King Charles II. He was chosen Treasurer of the Middle-Temple in 1685. On the 11th of June, 1688, he was called to the degree of a Serjeant at Law, and the same year advanced to be a Welsh Judge, or one of his Majesty's Justices for the counties of Glamorgan, Brecknock, and Radnor, in the principality of Wales. He married three wives, 1. Jane, youngest daughter of Francis Flyer of Brent-Pelham in Hertfordshire, Esq; by whom he had seven children: she died December 31, 1672. 2. Elizabeth, the relict of John Goulsmith of Stredset in Norfolk, Esq; one of the co-heirs of Gregory Wood of Risby in Suffolk, Gent. By her he had no issue. She died August 4, 1677. 3. His third wife was Elizabeth, the second daughter of Nathaniel Thrufton of Hoxny in Suffolk, Esq; by whom he had two children (c). He died in the year 1700, and was buried at Ardley, or Yardley. He published, 'The Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire [B]: with the Original of Counties, Hundreds, Wapentakes, Boroughs, Corporations, Towns, Parishes, Villages, Hamlets, &c.'

[A] Was descended from a family which came into England with William the Conqueror.] The name of Chauncy, or Chauncy, actually occurs in the roll of Battel-Abby (1). Sir Henry informs us (2), That that person was of Chauncy near Amiens in Picardy: and that several of this name remain still in Normandy, and live there in good credit and reputation. William, the eldest son of him who came into England with the Conqueror, purchased the manor of Scirpenbeck in Larkshire, which continued in his family, (together with the manor of Willughton in Lincolnshire, and other estates,) till 1399, when William de Chauncy mortgaged Scirpenbeck to Ralph Earl of Westmorland, who upon the forfeiture entered, and seized it into his hands; but, upon agreement, Richard Lord Scroop, Baron of Bolton, who married Margaret, the daughter of this Earl, granted the manor of Pisobury in Sabridgeworth in Hertfordshire, to William de Chauncy just now mentioned, whose posterity lived there, till about the 25th of Queen Elizabeth. He laid out the money, which should have discharged the mortgage of Scirpenbeck, upon the purchase of a fair estate at Stepney near London. His son, John Chauncy, married Margaret, one of the daughters and co-heirs of William Giffard of Gedleston, or Gilson, in Hertfordshire. — His descendant, Henry Chauncy, removed from Pisobury, in the 25th of Queen Elizabeth aforesaid, to Gedleston, where he built a handsome house called New Place. This Henry's second son, named George, married Jane, the daughter and heir of John Cornwall of Ardley, Esq; by whom he had a fine estate at Ardley in Hertfordshire, the manor of Fairstead in Essex, divers lands in Stebbing in the same county; together with some money, which enabled him to purchase of his elder brother's son (who was very extravagant,) his seat called New Place, with the manors of Giffards, and Netherall in Gedleston. He died in 1625, leaving his eldest son and heir Henry; who deceased in 1631. This Henry's eldest son, named also Henry, died in 1681. He was the father of Sir Henry Chauncy, who is the subject of this article. Sir Henry's mother was Anna, daughter and heir of Peter Parke of Tottenham in Middlesex, Gent (3).

[B] The Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire, &c.] The author was very fit for such an undertaking, being, in the first place, a native of that county, and a considerable proprietor therein, and therefore wanting neither means of information, nor money for carrying on such an expensive work. And then, as he observes himself (4), 'The near affinity Historical Antiquities have to that science, which he had studied, and all along practised, [viz. the Law] obliged him to be conversant in authors that treat thereof. — Nor had his frequent view of records, immediately relating to several parts of Hertfordshire, in many cases where he had been consulted, a little contributed to qualify him for an undertaking of this kind: though for completing it, he was forced to have recourse to all those that concerned that county, the better to enable him to serve such gentlemen as had lost their grants or charters, and would know the privileges belonging to their several manors.' — But he complains a little lower, — That many gentlemen who mistook their interest, delayed; and others, denied him, the opportunity of asserting their rights. And indeed this is a common obstacle in works of this nature; most people not caring, or being afraid, of shewing the titles and writings belonging to their estates. Sir Henry left some additions to his book, which came afterwards into the hands of N. Salmon, LL.B. and were the chief foundation upon which he built his History of Hertfordshire. The author of the English Topographer (5) wishes, 'that more care had been taken in the engraving part of this work, and that that part of the performance had been better.' But he seems to find fault without sufficient reason: for the plates in the copy now before us are really good, the greatest fault being in the paper. C

CHEKE (JOHN) a learned and ingenious writer in the XVIth century, was descended of an ancient and worthy family [A], that flourished long in wealth and reputation at Motston in the Isle of Wight (a). He was born at Cambridge June the 16th, 1514, being the son of Peter Cheke, Gent. and Agnes, daughter of Mr Dufford (b) of Cambridgeshire. After having been educated in grammar-learning under Mr John Morgan (c), he was admitted into St John's college in Cambridge at about the age of seventeen years; where he so closely applied himself to his studies, that he became very eminent for his knowledge in the learned languages, particularly the Greek tongue, which was then

[A] Was descended of an ancient and worthy family] A certain Historian, who seldom gives a favourable account of those who were inclined to the Reformation (1), says, That Mr Cheke was a man of mean birth. But therein he is very much mistaken. For, the antiquity of the Cheke family is traced as far back as the reign of King Richard II, when one Cheke married a daughter of the noble family of Montacute. Their paternal estate in the Isle of Wight, was three hundred pounds a year, which was never increased nor diminished, till sold outright about the year 1630 (2).

then almost universally neglected (d). Being recommended as such, by Dr Butts, to King Henry VIII, he was soon after made that King's scholar, and supplied by him with money for his education, and for his charges in travelling into foreign countries. While he continued in college, he introduced there a more substantial and useful kind of learning, than what had been received for some years; and encouraged especially the study of the Greek and Latin languages, and of Divinity (e). After having taken his degrees in Arts, being noted for an excellent Grecian, he was chosen Greek Lecturer of the university: There was no salary belonging to that place. But King Henry having founded, about the year 1540, a Professorship of the Greek tongue in the university of Cambridge, with a stipend of forty pounds a year, Mr Cheeke, though but twenty-six years of age, was chosen the first Professor (f). This place he held long after he left the university, namely, 'till October 1551 (g). In this station, he was highly instrumental in bringing the Greek language into repute, which was then very much slighted; and endeavoured to reform and restore the true and original pronunciation of it: but herein he met with great opposition from Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, Chancellor of the university (h) [B]. However, in the course of his Lectures, he went through all

Homer,

[B] He endeavoured to reform and restore the true and original pronunciation of the Greek language, but — met with great opposition from — Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester.] The Greek language was then but newly revived, and brought into the Universities, not without great opposition from the Patrons of Ignorance and Popery, who could not endure any thing that had the face of novelty, though never so true and right in itself. The pronunciation of it was very vicious; and the received way of founding the vowels and diphthongs, and some consonants, very odd and untoward. For instance, ei was pronounced as e (e), oi and ei as i (i), and η and υ were founded alike, as ω and α, or (j). Some of the consonants also were pronounced differently, according as they stood in the word; that is, the consonant π when it came after ι, they pronounced as a soft B. And τ after μ was pronounced as our D. The letter κ was pronounced as we do CH, and β as we do the V consonant. Now, since different letters must make different sounds, Cheke concluded these to be very false ways of reading Greek; and not, certainly, what was practised by the ancient Grecians (3). He saw, that not only the beauty of the language was lost in this way, but likewise it's very spirit and life were gone, by the loss of so many vowels and diphthongs, and the language become jejune and languid: In this way of speaking it, nothing of numerosity appeared in the ancient Orators and Rhetoricians, nor those flowing periods, for which they had been renowned in old Greece; neither could he himself shew his eloquence, in his orations or lectures, for want of the beauty and variety of sounds (4). He set himself therefore to find out what was the right method: and, partly, by considering the power of the letters themselves; partly, by consulting Aristophanes, and other ancient authors, he concluded, that each vowel should have it's proper sound, and, that diphthongs, consisting of two vowels should have the sound of two. This took exceedingly among the more ingenious men of the University, and great improvements were daily made in the knowledge of the Greek tongue, so that Plato and Aristotle began to be much read. But there was another party in the University, who, by being older, fancied themselves wiser than the others. These made a great disturbance about this new way of speaking Greek, as they called it, and opposed it with all their might, both by writing and speaking. But not finding their arguments so effectual as they wished, they carried their complaints to Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, Chancellor of the University; who, in the true spirit of Popery, made an edict, dated the 14th of May, 1542, wherein he forbid all persons to use the new fashion of pronouncing Greek, upon the following penalties: If he were a Regent to be expelled out of the Senate; if he stood for a degree, not to be admitted to it; if a scholar, to lose his scholarship; and the younger sort, to be privately chastised. This edict is framed in such a dictatorial air, that I cannot forbear laying the greatest part of it before the curious reader. — Sic edico: Quisquis nostram potestatem agnovit, sonos, literis sive Græcis sive Latinis, ab usu publico præsentis seculi alienos, privato iudicio assignere ne audeo. — Diphthongos Græcas, nedum Latinas, nisi id Diæresis exigat, sonis ne diducito, neve divellito. Quæsitam usu alteri vocalium prærogativam ne admittito. Sed ut marem feminae dominari finito. Quæ vero earum in communiõne soni usu convenerunt, *iis tu negotium ne facerito. A ε, ei ε, ei ab i sono ne distinguo. Tantum in orthographia discrimen servato. Η, ι, υ, uno eodemque sono exprimito. Cuiusq; tamen propriam in orthographia sedem diligenter notato. In κ ε γ, quoties cum diphthongis aut vocalibus sonos i aut e referentibus consonantur, quoniam a doctis etiamnum in usu variantur, aliis densiorem, aliis tenuiorem sonum affingentibus, utriusque pronuntiationis modum discito: Ne aut horum aut illorum aures offendas; neve de sonis litem inutiliter excites. Cæterum, qui in his sonis a pluribus receptus est, illum frequetato. B literam ad exemplum nostri B ne infissato, sed ad imitationem V. consonantis mollius proferto. Literas π ε τ, item γ ε κ, pro loco ε situ alios atque alios sonos adimere memento. Itaque τ ε π, tum denique β, quem proxime locantur, hæc post υ, illa post ν, his locis videlicet litera τ referat nostrum D, π vero B nostrum exprimat. Litera porro γ, cum proxima sedem occupet ante κ, χ, aut aliud γ, huic tu non suum, sed sonum v literæ accommodato. Ne multa. In sonis omnino ne phibitor, sed vitior præsentibus. In his siquid emendandum sit, id omne auctoritati permittito. — Si quis autem, quod abominor, secus fecerit, &c. Then follow the penalties expressed above — And the whole concludes thus — *In summa, hoc editum omnes sacrosanctum ita habent, ut nec contumacibus remissum, nec resistentibus severum esse videatur (5). Upon the coming out of this edict, Cheke wrote an elegant letter to the Bishop, wherein he said, 'That the true sounds of the letters were changed in the last barbarous ages, and that it was therefore better to mend that barbarity, than to follow it.' And for this he appealed to Erasmus, (who had writ a book of the true pronunciation of the Latin and Greek,) and other learned men. The Bishop replied, 'That the sound of letters was more like to be changed by the learned than the unlearned: the learned being wont to have so much regard to the euphony, and the gracefulness of the sound of words.' Cheke shewed, how by pronouncing the diphthong oi as an i, (as was then commonly done,) there would be no distinction between Λοιμὸς and Λιμὸς. But the Chancellor was for no changes. Utere, saith he to Cheke, *moribus antiquis, verbis vero præsentibus, ε multo magis sonis, i. e. use ancient customs, but present words, and much more sounds. And when Cheke alledged, 'He acted merely out of love for the truth.' The Chancellor broke out into this expression — *Quid non mortalia peccora cogit veri querendi fames? i. e. What does not too great an eagerness for seeking out truth drive men into? As if that had been so great a crime. However truth at length prevailed: And this true way of reading Greek came to be received not only in the Universities, but also throughout the kingdom (6). This controversy was managed between Bishop Gardiner and Mr Cheke in seven elegant epistles: of which the originals being left in the hands of Coelius Secundus Curio, a learned man of Basil, by Cheke himself, as he passed through that place in his journey to Italy, in the beginning of Queen Mary's reign; they were published from those originals in 1555, 8vo. without Mr Cheke's knowledge or consent, by Curio, with the following title, *Joannis Cheki Angli de pronuntiatione Græcæ potissimum Lingue, Disputationes cum Stephano Wintoniensi Episcopo, septem contrariis Epistolis comprehense, magna quadam ε elegantia ε eruditione referæ (7).**

Homer, all Euripides, part of Herodotus, and through Sophocles twice, to the advantage of his hearers, and his own credit (i). He was also at the same time University-Orator (k). About the year 1543, he was incorporated Master of Arts, at Oxford, where he had studied some time (l). On the 10th of July 1544, he was sent for to Court, in order to be School-master, or Tutor for the Latin tongue, jointly with Sir Anthony Cooke, to Prince Edward: and, about the same time, for an encouragement and a reward, the King granted him one of the Canonries in his new founded college at Oxford, now Christ-Church; but that college being dissolved in the beginning of the year 1545, a pension (m) was allowed him in the room of his Canonry (n). By this preferment it appears, he was then in holy orders. While he was entrusted with the Prince's education, he so adapted all the instructions he gave him, as that they should tend to render him a wise man, and a good Governor. And he made use of all the interest he had, in promoting men of learning and probity. He seems also to have had sometimes the Lady Elizabeth under his care (o). In 1547, he married Mary, daughter of Richard Hill, Sergeant of the Wine-cellar to King Henry VIII (p). When his Royal pupil, King Edward VI. came to the Crown, he rewarded him for his care and pains with an annuity of one hundred marks (q); and also made him a grant of several lands and manors [C]. He likewise caused him, by a Mandamus, to be elected Provost of King's College in Cambridge; which place was vacant by the deprivation of George Day, Bishop of Chichester (r). In May 1549, he retired to Cambridge, upon some disgust he had taken at the Court; and was notwithstanding one of the King's Commissioners, for visiting that university this summer. The October following, he was one of the thirty-two Commissioners, appointed to examine the old Ecclesiastical Law-books, and to compile from thence a body of Ecclesiastical Laws (s), for the government of the Church: and again, three years after, he was put in a new commission, issued out for the same purpose (t). He returned to Court in the winter of 1549, but met there with great uneasiness, on account of some offence given by his wife to Anne, Duchess of Somerset, whose dependent she was. Mr Cheke himself was not exempt from trouble, being of the number of those, who were charged with having suggested ill counsels to the Duke of Somerset, and afterwards betrayed him (u). But having got over this shock at Court, he stood the firmer, afterwards, and his interest and authority daily increased, so that he became the great Patron of religious and learned men, both English and foreigners. In 1550 (w), he was made chief Gentleman of the King's Privy-Chamber; whose tutor he still continued to be, and who made a wonderful progress through his good instructions. Mr Cheke, to ground him well in morality, read to him Cicero's Philosophical works, and Aristotle's Ethicks. And also, what was of great importance, instructed him in the General History, the State and Interest, the Laws and Customs of England (x). He likewise directed him to keep a Diary of all the remarkable occurrences that happened [D]. In October 1551, his Majesty conferred on him the honour of Knighthood, and to enable him the better to support that degree, made him a considerable grant [E]. The same year, he held two private conferences, with some other learned persons [F], upon the subject of the Sacrament, or Transubstantiation (y). He procured Bucer's manuscripts; and in 1552, the famous John Leland's valuable collections [G], for the King's library.

[C] Made him a grant of several lands and manors.] In 1548 he granted to him, and Walter Moyle, the very advantageous purchase, of the College of St John Baptist at Stoke, near Clare in Suffolk, and likewise all the messuages, tenements, &c. with the appurtenances belonging to the college of Corpus Christi, in the parish of St Laurence Poulney, London, lately dissolved; together with divers other lands and tenements in the counties of Suffolk, Devon, Kent, and in London; for the sum of 958 l. 3 s. 5 d. ob. a good penniworth, undoubtedly, as Mr Strype observes (8). The next year, in consideration of his industry in teaching the King, he obtain'd, the house and site of the late Priory of Spalding in the county of Lincoln, the manor of Hunden in the same county, and divers other lands and tenements in the counties of Lincoln, and Suffolk, to the yearly value of 118 l. 11 d. q. and no rent reserved (9).
 [D] He likewise directed him to keep a Diary, &c.] And to write down briefly, under each day of the month, debates in Council, dispatch of ambassadors, honours conferred, and other remarks as he thought proper. This undoubtedly produced that King's journal, which is preserved in the Cottonian Library, and thence printed in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, Vol. II. Appendix.
 [E] Made him a considerable grant.] It was a gift in fee simple, (upon consideration of his surrender of the hundred marks abovementioned,) of the whole manor of Stoke near Clare, exclusive of the college before granted him, and the appurtenances in Suffolk and Essex, with divers other lands, tenements, &c. all to the yearly value of 145 l. 19 s. 3 d. And a pasture, with other premises, in Spalding; and the Rectory, and other premises, in Sandon (10).

 [F] The same year he held two private conferences — upon Transubstantiation.] The first conference was held November the 25th, in Secretary Cecil's house, and the second December 3d, the same year, at Sir Richard Morison's. The auditors were, the Lord Russel, Sir Tho. Wroth of the Bed-Chamber, Sir Anthony Cook one of the King's tutors, Throgmorton Chamberlain of the Exchequer, Mr Knolles, and Mr Harrington, with whom were joined the Marquis of Northampton, and the Earl of Rutland, in the second Conference. The Popish disputants for the real presence were, Feckenham afterwards Dean of St Paul's, and Yong; and at the second disputation Watson. The disputants on the other side, were, Sir John Cheke, Sir William Cecil, Horn Dean of Durham, Whitehead, and Grindal. Some account of these disputations is still extant in Latin, in the library of MSS, belonging to Bennet-College in Cambridge; and from thence published in English by Mr Strype (11).
 [G] In 1552 he procur'd J. Leland's Collections, for the King's library.] But, either by reason of Sir John's misfortunes, or through some other accident, they were not repositied there. Four volumes of these Collections were given by his son Henry Cheke, to Humphrey Purefoy, Esq; one of Queen Elizabeth's Council in the North, whose son Thomas Purefoy, of Barwel in Leicestershire, gave them to the famous Antiquarian William Burton of Lindley, in the same county,

(11) Life of Sir John Cheke, p. 90—112.

- (z) Ibid. p. 12, library (z). Being at Cambridge, at the Commencement in 1552, he disputed there against Jesus Christ's local descent into hell [H]. On the 25th of August, the same year, he was made Chamberlain of the Exchequer for life: and in 1553, constituted Clerk of the Council; and soon after, one of the Secretaries of State, and a Privy-Counsellor (a). In May the same year, the King granted to him and his heirs male, the honour of Clare in Suffolk, with divers other lands, to the yearly value of one hundred pounds. His zeal for the Protestant Religion induced him to approve of the settlement of the Crown upon the Lady Jane Grey: and he acted as Secretary to her, and her Council, after King Edward's decease (b) [I]. But upon Queen Mary's accession to the throne, he was dealt with as a traitor; being committed to the Tower on the 28th of July, and an indictment drawn up against him, the 12th or 13th of August (c). The year following, after he was almost stripped of his whole substance, he obtained the Queen's pardon, and was set at liberty, September 3, 1554 (d). But not being able to reconcile himself to Popery, which was then restored again; and foreseeing the evil times that were drawing on; he obtained a licence from the Queen to travel for some time into foreign parts. He went first to Basil, where he stayed some time; and thence passed into Italy. At Padua, he met with some of his countrymen, whom he directed in their studies, and read and explained to them some Greek orations of Demosthenes. Upon his return from Italy, not caring to venture into his own country, he went and settled at Strasburgh in Germany, where the English service was kept up, and many of his pious and learned friends resided. But so offended at this were the Popish zealots in England, that his whole estate was confiscated to the Queen's use, under pretence, That he did not come home at the expiration of his travels (e). Being hereby reduced to low circumstances, he was forced to read a Greek lecture at Strasburgh, for his subsistence (f). In the beginning of the year 1556, his wife being come to Brussels, he resolved, chiefly upon an invitation he had received from the Lord Paget and Sir John Mafon [K], to go thither to fetch her. But, first, he consulted Astrology, in which he was very skilful and credulous [L], to know, whether he might safely undertake that journey? And being deceived by that delusive art, he fell into a fatal snare between Brussels and Antwerp. For, upon certain intelligence and orders from King Philip II, being way-laid there by the Provost-Marshal, he was suddenly seized on the 15th of May [M]; unhorfed, blindfolded, bound, and thrown into a waggon, conveyed to the nearest harbour, put on board a ship under hatches, and brought to the Tower of London, where he was committed close prisoner.

- county, in 1612; and he made use of them in his description of Leicestershire. Many years after, he made a present of them to the Bodleian library at Oxford, where they now are. Some other of these collections, after Cheke's death, came into the hands of William Lord Paget, and Sir William Cecil (12). The original of the Itinerary, in five volumes, 4^o. is in the Bodleian library; and two volumes of Collections, relating to Britain, are in the Cottonian. Julius C. 6.

- [H] He disputed against Jesus Christ's local descent into hell. This was a point very much canvassed in England, not long after the beginning of the Reformation (14); and which was grounded upon the authority of J. Calvin, who asserted, That Jesus Christ went into hell, and there suffered the pains of the damned (15).—At this Commencement at Cambridge, Christopher Carlile keeping a Divinity-Act, chose this for his Thesis, That Christ went into no other hell but the very lowest, i. e. that of the damned. Sir John Cheke agreed beforehand to dispute upon that question with him, on purpose to attack the Popish doctrine of the Limbus Patrum; that is, an apartment in hell, where, they say, the ancient patriarchs and good men before Christ were detained, and in which Christ descended on purpose to deliver them from thence (16).
- [I] He acted as Secretary to her [the Lady Jane Grey] and her Council, after King Edward's decease. He was sworn and admitted into that office June the 2d, and the two other Secretaries were yet continued, and all three Secretaries appeared in Council together, as is manifest from the council-book. But at this juncture Cecil was intended to be laid aside, because he scrupled coming into the ambitious designs of the Duke of Northumberland, who would have the Crown settled upon the Lady Jane Grey, which had married his son Guilford Dudley. But Cheke's zeal for religion made him come into those measures; and that was the cause of his advancement (17). One author tells us, 'he had that place three years (18).' But he is much mistaken; for he enjoyed it but little above four weeks; to which may be added the nine days of the Lady Jane's reign, for he acted to the last, viz. till July the 19th.
- [K] Upon an invitation he had received from the Lord Paget and Sir John Mafon. These two persons had been his friends and acquaintance in the late King Edward's reign, but having changed their religion, were in great favour with the Queen, and consequently had altered their inclination towards him. Paget came into those parts, under pretence of using the baths of Aix la Chapelle, but really with intent to have the Duchefs of Suffolk, and her husband, who had fled abroad for their religion, betrayed into his hands. As for Mafon, he was the Queen's Ambassador at the Court of Brussels. Failing in their attempt upon the Duchefs of Suffolk, they used this stratagem to get Sir John Cheke, and Sir Peter Carew (who had been engaged in Wyatt's insurrection, and was fled abroad) apprehended. They desired Sir John, to take the opportunity of fetching his wife, to come and see them at Brussels; and for his better security, Mafon assured him of a safe-conduct thither in King Philip's, and his own, name. He accordingly went thither, with Sir Peter Carew, and enjoyed his pretended friends Paget and Mafon; but, as he was coming back from them, he was seized between Brussels and Antwerp, as is above related. So that it appears, he and his friend Carew were betrayed (19).
- [L] He consulted Astrology, &c. That art was then much studied, both by the Nobility and Gentry; in so much, that Dr Laurence Humfrey, who lived in those days, and was afterwards Divinity Professor at Oxford, in his book De Nobilitate (20), observes, how this science above the rest was so snatched at, so beloved, and even devoured by most persons of fashion (21), that they needed no inticements to it, but a bridle rather; not to be fet on, but rather taken off from it. And that many had so trusted to this, that they almost distrusted God.
- [M] He was suddenly seized on the 15th of May. Or, as it is expressed in his second recantation,— 'When he thought least,—he was taken as it were with a hurlewind from the place he was in, and brought over the sea, and never knew whither he went, afore he found himself in the Tower of London, which of all places he abhorred most (22).

prisoner (g). He soon found, that it was on account of his religion he was thus strangely used. For, two of the Queen's Chaplains were sent to the Tower, to endeavour, out of charity and good-will, as they pretended, to reconcile him to the Church of Rome, tho' without success. But the desire of gaining so great a man, induced the Queen to send to him Dr Feckenham, Dean of St Paul's, a man of a moderate and obliging temper, and with whom he had been acquainted in the late reign. This man's arguments were enforced by this dreadful alternative, either comply, or burn, which Sir John's frailty was not able to withstand. Seeming therefore inclined to turn, he was, at his own desire, carried before Cardinal Pole, who gravely advised him, to depart from the variety of Doctors to the Unity of the Church. Whereupon, he was forced to submit his person to be ordered as should be thought best for his soul's health, to them that had authority in the Church upon such offenders. Then he drew up a paper, consisting of quotations out of the Fathers that seemed to countenance Transubstantiation; representing them as his own opinion, and hoping that would suffice to procure him his liberty, without any other publick declarations of his change. This paper he sent to Cardinal Pole, with a letter dated July 15, wherein he desired him, to have so much compassion of his frailty, as to spare him from making an open recantation; but that was refused him. He writ a letter to the Queen the same day, in which he declared his readines to obey her laws, and other orders of religion. After which, to declare his repentance for rejecting the Pope, he made his solemn submission before the Cardinal, suing to be absolved, and received into the bosom of the Roman Catholick Church; and this was granted him as a mighty favour. But notwithstanding all that, he was forced to make a publick recantation before the Queen, on the 4th of October, and another long one before the whole Court [N]; and submitted, moreover to whatever penances should be enjoined him by the Pope's Legate, i. e. the Cardinal (b). After all this drudgery, his lands were restored to him, but it was upon condition of an exchange with the Queen for others [O]. The Papiests, to triumph in his conversion, and to mortify the Protestants, obliged him to keep company generally with Catholicks, and to be present at the examinations and convictions of those they called Hereticks (*). But his remorse and extreme vexation for what he had done, sat so heavy upon his mind, that pining away with shame and regret, he died September the 13, 1557, aged forty-three, at his friend Mr Peter Osborne's house, in Woodstreet, London, and was buried in St Alban's Church there, in the north chapel of the choir, the 16th of September (i). A stone was set afterwards over his grave, with an inscription [P]. He left three sons [Q]; and was author of several books [R]. As to his character; he was a person of extraordinary wit, and was accounted one of the best and learnedest men of his age, and a singular ornament to his country. He was one of the revivers of polite literature in England, and a great lover and encourager of the Greek language in particular. The authors he chiefly admired and recommended, were, Demosthenes, Xenophon, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and Cicero. These, together with the Bible, and a few more, were sufficient, in his judgment, to render [N] And another long one before the whole Court.] This second recantation, in particular, is manifestly in the style of Cardinal Pole, that is, long and tedious. Cheke is made to accuse himself therein, in the most ignominious manner — As may appear from these few lines — ‘I did most grievously offend, both to the ruin of myself, and of others that were conversant with me in the Court, where I had more occasion to do hurt for the place of schoolmaster I had with young King Edward, and with all the youth of the Nobility than any other had. And albeit mine office was not to teach him the matters of religion, which was committed to others; yet I confess touching my pestilent error, I peradventure did no less to confirm and set forward the same in his mind, and all the rest of the youth than any other. — Mine error [i. e. his being a Protestant] was a blasphemy of the holy name of God, under colour to glorify the same, and a persecution of the name of Christ, more grievous than ever were they, that, deceived by others, crucified Christ, or afterward did persecute those that were his disciples — (23).’

[O] But it was upon condition of an exchange with the Queen for others.] Upon his surrendering the lands mentioned above in Note [E] the Queen granted him, April 12, 1556, the reversion of the manor of Brampton-Abbot in Devonshire, and the annual rents of 37*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* ob. and the reversion of customary lands of Freshford, and Woodwick, in Somersetshire; the capital messuage of Batokysborough; the manor of Aylcote; and the manor of Northlode, in the same county; the manor of More in Devonshire; and some other things (24).

*Doctrinæ lumen Cbecus, vitæque magister, Aurea naturæ fabrica, morte jacet.
Non erat à multis unus, sed præstitit unus
Omnibus, & patriæ sos erat ille juæ.
Gemma Britannia fuit, tam magnum nulla tulerunt
Tempora thesaurum, tempora nulla ferent (25).*

[Q] He left three sons.] John, and Edward, the two youngest, died without issue. Henry, the eldest, was Secretary to the Council in the North, and knighted by Queen Elizabeth: he died about the year 1586. Thomas, his eldest son and heir, was knighted by King James I. He purchased the feat of Pyrgo near Romford in Essex, where he and his posterity were settled several years. He was buried March 25, 1659, in St Alban's Woodstreet, near his grandfather Sir Thomas's second son, Thomas, commonly known by the name of Colonel Cheke, inherited the estate, and was Lieutenant of the Tower in the reigns of King Charles II. and James II. This Thomas had two sons, Henry, who died young; and Edward, who succeeded him in his estates. This Edward dying in 1707 left two sons; but they died both under age; and so the estate devolved to Edward's younger sister Anne, wife of Sir Thomas Tipping of Oxfordshire, Baronet. She left only two daughters, whereof Catharine, the youngest, is married to Thomas Archer of Underlade in Warwickshire, Esq; the present possessor of the Essex-Estate of the Cheke's (26).

[R] And was author of several books.] Those that are printed, are as follow. I. A Latin translation of two of St Chrysostom's Homilies, never before published, Contra observatores novilunii; and De dormientibus in Christo. Lond. 1543. 4°. II. render a man substantially learned, and withal to make him wife and good, which is the true end of learning (k). He was very happy in imitating the ancient and best writers, and had great judgment in translating them. In the orthography, and pronunciation, of the Latin and Greek languages, he was very critical and exact [S]; and also took great pains to correct, regulate, and improve, his mother-tongue, the English [T]. We are also assured, That he was an excellent Statesman, and a true and sincere Christian, and a hearty professor of the Reformed Religion (l): and likewise extremely beneficent, charitable, and communicative (m). His unhappy fall is indeed a great blemish to his memory. But before he is absolutely condemned, let any one place himself in his circumstances, and then consider, how few can have resolution enough, to withstand this dreadful dilemma, either turn, or burn? An author of more zeal, than charity or knowledge (n), treats him as a 'a Libertine by profession,' but, undoubtedly, he has borrowed that odious and unjust character of him from his enemies the Papists. With regard to his person; he had a full

Providentia Dei. Lond. 1547. III. 'The hurt of fe-'dition, how grievous it is to a commonwealth.' The running tide is, 'The true subject to the rebel.' It was written, and published, by Mr Cheke in 1549, on occasion of the insurrections in Devonshire and Norfolk; and contains very serious and earnest expositions with the rebels. 'Tis inserted in Holinshed's Chronicle, under the year 1549, and was reprinted in 1576, as a seasonable discourse upon apprehension of tumults from malecontents at home, or renegadoes abroad. Dr Gerard Langbaine of Queen's College Oxon, caused it to be reprinted again about 1641, for the use and consideration of the rebels against King Charles I. in the time of the civil wars, and prefixed to it a short life of the author (27). IV. A Latin translation of the English Communion-book; done for the use of M. Bucer, that he might understand it, and pass his judgment upon the same. 'Tis printed among Bucer's ssimi Theologi domini Martini Bucer, &c. Epistola duæ*. Lond. 1551. 4°. printed in Bucer's Scripta Anglicana. He also wrote an Epicædium on the death of that learned man (28). VI. Carmen heroicum, or Epitaphium, in Antonium Deneium clarissimum virum.

Lond. 4° (29). This Sir Anthony Denny was originally of St John's College in Cambridge, and a learned man; afterwards he became one of the Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber, and Groom of the Stole to King Henry VIII, and one of the executors of his will.
VII. De Pronuntiatione Græcæ potissimum linguæ dis-putationes, &c. See above, note [B]. Basl. 1555, 8°. VIII. De superstitione ad regem Henricum. This discourse on superstition was drawn up for King Henry's use, in order to excite that Prince to a thorough Reformation of religion. It is written in very elegant Latin, and was prefixed by the author, as a dedication, to a Latin translation of his, of Plutarch's book of Superstition. A copy of this discourse, in manuscript, is still preserved in the library of University College, Oxon, curiously writ, and bound-up in cloth of silver;
which makes it probable, that it was the very book that was presented to the King. An English translation of it, done by the learned W. Elstob, formerly Fellow of that college, was published by Mr Strype, at the end of his Life of Sir John Cheke. IX. Several Letters of his, are published in the Life just now mentioned (30), and perhaps in other places. X. A Latin translation of Archbishop Cranmer's book on the Lord's Supper; was also done by Sir John Cheke; and printed in 1553. XI. He likewise translated Leo de apparatus bellico. Basl. 1554. 8°.

Those pieces of his that are lost, or else were never printed, are these. I. De Fide justificante. Of justifying faith; undoubtedly against the Papists. II. De Eucharistia sacramento. On the Eucharist: Probably his conferences with Dr Feckenham, as mentioned above note [F]. III. In quosdam Psalmos. IV. In Psalmum, Domine probasti, &c. These Mr Strype supposes to be some pious meditations of his on those psalms (31). V. De cineribus & palmis. Ad Wintonniensem. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was earnest with the Protector, for retaining the old usages in the Church; particularly, sprinkling of ashes on Ash Wednesday, and carrying palms on Palm-Sunday. Perhaps, this tract of Cheke was an answer to Gardiner's letter on that subject to the Duke of Somerset (32).
VI. De Ecclesiâ; An potest errare? Of the Church;
whether it can err? Still extant among J. Fox's manuscripts. It is a dispute against the Romanists, under these three questions, whether there be a Church?

what the Church is? and, whether it can err? VII.
An liceat nubere post divorcium? Whether a woman may marry after being divorced? A case much handled in those times. VIII. De nativitate Principis. On the Prince's nativity. The author of Heroologia Anglicana will have this to be a panegyric on the Prince's birth: and so accordingly Mr Wood entitles it, Panegyric in nativitatem Edwardi Principis (33). But Mr Strype more truly supposes, that it was some private calculation of Prince Edward's nativity, an art in which Cheke had great skill, and depended on too much. IX. Introductio Grammaticæ, an introduction to Grammar. X. De ludimagistrorum officio. Of the duty of schoolmasters. These two were probably writ by him for the use of his royal pupil, the Prince. XI.
Elegia de Agrotatione & obitu R. Edwar. 6. An elegy on the sickness and death of King Edward 6.
There is an English elegy, much of the same nature as this, printed in the Heroologia; but Mr Strype does not seem to believe it to be his (34). XII. Epitaphia.
Epitaphs. Besides his epitaph on Sir Anthony Denny, mentioned above; and a Greek epitaph for his sister Mary, wife of Sir William Cecil (35): Mr Strype supposes, he also was author of the inscription on the monument of his patron Dr Butts, in Fulham-Church; and on his father-in-law, Richard Hill, in St Michael's Queen-Hith, London. XIII. He also translated from Greek into Latin. 1. Five books of Josephus's Antiquities. 2. The Ascetic of Maximus the monk. 3.
Plutarch of superstition. 4. Three of Demosthenes his Philippics. 5. And his three Olynthiacs. 6. His oration against Leptines. 7. The orations of Demosthenes and Æschines, on the two opposite sides. 8.
Aristotle de Anima. 9. He translated Sophocles and Euripides literally. 10. And made corrections on Herodotus, Thucydides, Plato, Xenophon, and other authors. Finally, he collected the arguments and reasons of both sides, upon the business of the Eucharist; at the time that point was learnedly and largely debated in parliament, when the Communion-book was appointed. Mr Strype supposes, he wrote many other things, which are unknown to us at this distance.
But, adds he, this is sufficient to inform us what a scholar he was (36).

[S] In the orthography, and pronunciation, of the Greek and Latin languages, he was very critical and exact. What he did with regard to the Greek, hath
tin; that it might be spoken truly, and the syllables in reading pronounced long or short, according to their nature, he devised a way to write the vowels according to their quantity. Namely the long vowel O, after this manner ω, like a Greek omega, as in Uxorem, Liberωs.
And the long I, with two titles over it, as in Divinitus; and as for the long E, especially the Diphthong, which before was commonly writ as the ordinary E, he put a tail to it, as in Lector (37).

[T] And also took great pains to correct, regulate, and improve—the English. Namely in these following particulars. 1. He would have no E put to the end of words, as being needless and unexpressive of any sounds; for instance, in these words, excus, giro, deceiv, prais, commū: Unless where it is sounded, and then to be writ with a double E, as in necessitee.
2. Where the letter A was sounded long, he would have it writ with a double A, in distinction from A short; as in maad, sraat, daar. 3. Where the letter I was sounded long, to be writ with a double I, as in

in desir, lif. 4. He entirely threw the letter Y out of the alphabet, as useles, and supplid it with I, as mi, fai, awai. 5. U long he wrote with a stroke over it, as in præsum. 6. The rest of the long vowels he would have to be written with double letters, as weer, theer, (and sometimes theear), noo, noon, adoo, thoo, loov, to avoid an E at the end. 7. Letters without found he threw out, as in these words, frutes, wold, faut, dout, again for against, hole, meen for mean. And, 8. Changed the spelling in some words, to make them the better expressive of the sounds; as in gud, britil, praisabil, &c. He also had better skill in our language to judge of the phrases, and properties of words, and to divide sentences, than any else then had: And was thought to have greatly improved the language by a practice he had, when he read his Greek lectures, to take the book, and only looking upon the book, to read it in English. He further brought in a short and expressive way of writing, without long and intricate periods. And moreover in what he writ himself, he would allow no words, but such as were true English, or of Saxon original; suffering no adoption of any foreign word into the English language; which he thought was copious enough of itself, without borrowing words from other countries. This made him dislike the then English translation of the Bible, because there were in it so many foreign words, and to undertake a new one. He went through the Gospel of St Matthew, and began that of St Mark; wherein all along he laboured to use only true English Saxon words, though they were sometimes odd and uncouth; as for instance, desirful, ungreuous, tollers for publicans, &c. The original under his own hand still remains in the MS. Library at Benet College, Cambridge. A specimen whereof follows. Matth. I. ver. 8.— ‘After his mother Mari was en- fured to Joseph, before thei weer cupled together, she was preived to be with child; and it was indeed by the Holi Ghoost. 19. But Joseph her busband, being a just man, and loth to use extremitie toward her, entended privili to divorce himself from her. 20. And being in this mind, lo the angel of the Lord appeared by dream, &c. Chap. II. ver. 16. Then Herod seeing that he was plaid withal by the wife-heards,’ &c.— Lastly, Sir John Cheke brought in a fair and graceful way of writing; for he wrote himself an excellent and accurate hand, as did also the best scholars in those times, namely Smith, Cecil, and especially Ascham. So that fair writing, and good learning seem to have begun in England together (38). C

CHICHELEY or CHICHELY (HENRY) Archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Henry V, and VI, was born, of an obscure family, at Higham-Ferrars in Northamptonshire (a). He was educated in Grammar learning at Winchester-School (b), and afterwards became Fellow of New-College in Oxford, where he took the degree of Doctor in the Civil and Canon Law. He was next Chaplain to Robert Medford, Bishop of Salisbury, who, about the year 1402, preferred him to the Archdeaconry of Salisbury [A], which he exchanged, two years after, for the Chancellorship of that diocese [B]. His eminent qualifications being now generally taken notice of, he was employed by King Henry IV in several important negotiations. He was sent Ambassador to Pope Gregory XII, to congratulate him on his advancement to the papacy (c). The Bishoprick of St David's becoming vacant during his absence, he was promoted to that See by the Pope, who consecrated him with his own hands at Sienna, the 4th of October 1407 [C]. He returned into England in April following, and on the 26th of August made profession of canonical obedience in the Cathedral Church of Canterbury. In the beginning of the year 1409, he was deputed by the Synod of London, with Robert Hallum, Bishop of Salisbury, and the Prior of Canterbury, to the General Council of Pisa, held for the putting an end to the schism of the Church (d). After the breaking up of that Council, Bishop Chicheley returned into England, and was present in two Synods holden at London in 1410 and 1411 (e). In 1413, he was sent by King Henry V Ambassador, together with Richard, Earl of Warwick, first to the King of France, and then to the Duke of Burgundy, for concluding a truce between England and France, then at war (f). And being returned into England, he was sent again in the same year, with the Earl of Warwick, to demand the Duke of Burgundy's daughter in marriage for King Henry (g). The next year 1414, upon the death of Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, our Bishop of St David's was translated by virtue of the Pope's bull, to the Archiepiscopal See [D]. The

[A] He was preferred to the Archdeaconry of Salisbury. The learned Dr Duck tells us (1), that one Walter Fitzperes, a priest, commenced a suit against him for this dignity, claiming it by virtue of a Grant from King Henry IV, under the Great Seal. But, the cause being brought by appeal before Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archdeaconry was adjudged to Henry Chicheley by the Auditor of the Archbishop's court, who was deputed with full power to determine this affair.

[B] He exchanged it for the Chancellorship of that diocese. He made this exchange with Walter Medford, the Bishop of Salisbury's brother, who enjoyed that dignity; which was allowed to be lawful by the constitutions of the Canon Law: and having both quitted their several dignities, Henry was made Chancellor, and Walter Archdeacon. There was annexed to the Chancellorship the Parsonage of Odyham in the diocese of Winchester, which was then vacant, and was given him by the Bishop, and he was immediately put in possession of it by the Custos Rotulorum of the See of Winchester, which was then vacant by the death of William Wickham (2). Here it may be proper to observe from the same author (3), that these two pre-ferments (the Archdeaconry and Chancellorship) were both given him by the Bishop of Salisbury, who always highly esteemed him, and when he died, which was about three years after, left him by will a golden cup with a cover, and appointed him the chief of his executors.

[C] He was consecrated the 4th of October 1407. Bishop Godwin (4) assigns the 12th of June 1409, which is almost two years later, for the time of his consecration. But, if he was deputed, in quality of Bishop of St David's, to the Synod of Pisa, in the beginning of the year 1409 (5), it is plain his consecration to that See must have preceded that date: and therefore I adhere to the authority of the Life-writer in this point.

[D] He was translated, by virtue of the Pope's bull, to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury. Upon the death of Archbishop Arundel, John Woodneburgh, Prior of Canterbury, and the monks of that church, desired the King's leave for electing a new Archbishop; which prerogative, the learned author of Chicheley's Life affirms, the Kings of England had challenged to themselves since the time of Edward III, who took it away from the Pope, and constituted Bishops by his own authority;

The King delivered to him the temporalities the 30th of May, and, on the 29th of June following (b), the pall was delivered to him by the Bishops of Winchester and Norwich, delegated by the Pope for that purpose, with great solemnity, in the presence of the King and many of the Nobility, at the King's palace of Sutton (i): at which time he took an oath of obedience and fidelity to the Pope [E]. In a Parliament held the same year at Leicester, Archbishop Chichley persuaded King Henry V to assert his title to the Crown of France [F]. On the 28th of November 1415, he held a Provincial Synod at London [G], and another on the 1st of April 1416 [H]; after the breaking up

thority; and that these royal elections were agreeable to the constitutions of the Canon Law (6). But this seems to be a mistake: for the author of the Antiquity of the British Church expressly tells us, that, at the very time we are speaking of, notwithstanding the laws in being against Papal provisions, the many royal proclamations and petitions of the Clergy, and even the threats of the nobility and people, against obtaining those provisions for bishopricks and other benefices, they were still suffered and obtained, with as much licence and impunity, as if there were no law forbidding them. Legē atque sanctionē jam diu ante contra Papales provisiones lata, multisque regum decretis & clerici intercessionibus, procerumque & populi minis interpositis, ne impetrarentur a Papa episcopatum & beneficiorum provisiones; ea tamen adhibere impunitate ac licentia permittē atque obtentæ sunt, ac si nullo jure vetari putarentur (7). The King's leave being obtained under the Great Seal, the monks assembled in the Chapter-House, and, after divine service, and a sermon, proceeded to the choice of an Archbishop; and, the election unanimously falling upon Chichley, it was declared by John Langdon, one of the monks, in the name of the rest, to the people, who were assembled in the church in great numbers. The same day two of the monks, William Moleth and John Moland, were appointed proxies for the rest; who, on the 15th of March, waited upon the Bishop at London, and acquainted him with the humble request of the prior and monks, that he would take upon him the government of the church of Canterbury. He desired a day's time to consider of it; and the next day, when they came to him again in the Bishop of Norwich's house, in the presence of Edward Duke of York, and several of the nobility, he expressly told them, he could not gratify their request without the Pope's consent, to whose arbitration he referred their petition. Whereupon the prior and the monks, by their proxies, sent to Rome, humbly requested of Pope John XXIII, that he would confirm their election of the Bishop of St David's to the See of Canterbury. The King also signified to his Holiness, that he had granted leave to the Chapter of Canterbury to elect an Archbishop. The Pope, who was then at Bologna, would not confirm the election of the monks, but, on the 27th of April, in virtue of his own authority, translated Chichley by way of Provision (*), to the Archbishoprick (8). The author of the Antiquity of the British Church tells us, that the Pope, resolving to keep fast hold of the right of nominating to benefices, by way of Papal Provision, and not to depart from it by any disguise, or by permitting any contrary acts, signified to the monks of Canterbury by letter, that he had referred to himself the collation to the See of Canterbury, before the death of Thomas Arundel, and that he annulled whatever they, or any other persons, might have done in prejudice of his Provision. However he collated, by his Bull of Provision, the same Henry Chichley, whom they had elected, to the archiepiscopal see. Papa vero Joannes vicessimus tertius, ut provisionis usu captionem teneret mordicus, nec ab ea desuetudine ulla aut contrariis tolerandis actibus recederet, monachis Cantuariensibus rescripsit; Cantuariensis Archiepiscopatus collationem suæ provisioni ante mortem Thomæ Arundel fuisse reservatam; seque irritum ac inane decrevisse, quicquid ab his, aut aliis quibuscumque, in suæ provisionis prejudicium fieret. Tum Archiepiscopatum eidem Henrico Chicheley provisionis sui prætextu donavit (9).

[E] He took an oath of obedience and fidelity to the Pope.] It was conceived in the following terms (10). I, Henry, Archbishop of Canterbury, will be faithful, and obedient to St Peter, to the holy Apostolical Church of Rome, and to my Lord John the twenty-third, and his successors that shall be canonically elected. I will not consent to, nor engage in any design against their life, limbs, or liberty. The secrets that they shall entrust me with, either by themselves, by their legates, or by letters, I will not reveal to any one to their prejudice. I will assist them in maintaining and defending the Papacy, and the rights of St Peter, against all persons whatsoever, as far as is consistent with the privileges of my own station. I will honourably attend the Legate of the Apostolical See both at his coming and return, and will supply his necessities. When I am called to a Council, I will come, unless hindered by some lawful impediment. I will visit the Apostolical Palace every three years, either in my own person, or by my deputy, unless excused by leave from the Pope. The possessions belonging to my Archiepiscopal See I will not sell, nor give away, nor mortgage, nor grant any new infeoffments of them, nor any other way alienate them without the consent of the Pope. So help me God, and his holy Gospel. This tie of canonical obedience to the Pope seeming to bear hard upon the duty of a subject, and to contain several clauses not reconcilable to the oath of allegiance, the Archbishop, when he did homage to the King, was obliged to renounce all clauses in the Pope's bull of translation, or any other engagements to that See, which were prejudicial to the royal prerogative (11).

(11) Id. ib. p. 43.

[F] He persuaded King Henry V to assert his title to the Crown of France.] King Henry having demanded of the Parliament a subsidy, the Commons thereupon revived a former project against the wealth of the Clergy, and addressed the King to seize their revenues, and apply them to the service of the publick. The Archbishop, apprehensive of the Church's danger, and fearing the King's youth might be surprized by the plausibleness of the bill, advised the Clergy to make an offer of a large subsidy, and to put the King in mind of his title to the Crown of France; the starting a new enterprise, and opening the prospect to another Crown, being the most likely way to divert the storm. Most of the writers of that age relate, that the Archbishop, upon this occasion, called a Synod at London: but none of it's decrees are now to be found among the publick records. The Archbishop's expedient being approved, he prepared himself for the subject, and addressed himself in a speech to the King, sitting on his throne. He began with insinuating the virtues of the King, saying, he was worthy to wear, not the Crown of England only, but that of the whole world. Then he represented to him, 'That it was inconsistent with his glory to let the French King peaceably enjoy Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, Maine, and part of Guienne, all those provinces having been taken away from the Kings of England by merc force, and upon frivolous pretences: that he had not only an incontestable right to these countries, but even might very justly pretend to the whole kingdom of France, in quality of heir and successor of Edward III.' Here the Archbishop made a long deduction of the reasons upon which the King's title was founded. He speaks of the Salique Law as a mere chimera, supported upon no good foundation, and which, being contrary to natural right, could not be admitted, even supposing it to be as true, as it was imaginary (†).

[G] He held a Provincial Synod at London, the 28th of November, 1415.] The first day of their meeting was taken up in religious assemblies. The following days, the Bishops and Abbots met in St Mary's chapel, and the Priors, Deans, Archdeacons, and Proctors of the several Dioceses, withdrew into the Chapter-House, where they consulted separately about the affairs of the Church; from whence (says my author) they are generally called, The Upper and Lower House of Convocation.

[H] ——— Another Synod on the 1st of April 1416.] This Synod was held, to consult with the Bishops and Clergy about sending Delegates to the Council of Constance (12).

(†) The Archbishop, or whoever made the Speech for him, forgot, that, without the Salique Law, Edward III himself could have no pretension to the crown of France.

of which, the Archbishop went over into France to the King (k). He came back soon after with the King from Calais, and, by the King's command, held a third Synod at London on the 9th of November 1416 [I]. The King being again departed for France, the Archbishop commanded all the Bishops of his province to cause processions to be made in all churches and chapels, for the safety of the King, and the success of his arms (l). The same year, he exercised the power of ecclesiastical censures, in a remarkable manner, against the Lord and Lady Strange [K]. On the 26th of November 1417, he held a fourth Synod at London [L], upon a command from the King by letters out of France (m). Towards the end of this year, the Archbishop repaired to the King at Rouen in Normandy, and was appointed one of the Commissioners for treating a peace between England and France (n). He staid some time with the King at Rouen, being entertained in a Convent of preaching Fryars there, and afterwards attended his Majesty in his camp at Meudon and Pontoise; whence he returned into England about the end of August 1419 (o). On the 30th of October that year, he held a fifth Synod at London [M]; after which he again ordered processions to be made to all churches for the King's success in France (p). On the 10th of June 1420, the Archbishop took shipping at Winchelsea, and sailed over to France, to congratulate the King upon his late marriage with Catharine of France, and was present in the King's camp at the siege of Melun; after the surrender of which, he accompanied the King to Paris; from whence he returned into England about the end of November (q). The next year 1421, he solemnly crowned Queen Catharine (r), and about that time called a sixth Synod at London [N]; after the breaking up of which, he used some endeavours to unite the Churches of France and England [O]. In December that year, he christened the young Prince Henry, afterwards King Henry VI, who, when he came to the Crown, used to call the Archbishop godfather, and always paid him a great deal of respect (s). On the 4th of August 1422, the Archbishop held a seventh Synod at London [P]. In the first Parliament after the death of Henry V. held at Westminster the ninth of November 1422 (t), Archbishop Chichley was commanded by the Protector to declare the cause of their meeting [Q], and was likewise nominated

[I] He held a third Synod at London on the 9th of November 1416. In this Synod, at the request of Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, the Earl Marshal, and Henry Ware, Keeper of the Privy-Seal, who for that purpose were sent thither by the King, he prevailed with the Clergy to grant the King two tenths for his expedition into France. There was nothing else done in this Synod, but the appointing the days of John Beverley, and of Crispin and Crispianus, on which the battle of Agincourt was fought, to be holy days (13).

[K] He exercised the power of ecclesiastical censures — against the Lord and Lady Strange. The affair was this. On Easter-Day, the Lord Strange, with the Lady Elizabeth his wife, and a great train of servants attending them, came to St Dunstan's Church to Vespers; and meeting Sir John Trussel there, between whom and the Lord Strange there had been an ancient quarrel, the Lord Strange's servants drew their swords in the church, wounded Sir John, his son, and some others of his family, and killed one Thomas Petwardy a citizen of London, who, to accommodate the matter between them, had thrust himself into the scuffle. The affair being brought before the Archbishop, he interdicted the church, as having been polluted with blood, and publicly excommunicated the authors and accomplices of the crime at Paul's Cross. And sitting as Judge in St Paul's Church, after he had examined the fact, he obliged the Lord Strange and his Lady to ask the Church's pardon on their knees before him, and imposed this farther penance on them, that their servants in their shirts and drawers only, and he and his wife with tapers in their hands, should walk through the great street of the city from St Paul's to St Dunstan's: which was accordingly performed with great solemnity, and, when the Archbishop purified St Dunstan's church, the Lady Strange filled the vessels with water; and each of them were commanded to offer a pyx and an altar-cloth (14).

[L] He held a fourth Synod at London the 26th of November 1417. In this Synod were present Thomas Bishop of Durham, Lord Chancellor of England; Thomas Beaufort Duke of Exeter, Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, and Ralph Nevil Earl of Westmorland; being sent by the Regent, John Duke of Bedford, to desire of the Clergy a supply of money for the King, who was then carrying on the war successfully in France; which being seconded by the Archbishop, they granted two tenths.

[M] He held a fifth Synod at London the 30th of October 1417. It was summoned, that the Clergy might consult about granting a supply of money to the King, who was carrying on the war in France with success. The Synod granted half a tenth upon all livings; and it was also agreed, that those that held chapels or chantries, or that received stipends for saying mass, should pay to the King six shillings and eight pence each: but withal a publick protestation was made by William Lyndewood, in the name of the Proctors for the Clergy, that this concession should be no prejudice to them hereafter, nor be made a precedent for succeeding ages (15).

[N] He called a sixth Synod at London. He obtained of them a tenth for the service of the King; which was granted upon some conditions, put in by William Lyndewood, in the name of the Proctors for the Clergy. They were these: That the King's purveyors should not meddle with the goods of the Clergy; that they should not be committed to prison, but upon manifest conviction of theft or murder; that for all other crimes, they should only find sureties for their appearance at their trial, but should not be imprisoned; and that it should be felony to geld a priest: all which the King confirmed in parliament (16).

[O] He endeavoured to unite the Churches of France and England. To this end, he recalled those judges he had placed, to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in most of the dioceses conquered by the King; and by his letters commanded all the people of France, that for the future they should obey their Bishops, and the Ordinaries of the places in which they lived (17).

[P] He held a seventh Synod at London the 4th of August 1422. In this Synod, several Bishops, and others of the Clergy, were appointed to represent the English nation at the Council of Pavia (18).

[Q] He was commanded by the Protector to declare the cause of their meeting. This he did in a set speech, wherein, having spoken largely in praise of the virtues of King Henry V, and made honourable mention of his actions in France, he came to speak of the young King, and affirmed, 'That it was by the special favour of Almighty God, that a son of such promising hopes should succeed so great a father; that his very title of the Sixth was attended with a lucky omen; for, as the number Six was the most complete of all the rest, because in so many days God Almighty had made this vast fabric of the world; so this King Henry, the sixth of that name, would prove the greatest of all his predecessors, and compleat what his father had so prosperously begun in France; and that, as he was descended both from the Kings of England and France, so he would at length enjoy both those crowns, which were devolved to him by lawful inheritance.' Then the Arch-nominated to be the first Privy-Counsellor during the minority of the King: but he chose to decline publick business, and retired within the bounds of his province, in which he performed the duties of his function with great diligence. The next year 1423, by virtue of his metropolitcal authority, he visited the dioceses of Chichester and Salisbury, and the year following that of Lincoln. About this time he founded a noble college at Higham-Ferrers, the place of his birth, in honour of the Virgin Mary, St Thomas of Canterbury, and King Edward the Confessor, for eight Fellows, four Clerks, six Choristers, and over them all a Master, to pray for the souls of the deceased. He also built a large hospital, for the maintenance of the poor of that place. Both these foundations he endowed with ample revenues, which were afterwards augmented with great legacies by his brothers Robert and William Chichley, Aldermen of London (u). He held an eighth Synod at London, the 12th of October 1423 [R], and a ninth the 23d of April following [S]. The same year, he was very instrumental in healing the differences between the Protector Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, and Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester (w). He held a tenth Synod at London, the 15th of April 1426 [T]. About this time Pope Martin shewed his displeasure against our Archbishop [U], for having vigorously opposed the encroachments of the See of Rome (x). bishop declared, in the King's name, to the Peers, and all the people, 'That they should enjoy all the privileges and immunities granted them by his Highness's predecessors; and that he was commanded to give them three reasons for calling this Parliament; which were, 'That governors might be assigned the King by a publick act; that they might consult about the peace of the realm, and the administration of justice; and that they might provide for the defence of the kingdom against the insults of foreign enemies.' Lastly, he exhorted them, from the example of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, 'To make choice of the best and wisest of the nobility, to take upon them the government of the King and kingdom, and to use their utmost endeavours for the safety of the King, and the benefit of their country (19).

[U] Pope Martin V. shewed his displeasure against the Archbishop.] The state of this affair is briefly this. His Holiness, it seems, thought this prelate to blame for having made no opposition to the statute of Premunire i Henry IV. But, Henry V being the greatest Prince in Christendom, the Pope did not think it advisable to remonstrate in his time. But now, the English affairs being somewhat upon the decline, he laid hold of the opportunity, and expostulated severely with the Archbishop for his remissness, in a letter dated December the 5th, 1426 (22). If it be asked, what was Chichley's peculiar guilt in this matter, since he could not oppose a statute, which was passed before his time; and why his predecessors Courtney and Arundel were not reprimanded upon this score: the answer is, that the Pope seems to have had a peculiar grudge against Chichley; first, because that prelate, in his first Synod, had moved for the annulling Papal Exemptions (23); and, in the next place, because he had written to King Henry V to stop the Cardinalate of the Bishop of Winchester (24). Besides, the Pope had been hitherto greatly embroiled by schisms: but now Pope Martin, having got the better of his competitors, had time to look about him (25). The Archbishop, not willing the matter should come to extremities, sent an excuse of his conduct to Rome. But the Pope, it seems, was not satisfied with this answer; for his Holiness's next letter is still more severe, and suspends the Archbishop's legantine power. Upon which Chichley appealed from the Pope to the next General Council, and, if none met, to the tribunal of Christ (26). The Pope's next to the Archbishop was dated the sixth of May, and requires him to make his utmost effort for repealing the statute. He is likewise severely reprimanded for having said, the Pope's zeal in this matter was only to raise a good sum of money upon the English (27). The next letter is in a still higher strain. It is directed to the two Archbishops, and, to mortify Chichley, the Archbishop of York is named first. In this the Supremacy flies a very lofty pitch: for his Holiness pretends to make void the statutes of Provisors and Premunire made in the reigns of Edward III and Richard II, and commands the Archbishops never to act upon the authority of those statutes. It is dated the 8th of December (28). To mollify the Pope's displeasure, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Durham, and Lincoln, wrote in Chichley's behalf.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Ibid.

The University of Oxford likewise interceded for him with Pope Martin, in a letter bearing date the 24th of July that year; in which, after giving him a very extraordinary character, calling him the mirror of life, the light of manners, a person most dear to the people and clergy, and a golden candlestick set up in the Church of England, they besought his Holiness, that he would not suffer the credit of so eminent a prelate to be blasted by the secret calumnies of detractors (29). To which purpose also, in the Parliament at Westminster (30), the House of Commons petitioned the King to send an ambassador to the court of Rome to intercede with the Pope in behalf of the Archbishop (31). These apologetical applications the Archbishop sent by an express to Rome, and wrote a very submissive letter to the Pope, protesting that he had done, and would still do, his utmost towards repealing those statutes. One passage in his letter is particularly remarkable. He tells the Pope, he hears he had proceeded to a sentence against him, which had never been done from the days of St Augustin (32) to that time: that he knew this only by report, having not so much as opened the bulls, which contained the censure, because he had been commanded by the King to lodge those instruments, with the seals whole, in the Paper-Office, 'till the meeting of the Parliament (33). The Archbishop had already moved the Commons to vote for the repeal of the Premunire act. But the Commons, after debating the matter, had come to no resolution, either for repealing or explaining that act (34). And here the matter rested for that time.

[W] He held an eleventh Synod at London, the 5th of July, 1428.] In their first session, at the request of the Archbishop of York Lord Chancellor, and Walter Hungerford Lord Treasurer, they granted the King half a tenth. This Synod was prorogued, by reason of the excessive heat of the summer, to St Martin's day in November following; and then again to the 29th of October the next year: at which time, the Archbishop of York, with some other Lords, was sent to them again from the King; at whose request, a tenth and a half was granted, and solemn processions were ordered to be made for the success of the war. These liberal concessions were rewarded by an Act of Parliament, granting the Clergy, assembled in Convocation, the privilege, as was enjoyed by members of Parliament, of being exempted, they and their servants, from arrests (35).

[Z] — A thirteenth, the 15th of September, 1432. It was summoned in relation to the dissension between Pope Eugenius IV and the Council of Basil; and it was unanimously concluded to send Delegates to the Fathers at Basil, and others to his Holiness at Bologna; and, for the expences thereof, they voted a penny in the pound out of all the profits of the Clergy, besides the two pence granted by the former Synod. They likewise granted the King half a tenth (37).

(37) Ibid. p. 144.

[Z] — A fourteenth, the 7th of November, 1433. It was called on occasion of the differences still subsisting between the Pope and the Council; and it was resolved to nominate more Delegates, many of those, who were sent before, being dead at Basil: whereupon eight Doctors of Divinity and Law were chosen, to be sent to Basil, provided the Fathers would admit them without imposing upon them any new oath. In this Synod, three quarters of a tenth were granted to the King towards re-establishing the affairs of France, which declined daily. (38).

(38) Id. ibid. p. 150, 151.

[AA] — A fifteenth, the 7th of October, 1434. About this time, the Clergy complained grievously of the proceedings of the King's Judges, and the Common Lawyers; 'That, against all law and equity, priests were brought before the secular courts; that the power of the ecclesiastical judges was restrained by their unjust prohibitions; and particularly that they wrested the statute of Richard II against Provisors, to the prejudice of the Ecclesiastical Courts' The Archbishop hereupon, in a pathetic speech to the Synod, expressed how solicitous he was that the Church should receive no prejudice under his government, and that it might be delivered from the illegal oppression of the Lawyers, and be restored to its ancient dignity; and commanded them to consider, what measures were to be taken to ease the Clergy of the weight of those oppressions? But, the plague breaking out in the city, the Synod was soon dissolved, having only appointed a holiday to be kept in honour of St Tridevide, Protectores of the University of Oxford, and denounced excommunication (39), against all those that should detract from the privileges and jurisdiction of the Church (40).

(39) See the remark [CG].

[BB] — And a sixteenth the 30th of April, 1437. This Synod did nothing more than grant the King a tenth for carrying on the war in France (41).

(40) Ar. Duck, ib. p. 153; and M. Parker, ib. p. 419.

[CC] He founded the convent of St Bernard. The Archbishop had a long time designed to erect some noble monument, for the service of religion and learning, and for his own glory, at Oxford, the place of his education. For, at that time, the estates of private persons, as well as the publick revenues, being greatly exhausted by the long continuance of the French war, the University was so thin and empty, that most of the colleges and halls were quite forsaken by the students. Wherefore, that he might by his bounty repair the decays of learning occasioned by the general poverty of the kingdom, he gave orders for building a large and stately edifice, of a square form, in a north part of the suburbs of Oxford, which he designed for a college. But, when the work was almost finished, whether it was, that he found fault with the structure, or did not like the situation of it, he changed his mind, and gave it to the monks of St Bernard, for the reception of novices out of all the convents of that order, to study the Arts and Divinity. Afterwards, at the dissolution of the monasteries, it was purchased by Sir Thomas White, merchant of London, who founded there the college of St John Baptist (42).

another place for building a college, very commodious for the students, in the middle of the town, near St Mary's church, and pulled down the houses, which stood there, he laid out a square court; and on the 10th of February 1437, the first stone of this auspicious building was laid, and the inspection of the work was committed to the care of one John Druel, a clergyman, who executed that trust with great integrity and diligence (43). The walls of this new structure were finished about the latter end of the year 1439, and the workmen had begun to lay the roof. The Archbishop had purchased lands and manors for the perpetual maintenance of his foundation: all which he acquainted the King with, and humbly besought him to permit, that the college might be founded in his name, because the lawyers were of opinion, that the splendor and authority of the King's name was of great importance towards founding a college in due and lawful manner. Whereupon the King, by his letters patent under the Great Seal, erected this building into a college, and granted it very large privileges. He also gave the founder leave to place in it a Warden and Fellows, and to make laws and statutes for the government of the society. Upon which the Archbishop went the next year to Oxford, where he solemnly consecrated the chapel of his college, and made Richard Andrew, Doctor of Laws, and Chancellor of Canterbury, Warden of it. He also appointed twenty Fellows, being all choice men pick'd out of the whole University; to whom he gave power to elect into their society twenty more: out of which number he ordered that twenty-four should study Divinity and the liberal sciences, and the other sixteen the Civil and Canon Law. He also commanded all the members of his foundation to pray for the souls of King Henry V, of Thomas Duke of Clarence, and of the nobility and common soldiers that had been killed in the French war. For which cause he ordered his college to be called The College of All-Souls departed in the faith. He added also two chaplains, several choristers, and servants. After this he prescribed them laws and statutes, and committed the care of beautifying and enlarging it to Robert Keyes, afterwards Warden (44).

[EE] In 1438, he held a seventeenth Synod at London. The King having appointed some persons of eminent quality to go Ambassadors to the Council of Ferrara, the Bishops voted them an allowance suitable to their rank; which however was not complied with by the Proctors for the Clergy in the Lower House, who were more inclined in favour of the Council of Basil; only the Proctors for the Convents granted four pence in the pound out of their revenues. In this Synod the Archbishop complained heavily of a late injury offered him by Pope Eugenius, who, by his sole authority had given the Bishoprick of Ely in commendam to Lewis Archbishop of Rouen, and by his bull had confirmed him in the government of that See; and therefore he recommended it to the Synod to consider, how to put a stop to a proceeding, which had never been attempted by any Pope before. But Philip Morgan, who was then Bishop of Ely, outliving the Archbishop of Rouen, the Pope's design was frustrated (45).

[FF] — And an eighteenth, the 21st of November, 1439. The Archbishop, being hindered by some indisposition, was not at the opening of this Synod. However, a few days after, he came, and in a long speech, in which he could hardly refrain from tears, he reckoned up the miseries of the Church, proceeding from the penalties daily inflicted by the ecclesiastical judges, which by the statute of Premunire were designed against Provisors; and from the citations of the clergy to the secular courts. Whereupon it was unanimously agreed, that the Archbishop should present a remonstrance to the King upon the subject of these grievances. Which being done, the King answered, 'That he would lay their petition before the next Parliament, and that in the mean time he would take care that no one should be molested by his Judges upon the account the same time, drew up a form of excommunication [GG], ordering it to be published in all the cathedral and parochial churches of his province (a). He was the first, who ordered the Proctors of the Court of Arches to wear the same habit in Court that Bachelors of Arts do in the Universities (b). He was a very liberal benefactor to the University of Oxford [HH], and to the church of Canterbury [II], and contributed largely towards the building of Croydon church, and Rochester bridge (c). This gracious answer of the King's so pleased the Synod, that they immediately granted him a whole tenth, with this express condition, that the revenues and benefices belonging to the college of All-Souls (of which the Archbishop was the founder) should not be included in the concession (46).

[HH] He was a benefactor to the University of Oxford. There had been begun some time before, by the munificence chiefly of the Duke of Gloucester, a lofty and magnificent structure; the upper part of which was designed for a library, and the lower for the Publick Divinity Schools. To this work the Archbishop gave a great sum of money himself, and was very earnest in soliciting all the Bishops and Peers, who came to the Parliament at Westminster, to contribute towards it: all which is gratefully acknowledged by the University in their letters to him (49). He gave also two hundred marks to the publick chest of the University; which he ordered to be kept by three Masters of Arts, two Regents, and one Non-Regent, who were to be chosen yearly, and were bound by an oath to the faithful discharge of that trust: out of which money the University might borrow for the publick use five pounds, every particular college five marks, a Master of Arts forty shillings, a Licentiate or Bachelor two marks, and an Under-Graduate one; with this condition, that every one should deposit a sufficient pawn, which, if the money were not repaid within a month, was to be forfeited. Besides which benefactions, it appeared by his private accounts, that he had allowed yearly stipends to several poor students. And, to perpetuate the memory of these favours, it was ordered by a publick decree of the University, that Archbishop Chichley's name should be registered among their benefactors, and read every year in the Publick Schools by the chaplain of the University; and that a solemn mass should be said for him on the anniversary of his death (50).

The inscription on his monument is as follows (52). *Hic jacet Henricus Chichele Legum doctor, quondam Cancellarius Sarum, qui anno septimo Henrici IV Regis ad Gregorium Papam XII in ambasciata transmissus, in civitate Senensi per manus ejusdem Papæ in Menevensem Episcopum consecratus est. CHICHESTER (ARTHUR) a brave officer in the XVIth century, and made Lord Deputy of Ireland, and Baron of Belfast [A] in the beginning of the XVIIth, was born at Raleigh, near Barnstaple in the county of Devon (a). Some part of his youth he spent in the university, but that being too sedentary a life for his active genius, he went into

[A] CHICHESTER (ARTHUR) a brave officer in the sixteenth century, &c.] The family of Chichester hath flourished for many generations at Raleigh above-mentioned. Arthur, who is the subject of this article, was the second son of Sir John Chichester, of that place, Knight, by Gertrude his wife, daughter of Sir William Courtenay of Powderham, Knight. They had a very numerous issue; namely, five sons, four whereof were knights, and one, (viz. Arthur) was made a Baron: And eight daughters, all married into the chiefest families in those parts. 1. Elizabeth to Hugh Fortescue of Pillegh, Esq; 2. Dorothy to Sir Hugh Pollard of King's Nampton, Knight. 3. Eleanor to Sir Arthur Basset of UMBERLEGH, Knight. 4. Mary to Richard Blewet of Holcomb-roguis, Esq; 5. Cecilia to Thomas Hatch of Aller, Esq; 6. Susanna to John Fortescue of Buckland Pillegh, Esq; 7. Bridget to Sir Edmund Prideaux of Farway, Baronet; all in Devonshire. And, 8. Urith to — Trevillian of Nettcomb in Somersetshire, Esq; (1).

into the wars [B]; and at every place where his Sovereign's service required, there he was, by sea and land, in England and in France; in the last of which, for some signal exploit done by him in the presence of King Henry IV, he was knighted by that excellent Prince (b). But his assistance being mostly wanted in Ireland, where things were in the utmost confusion, he put himself into that service: and in this employment manifested great valour and wisdom, so fairly and evenly tempered; that his generous actions expressed an uncommon capacity (c). In June 1600, he was at the taking of the strong castle of Ballinshor (d). And in the ensuing winter, was put in garrison at Carrickfergus, with eight hundred and fifty foot and a hundred and twenty-five horse, under his command (e). In August 1602, he, and Sir Henry Danvers, took the strong fort of Ennislughlin, wherein most of the Earl of Tir-Oen's plate and choice goods were deposited (f). The March following he expelled Brian Mac-Art from Killultagh, where he had secretly lodged himself with five hundred men (g); and brought the rebels in Ireland to so low a condition, that they were forced to eat human flesh [C]. In a word, he was so effectually assistant, as one expresses it (h), first to plow and break up that barbarous nation by conquest; and then to sow it with the seeds of civility, when he was made Lord-Deputy of Ireland (which was in 1604) that he did more than could be done in several years before. Good laws and provisions had indeed been made by his predecessors, but they were like lessons set for a lute out of tune, useless, 'till the instrument was fitted for them. Being therefore raised to that eminent station, in which he was sworn the third of February (i), he acted with such prudence and resolution, that he quite put an end to all insurrections in that kingdom; and did three great things towards a reformation therein (k). The first was, his management of the most stubborn Parliament that ever was in Ireland, which nevertheless he prevailed with to attain the Earls of Tir-Oen, and Tirconell, Sir Cahir O Dogharty, and others, and to make an Act of Recognition, and give the King a subsidy. The second was, the plantation of the forfeited estates in Ulster, which he very much influenced and promoted. And the third was, the establishing a new circuit for Judges of Assize in the province of Connagh, and retrieving the circuit of Munster, which had been discontinued for two hundred years (l). So that, whereas the circuits were before confined to the English Pale, they were extended by him throughout the kingdom (m). By this wise regulation, Ireland was, in a short time, so cleared of thieves and capital offenders, that so many malefactors were not found in the two and thirty shires of that kingdom, as in six English shires in the western circuit (n). He also reduced the mountains and glinns on the south of Dublin, which used to be thorns in the sides of the English, into the county of Wicklow (o). And so watchful was he over the actions of suspected persons, that Tir-Oen was heard to complain, 'He could not drink a full carouse of sack, but the State was, within a few hours, advertised thereof (p).' In the year 1612 (q), he was, for a reward of his great services, advanced to the dignity of Baron of Belfast (r). Whilst he continued Lord-Deputy, namely in 1614, the harp was first marshalled with the arms of Great Britain (s): and about the same time the Irish began to imitate the English fashions, and to cut their mantles into cloaks (t). In the beginning of the year 1616, after this worthy person had continued Lord-Deputy of Ireland above eleven years (u), King James I. appointed him Lord High-Treasurer of that kingdom (w), and recalled him to England; not out of any displeasure, but, as far as can be conjectured, through the artifices of the Irish Papists, over whom he kept a strict hand (x). Being thus returned home, so considerable were his abilities that he was not suffered to lie unactive: for in May 1622 he was sent by King James I. to the Palatinate, and from thence to the Emperor (y). While he was in Germany, Manheim was seasonably victualled through his prudent direction and advice. And being in that place when it was besieged by Count Tilly the Emperor's General, his Lordship sent the Count word, 'That it was against the law of nations to besiege an Embassador.' Tilly returned for answer, 'That he took no notice that he was an Embassador.' Upon which the Lord Chichester replied to the messenger, 'Had my Master sent me with as many hundred men, as he hath sent me on fruitless messages, your General should have known, that I had been a Soldier, as well as an Embassador (z).' At his return from this embassy, in the October following, his Lordship was very well received by King James, and the 31st of December made one of his Majesty's Privy-Council in England (a). He died about the same time as his Master

King

[B] He went into the wars.] In his youth he was guilty of great extravagance, and, to support it, robbed one of Queen Elizabeth's Purveyors. To avoid being prosecuted for that crime, he fled into France, where he behaved with great bravery and conduct. The fame of which reaching the Queen's ears, his friends took thence an opportunity to sue for his pardon, which the Queen readily sent him, with an invitation home. Whereupon she employed him in her wars in Ireland, where he made his fortune, as is related in this article. This is mentioned in no historian, but has been handed down in the family, as a certain fact. The famous Richard Boyle, created afterwards Earl of Corke, is said to have been his Secretary, when he was Lord-Deputy.

VOL. II. No. CXII.

[C] That they were forced to eat human flesh.] Three children were seen eating the entrails of their dead mother, upon whose flesh they had fed twenty days, and roasted it with fire; and it was manifest that some older people had been in such a starving condition, that they murdered and eat children for a long time together, and were at last discovered and executed for that barbarity. In short, as R. Cox, Esq; observes (2), the famine of Jerusalem did not exceed that amongst the rebels of Ireland, and therefore it is no wonder, that on the 30th of March 1602, the Earl of Tir-Oen, not knowing of Queen Elizabeth's death, did at Melifont, in most humble manner, and upon his knees, make his submission to the Deputy.

King James, namely, about the beginning of the year 1625 (b) : but, in This superior to his Sovereign, that he died in as great honour as any Englishman of his age (c) ; and to the great grief of his country, because it was in such a time as most required his assistance, courage, and wisdom, which seldom meet, but in him were united, and challenged an equal share in his perfections (d). He was buried at Belfast, in Ireland (e) [D]. He was stout in his nature, above any disorder upon emergencies, resolved in his temper above any impressions from other Princes, and high in his proposal beyond the expectation of his own. With regard to Ireland his sentiments were, that time must open and facilitate things for reformation of religion, by the Protestant plantations, by the care of good Bishops and Divines ; the amplification of the college ; the education of wards ; and insensible seizure of Popish liberties ; reducing the number of Privy- Counsellors, which were fifty or sixty at least, and that occasioned great debates, and caused business to be divulged, &c (f). In a word, he was a good soldier, and a true Englishman (g), which is as great a character as can be given. He married Letice, daughter of Sir John Perrot Lord-Deputy of Ireland [E] ; and having no issue by her, made his youngest brother, Sir Edward Chichester, Knt. the heir : who was created by King Charles I. Baron Belfast, and Viscount Chichester, of Carrick-fergus in the county of Antrim. His son Arthur was created Earl of Donegall ; which dignity hath been ever since enjoyed by his posterity (b).

[D] He was buried at Belfast in Ireland.] Mr Prince supposes, that his brother and heir, the Lord Edward Chichester, might afterwards bring over, and lay his remains in the sepulchre belonging to his house at Eggesford in Devonshire. And observes, that in a little oratory adjoining to the church of Eggesford, on the north side of the chancel, he saw this memorial of him ; namely, a head cut out in coarse marble, where his face is represented to the life, with a look stern and terrible, like a soldier. They who are skill'd in sculpture, say, it is an excellent piece of art (3). There are extant, two Letters of my Lord Chichester's writing, in the Cabala (4).

[E] He married Letice, &c.] F. Nicholls, author of the Irish Compendium, is guilty of a very great error (5), in saying, that ' he married Mary eldest daughter to John Digby the first Earl of Bristol ' Whereas, he that married that Lady, was, Arthur the first Earl of Donegall, son of Sir Edward Chichester, Knight, mentioned above in the text (6). CHILLINGWORTH (WILLIAM) a learned Writer and Divine of the last Century, was son of Mr William Chillingworth, Citizen, and some time Mayor, of Oxford ; and was born in St Martin's parish in that city, in October 1602. After he had been educated in Grammar learning at a private school in that city, he was admitted a Scholar of Trinity-College, the 2d of June 1618 (a). June the 18th, 1620, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b) ; the 16th of March 1623, he was admitted Master of Arts (c) ; and the 10th of June 1628, he was elected Fellow of his College [A]. About this time, by the arts and insinuations of the famous Jesuit John Fisher, Mr Chillingworth was converted to the Romish Religion [B], and persuaded to retire to the Jesuits College

[A] — Fellow of his college.] ' He was then observed, says the Oxford Antiquary (1), to be no drudge at his study, but being a man of great parts would do much in a little time when he settled to it. He would often walk in the college grove, and contemplate ; but when he met with any scholar there, he would enter into discourse, and dispute with him, purposely to facilitate, and make the way of wrangling common with him ; which was a fashion used in those days, especially among the disputing Theologits, or among those that set themselves apart purposely for Divinity.' Mr Chillingworth did not confine his studies to Divinity : he applied himself likewise, with good success, to the Mathematicks (2), and had the reputation of a Poet, as appears from these verses of Sir John Suckling ;

There Selden, and he sat hard by the chair ;
Weniman not far off, which was very fair ;
Sands with Townsend, for they kept no order ;
Digby and Shillingworth a little further (3).

Our author's intimate friends, at this time, were Sir Lucius Cary, afterwards Lord Viscount Falkland, Mr John Hales of Eton, &c but more particularly Mr Gilbert Sheldon, who succeeded Dr Juxon in the See of Canterbury, in 1663 (4).

[B] He was converted, by John Fisher the Jesuit, to the Romish Religion.] The conversation and study of the University scholars, in our author's time, turned chiefly upon the controversies between the Church of England and the Church of Rome ; occasioned by the uncommon liberty allowed the Romish priests by King James I. and King Charles I. Several of them lived at or near Oxford, and made frequent attempts upon the young Scholars, some of whom they deluded to the Romish religion, and afterwards convey'd to the English Seminaries beyond sea. Among these priests was the celebrated John Fisher (5), who was, at that time, very conversant at Oxford ; and Mr Chillingworth being accounted a very ingenious man, he used all possible means to be acquainted with him. Their conversation soon turned upon the points controverted between the two Churches ; but more particularly on the necessity of an infallible living judge in matters of faith. Mr Chillingworth found himself unable to answer the arguments of the Jesuit on this head ; and, being once convinced of the necessity of such a judge, he was easily brought to believe, that this infallible judge was to be found in the Church of Rome, and that therefore the Church of Rome must be the true Church, and the only Church, in which men could be saved. He therefore forsook the communion of the Church of England, and, with incredible satisfaction of mind, embraced the Romish religion (6). Mr Des Maizeaux has given us a letter (7), which Mr Chillingworth wrote on this occasion to his friend Mr Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, in which he desires him seriously to consider the following queries. I. Whether it be not evident from Scriptures, and Fathers, and reason, from the goodness of God, and the necessity of mankind, that there must be some one Church infallible in matters of faith ? II. Whether there be any other society of men in the world, besides the Church of Rome, that either can upon good warrant, or indeed at all, challenge to itself the privilege of infallibility in matters of faith. After which, he concludes his letter with these words ; ' When you have applied your most attentive consideration upon these questions, I do assure myself, your resolution will be affirmative in the first, and negative in the second. And then the conclusion will be, that you will approve and follow the way wherein I have had the happiness to enter before you ; and should think it infinitely increased, if it would please God to draw you after.'

College at Douay (d). But Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, who was his godfather (e), corresponding with him by letters [C], and pressing him with several arguments against the doctrines and practices of the Romanists, Mr Chillingworth, who began now to see the arguments, by which he had been converted, in another light, left Douay, after a short stay there [D], in 1631 (f). Upon his return to England, with the approbation of Bishop Laud, he retired to Oxford, where he pursued his enquiries into religion with great care and diligence, reading the best books, and conversing with the learnedest men, of both persuasions; 'till, at last, the Protestant principles appearing to him the most agreeable to Scripture and reason, he declared for them; and, about the year 1634, wrote a paper [E] in confutation of the arguments, by which he had been seduced; though such was his love of truth, that, even after his return to Protestantism, he made no scruple to re-examine the grounds of it, as appears by a letter he wrote to Dr Sheldon, containing some scruples he had about leaving the Church of Rome, and returning to the Church of England (g); which seems to have occasioned the report, that he had turned Papist a second time, and then Protestant again (h). Nor is it strange, that this seeming inconsistency of temper and judgment, for which our author has modestly apologized [F], should

[C] Dr Laud—corresponded with him by letters.] Archbishop Laud, in his speech before the Lords, on the first day of his trial, March 12, 1643, appealed to the letters, which then pass'd between him and Mr Chillingworth, in order to vindicate himself from the charge of Popery. Mr Chillingworth's learning and abilities, says he (8), are sufficiently known to all your Lordships. He was gone, and settled at Doway. My letters brought him back; and he lived and died a defender of the Church of England. And that this is so, your Lordships cannot but know: for Mr Pryn took away my letters, and all the papers, which concerned him, and they were examined at the Committee. These letters are supposed to be lost. Mr Prynne, who took away Archbishop Laud's papers, pursuant to an order of the House of Commons, kept them 'till after the Restoration, when, by order of the King in Council, they were deliver'd to Dr Sheldon Archbishop of Canterbury. But very few of those papers, which Prynne had published in several pamphlets and books, came into the Archbishop's hands: And many, even of those which had not been published, were found wanting; among which were the letters in question (9).

[D] He left Douay, after a short stay there.] Mr Chillingworth was soon tired with the company of his new friends at Douay, as appears from the following passages of Mr Lacy, a Jesuit, who wrote a bitter invective against him, after he had published his book, intitled, The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation, &c. Had he not made, says that author (10), so much haste in running back from the Catholic, as though he had come thither only to fetch fire of faction, he might have acquainted himself better with the practice of the holy Church, in this very point of miracles, and relations concerning saints.

Again: 'Yet, had the man but stay'd, says he (11), to have learned his catechism among us, he might have known the use and meaning of our ceremonies: now having come into the Church, as Cato came unto the theater, only to go out againe; what meruaile if he returne a ridiculous censurer of what he only saw and understood not? Such post-hast were hardly tolerable in a spie, much lesse in one who comes to see and censure.' Elsewhere he says (12); 'Would any man think, that this man was never Catholic above two months at once, who knowes the Jesuits so well?' That Mr Chillingworth met with a kind and respectful treatment from the Jesuits, during his short stay among them, may be inferred from the above-cited author, who says (13): 'Indeed he lost his fellowship by it (by changing his religion), but I presume the Catholique would have given him a better, had he but held out his yeares probation.' Some Protestant writers have indeed insinuated the contrary; particularly Dr Fuller, who, mentioning Mr Chillingworth, tells us (14), 'he was an acute and subtil disputant, but unsettled in his judgment, which made him go beyond the seas, and in some sort was conciled to the Church of Rome, but, whether because he found not the respect he expected (which some shrewdly suggest) or because his conscience could not close with all the Romish corruptions (which more charitably believe) he returned into England, &c.'

(13) Ibid. p. 18.

(14) Worthies of England, Oxfordshire, p. 339.

Besides this groundless insinuation, there are two faults

in this narrative: for, first, Mr Chillingworth's going beyond the seas was not occasioned by his being unsettled in his judgment, but, on the contrary, by his being settled in his opinion in favour of the Romish Church; and, secondly, he was conciled to the Church of Rome, not in some sort, but entirely and sincerely. Anthony Wood has suggested the same thing in regard to Mr Chillingworth's treatment by the Jesuits, besides some other mistakes, and malicious reports, which we shall set down in his own words. 'About the same time, says he (15), being much unsettled in his thoughts, he became acquainted with one who went by the name of John Fisher, a learned Jesuit and sophistical disputant, who was often conversant in those parts (Oxford). At length, by his persuasions, and the satisfaction of some doubts which he could not find among our great men at home, he went to the Jesuits college at St Omer, forsook his religion, and became a Roman Catholic.' But 'so it was, that finding not that satisfaction from the Jesuits concerning various points of religion, or (as some say) not that respect, which he expected (for the common report among his contemporaries in Trinity College was, that the Jesuits, to try his temper, and exercise his obedience, did put him upon servile duties far below him) he left them in the year 1631, returned to the Church of England (though the Presbyterians said not, but that he was always a Papist in his heart, or, as we now say, in masquerade) and was kindly received by his godfather Dr Laud, then Bishop of London.' Mr Chillingworth did not retire to the college of St Omer, as this writer asserts, but to that of Douay, if Archbishop Laud, who certainly knew it best, is to be believed (16). Neither is it at all probable, what the Presbyterians said, that Mr Chillingworth continued still a Papist in his heart, after his return to the Church of England.

[E] A paper.] This paper is now lost. It is true, we have a paper of Mr Chillingworth's on the same subject; but it seems to be written on some other occasion, probably at the desire of his friends. It was first publish'd, in 1687, in the Additional Discourses of Mr Chillingworth (17).

(17) See the remark [I].

[F] His modest Apology for this seeming inconsistency of temper and judgment.] There are numberless passages in Mr Chillingworth's works, wherein his religious conduct is strongly justified. But we shall select only the following from his celebrated piece, intitled The Religion of Protestants, &c. in answer to Mr Knott's Charity maintained by Catholics, &c. 'I know a man, says our author (18), speaking of himself, that of a moderate Protestant turn'd a Papist, and the day that he did so (as all things that are done are perfected some day or other) was convicted in conscience, that his yesterdaies opinion was an error, and yet thinks hee was no schismatic for so doing, and desires to be informed by you whether or no hee was mistaken. The same man afterwards, upon better consideration, became a doubting Papist, and of a doubting Papist a confirm'd Protestant. And yet this man thinks himself no more to blame for all these changes, than a traveller, who using all diligence to find the right way to some remote city, where he had never been (as the partie I speak of had never been in Heaven) did yet mistake it, and after find his error, and amend should expose him to the most malicious and ill-grounded calumnies [G], as well as to several disputes with those of the Romish Religion [H]. But, in 1635, he was engaged amend it. Nay, he stands upon his justification so farre, as to maintain that his alterations, not only to you, but also from you, by God's mercy, were the most satisfactory actions to himselfe, that ever he did, and the greatest victories that ever he obtained over himselfe, and his affections to those things which in this world are most precious; as wherein, for God's sake, and (as he was verily persuaded) out of love to the truth, he went upon a certain expectation of those inconveniences, which to ingenuous natures are of all most terrible. So that though there were much weaknesse in some of these alterations, yet certainly there was no wickednesse. Neither does he yeeld his weaknesse altogether without apologie, seeing his deductions were rational, and out of some principles commonly received by Protestants as well as Papists, and which by his education had got possession of his understanding. Here, we see, Mr Chillingworth was so far from thinking such changes of religion sinful or disreputable, that he glories in them, and makes them matter of triumph.

[G] He was exposed to the most malicious and ill-grounded calumnies.] So, I think, we may very well call the following passage in one of Dr Wood's controversial Letters to Mr Bullstrode. 'Can there be any thing more notoriously false, says he (19), than the words of Chillingworth, cited by you; I see plainly, and with my own eyes, Councils against Councils, a consent of Fathers of one age, against a consent of Fathers of another age; the Church of one age, against the Church of another age. If I could find what he said here to be true, I would soon discard all Revealed Religion, and would turn Deist, for I don't see any argument that can be more for a Deist's purpose than this; and, if the truth were known, he was one in masquerade; for a confirmation of which I can give you a very good testimony, that at the bottom he was such, notwithstanding his book which he writ against us. Chillingworth having an intimate friendship with the gentleman of the Horse to the grandfather (as I think) of the present Lord Mountague of Coudrey, was ask'd by this gentleman (who heard all the world extolling Chillingworth for his great learning, and particularly in controversy) as a true and sincere friend, to tell him his opinion freely and candidly, which was the true Religion: to which he answered in short, that he (the Enquirer) should keep to the Religion in which he was (which was the Roman Catholick) for if there were any religion, that it was the right, and that if there were none, that the worst that could happen to him was but so much pains lost. I don't say that these are the words of his letter, but I remember that they were much to this purpose. Now it is plain by this letter (which I don't doubt you will say it is feigned) that this great champion of your religion was but a sceptick in religion at the best, and what most of your greatest men are; for if they can believe that so many learned and holy men have been deceived for so many ages in matters of this consequence, have they not reason to doubt, that these latter ages have been deceived fo too, and so consequently there must be very little or no security of the Christian Faith.' Till the original of Mr Chillingworth's letter, here referred to, is produced (which it has never yet been) we may fairly set down this story as a malicious and ill-grounded calumny.

[H] He had several disputes with those of the Romish Religion.] One of these was Mr John Lewgar, a great zealot for the Church of Rome; who was a beneficed Clergyman in Essex, but quitted both his religion and preferment, to turn Roman Catholick (20). Anthony Wood pretends (21), he was converted by the force of Mr Chillingworth's arguments, with whom he had several conferences, after that gentleman's return to England, about matters of religion. But, if Mr Chillingworth induced Mr Lewgar to turn Papist, it is strange neither of them should take any notice of it in the letters which passed between them. However, Mr Lewgar, between whom and Mr Chillingworth there had always been an intimate friendship, as soon as he heard that Mr Chillingworth was returned to the Church of England, sent him a very angry and abusive letter, to which Mr Chillingworth returned an answer full of affection and charity (22). This letter was first printed in the year 1662; with this title: Mr Chillingworth's letter touching Infallibility, 4to. In the last page is the Imprimatur of M. Frank, chaplain to Dr Sheldon, then Bishop of London, dated the 5th of August 1662. It was afterwards inserted in the fifth edition of Mr Chillingworth's Religion of Protestants, &c. in the year 1684, with this title: Reasons against Popery, in a letter from Mr William Chillingworth to his friend Mr Lewgar, persuading him to return to his mother the Church of England from the corrupt Church of Rome. It was printed again at the end of the contracted edition of Mr Chillingworth's Religion of Protestants, &c. in 1687, with this title: Out of Mr Chillingworth's Manuscript, A Letter to Mr Lewgar, concerning the Church of Rome's being the guide of faith and judge of controversies. But, notwithstanding all these several impressions, Mr Grafcome, having met with an imperfect copy of it, inserted it as a piece of Mr Chillingworth's never before published, in the Preface of his book intitled Certamen Religiosum (23), &c. in which he tells us, it was communicated to him by Sir Thomas Fanshawe, a curious collector of uncommon pieces. The famous Dr Hickee, though a man of great knowledge in books, thought this piece had been first published by Mr Grafcome, and as such reprinted it in 1705, in the Appendix to a book intitled; Several letters, which passed between Dr George Hickee and a Popish priest, &c. in the preface to which, speaking of the Appendix, he says, 'The second paper is a letter of Mr Chillingworth, about the Infallibility of the Church of Rome. I have published it—because I think it worthy to be read of all men, especially by Protestants, who, when they happen to be assaulted publicly or privately by Popish priests, may make this use of it, to defy them to answer this letter, and in the mean time to forbear.' Mr Lewgar could not help being touched with a letter, which shewed so much love, sincerity, and moderation. He desired to see his old friend again; and Mr Chillingworth had a Conference with him about Religion before Mr Skinner and Dr Sheldon (24). There passed afterwards several papers between them concerning the pretended Infallibility and Catholicity of the Romish Church; and we have a paper of Mr Chillingworth's, intitled, A Conference concerning the Infallibility of the Roman Church, &c. which seems to contain the abstract or summary of their dispute (25). We have, in the same manner, the substance of a dispute he had with Mr Daniel, or Dan à Jesu, a Jesuit, whose real name was John Floyd; wherein he disproves the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, by an argument taken from the contradictions, which are contained in the doctrine of Transubstantiation (26). He had another with a gentleman, whom he does not name; in which he confutes the same Infallibility, by proving, that either the present Church of Rome errs, in offering tapers and incense to the Virgin Mary, or that the antient Church of Rome did err, in condemning as hereticks the Collyridians for offering a cake to her (27). Besides the pieces already mentioned, Mr Chillingworth wrote one to demonstrate, that the doctrine of Infallibility is neither evident of itself, nor grounded upon certain and Infallible reasons, nor warranted by any passage of Scripture (28). And in two other papers, he shews, that the Church of Rome hath formerly erred; first, by admitting Infants to the Eucharist, and holding, that without it they could not be saved: and, secondly, by teaching the doctrine of the Milennaries; both which doctrines are condemned as false and heretical by the present Church of Rome (29). He wrote also a short letter, in answer to some objections put to him by one of his friends, wherein he shews, that neither the Fathers, nor the Councils, are infallible witnesses of tradition, and that the Infallibility of the Church of Rome must first of all be proved from the Scripture (30). We must not forget our author's Answer to some Passages in the Dialogues, published under the name of Mr Russellworth (31). The occasion was this: The Lord Digby desired Mr Chillingworth to meet Mr White, the true author of those dialogues, at the lodgings of Sir Kenelm Digby, a late convert to the Church of Rome. The Lord Digby himself was there. Their conference turn'd upon Tradition; and as Mr White had treated the same matter in his Dialogues, which were not yet published, Mr Chillingworth, probably at the request of the Lord Digby, selected out of them some passages relating to that subject, and confuted them (32). The foregoing pieces were published together in the year 1637, under the title of Additional Discourses of Mr Chillingworth, never before printed.

[I] His Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation. The whole title is: The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation: Or, An Answer to a Book intitled; Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholics: which pretends to prove the contrary. By William Chillingworth, Master of Arts of the University of Oxford. Edward Knot (33), the Jesuit, had put out, in 1630, a little book, intitled, Charity mistaken, with the want whercof Catholicikes are unjustly charged, for affirming, as they do with grief, that Protestancy unrepented destroys salvation. In 8vo. This book was answered by Dr Potter, Provost of Queen's College in Oxford, in a piece, intitled, Want of Charitye justly charged on all such Romanists, as dare (without truth or modesty) affirme, that Protestancie destroyeth Salvation. In answer to a late Popish pamphlet, intitled, Charity mistaken, &c. 1633. The Jesuit replied in 1634, under this title: Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholicikes. By way of Reply upon an Answer lately framed by D. Potter to a Treatise which had formerly proved, that Charity was mistaken by Protestants: With the want whercof Catholicikes are unjustly charged, for affirming, that Protestancy unrepented destroys Salvation. Devided into two parts. Mr Chillingworth undertook to answer this Reply: which gave him frequent occasions to refer to his most ingenious and learned friend the Lord Falkland, at Great Tew, his Lordship's seat in Oxfordshire; whose curious library, as well as conversation, was of great use to him on this occasion (34).

Mr Knott, being informed that Mr Chillingworth was preparing an Answer to his book against Dr Potter, came out with an abusive piece against him, intitled, A Direction to be observed by N. N. if hee meane to proceede in answering the Booke intitled, Mercy and Truth, or Charity maintained by Catholiciks, &c. 1636. 8vo. The Jesuit's design in this pamphlet being to prejudice the publick against Mr Chillingworth's answer, he charged him in it with Socinianism, the most odious imputation he could find, and the fittest for his purpose (35).

Mr Chillingworth's answer to Mr Knott was very near finished by the beginning of the year 1637; when Archbishop Laud, who knew our author's freedom in delivering his thoughts, and was under some apprehension he might indulge it too much in his book, recommended the revivall of it to Dr Prideaux (36), Professor of Divinity at Oxford; and desired it might be published with his approbation annex'd to it (37). And to Dr Prideaux were added Dr Baylie, Vice-Chancellor of the University, and Dr Fell, Lady Margaret's Professor in Divinity, for the examination of Mr Chillingworth's book, which was soon after put to the press at Oxford. Mr Knott was then lurking about that place, and found means, by bribery, to have the sheets from the press, as they were wrought off (38).

The impression of our author's answer to the first part of Mr Knott's book being near finished; he acquainted Dr Baylie with his reasons for not answering the second part; and the Archbishop being consulted thereupon (39), it was agreed, that Mr Chillingworth, in the Conclusion of his work, should give the reasons he had for not publishing an answer to the second part. Accordingly the book was published, and presented by the author to the King, with a very elegant, modest, and pious dedication; in which we learn this remarkable circumstance, that Dr Potter's vindication of the Protestant Religion against Mr Knott's book was written by special order from his Majesty; and that, by giving such an order, that most pious and religious Prince, besides the general good, had also some aime at the recovery of Mr Chillingworth from the dangerous deviation he happened then to be in, by the change of his religion (40). Next to the Dedication were printed, as the Archbishop had desired, the approbations of Dr Baylie, Dr Prideaux, and Dr Fell; who had examined Mr Chillingworth's book with such rigour and severity, as made him say (41), it had passed a fiery trial. And Mr Knott affirmed (42), that so many alterations had been made by the censors in Mr Chillingworth's manuscript, that the book was quite another thing from what it was first drawn up by the author. Anthony Wood, upon the authority of Mr Cheynell (43), tells us, that Dr Prideaux, after the examination and correction of Mr Chillingworth's book, used in private conversation to compare it to an unwholesome Lamprey, by having a poisonous sting of Socinianism throughout it, and tending in some places to plain infidelity and atheism (44). Dr Fuller takes notice of the same story, but with this judicious remark (45): A passage in my opinion inconsistent with the Doctor's approbation prefix'd in the beginning of the book. This Approbation is as follows: Perlegi hunc librum—in quo nihil reperio doctrinæ vel disciplinæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ adversum, sed quam plurima quæ fidem orthodoxam egregie illustant, & adversantia glossata acute, perspicue, & modeste dissipant. After so full and express an attestation to the orthodoxy of Mr Chillingworth's performance, is it probable, Dr Prideaux should afterwards represent it, among his friends, as a book full of Socinianism, and even infidelity and Atheism? But Mr Wood was fond of defamatory reports, however ill-grounded, when they concerned any adversaries to Popery.—Mr Chillingworth's Preface is inscribed 'To the author of Charity maintained; with an answer to his pamphlet, entituled A Direction to N. N.' He expresses what care and diligence he had employ'd to make his answer unexceptionable; how earnestly he desired, before the printing of it, to confer with Mr Knott, and hear what he could offer in vindication of any one argument in his book; and complains, that, instead of agreeing with this fair and reasonable proposal, he had used base and oblique means in order to deter him from publishing his answer (46). Then he proceeds to vindicate, first the Protestants in general; secondly, the Divines of the Church of England; and, lastly, himself, from the calumnies and foul aspersions cast upon them in the Jesuit's pamphlet (47). But, the Jesuit having excepted against Mr Chillingworth's being a fit champion for the Protestant cause, because he had often, and even not very long since, profess'd that he would never subscribe to their thirty nine Articles (48); and, secondly, because he had set down in writing, motives, which endued him to forsake Protestantism, and had never answered them: Mr Chillingworth replies to these two objections in the close of his preface (49). The book itself is divided into seven chapters, in answer to so many of which the Jesuit's first part confits, which are reprinted with our author's answers. In the first chapter Mr Chillingworth asserts, that Papists are uncharitable in condemning Protestants: in the II^d, that the Scripture is the only rule, whereby to judge of controversies: in the III^d, that no Church of one denomination is infallible: in the IVth, that the Creed of the Apostles contains all necessary points of meer belief: in the Vth, that the Religion of Protestants is a safer way to Salvation than the Religion of Papists: in the VIth, that Protestants are not Hereticks: and, in the VIIth, that they are not bound by the charity, which they owe to themselves, to re-unite themselves to the Roman Church. This performance of our author's was received with uncommon applause; in somuch that two editions of it were published within less than five months. It has been re-printed several times since the Restoration. The first edition of it was printed at Oxford in 1638: the second, the same year, at London, with the Imprimatur of Dr Samuel Baker, chaplain to Dr Juxon, then Bishop of London. The third edition came out in 1664, with the licence of Dr Stradling, chaplain to Archbishop Sheldon. To this edition were added some other pieces of Mr Chillingworth, viz. the Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, and nine Sermons, the first preached before his Majesty Charles I. the other upon special and eminent occasions (50). The fourth edition came out in 1674; and the fifth in 1684, with the addition of Mr Chillingworth's Letter to Mr Lewgar. In 1687, when the nation was in imminent danger of Popery, Mr Chillingworth's book being looked upon as the most effectual preservative against it, Dr John Patrick, at the request of the London Clergy, published an abridgment of it; with some additional pieces of Mr Chillingworth against Popery, which had not been as yet printed. It came out with this title: Mr Chillingworth's book, called The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation, made more generally useful, by omitting personal contests, but inserting whatsoever concerns the common cause of Protestants, or defends the Church of England: with an addition of some genuine pieces of Mr Chillingworth, never before printed. In quarto. In the Advertisement Dr Patrick informs us, that the manuscript, out of which most of the additional pieces were faithfully transcribed, was an original of Mr Chillingworth's own hand-writing, in the custody of the Reverend Dr Tennison, to whom the reader was obliged for their publication. These pieces were published with this title: Additional Discourses of Mr Chillingworth, never before printed; with the licence of William Needham, chaplain to Archbishop Sancroft (51). The sixth edition of Mr Chillingworth's book was printed in 1704, with the additional Discourses, and the table of contents of the contracted edition. But this impression is very full of typographical errors. The seventh edition came out in 1719; the eighth, in —; and the ninth, in 1727. This last edition was prepared from that of 1664, carefully examined and compared with the two preceding editions. The various readings of these editions are taken notice of at the bottom of each page, with the words Oxf. or Lond. after them. The tenth and last edition is of the year 1742, with the Life of Mr Chillingworth, by the Reverend Mr Thomas Birch (52). In 1638, Mr Knott published a pamphlet, intitled, Christianity maintained: Or, A Discovery of sundry doctrines tending to the overthrow of the Christian Religion, contained in the Answer to a book intitled, Mercy and Truth, &c. Printed at St Omer, in 4to. This last pamphlet of Mr Knott's is but a paraphrase of the first: The same accusations are brought over again, and little or no notice is taken of Mr Chillingworth's answers. Mr Knott himself was so sensible, that this piece could never be looked upon as a satisfactory answer to Mr Chillingworth's book, that, in the preface, he promises a larger work. The doctrines tending to the overthrow of the Christian Religion, which he imputes to Mr Chillingworth, are these: 1. That faith necessary to Salvation is not infallible, the grounds of which doctrine, he says, lead to Atheisme. 2. That the assurance we have of Scriptures is but moral. 3. That the Apostles were not infallible in their writings, but erred with the whole Church of their time. 4. That his principles are injurious to the miracles of our Saviour and his Apostles. 5. That by resolving faith into reason, he destroys the nature of faith, and beliefs of all Christian verities. 6. That his doctrine is destructive of the theological virtues of Christian hope and charity. 7. That it takes away the grounds of rational discourse. 8. That it opens a way to deny the blessed Trinity, and other high mysteries of the Christian faith. 9. That it lays grounds to be constant in no religion. 10. And lastly, That it provides for the impunity and preservation of whatsoever damnable error against Christian faith. Mr Knott dedicated this piece to the King. There is subjoined to it a little piece, printed the same year, and at the same place, under the title of; Motives maintained, or, A Reply unto Mr Chillingworth's Answer to his own motives of his conversion to Catholike Religion. Mr Wood did not know, that Mr Knott was the author of this pamphlet: if he had, he would undoubtedly have named him; whereas he only describes the author by the letters J. H. (53), which are at the bottom of the dedication to the King. But Mr Knott had used the same initials at the end of his dedication to that Prince, prefixed to his Charity maintain'd, &c. The next pamphlet against Mr Chillingworth was printed likewise at St Omer, with this title; The Church conquerant over Lunan wit, Or, The Churches Authority demonstrated by M. William Chillingworth (the proflour for wit against her) his perpetual contradictions, in his booke entituled The Religion of Protestants, &c. 4to. The author was John Floyd the Jesuit (54); who published, in 1639, by way of Appendix to this piece, another intitled; The totall Summe, or, No danger of Damnation unto Roman Catholiques for any errors in faith, &c. 4to. The third and last pamphlet against Mr Chillingworth's book was printed, in 1639 (probably at St Omer) under the title of The Judgment of an University man concerning Mr William Chillingworth his late pamphlet (55), in answer to Charity maintain'd. The author of it was Mr William Lacy, a Jesuit, who, at the time of writing it, lived at Oxford (56). At the same time was printed a sequel to this piece, by the same hand, under the title of Heautomachia, Mr Chillingworth against himself. But our author's performance was not only attacked in his lifetime, but even nine years after his death, by his old antagonist Mr Knott, who, as, in his last pamphlet, he had charged him with Socinianism, so, in a book published in 1652, he charges him with Infidelity: for he entituled it; Infidelity unmasked; Or, The Confutation of a Booke published by Mr William Chillingworth, under this title: The Religion of Protestants a safe way to Salvation. Printed at Ghent, in 4to (57).

[K] He refused to subscribe the Thirty nine Articles. Mr Chillingworth, considering, that, by subscribing the articles, he must not only declare willingly and ex animo, that every one of the Articles is agreeable to the word of God, but also that the Book of Common-Prayer contains nothing contrary to the word of God; that it may lawfully be used; and that he himself would use it; and conceiving, at the same time, that, both in the Articles, and in the Book of Common-Prayer, there were some things repugnant to the Scripture; or that were not lawful to be used: he fully resolved to lose for ever all hopes of preferment, rather than comply with the subscription required (58). One of his chief objections to the Common-Prayer related to the Athenasian Creed; the damatory clauses of which he look'd upon as contrary to the word of God. Another objection concerned the Fourth Commandment; which, by the prayer subjoined to it, Lord, have mercy upon us, &c. appeared to him to be made a part of the Christian Law, and consequently to bind Christians to the observation of the Jewish Sabbath (59). See, in Mr Des Maizeaux (60), a letter, which he wrote upon this occasion, to his good friend Dr Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. It seems there passed several letters between our author and Dr Sheldon upon this subject. For Mr Chillingworth being now intent upon a full enquiry into the sense of the Articles, every step afforded him new scruples. Thus he objected, 1. To the XXth Article, importing, that the Church hath power to decree rites or ceremonies, and authority in controversies of Faith. 2 To the XIVth Article, that voluntary works, besides over and above God's commandments, which they call works of supererogation, cannot be taught without arrogancy and impiety, &c. which seem'd to him to condemn the doctrine of Evangelical counsels, maintained by the Fathers, and by several eminent Divines of the Church of England, as Bishop Andrews, Bishop Morton, Bishop Mountague, &c. 3. To the XXXIst Article, that the offering of Christ once made, &c. 4. To the XIIIth Article, that works done before the grace of Christ, &c. which seem'd to him to confine God's grace within too narrow bounds, and to exclude from salvation the most virtuous among the Pagans. Lastly, he objected to the Articles in general, as an imposition on mens consciences, much like the authority assumed by the Church of Rome (61). These scruples of our author, about subscribing the Articles, furnish'd his antagonist, the Jesuit (62), with one objection against him, as an improper champion for the Protestant cause. To which Mr Chillingworth answers, in the close of his Preface to the Religion of Protestants, &c. that, 'though he does not hold the doctrine of all Protestants absolutely true—yet he holds it free from all impiety, and from all error destructive of salvation, or in itself damnable. And this, he thinks, in reason, may sufficiently long continuance; being, probably, removed by the arguments of his good friend, Dr Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (l): for, being promoted to the Chancellorship of Salisbury, with the Prebend of Brixworth in Northamptonshire annexed, the 20th of July 1638, he complied with the usual subscription [L]. About the same time, he obtained the Mastership of Wigstan's Hospital in Leicester (m). In 1640, Mr Chillingworth was deputed, by the Chapter of Salisbury, as their Proctor to the Convocation, which met with the Parliament, and was opened the 14th of April (n) [M]. He was likewise deputed to the Convocation, which met the same year with the new Parliament, and was opened the 4th of November (o). He was zealously attached to the Royal party, and, in August 1643, was present, in the King's army, at the siege of Gloucester; where he advised and directed the making certain engines, for assaulting the town [N], after the manner of the Roman Testudines cum pluteis (p). Soon after, having accompanied the Lord Hopton, General of the King's forces in the West, to Arundel-Castle in Suffex, and chusing to repose himself in that garrison, on account of an indisposition occasioned by the severity of the season, he was there taken prisoner, the 9th of December 1643, by the Parliament forces under the command of Sir William Waller, who obliged the castle to surrender (q). But, his illness increasing, and not being able to go to London with the garrison, he obtained leave to be conveyed to Chichester; where he was lodged in the Bishop's palace, and, after a short illness, died [O], some time in the

ciently qualify him for a maintainer of this assertion, that Protestancy destroys not salvation. Then he adds this remarkable declaration: 'For the Church of England, I am persuaded, that the constant doctrine of it is so pure and orthodox, that whosoever believes it, and lives according to it, undoubtedly he shall be saved; and that there is no error in it, which may necessitate or warrant any man to disturb the peace, or renounce the communion of it. This, in my opinion, is all intended by subscription; and thus much if you conceive me not ready to subscribe, your charity, I assure you, is much mistaken (*).' Mr Chillingworth expresses here, not only his readiness to subscribe, but also what he conceives to be the sense and intent of such a subscription; which he now takes to be a subscription of peace or union, and not of belief or assent, as he formerly thought it was. And, as he did, within a few months, actually subscribe, we have reason to believe he did it in the same sense; especially if we consider, that this was also the sense of Archbishop Laud (63), with which Mr Chillingworth could not be unacquainted; and of Dr Sheldon (64), who laboured to convince him of it, and was, no doubt, the person that brought him at last into it. Dr Bennet, indeed, in his Essay on the XXXIX Articles (65), undertakes to prove, from the foregoing passage of Mr Chillingworth, that he was of opinion, that a subscription of belief or assent to the articles is required of the Clergy. But, besides the plain import of our author's words, it may be observed, that the Romish controversies have always understood Mr Chillingworth's sense of subscription to be as we have represented it, and have charged it upon him as a novelty he had introduced into the Church of England (66). Archbishop Sancroft, and several other Divines of the Church of England, have concurred in opinion with Mr Chillingworth, that her articles are not articles of belief and assent, but of peace and union, and consequently may be subscribed as such.

[L] He complied with the usual subscription. He did it in the following words, as appears from the subscription-book of the Church of Salisbury: Ego Gulielmus Chillingworth, Clericus, in Artibus Magister, ad Cancellarium Ecclesie Cathedralis beate Mariæ Sarum, una cum Præbenda de Brixworth alias Bricklesworth in comitatu Northampton, Petriburgenfis Diocæses in eadem Ecclesia fundata & eidem Cancellariatu annexa, admittendus & instituendus, omnibus hisce articulis & singulis in iisdem contentis volens & ex animo subscribo, & consensum meum iisdem præbeo; 20 die Julii 1638. GULIELMUS CHILLINGWORTH. Hence it appears, that Mr Chillingworth did actually subscribe, and that in the legal form: both of which have been questioned by several persons. Mr Knott affirms (67), that Mr Chillingworth never subscribed the Articles; and the Bishop of Bangor (now †) Bishop of Winchester concludes (68), upon the same false supposition, that Mr Chillingworth's enjoying a preferment in the Church, without subscribing, was an effect of the particular favour, which the churchmen of those days had for him, as a convert from the Church of Rome.

[M] He was Proctor for the Chapter of Salisbury to the Convocation which met—the 14th of April 1640.] The proceedings of this Convocation (which sat after the dissolution of the Parliament, and made several Canons and Constitutions) being highly resented in the next Parliament by the House of Commons, who declared them to be against the right of Parliament, and the liberty of the subject (which votes were agreed to by the house of Lords). A bill was brought in, and pass'd the Commons (but was thrown out by the Lords) for punishing and fining the members of the Convocation; wherein Mr Chillingworth, as Proctor for the Chapter of Salisbury, was fined a thousand pounds (69).

[N] He advised and directed the making certain engines, for assaulting the town of Gloucester.] Mr Rushworth's account of this matter is as follows (70): 'The King's forces, by the direction of Dr Chillingworth, had provided certain engines, after the manner of the Roman Testudines cum pluteis, wherewith they intended to assault the city between the south and west gates: They ran upon cart-wheels, with a blind of planks musket-proof, and holes for four musqueteers to play out of, placed upon the axle-tree, to defend the musqueteers, and those that thrust it forwards, and carrying a bridge before it: the wheels were to fall into the ditch, and the end of the bridge to rest upon the town's breast-work, so making several compleat bridges to enter the city.' But, before the effect of Mr Chillingworth's machines could be proved, the siege was raised by the approach of the Earl of Essex's forces. That Mr Chillingworth was present at the siege of Gloucester, is farther confirmed by a letter of Bishop Barlow's, in answer to one from a friend, who had quoted Mr Corbet's (||) Relation of the siege of Gloucester, in which, that writer mentions Mr Chillingworth very unworthily, calling him the Jesuitical Doctor Chillingworth. The Bishop's words are (71): 'For Mr Chillingworth, none ever questioned his loyalty to his King. What Corbet (in his book you mention) writes of him, that he was in the siege of Gloucester, in the King's army, assisting it to take the city, is a great commendation of his loyalty and truth: for I know Mr Chillingworth was there in the siege (but whether as a Chaplain, or Assistant only, I know not). For going thither to see Sir William Walter my good friend who was a commander there, I did also see Mr Chillingworth among the commanders there.'

[O] His death.] We have a very particular account of Mr Chillingworth's sickness and death, written by his great adversary Mr Cheynel, who accidentally met him in Arundel Castle; and frequently visited him at Chichester till he died. It was at the request of this gentleman, that our author was removed to Chichester. Here Mr Cheynel attended him constantly, and behaved towards him with as much charity and compassion, as his rigid orthodoxy would permit. And no doubt, it was out of a desire to shew his zeal in that respect, as well as his entire devotion to the Parliament, that he published his account of Mr Chillingworth;

the month of January [P] 1643-4, and was buried, according to his own desire, in the Cathedral Church of Chichester (r) [Q]. Besides our author's works already mentioned, there are extant nine Sermons [R], a Tract in defence of Episcopacy [S], and some other pieces, worth; which he intituled, Chillingworthi Novissima: Or, The sickness, heresy, death and buriall of William Chillingworth (in his own phrase) Clerk of Oxford, and, in the conceit of his fellow-soldiers, the Queen's arch-engineer, and grand-intelligencer. Set forth in a letter to his eminent and learned friends: A relation of his apprehension at Arundel, a discovery of his errors in a briefe catechisme, and a short Oration at the buriall of his heretical book. By Francis Cheynell, late fellow of Merton College. Published by Authority. London, 1644, in quarto. He prefixed to it an epistle or dedication, 'To the learned and eminent friends of Mr Chillingworth, and in particular to Sir John Culpepper, Knight; Dr John Prideaux, Bishop of Worcester; Fell, Dean of Christ-Church; Bayly, Dean of Sarum; Sheldon, Warden of All-Soules; Potter, Provost of Queene's; and Morley, Canon of Christ-Church.' Then comes the Relation itself, with a new title, no less curious than the first: A briefe and plaine Relation of Mr Chillingworth's sickness, death, and buriall; together with a just censure of his work, by a discovery of his errors collected out of his book, and framed into a kind of atheisticall Catechisme, fit for Racovia or Cracovia; and may well serve for the instruction of the Irish, Welsh, Dutch, French, Spanisb, Army in England, and especially for the black Regiment at Oxford. The whole piece is a most ludicrous, as well as melancholy, instance of fanaticism and religious madness. But, as we cannot reasonably suspect the truth of the most material passages it contains, we may learn from it, that Mr Chillingworth was attended, during his sickness, and provided with all necessaries, by one Lieutenant Gollidge, and his wife Christobell, at the command of the Governor of Chichester: that, at first, he refused the assistance of Sir William Waller's Physician, but afterwards was perswaded to admit his visits, though his distemper was too far gone to leave any hope of his recovery: that his indisposition was increased by the abusive treatment he met with from most of the officers, who were taken prisoners with him in Arundel Castle, and who looked upon him as a spy, set over them and their proceedings: and that, during his whole sickness, he was often teased by Mr Cheynell himself, and by an officer of the garison of Chichester, with impertinent questions and disputes (72). If this be a true account, as most probably it is, the Earl of Clarendon was misinformed in relation to Mr Chillingworth's death. For, after having observed, that he was taken prisoner in Arundel Castle, he adds (73): 'As soon as his person was known, which would have drawn reverence from any noble enemy, the Clergy that attended that army profecuted him with all the inhumanity imaginable; so that, by their barbarous usage, he died within few days; to the grief of all that knew him, and of many who knew him not, but by his book, and the reputation he had with learned men.' From whence it may be infer'd, that the Noble Historian did not know, or had forgot, that Mr Chillingworth was sent to Chichester; but believed, that he died in Arundel Castle, within a few days after the taking of it by Sir William Waller. Mr Wood, who had before him Mr Cheynell's Relation, tells us (74), the Royal party in Chichester looked upon the impertinent discourses of Mr Cheynell to our author as a shortning of his days.

[P] He died some time in the month of January. It may be thought strange by those, who are unacquainted with the many defects in history, that no body as yet has fettled the exact day of Mr Chillingworth's death. Anthony Wood (75) says, he gave way to fate on the 24th of January, or thereabouts, but he quotes no authority for it. Dr Walker, who has taken almost his whole account of our author from Wood, yet affirms (76), that his death happen'd on the 20th of January: but why he differs from the Oxford Antiquary, he does not tell us. Le Neve says (77), Mr Chillingworth died the 20th of January, or thereabouts. But Mr Des Maizeaux, from several circumstances in Mr Cheynell's Narrative, has made it highly probable, that he died on Tuesday the 30th of January 1643 (78).

[Q] He was buried at Chichester. We learn from the author of the Relation above-mentioned (79), that the Presbyterian party were unwilling, at first, to allow Mr Chillingworth Christian burial, but afterwards consented, that he should be buried by those of his own persuasion; which was accordingly performed in the Cathedral Church, most of the Royal Party of that city attending his body to the grave. Here Mr Cheynell gave a new and uncommon instance of his zeal and orthodoxy. For he met the Malignants, as he calls them, at the place of interment, with Mr Chillingworth's book in his hand, which, after a ridiculous and fanatical speech, he flung into the grave, to rot with it's author, and see corruption. It may serve to amuse the reader, if we transcribe here Mr Cheynell's whimsical lamentation over Mr Chillingworth, in Scripture phrase. 'Howse ye firre trees, for a cedar is fallen: lament, ye sophisters, for the master of sentences (shall I say) or fallacies is vanish'd: wriug your hands, and beat your breasts, see Antichristian Engineers, for your arch-engineer is dead, and all his engines buried with him. Ye daughters of Oxford, weep over Chillingworth, for he had a considerable and hopeful project how to clothe you and himself in scarlet and other delights. I am distressed for thee, my brother Chillingworth (may his executrix (*) say) very pleasant hast thou been unto me, thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of father, husband, brother. O how are the mighty fallen, and the weapons, nay engines, of warre perished! O tell it not in Gath, that he who raised a battery against the Pope's chaire, that he might place reason in the chaire instead of Antichrist, is dead and gone: publish it not in the streets of Ashelton, that he who did at once batter Rome, and undermine England, the reforming Church of England, that he might prevent a Reformation, is dead; left if you publish it, you puzzle all the Conclave, and put them to consider, whether they should mourn or triumph.'

[R] His Sermons. They were printed together in the year 1664, with this title: Nine Sermons: the first preached before his Majesty King Charles the First: the other eight upon special and eminent occasions. The first of these discourses, preach'd before the King, at Oxford, on a publick fast day, was published at Oxford, by his Majesty's command, after the author's death, in 1644; and was the first sermon of our author's printed before the Restoration. The publisher of these Sermons justly observes, that they were fitted by the author to the congregations to which he was to speak, and intended only for the benefit of hearers, not of readers. But yet a judicious reader will soon perceive, that they come from a masterly hand. He will find in them in a noble simplicity, attended with sublime and exalted thoughts, with an unfeigned zeal for the glory of God, and the good of mens souls.

[S] His Tract in defence of Episcopacy. The design of this piece was to shew, that Episcopacy is not repugnant to the government settled in the Church for perpetuity by the Apostles. The occasion was this: Dr Morton, Bishop of Durhan, having composed a treatise, intituled, The Judgment of Protestant Divines, of remote Churches, as well such as were the first reformers of religion, as others after them, in behalfe of episcopal degree in the Church: his manuscript was sent to Archbishop Usher, who was then at Oxford: and he published it without the author's name to it, and knowledge of it (80), under the title of Confessions and Proofs of Protestant Divines of reformed Churches; that Episcopacy is in respect of the office according to the word of God, and in respect of the use the best. The learned Primate added to it a brief treatise of his own, with his name prefixed to it, touching the original of Bishops and Metropolitans. And, in order to complete that collection, Mr Chillingworth furnished him with the aforesaid tract; which being subjoined to the other two, as a conclusion, was intituled, The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, deduced out of the premises by H. C. This little piece was printed by itself in 1644, in 4to, with this title: The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy: but without the author's name. It was again again printed in 1660, with a Speech of my Lord Falkland concerning Episcopacy: and here our author's tract is intitled, The Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, demonstrated by Mr William Chillingworth. This performance of our author's was attacked, in 1707, by Mr Alexander Lauder, a Scotch Divine, in a book intitled, The ancient Bishops considered, both with respect to the extent of their jurisdiction, and nature of their power: In answer to Mr Chillingworth and others.

[T] His other pieces—never yet printed.] They are in the library of Lambeth, among the manuscripts of Mr Henry Wharton, purchased by Archbishop Tenison. Mr Wharton, in the catalogue of those manuscripts, drawn up by himself, observes, that the volume marked M is Volumen Chartaceum in fol. containing, A Collection of papers, formerly belonging to Archbishop Laud, many of them wrote with his own hand, but most of them endorsed with his hand, together with some papers of the Archbishops Sheldon and Sancroft, and many of Mr Chillingworth: and after having set down part of the contents of that volume, he adds: Several Papers of Mr William Chillingworth, viz. 1. Mr Peake's five questions proposed to Mr Chillingworth, about the nature of faith, and the resolution and consequences of the faith of Protestants. 2. Mr Chillingworth's answer to Mr Peake's questions: first draught imperfect. 3. Mr Chillingworth's answer to the same: being complete and perfect. 4. The beginning of A Treatise against the Scots: by Mr Chillingworth. 5. Passages extracted out of the Declarations of the Scots; by Mr Chillingworth. 6. Observations upon the Scottish Declaration; by Mr Chillingworth. 7. A Treatise of the unlawfulness of resisting the lawfull Prince, although most impious, tyrannical, and idolatrous; by Mr Chillingworth. 8. A Letter of Mr Chillingworth excusing his writing against the rebels (81). 9. Notes of Mr Chillingworth concerning God's universal mercy in calling men to repentance. 10. A Problematical Tentamen of Mr Chillingworth against punishing crimes with death in Christian societies: cancelled. 11. A Letter of Mr J. to Mr Chillingworth, of the imperfection of Natural Religion and Reason, without the assistance of Revelation: wrote in 1637. 12. A short Discourse of the Nature of Faith; by Mr Chillingworth. 13. A larger Discourse of the Nature of Faith; by Mr Chillingworth. 14. Of the Absurdity of departing from the Church of England, for want of a succession of visible professors in all ages; by Mr Chillingworth. 15. A brief Answer to several texts of Scripture, alledged to prove the Church to be one, visible, universal, perpetual, and infallible; by Mr Chillingworth. 16. A Letter of Dr Sheldon to Mr Chillingworth, to satisfy his scruples about subscribing (82). 17. Letter of Mr Chillingworth to Dr Sheldon, containing some scruples about leaving the Church of Rome, and returning to the Church of England. 18. Letter of Mr Chillingworth to Dr Sheldon, containing his scruples about Subscription, and the reason of them (83).

[U] The opinions of some eminent writers concerning Mr Chillingworth.] We begin with Archbishop Tillotson, who, in his Sermon on The Efficacy, &c. of Divine Faith (84), says: 'I know not how it comes to pass, whether through the artifice of the Popish party—or through the ignorance of too many well-meaning Protestants; I say, I know not how it comes to pass, but so it is, that every one that offers to give a reasonable account of his Faith, and to establish religion upon rational principles, is presently branded for a Socinian; of which we have a sad instance in that incomparable person Mr Chillingworth, the glory of this Age and Nation; who, for no other cause, that I know of, but his worthy and successful attempts to make the Christian Religion reasonable, and to discover those firm and solid foundations, upon which our Faith is built, hath been required with this black and odious character. But if this be Socinianism, for a man to enquire into the grounds and reasons of Christian Religion, and to endeavour to give a satisfactory account why he believes it, I know no way but that all confederate inquisitive men, that are above fancy and enthusiasm, must be either Socinians or Atheists.' Mr Locke had a high value for Mr Chillingworth, and recommends the reading of his works, in several of his pieces. Particularly, in his tract, containing Some Thoughts concerning Reading and Study for a Gentleman, after having observed, that the art of speaking well consists chiefly in two things, perspicuity and right reasoning, and proposed Dr Tillotson as a pattern of the former, he adds (85): 'Besides perspicuity, there must be also right reasoning; without which perspicuity serves but to expose the speaker. And for attaining of this, I should propose the constant reading of Chillingworth, who, by his example, will teach both perspicuity, and the way of right reasoning, better than any book that I know; and therefore will deserve to be read upon that account over and over again; not to say any thing of his argument.' Bishop Barlow, in a letter to one of his friends, who had writ to him for his judgment, wherein Mr Chillingworth's peculiar excellency above other writers considered, returns the following answer (86): 'You desire to know, wherein Mr Chillingworth's excellency, above other writers, did consist? So that you seem to take it for granted, that he has an excellency (if not above all, yet) above many, or most writers; and I think so too. But then the case must be cautiously stated; for his excellency we speak of, cannot consist in any extraordinary knowledge he had of Antiquity (sacred or civil) of Councils and Fathers, or learned men animadversions upon them; nor in any great skill he had in several Tongues and Languages, &c. But his excellency, wherein he excelled many (if not most) writers, did arise from, and consist in his Logick, both natural, and (by exceeding great industry) acquired—But that Logick, in which Mr Chillingworth's excellency did principally consist, was his acquired Logick: he industriously studied it, finding the exceeding use of it, especially in controversies of religion. Logick (and that only) makes a man to write so, that his arguments shall be, 1. Consequent. 2. Evident. For that (and that only) enables a writer really to know, whether the premises do indeed infer the conclusion; or otherwise are false, or fallacious, and sophistical, and not truly logical and concluding arguments. And for this Mr Chillingworth (after an industrious and diligent reading Aristotle's and Crakenthorp's Logick, who were best able to instruct him) was of greater ability to judge truly, than most (if not all) the writers I have yet met with. Besides, Mr Chillingworth, in all his disputes against Papery, draws his arguments, not from the Fathers or Councils (though in several things they may be of good use, though they be not infallible) but from the sacred Scriptures; which being of divine authority and infallible, are a sure and just ground of that confidence we are speaking of.' We shall only add the following judicious observation of Bishop Hare, in relation to the reading of our author. 'Mr Chillingworth, says he (87), is certainly a good reasoner, and may be read with much advantage: but I fear the reading of him by young Divines hath had one great inconvenience: They see little shew of reading in him, and from thence are induced to think, there is no necessity of learning, to make a good Divine; nay, that if he had been more a scholar, he had been a worse reasoner; and therefore not to study the ancient writers of the Church, is one step to the being Chillingworth's themselves: I fear, I say, the reading Mr Chillingworth in their first years has had this influence, to make them think, that good parts and good sense would do without learning, and that learning is rather a prejudice than an improvement of them. But 'tis a great mistake to judge of a man's learning by the shew that is made of it. Mr Chillingworth had studied hard, and digested well what he read; and so must they who hope to write as well, and be as much esteemed.'

CHURCHILL (Sir WINSTON) a gentleman of distinguished loyalty, and an eminent Historian in the reign of Charles II. He was descended from an antient and very honourable family in Dorsetshire, who had been owners of land in that county, from a very little after the Norman Conquest, down to the time of his birth (a); so that in point of descent, there was no need of having recourse to art, in order to give lustre to a family, which, in itself, had all the genuine marks of splendor that constitute true nobility, viz. a known lineage of worthy persons through a long series of years, whose names are to be found in our records, the only certain evidences of English gentility [A]. He was the son of John Churchill, Esq; of Minthorn in Dorsetshire, a very eminent Lawyer, who added that and other estates to those which descended to him from his ancestors, by his success in his profession (b), by Sarah, daughter and coheirs of Sir Henry Winston, of Standiton in Gloucestershire, Knt (c). He was born at Wooton Glanvile in Dorsetshire, some time in the year 1620, as some say (d), but Anthony Wood tells us that he was born at London, but fixes his birth in the same year (e). He was distinguished in his youth by the mildness and modesty of his disposition, as well as by a natural turn to learning, which occasioned his being sent to St John's college at Oxford, when he had scarce attained the age of sixteen (f). He studied there with great industry and application, and would probably have betaken himself to some learned profession, if the disorders of the times, and the circumstances of his family, had not obliged him to leave the university sooner than he intended, and before he had taken a degree (g). He engaged, from principles of loyalty, in the cause of his unfortunate Sovereign King Charles I, for which he suffered severely in his fortune, and having married while young, Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir John Drake of Ash in Devonshire, she was forced to seek a refuge in her father's house, when Mr Churchill's undeserved misfortunes left him none that he could call his own, and there most of his children were born, and consequently were, by the mother's side, allied to some of the best and noblest families in this kingdom [B]. At the King's

A certain German writer, after the battle of Hochstedt, drew up an account of this family, in the manner of that country, without authorities (1), and therefore, little or no regard ought to be paid to it. The highest that, with any appearance of truth, and historical certainty, can be traced of this line, is Gitto de Leon, a Norman, who flourished, Anno Domini 1055, under William the Bastard, Duke of Normandy. His second son, Wandrill, took the surname of Courcil, from a Lordship of that name, of which he was the owner. He had two sons, Roger and Rowland. From the latter descend the family of Courcils, who have large possessions in several provinces in France, at this day. Roger de Courcil attended Duke William in his expedition into this kingdom, and as a reward for his services had lands given him in Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Shropshire, among which was the Lordship of Churchill, as it was afterwards called, in the county of Somerset, the place of his abode (2). This Roger by his wife Gertrude, daughter to Sir Guy de Torbay, had John his son and heir, whose wife was Joan de Kilrington, by whom he had Sir Bartholomew de Chercile, who held the Castle of Bristol for King Stephen. In whose service he was killed, and in honour of him, the small town of Churchill, was so called (3). He married Agnes, daughter to Ralph Fitz Ralph, Lord of Tiverton, and by her had Pagan de Chercile, whose son Roger had free warren in his lands in Chercile in the reign of Edward I. To this Roger succeeded Elias de Churchelle, whose wife was Dorothy, a daughter of the ancient family of Columbiers, and by her had three sons, John, who married Joan, daughter and coheir to Roger Dawney of Norton, and left only two daughters his coheirs, Margaret, the wife of Andrew Hilberston of the county of Devon, and Agnes, married to Thomas Gifford of Theuborough in Cornwall, whereby the Lordship of Churchill and other lands devolved on them. Giles second son, had the Lordship of Yampton and Lineham in Devonshire, which estates, by a female heir, descended to the family of Croker of the same county, so that William, the third son of Elias was the chief heir-male (4). This William was seated at Rockbeare in the county of Devon, and left issue, Giles Churchill, Esq; father of Charles Churchill, Esq; who for his firm adherence to the House of York, was in great favour with King Edward IV, who advanced him to the marriage of Margaret, only daughter of Sir William Wodvile, by whom he had Thomas Churchill, Esq; whose wife was Grace, daughter and coheir to Thomas Tylle of Tylle house in the county of Cornwall, and by her he had William Churchill, his heir and successor, who married Mary, eldest daughter to Richard Creufe of Microft-caille in the county of Devon, Esq; and by her he had three sons, Roger of Catherston, William of Corton, and John, who was seated at Muston, all in the county of Dorset. The said Roger marrying Jane, relict of Nicholas Mogg, and daughter to William Peverell of Bradford, by her had Matthew Churchill of Bradford, who marrying Elizabeth, daughter to John Chaplet of Herrington in the county of Dorset, had John, his heir, grandfather of Sir Winston, and another son, named Jasper, father of Sir John Churchill, an eminent Counsel in the reign of King Charles II, who marrying Susan, daughter to Edmund Prideaux, Esq; by her left only four daughters, who were his coheirs (5).

[B] To some of the best and noblest families in this kingdom. The family of the Drakes of Ahe in the county of Devon, were very ancient and honourable, and were first seated at Exmouth in the same county, where there had been no less than ten successions, all of the name of John (6). Sir Bernard Drake, grandfather of Sir Winston Churchill, by his mother's side, was a great Courtier, and a famous sea Captain in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and was a person of so high spirit, that he gave the famous Sir Francis Drake a box on the ear for assuming his Arms, which were a Wivern displayed, Gules; and this provoked the Queen to such a degree, that she gave a new Coat to Sir Francis Drake, and for his crest, a ship on a Globe held by a cable with a hand out of the clouds, and in the rigging hung up by the heels a Wivern with-wings displayed, Gules; of which, when she asked Sir Bernard his opinion, he boldly answered, Madam, though you could give him a finer, yet you could not give him an antienter Coat than mine (7). This gentleman, who deceased Anno Dom. 1585, by Gertrude his wife, daughter of Bartholomew Fortescue of Fillegh in the same county, ancestor to the present Earl of Clinton (8), had issue, Sir John Drake, Knt, who married Eleanor, second daughter, and one of the coheires of John Lord Boteler of Brampsfield (9) in the county of Hertford, a person of very illustrious descent, and who espoused Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir George Villiers of Brokeby in the county of Leicester, Knt. sister to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of the Kings, James and Charles I (10). The son of this gentleman, and the brother of Lady Churchill, was knighted by King Charles II, and afterwards created a Baronet by the same Prince, August 31, 1660 (11); he was also intended among the rest of the loyal Gentlemen of Devonshire to have been made a Knight of the Royal Oak, if the King, for very good reasons, had not thought fit to desist from that design; but his name

King's return Mr Churchill's affairs wore another aspect, he removed to his seat at Minthorn in Dorsetshire, and was elected a Burgess for the borough of Weymouth in that county, for that Parliament which met May 8, 1661 (i), and soon after, viz. in the latter end of 1663, his Majesty was pleased to confer upon him the honour of knighthood (k). The security and quiet of the times reviving in his breast that love of literature which had possessed him in his youth, he associated himself much with men of learning, and with such as were remarkable for being the patrons of learning, which induced the Members of the Royal Society, soon after it's foundation, to elect him a Fellow of that noble establishment for the promoting useful knowledge (l). In the year 1664, Sir Winston Churchill, together with Sir Richard Rainsford, Sir Thomas Beverly, Sir Edward Deering, Sir Edward Smith, Sir Allen Broderick, and Col. Cook, were appointed Commissioners of the Court of Claims in Ireland (m), with power to hear and adjudge the qualifications of those who had forfeited their estates, in which office he did very great service, by contributing, in conjunction with his colleagues, to settle that nation in a state of tranquillity, which, at the time of their coming over, was in very great distraction (n) [C]. Upon his return from thence he was constituted one of the Clerks Comptrollers of the Green Cloth, an office of consideration and credit at Court, and received also other marks of his Majesty's kind acceptance of his services. But, as his attendance at Court did not take up any great portion of his time, he had leisure enough to resume his studies, and this lead him to review and publish a kind of Political Essay upon the History of England, in which having treated many points, and more especially one, according to those high notions of loyalty which he had imbibed in his youth, and upon which he always acted (o), they drew a censure upon his book by men of different principles, who likewise attacked his conduct in Parliament with great virulence. It is perhaps owing to the notions then conceived to it's prejudice, that, notwithstanding the reading and learning shewn therein, very little regard is now paid to his work [D]. The dislike still remains in the list of those who were proposed for that honour, from whence it appears, that he was then esteemed to have an estate of eight hundred pounds a year (12); this family is now extinct, but in honour of his descent from it, his Grace, the late Duke of Marlborough, took for his supporters, two Wiverns, Gules (13); and the present Duke has for his finitler supporter, a Wivern, Argent, wings expanded (14).

[C] Was in very great distraction. The design of this Court, which was erected in virtue of the Act of Settlement, was to distinguish, among the old Irish, between the innocent and the guilty. The period assigned by the King's Declaration, was the 2d of May 1661, which the Irish Parliament enlarged to the first of August 1662, and prolonged it afterwards to July 2, 1663. The place in which they sat was at the King's Inns in Dublin, and out of about four thousand Claims, they determined before their commission expired, about six hundred and thirty, by which, numbers of persons and their heirs were restored, who would otherwise have lost their estates (15). This certainly contributed not a little to calm the minds of the native Irish, but at the same time it occasioned a very high clamour amongst Cromwell's soldiers, and all those to whom these lands had been disposed of, by the powers that were then lately in being; and to this, we are to impute that resentment with which some writers speak of this Court of Claims, and of those who sat therein (16).

[D] Very little regard is now paid to his work. The title of this book at large, runs thus: DIVI BRITANNICI, being a Remark upon the Lives of all the Kings of this Isle, from the year of the world 2855, unto the year of Grace 1660, by Sir Winston Churchill, Knt. London 1675, fol. It is dedicated to King Charles II; and in the Dedication, the author takes notice, that having served his Majesty's father as long as he could with his sword, he spent a great part of those leisure hours, which were forced upon him by his misfortunes, in defending that Prince's cause, and, indeed, the cause of Monarchy itself, with his pen; and he very clearly avows, that he looked upon his work as the funeral Oration of that deceased government, or rather, as his title speaks it, the Apotheosis of departed Kings. This being the nature of his work, it was natural to expect, that the stile should correspond therewith, that it should be raised and florid, and not subjected to the rules of History, for which the author never meant it. But notwithstanding this, the dates are generally very exact, the facts are well supported by authorities, there are abundance of curious and judicious observations interspersed through it, and if it was not for that flaming zeal, that Enthusiasm of Loyalty which runs through it, and which, if it was a weakness in the author, was also the foible of those times, and the more excusable in a person who had fought and suffered for his principles, it might be considered as a very extraordinary performance. In order to justify in some measure this account, it may not be amiss to cite a very curious passage from his Introduction. Thus it runs; 'What the number and strength of the Norman was, may be nearly computed by what he did abroad in that holy, and what he suffered at home in that unholy, war, commonly called the Barons War: the first, for religion; the last, for liberty. The one having consumed as many lives as there were stones in the walls of the Holy City they fought for; the other not so fatal, because poised with a more equal force, but altogether as formidable; there being at least 50,000 always ready to do execution on either side. So stood the case for the first two hundred and fifty years after the entrance of William the First. The computation of the middle times, must be taken from the preparation of Edward the Third, when he took two Kingdoms, and missed but little of taking two kingdoms at once, engaging himself in a double edged war, that ended not with his own life or theirs; wherein, though it is supposed he exhausted as much of the force as the treasure of the kingdom, yet he did not so weaken his successor Richard II, but that he was able to take the field with 300,000 foot, and 100,000 horse attending him (as Walsingham tells us) whose testimony has the more credit, by how much it is seconded by Emilius, the French Historian, who had no cause to magnify the number of the English at that time. Later computations may be taken from the preparations of Henry the Eighth, at Bullen, Queen Elizabeth, at Tilbury, at either, not so little, as 185,000 foot, and 40,000 horse in readiness for present service; for I am willing to pass by the consideration of those vast numbers which supported that unnatural quarrel betwixt the two fatal Houses of York and Lancaster, as likewise the late war betwixt King Charles the First and the Republican Faction, when it is believed there were no less than three hundred thousand foot, and sixty thousand horse actually engaged in arms, and from those parades at the reception of King James, when he made his first entry into England, and more especially at the happy Restauration of our Sovereign that now is, whose Life-guard at his landing, were no less than fifty thousand of perhaps the best horse in the world: not reckoning those appointed for the defence of the Realm. However, all the computations of our land forces dislike of the party did not stop here, but followed him so closely, that after the dissolution of that which was stiled the Long Parliament, he was, in 1678, dismissed from his post of Clerk of the Green Cloth (p), though much against his Master's will, who, as soon as he delivered himself from the restraint which the situation of his affairs had put him under, restored him again to his office, which, during the rest of that reign, he held, and was the oldest Clerk of the Green Cloth at King Charles's death (q). He remained in his office, and enjoyed the same if not a greater degree of favour from Court, during the short reign of King James II, and having had the pleasure to see his eldest surviving son raised to the Peerage, and the rest of his children in a fair way of promotion, he departed this life the twenty-sixth of March 1688 (r), and three days after was buried in the parish-church of St Martin in the Fields, leaving issue by his Lady before-mentioned several children both sons and daughters, as the reader may see in the notes [E]; besides three sons and as many daughters that died in their infancy, and of whom therefore it was not necessary to give any farther account.

' forces fall so short of our Maritime, that, as there is no comparison to be made betwixt them; so we may say, that we have rendred ourselves more formidable by our Cannon Law at sea, than any other people by any Law of Arms whatsoever.' We are told by Anthony Wood (17), that there being some passages in this work about the King's power of raising money without Parliament; this gave such offence to the Members of the Parliament then sitting, that the leaf in which this occurred being cancelled, and reprinted without that offensive passage in a great part of the edition, the author hoped thereby to please and to give content. If Mr Wood had been pleased to inform us, which page this was, it would have shewn more accuracy and better acquaintance with a work that he has censured very severely. In the said book, says he, which is very thin and brittle, are the Arms of all the Kings of England, which made it sell among Novices, rather than from the matter therein. Another critical Historian, who seems to have had Mr Wood in his eye, speaks also very slightly of our author's performance (18). ' There are, says he, some later Histories, which are so well known to all that are any thing curious in these matters, that I need do little more than mention them; such are Sir Winstone Churchill's Diwi Britannici, which gives the reader a diverting view of the Arms and exploits of our Kings down to the Restoration in 1660, &c.' Another writer treats our author's character as well as book with less decency, for he charges him (19) not only with asserting that the King might raise money without a Parliament, but with consenting to his daughter's kindness for the Duke of York, and receiving in gratifications from the Crown ten thousand pounds. But considering this as a political pamphlet written to serve a particular turn, and written at a time when the press being under restraint, that which was intended for the cure, proved really the cause of libels, we are not bound to receive all the author of it says for Gospel.

[E] As the reader may see in the notes.] The eldest of his sons that lived to man's estate, was John, afterwards Duke of Marlborough, &c. of whom in the next article. The next, George Churchill, of whom we shall also speak hereafter. Charles Churchill, the Duke's second brother was born at Ashe the 2d of February 1656. He was likewise bred to arms, and was noted for several brave actions. At thirteen years of age, he was made Page of Honour to Christian King of Denmark; and at sixteen, Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber to his brother Prince George. At the Revolution, he succeeded Major-General Oglethorpe in his regiment of foot; and in 1692, at the battle of Steenkirk, August 23, he was Brigadier-General. The Brigade under his command behaved bravely, as they did, likewise the year following, at the battle of Landen, where he himself gave the greatest proofs of his courage and conduct in the defence of the villages of Lare and Neder Winden, and where he took his nephew the Duke of Berwick prisoner. He was made Major-General of Foot, and Governor of Kinsale in Ireland, by King William, and after many battles fought with great bravery and conduct, was esteemed one of the best Commanders of Foot in Europe. By his gracious Mistress, Queen Anne, he was made Governor of the Tower of London, General of the army, and General in Chief of Foot, and had a great and honourable share in the ever memorable battle of Blenheim: after which, for his many and great services, he was made Governor of Brussels, Colonel of the Coldstream regiment of Foot guards, and Governor of her Majesty's island of Guernsey. In the year 1702, he married Mary, daughter and sole heiress of James Goulde of Dorchester, Esq; by whom he had no issue; he died much lamented, December 29, 1714; and his widow about three years after his decease, married the Right Honourable the Earl of Abingdon. Theobald Churchill, Sir Winston's youngest son, had his academical education in Queen's College in Oxford, where he commenced Master of Arts, June 13, 1683; and entering into Holy Orders, died unmarried, December 3, 1685, and was buried in the parish-church of St Martin in the Fields in Westminster. Arabella Churchill, the eldest of Sir Winston's children, was born in March 1648, was Maid of Honour to the Dukes of York, and beloved by the Duke, afterwards King James II, by whom she had two sons and two daughters. The eldest, James Fitz-James, was created by his father, Duke of Berwick; he was also Knight of the Garter and of the Golden-Fleece, Marshal of France, and Grandee of Spain of the first class. He was justly reputed one of the greatest officers of his time, and being Generalissimo of the armies of France, fell by a cannon-shot at the siege of Philipburgh in 1734. Henry Fitz-James, Grand Prior of France, Lieutenant-General and Admiral of the French galleys, was born in 1673, and died in 1702. Henrietta, born in 1670, married Sir Henry Waldgrave of Cheuton, grandfather to the present Earl of Waldgrave, and died in 1730: the younger daughter was a Nun. This Lady afterwards married Colonel Godfrey, by whom she had two daughters; the eldest, Charlotte, married the late Lord Viscount Falmouth; and the younger, Elizabeth, espoused Edmund Dunch, Esq;

CHURCHILL (JOHN) Duke of Marlborough, and Prince of the Holy Roman Empire, one of the ablest Statesmen and most polite Courtiers, as well as one of the greatest Captains and most illustrious Heroes, that our nation, or indeed any other, has produced. He was born at Ashe, the seat of his grandfather by the mother's side, in Devonshire, on Midsummer day 1650, a little before noon, and two days after was baptized by Mr Matthew Drake Rector of that parish (a). We have already shewn that his father's circumstances were far from being easy, either at this time, or for several years afterwards, therefore we need not at all wonder, that his son had not those advantages in his education which were due to his birth (b). Yet there is reason to believe, that a learned father would not in any degree neglect the care of a son, who was the first hopes of his family, for though he had an elder brother, Winston Churchill, yet he soon died, and therefore John, while a child, was considered as the heir, and treated accordingly. A worthy worthy clergyman in the neighbourhood instructed him in the first principles of literature, under the eye of his farther, and from them both he received such a tincture of true religion and zeal for the Church of England, as continued to manifest itself throughout his whole life, and tho' no man was less a bigot, yet never any person of his rank shewed either greater respect for, or firmer belief in, the Christian faith, than he (c). His father carried him very early to Court, where the beauty of his person, the pregnancy of his parts, and the modesty of his behaviour, recommended him, when but twelve years of age, to the peculiar notice of James Duke of York, to whom he soon afterwards became a Page, and at the same time a favourite (d). It is generally agreed, that he had a pair of colours given him in the Guards during the first Dutch war, that is, about the year 1666, but the manner in which he obtained them is somewhat differently reported [A]. That war ending soon after, and Mr Churchill being impatient to gain some practical knowledge in the trade of arms, which he now considered as his profession, obtained leave to go over to Tangier, then in our hands and besieged by the Moors (e), where he resided for some short time, and where he had the first opportunity of shewing his courage, and of acquiring experience, which never any did in less time than he; for, as we shall hereafter have occasion to observe, his very first actions were in their nature as great as any in his whole life, and the first time he was honoured with a command in chief, he appeared as much a General as in the last of his most glorious actions. Upon his return to England he continued his attendance at Court, and received, as well from the King as from the Duke, daily marks of kindness and favour, notwithstanding the slanderous tales that flew about the Court as to his amorous adventures (f). In 1672 the Duke of Monmouth commanding a body of English auxiliaries in the service of France, Mr Churchill, who was always for seeing action, attended him, and was very soon after made Captain of Grenadiers in his Grace's own regiment. He had a share in all the actions that were performed in that famous campaign, which brought the republick of Holland lower in a few months, than the Spaniards were able to bring her in many years. At the siege of Nimeguen Captain Churchill distinguished himself particularly, insomuch that he was taken notice of by the celebrated Marshal Turenne, who bestowed on him the name of the handsome Englishman, by which he was generally known while he continued in the French army, more especially after a very gallant action he performed, in recovering a post of importance from the Dutch, with half the number of men that had been under a French Lieutenant-Colonel, who was entrusted with the defence of it, and who quitted it upon the enemy's approach (g). But the most soldier-like action of this war was the reduction of the strong fortrefs of Maestricht, which had in it a garrison of ten thousand men at that time, and those too well provided and well commanded. In the night of the fourteenth of June, the Duke of Monmouth being Lieutenant-General of the trenches, attacked, and made himself master of a half-moon, but the Dutch before day sprung a mine to the right with so good effect, that the French troops, though the best in the whole army, were beaten out of those posts, nor could the forces ordered for that service recover them, till the Duke of Monmouth with ten or twelve English volunteers, threw himself into the hottest fire, and thereby inspired the forces with such ardour that they again drove out the Dutch, and became a second time masters of all the posts which they had attacked the day before (h). The share Captain Churchill had in this business was so very remarkable, that the French King thanked him for it at the head of the line, and assured him that he would acquaint his Sovereign with the particulars of his gallant behaviour, which he did; and his Grace the Duke of Monmouth, on their return to England, in relating what happened at the attack, told the King his father, that he was indebted to Captain Churchill for much of his glory, and for his safety altogether, since by his bravery he had preserved his life (i). This good fortune which began in the second year of our hero's life, attended all his succeeding undertakings, so that his sword was never drawn but victory pursued. The laurels he brought from France very justly entitled him to preferment at home, and his Majesty

[A] Is somewhat differently reported. It is said by some, that Sir Winstone Churchill perceiving his son's inclination to Arms, and being desirous to gratify it, applied to the Duke of York, and by his interest with that Prince, procured him an Ensign's commission (1). Another account is given, which is the more probable, and which I have heard confirmed by persons that had a relation to the Duke of Marlborough's family. He was first Page to the Duke, and in that quality attended his Royal Highness frequently when the Guards were exercised and mustered before him, to which the youth being extremely attentive, and upon being asked some questions relating to their exercise, answering with an unexpected degree of penetration and sagacity, the Duke, who, in the judgment of Marshal Turenne, had a very good military genius, and was to the last degree fond of troops, shewed himself highly pleased, as well with his capacity as his inclination, and thereupon, to encourage and enter him in the world, gave him the next pair of Colours that fell (2). Those who are fond of secret History and marvellous adventures, have reported, that the Duke gave him this commission, that he might have an opportunity of sending him to Tangier out of the way of the Duchess of York, who was thought to look upon him with an air of tenderness, that made his Royal Highness not a little uneasy (3). But whoever considers, not only the great difference of rank, but the vast disproportion in age between them, for Mr Churchill could not be above fifteen, when this is supposed to have happened, the several easy and natural motives exclusive of the young Gentleman's merit, that might induce the Duke to have a more than ordinary affection for him, and the constancy of that Prince's favour towards him through all the different changes of both their circumstances, will see no cause whatever to recur to any such slight anecdotes as these, which tarnish so many reputations, and, at the same time, are not so much as reported by any who could be supposed to have a just knowledge of the truth of them, if, which is very improbable, they had been really facts.

Majesty having made him Lieutenant-Colonel of Littleton's regiment, the Duke made him Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, and soon after Master of the Robes (k). The second Dutch war being over, Colonel Churchill found himself again obliged to pass his days at Court, where he was no less distinguished as a fine gentleman, than he had been admired for his military qualities in the camp [B]. He behaved with great prudence and circumspection in those troublesome times that ensued, and gave frequent demonstrations of his inflexible attachment to the Protestant Religion, as well as an inviolable fidelity to his most gracious Master. In the beginning of the year 1679, when the King's pleasure was signified to the Duke of York, that he should pass some time in the Low-Countries; Colonel Churchill attended his Royal Highness and his family, first to the Hague and then to Brussels; waited upon him in his short trip to England, and in his journey to Windsor, and returned with him upon the King's recovering from that illness, which brought over the Duke a second time to Brussels (l). He likewise accompanied him the next year in travelling by land into Scotland, where the King his brother gave him not only leave to reside, but in some measure put the management of that kingdom into his hands, which has not been numbered amongst the wisest actions of that Monarch's reign. His Royal Highness arrived at Edinburgh on the fourth of December 1680, whither Colonel Churchill attended him, and being then considered as a favourite, was very respectfully treated, and generally applied to by the Nobility of Scotland (m). He returned with his Master to London, and went down with him a second time by sea, when he had the misfortune to be obliged to retire thither again, upon the heats raised against him in the House of Commons. While he waited upon the Duke, here he had a regiment of dragoons given him, and thinking it now time to settle himself in the world, he made his addresses to Mrs Sarah Jennings, who then waited on the Lady Anne, afterwards Queen of Great Britain. This young Lady, who was then about twenty-one, and justly esteemed both for her person and her parts one of the finest woman in this island, he married in 1681, and thereby added very considerable to the interest he already had at Court (n). In the spring of the year 1682 the Duke of York returned to London, and having procured his Majesty's leave to quit that kingdom, and to reside as formerly at Court, he resolved to return to Scotland by sea to bring up his family, and for that purpose embarked on board the Gloucester-frigate, commanded by Sir John Berry, May 4, 1682, but unluckily ran upon the Lemon-Oar, a dangerous sand that lies about sixteen leagues from the mouth of the Humber, where his ship was lost with some persons of quality, and upwards of one hundred and twenty persons on board her (o). This melancholy accident afforded his Royal Highness an opportunity of shewing the tender affection that he had for Colonel Churchill, of whose safety he was particularly careful, by taking him with him in the boat in which himself escaped the danger. The circumstances of this shipwreck are very differently reported, but with regard to the Duke's concern for Colonel Churchill all writers are agreed, though hardly in any other point [C]. The stay

[B] For his military qualities in the camp] It may be reasonably looked upon as a thing not a little strange, that, considering the great figure the Duke of Marlborough made for so many years, there should be so few materials preserved of the earlier part of his life; and that those we have, are much fitter to adorn Novels, than to enrich Histories. It is for this reason, that all one can say upon this subject, must be borrowed from tradition, and from the reports of those, who were well acquainted with this great man in the dawn of his life. On this, which is the best authority that can be had, I may venture to acquaint the reader, that very few people of his rank, were either so much or so generally esteemed, as Colonel Churchill; and I dare assure him, that at a time when the Court of England was considered in all respects, as the most splendid and the most polite in Europe, that of France only excepted, Colonel Churchill was distinguished by the general reputation, of being one of the best natured and best bred men in it. It is very certain, that his amours are much talked of, and in so gallant a Court, as that of King Charles II, a very young, a very handsome, and a very rising man, might be excused, if he fell into some errors of this kind; but it is on all hands allowed, that even at this time, his prudence had so much the better of his passions, that he never suffered himself to be carried away by any of them, to such a degree, as to be in any respect wanting, either to his duty or his interests, which, whoever is well acquainted with human nature, will look upon to be a very extraordinary thing at his time of life; since experience, as well as reason, will inform us, that tho' commanding armies and gaining victories are great things, yet in respect to the powers of the human mind, it is a still greater, with faculties capable of commanding and conquering, to be able to controul desires, and to keep every appetite in due subjection. This he did in a very great degree, and yet in his youth, he was thought for a courtier somewhat too free a speaker. He had wit, and indeed a great deal of wit, but his supreme excellency was his penetration, for which he was highly distinguished long before the great rise of his fortunes; for by the natural strength of his judgment, he would pronounce so clearly, both of men and things, that his remarks were frequently talked of, and as they were almost always justified by the event, he was admired as one of the shrewdest men of those times; but together with this admiration, there went no small mixture of envy. He was so sensible of the inconveniences that might arise from the liberty that was natural to him in discourse, that he declined as much as he could all political subjects, and never had any notion of becoming a Member of the House of Commons, but contented himself with pushing his fortune in his own way, or as the gamesters say, he would bowl only upon ground that he perfectly understood. In short, his affability gained him a general good report, for which he had a just esteem; his application to the profession of arms, secured to him the character he truly deserved, of being, in it's most extensive sense, a good officer; and his steady zeal for the person and cause of the Duke, which at that juncture was very conspicuous, procured him that interest and influence, which no man in the world knew better, how to direct or to apply.

[C] Tho' hardly in any other point] This business of the Duke's shipwreck in going to Scotland has exercised many pens, and has been transmitted to posterity in very different lights; but with respect to the saving Colonel Churchill, it is agreed, that when the ship was lost, the Duke was asleep; and that upon his being awaked, and finding nothing to trust to but the long-boat, he named some particular persons who should go into her with him, and amongst others, of his Royal Highness in that kingdom was but very short, for as he sailed from England in the beginning, so he arrived with his family in the river of Thames from Scotland, before the end of the month of May 1682, and was received with the utmost marks of brotherly affection by the King. The first use made by his Royal Highness of this sunshine of favour, was to obtain a title for his favourite, Colonel Churchill, who, by Letters Patents bearing date December 1, 1682, was created Baron of Eymouth in the kingdom of Scotland (p), and was also appointed Colonel of the third troop of Guards. These were the last favours he received from that King, and no doubt his Lordship would have much more regretted the loss of so kind and good a Prince, had he not been succeeded by the Duke of York, to whom the Lord Churchill was still dear. This appeared plainly upon the first accession of King James, who not only continued him in his post in the Bed-chamber, and in his command in the Guards, but sent him also his Ambassador to France to notify his accession, which high office he discharged with much advantage to his reputation (q) [D]. On his Lordship's return from France he was constituted High-Steward of the borough of St Alban's, on the sixteenth of March 1685; an honour seldom conferred but upon persons of the highest quality (r). He assisted at the coronation of King James on the twenty-third of April following, and on the fourteenth of May the same year he was created a Peer of England, by the title of Baron Churchill of Sandridge in the county of Hertford, a manor that belonged to him in right of his wife; into whose family it came a little before by marriage (s). In the month of June, his Lordship being then Lieutenant-General of the King's forces, was ordered into the West, upon the Duke of Monmouth's making a bold but very inconsiderate attempt, in which, amongst many other errors, his greatest was that of assuming the lofty title of King, and setting a price upon

Colonel Churchill (4), tho' a certain author turns the tables, and says, the Colonel was very instrumental in saving his Royal Highness's life (5), which very possibly might, and if there was any room for it must, be true. A certain reverend Prelate (6) gives us the following account of it, which, considering the respect paid to his authority, deserves, if possible, to be explained and corrected. 'The Duke had leave given him to come to the King at New-Market; and there he prevailed for leave to come up and live again at Court. As he was going back to bring the Duchess; the Gloucester frigate that carried him struck on a bank of sand. The Duke got into a boat: and took care of his dogs, and some unknown persons, who were taken from that earnest care of his to be his Priests. The long-boat went off with very few in her, tho' she might have carried off above eighty more than she did. One hundred and fifty persons perished: some of them, men of great quality. But the Duke took no notice of this cruel neglect which was laid chiefly to Legge's charge.' Another writer who penned his accounts of things at this time, and without any view of publishing them, tells this story thus (7): 'May the 10, 1682, this day came news, that his Highness had been in great danger of being cast away in his voyage back to the North; the ship he was in having struck upon Yarmouth sands, and that a great number of the passengers had been lost; a piece of news, that was at first contradicted, but in a day or two confirmed by a particular account, that the Gloucester, a third rate, in which the Duke of York had embarked for Scotland, had actually suffered shipwreck upon one of Yarmouth sands, called the Lemon-Oar; and that the Duke with about an hundred and sixty persons were saved: among those that perished were the Lords O Brian and Roxborough, and Mr Hyde Lord Clarendon's brother.' This account agrees very well with that given us by another writer, of there being above three hundred persons aboard the ship, of which the major part were saved, and amongst those who were drowned was the Duke's brother-in-law, Mr Hyde, which did not argue any great respect of persons in those who were suffered to go into the long-boat (8). What blame fell upon Legge, or who this Legge was, is not easy to determine; for as to Colonel Legge, then Master of the Ordnance, and a Privy Counsellor, afterwards Lord Dartmouth, and Admiral of the fleet, he was visiting the fortresses of the kingdom at this time by his Majesty's command (9). What there was of severity in the case, seems to have been no more than this; that two persons, one in the boat, the other on board the ship, stood with their swords drawn, to prevent that irregular crowding, which might have endangered the boat as well as the ship; and if the reader is curious to know who those persons were, we shall endeavour to satisfy him. He on board the ship was Sir John

Berry, who after performing this service, escaped very narrowly himself, by swimming to a rope that was thrown over the stern of Capt. Wybourn's ship (10); and he in the boat was Colonel Churchill (11), who for this service is very justly said to have contributed to the preservation of the Duke his master's life.

[D] Which high office he discharged with much advantage to his reputation.] We have an account of this matter from a reverend Prelate, who seems to be better acquainted with it than any writer of those times, and therefore upon his authority we must in this case wholly rely. His words upon the subject are these (12). 'In one thing only the King seemed to comply with the genius of the nation, though it proved in the end to be only a shew. He seemed resolved not to be governed by French counsels. but to act on an equality with that haughty monarch in all things. And as he entertained all the other foreign Ministers with assurances, that he would maintain the balance of Europe with a more steady hand than had been done formerly, so when he sent over the Lord Churchill to the Court of France, with the notice of his brother's death, he ordered him to observe exactly the ceremony and state with which he was received, that he might treat him who should be sent over, with the compliment in return to that in the same manner. And this he observed very punctually, when the Marshal de Lorge came over. This was set about by the courtiers, as a sign of another spirit, that might be looked for in a reign so begun. And this made some impression on the Court of France, and put them to a stand. But not long after this the French King said to the Duke of Ville-roy, who told it to young Rouvigny, now Earl of Galway, (from whom I had it) that the King of England, after all the high things given out in his name, was willing to take his money, as well as his brother had done.' It may not be amiss to annex here, another piece of secret history from a writer, who was very well acquainted with these times, and yet he will be a bold man that should desire implicit credit to be given to either author (13); 'At this time, says my author, the Favourites at Court began to be at strife with each other; the Lord Sunderland was made President of the Council, and continued Secretary of State; his Lordship having artfully insinuated to the Queen (he had then a misunderstanding with the Treasurer) that the friends and relations of the King's first wife, as Rochester, Clarendon, Dartmouth, and others, were in greatest favour, and in possession of the best places, while her friends, though she was Queen consort, were but slenderly provided for; and her friends being reckoned to be Lord Sunderland, the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Churchill, they began to play their private batteries against each other.'

(f) Life of King James, p. 235. upon his uncle's head, which afterwards became fatal to his own (t). His forces were, from the beginning, harrassed by a very inconsiderable body of horse commanded by Lord Churchill, which was one great reason that compelled him to venture all upon a battle; and knowing that his irregular troops would be very unequally matched, though somewhat superior in number to the King's forces, he laboured to remedy that inconvenience by attacking in the dark (u), which might probably have been attended with success, if Lord Churchill, who was more vigilant than other officers, had not sat up all night, and with part of Dunbarton's regiment kept the rebels in play 'till the infantry was formed, and then charging the Duke's horse that were commanded by Lord Gray, they were either broken or betrayed into immediate flight, which decided the fortune of the day and that early; for the battle of Sedgmore was over between four and five o'clock in the morning, on the sixth of July 1685 (w). This was a decisive stroke, and would have been so which ever side prevailed, for a great part of the nation, from the fear of Popery, were inclined to the Duke, but his army being defeated, and himself taken, the danger of the rebellion was entirely over. It is reasonable to suppose that Lord Churchill was extremely well received by the King upon his return, but it was not long before his Lordship discerned that this victory had had as well as good effects, that it confirmed the King in his opinion of his standing forces, and mis-led him into a belief, that at the head of an English army he might trample upon English liberty, but he soon found his mistake (x). Whatever share his Lordship had in the Royal favour, and whatever advantage accrued to him from his posts and preferments, it is a truth notorious, that he was never guilty of any mean compliance, nor had any concern in suggesting, or in executing any of the violent counsels in that unhappy reign. Those came from other men, and men of other principles, or rather of no principles at all, who hurried their master to his ruin, while Lord Churchill very prudently declined meddling much in business, spoke little except when his advice was asked, and then always recommended moderate measures (y). It is said that he declared very early to Lord Galway, that if his master attempted to overturn the established religion he would leave him, and this is the more probable, because during that whole reign; and indeed during his whole life, he never dissembled his zeal for the Church of England, on what side soever that Church was attacked. It is also said that he signed the Memorial transmitted to the Prince and Princess of Orange, by which they were invited to rescue this nation from Popery and slavery (z), but be that as it will, it is very certain that he remained with, and was entrusted by, the King, after the Prince of Orange was landed, November 5, 1688. He attended King James when he marched with his forces to oppose, and even to fight, the Prince, and had the command of a brigade of five thousand men, yet the Earl of Feversham suspecting his inclinations, advised the King to seize him, but his Majesty's affection to him was so great, that he rejected that motion, which gave his Lordship an opportunity of executing his design of retiring to the Prince; but he betrayed no post, carried off no troops, but with the Duke of Grafton, Colonel Berkeley, and four or five officers, withdrew from the King's quarters, and joined the Prince of Orange at Axminster, which is about twenty miles from Exeter, leaving a letter for the King, expressing the reasons of his conduct, and the grief of mind he was under from the part that he was obliged to take (a) [E]. It has been indeed said by a French Jesuit, and from him copied by some other spiteful writers, that he not only left the King, but also laid a design for betraying his Majesty, which was concerted with Colonel Kirke, who commanded at Warminster (b), and that it was prevented by the King's being taken with a bleeding at the nose, which was not stopped 'till a vein was opened. Some of these writers afterwards asserted, that he was concerned in Sir John Fenwick's plot for restoring

[E] From the part that he was obliged to take.] Whoever considers the great obligations that Lord Churchill lay under to King James, must naturally conclude, that he could not take the resolution of leaving him, and withdrawing to the Prince of Orange, but with infinite concern and regret; and that this was really the case, appears very plainly from the letter which follows; and which has so strict a relation to the history of this illustrious person, that it is absolutely necessary to give it a place here; the very language in which it is conceived, being perhaps the best proof of it's sincerity; for if any man will but consider with himself, what under such circumstances he would have wished to have said, he cannot help seeing, that this is what the Lord Churchill has said, in the shortest and most pathetic terms possible (14).

S I R,

SINCE men are seldom suspected of sincerity when they act contrary to their interests; and though my dutiful behaviour to your Majesty in the worst of times (for which I acknowledge my poor services much over-paid), may not be sufficient to incline you to a charitable interpretation of my actions; yet I hope the great advantage I enjoy under your Majesty, which I can never expect in any other change of government, may reasonably convince your Majesty and the world, that I am acted by an higher principle, when I offered that violence to my inclination and interest, as to desert your Majesty at a time, when your affairs seem to challenge the strictest obedience from all your subjects, much more from one, who lies under the greatest obligations imaginable to your Majesty. This, Sir, could proceed from nothing but the inviolable dictates of my conscience, and a necessary concern for my religion, which no good man can oppose, and with which I am instructed nothing ought to come in competition. Heaven knows with what partiality my dutiful opinion of your Majesty, has hitherto represented those unhappy designs, which inconsiderate and self-interested men have framed against your Majesty's true interest and the Protestant Religion; but as I can no longer join with such, to give a pretence by conquest to bring them to effect; so I will always with the hazard of my life and fortune (so much your Majesty's due) endeavour to preserve your royal person and lawful rights, with all the tender concern and dutiful respect, that becomes, &c.

King James (c): it is impossible to believe both these stories to be true, but we may rationally conclude them to be both absolutely false, as Yonge's contrivance was proved to be, who laboured to fix a conspiracy of the same nature upon his Lordship, and Dr Sprat Bishop of Rochester (d). It is supposed to have been in consequence of his Lordship's sollicitation, that Prince George of Denmark took the same step, as soon after his consort the Princess Anne likewise did, by the advice of Lady Churchill (e). His Lordship was received with great marks of esteem and respect by the Prince of Orange, who when he advanced with his army as far as Henley, sent Lord Churchill to London to re-assemble his troop of guards, which service he readily performed, and concurred in the application of the Lords to the Prince, at the close of the year, desiring him to take upon him the administration (f). But it is very remarkable, that in all the delicate conjunctures of those disturbed times, he acted not only with caution and circumspection, but with so true a spirit of moderation, that, notwithstanding the malice of one party, and the envy of the other, for he was very early exposed to both, he maintained his interest as well with the Prince of Orange as with Prince George and the Princess Anne, and was extremely serviceable in composing those jars, which had otherwise prevented that settlement that was afterwards made by the Convention (g). But notwithstanding his influence and even activity in those important affairs, he carried every thing with so much silence and secrecy, that his sentiments were never to be collected otherwise than by the event, for he was ever an enemy to the noise and bustle, as well as to the heats and fury of a party, taking his measures after mature deliberation with steadiness, and behaving to persons of all ranks and of all sentiments, with a smoothness and civility that contented them, and made things easy to himself. He was entrusted in that critical conjuncture by the Prince of Orange, who gave him the rank of Lieutenant-General, with the care of new modelling the army, and reducing some new raised regiments, which he performed (h), and the Prince and Princess of Orange being declared King and Queen of England, the sixth of February 1689, Lord Churchill went immediately to congratulate them, and on the fourteenth of the same month was sworn of their Privy-Council, and one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber to the new King (i). On the ninth of April following he was raised to the dignity of Earl of Marlborough (k) in the county of Wilts; but though a certain writer positively says, that he was made Viscount Churchill by King James (l); yet it may be looked upon as a thing out of doubt, that he never had that title either in England or in Scotland. He assisted at the coronation of their Majesties, and was very soon after appointed to command in chief the English forces that were sent over to Holland, in order to make a part of the army of the Allies, and according to his usual custom hastened early to his command, arriving at Rotterdam the seventeenth of May, from whence he proceeded immediately to the army, which was then commanded by the famous Prince of Waldeck. The Earl of Marlborough was at the head of those forces at the battle of Walcourt, which was fought August 15, 1689 (m), wherein the English troops distinguished themselves in so extraordinary a manner, that we find it both acknowledged and applauded even by the French Historians, and the Earl of Marlborough gave such extraordinary proofs of his conduct upon this occasion, that Prince Waldeck, speaking in his commendation to King William, said, That he saw more into the art of war in a day, than some Generals in many years (n). It is to be observed that King William commanded this year in Ireland, which was the reason that the Earl of Marlborough was at the head of the English troops abroad, and gave him an opportunity of laying the foundation of that fame amongst Foreigners, which he extended afterwards to the utmost bounds of Europe [F].

It

[F] Which he extended afterwards to the utmost bounds of Europe.] It is the fault of almost all our historians, that they do not take pains enough in looking for foreign materials, in reference even to those parts of their histories, which relate to foreign parts; and which therefore it is impossible to treat clearly, from the materials that are to be met with at home. In reference to our hero's future exploits, this is very seldom the case; in respect to this campaign it is apparently so, for though Prince Waldeck's character of the Earl of Marlborough, has been over and over repeated, yet in our histories it seems to be a compliment rather than a character, because we are not sufficiently acquainted with the facts upon which it was founded. We will endeavour to relate these, in as narrow a compass as it is possible (15). The French army was commanded by the Marshal de Humieres, and was very little, if at all superior to that of the Allies, commanded by the Prince of Waldeck; and the true design of both Generals was the same, viz. each intended to hinder the other from passing the Sambre. At length however, Prince Waldeck, after many marches and countermarches, found means to pass at l'ontaine l' Eveque. This alarmed the French Marshal, who though he pretended to seek nothing so much as an action, yet was really rather inclined to avoid it (16); and the Allies on the other hand, had no temptation to fight, unless they had some considerable advantage. But on the 15th of August, N. S. the cavalry of the Allies being for the most part abroad for forage, the Duke de Joyeuse, Lieutenant-General of the day, fell upon and defeated them; and either he or the Marshal himself, were so heated by this small success, that they resolved to push the affair as far as it would go (17), and at length attacked the little town of Valcourt; which though not regularly fortified, had a very good wall, and was strong by situation, lying at the distance of about half a league from the Prince of Waldeck's camp, having a sharp rugged ascent on the one side, and a flat open plain on the other (18). A numerous body of infantry in the town, kept a smart fire on the enemy in front, who were also galled by a battery of twelve pieces of cannon, Prince Waldeck caused to be erected on the eminence before-mentioned. The Earl of Marlborough at the head of two regiments of horse and the guards, kept possession of the plain, and was a very calm spectator of the attack; for seeing the infantry of the Allies well covered by the wall, he would give the enemy no disturbance; but when after a furious attack which lasted an hour and half, the enemy found it was impossible to prevail, and the Marshal sent orders for a retreat; the Earl as soon as they began to move, fell in upon their flank, and as the French themselves allow, did terrible execution;

It doth not appear that his Lordship was employed any where in the beginning of the next campaign, but towards the close of it he proposed a scheme for reducing Cork, a place of great consequence in Ireland, and thought to be well fortified, with a small body of troops in the winter when they could be of no use elsewhere, to which King William assented (o). He landed near Cork in the latter end of the month of September, and though some small delay was occasioned by the Duke of Wirtemberg's disputing with him the command, yet he very soon reduced the place, having observed what those who were employed to fortify it had never discerned, that it was commanded by an adjacent eminence, upon which erecting a battery, the garrison capitulated and were made prisoners of war (p). The very important port of Kinsale, and two strong forts that were erected to cover it, soon shared the same fate, all the troops in them being made prisoners likewise, and the Earl having thus gloriously completed the design which he had so wisely contrived, returned to England before the close of November, and on his first appearance at Court, King William was pleased to say of him (q), That he knew no man so fit for a General who had seen so few campaigns. It was thought proper, and much for the King's service, that the Earl should return to Ireland, which he accordingly did, notwithstanding the lateness of the season, and by his prudent management, and directing proper forts to be erected, kept the Irish in close quarters, and yet returned early enough to be ready to attend King William the next spring into the field (r). His Majesty shewed the entire confidence which at that time he placed in his Lordship, by sending him with Count Solmes before him to the army, in order to make the necessary dispositions for opening the campaign (s), and very certain it is, that his behaviour on receiving and in discharging this commission, could not but raise his credit with so wise a Prince, since it was such that deserved the applause of one of the best officers, and most experienced Generals of that age, and this not grounded at all upon events, for the great scheme the Earl of Marlborough had formed was actually laid aside from the opposition of the Dutch (t) [G]. His Lordship returned into England in the beginning of the winter, attended the service of Parliament very assiduously, and his duty at Court as the nature of his office required, for in things of this kind there was no man in the world more punctual, and yet all this attention, all his past services, and all the knowledge King William had of the great abilities he had for his service, did not hinder his being disgraced, and that in a manner so sudden, so publick, and with such extraordinary circumstances, that it was as much the wonder of those times, as the real cause of it remains a secret even in these (u) [H].

The

execution; so that this affair cost them two thousand killed and wounded, and the loss of the Allies did not exceed three hundred (19). One of the best French writers on the art of war, having given a very succinct account of this action, concludes with this remark, that he mentioned it only as a caution to prevent any General from making such another mistake, as Marshal de Humieres made here (20).

[G] From the opposition of the Dutch. To explain this matter a little, it is necessary to observe, that the reason of the King's staying in Holland, was on the score of that famous Congress at the Hague, which was one of the most illustrious scenes in his whole reign (21). To have the more leisure to confer with so many great Princes that repaired thither, purely to pay their respects to his Majesty, he sent the Earl of Marlborough to the army, who upon his arrival, and receiving an account of the contents of two magazines, one of fire-wood and the other of dry forage, immediately pronounced that the design of Louis XIV, was against Mons and not Charleroy; upon which he proposed to the Deputies of the States-General in the army taking such a camp, as would have frustrated that design; but they depended so much upon their own intelligence, and looked upon a siege at that time of the year as a thing so impracticable, that they would not yield to his representations; and when Marshal Boufflers on the 4th of March invested Mons on the side nearest the Allies, their astonishment was so great, that they could hardly believe it (22). All precautions however were then too late, for the French King besieged and took the place in much less time than could have been expected. Prince Vaudemont being some time after with the King at Loo, is said to have spoken to him in this manner. 'There is somewhat in the Earl of Marlborough, that I want words to express; he has the fierceness of Kirk, the judgment of Lanier, the conduct of Mackay, and the intrepidity of Colchester altogether; and either my skill in faces deceives me, which yet it never did, or he will make a greater figure as a General, than any subject your Majesty has.' The King smiled and said, Marlborough is obliged to you, but I really believe you will lose no credit by your prediction (23).

[H] As the real cause of it remains a secret even in these.] It is natural to suppose, that upon the happening of an event of such consequence in its nature, and so unexpected in its manner, as the disgrace of this noble Peer; abundance of stories were told, which however easily refuted, from the knowledge of the inconsistency of their circumstances at that time, cannot be so well distinguished at this distance. If the reader has a mind to take a view of these and judge for himself, he may find them recapitulated in a work, to which he is directed in the margin (24). But as he will probably expect to have some reason assigned here, or at least our thoughts upon the subject, we shall give them with that freedom and impartiality, which a work of this kind demands; and in which there is nothing farther from our design, than either to flatter or to excuse, except it be to calumniate or defame. It is certain that King William took it much amiss, that upon settling the revenue, an independent provision was insisted upon for the Princess of Denmark, of fifty thousand pounds per ann. and there were some circumstances that rendered this still more disagreeable to his consort. As the whole of this transaction was attributed to the advice of the Countess of Marlborough, in whom the Princess of Denmark was known to have an entire confidence; and as the success of this measure in both Houses of Parliament, was ascribed to the extensive influence and indefatigable industry of the Earl of Marlborough: it seems highly reasonable to imagine, that though he was not immediately disgraced, yet from this time forward, he could not stand upon very favourable terms with the King, and much less with the Queen (25). He had also the misfortune to be envied and hated by all the King's personal favourites, and more especially by the Lord Sydney and Mrs Villiers, afterwards Countess of Orkney; who no doubt were not wanting in their endeavours, to add credit to any informations, that were given to his Lordship's prejudice. It is no less certain, that at this juncture the King's counsels were most strangely betrayed; and from thence it has been suggested, not without some degree of probability, that it was insinuated the Countess of Marlborough being mistress of her husband's secrets, which were also those of the King; and being intimate also with a certain Lady warm in the interests of King James, there might possibly be a canal

The Earl being in waiting at Court, as a Lord of the Bed-chamber; and having in that quality introduced to his Majesty Lord George Hamilton, a younger son of Duke Hamilton, afterwards Earl of Orkney and Field-Marshal of Great Britain, and returned from Court to his own house without receiving from the King any marks of coldness or displeasure, he was followed not long after, by the same Lord George Hamilton, with a very short and surprizing message, That the King had no farther occasion for his service (w). As he had been named to attend the King in the next campaign, in quality of Lieutenant-General of Foot, Lionel Talmash, Esq; was appointed in his stead; his troop of Guards was given to the Lord Colchester; and Lord George Hamilton, who brought him the message, had his regiment of Fuzileers; but his post in the Bed-chamber remained vacant some time after (x). This strange and unexpected blow was followed by one much stranger; for not long after, the Earl, by a warrant under the hand and seal of the Lord Viscount Sydney, then Secretary of State, was committed to the Tower for high-treason, which was the effects of a vile conspiracy formed by some desperate and profligate persons, who for their just deserts were at the time of framing it prisoners in Newgate, and supported by a horrid scene of forgery and perjury (y). His Lordship was soon after bailed, and the whole contrivance being fully and indisputably detected, a prosecution was commenced against the principal author of it, who was tried, convicted (z), and punished. Thus ended this strange affair, which had in all probability rendered a man of a less settled and sedate temper a malecontent, but it had no such effect upon the Earl of Marlborough, whose behaviour afterwards was as free from circumspection as from any colour of guilt. He behaved in Parliament as became an English Nobleman; he never failed to join with the Courtiers when he thought them in the right, and never opposed them from any other principle than a conviction in his own mind that they were in the wrong. His own and his Lady's interest with the Princess Anne of Denmark, made them still very considerable; nor was it in the power of their enemies, who had so much influence at one Court, to affect them even in the smallest degree in the other, and to the honour of both this noble pair it may be truly said, and now they are both dead it may be surely said without the least imputation of flattery, that never any persons appear to have deserved Court favour better than they did, since the greater measure they had of it, the better were the affairs of that Court managed in which they enjoyed it (a); so that, at this very time, the Earl of Marlborough and his Countess merited all things from King William, by the pains they took to keep the Princess of Denmark within those bounds of duty and respect, from which she wanted not either provocations or solicitations to digress; and to how great a degree this might have distressed the Court, the History of those times will thoroughly inform the reader (b). The attempt made to represent the Earl as embarked in the Assassination Plot, failed through its great improbability, which made an extraordinary degree of evidence necessary to support it, and yet it came with none at all, save the assurance given by an unhappy man, who said what he did purely to save his life (c). It is certain that the Earl of Marlborough acted very coolly upon this occasion, shewed very little concern, and no degree of warmth. After Queen Mary's death; when their respective interests brought the two Courts to better agreement, King William thought fit to re-call the Earl of Marlborough to his Privy-Council, and June 19, 1698, appointed him Governor to the Duke of Gloucester with this extraordinary compliment (d), My Lord, make him but what you are, and my nephew will be all I wish to see him. His Lordship continued from this time forward in his Majesty's favour to the time of his death, as appears from his having been three times appointed one of the Lords Justices during his absence, viz, July 16, 1698, May 31, 1699, and June 27, 1700 (e). As soon as it was discerned that the death of Charles II. of Spain would become the occasion of another general war, the King endeavoured to provide for it early, by sending over a body of troops to Holland, and on the first of June the same year he declared the Earl of Marlborough General of Foot, and Commander in chief of those forces; and on the twenty-eighth of the same month, he was also pleased to appoint him Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to their High Mightinesses, upon which he went canal of intelligence this way established; and as the managers of this intrigue might lay hold, as it is said they did, of any remarkable instance of discovery, it might easily produce such a sudden disgrace as this of the Earl's, and that too without any explanation. It was immediately followed by forbidding the Countess of Marlborough the Court, as that was by the retiring of the Princess of Denmark from it, and in less than six weeks the sham plot followed this. We have an account of the last event, from the pen of Lady Marlborough herself, which the reader may peruse, and will from thence judge of the probability of the account that has been given (26). 'Soon after the Princess going to Sion, a dreadful plot broke out, which was said to have been hid somewhere, I don't know where, in a flower-pot, and my Lord Marlborough was sent to the Tower. To commit a Peer to prison, it was necessary there should be an affidavit from some body of the treason. My Lord R—y therefore, S—y of State, had sent to one Young, who was then in goal for perjury and forgery, and paid his fine, in order to make him what they call a legal evidence: for as the C—rt L—rs said, Young, not having lost his ears, was an irreproachable witness. I shall not dwell on the story of this fellow's villany, the B—p of R—r having given a full account of it in print.' It is very apparent from all our Histories, but more especially from the Journals of the House of Lords, and the Resolutions that they came to, that these accusations never gained the least degree of credit, except amongst those who were disposed to believe any thing of one, against whom they were prejudiced (27).

went immediately over to Holland, where, as a particular mark of their respect, the States lodged him in the house of Prince Maurice, that he might with more conveniency confer with foreign Ministers (f). Upon the King's coming over and taking a view of the forces, he dined with the Earl of Marlborough at his quarters on the 30th of September, which was one of the last marks of honour and favour he received from that great Prince, who died on the eighth of March following, unless we reckon his recommendation of his Lordship to the Princess of Denmark a little before his death, as the properest person to be entrusted with the command of the army which was to protect the liberties of Europe (g) [I]. About a week after the King's death, he was elected one of the Knights Companions of the most noble Order of the Garter, and soon after declared Captain-General of all her Majesty's forces in England and abroad, and was immediately sent over to the Hague with the same character that he had the year before (h). At his first audience of the States-General, on the twentieth of March, he made a short, solid, and sensible speech, in which, without making use of many fine-turn'd periods, he gave them such plain and hearty assurances of his Mistress's sincere intention to pursue the plan that had been formerly settled, as fully convinced them of her sincerity and of his own. His stay in Holland was very short, and it was his peculiar felicity to dispatch much, and even the most important business, in a very little time, of which he gave the strongest instance here, for the States not only concurred in all that he proposed, but of their own motive did what he could neither propose or expect, for they declared him Captain-General also of their forces, with an appointment of one hundred thousand florins per annum, and left to him the settling the rank of General officers, which he did in such a manner as was very honourable for his Sovereign, and entirely to their satisfaction (i). On his return to England he found the Queen's Council already divided, some being for carrying the war on as auxiliaries only, and others for declaring against France and Spain immediately, and so becoming principals at once; with these the Earl joined, and they carrying their point, war was declared the fourth of May, 1702, which was afterwards approved by Parliament, notwithstanding the Dutch at that time had not declared (k) [K]. The campaign was opened with but indifferent success, which was chiefly owing to the extraordinary caution of the Earl of Athlone, a very brave man, but either a little too circumspect, or, which is more probable, too much limited in his command. However that matter may be, certain it is, that the army had retired with some precipitation under the walls of Nimeguen, before the Earl of Marlborough took the command, which was on the twentieth of June (l). His presence and his activity soon changed the face of affairs, for though his army did not consist of above sixty thousand horse and foot, and that of the enemy was superior in number, commanded

[I] Which was to protect the liberties of Europe.] There has been a doubt raised, as to the high marks of favour shewn to the Earl of Marlborough in the last years, and even the last hours of King William's life and reign, for some have attributed them merely to policy. Mr Hornby, if he was really the author of the book cited in the margin, would persuade us, that it was not out of affection to the common cause, or a sense of the Earl of Marlborough's merit, but from his love to his own country, and his kindness to the Earl of Albemarle, that the King took these steps (28). His words are these. 'The late King, who was as well acquainted with his qualifications as his interest, had foreseen these effects of her Majesty's favour; and his own state of health given him cause to apprehend a short continuance in this world, he had recommended him to his countrymen, as the man on whom they were chiefly to depend after his decease, when that he might be less a stranger to them, William resolves to sacrifice his resentments to their interest, and procure a reconciliation with the Earl, in order to introduce him into their acquaintance; and at the same time finding that his deluge of bounty to his new favourite, unlike the old one, had been only poured like water through a sieve, and that therefore he might stand in need of a friend after the loss of so kind a master, the King, to kill two birds with one stone, employed him to manage this affair, as if it were entirely of his own motion.' This has been esteemed a severe satire upon the memory of King William, but it appears to me in quite another light; for, granting it to be true, it shews a high command over his passions, and a strong affection for his country; and if these are faults, what are virtues! Yet the fact seems to be, that with the death of Queen Mary, the King's dislike to the Earl of Marlborough vanished; and there is no doubt that he was convinced, that all the stories told of him were false, and as to his parts and abilities, he was acquainted of them long before. In short, his conduct in this respect, was perfectly right; and as it was the last, it was the greatest action of his life; the clearest proof of his having a soul superrior to little and narrow notions, and entirely taken up with the great view of saving England and Holland, and indeed all Europe, from being swallowed up by an overgrown power, conducted by a Prince, whose ambition was without bounds (29), and who could know no quiet, while his neighbours were free and independent.

[K] Notwithstanding the Dutch at that time had not declared.] This was a point of very great importance, and it cannot but be allowed, that the arguments which were offered in favour of an auxiliary war, were many of them very plausible; but the Earl of Marlborough opposed it by unanswerable reasons, and those conceived, as his always were, in very few words (30). He said, the war took rise from injuries received heretofore, and the want of security for the future; that England was as much interested in both as any other nation, and was therefore as much bound to act as a principal as they; that war was an evil in itself, considered in any other light than as an instrument, necessary to procure a safe and solid peace; which end the war could never answer, if England was not a principal. That a favorable opportunity now offered, for reducing France, which, let slip, might in all probability never return; and that the true question was, whether considering the power of France, England could be safe? for if she might, it was better to maintain peace; if not, that kind of war was best, that would make her safe. The majority of the Council concurred with him in opinion, and upon this declaration of war was drawn, agreeable to the prerogative of the Crown; but it was not actually proclaimed, till the sentiments of the Parliament were known, and consequently the sense of the nation. The Earl of Marlborough procured also Lord Godolphin's being made High-Treasurer, which was a thing disagreeable to many, and not at all pleasing to that Lord himself; but the Earl insisted upon it as a measure absolutely requisite, since without it he could not depend upon the Treasury, or the punctuality of remittances so necessary to an army in the field; where a slip of this kind might in a single instance prove fatal (31).

manded by the Duke of Burgundy, whose first campaign it was, yet the Earl never declined any opportunity of coming to action, but on the contrary pressed it all he could, and would have forced the French to a battle three several times, if he had not been hindered by the Dutch Deputies (m). Yet those who blame them do it without reason, for the very spirit of the army, and their offering the enemy battle, was of great use to their affairs, whereas any check would have destroyed them, the party which had opposed King William beginning to shew itself in several cities and provinces, so that they had reason to be cautious. On the other hand the Earl of Marlborough, far from complaining of their conduct, contented himself with shewing them clearly what advantages they lost, by which he gained their confidence highly, as he secured the affection of all their officers by his condescension and politeness (n). He very soon discerned that the States were made uneasy by the places which the enemy held on their frontiers, and therefore he readily consented to attack and reduce them, and accordingly, in this single campaign, he made himself master of the castles of Gravenbroeck and Waerts, the towns of Venlo, Ruremond, and Stevenswaert, together with the city and citadel of Liege, which last was taken sword in hand, and the States, as they had reason, testified the highest satisfaction with regard to his Lordship's conduct and success (o). The Earl of Athlone did a gallant thing upon this occasion, he wrote to the States, that their thanks were due entirely to the Earl of Marlborough, whose measures he had opposed during the whole campaign, but was not at all less pleased with the advantages he had obtained. These had like to have been of very short date, for the army separating in the neighbourhood of Liege on the third of November, his Lordship was taken the next day in his passage by water, by a small party of thirty men from the enemies garrison at Gueldres, but it being towards night, and the Earl insisting upon an old pass given to his brother, and out of date, was suffered to proceed, and arrived at the Hague when they were in the utmost consternation on the news of the accident that had befallen him (p). His calmness of mind upon this occasion, and the dexterity with which he extricated himself in so unexpected a disaster, raised his credit prodigiously, and the Grand Pensionary made him a compliment upon that occasion, which did him more honour than all his victories, and the modesty of his Lordship's answer at least equalled the dignity of that compliment (q). On his return to England, he received the highest testimonies of the sense that his Sovereign and the nation had of his services, expressed in the thanks of the two Houses, and his being created Duke, which served only to encourage and confirm him in his noble resolution of continuing to render them still greater and more important services. A few of the most remarkable particulars during his stay in the winter, are taken notice of at the bottom of the page [L]. He was on the point of returning to Holland, when, on Feb. 20, 1702-3, his only son, the Marquis of Blandford, died at Cambridge at the age of eighteen. This afflicting accident did not however long retard his Grace, who was too wife a man to suffer even the nearest of his private concerns to prejudice the publick affairs, now almost wholly entrusted to his care, and therefore, after allowing a very short season to grief, passed over to Holland, and arrived at the Hague the sixth of March. It very soon appeared how much the common cause was assisted by the wise precautions, and judicious foresight, of the Duke of Marlborough, for he was very careful in obliging the Princes of the Empire, whose troops were in the British pay, to bring them early into the field, and perfectly compleat; and yet in his representations upon this head, though his remarks were very smart and strong, yet they were expressed in a language so decent and full of respect, that they were kindly received, and punctually complied with (r). The French had a great army this year in Flanders, in the Low-Countries, and in that part of Germany which the Elector of Cologne had put into their hands; and the Marshals Villeroy and Boufflers were sent to command there, assisted by Prince Tserclaes de Tilly, the Marquis de Bedmar, and other experienced officers in the Spanish service, who, depending entirely upon that promptness with which the absolute power of the French King enabled him to execute all his projects, intended to act offensively, and to open the campaign with the siege of Liege on the eighteenth of April, for which prodigious preparations

[L] At the bottom of the page. The Earl of Marlborough arrived in London on the 28th of November, some time after the Queen had been complimented by both Houses of Parliament, on the success of her arms in Flanders; in consequence of which there had been a publick Thanksgiving on the 4th of November, when her Majesty went in great state to St Paul's (32). Soon after a Committee of the House of Commons, of which Sir Edward Seymour, was Chairman, attended him with the thanks of the House. On the 2d of December, her Majesty declared her intention in Council, of creating his Lordship a Duke; which she soon after did, by the title of Marquis of Blandford, and Duke of Marlborough; she likewise added a pension of five thousand pounds a year out of the Post-Office during her own life (33), and sent a message to the House of Commons, signifying her desire that it might attend the honour she had lately conferred; but with this the House would not comply, contenting themselves in their address to the Queen upon this occasion, to applaud her manner of rewarding publick service; but declaring their inability to make such a precedent, for alienating the revenue of the Crown (34). The House did not shew the less respect for this to another motion, that was made in consequence as they very well knew of his advice, viz. that an additional number of troops might be employed in Flanders, to frustrate the designs of France, as she was then preparing to take the field early, and with a superior force (35). It was with this view, that a vote passed for taking ten thousand foreign-troops into English pay, which was a very reasonable measure, and what indeed could not be avoided as things stood at that time; and there is no doubt that this raised his Grace's reputation not a little with the States-General, as it was an equal proof of his sincerity and interest.

- parations were made, and all the necessary measures taken (s). Yet these were all broken by the vigilance and activity of the Duke of Marlborough, who, with the army of the Allies, was in the field before them, and on the thirteenth of April invested Bonn, the usual residence of the Elector of Cologne (t). This siege was carried on with so much spirit, and with a train of artillery so much superior to any thing that had been seen, as advanced it's progress beyond expectation. The French, in order to create a diversion, made a hasty march towards Maestricht with a view to have surprized the army of the States under Marshal D'Averquerque, and in their way surrounded two battalions that lay in Tongeren, but though these were made prisoners of war, yet it was after so obstinate a defence, that the Dutch army had all the time requisite to provide against the surprize, so that the enemy's design miscarried (u); and after the surrender of Bonn on the fourth of May, the Duke of Marlborough rejoined the army of the Allies, and obliged the enemy to retire before him, and to shelter themselves behind their lines, which were soon after forced in two places (w). The Duke, upon this, formed a project of making himself master of Antwerp, which was frustrated by Marshal Boufflers attacking the Dutch General Opdam at Ekeren, on the nineteenth day of June, in which action both sides claimed the victory (x). The truth is that there were two actions, in the former of which the French were entirely successful, but lost all they obtained in the first by the second, and were obliged to abandon the passes they had taken, through which the Dutch, under the command of General Schlangenburg, for Opdam in the beginning of the battle was obliged to fly with a few horse, made (y) not a safe only, but glorious retreat. The Duke of Marlborough, after this, would have attacked the French lines, but being hindered by the Dutch Deputies, Huy was invested and taken. His Grace proposed again attacking the lines, in a grand Council of War held the fourteenth of August, in which he was again restrained by the Dutch, and the siege of Limburgh resolved upon (z), which was very soon taken, as by the close of the year was the city of Gueldres, which left the Dutch secure on every side except that of Brabant (a). When the campaign was over his Grace went to Duffeldorp, to meet the late Emperor, then styled Charles III, King of Spain, who made him a present of a very rich sword from his side, with a compliment more glorious than the present, and then returning to the Hague, after a very short stay came over to England (b) [M]. When measures were properly settled at home, the Duke, on the eighth of April 1704, embarked at Harwich for Holland, where he spent near a month, in adjusting all the necessary steps for executing the greatest design that had been formed within this century, which he covered so effectually, that when in the beginning of May he began his march for Germany, the French imagined that he intended to act upon the Moselle, and the whole of the expedition was conducted with such address, that he passed both the Maine and the Neckar before the French had any just notion of his intention, and indeed before it was known in it's full extent in Holland (c). After this, he took some steps that looked as if his design tended to the recovery of Landau, which put all the enemy's troops in motion on that side, while his Grace continued his march into the heart of the Empire, and had a conference with the Princes Eugene of Savoy, and Lewis of Baden, who complimented him in the highest terms on the generosity of his design, and the great prudence he had shown in the conduct of it (d). His Grace continued to press the march of his troops, and of the reinforcements sent him from Holland, with the utmost vigour, so that he arrived before the strong intrenchments of the enemy at Schellenburgh very unexpectedly on the twenty-first of June, and though there were in them twenty thousand men, and it was afternoon when they arrived, yet he could not be persuaded to delay the attack, but began it with the English and Dutch infantry, before the Imperialists, under Prince Lewis of Baden, could come up (e). The dispute was very obstinate and bloody, the Allies were twice repulsed, but at the third attack the Imperialists forced the intrenchment on the right, and soon after the English and dam (38), and went from thence immediately to the Hague, where he communicated to the Pensionary, his sense of the necessity there was, of attempting something the next campaign for the relief of the Emperor, whose affairs at this time were in the utmost distress; having the Bavarians on one side, and the Hungarian malecontents on the other, making incursions to the very gates of Vienna; while his whole force scarce enabled him to maintain a defensive war; which unless speedily relieved, would certainly exhaust him. The Pensionary approved so much of the Duke's scheme as he opened to him, but it was agreed that he should not explain himself to the States, only measures were concerted, as if the next campaign was to open upon the Moselle; and even in this an air of secrecy was observed, which had very good effects. Matters being thus adjusted, and the Generals named who were to command on the frontiers of the State's dominions, the Duke returned to England (39) on the 14th of February following.

[M] Came over to England. His Grace arrived here on the 13th of October 1703, and soon after King Charles III of Spain, whom he had accompanied to the Hague, came likewise over to England, and arrived at Spithead the day after Christmas. His Grace the Duke of Somerset, and his Grace of Marlborough, were immediately sent down to receive and to conduct him to Windsor (36). On the 28th he lay at Petworth, and on the 29th in the evening, he arrived in company of the two Dukes at Windsor. Upon this occasion, I must mention what most of our Historians have overlooked, viz. that on the 30th the Duke of Marlborough introduced to his Catholick Majesty the Spanish Merchants, and procured for them the strongest assurance of protection and favour, that the King could give (37). In the beginning of the month of January, the States-General desired her Majesty to give leave to his Grace of Marlborough to come to the Hague, which her Majesty granted, and his Grace embarked on the 15th of the same month on board the Mary Yacht, in which he passed over to Rotter-

and Dutch did the same on the left, so that the enemy were obliged to retire very precipitately, after losing one third of their troops at least (f). It was upon this occasion that the Emperor wrote the Duke a letter with his own hand, acknowledging his services in the most obliging manner, and offering him the title of a Prince of the Empire, which he modestly declined (g), 'till the Queen afterwards commanded him to accept of it. This great stroke, by which a way was opened for the relief of the Empire, was, by the Germans themselves, justly and universally ascribed to the Duke [N]. He prosecuted this success with all the diligence imaginable, and laboured to bring the enemy to a decisive battle, which the Elector of Bavaria declined by retiring under the walls of Augsburgh. At length, being joined by a new French army under the command of Marshal Tallard, he advanced to Hochstet, where, on the second of August, he was attacked by the Allies (b). Prince Lewis of Baden being detached with part of the army to make the siege of Ingoldstat, the remainder consisted of about fifty-two thousand men, commanded on the right by Prince Eugene, and on the left by the Duke of Marlborough; the French and Bavarians were about sixty thousand, commanded by Marshal Tallard on the right, and on the left by the Elector of Bavaria and Marshal Marfin; the attack, though bold and hazardous, was conducted with all the caution imaginable, and the Duke receiving the Sacrament the evening before, went to the field with a resolution to conquer or to die (i). The dispute was for some hours bloody and doubtful, but at length Victory declared on the side of the Allies, the enemy losing at least half, some accounts say two thirds, of their army, of whom thirteen thousand, and amongst them Marshal Tallard, with twelve hundred officers, were made prisoners, and fourteen thousand killed or drowned, besides a vast number that were lost in their precipitate retreat (k). After this glorious action, by which the Empire was saved, and the whole electorate of Bavaria conquered, the Duke continued his pursuit 'till he forced the French to re-pass the Rhine, and then Prince Lewis of Baden laid siege to Landau, while the Duke and Prince Eugene covered it, and if through the slowness of the Germans that siege had not lasted too long, his Grace had projected an expedition on the Moselle, in order to have forced a passage that way into France; as it was, he took possession of Homburgh, Treves, &c. and had the pleasure of seeing Landau taken on the twelfth of November, after sixty-six days open trenches (l). He made a tour also to Berlin, and by a short negotiation suspended the disputes between the King of Prussia and the Dutch, by which he gained the good will of both parties. When the campaign was over he returned to Holland, where he received the publick thanks of the States for his services in the field and in the cabinet, and on the fourteenth of December he arrived in England, laden with the trophies of his victories (m), by which he gained a reputation truly immortal [O]. [N] Was by the Germans themselves justly and universally ascribed to the Duke.] The transactions of this campaign, are so peculiarly glorious in respect to the memory of this noble person, that we are under an indispensable necessity of detaining the reader, upon some few of the most remarkable circumstances, that demonstrate the veracity of what is asserted in the text. In the first place, the great capacity of the Duke is visible, in forming so vast a design in his own mind, with respect to which he could not either ask or receive advice; but was obliged to lay the whole plan, and to contrive the means of overcoming the many difficulties, exclusive of all the hazards of war that lay in the way of its execution, without the least assistance. We are next to advert to the great secrecy and wonderful address, with which he managed it. At home it was entrusted only to the Queen, the Prince of Denmark, and the Lord Treasurer Godolphin; abroad, only the Pensionary and another person had any intimation of it, neither was it communicated to them in its full extent. But what is still more admirable, there was no intimation given of it to the Imperial Court, as appears from the memorial of the Imperial Minister, presented to the Queen in the middle of April, when the Duke was actually on his march, beseeching her assistance. It is no wonder therefore, that with all their intelligence, the French were deceived to the very last, and did not apprehend the Duke's true design, 'till he was within sight of the Danube. His Grace's dexterity, in opening his design to the States by degrees, and thereby obtaining their consent, not only to carry their troops with him to such a distance, but also to have them augmented by considerable reinforcements, which from the nature of their constitution at all times, and the situation they were in at this critical conjuncture, will to future ages seem incredible. His celerity in performing so extraordinary a march, as from the frontiers of Holland to the Danube, in about fifty days, without prejudice to his troops, is astonishing; but the most surprising stroke of all was, the firmness the Duke expressed in attacking the enemy the same day that he arrived, when their entrenchments were not half finished, and before they were recovered from the confusion into which he had thrown them, by his unexpected arrival; to which, and to his persisting in making the last effort, the success of this affair (with the assistance of the divine favour) was absolutely due. The same thing happened again at Hochstet, where most of the Generals would have dissuaded his Grace from fighting; but he was inflexible, well knowing that to do nothing was the surest way to be undone, and that delay would have made the hazard greater; so that we may truly say, the fortune of the Duke of Marlborough arose from his conduct; and that he was victorious, in consequence of his chusing the fittest times for actions; being always cool and composed, observing and making the most of every advantage, and rendering his forces superior to the enemy, by that confidence which he placed in them, and which thro' the whole war they never failed to justify, by shewing that spirit, which Prince Eugene frankly said, he never saw in any other troops.

It is impossible within the narrow compass to which we are confined, to mention all the honours this hero received; and it is the less necessary, as not our own histories only, but those of foreign nations also, will always preserve them, we shall content ourselves therefore with remarking, that, exclusive of the medals struck, and the Poems written in honour of this victory, of which Mr Addison's was really worthy of it, all the other testimonies of a just sense of his services were given, that even those services could merit. He brought over with him Marshal Tallard, and twenty-six other officers of distinction, one hundred twenty-one standards, and a hundred and seventy-nine colours, which by her Majesty's order, were put up in Westminster-Hall (40); he was received by the Queen and her Royal Consort, with the highest marks of esteem, and had the solemn thanks of both Houses of Parlia-

the Duke's designs cost him much greater pains than the execution of them, so when they were once formed he was unwilling to part with them, what obstacles soever lay in the way of completing them. He meditated therefore all the winter the project he had formed of penetrating from the Moselle, which project, by the way, is the original after which many have been copied since, and upon his going over to Holland, in the latter end of March, he laboured to put every thing in order for this favourite expedition, which might possibly have ended the war that campaign, but must have reduced the enemy to the greatest extremity in the next. The raising of magazines, which was the greatest obstacle apprehended in the execution of the Duke's scheme, he had wisely provided for, by causing them to be erected the winter before at Triers, and under various pretences keeping them there to this time (n). The States-General, upon his laying before them the great advantages that would follow from a successful campaign on the Moselle, consented, without much difficulty, to his leading their troops thither; and Prince Lewis of Baden also, without whose concurrence he could do nothing, promised him an interview at Creutznach. His Grace having done every thing at the Hague, and having marched part of the troops with a view to his great design, went in person to Coblenz, where he arrived on the sixth of May, and proposed two days after to have had an interview with Prince Lewis, but the next morning his Highness excused himself by a message, on account of his ill state of health (o). Upon this his Grace set out for Rastadt, the place of his Highness's residence, where he had a long conference with him, in a manner against his will, in which it is said his Highness promised him, to concur as far as in him lay to the execution of his designs; upon which the Duke returned to the army, passed the Moselle, and disposed every thing for the siege of Saar Lewis, but Prince Lewis of Baden falling sick again, and the Germans failing in every thing, the Duke was able to do nothing (p). On the other hand, the French, instead of reinforcing the army that should have opposed the Duke of Marlborough, pursued their plan of operations in the Low-Countries, as if they had depended upon this disappointment, and taking the advantage of the weakness of Marshal D'Averquerque's army, recovered Huy, and laid siege to Liege (q). His Grace, upon this, decamped on the sixth of June, and made so quick a march with his cavalry, that he obliged the enemy to raise the siege of the citadel of Liege, and soon changed the face of affairs on that side. But his back was no sooner turned, than Mons. d'Aubach, the Palatine General, who was left to act upon the defensive on the Moselle, retired precipitately, and, as if he meant to put it out of his Grace's power ever to resume his design of penetrating into France that way, burnt all his magazines at Triers, upon the first motion of the French towards him, without waiting for orders (r). The Duke, having recovered Huy, resolved to force the French lines, which some of the Dutch Generals opposed, but Marshal D'Averquerque, and the present King of Sweden, declaring positively in favour of the Duke's proposition, it was carried into execution with all the ease imaginable, by which, exclusive of the glory of the action, the French suffered a very considerable loss, and the Elector of Bavaria, and Marshal Villeroy, were obliged to retire with precipitation (s). Yet the Duke missed his principal design, which was recovering Lorraine, Brussels, and Antwerp, by the slowness of some of the Dutch Generals. He was in like manner disappointed in two other designs, in one, by the obstinacy of General Schlagenburg, in the other, by the opposition of the Dutch Deputies, which occasioned pretty warm disputes with the States, who at last gave him some kind of satisfaction. The campaign ended soon after with some successes, which would have made a considerable figure in a campaign under any other General, but are scarce worth mentioning where the Duke of Marlborough commanded, who though he bore them with admirable patience, yet was infinitely chagrined with such a train of disappointments (t). The season for action being over, he made a tour to the Courts of Vienna, Berlin, and Hanover. At the first of these he acquired the entire confidence of the new Emperor Joseph, who made him a present of the principality of Mindelheim; at the second he renewed the contract for the Prussian forces, and obtained every thing he asked from a Prince, with whom all other Ministers could do nothing; and at the last, he restored a perfect harmony, and adjusted every thing to the Elector's satisfaction; after which he returned to the Hague, where, in a single conference, he induced the States to agree

(41). Besides this the Commons addressed her Majesty to perpetuate the memory of this victory, which she did, by granting him the honour of Woodstock, with the Hundred of Wotton, that was vested in him and his heirs for ever by act of Parliament, which passed on the 14th of March following, with this remarkable clause, that they should be held by rendering to the Queen, her heirs and successors, on the 2d of August, every year for ever, at the Castle of Windsor, a standard, with three fleurs de lys painted thereon (42). On the sixth of January, the Duke was feasted by the City; and on the 8th of February, the Commons addressed the Queen to testify their thanks for the wise treaty which the Duke had concluded with the Court of Berlin, by which a large body of

Prussian troops were sent to the assistance of the Duke of Savoy (43); so equal was this great man to all things, and so great was his dexterity in managing the most arduous negotiations; which he concluded in less time, than most ministers would have taken to enter upon business; and at the same time so extensive were his views, that every scene of action was alike the object of his care; and he had no sooner freed Germany from her fears, than he provided effectually for the relief of Italy, by engaging Prince Eugene to take upon him the command there, and by procuring for him this necessary and effectual assistance; so that in reality he was the very soul of the war, animating and directing it every where for the service of the common cause, and for the glory of his country.

agree to their proportion of the pay of ten thousand men that were to be sent into Italy, and towards the close of the year, embarked for, and arrived safely in, England (a) [P]. All things being concerted for rendering the next campaign more successful than the former, his Grace, in the beginning of April 1706, embarked for Holland. He remained at the Hague about three weeks, and found the States very well disposed to perform the promise they had given him, of making him easy in his command, which was not only a thing very reasonable in itself, but highly conducive to their interests, and very suitable to the inclinations of the people. In order to this, General Schlaingenburg was laid aside, which was a thing of great consequence with respect to other officers, and the Field Deputies were given to understand, that a very high deference was on all occasions to be paid to his Grace's sentiments (w). On his arriving in the army which was in the neighbourhood of Liege, he found new difficulties to struggle with. He had intelligence that the French army under Marshal Villeroy was perfectly compleat, while, as to that of the Allies, the Danish horse absolutely insisted upon being paid their arrears before they left their winter-quarters, and as for the Prussian troops that were ordered to join them, they were at a great distance. While things were in this situation the French passed the Deule, whence the Duke very easily discerned that they hoped to treat him as they had done the last year, and placed their whole confidence in his disappointments. To prevent this his Grace applied himself to the Duke of Wirtemberg, with whom, ever since the little dispute they had in Ireland, he had a strict friendship, and having given him his own, and procured the Dutch Field Deputies to engage their promise, that all arrears should be duly paid, his Serene Highness generously declared that he thought it was all his Danish Majesty could expect, and that he would march his troops immediately without waiting for that Monarch's orders (x). This was a thing of the utmost consequence, for the French relied upon the obstinacy of the Danes which induced them to hurry on an action in such a manner, that the Elector of Bavaria was forced to ride post to it, and scarce arrived in time. They were deceived in their expectations, for the Danish horse joined the Confederates on Saturday the eleventh of May, and the next morning, being Whitfunday, was fought the battle of Ramillies. The French must be allowed the honour of having offered the Allies battle, which, if they had not done, the Duke would have forced them to an action the next day (y). It began about one, and the Duke soon observing that his right wing would not be able to act on account of a morass, drew twenty squadrons from thence to the assistance of the left (z), where the Dutch cavalry had been broke by the French household troops; but the Danish horse, supported by this reinforcement, and encouraged by the presence of the Duke, broke them in their turn, and carried all before them. The Duke was twice in the utmost danger, once by a fall from his horse, and a second time by a cannon shot, that took off the head of Col. Bringfield as he was holding the stirrup for his Grace to re-mount (a). The dispute was indeed but very short, some of the best accounts say not above half an hour, others two hours, and then the French began every where to give way; so that the rout soon became total, and their baggage being placed between the two lines of the army, not only rendered the day irrecoverable, but hindered all regularity in the retreat (b). The loss of the enemy was very great; about six thousand killed, near the same number taken, and not many fewer than these deserted; their whole train, consisting of fifty pieces of cannon, several kettle-drums, one hundred and twenty standards and colours, demonstrated the entireness of the victory (c). If any farther proof of this was necessary, it was given by their retreat, or rather by the precipitation of their flight, by which they abandoned a great part of Brabant without any apparent necessity, and this was so far improved by the vigilance and wisdom of the Duke, that Louvain, Brussels, Mechlin, and even Ghent and Bruges, submitted to King Charles III of Spain without a stroke, and Oudenard surrendered upon the first summons. The city of Antwerp followed this example, and thus, in the short space of a fortnight, the Duke reduced all Brabant, and the marquisate of the Holy Empire, to the obedience of King Charles (d). He gave, upon this occasion, such extraordinary marks of disinterestedness,

A new Parliament had been called this year, and great expectations were formed of their conduct, and it soon appeared with very good reason (44). Upon the 7th of January, the House of Commons, came to a resolution to thank his Grace of Marlborough, as well for his prudent negotiations, as for his great services. But notwithstanding this, it very soon appeared, that there was a strong party formed against the war; and a pamphlet was published, in which the conduct of his Grace of Marlborough was directly attacked; but the author soon after thought proper to write a letter (45) to the Duke by way of recantation. An attempt was also made in the House of Lords, to have procured from her Majesty all the papers relating to the last campaign, in hopes that something might have been found in them, which might have proved a ground for censuring his Grace's conduct; which, in the mean time, to take off all suspicion, they very highly commended, and spoke with the utmost bitterness of Prince Lewis of Baden and the Dutch (46). But this also was seen through and defeated, chiefly through the prudence of the Duke, who spoke always with much moderation of what had happened abroad, and having seen Prince Lewis of Baden after the campaign was over, in the tour he made through Germany, he treated him with the utmost deference and respect (47). Her Majesty at this time had some overtures made to her by the Duke of Savoy, in reference to the attempt upon Thoulon, which were referred to the Duke of Marlborough, such was the entire confidence the Queen reposed in him at that time (48); and as to the plan of the ensuing campaign, it was also entirely referred to his Grace; who at that time was very apprehensive that the French would act as they had done the year before, entirely on the defensive; and had therefore fixed on several steps proper to have forced them to change that scheme, if their own politicks (49) had not, very fatally for them, had that effect, as the reader will see in the text.

terestedness, as deserved more regard than have been hitherto paid them. Instead of making those advantages to which his victory entitled him, he received and protected the inhabitants of these places as the King of Spain's subjects, and when the government of the Austrian Netherlands was offered him with the usual appointments, he generously refused it, put the administration into the hands of the States of the province, and by various other instances gave incontestible proofs, that he did all for the Common Cause and nothing for himself (e). In the latter end of May he made a short tour to the Hague, in order to prevail upon the States to have consented to certain measures, particularly the siege of Dunkirk, by which he hoped to have shortened the war, but not being able to prevail, he was obliged to pursue his successes in the way most agreeable to them, and accordingly ordered Ostend to be invested, before which the trenches were opened on the eighteenth of June (f). It was during this siege, that, in my poor judgment, his Grace committed the greatest oversight in his whole life, for going to visit this siege, he exposed his person for more than an hour in the trenches, during as warm a fire as ever was seen, and this notwithstanding a letter the Queen did him the honour to write him on his victory, with her own hand, in which the only command she gave him was, Be careful of yourself (g). The siege was conducted with so much vigour that the place surrendered on the twenty-seventh. The strong fortress of Menin, esteemed the master-piece of Marshal Vauban, defended by a numerous garrison under the command of one of the best officers in France, was invested next, the trenches opened before it on the twenty-fourth of July, and the siege being carried on with extraordinary diligence and warmth, the place surrendered on the eleventh of August (h). Dendermonde, which had been blocked up soon after the battle of Ramillies, surrendered, after a short siege, on the twenty-fifth of the same month; and on the fifth of September Aeth was invested, and the trenches opened before it upon the eleventh. It was expected that this place would have made a pretty long defence, but, following the example of the rest, it surrendered on the twenty-first. The Duke de Vendosme had been sent to command in Flanders instead of Marshal Villeroy, and though without doubt he was as good an officer, and as brave a man, as any subject the French King had, and notwithstanding his army was reinforced to an equality at least with that of the Allies, he remained a calm spectator of the Duke's conquests, not daring to undertake any enterprize of importance, with an army that had quite lost their spirits (i). The forces of the Allies after this glorious campaign being about to separate, his Grace, on the sixteenth of October, went to the Hague, where the proposals which France had made for a peace, contained in a letter from the Elector of Bavaria to the Duke of Marlborough, were communicated to the Ministers of the Allies, after which his Grace embarked on the fifteenth of November for England, where he arrived the day following (k) [Q]. The measures necessary for promoting the success of the ensuing campaign being very early settled at home, and it being found absolutely necessary that his Grace should make a tour to Germany before the army entered upon action, he proposed to have been at the Hague before the end of March, but being hindered by contrary winds, he did not arrive there before the fifth of April, 1707 (l). He explained to the States the motives of his journey to Saxony, whither he went to confer with the King of Sweden, whose situation was at that time such as enabled him to have given law to Europe. His Grace accordingly made a journey to his Swedish Majesty's head quarters, presented him with the Queen his Mistress's letters, and after a very successful negotiation, in which it is certain that he made very favourable impressions on the mind of that Prince, and gained a perfect acquaintance with his designs (m), he returned by Hanover to the Hague, and having acquainted the States with the issue of his journey, he set out for Brussels where he arrived

[Q] Where he arrived the day following. His Grace of Marlborough arrived at London on the eighteenth of November 1706 (50), and though at this time there was a faction forming against him at Court, yet the great services he had done the nation, and the personal esteem the Queen always had for him, procured him an universal good reception, in which it seemed as if there was a competition who should oblige him most. The House of Commons, in their Address in answer to her Majesty's Speech from the throne, spoke of the success of the campaign in general, and the Duke of Marlborough's share in particular, in the strongest terms possible, and the very next day after they presented this Address, unanimously voted him their thanks (51). The Lords did the same with respect both to the Address and their thanks, which were given his Grace by William Cowper, Esq; then Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal (52). They went still farther, for on the seventeenth of December they addressed the Queen for leave to bring in a bill, to settle the Duke's honours upon the male and female issue of his daughters, which was granted, and Blenheim-house, and the manor of Woodstock, was, after the decease of the Duchesses upon whom they were settled in jointure, entailed in the same manner with the honours (53). Two days after this, the standards and colours taken at Ramillies being carried in state through the city, in order to be hung up in Guild-Hall, his Grace of Marlborough was invited to dine with the Lord Mayor, which he accordingly did. The last day of the year was appointed for a General Thanksgiving, and her Majesty went in state to St Paul's, in which there was this singularity observed, that it was the second Thanksgiving within the year (54). On the seventeenth of January, the House of Commons addressed the Queen, signifying, that as her Majesty had built the house of Blenheim to perpetuate the memory of the Duke of Marlborough's services, and the House of Lords ordered a bill for continuing his honours, so they were desirous to make some provision for the more honourable support of his dignity (55). In consequence of this, and of the Queen's answer, the pension of five thousand pounds a year from the Post-Office, was settled in the manner the Queen had formerly desired of another House of Commons, who happened not to be in quite so good a temper. These points adjusted, his Grace made haste to return to his charge, it being thought more especially necessary, that he should give the foreign Ministers at the Hague to understand (as he did) that the Queen of Great Britain would hearken to no proposals for a peace, but what would firmly secure the general tranquillity of Europe (56).

arrived on the second of May (n). The army of France was commanded this year by two great Princes, who were also great officers, the Elector of Bavaria, and the Duke of Vendosme. They were both esteemed enterprising in their conduct, as they were indisputably very gallant in their persons, yet the highest honour to which they aspired with a superior army, was to move about a little from camp to camp without being obliged to fight, to which the Duke of Vendosme would never consent (o). His Grace of Marlborough was a little deceived in the beginning of the campaign, he knew the strength of the French army, and was well acquainted with the character of the Princes beforementioned, and therefore when he knew they had assembled their army without the lines, he took it for granted they intended to give him battle, upon which he advanced towards them, who were then encamped on the plains of Flerus, but, upon the approach of the Allies, the Duke de Vendosme occupied the pass at Ronquiers by so strong a detachment, that the Duke of Marlborough saw plainly, his intention was neither to offer battle nor to be forced to fight, upon which he was obliged to retire towards Brussels (p). His intention at the beginning of the campaign was to have besieged either Mons or Charleroy, in case the enemy declined fighting, and this the Dutch Deputies did not in the least oppose, but the Duke de Vendosme having seized the strong camp of Gemblours, his Grace of Marlborough saw plainly that there was no venturing to make a siege, without exposing all the great open towns of Brabant to be re-taken by the French, and this kept him in a kind of inaction during the remaining part of the campaign, except that, upon his receiving advice of the enemy's having detached a few squadrons and thirteen battalions into Provence, he advanced with a resolution of attacking Vendosme, even in the strong camp of Gemblours (q). But upon his approach he decamped, and by very quick marches gained a stronger post at Peiton, whither his Grace followed, and pushed him so close, that they were obliged to decamp again, and at last, after shifting from place to place, retired within their lines, where, having the Schelde and strong entrenchments before them, the army of the Duke of Vendosme could bear the approach of the Allies, without desiring to get out of their way (r). The Duke, finding all his endeavours to no purpose, and the weather being grown very bad, quitted the army on the twenty-third of September, and went to the Hague, from whence he set out again soon after for Frankfort, where he laboured to have infused some degree of warmth into the Princes of the Empire, and to have drawn his Imperial Majesty to have shewn more punctuality to his engagements than he had done hitherto since the war begun, in which, not meeting with his usual success, he returned again to the Hague (s), and after encouraging the States to persist in the resolutions they had taken for the support of the Common Cause, he embarked for England, without shewing any apparent concern at the close of the most barren campaign he ever made [R]. The very unexpected distastes the Duke had met with through the whole course of the winter, as well as the repeated applications of the States-General, induced him to go to Holland early in the Spring, and arriving at the Hague on the nineteenth of March, he found there Prince Eugene of Savoy, who had been at infinite pains to engage the Court of Vienna, and some of the Princes of the Empire, to come into a scheme which he knew would be grateful to the Duke, as well as of high consequence to the Common Cause (t). In order to compleat this, however, it was absolutely necessary to engage the Elector of Hanover, afterwards King George I, to part with some regiments that were to have composed the army that he was to command on the Rhine, and this the Duke of Marlborough was to undertake, which he did, and succeeded in his commission (u). Prince Eugene, who made a tour through the Empire, met his Grace at Hanover, and concerted with him there the operations of the campaign; after which he returned to Vienna, giving out that he was to command a separate body upon the Moselle, which was understood to be avoiding a junction with the Duke of Marlborough (w). The giving credit to this circumstance, trifling as it seemed, proved the ruin of the French affairs, for at the same time the Duke of Burgundy was sent to command in Flanders, Marshal

[R] Of the most barren campaign he ever made.] After the fatigue of so dissatisfactory a negotiation as that of Frankfort, the troublesome appendix of his labours in the field, which this year only repaid him not with laurels, his Grace no doubt hoped for some quiet at his return. His hopes however were disappointed, that fire which had been suspected the last year, had broke out in his absence, and it was known that the Queen had a female favourite who was in a fair way of gaining ground of the Duchess, and that she listened to the insinuations of a Statesman who was no friend to the Duke (57). He bore this with an unshaken serenity, but when he found not himself only but the Common Cause attacked, though in a very dark and sinister way, in the House of Lords, his patience was somewhat moved, and he could not help shewing his enemies for once, that however great in the field, or wife in the cabinet, he had still the like passions with themselves (58). His Speech however had a good effect, and prevented that project from taking place, which had done the French king more service; than even the cautious conduct of the Duke of Vendosme in the last campaign, I mean the scheme for lessening the army in Flanders on the colour of augmenting that in Spain, where, for reasons known only to themselves, the very Allies for whom we fought seemed not very anxious about our success. He gained likewise a compleat victory at Court, where his antagonist was forced to quit the field, but it was in such a manner, and with so visible a reluctance in the Queen, that the Duke, who was a man of the utmost penetration, easily foresaw the inconveniencies that were like to follow; to prevent which his only hopes lay in the success of the next campaign, for now, and indeed throughout the war, his personal interest was bound up in the Common Cause, for he had no enemies but those who were likewise no friends to that, and who might have been easily reconciled, if his Grace would have detached himself from that system, which he took to be the only one that could effectually provide for the independency of Europe, the Queen his Mistress's security, and the safety and glory of Great Britain.

(58) Memoirs of the Duke of Marlborough.

Marshal Berwick was sent to oppose Prince Eugene upon the Rhine, but he having several days march of him, moved with such unusual celerity, that his forces preserved the advantages they had acquired 'till they had joined the Allies. The French, under the Dukes of Burgundy and Vendosme, had a very fine army of one hundred thousand men (x), whereas, after draining all his garrisons, the Duke of Marlborough could not take the field with full fourscore. The enemy might have preserved this superiority through the campaign, if they had taken care to facilitate their junction with Marshal Berwick, but the Duke of Burgundy, mis-led by the advice of a few favourites, crossed the Duke of Vendosme in every thing, and having succeeded in his design of surprizing Ghent and Bruges, fancied he was able to act by his own lights, and thereupon caused the little town of Oudenard (y) to be invested, which brought on a battle, contrary to that Prince's design, who, to avoid it, would have retired towards Ghent, and by this means the French army were attacked on the thirtieth of June 1708, when they were in great disorder, and without any difficulty defeated, with the loss of four thousand killed, and seven thousand taken prisoners, and about one hundred standards and colours, and would have suffered still more in their retreat if the Duke of Vendosme had not commanded the rear guard (z). But, as it was, the consequences of the defeat were very fatal, and made way for the siege of Lisle, which was invested by the Prince of Nassau, father to the present hereditary Stadtholder of the United Provinces, on the second of August (a). This was by far the boldest undertaking of the kind during the war, and many have not scrupled to stile it a very rash attempt. It is very probable, that the Duke of Marlborough depended on the vigour and spirit with which Prince Eugene would carry on the siege on one side, and the misunderstandings that reigned amongst the French Generals on the other, and the event shewed that he was not mistaken in his conjecture, for notwithstanding the French had, according to their own accounts, an army superior to the Duke's by above a fourth, commanded by the Dukes of Burgundy, Vendosme, and Berwick, yet they did nothing, so that October 12, the town of Lisle surrendered, and Marshal Boufflers retired into the citadel (b).

To relieve this important place, the Elector of Bavaria, on the fifteenth of December, made a very brisk attempt upon Brussels, in which he was disappointed by the vigilance of the Duke of Marlborough, and his passing the Schelde with the army under his command, which was looked upon as a thing impracticable (c), and the Duke of Marlborough himself considered it as so high a providence, that he caused a General Thanksgiving to be religiously observed throughout the whole army, on the second of December N. S. (d) and on the ninth the citadel of Lisle surrendered, which was one of the greatest blows the French received during the war (e). His Grace, to compleat the success of this campaign, caused Ghent to be invested, which was very soon surrendered, in consequence of which the French abandoned Bruges, and the rest of the places they had surprized in the beginning of the campaign (f), so that the Duke returned to the Hague, and from thence to England, as usual, crowned with laurels, and the universal acclamations of his countrymen and their Allies [8]. The French King thought fit, in the beginning of the year 1709, to set on foot a negotiation for peace, in which it is thought he had three principal points in view, and failed in them all (g). The first was, to quiet the minds of his own subjects, labouring under the deepest distress, and afflicted with calamities the most grievous that a nation can sustain, war, sickness, and famine; the second, sowing jealousies and suspicions amongst the Confederates, in hopes of bringing some of them either to desert the Common Cause, or to prosecute it with less vigour; the third, to amuse the Allies with false hopes of peace, and thereby retard their military preparations. These negotiations induced the Queen to send his Grace back to Holland, in the latter end of the month of March, with the character of her Plenipotentiary, which was a point of very great consequence, and contributed not a little to the enemy's disappointment.

After

[8] And the universal acclamations of his countrymen and their Allies. The House of Commons this year gave a very uncommon testimony of their respect for the Duke of Marlborough; for, besides addressing the Queen, they, on the twenty-second of January, voted thanks to his Grace unanimously, and ordered them to be transmitted to him abroad by the Speaker (59). His Grace returned to England on the twenty-fifth of February, and on his first appearance in the House of Lords, the thanks of that august assembly were given him by the Lord Chancellor Cowper, to which, as upon all other occasions, the Duke gave an answer full of modesty, gratitude, and deep respect (60). His stay was so very short, that we have no need to dwell long upon what passed here in the winter, it is sufficient to say, that those who were apprehensive of the dangerous effects that might attend the artificial proposals that France made for the conclusion of a general peace, were also of opinion, that nobody was so capable of setting their danger in a true light in Holland as his Grace the Duke of Marlborough, which was the reason of his going thither (61). We have had occasion to shew in some instances before, that whatever might be said from party resentment, the Duke was far enough from desiring to protract the war, and that the steps which his enemies had mentioned as instances of his inclination that way, were in reality taken from no other motive than that of necessity; he would have acted with more vigour, and have brought things sooner to a conclusion, if he could; but not being able to do this, he did all in his power abroad, and bore with great temper the groundless reflections that were made upon his conduct at home. In respect to peace his sentiments were the same, he was far from being averse to it, but then he was desirous that this peace should be safe and solid, which he thought it could not be if the power of France was not greatly reduced, and as he had the satisfaction of seeing that the war was in a fair way of doing this effectually, he was loth to lose a certainty, though attended with many inconveniences, for an uncertainty that he foresaw must be attended with more. He had the good luck to bring the States-General entirely into his sentiments, and thereby defeated the French in their negotiations, as clearly as he had ever done their forces; so that he might be truly said to triumph over them in the cabinet as well as in the field, and to have done equal honour to his country as a Statesman and a Soldier.

(61) Memoirs of the Duke of Marlborough.

After his Grace's return to England, the French King made another attempt, by sending the Marquis de Torcy, his Minister for foreign affairs, into Holland. This measure proved also without effect, for the Duke of Marlborough had contrived to have the preliminaries for a peace, that were not only proposed, but signed and ratified by the Queen his Mistress, so drawn, that the concerns of all the Allies were equally and effectually provided for, by which means the French arts, instead of disturbing the Confederates, or detaching any of them from the Grand Alliance, only united them more firmly, by procuring them this decisive proof, that perseverance would procure them all that they could desire (b). The Marshal Villars commanded the French army, which was very numerous, and in good condition. Lewis XIV expressed his hopes, by saying a little before the opening of the campaign, Villars was never beat (i). Indeed that General seemed very desirous of preserving that reputation, for upon his taking the field he entrenched his army at Lens in such a manner, that though the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene were very willing to have come to a battle, they found it not in their power. As their army was considerable enough to form a siege and to cover it against the enemy, that was resolved upon. M. Villars foresaw this, and believed that Ypres would be the place, for which reason he had taken such a camp as covered it (k). The Duke of Marlborough having sent his heavy baggage to Lisle, and made all the necessary dispositions for attacking the enemy, marched in the night towards their camp without sound of trumpet or beat of drum, and suddenly turning off to the left, to the surprize of his own troops as much as those of the enemy's, invested Tournay on the sixteenth of June (l). This place was but indifferently provided in respect to a garrison, but Lieutenant-General de Surville, who commanded in the town, was a very able and gallant officer, and M. de Megrigni, Governor of the citadel, was the best Engineer in France; besides, the place was looked upon as one of the strongest fortresses in the Low-Countries, and the citadel esteemed the master-piece of the officer appointed to defend it (m). The trenches were opened in the night of the twenty-seventh, and though Marshal Villars made several attempts, either to succour the place, or to raise the siege, they proved all ineffectual, so that on the twentieth of July it was surrendered, and the garrison retired into the citadel (n). Upon this a negotiation was set on foot for the surrender of that place also, with a view only to gain time, in resentment of which the Duke of Marlborough would grant no other terms, than the garrison surrendering prisoners of war, as they did on the twentieth of August (o). After this conquest the army of the Allies advanced to the enemy's lines, which they abandoned in order to take such a post as might prevent the siege of Mons, and a very strong camp they took, however, even in that it was resolved to attack them, and this brought on the famous battle of Blaregnies, Malplaquet, Tanieres, or the Wood, which was fought August 31, 1709, in which the French were clearly defeated, after a most bloody and obstinate engagement, notwithstanding all the advantages they had from the situation of ground, and entrenchments raised with incredible labour, disposed with great skill, and defended by a numerous artillery, with the loss of fifteen thousand men to the enemy, and about eighteen thousand killed and wounded of the Allies (p). This victory made way for the siege of Mons, before which the trenches were opened on the fifteenth of September; the garrison was but weak, which was the true reason the French ran the hazard of a battle to protect it, and the Governor, desirous of saving his garrison, signed an honourable capitulation on the tenth of October following (q), after which the army went into winter quarters, and his Grace of Marlborough, after regulating some matters of importance at the Hague, returned to England [T]. The entertainment the Duke met with here at home during the winter did not render it very agreeable to him, and he would very probably have gone abroad earlier if things could have been properly settled for that purpose, which at last they were, and towards the latter end of February his Grace went to the Hague, where he met with Prince Eugene, and soon after set out with him for the army which assembled in

[T] Returned to England.] Upon the first news of the glorious victory gained at Malplaquet, the city of London addressed the Queen in terms the most expressive, the most loyal, and the most respectful, which the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs, carried to Windsor, and presented on the tenth of September (62). The Queen in Council, on the third of October following, ordered a Proclamation for a General Thanksgiving (63). The Duke of Marlborough came to St James's on the tenth of November, on the fifteenth the Parliament of Great Britain assembled, and, on the very first day of their sitting, appointed a Committee, consisting of thirteen of their most distinguished members, to carry their thanks to the Duke (64). The Lord Chancellor Cowper gave him the thanks of the House of Peers on his first coming thither (65). The Addresses to the Crown were conceived even in stronger terms than formerly, and the Queen, as if she was desirous of taking any occasion that presented itself of shewing her kindness for his Grace, appointed him Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Oxford (66). In the beginning of the year 1710, the French set on foot a new negotiation for a peace, which was commonly distinguished by the title of the treaty of Gertrudenburg. The States-General upon this having shewn an inclination to enter into conferences with the French Plenipotentiaries, the House of Commons being made acquainted with it by Sir Gilbert Heathcote, immediately framed an Address to the Queen, that she would be pleased to send the Duke of Marlborough over to the Hague without delay, with which Address the House of Lords having concurred, it was presented on the eighteenth of February, and immediately complied with (67). But amidst these seeming honours, preferments, and favours, the Duke was really chagrined to the last degree. He perceived that the French intrigues began to prevail both in England and Holland, the affair of Dr Sacheverell had thrown the nation into a ferment, and the Queen was not only estranged from the Dukes of Marlborough, but had taken such a dislike to her that she very seldom appeared at Court (68). The friends of the Duke therefore were glad of an opportunity to divert his uneasiness, by sending him abroad again in so honourable a manner.

in the neighbourhood of Tournay (r). The first thing done of importance was the entering of the French lines, and this was performed without any loss. The siege of Douay was next resolved upon, and the place invested on the twelfth of April; it was naturally strong, had been fortified with great skill, well provided with every thing in the winter, had a garrison of eight thousand good troops commanded by the Marquis de Albergotti, an Italian Nobleman of great merit and of long service, there was no place better defended during the war, and yet, notwithstanding the siege was often interrupted by a superior army under the command of Marshal Villars, the place was forced to surrender (s) on the 22d of June 1710, though upon very honourable terms, but an attempt that was concerted for surprizing Ypres, during this siege, miscarried. After the surrender of Douay, the French army under the command of Marshal Villars retired within their new lines, and the forces of the Allies under Prince Eugene, invested Bethune on the fourth of July; the place was strong, the garrison numerous, and the Governor a man of experience and valour, who defended it to the seventeenth of August, and then surrendered upon honourable terms (t). The enemy still continuing to decline an engagement, the army of the Allies invested Aire and St Venant in one day. The trenches were opened before the latter on the fifth of September, and though the place was remarkably strong by nature, as lying in the midst of a morass, and for it's size defended by a numerous garrison, yet it surrendered on the eighteenth (u). The siege of Aire was a work of greater difficulty, the garrison was commanded by Lieutenant-General Goezbriant, who had under him a Major-General, seven Brigadiers, and a garrison of at least eight thousand men; the place was defended with much obstinacy, and did not surrender till the thirtieth of October, and then upon honourable conditions (w). The Confederate army soon after going into winter quarters, the Duke and Prince Eugene went together to the Hague, and the former about the middle of December returned to England [U]. An exterior civility, which in the Court language was stiled a good understanding, being established between the Duke and the new Ministry, and the Queen having written to the States-General in very gracious terms in relation to her confidence in him, he went over soon after to the Hague, and there met with Prince Eugene with whom he went to the army, resolved to convince all Europe, that no personal resentment should restrain him from supporting the Common Cause, and prosecuting the war with success while he continued at the head of the Allies (x). Villars, who had undergone a kind of disgrace at the latter end of the last campaign, for speaking his mind a little too freely of the Duchefs of Burgundy, was again at the head of the French army, which, by the care he had taken of it, was one of the finest that had been sent into the field during the war, and not at all inferior to that of the Allies. His Grace, from the time that he opened the campaign, proposed to himself getting within the French lines, which Villars had over and over declared to be impenetrable; he proposed also to offer the enemy battle, and if it was found impossible to force him to fight, he then resolved to reduce by siege that fortress, which would contribute most to open a passage into France (y). It was with this intention that he attacked and made himself master of the little post of Arleux, marching the Confederate army through the plains of Lens, that if they had any intention of fighting, the enemy might have a fair opportunity of shewing it. But finding both schemes disappointed, for Villars would not hazard a battle, nor did the possession of Arleux answer what was expected from it; one must naturally suppose that this strongly affected the Duke's mind, who knew that the eyes of the whole world were upon him, and that a disappointment would tarnish all the glory he had acquired; he made therefore a great effort, and since Villars would not run the risk of being beaten in the field, he contrived to beat him in his own way, by stratagem; in other campaigns he had excelled all other Generals, but foreseeing it would be his last, in this he excelled himself (z). He made such a disposition of his troops that Arleux was attacked, but he took care to support that post in such a manner that the French were repulsed. He made another motion by which it was again exposed,

[U] And the former about the middle of December returned to England.] The negotiations mentioned in the last note, were carried on during a great part of the summer, but ended at last in nothing (69). In the midst of the summer the Queen began the great change in her Ministry, by removing the Earl of Sunderland from being Secretary of State; and on the 8th of August following the Lord Treasurer was likewise removed (70). Upon the meeting of the Parliament, no notice was taken in the addresses of the Duke of Marlborough's success. An attempt was made to procure him the thanks of the House of Peers, but it was very eagerly thwarted by the Duke of Argyle (71). After his Grace came over, he was kindly received by the Queen, who seemed to be desirous that he should live well with her new Ministry, which the world in general looked upon as a thing impracticable; and it was every day expected, that his Grace would have laid down his commission. There is not however the least appearance that he had any such intention, for the service of his country he had long commanded armies, and the same principle now required that he should command his passions. Faithful to that in both, he carried the Gold Key, the ensign of the Duchefs of Marlborough's dignity, on the 19th of January to the Queen, and resigned all her employments with that duty and submission, which became him (72). With the same firmness of mind, he consulted the necessary measures for the next campaign, with those whom he knew to be no friends of his; but the candour of his behaviour, and the generous concern he expressed for the common cause, moved even these men, while he was present, to treat him with decency and respect; and as it was phrased in those days, to take such measures as made him easy in his command (73). There is no doubt that the Duke felt some inward disquiet, though he shewed no outward concern, at least for himself; but when the Earl of Galway was very indecently treated in the House of Lords, the Duke of Marlborough could not help saying (74), 'It was somewhat strange, that Generals who had acted according to the best of their understandings, and had lost their limbs in the service, should be examined like offenders about insignificant things.'

posed, and six hundred men only left to defend it; it was then attacked by Marshal Montesquieu at the head of a whole army, and before the great detachment the Duke sent to save it could come up, was taken. His Grace seemed then to abandon his design, and moved still farther, and at last, as if he was grown impatient, he ordered fascines to be cut, went himself with all the General Officers to view the enemy's dispositions, and made his own in such a manner, that there was not a man in his army who did not expect a battle the next morning, but at the close of the evening on the twenty-fourth of July, he marched off without beat of drum or sound of trumpet, having ordered Lieutenant-General Cadogan, and Count Hompech, to pass the Senfett at Arleux with twenty-three battalions and seventeen squadrons, which were so placed as that they were able to assemble them in a little time; for his Grace foresaw they would find that place slighted, and no troops near enough to oppose them, which indeed happened, for Marshal Villars re-called all his detachments, from an apprehension of being attacked in his camp as at Malplaquet (a). But as soon as he was informed of the march of the Confederates, he perceived the deceit, and taking a shorter rout to Arleux with his horse and dragoons, arrived within sight of the Senfett, as the Duke of Marlborough in person, and the cavalry of his left wing, joined the troops under General Cadogan, and advanced in order to attack him (b). Ashamed of being out-done in that point of conduct which he best understood, the Marshal gave out that he would fight the next day, but he was wiser, and the Duke of Marlborough, who in the beginning of the war had been so often hindered from fighting by the Dutch Deputies, now declined fighting when they pressed him to it, because the troops were excessively fatigued with marching all night, and because, if any accident happened, their being within the enemy's lines might have been fatal (c), he resolved therefore to besiege Bouchain, contrary to the sentiments of all that were about him, who thought it impossible that he should take a fortress, strong by situation, well garrisoned as well as excellently fortified, and with which it was hardly possible to cut off the enemy's communication. The Duke however was determined, and the place was invested on the first of August (d). This siege was apparently a trial of skill between the two Generals, and it must be allowed that Marshal Villars gave the clearest proofs of his capacity in the course of it, but the bravery of the troops of the Allies, animated by the presence of the Duke who was every where in person, carried all before them, and, contrary to the expectation both of friends and enemies, the place was surrendered on the seventeenth of September, and that too upon the worst terms possible, for the Duke would grant no other (e). After which the army separated, though the Duke would willingly have besieged Quesnoy, to which the Dutch refused their consent (f). On his return to the Hague he was received with the highest marks of respect possible, and having adjusted all things with the States, he embarked for England, and came to London on the eighteenth of November [W]. As his Grace had always declared, that no ill usage that he met with from his enemies should drive him to revenge himself on his country, or on the Common Cause, by resigning his commission; so those who were resolved that he should keep it no longer, found themselves under a necessity to engage the Queen to take it from him; this necessity chiefly arose from Prince Eugene's being expected to come over with a commission from the Emperor, and to give some kind of colour for it, an enquiry was promoted in the House of Commons to fix a very high imputation upon the Duke, as if he had put very large sums of publick money into his own pocket. When a question to this purpose had been carried, the Queen, by a letter conceived in very obscure terms, acquainted him with her having no farther occasion for his service, and dismissed him from all his employments, to which he returned a dutiful and submissive answer (g). He was from this time exposed to the most painful persecution that a great and good man could endure. On the one hand he stood exposed to the clamour of the populace, and to the outrages of those licentious pens, which are ever ready to espouse the quarrels of a Ministry, and to insult without mercy whatever characters they know they may insult with impunity; on the other hand, a prosecution was commenced against him by the Attorney-General, for applying publick money to his private use, and the workmen employed in building Blenheim-house, though set at work by the Crown, were encouraged to sue his Grace for the money that was due to them; all his actions also were scandalously misrepresented (h). These uneasinesses, [W] He embarked for England, and came to London on the 18th of November. Upon his Grace's return to England, he acted with all the caution imaginable; for happening to land the very night of Queen Elizabeth's inauguration, when great rejoicings were intended by the populace, he continued very prudently at Greenwich, and the next day waited upon the Queen at Hampton-Court, who received him graciously (75). He was visited by the Ministers, and visited them; but he did not go to Council, because a negotiation for peace was then on the carpet, upon a basis which he did by no means approve; he acquainted her Majesty in the audience he had at his arrival, that as he could not concur in the measures of those who directed her councils, he would not distract them by a fruitless opposition (76). Yet finding himself attacked in the House of Lords, and loaded with the imputation of having protracted the war, he vindicated his conduct and his character, with great dignity and spirit; and in a most pathetic speech, appealed to the Queen his Mistress, who was there incognito, for the fallshood of that imputation; declaring, that he was as much for a peace as any man, provided it was such a peace, as might be expected from a war undertaken on so just motives, and carried on with continual success (77). This had a very great effect on that most august assembly, and perhaps made some impression on the Queen, but at the same time it gave such an edge to the resentment of his enemies, who were then possessed of power, that they resolved to remove him, and to be rid of him, which was soon after put in execution (78).

nesses, added to his grief for the death of the Earl of Godolphin, induced his Grace to gratify his enemies by going into a voluntary exile, and accordingly he embarked at Dover, Nov. 14, 1712, and landing at Ostend, went from thence to Antwerp, and so to Aix la Chapelle, being every where received with the honours due to his high rank, and with the applause justly paid to his merit (i). At home, as if their end had been answered, those prosecutions were suspended, which were as scandalous in their nature, as they were false and groundless in point of fact (k). The Duchesses of Marlborough also, as she shared the Glory, took likewise her part in her Lord's disgrace, and attended him in all his journies, and particularly in his visit to the principality of Mindelheim, that was given him by the Emperor, and exchanged for another at the peace which was made while the Duke was abroad, though all the advantages that were derived from it, as well as many more that might have been derived from it, were the fruits of his victories. The conclusion of that peace was so far from restoring harmony amongst the several parties in Great Britain, that it widened their differences exceedingly, insomuch that the Chiefs, despairing of safety in the way they were in, began to think of a retreat, and are said to have secretly invited the Duke of Marlborough back to England. However that matter may be, it is very certain that he took a resolution of returning a little before the Queen's death, and, landing at Dover, came to London August 4. 1714 (l). His Grace was received with the utmost joy and respect possible, by those who, upon the demise of the Queen, were entrusted with the government, and upon the arrival of his late Majesty King George I, the Duke was particularly distinguished by the most remarkable acts of royal favour, for he was again declared Captain-General, and Commander in Chief, of all his Majesty's land forces, Colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, and Master of the Ordnance (m). His advice was of great use in concerting those measures by which the rebellion was defeated, and it has been particularly remarked, that the Duke had the sagacity to foresee that rash attempt would be crushed at Preston. The advice he gave upon this occasion was his last effort in respect to publick affairs (n), for his infirmities increasing with his years, he retired from business, and spent the greatest part of his time, during the remainder of his life, at one or other of his houses in the country. His death happened June 16, 1722, in his seventy-third year (o), at Windsor-lodge, leaving behind him a very numerous posterity, allied to the noblest and greatest families in these kingdoms [X]. Upon his demise all parties united in doing honour or rather justice to his merit, and his corpse was interred the ninth of August following, with all the solemnity due to a person who had deserved so highly of his country, in Westminster-abbey (p). The noble pile near Woodstock, which bears the name of Blenheim-house, may be justly stiled his monument, but without pretending to the gift of prophecy one may venture to foretel, that his glory will long survive that structure, and that so long as our Histories remain, or indeed the Histories of Europe, his memory will live and be the boast of Britain, who by his labours was raised to be the first of nations, as during the age in which he lived he was deservedly esteemed the first of men [Y].

[X] Leaving behind him a very numerous posterity, allied to the noblest and greatest families in these kingdoms. His Grace had four daughters, upon whom in succession his honours were entailed, first in the male, and failing that in the female line. First, Henrietta, born July 19, 1682, married in 1698, to the present Earl of Godolphin; she had the title of the junior Duchesses of Marlborough, and died in 1733. Her Grace had issue William, Marquis of Blandford, who was born in February 1699, and died without issue in 1731; Henrietta, born April 12, 1701, married to his Grace the present Duke of Newcastle, by whom she has no children; and Mary, who married June 26, 1740, his Grace the present Duke of Leeds. His Grace's second daughter Anne, married Charles Earl of Sunderland, by whom she had Robert Earl of Sunderland, who died in 1729; Charles, born November 22, 1706, who on the demise of his brother, became Earl of Sunderland; and on the death of the Marquis of Blandford, succeeded him in title and estate, as he did to all the honours of this entail upon the demise of Henrietta, Duchesses of Marlborough. His Grace married Elizabeth, daughter to Thomas Lord Trevor, by whom he has issue; John, who married a third daughter of John Lord Carteret, who is now his widow, and by whom he has issue; Anne, married to the late Lord Viscount Bateman of the kingdom of Ireland; and Diana, late Duchesses of Bedford, who died without issue. The third daughter, Elizabeth, born in 1687, married Scroop, late Duke of Bridgewater, by whom she had two sons that died young, and a daughter Anne, married first to the late Duke of Bedford, and now the wife of William Earl of Jersey. Her Grace the Duchesses of Bridgewater died March 22, 1713-14. His Grace's youngest daughter, Mary, who is still alive, was born in 1689, and married the present Duke of Montague, by whom she had two sons, who died young, and two daughters still living; Isabella, who married the late Duke of Manchester, by whom she had no issue, and now the wife of Mr Hussey, by whom she has issue; Mary, married to George Earl of Cardigan, by whom she has several children (79).

[Y] First of men] He was in his private life remarkable for an easiness of behaviour, which gave an inimitable propriety to every thing he said and did; a calmness of temper no accident could move, a temperance in all things, which neither a court life, or court favours, could corrupt; a great tenderness for his family, a most sincere attachment to his friends, and a strong sense of religion, without any tincture of bigotry. He was the most accomplished Courtier of his time, distinguished by the favour of five Princes at home, and by particular marks of respect from the greatest Princes abroad; more especially those two great rivals for fame, Charles XII and Peter the Great, who sent a Captain of his guards express, to carry the Duke the news of his victory at Pultowa. He was an able Statesman, as appears from his success in many negotiations; a strong and clear speaker, and one who from the pathetic manner of his delivery, never failed to move the passions of others, as it did his own. He was a consummate General, for he gained every battle he fought, took every town he besieged, and had the better of all the great Generals that were employed against him. But above all, he was a true Patriot, and followed what he took to be the interest of this nation at home and abroad, without respect of persons or of consequences. In fine, he was equally amiable and great; and if he had foibles, as these are inseparable from human nature, they were so hid by the glare of his virtues, that they were scarce perceived in his own time; and one has reason to hope, that envy will hardly find a secretary, capable of transmitting them to posterity.

CLAGETT (NICOLAS) an eminent Divine in the XVIIth Century, was born in the city of Canterbury (a), about the year 1607 [A]. In the beginning of the year 1628, he was entered a Student of Merton-College in Oxford (b); and on the 20th of October 1631, took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, as a member of that House (c). Afterwards he removed to Magdalen-Hall in the same University (d), and took his degree of Master of Arts the 11th of June 1634 (e), being then generally esteemed a very able moderator in Philosophy (f). About the year 1636, he became Vicar of Melbourne in Dorsetshire; and, some years after, was elected Preacher at St Mary's Church in St Edmundsbury Suffolk, where he was held in great veneration for his improving way of preaching, and for his singular piety. He died on the 12th of September 1663, aged fifty-six years or thereabouts, and was buried in the chancel of St Mary's Church beforementioned (g). He published, 'The Abuses of God's Grace, discovered in the Kinds, Causes, &c. proposed as a seasonable Check to the wanton Libertinism of the present Age.' Oxon. 1659, 4to (h). Though he was a man eminent in himself, he was more so for being the father of two worthy sons, of whom we shall give an account in the two next articles.

[A] Was born—about the year 1607.] This appears from his age at the time of his death, mentioned above, namely, that he was fifty-six, in the year 1663. But there seems to be a mistake in what Mr Wood says of his age. For if he was fifty-six years of age in 1663, and consequently born in 1607, he must have been twenty-one years old when he was admitted into the University; which is a little improbable, the usual years of admission there being about seventeen or eighteen. It is therefore more probable that he was born about the year 1610, and that he was not quite so old at the time of his death as Mr Wood imagin'd.

CLAGETT (WILLIAM) a most valuable and learned Divine in the XVIIth Century, and eldest son of Mr Nicolas Clagett mentioned in the last article, was born at St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, September 14, 1646 (a). His education was in the Free-School there, under the care of Dr Thomas Stephens, author of the notes on Statius's Sylvæ, who took very early notice of the promising parts of his Scholar. And, what great and uncommon improvements he made, is manifest from his early admission into the University, even before he was full thirteen years of age: for he was admitted in Emmanuel-College in Cambridge, September 5, 1659; under the tuition of Mr Thomas Jackson (b). He regularly took his degrees in Arts, and commenced Doctor in Divinity in 1683 (c). His first publick appearance in the world, was at his own native town of St Edmund's-Bury, where he was chosen one of the Preachers: which office he discharged for seven years with an universal reputation (d). From thence, at the instance of some considerable men of the long robe, whose business at the affizes there, gave them opportunities of being acquainted with his great worth and abilities, he was prevailed with to remove to Gray's-Inn. And it was no small testimony given to his merit, that he was thought worthy by that Honourable Society to succeed the eminent Dr Cradock, as their Preacher (e). He continued in this place all the remaining part of his life, and therein behaved himself worthily; which the gentlemen of that House took all occasions of declaring, by the constant kindness they expressed to him while he lived, and the respects they paid him at his death (f). Besides this honourable employment, he was presented by the Lord Keeper North (who was his wife's kinsman) to the Rectory of Farnham-Royal in Buckinghamshire, into which he was instituted, May 14, 1683 (g). He had another preferment, which he himself most valued next to his Preacher's place at Gray's-Inn, and that was the Lecture of St Michael Basishaw, to which he was elected by that parish about two years before his death [A]. He was also Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty (h). This excellent person, who was worthy of a longer life, was untimely snatched away by the small-pox, in the forty-second year of his age. He was seized with that fatal distemper on a Sunday evening, March the 16th, after having preached at St Martin in the Fields, in his Lent course there (i): and dying of it, March 28, 1688, he was buried in a vault under part of the Church of St Michael Basishaw (k). His wife, Mrs Thomasin North, a most virtuous and accomplished woman, died eighteen days after him of the same disease, and was buried in the same grave with him (l). We are assured by the testimony of Dr Sharp (m), and of persons still living, that no man of a private condition, in the last age, died more lamented. For, as he had all the amiable charming qualities to procure the esteem and love of every one that knew him: so he was endowed with so many great and useful talents, for the doing service to religion, to the Church, to all about him; and he so faithfully and industriously employed those talents to those purposes, that he was really a publick blessing, and he had that right done him as to be esteemed so. It was the Society of Gray's-Inn that brought him to London: but after he came thither, his own merit in a little time rendered him sufficiently conspicuous. For, so innocent and unblameable was his life, such an unaffected honesty and simplicity appeared in all his conversation, so obliging he was in his temper, so sincere in all his friendships, so ready to do all sorts of good offices that came in his way;

way; and withal so prudent a man, so good a preacher, so dexterous in untying knots, and making hard things plain, so happy in treating of common subjects in an uncommon, and yet useful way. So able a champion for the true religion against all opposers whatsoever; and lastly, so ready upon all occasions to advise, to direct, to encourage any work that was undertaken for the promoting or defending the cause of God.—All these qualities were so eminent in Dr Clagett, that it was impossible they should be hid. The town soon took notice of him, and none that intimately knew him could forbear to love and admire him; and scarce any that had heard of him, to esteem and honour him (n). Bishop Burnet ranks him, among those worthy and eminent men, whose lives and labours did in a great measure rescue the Church from those reproaches that the follies of others drew upon it. And adds,—that they deserved a high character; and were indeed an honour, both to the Church, and to the age in which they lived (o). It must not be forgotten, that he was one of those excellent Divines, who made that noble stand against Popery in the reign of King James II, which will redound to their immortal honour.—The several things published by Dr Clagett, are as follow. [B] Part II Lond. 1680. 8vo. &c.] The learned author composed also a third part. Dr Owen having made a great shew, in the margin of his book, of quotations from the Fathers, as if Antiquity had been on his side; it was intended in this third part to prove (as may be seen in the conclusion of the second part) that Dr Owen had not the Fathers with him, as he pretended. Dr Clagett had finished his Collections from the Ancients to this purpose, and made the book ready for the press, but it happened unfortunately that the manuscript copy was lodged with a friend of his, whose house was burnt, and the book perished in the flames. After this accident he attempted to make his collections over again, but never had an opportunity to finish them (2). An Abridgment of the two parts published, was printed at London in 1719. 8vo. under the following title; ‘A treatise concerning the Operations of the Holy Spirit, being the substance of the late Reverend and Learned Dr William Clagett’s Discourse upon that subject, with large additions. [C] From the original French of Father Toussain Bridoul, a Jesuit.] By these several learned pieces, which Dr Clagett published himself, the reader may in some measure (as Dr Sharp observes) be able to make a judgment of his genius and abilities (3). If a friend, adds he, can speak without partiality, there doth in those writings appear so strong a judgment, such an admirable Nicolas Clagett published four volumes of his sermons [D]. The first, printed in 1689, contained seventeen sermons; with the Sum of a Conference on February 21, 1686, between Dr Clagett and Father Gooden, about the point of Transubstantiation. One of those sermons was greatly admired by Queen Mary [E]. The second volume, printed in 1693, contained, eleven sermons. A Paraphrase and Notes upon the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, seventh, and eighth Chapters of the Gospel of St John [F]: the Paraphrase, and Notes on the sixth Chapter, which had been published before: A Discourse of Church-Unity, with directions how in this divided State of Christendom to keep within the Unity of the Church: A Discourse of Humanity and Charity: And a Letter concerning Protestants Charity to Papists; published by Dr Clagett. The third and fourth volumes did not come out 'till the year 1720; which was at so great a distance of time from the two former volumes, that the Booksellers concerned could not be prevailed with to call them the third and fourth volumes, as they really were; but they were called the first and second volume, as well as the former: only notice was given, that they were never before published (s).

admirable faculty of reasoning, so much honesty and candour of temper, so great plainness and perspicuity, and withal so much spirit and quickness; and, in a word, all the qualities that can recommend an author, or render his books excellent in their kind; that I should not scruple to give Dr Clagett a place among the most eminent and celebrated writers of this Church. And if he may be allowed that, it is as great an honour as can be done him. For perhaps from the inspired age to this, the world did never see more accurate, and more judicious compositions in matters of Religion, than the Church of England has produced in our days.

[D] His brother Mr Nicolas Clagett published four volumes of his Sermons. These posthumous Sermons, as Dr Sharp well observes (4), do sufficiently speak their author. For they every where express the spirit, the judgment, and the reasoning of that excellent man; though some of them, perhaps, want that finishing which his masterly hand would have given them, had he been to have published them himself. The learned publisher informs us (5), that his sudden thoughts upon a subject were so marvellous good, that they seemed to flow from a fountain of reason, and discovered a great readiness of judgment in him; but they were very clear and full discourses, which he took any time, and a particular care to compose.

[E] One of these sermons was greatly admired by Queen Mary. Namely, the sixteenth in the first volume, on Job ii. 10. Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? This the pious Queen desired to hear read more than once, during her illness, a little before her decease (6). It was composed by the learned author upon occasion of the death of a child of his, that happened a little before; and it was the last he made. The last he preached, was the seventeenth in the first volume (7).

The occasion of his writing this Paraphrase was this; a Commentary upon the whole Bible was undertaken by a select number of Divines of our Church. C L A G E T T (N I C O L A S) a learned Divine in the XVIIth, and part of the XVIIIth Century, was a younger son of Mr Nicolas Clagett, Minister of St Edmund's-Bury, and brother to Dr William Clagett mentioned in the last article. He is entered in the register-book of St Mary's parish in Bury, as baptized, May 20, 1654 (a). His education was in the Free-School of the place of his nativity, which was at that time under the care of Mr Edward Leeds [A]. From hence he was sent to Christ's College in Cambridge, where he was admitted, January 12, 1671, under the tuition of Dr Widdrington. He regularly took his degrees in Arts, and in 1704 commenced Doctor in Divinity. Upon his brother's removal to Gray's-Inn, he was elected in his room, March 21, 1680, Preacher at St Mary's in St Edmund's-Bury. In this station he continued near forty-six years: and, during that long period of time was a constant preacher, and diligent in every other part of his ministry. On the first of February 1683, he was instituted to the Rectory of Thurlo parva. Dr John Moore, then Bishop of Norwich, who was well acquainted with his merit and abilities, collated him, on the 14th of June 1693, to the Archdeaconry of Sudbury. He had also the Rectory of Hitcham in Suffolk, to which he was instituted, March 8, 1707 (b). This eminent Divine lived extremely valued and respected, on account of his exemplariness, charity, and other virtues; and died much lamented, on the 27th of January 1726-7, in the seventy-third year of his age. He was buried in the chancel of the parish Church of St Mary's in St Edmund's-Bury. Among other children, he had Nicolas, Lord Bishop of Exeter, lately deceased. The following things were published by him; I. 'A Persuasive to Peaceableness and Obedience, being an Assize Sermon preached at St Edmund's-Bury.' Lond. 1683, 4to. II. A pamphlet, intituled, 'A Persuasive to an ingenuous Trial of Opinions in Religion.' Lond. 1685, 4to. III. 'A Sermon preached at St Edmund's-Bury at the Visitation of William (Lloyd) Lord Bishop of Norwich.' Lond. 1686, 4to. IV. 'Christian Simplicity. A Sermon preached, December 31, 1704, before the Queen.' Lond. 1705, 4to. V. CLARKE (Dr SAMUEL) a very learned and eminent Divine of the last and present Centuries, was born in the city of Norwich [A], the 11th of October 1675, and educated in the Free-School of that place, under the care of the Reverend Mr Burton. In 1691, he was removed to Caius-College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Ellis, afterwards Sir John Ellis (a). Here his great genius and abilities soon discovered themselves; and, before he was much above twenty-one years of age, he greatly contributed, both by his own example, and his excellent translation of, and notes upon, Robault's Physicks [B], to the establishment of the Newtonian Philosophy [C]. Afterwards he turned his thoughts to Divinity [D], and, having taken holy Orders, became Chaplain to Dr John Moore, Bishop of Norwich [E]. In 1699, he published Three Practical Essays upon Baptism, Confirmation,

[A] He was born at Norwich.] His father was Edward Clarke, Esq; Alderman of that city, and one of it's Representatives in Parliament for several years: a gentleman of an excellent natural capacity, and untainted reputation for probity and virtue. His mother was Hannah, the daughter of Mr Samuel Parmenter, Merchant, of the same city (1). Mr Whiston informs us (2), that Mr Clarke was so acceptable to the citizens of Norwich, that they chose him, without any solicitation, nay, against his own inclination, to represent them in Parliament.

[B] His translation of, and notes upon, Rohault's Physicks.] There have been four editions of it: the first in 1697, in 8vo; the last in 1718, in 8vo, under this title, Jacobi Rohaulti Physica; Latine vertit, recensuit, & uberioribus jam Annotationibus, ex illustrissimi Isaaci Newtoni Philosophia maximam partem haustis, amplificavit & ornavit, S. Clarke, S.T.P. Accedunt etiam in hac quarta editione novae aliquot Tabulae aeri incisae, & Annotationes multum sunt auctae. Dr John Clarke, Dean of Sarum, and our author's brother, translated this work into English, and published it, in two volumes, 8vo, under the title of: Robault's System of Natural Philosophy; illustrated with Dr Samuel Clarke's Notes, taken mostly out of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy; with Additions. Done into English by John Clarke, D. D. The motives that induced Dr Samuel Clarke to translate, and comment upon, Mr Rohault, may be seen in the following remark.

[C] He greatly contributed—to the establishment of the Newtonian Philosophy.] When our author came first to the University, the system of Des Cartes was the established Philosophy there; though (as Bishop Hoody justly observes) it was no more than the invention of an ingenious and luxuriant fancy, having no foundation in the reality of things, nor any correspondence to the certainty of facts. Mr Ellis himself (Mr Clarke's tutor) though a very learned man, was a zealot for this Philosophy, and no doubt gave his pupils the most favourable impressions of what he had so closely embraced himself. The great Sir Isaac Newton had indeed then published his Principia. But this book was but for the few; both the matter and manner of it placing it out of the reach of the generality even of learned readers, and strong prejudice, in favour of what had been received, working against it. But neither the difficulty of the talk, nor the respect he paid to the director of his studies, nor the warmth and prejudice of all around him, had any influence upon his mind. Dissatisfied therefore with arbitrary Hypotheses, he applied himself to the study of what was real and substantial. And in this study he made such uncommon advances, that he was presently master of the chief parts of the Newtonian Philosophy; and, in order to his first degree, performed a public exercise in the Schools, upon a question taken from thence; which surprized the whole audience, both for the accuracy of knowledge, and clearness of expression, that appeared through the whole. The System of Natural Philosophy, then generally taught in the University, was that written by Mr Rohault, entirely founded upon the Cartesian principles, and very ill translated into Latin. Mr Clarke justly thought, that Philosophical notions might be expressed in pure Latin; and therefore resolved to give a new translation of that author, and to add to it such notes, as might lead students insensibly, and by degrees, to other and truer notions than could be found there. And this certainly (the Bishop observes) was a more prudent method of introducing truth unknown before, than to attempt to throw aside this treatise entirely, and write a new one instead of it. The success answered exceedingly well to his hopes. For, by this means, the true Philosophy has, without any noise, prevailed: and to this day his translation of Rohault is, generally speaking, the standing text for lectures; and his notes, the first direction to those, who are willing to receive the reality and truth of things, in the place of invention and romance (3). Mr Whiston relates (4), that, in the year 1697, while he was Chaplain to Dr Moore, then Bishop of Norwich, he met young Mr Clarke (at that time wholly unknown to him) at one of the Coffee-houses in the Market-place of Norwich; where they entered into a conversation about the Cartesian Philosophy, particularly Robault's Physicks, which Mr Clarke's tutor (Mr Whiston says) had put him to translate. Mr Whiston, being asked his opinion concerning the fitness of such a translation, answered; 'that since the youth of the University must have, at present, some system of Natural Philosophy for their studies and exercises; and since the true system of Sir Isaac Newton was not yet made easy enough for that purpose; it was not improper, for their sakes, to translate and use the System of Rohault, who was esteemed the best expofitor of Des Cartes; but that as soon as Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy came to be better known, that only ought to be taught, and the other dropped.' Which last part of his advice (Mr Whiston tells us) has not been followed; Dr Clarke's Robault being still the principal book for young students in the University. 'Though such an observation (he adds) is no way to the honour of the tutors, who, in reading Robault, do only read a Philosophical Romance to their pupils, almost perpetually contradicted by the better notes thereto belonging.' However, upon this occasion, Mr Whiston and Mr Clarke fell into a discourse about the wonderful discoveries made in Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy. And the result was, that Mr Whiston was greatly surprized, that so young a man, as Mr Clarke then was, should know so much of those sublime discoveries, which were then almost a secret to all, but to a few particular Mathematicians.

[D] He turned his thoughts to Divinity.] His first studies, in order to fit himself for the sacred function, were, the Old Testament in the original Hebrew, the New in the original Greek, and the Primitive Christian writers. The first of these he then read with that exactness of judgment, which very few have shewn after a much longer application; and which furnished him with many observations, written at that time with his own hand in the margin, relating to the mistakes of the common translation of it (5).

[E] He became Chaplain to Dr John Moore, Bishop of Norwich.] This Prelate, the greatest patron of Learning, and learned men, received Mr Clarke into his familiarity and friendship, to such a remarkable degree, that he lived for near twelve years in that station, with all the decent freedoms of a brother and an equal, rather than an inferior. The Bishop's value for him increased every day, and there was no mark of esteem he did not shew him while he lived: and, at his death, he gave him the highest proof of confidence in leaving all the concerns of his family solely in his hands; a trust, which Mr Clarke executed with the most faithful exactness, and to the entire satisfaction of every person concerned (6). Mr Whiston (7) lays claim to the merit of introducing Mr Clarke to the acquaintance and friendship of the Bishop of Norwich. After the conversation mentioned above (8), which Mr Whiston gave the Bishop an account of, upon his return to the Palace, Alderman Clarke and his son were, by order of the Bishop, invited, and handsomely entertained by Mr Whiston at the Palace. The next year (1698) Mr Whiston, being collated by the Bishop to the Living of Lowestoft in Suffolk, resigned his Chaplainship, in which he was succeeded by Mr Clarke.

tion, and Repentance [F], and an anonymous piece, intituled, Reflexions on part of a book, called Amyntor [G]. In 1701, he published his Paraphrase on the Gospel of St Matthew, which was soon followed by those on St Mark, Luke, and John [H]. Bishop Moore

[F] His three Practical Essays upon Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance.] The whole title is: Three practical Essays on Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance: Containing full Instructions for a Holy Life; with earnest Exhortations, especially to young Persons, drawn from the consideration of the severity of the Discipline of the Primitive Church. The author, in his Preface, having observed the mistakes men have run into with respect to the great business of repentance and conversion, tells us, his design in these Essays, is, 'to endeavour briefly to set this great and important matter in it's true light, from the analogy of Scripture, and from the sense of the purest ages of the Primitive Church: to shew, that at Baptism God always bestowes that grace, which is necessary to enable men to perform their duty; and that to those, who are baptized in their infancy, this grace is sealed and assured at Confirmation: that from henceforward men are bound, with that assistance, to live in the constant practice of their known duty, and are not to expect (except in extraordinary cases) any extraordinary, much less irresistible grace, to preserve them in their duty, or to convert them from sin: that if after this they fall into any great wickedness, they are bound to a proportionably great and particular repentance: and that, as the Gospel hath given sufficient assurance of such repentance being accepted, to comfort and encourage all true penitents; so it has sufficiently shewn the difficulty of it at all times, and the extreme danger of it when late, to deter men from delaying it when they are convinced of it's necessity, and from adding to their sins when they hope to have them forgiven.' Bishop Hoadly (9) mentions these Essays, and the Reflexions on Amyntor (10), not to put them upon a level with the author's other performances, but only as having upon them the plain marks of a Christian frame of mind, and as proofs of his knowledge in the writings of those early ages, even at his first setting out into the world. Mr Whiston (11) esteems these Essays the most serious treatise Dr Clarke ever wrote, and which, with a little correction, will still be very useful in all Christian families. Upon this occasion Mr Whiston tells us, he remembers, he once told Dr Clarke, after he had been long at St James's, and about the Court, that 'he doubted he was not now so serious, and good a Christian, as he had been in the days of Hermas.' This, he says, Dr Clarke readily understood to mean the time of his writing these three practical Essays, in which he had very often quoted that excellent, but despised, book of Primitive Christianity: The Shepherd of Hermas. There have been five editions of these Essays.

[G] His Reflexions on—Amyntor.] The whole title is: Some Reflexions on that part of a book, called Amyntor, or, A Defence of Milton's life, which relates to the Writings of the Primitive Fathers, and the Canon of the New Testament: In a Letter to a Friend. The author of Amyntor, it is well known, was the famous Mr Toland, and the propositions, maintained therein, which Dr Clarke thought most to deserve consideration, are these three: First, That The books ascribed to the Disciples and Companions of the Apostles, which are still extant, and at this time thought genuine, and of great authority; such as, the epistle of Clemens to the Corinthians, the epistles of Ignatius, the epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians, the Pastor of Hermas, and the epistle of Barnabas, &c. are all very easily proved to be spurious, and fraudulently imposed upon the credulous. Secondly, That it is the easiest task in the world, to shew the ignorance and superstition of the writers of these books: that Barnabas has many ridiculous passages; and by saying, that the Apostles before their conversion were the greatest sinners in nature, we are robbed of an argument we draw from their integrity and simplicity against infidels: that the pastor of Hermas is the silliest book in the world: and that Ignatius says, the virginity of Mary was a secret to the devil; which, Dr Clarke supposes, Mr Toland cites as a ridiculous saying. Thirdly, that They, who think these books genuine, ought to receive them into the Canon of Scripture, since the reputed authors of them were the companions and fellow-labourers of the Apostles, as well as St Mark and St Luke, which is the only reason (Mr T. ever heard of) why these two Evangelists are thought inspired. These are the principal assertions of the author of Amyntor; in opposition to which Dr Clarke advances, and maintains, the three following propositions: First, that, 'Though we are not infallibly certain, that the Epistles of Clemens, Ignatius, Polycarp and Barnabas, with the Pastor of Hermas, are genuine; yet that they are generally believed to be so, upon very great authority, and with very good reason.' Secondly, that therefore 'Though they are not received as of the same authority with the Canonical Books of the New Testament, yet they ought to have a proportionable veneration paid to them, both with respect to the authors, and to the writings themselves.' Thirdly, that 'Neither the belief of the genuineness of these books, nor the respect paid to them as such, does in the least diminish from the authority of the New Testament, or tend to make the number of the Canonical Books uncertain or precarious.' This Treatise was first published, without a name, in 1699, and since added to Dr Clarke's Letter to Mr Dodwell, &c.

[H] His Paraphrases on the Four Gospels.] Among the many excellent Commentaries and Expositions upon the Books of the Holy Scripture, there had been none, wherein the text of the New Testament is fully paraphrased with brevity and plainness. Erasmus's performance of this kind is very elegant and judicious: but his explications are large, having frequent digressions; in many places he indulges allegorical interpretations; and, besides, the beauty of his work is very much lost in our translation. The eminent and learned Bishop Hall wrote a pious Exposition upon particular difficult texts; but, because it was only upon particular texts, the design itself allowed him not to regard transitions, and to make his paraphrase one continued uninterrupted discourse. Dr Hammond has with great pains collected all the assistances of ancient and modern learning, and with great success applied them to the explication of the New Testament. But those, who justly admire his great learning and skill in interpreting, yet complain of the obscurity and perplexedness of his stile, which makes his Paraphrase somewhat difficult, and of less general use: and besides, it was never printed by itself without his large notes. Dr Patrick, Bishop of Ely, has, with admirable learning and judgment, brought this way of writing to perfection, in his Paraphrase upon some books of the Old Testament; and all, who desire to understand the Scriptures fully, will ever wish he had gone through all the writings both of the Old and New Testament in the same way. Others, who have written good expositions upon the Holy Scriptures, have either made large commentaries, of less general and constant use; or have insisted chiefly on such critical observations, as are proper only for the learned. Dr Clarke tells us (12), he has 'endeavoured in these papers to express the full sense of the Evangelists in the plainest words, and to continue the sense without interruption by the clearest transitions he could. He has all along consulted the best Expositors, and selected out of every one what seemed to discover the most natural meaning of the text: and where any thing remarkable offered itself to his thoughts, different from what he met with in Commentators, he set it down in short notes in the margin. But other critical observations he has generally omitted (excepting what use is made of them in the Paraphrase) that he might not swell the marginal notes into a commentary, and trouble the reader with repeating what others had said already.' Of how great benefit these Paraphrases have been, and always will be, to those English readers, who have sense and goodness enough to be pleased with a just representation of the true meaning of what is recorded in the Gospel, we need not say. And we cannot but express our wishes, that he had pursued his original design, which was to have completed the work upon the whole New Testament. We are told (13), he had actually begun his Paraphrase upon the Acts of the Apostles: but something acciden-

Moore gave our author the Rectory of Drayton near Norwich, and procured for him a parish in that city; both together of very inconsiderable value: and these he served himself in the season when the Bishop resided at Norwich. His preaching was, at first, without notes, and so continued 'till he became Rector of St James's (b). In the year 1704, he was appointed to preach Mr Boyle's Lecture; and the subject he chose was, The Being and Attributes of God [I]: in which he succeeded so well, that he was appointed to tal interrupted the execution. And it is now only to be lamented, that he did not afterwards resume and complete so excellent a work; which his friends often pressed upon him, and to which he would sometimes answer, That it was made less necessary by the labours of several worthy and learned persons, since the publication of his work upon the Four Gospels. There have been four editions of Dr Clarke's Paraphrase.

[I] His Sermons on the Being and Attributes of God. These, together with his Sermons on the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion, are thrown into continued Discourses, and printed together, under the general title of A Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, the Obligations of Natural Religion, and the Truth and Certainty of the Christian Revelation, in answer to Mr Hobbs, Spinoza, the author of the Oracles of Reason, and other deniers of Natural and Revealed Religion: being sixteen Sermons preached in the cathedral church of St Paul, in the years 1704 and 1705, at the Lecture founded by the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; The particular title of the first eight sermons is, A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. There having been already published, many and good books, to prove the Being and Attributes of God, our author chose to contract what was requisite for him to say upon this subject, into as narrow a compass, and to express what he had to offer, in as few words, as he could with perspicuity. For which reason, he confined himself to one only method, or continued thread of arguing; which he endeavoured should be as near to mathematical, as the nature of such a discourse would allow: omitting some other arguments, which he could not discern to be so evidently conclusive: 'Because (to use his own words) 'it seems not to be at any time for the real advantage of truth, to use arguments in its behalf founded only on such hypotheses, as the adversaries apprehend they cannot be compelled to grant (14). Yet he has not made it his business to oppose any of those arguments, because he thought it not the best way 'for any one to recommend his own performance, by endeavouring to discover the imperfection of others, who are engaged in the same design with himself, of promoting the interest of true religion and virtue (15). Dr Clarke's Sermons at Mr Boyle's Lecture were printed in two distinct volumes; the former in 1705, and the latter in 1706. They have been since printed in one volume, and have passed through several editions. In the fourth and fifth editions were added several letters to Dr Clarke from A Gentleman in Gloucestershire *, relating to the Demonstration, &c. with the Doctor's Answers. In the sixth and seventh editions were added, A Discourse concerning the Connexion of the Prophecies in the Old Testament, and the Application of them to Christ; and An Answer to a seventh Letter concerning the Argument à Priori. Dr Clarke having endeavoured to shew, that the Being of a God may be demonstrated by arguments à Priori (in which attempt, whether successful or not, surely he may be excused) is unluckily involved in the censure a very great wit has passed upon this method of reasoning, in the following lines, which he puts into the mouth of one of his Dunces, addressing himself to the Goddess:

Let others creep by timid steps and slow,
On plain experience lay foundations low,
By common sense to common knowledge bred,
And, last, to nature's cause thro' nature led.
All-seeing in thy mists, we want no guide,
Mother of arrogance, and source of pride!
We nobly take the high Priori road,
And reason downward, 'till we doubt of God (16).

Upon which we have the following note: 'Those, who, from the effects in this visible world, deduce the eternal power and Godhead of the First Cause, tho' they cannot attain to an adequate idea of the Deity, yet discover so much of him, as enables them to see the end of their creation, and the means of their happiness; whereas they, who take this high Priori road (as Hobbs, Spinoza, Des Cartes, and some better reasoners) for one that goes right, ten lose themselves in mists, or ramble after visions, which deprive them of all sight of their end, and mislead them in the choice of wrong means.' Mr Pope would, perhaps, have spared his better Reasoners, and not have joined them with such company, had he recollected our author's apology for using the argument à Priori. The argument à posteriori (he tells us) is indeed by far the most generally useful argument, most easy to be understood, and in some degree suited to all capacities; and therefore it ought always to be distinctly insisted upon. But so far as atheistical writers have sometimes opposed the Being and Attributes of God by such metaphysical reasonings, as can no otherwise be obviated, than by arguing à Priori; therefore this manner of arguing also is useful and necessary in its proper place (17). Bishop Hoadly, speaking of Dr Clarke's Demonstration, &c. tells us (18), he has 'laid the foundations of true religion too deep and strong, to be shaken either by the superstition of some, or the infidelity of others.' That 'He chose particularly to consider the arguings of Spinoza and Hobbs, the most plausible patrons of the system of Fate and Necessity; a system, which, by destroying all true freedom of action in any intelligent being, at the same time destroys all that can be styled virtue, or praise-worthy.' That, 'this being a subject, into which all the subtilities and quacks of Metaphysicks had entered, and thrown their usual obscurity and intricacy; the difficulty lay in clearing away this rubbish of confusion; in introducing a language that could be understood; in clothing the clearest ideas in this plain and manly language; and in concluding nothing but from such evidence as amounts to Demonstration.' That 'He began with self-evident propositions; from them advanced to such as received their proof from the former; and in these took no step 'till he had secured the way before him.' That 'Throughout the whole no word is used, but what is intelligible to all who are at all versed in such subjects, and what expresses the clear idea in the mind of him who makes use of it.' And that 'All is one regular building, erected upon an immovable foundation, and rising up, from one stage to another, with equal strength and dignity.' Let us hear Mr Whiston's opinion in relation to this performance of Dr Clarke's. He tells us (19), when the author brought him his book, he was in his garden over-against St Peter's College in Cambridge, where he then lived. 'Now I perceived, says he, that in these Sermons he had dealt a great deal in abstract and metaphysical reasonings. I therefore asked him how he ventured into such subtilities, which I never durst meddle with? And shewing him a nettle, or the like contemptible weed, in my garden, I told him, that weed contained better arguments for the Being and Attributes of God than all his Metaphysicks. He confessed it to be so; but alledged for himself, that since such Philosophers as Hobbs and Spinoza had made use of those kind of subtilities against, he thought proper to shew, that the like way of reasoning might be better made use of on the side of religion. Which reason, or excuse, I allowed not to be inconsiderable. As to myself, I confess I have long esteemed such kind of arguments as the most subtle, but the least satisfactory of all others whatsoever. And my own opinion is, that, perhaps, Angels, or some of the orders of rational beings superior to them, may be able to reason a great way à Priori, as it is called, and from Metaphysicks, to their own and others satisfaction; but I do not perceive that we men, in our present imperfect state, can do so.' Whatever this honest gentleman can, or cannot do, it is certain, that Dr Clarke, and other ingenious men, of clear heads and sound judgments, to preach the same Lecture the next year, when he chose for his subject, The Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion [K]. About this time, or not much later, Mr Whiston tells us (c), he discovered, that Mr Clarke had been looking into the primitive writers, and began to suspect, that the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity was not the doctrine of the early ages [L]. In 1706, his Patron Bishop Moore, by his Intetest, procured for him the Rectory of St Bennet Paul's Wharf in London (d). The same year, he published his Letter to Mr Dodwell, in answer to that author's Epistolary Discourse concerning the Immortality of the Soul [M]. The same year likewise, he translated Sir Isaac Newton's Treatise of Opticks into elegant Latin [N]. He was now brought by his Patron to Court, and having reasoned a great way à Priori; and that metaphysical reasoning in such hands is not only the most satisfactory, but is the highest and noblest effort of the human understanding. We shall conclude this remark, with just mentioning some pieces written for, and against, Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God. It was animadverted upon by Mr Edmund Law, in his Notes upon Archbishop King's Essay on the Origin of Evil, translated from the Latin. This occasioned a piece intitled, A Defence of Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God: Wherein is particularly considered the nature of Space, Duration, and necessary Existence: Being an Answer to a late Book intitled, A Translation of Dr King's Origin of Evil, and some other Objections: Together with a Compendium of A Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, London, 1732. in 8vo. Mr Law vindicated his Remarks in a Postscript to the second edition of Dr King's Essay: which occasioned, A second Defence of Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God: In answer to a Postscript, &c. By the author of the first Defence, London, 1732. in 8vo. The same year was published a pamphlet, intitled, Dr Clarke's notion of Space examined: In vindication of the translation of Archbishop King's Origin of Evil: Being an Answer to two late pamphlets intitled, A Defence, &c. Mr John Jackson published a piece, intitled, The Existence and Unity of God, proved from his Nature and Attributes: Being a Vindication of Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Being and Attributes of God, London, 1734, in 8vo. The same year appeared two pamphlets, printed at Cambridge; one intitled, An Enquiry into the ideas of Space, Time, Immensity, and Eternity, as also the Self-Existence, Necessary Existence, and Unity of the Divine Nature, by Edmund Law, M. A. the other intitled, An Examination of Dr Clarke's Notion of Space, by Joseph Clarke, M. A. Mr John Clarke, author of the two Defences of Dr Clarke's Demonstration, having published a third, Mr Joseph Clarke published A further Examination of Dr Clarke's Notions of Space, with some Considerations on the possibility of Eternal Creation: In Reply to Mr John Clarke's third Defence, &c. To which are added, some Remarks on Mr Jackson's Exceptions to Dr Clarke's Notions of Space examined in his Existence and Unity, &c.

[K] On the Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion.] In these Discourses he laid the foundations of Morality deep, in the mutual relations of things and persons one to another; in the unalterable fitness of some actions, and the unfitness of others; and in the will of the great Creator of all things, evident from his making man capable of seeing these relations and this fitness, of judging concerning them, and of acting agreeably to that judgment. He then proceeded to demonstrate the Christian Religion to be worthy of God, from it's internal evidence, taken from the perfect agreeableness of it's main design to the light of nature, and to all the moral obligations of eternal reason; without which agreeableness, all the arguments in the world could never conclude in it's favour: and, after this, to prove it to have been actually revealed to the world by God, from the external evidence of prophecy going before it, and of miraculous works performed in express confirmation of it. These Sermons, together with those on the Being and Attributes of God, every Christian in this country, as Bishop Hoadly well observes (20), 'ought to esteem as his treasure; as they contain the true strength, not only of natural but of revealed religion: which, if ever it be removed from such a foundation, or separated from such an alliance with reason and uncorrupted nature, will not long subsist in the belief of understanding persons, after such a separation. And therefore,

[L] He began to suspect, that the Athanasian doctrine of the Trinity was not the doctrine of the early ages.] Whether Mr (Sir Isaac) Newton had given Mr Clarke any intimations of that nature, or whether it arose from enquiries of his own, Mr Whiston, who gives us this account (21), cannot directly inform us; though he inclines to the latter. This only he remembers to have heard Mr Clarke say, that he never read the Athanasian Creed, in his Parish, at or near Norwich, but once, and that was only by mistake, at a time when it was not appointed by the Rubrick.

[M] His Letter to Mr Dodwell, in answer to that author's Epistolary Discourse concerning the Immortality of the Soul.] The whole title is, A Letter to Mr Dodwell; wherein all the arguments in his Epistolary Discourse against the immortality of the soul are particularly answered, and the judgment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly represented. Mr Dodwell's book, against which this is levelled, is intitled: An Epistolary Discourse, proving from the Scriptures, and the first Fathers, that the soul is a principle naturally mortal, but immortalized actually by the pleasure of God, to punishment or to reward, by it's union with the divine baptismal Spirit: Wherein is proved, that none have the power of giving this divine immortalizing Spirit, since the Apostles, but only the Bishops. The mischievous tendency of this doctrine, as it was backed by the great name of the author in the learned world, made it more necessary that an answer should be given to what, from another hand, might perhaps have been received as a designed banter upon both natural and revealed religion. Mr Clarke was thought the most proper person for this work. 'And he did it (says the Bishop of Winchester) in so excellent a manner, both with regard to the philosophical part, and to the opinions of some of the primitive writers, upon whom this doctrine was fixed, that it gave universal satisfaction (22). But this controversy did not stop here. For Mr Anthony Collins, coming in as a second to Mr Dodwell, went much farther into the philosophy of the dispute, and indeed seemed to produce all that could plausibly be said, against the immortality of the soul, as well as the liberty of human actions (23). This opened a larger field of controversy; into which Mr Clarke entered, and wrote with such a spirit of clearness and demonstration, as shewed him greatly superior to his adversaries both in metaphysical and natural knowledge. 'And I am persuaded, says Bishop Hoadly (24), that, as what he has writ in this controversy comprehends the little that the Antients had said well, and adds still more evidence than ever clearly appeared before, and all in words that have a meaning to them; it will remain the standard of good sense on that side of the question, on which he spent so many of his thoughts, as upon one of his favourite points.' Mr Clarke's piece was soon followed by four Defences of it in four several Letters to the author of A Letter to the learned Mr Henry Dodwell; containing some Remarks on a (pretended) Demonstration of the immateriality and natural immortality of the soul, in Mr Clarke's Answer to his late Epistolary Discourse, &c.

[N] He translated Sir Isaac Newton's Opticks into elegant Latin.] In the midst of his other labours, he found time also to shew his regard to the mathematical and physical studies, and his exact knowledge and skill in them. And his natural affection and capacity for these studies were not a little improved by the particular friendship of the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton; at whose request, Bishop Hoadly tells us (25), he translated that excellent performance, and sent it all over Europe in a plainer and less ambiguous stile, than

a time when his unequalled victories and successes had raised his glory to the highest pitch abroad, and lessened his interest and favour at home (33). In the publication of this book, Dr Clarke took particular care of the punctuation, or a proper distribution of each sentence into its constituent members: an exactness too much neglected by learned men, though absolutely necessary for preserving the perspicuity, and even beauty, of an author's language. In the annotations, he selected what appeared the best and most judicious in other editors, with some corrections and emendations of his own interspersed. He acknowledges himself particularly obliged to the learned Dr Richard Bentley, for the use of a manuscript in the King's Library; to the Rev. Dr Robert Cannon, for some various readings, transcribed from the Museum of Isaac Vossius; but different from those, which are inserted in the Amsterdam edition of Cæsar, with the notes of Dionysius Vossius; and lastly, to Dr John Moore, Bishop of Ely, for a manuscript, used by Dr Davis in his edition of Cæsar, and by him called the Norwich manuscript *. Mr Addison takes notice of Dr Clarke's folio edition of Cæsar's Commentaries in the following words: 'The new edition, which is given us of Cæsar's Commentaries, has already been taken notice of in foreign Gazettes, and is a work that does honour to the English press. It is no wonder, that an edition should be very correct, which has passed through the hands of one of the most accurate, learned, and judicious writers this age has produced. The beauty of the paper, of the character, and of the several cuts, with which this noble work is illustrated, makes it the finest book that I have ever seen; and is a true instance of the English genius, which, though it does not come the first into any art, generally carries it to greater heights than any other country in the world (34).'

[9] His Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.] It was first published in 8vo, in 1712. Afterwards there was a second edition, with some alterations, in 1719. The whole title is: The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity; wherein every text in the New Testament relating to that doctrine is distinctly considered, and the Divinity of our blessed Saviour, according to the Scriptures, proved and explained. The subject of this book, the author tells us (35), 'is a doctrine no way affecting the particular constitution, order, or external government of the Church, but in general of great importance in religion; a matter not to be treated of slightly and carelessly, as it were by accident only, or after the manner of superficial controversies about words, or of particular occasional questions concerning the meaning of single ambiguous texts; but which ought, when discoursed upon at all, to be examined thoroughly on all sides, by a serious study of the whole Scripture, and by taking care that the explication be consistent with itself in every part.' It is divided into three parts. The first is, A Collection and Explication of all the Texts in the New Testament, relating to the doctrine of the Trinity. In the second part, The foregoing doctrine is set forth at large, and explained in particular and distinct propositions. And in the third, The principal passages in the Liturgy of the Church of England, relating to the doctrine of the Trinity, are considered. The Bishop of Winchester applauds our author's method of proceeding, in forming his own sentiments upon so important a point. 'He knew, and all men agreed, that it was a matter of meer revelation: he did not therefore retire into his closet, and set himself to invent and forge a plausible hypothesis, which might fit easily upon his own mind. He had not recourse to abstract and metaphysical reasonings, to cover or patronize any system he might have embraced before. But, as a Christian, he laid open the New Testament before him. He searched out every text, in which mention was made of the three Persons, or of any one of them. He accurately examined the meaning of the words used about every one of them; and by the best rules of Grammar and Critique, and by his skill in language, he endeavoured to fix plainly what was declared about every person, and what was not (36).' 'I am far from taking upon me, adds the Bishop, to determine, in so different a question, between Dr Clarke, and those who made replies to him. The debate soon grew very warm; and in a little time seemed to rest principally upon him, and one particular adversary (*), very skilful in the management of a debate, and very learned and well versed in the writings of the antient Fathers. — This I hope I may be allowed to say, that every Christian Divine, and Layman, ought to pay his thanks to Dr Clarke, for the method into which he brought this dispute, and for that collection of texts of the New Testament, by which at last it must be decided, on which side forever the truth may be supposed to lie. And let me add this one word more, that, since men of such thought, and such learning, have shewn the world, in their own example, how widely the most honest enquirers after truth may differ upon such subjects; this, methinks, should a little abate our mutual censures, and a little take off from our positiveness about the necessity of explaining, in this or that one determinate sense, the antient passages relating to points of so sublime a nature (37). His Lordship concludes what he had to say upon this subject, with assuring us, 'that from the time of Dr Clarke's publishing this book, to the day of his death, he found no reason, as far as he was able to judge, to alter the notions which he had there professed, concerning the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, towards any of those schemes, which seemed to him to derogate from the honour of the Father on one side, or from that of the Son and Spirit on the other. This (adds the Bishop) I thought proper just to mention, as what all his friends know to be the truth (38).' Some time before the publication of Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, a message was sent him from the Lord Godolphin, and others of Queen Anne's Ministers, importing, 'that the affairs of the publick were with difficulty then kept in the hands of those, who were at all for liberty; that it was therefore an unseasonable time for the publication of a book, which would make a great noise and disturbance; and that therefore they desired him to forbear, till a fitter opportunity should offer itself.' Which message Dr Clarke had no regard to, but went on, according to the dictates of his conscience, with the publication of his book (39). Since Dr Clarke's death, a third edition of this book has been printed, with very great additions, left under the author's own hand, ready prepared for the press. As it gave occasion to a great number of books and pamphlets on the subject, written by himself and others, we shall subjoin a list of those published by our author, referring, for the rest, to a Pamphlet intitled, An Account of all the considerable books and pamphlets, that have been wrote on either side, in the Controversy concerning the Trinity, since the year 1712; in which is also contained an account of the pamphlets writ this last year on each side by the Dissenters, to the end of the year 1719, London, 1720, in 8vo. Dr Clarke's Tracts are as follow. I. A Letter to the Rev. Dr Wells, in answer to his Remarks, London 1714, in 8vo. II. A Reply to the Objections of Robert Nelson, Esq; and of an Anonymous Author (||) against Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity: Being a Commentary on forty select Texts of Scripture. III. An Answer to the Remarks of the Author () of Some Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the ways of managing that Controversy.* These two last published together; London, 1714, in 8vo. IV. A Letter to the late Rev. Mr R. M. (†) containing Observations upon his book, intitled, A plain Scripture Argument against Dr Clarke's Doctrine concerning the ever-blessed Trinity. V. A Letter to the author of a book, intitled, The true Scripture Doctrine of the most holy and undivided Trinity, continued, and vindicated: Recommended first by Mr Nelson, and since by Dr Waterland. The two last pieces published together, London 1719, in 8vo, at the end of a Tract by another author, intitled, The modest Plea for the Baptismal and Scripture Notion of the Trinity, &c. VI. The modest Plea continued; or, A brief and distinct Answer to Dr Waterland's Queries relating to the Doctrine of the Trinity, London, 1720, in 8vo. which notice was taken, and complaint made, by the Lower House of Convocation in 1714 [T]: but the affair soon ended, upon the Members of the Upper House declaring themselves

VIII. Dr Clarke's Replies to the author of three Letters to Dr Clarke, from a Clergyman of the Church of England, concerning his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity. The Letters and Replies published together, by the author of the Letters; London 1714, in 8vo.

[T] — Of which complaint was made by the Lower House of Convocation, in 1714.] Their complaint was sent to the Upper House, June the 2d, setting forth: 'That a book had been lately published, and dispersed throughout the province, intitled, The Scripture Doctrine, &c. and several Defences thereof, by the same author: which book, and defences, did, in their opinion, contain assertions contrary to the Catholick Faith, as received and declared by the Reformed Church of England, concerning three Persons, of one Substance, Power and Eternity, in the Unity of the Godhead: and tending moreover to perplex the minds of men in the solemn acts of worship, as directed by our established Liturgy, &c.' The Bishops returned for answer, June the 4th, that they approved the zeal of the Lower House, thought they had just cause of complaint, and would take it into their consideration. June the 12th, their Lordships sent a message to the Lower House, directing an extract to be made of particulars out of the books complained of. June the 23d, the said extract was accordingly laid before the Bishops, disposed under the following heads: I. Assertions contrary to the Catholick Faith, as received and declared by this Reformed Church of England, concerning three Persons, of one Substance, Power, and Eternity, in the Unity of the Godhead. II. Passages tending to perplex the minds of men in the solemn acts of worship, as directed by our established Liturgy. III. Passages in the Liturgy and Thirty-nine Articles, avowed by Dr Clarke in such manner, as is complained of in the Representation. Dr Clarke drew up a Reply to this extract, dated June the 26th: which, it seems, was presented to some of the Bishops; but (for what reason we are not told) was not laid before the House. After this, there appearing, in almost the whole Upper House, a great disposition to prevent dissensions and divisions, by coming to a temper in this matter; Dr Clarke was prevailed upon to lay before the House a paper, dated July the 2d, setting forth: 1. That his opinion was, that the Son of God was eternally begotten by the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father; and that the Holy Spirit was likewise eternally derived from the Father, by or through the Son, according to the eternal incomprehensible power and will of the Father. 2. That, before his book, intitled, The Scripture Doctrine, &c. was published, he did indeed preach two or three sermons upon this subject; but, since the book was published, he had never preached upon this subject: and (because he thought it not fair to propose particular opinions, where there is not liberty of answering) he was willing to promise (as indeed he intended) not to preach any more upon this subject. 3. That 'He did not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity: but, if he should fail herein, and write any thing hereafter, upon this subject, contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England, he did hereby willingly submit himself to any such censure, as his superiors should think fit to pass upon him.' 4. That, 'Whereas it had been confidently reported, that the Athanasian Creed, and the 3d and 4th petitions in the Litany, had been omitted in his Church by his direction, he did hereby declare, that the 3d and 4th petitions in the Litany had never been omitted at all, as far as he knew; and that the Athanasian Creed was never omitted at eleven o'clock prayers, but at early prayers only, for brevity sake, at the discretion of the curate, and not by his appointment.' 5. That, 'As to his private conversation, he was not conscious to himself, that he had given any occasion for those reports, which have been spread concerning him, with relation to this controversy.' The paper concludes with these words: I am sorry that what I sincerely intended for the honour and glory of God, and so to explain this great mystery, as to avoid the heresies in both extremes, should have given any offence to this

Synod, and particularly to my Lords the Bishops. I hope my behaviour for the time to come, with relation herunto, will be such, as to prevent any future complaints against me. After this paper had been laid before the Upper House, Dr Clarke being apprehensive, that if it should be published separately (as afterwards happened) without any true account of the preceding and following circumstances, it might be liable to be misunderstood in some particulars; caused an explanation, dated July 5, to be presented to the Bishop of London, the next time the Upper House met; setting forth: 'That, whereas the paper, laid before their Lordships the Friday before, was, through haste and want of time, not drawn up with sufficient exactness, &c. he thought himself indispensably obliged in conscience to acquaint their Lordships; that he did not mean thereby to retract any thing he had written, but to declare, that the opinion set forth at large in his Scripture Doctrine, &c. is that The Son was eternally begotten by the eternal incomprehensible Power and Will, &c. and that, by declaring he did not intend to write any more concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, he did not preclude himself from a liberty of making any inoffensive corrections in his former books, if they should come to another edition; or from vindicating himself from any misrepresentations or aspersions, which might possibly hereafter be cast upon him on occasion of this controversy.' After the delivery of the foregoing explanation to the Bishop of London, the Upper House resolved, July the 5, to proceed no farther upon the extract laid before them by the Lower House; and ordered Dr Clarke's papers to be entered in the Acts of that House. But the Lower House, not so satisfied, resolved, July the 7, that the paper subscribed by Dr Clarke, and communicated to them by the Bishops, does not contain in it any recantation of the heretical assertions, and offensive passages, complained of in their Representation, and afterwards produced in their Extract; nor gives such satisfaction for the great scandal occasioned thereby, as ought to put a stop to any further examination and censure thereof. Thus ended this affair; the most authentick account of which we have in a piece, intitled, An Apology for Dr Clarke, containing an Account of the late Proceedings in Convocation upon his writings concerning the Trinity. London 1714, in 8vo. It was written, Mr Whiston tells us (40), by a worthy Clergyman in the country (*), (40) Hist. Mem. P. 43. a common friend of his and Dr Clarke's, and contains true copies of the original papers relating to the proceedings of the Convocation and Dr Clarke, communicated by the Doctor himself, and occasioned by his friend's letter to him, in relation to his conduct; which letter, with Dr Clarke's answer, is printed in the Apology (41). The paper, laid by Dr Clarke before the Upper House of Convocation, was presently published, by an unknown hand, without the explanation that followed it, the resolution of the Bishops consequent thereupon, or the vote of the Lower House, which followed that resolution. This gave occasion to a report, both in written and printed news-papers, that Dr Clarke had retracted what he had written concerning the doctrine of the Trinity. Particularly, in the Political State of Great Britain for June 1714, were published these words: 'A few days after (after the extract was sent up) Dr Clarke thought fit to make a submission to the Upper House, and to deliver to their Lordships a paper, wherein he promised neither to write nor preach any more upon those abstruse points: whereby an end was put to that portentous affair. And, oh! that all Divines would be as wise, and sacrifice their private opinions to the peace and unity of the Church!' And, in October following, in a book, intitled, The History of the First and Second Session of the last Parliament, were published the following words: 'The Upper House of Convocation being made sensible, that he (Dr Clarke) had made a sacrifice of his private opinions to the peace and unity of the Church; and that by this prudent and Christian behaviour, &c.' About the same time came out several other accounts of the proceedings of the Convocation relating to this matter; most of which seemed to represent Dr Clarke as having made such compliances, as could not but be a great discouragement themselves satisfied with the explanations, delivered in to them by the author upon the subject of the complaint (g). About the year 1712, Dr Clarke had a conference with Dr Smalridge, concerning the Trinity, at Thomas Cartwright's Esq; at Aynho in Northamptonshire [U]. In 1715 and 1716, he had a dispute with the celebrated Mr Leibnitz, relating to the principles of Natural Philosophy and Religion; and a collection of the papers, which passed between them, was published in 1717 [W]. In 1718, a controversy arose concerning the primitive Doxologies, occasioned by an alteration made by Dr Clarke in those of the singing Psalms [X]. About this time, he was presented by Mr Lechmere, ment to all who placed their religion in a free and impartial study of the Scriptures. How far Dr Clarke's conduct upon this occasion, as represented above, will serve to justify these reports, is left to the reader's judgment. In the mean time, impartiality obliges us to set down Mr Whiston's reflections upon this affair (42). He calls Dr Clarke's opinion delivered in to the Bishops (at the head of the paper, recited above) a NEW DECLARATION of his Belief of a sort of Eternity of the Son and Spirit; the delivery of which Declaration he had heard him long afterward style a foolish thing, the occasions of which, he thinks, besides the sinister motives of human caution, and human fear, were these two: First, his own Metaphysick opinion, which he constantly and vigorously maintained, That any Creature whatsoever might possibly have been cœternal with it's Creator; and, secondly, that Bishop Smalridge, whose opinion was chiefly regarded, had dropped some words beforehand, intimating, that 'As to other of Dr Clarke's Metaphysical notions about the Trinity, he did not think it necessary to proceed to their condemnation, provided he would but declare he believed the eternity of the Son of God.' This New Declaration, Mr Whiston adds, was made, contrary to the wiser advice of Dr Bradford, who would have had Dr Clarke rather transcribe some such parts of his own books, as came nearest to the common doctrine, and send them to the Convocation, as so far a declaration of his faith: 'Which (says Mr Whiston) would have been a method of proceeding, both more honest and more unexceptionable.' And Mr Whiston is of opinion, there is a great deal of truth in what is said, that Dr Clarke was prevailed upon to deliver in his new, suspicious, declaration; the true point (he thinks) being SAVE THY SELF AND US: both of which were by this means obtained.

[U] He had a conference with Dr Smalridge concerning the Trinity, &c. It was proposed, Mr Whiston tells us (43), by the former, in order to the conviction of the latter. And if any person in England was able to convince upon that head, he thinks, it must have been Dr Smalridge, who was a thorough master of those original books of Christianity, from whence the arguments were to be taken, and who wanted not sagacity nor good-will to enforce them. However, if Mr Whiston is to be credited, Dr Smalridge failed of success, and the company were generally satisfied that the evidence on Dr Clarke's side was greatly superior to the other.

[W] A collection of papers, which passed between Dr Clarke and Mr Leibnitz. To this collection are added, Letters to Dr Clarke concerning Liberty and Necessity, from a Gentleman (*) of the University of Cambridge; with the Doctors Answers to them: also remarks upon a book, intitled, A Philosophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty (†). This book is inscribed to her late Majesty, Queen Caroline (then Princess of Wales) who was pleased, the Bishop of Winchester tells us (44), to have the controversy pass thro' her hands, and was the witness and judge of every step of it. And Dr Clarke, Mr Whiston informs us (45), used often to speak with admiration of the Queen's marvellous sagacity and judgment in the several parts of the dispute. It related chiefly to the important and difficult points of liberty and necessity; points, in which Dr Clarke always excelled, and shewed a superiority to all, whenever they came into private discourse, or publick debate. But, as the Bishop of Winchester justly observes (46), he never more excelled, than when he was pressed with the strength his learned adversary was master of; which made him exert all his talents, to set the subject once more in a clear light, to guard it against the evil of Metaphysical obscurities, and to give the finishing stroke to what must ever be the foundation of morality in man, and is the sole ground of the accountableness of intelligent creatures for all their actions. 'And as this, adds the Bishop, was the last of Dr Clarke's works relating to a subject, which had been, by the writings of cloudy or artful men, rendered so intricate; I shall take the liberty to say, with regard to all of the same tendency, from his first discourse about the being of God, to these letters; that what he has written to clear and illustrate this cause, does now stand, and will for ever remain, before the world, a lasting monument of a genius, which could throw in light where darkness used to reign; and force good sense and plain words into what was almost the privileged place of obscurity and unintelligible sounds. For such, indeed, had the subject before us been, under the hands of most who had written upon it; either thro' a desire of darkening it by words without meaning, or thro' an inability of discoursing clearly and consistently about it.' Mr Whiston observes (47), that Mr Leibnitz was pressed so hard by Dr Clarke, from matter of fact, known laws of motion, and the discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton (who, he tells us, heartily assisted the Doctor), that he was forced to have recourse to Metaphysical subtilities, and to a pre-established harmony of things, in his own imagination, which he styles a superior reason; till it was soon seen, that Monsieur Leibnitz's superior reason served to little else, but to confirm the great superiority of experience and Mathematics above all such Metaphysical subtilities whatsoever. 'And I confess, adds Mr Whiston, I look upon these letters of Dr Clarke, as among the most useful of his performances in Natural Philosophy.'

[X] He altered the forms of doxology in the singing psalms. This he did in certain select hymns and psalms, reprinted that year for the use of St James's parish. The alterations were these:

To God, through Christ, his only Son,
Immortal glory be, &c.

And,

To God, through Christ, his Son, our Lord,
All glory be therefore, &c.

A considerable number of these select psalms and hymns having been dispersed by the Society for promoting of Christian knowledge, before the alteration of the doxologies was taken notice of, Dr Clarke was charged with a design of imposing upon the Society; whereas, in truth, the edition of them had been prepared by him for the use of his own parish only, before the Society had any thoughts of purchasing any of the copies. However, the Bishop of London thought proper to publish A Letter to the Incumbents of all Churches and Chapels in his Diocese, concerning their not using any new Forms of Doxology, dated Dec. 26, 1718. This letter was animadverted upon by Mr Whiston, in his Letter of thanks to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of London, for his late Letter to his Clergy against the use of new Forms of Doxology &c. dated Jan. 17, 1718-19; and in a pamphlet, intitled, A humble Apology for St Paul, and the other Apostles; or, a Vindication of them and their Doxologies from the Charge of Heresy. By Cornelius Paets. London 1719. Soon after came out an ironical piece, intitled, A Defence of the Bishop of London, in Answer to Mr Whiston's Letter of Thanks, addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury. To which is added, A Vindication of Dr Sacheverell's late Endeavour to turn Mr Whiston out of his Church. Mr Whiston's Letter of Thanks occasioned likewise the two following pieces: viz The Lord Bishop of London's Letter to his Clergy vindicated, &c. By a Believer; London 1719; and A seasonable Review of Mr Whiston's Account of Primitive Doxologies, &c. By a Presbyter of the Diocese of London (*), be Dr William Berriman, Lechmere, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to the Mastership of Wigstan Hospital in Leicester (b). In 1724, he published in 8vo seventeen sermons on several occasions, eleven of which were never before printed. In 1727, upon the death of Sir Isaac Newton, he was offered the place of Master of the Mint, which he thought proper to refuse [Y]. In 1728, was published A Letter from Dr Clarke to Mr Benjamin Hoadly, concerning the Proportion of Velocity and Force in Bodies in Motion (i). The beginning of the year 1729, he published at London in 4to the twelve first books of Homer's Iliad [Z]. This was the last year of this great and learned man's life: for he was taken suddenly ill the 11th of May, and died the 17th [AA]. He married Katherine the only daughter of the Rev. Mr Lockwood, Rector of Little Maffingham in Norfolk; by whom he had seven children, two of which died before him, and one a few weeks after him (k). Since his death, have been published, from his original manuscripts, by his brother Dr John Clarke, Dean of Sarum, An Exposition on the Church Catechism [BB], and ten volumes of sermons. The particulars of Dr Clarke's character shall be laid together in the last remark [CC].

CLIFFORD,

London 1719. To the latter Mr Whiston replied in A Second Letter to the Bishop of London, &c. dated March 11, 1718-19: and the author of the seasonable Review, &c. answered him in a Second Review, &c. As to Dr Clarke's conduct in this affair, Mr Whiston (48) esteems it 'one of the most Christian attempts 'towards somewhat of reformation, upon the primitive 'foot, that he ever ventured upon.' But he adds, that the Bishop of London, in the way of modern authority, was quite too hard for Dr Clarke, in the way of primitive Christianity.

[Y] He thought proper to refuse the place of Master of the Mint. Upon the offer of this place, he advised with his friends, and particularly with Mr Emlyn and Mr Whiston; who were both heartily against his accepting it, as what he did not want, as what was entirely remote from his profession; and would hinder the success of his ministry. To which Mr Whiston added, as his principal reason against it, that such refusal would shew that he was in earnest in religion. Dr Clarke was himself of the same opinion, and could never reconcile himself to this secular preferment. And it is taken notice of, to the honour of Mrs Clarke, that she never set her heart upon the advantages this place would produce to her family, but left the Doctor at full liberty to act as his conscience and inclination should direct him. Mr Whiston, who particularly mentions this affair, informs us (49), that Mr Conduit, who succeeded, gave 1000l. to vacate a place among the King's writers; which was given to one of Dr Clarke's sons.

[Z] The twelve first books of Homer's Iliad. This edition was printed in quarto, and dedicated to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland. The Latin version is almost entirely new, and annotations are added at the bottom of the pages. Homer, the Bishop of Winchester tells us (50), was Dr Clarke's admired author, even to a degree of something like enthusiasm hardly natural to his temper; and that in this he went a little beyond the bounds of Horace's judgment, and was so unwilling to allow the favourite Poet ever to nod, that he has taken remarkable pains to find out, and give a reason for every passage, word, and title, that could create any suspicion. 'The translation, adds his Lordship, with his corrections, may now be styled accurate; and his notes, as far as they go, are indeed a treasury of grammatical and critical knowledge. He was called to this task by Royal command; and he has performed it in such a manner, as to be worthy of the young Prince, for whom it was laboured. The praises given to this excellent work by the writers abroad in their Memoirs, as well as by the learned Masters of the three principal Schools of England, those of Westminster, Eton, and St Paul's; and the short character, that the performance was supra omnem irividiam, bestowed by one, whom Dr Clarke had long before styled, Criticus Unus omnes longe longaque antecellens, and whom every one will know by that title without my naming him; make it unnecessary to add a word upon this subject.' The twelve last books of the Iliad were published, in 1732, in 4to by our author's son, Mr Samuel Clarke, who informs us, in the Preface, that his father had finished the annotations to the three first of those books, and as far as the 359th verse of the fourth; and had revised the text and version as far as verse 510 of the same book. A second edition of the whole was published in 1735, in two volumes 8vo.

[AA] His death. The day on which he was taken ill (Sunday, May 11) he went out in the morning, to preach before the Judges at Serjeant's-Inn; and there was seized with a pain in his side, which made it impossible for him to perform the office he was called to, and became quickly so violent, that he was obliged to be carried home. He went to bed, and thought himself so much better in the afternoon, that he would not suffer himself to be blooded; against which remedy he had entertained strong prejudices. But the pain returning very violently about two the next morning, made the advice and assistance of a very able Physician absolutely necessary; who, after twice bleeding him, and other applications, thought him, as he also thought himself, to be out of all danger, and so continued to think, 'till the Saturday morning following; when, to the inexpressible surprize of all about him, the pain removed from his side to his head; and, after a very short complaint, took away his senses, so as they never returned any more. He continued breathing 'till between seven and eight in the evening of that day (May 17) and then died (51).

[BB] His Exposition of the Church Catechism. It is made up of those Lectures he read, every Thursday morning, for some months in the year, at St James's Church. In the latter part of his time, he revised them with great care, and left them completely prepared for the press. The first edition of them was in 1729. This performance of Dr Clarke's was immediately animadverted upon by a very learned Divine (*), under the title of, Remarks upon Dr Clarke's Exposition of the Church Catechism. This produced An Answer to the Remarks upon Dr Clarke's Exposition of the Church Catechism (||). The author of the Remarks replied in a piece, intitled, The Nature, Obligation, and Efficacy, of the Christian Sacraments, considered; in Reply to a Pamphlet, intitled, An Answer, &c. As also the comparative Value of Moral and Positive Duties distinctly stated and cleared. The Answerer rejoined in A Defence of the Answer, &c. Wherein the Difference between Moral and Positive Duties is fully stated. Being a Reply to, &c. This occasioned A Supplement to the Treatise, intitled, The Nature, &c. Wherein the Nature and Value of Positive Institutions is more particularly examined, and Objections answered. By the same author. Then followed the Answerer's Reply, intitled, The true Foundations of Natural and Revealed Religion asserted: Being a Reply to the Supplement, &c. Which being animadverted upon by the Remarker in the Postscript to his Second Part of Scripture vindicated, produced An Answer to the Postscript, &c. Wherein is shewn, that if Reason be not a sufficient Guide in Matters of Religion, the bulk of Mankind, for four thousand years, had no sufficient Guide at all in Matters of Religion.

to a good skill in the three learned languages, a great compass of the best Philosophy and Mathematicks, as appears by his Latin works; and his English ones are such a proof of his own piety, and of his knowledge in Divinity, and have done so much service to religion, as would make any other man, that was not under the suspicion of heresy, secure of the friendship and esteem of all good Churchmen, especially of the Clergy. And to all this piety, and learning, and the good use that has been made of it, is added a temper happy beyond expression: a sweet, easy, modest, inoffensive, obliging behaviour, adorn all his actions; and no passion, vanity, insolence, or ostentation, appear either in what he writes or says: and yet these faults are often incident to the best men, in the freedom of conversation, and in writing against impertinent and unreasonableness adversaries, especially such as strike at the foundations of virtue and religion. This is the learning, this the temper of the man, whose study of the Scriptures has betrayed him into a suspicion of some heretical opinions. After this short, but comprehensive character, and what has been already said of Dr Clarke as an author, we shall add only a few particulars from the accounts given us by Bishop Hoadly and Mr Whiston. The former, in his character of Dr Clarke (53), tells us; the first strokes of knowledge, in some of its branches, seemed to be little less than natural to him; for they appeared to lie right in his mind, as soon as any thing could appear. He had one happiness, very rarely known among the greatest men, that his memory was almost equal to his judgment. He had so ready a genius, that he immediately comprehended what cost others a great deal of pains, and was esteemed one of the best judges to apply to, for a quick determination about the force or failure of any arguments. His critical skill in the learned languages he made subservient to the cause of religion, as well as polite learning. The design and tendency of his preaching was not to move the passions, nor had he any talent that way: but then his sentiments and expressions were so masterly, and his way of explaining the phraseology of Scripture so extraordinary and convincing, as more than made amends for the want of the other. His conversation, which was highly useful and instructive, was attended with a readiness of thought, and clearness of expression, which hardly ever failed him, when his opinion was asked upon the most important and trying questions. His piety was manly and unaffected; his charity and benevolence, extensive as the whole rational creation; and the ruling principle of his heart and practice, a love of the religious and civil liberties of mankind. In a word, his life, when he came into the view of the great world, was an ornament and strength to that religion, which his pen so well defended. Mr Whiston gives us (54) a remarkable example of what Bishop Hoadly observes, that the first strokes of knowledge seemed to be little less than natural to him. He had it from Dr Clarke's own mouth, and it is this. One of his parents asked him, when he was very young, whether God could do every thing? He answered, yes. He was asked again, whether God could do one particular thing, could tell a lie? He answered, no: and he understood the question to suppose, that this was the only thing that God could not do. Nor durst he say, so young was he then, he thought there was any thing else, which God could not do: while yet he well remembered, he had even then a clear conviction in his own mind, that there was one other thing, which God could not do, viz. that he could not annihilate that space, which was in the room wherein they were. Which impossibility now appears even in Sir Isaac Newton's own Philosophy. Mr Whiston fully agrees to the character given above of Dr Clarke by the author of Difficulties and Discouragements, &c. with such abatements as the Memoirs he himself has given us of this great man will make necessary. These abatements, respecting some parts of the Doctor's conduct, impartiality requires us to mention. And, in the first place, he blames Dr Clarke for subscribing the Articles, at a time when he could not, with perfect truth and sincerity, assent to the Athanasian parts of them. This was at his taking the degree of Doctor in Divinity. Mr Whiston, then Professor of Mathematicks at Cambridge, endeavoured to dissuade him from it; and when he could not prevail on that head, he earnestly pressed him to declare openly, and in writing, in what sense he subscribed the suspected Articles: but he could not prevail on this head neither. Upon this occasion, Professor James, who suspected Dr Clarke of an inclination to heretical pravity, said to him, upon his subscribing the Articles, 'He hoped he would not go from his subscription.' The Doctor replied, 'He could promise nothing as to futurity, and could only answer as to his present sentiments (55).' However, Mr Whiston acknowledges, that Dr Clarke, for many years before he died, perpetually refused all, even the greatest preferments, which required subscription, and never encouraged those who consulted him, to subscribe (56). In the next place, he objects to Dr Clarke his not acting sincerely, boldly, and openly, in the Declaration of his true opinions; and his over-cautious, and over-timorous way of speaking, writing, and acting, in points of the highest consequence. When Mr Whiston gave him frequent and vehement admonitions upon this head, his general answer, he tells us, was, who are those that act better than I do? 'Very few of which (says he) I could ever name to him; tho' I did not think that a sufficient excuse.' Lastly, Mr Whiston is greatly displeas'd with Dr Clarke's conduct in relation to the affair of the Convocation. We have already seen (57) some of his reflexions upon that event, the account of which he concludes with these words: 'Thus ended this unhappy affair; unhappy to Dr Clarke's own conscience; unhappy to his best friends; and above all unhappy as to its consequences in relation to the opinion unbelievers were hereupon willing to entertain of him, as if he had prevaricated all along in his former writings for Christianity.' This conclusion however, Mr Whiston owns, was too hasty, and that Dr Clarke did by degrees recover part of his former character (58). We shall finish this remark, and this whole account of Dr Clarke, with observing, that his great abilities and acquirements made him perpetually fought after by all the greatest lovers of virtue and knowledge; and that to such a degree, that, thro' his last years, he could command but very little time for his own studies, even in the morning: that, as he was the darling of the great and powerful, so, in particular, her late Majesty Queen Caroline, from her first acquaintance with his character to the day of his death, expressed the high esteem she had of his comprehensive capacity, and useful learning, by very frequent conversations with him upon the most important point of true Philosophy, and real knowledge (59).

He was born in the year 1558 (a), and educated at Peter-House in Cambridge, where he had for his tutor the celebrated John Whitgift, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. In this place, he applied himself chiefly to the study of the Mathematicks, which his genius led him to; whereby he became qualified for the several great expeditions he undertook afterwards (b). His eldest son and heir was Henry, father of George, of whom we are treating in this article (1). (1) See Dugdale, ubi supra, Vol. J. p. 335—345.

of the Peers who sat in judgment upon Mary Queen of Scots (c). But having a greater inclination to act by sea than by land; and (according to the fashion in the brave and warlike reign of Queen Elizabeth) being bent on making foreign discoveries, and defeating the ambitious designs of the Spaniard, who was preparing his invincible Armada for conquering England: he fitted out, at his own charge, a little fleet, consisting of three ships, and a pinnace [B], with a view to send them into the South-Sea, on purpose to annoy the Spanish settlements there [C]. They sailed from Gravesend the 26th of June 1586, and from Plymouth the 17th of August; but were forced back by contrary winds into Dartmouth. From whence putting out again on the 29th, they fell with the coast of Barbary the 17th of September, and the next day halled in with the road of Santa Cruz. On the 25th, they came to the Rio del Oro, just under the northern Tropick; where they anchored (d). Searching up that river, the next day, they found it to be as broad fourteen or fifteen leagues upward, as at the mouth, which was two leagues over: but met with no town, nor house. The last of September they departed for Sierra Leona, where they arrived the 21st of October. Going on shore, they burnt a town of the Negroes, and brought away to their ships about fourteen or fifteen tuns of rice: and having furnished themselves with wood and water, they sailed the 21st of November from Sierra Leona, making for the Straights of Magellan. The second of January 1586-7, they discovered land; and, on the 4th day of that month, fell in with the American shore in 30 deg. 40 min. South Latitude. Continuing their course southward, they took, January 10, not far from Rio de la Plata, a small Portuguese ship; and the next day, another: out of which the furnished themselves with what necessaries they wanted (e). The 12th of January they came to Seal-island, and two days after to the Green-island, near which they took in water. Returning to Seal-island, a consultation was held on the 7th of February, Whether they should continue their course for the South-Sea, and winter in the Straights of Magellan; or spend three or four months upon the coast of Brasil, and proceed on their voyage in the spring? The majority being for the former, they went as far as 44 degrees of Southern Latitude. But, meeting with storms and contrary winds, they took a final resolution, on the 21st of February, to return to the coast of Brasil: accordingly, they fell in with it the 5th of April; and after taking in water and provisions in the bay of Camana, came into the port of Baya, the 11th. Eight Portuguese ships being there, they found means to carry off four of them (the least of which were of a hundred and thirty tuns) notwithstanding all the enemies resistance; and also fetched a supply of fresh provision from the shore. The 16th and 17th of May they got a quantity of sugar out of the Portuguese ingenio's (f). The 26th of the same month, they made themselves masters of a new ship, of a hundred and twenty tuns burden, loaden with meal and sugar. On the 3d of June, some were for pursuing their voyage to the South-Sea [D]. But finding themselves upon examination, in want of a due number of men, and sufficient provisions, they resolved, on the 10th, to sail back to England: where they arrived, September 29, after an unprosperous voyage (g). This same year, he went, with many other English Noblemen and gentlemen, to the relief of Sluys then besieged by the Duke of Parma; but at his arrival, he found the place surrendered (h). In 1588, he was one of those brave persons, who put themselves on board the English fleet, to oppose the Spanish Armada that was advancing to invade England. He commanded, on that occasion, the Elizabeth Bonaventure, and signalized himself in a remarkable manner; especially in the last engagement with the Spaniards, near Calais (i). Queen Elizabeth was so pleased with his good services, that she granted him a commission, dated, October 4, 1588, to pursue his intended voyage to the South-Sea: and, for his greater honour and encouragement, lent him one of her own royal ships, named the Golden-Lyon, to be the Admiral. This he victualled and furnished at his own charge; and sailed about the end of October, attended with many brave English gentlemen. In the channel, he took a ship of Dunkirk, named the Hare, laden with merchandize for Spain, which he sent home. But contrary winds at first, and afterwards a violent storm which forced him to cut his main-mast by the board, deprived him of further hopes and ability, to prosecute his designs on the Spanish coasts; so that he returned to England (k). However, not discouraged by this unhappy disappointment, he undertook a third voyage to the West-Indies in 1589. For that purpose, he obtained the Queen's leave, and one ship of the Royal navy, called the Victory; to which adding three other small ships, furnished, at his

The Bark Clifford Vice-Admiral, of 130 tuns, and 70 men, Captain Christopher Lister Commander. The Roe, Rere-Admiral, commanded by Captain Hawes. The Dorothy pinnace, which was Sir Walter Raleigh's (2).

[C] To annoy the Spanish settlements there.] It was resolved by the judicious in that age, as Dr Fuller rightly observes (3), that the way to humble the Spanish greatness, was not by pinching and pricking him in the Low Countries, which only emptied his veins of such blood as was quickly refilled; but the way to make it a cripple for ever, was by cutting of the Spanish sinews of war, his money from the West-Indies.

[D] Some were for pursuing their voyage to the South Sea.] Captain Lister, in particular, had so great a desire to perform that voyage, according to the Earl of Cumberland's direction, that he went to the Admiral, and requested him to give him six butts of wine, one barrel of oyl, three or four barrels of flesh, and to have one Tho. Hood a Pilot, and seven or eight seamen in exchange for some landmen; and, by God's help, he, with the Bark Clifford, would alone proceed for the South-Sea: but the Admiral mightily withstood his motion, and would grant none of his requests (4).

own expence, with about four hundred men, and all necessaries [E], he set sail from Plymouth the 18th of June (l). Three days after, they took three French ships belonging to the Leaguers (m) in that nation. Meeting, on the 13th of July, with eleven ships bound for Hamborough, and other neighbouring ports, they took out of them a quantity of pepper and cinnamon belonging to a Jew of Lisbon, valued at about four thousand five hundred pounds. The first of August, they came within sight of St Michael, one of the Azores, and put out Spanish colours, the more easily to execute the project they had formed, of carrying off in the night some ships that were in the harbour. Accordingly they cut the cables of three of them, and towed them away: they were loaded with wine and oyl from Seville. The 7th, they took another little vessel, whose lading was Maderawine, woollen-cloth, silks, &c. Having got information, that the Spanish Carracks (a very valuable booty) were at Tercera, they made haste thither: and by the way looked into Fyal road, August the 27th, whence they brought away a ship of two hundred and fifty tuns, and fourteen guns, that was moored to the castle, and loaded with sugar, ginger, and hides. They fetched out likewise five other small ships, newly come from Guinea, notwithstanding the brisk fire of the enemy, and sent four of them to England on the 30th of August. At their coming near Tercera, being told that the Carracks had been gone thence eight days, they returned back to Fyal on the 10th of September; and having made themselves masters of the town with much ease, obliged the inhabitants to ransom it for two thousand ducats (n). They took there also fifty-eight pieces of iron ordnance. The 27th of that month they went to St Michael: and the 1st of October to Gratiofa, where they got a new supply of provisions. On the 14th they took a French ship loaden with fish from Newfoundland. The same day, and the five following, the Earl of Cumberland endeavoured to make himself master of fifteen sail of the Spanish West-India fleet, that had put into the port of Angra in Tercera: but finding it too dangerous an attempt, he desisted. Next, he sailed to St Michael's; where being hindered from taking in fresh water, he went for it to St Mary's island. And finding two Brasil ships there, which the people were trying to bring a-ground, Captain Lister boldly carried one of them off, notwithstanding the enemy's violent fire. But the Earl attempting to take the other, had two parts of his own men killed or wounded; and receiving himself three shot upon his shield, and a fourth on his side, tho' not deep: his head was likewise broke with stones and all covered with blood, and both his head and legs were much burnt with granadoes (o). Not being able to have water there, he took some in at St George's island, October 29; and then resolved to sail for England, taking the coast of Spain in his way. On the 4th of November they had the good fortune to make themselves masters of a Portuguese ship of one hundred and ten tuns, freighted with sugar and Brasil-wood: and two days after, of another, between three and four hundred tuns, loaden with hides, cochineal, sugar, china-dishes, and silver. Both were valued at fourteen thousand pounds, and forthwith were sent to England: but the latter was shipwrecked on the coast of Cornwall, and all the men perished except five or six; however, some of the goods were saved (p). The Earl himself being kept out at sea, by storms and contrary winds, longer than he expected, was, for want of provisions, reduced to the greatest extremities [F]. But at length, on the 2d of December, reaching

[E] To which adding three other small ships, &c.] Namely, The Meg, commanded by Captain William Monson, Vice-Admiral: the Margaret, by Captain Edward Careles, alias Wright, Rear-Admiral: and a Caravel, by Captain Pigeon. The Earl himself was Commander of the Victory, having under him Captain Christopher Lister (5).

[F] Was, for want of provisions, reduced to the greatest extremities.] The tragical account left us by one of the sufferers (6), of the great extremities they were reduced to for want of drink, is equal to the scene of hunger in Beaumont and Fletcher's sea-voyage. Soon after, says he, the wind came about to the eastwards, so that we could not fetch any part of England. And hereupon also our allowance of drinke, which was scant ynough before, was yet more scanted, because of the scarcitie thereof in the shippe. So that now a man was allowed but halfe a pinte at a meale, and that many times colde water, and scarce sweete. Notwithstanding this was an happie estate in comparison of that which followed: for from halfe a pinte we came to a quarter, and that lasted not long neither; so that by reason of this great scarcitie of drinke, and contrarietie of winde, we thought to put into Ireland, there to relieve our wants. But when wee came near thither, we were driven so farre to Leeward, that we could fetch no part of Ireland. In the mean time we were allowed every man three or foure spoones full of vineger to drinke at a meale: for other drinke we had none, saving onely at two or three meales, when we had instead hereof as much wine, which was wringed out of wine-lees that remained. With this hard fare

(for by reason of our great want of drinke, wee durst eate but very litle) wee continued for a space of a fortnight or thereabouts: saving that now and then wee feasted for it in the meane time; and that was when there fell any haile or raine: the haile-stones wee gathered up and did eate them more pleasantly than if they had bene the sweetest comfits in the world. The raine-drops were so carefully saved, that so neere as we coule, not one was lost in all our shippe. Some hanged up sheets tied with cordes by the foure corners, and a weight in the midst that the water might runne downe thither, and so be received into some vessel set or hanged underneth: some that wanted sheetes, hanged up napkins, and cloutes, and watched them 'till they were thorow wet, then wringing and sucking out the water. And that water which fell downe and washed away the filth and soiling of the shippe, trod under foote, as bad as running down the kennell many times when it raineth, was not lost, but watched and attended carefully, yea sometimes with strife and contention, at every scupper hole, and other place where it ran down, with dishes, pots, cannes, and jarres, whereof some drunk hearty draughts even as it was, mud, and all, without tarrying to cleanse or fettle it: others clenfed it first, but not often, for it was so thicke and went so slowly thorow, that they might ill endure to tary so long, and were loth to lose too much of such precious stuff: some licked with their tongues, like dogges, the boards under feete, the sides, railles, and masts of the shippe: others that were more ingenious, fastened girdles of ropes about the mastes, dawbing tallow betwixt them and the masse,

Bantry-bay in the West of Ireland, and having there refreshed himself and his men, he arrived safe at Falmouth the 29th of December; after a tedious passage of nine days from Ireland (q). In 1591, his Lordship undertook a fourth voyage, to the coast of Spain, with five ships [G], fitted out at his own charge (r). He sailed from England in May; and, in his way to the Spanish coasts, found several Dutch ships coming from Lisbon laden with spices, which he took out of them. These spices, he determined to send to England, in a ship, guarded by the Golden Noble his Rear-Admiral, but they were taken in a calm, by some Portuguese galleys from Penicha; one of the Captains, with several of the men slain; and the rest carried prisoners to Penicha, and from thence to Lisbon. His Lordship took, besides the spices just now mentioned, a vessel freighted with wine, which he unloaded into his own: and two ships laden with sugar; but one having a leak that could not be found, he left it: the other he sent for England; and by contrary winds, and want of victuals, it was forced into the Groyne, where it fell into the enemy's hands. These several misfortunes obliged the Earl to return to England; after having sent advice to the Lord Thomas Howard, Admiral of the English fleet, then waiting at the Azores to intercept the West-India plate fleet, That there was a large Spanish squadron ready to put out to sea (s). The next year, the Earl of Cumberland undertook a fifth expedition; in which he chose not to make use of any of her Majesty's ships [H]. He intended to have commanded in this voyage in person; but he was so crossed with winds, that three months provisions were spent in harbours, before they could get to the Westward of Plymouth. Whereupon, being disappointed in his principal design, namely, the taking of the outward-bound Spanish Carracks; he transferred the chief command to Captain Norton, with instructions to go to the Azores, and returned himself to London. His little fleet pursued their voyage, and one of the ships (t) took, near Cascais, and within shot of the castle, a Portuguese ship, which was conducted to England by the Golden Noble. The rest went to the Azores, and, with the assistance of other English Ships [I], attacked the Santa Cruz, a large Carrack, in the road of Lagowna; which the Spaniards set on fire, after having put the best of it's cargo on shore, but the English landed, and made themselves masters, both of it, and the town. The 3d of August, they took another rich Carrack, named Madre de Dios, or the Mother of God, valued at a hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling, which was brought to Dartmouth (u). The Earl of Cumberland's share, in proportion to his number of ships and men employed in that service, must have amounted to a very considerable sum: but, because his commission had not provided for the case of his return, and the substituting another in his room, it was adjudged, that he should depend on the Queen's mercy and bounty. And, by reason of several embezzlements, not above the fifth part of the ship's value being brought to account, his Lordship was forced to sit down contented with thirty-six thousand pounds; and that too as a mere matter of bounty and favour, not as his just right (w). The Earl, not hereby discouraged, undertook a sixth voyage, in the year 1593. Queen Elizabeth lent him for this expedition two ships of her Royal navy, namely, the Golden-Lyon, Admiral, which his Lordship commanded in person; and the Bonaventure, Vice-Admiral: to which he added four other ships (x). He had not been long at sea, before he took two French ships of great value, guarded by fourteen great hulks, one of which he carried with him, and sent the other to England. When he came near the Azores, hearing that the Spaniards had a fleet there to intercept him, and perceiving, by an advice-boat of theirs he took, that they were much superior to him in strength; he kept company with them one day, and then withdrew at ten or twelve leagues distance, and so continued for three weeks. In which time being seized with a violent fit of illness, he left the command of his little fleet to Captain Monson (who took one prize afterwards) and returned to England; this proving the most gainful voyage he ever made. Whilst he was near the coast of Spain, he sent three of his ships (y) to the West-Indies. They first touched at St Lucia and Martinico, where they refreshed themselves; and then proceeding

Now in every corner of the shippe were heard the lamentable cries of sicke and wounded men sounding wofully in our eares, crying out and pitifully complaining for want of drinke, being ready to die, yea many dying for lacke thereof, so as by reason of this great extremitie we lost many more men, then wee had done all the voyage before.'

ceeding to Margarita, an island famous for the pearl-fisherics, seized there a large quantity of pearl, to the value of two thousand pounds, besides other booty; and obliged also the inhabitants to pay them two thousand ducats in pearl, to save their town from being plundered. They sailed next to Cumana, to the islands of Aruba and Curassow, and to Rio de la Hache, which they intended to have taken, but found the people ready for them, and learned that they had carried their goods up to the mountains: they therefore set sail for Hispaniola, and having visited several ports round it, and also the islands of Mona and Savona, went up the river Socko in Hispaniola, where they exacted large contributions, threatening otherwise to pillage the Spaniards farm-houses. At Domingo, they took a fine frigate, which they brought to England. Thence they went to Jamaica, to Cuba, Cape Corientes and Cape St Antonio, where they waited for some time in vain for ships coming from the Havannah. After eight months spent in those parts, the Pilgrim sailed for England, and arrived at Plymouth, May 14, 1594. But the Antonio, and the frigate, went to the bay of Honduras, where, near Porto Cavallo, they found seven Spanish ships: from Six of them the Spaniards had taken off the rudders, that they might be disabled from sailing; and refusing to ransom them, the English set them on fire. But they first took out the best effects, and put them on board the Spanish Admiral, a ship of two hundred and fifty tuns, which they brought to England: and arrived at Plymouth the 15th of May, the next day after the Pilgrim (z). Before the return of these ships, the Earl of Cumberland had, at his own charge, with the help of some adventurers, fitted out a small fleet [K], designed for the Azores, and particularly for the island of Tercera. They sailed from Plymouth, April 6, 1594, and about the 25th, took a small bark of Viana in Portugal, laden with Galicia wines, and other commodities, which they divided amongst themselves. On the 2d of June they came within Sight of St Michael's island, one of the Azores; and on the 13th of the same month, met (a) with a large Portuguese Carrack, of two thousand tuns, called Las cinque Llagas, or the five wounds, returning from the East-Indies. They attacked it very vigorously, and would probably have become masters of it: but it being accidentally set on fire during the engagement, was blown up, with a great quantity of powder it had on board. After this disaster they sailed for the island of Flores, where they refreshed themselves: and then putting out again to sea, came up, the 1st of July, with another large Carrack of fifteen hundred tuns, which, after a few shot, they summoned to surrender. But it standing upon it's defence, and, in the engagement with the former Carrack, the Vice-Admiral and several men having been killed, and the Admiral with many more wounded, the rest began to grow faint and discouraged. So leaving this Carrack, they went and waited about Corvo and Flores for some prize from the West-Indies. None coming, and their victuals beginning to grow short, they returned for England, and arrived at Portsmouth about the end of August, having done much harm to the enemy, and little good to themselves (b). Notwithstanding that, the Earl of Cumberland resolved upon an eighth expedition in the year 1595. Thinking himself ill-used by the Queen, in the small share he received of the treasure found in the Madre de Dios; and not liking to be tied to such strict orders as he was when he went out with any ships of the Royal navy; likewise, being highly displeased at the loss of the two last mentioned Carracks for want of a sufficient strength; he built, at Deptford, a ship of his own, of nine hundred tuns: which the Queen, at the launching of it, named The Scourge of Malice. It was the best and largest ship, that, 'till then, had ever been built by any English subject. In this his Lordship intended to have gone in person, and had prepared three other ships to accompany him [L]. But when he had gone as far as Plymouth, the Queen sent him an order, by Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir John Hawkins, to return: and he complied. The ships, however, pursued their voyage [M]: three of them (c) went to the Azores, where they took a Carvel from St Thomas, of a hundred tuns, laden with sugar. They attacked, afterwards, near Flores, a large ship which they supposed to be a Carrack, but found it to be the St Thomas, Vice-Admiral of the Spanish Fleet, waiting there to convoy the East and West-India fleets to Europe. Being like to be over-powered by the English, it went and joined the other Spanish ships: all which together were too strong for the Earl of Cumberland's small squadron. Whereupon, these latter sailed for the coast of Spain. Near it, they took three Dutch Ships, laden with wheat, copper, and other ammunitions and provisions; which being for the King of Spain, were on that account thought lawful prize. By this time their victuals being near spent, they returned to England (d). In 1596, his Lordship fitted out a second time the Scourge of Malice: In which he went in person, accompanied with the Dreadnought belonging to the Queen, and some other small ships. About thirty [K] Fitted out a small fleet. Which consisted of, The Royal Exchange, Admiral, commanded by Captain George Cave: the May-flower, Vice-Admiral, under the conduct of Captain William Anthony: and the Sampson, Captain Nicholas Downton. They had each the like quantity of victuals; and the same number of men, that is 420, of all sorts. Besides these three ships, there was a pinnace, called the Violet, or The Why not I (11).

[L] And had prepared three other ships to accompany him. Namely, The Alcedo, Vice-Admiral, commanded by Captain Monson: the Antony commanded by Captain Daniel Jarret: and the Old Frigate (12).

[M] The ships, however, pursued their voyage. Except the Alcedo: the Commander of which, Captain Monson, was so highly displeased at Captain Langton's being appointed Admiral, and Commander of the Scourge, that he quitted the others, and betook himself to his own adventure in the Alcedo. That bred a quarrel, afterwards, between the Earl of Cumberland and him, and it was a long time before they were reconciled (13).

thirty or forty leagues from England, he met with a storm, wherein the Scourge sprung her main-mast, and was made unserviceable for that voyage: so that he was forced to return for England in the Dreadnought (e). The Queen having at that time prepared a large fleet, to go on the coast of Spain, under the command of the Earl of Essex, and the Lord Admiral; the Earl of Cumberland thought it proper to send also thither the Ascension, a ship of three hundred tuns, four and thirty pieces of ordnance, with a hundred and twenty men, commanded by Captain Francis Slingsby; on purpose to wait for such ships as were expected from Lisbon. Near the Goodwin-sands it had like to be lost in a storm: but, however, having been able to proceed to Plymouth, and being refitted there, they proceeded on their voyage. Meeting with a Carvel, they made a fruitless attempt upon it, in which the Captain was grievously wounded. Afterwards they happened to be vigorously attacked by seven Spanish ships, one of them the Admiral, against which they as vigorously defended themselves. They continued on the coast of Spain 'till they had but fourteen days provisions left; and then returned to England, without so much as one prize to make good the damage and loss they and the ship had sustained (f). The last, and most considerable expedition undertaken by the Earl of Cumberland, was in the year 1598. Having then fitted out, and victualled, his own ship the Scourge of Malice, with nineteen others [N], chiefly at his own charge, he undertook a voyage in person to the West-Indies. For that purpose, he set sail from Plymouth, March 6, 1597-8; and, on the coast of Spain, took a Hamburgh-ship laden with corn, copper, powder, and prohibited commodities; and a French ship laden with salt going into Lisbon: but had, in taking the first, three men killed, five or six wounded, and his ship shot in several places. Soon after he received intelligence, that there were at Lisbon, five very rich Carracks ready to sail for the East-Indies, and five and twenty ships for Brasil. But they hearing of the approach of the Earl's fleet, and he being tired of waiting for them, sailed on the 5th of April, for the South Cape. The 8th day they went from thence, towards the Canaries; and, on the 13th, made themselves masters of Lancerota, where they hoped to have met with a very great treasure, that island being then governed by a Marquis reputed worth an hundred thousand pounds, but they found little or nothing in the place (g). On the 21st of April sailing from Lancerota, they directed their course towards Dominica, where they arrived the 23d of May, and staid 'till the 1st of June. Next they went to the Virgin islands, then uninhabited, where the Earl mustered his men, and acquainted them with his design upon the island of St Juan de Porto Rico (h). Accordingly they set sail for that place, where they arrived the sixth of June, and immediately landed the soldiers, which were about a thousand in number. After a very difficult passage over a causeway to the town [O], and two violent assaults, the enemies quitted the place, of which his Lordship took possession, June the 8th (i). Within a few days, the strong fort of Mora, in which were four hundred soldiers, surrendered also to the English; and was afterwards razed. This town being accounted the very key of the West-Indies, and a passage to all the gold and silver in the Continent of America, his Lordship determined to keep it, and make it a place of war. For that purpose he sent away the inhabitants, on the 7th of July, to Carthagena (k); tho' they made great offers, to be permitted to stay [P]. But a bloody-flux that carried off [N] With nineteen others.] The whole fleet was as follows: The Scourge of Malice, commanded by the Earl himself; and, under him, by Captain John Watts outward, and Captain James Langton homewards. The Merchant Royal, Vice-Admiral, commanded by Sir John Berkeley. The Ascension, Rear-Admiral, Captain Robert Flicke. The Sampson, Captain Henry Clifford, and after his death at Porto Rico, Captain Christopher Colthurst. The Alcedo, Captain John Ley, and homewards Captain Thomas Cotch. The Convent, Captain Francis Slingsby. The Prosperous, Captain James Langton, and homewards Captain John Watts. The Centurion, Captain Henry Palmer, and, after his death, his son William Palmer. The Gallion Constance, Captain Hercules Folyambe. The Affection, Captain Flemming. The Guiana, Captain Christopher Colthurst, and homewards Captain Gerard Middleton. The Scout, Captain Henry Jolliffe. The Antony, Captain Robert Careles, and, after his death, Andrew Andrews. The Pegafus, Captain Edward Goodwin. The Royal Defence, Captain Henry Bromley. The Margaret and John, Captain John Dixon. The Berkeley-bay, Captain John Lea. The Old Frigot, Captain William Harper. And two barges used for landing of men (14). For this expedition, the Earl was authorized by the Queen's letters Patents dated the 14th of January 1586-7, to raise forces serviceable by sea and land: accordingly he levied twelve companies of eighty men each; and appointed officers for them, when he was within one day's sail of Porto Rico (15). The chief officers were, Sir John Berkeley, General; William Mefey, Lieutenant-Colonel; Hercules Folyambe, Serjeant-Major, &c (16).

[O] After a very difficult passage over a causeway to the town.] For, the town stood in a little island, to which there was no other passage but over a beach, or narrow causeway, guarded by two forts; not to be crossed but at low-water. At the further end of it there was a bridge, which had been pulled up, and a strong barricado. Besides, the causeway had been purposely made so rugged, that the English could not keep on their feet, and therefore chose to wade in the water by the side of it. To add to their misfortunes, the Earl of Cumberland, by the stumbling of him that bore his target, had a violent fall, and was in danger of drowning. For, his armour so overburdened him, that the Serjeant-Major, who by chance was next to him, had much ado at the first and second attempt to raise him. When he was up, he found he had swallowed a great deal of salt-water: which made him so sick, that he was forced to lie down for a while upon the causeway; 'till, being a little recovered, he was able to be led to a place of more ease and safety (17).

[P] Tho' they made great offers to be permitted to stay.] The Earl, in a letter of his after the taking of this place, affirmeth, That if he would have left the place, he might have had by good account as much sugar and ginger in the country as was worth 500,000 pounds. But he intended to keep it as the key of the Indies, which whoever possesseth (as his words were) may at his pleasure go into any chamber in the house, and see how they sleepe before he bee either stopped or defried: so as they must at every doore keepe so great a force to guard them, as will consume a great part of their yeerely revenue; and send it from place to place with so great a wastage, as will about four or five hundred of his men (l), made him alter his resolution. In the mean time, a Carvel coming on the 19th of July, into the harbour, from Margarita, with about a thousand ducats worth of pearl, was seized upon by the English: by which they being informed, that the King of Spain's pearl-chest at Margarita was very rich, and but slenderly guarded, the Earl of Cumberland failed with three ships, in order to have that great booty, but was hindered by contrary winds from executing his purpose. Before he quitted the island of St Juan de Puerto Rico, he endeavoured to prevail upon the chief inhabitants, for a sum of money to ransom their island and city. But finding that they trifled with him, and suspecting some treachery, he left the strength of his fleet with Sir John Berkley (2); to whom he gave full power and commission to transact all affairs in his absence. He took, for his own part, nine ships with him [R], on board of which he put what hides, ginger, sugar, and ammunition he could get; the bells of the Churches; and all the brass-cannons that were in the island, being fourscore in number. With these nine ships he set sail, on the 14th of August, for the Azores, where he hoped to intercept the Spanish Mexico fleet, or some of the Carracks (m). After many tedious calms, and one violent storm, he arrived at Flores, on the 15th of September: but, at his coming there, was told, that he came too late. It was in all likelihood much for his safety and advantage: for, but a few days before, there had been at that place nine and twenty large Spanish men of war, which undoubtedly would have proved too strong for him (n). Here he was joined by Sir John Berkley, with the rest of his fleet. After having taken in some provisions, they failed all together, the 16th of September, for England; where they arrived about the beginning of October (o). In this expedition, his Lordship lost, a barge sunk by his order in the haven, to the prejudice of the enemy; another barge cast away in a storm at Bermudas; the Pegasus wrecked upon the Goodwin sands, and the old Frigate upon the Ushent; in which two last ships, forty persons were drowned. He lost otherwise about seven hundred men, whereof six hundred died of the bloody-flux and calenture at Porto Rico; and sixty were slain in fight (p). And, for the vast expences he was at in hiring and fitting up ships, &c. he got nothing in this voyage, only some quantities of hides, ginger, and sugar, eighty pieces of ordnance, with some ammunition, the bells of the Churches, and about the value of a thousand ducats of pearl. It was, however, of considerable service to the English nation, and did great damage to the Spaniards; in that it hindered the Carracks from making their voyage to the East-Indies for this year, and obstructed the return of the Spanish plate-fleet from America (q). By the eleven voyages abovementioned, and by building of ships, horse-racing, tilting, and the like expensive exercises, this noble Earl wasted more of his estate than any of his ancestors (r). I should have observed, that, in 1692, he was elected Knight of the Garter (s). In 1601, he was one of the Lords, that were sent with forces to reduce the Earl of Essex to obedience (t). He departed this life at the Savoy in London, October 30, 1605, and was buried at Skipton in Craven in Yorkshire the 30th of March following: where a fine tomb was afterwards erected to his memory (u). He married Margaret, the third daughter of Francis Earl of Bedford, by whom he had two sons, who died young; and a daughter named Anne [S]. Dying thus without issue-male, he was succeeded in his honours by his brother Francis; who deceased in 1641, and had for successor his only son Henry. And he also dying the 11th of December 1643, left one only daughter, Elizabeth, born in 1613, and married July 5, 1635, to Richard Boyle Viscount Dungarvan, heir-apparent to Richard Earl of Cork, created in 1644 Lord Clifford of Lanborough, and on the 20th of March 1664, Earl of Burlington, ancestor of the present Earls of that name (w).

She likewise rebuilt a great part of the church there: and rebuilt, and repaired, the greatest part of the church at Skipton. Moreover, she totally rebuilt the churches of Bongate, and Ninekike; and the chapels of Brougham, and Mallerfang: and purchased lands of eleven pounds yearly value, for the perpetual support of a person qualified to read prayers, with the Homilies of the Church of England in this last; and to teach the children of the Dale, to write and read English (21).

1639 [A]: and his mother, Mary, daughter of Sir George Chudleigh of Ashton in the county of Devon, Bart (b). His grandfather, Thomas Clifford, Esq; a very eminent person [B], derived his pedigree from the noble family of the Cliffords Earls of Cumberland [C], by Sir Lewis Clifford Knight of the Garter, who died in the sixth of King Henry IV (c). — Thomas, who is the subject of this article, having in his youth had an education suitable to his birth and quality, was on the 25th of May 1647, admitted Gentleman-Commoner of Exeter-College in Oxford (d). In 1650, he supplicated for the degree of Bachelor of Arts; but whether he was admitted, appears not (e). However, after having made some considerable stay in the university, and well furnished himself with Academical learning, he became a Student in the Middle-Temple, London (f). Having there continued a while, he travelled into foreign parts, 'Being accounted by his contemporaries a young man of a very unsettled head, or of a roving shattered brain (g).' Notwithstanding that, we are assured by Mr Prince (h), that having an excellent genius, highly improved by education, he returned home a most accomplished gentleman. In the beginning of April 1660, he was elected one of the Burgesses for Totnes, to serve in that Parliament which began at Westminster the 25th of the same month, and restored King Charles II. And, after his Majesty's Restoration, he was chosen again Burgess for the same place, in the Parliament which began the 8th of May 1661 (i). In this Parliament he began to make a considerable figure [D]: for, being a man of great vivacity (k), of a good presence of mind and body, a sound judgment, and ready elocution, he became a frequent and celebrated Speaker in the House; at first against, but at length in behalf of, the Royal Prerogative. For which being taken notice of at Court, he was admitted into the King's favour; and soon after received the honour of Knighthood (l). He was one of those Members of the House of Commons, who formed, soon after the Restoration, the wicked project, of raising the King's authority, and increasing his revenue; which was defeated by the honest Earl of Clarendon (m). Being a person of a bold spirit, and martial temper, he attended in 1665, James Duke of York at sea, and was in that sea-fight with the Dutch, which happened on the 3d of June. After which continuing in the fleet, when it was commanded by Edward Earl of Sandwich, Vice-Admiral, he was in the expedition at Bergen in Norway; when, on the 2d of August, the English attacked the Dutch East-India fleet, which had taken refuge in that port (n). Soon after, he was sent Envoy to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, with full power to conclude new Treaties and Alliances with them (o). The next year 1666, he attended Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle at sea, in the expedition against the Dutch, and was in that great engagement which lasted the four first days of June; he was also with the same Generals, on the 25th of July following, in another fight with the Dutch (p). In consideration of which great services, he was, on the 8th of November following, made Comptroller of the King's Household, in the room of Sir Hugh Pollard, Knt. and Bart. who died the day before; and on the 5th of December ensuing was sworn one of his Majesty's Privy-Council (q). The 13th of June 1668, he was constituted Treasurer of the King's Household, upon the decease of Charles Viscount Fitz-harding; and, about the same time was made, by Patent, one of the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury (r). In 1670, he became one, of the King's Cabinet-Council, known by the name of the Cabal; who contrived, to render the King absolute; to establish Popery, and destroy the Protestant Religion; to break the Triple-Alliance; and to make war upon Holland (s): in all which they acted as the tools of France [E]. The next year, his Majesty granted him a sixty years lease of the pastures of

[A] His farther was Hugh Clifford of Ugbrook, Esq; &c.] And therefore Bishop Burnet is mistaken, when he says, That 'he was the son of a Clergyman, born to a small fortune (1).'

[B] His grandfather Thomas Clifford, Esq; a very eminent person.] He served in his youth in the Netherlands; but afterwards became a Scholar in the University of Oxford, and attended Robert Earl of Essex in his naval expedition to Cadiz, in the latter part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, by whom he was twice sent as Envoy to some of the German and Italian Princes. And having passed the age of fifty, applied himself to the study of Divinity; in which he became so great a proficient, that doing all his exercises, he took the degree of Doctor in the University of Oxford; and in that function continued, without accepting any preferment in the Church, but preached gratis all his time; to shew others the way of avoiding those rocks whereon he himself had in his youth sometimes run, as he often expressed. He died in the year 1634 (2). This gentleman's taking orders, is what probably occasioned the mistake animadverted upon in the foregoing note.

[C] Derived his pedigree from the noble family of the Cliffords Earls of Cumberland.] The founder of this ancient family was William Fitz-purc (3), who came into England with William the Conqueror. His grandson, Walter, took the surname of Clifford from the parish of Clifford in Herefordshire. Descended from him, was Lewis de Clifford, who lived in the reigns of King Richard II. and Henry IV. and was the immediate ancestor of the present Lords Cliffords. His great grandson was Thomas Clifford of Borscombe in the county of Wilts; whose great grandson Antony Clifford of Borscombe aforementioned, and King's Teignton in Devonshire, married Anne, daughter, and one of the heirs, of Sir Peter Courtenay of Ugbrook, Knt. by which means that estate came into the family of the Cliffords. Antony's eldest son, was Henry Clifford, Esq; from whom descended the Cliffords of Borscombe and King's Teignton; and by a female heir that estate is now come into the family of Bampfild. — His second son was William — and the third son, Thomas, mentioned in the last note, had the seat of Ugbrook, now enjoyed by the present Lord Clifford (4).

[D] In this Parliament he began to make a considerable figure.] When he first appeared in the House, he got one to recommend him to the Lord Clarendon's favour, but this Lord, who had many spies among the Priests, being informed of Clifford's being turned Roman Catholic, excused himself the best he could. So Clifford struck in with his enemies; and tied himself particularly to Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington (5).

[E] In all which they acted as the tools of France.] They had all of them great presents from France, besides what was openly given them; for the French of Creflow in Buckinghamshire (t). And the same year, he finished a new chapel at Ugbrook, which was consecrated, and dedicated to St Cyprian, by Anthony Bishop of Exeter (u). Upon the death of Sir John Trevor, which was on the 28th of May 1672 (w), and in the absence of Henry Earl of Arlington, Sir Thomas executed the office of Principal Secretary of State, 'till the return of the Lord Arlington from his embassy in Holland, and of Mr Henry Coventry from his embassy into Sweden (x). For his great services to King Charles II, and his brother the Duke of York, he was on the 20th of April 1672, created by Patent Baron Clifford of Chudleigh in the county of Devon, to him, and his heirs male; and, in June following, his Majesty gave him the manors of Cannington, and Rodway Fitz-payn in Somersetshire (y). Moreover, having advised King Charles to shut up the Exchequer [F], he was, for that important advice, rewarded, on the 28th of November, with the most profitable office of Lord High Treasurer of England; which had been executed by Commissioners ever since the death of Thomas Earl of Southampton (z). But being heated with the design of bringing in Popery, even to enthusiasm (a), he was guilty of some indecencies, which occasioned his losing soon that place. For, in pursuance of his and the rest of the Cabal's designs [G], King Charles having, for the service of Popery, published March 15, 1671-2, a Declaration for Indulgence, or Liberty of Conscience (b), wherein the execution of penal Laws against whatsoever sort of Nonconformists or Recufants, were suspended; the House of Commons, which began to perceive the King's designs, voted that Declaration to be against Law (c). In opposition to this vote, and two addresses to the King subsequent thereupon, the Lord Clifford resolved to maintain, in the House of Lords, the validity of that Declaration, with all the force, and all the arguments he could bring for it. He began the debate with rough words; calling the vote of the Commons a horrible monster (d), and running on in a very high strain. He said, in short, all that could be said, with great heat, and many indecent expressions (e). Tho' this speech was agreeable to the King, it raised such a flame in the Parliament [H], that the Cabal durst not pursue their projects; and the Earl of Shaftsbury deserting them, the King was prevailed upon [I] to recall and cancel his Declaration (f). Thereupon Embassador gave once each of them a picture of the King of France set in diamonds, to the value of 3000*l* (6). This conduct of theirs, in making our Court subservient to the designs of France, and for that purpose rendering even King Charles dependent upon Lewis XIV, was agreeable to the sentiments of the Lord Clifford in particular; who once said inadvertently, 'That if the King [Charles II] must be 'in a dependance, it was better to pay it to a great and 'generous King [namely Lewis], than to five hundred 'of his own insolent subjects (7).'

[F] Having advised King Charles to shut up the Exchequer. The occasion of that advice, was this: The King, under pressing necessities, promised the White Staff to any one of his Ministers, who could put him in a way to raise fifteen hundred thousand pounds, without applying to his Parliament. The next day Lord Ashley told Sir Thomas Clifford, That there was a way to do this; but it was dangerous, and might in its consequences inflame both Parliament and people. Sir Thomas, impatient to know the secret, plied the Lord Ashley with visits, and having drunk him to a proper height, led him insensibly to the subject of the King's indigence; Lord Ashley, warm and unguarded, dropt the important secret of shutting up the Exchequer. Sir Thomas took the hint, left Ashley as soon as he could, went the same night to White-hall, and attending 'till the King rose, demanded the White Staff. The King renewed his promise, if the money could be found; and then Sir Thomas disclosed the secret, and was accordingly made Lord Treasurer (8). That affair was proposed in Council January 2, 1671-2 (9).

[G] In pursuance of his, and the Cabal's designs. The Lord Clifford, a man of a daring and ambitious spirit, took the opportunity of the war with Holland the King was then engaged in, to propose the Declaration of Indulgence, that the Dissenters of all sorts, as well Protestants as Papists, might be at rest, and so vast a number of people not be made desperate at home, while the King was engaged with so potent an enemy abroad.—This Lord's notion was, That the King, if he would be firm to himself, might settle what religion he pleased, and carry the government to what height he would: for if men were assured in the liberty of their consciences, and undisturbed in their properties, able and upright Judges made in Westminster hall to judge the causes of Micum and Tuum; and if, on the other hand, the sort of Tilbury was snatched to bridle the city, the sort of Plymouth to secure the West, and arms for twenty-thousand men in each of these, and in Hull for the northern parts; with some addition (which might be easily and undiscernedly made) to the force, now on foot, there were none who had either will, opportunity, or power to resist (10).

[H] This speech raised a great flame in the Parliament. Upon a division, the Court had the majority. But against it about thirty of the most considerable of the House of Lords protested. So the Court saw, they had gained nothing in carrying a vote, that drew after it such a protestation. Thereupon, it was debated in the Cabinet, what the King should do. Lord Clifford and Duke Lauderdale were for the King's standing his ground. The Lord Clifford in particular said to the King, his people did now see thro' all his designs: and therefore he must resolve to make himself master at once, or be for ever subject to much jealousy and contempt. However, his Majesty followed the advice of the Earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington, who pressed him to give the Parliament full content. Whereupon he recalled his Declaration, as is related above (11).

[I] The King was prevailed upon, &c.] At first, he was all in a fury to be forsaken by his Chancellor, the Earl of Shaftsbury: and told Lord Clifford, how well he was pleased with his speech, and how highly he was offended with the other. But, the same afternoon in which that affair had been argued in the House of Lords, the Earls of Shaftsbury and Arlington got all those members of the House of Commons on whom they had any influence (and who had money from the King, and were his spies, but had leave to vote with the party against the Court, for procuring them the more credit) to go privately to the King, and to tell him that upon Lord Clifford's speech, the House was in such fury, that probably they would have gone to some high votes and impeachments: but the Lord Shaftsbury speaking on the other side, restrained them. So they made the King apprehend, that the Lord Chancellor's speech, with which he had been offended, was really a great service done him. And they persuaded him farther, that he might now save himself, and obtain an indemnity for his Ministers, if he would part with the Declaration. This was so dextrously managed by Lord Arlington, who got thus a great number of the members to go one after another to the King, and by concert to speak all the same language, that before night the King was quite changed, and said to his brother, that Lord Clifford had undone himself, and had spoiled their business by his mad speech; and that tho' Lord Shaftsbury had spoke like a rogue, yet that Thereupon, the Lord Clifford was disgraced [K], and resigning the White-Staff on the 19th of June 1673 (g), retired to his country-seat at Ugbrook: where, in September following, he died of the stone, being aged forty-three years, and about a month (b). He was buried in a vault under the chapel he had built, as is related above (i). This Lord's character is sufficiently evident from what is said of him in this article. But, besides that, Mr Prince informs us (k), That he was a gentleman, of a proper manly body, of a large and noble mind, of a sound head, and a stout heart. He not only had, but had the command of, most excellent parts, and knew how to employ them to his own best advantage. He had a voluble flowing tongue, a ready wit, a firm judgment, and an undaunted courage and resolution. He married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir to William Martin of Lindridge in Devonshire, Esq; by whom he had fifteen children; and was succeeded in honour and estate, by his eldest surviving son, Hugh: who departed this life October 12, 1730. And had for successor Hugh; who dying March 26, 1732, was succeeded by Hugh, the present Lord Clifford (l).

had stopt a fury which the other's indifferetion had kindled, to such a degree that he could serve him no longer. He gave him leave to let him know all this. Accordingly, the Duke told Lord Clifford what the King had said. The Lord Clifford, who was naturally a vehement man, went upon that to the King, who scarce knew how to look him in the face. Lord Clifford said, he knew how many enemies he must needs make to himself by his speech: but he hoped that in it he both served and pleased the King, and was therefore the less concerned in every thing else: but he was surprized to find by the Duke, that the King was now of another mind. The King was in some confusion: he owned that all he had said was right in itself: but he said, that he, who sat long in the House of Commons, should have considered better what they could bear, and what the necessity of his affairs required (12).

(12) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 349. 350.

[K] Thereupon the Lord Clifford was disgraced.] In his first heat he was inclined to have laid down his White Staff, and to have expostulated roundly with the King. But a cooler thought stopped him, he reckoned he must now retire: and therefore he had a mind to take some care of his family in the way of doing it: so he restrained himself, and said, he was sorry that his best-meant services were so ill understood. Soon after, he went to the Duke of Buckingham, who had contributed much to the procuring the White Staff to him; and told him, he brought him the first notice that he was to lose that place to which he had helped him, and that he would assist him to procure it to some of his friends. After they had talked round all that were in any sort capable of it, and had found great objections to every one of them, they at last pitched on Sir Thomas Osborn, created afterwards Duke of Leeds (13).

CODRINGTON (CHRISTOPHER) a brave soldier, and a man of great politeness and considerable learning, was born at Barbadoes in the year 1668. He had his first education in that island; but, as soon as he was of age to undergo the hardships of a voyage, he was sent to England; and, after some stay at a good private school at Enfield under the care of Dr Wedale, removed to Christ-Church in Oxford (a), where he was entered Gentleman Commoner, July 3, 1685 (b). Having taken there one degree in Arts, he was admitted Probationer-Fellow of All Souls-College in 1689 (c): wherein he so industriously improved, the fine opportunity he had of storing his understanding with all sorts of learning, that he became not only perfect in Logick, History, and the learned and modern languages, but also in Poetry, Physick, and Divinity. Nor was he less careful of those politer exercises and accomplishments, which might qualify him to appear in the world, and at the nicest Courts, with reputation and advantage: insomuch, that he soon acquired the deserved character of an accomplished well-bred Gentleman, and universal Scholar. Thus qualified, he betook himself to the army, but without quitting his Fellowship; and his merit and courage soon recommended him to his Prince's favour (d). For he was made Captain in the first regiment of foot-guards (e): and seems to have been instrumental in driving the French out of the island of St Christopher's, which they had seized at the breaking out of the war between France and England (f). But it is more certain that he was at the Siege of Namur in 1695 (g). Upon the conclusion of the peace of Rerwick, he was made Captain-General, and Governor in Chief, of the Leeward Caribbee islands (h): in which station he had not the happiness of pleasing all, or escaping censure; a thing indeed very difficult, or rather next to impossible! For, in 1701, several articles were exhibited against him to the House of Commons in England [A];

[A] Several Articles were exhibited against him to the House of Commons in England.] They were XV in number, and tended to charge him with violence, and arbitrary proceedings. As for instance, That having, by the King's Commission and Instructions, power and authority with the Council of the respective Islands under his government, to hear and determine appeals brought before him and them, from the Courts of the said islands; and by the nature of such power and authority ought not to sit and preside in the Courts where such suits are depending; yet he, contrary to the nature of his said Commission and Instructions and the duty of his place, had sat on the Bench with the Chief Justice and other the Judges in the said Courts, and interested himself in private causes, wherein matters of freehold and titles of land were in controversy, arguing both with the Bench and the Bar in favour of one of the parties. That after an Appeal had been prayed and granted by the said Courts, which is in its nature a Superfedeas to the execution until such appeal heard; yet, by his order, immediate execution had been granted: and he had treated petitions about appeals as libels; and declared he would not hear them. That letters Patents and other deeds, relating to some persons titles, having been enrolled in the Secretaries Office of the island where the lands lie, according to law and usual custom; he had in passion torn the said Patents, deeds, and writings, out of the said register; and had thereupon encouraged persons pretending a title to those lands, forcibly to take possession of them. Moreover, that he had forcibly and arbitrarily seized a plantation, without any legal trial, but only upon a pretended conviction by the view of the Justices. That he had issued out his warrants under his hand, commanding and requiring persons under his government, to appear at their peril before him to answer matters to which was published a distinct and particular answer. And at the end are subjoined two attestations from the Lieutenant-Governor, Members of the Council, and the Representatives, of Nevis [B], very much in his favour. In the year 1703, he was at the attack upon Guadalupe, belonging to the French (i); in which he showed great bravery, tho' that enterprize happened to be unsuccessful. Some time after, he resigned his government of the Leeward islands, and lived in a studious and retired condition (k). He died, at his seat in Barbadoes, on Good-Friday, April 7, 1710; and was buried the day following, in the parish church of St Michael in that island; but his body was afterwards brought over to England, and interred, on the 19th of June 1716, in the chapel of All Souls-College in Oxford, where two Latin Orations to his memory were spoken by two Fellows of that college; the one by Digby Cotes, M. A. the University-Orator, at his interment; the other the next day by Edward Young, L. L. B. at the laying of the foundation-stone of his library (l). Over his grave a black marble stone was, soon after, laid, whereon there is no other inscription but, CODRINGTON (m). By his last Will, he bequeathed his two plantations in Barbadoes, and part of the island of Barbuda, to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts [C]: and also left a very handsome matters of freehold and titles of land. That when he was petitioned for remedy against some irregular and unlawful acts and orders made by former Governors in chief of the said islands; he had refused to grant any redress therein, declaring he would justify all they had done. That when he suspected such order would not be made, or rule given, by the Judges, as he desired, he had risen from the Bench, and in a publick manner declared, that he was sorry he had given them their commissions. That when exceptions were taken at the commission granted by him to the Judges of the Court of Nisi Prius, he had openly declared, he would justify it; and had ordered, that no copy should be given of the same. That he did usually in his discourses abuse and vilify his Majesty's officers in the said islands in the most gross and abusive language imaginable, slighting their authority and magnifying his own, daily affronting and discouraging them in the execution of their several offices, &c. That after seizure of ships, as trading to the Charibbee islands contrary to the Act of Navigation, and the acquittal of them by the Court of Admiralty; he had caused an appeal from that sentence to be brought before himself alone, and had reversed the said sentence of acquittal; out of a covetous desire to get one third part of the full value of the seized ship, which by the said Act is given to the Chief Governor of the said islands. That whereas by his instructions he was required to transmit authentick copies, under the publick seal, of all laws and ordinances, made within the respective islands under his government, to his Majesty and the Commissioners of Trade and foreign Plantations, within three months, or sooner, after their being enacted; yet he had omitted or refused to transmit several Acts made by himself and the Assembly of the island of St Christopher's, and notwithstanding such omission, had put the said laws, &c. in full execution there, even to the raising of money. — These Articles were printed at London in 1702, 4to. with a distinct answer to each Article; (too long to be inserted here) which answer concludes in these words. 'The gentleman who is accused of so many and high misdemeanors, had in Europe a very fair and honourable character; and if the general testimony of Councils and Assemblies, and also of particular persons who come or write from the Leeward islands, a few who are disobliged excepted, may be relied on, he has increased it there; and by a speedy and impartial distribution of Justice, has gained an universal esteem: and were therefore the accusations against him better supported than by the evidence of a person so highly prejudiced [Mr Mead] who is one of the petitioners, and concerned in point of interest in most of the matters complained of, it will be still just and reasonable that he should first be allowed an opportunity of making his own defence, before any kind of censure pass to the prejudice either of his interest or reputation; for it is very easy to dress up a specious complaint against any man at a distance, which his friends who are strangers to the matter may be intirely unable to give answer to; and it is certain that in the present case, had it not been for some very accidental notice and information in some of the matters complained of, this accusation would have appeared much more to the disadvantage of Col. Codrington than it is prefumed it now will, even in the light it is at present set, without the least information or instruction from him.'

[B] And at the end are subjoined two Attestations, &c.] The first, which is from the Lieutenant-Governor, and Members of the King's Council, of Nevis, runs thus. 'Whereas his Majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint Christopher Codrington, Esq; Captain-General and Commander in Chief over all his Majesty's Leeward islands, to the great satisfaction of us his Majesty's subjects of this island, and that the said Captain-General hath justly merited the thanks of this island, and character of a good Governor, We the Lieutenant-Governor, and Members of his Majesty's Council of this island, do hereby testify and declare, that his said Excellency our Captain-General and Chief Governor hath ever since his happy arrival to this government, and particularly to this island, constantly employed himself for the publick good thereof, without regard to any private interest, that he hath caused good laws to be made, and the laws in general to be put in execution without favour or affection, hatred or malice to any, and that he has in reference to the preservation of these islands, in case of a war, used all means for their being put in a due posture of defence, and for the more effectual performance of which in true zeal for his Majesty's service, he hath been himself present at each island; wherefore his great Vertues, Honour, and Reputation, being highly advantageous to this government which is divided into several islands, and therefore has need in war of a most sure conduct, we humbly hope and request that no frivolous nor scandalous complaints may be heard against him, he having deserved no such treatment since his being with us. Dated in the Council-Chamber, in Charles Town, the 9th day of July 1701.'

The other attestation, or certificate, is from the Representatives of Nevis; wherein they certified, That his Excellency Christopher Codrington, Esq; their Captain-General and Chief Governor, had all along since his arrival and being in his government, acted and behaved himself with great zeal and vigour for his Majesty's service, and for the real good of that island, by passing all such wholesome and convenient laws as the Lieutenant-Governor, Council, and Assembly had thought fit to prepare and offer, by administering true justice and right judgment, impartially without favour or affection, profit or gain, to all both rich and poor; so that he had most justly acquired a laudable and honourable reputation, and might without the least flattery be stiled a good and careful General, an honest and prudent Governor, a true and upright Judge to them, &c.

[C] By his last Will, he bequeathed his two plantations in Barbadoes, and part of the island of Barbuda, to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts.] And desired, That the plantations should continue entire; and three hundred Negroes at least be always kept thereon. The uses he chiefly appropriated this great benefaction to, was, for building a college in Barbadoes; in which he appointed, that a convenient number of Professors and Scholars should be maintained: who are to be obliged to study and practise Physick and Chirurgery, as well as Divinity.

legacy to All Souls-College, of which he had been Fellow [D]. He might be author of several things, but there is nothing, as far as we can find, published under his name, except verses to Sir Samuel Garth, in praise of his excellent Poem the Dispensary [E]. We shall give his character in the note [F].

That by the apparent usefulness of the former (as the Will ran) they might endeavor themselves to the people, and have the better opportunities of doing good to men's souls, while they are taking care of their bodies (1). This gift is valued at two thousand pounds a year, clear of all charges (2).

[D] And also left a very handsome legacy to All Souls-College, of which he had been Fellow. Namely, the sum of ten thousand pounds: as appears from the following clause of his Will. — 'Imprimis, I give my nearest kinsman, Lieutenant-Colonel William Codrington, all my estate in and about Doddington, provided, and upon condition, that he pay to All Souls-College in Oxford ten thousand pounds sterling, in manner following; viz. two thousand pounds within one year after my decease, and the sum of two thousand pounds yearly afterwards, until the sum of ten thousand pounds be paid. I do appoint that six thousand pounds thereof be expended in the building of the library for the use of the said College; and that the remaining four thousand pounds be laid out in books to furnish the same. Item, I give and bequeath unto the said College, my library now in the custody of Mr John Caswell in Oxford.' This library, we are informed (3), was valued at six thousand pounds. — With the said six thousand pounds there is built a magnificent library, in length, within the walls, two hundred feet; in breadth, thirty-two-feet and a half; and in height, forty feet.

[E] There is nothing, as far as we can find, published under his name, except verses to Sir Samuel Garth, in praise of his excellent Poem the Dispensary. They are intitled, 'To my friend the author, desiring my opinion of his Poem.' And begin thus,

Ask me not, friend, what I approve or blame,
Perhaps I know not why I like, or damn;
I can be pleas'd; and I dare own I am.

I read Thee over with a lover's eye,
Thou hast no faults, or I no faults can spy;
Thou art all beauty, or all blindness I, &c.

We have observed, since the above was written, that he had a hand in Auctio Davisiana, &c. printed in the Musæ Anglicanæ, edit. Lond. 1741, 8vo. page 173, &c.

[F] We shall give his character, &c. Being as follows: 'Nature had blessed him with vast capacious parts, exceedingly above the common level of mankind. He had a great soul, of a fiery genius, happily united to a body of a subtle and flexible composition, in which the blood and animal spirits moved with vigor and rapidity, and rendered it rather a spur, than an hindrance to the operations of his mind. He had a quick and piercing apprehension, a strong, solid, distinguishing judgment, a retentive memory, a warm imagination, a fruitful sagacious invention, a bold pregnant wit, a sublime way of thinking, a methodical persuasive way of reasoning; and a voluble distinct utterance, upon the most unexpected occasions. After having resigned his government, he led a very private retired life, and spent most of his time in contemplation and study. For a few years before his death, he chiefly applied himself to Church-History and Metaphysics. If he excelled in any thing, it was in Metaphysical learning, of which he was, perhaps, the greatest master in the world. He was a great admirer of the Fathers, particularly of St Basil, whom he seems not a little to have resembled, in the universality of his genius, the warmth and activity of his temper, and affection for a monastick life; but chiefly in his eloquent sublime way of speaking and writing. He was particularly careful to form his stile upon the great models of Antiquity, some of whom he equalled, and most of them excelled. His stile was plain and easy, yet powerful and lofty; fluent but not turgid; florid, yet natural and unaffected; elegant, but not overwrought or forced. In his studied and elaborate compositions, there was an inimitable beauty and efficacy, whereby he would, at once, charm the affections, move the passions, and convince the understanding, with such surprizing turns, impetuous force, and solid reasons, that, as was said of his forementioned pattern, he spoke nothing but life, and breathed a soul in the dullest argument he treated of; and yet his care of his stile, did not at all cramp the exactness, or interrupt the chain of his most refined and abstracted enquiries; for every thought was placed in the most advantageous light, as well as dressed in the gayest manner; and every period was just, and had a natural cadence: in the same discourse, he would display the Orator and the Philosopher, to so great perfection, that it was hard to determine in which he most excelled, so much did he excel in both. In a word, he had, in his West-India retirement, made so wonderful a progress in his studies, that had he lived to have returned to his beloved University, he would have been as much the object of their admiration, as he deserved to be the object of their delight. He was so great a lover of learning, and learned men, that wherever he met with an ingenious person, he courted his acquaintance, and readily received him into his friendship (4).

COKE, or COOKE (JOHN) Secretary of State in King Charles the 1st's reign, was a younger brother of Sir Francis Cooke, and born at Trusley in Derbyshire, of an ancient family there, allied to the best in that county (a). He was probably educated at Westminster-school; and on the 22d of April 1580, admitted Scholar of Trinity-college in Cambridge. After having taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts, he was chosen Fellow of the same college, about the 4th of April 1584 (b). He continued long in the university (c); and being taken notice of for his learning, was chosen publick Professor of Rhetorick: in which employment he so distinguished himself by his ingenious and critical Lectures, that Rhetorick seemed not to be so much an art to him, as his nature. Then he travelled beyond the seas for some time, in the company of a person of quality, and returned rich in languages, remarks, and experience: having avoided all the dangers incident to him on account of his religion, by this prudent declaration, That he came to learn and not to search (d). Afterwards he retired into the country in the condition of a private gentleman, 'till after he was fifty years of age; when, upon some reputation he had for industry and diligence, he was called to some painful employment in the office of the Navy, which he discharged well, and was made Secretary thereof. Afterwards, partly through his own merit, and partly through the interest of Fulk Grevile, Lord Brook, to whom he was related, he was made Master of the Requests; and at last Secretary of State, about the year 1620, in the room of Sir Albert Moreton, deceased. He was also knighted (e). In the first and third Parliaments of King Charles I, he was one of the representatives for the university of Cambridge (f): and made several speeches in Parliament

Parliament [A]. He governed himself in the management of his places by the following rules; That no man should let what is unjustifiable or dangerous appear under his hand, to give envy a steady aim at his place or person; Nor mingle interests with great men made desperate by debts or Court-injuries, whose falls have been ruinous to their wisest followers; Nor pry any farther into secrecy, than rather to secure than shew himself; Nor impart that to a friend which may impower him to be an enemy (g). He likewise kept himself strictly to the law of the land [B]. But, notwithstanding his great caution, on the eighth of November 1641, a Messenger of the House of Commons was sent to fetch him up out of Derbyshire, to answer some complaints made against him, about some commitments in the year 1628 (b). He is also accused, though unjustly, of having put into the King's hands a paper from the Scots, instead of the genuine Articles of Pacification at York: and to have so far complied with the change of the times, as to have brought propositions from the Parliament to the King, as actively, as formerly he had carried messages from the King to the Parliament (i). However, after having continued Secretary of State about twenty years (k), he was removed to make room for Sir Henry Vane (l): and died the 8th of September 1644 (m). With regard to his character: we are informed that he was a grave and prudent man, in gate, apparel, and speech; one that had his intellectuals very perfect in the dispatch of business 'till he was eighty years old (n). He is also said to have been a very zealous Protestant, and to have done all good offices for the advancement of true religion (o). But the Lord Clarendon, who seems to have had a prejudice against him, gives him a more unfavourable character. He was, says he (p), a man rather unadorned with any parts of vigour and quickness, and unendowed with any notable virtues, than notorious for any weakness or defect of understanding, or transported with any vicious inclinations; appetite to money only excepted. His cardinal perfection was industry, and his most eminent infirmity covetousness. His long experience had informed him well of the state and affairs in England; but of foreign transactions, or the common interest of Christian Princes, he was entirely undiscerning, and ignorant. But, another, to soften his character, says (q), He had an happy mixture of discretion and charity, whereby he could allow to things and persons more than men of freighter apprehensions, or narrower affections were able to do. He had a brother named

GEORGE, educated at Pembroke-hall in Cambridge; who was Rector of Bigrave in Hertfordshire, and afterwards successively Bishop of Bristol, and Hereford (r): A meek, grave, and quiet man, much beloved of those who were subjected to his jurisdiction. He was involved in the same condemnation with the rest of his brethren the Bishops, for subscribing the Protest in Parliament in preservation of their privileges (s). He died in low circumstances (t) on the 10th of December 1646; and was buried in Hereford Cathedral, where there is a long, obscure, and almost unintelligible epitaph, to his memory (u).

[A] And made several Speeches in Parliament.] Several of his Speeches, and Messages from the King to the Parliament, are printed in Ephemeris Parliamentaria; or 'Faithful Register of the Transactions in Parliament, in the third and fourth years of King Charles I (1). In his first Speech, speaking of the Papists, he hath these words. — 'They have a Bishop consecrated by the Pope; this Bishop hath his Subalternate Officers of all kinds, as Vicars-General, Archdeacons, Rural Deans, Apparitors, and such like. Neither are those nominal or titular offices alone, but they all execute their jurisdictions, and make their ordinary visitations through the kingdom, keep Courts, and determine ecclesiastical causes — Neither are the Seculars alone grown to this height, but the Regulars are more active and dangerous, and have taken deep root; they have already planted their Societies and Colleges of both sexes, they have settled revenues, houses, libraries, vestments, and all other necessary provisions to travel or stay at home; nay, even at this time, they intend to hold a concurrent assembly with this Parliament, — &c.' [B] He likewise kept himself strictly to the law of the land.] Infomuch, that being sent to command Bishop Williams from Westminster; and being asked by the stout Bishop, by what authority he commanded a man out of his house and his freehold, he was so tender of the point, that he never rested 'till he had his pardon for it (z).

COKE (Sir EDWARD) Lord Chief Justice of England, and one of the most eminent Lawyers this kingdom has produced. His father was Robert Coke, Esq; of Mileham in the county of Norfolk, himself a learned professor of the Law, a Barrister of great practice, and a Bencher of Lincoln's-Inn (a); his mother's name was Winifred, daughter and coheirefs of William Knightley, of Morgrave-Knightley in the county of Norfolk (b); so that in point of descent, he might be justly esteemed of a good family, in a county, where there are as many good families, as in any other in the kingdom [A]. He was born at his

[A] Where there are as many good families, as in any other in the kingdom.] It appears from a pedigree of this family drawn by the learned Camden, that William Coke was seated at Doddington in the county of Norfolk, in the 8th of King John, that is, in the year 1206 (1); from whom descended lineally, Sir Thomas Coke, Knt. who flourished in the reign of King Edward III, and his eldest son Sir Thomas Coke the younger, Knight, who for his wisdom was made Seneschal of Gascoigne (2), and for his valour a Knight Banneret, but he died before his father. Robert Coke, the grandson of Sir Thomas Coke the elder, married a lady of a considerable fortune, and by her had issue John, who was the father of Thomas Coke, who by his intermarriage with Alice, daughter of William Falcord Lord of Sparham and Stivekey-Hall (3), those estates, or at least the greatest part of them, came to their son Robert Coke, who married Anne, daughter of Thomas Woodhouse, Esq; by whom he had two sons and two daughters; and his eldest son Robert Coke, was the father of Sir Edward, of whom we are speaking; who by the Lady mentioned in the text, had this only son and seven daughters, who all lived to be married (4). As for this Robert Coke, Esq;

his father's seat at Mileham in the year 1550, and had all the care taken of him in his infancy that could be bestowed by a tender mother, for whose memory he had always the highest veneration. At the age of ten he was sent to the free-school at Norwich, then esteemed one of the best in England, where, under the care of Mr Walter Hawe (c), and by his own singular diligence and application, he made a very great proficiency. His next remove was to Trinity-college in Cambridge, where, if a certain author might be relied on, he had Dr George Whitgift for his Tutor (d), but that seems to be improbable, for Dr Whitgift was Fellow of Peter-House (e), and became Master of Trinity-college about the time that Mr Coke became a member of the university (f), which is sufficient to justify the fact for which he is mentioned as his Tutor, and of which we shall hereafter take notice. He remained in the university about four years, and was then removed to Clifford's-Inn, the year after which he was entered a Student of the Inner-Temple. He had not been long there before he gave a very extraordinary proof of the quickness of his penetration and the solidity of his judgment; this was with regard to the Cook's case of the Temple, which had puzzled the whole House, and which he stated so exactly that it was taken notice of and admired by the Bench (g). It is not at all improbable that this might promote his being early called to the Bar, as he was at six years standing, which, in those strict times, was held very extraordinary (b). We are told by himself, that the first cause in which he appeared in the Court of Queen's Bench was in Trinity term 1578, and it was a very remarkable one (i) [B]. About this time he was appointed Reader of Lyon's-Inn, and so continued for three years, during which space his Lectures were much resorted to, his reputation increased, and with it his practice, so that when he had been at the bar a few years, he thought himself in a condition to form pretences to a Lady of one of the best families, and at the same time of the best fortune in the county of Norfolk (k). This Lady's name was Bridget, daughter and co-heiress of John Paston, Esq; whom he soon married, and with whom he had first and last thirty thousand pound (l) [C]. After this marriage, by which he became allied to some of the noblest he died November 15, 1657, at his chambers in Lincoln's-Inn, while his son was at Norwich-School; who in honour of his memory, caused a fair monument to be erected many years after in the parish church of St. Andrew's Holborn, with an inscription, from which most of these particulars are taken.

[B] In Trinity Term 1578, and it was a very remarkable one.] Mr Edward Denny was Vicar of Northlinham in the County of Norfolk, and the then Lord Cromwell, who lived near him, procured two persons to preach several sermons in his church, in which they inveighed against the book of Common Prayer, styling it superstitious and impious. For this reason, when one of them came next to preach, the Vicar knowing he had no licence would have hindered him; but being supported by Lord Cromwell, he proceeded and did preach. Upon this occasion some warm words passed between Lord Cromwell and the Vicar; the former saying, Thou art a false varlet, and I like not of thee; to which the latter replied, It is no marvel though you like not of me, for you like of these, meaning the preachers, that maintain sedition against the Queen's proceedings. Upon this Lord Cromwell brought his action, upon the statute de scandalis magnatum. The defendant justified, upon which the plaintiff demurred, and the bar was held insufficient; but upon a motion in arrest of judgment that the declaration was insufficient, the Court gave judgment for the defendant. Upon this Lord Cromwell brought another action, and amended his declaration, and then the Court was moved that the words were not actionable, because they might be taken in a milder sense; but the Court delivered no opinion, but said to the defendant's council, be well advised, and plead or demur at your pleasure; whereupon they pleaded a special justification, and set it forth in the manner before recited; to which the plaintiff's council took exception, for two reasons; First, That the matter of justification was insufficient, because sedition cannot be committed by words, but by publick and violent actions: Secondly, If the matter of justification was sufficient, then the defendant was not guilty, and ought so to plead. The Court however held, that the justification was good, and that the defendant should not be driven to the general issue. Afterwards the matter in dispute was compromised between the parties. Our author's observations upon this, will shew the excellence of his method in reporting, which acquired him so high a reputation in his own time, and which has been deservedly admired and applauded ever since (5). In this case, reader, you may observe an excellent point of learning in actions for slander, to observe the occasion and cause of speaking of them, and how it may be pleaded in the defendant's excuse. 2. When the matter of fact will clearly serve for your client, although your opinion is, that the plaintiff has no cause of action, yet take heed you do not hazard the matter upon a demurrer; in which upon the pleading and otherwife, more perhaps will arise than you thought of; but first take advantage of the matters of fact, and leave matters in law, which always arise upon the matters in fact ad ultimum, and never at first demur in law; when after trial of the matters in fact, the matters in law (as in this case it was) will be saved to you.

[C] With whom he had first and last thirty thousand pounds.] The Paston's of Paston in Norfolk, were a very ancient and honourable family, greatly distinguished by their services rendered to the Crown in almost all capacities; William Paston was Sergeant at Law in the reign of Henry IV, a Judge and in high favour with King Henry VI; he left a vast estate to John Paston, Esq; his eldest son, and no small one to William his second son, who married Anne, daughter to William Duke of Somerset (6); of the same line was Sir Clement Paston, who it is said King Henry VIII called his champion, the Duke of Somerset his soldier, Queen Mary her seaman, and Queen Elizabeth her father (7). As for the father of this Lady, he was the third son of Sir William Paston of Paston, but was himself settled at Huntingfield-Hall in Suffolk (8). His sister Eleanor married Thomas Earl of Rutland, by whom she had Henry Earl of Rutland, Gertrude Countess of Shrewsbury, Anne Countess of Westmoreland, and Frances Lady Abergavenny; to all which noble families Mr Coke became allied, by this marriage (9). If therefore we consider that he had a very large fortune left him by his father, that he had one way or other thirty thousand pounds with this Lady, and that from his first coming to the bar he was in great business, to which we may add, that purchases were then made at very moderate rates, we need not at all wonder, that in a very few years he acquired a very large landed estate, more especially as he was always frugal and a great economist, keeping very exact accounts both of the income of his estates, and of what he acquired by his profession, as appears from several large books, mostly in his own handwriting, that are still carefully preserved, as authentick monuments of his wonderful accuracy and industry (10); qualities, by which he was distinguished in an age, when they were much more common than they are now. It does not very clearly appear, either when he married this Lady, or when she died, but from several concurring noblest houses in the kingdom, he began to rise faster by much than was usual in those times, for the cities of Coventry and Norwich (m) chose him their Recorder, he was in all the great causes of Westminster-Hall, was in high credit with the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh (n), and was frequently consulted in the Queen's affairs. His large estate, and his great credit in his country as well as at Court, recommended him to the freeholders of his county, by whom he was chosen Knight of the shire, and in the Parliament held in the thirty-fifth of Elizabeth he was chosen Speaker (o), being at that time the Queen's Solicitor, which was bestowed upon him in 1592 (p), and very soon after he was advanced to the post of Attorney-General. Some time after this he lost his wife, by whom he had ten children, which gave him an opportunity of making his addresses to another Lady of great fortune and quality, viz. the Lady Hatton, relict of Sir William Hatton, and sister to Thomas Lord Burleigh afterwards Earl of Exeter, which marriage, as it was afterwards the source of many inconveniences and troubles to both parties, so the very celebration of it occasioned no small noise and disquiet, by a very unlucky accident that attended it. There had been the same year, which was 1598, so much notice taken of irregular marriages, that Archbishop Whitgift had signified to the Bishops of his province, that he expected they should be very diligent in causing all such persons to be prosecuted as were guilty of any irregularity in the celebration of marriage, in point of time, form, or place (q). But whether it was that Mr Coke looked upon his own and the Lady's quality, and their being married with the consent of the family, as setting them above such restrictions, or whether he did not advert to them, certain it is, that they were married in a private house without either banns or license, upon which Mr Coke and his new married Lady, Mr Henry Bothwel, Rector of Okeover in the county of Rutland, Thomas Lord Burleigh, and several other persons, were prosecuted in the Archbishop's court, but upon their submission by their proxies, were absolved from the greater excommunications and the consequent penalties which they had incurred, by over-looking the authority of the Church, because, says the record, they had offended, not out of contumacy, but through ignorance of the law in that point (r). It cannot be conceived that there was any thing either of extraordinary severity, or of personal prejudice, in the Archbishop, but rather the contrary, for upon Mr Coke's being made the Queen's Attorney-General, we are told that he sent him a fair Greek Testament with this message, That he had studied the Common Law long enough, and that he should thereafter study the Law of God (s); neither was it likely that Mr Coke meant any contempt of the Church, since it clearly appears, that he was upon all occasions a very fast friend both to it and to the Clergy, as is more especially evident from an extraordinary testimony given him in that respect, by the Chapter of the cathedral church of Norwich, to whom he had been very useful in his profession, and had saved part of their lands from being torn from them by foul practices, and under colour of concealments (t) [D]. His favour to the Clergy was also very discernible, in the freedom with concurring circumstances it seems pretty evident, that his first marriage was contracted about seven years after he was first called to the bar.

[D] Under colour of concealments] The services rendered by this worthy person to the church of Norwich, were of different sorts, upon very different motives, and done at many different times. What we aim at in this note, is to give the reader a general, and at the same time a clear notion, of the nature of these services, because they give a strong light into the temper and disposition of this Gentleman, with regard to the church and churchmen in general, and of the Clergy of his own county of Norfolk in particular. He was very instrumental in procuring an act to pass in the 35th of Elizabeth (11), when he was Speaker of the House of Commons, of the nature and effects of which, more will be said hereafter. This was with regard to the Church in general. Some years afterwards a set of people procured, in consequence of letters patents of concealment, bearing date August 2, in the 27th of Queen Elizabeth, several estates to be taken from them by leases, and one particularly with the privy of Dr William Redmayne, then Bishop of Norwich; but Mr Attorney Coke foreseeing what this might produce, interposed so far as to prevail upon the Bishop to agree to the bringing in of a bill for establishing the Bishoprick and the revenues, which by his interest was passed into a law; which set the Cathedral of Norwich out of the reach of these devourers of churches, as this Gentleman very justly calls them (12). This did not hinder the same sort of folks from endeavouring, under the very same title, to seize the estate of the Deanery and Chapter of Norwich; but here again Mr Attorney Coke interposed, and with spirit and learning defended the Chapter, and preserved their estates, as the reader may see at large in his own excellent work (13). At the close of this report, he shews the great importance of the act mentioned at the beginning of this note, and the great security derived from thence to the Protestant Clergy.

Note reader, The great assurance and establishment, which is made by the good and strong act of Parliament, of the said most illustrious and most noble Queen Elizabeth, in the said thirty-fifth year of her reign, not only of all foundations of cathedral churches and colleges, in any manner founded or translated, or mentioned to be founded or translated by King Henry VIII, but also to all subjects who have any estate or interest, in any of the possessions of any Abbot, Prior, or any other such religious persons, notwithstanding they made not any surrender to King Henry VIII, or that their surrender was insufficient, or that the record thereof be now imbezelled or lost; and notwithstanding divers other such like defects, all which are remedied by the said most excellent act of Parliament, the fatal plea to all concealments as to these possessions. And although these resolutions properly concern the meridian of the cathedral church of Norwich, yet they will very well serve as well for many other cathedral churches, as for divers colleges in the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford.

The Dean and Chapter therefore might well grant under their common seal, an authentick testimony of the obligations they were under to so kind a friend, so learned an advocate, and so powerful a protector. This testimonial was conceived in the following terms (14).

Edwardus Coke, Armiger, sapius & in multis difficilimis negotiis ecclesie nostrae auxiliatus est, & nuper eandem contra templorum helleones, qui dominia maneria & hereditamenta nostra devorare, sub titulo obscuro (concelatum dicunt) sponte sua nobis inscius & sine mercede ullâ legitime tutatus est, atque eandem suam nostram defensionem in perpetuam tantae rei memoriam, quam posterorum (si opus fuerit) magna cum industria & scriptis redegit & sub sigil. nostrae ecclesiae donavit.

which he bestowed the many benefices that were in his own gift, and from his memorable saying on that head, as indeed many of his sayings were memorable on very different subjects, but in regard to this it was his constant maxim, That he would have Church livings pass by livery and seisin, not bargain and sale (u). As there was no reign in which great Lawyers were more considered than in that of Queen Elizabeth, which perhaps may be one reason why in few reigns there have been so many considerable Lawyers as in her's, so, amongst them, none towards the latter end of her government, was either more distinguished in his profession, or had greater respect paid him, than Mr Coke, whom the Ministers consulted in all points of difficulty, and who never failed to furnish them with legal colours for all their proceedings, which, though many of them were very extraordinary, yet being so guarded, were beheld by the people as just and honourable. But the affair of greatest moment, in which, as Attorney-General, he had a share in this reign, was the prosecution of that popular Nobleman Robert Earl of Essex, who, together with Henry Earl of Southampton, was brought to the bar before the Lords commissioned for his trial in Westminster-hall, Feb. 19, 1600 (w), the Earl of Buckhurst sitting as Lord High Steward. The charge against the Lords was opened by Serjeant Yelverton, in which, though he compared the Earl of Essex to Cataline, and expressed his wonder that the Lords did not blush to put themselves upon a trial, instead of confessing their guilt, which he said was in all mens judgment palpable, yet it does not appear that either of the prisoners were troubled at his discourse. But when Mr Attorney Coke laid open the nature of the treason, the many obligations the Earl of Essex was under to the Queen, and hinted at last, That by the just judgment of God, he of his earldom should be Robert the last, that of a kingdom thought to be Robert the First (x), Essex lost all patience, and on several other occasions in his trial, endeavoured to represent Mr Attorney as having a special hand in all the proceedings to his prejudice, and as if he was deep in the interests of Cobham, Cecil, and Raleigh, whom he alledged were his capital enemies, and insinuated that they, and particularly Sir Robert Cecil, were in the Spanish interest, and that the latter had gone so far as to declare, that none but the Infanta had a right to the crown of England. It does not however appear, that Mr Attorney Coke had any particular prejudice to that unfortunate Lord, but that, as his manner always was, he kept close to the point, and instead of running out, as others did, into parallels from the Greek and Roman Histories, he stuck to the facts, and shewed wherein the treasons consisted with which the Earls were charged (y) [E]. There is no doubt that in the latter part of that Queen's reign, Mr Attorney was upon the best terms possible with Sir Robert Cecil and the rest of her Ministers, and there is good reason to believe, that the Proclamation of King James, and other papers of State at that time, were drawn by him (z). Yet he was not so hasty as many much inferior to him in degree, in procuring admission to the King's person, but upon the twenty-second of May 1603, when the King feasted the principal persons of the kingdom, on account of his quiet accession, at Greenwich, he, together with Robert Lee, then Lord Mayor of London, and John Crooke, Esq; the Recorder, received the honour of knighthood (a). In the beginning of July following, that which was called Sir Walter Raleigh's plot was discovered, but though all who were concerned in it were immediately seized and sent to several prisons, yet they were not brought to their trial till the beginning of the month of November following, at Winchester, to which city the term was adjourned on account of the plague being at London (b). There, upon the seventeenth of November, Sir Walter Raleigh was tried before Commissioners appointed for that purpose,

[E] With which the Earls were charged. We have a large account of the whole of this transaction in Camden, as well as in the printed trial by authority; and in the former, I think there are some things more clearly explained than in the latter; we are there told, 'That Southampton made a short and modest defence, and asked pardon for his crime, which was purely owing to his affection for the Earl of Essex; and after a declaration of his steadfast loyalty to the Queen, he answered, That some proposals of that kind were made indeed, but nothing resolved upon, the whole being referred to Essex. That what was acted, was a thing quite different from the matter of debate, viz. Their going into the city, which was with no other design than to facilitate Essex's access to the Queen, there to make a personal complaint of the wrongs that were done him: That his sword had not been drawn all that day. That he heard nothing of the proclamation, wherein they were declared rebels: That he hindered as much as in him lay, the firing of any shot from Essex's house. He then desired that the cause might be decided by rules of equity, not the niceties and quirks of the law. This the Queen's Attorney called a colourable evasion, and demanded, Whether it were not treason to seize upon the Court-Gate, the Court, the Privy Chambers, &c. hereby to get the Queen into their hands? Southampton calmly asked him, What he thought in his con- science they designed to do with the Queen? The same, replied he, that Henry of Lancaster did with Richard II. He went to the King and fell on his knees, pretending nothing but the removal of his evil counsellors: but when he had once got the King in his clutches, he robbed him of his crown and life (15). This seems to be a severer passage, and to have gone deeper in shewing the Earl's treason, than any in the trial; and yet there are many sharp things there too, inasmuch that the Earl of Essex all along complains of being talked out of his life by Orators: and as for the Earl of Southampton (16), he went farther, making use of these words at the end of his defence, Mr Attorney, you have urged the matter very far, and you wrong me therein. My blood be upon your head. Yet it is evident enough that Mr Attorney Coke did not stretch the nature of that treason at all, nor does he seem to have changed his opinion some years afterwards, as appears by what he said to Sir Walter Raleigh upon this subject at his trial; Essex, said he, died the child of God, God honoured him at his death; thou wast by when he died: Et lupus & vulpes instant morientibus urse. He died indeed for his offence (17). The King himself spake these words, He that shall say Essex died not for treason, is punishable. So that Coke not only kept his own notions, but prevailed on King James to change his, for we are told, he once considered Essex as his martyr.

pose, amongst whom were Sir John Popham Chief Justice of England, and Sir Edmund Anderson, Chief Justice of the common Pleas. The trial lasted from morning 'till six in the evening (c); there was no evidence offered against the prisoner, but several examinations of the Lord Cobham, and extracts of other examinations; for the Chief Justice told the prisoner, that the Statutes requiring two witnesses were repealed, and that if there were proofs, either under hand, or by testimony of witnesses, or by oaths, it was sufficient, even if the examinations were not signed by those from whom they were taken, if it did otherwise appear by evidence that they were taken (d). Sir Edward Coke managed this trial entirely with much eagerness against the prisoner, and with great indecency towards the Court, for upon Lord Cecil's interposing and desiring him to be patient, or, as it is elsewhere said with some shew of probability, upon that Lord's asking him, Whether he came thither to direct them (e)? he sat down in his chair and would not speak again, until all the Commissioners joined their entreaties, upon which he rose up, and recapitulating the circumstances relating to the charge, Sir Walter was found guilty. This behaviour of Sir Edward Coke has been generally and justly censured, as carrying in it such marks of heat, resentment, and an over-bearing spirit, as much lessened him in the world's opinion (f) [F]. Whatever credit this great man might lose by his intemperate behaviour upon this occasion, yet he soon recovered it again by the sagacity and vigilance he shewed in unravelling all the dark scenes of the Powder Treason, and by his admirable management of the evidence against Sir Everard Digby, and the rest of the conspirators tried at Westminster June 27, 1605 (g), and at the trial of Henry Garnet at Guild-Hall, the twenty-eighth of March following, on both which occasions he gave the most convincing proofs of his extensive capacity, quick penetration, and solidity of judgment, so that the Earl of Salisbury had reason to say in his own speech upon the last trial, That the evidence had been so well distributed and opened by the Attorney-General, that he never heard such a mass of matter better contracted, or made more intelligible to a jury (h). This appears so exactly conformable to truth, that many esteem this last speech especially, Sir Edward Coke's master-piece at this day [G]. It was in reward for his service upon this

This appears clearly from a letter sent to him by Sir Francis Bacon many years afterwards, containing a very extensive view of all his faults and foibles, wherein are these expressions (18); 'As in your pleadings you were wont to insult over misery, and to inveigh bitterly at the persons, which bred you many enemies, whose poison yet swelleth, and the effects now appear, &c.' It has been believed, that Shakspeare in his Comedy of the Twelfth Night (19), hints at this strange behaviour of Sir Edward Coke at Raleigh's trial. Mr Osborn says plainly, that Sir Walter Raleigh was tired out of his life, by the howling of the King's Council on one side, and the Bench insisting on a confession extorted from the Lord Cobham out of fear, on the other. Another Gentleman observes (20), 'that as to Coke's behaviour, there is but one way to account for it, which is this; that if Essex was known to have ever been in any wife a friend or patron to him, as it appears he was, in a private memorial of an honourable person, who was of the same college in Oxford with Raleigh, and almost of the same standing, then Coke might perhaps think of retrieving himself in the eye of the world, and making atonement for his ingratitude to the said Earl also, at his trial, and to his memory after his death, by his inhumanity now to one of the contrary faction (21).' The reader may compare this with what is observed at the close of the last note, from which it plainly appears, that though Sir Edward Coke commended Essex's death, yet he did not retract his opinion of his being a traitor, but urges as a confirmation of it, that the King was of his opinion also. He was as tenacious of his sentiment with respect to Raleigh's treason, for we find him insisting upon it again and again, at the trial of the Powder Plotters (22). Yet whatever his opinion might be, it is no sort of excuse for his language, and therefore that worthy person who wrote the preface to the State Trials, describes very justly such petulant Orators in the following terms (23). 'Those who with rude and boisterous language, abuse and revile the poor unfortunate prisoner; who stick not to take all advantages of him, however hard and unjust, which either his ignorance, or the strict rigour of the law may give them; who by force or stratagem endeavour to disable him from making his defence; who brow-beat his witnesses as soon as they appear, though ever so willing to declare the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out of countenance, and confound them in delivering their evidence, as if it were the duty of their place to convict all who are brought to trial, right or wrong, guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, had a peculiar dispensation from the obligations of truth and justice. Such methods as these should be below men of honour, not to say men of conscience; yet in the perusal of this work, such persons will too often arise to view; and I could wish for the credit of the Law, that that great Oracle of it, the Lord Chief Justice Coke, had given less reason to be numbered among this sort.'

In his speech at the trial of Sir Everard Digby (24), he informs us, that three and twenty days had been spent in taking those examinations, the substance of which he offered to the Court, he shews, that the ground-work of this treason was laid in the life-time of Queen Elizabeth; and that two of the conspirators Catesby and Tresham, had been in all the plots that had fallen under his inspection; that of the unfortunate Earl of Essex, that of Watson and Clark, that with which Sir Walter Raleigh was charged, and now this, which was originally contrived to have taken effect by the assistance of a Spanish army; but not being able to depend upon that, the conspirators had recourse to the horrid design of freeing themselves from penal laws, by blowing up the King, the Royal Family, and the Parliament, with thirty-five barrels of gunpowder. There is not a step or motion of these conspirators in the management of their affairs, for so many years together, with so many different persons, and in so many several places, that is, in Spain and Flanders as well as in England, but what he has traced out; nor were there any colours in which they meant to shade or conceal their treason, which he did not remove; setting the whole and every circumstance of the transaction in so perspicuous a light, that the prisoners themselves acknowledged, that all their doings were fairly detected, recommending themselves to the favour and intercession of the Court. At Garnet's trial (25) he carried his inquiries much higher, and traced the plots and conspiracies of the Priests and Jesuits through the greatest part of Queen Elizabeth's reign, down to this very last; shewing that there was a constant series of them, from which they were never to be diverted, either by severe laws and frequent punishments, or by repeated acts of lenity and mercy; that with respect to the King then reigning, they plotted against his title to the Crown before Queen Elizabeth's death, writ books on purpose to render it weak and dubious in the opinions this occasion, that it was resolved to promote him to the most beneficial place in the Law, in order to which he was called to the degree of a Serjeant, June 20, 1606 (i), and upon this promotion it was remarkable, that the motto he gave upon his rings came to be afterwards very applicable to his fortune, viz. Lex est tutissima cassis, The Law is the safest helmet (k). On the last of the same month he was raised to be Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and as this made way for Sir Henry Hobart to be Attorney-General, so it brought Sir Francis Bacon into the post of Solicitor (l), not much to the satisfaction of the new Chief Justice, if we may confide in a letter written to him by Sir Francis Bacon on that occasion, the contents of which are singular enough [H]. In this post, as Sir Edward Coke behaved with great probity as well as sufficiency, so there seems to be little or no reason to doubt, that he was perfectly well satisfied with his station, and would very willingly have remained there as long as he lived; but it seems there were other people who desired to see him removed, and the method they took was, by suggesting that his great abilities might be much better employed for the King's service in another place, and by this slight he was, October 25, 1613, raised to be Chief Justice of the King's-Bench, or, as he styled himself according to the custom of his predecessors, Chief Justice of England (m). By this he made room for Sir Henry Hobart to succeed him as Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, whereupon Sir Francis Bacon became Attorney-General, which it is proper to mention, because the latter seems to own, that he had no small hand in that intrigue by which all these changes were brought about (n), and this plainly shews that the old dislike between them still continued, and we shall meet with some other very remarkable instances before this article is concluded, that will shew how great injuries the publick receive from the private feuds and animosities of great men, who study to gratify their particular inclinations, though it be at the expence of their Master's service, and the good of his subjects (o). But notwithstanding all this, and the Lord Chief Justice having in point of Proclamations, Prohibitions, and other matters, shewn himself no friend (p) to a boundless Prerogative, yet so much he retained of the King's favour, or at least such expectations were had of his future services, that November 4, 1613, he was sworn of the Privy Council (q). This was a mark only of the King's countenance, for Bacon had now his Majesty's ear entirely, to whom he represented his antagonist in a very unfavourable light on many occasions, but more especially in a certain case of treason, where he undertook to obtain the opinions of the Judges of the Court of King's-Bench, and particularly that of the Chief Justice separately and privately (r), in which he met with more difficulty than he imagined, for Sir Edward Coke was very unwilling to enter into any matter of this sort in the manner Mr Attorney proposed, because it was directly contrary to his Lordship's found maxim, That he was a Judge in a Court and not in a chamber. It appears however, that Sir Francis Bacon valued himself very much on the art and skill he shewed in managing the of the people; that after his accession, and before his coming into England, they entered into schemes to defeat his possession; as a little more than a month after he came, they formed a design of surprizing his person; that notwithstanding his lenity and clemency towards them in the first year of his reign, they were still prosecuting the same wicked purposes by a variety of treasons; and that by their absolute dominion over the consciences of their deluded followers, they had influenced some who were embarked in this treason, and who died before they could be brought to justice, to perjure themselves in their last moments. To sum up all in a word, whoever desires to see a true picture of the art and subtilty of these sort of men, and to find in a narrow compass, the history of their endeavours to subvert this constitution, and to throw all things into blood and confusion, for the furtherance of their design, need only peruse this speech of Sir Edward Coke's, most of the capital facts in which, were acknowledged freely by Garnet himself in open Court after his conviction; so that as the penetration and sagacity of this great man are plainly proved by so long and clear a deduction, the truth of what he delivered is freed from all doubts, by the evidence then produced, and the confession before-mentioned.

[H] The contents of which are singular enough. As we have occasion to speak often of the disputes and animosities between these two great men Bacon and Coke, it is requisite to produce this short letter from the former to the latter, which shews when and from whence it took rise, viz. in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when Bacon by the assistance of his great friend the Earl of Essex (26), made the strongest efforts to have obtained the post of Solicitor-General about the year 1594; which missing then, and more than once afterwards, fixed in him that strong desire of mortifying his adversary; for which as various opportunities offered, so it will be found that he neglected none, whenever they offered. There is no date to this letter, but the contents of it plainly shew, that it was written while Sir Edward Coke continued Attorney-General, and after it was resolved that he should be made Chief Justice of the Common Pleas (27).

• Mr Attorney,

I Thought best once for all, to let you know in plainness what I find of you, and what you shall find of me; you take to yourself a liberty to disgrace and disable my law, my experience, my discretion; what it pleaseth you, I pray think of me; I am one that knows both mine own wants and other mens, and it may be perchance that mine mends, others stand at a stay. And surely I may not endure in publick place to be wronged, without repelling the same to my best advantage to right myself. You are great, and therefore have the more enviers, which would be glad to have you paid at another's cost. Since the time I missed the Solicitor's place (the rather I think by your means) I cannot expect that you and I shall ever serve as Attorney and Solicitor together; but either to serve with another upon your remove, or to step into some other course; so as I am more free than ever I was, from any occasion of unworthy conforming myself to you, more than general good manners, or your particular good usage shall provoke; and if you had not been short-sighted in your own fortune (as I think) you might have had more use of me. But that side is passed. I write not this, to shew my friends what a brave letter I have written to Mr Attorney; I have none of those humours, but that I have written is to a good end; that is, to the more decent carriage of my Master's service, and to our particular better understanding one of another. This letter, if it shall be answered by you in deed and not in word, I suppose it will not be worse for us both: else it is but a few lines lost; which for a much smaller matter I would have adventured. So this being to yourself, I for my part rest, the Chief Justice, though in spite of all his dexterity and address, he seems to confess that he was baffled in the end [I]. In the spring of the succeeding year, an occasion happened by which the Chief Justice might have recovered his Master's favour. Mr Oliver St John, upon a benevolence being set on foot, had declared his opinion publicly that it was against law, reason, and religion, for which he was brought into the Star Chamber, and April 25, 1615, was sentenced there to pay a fine of five thousand pounds, and to suffer imprisonment during the King's pleasure (s); upon this occasion, as Bacon told the King in a letter, the Chief Justice delivered the Law for the benevolence strongly, but adds, that this might do him no good, that he wished he had done it timely (t). Another case followed soon after in which Bacon also boasts of having sifted the Chief Justice, but owns that he found him exceeding clear in his opinion, and this too was a case of treason; for one Mr Owen of Godstowe in Oxfordshire, having asserted that Princes excommunicated by the Pope might be lawfully killed, he was thereupon indicted and convicted, May 17, 1615 (u). Some time after this there broke out a very extraordinary affair, which was the discovery of Sir Thomas Overbury's being murdered in the Tower, at the distance of about two years after the fact happened, for Overbury died September 16, 1613 (w), and the judicial proceedings against his murderers did not commence till about September 1615. It has been much disputed whence this affair took rise, some ascribing it to Dr George Abbot, then Archbishop of Canterbury, who was supposed to have a great aversion to the Earl of Somerset; others to Sir Edward Coke (x), but the most probable opinion is, that Sir Ralph Winwood, who succeeded the Earl of Somerset as Secretary, had the first intelligence of it from one Mr Trumbal, the King's Agent in the Low-Countries, which produced some strong reports that reflected on Sir Gervase Ellways, Lieutenant of the Tower, and he, by endeavouring to vindicate his own character, brought the whole matter to light, as has been already mentioned in another place (y). In the detecting all the secret steps of this dark business, the Lord Chief Justice Coke was equally zealous and diligent, taking, as we are told from a very high authority, several hundred examinations (z). In consequence of these, the principal actors in this black affair were apprehended and brought to justice, notwithstanding all the arts and influence that were exerted to prevent it. Richard Weston, who had been Overbury's Keeper, was brought to his trial October 19, 1615, at Guild-Hall, and at first shewed a resolution of standing mute, to which he is said to have been prompted by the King's Solicitor, who owed his promotion, and other favours, to the Earl of Somerset (a). The Chief Justice very judiciously avoided coming to extremities by adjourning the Court, and before it met again Weston was prevailed upon to plead, and was thereupon convicted and executed (b). Upon this, Sir John Hollis afterwards Earl of Clare, Sir John Wentworth, and Mr Lumfden, undertook

[I] That he was baffled in the end. It is necessary in the first place, to shew what the nature of this business was; next, what the King desired; and lastly, how Sir Francis Bacon endeavoured to accomplish what the King committed to his charge. As to the first, the case was this; Mr Peacham was a Minister, and in a sermon found in his study, which was never preached, or intended to be published, there were several passages supposed to be treasonable (28). Now the thing the King desired, was to have the sentiments of the Judges as to these passages separately and privately, before the man was brought to his trial. This was the point Sir Francis Bacon was to manage, and of his management he gives this account to the King, in a letter dated January 27. 1614 (29).

For the course your Majesty directeth and commandeth, for the feeling of the Judges of the King's Bench their several opinions, by distributing ourselves and enjoining secrecy; we did first find an encounter in the opinion of my Lord Coke, who seemed to affirm, that such particular, and as he called it, auricular taking of opinions, was not according to the custom of this realm; and seemed to divine, that his brethren would never do it. But when I replied, that it was our duty to pursue your Majesty's directions, and it were not amiss for his Lordship to leave his brethren to their own answers; it was so concluded, and his Lordship did desire that I might confer with himself; and Mr Serjeant Mountague was named to speak with Justice Crook, Mr Serjeant Crew with Justice Houghton, and Mr Solicitor with Justice Dodderidge. This done, I took my fellows aside, and advised that they should presently speak with the three Judges, before I could speak with my Lord Coke for doubt of infusion; and that they should not in any case make any doubt to the Judges, as if they mistrusted they would not deliver any opinion apart, but speak resolutely to them, and only make their coming to be to know what time they would appoint to be attended with the papers. This forted not amiss, for Mr Solicitor came to me this evening, and related to me, that he had found Judge Dodderidge very ready to give opinion in secret; and fell upon the same reason, which upon your Majesty's first letter I had used to my Lord Coke at the Council Table; which was, that every Judge was bound expressly by his oath, to give your Majesty council when he was called; and whether he should do it jointly or severally, that rested in your Majesty's good pleasure as you would require it. And though the ordinary course was to assemble them, yet there might intervene cases wherein the other course was more convenient. The like answer made Justice Crook; Justice Houghton who is a soft man, seemed desirous first to confer; alledging, that the other three Judges had all served the Crown before they were Judges, but that he had not been much acquainted with business of this nature. We purpose therefore forthwith, they shall be made acquainted with the papers; and if that could be done as suddenly as this was, I should make small doubt of their opinions: and howsoever I hope, force of law and precedent, will bind them to the truth: neither am I wholly out of hope, that my Lord Coke himself, when I have in some dark manner put him in doubt that he shall be left alone, will not continue singular.

In another letter dated the 31st of the same month, he acquaints the King at large, with the arguments he made use of to the Lord Chief Justice, and concludes with saying, that the Chief Justice desired the papers might be left with him (30); and notwithstanding, it appears by several letters, that Sir Francis Bacon gave him no rest, yet it was a fortnight before he could obtain his Lordship's answers; which were so little to his purpose, that he tells the King his Master, He was glad to send them in the Chief Justice's hand-writing, for his own discharge (31). Yet notwithstanding this, it seems Mr Peacham was tried and convicted of high treason.

undertook to examine him at the gallows, in order to make the world believe, that this exemplary act of justice, was only the effect of a conspiracy against that Nobleman who has been so often mentioned, for which they were severely censured in the Star Chamber (c). It is certain, that from the very beginning, the Chief Justice was very apprehensive of the consequences of this affair, and therefore went to Royston to the King, and desired that others might be joined with him in commission, which was granted, and these Commissioners were, the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, the Duke of Lenox, Lord Steward, and the Lord Zouch, Warden of the Cinque Ports, and by their assistance this whole business was conducted (d). Sir Francis Bacon, in a Letter to the King himself, says, that this was the wisest action of Sir Edward's life, which seems to speak it voluntary, and so it is represented upon another solemn occasion (e). But there is notwithstanding a very different account of this matter, which, as it is supposed to have come from the mouth of one of his Lordship's sons, who was an eye and ear witness, may be worth the reader's notice (f) [K]. But however this matter might be, the Chief Justice, with the assistance of his fellow Commissioners, proceeded vigorously, tho' with great caution. On the seventh of November following, Mrs Anne Turner, who had been about the Countess of Somerset from her youth, was brought to her trial in the Court of King's-Bench, and upon very full evidence convicted and executed (g). On the sixteenth of the same month, Sir Gervase Ellways, who had been Lieutenant of the Tower, was convicted at Guild-Hall, and on the twentieth hanged at Tower-hill (h). Upon the twenty-seventh of the same month, James Franklin was tried and convicted in the King's-Bench, and a few days after executed. One would have imagined after all this, that no great blame could be laid at the Chief Justice's door, and yet we find a certain writer charging him, though in all appearance very falsely, with dealing hardly with the prisoner at this last trial, and making too much haste in the former (i) [L]. Sir Thomas Monson, who was a great favourite

[K] May be worth the reader's notice.] There is hardly any transaction, about which there has been more written, than as to this barbarous and inhuman murder of Sir Thomas Overbury; and yet it may be very truly affirmed, that hardly any of the relations we have, are (at least as they stand) of any great authority; because most of them are full of inconsistencies, contradictions, and palpable falsehoods; notwithstanding which, we find them transcribed into our Histories, as if they contained indisputable facts. The following is a very proper specimen of this, as it pretends to great accuracy, as well as to the best authority (32). The King, says this writer, at this time, that is, when the murder was discovered, which he places in the middle of August, was at Royston, and Somerset with him; and when the King had been there about a week, next day he designed to proceed to Newmarket, and Somerset to return to London, when Sir Ralph (Wynwood) came to Royston, and acquainted the King with what he had discovered about Sir Thomas Overbury's murder; the King was so surprized herewith, that he posted away a messenger to Sir Edward Coke, to apprehend the Earl; I speak this with confidence, because I had it from one of Sir Edward's sons.

Sir Edward lay then at the Temple, and measured out his time at regular hours, two whereof were to go to bed at nine o'clock, and in the morning to rise at three: at this time Sir Edward's son and some others, were in Sir Edward's lodging, but not in bed, when the messenger about one in the morning, knocked at the door, where the son met him and knew him: says he, I come from the King, and must immediately speak with your father. If you come from ten Kings, he answered, you shall not, for I know my father's disposition to be such, that if he be disturbed in his sleep, he will not be fit for any business; but if you will do as we do, you shall be welcome, and about two hours hence my father will rise, and you then may do as you please, to which he assented.

At three Sir Edward rung a little bell, to give notice to his servant to come to him, and then the messenger went to him and gave him the King's letter, and Sir Edward immediately made a warrant to apprehend Somerset, and sent to the King that he would wait upon him that day.

The messenger went back post to Royston, and arrived there about ten in the morning; the King had a loathsome way of lolling his arms about his favourites necks and kissing them, and in this posture the messenger found the King with Somerset, saying, When shall I see thee again? Somerset then designing for London, when he was arrested by Sir Edward's warrant: Somerset exclaimed that never such an af- front was offered to a Peer of England, in the presence of the King: Nay man, said the King, if Coke sends for me I must go; and when he was gone, Now the Deil go with thee, said the King, for I will never see thy face any more.

About three in the afternoon, the Chief Justice came to Royston, and so soon as he had seen the King, the King told him that he was acquainted with the most wicked murder by Somerset and his wife, that was ever perpetrated, upon Sir Thomas Overbury; and that they had made him a pimp, to carry on their bawdry and murder; and therefore commanded the Chief Justice with all the scrutiny possible, to search into the bottom of the conspiracy, and to spare no man, how great soever; concluding, God's curse be upon you and yours, if you spare any of them; and God's curse be upon me and mine, if I pardon any one of them.

In the first place it is observable, that there is not one single date, but from the manner in which this is delivered, one would imagine that all these facts passed in the month of August; but there is another circumstance which seems to point out the day, and that is the commitment of the Earl of Somerset, and yet this was upon the 18th of October (33). It is indeed true, as is said in the text, that Sir Edward went to Royston, and received the King's instructions, and this might be about the time, or perhaps before the Earl of Somerset was committed. It is certainly not true, that he was sent for from Royston, or arrested there by Sir Edward Coke's warrant, on the contrary, he was at full liberty when Weston was first taken up and examined, and came from Court to London, to outface the report that he was concerned in the murder (34). It is no less certain, that at this very time King James was not convinced of the Earl of Somerset's having a hand in the murder; but upon the application of the Lord Chief Justice, which seems to have been on the day the Earl was committed; and that was the day before Weston was arraigned, the enquiry was referred to Commissioners mentioned in the text (35), and not to the Judges; so that upon the whole, there are very few circumstances in all this account, that can with any shadow of probability be thought true; and this will still further appear, from the circumstances mentioned in the subsequent notes.

[L] Dealing hardly with the prisoner at this last trial, and making too much haste in the former.] Sir Anthony Weldon, if he was the author of the book that goes under his name, pretends also to tell this story very circumstantially; sometimes from his own knowledge, and sometimes from the information of persons, who had the greatest opportunity of knowing the truth. His account is equally inconsistent with itself, favourite with Lord Northampton, who appears to have been very deep in this affair, and to have made use of him as his agent, was arraigned on the fourth of December at Guild-Hall, as an accessory, before the fact, with Weston and the rest, in poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury (k); yet he was never tried, for reasons about which posterity have been but darkly informed, and it is with much confidence reported, that the Lord Chief Justice, at his arraignment, let fall some very hafty and mysterious speeches, which gave occasion to the stopping the progress of his prosecution (l). Yet with respect to these speeches, there is only inconsistent and suspicious evidence, as the reader will see in the notes [M]. One might conjecture, from the laying together of circumstances, that self, and with the former, and yet most of the same facts are in it. He makes the King go from Whitehall to Roylton, and the same day when he was there, fend for all the Judges and make a speech to them, ending with the curses mentioned in the former (36). The Chief Justice's son, if the account last mentioned came from him, makes the King fend only for his father late at night (37). Sir Anthony Welden makes the Judges sent for to Roylton in a body (38), without shewing any cause why the King did not fend for them the day before, when he was at Whitehall. Yet Sir Francis Bacon in a letter to the King himself, says, that Sir Edward Coke went of his own accord, and shews us why he went (39). Sir Anthony Welden pretends to have been an eye-witness of the King's parting with Somerset, and speaks of his hanging upon his neck, and kissing him (40). The former account says, this was after the Chief Justice had sent for him, and that by a warrant (41). Sir Anthony directly the contrary, and that he was not arrested 'till his coming to London, which the King knew would happen, but Somerset did not (42). Wilson, from whom we have the same story, says, that the Chief Justice sent for him, and that the Earl complained to the King of his infelence (43). After all it is certain, that he was not sent for, that he came to London of his own motive, and to take measures for his own safety, as he affirmed himself (44) at his trial. But Sir Anthony Welden, though he makes the Earl of Somerset as black as he can make him, inclines to make this a conspiracy against him, into which he insinuates Sir Edward Coke entered, on account of Sir George Villiers's brother being to marry his daughter, which was a thing not thought of for many years after. Having thus prejudiced the reader's opinion against the Chief Justice, he proceeds to blacken his conduct in the following manner (45). 'And now poor Mrs Turner and Franklyn began the tragedy; Mrs Turner's day of mourning, being better than the day of her birth; for she died very penitently, and shewed much modesty in her last act, which is to be hoped was accepted with God; after that died Weston, and then was Franklyn arraigned, who confessed that Overbury was smothered to death, not poisoned to death, though he had poison given him. Here was Coke glad how to cast about to bring both ends together, Mrs Turner and Weston being already hanged for killing Overbury with poison, but he being the very quintessence of the law, presently informs the Jury, that if a man be done to death with pistols, poinards, swords, halters, poison, &c. so he be done to death the indictment is good, if but indicted for any of those ways; but the good Lawyers of those times were not of that opinion, but did believe that Mrs Turner was directly murdered by my Lord Coke's law, as Overbury was without any law.' Some little truth there is in this paragraph, and but a little, for Weston was executed long before Mrs Turner; and not only hanged before her, but before she was arraigned. As for Sir Thomas Overbury's being smothered, that is a pure invention of his own; nor was Franklyn ever indicted for any such thing, but for procuring the poisons which Weston administered to Sir Thomas; neither was Franklyn present at Overbury's death, nor was there ever the least suspicion but by himself, that Mrs Turner was murdered by my Lord Coke's law. In all probability, this poor Gentleman wrote after his senses began to fail him; for after all, there was a kind of ground for this strange story that he has told, though not with regard to Franklyn, but to Weston; of whom, as we said before, there was a report that he did not confess the fact at his death; and the reason of this the Lord Chief Justice gave, in the speech he made at the trial of Sir John Hollis in the Star-Chamber, from a dark remembrance, or a hearsay report, of which this wild tale was coined. What he said, take in his own words (46). 'In this case of Weston, he would never confess the indictment, because the indictment was, that he poisoned Sir Thomas Overbury with arsenick, roseaker, and mercury sublimate, when as indeed it was not known what poison killed him. Here the poor man conceived a scruple, that if he did not know with which of the poisons Overbury was poisoned, he was not guilty of the offence laid in the indictment, and therefore said he was not guilty of the offence. Now, ut obstruatur os iniqui, that the mouth of the wicked man may be fully stopped, after that it was resolved unto him, that the manner of killing laid in the indictment, was not the point of the indictment, but the matter of killing; as if the indictment be that a man was killed with a sword, whereas indeed he was killed with a dagger, yet the party is guilty, because the killing of a man is the point of the indictment; then he confessed the fact.'

[M] As the reader will see in the notes.] The first, and indeed the most credible author that relates any thing upon this head to the prejudice of the Chief Justice, delivers his story thus (47). 'Sir Thomas Monson, another of the Countess's agents in this poisoning contrivance, had past one day's tryal at Guild-hall. But the Lord Chief Justice Coke in his rhetorical flourishes at his arraignment, vented some expressions (which he either deduced from Northampton's assuring the Lieutenant of the Tower, that the making away of Sir Thomas Overbury would be acceptable to the King, or from some other secret hint received) as if he could discover more than the death of a private person; intimating, though not plainly, that Overbury's untimely remove had something in it of retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the same crime against Prince Henry, blessing himself with admiration at the horror of such actions. In which he flew to high a pitch, that he was taken down by a Court lure; Sir Thomas Monson's tryal laid aside, and he soon after set at liberty, and the Lord Chief Justice's wings were clipped for it ever after.'

'And it was rumoured that the King (heightened to so much passion by this eruption of Sir Edward Coke's) went to the Council Table, and kneeling down there, desired God to lay a curse upon him and his posterity for ever, if he were consenting to Overbury's death.' It is exceeding strange, that if the Lord Chief Justice really dropt any such expressions at this tryal, there should not be a word of them mentioned in the minutes of that tryal; which were published not only at a time when any thing might have been freely said in respect to this Monarch's memory, but when from the preface prefixed to them, it plainly appears the great end of publishing them, was to throw dirt upon him (48). It is also worth observing, that the story of the curse is entirely altered for the third time, but appears here with greater probability, than in either of the other stories. Here comes in properly, what Sir Anthony Welden says, both with respect to the King's curse, and the Chief Justice's speech (49). 'It is verily believed, that when the King made those terrible imprecations on himself, and deprecations of the Judges, it was intended the law should run in it's proper channel, but was stoppt and put out of course, by the folly of that great Clerk, Sir Edward Coke, though no wise man; who in a vain-glorious speech to shew his vigilancy, enters into a rapture as he sat on the bench, saying, God knows what became of that sweet babe Prince Henry, but I know somewhat; and surely in searching the cabinets, he lighted on some papers that spake plain in that, which was ever

Sir Thomas Monson's tryal was postponed, in order to bring on those of the Earl and Countess of Somerset; for if the evidence had failed in convicting him, it might have given a new turn to things, at least with respect to the Earl, and his conviction was now looked upon as a point of very great consequence (m). Besides, Sir Francis Bacon was now come into the principal management of things, who had not meddled in this matter before, but left the prosecution of the other offenders to the Queen's Attorney-General. For this reason we find the proceedings were now drawn into a greater length, and it is pretty evident, that in the course of them certain circumstances appeared, by which a suspicion was given, that besides their privacy to this murder, Northampton and Somerset had been embarked in some state intrigues of a dark and dangerous consequence, and had been tampering with the Spaniards (n). Hence arose the necessity of new searches and fresh examinations, by which this matter received a delay of some months. In the mean time, there happened another affair that produced no small disturbance to the Chief Justice. This was a clashing in point of jurisdiction, between the Court in which his Lordship sat as Chief, and the High Court of Chancery (o). This made a very great noise then, and has been the ground of much controversy since, notwithstanding the matter was brought to some kind of termination a few months after (p). At this time, when the difference broke out, the Chief Justice was of so great use, that those who were none of his friends, advised the King to dissemble any knowledge he had of the share he took in it, and what share that was, or rather was supposed to be, will at the bottom of the page appear (q) [N]. By this means things were kept quiet a little, while matters were preparing whispered; which had he gone on in a gentle way, would have fallen in of themselves, not to have been prevented; but this folly of his tongue, stopt the breath of that discovery, of that so foul a murder which I fear cries still for vengeance.' There is yet another writer who speaks of this matter, and it is very fit the reader should see what he says (50). 'There was a general rumour, that the Chief Justice making a severe inspection into Overbury's murder, found some papers about the poisoning of Prince Henry; and Sir Anthony Welden, in his History of the Reign of King James, says, That the Chief Justice had blabbed abroad so much: I am sure there was never any such acquaintance between the Chief Justice and him, that he should blab it out to Welden; whether this was true or false I cannot tell, but sure the displacing Sir Edward Coke the next year, gave reputation to these rumours?' Yet this very writer, notwithstanding this insinuation, very well knew what was the real cause of Sir Edward Coke's removal, and that from his family, which he afterwards gives in his work very fairly (51). What has been before said of the printed tryals, is a full answer to both these writers, as well as to him who is first cited. But besides all this, we have several letters of Sir Francis Bacon's to the King upon this subject, in which he is far enough from magnifying the Chief Justice's conduct, and yet not a word in them of these intemperate speeches (52). If it should be suggested, that Bacon could not mention these to his Master with decency, we have yet another letter of his to Sir Edward Coke after his fall, in which he insists largely upon his errors in the management of this business; and there surely he would hardly have omitted a thing, at once so gross and so notorious, if there had been any truth in it (53). On the whole therefore, this seems to be a groundless rumour thrown out by those, who hated both the King and the Chief Justice; and who were credulous enough to believe any thing, or at least malicious enough to say any thing, that might fix an odium upon either. As to the credulity of Sir Anthony Welden, it appears clearly in this, that after all he has said, he declares in his own opinion, that the Earl of Somerset was innocent of the murder (54); and, which is still more extraordinary, he seems to think Sir Gervase Ellways innocent (55) also; so that his notions and his evidence, seem to be of equal value; or, to speak plainly, of any value at all.

[N] Will at the bottom of the page appear.] The clearest, most curious, and withal most concise account of this affair, is contained in a letter from Sir Francis Bacon then Attorney-General, to King James; and as he professes therein, to write ex officio, for the true information of his Master's judgment, so it is very apparent, that he penned it with equal skill and sincerity; and considered in that light, it is one of the finest papers that ever fell from his pen (56). 'It is necessary I let your Majesty know, the ground of the difference between the two Courts, that your Majesty may the better understand the narrative.

' There was a statute made 27 Edw. III. cap. 1. which no doubt, in the principal intention thereof, was ordained against those that sued to Rome; where in there are words somewhat general against any that questioneth, or impeacheth any judgment given in the King's Courts, or in any other Courts. Upon these doubtful words, (other Courts) the controversy groweth. For the fonder interpretation taketh them to be meant of those Courts, which though locally they were not held at Rome, or where the Pope's chair was, but here within the realm, yet in their jurisdiction had their dependance upon the Court of Rome, as were the Court of the Legate here, and the Courts of the Archbishops and Bishops, which were then but subordinate judgment-seats to that high tribunal of Rome. And for this construction, the opposition of the words, if they be well observed, between the King's Courts and other Courts, maketh very much, for it importeth as if those other Courts were not the King's Courts. Also the main scope of the statute fortifieth the same. And lastly, the practice of many ages. The other interpretation which cleaveth to the letter, expoundeth the King's Courts to be the Courts of Law only, and other Courts to be Courts of Equity, as the Chancery, Exchequer-chamber, Duchy, &c. Though this also flieth indeed from the letter, for that all these are the King's Courts.

' There is also another statute, which is but a simple prohibition, and not with a penalty of a premunire, (as the other is) that after judgments given in the King's Courts, the parties shall be in peace, except the judgment be undone by error or attain, which is a legal form or reversal. And of this also I hold the fonder interpretation to be, to settle possessions against disturbances, and not to take away remedy in equity, where those judgments are obtained ex rigore juris, and against good conscience.

' But upon these two statutes, there hath been a late conceit in some, that if a judgment pass at the common law against any, that he may not after sue for relief in Chancery; and if he doth, both he and his Counsel, and his Solicitors, yea, and the Judge in Equity himself, are within the danger of those statutes.

' Here your Majesty hath the true state of the question, which I was necessarily to open to you, first because your Majesty calleth for this relation not as news, but as business. Now to the historical part.

' It is the course of the King's Bench, that they give in charge to a Grand-Jury offences of all natures, to be presented within Middlesex where the said Court is; and the manner is to enumerate them, as it were in articles. This was done by Justice Crook the Wednesday before the term ended. And that article (If any man after a judgment given had drawn the said judgment to a new examination in any other Court) was by him specially given in charge, which had not used to be given in charge before. It is true it was not solemnly dwelt upon, but as it were thrown in amongst the rest.

' The

paring for the trials of the Earl and Countess of Somerset, in which those who were now entrusted with the King's secrets, were obliged to carry fair with him. Yet, as a variety of accidents retarded those trials, the enemies of the Chief Justice contrived to bring him into a new difficulty in respect to the business of Commendams, where he behaved with great dignity and firmness, and in which, if he was guilty of any error, he offended in company with all his brethren, as will be shewn hereafter (r). This happened towards the latter end of April, and within a day or two after the Peers were summoned for the trial of the Earl and Countess of Somerset. The latter was first tried on the twenty-fourth of May, and Lord Chancellor Ellesmere sat as Lord High Steward; the King's instructions were produced to the Commissioners, by which they were directed to examine, first, Whether there were good grounds to believe the Lord and Lady guilty? and if there were not, then they were to enquire after the authors of the conspiracy (s). To these instructions were subjoined heads of examination, and they were produced to the Lords as an evidence of the King's care and impartiality, as well as the Commissioners diligence in this business. The Countess gave them no trouble, for she pleaded guilty (t). The next day, being the twenty-fifth of May, the Earl of Somerset was tried, and the Lord Chief Justice gave a very full and fair account of his own conduct in the whole business, and the manner in which the Letters and other written evidence produced came into the hands of the Commissioners; so that after a trial which lasted twelve hours, the Earl was found guilty by his Peers (u). All the thanks which the Chief Justice received for his honest zeal and matchless vigilance in this business, was to be considered in a bad light at Court, where he was alike persecuted by the friends of the old, and the creatures of the new, favourite. By the industry of these people, his conduct was not only misrepresented to the King but to the crowd; and Bacon, who certainly wrote as well as any man, undertook to make my Lord Coke himself sensible (w), that for all the pains and labour he had bestowed, he met with no worse treatment than he deserved [O]. It was not long after, that he was attacked

' The last day of the term, and that which all men condemn the supposed last day of my Lord Chancellor's life, there were two indictments preferred of premunire for suing in Chancery after judgment in Common Law; the one by Richard Granville, the other by William Allen; the former against Courtney the party in Chancery, Gibb the Chancellor, and Leurst the Clerk; the latter against Alderman Bowles and Humphrey Smith, parties in Chancery; Serjeant More the Counsellor, Elias Wood Solicitor in the cause, and Sir John Tindal Master in Chancery, and an Assessor to my Lord Chancellor.

' For the cases themselves it were too long to trouble your Majesty with them, but this I will say, if they were set on that preferred them, they were the worst marksmen that ever were, that set them on. For there could not have been chosen two such causes to the honour and advantage of the Chancery; for the justness of the decrees, and the foulness and scandal both of fact and person, in those that impeach the decrees.

' The Grand-Jury, consisting as it seemeth of very substantial and intelligent persons, would not find the bills, notwithstanding they were clamoured by the parties and twice sent back by the Court; and, in conclusion, resolutely seventeen of nineteen found an ignoramus, wherein for that time I think, Ignoramus was wiser than those that knew too much.'

[O] He met with no worse treatment than he deserved. It is very certain, that this letter of Sir Francis Bacon, as it is written with much spirit and freedom, so it is very far from being void of elegance or truth; and perhaps it had been a great happiness for him, if, in his turn, he had met with such a monitor. It is however to be regretted, that this letter has no date, though the very circumstances of it plainly shew, that he was already under difficulties, though not absolutely overthrown; and hence we may conjecture, that it might be penned in June 1616. At present, we will quote only what relates to these prosecutions (57).

' In your last, which might have been your best piece of service to the state, you affected to follow that old rule, which giveth justice leaden heels and iron hands; you used too many delays, till the delinquents hands were loosed and your's bound: in that worke you seemed another Fabius, where the humour of Marcellus would have done better. What need you have sought more evidences than enough? while you pretended the finding out of more (missing your aim) you discredited what you had found. This best judgments think; though you never used such speeches as are fathered upon you, yet you might well have done it, and but rightly: for this crime was second to none but the Powder Plot: that would have blown up all at one blow, a merciful cruelty: this would have done the same by degrees, a lingering but a sure way; one by one might have been culled out, till all opposers had been removed.

' Besides, that other plot was scandalous to Rome, making Popery odious in the sight of the whole world; this hath been scandalous to the whole Gospel, and since the first nullity to this instant, when justice hath her hands bound, the Devil could not have invented a more mischievous practice to our State and Church than this hath been, is, and is like to be. God avert the evil!

' But herein you committed another fault; that as you were too open in your proceedings, and so taught them whereby to defend themselves; so you gave them time to undermine justice, and to work upon all advantages, both of affections, and honour, and opportunity, and breach of friendship; which they have so well followed, sparing neither pains nor costs, that it almost seemeth an higher offence in you to have done so much indeed, than that you have done no more; you stopt the confessions and accusations of some, who perhaps had they been suffered, would have spoken enough to have removed some stumbling-blocks out of your way; and you did not this in favour of any one, but of I know not what present unadvised humours, supposing enough behind to discover all, which fell not out so. Howsoever, as the Apostle saith in another case, you went not rightly to the truth, and therefore though you were to be commended for what you did, yet you were to be reprehended for many circumstances in the doing; and doubtless God hath an eye in this cross to your negligence, and the briars are left to be pricks in your sides and thorns in your eyes.'

It is not a little strange, that these reflections upon Sir Edward Coke's conduct have gone so long current, and are like to be transmitted without so much as a remark to posterity, and yet sure they deserve a contrary usage. The Lord Chief Justice at his setting out, acted with the spirit of Marcellus; which nobody knew better than the author of this letter, or he would not have said so much in his fine speech against Sir John Hollis in the Star-Chamber (58). But when there appeared such a spirit in the city and country, as well as in the Court, of treating this matter not as a course of justice, but as a conspiracy against the Earl of Somerset, it very much imported Sir Edward Coke to act with caution. It was then he assumed the character of Fabius, and this very writer told the King thereupon attacked in another manner, and with greater effect; first, with relation to the cause of Commendams, in which not only his behaviour, but that of the whole twelve Judges, was examined and censured in the Privy-Council, for doing what they took to be their duty, and following what they understood to be the meaning of an Act of Parliament, to which the rest submitted patiently, but Sir Edward Coke expostulated the matter with dignity and decency; so that notwithstanding he could not resist a superior power, for here he had both the Crown and the Church, or rather the Crown at the instigation of the Church, against him; yet he did not give way to it, or afford any sanction to the usage he met with, by a tame and pusillanimous submission (x) [P]. About this time the business

thereupon in one of his letters, it was the wisest part he ever acted (59); but what was right then, could it be wrong now? As to the trial of the great offenders, no man could be better acquainted with the reasons of the delay than the author of this letter; who ascribes them absolutely to the Chief Justice, though surely many of them lay out of his power. For first they could not be tried as accessaries before the fact, till the principals were convicted. Franklyn, who was the last of them, was tried on the 30th of November, and on the 9th of December following, the Countess of Somerset was brought to bed (60). This was another cause of delay, which the Chief Justice could not either foresee or prevent. But the Earl might have been tried in the mean time. He might so, if there had been evidence to convict him, which very probably there was not; since the evidence on which he was convicted, did not come to the Chief Justice's hands till the 21st of December, when by accident the trunk was discovered, in which the letters that affected him were hid (61). There was indeed a delay of four months after this, but that ought not to lie at the Chief Justice's door, as any who will peruse this Gentleman's letters to Sir George Villiers and the King will perceive. Others have accused Sir Edward Coke for his intemperate speeches, of which he is acquitted by Sir Francis Bacon; who by a very singular kind of logick, censures him for not using them, though himself advised and procured the King's command, that no harsh speeches should be used at the trials of the Earl and Countess (62). After all, what was done in the way of justice was done by Lord Coke; what was afterwards done in the way of mercy came through other hands. It is also no less certain, as the reader may see in another place, that Bacon was very jealous of Coke's becoming Chancellor; to prevent which, he insinuated some things to the King, that were not much to the advantage of Lawyers, or indeed of the Law itself (63). These are facts that occur in justification of this great man's memory, though I do not find they have ever been applied to that purpose, the reader must decide with what propriety they have been so applied here.

[P] By a tame and pusillanimous submission] The history of this affair, which is very curious, and has also a very close connection with the memoirs of this eminent person, we shall digest into the narrowest compass possible. The dispute arose thus, Dr Bilson Bishop of Winchester informed the King, that Serjeant Chiborne in arguing the cause against Commendams at the Common Pleas Bar, had maintained divers positions contrary to the King's prerogative, as that the translation of Bishops was against the Canon Law; and that the King had no power to grant Commendams but in cases of necessity; which necessity could never happen, because no man was bound to hospitality beyond his means (64). Upon this information, the King directed his Attorney-General Sir Francis Bacon, to signify his pleasure unto the Lord Chief Justice, that he held it necessary himself should be first consulted, before the Judges proceeded to argue it; and therefore the day appointed should be put off, till they might speak with his Majesty. This letter was dated April 25, 1616 (65). Sir Edward Coke upon receiving the letter, desired the other Judges might have the like, which they accordingly had; and upon their meeting together, they came unanimously to a resolution of doing in this case, what they took to be their duty; and when they had so done, they justified themselves by the following letter to the King. Mr Collier in his Ecclesiastical History, says, this letter was signed by ten Judges, of whom Coke and Hobart were two (66); but the reader will see (67), that it was signed by all the twelve, and runs thus.

Most dread and most gracious Sovereign,

IT may please your most excellent Majesty to be advertised, That this letter here inclosed, was delivered unto me your Chief Justice on Thursday last in the afternoon, by a servant of your Majesty's Attorney-General; and letters of like effect were on the day following, sent from him by his servant to us, your Majesty's Justices of every of the Courts at Westminster; we are, and ever will be ready, with all faithful and true hearts, according to our bounden duties, to serve and obey your Majesty, and think ourselves most happy to spend our times and abilities to do your Majesty true and faithful service, in this present case mentioned in this letter; what information hath been made unto you, whereupon Mr Attorney doth ground his letter from the report of the Bishop of Winton, we know not; this we know, that the true substance of the cause, summarily is thus: It consisteth principally upon the construction of two Acts of Parliament, the one of the 25th year of King Edward III, and the other of the 25th of King Henry VIII; whereof your Majesty's Judges upon their oaths, and according to their best knowledge and learning, are bound to deliver their true understanding faithfully and uprightly; and the case between two for private interest and inheritance, earnestly called on for justice and expedition. We hold it our duty to inform your Majesty, that our oath is in these express words, That in case any letters come unto us contrary to Law, that we do nothing by such letters, but certify your Majesty thereof, and go forth to do the Law notwithstanding the same letters; we have advisedly considered of the said letter of Mr Attorney, and with one consent do hold the same to be contrary to Law, and such as we could not yield to by our oath; assuredly persuading ourselves, that your Majesty being truly informed that it standeth not with your royal and just pleasure to give way to them. And therefore knowing your Majesty's zeal to justice to be most renowned, therefore we have according to our oaths and duties, at the very day prefixed the last term, proceeded, and thereof certified your Majesty, and shall ever pray to the Almighty for your Majesty in all honour, health, and happiness, long to reign over us.

The King replied in a letter, that the alledging their oath for their non-compliance, was a weak and impertinent pretence: that 'twas very unreasonable to suppose his predecessors should be carried off their guard to such a degree, as to pass an act so very prejudicial to their prerogative: that their oath only reached to private cases between subject and subject, and was designed to prevent the Prince being solicited by either of the parties. And in the close, commands them not to proceed in the cause, till his return to London. At his Majesty's coming to town, the Judges were all sent for to the Council Table. The King began with taking their letter in pieces, and shewing their misbehaviour with respect both to matter and manner. He reprimands them for their remissness, in permitting the Council to dispute his prerogative at the Bar; and tells them 'twas their duty to check those intemperate sallies, and not suffer such insolence upon the Crown. Then as to their own business he acquaints them, That deferring their resolution upon just and necessary reasons, is neither a denial nor delay of justice: 'tis rather business of the Court of Chancery was also brought to an issue, in which it is generally thought that the Chief Justice, who was a man of high spirit, and naturally prone to rough measures, was in reality much in the wrong (y). But perhaps there is somewhat of mistake in this matter, for though it should be granted that there might be something amiss in the decision of the cause in the King's-Bench, which gave occasion to this dispute, and that consequently it was reasonable the party injured should find relief elsewhere; yet as it was never suggested that the Chief Justice did any thing that was wrong, and as there appear only suspicions of his having countenanced the measure taken to support the jurisdiction of his Court, we ought not to be too hasty in concluding to his prejudice (z) [2]. But a design there was of humbling him, and a multitude of great and powerful persons were embarked in it, so that there is no great cause for amazement, if, notwithstanding his steady courage, his great integrity, and his quick and admirable parts, he was brought into great difficulties, more especially in the Royal Presence, and before a new judicature, and where those who sat while he knelt, were, some of them at least, the principal authors of his calamity, and the inventors of this new method of treating a Lord Chief Justice, considered by the nation

ther a pause of necessary prudence: nothing being more proper and advisable, than to consult the King where the Crown is concerned. He told them farther, That to say the point was a private contest between the subject, was wide of the case: for that a Bishop, the defendant, pleaded for a Commendam only in virtue of the prerogative royal: and besides, they could not prove either of the parties solicited for expedition. And lastly, he let them know their letter was indecently couched, and failed in the form. Upon this all the Judges knelt, owned their error, and craved pardon. But as to the matter, the Chief Justice Coke stood upon his defence, declared that his Majesty's command for stopping the proceedings was a delay of justice, and by consequence against Law and their oath: and that as they intended to manage the pleading, the King's prerogative should not have been concerned. To this the King answered, that for them to pronounce whether his prerogative was concerned or not, without consulting him, was preposterous management. And his Majesty required the Lord Chancellor to deliver his opinion, whether he had commanded the Judges any thing against Law and their oath?

The Chancellor excusing himself as to the point of Law, referred the Question to the King's Counsel. Upon this the Attorney-General Bacon declared, That to put off the day was no delay of justice, nor any failure in their oaths: that the King's reasons for this delay were only to secure his prerogative. And therefore puts the question to the Judges, Whether this refusal of theirs to make a stay, was not nearer a breach of their oath? For they were sworn to counsel the King when they are called. But not to give his Majesty counsel 'till the business is over, is in effect not to give counsel at all. The rest of the King's Counsel concurred with the Attorney. The Chief Justice Coke argued the King's Counsel had exceeded their bounds: that 'twas their duty to plead before the Judges, but not against them. To this the Attorney Bacon replied, that the King's Counsel were obliged both by their oath and office, not only to plead, proceed, and declare against the greatest subject, but also against any body of subjects, were they Judges, Courts, or Commons in Parliament: That the Judges had highly outraged their character by making this challenge. And in the close the Attorney appealing to the King, the Chief Justice said he would not dispute it with his Majesty. The Lord Chancellor gave his opinion for the King, and his Counsel learned in the Law. Upon this the question was put by all the Lords of the Board, Whether in a case where the King believed his prerogative or interest concerned, and requires the Judges to attend him for their advice; whether in such a case they ought not to stay proceedings 'till his Majesty has consulted them?

All the Judges submitted to the affirmative side of the question, excepting Coke Chief Justice of the King's Bench, who said, That when the case happened, he would do his duty. The Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was more compliant in his answer, and declared that for his part, he would always trust the justice of the King's command. The day drawing nigh for arguing the Commendams further, the King asked the Judges if they intended to discuss, whether the King had a general power for granting Commendams or not? They all agreed not to draw his Majesty's power into question, and promised to correct the pre-emption of those pleaders, who took the liberty to state the prerogative. And as to the present case, Judge Dodderidge gave his opinion for the King, that the Church was void and in his majesty's gift; and that he might grant a Commendam to a Bishop, before, or after consecration, and that either during life, or for years. When the Judges were gone, it was resolved by the privy-Council, that what the King required, was neither against Law, nor the Judge's oath. And this opinion was signed by all the Board (68).

[2] We ought not to be too hasty in concluding to his prejudice. We are told by a certain Historian, that the case in the King's Bench about which all this trouble arose, was a very foul one; and so indeed it was, if he hath stated it fairly (69); which from certain authorities I have seen, I really conceive he has. The matter then was thus; the defendant in the cause while in the King's Bench, prevailed upon the plaintiff's principal witnesses not to attend, or to give any evidence in the cause, provided he could be excused. One of the defendant's agents undertakes this, and carrying the witness to a tavern, called for a gallon of sack in a pot, and bid the man drink. As soon as he laid his lips to the flaggon, the defendant's agent quitted the room. When the witness was called, the Court was informed that he was unable to come, to prove which this agent was produced, who deposed, that he left him in such a condition, that if he continued in it but a quarter of an hour he was a dead man. For want of this person's testimony the cause was lost, and the verdict given for the defendant. Upon this a bill was brought in Chancery for relief, to which the defendants refused to answer, and were committed for their contempt; and they again in revenge for this, preferred bills at the close of term, as has been before mentioned. The King having all this matter brought before him, and having had it solemnly argued by his Attorney and Solicitor-General, and Counsel learned in the Law, caused the same to be settled by an order of Council (70). In this matter it cannot be denied, that the resort of the plaintiffs to the Court of Chancery was very reasonable; but then on the other hand, there is room to imagine, that some inconveniences were also discernable in the other practice, since we find that Sir Francis Bacon (71), upon his having the Seals, thought fit amongst other things to declare himself largely upon this very head in the Court of Chancery, and this in terms, which shew plainly enough, that how much soever he aggravated the offence of the Lord Chief Justice Coke, in taking such rough measures to support the jurisdiction of his Court; yet he did not care in the place he then held, to be esteemed the author of a sentiment directly opposite, but chose rather to qualify the power of the Court of Chancery, and thereby remove effectually those inconveniences, that with great reason were apprehended, from the clashing of these jurisdictions. Whoever desires to see this whole matter, as it was discussed upon this memorable occasion, may consult the book cited in the margin, and receive full satisfaction (72). It may not be amiss however to observe, that it will hereafter appear, that the Lord Chief Justice himself was content with this decision, and that he never complained of it afterwards; which is a proof, that the principal point he aimed at, was to obtain some kind of settlement, that was to be a universal benefit to the subjects of this kingdom; and for the sake of which, his conduct might surely be excused, though not justified.

It may please your Majesty,

THE Lord Chief Justice presenting himself on his knees at the Board, your Solicitor signified that he was by your commandment to charge him for certain acts and speeches, wherein your Majesty was much unsatisfied, which were in number three. I. An act done. II. Speeches of high contempt, uttered in the seat of Justice. III. Uncomely and undutiful carriage in the presence of your Majesty, the Privy Council, and Judges. Concerning the first, which was the act, it was done when he was in a place of trust, and concealed a statute of 12,000 l. taken of Sir Christopher Hatton to the use of Sir Edward Coke, when he was your Majesty's Attorney-General, not to pay a debt of good value due unto your Majesty, nor to accept of a discharge for the same. And for the better strengthening of the statute, there was likewise a bond taken of 6000 l. with sureties to the same effect. So that Sir Christopher Hatton lay charged under the penalty of 18,000 l. not to pay the debt, nor agree to any surrender, discharge or release, nor any ways to assent thereunto. That this offence was aggravated by the denial and protestation made of late by the Lord Chief Justice, that he was not privy to the condition of the defeazance, whereas the statute was taken to himself by indenture, whereof Sir Christopher Hatton's part was found, but the other was not found. That he was privy to the penning of it, inserted words with his own hands, and that Mr Walter and Mr Bridgman his own Counsel, were witnesses thereunto. The second words spoken in the King's Bench the last day of Hillary Term last, at a case of Glanvill and Allen, whereof the Solicitor made a narrative relation, and charged the Lord Chief Justice to have given too much heart and encouragement to that cause; and that he had too constantly directed the Jury, turning them thrice from the Bar, that if they set their hand to a bill after judgement, he would foreclose them the Court. And further in another cause the same day, said that the Common Law of England would be overthrown, and that the light of the Law would be obscured. And that all this was confirmed by good witnesses. The third and last point, was his undecent behaviour before your Majesty, your Council, and your Judges. And that consisted of two points. First, the exception that he took at your learned Counsel in your presence, for speaking at your commandment. The second, that your Majesty having opened yourself in the case of Commendams, and satisfied the Judges that your Majesty's sending to them, had no intent to delay justice; and the question being put to the rest of the Judges, whether they did not hold it for a delay of Justice that your Majesty had sent in the case, or if your Majesty should send hereafter in a like case, wherein your Majesty's progenitors were interested? The rest of the Judges submitting themselves, he only dissented from all the rest. This being the effect of your Solicitor's charge, your Lord Chief Justice made answer, that he would by their Lordships favour begin with the last. And said, for the part of challenge and taking exception at your Majesty's Counsel learned, speaking in the case by your Majesty's commandment, he acknowledged it for an error, and submitted himself. To the part, that upon the question asked the Judges, touching stay of proceedings, he denied when all the rest did yield, his answer was, That the question yielded many particulars, which suddenly occurred to his mind, and caused him to make his answer; that when the time should be, he would do that which should become an honest and just Judge. For the bond he saith, that that assurance was in hammering a year and a half, they were Elephantii libelli; and now twelve years being past, it was no great marvel if his memory were short. Especially since about that time he was employed, first, in the great service of the Priest treason and Cobham, and in the next year in the Powder treason. And that if any things had slipped in the multitude of business, that these services blot out his errors. Secondly, ab impossibili, which was, that the debt remaining at the time, was 33,000 l. and that young Mr Hatton's means were very mean, and not above 100 marks a year. And as soon as it came to the possibility, when he first heard of Sir Robert Rich's offer, he then submitted it before such time as he remembered the statute or defeazance. Thirdly, Cui bono? He said he had never any profit by it, but the presentation to a benefice, and all the rest was his wife's. Fourthly, that the Crown was content with the establishment, and he did but take bond to continue it. And throughout all this, he did submit himself to your Majesty and the Board, saying, Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. For his speech in the King's Bench, &c. he saith, that first, whatsoever was done, was by the common consent. And for those speeches, many of them were spoken, and he knew by whom they were spoken, but not by himself. And then offered four considerations. I. That the Court, unto which nevertheless he did accept, was ad informandum non ad convincendum. II. They were witnesses but on one side. III. That the interrogatories might be drawn too short. IV. That it was concerning words spoken four months ago, which being spoken amongst many, may be diversly reported. And thereupon produced a paper written by himself, containing, as he saith, the true passage of the day (which paper we present unto your Majesty here withal) being as he saith, set down by himself the day after, sedato animo. And touching these words, that the Common Law would be overthrown, and the Judges would have but little to do at the Assizes, because the light of the Law would be obscured, he confesseth the words, but saith, they were not spoken the same day, but at another time, in a case of Sir Anthony Mildmay's. And added, that he would not maintain a difference between the two Courts, nor bring it into question; yet if it were an error, he may say, Erravimus cum patribus. And thereupon alleged the examples. First, the article against Cardinal Wolsey, 20 Hen. VIII, wherein the same words are used, viz. that such proceedings in the Chancery, tended to the subversion of the Common Law, art. 20. Secondly, the book intituled the Doctor and Student. Thirdly, an opinion of the Judges in Throgmorton's case, in Queen Elizabeth's time. And added also further, that for the time to come, no man should ever make any opposition. So that the Judges having received your Majesty's commandment by the Attorney General, that no bill of that nature should be hereafter received, he and his brethren have caused the same to be entered as an order in the same Court, which shall be observed; which being the effect of his answer, we have thought to add withal, that before us, as well in speech as in action, he behaved himself modestly and submissively.

On the 30th of June following, the Chief Justice presented himself again at the Council Table (74) upon his knees, when Secretary Winwood informed him, that report had been made to his Majesty of what had passed there on the Wednesday before, together with the answer he had given, and that too in the most favourable manner, but that his Majesty was no way satisfied in respect to any of the heads; but that notwithstanding his Majesty, as well out of his own clemency, as in regard to the former services of his Lordship, was pleased not to deal heavily with him, and therefore had decreed, I. That he be sequestered from the Council Table, until his Majesty's pleasure be further known. II. That he forbear to ride his summer-circuit as Justice of Assize. III. That during this vacation, while he had time to live privately and dispose himself at home, he take into his consideration and review his books of Reports; wherein as his Majesty is informed, be many extravagant and exorbitant opinions set down and published, for positive and good Law. And if in reviewing and reading thereof, he find any thing fit to be altered and amended, the correction

The issue of this strange business was, that on the thirtieth of June 1616, Sir Edward Coke was suspended from the execution of his office, and Sir Randolph Crew appointed to go the circuit in his stead (b); things stood thus till the 15th of November, when Sir Henry Mountague was made Chief Justice, and at the time of his being sworn into his office it was intimated, that the cause of his predecessor's removal was his too great popularity (c). We are however to consider this merely as a colour, since it is in a manner certain, that he lost his office for not complying with the will of the favourite, then Lord Viscount Villiers (d), afterwards Duke of Buckingham; and as this assertion would be an inexcusable injury to King James's administration if it was not well founded, so it will be shewn in the notes, that it is not a piece of secret History drawn from the libels of those times, or from weak and suspected authorities, but supported by plain, positive and incontestible evidence (e) [S]. Thus was this great man removed from that high seat of Justice, in which he had been regarded as the oracle of the Law; and he it spoken to his honour, that he was removed by the power of his enemies, and did not fall through any fault of his own. Not that Sir Edward Coke was free from imperfections, either as a man or as a Judge; but those imperfections were not of a nature to require, or to justify, such a proceeding towards him; and this is apparent from hence, that he might have been restored if he would but have taken, not the right but the ready, road to it, which he disdained, for his answer upon such a motion was (f), That as a Judge ought not to take, so neither ought he to give, a bribe. We are told that his Master said of him, That whichever way he was thrown he would fall upon his feet, but perhaps it might be more truly said, that in spite of all the art and power of his adversaries, he still stood upon them (g), and made good his motto, when advanced restitution is left to his discretion. Amongst other things, the King was not well pleased with the title of those books, wherein he styled himself Lord Chief Justice of England, whereas he could challenge no more, but Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench. And having corrected, what in his discretion he found meet, in these Reports, his Majesty's pleasure was, he should bring the same privately to himself, that he might consider thereof, as in his princely judgment should be found expedient. Hereunto Mr Secretary advised him to conform himself in all duty and obedience, as he ought, whereby he might hope that his Majesty in time, would receive him again to his gracious and princely favour. Thereunto the Lord Chief Justice made answer, That he did in all humility prostrate himself to his Majesty's good pleasure; that he acknowledged that decree to be just, and proceeded rather from his Majesty's exceeding mercy, than from his justice; gave humble thanks to their Lordships for their favours and goodness towards him; and hoped that his behaviour for the future time, shall be such as should deserve their Lordships favours. The Lords having thus far proceeded, The Lord Treasurer told him, that he had one thing more to let him know, which belonged to the Earl marshal to take notice of, which was, that his coachman used to ride bear-headed before him, which was more than any ways he could assume or challenge to himself, and required him to forbear it for the future. To which the Lord Chief Justice answered, That his coachman did it only for his own ease, and not by his commandment. And so, with the like submission and acknowledgment of favour, departed.

[S] But supported by plain, positive, and incontestible evidence. A certain writer, who says that he had his information from one of his Lordship's sons, gives us the history of his removal, pretty truly in the main (75); though he makes a strange mistake in the name, and lets slip, a very material passage, if indeed his author out of regard to his father's memory, did not conceal it from him. We will relate the whole story, let the blame fall where it will. In the time of the Earl of Somerset's prosperity, Sir Edward Coke had given his consent to an agreement, that upon Sir John Roper's resigning the office of Chief Clerk for inrolling of Pleas in the King's Bench, which at that time was worth four thousand pounds a year, he would admit two persons that should hold that office in trust for the favourite (76). Upon the fall of the Earl of Somerset, and the rise of Sir George Villiers, an overture was made to the Chief Justice by Sir Francis Bacon, that he should admit two trustees for the new favourite (77). To this the Chief Justice gave no other answer, than that he was old and could not struggle, which very probably was taken for a mark of compliance. But when Sir John Roper actually surrendered his office, in consideration of which, July 9, 1616, he was created Lord Teynham (78), the Chief Justice shewed himself of another opinion, and suggested, that as the salary of the Judges in his Court were very small, it would be an easy matter to augment them, by making a proper use of this place, which was absolutely in his disposal (79). This was Sir Edward's great crime, for a resolution was immediately taken to remove him, and to prefer another person, who should do what the favourite, now Lord Viscount Villiers, expected. It seems that Lord Teynham was desirous of having one of the lives, and leaving the other to the Viscount, and to this the Lord Treasurer Suffolk was inclined to give way, but the Attorney-General interposed warmly, and secured both lives for his friend. He went farther still, for he took declarations in trust from Mr Shute and Mr Heath, afterwards Solicitor-General, who were to be the Viscount's deputies and trustees, so as to secure him the entire benefit of that office for their lives, that he might dispose of it by will in case he died before them (80). His caution stretched beyond this, for Sir Henry Mountague, then Recorder of London, being the person fixed upon to succeed Sir Edward Coke, he took a tye of him (not a tye, as it is falsely printed in Bacon's Works) that is, an obligation that he would keep his promise (81); for having mistaken one Chief Justice's sense, he was resolved not to trust another. Accordingly he was no sooner possessed of his office, than Lord Villiers's deputies were admitted. All these circumstances are collected, as the reader sees, from Bacon's own letters; and if it be requisite to shew, that this was the true and absolute reason of Sir Edward Coke's removal, we have their testimony for that too, for thus Sir Francis Bacon writes to the Viscount (82). 'I did cast advanced to the degree of a Serjeant, The Law is the best helmet; for it was not long before a new turn happened in his affairs, and that some even of those who were most busy in bringing him into difficulties, found it for their interest, and therefore were as ready, to bring him out of them again; and to smooth the way for his return to some degree, at least, of the King his Master's favour. — But the first step to his being restored to credit, was a difference that fell out between the Lord Keeper Bacon, and Secretary Winwood; for upon the King's going to Scotland about the middle of March 1617, the chief direction of affairs was confided to the former, who carrying it somewhat haughtily to the Secretary, he is said to have refused ever to sit afterwards with him in Council, during the King's absence (b). Sir Edward Coke having business with Secretary Winwood, who was his old friend, and knowing his interest with the favourite, now become Earl of Buckingham, proposed to him a match between the Earl's elder brother Sir John Villiers, and his own youngest daughter by the Lady Hatton (i). An account of this being written to Buckingham in Scotland, the proposal was readily accepted, but it very quickly appeared, that notwithstanding the great personages interested therein, it was not like to proceed so quietly as might have been expected, and, in process of time, this little family business ripened into an affair of State (k). On the one hand, the Lady Hatton resenting her husband's attempt to dispose of her daughter without asking her leave, carried away the young Lady, and lodged her at Sir Edmund Withpole's house near Oatlands (l). Upon this Sir Edward wrote immediately to the Earl of Buckingham, to procure a warrant from the Privy-Council to restore his daughter to him, but before he received an answer, he had intelligence where she was, and thereupon, without waiting for any authority, he went with his sons to Sir Edmund Withpole's house, and took her away by force, which produced a complaint of the Lady Hatton to the Privy-Council (m). On the other hand, the Lord Keeper Bacon, suspecting that he should lose the favourite, and in consequence of that the King, opposed this match to the utmost, and thereby drew upon himself immediately that, of which he had only a distant apprehension. For Buckingham, who was not of a nature to bear any contradiction, resented his proceeding highly; and his mother, the Lady Compton, lost all patience, and treated the Lord Keeper with extraordinary freedom (n). His Lordship, however, was so set upon carrying this point, that he countenanced the Attorney-General, Sir Henry Yelverton, (the same person who had advised Weston to stand mute at his trial) in filing an information in the Star-Chamber against Sir Edward Coke, for the steps he had taken to recover his daughter (o). In the mean time the two Ladies, Compton and Hatton, came to a good understanding, and soon after the latter was, in appearance at least, reconciled to Sir Edward Coke, upon which the Star-Chamber suit was suspended. On the King's return from Scotland, which was on the fifteenth of September, Sir Edward Coke was restored to his favour, and reinstated in his place (p), as a Privy-Counsellor, for which however he paid pretty dearly [T]. The King's affairs in general were at this time in much disorder on every

[T] For which however he paid pretty dearly.] To such a degree was King James under the direction and dominion of his favourite, that upon his coming to London, he signified his satisfaction in their conduct to such of his Ministers as had promoted this match, and made those who had opposed it thoroughly sensible of his displeasure, particularly Bacon and Yelverton; the former by a very deep submission to Buckingham, soon recovered the King's good graces (83); but the latter stood upon his integrity, and never made any submissions, which cost him afterwards the loss of a great part of his fortune, and a severe imprisonment; and yet his courage and constant friendship to his old master Somerset, wrought so much with Buckingham, that he sued for his friendship, and made him a Judge of the Common pleas unasked, in which station he died (84). The very same day the King arrived, Sir Edward Coke was admitted to his presence and to the Council Table, and on Michaelmas-day following, Sir John Villiers was married to Mrs Frances Coke at Hamton-Court, with all the splendour imaginable (85). It was this wedding, that as it restored Sir Edward to credit at Court, went so deep in his fortune. For besides 10,000 l. paid in money at two payments, Sir Edward and his son Sir Robert, did upon the 2d of November, pursuant to articles and directions from the Lords of the Council, assure to Sir John Villiers a rent charge of 2000 marks per annum, during Sir Edward's life; and of 900 l. a year during the Lady Hatton's, if she survived her husband. And after both their deaths, the manor of Stoke, &c. in Buckinghamshire, of the value of 900 l. per annum (being the moiety of the lands intended to his two daughters by the lady Hatton) to Sir John Villiers and his Lady, and to the heirs of her body. And that the same were settled by good conveyances carefully drawn, upon the 27th of January, 1617, was certified to his Majefty, under the hands of Sir Ranulph Crewe, Sir Robert Hicham, and Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Serjeants and Attorney (86). It is not absolutely certain what settlements were made by the Lady Hatton upon this marriage, but without question they were very considerable; for since her marriage with Sir Edward Coke, she had purchased the island and castle of Purbeck, and several other estates in different counties; and by her liberality upon this occasion, she procured her liberty soon after; for at the time of the marriage she was confined, upon the complaint of her husband (87). On the 2d of November she was set at large, and on the 18th of the same month, she entertained (88) the King, the Duke of Buckingham, and the whole Court without inviting her husband, in the month of June 1619, Sir John Villiers was raised to the dignity of Baron Stoke in the County of Buckingham, and Viscount Purbeck in the County of Dorset (89); and it was currently reported, that the Lady Hatton might have been raised to the dignity of Viscountess Westmoreland at the same time, but that she refused to come up to the price (90). All this time the quarrel between her and her husband subsisted, and many letters are still preserved, which shew a great deal of heat and resentment in both parties; and what is most extraordinary, is to find that several persons of the first quality in the Kingdom, interested themselves deeply on both sides in this quarrel, inasmuch that the Lord Houghton (formerly Sir John Hollis) was committed, for having, in conjunction with Lady Hatton, framed some scandalous libels against Sir Edward Coke (91). This marriage of the Lord Purbeck and his Lady, as it began with so much trouble and disturbance, became productive of much more; the Lady being accused of two great familiarities with Sir Robert Howard, which served to exercise the tongues of the multitude for many years (92). The Lord Viscount side, but more especially in respect to his treasure, which, through his own liberality on one side, and the frauds of those who had been entrusted with the management of it on the other, was in a great measure exhausted, and, which was still worse, it was found a thing equally difficult, to procure supplies, or to work a reformation (9). The Favourite was by no means inclined to a Parliament, the only method by which the first could be obtained; and therefore the latter was looked upon as the only remedy, in respect to which the counsels of Sir Edward Coke were very much regarded. The Lord Chancellor Bacon seeing him in this road, and aiming, as he apprehended, at the post of Lord Treasurer, dropped his animosity, and from this time forward we find Sir Edward Coke's abilities represented in a very favourable light both to Buckingham and the King his master (r). It would draw this article into too great a length, if we should enter particularly into the services he performed of this kind during his continuance in favour, and therefore it shall suffice to give the reader a succinct account of them in the note [U]. The enemies of this great man have represented him as one of an impatient spirit, and yet apt to retain the impression of injuries, and to follow them at a great distance of time with extraordinary resentment (s). If this was really a part of his character, he had undoubtedly as many favourable opportunities, during the short space in which he enjoyed this second possession of power from the recovery of his master's favour, as ever any man had, to gratify them, since, except those of his enemies who had reconciled themselves to him, there was hardly one that did not fall under the weight of his hand, a few instances of which make not only proper, but indeed necessary parts of his personal History. In the year 1691, the chief of the Dutch merchants in England fell under a prosecution for exporting bullion contrary to Law, in the bringing which cause to a hearing, Sir Edward Coke was almost alone, the Chancellor Bacon being suspicious of the event from a change in the Attorney-General's conduct, who, though warm in the beginning of the prosecution, grew faint before the trial; but Sir Edward, well knowing the grounds upon which he went, kept his own pace, and would not be either drawn off, or taken down in the management of this business, which he brought to it's intended issue, and the several offenders were fined in the Star-Chamber to the

Purbeck went abroad in the latter end of May 1620, under colour of drinking the waters at the Spaw, but in fact, as Camden tells us, to hide from the world his being run mad with pride (93). To this man, and to him only of all Buckingham's family, Sir Anthony Weldon gives a good character, and insinuates, that his wife was supported in her bad behaviour, 'till she drove him mad (94); which is a little improbable, considering the prosecutions set on foot against her for her bad behaviour. Many years after this, Viscount Purbeck married privately after her demise, the daughter of Sir William Slingsby of Yorkshire, by whom he had a son, who married the daughter of Sir John Danvers, one of the King's Judges, and obtained a patent from the Protector Cromwell, to change his name from Villiers to Danvers, but he died without issue (95).

[U] A succinct account of them in the note] We can only give the reader here, an account from the records of those weighty and important affairs, in which Sir Edward Coke as a Privy-Counsellor was employed. He was commissioned 23 June 1618, 16 Jac. I. (96), with other Privy-Counsellors, to put in force the Act of Parliament made in Queen Elizabeth's reign, against Jesuits, Seminary Priests and others; and to banish them out of England and Ireland, and all other the King's dominions. The same year he was also commissioned with others, in confidence of their approved wisdoms, fidelities, and circumspections, from time to time, to call before them all officers, or Minister's Clerks and other Persons, that since the first of May, in the 10th year of the reign of the King, had any charge, directly or indirectly, in or about the receipt or disbursement of any of his treasure; or had any office in or about the receipt or disbursement of his treasure; as also to view Privy-Councils, and other warrants, orders, tallies, books, &c. to the same belonging, in order to discover frauds committed by the Ministry, in disposing of the public money.

The year after, the King signifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. one of his Privy-council, and others, 2 July 1619 (97). That whereas by a late commission dated the 19th of April last past, he impowered them, or some of them, to make inventories and schedules of all such jewels, precious stones, ornaments, household stuff, and implements, &c. as did belong to his late dear consort Queen Anne, in her life time, with their names, fashions, qualities, and values, and the same to sign, which they had performed. And so much as he appointed the choicest of them to be sent to the secret Jewel-house in the Tower of London, others to be preserved for presents for Ambassadors; others to be preserved for presents for Ambassadors, and others to the custody of Sir Henry Knight, Master and Treasurer of his jewels and plate; and others to be kept at Denmark-House for ornament there, or otherwise to be disposed of at pleasure; and the rest, being of small value, to be disposed of to the best advantage, and a book or inventory being made of the same, with their names, fashions, and quantities, amounting to the sum of 20,000*l.* or thereabouts. Therefore confiding in their approved fidelities, wisdoms, and circumspections, he commissions them to sell and dispose of the same, at such rates and prices, as the same stand therein valued, or to the most benefit and advantage; and the monies arising thereby, to deliver into the receipt of Exchequer, &c.

He was also commissioned, 16 July 1619, 17 Jac. I. (98), to confer with the Deputies of the States General, touching the differences between the Dutch East-India Company and the English merchants trading to the East Indies. And by another commission dated at Westminster the twenty-ninth of April, 1620, 18 Jac. I. (99), he was empowered to put in force certain laws, relating to matters ecclesiastick. Also by commission dated at Westminster the 22d of June, 1620 (100), 18 Jac. I. he and others were to inquire into the abuses touching fines payable to his Majesty, as well by copyholders as freeholders, on surrenders, alienations, and the herriots, reliefs, escheats, perquisites and profits of courts, waifs, estrays, goods and chattels of felons, growing due to his said Majesty; and being within the survey of the court of Exchequer. And in another commission dated at Westminster, 15 July 1620 (101), 18 Jac. I. he was empowered, with others of the Privy-Council, to demise the royalties of the Crown, casualties and casual profits, and to suppress the superfluous number of officers, and for reducing the unnecessary charge of them. The same year, the King on December the twelfth, signifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt. and others, the great offences committed by transporting to foreign parts great quantities of brazen and iron ordinance for their private lucre and gain, contrary to Law; and therefore appoints them commissioners, to examine witnesses, on or without oath; and to search into such books or writings, as to them shall seem convenient, for the discovery of all such matters, since the beginning of his reign. Such were the services, in which Sir Edward Coke was employed during his second return to royal favour.

the amount of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which as they were very able to pay, this might have been a seasonable relief to his Master, if Buckingham, at the request of the States-General, had not interfered and procured a mitigation (i). The year following the Lord High-Treasurer Suffolk and his Lady fell into disgrace, and under a severe prosecution for corruption; the reader has been told how that Lord stepped once a little out of his way to reflect upon Sir Edward Coke when upon his knees, upon his coachman's driving bare-headed, but Sir Edward now sat on the Bench when he came to receive his sentence in the Star-Chamber, Nov. 15, 1619, and led the way in a long and learned speech, where, after shewing how often Treasurers had pillaged both King and people, he concluded with proving, that by the Earl and his Countess the King had lost fifty thousand pounds, for which he fined them double that sum, and imprisonment in the Tower 'till it was paid; but the Lord Chief Justice Hobart thinking that too much, proposed thirty thousand, and with him the major part of the Court agreed, but the Earl and Countess were committed to the Tower, and their instrument, Sir John Bingley, to the Fleet (u). In 1620, the Attorney-General Yelverton, who, when he was Solicitor, had been so active against the Lord Chief Justice, fell under a like prosecution, for having put some clauses into a charter for the City of London for which he had no warrant, and tho' his cause was drawn to a great length, yet on the eighth of November it came to a hearing, when Sir Edward Coke, whose place it was to begin, concluded his long and bitter speech, as a certain author calls it, with a fine of six thousand pounds and loss of his place, which the rest of the Court moderated to four thousand pounds, discharging him of his place by way of opinion, but submitting the same to the King, during whose pleasure they also sentenced him to imprisonment in the Tower (w). It appeared clearly towards the end of this year, that the King's affairs absolutely required the calling of a Parliament, which was chiefly advised by Chancellor Bacon, now become Lord Verulam and Viscount St Albans, who undertook to prepare things for it's meeting, and in this consulted with, and had all the assistance that Sir Edward Coke (x) could give him, notwithstanding which, it was very far from answering those purposes for which it was called. Sir Edward Coke was a member, and his age, experience, and dignity, gave him a great weight there; but it very soon appeared that he was resolved to act a different part from what the Court, and more especially the great favourite Buckingham, expected. On the sixth of February 1620-21, there was a great debate in the House of Commons on several points of importance, such as liberty of speech, the increase of Popery, and other grievances, upon which Sir Edward Coke spoke very warmly, and also took occasion to shew, that Proclamations against the tenor of Acts of Parliament were void, for which he is highly commended by Camden (y). On the fifteenth of March, complaints were made to the House of Commons against the Lord Viscount St Albans, Chancellor of England, in which Sir Edward Coke was of the Committee for preparing the charge, and proceeded mildly (z). On the fifth of May following, Clement Coke Esq; youngest son to Sir Edward, was committed to the Tower for some rash expressions that had escaped him (a). In the month of July Sir Edward Coke and his wife, the Lady Hatton, were reconciled by the King (b). The Houses being adjourned by the King's command on the fourth of June, met again in November, and, upon their meeting, the House of Commons fell into great heats on account of the commitment of Sir Edwin Sands soon after the adjournment, which had such unfortunate consequences, that on the one hand the Commons protested, December 18, 1621, against the invasion of their privileges, upon which the King prorogued the Parliament on the 21st (c), and on the 27th Sir Edward Coke was committed to the Tower, and his chambers in the Temple being broke open, his papers were delivered to Sir Robert Cotton and Mr Wilson to examine (d). On the thirtieth of December the King sent for the Journal of the House of Commons, and tore out the Protest with his own hand, as appears by an Act of Council (e) drawn up by his order upon that occasion. On the sixth of January the Parliament was dissolved, and the same day Sir Edward Coke was charged before the Council with having concealed some true examinations, in the great cause of the Earl of Somerset, and obtruding false ones (f); notwithstanding which he was soon after released, but not without receiving some very high marks of the King's resentment, for he was a second time turned out of the Privy-Council, and the King gave him this character, That he was the fittest instrument for a tyrant that ever was in England, which might very probably be, on account of his having called the King's prerogative in Parliament a great monster (g). Some have represented him as very inconsistent in this, but we want sufficient lights to judge of this question, and where we find them in others, it never appears that Sir Edward Coke did not know what he was saying, or was ever at a loss to defend what he had done. Notwithstanding all this we find, that towards the close of the year 1623, the King issued a commission to him with several others, in which very large powers were given them in the kingdom of Ireland, but it might be very much questioned, whether this was a mark of favour and confidence, or a stigma of banishment and disgrace; but it is very apparent that Sir Edward himself understood it in the latter sense, and yet he was willing to have gone (h) [W]. It may be the willingness he shewed prevented his going, though other gentlemen who were in his sentiments actually went. He remained firm in his opinions, nor does there appear any traces of his seeking to be again reconciled to the Court; so that he was absolutely out of favour at the death of King James. In the beginning of the next reign, when it was found necessary to call a second Parliament, he was pricked for Sheriff of the county of Buckingham in 1625, to prevent his being chose (i). He laboured all he could to avoid it, in order to which he took exceptions against the oath, which he transmitted to the Attorney-General, who, by order of the Council, attended the Judges, who found only one objection out of four to be reasonable, and that was as to the prosecution of Lollards (k), in respect to which the oath was amended, but Sir Edward was obliged to serve the office, and to attend the Judges at the assizes, who had been Chief Justice of England himself (l). This did not hinder his being elected Knight of the shire for the county of Bucks, in that Parliament which was held in the year 1628 (m), in which he distinguished himself more than any man in the House of Commons, spoke warmly for the redress of grievances, argued boldly in defence of the liberty of the subject, and strenuously supported the privileges of the House of Commons (n). In this Parliament he did the highest service to his country, not only in regard to his personal endeavours, but perhaps the highest that was ever done by a private man; for he it was, that, laying hold of a message from the King, proposed and framed the PETITION of RIGHTS (o). He also, on the fifth of June 1628, vindicated the right of the House of Commons to proceed against any subject how high soever, who misled his Sovereign to the prejudice of his subjects, by naming the Duke of Buckingham as the cause of all the miseries of the kingdom [X]. We are indeed told by the noble Historian, that, not long before this, Sir Edward such persons into commissions, for the kingdom of Ireland (102), with great expressions of royal kindness and confidence in them, but with a real design to prevent their being troublesome, by sending them out of the realm. The truth of the first part of this account, will sufficiently appear, by giving the heads of that commission, in which the name of Sir Edward Coke was inserted, and his own explanation of the matter five years after, will make good the latter part of the assertion. On the twenty-ninth of December 1623 (103), the King signifies to Sir Edward Coke, Knt, and others, That whereas he granted his commission to his Deputy of Ireland and others, dated at Westminster the twentieth of March, in the nineteenth year of his reign, out of his princely care and desire to advance the flourishing state of Ireland, by the increase of trade, settling of plantations, &c. he now commissions Henry Viscount Falkland, Deputy of Ireland, Sir Edward Coke, Knt; Sir William Jones, Knt, Sir Edwin Sandys, Knt, John Lloyd and Francis Phillips, to inquire what, and how, many parishes and churches be in Ireland; also how many presentations, and which are appropriate, and how those churches are served, &c. and to consider what churches are fit to be repaired or new built, &c. and generally to inquire into all matters tending to the decay of religion in that kingdom; as also into the trade and commerce of that nation, &c. Thus far the commission, let us come next to the explication.

In the third parliament, called in the reign of King Charles the first, viz. April the second 1628. amongst other grievances, this of sending men abroad against their will, and thereby into a kind of involuntary banishment, was canvassed in the House of Commons (104); when Mr Selden, Sir Thomas Hobby, Sir Peter Hayman, Mr Hakvil, and others, delivered their sentiments; amongst the rest, Sir Edward Coke spoke to the following effect (105): 'No restraint, be it ever so little, but is imprisonment, and foreign employment is a kind of honourable banishment: I myself was designed to go to Ireland, I was willing to go, and hoped if I had gone, to have found some Mompessons there; there is difference when the party is the King's servant, and when not, 46 E. III. This was the time, when the law was in it's height; Sir Richard Pembridge was a Baron, and the King's servant, and at that time Warden of the Cinque-Ports, he was commanded to go to Ireland, and to serve as Deputy there, which he refused; he was not committed, but the King was highly offended, and having offices, and fees, and lands, pro servitio suo impenso, the King seized his lands and offices. I went to the parliament roll, 47 E. III, where I found another precedent for foreign employment; they that have offices pro consilio or servitio impenso, if they refuse, those lands and offices so given are seized, but no commitment.'

[X] By naming the Duke of Buckingham as the cause of all the miseries of the kingdom. On the fifth of June

1628, Sir John Finch, the Speaker of the House of Commons, delivered a message to the House from the King, importing, that his Majesty had fixed a day for putting an end to their session, and therefore required that they should not enter into new business, or lay any aspersion on the Government, or Ministers thereof. This produced a warm debate, in which Sir John Elliot, advancing somewhat that looked as if he meant to touch the Duke of Buckingham; the Speaker rose up, and said, There is a command upon me, that I must command you not to proceed (106). Upon this a deep silence ensued, and then the House resolved itself into a committee, to consider what was fit to be done; and ordered that no man should go out, on pain of going to the Tower. The Speaker however desiring to withdraw, had leave so to do; and Mr Whitby being in the chair, Sir Edward Coke spoke to the following effect (107): 'We have dealt with that duty and moderation, that never was the like, rebus sic stantibus, after such a violation of the liberties of the subjects; let us take this to heart. In 30 E. III. were they then in doubt in parliament to name men that misled the King? they accused John de Gaunt, the King's son, and Lord Latimer, and Lord Nevil for misleading the King; and they went to the Tower for it. Now when there is such a downfall of the State, shall we hold our tongues? How shall we answer our duties to God and men? 7 Hen. IV. parl. rot. No. 31, 32, and 11 Hen. IV. No. 13, there the Council are complained of and are removed from the King; they mewed up the King, and dissuaded him from the common good; and why are we now retired from that way we were in? why may we not name those, that are the cause of all our evils? In 4 Hen. III, and 27 E. III, and 13 R. II, the parliament moderateth the King's prerogative; and nothing grows to abuse, but this House hath power to treat of it; what shall we do? let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not prosper us. I think the Duke of Buckingham is the cause of all our miseries; and till the King be informed thereof, we shall never go out with honour, or sit with honour here; that no man is the grievance of grievances; let us set down the causes of all our disasters, and all will reflect upon him.' It seems, that the Patriots of those times were either much more in earnest, or much better dissemblers, than in others; for we are assured, that the Speaker wept very much, while he delivered his disagreeable message to the House; that many of the members followed his example, during the silence occasioned thereby; and that Sir Edward Coke himself sat down, after he began speaking, to wipe away his tears (108). His speech was seconded by Mr Selden, and at length it was agreed to frame a remonstrance to the King, and therein to name the Duke of Buckingham as the great author of their grievances. But while this was in agitation, the Speaker, who went privately to the King, returned, and in his Majesty's name desired them to adjourn to the next day, ward Coke had blasphemously stiled the same Duke our Saviour (p). It is not easy to excuse him upon this head, but perhaps if we had the whole of that speech the task might not be so difficult. In all probability this might be in the last Parliament of King James, when the Duke of Buckingham took great pains to shew, that he brought the Prince back from Spain, and was the breaker of the match, as most undoubtedly he was, and for that reason grew into as great favour with the people, as he had been, with either of his Royal Masters. At this time, if, in the high-flown eloquence of that age, Sir Edward Coke did stile him Saviour of the nation, it might deserve pardon, though it could not be justified. But the noble Historian himself, in the very place where he says this, confesses that the Duke had been the cause of dissolving two Parliaments, and of some violent counsels that had attended these dissolutions, by which, whatever he might intend, he certainly frees Sir Edward Coke from inconsistency, since the Duke's saving the nation by bringing home the Prince and breaking the Spanish match, gave him no title to proceed so far as he afterwards did, towards the ruin of the King and kingdom; and all that can be inferred from hence in reference to the person of whom we are speaking, is no more than this, that he was a very open and frank Orator upon all occasions, for there is nothing appears to shew that he was not alike sincere in both his declarations. We may add to this, that whatever he might design with regard to the Duke, he could not by that high commendation seek to flatter King James, with whom the Favourite then stood upon doubtful terms; and in the last case he did what he took to be his duty, without fear of incurring the hatred of the Favourite, or the displeasure of his Master. After the dissolution of this Parliament, which happened March 28, 1628-9, he retired to his house at Stoke-Pogey's (q) in Buckinghamshire, where he spent the remainder of his days in a quiet retirement, universally respected and esteemed; his behaviour in the latter part of his life having cancelled all the prejudices that had been formed against him in the earlier part of it, and there, September 3, 1634, he breathed his last, in the eighty-sixth year of his life, expiring with these words in his mouth, Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done (r). It is said that he was persecuted by the resentment of his potent enemies even in his very latest moments, Sir Francis Windebanke entering his house, in virtue of an order of Council for seizing certain seditious papers, when he took away his Commentary upon Littleton, and the History of that Judge's Life in his own hand writing; his Commentary upon Magna Charta, &c. the Pleas of the Crown, and Jurisdiction of Courts, and fifty-one other manuscripts, together with his last Will and Testament, in which he had disposed of his very large fortune in the way he judged most convenient, amongst his numerous posterity. About seven years afterwards, upon a motion made by one of his sons in the House of Commons, the King was desired to order all the papers taken by Sir Francis Windebanke out of Sir Edward's house, to be delivered to Sir Robert Coke his heir, with which his Majesty was graciously pleased to comply, and such of them as could be found, were accordingly so delivered; but as to his Will it was never heard of, to the no small prejudice of his family (s). We have now compleated the memoirs of this great man, but there still remains a duty incumbent upon us, to say somewhat of his publick and private character, as well as of his valuable writings. To begin then with his person, which was every way well proportioned, his features regular, his countenance always grave and composed, and his air and manner of speaking full of dignity (t). He was neat, but not nice, in his dress; and his common saying was, That the cleanness of a man's cloaths, ought to put him in mind of keeping all clean within (u). He had great quickness of parts, deep penetration, a faithful memory, and a solid judgment. He was wont to say, That matter lay in a little room, and in his pleadings he was concise, but in set speeches, and in his writings, rather too diffuse; but whether this was owing to an affectation of learning, to the activity of his fancy, and the strength of his memory, which furnished not only a copiousness but a redundancy of matter; or to the error of the times, when this manner of speaking and writing was much in fashion, is not easy to determine (w). He was indubitably a great master of his profession, as even his enemies allow; had studied it regularly, and was perfectly acquainted with all the old authors in which the true principles of our laws are found, and with the records which contain the laws themselves. It was by his singular and comprehensive knowledge in these, that he gained so high an esteem in Westminster-hall, and came to enjoy so large a share in the great Lord Burleigh's favour, who never loved superficial men, or raised any that were not masters of the science they professed (x). He valued himself, and not without reason, upon this, that he obtained all his preferments without employing either prayers or pence; and that he became the Queen's Solicitor, Speaker of the House of Commons, Attorney-General, Chief Justice of both Benches, High-Steward of Cambridge, and a member of the Privy-Council, without either begging or bribing. As he derived his fortune, his credit, and his greatness, from the Law, so he loved it with the most sincere affection (y), some think to a degree of intemperance; but however that which was agreed (109). But in consequence of this debate, a remonstrance was drawn up full of duty and respect to the King, as well as zeal and fidelity to the publick, in which the Duke of Buckingham, and the Bishops Neale and Laud, are expressly named, as the authors of those calamities which the nation felt at that time (110); and the concern he had in this, was the very last publick service that Sir Edward Coke rendered to his country.

might be, as he maintained the character of a learned and upright Judge upon the Bench, to which he was raised by his abilities at the bar; so he had no desire to hide his talent in a napkin, or to conceal the lights he had acquired by his indefatigable reading and extensive practice. On the contrary, he committed every thing to writing with an industry beyond example, and superior to imitation; neither were his writings confined to his closet, but sent abroad into the world, to the great credit of their author, and, if the best judges may be believed, no less to the benefit of the publick (z): more he had published if he had not been hindered by his troubles; and more correct those writings had certainly been that have since come abroad, if they had passed the press in his life-time. As it is, a certain author says (a), His learned and laborious works on the Laws will be admired by judicious posterity, while Fame has a trumpet left her, and any breath to blow therein. This is the character of his writings in general, and with respect to particulars they belong properly to the notes [X]. His whole life, from the time he became a man, was spent in labouring

[Y] They belong properly to the notes.] In speaking of the writings of this great man, the most natural method seems to be, to begin with those published in his life-time, and consequently with his Reports; the title of the first part of which runs thus:

The first Part of the Reports of Sir Edward Coke, Knt. Her Majesty's Attorney-General, of divers Resolutions and Judgments given with great Deliberation by the reverend Judges and Sages of the Law, of Cases and Matters in Law, which were never resolved, or adjudged before. And the Reasons and Causes of the said Resolutions and Judgments during the most happy Reign of the most illustrious and renowned Queen Elizabeth, the Fountain of all Justice, and the Life of the Law.

It appears from the preface, that these were published about the year 1600, and in the same preface, there is an account of the principle reasons, which induced him to publish them; which take in his own words. 'I have since the twenty-second year of her Majesty's reign, which is now twenty years compleat, observed the true reasons, as near as I could, of such matters in Law, (wherein I was of counsel and acquainted with the state of the question,) as have been adjudged upon great and mature deliberation: and as I never meant, as many have found, to keep them so secret for my own private use, as to deny the request of any friend, to have either view or copy of any of them; so, 'till of late, I never could be persuaded (as many can witness) to make them so publick, as by any entreaty to commit them to print. But when I considered, how by her Majesty's princely care and choice, her feats of Justice have been ever for the due execution of her Laws furnished with Judges of such excellent knowledge and wisdom, (whereunto they have attained in this fruitful spring-time of her blessed reign) as I fear, that succeeding ages shall not afford successors equal unto them. I have adventured to publish certain of their resolutions, (in such sort as my little leisure would permit) for the help of their memory, who heard them and perfectly knew them; for the instruction of others, who knew them not, but imperfectly heard of them; and lastly for the common good, (for that is my chief purpose) in quieting and establishing of the possessions of many in these general causes, wherein there hath been such variety of opinions.'

The second and third part of his Reports were published in the same reign; in the preface to the former, he speaks largely of the excellency of the Common Law, the uprightnes of the Judges, and of the integrity of it's professors. In the preface to the third part, he shews that at the time of his writing, there were no more than fifteen volumes of Reports, viz The nine Year Books, the Commentaries of Mr Edward Plowden, and the Reports of Sir James Dyer, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, with his own three parts of his Reports. He published his fourth Reports in the first year of King James when he was Attorney-General, and so also the fifth part of his Reports which begins with Caudrey's Case, from whence he takes occasion to enter into a full and large discourse of the King's Ecclesiastical Law, in answer to which, there was written a famous piece by Robert Persons, the Jesuit, under the following title:

An answer to the fifth part of Reports, lately set forth by Sir Edward Coke, Knt. the King's Attorney-General, concerning the ancient and modern municipal Laws of England, which do appertain to Spiritual Power and Jurisdiction. By occasion whereof, and of the principal question set down in the second page, there is laid forth an evident, plain, and perspicuous Demonstration of the Continuance of Catholick Religion, from our

Of this book, we have a very high character given by Bishop Nicholson (111), but for what reason is not easy to find out; since the whole of it is penned in a high-flown declamatory stile, in defence of papal power and of popish Religion; for which reason Sir Edward Coke, in the sixth part of his Report, says very justly, that it was impossible for him to write any answer, because as his own was a book of Law and facts, so that of his adversary was a rhapsody of Divinity, History, Canon Law, &c. How competent a Critick the Prelate before mentioned was, appears from his censuring Camden (112), for calling Sir John Popham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and asserting he never was so, contrary to the concurring authorities of Records, Law, and History. The sixth part of Sir Edward Coke's Reports followed soon after. In the title of the seventh Report, he stiles himself Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, and it was published in the sixth year of King James; and as it appears by the preface Calvin's Case, which is that of the post-nati, was reported by Order. The eighth part of the Reports was published in the ninth year of King James, and the year following, the ninth part, in which the author takes the same title. In the tenth Report, published in the eleventh year of King James, our author stiles himself Lord Chief Justice of England, which is thus qualified in the next part of his Reports, which was published anno 1615: that is, in the thirteenth of King James, viz. The eleventh Part of the Reports of Sir Edward Coke, Knt. Chief Justice of England, (of Pleas assigned to be holden before the King himself) and one of the Privy-Council of State. These were all the Reports published by himself. The twelfth part of his Reports hath a certificate printed before it, dated February the second 1655, and subscribed E. Bullstrode, signifying that he conceives it to be the genuine work of Sir Edward Coke. The title of the thirteenth part is Select Cases in Law, reported by Sir Edward Coke, and these are asserted to be his in a preface, signed with the initial letters, J. G.

There was published in the year 1607, A Speech and Charge at Norwich Assizes; intended to pass for Sir Edward Coke's, but he clearly disclaims it (113); not but that he did make a speech at that time, and in some measure to this purpose; but these notes of it were gathered and published without his knowledge in a very incorrect and miserable manner, so that there was not so much as a single sentence that was not corrupted and maimed in such a manner, as made it apparent to all the world, that it could not be the speech of this grave and learned Judge; but published with a design to prejudice and expose him: in which however the authors of that design were by no means successful, the blunders in the book rendering the forgery ridiculous.

A Book of Entries, containing perfect and approved Precedents of Counts, Declarations, Informations, Plaints, Indictments, Bars, Replications, Rejoinders, Pleadings, Processes, Continuances, Emissions, Issues, Defaults, Departure in despite of the Court, Demurrers, Trials, Judgments, Executions, and all other matters and proceedings (in effect) concerning the practick part of the Laws of England, in actions real, personal, and mixt, and in Appeals; being very necessary to be known, and of excellent use for the modern practice of the Law, many of them containing matters in Law, and points of great learning; collected and published for the common good and benefit of all the studious and learned professors of the Laws of England. fol. 1614.

to understand, and in endeavouring to support, the Constitution. It is already shewn that he was a friend to the Church and to the Clergy, and to this it must be added, that after he had lost his publick employments, and a great Peer was inclined to question the rights of the cathedral church of Norwich, he hindered it, by telling him plainly, That if he proceeded, he would put on his cap and gown, and follow the cause through Westminster-hall again (b). He was a zealous and faithful servant of the Crown in all capacities; asserted the prerogative considered in a right light, and opposed it when either mistaken or misapplied.

He

As this was a very labourious, so, at the time it was composed, it was a most useful undertaking, compiled with accuracy and judgment, and serving in some measure as a supplement to his Reports. It is true, that, notwithstanding there have been but two editions of this very large collection, it is very far from being scarce, and further still from being dear; but this ought not to diminish the credit of the work, or of it's author, with men of impartial judgments; since this has partly happened from the subsequent alterations of the Law, with respect to practice, and partly from many lesser volumes that have been stolen out of it, and have been accommodated to vulgar use; but when Sir Edward Coke published his book, Entries were more scarce, and he actually laid the foundation thereby of another capital pillar for supporting the great edifice of the Law (114).

(114) See the Prefaces to latter books under the same title.

We come now to speak of his Institutes, which are divided into four parts. The first is his Translation and Comment upon the Tenures of Sir Thomas Littleton, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of Ed. IV, it was published in the life-time of the author in 1628, but that edition was very incorrect; there was a second in 1629, said to be revised by the author, and in which the work is much amended, yet very probably that manuscript copy, that was seized amongst his papers at the time of his decease, was still more correct, and if it had been printed, there might perhaps have been less room for the censure of a certain prelate, who was more inclined to remark other peoples mistakes than to correct his own (115). The second part of the Institutes gives us Magna Charta, and several other select statutes in the original languages in which they were first enacted, and much more correct than they were to be had any where else. He adds to these a continued Commentary full of excellent learning, wherein he shews how the Common-Law stood before those statutes were made, how far they are introductory of new Law, and how far declaratory of the old; what were the causes of making them, to what ends they were made, and in what degree, at the time he wrote, they were either altered or repealed. The third part of the Institutes contains the Criminal Laws or Pleas of the Crown; and therein the author proposes the same end as in his former work, comparing the Statute with the Common Law, shewing where acts are only declaratory, and where introductory of new matter. After explaining the nature of crimes, and ascertaining the punishments insisted on them by Law, he concludes with the nature of pardons and restitutions, shewing, how far the King may proceed in such matters by his prerogative, and where the assistance of Parliament is necessary. The fourth part of the Institutes comprehends the jurisdiction of all the courts in this kingdom, from the high Court of Parliament, down to the Court-Baron. In his proem to this part of his work, he modestly observes, that having collected some materials towards the raising this great building, and fearing they would be of little use after his decease, being very short, and not easy of others to be understood, he in his declining years had done what in him lay to advance and perfect his performance. But this not being published till after his decease, there are, as might be expected, many inaccuracies, and some greater faults which gave occasion to the following work.

When we consider not only the quantity, but the quality of his writings, how they contribute to illustrate, as well the origin as the body and substance of our Laws, explain their nature, vindicate their justice, and demonstrate the benefit of them; how they take in the whole circle of this extensive science, in reference both to it's grounds and practice, and how methodically and accurately every thing touched by his pen is treated, we cannot but stand amazed at his wisdom, his diligence, and his publick spirit. His wisdom appears in his being able to examine, acquire, and digest, such a prodigious fund of knowledge, and apply it with such distinctness, perspicuity, and propriety, as he did, to every point; and tho' much of what he has written, may thro' time become of little use in regard to practice; yet the utility of it, in respect to the understanding of our Law will remain as long as it subsists on it's present basis; and that I hope will be as long as we shall continue a people. Viewing things only in this light, it is impossible for any impartial reader to avoid paying the highest reverence to his memory. But when we consider also, his wonderful diligence in collecting, framing, and disposing, so many, so labourious, and such different kinds of writing, our wonder must increase. And when we reflect on the strange returns made him, for the vast services done the Commonwealth in this respect, and his continuing to the very last to prosecute the same services, in spite of this ill usage, merely from a principle of publick spirit, and the sincere love of his country and it's Laws, it must raise our admiration still higher. Besides there are some circumstances yet untouched, that ought to have equal weight with any thing that has been already said upon this subject. For he took all this pains for posterity in the midst of a life occupied with continual cares for the service of that age in which he lived, when in the full possession of the greatest practice at the Bar, when called to the highest offices of his profession, when involved in the perplexity of publick employments, as well as when out of them and more at leisure. We may add to all this, that from the account we have of the manuscripts seized at his death, there is a very great probability that the world has been deprived of a considerable part of his writings, notwithstanding those we enjoy make so great a figure, and place him in a sphere so much superior to any of those who have laboured to serve their country in the same way. Permit me to add to these remarks, which proceed purely from sincerity of heart, and a real concern for truth and justice, that, to his care we owe the reducing the knowledge of our Laws into a system, and the putting it in the power of others, to prosecute and improve his plan; for if we compare the Law, as he found it, with the condition in which he left it, and the benefits that have since arisen from his industry and example, we shall see his merit in it's true point of light, and have a just notion of the reasons which induced that and the succeeding age to stile him the Oracle of the Law, as he really was, and will be, what ever may be the fate of his writings in succeeding times; since from him were originally borrowed those lights that have lead all succeeding Lawyers, who, if they had wanted this great guide, would never have been able to have traversed those paths which led them to knowledge and credit. We live in times, when it is fashionable to decry, or at least to depreciate, the abilities of those who went before us; and therefore it is the duty of all such as are embarked in works of this nature, to make a stand in favour of antiquity, and to vindicate the memories of those great men whose actions they record, and in doing which, as they faithfully discharge their trust, so they may hope for a favourable reception from posterity for themselves.

[Z] Posterity

He was a useful member of the Privy-Council, while he continued in it; and very serviceable to Queen Anne, to whom he was of Counsel, and Chief Justice in Eyre of her forests, as long as she lived (c). In the Star-Chamber he is reputed to have been not only strict and active, but even bitter and severe; by which he created himself many enemies who gave him trouble enough, and who no doubt would have brought his conduct under publick censure, if any colourable imputations could have been fixed upon it (d). In his behaviour as a Senator, he shewed a laudable zeal for correcting abuses, an inflexible integrity in pursuing them, and a spirit not to be quelled either by the arts or threats of a Court (e). He met with many changes of fortune, was sometimes in power, sometimes in disgrace; and it must be allowed, that he made a better figure in adversity than in prosperity; for, as King James said, he fell always upon his feet, and whatever credit he lost at Court, he found it made up to him in the country, where he was equally revered and esteemed (f). In the earlier part of his life, he represented the county of Norfolk in Parliament; and more than forty years after, he was Knight of the Shire for the county of Bucks, and in that quality sat in the last Parliament he lived to see (g). With all these great endowments, he was certainly not free from failings, nor are we ignorant what those were reputed to be; for as his character was eminent, so it has been drawn by pens very differently affected, and by comparing what has fallen from them, posterity may come at least pretty near the truth [Z]. His private resembled his publick life, that is, it was chequered

In order to obtain the sentiments of the contemporaries of Sir Edward Coke, concerning his character, we ought to consider, not so much what was said of him in power, for then envy might work and passion prevail, but what was thought of him in disgrace, and published when he was no longer in a condition, either to hurt such as spoke ill, or to reward those who spoke well of him. When he was first in disgrace, the Lord Keeper Bacon stirred up the business of his Reports, and desired that two more Judges might be added to the committee appointed to examine them; upon this, Sir Edward Coke desired two things, first, That his books might be revived by the whole twelve Judges; and secondly, That they might report not only his defects, but what he had published for his Majesty's prerogative, the benefit of the Church, the quieting mens inheritances, and the general good of the commonwealth; upon this the affair dropped; the enemies of Sir Edward Coke did not chuse to trust him with such a jury as the twelve Judges (116). When he fell under his second disgrace, and was sent to the Tower, all methods possible were contrived as well to distress as to blacken him; his papers were seized, and amongst them securities for money: ways and means were consulted to exclude him from the benefit of a general pardon, and a prosecution set on foot for the old debt of Sir William Hatton; but no imputations could be fixed upon him, notwithstanding the industry of Sir Henry Yelverton his old antagonist, and when a brief was given in the cause of Sir John Walter, he laid it aside with this memorable sentence, Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, when ever I open it against Sir Edward Coke. Yet he who said this, was the Prince's Attorney-General; the cause however was tryed, and a verdict given for the defendant (117). This, and his care in preserving Sutton-Hospital, or the Charter-House, are strong proofs of his uprightness and integrity. The learned Camden, besides many other occasional commendations, drew his character at large in these words, which follow his mentioning a small rivulet in Norfolk (118). "The river is anonymous, rising not far from Godwicke, a lucky name, where is a small feat, but made great by the ornament it receives from the famous Sir Edward Coke Knt. a person of admirable parts, than whom, as no one ever applied himself closer to the study of the Common-Law, so never any understood it better; whereof he convinced England by his discreet management for many years together whilst Attorney-General, and still does by executing the office of Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas with the greatest prudence; nor has he given less proof of his abilities in his Commentaries upon our Laws, whereby he has highly obliged both his own age and posterity." We will next quote his old adversary, Sir Francis Bacon, who in a famous piece of his addressed to King James, speaks thus of our author's writings. "To give every man his due; had it not been for Sir Edward Coke's Reports, which, tho' they may have errors, and some peremptory and extrajudicial resolutions, more than are warranted, yet they contain infinite good decisions, and rulings over of cases; the Law by this time had been almost like a ship without ballast; for that the cases of modern experience are fled from those that are adjudged and ruled in former time." If we should cite all the commendations bestowed upon him by his learned successors in the profession, we might fill a small volume, and therefore it may be sufficient to produce the character entered of him by Sir George Crook, one of the Judges of the King's Bench, in his Reports, which runs thus (119). "Memorandum, in the Vacation, viz. in August 1634, William Noy, Attorney-General, died at his house at Brainford, in the county of Middlesex; and Sir Edward Coke, (who was Attorney-General to Queen Elizabeth, and to King James, and afterwards Chief Justice of the Common Bench, and then Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and in 14 Jacobi discharged of that place) died at his house, in Stoke in the county of Bucks, in September 1634, being a prudent, grave, and learned man in the common Laws of this realm, and of a pious and virtuous life." We will now produce a mixt character of him by an author very little inclined to flatter, speaking of him he says (120). "Truly he was a man of excellent parts, but not without his frailties: For as he was a storehouse, and magazine of the Common-Law for the present times, and laid such a foundation for the future, that posterity may ever build on; so his passion and pride were so predominant, that, boiling over he lost (by them) much of his own fullness, which extinguished not only the valuation, but respect to his merit; so often is a heat, that gives life to noble parts by a circular motion, the ruin of them." Sir Henry Spelman, whose learning was so great, and his character so fair, that his commendation of any man might pass without dispute, in citing the opinion of our author, makes use of this extraordinary circumlocution, That ever honourable Judge and Oracle of Law my Lord Coke himself (121), which sufficiently shews his sentiments of him. After such writers as these, to cite, as might be easily done, many of lesser note, would be so far from adding to, that they might seem rather to diminish his reputation. But there were writers that spoke of him in a different manner. It is very true, and the reader shall hear who and what they were. The famous Persons, the Jesuit, was one of the fiercest and the loudest (122), he charged him with murdering Father Campion and his companions, to gain credit with the Earl of Essex, in Queen Elizabeth's time; and serving Father Garnet, and his friends, in the same manner, in the days of her successor; but it is well known that these men died by the hand of the hangman for high-treason, and Sir Edward Coke only stated the proofs against them. Sir Anthony Weiden (123) has bestowed his dirt pretty plentifully upon his character, which I hope has been already so well wiped off, as to leave little or no stain. The famous Mr William Prynne (124), tho' he qualifies what he delivers with many strange compliments and forced civilities, yet bears hard enough upon him in many circumstances, tho' he knew very well, that the true reason of the imperfections of the book he criticized, was the death of the author before it's publication, and either the ignorance or want of care in those who sent it to the press. The renowned philosopher chequered with good and evil. He was unhappy in his second marriage more ways than one, and as the inconveniences arising from it began early, so they stuck to him to his last breath (b); yet he left behind him a numerous posterity, as well as a vast fortune. By his first lady he had seven sons and three daughters. Of the latter, Elizabeth died young; Anne became the wife of Ralph Sadler, Esq; son and heir of Sir Thomas Sadler; and Bridget was married to William Skinner, Esq; son and heir of Sir Vincent Skinner (i). Of his seven sons, Edward, the eldest, died an infant; Robert, his second son, was knighted, and married Theophila, daughter to Thomas Lord Berkely, by whom he left no issue, dying July 19, 1653, aged sixty-seven (k). Arthur, the third son, married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir George Walgrave, by whom he had four daughters. John, the fourth son, was seated at Holkham, and married Meriel, the daughter of Anthony Wheatly, Esq; by whom he had seven sons and as many daughters; but the inheritance descending to John, the youngest of them, and he dying unmarried, the estate came to the heirs of Henry Coke (l). This Henry, the fifth son, was seated at Thurington in Suffolk, and having espoused Margaret, daughter and heiress of Edward Lovelace, Esq; left issue Richard Coke, Esq; who, by Mary, daughter of Sir John Rous, Bart. left Robert Coke, Esq; who by the death of John Coke of Holkham beforementioned, became possessed of that seat, and the greatest part of the Lord Chief Justice Coke's estate (m). This Robert Coke, Esq; married the Lady Anne Osborne, daughter of Thomas Duke of Leeds, by whom he had an only son, Edward Coke, Esq; and dying January 16, 1679, in the twenty-ninth year of his age, was interred in the church of Tittleshall in Norfolk, where an elegant monument, with a suitable inscription, was erected to his memory, by his widow, the Lady Anne Coke. The said Edward Coke his only son, married Carey, daughter of Sir John Newton, in the county of Gloucester, Bart. He died on the thirteenth of April 1707, and she survived him but a short time, deceasing on the fourth of August following, and were both buried at Tittleshall in Norfolk. They had issue three sons and two daughters. THOMAS; Edward Coke of Longford in the county of Derby, Esq; who dying at his seat at Longford in August 1733, unmarried, left his estate to his youngest brother, Robert Coke, who was Vice-Chamberlain to the late Queen Caroline, and in June 1733 married the Lady Jane, eldest sister and coheir of Philip, late Duke of Wharton, and relict of John Holt of Redgrave in Suffolk, Esq; The two daughters were, Carey, wife of Sir Marmaduke Wyvill, of Constable-Burton in the county of York, Bart. and Anne, married to Philip Roberts, Esq; Major of the second troop of horse-guards. Thomas Coke, Esq; the eldest son and heir of the family, having distinguished himself in the service of his country, by his constant attendance in Parliament and otherwise, was, on the twenty-seventh of May 1725, upon the revival of the Order of the Bath, appointed by his late Majesty King George I, one of the Knight's Companions, and so installed at Westminster, after which his present Majesty, in the first year of his reign, viz. on the twenty-eighth of May 1728, was graciously pleased, in consideration of the merits of Sir Thomas Coke, and of the services rendered by himself and his family to the Crown, to raise him to the dignity of a Peer of this realm, by the stile and title of Baron Lovell, of Minster Lovell in the county of Oxford. In 1733, his Lordship was constituted Post-Master-General of Great Britain and Ireland, jointly with the Honourable Edward Carteret, Esq; which employment he afterwards held with Sir John Eyles, Bart. and now enjoys with Sir Everard Fawkner, Knt (n). In 1747, his Majesty, as a farther mark of his royal favour, was pleased to raise his Lordship to the superior title of Viscount Coke and Earl of Leicester. His Lordship married, July 2, 1718, Lady Margaret Tufson, one of the daughters and coheiresses of Thomas Earl of Thanet, to whom his Majesty has confirmed the right she had by decent to the antient barony of Clifford, by whom he has an only son Edward, Lord Viscount Coke, married to Lady Mary Campbell, daughter of the late Field-Marshal Duke of Argyle. Clement Coke, Esq; youngest surviving son of the Chief Justice, married Sarah, daughter of Alexander Redish, Esq; of an antient family in Lancashire, by whom he had two sons and two daughters (o), but his posterity became extinct in 1727. Thomas, the seventh son of Sir Edward Coke, died in his infancy. By his second wife, Lady Elizabeth, daughter to Thomas Earl of Exeter, Sir Edward Coke had two daughters (p): Elizabeth, who died unmarried; and Frances, the wife of John, Viscount Purbeck, by whom she had no issue.

pher of Malmesbury to Mr Thomas Hobbes (125), was a great adversary to my Lord Coke, whom he corrects for his errors in Law, with the same air of superiority and sufficiency, that he did the Archbishop of Armagh in Divinity, and Dr Wallis in Geometry, as being alike knowing, or to speak plainly alike conceited in all things. As for any more censurers, I profess I cannot tell where to find them, unless I mention one Mr Jeffs (126), who in the fifth year of King Charles I, delivered a paper to his Majesty, in which he complained of a Judgment given by Sir Edward Coke, in the case of Magdalen College, which he affirmed to be treason, and stiled him therein a traitor and a perjured Judge; for which he was convicted in the King's Bench, and was fet on the pillory at Westminster and Cheapside; obliged to make submission in all the Courts, fined a thousand pounds to the King, and to find sureties for his good behaviour during life. Such were the friends and admirers, such the adversaries and censurers, of Sir Edward Coke; and which do him most honour, being unable to decide, I leave to the judgment of the reader. E

COLE (HENRY) a person of considerable learning in the XVIth Century, was born at Godhill in the Isle of Wight, and educated in Wykeham's school near Winchester (a). From thence he was chosen into New-College Oxon, of which he became perpetual Fellow in 1523, and there studying the Civil Law, took the degree of Bachelor in that faculty, March 3, 1529-30 (b). Then he travelled into Italy, and improved himself in his studies at Padua; being a zealous Roman Catholic. Notwithstanding which, upon his return to England, he acknowledged King Henry VIII, to be supreme Head of the Church of England (c). In 1540, he took the degree of Doctor of the Civil Law (d), and the same year resigned his Fellowship, being then settled in London, and Advocate in the Court of Arches, Prebendary of Yatminster Secunda in the church of Sarum, and about the same time made Archdeacon of Ely (e). On the 11th of September 1540, he was admitted to the Rectory of Chelmsford in Essex; and October the 5th following, collated to the Prebend of Holbourn, which he resigned April 19, 1541, and was the same day collated to that of Sneating; which he voiding by cession on or before March 22d next ensuing; was on that very day collated to the Prebend of Wenlakesbarne (f). In 1542, October the 4th, he was elected Warden of New-College; and in 1545, made Rector of Newton Longville in Buckinghamshire (g). Soon after, when King Edward VI came to the Crown, Dr Cole outwardly embraced, and preached up the Reformation; frequented the Protestants service, and communicated with them. However, altering his mind, or being disgusted at some of the proceedings then taken, he resigned his Rectory of Chelmsford in 1547; and in 1551, his Wardenship of New-College; and the year following his Rectory of Newton Longville (h). After Queen Mary's accession to the Crown, he became again a zealous Roman Catholic; and in 1554, was made Provost of Eaton-College, of which he had been Fellow (i). The same year, June 20, he had the degree of Doctor in Divinity conferred on him (k); and was one of the Divines that disputed publicly at Oxford with Archbishop Cranmer, and Bishop Ridley (l). He also preached the funeral sermon before Archbishop Cranmer's execution (m). Moreover, he was appointed one of the Commissioners to visit the University of Cambridge; was elected Dean of St Paul's the 11th of December 1556; made (August 8, 1557) Vicar-General of the Spiritualities under Cardinal Pole Archbishop of Canterbury; and the 1st of October following, Official of the Arches, and Dean of the Peculiars; and in November ensuing Judge of the Court of Audience. In 1558, he was appointed one of the Overseers of that Cardinal's Will (n). In the first year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, he was one of the eight Catholic Divines who disputed publicly at Westminster with so many Protestants [A], when that Queen was about to settle a Reformation in the Church of England (o). He distinguished himself then, and afterwards by his writings in favour of Popery [B]. But that disputation, wherein Dr Cole was Spokesman, coming to nothing, he was deprived of his Deanery (p), fined five hundred marks, and imprisoned (q). He died in, or near, Woodstreet Compter in London, in December 1579 (r). The famous Leland hath eternized his memory among other learned men of our nation (s). He is elsewhere called, 'A person more earnest than wife (t).' But R. Ascham highly commends him (u), for his learning and humanity [C].

[A] He was one of the eight Catholic Divines, who disputed publicly at Westminster with so many Protestants. Those eight Roman Catholic Divines, were, White, Watson, Baine, and Scot, Bishops of Winchester, Lincoln, Coventry and Lichfield, and Chester; and the Doctors Cole, Dean of St Paul's, Langdale, Harpsfield and Chedsey, Archdeacons of Lewis, Canterbury and Middlesex. The Protestant Divines, were, John Scory late Bishop of Chichester, David Whitehead, John Jewell, John Aylmer, Richard Cox, Edmund Grindal, Robert Horne, and Edmund Guest (1). The points then disputed upon, were, 1. Prayers in an unknown tongue. 2. The Church's authority to appoint, change, and take away Ceremonies. 3. Whether in the Mass there was a propitiatory sacrifice (2). [B] He distinguished himself by his writings in favour of Popery. They were I. Disputation with Archbishop Cranmer, and Bishop Ridley at Oxford, in 1554. II. Funeral Sermon, at the burning of Dr Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury (3).

III. Letters to John Jewell Bishop of Salisbury, upon occasion of a Sermon that the said Bishop preached before the Queen's Majesty and her honourable Council, an. 1560. Lond. 1560. in a thick 8vo, printed afterwards among Bishop Jewell's works. IV. Letters to Bishop Jewell, upon occasion of a Sermon of his preached at Paul's-Cross on the second Sunday before Easter in 1560. V. Answer to the first Proposition of the Protestants, at the Disputation before the Lords at Westminster (4).

[C] But R. Ascham highly commends him, for his learning and humanity. In the following words. Tantum ego & communi omnium voci de tua eruditione, & frequenti Morysini sermone, de tua humanitate semper tribui, doctissime humanissimeque Cole, ut imperitus ipse si te non colerem, & inhumanus si non amarem, merito videri possim (5), i. e. 'I have heard so much by common fame of your learning, and by Mr Morysin of your humanity, that I must renounce all pretensions to learning if I did not esteem you, and be altogether inhuman if I did not love you.'

COLES (ELISHA) author of the Dictionary, was born in Northamptonshire about the year 1640 (a). Towards the end of the year 1658, he was entered into Magdalen-College in Oxford; but left it without taking a degree; and retiring to London, taught Latin there to youths, and English to foreigners about 1663. Afterwards he continued that employment with good success in Russel-street near Covent-Garden: and at length became one of the Ullers of Merchant-Taylors School. But being there guilty of a very great fault (b), he was forced to withdraw into Ireland, from whence he never returned. He was a curious and critical person in the English and Latin tongues, did much

[A] A Dictionary English-Latin and Latin-English. Mr Robert Ainsworth (1) gives the following character of that book. 'He [the author] hath indeed considerably enlarged the English-Latin part, which containeth many more English words and phrases than any Latin Dictionary published before his time.

'But not a few of those words are now entirely obsolete, many of them interpreted in a wrong sense, and worse translated into Latin. And the Latin-English part is very defective both with regard to the several senses of the Latin words, and, the citation of the Roman writers proper to fix their authority.'

(1) Preface to his Theſaurus Linguae Latinae Compendarius.

COLET (JOHN) a very learned Divine, and founder of St Paul's-School, London, was the eldest son of Sir Henry Colet, Knt [A], twice Lord Mayor of London, by Christian his wife, a gentlewoman of good birth, probably of the family of Knevet (a). He was born in the parish of St Anthonine's, now better known by the name of St Antholin's, within the city of London, in the year 1466 (b). 'Tis taken for granted, that he had his first education at St Anthony's-School; then the most eminent in London, but now utterly decayed (c). In 1483, he was sent to the University of Oxford, and in all probability to Magdalen-College, where there were at that time one or more of his surname (d). After having spent seven years in the study of Logick and Philosophy, he took his degrees in Arts; being then thoroughly acquainted with M. T. Cicero's works, which he had most carefully perused; and also no stranger to Plato and Plotinus, which he not only read, but compared, making the one serve as a commentary to the other [B]. He was moreover skilled in every branch of the Mathematicks (e). Having thus laid a good

[A] Was the son of Sir Henry Colet, Knt. Sir Henry Colet was a younger son of Robert Colet of Wendover in Buckinghamshire, Esq; and born in that county at the manor of Hale. He was bred a Mercer in London, where he got very considerable riches (1). In the year 1477, he was the elder of the two Sheriffs of London; and in part of the years 1486, and 1487, Lord Mayor of that city: as he was again, a second time, in part of the years 1495, and 1496 (2). By his wife Christian, he had two and twenty children, eleven sons, and eleven daughters (3). He died in 1510, and was buried at Stepney: but his widow lived to bury her only son the Dean, being then above ninety years of age (4). Sir Henry was a great benefactor to his parish Church of St Anthonine's; and, in Mr Stow's time, the pictures of him, and his wife, ten sons, and ten daughters, were in the glass-window on the north-side of that Church (5). John who is the subject of this article, was the first-born; and within a few years became the only surviving comfort to his parents (6).

[B] He was no stranger to Plato and Plotinus, which he not only read, but compared, &c. But he was forced to read them only in their Latin translations (7). See below note [D].

good foundation of learning at home, he went and travelled abroad, for his further improvement; first to France, and then to Italy: and seems to have continued in those two countries from the year 1493 to 1497 (f). But, before his departure, and indeed when he was but two years standing at the university, but nineteen years of age, and only in the order of an Acolythe, namely, on the 6th of August 1485, he was instituted to the Rectory of Denington in Suffolk [C], to which he was presented by Sir William Knevit, Knt. and his Lady, and kept it to his dying day (g). He was also presented by his own father, on September 30, to the Rectory of Thyrning in Huntingdonshire, to which he had institution, October 2, 1490 (h), but he resigned it before the latter end of the year 1493 (i), probably before he set out on his travels. Being come to Paris, he improved himself there by the conversation of learned men; particularly of Robert Gaguin the Historian, who raised in him an earnest desire of being acquainted with Erasmus, the honour of his age: he became also acquainted with the celebrated Budæus; and Mr Deloigne, who procured him what he wished, by recommending him to Erasmus (k). In Italy, he contracted a friendship with several eminent persons; especially with his own countrymen, William Grocin, Thomas Linacre, William Lilly, and William Latimer, who were learning the Greek tongue (then but little known in England) under those great masters, Demetrius, Ang. Politianus, Hermolaus Barbarus, and Pomponius Sabinus (l). As he knew, himself, very little of it when he left Oxford (m), he undoubtedly embraced the opportunity of perfecting himself in that language [D]. And, having devoted himself to the study of Divinity, he read, whilst abroad, the best of the ancient Fathers, particularly Dionysius, Origen, Cyprian, Ambrose, and Jerome (n). But he very much despised St Augustin; which showed his good sense and judgment (o). In the course of his studies both at home and abroad, he sometimes looked into D. Scotus, and T. Aquinas, and other school Divines. He also studied both the Civil and Canon Law. Moreover, there was not one book relating to the History and Constitution of Church and State, which he did not carefully peruse. And, in order to polish and improve his stile, and qualify himself for an elegant preacher, he frequently read such English Poets as were then extant (p). During his travels, he was presented to the Prebend of Botevart in the cathedral church of York, into which he was installed by proxy, March 5, 1493-4 (q). He was also made Canon of St Martin's Le Grand, London, and Prebendary of Good-Easter in the same church (r). Upon his return to England in 1496, or 1497, he was ordained Deacon, December 17, and Priest the 26th of July following (s). He had indeed, before he entered into Orders, great temptations both from his natural disposition, and otherwise, to lay his studies aside, and give himself up to all the gaieties of the Court [E]: but he

[C] When he was but nineteen years of age, and only in the order of an Acolythe—he was instituted to the Rectory of Denington, &c.] This practice of taking livings, while thus under age, has generally prevailed in the Church of Rome, and was one of those many abuses, which have been removed by the Reformation. But if Mr Colet did enter upon a cure of souls before he could sufficiently consider the weighty charge belonging to it, he atoned for it, by his extraordinary care, when he came to a more mature age (8). The order of an Acolythe is one of the few orders in the Church of Rome as may be seen in all the the rituals.

[D] As he knew very little Greek, when he left Oxford, he undoubtedly embraced the opportunity of perfecting himself in that language.] For, at school he had no opportunity of learning the Greek tongue, nor scarce in the University, at his first coming thither. Such was the infelicity of those times of ignorance, that the Greek language was not taught in any of our grammar-schools; nor was there imagined to be any great need of it in the two Universities, by the generality of Scholars. Even to love or encourage the study of it, was looked upon as heresy. Hence the proverb

(9), Cave a Græcis, ne fias Hæreticus. Fuge literas Hebræas, ne fias Judeorum similis, i. e. 'Take care of Greek, lest you become a heretick. Avoid Hebrew, that you may not become like the Jews.' And for this reason those very few that understood Greek were afraid to teach it, lest they should be thought to propagate heresy (10). As for Oxford, nothing was known there but Latin, and that in the most depraved stile of the schoolmen. Cornelius Vitellius, an Italian, was the first who taught Greek in that University; and from him the famous Grocin learned the first elements thereof. In Cambridge, Erasmus was the first who taught the Greek grammar. And so very low was the state of learning in that University, that in 1485, nothing was taught there, but Alexander's Parva Logica, the old axioms of Aristotle, and the questions of Scotus, all in Latin: 'till in process of time, the Mathematicks were brought in, and Aristotle in Greek, with several authors, whose names had not been heard of before (11). Linacre and Grocin were the only two Englishmen then able to teach Greek. Soon after Bernard André a native of Tboloufe opened a school for that language in London. But the first Englishman, who in any publick school taught Greek as well as Latin, was William Lilly in St Paul's-school; the founder whereof, Dean Colet, seeing the necessity of having a tolerable knowledge of the Greek tongue, in order to proceed the better in his Theological studies, did shun no pains, nor thought himself too old to learn it, or at least to improve himself therein (12).

[E] He had—great temptations—to lay his studies aside, and give himself up to all the gaieties of the Court.] And, indeed, he was induced with some natural propensities, that seemed fitter for a publick life at large, than for the confinement of a college, or a gown. For he had naturally a spirit exceeding high, and impatient of the least injury and affront. He was too much addicted to love and luxury, and sleep, and mightily disposed to an air of freedom and jocoseness, and had a tincture of avarice in him. But he conquered himself, and brought his high spirit to be subject to reason; so that he could bear a reproof even from his own servant. His disposition to love, sleep, and luxury, he restrained by a continual abstinence from suppers, a strict sobriety, a close application to his studies, and by a serious and religious conversation. So that by his Philosophy, his sacred studies, his watchings, and fastings, and devotions, he preserved himself every step of his whole life from the pollutions of the world. And yet whenever opportunities offered themselves, either of jesting with facetious persons, or talking familiarly with the female sex, or of appearing at feasts and entertainments, there nature would break forth. For which reason, he very much forbore acquaintance with laymen, and especially all publick entertainments: where, if necessity brought him, he picked out some learned friend, and talked Latin with him, to avoid the prophane discourse of the

- (r) Ibid. p. 27. he curbed those idle inclinations (t); and, after having stayed a few months with his father and mother at London and Stepney (u), he retired to Oxford (v). Here, he did not spend his time in idleness, but undertook to read publick Lectures, without any stipend or reward, on St Paul's Epistles [F], which were crowded with hearers, and much admired (x). And, in this place, he had the pleasure of contracting an acquaintance with the immortal Erasmus (who came to Oxford about the end of the year 1497) which ended in the strictest intimacy imaginable, and continued to the end of their lives (y). The time when Mr Colet expounded St Paul's Epistles, was in the years 1497, 1498, 1499, &c. (z). In the year 1501, he was admitted to proceed in Divinity, or to the reading of the sentences (a). In 1502, he became Prebendary of Durnesford in the church of Sarum: And on the 20th of January 1503-4, he resigned his Prebend of Good-Easter (b). In 1504, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (c). And, May 5, 1505, was instituted to the Prebend of Mora, in the cathedral church of St Paul (d). The same year and month, he was made Dean of that church (e), without the least application of his own (f); at which time he resigned the Vicarage of Stepney, the date of whose admission to which doth not appear (g). Being raised to this station, he reformed the decayed discipline of his cathedral church, and brought in a new practice there, the preaching himself upon Sundays, and all solemn Festivals. In which course of preaching, he did not take a desultory text out of the Gospel or Epistle for the day, but chose a larger subject; as St Matthew's Gospel, the Creed, or the like, and made successive sermons upon them, 'till he had gone through the whole. That his church might be constantly supplied, he called in to his assistance other learned and able persons; particularly William Grocin, and John Sowle, who read Divinity-Lectures. And at last he procured a settlement for ever, for such a lecture to be constantly read in St Paul's cathedral, three days in every week, by the Chancellor of the church, or his sufficient Deputy (h). These Divinity-Lectures raised in the nation an enquiry after the Holy Scriptures, which were in a manner laid aside for the School-Divinity, and so prepared a way for the Reformation. And what helped to promote it, was the contempt which Dean Colet expressed for the religious houses, the abuses he shewed were in them, and the danger of imposing celibacy on the clergy (i). This way of thinking, and the Dean's free manner of communicating his thoughts, which were then looked upon as heretical and impious, exposed him to the hatred of the Clergy, and to a persecution from Dr Fitz-james [G], Bishop of London (k). For, preaching frequently at St Paul's, and before the King, and in other populous assemblies, he would not refrain from speaking, with some freedom and boldness, against the vulgar superstitious and prevailing corruptions in the Church; whereby he incurred the indignation of the Bishop, who was a rigid and superstitious man, and had for a long while looked upon him with an evil eye (l). But the Dean's troubles and persecutions seemed only to have rendered him more devout, and charitable, and weaned him from the world. Having therefore a plentiful estate, without any very near relations; and having already dispensed the yearly produce of it in the occasional demands of piety and charity: he resolved, in the midst of his life and health, to consecrate the whole property of it to some standing and perpetual benefaction (m). And this he performed, by founding St Paul's-School in London [H], which hath produced several learned and ingenious men (n).

the table. And in the mean time he would eat but of one dish, and take but one or two draughts of beer, refraining commonly from wine: which yet he relished, if very good. There never was a more flowing wit; and, for that reason, he delighted in the like society: but even then, he chose rather to divert to such discourses as favoured most of religion. He was a great lover of little children; admiring their pretty innocence and simplicity (13).

[F] He undertook to read publick Lectures, without any stipend or reward, on St Paul's Epistles. And though he had neither taken nor desired any degree in Divinity, there was not a Doctor in Divinity, or Law, no Abbot, nor any other dignitary, but came gladly to hear him, and took notes of his Lectures (14). For, at this time, it was a new thing to have any reading upon the Scriptures (15).

[G] The Dean's free manner of communicating his thoughts—exposed him to—a persecution from Dr Fitz-james. His Lectures and Sermons being chiefly employed in opening the sense of the Scriptures, then called New Learning; he came to be counted a perverse heretick, at least to be suspected of the crime of heretical pravity. The Bishop, upon this score, accused him to Archbishop Warham, as a dangerous man; and calling in the assistance of two other Bishops, of equal bigotry, and no less virulence, he began to create Dean Colet a great deal of trouble and vexation; using no other weapon but that of the charge of heresy, then reckoned the most fatal engine for the destruction of an enemy. So the Bishop drew up the following Articles against him. I. That the said Dr Colet had taught, that images were not to be worshipped. II. That he had preached against the temporal possessions, of the Bishops, by denying that the repeated exhortation of Christ to Peter, to feed his sheep, could be at all meant of hospitality, but of an exemplary life, and good doctrine; because the Apostles were then poor, and not able to be hospitable. III. That he had preached against mens reading their sermons in a cold unaffected manner; whereby he must needs mean to reflect upon the Bishop himself, who, by reason of his old age, had taken up that way of preaching. But Archbishop Warham, who knew the integrity and worth of Dr Colet, dismissed him, without given him the trouble of putting in any formal answer. However, the Bishop not satisfied with that fruitless attempt, endeavoured afterwards to stir up the King, and the whole Court, against Dean Colet (16). Nay, we are told, that he was not only in trouble, but should have been burnt, if God had not turned the King's heart to the contrary (17). And that, some years after his decease, his body had like to be taken up, and burnt (18).

[H] And this he performed, by founding St Paul's school in London. This school was founded between the years 1508, and 1512; some years being taken up in purchasing the site, removing the encumbrances, erecting the new pile of buildings, providing suitable masters, and settling the endowments in trust for ever (19). This is the reason why our Historians vary so much about the exact year of it's foundation: for some (20) place it under the year 1508; others in 1509 (21); others in 1510 (22); and, finally, others in

For the use of this School, he drew up some rudiments of grammar, with an abridgment of the Principles of Religion; of which we shall give an account below among the rest of his works (o). Besides his dignities and preferments already mentioned, he was Rector of the Fraternity or Guild of Jesus in St Paul's Church (p), for which he procured new Statutes; and also Chaplain, and Preacher in Ordinary to King Henry VIII, and (if Erasmus is not mistaken) one of his Privy-Council (q). When he came to about the fiftieth year of his age, he grew so weary of the world, that he fully purposed to throw himself into some monastery, and there end his days in quiet and solitude (r). In pursuance of this resolution, he built a convenient and handsome house within the precinct of the Charter-house near Richmond-palace in Surry, where he intended to retire in his old age, when broken with infirmities, and unable to discharge the duties of his function (s). But death prevented him: for having been seized by the sweating sickness at two several times before; and relapsing into it a third time, he fell into a consumption that carried him off on the 16th of September 1519, in the fifty-third year of his age (t). He was buried on the south side of the choir of St Paul's, with an humble monument prepared by him several years before, and having no other inscription but his bare name (u). But afterwards a handsomer monument was set up for him [I], by the company of Mercers (w). He writ several things, of which there is an account in the note [K]. As to his person

The worthy founder dedicated it to the honour of Christ Jesus in his childhood: and ordained, That there should be in it, an High Master; a Sur-maister; and a Chaplain; who should teach gratis one hundred and fifty three children, divided into eight classes. He endowed it with one messuage, and two shops in Sopers lain; six tenements in St George's parish in Pudding-lain; two messuages in Bridge-street, in the parish of St Magnus; four shops; some tenements without Aldgate, and all their appurtenances: manors, lands, and tenements in Buckinghamshire; the manor of Vath in Barton, and that of Berwicke; lands in Colchester; several fields and tenements, the places where they lie not expressed, only the occupiers names; a barn; four acres of land the backside of White-hart-street; eight acres in London-field; nine acres, and gardens, near it, with several tenements, amounting then in all to 122 l. — 4 s — 7 d. ½ a year, but now much improved. The Company of Mercers were appointed Trustees (24). The High Masters of this School, from the first to this time, have been these: (1.) William Lilly, appointed by the founder in 1512. (2.) [I] But afterwards a handsomer monument was set up for him.] By the Company of Mercers. It was destroyed, with St Paul's cathedral, in the general conflagration in 1666. But the representation of it is preserved in Mr William [afterwards Sir William] Dugdale's History of St Paul's; and in Dr S. Knight's Life of Dr John Colet (26). On the two sides of the butt was this inscription. 'John Colet, Doctor of Divinity, Dean of Pauls, and the only founder of Pauls-school, departed this life anno 1519, the son of Sir Henry Colet, Knt. twice Lord Mayor of the city of London, and free of the Company and Miltary of Mercers.' Lower, there were other inscriptions in Latin. About the year 1680, when the church was taking down, in order to be rebuilt, his leaden coffin was found inclosed in the wall, about two foot and a half above the floor. At the top of it was a leaden plate fastened, whereon was engraved the Dean's name, his dignity, benefactions, &c (27).

[K] He writ several things, &c.] Those which he published himself, or that have been put out since his decease, are as follow. I. Oratio habita a Doctore Joanne Colet, Decano Sancti Pauli, ad Clerum in Convocatione, anno 1511. Printed the same year by Richard Pyfoun, in three sheets, 4to. This is very scarce, being hardly to be met with, except in the Bodleian library, Oxon, among Archbishop Laud's MSS. It is reprinted by Dr S. Knight, in his Appendix to VOL. II. No. CXIX.

the Life of Dr John Colet (28). In the same book is also printed, an old English translation of it, intitled, 'The Sermon of Doctor Colete, made to the Convocation at Paulis.' Printed first by Thomas Berthelet, and suppos'd by Dr Knight (29) to be done by the author himself. It was reprinted in 1661, 12mo. by Thomas Smith of Christ's-College, with notes: under this title, 'A Sermon of Conforming and Reforming made to the Convocation at St Paul's Church in London, by John Colet, &c.' Reprinted again, in the Phoenix, Vol. I. 8vo. and lately in a collection of 'Select Sermons, fol.' II. Rudimenta Grammatices a Johanne Coleta, Decano Ecclesie sancti Pauli London. in usum Scholæ ab ipso institutæ (30); commonly called Paul's Accidence. Lond. 1539 8vo. III. The construction of the eight parts of speech, intitled, Absolutissimus de octo Orationis partium constructione Libellus; which, with some alterations, and great additions, makes up the syntax in Lilly's grammar. Antwerp. 1530, 8vo. IV. 'Daily Devotions: or the Christian's Morning and Evening Sacrifice, &c.' Printed at London several times in 12mo and 16mo. This is said not to be all of his composition (31). V. 'Monition to a godly Life.' Lond. 1534, 1563, &c. This Mr Wood supposes (32) to be the same with, 'A right fruitful Admonition concerning the Order of a good Christian's Man's Life, &c.' Lond. 1577, 8vo. VI. Epistolæ ad Erasmmum. Many of them are printed among Erasmi Epistolæ; and some at the end of Dr S. Knight's Life of Dean Colet. The following pieces remain in manuscript. VII. Commentarii in Epistolas D. Pauli ad Romanos & Corinthios: i. e. Commentaries on St Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. Given to the publick library at Cambridge by Archbishop Parker. In the same volume are several pieces of Dean Colet viz. VIII. De Angelis celestique hierarchia, being a commentary in Ecclesiasticum D. Dionysii Hierarchiam. And IX. Epistola Abbati Winchcombensis, printed by Dr Knight, at the end of the Dean's Life. The Commentaries upon the Epistles to the Corinthians, are also in manuscript in Emmanuel-College library, given thereto by Dr Anthony Tuckeny. And in that of Bennet-College; the gift of Archbishop Parker. At the end of this last, there is the Beginning of a Commentary on Genesis, no where else to be met with. X. One of the Dean's own manuscripts, being an Analytical Commentary on the Apostolical Epistles, and a Summary of his larger Comments, is in the possession of Roger Gale, Esq; it is the fairest, and indeed the only one manuscript of Dr Colet's, of that kind, extant (33). Bale and Pits mention also these books of his. 1. Commentaria in Proverbia Salomonis. 2. In Evangelium S. Mattheæ. 3. In Precationem Dominicam; translated, as Mr Wood tells us (34), into English. 4. In Symbolum fidei. 5. Breviloquium didactorum Christi. 6. Responsio ad argumenta Erasmi de tædio & pavore Christi (35); called by Bale and Pits, Ad argumenta Erasmi; And, De reformatione Christi; and made two different books. 7. Conciones ordinariæ, & extraordinariæ. Among which were two sermons on war, preached before King Henry VIII. 8. Vita hominis Christiani. 9. Excerptiones

person and character, they are thus described. He was tall, comely, and very graceful: there was something in his mien and carriage extremely becoming; as was every thing he said or did (x). His learning and piety were above the pitch of the times he lived in; but what made him most renowned, was his publick spirit (y). In his writings, his style was plain and unaffected, but it had always something weighty and pungent. And this, which some might call carelessness, did not proceed from a want of what goes under the name of Rhetorick; but from a professed contempt of it, as an art only of amusing (z). He could not bear, that the standard of a good style should be taken from the exact rules of grammar: which, he often said, did rather obstruct the purity of the language; not to be obtained but by reading the best and purest authors. This contempt of grammarrules made him sometimes fall under the censure of the Criticks (a). He was, however, a great master of style and language; so that tho' his preaching was popular, and adapted to vulgar capacities, yet withal it was agreeable to the better judgment of men of wit and learning, and was much admired by the great Sir Thomas More (b). Likewise, he was a great lover and encourager of the Greek tongue. With regard to some of his notions, he was a very eminent fore-runner of the Reformation. And he, and Erasmus, jointly promoted it; not only, by pulling down those strong holds of ignorance and corruption the Scholastical Divinity, and routing entirely both the Scotists and Thomists, who had divided the Christian world between them (c); but also by discovering the shameful abuses of Monasteries, and the dangers of imposing celibacy on the Clergy: to which places, Colet gave little or nothing while he lived, and left not a farthing when he died; not so much out of hatred to their several orders, as because he found, few or none of them lived up to their vows and professions (d). He thought simple fornication in a Priest more excusable, than pride and avarice. And was with no sort of men more angry, than with those Bishops, who, instead of Shepherds, acted the part of so many wolves: he thought none more execrable than they, because under the pretence of devotions, ceremonies, benedictions, and indulgences, they recommended themselves to the veneration of the people, while in their own hearts they were slaves to the world, that is, to glory and gain (e). He condemned Auricular Confession: and was content to say mass only upon Sundays and great Festivals, or at least upon a very few days besides. He had gathered up several authorities from the ancient Fathers against the current tenets and customs of the Church: and tho' he did not care to fly in the face of the Governors, yet he could not but favour those who disliked the way of worshipping images (f). As to his other qualifications: he was a man of exemplary temperance, and all other virtues. The Dean's table, which, under the name of hospitality, had before served to luxury, he contracted to a more frugal way of entertaining. And it having been his custom, for many years, to eat but one meal, that of dinner, he had always the evening to himself. As he dined late, he had but few guests; and the fewer, because his provision was frugal, tho' neat. The sittings were short, and the discourses such as pleased only the learned and the good. As soon as grace before meat was said, a boy read, with a loud voice, and distinctly, a chapter out of one of St Paul's Epistles, or the Proverbs of Solomon. When it was finished, the Dean raised, from some particular part of it, a subject matter of discourse. He was so impatient of whatsoever was foul or undecent, that he could not bear with an improper way of speaking. He loved to be neat and clean in his goods, furniture, entertainments, apparel, and books, and whatever belonged to him; but he despised all state and magnificence (g), there being in his demeanour the most unaffected simplicity imaginable (b).

ceptiones doctorum. 10. Epistola ad Taylorum. 11. Ortolanus. 12. De moribus componendis. 13. De puerili institutione. These two last seem to be the same, as his Rudimenta Grammaticæ (36). As the Dean had an inaccuracy and uncorrectness in his way of writing (37), that was like to expose him to the censures of the Criticks; and besides was no perfect master of the Greek tongue, without which he thought a man was nothing, that is, no scholar (38); it is therefore probable he had no intention of publishing any thing. The pieces mentioned above, were found, after his death, in a private corner of his study; as if he had designed they should lie buried in oblivion (39). Besides they were written in such a manner, as if he intended no body should understand them but himself (40). With regard to sermons, he wrote but few; for he generally preached without notes (41). COLLIER (JEREMY) son of Jeremy Collier, was born at Stow Qui, or Quire, in Cambridgeshire, September 23, 1650. His father was a Divine and considerable Linguist, and some time Master of the free-school at Ipswick in the county of Suffolk. His grandfather likewise was a Clergyman, settled at Bradford in Yorkshire, where he lived in esteem for his function. He was born at Yeaton near Bradford, and descended from a gentleman's family of that name, seated at Thrusk in the same county, in the reign of Henry VIII. His mother was Elizabeth Smith of Qui in Cambridgeshire, where her family were possessed of a considerable interest, and related to the Sternes of that town, being by her mother descended from the Keys or Cays of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire. He was educated under his father at Ipswick, from whence he was sent to Cambridge, and admitted a poor Scholar of Caius-college, under the tuition of Mr John Ellys. His admission bears date April 10, 1669, in the eighteenth year of his age. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 1672-3, and that of Master of Arts in 1676, being ordained Deacon on the twenty-fourth of September the same year, by Dr Peter Gunning Bishop of Ely, and Priest Feb. 24, 1677, by Dr Henry Compton Bishop of London.

Having

Having entered into Priests orders, he officiated some time at the Countess Dowager of Dorset's, at Knowle in Kent, from whence he removed to a small rectory at Ampton, near St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, to which he was presented by James Calthorpe, Esq; and instituted by Dr Anthony Sparrow, Bishop of Norwich, September 25, 1679. After he had held this benefice six years, he resigned it, and came to reside in London in 1685, and was some little time after made Lecturer at Gray's-Inn. But the Revolution coming on, the publick exercise of his function became impracticable (a): He did not however think it compatible with his principles, at that critical conjuncture, to sit down contentedly and say nothing, but finding, in that confusion which arose upon King James's going to France, that the Convention was in a great measure influenced by the papers written by a Clergyman who came over with the Prince of Orange, he thought the same liberty might be taken by a Clergyman who conceived differently from him, and accordingly broke the ice, and published the first pamphlet that appeared in defence of the cause which he espoused (b), and a very sharp piece it was [A]. When the government was settled, by placing King William and Queen Mary upon the throne, Mr Collier remained firm to the principles he had embraced, and continued not only to abstain from taking the oaths which the new legislature had imposed, but laboured all that in him lay to prevent others, more especially such as were zealous members of the Church of England, from owning, or so much as complying with them. It was to this end that he wrote several warm and bitter pieces, which in those days had their effect, and consequently procured their author, in the opinion at least of those who were of his own party, the character both of a solid and shining writer [B]. There is no doubt but this conduct of his occasioned an eye to be kept over his proceedings, nor could it be supposed that any government would forbear the first opportunity that occurred of giving some check, to so active, so industrious, and so dangerous a man. It was not long before such an occasion offered itself: information was given to the Earl of Nottingham, at that time Secretary of State, that Mr Collier, with

(a) Thus far this article was (except some dates) drawn up by Mr Collier himself.

(b) From the information of a gentleman, who was intimately acquainted with Mr Collier.

[A] And a very sharp piece it was. As this article cannot be rendered perspicuous, indeed hardly intelligible, without explaining the political, and literary controversies, in which this writer was engaged, we shall endeavour to give as clear and concise an account of them as possible. In the month of December 1688, the famous Dr Gilbert Burnet afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, sent abroad a very succinct, and well written pamphlet, under the title of An Enquiry into the present state of affairs, and in particular whether we owe Allegiance to the King in these circumstances, and whether we are bound to treat with him, and call him back again, or not? Published by authority (1). In this piece, the Doctor gives his sentiments very freely, as to the behaviour of King James, and the conduct that was to be observed towards him, as the reader will see from the following short quotation. 'In all that I have said concerning his desertion; I limit my reflections to his first leaving of Whitehall, for the accident at Feverham, and what followed after that, cannot be called a return to his people; and since the seals never appeared, and the King never spake of a parliament, nor altered his measures in any thing, but still prosecuted his first design by his second escape, his desertion is still to be dated from his first going from Whitehall; and he having given that just advantage against himself, which came after all that series of injustice and violence, that had gone before it, no man can think; that it was not very sitting to carry it as far as it would go; and not to treat with him any more upon the foot of acknowledging him King (2).' It was in answer to this treatise, and particularly to the argument insisted upon in this passage, that Mr Collier wrote the piece mentioned in the text, and which was intitled,

I. The Desertion discussed in a letter to a country Gentleman. Lond. 1688, 4to. He labours in this short pamphlet to shew, that the King, before his withdrawing had sufficient grounds to be apprehensive of danger; that his leaving any representative behind him was impracticable at that juncture, and that there were no grounds, either from the laws of the realm, or of nature, to pronounce the throne void from such a retreat. To this pamphlet of Mr Collier's, an answer was written by Edmund Bohun, Esq; in which, he gives him the following character (3). 'The author of it is my acquaintance, and a person for whom I have a great esteem, both on the account of his profession, and of his personal worth, learning, and sobriety; so that I cannot believe he had any ill design, either in the writing, or the publishing of it; his zeal for the Church of England's loyalty, and the difficulty, and the unusualness of the present case, having been the occasions, if not the causes, of his mistake; and therefore I will endeavour to shew him, and the world, his error, with as much candour and sweetness, as he himself can wish; because I have the same design for the main, that he had; viz. the honour of the Church of England, and the safety of government, and especially our Monarchy.' But this was not the only answer Mr Collier received, for his performance gave such offence, that after the government was settled, he was seized and committed to Newgate, where he continued a close prisoner for some months, but was at length discharged without being brought to a trial. He afterwards wrote the following pieces, viz.

II. A Translation of the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th books of Sleidan's Commentaries. Lond. 1689, 4to.

III. Vindiciæ Juris Regii, or Remarks upon a paper intituled, An Enquiry into the measures of submission to the supreme authority. Lond. 1689, 4to. The author of this Enquiry, was also Dr Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury.

IV. Animadversions upon the modern explanation of 11 Hen. VII. cap 1. or a King de Facto. 1689, 4to.

[B] The character both of a solid, and shining writer. As Mr Collier was now embarked in an avowed opposition to the government, he laboured as much as in him lay to enlarge the strength of the party which he had joined; and with this view he continued to write, as the reader will see in the following catalogue of his works, during the space of less than two years.

V. A Caution against Inconformity, or the connection between praying and swearing in relation to the civil powers. 1690, 4to. This Discourse is a dissuasive from joining in publick assemblies.

VI. A Dialogue concerning the Times, between Philobelus and Sempronius. 1690, 4to. There was another dialogue with much the same title, printed in 1692, and called a second part, but it was not Mr Collier's, being a narrative of the Revolution, whereas Mr Collier's relates chiefly to the authority of the Convention.

VII. To the Right Honourable the Lords and to the Gentlemen convened at Westminster. October 1690; half sheet; it is a petition for an enquiry into the birth of the Prince of Wales.

VIII. Dr Sherlock's Case of Allegiance considered with some remarks upon his Vindication. Lond. 1691, 4to.

IX. A Brief Essay concerning the Independency of Church Power. 1692, 4to. The design of this essay is to prove the publick assemblies guilty of schism, upon account of their being held under such Bishops, as had assumed, or owned such, as had assumed the sees of those, that were deprived for not complying with the government, &c.

with one Mr Newton, another Nonjuring Clergyman, was gone down to Romney-Marsh, which was enough to fix a suspicion, that they were either endeavouring to send intelligence to, or were labouring to receive it from, the other side of the water. Upon this, about the latter end of the year 1692, Messengers were sent down into Kent to apprehend them, which they accordingly did, and brought them to London, where, after a short examination before the Earl of Nottingham, who charged them with being in a design against the government, they were committed to the Gate-House (c). But, as no evidence of their being in any such design could be found, they were admitted to bail. So strict, however, were Mr Collier's principles, that he had not been long at liberty, before he began to question the consistency of his own conduct in giving bail, upon which he went before the Lord Chief Justice Holt, surrendered in their discharge, and was committed to the King's Bench prison; but upon the application of some of his friends to that most upright and impartial Judge, he was discharged in a week or ten days (d). Yet even this did not content him, as appears by several pieces of his written upon this subject [C]. In the space of some years following, there happened nothing that so far engaged this gentleman's attention, as to induce him to write against the transactions of the State, which was, generally speaking, the subject that employed his pen. But upon the breaking out of that which was called the Assassination Plot, and the conviction of Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins, an incident happened which made a very great noise, and deeply affected Mr Collier his whole life after. The fact was this: Mr Collier, with Mr Cook and Mr Snatt, both Clergymen of his own opinion, attended those unhappy persons at the place of execution, where Mr Collier solemnly absolved the former, as Mr Cook did the latter, and all three joined in the imposition of hands upon them both (e). This, as might be very well expected, made a very great noise, and was looked upon as a very high insult on the Civil and Ecclesiastical government, for which reason they fell under a severe prosecution on one side, in consequence of which Mr Cook and Mr Snatt were sent to Newgate, but afterwards were released without being brought to a trial, and Mr Collier having still his old scruple about putting in bail, absconded, and was outlawed, under which incapacity he remained as long as he lived (f). On the other hand, both the Archbishops, and ten of their suffragans, viz. the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Coventry and Lichfield, Rochester, Hereford, Norwich, Peterborough, Gloucester, Chichester, and St Asaph, published a very strong Declaration of their sense of this scandalous and irregular proceeding (g). To this our author wrote an answer with his usual vigour, and after that several other pieces, in support of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair [D]. After this storm was a little over, Mr Collier employed himself in reviewing and

(g) This Declaration is to be found at large in the Appendix to the third Vol. of the State Tracts in the time of King William.

[C] As appears by several pieces of his written upon his subject. It seems that Mr Collier had occasionally read Law, and this it was that induced him to make a scruple of remaining upon bail, because he apprehended that the very recognizance, by which bail was taken, carried in it an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the Court, in which the bail was taken, and by consequence of the power from whence the authority of that court was derived. In support of these principles, and in justification of his own conduct, he wrote the following pieces, of which it is said, there were only five copies printed.

X. The case of giving bail to a pretended authority examined, dated from the King's Bench. November 23 1692, with a preface dated December 1692, and a letter to Sir John Holt, dated November 30 1692. And also a reply to some remarks upon the case of giving bail, &c. dated April 1693. He wrote, soon after this,

XI. A Perswasive to Consideration tendered to the Royalists, particularly those of the Church of England. Lond. 1693, 4to. It was afterwards reprinted in 8vo. together with his vindication of it, against a piece entitled The Layman's Apology, &c. written in confutation of that part of the Perswasive, which relates to the controversy about the frequenting the publick assemblies.

XII. Remarks upon the London Gazette, relating to the Straits Fleet, and to the battle of Landen in Flanders 1693, 4to.

[D] In support of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair. In order to form some notion of this transaction, it will be requisite to see that part of the Prelates Declaration which relates to the conduct of these Clergymen, and in which they shew, that their proceeding was not to be justified by the doctrines or practice of the Church of England. There words are these (4):

For those Clergymen that took upon them to absolve these criminals at the place of execution, by laying all three together their hands upon their heads, and publickly pronouncing a form of absolution; as their manner of doing this was extremely insolent, and without precedent either in our Church, or any other that we know of; so the thing itself was altogether irregular.—The rubrick in our Office of the Visitation of the Sick, from whence they took the words they then used, and upon which, if upon any thing in our Liturgy, they must ground this their proceeding, gave them no authority nor pretence for the absolving these persons; nay, as they managed the affair, they acted, in this absolution, far otherwise than is there directed. That rubrick is concerning sick persons, and it is there required, First, That the sick person shall be moved to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter, and then, after such confession, the Priest shall absolve him, if he humbly and heartily desire it. But here they absolved, and that publickly, persons condemned by law for execrable crimes, without so much as once moving them, at that time, to make a special confession of their sins, at least of those sins for which they were condemned. And on the other side, here were persons absolved that did not humbly desire absolution, as feeling any such weighty matter to trouble their conscience, but on the contrary, in Sir John Friend's paper it is declared, that he had a great deal of satisfaction in suffering for that cause, which he firmly believed to be the cause of God and true religion. If these Ministers knew not the state of these mens souls before they gave them absolution, as it is manifest two of them, Mr Snatt and Mr Cook, did not as to Sir William Perkins, (they having since declared that they had not spoke with Sir William, 'till they were at the place of execution) how could they, without manifest transgression of the Church's order, as well as the profane abuse of the power Christ hath left with his Ministers, absolve them from all their sins? If they were acquainted with these mens sentiments declared in their papers, then they must look upon them either as hardened impenitents or as martyrs. We are so charitable to believe, that they would not absolve them under the former notion, for that had been in effect sealing them to damnation; but if they held these men to be martyrs, then their absolving them and retouching several miscellaneous pieces of his, to which he added some others and published them in a volume, and these were so well received, that about seven years afterwards he published another; and several years after that a third. These pieces of his were written upon religious, moral, and entertaining subjects; with such a mixture of learning and wit, and in a style so easy and flowing, that notwithstanding the prejudice of party which could not but be strong against him, they were generally well received; and have run through many editions since. One must indeed allow, that very few books bid fairer for universal approbation, in an age, which, if not strictly virtuous, was at least highly decent, and when every body affected a concern for promoting, whatever had a tendency to make men wiser, better, or more polite, all which ends were prosecuted with great effect in this collection of Essays (b) [E]. The very next year after the publication of the first volume in that manner was a justification of those grievous crimes for which these men suffered, and an open affront to the laws both of Church and State. Upon the consideration of these things, and for the doing of right to our Church, which may otherwise suffer amongst such as are strangers to our constitution, by the evil principles and practices, both of the aforesaid criminals, and the three Clergymen that assisted them, who all pretended to be members of the Church of England: we do declare, that we disown and detest all such principles and practices, looking upon them as highly schismatical and seditious, dangerous both to the Church and State, and contrary to the true doctrine and spirit of the Christian religion. And we also take this occasion to warn and exhort all the people committed to our charge, to beware of such seducers, and to avoid them, lest, as the Apostle St Peter speaks, They be led away with the error of the wicked, and fall from their steadfast adherence to the principles of the true Church of England, as it was established at the blessed Reformation of religion; and as, by God's especial Providence, it continues to this day. What was farther done in this matter, will best appear from Bishop Kenner's account, which runs thus (5): 'On April the 27th, the Lord Chief Justice (Holt) of the King's Bench, did likewise represent to the grand Jury, the shameful and pernicious practice of those three absolving Priests. Whereupon the Jury made a presentment to the Court, that Collier, Cook, and Snatt, Clerks, did take upon them to pronounce and give absolution to Sir William Perkins, and Sir John Friend, at the time of their execution at Tyburn, immediately before they had severally delivered a paper to the Sheriff of Middlesex, wherein they had severally endeavoured to justify the treasons for which they were justly condemned and executed. And that they, the said Collier, Cook, and Snatt, had thereby countenanced the same treasons, to the great encouragement of other persons to commit the like treasons, and to the scandal of the Church of England established by Law, and to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. Upon which the court ordered an indictment to be preferred against them, and on May the 8th, Mr Cook and Mr Snatt were committed to Newgate, for suspicion of high-treason and treasonable practices. But such was the lenity of the government, that no manner of punishment was inflicted on them, and Mr Collier, with great assurance, published several papers to justify his practice.' The writings to which this Prelate referred were these:

XIII. A Defence of the Absolution given to Sir William Perkins at the place of execution, April 3d, with a farther Vindication thereof, occasioned by a paper entitled, A Declaration of the Sense of the Archbishops, and Bishops, &c. The first dated April the 9th, 1696, the other April the 21st, 1696. To which is added a Postscript in relation to a paper called an Answer to his Defence, &c. dated April 25. Also a Reply to the Absolution of a Penitent, according to the Directions of the Church of England, &c. dated May 20, 1696; and An Answer to the Animadversions on two Pamphlets lately published by Mr Collier, &c. dated July 1, 1696, &c.

[E] All which ends were prosecuted with great effect, in this collection of Essays.] We have in the text, spoken in general of the several volumes of this collection, as if it had been composed in the same manner with other books of that kind, whereas, instead of being made up of detached discourses, it is rather composed of a variety of small pieces on different topics which fell from the author's pen at a great distance of time, and after wandering most of them singly through the world, were at last drawn thus into a body to prevent their being lost. The title given them in their last edition is,

XIV. ESSAYS upon several Moral Subjects, by Jeremy Collier, M. A. in three volumes, 8vo. In order to give the reader a clear account of the contents of these volumes, which are not commonly understood to comprehend so large a part of their author's works as they really do, it is necessary to enter a little into particulars. The first volume is divided into two parts, which were published separately. The first part consists of six Essays, viz. upon Pride, Cloaths, Duelling, General Kindness, the Office of a Chaplain, and the Weakness of Human Reason. The four first are written in the way of dialogue, and with great spirit and vivacity; the two last are continued discourses. That on the Office of a Chaplain is particularly laboured, and has been looked upon as the author's master-piece, the reason being more close, the language more exact, and the thread of the argument better preserved, than in many of the rest. His Essay on the Weakness of Human Understanding is in some measure a declamation, but it ends with a moral reflection of great importance, and which perhaps this gentleman did not keep always in his mind (6). 'We may plainly perceive, says he, that the prejudices, of education have a great stroke in many of our reasonings, and that the sentiments of men discover the colour of their original tinctures. And as there are some inbred principles impregnable against custom, so there are some customs which nature finds very difficult to deal with.'

The second part contains seventeen discourses upon Fame, Musick, The Value of Life, The Spleen, Eagerness of Desire, Friendship, Popularity, The Immateriality of the Soul, The Entertainment of books, Confidence, Envy, The Aspects of Men, Despair, Covetousness, Liberty, Old Age, and Pleasure; several of these are written in dialogue, but most of them are set discourses; and are all of them calculated to inform the understanding; reform the manners; and to give a right turn to the thoughts of the reader.

The second volume contains the third part, in which the author discourses of Pain, Revenge, Authors, Infancy and Youth, Riches and Poverty, Debauchery, Drunkenness, Usury, The Character of an Apostle, and of Solitude. Then follows a Translation of St Gregory's Oration, in commendation of the Maccabees, Of the Unreasonableness of ill-timed Diversions, St Cyprian's Discourse upon the Plague, his Description of the manners of the Age, in which he lived, and his Discourse on Patience: it is closed by the author's Essay upon Discontent, written in dialogue: there is usually annex to this volume, (tho' it was printed separately) An Essay upon Gaming, in a dialogue, which is at once an useful, entertaining, and most instructive performance. The third volume, and the fourth part consists mostly of religious subjects, and was written after he had published the first volume of his Ecclesiastical History: in this he treats of Goodness, Honesty, Religious Temper, Lying, Fortitude, Flattery, Theft, Peace, and the Resurrection; all these topics are treated with very great plainness and freedom; many of the thoughts are new and singular, such as are written in dialogue, are well sustained, and if we abate the flowerness of the language, which was the fashion, I will not say the fault of that time, it will be difficult to find any essays more capable of affording a rational pleasure, than those of our author.

volume of these Miscellaneous Discourses, Mr Collier made an attempt to reform the Stage, which involved him in a very brisk controversy with several of the greatest wits, and ablest writers of the age, in which he acquitted himself with so much force and vivacity, that the most considerable of his antagonists were obliged, not only to quit the field of battle, but confess that they were vanquished; and though some of them did not do this with the best grace, yet as their failing in point of manners ought to be attributed to the smart of their wounds, it is very far from reflecting upon the merit of our author, whose animadversions actually produced both repentance and amendment (7), and was the original cause of that decorum, which has been, for the most part, observed by the modern writers of dramatick poetry. The titles of his pieces upon this occasion will be found in the notes [F]. His abilities and industry were next exercised in a much larger work than any he had hitherto undertaken, which was that of making Moreri's performance useful

[F] Will be found in the notes.] It was certainly a very bold thing in Mr Collier, to attack at once the Wits and the Writings of those times; among the first, were Mr Dryden, Mr Congreve, and Mr Vanbrugh; amongst the latter, was Tom. Durfey and many more; but he is certainly to be commended for forming so good a design, as that of reducing the stage to order, and thereby preventing the morals of mankind from being corrupted, where they ought to be amended: the first he published with this design, had the following title.

XV. Short-view of the immorality and profaneness of the English Stage together with the sense of Antiquity upon this argument, Lond. 1698, 8vo. It is a very methodical and learned work: he begins with shewing the immodesty and indecency of the stage, and the ill consequences that attend it; he proves next, that the Roman and Greek theatres were much more inoffensive than the English, and then produces the authorities of Ben Johnson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and the French Poet Corneille, against the modern Stage. He proceeds to open the indictment by a charge of profaneness, which he supports by instances from several pieces of Mr Dryden, Mr Otway, Mr Congreve, and Vanbrugh. His second charge is the abuse of the Clergy; his third relates to immorality encouraged by the Stage; he then descends to some remarks upon Amphitruon, exposes the horrid profaneness of the comical History of Don Quixote; then criticizes the Relapse, or Virtue in Danger; he concludes with producing the opinions of the Heathen Philosophers, Orators, and Historians, the restraints imposed upon the Stage by the laws in several countries, and the sentiments of the Fathers of the Church.

In answer to this, Mr Congreve published a little piece, intitled, Amendments of Mr Collier's false and imperfect citations from the old Bachelor, the Double Dealer, &c. It must be allowed, that in this piece, the ingenious author is very hard put to it, and struggles with infinite difficulty to give a fair gloss to passages, that, in the natural sense of the words, convey a very different meaning; and besides this, there is an air of anger and resentment runs through the whole piece, which plainly shews how much the author felt the weight of that censure he endeavours to ridicule, and would be thought to despise. Mr Vanbrugh, afterwards Sir John Vanbrugh, likewise published a small piece in support of his own performances, under the title of, A short Vindication of the Relapse, and the Provok'd Wife; but this was very far from dejecting, or silencing our author, he thought he had a good cause; and that he was able to manage it with as much sense and spirit as any of his adversaries; and he found by experience too, that he was as well heard as they by the publick; all which encouraged him to return to the charge, and to defend what he had written, not only against these, but against several other authors, who thought fit to enter the lists on the side of the Poets, against the Priest. These pieces of his were,

XVI. A Defence of the Short View &c. being a Reply to Mr Congreve's Amendments, &c. And to the Vindication of the author of the Relapse, Lond. 1699, 8vo.

XVII. A Second Defence of the Short View, &c. Being a Reply to a Book intitled, The Ancient and Modern Stages spruced, &c. Lond. 1700, 8vo. The Book here replied to, was written by Dr Drake.

XVIII. Mr Collier's Dissuasive from the Play House; in a letter to a Person of Quality, occasioned by the late calamity of the Tempet, Lond. 1703, 8vo.

XIX. A farther Vindication of the Short View, &c. in which the Objections of a late Book, intitled, A Defence of Plays, are considered, Lond. 1708, 8vo.

The Defence of Plays, has Dr Filmer for its author.

We have shewn in the text, what the event was of this long dispute, in support of which, I shall produce what Mr Dryden says upon this subject (7). 'I shall say (7) Preface to his Fables. the less of Mr Collier, because in many things he has taxed me justly, and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine, which can be truly arraigned of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them. If he be my enemy, let him triumph; if he be my friend, as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to draw my pen in the defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one: yet it were not difficult to prove, that in many places he has perverted my meaning by his glosses, and interpreted my words into blasphemy and bawdry, of which they were not guilty; besides that, he is too much given to horse-play in his rallery and comes to battle like a Dictator from the plough: I will not say the zeal of God's house has eaten him up; but I am sure, it has devoured some part of his good manners and civility; it might also be doubted, whether it were altogether zeal, which prompted him to this rough manner of proceeding, perhaps it became not one of his functions, to rake into the rubbish of ancient and modern plays; a Divine might have employed his pains to better purpose, than in the nastiness of Plautus and Aristophanes, whose examples, as they excuse not me, so it might possibly be supposed, that he read them not without some pleasure. They, who have written commentaries on those poets, or on Horace, Juvenal, and Martial, have explained some vices, which, without their interpretation, had been unknown to modern times; neither has he judged impartially between the former age and us. There is more bawdry in one Play of Fletcher's, called, The Custom of the Country, than in all ours together, yet this has been often acted on the stage in my remembrance: are the times so much more reformed now, than they were five and twenty years ago? if they are, I congratulate the amendment of our morals; but I am not to prejudice the cause of my Fellow-Poets, tho' I abandon my own defence. They have some of them answered for themselves, and neither they nor I can think Mr Collier so formidable an enemy, that we would shun him. He has lost ground at the latter end of the day, by pursuing his point too far, like the Prince of Condé at the battle of Seneff. From immoral-plays to no plays; ab abusu ad usum non valet consequentia. But being a party I am not to erect myself into a judge.'

The first part of Mr Dryden's apology is so very decent, and wickal so very just, that one cannot help being sorry he did not rest it there; but as to what follows, it is mighty little to the purpose, he has owned, that Mr Collier has shewn him his faults, and yet he is out of humour that they were shewn. Was it in his power to prove his charge against the stage any other way than he has done? did not the quibbling and prevarications of his antagonists, compel him to explain things so broadly? and might not any criminal at the bar charge the Attorney-General, with being a traitor in his heart, for setting forth, and insisting upon his own treasons with the same force of argument, that is used in retorting upon Mr Collier? The truth is, that men offend with gaiety of heart; but repent with bitterness of soul; which is the reason, that tho' they cannot help owning the physick has done them good, yet they cannot avoid bearing ill will to the doctor.

useful to the English nation, in which he laboured for many years with great success, taking all the precautions possible to be well informed as to the new articles he published; and so well were his endeavours in this kind received by the publick, notwithstanding some exceptions that were taken to them, that few books have met with a better fate, or longer maintained their credit [G]. After the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, great endeavours were used to recover Mr Collier to the Church, by inducing him to comply with the terms prescribed by the State. All efforts of this kind, though supported not only with general promises of preferment, but with more particular assurances, were ineffectual, and Mr Collier remained among the Nonjuring Clergy, as seeing no reason to alter his sentiments from any change that had happened, and being incapable of dissembling an alteration for the sake of temporal views (k). About the same time that he published the first volume of his Dictionary, he likewise obliged the world with a very elegant translation from the Greek, of that famous book of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, which has done more credit to his memory than even his excellent administration of publick affairs during a reign which does honour to the Roman History (l). This translation was universally well received on it's first appearance, and continues to be read with all the applause, that so well written, and so useful a treatise of Moral Philosophy deserves [H]. The situation of those times, and the many worthy and generous patrons of whatever regarded the honour of this kingdom who then flourished, encouraged Mr Collier to hope, that an Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, which, in the extent he intended it, had never been attempted by any Protestant writer before, might meet with general acceptance. Accordingly, proposals were published for sending abroad such a work, and the offer very well received, and such encouragements given, as induced him to prosecute with diligence the great design he had formed, and at length finished a copious History of Church Affairs, from the first entrance of Christianity into this Island, to the close of the reign of Henry VII. This all parties allowed to be a work of great labour and learning, methodically and elegantly written; but in other respects they differed, as might well be supposed, in their judgments concerning it's merit [I]. After the pains this book had cost him,

[G] Or longer maintained their credit.] We shall in this note give an account of the different times, in which the several parts of this Dictionary were published, and other circumstances relating to them, that may be worth the reader's knowing.

XX. The Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary, &c. four volumes Fol.

The two first volumes were printed in the year 1701, and the author gave notice in his preface, that such of the Articles as were of a later date than the year 1688, were composed by another hand. The third volume was published, under the title of A Supplement, &c. in 1705, and was reprinted in 1727. It is in the preface to this, that he answers the objections made to his conduct; and to prevent those articles being taken for his, which in this volume also, were written by another hand, they are placed under another alphabet. The fourth and last volume, which in the title page is called An Appendix, as in reality it is to the other three, was printed in 1721. The whole is certainly a great treasure of Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Learning; and is not only very useful and entertaining to young scholars, who may by the help of it acquire much knowledge, and enter thoroughly into the meaning of the books they read in any of these kinds of learning; but even to persons of the greatest abilities, and most comprehensive science, who have but small libraries, and live at a distance from London, and the two Universities; yet this work is certainly capable of great improvements, and these might be made without enlarging the bulk, for it might be reduced under one alphabet; whereas at present there are four or five, and as by this means a multitude of repetitions, alterations, and corrections, might be thrown out, so this would make room for new articles, which might be easily found in the last edition of Moreri's Dictionary, now enlarged to seven volumes. The learned reader will easily discern, that this is no reflection either upon Mr Collier's memory or his performance, since he did all that was possible to be done at the time he wrote, and the inconveniences beforementioned were unavoidable from his manner of publication, as that too, with respect to him, was a matter not of choice but of necessity.

[H] That so well written, and so useful a treatise of Moral Philosophy deserves.] This work of Mr Collier's has since borne three impressions, all of them under the following title:

XXI. The Emperor Marcus Antoninus his conversation with himself. Together with the preliminary Discourse of the learned Gataker, &c. to which is ad- ded the Mythological Picture of Cebes the Theban, &c. Translated into English from the respective originals, Lond. 1701, 8vo.

This is one of the best collections we have in the English tongue of the Morals of the Ancients; and, in conjunction with the works of Plutarch, Epictetus, and Seneca, will make an admirable library of that kind. The pieces of which it is composed are very well chosen, illustrate each other perfectly, so as to render all the passages in them clear and intelligible; and yet it is of a very moderate size, and has nothing in it redundant, or foreign to the purpose.

[I] Concerning it's merit.] As this great work was published in two volumes at different times, it is requisite to speak of them separately. The first bore the following title:

XXII. An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, chiefly of England, from the first planting of Christianity, to the end of the Reign of King Charles II. With a brief Account of the Affairs of Religion in Ireland. Collected from the best antient Historians, Councils, and Records, fol. 1702, Vol. I. which comes down to the Reign of Henry VII.

As the scheme of this work was in itself of large extent, it required a great knowledge in Divinity, History and Antiquity, and a very assiduous application to the perusal of Records and manuscripts, as well as a vast variety of antient and modern authors; so the performance itself demonstrates very great care to have been taken in all these respects. The method in which this History is written is very clear and exact, his authorities are constantly cited by the author, his remarks are short and pertinent, and, with respect to the dissertations that are occasionally inserted, they are such as tend to illustrate and explain those perplexed points of which they treat, and contribute thereby to the clearer understanding of the narration. The style is very uniform and grave, which is the more remarkable, because the author, in other writings, has shewn as lively a fancy, and as much quickness of wit, as any writer of his own time; but he knew this would be improper here; and therefore it is with great judgment avoided. He speaks modestly and respectfully of most of the Historians who went before him, and if he is any where severe, he takes care that his reason shall go along with his censure. His own peculiar sentiments with respect to religion and government may be in some places discerned, but taking the whole together, it will be found as judicious and impartial a work, as the world, in doing justice to his talents, could have expected it:

him, our author thought a season of repose necessary, or, as himself expresses it, judged it convenient to breathe a little after a folio (m); yet without dropping, or so much as discontinuing his former design, but knowing that it required not only assiduity and vigilance, but the utmost prudence and circumspection likewise, he chose to act cautiously and rather to apologize to the publick for his delay, than to precipitate matters in order to hurry his work through the press. In the year 1713 he was consecrated a Bishop by Dr George Hickes, who was himself consecrated Suffragan of Thetford by the deprived Bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough (n), Feb. 23, 1694. In the succeeding year came abroad the second volume of his Ecclesiastical History, which met with a different reception from persons of different sentiments, applauded by some and censured by others. Of the latter there were those who made a considerable figure in the learned world, against whose objections the author thought it incumbent upon him to write [K]. As he grew in years, that great share of health which he had enjoyed was interrupted by frequent attacks of the stone, to which there is no doubt that his sedentary life might much contribute, so that from this time we hear of nothing that he published farther, except a collection of Sermons; of which, together with some smaller pieces prefixed to other mens works, an account will be given at the bottom of the page [L]. He lived however several years in an indifferent state of health, sometimes tolerably free, and at others grievously afflicted by his old distemper, which brought him to his grave April 26, 1726, and three days after his body was interred in the church-yard of St Pancras. He was in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and preserved the free use of his senses to the very last. As to his character, we have already given it in the impartial history of his works, and shall therefore only add, that his morals were unexceptionable, and that, as his conduct had in it all the regularity becoming a Clergyman, so his behaviour had nothing stiff or pedantick, but all that life, spirit, and innocent freedom, which constitutes the good breeding of a gentleman. His reputation as a man of letters extended beyond the bounds of his own country, for the learned and ingenious Father Courbeville, who translated into French the Hero of Balthazar Gracian, in the Preface of that work, speaks in the highest terms of praise of our author's Miscellaneous Works which he says set him on a level with Montaigne, St Evremont, La Bruyere, &c. The same reverend and learned person translated into French Mr Collier's Short View of the English Stage, and from thence takes occasion to speak of him again, with all the marks of admiration and esteem possible.

yet, as we have hinted in the text, it was far enough from escaping the censure of the Criticks, but was still much happier in that respect than the second volume, in speaking of which we shall shew who these Criticks were, as well as the titles of the pieces written by our author in his own defence, and in justification of his History.

[K] Thought it incumbent upon him to write.] As the second volume of his Ecclesiastical History took in the entire account of the Reformation, and the struggles with the Puritans from their first appearance, to the overturning of our constitution in Church and State; so it must be naturally supposed, that a man of Mr Collier's principles could never treat these delicate subjects, without affording some room, for such as were desirous of criticizing him to take offence. Dr Nicholson, Bishop of Derry, has treated him with great severity, not to say more, in the character he has given of his works. Bishop Burnet and Bishop Kennet, who were infinitely better judges as well as writers, have corrected him with great decency. Mr Collier defended himself against them all, in the pieces of which we shall presently speak, but before we come to them, it may not be amiss to remark a single, and a shining, instance of his impartiality, and that is, in disculpating the Presbyterians from the false and scandalous imputations that had been thrown upon them, as if they consented to, or at least temporized in, the murder of King Charles I. from which he has vindicated them with equal perspicuity and justice, and has fully shewn, that as they only had it in their power to oppose, so to the utmost extent of that power they did oppose, and protest against that bloody fact, both before and after it was committed (8). The pieces written by him in defence of his History are these:

XXIII. An Answer to some exceptions in Bishop Burnet's third part of the History of the Reformation, &c. against Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History; together with a Reply to some Remarks in Bishop Nicholson's English Historical Library, &c. upon the same subject, fol. Lond. 1715.

XXIV. Some Remarks on Dr Kennet's second and third Letters, wherein his misrepresentations of Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History are laid open, and his calumnies disproved, Lond. 1717, fol. and 8vo. But in the octavo it is called Some Considerations, &c.

XXV. Several Discourses upon Practical Subjects, Lond. 1725, 8vo. The last discourse of this collection had been printed separately, in 1723, with the following title. The comparison between giving and receiving, with the reasons for preference; stated in a Sermon preached at Whitehall, April 19th, 1687, 4to.

XXVI. God not the Origin of Evil, being an additional Sermon to a collection of Mr Collier's Discourses, &c. Lond. 1726, 8vo.

He published also An Advertisement against Bishop Burnet's History of his own time, which was printed on a slip of paper, and dispersed in all the Coffee-houses in 1724, and is to be seen in the Evening Post, No. 2254. Besides this, he wrote several Prefaces, &c. As (1.) An Advertisement concerning the Author, and the translation of Maxims and Reflections upon Plays, in answer to a Discourse of the lawfulness and unlawfulness of Plays, printed before a late Play intitled, Beauty in Distress, written in French, by the Bishop of Meaux, Lond. 1669. (2.) A Recommendatory Preface to Tully's five Books de Finibus, &c. Done into English by S. P. (Sam. Parker) Gent. Together with an Apology for the philosophical writings of Cicero, in a letter to the Translator; by Mr Henry Dodwell, Lond. 1702. (3.) A Recommendatory Preface to human Souls naturally immortal, translated from a Latin MS. by S. E. Lond. 1707. Of this Preface Mr Norris makes honourable mention in his letter to Mr Dodwell, concerning the immortality of the Soul of Man, and says that Mr Collier's single remark against Mr Locke, is, in his opinion, worth all the book besides (9). It is also upon good grounds believed, that he was concerned, amongst others, in collecting the passages referred to by Dr Henry Sacheverell, in his answer to the articles of his impeachment. E

COLLINS (ANTHONY), an eminent Writer of the present Century, was son of Henry Collins, Esq; a gentleman of a considerable estate; and was born at Heston near Hounslow in Middlesex, June 21, 1676 (a). He was educated in grammar learning at Eaton-College near Windsor, and from thence was removed to King's College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Francis Hare (b). Upon his leaving college, he was entered a Student in the Temple: but disrelishing the study of the Law, he soon abandoned it. In 1698, he married Martha, the daughter of Sir Francis Child, Alderman of London (c), and by her had two sons, Henry and Anthony [A], and two daughters, Elizabeth and Martha (d). In 1700, our author published a tract, intituled, Severals of the London Cafes considered (e). In 1703, and 1704, he held an epistolary correspondence with the great Mr Locke, who expressed an high regard and friendship for our author [B]. In 1707, he published his Essay concerning the Use of Reason (f) [C]. The same year, our author engaged in the controversy, then on foot between Mr Dodwell and Dr Samuel Clarke, concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul [D]. In December 1709, came out a pamphlet (g), intituled, Priestcraft in Perfection [E]; and, in February the year following, another intituled, Reflexions on a late Pamphlet, intituled, Priestcraft in Perfection; both written by our author. The same year, he published his Vindication of the Divine Attributes, in some Remarks on the Archbishop of Dublin's Sermon (h). In March 1711, Mr Collins went over to Holland, where he became acquainted with Mr Le Clerc, and other learned men, and returned to London in November following. In 1713, he published his Discourse of Free-Thinking [F]; and soon after made a second trip to Holland, (3) M. Locke died the 28th of October, 1704.

[A] He had—two sons, Henry and Anthony.] Henry, the elder, died in his infancy. Anthony the younger, a youth of great hopes, and educated at Bennet-College in Cambridge, died in the 22d year of his age, lamented by all that knew him (1).

[B] Mr Locke expressed an high regard and friendship for our author.] This appears from Mr Locke's letters to Mr Collins (2). In that dated from Oates in Essex, October 29, 1703, he writes as follows. 'If I were now setting out in the world, I should think it my great happiness to have such a companion as you, who had a true relish of truth, would in earnest seek it with me, from whom I might receive it undisguised, and to whom I might communicate what I thought true, freely. Believe it, my good friend, to love truth for truth's sake, is the principal part of human perfection in this world, and the seed-plot of all other virtues; and, if I mistake not, you have as much of it, as ever I met with in any body. What then is there wanting to make you equal to the best, a friend for any one to be proud of?' In another, dated from Oates, September 11th, 1704, he writes thus: He that has any thing to do with you, must own that friendship is the natural product of your constitution; and your soul, a noble soil, is enriched with the two most valuable qualities of human nature, truth and friendship. What a treasure have I then in such a friend, with whom I can converse, and be enlightened about the highest speculations? These extracts evince, that, at that time, Mr Collins appeared to Mr Locke in the light of an impartial, disinterested, enquirer after truth. How far that great man, who was undoubtedly a friend to Revelation, would, probably, have altered his opinion of our author, had he lived (3) to see his works (of which he had published none but his London Cafes considered) the readers of Mr Collins's works will judge.

[C] His Essay concerning the use of Reason.] The title at length is: An Essay concerning the use of Reason in Proposition, the evidence whereof depends upon human testimony. Dr Francis Gastrell, afterwards Bishop of Chester, being animadverted upon in this essay, with relation to some passages in his Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that controversy, printed at London in 1702, he subjoined to the third edition of it, in 1707, a Vindication of it in answer to Mr Collins's Essay.

[D] He engaged in the Controversy—concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul.] Upon this subject Mr Collins published the following pieces. I. A Letter to Mr Dodwell, containing some remarks on a (pretended) Demonstration of the immateriality and natural immortality of the soul, in Mr Clarke's Answer to a late Epistolary Discourse. London, 1707 and 1709, in 8vo. II. A Defence of the Argument made use of in a Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1707 in 8vo. III. A Reply to Mr Clarke's Defence of his letter to Mr Dodwell: with a postscript to Mr Milles's Answer to Mr Dodwell's Epistolary Discourse. London, 1707, in 8vo. A second edition of this piece, corrected, was published in 1709, in 8vo. IV. Reflexions on Mr Clarke's second Defence of his Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1707, in 8vo. There was a second edition in 1711, in 8vo. V. An answer to Mr Clarke's third Defence of his Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1708, in 8vo. There was a second edition, corrected, London, 1711, in 8vo.

[E] A pamphlet intituled Priestcraft in Perfection.] The title at length is: Priestcraft in perfection, or, a Detection of the fraud of inserting, and continuing that clause [The church hath power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and authority in Controversies of Faith] in the twentieth article of the Articles of the Church of England. The authority of this clause had been called in question, in a book intituled; The Peril of being zealously affected, but not well; or Reflexions on Dr Sacheverell's Sermon preached at St Paul's Nov. 5, 1709 (4). And it being now again professedly attacked by Mr Collins, several Pamphlets, Sermons, and Books were published upon the subject. Among which the most remarkable were the two following. I. A Vindication of the Church of England from the aspersions of a late libel intituled, Priestcraft in Perfection: wherein the controverted clause of the Church's power in the 20th Article is shewn to be of equal authority with all the rest of the Articles, and the fraud and forgery, charged upon the Clergy, upon the account of that clause, is retorted upon the accusers. With a Preface containing some Remarks upon the Reflexions on that Pamphlet. By a Priest of the Church of England, London, 1710, in 8vo. II. An Essay on the XXXIX Articles of Religion, agreed on in 1562, and revised in 1571, &c. By Thomas Bennet, D. D. In answer to these two Books, Mr Collins published his Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles &c. (5). The second and third editions of his Priestcraft in Perfection were printed, with corrections, at London, in 1710, in 8vo; and at the end of the third is subjoined the following advertisement. 'Whereas in the two former impressions of Priestcraft, &c. A letter from Oxford is cited, giving an account of an English edition of the Articles being cut out from a volume of Miscellanies in the Bodleian Library; I have omitted that passage in this edition, upon the sight of a letter from Oxford, which assures the gentleman, to whom it was wrote, that my friend was mistaken. I do not know at present in what part of England he is, and therefore I cannot as yet give the reader or myself that satisfaction in the matter, which I hope to do when I hear of his return to Oxford.'

[F] His Discourse of Free-thinking.] The title at length is: A Discourse of Free-Thinking, occasioned by the rise and growth of a Set called Free-Thinkers. It was reprinted at the Hague, with some additions and corrections, in 1713, in 12mo; tho' in the title page, it is said to be printed at London. In this edition, the translations in several places are corrected from

Holland [G], and from thence to Flanders; where he received great civilities from the Priests, Jesuits, and others. He intended to have visited Paris; but the death of a near relation (i) obliged him to return to London, where he arrived the 18th of October 1713. In 1715, he retired into the county of Essex, and acted as a Justice of the Peace, and Deputy Lieutenant of that county, as he had done before in the county of Middlesex, and liberty of Westminster. The same year, he published, at London, A Philosophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty (k) [H]. In 1718, he was chosen Treasurer for the county of Essex [I]. In 1724, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Walter Wrottesly, Bart (l); by whom he had no children. The same year, he published his Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England [K]; also his Discourse of the Grounds

Dr Bentley's Remarks, and some references are made to those Remarks, and to Dr Hare's Clergyman's Thanks. And whereas, in the former edition, the Discourse ended with these words; 'For I think it virtue enough to endeavour to do good, only within the bounds of doing your self no harm; in the Hague edition, after the words virtue enough, is inserted this parenthesis; in a country so ignorant, stupid, superstitious, and destitute of all private and publick virtue as ours. The Discourse was attacked in several pieces, particularly the following, I. Reflections on an Anonymous Pamphlet, intitled, A Discourse of Free-Thinking. By William Whitton, A. M. Lond. 1713. There have been three editions of this pamphlet. Mr Whitton observes (6), that, 'tho' the Discourse is commonly so worded, as to seem rather meant against the Heathen Idolatry, Popish Superstition, Real Priestcraft, and Tyranny over conscience, than against Christianity itself, with it's sacred books, yet that the author's real design must appear from the ill characters given of the Clergy or Christian Priesthood in general; the oblique reproaches cast upon Revealed Religion; the visible slight put upon the whole Jewish nation and the Mosaic law; the plain disregard of the great foundation of religion, the immortality of the soul; and the many insinuations visibly tending to render the sacred books, both Jewish and Christian, contemptible and uncertain.' II. An anonymous pamphlet, intitled, Free Thoughts upon the Discourse of Free-thinking, London, 1713, in 8vo. III. Queries recommended to the authors of the late Discourse of Free-Thinking. By Mr Benjamin Hoadly, now (*) Bishop of Winchester (7). This ingenious writer declares (8), 'that, tho' some of the particulars, mentioned in his Queries, as designed plainly against the belief of Christianity, are produced in the Treatise of Free-thinking under the specious pretence of their being good reasons and occasions for a free and impartial examination, and not expressly declared to be intended against the Gospel, in the same passages, in which the authors of that Treatise produce them; yet he verily believes, that these authors themselves would inwardly laugh at any, who should suppose them to have had any other view in that performance.' And having placed several particulars from the Discourse of Free-Thinking in one view, he concludes with these words (9): After this let any one doubt, if he can, what sort of Free-thinking all that is produced in the first part of this treatise is designed to promote; or suppose it possible, that the chief view of these authors could be any other than the promoting that Free-Thinking, which they themselves contend to be Atheism and Infidelity. IV. Remarks upon a late Discourse of Free-Thinking; in a Letter to F. H. D. D. By Phileleutherus Lipsiensis. Lond. 1713, in 8vo. The author of this ingenious performance was the truly learned Dr Richard Bentley; and the person to whom it is addressed, Dr Francis Hare, afterwards Bishop of Chichester. It exposes the weakness and fallacy of the Discourse, with great strength of argument and frightfulness of wit. A Second part, and a sheet or two of a Third, were printed the same year at Cambridge: but the learned author proceeded no farther. The first part of these Remarks gave birth to a pamphlet, said to be written by Dr Hare, intitled, The Clergyman's Thanks to Phileleutherus, for his Remarks on the late Discourse of Free Thinking. In a Letter to Dr Bentley. Lond. 1713, in 8vo. The author concludes this piece with remarking, that 'If we have gained by Dr Bentley's Remarks in one respect, we are, on the other hand, in danger of losing no less than an edition of all Tully, and, what is of more consequence, a New Gospel; with both which, for the advancement of learning and religion (their learning and their religion) The Free-Thinking Club were preparing to oblige the world. And the last of these (says he) was, I am told, quite finished, and ready to be published, when your Remarks unluckily came out to shew, that they are neither Christians nor Scholars. And this has suppressed at least for some time, if not totally sunk, both these undertakings.'

[G] He made a second trip to Holland.] This was ascribed to the general alarm caused by the Discourse of Free-Thinking, and the author's being discovered by his Printer Mr John Darby. Whereupon Dr Hare having observed, that the least appearance of danger is able in a moment to damp all the zeal of the Free-Thinkers, tells us (10), 'that a bare enquiry after the Printer of their wicked book has frightened them, and obliged the reputed author to take a second trip to Holland; so great is his courage to defend, upon the least appearance of an opposition. And are not these (adds the Doctor) rare champions for Free-Thinking? And is not their book a demonstration, that we are in possession of the liberty they pretend to plead for, which otherwise they durst never have writ? and that they would have been as mute as fishes, had they not thought they could have opened with impunity?'

[H] His Philosophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty.] Dr Samuel Clarke wrote Remarks upon this Enquiry (11). But Mr Collins did not publish any Reply to Dr Clarke upon this subject; because, we are told (12), though he did not think the Doctor had the advantage over him in the dispute, yet, as he had represented Mr Collins's opinions as dangerous in their consequences, and improper to be insisted upon, our author, after such an insinuation, found he could not proceed in the dispute upon equal terms. The Enquiry was translated into French by the Reverend Mr D*, and printed in the first volume of Recueil de diverses Pieces sur la Philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, l' Histoire, les Mathematiques, &c. par Messieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, et autres auteurs celebres; published by M. Des Maizeaux at Amsterdam, 1720, in two volumes, 12mo.

[I] He was chosen Treasurer for the county of Essex.] In the discharge of this office Mr Collins highly merited the thanks of several tradesmen and others, who had large sums of money due to them from the said county, but could not get it paid them, it having been spent and embezzled by their former Treasurer. The poorest of them, we are informed, he supported with his own private cash, and others he promised interest for their money 'till it could be raised to pay them. In 1722, the debts were all discharged, and by his care and management the county's debts were, from that time, discharged every three months, and with little more than half the money, which had been annually raised for upwards of twenty years before.

[K] His Historical and Critical Essay upon the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England.] The title at length is: An Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England; wherein it is demonstrated, that this clause, The Church has power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controversies of Faith, inserted in the Twentieth Article, is not a part of the Articles, as they were established by Act of Parliament in the 13th. of Eliz. or agreed on by the Convocations of 1562 and 1571. This we have already said (13), was designed as an Answer to the Vindication of the Church of England, &c. and Dr Bennet's Essay on the XXXIX Articles, both published against his Priestcraft in perfection. In the Preface he tells us, 'he was engaged in writing this work

work by a worthy Minister of the Gospel, who knew that he had made some enquiries into the modern Ecclesiastical History of England; and that he was preparing An History of the variations of the Church of England and it's Clergy from the Reformation down to this time, with an Answer to the Cavils of the Papists made on occasion of the said Variations. But nothing of this kind from our author's hand was ever printed. As to the Essay in question, he concludes it with drawing up in brief the Demonstration, promised in the title page, and given in the book; and which is as follows. The Articles of the Church of England are supposed to have their Convocational Authority from the Convocation of 1562, which first agreed on them; and from the Convocation of 1571, which, after having revised, and made alterations in, and additions to, them, agreed on them again. The way of passing Acts of Convocation is by the subscription of the majority of the members of each house by themselves. The MS. Articles, which passed the Convocation in 1562, and were subscribed by the majority of both Houses, are extant; as are the MS. Articles of 1571, with the subscription of the Upper House. And both these Manuscripts are without the clause. The Parliament in 1571 did, by a statute, intituled, An Act for the Ministers of the Church to be of sound Religion, confirm Articles of Religion, comprized in an imprinted English book intituled, Articles &c. put forth by the Queen's authority. All the English printed books of the Articles extant before 1571, and while the Parliament were making this Statute, bore the title recited in the Statute, and were without the clause. Wherefore it follows, that the clause has neither the authority of the Convocation nor Parliament. The reader may see the whole state of this Controversy, and a full vindication of the Church of England from the charge of forgery in respect to the above-mentioned clause, in Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History (14), where particular notice is taken of our author.

[L] His Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. The title at length is: A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, in two parts: The first containing some Considerations on the Quotations made from the Old in the New Testament, and particularly on the Prophecies, cited from the former, and said to be fulfilled in the latter: The second containing an Examination of the scheme advanced by Mr Whiston in his Essay towards restoring the true text of the Old Testament, and for vindicating the citations thence made in the New Testament. To which is prefixed, An Apology for free Debate and Liberty of writing. The drift of this Discourse is to shew, that Christianity is founded on Judaism, or the New Testament on the Old: that the Apostles prove Christianity from the Old Testament: that if the proofs fetched from thence are valid, Christianity is firmly established on it's true foundation; but if invalid, Christianity is false; and that those proofs are typical or allegorical.

[M] It was attacked by a great number of writers. I shall mention only the most remarkable. I. A List of Suppositions or Assertions in the late Discourse of the Grounds &c. which are not therein supported by any real or authentick Evidence; for which some such evidence is expected to be produced. By William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1724. This piece is subjoined to the author's Proposals for printing by subscription, Authentick Records concerning the Jewish and Christian Religion, dated Jan. 17, 1724, and given away to all the Members of Parliament. In this piece, Mr Whiston treats Mr Collins, together with Mr Toland, in very severe terms, 'as guilty of impious frauds and lay-craft. II. The Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies, being a full answer to a late Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1724. III. A Defence of Christianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, wherein are considered all the Objections against this kind of proof, advanced in a late Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By the Right Reverend Father in God Edward (Chandler), Lord Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (15) 8vo. 1725. This is a very learned and elaborate performance, and has passed thro' several editions. IV. A Discourse of the Connection of the Prophecies in the Old Testament, and Application of them to Christ. By Samuel Clarke, D. D. Rector of St James's Westminster, 8vo. 1725. This was not intended for a direct answer to Mr Collins's book, but as a Supplement (occasioned thereby) to a proposition in Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion; with which it has since been constantly printed. V. The Reasoning of Christ and his Apostles, in their defence of Christianity, considered, in Seven Sermons preached at Hackney in Middlesex, 1724. To which is prefixed a Preface, taking notice of the false representations of Christianity, and of the Apostles reasonings in defence of it, in a Book, intituled, The Grounds, &c. By Thomas Bullock, A. M. published at the request of the gentlemen of Hackney, 8vo. 1725. VI. An Essay upon the truth of the Christian Religion, wherein it's real foundation upon the old Testament is shewn, occasioned by the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By Arthur Ashley Sykes, A. M. Rector of Rayleigh in Essex, 8vo. 1725. Mr Collins gives it as his opinion, that, 'of all the writers against the Grounds, &c. Mr Sykes alone has advanced a consistent scheme of things, which he has proposed with great clearness, politeness, and moderation (16).' VII. The Use and Intent of Prophecy, in the several Ages of the Church. In six Discourses delivered at the Temple Church, 1724, published at the desire of the Masters of the Bench of the two Honourable Societies. By Thomas Sherlock, D. D. Dean of Chichester, and Master of the Temple (17), 8vo. 1725: This was not designed as an answer to the Grounds, &c. but only to throw in light upon the argument from Prophecy, attacked by our author. VIII. A Vindication of the Christian Religion, in two parts. The first, a Discourse of the nature and Use of Miracles. The second, An answer to a late book intituled, A Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By Samuel Chandler, 8vo. 1725. IX. A Supplement to the Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies, containing Observations on Dr Clarke's, and Bishop Chandler's late Discourses of the prophecies of the Old Testament; by William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1725. X. Letters to the author of the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. shewing that Christianity is supported by facts well attested: that the words of Isaiah, chap. vii. 14. Behold a Virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son, in their literal and only sense, are a prophecy of the Conception and Birth of the Messiah, fulfilled in Jesus; and that the Gospel application of several other passages in the Old Testament is just; By John Greene, 8vo. 1726. XI. A Brief Defence of the Christian Religion: or, the Testimony of God to the truth of the Christian Religion; By Theophilus Lobb, M. D. 8vo. 1726. The reader will find an entire catalogue of all the pieces, written against the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. amounting in number to thirty-five, among which are Sermons, London Journals, Woolston's Moderator, &c. at the end of the Preface to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered.

[N] His Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. The title at length is; The Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; in a view of the Controversy occasioned by a late book, intituled, A Discourse of the Grounds, &c. It was printed at the Hague by Thomas Johnson, in 1726, in two volumes 12mo, and reprinted at London with corrections; in 1727, in 8vo. It is dated at London November 13, 1725, and addressed to the Right Honourable  In this piece (18) Mr Collins mentions a Dissertation he had written, but never published, against Mr Whiston's Vindication of the Sibylline Oracles; in which he endeavours to shew, that those oracles were forged by the Primitive Christians, who were thence called Sibyllists by the Pagans. He also mentions a manuscript Discourse of his upon the miracles recorded in the Old and New Testament.

Collins, that his pieces were all anonymous. His health declined some years before his death, which fell out, December 13, 1729, occasioned by a violent fit of the stone. He was interred in Oxford-Chapel, where is a monument, with a Latin inscription on it [P], erected to his memory by his widow. A letter printed in the London Journal, April 1, 1727, with an answer to the same. London 1727, 8vo. II. A letter to the author of the London Journal, Saturday April 1, 1727; it was written by Dr Sykes, Dean of Burien, and is that answered by Mr Collins, at the end of his Letter to Dr Rogers. Dr Sykes wrote a second letter in defence of his former, dated June 24, 1727, and printed in a pamphlet intitled, The true Grounds of the expectation of the Messiah, in two letters. The one printed in the London Journal, April 1, 1727. The other in vindication of it; being a reply to the Answer published at the end of A Letter to Dr Rogers; By Philalethes, London, 1727, 8vo. III. A Vindication of the Antiquity and Authority of Daniel's Prophecies, and their application to Jesus Christ, in answer to the Objections of the author of the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered: By Samuel Chandler, London, 1727, 8vo. IV. A Vindication of the Defence of Christianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, In Answer to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; By the Right Reverend Father in God, Edward, Lord Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield: in two volumes. London 1728, 8vo. V. *The Reasoning of Christ and his Apostles vindicated: in two parts, The first being a Defence of the Argument from Miracles, proving the Argument from Prophecy, not necessary to a rational defence of our Religion. The second being a Defence of the Argument from Prophecy proving the Christian Scheme to have a rational foundation upon the Prophecies of the Old Testament; By Thomas Bullock, A. M. [Q] Something of his character.] We are told (19), that 'the corruption among Christians, and the persecuting spirit of the Clergy, had given him a prejudice against the Christian religion, and at last induced him to think, that upon it's present footing it is pernicious to mankind : and that, as he had a great fund of humanity, sweetness of temper, and moderation, he saw with grief, that these virtues were banished from society, and that religion was made use of as a cloak to authorize all kinds of violence and injustice.' Mr Whiston, in his List of Suppositions and Assertions, &c (20), creating our author, together with Mr Toland, as guilty of impious frauds and Lay-craft, expresses himself, with regard to the former, in these terms : 'A second instance must be Mr Anthony Collins, a gentleman, who has many years taken superabundant care not to be suspected of believing so much as the Apostles Creed, or the books of the Old or New Testament, or indeed any Divine Providence at all. Yet does he claim a right to be admitted to take an oath upon the Bible, and to receive the Holy Communion itself ; and he is at this day admitted to do both, and in virtue thereof is in the commission of the peace, as a good Church-man : i. e. notwithstanding his open and professed infidelity, he ventures, in the most publick and solemn manner, to declare his unfeigned acknowledgment of the Divine Providence, of the truth of the Christian religion, and of the books of the Holy Scripture, that is possible to be done among men. It is with great regret I add this example of an old friend, and one whom I still love better than he loves himself ; but it is too flagrant to be omitted. This I call gross immorality, impious fraud, and Lay-craft.' Mr Armand de la Chapelle, having translated this passage into French (21), observes, that the expressions are a little too choleric, and that Mr Collins would have reason to triumph upon this instance of passion in his antagonist. This occasioned the sending a letter to Mr de la Chapelle (22), in which the writer observes, that 'Mr Whiston having accused Mr Collins of irreligion, but being sensible that this accusation, being destitute of proof, was ridiculous, he has artfully pretended, that the latter had been his friend, insinuating thereby that Mr Collins had disclosed to him his most secret sentiments. And yet (adds the writer) I have been assured by persons who are very well informed, that Mr Collins never had any intercourse of friendship with him ; that he never spoke to him above eight or ten times in his life, in a coffee-house or elsewhere, and always in other company, and that he has not seen him for above five years. Is this sufficient for Mr Whiston to claim the character of a friend ?' Mr Whiston, in another place (23), speaks thus of Mr Collins. The reputed author of Freethinking is, for all I have ever heard, a sober man ; thanks to his natural aversion to intemperance ; and that is more than can be said of some others of the club : but as for any other virtue, he has told us () it is such as he intends shall never hurt him. And it can't be thought uncharitable, if I say it rises from no higher origin than fear ; for he has himself disclaimed all nobler principles.* But, of all writers, the author of the Guardian (24) has treated our author's character with the greatest severity in the following passages : 'He that should burn a house, and justify the action by asserting he is a free agent, would be far more excusable than this author in uttering what he has from the right of a Free-Thinker.' Again; This gentleman may be assured he has not a taste for what he pretends to decry, and the poor man is certainly more a blockhead than an Atheist. Again; 'When such writers as this, who have no spirit but that of malice, pretend to inform the age, Mohocks and Cut-throats may well set up for wits and men of pleasure.' Lastly; If ever any man deserved to be denied the common benefits of air and water, it is the author of a Discourse of Free-thinking. But, notwithstanding the reproaches cast upon Mr Collins as an enemy to ALL religion, impartiality obliges us to remark, what is said, and generally believed to be true, that upon his death bed, he declared, 'That, as he had always endeavoured, to the best of his abilities, to serve his God, his King, and his country, so he was persuaded he was going to that place, which God had designed for them that love him:' to which he added, that The Catholick religion is to love God and to love man; and he advised such as were about him to have a constant regard to these principles. His library, which was a very large and curious one, was open to all men of letters, to whom he readily communicated all the lights and assistance in his power, and (we are told) even furnished his antagonists with books to confute himself, and directed them how to give their arguments all the force of which they were capable. We shall only add, that he carefully avoided all the indecencies of conversation, and discouraged every the least tendency towards obscenity of discourse.

COLSTON (EDWARD) a person ever memorable for his great and extensive charities, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century; was the eldest son of William Colston, Esq [A]; by Sarah his wife, and born in Temple parish in the city of Bristol, November 2, 1636 (a). He was brought up to trade, probably under his father (who was a most eminent Spanish Merchant); and resided some time in Spain: as did also his brothers, two of whom were inhumanly murdered there by assassins [B]. Through a very laudable industry, and in the course of a long and happy life, he acquired very great riches [C]; of which he expended a considerable part in works of beneficence and charity. In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St Michael's-hill Alms-house, in Bristol [D]. The same year, he gave houses and lands, without Temple-gate in that city, to the Society of Merchants for ever, towards the maintenance of six poor old decayed Sailors, to the yearly value of twenty-four pounds. In 1696, he purchased a piece of ground in Temple-street in the same city, and built at his own charge a school and dwelling-house for a Master, to instruct forty boys, in Writing, Arithmetick, and the Church-Catechism [E]. In 1702, he gave five hundred pounds, towards rebuilding Queen Elizabeth's Hospital on the College-Green in Bristol; and for the maintenance, cloathing, and education of six boys there, and putting them out apprentices, he appropriated an estate, out of which is paid to the Master the yearly sum of sixty pounds exclusive of all taxes and charges, besides ten pounds for placing out the boys apprentices. In the year 1708, he settled his great benefaction, of the Hospital in St Augustine's back, in the city aforesaid, consisting of a Master, two Ushers, and one hundred

(a) From Mr Colston's monument, in All-Saints church in Bristol; and from an account sent by the Rev. Mr Tucker.

[A] Was the eldest son of William Colston, Esq;] Who was a very eminent Spanish Merchant, as is said above. He was usually stiled Deputy Colston, because generally deputed by the corporation of the city to officiate for the Mayor elect, when he went to London to take the oaths; which the Mayors of Bristol always did before the new charter granted to that city by Queen Anne. This circumstance is a strong proof, both of his station in life, and of his character for integrity and virtue. Sarah, his wife, was a Counsellor's daughter (1). Their son, Mr Edward Colston, erected a monument to their memory, in the church of All-Saints in Bristol; the inscription on which is as follows: 'To the dear memory of his father William Colston, Esq; and of his mother Sarah Colston, interred near this place in the sepulchre of his ancestors; as also their four sons, William, Thomas, Robert, and William, and their two daughters, Martha and Martha, who were all natives and inhabitants of this city. William his father died 21st Nov. 1681, aged 73 years; and Sarah his mother the 23. Dec. 1701. aged 93 years.

[B] Two of whom were inhumanly murdered by assassins.] There is a tradition, that when Mr Colston and his two brothers were in Spain, in their disputes with the Papists it was often objected to them, 'That Reformed religion, produced no examples of great and charitable benefactions;' to which they were wont to reply, That if it pleased God to bring them safe home, they would wipe off that aspersion. Upon which, two of them were poisoned, to prevent their return: but their elder brother, Mr Edward Colston, escaped. Such is the tradition, but it is more certain, that one or both of them, were assassinated by banditti's or bravoos; very common in Spain and Portugal.

[C] He acquired very great riches.] The visible means whereby he acquired his riches, were as follow: 1. Being the eldest son, he received a handsome for-

ture from his parents. 2. Surviving all, if not most of, his brothers and sisters, he received theirs likewise: and the brothers had made very great additions to theirs by trade. 3. The Colston family had at that time the two most valuable branches of trade, in that part of the kingdom, almost entirely to themselves, viz. the fruit, and the oil, trade; Mr Colston having two ships always employed in that business: and oil was much more in use formerly than at present. Mr Colston not only supplied all, but purchased it abroad at a very great advantage, by advancing money to those necessitous people, the Spaniards and Portuguese, before their vintage, and being allowed a discount. 4. He never insured a ship, saving that expence, and yet he never lost one (2).

[D] In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St Michael's-hill alms house in Bristol.] The front and two sides are faced with free-stone. It contains a chapel neatly adorned; twenty-four apartments; and other conveniences, for twelve men and twelve women. The elder brother receives six shillings; and each of the others three shillings, weekly; besides an allowance for coal, &c. To a Clergyman is paid the sum of ten pounds yearly. He is to read the Common-Prayer, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, twice every day, except when prayers are read in St Michael's church; at which every member of this alms-house is to attend. The endowment, or estate given for this charity, arises chiefly from fee-farm rents, and amounts yearly to two hundred and eighty-two pounds, three shillings, and four pence. The over-plus of this estate is paid towards the maintenance of the six Sailors in the merchants alms-house in King-street. The charge of building and finishing this house amounted to about two thousand five hundred pounds.

[E] To instruct forty boys, in Writing, Arithmetick, and the Church-Catechism.] The boys are likewise to be clothed. The estate given for this charity is an annuity of fourscore pounds yearly, clear of all charges.

hundred boys [F]. He also gave six pounds per Ann. to the Minister of All Saints in Bristol, for reading prayers every Monday and Tuesday morning throughout the year; and one pound a year to the Clerk and Sexton. Likewise, six pounds yearly for ever, for a monthly sermon and prayers to the prisoners in Newgate there: and twenty pounds to be paid yearly for ever to the Clergy beneficed in that city, for preaching fourteen sermons in the time of Lent [G]. Besides many occasional charities, and benefactions, to several Churches and Charity-Schools, in the same city of Bristol [H].—Moreover, he built an Alms-houfe for six poor people at Shene in Surrey. He gave six thousand pounds, for the augmentation of sixty small livings [I]. To St Bartholomew's Hospital London, he gave two thousand pounds; wherewith was purchased an estate of one hundred pounds a year, which is settled on that Hospital: and he left to the same, by Will, five hundred pounds more. To Christ's Hospital, at several times, he gave a thousand pounds; and bequeathed thereto the like sum afterwards. As also to St Thomas's Hospital, and to Bethlem, five hundred pounds a piece. To the Work-houfe without Bishopsgate, two hundred pounds. To the Society for propogating the Gospel in foreign parts, three hundred pounds. He left, moreover, very handsome legacies to Mortlake in Surrey, where he died [K]. And gave the sum of one hundred pounds per Ann. to be continued for twelve years after his death, and to be distributed by the direction of his Executors; either to place out every year ten boys apprentices, or to be given towards the setting up ten young tradesmen, to each ten pounds: in the whole twelve hundred pounds. He gave likewise to eighteen Charity-Schools in several parts of England, and to be continued to them for twelve years after his decease, to each school yearly five pounds; or in all, each year, ninety pounds [L]. Finally, he gave towards building a church at Manchester in Lancashire, twenty pounds: and towards the building of a church at Tiverton in Devonshire, fifty pounds. Besides these known and publick benefactions, he gave away every year large sums in private charities, which was his practice for the course of many years: and there is reason to believe, that these were not much short of his publick charities (b). His usual method was, never to give any thing to common beggars; but he always ordered,

(b) From Mr Colston's Funeral Sermon by Dr Harcourt, preached in the church of All-Saints in Bristol, Oct. 29, 1721, and printed at London, the same year.

[F] In—1708, he settled his great benefactions, of the hospital in St Augustine's Back, in the city aforesaid, &c.] For the maintenance, cloathing, and education of these boys, and for placing them apprentices, he gave an estate, mostly arising by fee-farm rents, to the yearly value of thirteen hundred and eighteen pounds, fifteen shillings, and six-pence farthing. And the charge of first fitting up the hospital, and making it convenient for the purpose, amounted to about eleven thousand pounds. Out of that estate is to be paid yearly, ten pounds to a clergyman of the Church of England, for explaining and instructing the children in the Church Catechism: and in case the estate given for this charity, be not sufficient to answer the charges upon it, the executors are empowered to supply any deficiencies which have been, and to prevent them for the future.

[G] And twenty pounds to be paid yearly for ever to the Clergy beneficed in that city, for preaching fourteen sermons in the time of Lent.] The subjects on which he himself appointed they should be preached, are these: The Lent-fast; against Atheism and Infidelity; the Catholick Church; the Excellence of the Church of England; the Powers of the Church; Baptism; Confirmation; Confession and Absolution; the Errors of the Church of Rome; Enthusiasm or Superstition; Restitution; Frequenting the Divine Service; Frequent Communion; the Passion of our Blessed Saviour.

[H] Besides many occasional charities and benefactions to several churches and charity-schools in Bristol.] Particularly—to the cathedral, towards beautifying the choir, the marble about the communion-table, and organ, &c. at several times, two hundred and sixty pounds.—Towards rebuilding the Tower, and the repair and beautifying the chancel of All-Saints church, at three several times, two hundred and fifty pounds.—Towards the building of a new isle in Clifton-church, near Bristol, fifty pounds.—Towards the building of a gallery, and erecting an organ in St James's church, fifty pounds.—Towards an organ to be erected in St Mary Redcliff, a hundred pounds.—Towards the repair of St Michael's church, fifty pounds.—Towards the repair of St Stephen's church fifty pounds.—Towards the altar piece, ceiling, and portal, in the Temple-church, one hundred and sixty pounds.—Towards the repair of St Thomas's church, fifty pounds.—For an altar piece, in the church of St Werburgh, one hundred and sixty pounds. In 1702, he gave to the Mint work-houfe, for employing the poor, two hundred pounds. And for placing out poor boys and girls apprentices, two hundred pounds more. He gave yearly sixty pounds, to the charity-schools in the parishes of St Philip and St Jacob, St Thomas and Redcliff, St James's and to several erected in other places. And left by will, to the charity-schools erected in the parishes of St Philip and Jacob, ten pounds; of St Thomas and Redcliff, ten pounds; of St Augustine and St Michael, ten pounds; of St James, ten pounds. And to each of these ten pounds yearly, to be continued for twelve years after his death. All this in Bristol.

[I] He gave six thousand pounds, for the augmentation of sixty small livings.] This gift at first was four thousand pounds, to which he afterwards added the other two thousand pounds. No more than a hundred pounds was to be given to one living. The distribution was to be after this manner: any living that was intitled to Queen Anne's bounty might have this too, on condition, that every parish, which did receive this, should be obliged to raise one hundred pounds, to be added to the hundred pounds allowed by Mr Colston. Many livings have had the grant of this bounty from Mr Colston (3).

[K] He left moreover very handsome legacies to Mortlake in Surrey, where he died.] He bequeathed for the education and cloathing of twelve boys and twelve girls, in that place; to be continued for twelve years after his death, yearly forty-five pounds; amounting in the whole to five hundred and forty pounds. Moreover, he gave eighty-five pounds (as many as he was years old) to be distributed to eighty-five poor men and women there, to each twenty shillings, at the time of his decease.

ordered, that poor house-keepers, sick, and decayed persons, should be sought out as the fittest objects for his charity. In building his hospitals and alms-houses, he showed, that his judgment could not be imposed upon by the workmen, as to the goodness of the materials, or the value of their work. For, as he understood those things very well, he drove what they would call a hard bargain; and paid all the workmen, himself, if present, or else ordered them to be paid, every Saturday night. If they worked longer than their customary hours, he paid them proportionably; if otherwise, he deducted; but never allowed any thing for drink. It is observable, that all the Colston-family were animated with a spirit of charity and piety. Several of Mr Edward Colston's publick benefactions were designed, and some actually begun, by his brothers; which he afterwards confirmed and enlarged (c). Some years before his decease he retired from business, and came and lived at London, and at Mortlake where he had a country-seat. At this last place he died October 11, 1721, aged eighty-four years, eleven months, and nine days: and was buried the 29th of the same month, in the church of All Saints in Bristol, where there is a monument erected to his memory [M]. His charity was his most shining virtue [N], as is abundantly manifest from those many instances of it mentioned above. As for the rest of his character; he was a constant communicant with the Church of England, a most zealous advocate for her doctrines, worship, and discipline, in opposition to Popery as well as Fanaticism, and a most lively and exemplary son of it (d). He was, likewise, a person of great temperance, meekness, evenness of temper, patience, and mortification. He always looked chearful and pleasant, scarce ever in the least discomposed: and was naturally of a very peaceable and quiet disposition. He was remarkably circumspect in all his actions; always observed the same regularity in keeping his accounts, as when he began the world, and was a very good master of book-keeping (e). His strength continued vigorous, his understanding clear, his apprehension quick, and his judgment sound, long beyond the age of man, even to reach almost to the end of his eighty-fifth year, without decay in his understanding, without labour or sorrow (f).

[M] Where there is a monument erected to his memory.] The inscription thereon, contains an enumeration of his publick charities, already mentioned in this article. Then on the pedestal, or base, is added as follows:

'Edward, the son of William Colston, Esq; and Sarah his wife, was born in this city Nov. 2, 1636, died at Mortlake in Surrey Octob. 11, 1721, and lies buried near this monument.'

[N] His charity was his most shining virtue.] And so extensive was it, that, as Dr Harcourt observes (5), 'To do justice to his character, would oblige one to enumerate almost every kind of charity, whereby we can promote the glory of God, or relieve the necessities of our fellow-creatures. Scarcely any sort of temporal calamity escaped his charitable assistance; nor is there scarcely one spiritual want, towards the removing of which he did not piously and freely afford his contribution. In short, the charities which have taken either their foundation or improvement from his open hand, are so numerous, that the variety will appear so great as to surprize; and the immensity of the sums expended in them will be judged extremely large, when it shall be considered, that they are the charity of one private person. From his bountiful benefactions, the ignorance of the young, the miseries of the infirm, and the helpless necessities of the old, are removed, eased, and relieved.' C

COMBER, or CUMBER (THOMAS) a considerable Divine in the XVIIth Century [A], was born in Westram in Kent, in the year 1645 (a), being the son of James Cumber of that parish. He was educated in grammar learning in his native place, by Thomas Walter, and William Holland Vicars of Westram. At fourteen years of age, on the 18th of April 1659, he was admitted into Sidney-Suffex-College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Edmund Matthews, B. D. The 16th of January 1662-3, he was elected Scholar of that house; and the next day had his grace in college for the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b): which he accordingly took and completed in the university (c). On the 26th of May 1666, he had likewise his grace for the degree of Master of Arts (d). It moreover appears, that he was created Doctor in Divinity between the years 1676 and 1679; but as his name doth not occur in any of our university-registers, it is therefore probable, that he had that degree conferred upon him at Lambeth. On the 5th of July 1677, he was collated by Archbishop Sterne to the Prebend of Holme in the cathedral church of York (e); which he quitted, the 19th of July 1681, for the Prebend of Fenton in the same church (f). The 19th of January 1683-4, he was also collated to the Precentorship (g). Upon the deprivation of Dr Dennis Granville, he was nominated April 23, 1691, to succeed him in the Deanery of Durham; whereupon he resigned his Precentorship of York (h). He was Chaplain to Anne Princess of Denmark, and to King William and Queen Mary. He died November 25, 1699, in the fifty-fifth year

He must not be confounded with another Dr Thomas Comber, who lived in the same century, and was of Trinity-college in Cambridge. This last was born in Suffex, Jan. 1, 1575; admitted Scholar of Trinity-college, May 11, 1593; Fellow of the same, October 2, 1597; Junior Dean, October 2, 1608; Preacher, October 16, 1609; Greek Examiner, October 2, 1611; Chief Reader, October 2, 1612; Senior

Dean, October 2, 1618, 1619, and 1625; Senior Treasurer, Dec. 13, 1620, and Dec. 20, 1621; appointed Dean of Carlisle, Aug. 28, 1630; and sworn in Master of Trinity-college, October 12, 1631 (1). He writ 'An Historical Vindication of the vine Rights of Tithes, &c.' against Mr Selden's History of Tithes, 4to. In 1642, he was imprisoned, plundered, and deprived of all his preferments. He died Feb. 28, 1653, at Cambridge, and was buried March 3, in St Botolph's church in that town (2).

[C] With the occasional Prayers and Thanksgiving.] Printed in two volumes 8vo. 1679. His general method in this work, is, to give, first, an analysis of each part: secondly, an explanation of it: thirdly, a paraphrase; and, lastly, a meditation upon it.

[D] A Companion to the Altar, &c.] It is dedicated by the author to his patron Richard Archbishop of York. — To whom, as he observes, he was obliged to make this tender by his condition and his duty, by gratitude and affection; — having first received the Holy Order of Priesthood, and the power of dispensing the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper from his Grace's hands. — He observes, in the same place, that 'There is nothing more useful to the friends of this Church, nor more convincing to the dissenters from it, than to present her pure and primitive order of worship in it's natural and lovely splendor.' — The Imprimatur bears date January 21, 1673-4. It was so well received, that a fourth edition came out in 1685, within the space of eleven years. The whole is divided into four parts, containing learned observations, and then paraphrases, and meditations upon each branch of the Communion-Office.

[E] A Discourse upon the Offices of Baptism, Catechism, and Confirmation.] The author dedicates it to Dr Tillotson, then Dean of Canterbury: and says, 'it will contribute to the reputation of these tracts, to be ushered in with so worthy a name, and add to their author's character, to be reckoned among the number of your friends.'

[F] A Discourse on the occasional Offices, &c.] First printed in 1676, 8vo. These four last pieces, were re-printed together in one volume, fol. 1701, divided into four parts. They are dedicated to King William.

[G] Short Discourses upon the whole Common-

Prayer, &c.] He tells us in his Dedication, that the importunity of his friends had engaged him to write these shorter Discourses, for the use of those who wanted time to consider the larger work, i. e. his Companion to the Temple and Altar. As for the method and design of it, First, the Original and Antiquity of every part of Common-Prayer is therein declared. Secondly, the method of each several piece is cleared. Thirdly, the sense of all is opened by divers plain and natural observations on the matter of these offices, to help all to perform them with a devotion suitable to their great worth. And it is designed, 1. To instruct those who did not understand, or rather not observe, these excellencies to be in the Common-Prayer. 2. To furnish the devout sons of the Church with profitable meditations, to enlarge upon in their minds in the use of these prayers, and to put them into a right frame for saying them affectionately, and with a holy importunity. 3. It is designed to convince the mistaken Dissenters if they will hear reason; if not, to discover to others the injustice and malice of their clamours against it (4).

[H] Roman forgeries in the Councils, &c.] In the introduction he observes, that in the allowed Romish editions of the Councils (those of Binus, Colon. 1618, and of Labbé and Costart, Paris, 1671) 'there is such adding and expunging, such altering and disguising things in the body of the Councils, and such excusing, falsifying, and shuffling in the notes, that a judicious reader will soon perceive, those venerable records truly set down and explained, do not favour them. But these corruptions are carried on with such confidence and cunning, that an unexperienced and unwary student, may be imposed on by this specious shew of venerable antiquity: for their fakes therefore he thought it necessary to take a short view of that fraud and policy which is so commonly made use of in those editions of the Councils which pass through the Roman mint.' — Then he says he hopes 'this undertaking will be many ways useful: First, It will tend to the ease of those who intend to read over the tomes of the Councils, or the Annals of Baronius, and save them much time and pains by presenting the principal errors of those great volumes at one view, which they would spend a long time in searching after, if they were to gather them up as they lie dispersed. Secondly, It may be very useful to those who desire to be rightly informed in the controversies between us and the Roman Church, because it will give them a clear prospect of what Councils and other antiquities are authentick, and may be allowed for evidence in this dispute; wherein our adversaries have so little regard to their own honour, that generally one half of their evidence is such as they have either forged or corrupted. Thirdly, It will be necessary (by way of antidote) to prepare those, who by reading books so full of infection, may by these plausible falsifications epitaph, to have been a person eminent for piety, learning, ingenuity, judgment, and other excellent qualities: and a strenuous defender of the doctrine, worship, and discipline of the Church of England.

* be in danger to be seduced into a great esteem of the opinions and practices of the Roman Church; when they find so many seemingly ancient tracts and Councils brought in to justify her in all things, and see (by this false light) all Ecclesiastical History and Records so modelled, as to persuade their readers, that in the purest Christian times, all things were believed and done in the Catholick Church just as they are now at Rome. But when it shall appear, that all this is a continued series and train of impostures, it will render their notions and practices, not only suspected, but odious, as needing such vile and base artifices, to make them seem agreeable to true Antiquity. C

COMPTON (WILLIAM) ancestor of the present noble Earls of Northampton and Wilmington, was the son of Edmund de Compton [A], and born in the year 1481 (a). The first foundation of his succeeding honours and riches, was, his being made, in the eleventh year of his age (b), one of the Pages to Henry Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Henry VIII: who, as soon as he came to the Crown, made him Groom of his Bed-chamber (c); and, before the expiration of that year, chief Gentleman of his Bed-chamber (d). He grew so much in favour with that King, that he was appointed by him, in the second year of his reign 1510, Groom of the Stole (e); and, soon after, Constable of Sudley-castle in Gloucestershire (f); as he was also of Gloucester-castle, in 1511 (g). In consideration of his good and faithful services, he obtained, in 1512, November the 7th, a special grant, to himself and his heirs, of an honourable augmentation to his Arms (h), out of the King's own royal ensigns and devices [B]: and, on the 4th of February next ensuing, the King conferred on him the office of Usher of the Black Rod, with an allowance of twelve pence a day for that service (i). He had likewise, the same year, by his Majesty's favour, a large grant, to himself and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten (k), of several Lands and Manors [C]. In 1513, being a Knight, he had a commission, to retain men in any of those Lordships belonging to the Monasteries whereof he was then Steward, for the service of the King in his wars (l): and, in the expedition to Terouenne and Tournay the same year, led the rere-guard of the King's army (m). Shortly after, he was made one of the Knights for the King's body (n); as also Chancellor of Ireland, with liberty to execute that office by a sufficient Deputy (o). But he did not hold it long; for, two years after, namely, in 1515, it was given to the Archbishop of Dublin (p). In 1514, and 1517, he had a grant to himself and his wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies lawfully begotten (q), of several manors and estates [D]. The same year, namely, 1517, he was appointed Constable of Hanley-castle in Worcestershire (r): And in 1518, was ordered to provide fifty archers for the King's service in his wars (s). In 1519, he obtained licence to make a park at his manor of Compton Vineyatys, or Vineyard, in Warwickshire; and, for an addition to the same, to inclose two thousand acres more, thereto adjoining (t). Upon the attainder of Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, in 1521, he obtained a grant of the manor, castle, and park of Maxstoke in Warwickshire, as also of the manors of Scotton and Brereton in Yorkshire, in reversion, after the death, or surrender, of Simon Coniers (u). In 1523, he was employed with the Earl

[A] Was the son of Edmund de Compton.] This noble family derive their descent from Turbill the son of Alwin; who, in the time of Edward the Confessor, resided at Warwick, of which county he was Earl. At the time of the Norman conquest, not joining with Harold, he continued in the possession of his own lands, among which was the Lordship of Compton, and forty seven manors in divers counties. By Leverunia his second wife he had Osbert, who wrote himself of Compton, and was ancestor of the present noble family. His second son was Philip; to whom succeeded his son and heir Thomas, that lived in the reign of Henry the third; and whose eldest son was Philip; father of Robert de Compton, who was knighted before the 31st of Edward the second; and was succeeded by Robert, father of Thomas de Compton. He was one of the Coroners for Warwickshire, in the 23d of Edward the third, an office of great account in those days. It was enjoyed after him by his son and heir Edmund, who died in the reign of Henry IV. He had issue six sons, whereof William the eldest, dying about the year 1431, left issue Robert his son and heir, who died in 1480. His son, and successor was Edmund, who dying in 1492, left issue by Joan his wife, daughter and heir of Walter Aylworth, Esq; William, who is the subject of this article (1).

[B] Out of the King's own royal ensigns and devices.] Namely, 'a Lyon passant guardant, or.' And for the crest, 'a demi-dragon crazed, gules, within a coronet of gold, upon a tose argent and vert.' as by a special instrument under the King's own sign manual, bearing date Novem. 7, 1512, appeareth (2).

[C] Of several Lands and Manors.] Of which these are the names. The manor of Wyke in Middlesex, formerly belonging to George Duke of Clarence: Lovel's Inn in Pater-Noster Row, London; with divers tenements pertaining therto: The manor of Aldwike, or Holand's, with Baro-Shanke wood, in Northamptonshire; twenty four acres of meadow in Brantfy; twenty four in Swillingholm; all in Aldwicle, (or Aldwike) in the same county: also the manor of Dcyncourt in Buckinghamshire, part of the possessions of Francis Lord Lovel; with the manors of Rocholds, Cobham, and Rishams, part of the lands of Sir Richard Charlton, Knt (3).

[D] In 1514, and 1517, he had a grant—of several manors and estates.] Namely, in 1514, the manors of Elcombe, and Ufcote, in Wiltshire; and the manor of Pole-place in Berkshire, part of the possessions of Francis Viscount Lovel. In 1517, the manors of Salthrope, Chilton, and Blagrove, in Wiltshire; two hundred acres of pasture, called Blagrove, with their appurtenances in Blagrove and Wroughton, in the same county. Likewise the manor of Wythynden, or Myhunden in the parishes of Wroughton, and Lidiard-Tregoze, in the same county; the manor of Elcomb, with the park; the manors of Watlescote, and Westcote; one hundred acres of land, and sixty acres of pasture, in Wigleste, and Wroughton: The manor of Uffecote, two messuages, a thousand acres of land, a thousand acres of pasture, three hundreded acres of meadow, and three hundreded acres of wood in Broad-Hinton, all in the same county. And eight pounds yearly rent issuing out of the manor of Denford, in Berkshire, late Francis Viscount Lovel's attained (4).

Earl of Surrey, and the Marquis of Dorset, &c. to make incursions into Scotland. This ungrateful office was put upon him by the contrivance of Cardinal Wolsey; who observing, how much Sir William was in the King's favour, and fearing he should diminish his authority, procured him to be thus sent into the wars against the Scots. For, Sir William could not bear the Cardinal's presumption, in taking so much upon him to the derogation of the King's prerogative; therefore the Cardinal thought, in his absence, to have work'd him out of favour. But he could not, for the King recalled him soon after to Court (w): and, in 1525, constituted him Keeper of his money and jewels (x), which is the same we now call the Privy Purse (y). Sir William built a very noble house at his manor of Compton [E]: and, in the chapel, erected a beautiful window towards the east; in the painted glass of which, most curiously done, was represented the passion of Jesus Christ. And in the lower part, Sir William himself and his Lady, kneeling, in their surcoats of Arms (z). He died of the sweating sickness, in the year 1528, May 31, aged forty-seven (a); being at that time of the Privy-Chamber to the King, who was then also in great danger (b). His body was buried at Compton; as he had desired in his Will, bearing date March 8, 1522; in which he also desired, that his Lady should be interred in the same place: and, that a tomb of alabaster should be made, by the direction of his Executors, for his father, and set over his grave, with his Arms cut thereon. Likewise, that his mother's body should be taken up from the place where she lay buried, and deposited by his father. Moreover, he appointed that his Executors should found in his name two chantries at Compton; and that every Priest therein should have a yearly salary of ten marks (c) [F]. He married Werburge, daughter and heir of Sir John Breton, Knt. and widow of Sir Francis Cheney, Knt. by whom he had issue

PETER, who being under age at the time of his father's decease, was put under the Wardship of Cardinal Wolsey (d). He married Anne daughter of George Earl of Shrewsbury; but dying before he came of age, on the 30th of January 1543, he left only one son, forty-nine weeks and five days old (e); named

HENRY, who was knighted February 10, 1566, by the Earl of Leicester; and, on the 8th of May 1572, summoned by writ to the House of Lords, by the title of Baron Compton of Compton. In 1586, he was one of the Peers for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots (f). He is supposed to have died in the year 1589 (g). By his first Lady, Frances daughter to Francis Hastings Earl of Huntingdon, he had, among other children [G]

WILLIAM, his eldest son and heir, who was summoned to Parliament in the thirty-fifth of Queen Elizabeth, and was one of the Privy-Council to that Queen. On the 5th of January 1604, he was made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Charles Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Charles I (h); and was constituted, some years after, President of the Council for the Marches of Wales (i), and Lord-Lieutenant of the counties of Worcester, Hereford, Salop, and Warwick (k). On the 2d of August 1618, he was advanced to the title of Earl of Northampton (l); and on the 21st of April 1629, installed a Knight of the Garter. He died June 24, 1630: leaving issue, by Elizabeth his Lady, sole daughter and heir of Sir John Spencer Alderman of London, Spencer, of whom we shall speak in the next article.

[E] Sir William built a very noble house at his manor of Compton. The greatest part of the brick used in the building of it, was brought from Fulbrook in the same county (of Warwick) where there stood a ruinous castle, of which the King had granted him the custody. This castle he pulled down, making use of the materials for that building (5).

[F] And that every priest therein should have a yearly salary of ten marks. For the proving of this Will, Cardinal Wolsey (who, under the colour of his Legantine authority, had wrested the probate of wills from the Prerogative court of Canterbury,) exacted no less than a thousand marks; as was publicly declared by Sir Henry Guilford, one of the executors. And this extortion was the cause of making the statute 21 Hen. VIII. ch. v. wherein the fees to be taken for the Probate of testaments, were settled and limited (6).

[G] Among other children. His children by the Lady Frances Hastings besides William here mentioned, were, Margaret, married to Henry Lord Mordaunt; and Thomas, who on the 4th of March, 1606-7, was knighted; he married Mary, daughter of Anthony Beaumont, second son of William Beaumont of Cole-Overton in Leicestershire; which Mary was by King James I. created Countess of Buckingham, July 1, 1618, being the mother of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of King James, and King Charles I. — The second wife of Henry Lord Compton, was Anne daughter of Sir John Spencer of Althorpe in Northamptonshire, Knt. by whom he had, Sir Henry Compton of Bramble-Tigh in Suffex Knight of the Bath; Cecily; Mary; and Margaret (7).

COMPTON (SPENCER) only son of the former [A], and second Earl of Northampton, deserves to be particularly remembered. He was made Knight of the Bath, on the 3d of November 1616, at the time when Charles Duke of York (afterwards King Charles I.) was created Prince of Wales; with whom he became a great favourite. In 1622, he accompanied him into Spain, waiting on him in quality of Master of his Robes and Wardrobe, and had the honour to deliver all his presents, amounting, as was computed, to sixty-four thousand pounds. At the Coronation of that Prince, he attended dale in Scotland; and Anne to Ulick Bourk, Lord Dunkellin, son and heir to Richard Earl of Clanrickard in Ireland, and Earl of St Albans in England (1).

as Master of the Robes; and, in 1639, waited on his Majesty in his expedition against the Scots. He was likewise among those Noblemen, who, on the 4th of May 1641, took the Protestation to defend the true Protestant Religion expressed in the doctrine of the Church of England, and his Majesty's Royal person, honour, and estate; as also the power and privilege of Parliaments, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subject (a). In 1642, he waited upon his Majesty at York; and was one of the Lords who subscribed, the 15th of June the same year, a Declaration at that place, wherein they professed before God, and testified to all the world, that they were fully persuaded, that his Majesty had no intention to make war upon his Parliament: but that all his endeavours tended to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant Religion; the just privileges of Parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the law, peace, and prosperity of the kingdom (b). Having, after that, often endeavoured to compose the unhappy jealousies in the nation; but finding his endeavours ineffectual, and that the Parliament were raising forces to distress such as came not into it's measures, he thought it more for his Majesty's service to retire to his native country; where he soon got together such a number of Gentlemen and Soldiers, as awed the country into the King's allegiance, drove the Lord Brook out of Warwickshire, who endeavoured to secure that county for the Parliament; and in twelve skirmishes put a great stop to the Earl of Essex's rendezvous at Northampton (c). After King Charles I. had set up his standard at Nottingham, he raised, one of the first, at his own charge, a troop of horse, and a regiment of foot (d): and, at the battle between Keinton and Edge-hill, brought two thousand of the best disciplined men in the whole army. When that battle (which happened on the 23d of October 1642) was over, the King's army having taken Banbury, a garrison was placed therein under the command of the Earl of Northampton (e): who, by his vigilance and conduct, performed many successful services, and was the life of his Majesty's cause in those parts. He secured most of the arms, ammunition, and garrisons in Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Northamptonshire; and settling an Association, made the country from garrison to garrison one line of communication (f). Afterwards, with a strong party of horse, and dragoons, from his garrison at Banbury, he relieved the town of Stafford, that was besieged by Sir John Gell; and putting himself into that town, beat up a quarter of the enemies, in which he took and killed above an hundred of their horse. But Sir John Gell having joined Sir William Brereton, and they being near three thousand foot and horse, with a good train of artillery, moved back towards Stafford; imagining the Earl of Northampton would meet them without the walls. And it happened according to their expectation: for, on Sunday the 19th of March 1642-3, as soon as he heard they were advancing towards the town, he marched out with his party, consisting in all of near one thousand horse, dragoons, and foot, to encounter them. He found the enemy in very good order, expecting him, on a plain called Cranock-green, Salt-heath, or Hopton-heath (g), about two or three miles from Stafford. Though their number was more than double that of his Lordship's [B], yet the Heath seeming very fair, the breadth of it being more than musquet-shot from the enclosure on each side, and the number of his horse at least equal to theirs, he resolved to charge them: and accordingly did, with so good success, that he totally routed one part of their horse. Rallying again his men, he charged the other part of their horse, which stood more in shelter of their foot, and so totally dispersed them, that the enemy had scarce a horse left upon the field. He took likewise from them eight pieces of cannon [C]. In this second charge, his Lordship being engaged in the execution, very near, or among, their foot, had his horse killed under him [D]: so that his own body of horse, pursuing the chase with too much fury, he was left encompassed by the enemy. After he was on his feet, he killed with his own hand the Colonel of foot, who first came near him; And, after his head-piece was struck off with the but-end of a musquet, they offered him quarter; which he refused, answering, 'That he scorned to

(*) Memorable

[B] Though their number was more than double that of his Lordship's. We are assured, that the number of their men, was 'near three thousand foot and horse, with a good train of artillery (2).' Some of the Parliament-Historians (3) affirm indeed, that Sir John Gell's army consisted but of about fifteen hundred, horse and foot; and the Earl's of about twelve hundred: tho' they mention afterwards the coming of Sir William Brereton to Gell's assistance, before the fight was ended. But they do not express the number of the forces he brought; in which point, their silence seems to be culpable, as being designed to mislead the reader. Such instances are very frequent in Vicens's Chronicle; which indeed is only a heap of falsehood and misrepresentations, as well as of most shocking hypocrisy, and canting nonsense. Honest Mr Whitelock tells us plainly, and without disguise (4), that Sir John Gell and Sir William Brereton came with three thousand horse and foot.

[C] And so totally dispersed them, that the enemy had scarce a horse left upon the field, &c. This is the Lord Clarendon's account. And Dr Ryves more particularly informs us (*) that in this fight above three hundred of the rebels were taken and killed; at the least, two hundred more wounded; above three hundred of their horse taken, with four pieces of cannon, and a case of Drakes. And on the King's side, some few slain. On the other hand Vicens affirms (5), that the Parliament-forces repulsed the Earl's horse, — and at least an hundred and forty Cavaliers were slain with him; with the loss of eight or ten only of the Parliamentarians. And 'by the timely coming in of Sir William Brereton, before the fight was ended, Sir John Gell obtained a glorious victory, and drove his enemies quite out of the field.' Such are the frequent contradictions between Historians of different parties. But, on which side the victory inclined, we may judge by the consequence. And that it was in the King, is evident by the Earl of Northampton's forces recovering Lichfield soon after; which the others would never have permitted them to do, had they been victorious.

'take quarter from such base rogues and rebels, as they were.' Upon which, he was slain by a blow with a halbert on the hinder part of his head, receiving, at the same time, another deep wound in his face (b). He was then in the forty-second year of his age (i). The enemy refused to deliver the body to the young Earl of Northampton, and would not even permit his Surgeons to come and embalm it, unless he would deliver, in exchange for it, all the ammunition, prisoners, and cannon he had taken in the late battle (k). However, it was delivered up at last, and buried in All-hallows Church in Derby, in the same vault with his relation the old Countess of Shrewsbury (l). As to this noble Lord's character; we are informed, that he was a person of great courage, honour, and fidelity, and not well known 'till his evening; having, in the ease, plenty, and luxury, antecedent to our unhappy dissensions, indulged himself in that licence which was then thought necessary to great fortunes. But, from the beginning of the civil wars, as if he had been awakened out of a lethargy, he never proceeded with a lukewarm temper. From the time he submitted himself to the profession of a soldier, no man was more punctual upon command, no man more active and vigilant in duty. All distresses he bore like a common man, and all wants and hardships, as if he had never known plenty or ease; most prodigal of his person to danger; and would often say, That if he out-lived these wars, he was certain never to have so noble a death (m). His Lordship married Mary daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, Knt. by whom he had two daughters, and six sons. The daughters were, Anne married to Sir Hugh Cholmondeley of Whitby in Yorkshire, Bart. and Penelope to Sir John Nicholas, Knight of the Bath, eldest son of Sir Edward Nicholas, one of the Secretaries of State to King Charles I, and King Charles II (n). Of the sons, who were all highly esteemed for their eminent abilities, and all inherited their father's courage, loyalty, and virtue; five of them received the honour of Knighthood, namely, James the eldest son and heir; Sir Charles; Sir William [E]; Sir Spencer; and Sir Francis: and Henry, the sixth, and youngest, late Bishop of London, was no less conspicuous. At the battle of Hopton-heath, the three eldest, who were officers under their father, charged that day in the field, when Sir James, the eldest, received a shot in one of his legs (o). At the battle of Edge-hill he was absent; but Sir Charles, and Sir William, tho' neither of them was twenty, charged in the troop with their father; and Sir Spencer, though not able to grasp a pistol, yet in indignation cried, That he was not exposed to the same hazard as his brothers (p).

[E] Sir William.] This brave gentleman had the command of a regiment, wherewith he performed considerable service at the taking of Banbury, leading his men on to three attacks, and had two horses shot under him. Upon the surrender of the town and castle, he was made Lieutenant-Governor under his father; and on the 19th of July, 1644, when the Parliament's forces came before the town he returned answer to their summons; 'That he kept the castle for his Majesty, and as long as one man was left alive in it, 'willed them not to expect to have it delivered:' also on the 16th of September, they sending him another summons, he made answer, 'That he had formerly answered them, and wondered they should send again.' He was so vigilant in his station, that he countermined the enemy eleven times, and during the siege, which held thirteen weeks never went into bed, but by his example so animated the garrison, that tho' they had but two horses left uneaten, they would never suffer a summons to be sent to them, after the answer beforementioned was delivered. At length, his brother the Earl of Northampton raised the siege on the 26th of October, the very day of the month, on which both town and castle had been surrendered to the King two years before. Sir William continued Governor of Banbury, and performed many signal services for the King, 'till his Majesty left Oxford, and the whole kingdom was submitting to the Parliament: and then on the 8th of May, 1646, surrendered upon honourable terms. In 1648, he was Major-General of the King's forces at Colchester, where he was so much taken notice of for his admirable behaviour, that Oliver Cromwell called him the sober young man, and the godly Cavalier. At the Restoration of King Charles II. he was made one of the Privy-Council, and the master-General of the Ordnance; and died October 19, 1663, in the 39th year of his age, having married Elizabeth, widow of Lord Allington of Horheath in Cambridge, with whom he lived twelve years, but left no issue (7). There is an epitaph erected to his memory in the church of Compton-Winyate (8).

COMPTON (JAMES) the eldest of the six sons last mentioned, and third Earl of Northampton, taking arms with his father for King Charles I, was distinguished for his bravery and conduct, and performed many gallant acts in those times of confusion. He was at the battle of Edge-hill, the taking of Banbury, &c (a). and waiting upon the King at Oxford, had the degree of Doctor of Laws conferred on him by that university, November 1, 1642 (b). The 19th of March following, he was in the engagement at Hopton-heath, where receiving a shot in one of his legs, he was obliged to quit the field (c). However, he was in a short time so well recovered of that wound, that on the 8th of April 1643, he was with Prince Rupert at the taking of Lichfield, and the surrender of the Close there, the 21st of the same month. Also May 6, the same year, he routed a party of the enemies horse and foot (d) at Middleton-cheney in Northamptonshire, which thought themselves strong enough to attempt the taking of Banbury; and he defeated their horse, killed above two-hundred of their foot, and took as many more prisoners (e). He afterwards commanded the horse at the first battle of Newbury, September 20, 1643, and charged and put to flight the enemy's horse under Sir William Waller. On the 29th of June 1644, he was one of the Commanders at Cropredry-bridge fight, wherein Sir William Waller was routed again (f). Soon after he marched with the King into Cornwall; and at his return raised the siege of Banbury October 26, 1644, routing the Parliament forces, tho' their horse were much superior in number (g). Then joining the King, he relieved Donnington-castle; whereupon battle was offered to the enemy, who declined it, tho' tho' they had just before obtained advantages in the second fight at Newbury, the Earl being absent in raising the siege of Banbury (b). On the 18th of March 1644-5, he and his three brothers, routed a great body of the Parliamentarians horse of Northampton near Althorp, killed about thirty, and hurt many more, taking twenty-six prisoners (i). But in April 1645, he was defeated by Lieutenant-General Cromwell near Oxford, and several of his men were taken prisoners (k). After which, finding that his Majesty was over-powered by the Parliament, he resolved to go beyond sea, and obtained a pass from the House of Commons for that purpose (l). But, however, he seems to have compounded for his estates, and to have staid in the kingdom (m). Afterwards, the powers in being growing jealous of him, he was imprisoned; but discharged again, the 2d of November 1659, upon security given to live peaceable (n). On the 29th of May 1660; at the Restoration of King Charles II, he led a troop of two hundred Gentlemen, clothed in grey and blue: and, in the reign of that King, was of the Privy-Council, Constable of the Tower of London; Lord Lieutenant of the county of Warwick, and city of Coventry, Recorder of the same, and also of the towns of Northampton and Tamworth. He died at his seat of Castle-Ashby in Northamptonshire, December 15, 1681, and was interred among his ancestors at Compton in the county of Warwick; which church being demolished in the civil wars, was rebuilt at his Lordship's sole expence, in 1665. He was married twice [A]. By his second Lady he had three sons, GEORGE, who succeeded him in his honours [B]; James, that died young; and Spencer, created January 11, 1727-8, Baron of Wilmington in Suffex, and May 12, 1730, Viscount Pevensy in the same county, and Earl of Wilmington (o).

[A] He was married twice. His first Lady was, Isabella, one of the two daughters and coheirs to Richard Earl of Dorset; by whom he had issue two sons, William, and James, who both died in their childhood; and three daughters, Anne, and Isabella, which also died young, and Alethea married to Edward Hungerford, Esq; this first Lady died Octob. 14, 1661. His second Lady, was Mary, eldest daughter of Baptist Noel Viscount Camden, by whom he had three sons as mentioned above; and two daughters, Juliana who died young; and Mary married to Charles Sackville Earl of Dorset, mother of Lionel the present Duke of Dorset (1).

[B] GEORGE, who succeeded him in his honours. His Lordship was of Christ-Church in Oxford, where he was created Master of Arts, February 18, 1681-2 (2). Tho' he was under age at the time of his father's death, he was notwithstanding, made Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of Warwickshire. On Queen Anne's accession, he was sworn of her Privy-Council;

and in 1712, appointed Constable of the Tower of London. His Lordship died April 15, 1727, and was buried at Compton with his ancestors. By his first Lady, Jane, youngest daughter of Sir Stephen Fox Knt. which he married in 1686 (3), he had issue four sons; JAMES, the present Earl of Northampton; George, Member in this Parliament for Northampton, and one of the Lords of the Treasury: Stephen, who died young; and Charles, who on the 10th of May 1727 was appointed Consul at Lisbon, and Consul-general in the dominions of Portugal. He had also by her six daughters; Elizabeth, Mary, Jane, Anne, Penelope, and Margaret; of whom the second was married in April, 1709, to William Gore of Tring in Hertfordshire, Esq; and the fourth, on the 16th of October, 1729, to Sir John Roushott of Northwick, in Worcestershire, Bart. His second Lady, was Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Roushott of Northwick, Bart. relict of Sir George Thorold Bart. who in 1719, was Lord Mayor of London; but by her he had no issue (4).

COMPTON (HENRY) Bishop of London in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, and one of the most eminent Prelates that ever sat in that See, was the sixth [A] and youngest son of Spencer the second Earl of Northampton, mentioned in the foregoing article. He was born at Compton (a) in the year 1632 (b). His father being unhappily slain in 1642-3, when this his youngest son was but ten years old, he was thereby deprived of that paternal care which is so necessary in that tender age. However, (notwithstanding that misfortune) he received an education suitable to his quality. When he had gone through the Grammar-schools, he was entered a Nobleman of Queen's College in Oxford, in the year 1649, and having continued there 'till about 1652, went and lived with his mother at Gryndon in Northamptonshire. Afterwards he travelled beyond sea (c), where he remained a considerable time; and examined the civil and ecclesiastical polities abroad, but the more he observed them, the more he liked the English constitution: He saw their manners, and was too wise to imitate them. However, what he thought valuable amongst them he brought home, and in particular retained their languages perfectly (d) [B]. After the Restoration of King Charles II, he returned to England; and a regiment of horse being raised about that time for the King's guard, of which the command was given to Aubrey Earl of Oxford, Mr Compton accepted of a Cornet's commission therein, either by his own choice, or the persuasion of friends. But, soon after, discovering a greater inclination to his studies than to a military life, he quitted that post,

[A] Was the sixth. See above, in the article SPENCER COMPTON. Mr Boyer says by mistake, that he was the fourth son (1). We are told that he was in the field at Edgehill in his cradle; by which 'is understood, that he was carried to the camp for security when very young (2). But certainly he could not be there in his cradle: for he was then ten years old.

[B] And in particular retained their languages perfectly. Dr Gooch informs us (3), that, 'The better to prepare him for that figure he was afterwards to make, he spent some years in travelling; not to suck

in the maxims of foreign states, or to try the vices of foreign Courts; not before he knew our constitution in Church and State, and was able to defend it, and sure to stick to it. He observed and examined the Civil and Ecclesiastical Polities abroad; he made them his study, but not his rule. The more he staid in France and Italy, &c. the more Englishman he was; he came home the better Stateman and the better Churchman; he was proof against all their arts, to debauch either his principles or his practices.' Whilst he was abroad, he is said to have trailed a pike in Flanders, under the Duke of York (4).

post, and dedicated himself to the service of the Church (e). Accordingly he went to Cambridge, where he was created Master of Arts (f). Afterwards entering into Orders [C], and obtaining a grant of the next vacant Canonry of Christ-Church in Oxford, he was admitted Canon-Commoner of that college, in the beginning of the year 1666, by the advice of Dr John Fell then Dean of the same (g). The 7th of April next ensuing, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, as he stood at Cambridge (h): about which time, he was possessed of the Rectory of Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, worth above five hundred pounds a year. Before that, he had a lesser benefice. In both he showed his great concern for the souls of men. He was constituted in 1667, Master of St Cross's Hospital near Winchester, upon the death of Dr William Lewis [D]. On the 24th of May 1669, he was installed Canon of Christ-Church [E], in the room of Dr Richard Heylin deceased (i). Two days after (k), he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (l); and that of Doctor, the 28th of June following (m). Advancing daily in the King's favour and esteem, and in the opinion of all good men, he was, upon the translation of Dr Nathanael Crew from the Bishoprick of Oxford to that of Durham, nominated to succeed him in the See of Oxford: to which he was elected November 10; confirmed December 2, and consecrated at Lambeth December 6, 1674 (n). About July 1675, he was made Dean of the Royal Chapel, on the death of Dr Blandford Bishop of Worcester; and being the same year translated to the See of London [F], in the room of Dr Henchman deceased, was confirmed therein the 18th of December (o). On the 22d of January 1675-6, King Charles, who entertained a just opinion of his capacity and fidelity, caused him to be sworn one of his Privy-Council; which station his Majesty thought fit to continue him in, upon his constituting a new Privy-Council in April 1679 (p). The educating, and well-grounding, of the King's two nieces, the Princesses Mary and Anne (q), in the doctrine and communion of the Church of England, was committed to his care; and that important trust he discharged, to the nation's universal satisfaction [G]. On the 4th of November 1677, he had the honour of performing the ceremony of the marriage of the eldest, Mary, with William Prince of Orange: and on the 28th of July 1683, that of Anne, the youngest, with George Prince of Denmark (r). The firmness of these two Princesses in the Protestant Religion, was owing in a great measure to their learned tutor Bishop Compton; which afterwards, when Popery came to prevail at the Court of England, was imputed to him as an unpardonable crime. During the mutual heats and animosities in the latter part of King Charles II's reign, some of the most learned and exemplary Clergy endeavoured, both in private and publick, to bring the Dissenters to a sense of the necessity of union among Protestants. To promote that good design, our worthy Bishop held, in 1679 three conferences with his Clergy upon the two Sacraments, and upon catechising youth in the true principles of religion. In 1680, he pursued the same design in three other conferences; namely, on the half communion; prayers in an unknown tongue; and prayers to Saints: the substance of which he published in a letter to the Clergy of his diocese, dated July 6, 1680. He further hoped; that it might tend to pacify and reconcile the Dissenters, by bringing in the judgment of foreign Divines against their needless separation. For that purpose, he wrote to Monsieur Le Moyne, Professor in Divinity at Leyden; to Mr de l'Angle, one of the [C] Afterwards entering into Orders.] When he did so, he was not a novice in age, or knowledge; being above a Bishop's necessary years (i. e. thirty years of age), when he was ordained a Deacon: but he did not aspire to, or desire the Episcopal Office, before he was qualified for the good work.—And tho' he might have made high demands upon the Court, and raised himself at once to the greatest dignities, yet he chose to make gradual and regular advances (5).

(5) Gooch, ibid.

[D] He was constituted in 1667, Master of St Cross's Hospital, &c.] A fit preference, as Dr Gooch rightly observes (6), for him, whose house was always a constant hospital! by this his income was considerably increased, (it being above 500 a year) and he had greater opportunities of doing good; the only motive to him to wish for it's increase; this was his greatest pleasure; and here he lived, and enjoyed it: here he would gladly have rested; but Providence had designed him for greater things.

(6) Ibid.

[E] On the 24th of May 1669, he was installed Canon of Christ Church.] And when he was Sub-Dean in that church he moderated in the Divinity-Disputations, with such gravity and wisdom, as made those exercises both reputable and instructive (7).

[F] Being the same year, translated to the See of London.] Anth. Wood tells us (8), that, 'This translation was much promoted by some of the politic Clergy, because they knew him to be a bold man, an enemy to the Papists, and one that would act, and speak what they would put him upon, which they themselves would not be seen in, as many prime Papists used to say.' We are also informed (9), that this translation was effected through the Earl of Danby's interest; to whom the Bishop was a property, and was turned by him as he pleased. The Duke of York hated him; but Lord Danby persuaded both the King and him, that, as his heat did no great hurt to any person, so the giving way to it helped to lay the jealousies of the Church-Party. About a year after that, Sheldon dying, Bishop Compton was persuaded that Lord Danby had tried with all his strength to promote him to Canterbury; tho' that was never once intended. He was a great patron of the Converts from Popery, and of those Protestants whom the bad usage they were beginning to meet with in France drove over to us: And by these means he came to have a great reputation. He was making many complaints to the King, and often in Council, of the insolence of the Papists, and of Coleman's in particular. So that the King ordered the Duke to dismiss Coleman out of his service: yet he continued still in his confidence.

[G] And that important trust he discharged to the nation's universal satisfaction.] How well he executed it, as Dr Gooch observes (10), let those confess, who value the memory of the late most renowned Queen (Mary), or have not laid aside all duty to our present most gracious Sovereign (11). They never forgot their obligations to him, but he was always in the esteem of the former, and received marks of favour from the latter. He had the particular honour which no one Bishop ever had, of marrying two Regent Queens to Protestant Princes. They were both confirmed by him January 23, 1675-6 (12).

the Preachers of the Protestant Church at Charenton near Paris; and to Mr Claude, another eminent French Divine; who, in their several Answers [H], agreed in vindicating the Church of England from any errors in its doctrine, or any unlawful impositions in its service and discipline; and therefore did condemn a separation from it, as needless and uncharitable (s). But, Popery was what the Bishop most strenuously opposed. For, when it was gaining ground in these kingdoms; under the favour and influence of the heir-apparent to the Crown, James Duke of York; our worthy Prelate, at the head of his Clergy, made a noble stand: and, by his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more strenuously defended the Reformed Religion, than it had ever been; to the shame and silence of their Romish adversaries [I]. The great disservice thereby done to these, and their cause, was remembered, and repented, when King James II. ascended the throne. To our Bishop's immortal honour, this was his unpardonable crime: and, accordingly, he was marked out, as the first sacrifice to Popish fury (t). The first instance of it, was, his being dismissed from the Council-table soon after King James's accession: and, on the 16th of December 1685, he was put out from being Dean of the Royal Chapel (u). Further occasions were sought, and soon found, of molesting, or entirely ruining him, if possible. For Dr John Sharp Rector of St Giles's in the fields, London, having, in some of his sermons, vindicated the doctrine of the Church of England in opposition to Popery [K]; the King sent a letter, dated June 14, 1686, to Bishop Compton, wherein his Majesty 'required and commanded him, immediately upon receipt thereof, forthwith to suspend Dr Sharp from further preaching in any parish church or chapel in his diocese, until he had given the King satisfaction.' Upon the receipt of it, the Bishop sent an answer, June the 18th, to the Earl of Sunderland, Principal Secretary of State, wherein he said, That 'he should always count it his duty to obey the King in whatever commands he laid upon him, that he could perform with a safe conscience: but in this, he conceived, he was obliged to proceed according to Law; and therefore it was impossible for him to comply: because, tho' his Majesty commanded him only to execute his pleasure, yet in the capacity he was, to do it, he must act as a Judge, and no Judge condemns any man before he has knowledge of the cause, and has cited the party.' But the Court being resolved to be revenged on the Bishop, for his exemplary zeal for the Protestant interest; and intending thereby to terrify all persons (the Clergy in particular) from opposing their arbitrary designs, they caused his Lordship to be cited, on the 3d of August, to appear the 9th of the same month before the new Ecclesiastical Commission. At his appearance, he was charged with, 'not having observed his Majesty's commands in the case of Dr Sharp, whom he was ordered to suspend.' The Bishop seemed to be surprized at this; and humbly begged a copy of the commission, and a copy of his charge: but was answered by Chancellor Jefferys, 'That he should neither have a copy of, nor see, the commission; neither would they give [H] Who in their several Answers.] Their Answers are published at the end of Bishop Stillingfleet's Unreasonableness of Separation, 1681, 4to. That of Mr Le Moyne, bears date, September 3, 1680. That of Mr De L'Angle is dated from Paris, Octob. 31; and that of Mr Claude from the same place, Novemb. 29, 1680.

[I] By his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more strenuously defended the Reformed Religion, than it had ever been.] This we learn from a Gentleman, who had been his Lordship's Chaplain (13). 'From whatever quarter, says he, or at what time so ever any assault was made upon our Doctrine or Discipline, his vigilance and Christian courage were upon the guard to defend them; of which I shall give only some few instances within the narrow compass of my own knowledge. 1. From hence proceeded that volume of useful Treats against the Dissenters, to convince them by Reason, Scripture, and Antiquity, of the unreasonableness of their separation, and ill-grounded scruples: never yet replied to, or to be answered. 2. From hence likewise (before, and even under his suspension) came forth the distinct Reply to all the pretences of the Church of Rome, in their day of exaltation and trial; most of them written by the best learned Divines of this City. Join both these together, and you will find enough said to confirm you in the faith and worship of this Church, against the adversaries on either hand; not to separate from our holy Apostolical Communion, out of needless scruple, and the so often baffled pretences of seeking after greater purity, and better edification; nor yet to be perverted to Idolatry, in order to find out the true Church. 3. The danger of Socinianism, and the other Heresies, did not escape his care or remedy, as far as his power and persuasion could reach; to this end, many learned and rational treatises have been published by his Clergy on this subject. And when the dispute about the holy undivided Trinity was managed by some, in new and unusual terms, a

Royal Letter was procured to forbid the bringing in such terms into that controversy, as were unknown to Antiquity or to Scripture.—By these-like means, our pious Bishop, as the good shepherd of souls, used his strenuous endeavours to hold up the weak, heal the sick, bind up the broken, seek the lost, and bring back the out cast, not by severity even against the irreclaimable, or persecutions against the deceived, but first and chiefly by argument and conviction: yet not so merciful, as to be remiss against impious Hereticks, and notorious immorality.'

[K] Dr John Sharp—having, in some of his sermons vindicated the Doctrine of the Church of England in opposition to Popery.] He received one day, as he was coming out of the pulpit, a paper sent him, as he believed, by a Priest, containing a sort of challenge upon some points of controversy, touched by him in some of his sermons. Upon this, he not knowing to whom he should send an answer, preached a Sermon in answer to it: and after he had confuted it, he concluded shewing how unreasonable it was for Protestants to change their religion on such grounds. This was carried to Court, and represented there, as a reflection on the King for changing on those grounds (14). But in order to understand how this could be imputed as a crime to Dr Sharp, 'tis to be observed, that King James had caused the Directions concerning Preachers, published in 1662, to be now reprinted, and reinforced them by a letter directed to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, given at Whitehall, 5 March, 1685-6, to prohibit the preaching upon controversial points (15), which was, upon the matter, forbidding them to defend their religion in the pulpit; when it was at the same time attacked by the Popish Priests with all the vigour they were capable of, both in their Sermons and books. This order was taken from a precedent in Queen Mary II's time; who soon after her accession to the throne, issued out a proclamation, forbidding the preaching upon controverted points of religion; for fear, it was said, of raising animosities among the people (16).

(13) See A Sermon on the Death of the late Lord Bishop of London, preach'd, August 11, 1713, at St Martin's Ludgate, by Will. Whitfield, Lond. 1713, 8vo, p. 14, &c.

‘ give him a copy of the charge.’ Thereupon his Lordship desired time to advise with counsel; and there was given him ‘till the 16th, and afterwards ‘till the 31st of August abovementioned. In the mean time, he sent his Proctor for a copy of what orders and minutes they had set down concerning his business; but it was refused, tho’ never denied in any Court. On the 31st of August, when his Lordship appeared for the second time, he declared, That the whole world could bear him witness, he had been that whole summer endeavouring with all the power and skill he had, to enforce the King’s letter to the strict observation of his Clergy. Then he offered his plea to their jurisdiction [L]: which being over-ruled, he protested to his right, in that or any other plea, that might be for his advantage: And observed, that, as a Bishop, he had right by the most authentick and universal Ecclesiastical Laws, to be tried first before his Metropolitan, precedent to any other Court whatsoever. But the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would not, upon any account suffer their jurisdiction to be called in question; and therefore did not pay the least regard to whatever his Lordship could alledge, even, tho’ he further insisted upon ‘That in the capacity he was, they were warranted by their commission, to try him only for offences after the date of the commission. But this plea likewise was over-ruled by the Chancellor, who affirmed, ‘There were general words which gave authority sufficient to ‘look back.’ Whereupon the Bishop gave in his answer in writing [M]. And, after it was read, he observed, That the word suspend was liable to two constructions. In the first, which is the legal and strict sense of the word, he understood the King’s letter; and was advised by his counsel, That it was a judicial act, and by consequence could not be complied with, unless he had first cited the party, and heard the cause. In the other sense of the word suspend, that is, at large for silencing; he apprehended, he had in effect obeyed the King’s letter. For he sent for Dr Sharp, shewed him that letter, advised him not to preach ‘till he had endeavoured to know his Majesty’s further pleasure; and he had not preached to that day, so that his Majesty’s command was fulfilled. But, notwithstanding all that his Lordship or his counsel could alledge, he was suspended, on the 6th of September following [N], for his disobedience, from the function and execution of his episcopal office, and from all episcopal and other ecclesiastical jurisdiction, during his Majesty’s pleasure (w). Immediately after, the Bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, were appointed Commissioners to exercise all manner of ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the diocese of London, during the suspension of the Bishop (x). He acquiesced in this hard sentence [O]: but being suspended only as a Bishop, and remaining still whole in his other capacities, he made a noble stand as one of the Governors of the Charter-House [P]. However, as according to the form of the Ecclesiastical Courts, a person under suspension must make a submission within six months, otherwise he may be proceeded against as obstinate: so, six months after sentence, the Bishop sent a petition to the

[L] Then he offered his plea to their jurisdiction. This plea was chiefly a recital of the statute made in the 16th of K. Charles I. entitled. ‘A Repeal of the ‘branch of a statute primo Elizabethæ, concerning ‘Commissioners for causes Ecclesiastical:’ in which statute of Charles I. it was, among other things, enacted, ‘That no new Court should be erected, ordained, or appointed, within this realm of England, or ‘dominion of Wales, which should, or might have the like power, jurisdiction, or authority as the said ‘High-Commission Court then had, or pretended to ‘have; but that all and every such Letters-Patents, ‘Commissions and Grants made or to be made by his ‘Majesty, his heirs or successors, and all powers and ‘authorities granted thereby; and all Acts, Sentences, ‘and Decrees, to be made virtue or colour thereof, ‘should be utterly void and of none effect (17).’

[M] Whereupon the Bishop gave in his answer in writing. The Commissioners question to him was, Why ‘did you not obey the King’s command, in his letter ‘concerning the suspending Doctor Sharp?’ In answer to which, his Lordship, after reciting the King’s letter of June 14, abovementioned, says, ‘I took the ‘best advice I could get, concerning Doctor Sharp, ‘and was informed, that the letter being directed to me, ‘as Bishop of London, to suspend a person under my ‘jurisdiction, I was therein to act as a Judge, it being ‘a judicial act; and that no person could by Law be ‘punished by suspension, before he was called, or without being admitted to make his defence.’ And then goes on to say, That he represented so much to the Earl of Sunderland, in the letter mentioned above. Nevertheless, that he might obey his Majesty’s commands as far as by Law he could, he had shewed the King’s letter to Dr Sharp, who had not preached since that time within the Diocese of London (18).

[N] He was suspended, on the 6th of September following. The Court did not think fit to meddle with his revenues. For the Lawyers had settled that point, that Benefices were of the nature of Freeholds. So if the sentence had gone to the Temporalities, the Bishop would have had the matter tried over again in the King’s Bench, where he was likely to find good justice, Herbert not being satisfied with the legality and justice of the sentence. While this matter was in dependance the Princess of Orange thought it became her to interpose a little in the Bishop’s favour. So she wrote to the King, earnestly begging him to be gentle to the Bishop, who she could not think would offend willingly. She also wrote to the Bishop, expressing the great share she took in the trouble he was fallen into. The Prince wrote to him to the same purpose. The King wrote an answer to the Princess, reflecting severely on the Bishop, not without some sharpness on her for meddling in such matters (19).

[O] He acquiesced in this hard sentence. The Court seemed uneasy, when they saw they had gained so poor a victory: for now the Bishop was more considered than ever. His Clergy, for all the suspension, were really more governed by the secret intimations of his pleasure, than they had been by his authority before. So they resolved to come off as well as they could (20).

[P] He made a noble stand as one of the Governors of the Charter-House. For King James having, on the 17th of December 1686, sent a letter to the Governors of the Charter-House; requiring them to admit one Andrew Popham into the first Pensioner’s place in that Hospital, which should become void, and be in his Majesty’s disposal; without tendering any oaths to him, or require of him any subscriptions, or other acts in conformity to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England: the Bishop of London, jointly with the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Craven, Danby, and Nottingham, all Governors of that Hospital, and Dr Thomas Burnet, Master of the same, agreed, not to comply with the King’s illegal and unreasonable command (21).

the King, desiring to be restored to the exercise of his episcopal function : but he made no acknowledgment of any fault. So this had no other effect, but that it stopt all further proceedings; only the suspension lay still on him (y). Whilst he was thus sequestered from his episcopal function, he applied himself to the improvement of his garden at Fulham; and, having a great genius for Botany, enriched it with a new variety of domestic and exotic plants (z). His suspension was so flagrant a piece of injustice, that the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it [Q]; and, upon the dread of his Highness's coming over, the Court was willing to make the Bishop reparation, by restoring him, on the 23d of September 1688 (a), to his episcopal function. But he made no haste to resume his charge, and to thank the King for his Restoration; which made some people believe, he had no mind to be restored after such a manner, or that he knew well enough what passed in Holland (b). And, indeed, he was one of the noble persons who often met at the Earl of Shrewsbury's, and concerted measures for the Prince of Orange's coming over; whose interest he heartily endeavoured to promote (c). On the 3d of October 1688, he waited upon King James, with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and seven other Bishops; when they suggested to his Majesty such advices as they thought proper at that season, and conducting to his service (d). Upon the Prince of Orange's landing, the first share our Bishop had in the ensuing Revolution, was, together with the Earl of Dorset, the conveying safe from London to Nottingham the Princess Anne of Denmark [R]; left she, in the present confusion of affairs, might have been sent away into France, or put under restraint, because the Prince, her consort, had left King James, and was gone over to the Prince of Orange. Bishop Compton, at his return to London, set his hand to the Association begun at Exeter (e). Nor was he only one of the most instrumental in the Revolution, but also the most zealous in promoting the settlement of it: for, upon the 21st of December, he waited on the Prince of Orange, at the head of his Clergy, and even attended with some of the Dissenting Ministers; and in his own and their name, thanked his Highness, 'For his very great and most hazardous undertaking, for their deliverance, and the preservation of the Protestant Religion, with the ancient laws and liberties of this nation (f).' On the 30th of December, he administered the holy Communion to his Highness, in the Royal Chapel at St James's, according to the rites of the Church of England (g). The 29th of January 1688-9, when the House of Lords, in a grand Committee, debated the important question, Whether, the throne being vacant, ought to be filled up by a Regent, or a King? Dr Compton was one of the two Bishops, (Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Bishop of Bristol, being the other) who made the majority for filling up the throne by a King: for there were upon that occasion only fifty-one votes to forty-nine (h). On the 14th of February he was appointed one of the Privy-Council (i): and made Dean of the Royal Chapel (k). And afterwards pitched upon, by King William, to perform the ceremony of his and Queen Mary's Coronation, April 11, 1689 (l). The same year, he was constituted one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy; in the execution of which commission he laboured with great zeal and earnestness to reconcile the Dissenters to the Church: and also in the Convocation that met November 21, 1689, of which he was President. But the intended Comprehension met with insuperable difficulties [S], the majority of the Lower House being resolved not to enter

[Q] That the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it.] In the following words. 'The said Commissioners have suspended the Bishop of London, only because he refused to obey an order that was sent him to suspend a worthy Divine, without so much as citing him before him to make his own defence, or observing the common forms of process.'

[R] The conveying safe from London to Nottingham, the Princess Anne of Denmark.] We have a particular account of this transaction in the following words. 'When the news came to London, of Prince George of Denmark's having joined the Prince of Orange, the Princess Anne was so struck with the apprehensions of the King's displeasure, and of the ill effects it might have, that she said to the Lady Churchill, that she could not bear the thoughts of it; and would leap out at window rather than venture on it. The Bishop of London was then lodged very secretly in Suffolk-street. So the Lady Churchill, who knew where he was, went to him and concerted with him the method of the Princess's withdrawing from the Court. The Princess went sooner to bed than ordinary. And about midnight, she went down a back stairs from her closter, attended only by the Lady Churchill, in such haste, that they carried nothing with them. They were waited for by the Bishop of London, who carried them to the Earl of Dorset's, whose Lady furnished them with every thing. And so they went northward, as far as Northampton; where that Earl attended on them with all respect, and quickly brought a body of Horse to serve for a guard to the Princess. And in a little while a small army was formed about her, who chose to be commanded by the Bishop of London; of which he too easily accepted (22). So that, as Dr Gooch observes (23), the Bishop thought it then a proper time to resume his care and charge, and to guard the Princess against any attempts on her Religion or her Liberty. This is that so much talked of part he acted at the Revolution. He rescued the Princess Anne; he hid her (as it were) 'till Popish Tyranny was overpast. During that nice and difficult juncture, he was called peculiarly the Protestant Bishop; and, indeed, he was the ornament and security of the Protestant cause.

[S] But the intended Comprehension met with insuperable difficulties.] For, tho' many arguments were used to bring the more stiff of the inferior Clergy to a charitable condescension, and the much desired union; yet there prevailed amongst them a jealousy and a distrust not to be conquered. This appeared in the choice of a Prolocutor for the Lower-house? Dr Tillotson was the person proposed, and desired by our Bishop, and most of his Brethren, and yet Dr Jane had the majority of votes. And when he was presented to the Bishop of London, as President, for his approbation, he made a customary speech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the Church of England as established by Law, above all communities; implied that he wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this sentence, by way of triumph, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. But the Bishop of London, to whom Dr Jane had been chaplain, made a speech in the same language, wherein he told the Clergy; 'That they ought to endeavour a temper in those things, that are not essential in religion, thereby to open the

enter into any terms of accommodation with the Dissenters (m). King William having, soon after, named Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, his Lordship was made one of them: and the Bishop of London, for the time being, is always to be one, by reason of his superintendency of all the churches in the Plantations [T]. In the beginning of the year 1690-1, at his own charge he attended King William to the famous Congress at the Hague, where the Grand Alliance against France was concluded. But, notwithstanding the great part he acted in the Revolution, and his subsequent services, no sooner was the storm over, but jealousies were infused, and calumnies dispersed, to supplant and undermine him: infomuch, that tho' the Metropolitan See of Canterbury was twice vacant in that reign, yet he still continued Bishop of London [V]. However, he went on confidently and like himself, despising all other rewards, but the quiet and the applause of his own conscience, and the high esteem and intimacy of Queen Mary, which he preserved to her dying day (n). At the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, he seemed to stand fairest for the Royal favour. And tho' many things were said to disparage him at Court [W], yet nothing could discourage him from paying his duty and attendance there. About the beginning of May 1702, he was sworn of her Majesty's Privy-Council. The same year, he was put in the commission for the Union of England and Scotland, but was left out in the new commission issued out in April 1706. Two years before, he very much promoted the 'Act for making effectual her Majesty's intention for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor Clergy, by enabling her Majesty to grant the revenues of the First-Fruits and Tenths.' He maintained all along a brotherly correspondence with the foreign Protestant Churches, and endeavoured to promote in them a good opinion concerning the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and her moderate sentiments of them, as appears, both by his application to Messieurs Le Moyne, Claude, and de l' Angle beforementioned (o); and the Letters that passed between his Lordship and the University of Geneva in 1706 [X]. Towards the end of Queen Anne's reign, his access became easier

' door of Salvation to a multitude of straying Christians: that it must needs be their duty, to shew the same indulgence and charity to the Dissenters under King William, which some of the Bishops and Clergy had promised to them in their addresses to King James; and concluded with a pathetic exhortation to unanimity and concord (24). But tho' he made such great advances towards a Comprehension, yet when he observed the perverse and obstinate disposition of the Dissenters; when he found, that not a sense of true and undisssembled religion, but interest and humour were at the bottom; and that there was no Comprehension to be proposed, or satisfaction given, but by the expensive sacrifice of truth and order, then he thought it necessary to stop. He wished as well as any body to the Protestant interest, and would gladly have seen it more united: but he was not well-bred enough to betray the rights of the Church in favour of a schism. He had seen so much the effects of popular forwardness and contention, mens aukward dislike to what is settled, and desire to change, that he dreaded the thoughts of innovations (25). His not complying so far as the Dissenters liked, is undoubtedly what made an author who is very favourable to them (26) say, 'that Bishop Compton was a weak man, wilful, and strangely wedded a party:' that is, he was not of the same party in that respect as Bishop Burnet.

[T] By reason of his superintendency of all the churches in the Plantations.] Bishop Compton often declared his resolution of going over himself, to settle the Christian Church in those American Plantations; but by his persecution in King James's reign, and the mischiefs of a long war ever since, he could never bring it to effect. Greater then was his care in sending over good pastors; more constant his attention to their lives, manners, and doctrine; by every conveyance, letters sent of instruction, commendation, or reproof; a perpetual correspondence, in answer to volumes of complaints, wants, and requests. And all this carried on by himself, against the perverseness of the inhabitants, the wiles of the Church of Rome, and the subtilities of their societies de Propaganda Fide, 'till the Society for propagating Christian Knowledge was erected.

It was no small trouble or expence, to find out fit Pastors for that refractory and unbelieving part of mankind: men of integrity; for they could not be under his inspection as to their manners and doctrine, in those remote territories; and men of prudence and constancy, to reclaim the inhabitants from their old bittered leaven of Independency, Antinomianism, and Quakerism; and to reduce the natives from being worshippers of evil demons (25).

[V] Tho' the metropolitan See of Canterbury was twice vacant in that reign, yet he still continued Bishop of London.] The first time indeed, 'tis no great wonder he should miss of it, since he had for competitor Dr Tillotson the glory of the English nation. But why he should not be promoted to it at the second vacancy is entirely unaccountable, all circumstances considered. And no truer reason of it can be assigned than this, that it was thought, Dr Tennison would be more subservient to all the Court Designs, than Bishop Compton could ever be expected to be.

[W] And tho' many things were said to disparage him at Court.] For then, as Dr Gooch observes (26), was the time for the most artful management. Honesty and integrity will always stand in some mens way. The Bishop of London could neither be corrupted nor removed. But whatever attempts were made against him they moved him not; neither counted he his life dear, while he was doing God and his Church good service.

[X] The Letters that passed between his Lordship, and the university of Geneva in 1706.] What the substance of them was, we learn from the following passage in a letter from that University, to the University of Oxford, dated Feb. 5, 1706-7. Summo gaudio nos perfudit quod de vestra in nos charitate scribere dignatus est illustrissimus Præsul Henricus Londinensis Episcopus. Cum enim accepissimus, nos male audire, & Geneva famam apud vos deteri; nomine vestro nos docuit, præjudicatas esse & veteres opiniones nondum penitus depositas; & quæ in medium a quibusdam allata erant nos non spectare, verum nonnullos qui ecclesiæ Anglicanæ disciplinam & liturgiam detestantes, nomen nostrum præ se ferebant: illud vero a sententia nostra omnino distitum esse moverat vir illustrissimus. &c. i. e.

The assurances we have received from the most illustrious Bishop of London of your affection towards us, hath filled us with the utmost joy. For hearing that we were ill spoken of, and that Geneva was odious amongst you, he hath assured us in your name, that those were old prejudices, and wrong notions not yet laid aside; and that what had been said by some, did not concern us, but certain persons, who dissenting from, and railing at, the discipline and liturgy of the Church of England, made use of our name: but he knew us to be quite of another mind.—The compliment paid to his Lordship by the University of Oxford, in their answer to this letter, is both very just and handsome.—Quo nemo aut Ecclesiam Anglicanam paterno magis affectu fovet ac tuetur, aut exteres omnes, utcumque locorum intervallis distitas, arctissimo tamen purioris Fidei vinculo conjunctas charitate magis fraternam profequitur. i. e. 'Than whom, none hath a more paternal affection for the Church of England, nor a greater brotherly love for the foreign Churches, united by one close bond easier at Court, and he had greater power and interest there. But, whether the times were good or bad, he looked upon all that power and interest only as accidental circumstances that attended the office of a Bishop; and not as an essential part of it (p). In 1709-10; he was one of the Lords who opposed the prosecution then carried on against Dr Sacheverel, and declared him Not Guilty; and likewise protested against several steps taken in that affair (q). His Lordship having for some time been afflicted with the Gout and Stone [Y], it turned at last to a complication of distempers, which put an end to his most valuable life at Fulham, on the 7th of July 1713, in the eighty-first year of his age. His body was interred, the 15th of the same month, in the church-yard of Fulham [Z], according to his particular direction (r). What few things he published, are mentioned in the note [AA]. As to his personal qualifications: he was in all respects one of the best-bred men in his time; courteous and affable; not full of words, but very conversable; and, as in his ministerial offices, so in conversation too, willing and apt to teach. He was always easy of access, and ready to do good offices. In his friendships he was constant, or rather inflexible. He was a man of the largest and most publick spirit; and liked nothing that looked narrow or stingy. He had no little, artful, selfish designs. He was never seen to be afraid or concerned at danger. In the midst of storms he himself was calm. With regard to his moral character: he was a person of singular modesty, and humility; of great temperance and abstinence; of exemplary piety [BB], and every virtue. Never did such tender and such manly passions meet before in the same breast! never such firmness and fortitude, mixed with so much meekness and condescension! But he was most particularly eminent for his unbounded charity and beneficence: being generous and charitable beyond example. He disposed of money to every one who could make out (and it was very easy to make that out to him) that he was a proper object of charity. He answered literally the Apostle's character, poor enough himself, yet making many rich (s). He had divers ancient people, men and women, whom he supported by constant annual pensions; and several children at school, at his own cost and charge; beside those educated from children, and brought up to the Universities, to the sea, or to trades, &c (t). The poor of his parish were always attending his gate for their dole, and for the remains of his constant hospitable table; which was always furnished, and free to those whom respect or business drew to him: His hall was frequented in the morning with petitioners of all sorts (u). More particularly, he spared no cost nor pains to serve the Church and Clergy. He bought many Advowsons out of Lay-hands [CC]. He gave great sums for the rebuilding of churches (v), and greater still for the buying in Impro-

[Y] His Lordship having for some time been afflicted with the Gout and Stone. The Gout and Stone will make the stoutest heart to shrink; yet (says Dr Gooch) in the midst of these tormenting pains, we never heard the voice of murmur; those shocks that would make a beholder tremble, did not make him repine. He never complained against God, nor grew touchy and peevish to his domesticks; (almost every body's case in pain and sickness.) He was firm and constant, quiet and good-natured to the end. When his last illness came upon him, he foresaw and foretold what would be the event on't, with the same composedness as if he had been sure of his recovery. He knew his summons could never be sudden, because he was never unprepared to receive it. He had long ago settled his worldly affairs: indeed he had little worldly affairs to settle; for he had remitted his treasure to the other world and secured an eternal reversion there. He talked of dying with the same unconcernedness, (or with the same pleasure) as if he was only taking a journey; and wished for nothing but an easy passage:—which he obtained; being taken out of this world in the same easy and quiet manner as he had endeavoured to live, and wished to die (28).

[Z] His body was interred— in the churchyard of Fulham. According to his particular direction: for he used to say, 'that the church is for the living, and the churchyard for the dead.' So that his humility of life, and greatness of mind, above worldly pomp, followed him to his grave (29). Over it there is erected a handsome tomb, (surrounded with iron rails,) having only this short inscription. H. LONDON. FI MH EN TQ ΣΤΑΥΡΩ. M. DCC. XIII. The Greek words (Engl. Save in the cross) are part of Galatians VI. 14. God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.

[AA] What few things he published, are mentioned in the note. They are as follow. I. A Translation from Italian, of 'The Life of Donna Olympia Maldachini, who governed the Church during the time of Innocent X. which was from the year 1644 to 1655.' Lond. 1667, written originally by Abbot Gualdi, and printed privately at Paris, II. A Translation from French into English, of, 'The Jesuits intrigues; with the private instructions of that Society to their Missions.' Lond. 1669. nine sheets in 4to. This was found in manuscript in a Jesuit's closet after his death: and both were sent in a letter from a gentleman at Paris, to his friend in London. III. 'A Treatise of the Holy Communion.' Lond. 1677, 8vo. his name is not set to it. IV. 'A Letter to the Clergy of the Diocese of London, concerning Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Catechising.' Dated April 25, 1679, and printed on one side of a sheet. V. Second Letter, concerning 1. The half Communion. 2. Prayers in an unknown tongue. 3. Prayers to Saints. Dated from Fulham, July 6, 1680. and printed also on one side of a sheet of paper. VI. A third Letter, on Confirmation, and Visitation of the Sick. From Fulham 1682. VII. A fourth Letter; upon Canon 54. Dated from Fulham, April 6, 1683. VIII. A fifth Letter, upon Canon 118. From Fulham, March 19, 1684. IX. A sixth Letter, upon Canon 13. Fulham April 18, 1685. They were all reprinted together in 1686, 12mo, under this title Episcopalia: or, Letters of the Right Reverend Father in God, Henry Lord Bishop of London, to the Clergy of his Diocese (30). We are informed, that they were part of them printed without his knowledge; but not without a design of bringing more trouble upon his head from King James II, for his opposing Popery, as he doth in some of them (31). X. There is also, 'A Letter of his to a Clergy man in his Diocese, concerning Non-Resistance: written soon after the Revolution, and inserted in the Memoirs of the Life of Mr John Kettlewell (32).

[BB] Of exemplary piety] No one was so strict and regular in his private devotions; no one so constant and frequent in the service of the Church. For, beside the publick offices morning and evening, his whole family began the day with the Litany, and ended it with select prayers from the Liturgy: and at all these times he himself, when he was able, was a constant attendant (33).

[CC] He bought many Advowsons out of Lay hands. As the Rectories of St James, and All-Saints; and the Vicarage of St Peter's, all in Colchester: the Rectories of Abberton Tendring in Essex, &c.

priations, and settling them on the poor Vicars [DD]. There was no poor honest Clergyman, or his widow, in want, but had his benevolence, when applied for. Nor any in the Reformed Churches abroad, to whom he was not a liberal Patron, Steward, and perpetual Solicitor for. The French Refugees drank deep of his bounty for many years; so did the Irish in their day of affliction; and likewise the Scotch Episcopal party [EE] in their grievous persecution (x). He was indeed upon some occasions imposed upon, and bestowed his charity sometimes upon forward and impudent persons; who did not want or deserve it: but that is frequently the case of generous well-meaning persons; and must be owned to be a weakness rather than a fault [FF]. If we consider him as a Bishop: he was not only blameless, but a pattern of good behaviour in every respect. He applied himself more to his function, than Bishops had commonly done. He went much about his diocese, and preached [GG] and confirmed in many places (y). In order not to burden his Clergy with frequent visitations, he was wont to hire houses, and spend every summer in some new part of his diocese, where he rid out, and visited in person the several churches, and parsonage, and vicarage-houses. His method also was, in stated meetings with his Clergy, to propose some topick in Divinity; on which they discoursed together in a serious, familiar, and judicious manner; which afterwards was summed up, and formed into a regular treatise. Many of these discourses are published, under the title of, The Bishop of London's Conferences. At those times, and indeed upon all other occasions, he was extremely civil, affable, and courteous, full of candor and patience [HH]. In a word, by his death the Church lost a most excellent Bishop; the kingdom a brave and able Statesman; the Protestant Religion, at home and abroad, its ornament and refuge; and the whole Christian world an eminent example of virtue and piety (z). His Lordship was never married.

[DD] For the buying in Impropriations, and settling them upon the poor vicars. Particularly the Impropriation of Marks-Tay in Essex, for which he is said to have given no less than seven hundred pounds; whereby he raised a very mean Curacy to a competent subsistence.

[EE] And likewise the Scotch Episcopal party. He provided in particular, for numbers of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy, who fled into England at the Revolution. To Mr Robert Falconer, for instance, he gave the Living of Dunmow; to Mr Tho. Dunbar, that of Keldon; both in Essex, and the like in many other instances.

[FF] And must be owned to be a weakness rather than a fault. We shall conclude this article of his charities, with these words of Dr Whitfeld (34): 'To his Honour be it spoken! he died poor; having made the needy and miserable his heirs all his life long. His contempt of gathering or leaving riches out of the patrimony of the Church, was worthy of his great mind and station. And he died with that honour, with which he had always lived.'—We must not forget to observe, that he left the third part of his large and well chosen library to the corporation of Colchester. But, that noble gift was slighted; so that his Lordship's heir was forced to dispose of it otherwise. The two other parts of his library he left to St Paul's Cathedral, and to Sion College.

[GG] And preached. One author tells us (35), that 'his preaching was without much life or learning; for he had not gone thro' his studies with the exactness that was fitting.' But another who knew him better gives the following account. 'He spake with the affection and authority of a spiritual father; always above the affectation of popular eloquence, but in

' the power of the Spirit, and primitive simplicity, with the majesty of plainness, in the utmost sedateness and good judgement. His weighty reason needed not to be set off with trappings. The love with which his people met his Doctrine, made it superfluous to speak to their passions so easily raised and so soon sinking: he spake to convince their understanding. His deliberate way of utterance, gave them leisure to receive and fix his notions, and brought forth nothing but with maturity of thought, and exactness of judgment.—His knowledge and learning had been well cultivated in his privater station in the Church, and particularly assisted by his friendship with Dr Rich. Allestry Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. His books had always attended him in his most youthful years; nor were they neglected to the last in his fulness of business. His library was an evidence of his knowledge in divine things especially, and also in human learning, and in the modern languages (36).'

[HH] Full of candor and patience. 'None of his Clergy ever felt his displeasure, but for faults which carried their own mark and evidence. Not any difference of opinion in State-matters, did ever estrange him from a deserving man: that which was good and virtuous in the son, he laid hold on, and cherished with a fatherly tenderness, and passed by his mistaken judgment in that which was amiss. But in those that were bad, no interest, no being attached to the same cause with himself, could ever make him overlook their faults. This was true moderation! candor and charity to good men of all opinions, and firmness to his own just principles (37).'

The End of the SECOND VOLUME.

For the use of this School, he drew up some rudiments of grammar, with an abridgment of the Principles of Religion; of which we shall give an account below among the rest of his works (o). Besides his dignities and preferments already mentioned, he was Rector of the Fraternity or Guild of Jesus in St Paul's Church (p), for which he procured new Statutes; and also Chaplain, and Preacher in Ordinary to King Henry VIII, and (if Erasmus is not mistaken) one of his Privy-Council (q). When he came to about the fiftieth year of his age, he grew so weary of the world, that he fully purposed to throw himself into some monastery, and there end his days in quiet and solitude (r). In pursuance of this resolution, he built a convenient and handsome house within the precinct of the Charter-house near Richmond-palace in Surry, where he intended to retire in his old age, when broken with infirmities, and unable to discharge the duties of his function (s). But death prevented him: for having been seized by the sweating sickness at two several times before; and relapsing into it a third time, he fell into a consumption that carried him off on the 16th of September 1519, in the fifty-third year of his age (t). He was buried on the south side of the choir of St Paul's, with an humble monument prepared by him several years before, and having no other inscription but his bare name (u). But afterwards a handfomer monument was set up for him [I], by the company of Mercers (w). He writ several things, of which there is an account in the note [K]. As to his person

The worthy founder dedicated it to the honour of Christ Jesus in his childhood: and ordained, That there should be in it, an High Master; a Sur-masser; and a Chaplain; who should teach gratis one hundred and fifty three children, divided into eight classes. [I] But afterwards a handfomer monument was set up for him.] By the Company of Mercers. It was destroyed, with St Paul's cathedral, in the general conflagration in 1666. But the representation of it is preserved in Mr William [afterwards Sir William] Dugdale's History of St Paul's; and in Dr S. Knight's Life of Dr John Colet (26). On the two sides of the butt was this inscription. 'John Colet, Doctor of Divinity, Dean of Pauls, and the only founder of Pauls-school, departed this life anno 1519, the son of Sir Henry Colet, Knt. twice Lord Mayor of the city of London, and free of the Company and Militery of Mercers.' Lower, there were other inscriptions in Latin. About the year 1680, when the church was taking down, in order to be rebuilt, his leaden coffin was found inclosed in the wall, about two foot and a half above the floor. At the top of it was a leaden plate fastened, whereon was engraved the Dean's name, his dignity, benefactions, &c (27).

[K] He writ several things, &c.] Those which he published himself, or that have been put out since his decease, are as follow. I. Oratio habita a Doctore Joanne Colet, Decano Sancti Pauli, ad Clerum in Convocatione, anno 1511. Printed the same year by Richard Pynfon, in three sheets, 4to. This is very scarce, being hardly to be met with, except in the Bodleian library, Oxon, among Archbishop Laud's MSS. It is reprinted by Dr S. Knight, in his Appendix to the Life of Dr John Colet (28). In the same book is also printed, an old English translation of it, intitled, 'The Sermon of Doctor Colete, made to the Convocation at Pauls.' Printed first by Thomas Berthelet, and supposed by Dr Knight (29) to be done by the author himself. It was reprinted in 1661, 12mo. by Thomas Smith of Christ's-College, with notes: under this title, 'A Sermon of Conforming and Reforming made to the Convocation at St Paul's Church in London, by John Colet, &c.' Reprinted again, in the Phoenix, Vol. I. 8vo. and lately in a collection of 'Select Sermons, fol.' II. Rudimenta Grammaticæ a Johanne Coletæ, Decano Ecclesiæ sancti Pauli London in usum Scholæ ab ipso institutæ (30); commonly called Paul's Accidence. Lond. 1539 8vo. III. The construction of the eight parts of speech, intitled, Absolutissimus de octo Orationis partium constructione Libellus; which, with some alterations, and great additions, makes up the syntax in Lilly's grammar. Antwerp. 1530, 8vo. IV. 'Daily Devotions: or the Christian's Morning and Evening Sacrifice, &c.' Printed at London several times in 12mo and 16mo. This is said not to be all of his composition (31). V. 'Monition to a godly Life.' Lond. 1534, 1563, &c. This Mr Wood supposes (32) to be the same with, 'A right fruitful Admonition concerning the Order of a good Christian's Man's Life, &c.' Lond. 1577, 8vo. VI. Epistolæ ad Erasmus. Many of them are printed among Erasmi Epistolæ; and some at the end of Dr S. Knight's Life of Dean Colet.—The following pieces remain in manuscript. VII. Commentarii in Epistolâ D. Pauli ad Romanos & Corinthios: i. e. Commentaries on St Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Corinthians. Given to the publick library at Cambridge by Archbishop Parker. In the same volume are several pieces of Dean Colet viz. VIII. De Angelis cælestique hierarchia, being a commentary in Ecclesiasticam D. Dionysii Hierarchiam. And IX. Epistola Abbati Winchincobensii, printed by Dr Knight, at the end of the Dean's Life. The Commentaries upon the Epistles to the Corinthians, are also in manuscript in Emmanuel-College library, given thereto by Dr Anthony Tuckeny. And in that of Bennet-College; the gift of Archbishop Parker. At the end of this last, there is the Beginning of a Commentary on Genesis, no where else to be met with. X. One of the Dean's own manuscripts, being an Analytical Commentary on the Apostolical Epistles, and a Summary of his larger Comments, is in the possession of Roger Gale, Esq; it is the fairest, and indeed the only one manuscript of Dr Colet's, of that kind, extant (33). Bale and Pits mention also these books of his. 1. Commentaria in Proverbia Salomonis. 2. In Evangelium S. Mattheæ. 3. In Precationem Dominicam; translated, as Mr Wood tells us (34), into English. 4. In Symbolum fidei. 5. Breviloquium dictorum Christi. 6. Responsio ad argumenta Erasmusiana de tædio & pavore Christi (35); called by Bale and Pits, Ad argumenta Erasmi; And, De reformatione Christi; and made two different books. 7. Conciones ordinariæ, & extraordinariæ. Among which were two sermons on war, preached before King Henry VIII. 8. Vita hominis Christiani. 9. Excerptiones

person and character, they are thus described. He was tall, comely, and very graceful: there was something in his mien and carriage extremely becoming; as was every thing he said or did (x). His learning and piety were above the pitch of the times he lived in; but what made him most renowned, was his publick spirit (y). In his writings, his style was plain and unaffected, but it had always something weighty and pungent. And this, which some might call carelessness, did not proceed from a want of what goes under the name of Rhetorick; but from a professed contempt of it, as an art only of amusing (z). He could not bear, that the standard of a good style should be taken from the exact rules of grammar: which, he often said, did rather obstruct the purity of the language; not to be obtained but by reading the best and purest authors. This contempt of grammar-rules made him sometimes fall under the censure of the Criticks (a). He was, however, a great master of style and language; so that tho' his preaching was popular, and adapted to vulgar capacities, yet withal it was agreeable to the better judgment of men of wit and learning, and was much admired by the great Sir Thomas More (b). Likewise, he was a great lover and encourager of the Greek tongue. With regard to some of his notions, he was a very eminent fore-runner of the Reformation. And he, and Erasmus, jointly promoted it; not only, by pulling down those strong holds of ignorance and corruption the Scholastical Divinity, and routing entirely both the Scotists and Thomists, who had divided the Christian world between them (c); but also by discovering the shameful abuses of Monasteries, and the dangers of imposing celibacy on the Clergy: to which places, Colet gave little or nothing while he lived, and left not a farthing when he died; not so much out of hatred to their several orders, as because he found, few or none of them lived up to their vows and professions (d). He thought simple fornication in a Priest more excusable, than pride and avarice. And was with no sort of men more angry, than with those Bishops, who, instead of Shepherds, acted the part of so many wolves: he thought none more execrable than they, because under the pretence of devotions, ceremonies, benedictions, and indulgences, they recommended themselves to the veneration of the people, while in their own hearts they were slaves to the world, that is, to glory and gain (e). He condemned Auricular Confession: and was content to say mass only upon Sundays and great Festivals, or at least upon a very few days besides. He had gathered up several authorities from the ancient Fathers against the current tenets and customs of the Church: and tho' he did not care to fly in the face of the Governors, yet he could not but favour those who disliked the way of worshipping images (f). As to his other qualifications; he was a man of exemplary temperance, and all other virtues. The Dean's table, which, under the name of hospitality, had before served to luxury, he contracted to a more frugal way of entertaining. And it having been his custom, for many years, to eat but one meal, that of dinner, he had always the evening to himself. As he dined late, he had but few guests; and the fewer, because his provision was frugal, tho' neat. The sittings were short, and the discourses such as pleased only the learned and the good. As soon as grace before meat was said, a boy read, with a loud voice, and distinctly, a chapter out of one of St Paul's Epistles, or the Proverbs of Solomon. When it was finished, the Dean raised, from some particular part of it, a subject matter of discourse. He was so impatient of whatsoever was foul or unbecoming, that he could not bear with an improper way of speaking. He loved to be neat and clean in his goods, furniture, entertainments, apparel, and books, and whatever belonged to him; but he despised all state and magnificence (g), there being in his demeanour the most unaffected simplicity imaginable (h).

ceptiones doctorum. 10. Epistola ad Taylorum. 11. Grotianus. 12. De moribus componendis. 13. De puerili institutione. These two last seem to be the same, as his Rudimenta Grammaticæ (36). As the Dean had an inaccuracy and uncorrectness in his way of writing (37), that was like to expose him to the censures of the Criticks; and besides was no perfect master of the Greek tongue, without which he thought a man was nothing, that is, no scholar (38); it is therefore probable he had no intention of publishing any thing. The pieces mentioned above, were found, after his death, in a private corner of his study; as if he had designed they should lie buried in oblivion (39). Besides they were written in such a manner, as if he intended no body should understand them but himself (40). With regard to sermons, he wrote but few; for he generally preached without notes (41).

COLLIER (JEREMY) son of Jeremy Collier, was born at Stow Qui, or Quire, in Cambridgshire, September 23, 1650. His father was a Divine and considerable Linguist, and some time Master of the free-school at Ipswick in the county of Suffolk. His grandfather likewise was a Clergyman, settled at Bradford in Yorkshire, where he lived in esteem for his function. He was born at Yeadon near Bradford, and descended from a gentleman's family of that name, seated at Thrusk in the same county, in the reign of Henry VIII. His mother was Elizabeth Smith of Qui in Cambridgshire, where her family were possessed of a considerable interest, and related to the Sternes of that town, being by her mother descended from the Keys or Cays, of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire. He was educated under his father at Ipswick, from whence he was sent to Cambridge, and admitted a poor Scholar of Caius-college, under the tuition of Mr John Ellys. His admission bears date April 10, 1669, in the eighteenth year of his age. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 1672-3, and that of Master of Arts in 1676, being ordained Deacon on the twenty-fourth of September the same year, by Dr Peter Gunning Bishop of Ely, and Priest Feb. 24, 1677, by Dr Henry Compton Bishop of London.

Having

Having entered into Priests orders, he officiated some time at the Countess Dowager of Dorset's, at Knowle in Kent, from whence he removed to a small rectory at Ampton, near St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, to which he was presented by James Calthorpe, Esq; and instituted by Dr Anthony Sparrow, Bishop of Norwich, September 25, 1679. After he had held this benefice six years, he resigned it, and came to reside in London in 1685, and was some little time after made Lecturer at Gray's-Inn. But the Revolution coming on, the publick exercise of his function became impracticable (a). He did not however think it compatible with his principles, at that critical conjuncture, to sit down contentedly and say nothing, but finding, in that confusion which arose upon King James's going to France, that the Convention was in a great measure influenced by the papers written by a Clergyman who came over with the Prince of Orange, he thought the same liberty might be taken by a Clergyman who conceived differently from him, and accordingly broke the ice, and published the first pamphlet that appeared in defence of the cause which he espoused (b), and a very sharp piece it was [A]. When the government was settled, by placing King William and Queen Mary upon the throne, Mr Collier remained firm to the principles he had embraced, and continued not only to abstain from taking the oaths which the new legislature had imposed, but laboured all that in him lay to prevent others, more especially such as were zealous members of the Church of England, from owning, or so much as complying with them. It was to this end that he wrote several warm and bitter pieces, which in those days had their effect, and consequently procured their author, in the opinion at least of those who were of his own party, the character both of a solid and shining writer [B]. There is no doubt but this conduct of his occasioned an eye to be kept over his proceedings, nor could it be supposed that any government would forbear the first opportunity that occurred of giving some check, to so active, so industrious, and so dangerous a man. It was not long before such an occasion offered itself: information was given to the Earl of Nottingham, at that time Secretary of State, that Mr Collier,

(a) Thus far this article was (except some dates) drawn up by Mr Collier himself.

(b) From the information of a gentleman, who was intimately acquainted with Mr Collier.

[A] And a very sharp piece it was. As this article cannot be rendered perspicuous, indeed hardly intelligible, without explaining the political, and literary controversies, in which this writer was engaged, we shall endeavour to give as clear and concise an account of them as possible. In the month of December 1688, the famous Dr Gilbert Burnet afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, sent abroad a very succinct, and well written pamphlet, under the title of An Enquiry into the present state of affairs, and in particular whether we owe Allegiance to the King in these circumstances, and whether we are bound to treat with him, and call him back again, or not? Published by authority (1). In this piece, the Doctor gives his sentiments very freely, as to the behaviour of King James, and the conduct that was to be observed towards him, as the reader will see from the following short quotation. 'In all that I have said concerning his desertion, I limit my reflections to his first leaving of Whitehall, for the accident at Feverham, and what followed after that, cannot be called a return to his people; and since the seals never appeared, and the King never spake of a parliament, nor altered his measures in any thing, but still prosecuted his first design by his second escape, his deserting is still to be dated from his first going from Whitehall; and he having given that just advantage against himself, which came after all that series of injustice and violence, that had gone before it, no man can think; that it was not very fitting to carry it as far as it would go; and not to treat with him any more upon the foot of acknowledging him King (2).' It was in answer to this treatise, and particularly to the argument insisted upon in this passage, that Mr Collier wrote the piece mentioned in the text, and which was intitled,

I The Desertion discussed in a letter to a country Gentleman. Lond. 1688, 4to. He labours in this short pamphlet to shew, that the King, before his withdrawing had sufficient grounds to be apprehensive of danger; that his leaving any representative behind him was impracticable at that juncture, and that there were no grounds, either from the laws of the realm, or of nature, to pronounce the throne void from such a retreat. To this pamphlet of Mr Collier's, an answer was written by Edmund Bohun, Esq; in which, he gives him the following character (3). 'The author of it is my acquaintance, and a person for whom I have a great esteem, both on the account of his profession, and of his personal worth, learning, and sobriety; so that I cannot believe he had any ill design, either in the writing, or the publishing of it; his zeal for the Church of England's loyalty, and the difficulty, and the unusualness of the present case, having been the occasions, if not the causes, of his mistake; and therefore I will endeavour to shew him, and the world, his error, with as much candour and sweetness, as he himself can wish; because I have the same design for the main, that he had; viz. the honour of the Church of England, and the safety of government, and especially our Monarchy.' But this was not the only answer Mr Collier received, for his performance gave such offence, that after the government was settled, he was seized and committed to Newgate, where he continued a close prisoner for some months, but was at length discharged without being brought to a trial. He afterwards wrote the following pieces, viz.

II. A Translation of the 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th books of Sleidan's Commentaries. Lond. 1689, 4to.

III. Vindiciae Juris Regii, or Remarks upon a paper intitled, An Enquiry into the measures of submission to the supreme authority. Lond. 1689, 4to. The author of this Enquiry, was also Dr Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury.

IV. Animadversions upon the modern explanation of 11 Hen. VII. cap. 1. or a King de Facto. 1689, 4to.

[B] The character both of a solid, and shining writer. As Mr Collier was now embarked in an avowed opposition to the government, he laboured as much as in him lay to enlarge the strength of the party which he had joined; and with this view he continued to write, as the reader will see in the following catalogue of his works, during the space of less than two years.

V. A Caution against Inconsistency, or the connection between praying and swearing in relation to the civil powers. 1690, 4to. This Discourse is a dissuasive from joining in publick assemblies.

VI. A Dialogue concerning the Times, between Philobellus and Sempronius. 1690, 4to. There was another dialogue with much the same title, printed in 1692, and called a second part, but it was not Mr Collier's, being a narrative of the Revolution, whereas Mr Collier's relates chiefly to the authority of the Convention.

VII. To the Right Honourable the Lords and to the Gentlemen convened at Westminster. October 1690, half sheet; it is a petition for an enquiry into the birth of the Prince of Wales.

VIII. Dr Sherlock's Case of Allegiance considered with some remarks upon his Vindication. Lond. 1691, 4to.

IX. A Brief Essay concerning the Independency of Church Power. 1692, 4to. The design of this essay is to prove the publick assemblies guilty of schism, upon account of their being held under such Bishops, as had assumed, or owned such, as had assumed the fees of those, that were deprived for not complying with the government, &c.

with one Mr Newton, another Nonjuring Clergyman, was gone down to Romney-Marsh, which was enough to fix a suspicion, that they were either endeavouring to send intelligence to, or were labouring to receive it from, the other side of the water. Upon this, about the latter end of the year 1692, Messengers were sent down into Kent to apprehend them, which they accordingly did, and brought them to London, where, after a short examination before the Earl of Nottingham, who charged them with being in a design against the government, they were committed to the Gate-House (c). But, as no evidence of their being in any such design could be found, they were admitted to bail. So strict, however, were Mr Collier's principles, that he had not been long at liberty, before he began to question the consistency of his own conduct in giving bail, upon which he went before the Lord Chief Justice Holt, surrendered in their discharge, and was committed to the King's Bench prison; but upon the application of some of his friends to that most upright and impartial Judge, he was discharged in a week or ten days (d). Yet even this did not content him, as appears by several pieces of his written upon this subject [C]. In the space of some years following, there happened nothing that so far engaged this gentleman's attention, as to induce him to write against the transactions of the State, which was, generally speaking, the subject that employed his pen. But upon the breaking out of that which was called the Assassination Plot, and the conviction of Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins, an incident happened which made a very great noise, and deeply affected Mr Collier his whole life after. The fact was this: Mr Collier, with Mr Cook and Mr Snatt, both Clergymen of his own opinion, attended those unhappy persons at the place of execution, where Mr Collier solemnly absolved the former, as Mr Cook did the latter, and all three joined in the imposition of hands upon them both (e). This, as might be very well expected, made a very great noise, and was looked upon as a very high insult on the Civil and Ecclesiastical government, for which reason they fell under a severe prosecution on one side, in consequence of which Mr Cook and Mr Snatt were sent to Newgate, but afterwards were released without being brought to a trial, and Mr Collier having still his old scruple about putting in bail, absconded, and was outlawed, under which incapacity he remained as long as he lived (f). On the other hand, both the Archbishops, and ten of their suffragans, viz. the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Coventry and Lichfield, Rochester, Hereford, Norwich, Peterborough, Gloucester, Chichester, and St Asaph, published a very strong Declaration of their sense of their scandalous and irregular proceeding (g). To this our author wrote an answer with his usual vigour, and after that several other pieces, in support of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair [D]. After this storm was a little over, Mr Collier employed himself in reviewing and

[C] As appears by several pieces of his written upon his subject } It seems that Mr Collier had occasionally read Law, and this it was that induced him to make a scruple of remaining upon bail, because he apprehended that the very recognizance, by which bail was taken, carried in it an acknowledgment of the jurisdiction of the Court, in which the bail was taken, and by consequence of the power from whence the authority of that court was derived. In support of these principles, and in justification of his own conduct, he wrote the following pieces, of which it is said, there were only five copies printed.

X. The case of giving bail to a pretended authority examined, dated from the King's Bench. November 23 1692, with a preface dated December 1692, and a letter to Sir John Holt, dated November 30 1692. And also a reply to some remarks upon the case of giving bail, &c. dated April 1693. He wrote, soon after this,

XI. A Perswasive to Consideration tendered to the Royalists, particularly those of the Church of England. Lond. 1693, 4to. It was afterwards reprinted in 8vo. together with his vindication of it, against a piece entitled The Layman's Apology, &c. written in confutation of that part of the Perswasive, which relates to the controversy about the frequenting the publick assemblies.

XII. Remarks upon the London Gazette, relating to the Straits Fleet, and to the battle of Landen in Flanders 1693, 4to.

[D] In support of his own and his brethren's conduct in this affair. } In order to form some notion of this transaction, it will be requisite to see that part of the Prelates Declaration which relates to the conduct of these Clergymen, and in which they shew, that their proceeding was not to be justified by the doctrines or practice of the Church of England. These words are these (4):

For those Clergymen that took upon them to absolve these criminals at the place of execution, by laying all three together their hands upon their heads, and publicly pronouncing a form of absolution; as their manner of doing this was extremely insolent, and without precedent either in our Church, or any other that we know of; so the thing itself was altogether irregular.—The rubrick in our Office of the Visitation of the Sick, from whence they took the words they then used, and upon which, if upon any thing in our Liturgy, they must ground this their proceeding, gave them no authority nor pretence for the absolving these persons; nay, as they managed the affair, they acted, in this absolution, far otherwise than is there directed. That rubrick is concerning sick persons, and it is there required, First, That the sick person shall be moved to make a special confession of his sins, if he feel his conscience troubled with any weighty matter, and then, after such confession, the Priest shall absolve him, if he humbly and heartily desire it. But here they absolved, and that publicly, persons condemned by law for execrable crimes, without so much as once moving them, at that time, to make a special confession of their sins, at least of those sins for which they were condemned. And on the other side, here were persons absolved that did not humbly desire absolution, as feeling any such weighty matter to trouble their conscience, but on the contrary, in Sir John Friend's paper it is declared, that he had a great deal of satisfaction in suffering for that cause, which he firmly believed to be the cause of God and true religion. If these Ministers knew not the state of these mens souls before they gave them absolution, as it is manifest two of them, Mr Snatt and Mr Cook, did not as to Sir William Perkins, (they having since declared that they had not spoke with Sir William, till they were at the place of execution) how could they, without manifest transgression of the Church's order, as well as the profane abuse of the power Christ hath left with his Ministers, absolve them from all their sins? If they were acquainted with these mens sentiments declared in their papers, then they must look upon them either as hardened impenitents or as martyrs. We are so charitable to believe, that they would not absolve them under the former notion, for that had been in effect sealing them to damnation; but if they held these men to be martyrs, then their absolving them and retouching several miscellaneous pieces of his, to which he added some others and published them in a volume, and these were so well received, that about seven years afterwards he published another, and several years after that a third. These pieces of his were written upon religious, moral, and entertaining subjects, with such a mixture of learning and wit, and in a style so easy and flowing, that notwithstanding the prejudice of party which could not but be strong against him, they were generally well received, and have run through many editions since. One must indeed allow, that very few books bid fairer for universal approbation, in an age, which, if not strictly virtuous, was at least highly decent, and when every body affected a concern for promoting, whatever had a tendency to make men wiser, better, or more polite, all which ends were prosecuted with great effect in this collection of Essays. (b) [E]. The very next year after the publication of the first volume in that manner was a justification of those grievous crimes for which these men suffered, and an open affront to the laws both of Church and State. Upon the consideration of these things, and for the doing of right to our Church, which may otherwise suffer amongst such as are strangers to our constitution, by the evil principles and practices, both of the aforesaid criminals, and the three Clergymen that assisted them, who all pretended to be members of the Church of England: we do declare, that we disown and detest all such principles and practices, looking upon them as highly schismatical and seditious, dangerous both to the Church and State, and contrary to the true doctrine and spirit of the Christian religion. And we also take this occasion to warn and exhort all the people committed to our charge, to beware of such seducers, and to avoid them, lest, as the Apostle St Peter speaks, They be led away with the error of the wicked, and fall from their steadfast adherence to the principles of the true Church of England, as it was established at the blessed Reformation of religion, and as, by God's especial Providence, it continues to this day. What was farther done in this matter, will best appear from Bishop Kennet's account, which runs thus (5): 'On April the 27th, the Lord Chief Justice (Holt) of the King's Bench, did likewise represent to the grand Jury, the shameful and pernicious practice of those three absolving Priests. Whereupon the Jury made a presentment to the Court, that Collier, Cook, and Snatt, Clerks, did take upon them to pronounce and give absolution to Sir William Perkins, and Sir John Friend, at the time of their execution at Tyburn, immediately before they had severally delivered a paper to the Sheriff of Middlesex, wherein they had severally endeavoured to justify the treasons for which they were justly condemned and executed. And that they, the said Collier, Cook, and Snatt, had thereby countenanced the same treasons, to the great encouragement of other persons to commit the like treasons, and to the scandal of the Church of England established by Law, and to the disturbance of the peace of the kingdom. Upon which the court ordered an indictment to be preferred against them, and on May the 8th, Mr Cook and Mr Snatt were committed to Newgate, for suspicion of high-treason and treasonable practices. But such was the lenity of the government, that no manner of punishment was inflicted on them, and Mr Collier, with great assurance, published several papers to justify his practice.' The writings to which this Prelate referred were these:

XIII. A Defence of the Absolution given to Sir William Perkins at the place of execution, April 3d, with a farther Vindication thereof, occasioned by a paper entitled, A Declaration of the Sense of the Archbishops, and Bishops, &c. The first dated April the 9th, 1696, the other April the 21st, 1696. To which is added a Postscript in relation to a paper called an Answer to his Defence, &c. dated April 25. Also a Reply to the Absolution of a Penitent, according to the Directions of the Church of England, &c. dated May 20, 1696; and An Answer to the Animadversions on two Pamphlets lately published by Mr Collier, &c. dated July 1, 1696, 4to.

[E] All which ends were prosecuted with great effect, in this collection of Essays. We have in the text, spoken in general of the several volumes of this collection, as if it had been composed in the same manner with other books of that kind, whereas, instead of being made up of detached discourses, it is rather composed of a variety of small pieces on different topics which fell from the author's pen at a great distance of time, and after wandering most of them singly through the world, were at last drawn thus into a body to prevent their being lost. The title given them in their last edition is,

XIV. ESSAYS upon several Moral Subjects, by Jeremy Collier, M. A. in three volumes, 8vo. In order to give the reader a clear account of the contents of these volumes, which are not commonly understood to comprehend so large a part of their author's works as they really do, it is necessary to enter a little into particulars. The first volume is divided into two parts, which were published separately. The first part consists of six Essays, viz. upon Pride, Cloaths, Duelling, General Kindness, the Office of a Chaplain, and the Weakness of Human Reason. The four first are written in the way of dialogue, and with great spirit and vivacity; the two last are continued discourses. That on the Office of a Chaplain is particularly laboured, and has been looked upon as the author's master-piece, the reason being more close, the language more exact, and the thread of the argument better preserved, than in many of the rest. His Essay on the Weakness of Human Understanding is in some measure a declamation, but it ends with a moral reflection of great importance, and which perhaps this gentleman did not keep always in his mind (6). 'We may plainly perceive, says he, that the prejudices, of education have a great stroke in many of our reasonings, and that the sentiments of men discover the colour of their original tinctures. And as there are some inbred principles impregnable against custom, so there are some customs which nature finds very difficult to deal with.'

The second part contains seventeen discourses upon Fame, Musick, The Value of Life, The Spleen, Eagerness of Desire, Friendship, Popularity, The Immortality of the Soul, The Entertainment of books, Confidence, Envy, The Aspects of Men, Despair, Covetousness, Liberty, Old Age, and Pleasure; several of these are written in dialogue, but most of them are set discourses; and are all of them calculated to inform the understanding, reform the manners, and to give a right turn to the thoughts of the reader.

The second volume contains the third part, in which the author discourses of Pain, Revenge, Authors, Infancy and Youth, Riches and Poverty, Debauchery, Drunkenness, Usury, The Character of an Apostle, and of Solitude. Then follows a Translation of St Gregory's Oration, in commendation of the Maccabees, Of the Unreasonableness of ill-timed Diversions, St Cyprian's Discourse upon the Plague, his Description of the manners of the Age, in which he lived, and his Discourse on Patience: it is closed by the author's Essay upon Discontent, written in dialogue: there is usually annexed to this volume, (tho' it was printed separately) An Essay upon Gaming, in a dialogue, which is at once an useful, entertaining, and most instructive performance. The third volume, and the fourth part consists mostly of religious subjects, and was written after he had published the first volume of his Ecclesiastical History: in this he treats of Goodness, Honesty, Religious Temper, Lying, Fortitude, Flattery, Theft, Peace, and the Resurrection; all these topics are treated with very great plainness and freedom; many of the thoughts are new and singular, such as are written in dialogue, are well sustained, and if we abate the flowerness of the language, which was the fashion, I will not say the fault of that time, it will be difficult to find any essays more capable of affording a rational pleasure, than those of our author.

volume of these Miscellaneous Discourses, Mr Collier made an attempt to reform the Stage, which involved him in a very brisk controversy with several of the greatest wits, and ablest writers of the age, in which he acquitted himself with so much force and vivacity, that the most considerable of his antagonists were obliged, not only to quit the field of battle, but confess that they were vanquished; and though some of them did not do this with the best grace, yet as their failing in point of manners ought to be attributed to the smart of their wounds, it is very far from reflecting upon the merit of our author, whose animadversions actually produced both repentance and amendment (7), and was the original cause of that decorum, which has been, for the most part, observed by the modern writers of dramatic poetry. The titles of his pieces upon this occasion will be found in the notes [F]. His abilities and industry were next exercised in a much larger work than any he had hitherto undertaken, which was that of making Moreri's performance useful

[F] Will be found in the notes.] It was certainly a very bold thing in Mr Collier, to attack at once the Wits and the Witlings of those times; among the first, were Mr Dryden, Mr Congreve, and Mr Vanbrugh; amongst the latter, was Tom. Durfey and many more; but he is certainly to be commended for forming so good a design, as that of reducing the stage to order, and thereby preventing the morals of mankind from being corrupted, where they ought to be amended: the first he published with this design, had the following title.

XV. A short view of the immorality and profaneness of the English Stage together with the sense of Antiquity upon this argument, Lond. 1698, 8vo. It is a very methodical and learned work: he begins with shewing the immodesty and indecency of the stage, and the ill consequences that attend it; he proves next, that the Roman and Greek theatres were much more inoffensive than the English, and then produces the authorities of Ben Johnson, Beaumont and Fletcher, and the French Poet Corneille, against the modern Stage. He proceeds to open the indictment by a charge of profaneness, which he supports by instances from several pieces of Mr Dryden, Mr Otway, Mr Congreve, and Vanbrugh. His second charge is the abuse of the Clergy; his third relates to immorality encouraged by the Stage; he then descends to some remarks upon Amphitruon, exposes the horrid profaneness of the comical History of Don Quixote; then criticizes the Relapse, or Virtue in Danger; he concludes with producing the opinions of the Heathen Philosophers, Orators, and Historians, the restraints imposed upon the Stage by the laws in several countries, and the sentiments of the Fathers of the Church.

In answer to this, Mr Congreve published a little piece, intitled, Amendments of Mr Collier's false and imperfect citations from the old Batchelor, the Double Dealer, &c. It must be allowed, that in this piece, the ingenious author is very hard put to it, and struggles with infinite difficulty to give a fair gloss to passages, that, in the natural sense of the words, convey a very different meaning; and besides this, there is an air of anger and resentment runs through the whole piece, which plainly shews how much the author felt the weight of that censure he endeavours to ridicule, and would be thought to despise. Mr Vanbrugh, afterwards Sir John Vanbrugh, likewise published a small piece in support of his own performances, under the title of, A short Vindication of the Relapse, and the Provok'd Wife; but this was very far from dejecting, or silencing our author, he thought he had a good cause, and that he was able to manage it with as much sense and spirit as any of his adversaries; and he found by experience too, that he was as well heard as they by the publick; all which encouraged him to return to the charge, and to defend what he had written, not only against these, but against several other authors, who thought fit to enter the lists on the side of the Poets, against the Priest. These pieces of his were,

XVI. A Defence of the Short View &c. being a Reply to Mr Congreve's Amendments, &c. And to the Vindication of the author of the Relapse, Lond. 1699, 8vo.

XVII. A Second Defence of the Short View, &c. Being a Reply to a Book intitled, The Ancient and Modern Stages surveyed, &c. Lond. 1700, 8vo. The Book here replied to, was written by Dr Drake.

XVIII. Mr Collier's Dissuasive from the Play House; in a letter to a Person of Quality, occasioned by the late calamity of the Tempest, Lond. 1703, 8vo.

XIX. A farther Vindication of the Short View, &c. in which the Objections of a late Book, intitled, A Defence of Plays, are considered, Lond. 1708, 8vo.

The Defence of Plays, has Dr Filmer for it's author.

We have shewn in the text, what the event was of this long dispute, in support of which, I shall produce what Mr Dryden says upon this subject (7). 'I shall say the less of Mr Collier, because in many things he has taxed me justly, and I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine, which can be truly arraigned of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them. If he be my enemy, let him triumph: if he be my friend, as I have given him no personal occasion to be otherwise, he will be glad of my repentance. It becomes me not to draw my pen in the defence of a bad cause, when I have so often drawn it for a good one: yet it were not difficult to prove; that in many places he has perverted my meaning by his glosses, and interpreted my words into blasphemy and bawdry, of which they were not guilty; besides that, he is too much given to horse-play in his raillery and comes to battle like a Distator from the plough: I will not say the zeal of God's house has eaten him up; but I am sure, it has devoured some part of his good manners and civility; it might also be doubted, whether it were altogether zeal, which prompted him to this rough manner of proceeding, perhaps it became not one of his function, to rake into the rubbish of ancient and modern plays; a Divine might have employed his pains to better purpose, than in the nastiness of Plautus and Aristophanes, whose examples, as they excuse not me, so it might possibly be supposed, that he read them not without some pleasure. They, who have written commentaries on those poets, or on Horace, Juvenal, and Martial, have explained some vices, which, without their interpretation, had been unknown to modern times; neither has he judged impartially between the former age and us. There is more bawdry in one Play of Fletcher's, called, The Custom of the Country, than in all ours together, yet this has been often acted on the stage in my remembrance: are the times so much more reformed now, than they were five and twenty years ago? if they are, I congratulate the amendment of our morals; but I am not to prejudice the cause of my Fellow-Poets, tho' I abandon my own defence. They have some of them answered for themselves, and neither they nor I can think Mr Collier so formidable an enemy, that we would shun him. He has lost ground at the latter end of the day, by pursuing his point too far, like the Prince of Condé at the battle of Senef. From immoral plays to no plays; ab abusu ad usum non valet consequentia. But being a party I am not to erect myself into a judge.'

The first part of Mr Dryden's apology is so very decent, and withal so very just, that one cannot help being sorry he did not rest it there; but as to what follows, it is mighty little to the purpose, he has owned, that Mr Collier has shewn him his faults, and yet he is out of humour that they were shewn. Was it in his power to prove his charge against the stage any other way than he has done? did not the quibbling and prevarications of his antagonists, compel him to explain things so broadly? and might not any criminal at the bar charge the Attorney-General, with being a traitor in his heart, for setting forth, and insisting upon his own treasons with the same force of argument, that is used in retorting upon Mr Collier? The truth is, that men offend with gaiety of heart, but repent with bitterness of soul; which is the reason, that tho' they cannot help owning the physick has done them good, yet they cannot avoid bearing ill will to the doctor.

useful to the English nation, in which he laboured for many years with great success, taking all the precautions possible to be well informed as to the new articles he published; and so well were his endeavours in this kind received by the publick, notwithstanding some exceptions that were taken to them, that few books have met with a better fate, or longer maintained their credit [G]. After the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, great endeavours were used to recover Mr Collier to the Church, by inducing him to comply with the terms prescribed by the State. All efforts of this kind, though supported not only with general promises of preferment, but with more particular assurances, were ineffectual, and Mr Collier remained among the Nonjuring Clergy, as seeing no reason to alter his sentiments from any change that had happened, and being incapable of dissembling an alteration for the sake of temporal views (k). About the same time that he published the first volume of his Dictionary, he likewise obliged the world with a very elegant translation from the Greek, of that famous book of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, which has done more credit to his memory than even his excellent administration of publick affairs during a reign which does honour to the Roman History (l). This translation was universally well received on it's first appearance, and continues to be read with all the applause, that so well written, and so useful a treatise of Moral Philosophy deserves [H]. The situation of those times, and the many worthy and generous patrons of whatever regarded the honour of this kingdom who then flourished, encouraged Mr Collier to hope, that an Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, which, in the extent he intended it, had never been attempted by any Protestant writer before, might meet with general acceptance. Accordingly, proposals were published for sending abroad such a work, and the offer very well received, and such encouragements given, as induced him to prosecute with diligence the great design he had formed, and at length finished a copious History of Church Affairs, from the first entrance of Christianity into this Island, to the close of the reign of Henry VII. This all parties allowed to be a work of great labour and learning, methodically and elegantly written; but in other respects they differed, as might well be supposed, in their judgments concerning it's merit [I]. After the pains this book had cost him,

[G] Or longer maintained their credit.] We shall in this note give an account of the different times, in which the several parts of this Dictionary were published, and other circumstances relating to them, that may be worth the reader's knowing.

XX. The Great Historical, Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical Dictionary, &c. four volumes Fol.

The two first volumes were printed in the year 1701, and the author gave notice in his preface, that such of the Articles as were of a later date than the year 1688, were composed by another hand. The third volume was published, under the title of A Supplement, &c. in 1705, and was reprinted in 1727. It is in the preface to this, that he answers the objections made to his conduct; and to prevent those articles being taken for his, which in this volume also, were written by another hand, they are placed under another alphabet. The fourth and last volume, which in the title page is called An Appendix, as in reality it is to the other three, was printed in 1721. The whole is certainly a great treasure of Historical, Geographical, and Poetical Learning; and is not only very useful and entertaining to young scholars, who may by the help of it acquire much knowledge, and enter thoroughly into the meaning of the books they read in any of these kinds of learning; but even to persons of the greatest abilities, and most comprehensive science, who have but small libraries, and live at a distance from London, and the two Universities; yet this work is certainly capable of great improvements, and these might be made without enlarging the bulk, for it might be reduced under one alphabet; whereas at present there are four or five, and as by this means a multitude of repetitions, alterations, and corrections, might be thrown out, so this would make room for new articles, which might be easily found in the last edition of Moreri's Dictionary, now enlarged to seven volumes. The learned reader will easily discern, that this is no reflection either upon Mr Collier's memory or his performance, since he did all that was possible to be done at the time he wrote, and the inconveniences beforementioned were unavoidable from his manner of publication, as that too, with respect to him, was a matter not of choice but of necessity.

[H] That so well written, and so useful a treatise of Moral Philosophy deserves.] This work of Mr Collier's has since borne three impressions, all of them under the following title:

XXI. The Emperor Marcus Antoninus his conversation with himself. Together with the preliminary Discourse of the learned Gataker, &c. to which is ad- ded the Mythological Picture of Cebes the Theban, &c. Translated into English from the respective originals, Lond. 1701, 8vo.

This is one of the best collections we have in the English tongue of the Morals of the Antients; and, in conjunction with the works of Plutarch, Epictetus, and Seneca, will make an admirable library of that kind. The pieces of which it is composed are very well chosen, illustrate each other perfectly, so as to render all the passages in them clear and intelligible; and yet it is of a very moderate size, and has nothing in it redundant, or foreign to the purpose.

[I] Concerning it's merit.] As this great work was published in two volumes at different times, it is requisite to speak of them separately. The first bore the following title:

XXII. An Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain, chiefly of England, from the first planting of Christianity, to the end of the Reign of King Charles II. With a brief Account of the Affairs of Religion in Ireland. Collected from the best antient Historians, Councils, and Records, fol. 1702, Vol. I. which comes down to the Reign of Henry VII.

As the scheme of this work was in itself of large extent, it required a great knowledge in Divinity, History and Antiquity, and a very assiduous application to the perusal of Records and manuscripts, as well as a vast variety of antient and modern authors; so the performance itself demonstrates very great care to have been taken in all these respects. The method in which this History is written is very clear and exact, his authorities are constantly cited by the author, his remarks are short and pertinent, and, with respect to the dissertations that are occasionally inserted, they are such as tend to illustrate and explain those perplexed points of which they treat, and contribute thereby to the clearer understanding of the narration. The style is very uniform and grave, which is the more remarkable, because the author, in other writings, has shewn as lively a fancy, and as much quickness of wit, as any writer of his own time; but he knew this would be improper here; and therefore it is with great judgment avoided. He speaks modestly and respectfully of most of the Historians who went before him, and if he is any where severe, he takes care that his reason shall go along with his censure. His own peculiar sentiments with respect to religion and government may be in some places discerned, but taking the whole together, it will be found as judicious and impartial a work, as the world, in doing justice to his talents, could have expected it:

him, our author thought a season of repose necessary, or, as himself expresses it, judged it convenient to breathe a little after a folio (m); yet without dropping, or so much as discontinuing his former design, but knowing that it required not only assiduity and vigilance, but the utmost prudence and circumspection likewise, he chose to act cautiously and rather to apologize to the publick for his delay, than to precipitate matters in order to hurry his work through the press. In the year 1713 he was consecrated a Bishop by Dr George Hickes, who was himself consecrated Suffragan of Thetford by the deprived Bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough (n), Feb. 23, 1694. In the succeeding year came abroad the second volume of his Ecclesiastical History, which met with a different reception from persons of different sentiments, applauded by some and censured by others. Of the latter there were those who made a considerable figure in the learned world, against whose objections the author thought it incumbent upon him to write [K]. As he grew in years, that great share of health which he had enjoyed was interrupted by frequent attacks of the stone, to which there is no doubt that his sedentary life might much contribute, so that from this time we hear of nothing that he published farther, except a collection of Sermons, of which, together with some smaller pieces prefixed to other mens works, an account will be given at the bottom of the page [L]. He lived however several years in an indifferent state of health, sometimes tolerably free, and at others grievously afflicted by his old distemper, which brought him to his grave April 26, 1726, and three days after his body was interred in the church-yard of St Pancras. He was in the seventy-sixth year of his age, and preserved the free use of his senses to the very last. As to his character, we have already given it in the impartial history of his works, and shall therefore only add, that his morals were unexceptionable, and that, as his conduct had in it all the regularity becoming a Clergyman, so his behaviour had nothing stiff or pedantick, but all that life, spirit, and innocent freedom, which constitutes the good breeding of a gentleman. His reputation as a man of letters extended beyond the bounds of his own country, for the learned and ingenious Father Courbeville, who translated into French the Hero of Balthazar Gracian, in the Preface of that work, speaks in the highest terms of praise of our author's Miscellaneous Works which he says set him on a level with Montaigne, St Evremont, La Bruyere, &c. The same reverend and learned person translated into French Mr Collier's Short View of the English Stage, and from thence takes occasion to speak of him again, with all the marks of admiration and esteem possible.

yet, as we have hinted in the text, it was far enough from escaping the censure of the Criticks, but was still much happier in that respect than the second volume, in speaking of which we shall shew who these Criticks were, as well as the titles of the pieces written by our author in his own defence, and in justification of his History.

[K] Thought it incumbent upon him to write. As the second volume of his Ecclesiastical History took in the entire account of the Reformation, and the struggles with the Puritans from their first appearance, to the overturning of our constitution in Church and State; so it must be naturally supposed, that a man of Mr Collier's principles could never treat these delicate subjects, without affording some room, for such as were desirous of criticizing him to take offence. Dr Nicholson, Bishop of Derry, has treated him with great severity, not to say more, in the character he has given of his works. Bishop Burnet and Bishop Kennet, who were infinitely better judges as well as writers, have corrected him with great decency. Mr Collier defended himself against them all, in the pieces of which we shall presently speak, but before we come to them, it may not be amiss to remark a single, and a shining instance of his impartiality, and that is, in disculpating the Presbyterians from the false and scandalous imputations that had been thrown upon them, as if they consented to, or at least temporized in, the murder of King Charles I. from which he has vindicated them with equal perspicuity and justice, and has fully shewn, that as they only had it in their power to oppose, so to the utmost extent of that power they did oppose, and protest against that bloody fact, both before and after it was committed (8). The pieces written by him in defence of his History are these:

XXIII. An Answer to some exceptions in Bishop Burnet's third part of the History of the Reformation, &c. against Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History; together with a Reply to some Remarks in Bishop Nicholson's English Historical Library, &c. upon the same subject, fol. Lond. 1715.

XXIV. Some Remarks on Dr Kennet's second and third Letters, wherein his misrepresentations of Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History are laid open, and his calumnies disproved, Lond. 1717, fol. and 8vo. But in the octavo it is called Some Considerations, &c.

[L] Will be given at the bottom of the page. The collection of Sermons mentioned in the text, came abroad under this title.

XXV. Several Discourses upon Practical Subjects, Lond. 1725, 8vo. The last discourse of this collection had been printed separately, in 1723, with the following title. The comparison between giving and receiving, with the reasons for preference; stated in a Sermon preached at Whitehall, April 19th, 1687, 4to.

XXVI. God not the Origin of Evil, being an additional Sermon to a collection of Mr Collier's Discourses, &c. Lond. 1726, 8vo.

He published also An Advertisement against Bishop Burnet's History of his own time, which was printed on a slip of paper, and dispersed in all the Coffee-houses in 1724, and is to be seen in the Evening Post, No. 2254. Besides this, he wrote several Prefaces, &c. As (1.) An Advertisement concerning the Author, and the translation of Maxims and Reflections upon Plays, in answer to a Discourse of the lawfulness and unlawfulness of Plays, printed before a late Play intitled, Beauty in Distress, written in French, by the Bishop of Meaux, Lond. 1669. (2.) A Recommendatory Preface to Tully's five Books de Finibus, &c. Done into English by S. P. (Sam. Parker) Gent. Together with an Apology for the philosophical writings of Cicero, in a letter to the Translator; by Mr Henry Dodwell, Lond. 1702. (3.) A Recommendatory Preface to human Souls naturally immortal, translated from a Latin MS. by S. E. Lond. 1707. Of this Preface Mr Norris makes honourable mention in his letter to Mr Dodwell, concerning the immortality of the Soul of Man, and says that Mr Collier's single remark against Mr Locke, is, in his opinion, worth all the book besides (9). It is also upon good grounds believed, that he was concerned, amongst others, in collecting the passages referred to by Dr Henry Sacheverell, in his answer to the articles of his impeachment. E

COLLINS (ANTHONY); an eminent Writer of the present Century, was son of Henry Collins, Esq; a gentleman of a considerable estate; and was born at Heston near Hounslow in Middlesex, June 21, 1676 (a). He was educated in grammar learning at Eaton-College near Windsor, and from thence was removed to King's College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr Francis Hare (b). Upon his leaving college, he was entered a Student in the Temple: but disrelishing the study of the Law, he soon abandoned it. In 1698, he married Martha, the daughter of Sir Francis Child, Alderman of London (c), and by her had two sons, Henry and Anthony [A], and two daughters, Elizabeth and Martha (d). In 1700, our author published a tract, intitled, Several of the London Cafes considered (e). In 1703, and 1704, he held an epistolary correspondence with the great Mr Locke, who expressed an high regard and friendship for our author [B]. In 1707, he published his Essay concerning the Use of Reason (f) [C]. The same year, our author engaged in the controversy, then on foot between Mr Dodwell and Dr Samuel Clarke, concerning the Natural Immortality of the Soul [D]. In December 1709, came out a pamphlet (g), intitled, Priestcraft in Perfection [E]; and, in February the year following, another intitled, Reflexions on a late Pamphlet, intitled, Priestcraft in Perfection; both written by our author. The same year, he published his Vindication of the Divine Attributes, in some Remarks on the Archbishop of Dublin's Sermon (h). In March 1711, Mr Collins went over to Holland, where he became acquainted with Mr Le Clerc, and other learned men, and returned to London in November following. In 1713, he published his Discourse of Free-Thinking [F]; and soon after made a second trip to Holland,

[A] He had—two sons, Henry and Anthony.] Henry, the elder, died in his infancy. Anthony the younger, a youth of great hopes, and educated at Bennet-College in Cambridge, died in the 22d year of his age, lamented by all that knew him (1).

[B] Mr Locke expressed an high regard and friendship for our author.] This appears from Mr Locke's letters to Mr Collins (2). In that dated from Oates in Essex, October 29, 1703, he writes as follows. 'If I were now setting out in the world, I should think it my great happiness to have such a companion as you, who had a true relish of truth, would in earnest seek it with me, from whom I might receive it undisguised, and to whom I might communicate what I thought true, freely. Believe it, my good friend, to love truth for truth's sake, is the principal part of human perfection in this world, and the seed-plot of all other virtues; and, if I mistake not, you have as much of it, as ever I met with in any body. What then is there wanting to make you equal to the best, a friend for any one to be proud of?' In another, dated from Oates, September 11th, 1704, he writes thus: He that has any thing to do with you, must own that friendship is the natural product of your constitution; and your soul, a noble soil, is enriched with the two most valuable qualities of human nature, truth and friendship. What a treasure have I then in such a friend, with whom I can converse, and be enlightened about the highest speculations? These extracts evince, that, at that time, Mr Collins appeared to Mr Locke in the light of an impartial, disinterested, enquirer after truth. How far that great man, who was undoubtedly a friend to Revelation, would, probably, have altered his opinion of our author, had he lived (3) to see his works (of which he had published none but his London Cafes considered) the readers of Mr Collins's works will judge.

[C] His Essay concerning the use of Reason.] The title at length is: An Essay concerning the use of Reason in Proposition, the evidence whereof depends upon human testimony. Dr Francis Galtrell, afterwards Bishop of Chester, being animadverted upon in this essay, with relation to some passages in his Considerations concerning the Trinity, and the way of managing that controversy, printed at London in 1702, he subjoined to the third edition of it, in 1707, a Vindication of it in answer to Mr Collins's Essay.

[D] He engaged in the Controversy—concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul.] Upon this subject Mr Collins published the following pieces. I. A Letter to Mr Dodwell, containing some remarks on a (pretended) Demonstration of the immateriality and natural immortality of the soul, in Mr Clarke's Answer to a late Epistolary Discourse. London, 1707 and 1709, in 8vo. II. A Defence of the Argument made use of in a Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1707 in 8vo. III. A Reply to Mr Clarke's Defence of his letter to Mr Dodwell: with a postscript to Mr Milles's Answer to Mr Dodwell's Epistolary Discourse. London, 1707, in 8vo. A second edition of this piece, corrected, was published in 1709, in 8vo. IV. Reflexions on Mr Clarke's second Defence of his Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1707, in 8vo. There was a second edition in 1711, in 8vo. V. An answer to Mr Clarke's third Defence of his Letter to Mr Dodwell. London, 1708, in 8vo. There was a second edition, corrected, London, 1711, in 8vo.

[E] A pamphlet intitled Priestcraft in Perfection.] The title at length is: Priestcraft in perfection, or, a Detection of the fraud of inserting, and continuing that clause [The church hath power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and authority in Controversies of Faith] in the twentieth article of the Articles of the Church of England. The authority of this clause had been called in question, in a book intitled; The Peril of being zealously affected, but not well; or Reflexions on Dr Sacheverell's Sermon preached at St Paul's Nov. 5, 1709 (4). And it being now again professedly attacked by Mr Collins, several Pamphlets, Sermons, and Books were published upon the subject. Among which the most remarkable were the two following. I. A Vindication of the Church of England from the aspersions of a late libel intitled, Priestcraft in Perfection: wherein the controverted clause of the Church's power in the 20th Article is shewn to be of equal authority with all the rest of the Articles, and the fraud and forgery, charged upon the Clergy, upon the account of that clause, is retorted upon the accusers. With a Preface containing some Remarks upon the Reflexions on that Pamphlet. By a Priest of the Church of England, London, 1710, in 8vo. II. An Essay on the XXXIX Articles of Religion, agreed on in 1562, and revised in 1571, &c. By Thomas Bennet, D. D. In answer to these two Books, Mr Collins published his Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles &c. (5). The second and third editions of his Priestcraft in Perfection were printed, with corrections, at London, in 1710, in 8vo; and at the end of the third is subjoined the following advertisement. 'Whereas in the two former impressions of Priestcraft, &c. A letter from Oxford is cited, giving an account of an English edition of the Articles being cut out from a volume of Miscellanies in the Bodleian Library; I have omitted that passage in this edition, upon the sight of a letter from Oxford, which assures the gentleman, to whom it was wrote, that my friend was mistaken. I do not know at present in what part of England he is, and therefore I cannot as yet give the reader or myself that satisfaction in the matter, which I hope to do when I hear of his return to Oxford.'

[F] His Discourse of Free-thinking.] The title at length is: A Discourse of Free-Thinking, occasioned by the rise and growth of a Set called Free-Thinkers. It was reprinted at the Hague, with some additions and corrections, in 1713, in 12mo; tho', in the title page, it is said to be printed at London. In this edition, the translations in several places are corrected from

Holland [G], and from thence to Flanders; where he received great civilities from the Priests, Jesuits, and others. He intended to have visited Paris; but the death of a near relation (i) obliged him to return to London, where he arrived the 18th of October 1713. In 1715, he retired into the county of Essex, and acted as a Justice of the Peace, and Deputy Lieutenant of that county, as he had done before in the county of Middlesex, and liberty of Westminster. The same year, he published, at London, A Philosophical Enquiry concerning human Liberty (k) [H]. In 1718, he was chosen Treasurer for the county of Essex [I]. In 1724, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Walter Wrottesly, Bart (l); by whom he had no children. The same year, he published his Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England [K]; also his Discourse of the Grounds

Dr Bentley's Remarks, and some references are made to those Remarks, and to Dr Hare's Clergyman's Thanks. And whereas, in the former edition, the Discourse ended with these words; 'For I think it virtue enough to endeavour to do good, only within the bounds of doing your self no harm;' in the Hague edition, after the words virtue enough, is inserted this parenthesis; in a country so ignorant, stupid, superstitious, and destitute of all private and publick virtue as ours. The Discourse was attacked in several pieces, particularly the following, I. Reflections on an Anonymous Pamphlet, intituled, A Discourse of Free-Thinking. By William Whiston, A. M. Lond. 1713. There have been three editions of this pamphlet. Mr Whiston observes (6), that, 'tho' the Discourse is commonly so worded, as to seem rather meant against the Heathen Idolatry, Popish Superstition, Real Priestcraft, and Tyranny over conscience, than against Christianity itself, with it's sacred books, yet that the author's real design must appear from the ill characters given of the Clergy or Christian Priesthood in general; the oblique reproaches cast upon Revealed Religion; the visible slight put upon the whole Jewish nation and the Mosaic law; the plain disregard of the great foundation of religion, the immortality of the soul; and the many insinuations visibly tending to render the sacred books, both Jewish and Christian, contemptible and uncertain.' II. An anonymous pamphlet, intituled, Free Thoughts upon the Discourse of Free-thinking, London, 1713, in 8vo. III. Queries recommended to the authors of the late Discourse of Free-Thinking. By Mr Benjamin Hoadly, now (*) Bishop of Winchester (7). This ingenious writer declares (8), 'that, tho' some of the particulars, mentioned in his Queries, as designed plainly against the belief of Christianity, are produced in the Treatise of Free-thinking under the specious pretence of their being good reasons and occasions for a free and impartial examination, and not expressly declared to be intended against the Gospel, in the same passages, in which the authors of that treatise produce them; yet he verily believes, that these authors themselves would inwardly laugh at any, who should suppose them to have had any other view in that performance.' And, having placed several particulars from the Discourse of Free-Thinking in one view, he concludes with these words (9): After this let any one doubt, if he can, what sort of Free-thinking all that is produced in the first part of this treatise is designed to promote; or suppose it possible, that the chief views of these authors could be any other than the promoting that Free-Thinking, which they themselves contend to be Atheism and Infidelity. IV. Remarks upon a late Discourse of Free-Thinking; in a Letter to F. H. D. D. By Phileleutherus Liptienfis. Lond. 1713, in 8vo. The author of this ingenious performance was the truly learned Dr Richard Bentley; and the person to whom it is addressed, Dr Francis Hare, afterwards Bishop of Chichester. It exposes the weakness and fallacy of the Discourse, with great strength of argument and sprightliness of wit. A Second part, and a sheet or two of a Third, were printed the same year at Cambridge: but the learned author proceeded no farther. The first part of these Remarks gave birth to a pamphlet, said to be written by Dr Hare, intituled, The Clergyman's Thanks to Phileleutherus, for his Remarks on the late Discourse of Free Thinking. In a Letter to Dr Bentley. Lond. 1713, in 8vo. The author concludes this piece with remarking, that 'if we have gained by Dr Bentley's Remarks in one respect, we are, on the other hand, in danger of losing no less than an edition of all Tully, and, what is of more consequence, a New Gospel; with both which, for the advancement of learning and religion (their learning and their religion) The Free-Thinking Club were preparing to oblige the world. And the last of these (says he) was, I am told, quite finished, and ready to be published, when your Remarks unluckily came out to shew, that they are neither Christians nor Scholars: And this has suppressed at least for some time, if not totally sunk, both these undertakings.

[G] He made a second trip to Holland. This was ascribed to the general alarm caused by the Discourse of Free-Thinking, and the author's being discovered by his Printer Mr John Darby. Whereupon Dr Hare having observed, that the least appearance of danger is able in a moment to damp all the zeal of the Free-Thinkers, tells us (10), 'that a bare enquiry after the Printer of their wicked book has frightened them, and obliged the reputed author to take a second trip to Holland; so great is his courage to defend, upon the least appearance of an opposition. And are not these (adds the Doctor) rare champions for Free-Thinking? And is not their book a demonstration, that we are in possession of the liberty they pretend to plead for, which otherwise they durst never have writ? and that they would have been as mute as fishes, had they not thought they could have opened with impunity?'

[H] His Philosophical Enquiry concerning Human Liberty. Dr Samuel Clarke wrote Remarks upon this Enquiry (11). But Mr Collins did not publish any Reply to Dr Clarke upon this subject; because, we are told (12), though he did not think the Doctor had the advantage over him in the dispute, yet, as he had represented Mr Collins's opinions as dangerous in their consequences, and improper to be insisted upon, our author, after such an insinuation, found he could not proceed in the dispute upon equal terms. The Enquiry was translated into French by the Reverend Mr D*, and printed in the first volume of Recueil de diverses Pieces sur la Philosophie, la Religion Naturelle, l'Historie, les Mathematiques, &c. par Messieurs Leibnitz, Clarke, Newton, et autres auteurs celebres; published by M. Des Maizeaux at Amsterdam, 1720, in two volumes, 12mo.

[I] He was chosen Treasurer for the county of Essex. In the discharge of this office Mr Collins highly merited the thanks of several tradesmen and others, who had large sums of money due to them from the said county, but could not get it paid them, it having been spent and embezzled by their former Treasurer. The poorest of them, we are informed, he supported with his own private cash, and others he promised interest for their money till it could be raised to pay them. In 1722, the debts were all discharged, and by his care and management the county's debts were, from that time, discharged every three months, and with little more than half the money, which had been annually raised for upwards of twenty years before.

[K] His Historical and Critical Essay upon the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England. The title at length is: An Historical and Critical Essay on the XXXIX Articles of the Church of England; where-in it is demonstrated, that this clause, The Church has power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controversies of Faith, inserted in the Twentieth Article, is not a part of the Articles, as they were established by Act of Parliament in the 13th of Eliz. or agreed on by the Convocations of 1562 and 1574. This we have already said (13), was designed as an Answer to the Vindication of the Church of England, &c. and Dr Bennet's Essay on the XXXIX Articles, both published against his Priestcraft in perfection. In the Preface he tells us, 'he was engaged in writing this work by a worthy Minister of the Gospel, who knew that he had made some enquiries into the modern Ecclesiastical History of England; and that he was preparing An History of the variations of the Church of England and it's Clergy from the Reformation down to this time, with an Answer to the Cavils of the Papists made on occasion of the said Variations. But nothing of this kind from our author's hand was ever printed. As to the Essay in question, he concludes it with drawing up in brief the Demonstration, promised in the title page, and given in the book; and which is as follows. The Articles of the Church of England are supposed to have their Convocational Authority from the Convocation of 1562, which first agreed on them; and from the Convocation of 1571, which, after having revised, and made alterations in, and additions to, them, agreed on them again. The way of passing Acts of Convocation is by the subscription of the majority of the members of each house by themselves. The MS. Articles, which passed the Convocation in 1562, and were subscribed by the majority of both Houses, are extant; as are the MS. Articles of 1571, with the subscription of the Upper House. And both these Manuscripts are without the clause. The Parliament in 1571 did, by a statute, intituled, An Act for the Ministers of the Church to be of found Religion, confirm Articles of Religion, comprized in an imprinted English book intituled, Articles &c. put forth by the Queen's authority. All the English printed books of the Articles extant before 1571, and while the Parliament were making this Statute, bore the title recited in the Statute; and were without the clause. Wherefore it follows, that the clause has neither the authority of the Convocation nor Parliament. The reader may see the whole state of this Controversy, and a full vindication of the Church of England from the charge of forgery in respect to the above-mentioned clause, in Mr Collier's Ecclesiastical History (14), where particular notice is taken of our author.

[L] His Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion. The title at length is: A Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion, in two parts: The first containing some Considerations on the Quotations made from the Old in the New Testament, and particularly on the Prophecies, cited from the former, and said to be fulfilled in the latter: The second containing an Examination of the scheme advanced by Mr Whiston in his Essay towards restoring the true text of the Old Testament, and for vindicating the citations thence made in the New Testament. To which is prefixed, An Apology for free Debate and Liberty of writing. The drift of this Discourse is to shew, that Christianity is founded on Judaism, or the New Testament on the Old: that the Apostles prove Christianity from the Old Testament: that if the proofs fetched from thence are valid, Christianity is firmly established on it's true foundation; but if invalid, Christianity is false; and that those proofs are typical or allegorical.

[M] It was attacked by a great number of writers. I shall mention only the most remarkable. I. A List of Suppositions or Assertions in the late Discourse of the Grounds &c. which are not therein supported by any real or authentick Evidence; for which some such evidence is expected to be produced. By William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1724. This piece is subjoined to the author's Proposals for printing by subscription, Authentick Records concerning the Jewish and Christian Religion, dated Jan. 17, 1724, and given away to all the Members of Parliament. In this piece, Mr Whiston treats Mr Collins, together with Mr Toland, in very severe terms, as guilty of impious frauds and lay-craft. II. The Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies, being a full answer to a late Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1724. III. A Defence of Christianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, wherein are considered all the Objections against this kind of proof, advanced in a late Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By the Right Reverend Father in God Edward (Chandler), Lord Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (15) 8vo. 1725. This is a very learned and elaborate performance, and has passed thro' several editions. IV. A Discourse of the Connection of the Prophecies in the Old Testament, and Application of them

to Christ. By Samuel Clarke, D. D. Rector of St James's Westminster, 8vo. 1725. This was not intended for a direct answer to Mr Collins's book, but as a Supplement (occasioned thereby) to a proposition in Dr Clarke's Demonstration of the Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion; with which it has since been constantly printed. V. The Reasoning of Christ and his Apostles, in their defence of Christianity, considered, in Seven Sermons preached at Hackney in Middlesex, 1724. To which is prefixed a Preface, taking notice of the false representations of Christianity, and of the Apostles reasonings in defence of it, in a Book, intituled, The Grounds, &c. By Thomas Bullock, A. M. published at the request of the gentlemen of Hackney, 8vo. 1725. VI. An Essay upon the truth of the Christian Religion, wherein it's real foundation upon the old Testament is shewn, occasioned by the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By Arthur Ashley Sykes, A. M. Rector of Rayleigh in Essex, 8vo. 1725. Mr Collins gives it as his opinion, that, 'of all the writers against the Grounds, &c. Mr Sykes alone has advanced a consistent scheme of things, which he has proposed with great clearness, politeness, and moderation (16).' VII. The Use and Intent of Prophecy, in the several Ages of the Church. In six Discourses delivered at the Temple Church, 1724, published at the desire of the Masters of the Bench of the two Honourable Societies. By Thomas Sherlock, D. D. Dean of Chichester, and Master of the Temple (17), 8vo. 1725: This was not designed as an answer to the Grounds, &c. but only to throw in light upon the argument from Prophecy, attacked by our author. VIII. A Vindication of the Christian Religion, in two parts. The first, a Discourse of the nature and Use of Miracles. The second, An answer to a late book intituled, A Discourse of the Grounds, &c. By Samuel Chandler, 8vo. 1725. IX. A Supplement to the Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies, containing Observations on Dr Clarke's, and Bishop Chandler's late Discourses of the prophecies of the Old Testament; by William Whiston, A. M. 8vo. 1725. X. Letters to the author of the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. shewing that Christianity is supported by facts well attested; that the words of Isaiah, chap. vii. 14. Behold a Virgin shall conceive, and bear a Son, in their literal and only sense, are a prophecy of the Conception and Birth of the Messiah, fulfilled in Jesus; and that the Gospel application of several other passages in the Old Testament is just; By John Greene, 8vo. 1726. XI. A Brief Defence of the Christian Religion: or, the Testimony of God to the truth of the Christian Religion; By Theophilus Lobb, M. D. 8vo. 1726. The reader will find an entire catalogue of all the pieces, written against the Discourse of the Grounds, &c. amounting in number to thirty-five, among which are Sermons, London Journals, Woolston's Moderator, &c. at the end of the Preface to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered.

[N] His Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered. The title at length is; The Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; in a view of the Controversy occasioned by a late book, intituled, A Discourse of the Grounds, &c. It was printed at the Hague by Thomas Johnson, in 1726, in two volumes. 12mo, and reprinted at London with corrections; in 1727, in 8vo. It is dated at London November 13, 1725, and addressed to the Right Honourable * * * * *. In this piece (18) Mr Collins mentions a Dissertation he had written, but never published, against Mr Whiston's Vindication of the Sibylline Oracles; in which he endeavours to shew, that those oracles were forged by the Primitive Christians, who were thence called Sibyllists by the Pagans. He also mentions a manuscript Discourse of his upon the miracles recorded in the Old and New Testament.

Collins, that his pieces were all anonymous. His health declined some years before his death, which fell out, December 13, 1729, occasioned by a violent fit of the stone. He was interred in Oxford-Chapel, where is a monument, with a Latin inscription on it [P], erected to his memory by his widow. A letter to the author of the London Journal, Saturday April 1, 1727; it was written by Dr Sykes, Dean of Burien, and is that answered by Mr Collins, at the end of his Letter to Dr Rogers. Dr Sykes wrote a second letter in defence of his former, dated June 24, 1727, and printed in a pamphlet intitled, The true Grounds of the expectation of the Messiah, in two letters. The one printed in the London Journal, April 1, 1727. The other in vindication of it; being a reply to the Answer published at the end of A Letter to Dr Rogers; By Philalethes, London, 1727, 8vo. III. A Vindication of the Antiquity and Authority of Daniel's Prophecies, and their application to Jesus Christ, in answer to the Objections of the author of the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered: By Samuel Chandler, London, 1727, 8vo. IV. *A Vindication of the Defence of Christianity, from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, In Answer to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; By the Right Rev. and Father in God, Edward, Lord Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield: in two volumes. [Q] Something of his character.] We are told (19), that 'the corruption among Christians, and the persecuting spirit of the Clergy, had given him a prejudice against the Christian religion, and at last induced him to think, that upon it's present footing it is pernicious to mankind: and that, as he had a great fund of humanity, sweetness of temper, and moderation, he saw with grief, that these virtues were banished from society, and that religion was made use of as a cloak to authorize all kinds of violence and injustice.' Mr Whiston, in his List of Suppositions and Assertions, &c (20), treating our author, together with Mr Toland, as guilty of impious frauds and Lay-craft, expresses himself, with regard to the former, in these terms: 'A second instance must be Mr Anthony Collins, a gentleman, who has many years taken superabundant care not to be suspected of believing so much as the Apostles Creed, or the books of the Old or New Testament, or indeed any Divine Providence at all. Yet does he claim a right to be admitted to take an oath upon the Bible, and to receive the Holy Communion itself; and he is at this day admitted to do both, and in virtue thereof is in the commission of the peace, as a good Church-man: i. e. notwithstanding his open and professed infidelity, he ventures, in the most publick and solemn manner, to declare his unfeigned acknowledgment of the Divine Providence, of the truth of the Christian religion, and of the books of the Holy Scripture, that is possible to be done among men. It is with great regret I add this example of an old friend, and one whom I still love better than he loves himself; but it is too flagrant to be omitted. This I call gross immorality, impious fraud, and Lay-craft.' Mr Armand de la Chapelle, having translated this passage into French (21), observes, that the expressions are a little too choleric, and that Mr Collins would have reason to triumph upon this instance of passion in his antagonist. This occasioned the sending a letter to Mr de la Chapelle (22), in which the writer observes, that 'Mr Whiston having accused Mr Collins of irreligion, but being sensible that this accusation, being destitute of proof, was ridiculous, he has artfully pretended, that the latter had been his friend, insinuating thereby that Mr Collins had disclosed to him his most secret sentiments. And yet (adds the writer) I have been assured by persons who are very well informed, that Mr Collins never had any intercourse of friendship with him; that he never spoke to him above eight or ten times in his life, in a coffee-house or elsewhere, and always in other company, and that he has not seen him for above five years. Is this sufficient for Mr Whiston to claim the character of a friend?' Mr Whiston, in another place (23), speaks thus of Mr Collins. The reputed author of Freethinking is, for all I have ever heard, a sober man; thanks to his natural aversion to intemperance; and that is more than can be said of some others of the club: but as for any other virtue, he has told us () it is such as he intends shall never hurt him. And it can't be thought uncharitable, if I say it rises from no higher origin than fear; for he has himself disclaimed all nobler principles.* But, of all writers, the author of the Guardian (24) has treated our author's character with the greatest severity in the following passages: 'He that should burn a house, and justify the action by asserting he is a free agent, would be far more excusable than this author in uttering what he has from the right of a Free Thinker.'

Again; This gentleman may be assured he has not a taste for what he pretends to detest, and the poor man is certainly more a blockhead than an Abbeist. Again; When such writers as this, who have no spirit but that of malice, pretend to inform the age, Mohocks and Cut-throats may well set up for wits and men of pleasure. Lastly; If ever any man deserved to be denied the common benefits of air and water, it is the author of a Discourse of Free-thinking. But, notwithstanding the reproaches cast upon Mr Collins as an enemy to ALL religion, impartiality obliges us to remark, what is said, and generally believed to be true, that upon his death bed, he declared, 'That, as he had always endeavoured, to the best of his abilities, to serve his God, his King, and his country, so he

' was persuaded he was going to that place, which God had designed for them that love him: ' to which he added, that The Catholick religion is to love God and to love man; and he advised such as were about him to have a constant regard to these principles. His library, which was a very large and curious one, was open to all men of letters, to whom he readily communicated all the lights and assistance in his power, and (we are told) even furnished his antagonists with books to confute himself, and directed them how to give their arguments all the force of which they were capable. We shall only add, that he carefully avoided all the indecencies of conversation, and discouraged every the least tendency towards obscenity of discourse.

COLSTON) (EDWARD) a person ever memorable for his great and extensive charities, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, was the eldest son of William Colston, Esq [A]; by Sarah his wife, and born in Temple parish in the city of Bristol, November 2, 1636 (a). He was brought up to trade, probably under his father (who was a most eminent Spanish Merchant); and resided some time in Spain: as did also his brothers, two of whom were inhumanly murdered there by assassins [B]. Through a very laudable industry, and in the course of a long and happy life, he acquired very great riches [C]; of which he expended a considerable part in works of beneficence and charity. In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St Michael's-hill Alms-house, in Bristol [D]. The same year, he gave houses and lands, without Temple-gate in that city, to the Society of Merchants for ever, towards the maintenance of six poor old decayed Sailors, to the yearly value of twenty-four pounds. In 1696, he purchased a piece of ground in Temple-street in the same city, and built at his own charge a school and dwelling-house for a Master, to instruct forty boys, in Writing, Arithmetick, and the Church-Catechism [E]. In 1702, he gave five hundred pounds, towards rebuilding Queen Elizabeth's Hospital on the College-Green in Bristol; and for the maintenance, cloathing, and education of six boys there, and putting them out apprentices, he appropriated an estate, out of which is paid to the Master the yearly sum of sixty pounds exclusive of all taxes and charges, besides ten pounds for placing out the boys apprentices. In the year 1708, he settled his great benefaction, of the Hospital in St Augustine's back, in the city aforesaid, consisting of a Master, two Ushers, and one hundred

(a) From Mr Colston's monument, in All-Saints church in Bristol; and from an account sent by the Rev. Mr Tucker.

[A] Was the eldest son of William Colston, Esq;] Who was a very eminent Spanish Merchant, as is said above. He was usually stiled Deputy Colston, because generally deputed by the corporation of the city to officiate for the Mayor elect, when he went to London to take the oaths; which the Mayors of Bristol always did before the new charter granted to that city by Queen Anne. This circumstance is a strong proof, both of his station in life, and of his character for integrity and virtue. Sarah, his wife, was a Counsellor's daughter (1). Their son, Mr Edward Colston, erected a monument to their memory, in the church of All-Saints in Bristol; the inscription on which is as follows: 'To the dear memory of his father William Colston, Esq; and of his mother Sarah Colston, interred near this place in the sepulchre of his ancestors; as also their four sons, William, Thomas, Robert, and William, and their two daughters, Martha and Martha, who were all natives and inhabitants of this city. William his father died 21st Nov. 1681, aged 73 years; and Sarah his mother the 23. Dec. 1701. aged 93 years.

Edward Colston, their eldest son, born likewise in this city, but an inhabitant of London, had dedicated this monument.'

[B] Two of whom were inhumanly murdered by assassins.] There is a tradition, that when Mr Colston and his two brothers were in Spain, in their disputes with the Papists it was often objected to them, 'That Reformed religion, produced no examples of great and charitable benefactions; to which they were wont to reply, That if it pleased God to bring them safe home, they would wipe off that aspersion. Upon which, two of them were poisoned, to prevent their return: but their elder brother, Mr Edward Colston, escaped. Such is the tradition, but it is more certain, that one or both of them, were assassinated by banditti's or bravoos; very common in Spain and Portugal.

[C] He acquired very great riches.] The visible means whereby he acquired his riches, were as follow: 1. Being the eldest son, he received a handsome fortune from his parents. 2. Surviving all, if not most of, his brothers and sisters, he received theirs likewise; and the brothers had made very great additions to theirs by trade. 3. The Colston family had at that time the two most valuable branches of trade, in that part of the kingdom, almost entirely to themselves, viz. the fruit, and the oil, trade; Mr Colston having two ships always employed in that business: and oil was much more in use formerly than at present. Mr Colston not only supplied all, but purchased it abroad at a very great advantage, by advancing money to those necessitous people, the Spaniards and Portuguese, before their vintage, and being allowed a discount. 4. He never insured a ship, saving that expence, and yet he never lost one (2).

[D] In the year 1691, he built upon his own ground, at his own charge, St Michael's-hill alms house in Bristol.] The front and two sides are faced with freestone. It contains a chapel neatly adorned; twenty-four apartments; and other conveniences, for twelve men and twelve women. The elder brother receives six shillings; and each of the others three shillings, weekly; besides an allowance for coal, &c. To a Clergyman is paid the sum of ten pounds yearly. He is to read the Common-Prayer, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, twice every day, except when prayers are read in St Michael's church; at which every member of this alms-house is to attend. The endowment, or estate given for this charity, arises chiefly from fee-farm rents, and amounts yearly to two hundred and eighty-two pounds, three shillings, and four pence. The over-plus of this estate is paid towards the maintenance of the six Sailors in the merchants alms-house in King-street. The charge of building and finishing this house amounted to about two thousand five hundred pounds.

hundred boys [F]. He also gave six pounds per Ann. to the Minister of All Saints in Bristol, for reading prayers every Monday and Tuesday morning throughout the year; and one pound a year to the Clerk and Sexton. Likewise, six pounds yearly for ever, for a monthly sermon and prayers to the prisoners in Newgate there: and twenty pounds to be paid yearly for ever to the Clergy beneficed in that city, for preaching fourteen sermons in the time of Lent [G]. Besides many occasional charities, and benefactions, to several Churches and Charity-Schools, in the same city of Bristol [H].—Moreover, he built an Alms-house for six poor people at Shene in Surrey. He gave six thousand pounds, for the augmentation of sixty small livings [I]. To St Bartholomew's Hospital London, he gave two thousand pounds; wherewith was purchased an estate of one hundred pounds a year, which is settled on that Hospital: and he left to the same, by Will, five hundred pounds more. To Christ's Hospital, at several times, he gave a thousand pounds; and bequeathed thereto the like sum afterwards. As also to St Thomas's Hospital, and to Bethlem, five hundred pounds a piece. To the Work-house without Bishopsgate, two hundred pounds. To the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, three hundred pounds. He left, moreover, very handsome legacies to Mortlake in Surrey, where he died [K]. And gave the sum of one hundred pounds per Ann. to be continued for twelve years after his death, and to be distributed by the direction of his Executors; either to place out every year ten boys apprentices, or to be given towards the setting up ten young tradesmen, to each ten pounds: in the whole twelve hundred pounds. He gave likewise to eighteen Charity-Schools in several parts of England, and to be continued to them for twelve years after his decease, to each school yearly five pounds; or in all, each year, ninety pounds [L]. Finally, he gave towards building a church at Manchester in Lancashire, twenty pounds: and towards the building of a church at Tiverton in Devonshire, fifty pounds. Besides these known and publick benefactions, he gave away every year large sums in private charities, which was his practice for the course of many years: and there is reason to believe, that these were not much short of his publick charities (b). His usual method was, never to give any thing to common beggars; but he always

[F] In—1708, he settled his great benefactions, of the hospital in St Augustine's Back, in the city aforesaid, &c.] For the maintenance, cloathing, and education of these boys, and for placing them apprentices, he gave an estate, mostly arising by fee-farm rents, to the yearly value of thirteen hundred and eighteen pounds, fifteen shillings, and six-pence farthing. And the charge of first fitting up the hospital, and making it convenient for the purpose, amounted to about eleven thousand pounds. Out of that estate is to be paid yearly, ten pounds to a clergyman of the Church of England, for explaining and instructing the children in the Church Catechism: and in case the estate given for this charity, be not sufficient to answer the charges upon it, the executors are impowered to supply any deficiencies which have been, and to prevent them for the future.

[G] And twenty pounds to be paid yearly for ever to the Clergy beneficed in that city, for preaching fourteen sermons in the time of Lent.] The subjects on which he himself appointed they should be preached, are these: The Lent-fast; against Atheism and Infidelity; the Catholick Church; the Excellence of the Church of England; the Powers of the Church; Baptism; Confirmation; Confession and Absolution; the Errors of the Church of Rome; Enthufiasm or Superstition; Restitution; Frequenting the Divine Service; Frequent Communion; the Passion of our Blessed Saviour.

[H] Besides many occasional charities and benefactions to several churches and charity-schools in Bristol.] Particularly—to the cathedral, towards beautifying the choir, the marble about the communion-table, and organ, &c. at several times, two hundred and sixty pounds.—Towards rebuilding the Tower, and the repair and beautifying the chancel of All-Saints church, at three several times, two hundred and fifty pounds.—Towards the building of a new isle in Clifton-church, near Bristol, fifty pounds.—Towards the building of a gallery, and erecting an organ in St James's church, fifty pounds.—Towards an organ to be erected in St Mary Redcliff, a hundred pounds.—Towards the repair of St Michael's church, fifty pounds.—Towards the repair of St Stephen's church fifty pounds.—Towards the altar piece, cieling, and portal, in the Temple-church, one hundred and sixty pounds.—Towards the repair of St Thomas's church, fifty pounds.—For an altar piece, in the church of St Werburgh, one hundred and sixty pounds. In 1702, he gave to the Mint work-house, for employing the poor, two hundred pounds. And for placing out poor

boys and girls apprentices, two hundred pounds more. He gave yearly sixty pounds, to the charity-schools in the parishes of St Philip and St Jacob, St Thomas and Redcliff, St James's and to several erected in other places. And left by will, to the charity-schools erected in the parishes of St Philip and Jacob, ten pounds; of St Thomas and Redcliff, ten pounds; of St Augustine and St Michael, ten pounds; of St James, ten pounds. And to each of these ten pounds yearly, to be continued for twelve years after his death. All this in Bristol.

[I] He gave six thousand pounds, for the augmentation of sixty small livings.] This gift at first was four thousand pounds, to which he afterwards added the other two thousand pounds. No more than a hundred pounds was to be given to one living. The distribution was to be after this manner: any living that was intitled to Queen Anne's bounty might have this too, on condition, that every parish, which did receive this, should be obliged to raise one hundred pounds, to be added to the hundred pounds allowed by Mr Colston. Many livings have had the grant of this bounty from Mr Colston (3).

[K] He left moreover very handsome legacies to Mortlake in Surrey, where he died.] He bequeathed for the education and cloathing of twelve boys and twelve girls, in that place; to be continued for twelve years after his death, yearly forty-five pounds; amounting in the whole to five hundred and forty pounds. Moreover, he gave eighty-five pounds (as many as he was years old) to be distributed to eighty-five poor men and women there, to each twenty shillings, at the time of his decease.

[L] He gave likewise to eighteen charity-schools in several parts of England, and to be continued to them for twelve years after his decease, to each school yearly, five pounds, &c.] Those eighteen charity-schools were:—In Berkshire; at Longcotton, in the parish of Shrevenham: at Shrevenham: at Farrington: and at Stanford.—In Devonshire; at Plymouth: and at Barnstable.—In Dorsetshire; to one at Dorchester set up by Madam Strangeways.—In Hamshire; to one at Alton.—In Kent, at Stroud near Rochester: and at Chislehurst near Bromley.—In Middlesex; at Highgate: and at Brentford.—In Northamptonshire; to one at Kettering.—In Oxfordshire; to one at Bradwell, if the inhabitants thereof can maintain twenty-five boys.—In Somersethire; at Chewstokey: at From: at Farmborough.—In Wiltshire; to one at Box near Bath (4).

ordered, that poor house-keepers, sick, and decayed persons, should be sought out as the fittest objects for his charity. In building his hospitals and alms-houses, he showed, that his judgment could not be imposed upon by the workmen, as to the goodness of the materials, or the value of their work. For, as he understood those things very well, he drove what they would call a hard bargain; and paid all the workmen, himself, if present, or else ordered them to be paid, every Saturday night. If they worked longer than their customary hours, he paid them proportionably; if otherwise, he deducted; but never allowed any thing for drink. It is observable, that all the Colston-family were animated with a spirit of charity and piety. Several of Mr Edward Colston's publick benefactions were designed, and some actually begun, by his brothers; which he afterwards confirmed and enlarged (c). Some years before his decease he retired from business, and came and lived at London, and at Mortlake where he had a country-seat. At this last place he died October 11, 1721, aged eighty-four years, eleven months, and nine days: and was buried the 29th of the same month, in the church of All Saints in Bristol, where there is a monument erected to his memory [M]. His charity was his most shining virtue [N], as is abundantly manifest from those many instances of it mentioned above. As for the rest of his character; he was a constant communicant with the Church of England, a most zealous advocate for her doctrines, worship, and discipline, in opposition to Popery as well as Fanaticism, and a most lively and exemplary son of it (d). He was, likewise, a person of great temperance, meekness, evenness of temper, patience, and mortification. He always looked cheerful and pleasant, scarce ever in the least discomposed: and was naturally of a very peaceable and quiet disposition. He was remarkably circumspect in all his actions; always observed the same regularity in keeping his accounts, as when he began the world, and was a very good master of book-keeping (e). His strength continued vigorous, his understanding clear, his apprehension quick, and his judgment sound, long beyond the age of man, even to reach almost to the end of his eighty-fifth year, without decay in his understanding, without labour or sorrow (f).

[M] Where there is a monument erected to his memory.] The inscription thereon, contains an enumeration of his publick charities, already mentioned in this article. Then on the pedestal, or base, is added as follows:

'Edward, the son of William Colston, Esq; and Sarah his wife, was born in this city Nov. 2, 1636, died at Mortlake in Surrey Octob. 11, 1721, and lies buried near this monument.'

[N] His charity was his most shining virtue.] And so extensive was it, that, as Dr Harcourt observes (g), 'To do justice to his character, would oblige one to enumerate almost every kind of charity, whereby we can promote the glory of God, or relieve the necessities of our fellow-creatures. Scarcely any sort of temporal calamity escaped his charitable assistance; nor is there scarcely one spiritual want, towards the removing of which he did not piously and freely afford his contribution. In short, the charities which have taken either their foundation or improvement from his open hand, are so numerous, that the variety will appear so great as to surprize; and the immensity of the sums expended in them will be judged extremely large, when it shall be considered, that they are the charity of one private person. From his bountiful benefactions, the ignorance of the young, the miseries of the infirm, and the helpless necessities of the old, are removed, eased, and relieved.' C

COMBER, or CUMBER (THOMAS) a considerable Divine in the XVIIth Century [A], was born in Westram in Kent, in the year 1645 (a), being the son of James Cumber of that parish. He was educated in grammar learning in his native place, by Thomas Walter, and William Holland Vicars of Westram. At fourteen years of age, on the 18th of April 1659, he was admitted into Sidney-Suffex-College in Cambridge, under the tuition of Edmund Matthews, B. D. The 16th of January 1662-3, he was elected Scholar of that house; and the next day had his grace in college for the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b): which he accordingly took and completed in the university (c). On the 26th of May 1666, he had likewise his grace for the degree of Master of Arts (d). It moreover appears, that he was created Doctor in Divinity between the years 1676 and 1679; but as his name doth not occur in any of our university-registers, it is therefore probable, that he had that degree conferred upon him at Lambeth. On the 5th of July 1677, he was collated by Archbishop Sterne to the Prebend of Holme in the cathedral church of York (e); which he quitted, the 19th of July 1681, for the Prebend of Fenton in the same church (f). The 19th of January 1683-4, he was also collated to the Præcentorship (g). Upon the deprivation of Dr Dennis Granville, he was nominated April 23, 1691, to succeed him in the Deanery of Durham; whereupon he resigned his Præcentorship of York (h). He was Chaplain to Anne Princess of Denmark, and to King William and Queen Mary. He died November 25, 1699, in the fifty-fifth year

[A] A considerable Divine in the XVIIth century.] His surname, as printed in his works, is Comber; but it is written Cumber, in the admission-book of Sidney-college. He must not be confounded with another Dr Thomas Comber, who lived in the same century, and was of Trinity-college in Cambridge. This last was born in Suffex, Jan. 1, 1575; admitted Scholar of Trinity-college, May 11, 1593; Fellow of the same, October 2, 1597; Junior Dean, Octob. 2, 1608; Preacher, Octob. 16, 1609; Greek Examiner, Octob. 2, 1611; Chief Reader, Octob. 2, 1612; Senior

Dean, Octob. 2, 1618, 1619, and 1625; Senior Treasurer, Dec. 13, 1620, and Dec. 20, 1621; appointed Dean of Carlisle, Aug. 28, 1630; and sworn in Master of Trinity-college, Octob. 12, 1631 (1). He writ 'An Historical Vindication of the Divine Rights of Tithes, &c.' against Mr Selden's History of Tithes, 4to. In 1642, he was imprisoned, plundered, and deprived of all his preferments. He died Feb. 28, 1653, at Cambridge, and was buried March 3, in St Botolph's church in that town (2).

of his age (i); and was buried at Stonegrave in Yorkshire, of which it seems he was Rector. There is a tombstone on his grave, with an inscription [B]. He was author of several works, chiefly on the Common-Prayer; in which he shows great piety, and very extensive learning: being well read in sacred and profane authors, both antient and modern. [C] With the occasional Prayers and Thanksgiving.] Printed in two volumes 8vo. 1679. His general method in this work, is, to give, first, an analysis of each part; secondly, an explanation of it: thirdly, a paraphrase; and, lastly, a meditation upon it.

[D] A Companion to the Altar, &c.] It is dedicated by the author to his patron Richard Archbishop of York. — To whom, as he observes, he was obliged to make this tender by his condition and his duty, by gratitude and affection; — having first received the Holy Order of Priesthood, and the power of dispensing the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper from his Grace's hands. — He observes, in the same place, that 'There is nothing more useful to the friends of this Church, nor more convincing to the dissenters from it, than to present her pure and primitive order of worship in it's natural and lovely splendor.' — The Imprimatur bears date January 21, 1673-4. It was so well received, that a fourth edition came out in 1685, within the space of eleven years. The whole is divided into four parts, containing learned observations, and then paraphrases, and meditations upon each branch of the Communion-Office.

[E] A Discourse upon the Offices of Baptism, Catechism, and Confirmation.] The author dedicates it to Dr Tillotson, then Dean of Canterbury: and says, 'it will contribute to the reputation of these tracts, to be ushered in with so worthy a name, and add to their author's character, to be reckoned among the number of your friends.'

[F] A Discourse on the occasional Offices, &c.] First printed in 1676, 8vo. These four last pieces, were re-printed together in one volume, fol. 1701, divided into four parts. They are dedicated to King William.

[G] Short Discourses upon the whole Common-

Prayer, &c.] He tells us in his Dedication, that the importunity of his friends had engaged him to write these shorter Discourses, for the use of those who wanted time to consider the larger work, i. e. his Companion to the Temple and Altar. As for the method and design of it, First, the Original and Antiquity of every part of Common-Prayer is therein declared. Secondly, the method of each several piece is cleared. Thirdly, the sense of all is opened by divers plain and natural observations on the matter of these offices, to help all to perform them with a devotion suitable to their great worth. And it is designed, 1. To instruct those who did not understand, or rather not observe, these excellencies to be in the Common-Prayer. 2. To furnish the devout sons of the Church with profitable meditations, to enlarge upon in their minds in the use of these prayers, and to put them into a right frame for saying them affectionately, and with a holy importunity. 3. It is designed to convince the mistaken Dissenters if they will hear reason; if not, to discover to others the injustice and malice of their clamours against it (4).

[H] Roman forgeries in the Councils, &c.] In the introduction he observes, that in the allowed Romish editions of the Councils (those of Binius, Colon. 1618, and of Labbé and Cossart, Paris, 1671) 'there is such adding and expunging, such altering and disguising things in the body of the Councils, and such excusing, falsifying, and shuffling in the notes, that a judicious reader will soon perceive, those venerable records truly set down and explained, do not favour them. But these corruptions are carried on with such confidence and cunning, that an unexperienced and unwary student, may be imposed on by this specious shew of venerable antiquity: for their sakes therefore he thought it necessary to take a short view of that fraud and policy which is so commonly made use of in those editions of the Councils which pass through the Roman mint.' — Then he says he hopes 'this undertaking will be many ways useful: First, It will tend to the ease of those who intend to read over the tomes of the Councils, or the Annals of Baronius, and save them much time and pains by presenting the principal errors of those great volumes at one view, which they would spend a long time in searching after, if they were to gather them up as they lie dispersed. Secondly, It may be very useful to those who desire to be rightly informed in the controversies between us and the Roman Church, because it will give them a clear prospect of what Councils and other antiquities are authentick, and may be allowed for evidence in this dispute; wherein our adversaries have so little regard to their own honour, that generally one half of their evidence is such as they have either forged or corrupted. Thirdly, It will be necessary (by way of antidote) to prepare those, who by reading books so full of infection, may by these plausible falsifications be

COMPTON (WILLIAM) ancestor of the present noble Earls of Northampton and Wilmington, was the son of Edmund de Compton [A], and born in the year 1481 (a). The first foundation of his succeeding honours and riches, was, his being made, in the eleventh year of his age (b), one of the Pages to Henry Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Henry VIII: who, as soon as he came to the Crown, made him Groom of his Bed-chamber (c); and, before the expiration of that year, chief Gentleman of his Bed-chamber (d). He grew so much in favour with that King, that he was appointed by him, in the second year of his reign 1510, Groom of the Stole (e); and, soon after, Constable of Sudley-castle in Gloucestershire (f); as he was also of Gloucester-castle, in 1511 (g). In consideration of his good and faithful services, he obtained, in 1512, November the 7th, a special grant, to himself and his heirs, of an honourable augmentation to his Arms (h), out of the King's own royal ensigns and devices [B]: and, on the 4th of February next ensuing, the King conferred on him the office of Usher of the Black Rod, with an allowance of twelve pence a day for that service (i). He had likewise, the same year, by his Majesty's favour, a large grant, to himself and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten (k), of several Lands and Manors [C]. In 1513, being a Knight, he had a commission, to retain men in any of those Lordships belonging to the Monasteries whereof he was then Steward, for the service of the King in his wars (l): and, in the expedition to Terouenne and Tournay the same year, led the rere-guard of the King's army (m). Shortly after, he was made one of the Knights for the King's body (n); as also Chancellor of Ireland, with liberty to execute that office by a sufficient Deputy (o). But he did not hold it long; for, two years after, namely, in 1515, it was given to the Archbishop of Dublin (p). In 1514, and 1517, he had a grant to himself and his wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies lawfully begotten (q), of several manors and estates [D]. The same year, namely, 1517, he was appointed Constable of Hanley-castle in Worcestershire (r): And in 1518, was ordered to provide fifty archers for the King's service in his wars (s). In 1519, he obtained licence to make a park at his manor of Compton Vineyats, or Vineyard, in Warwickshire; and, for an addition to the same, to inclose two thousand acres more, thereto adjoining (t). Upon the attainder of Edward Stafford Duke of Buckingham, in 1521, he obtained a grant of the manor, castle, and park of Maxstoke in Warwickshire, as also of the manors of Scotton and Brereton in Yorkshire, in reversion, after the death, or surrender, of Simon Coniers (u). In 1523, he was employed with the Earl

[A] Was the son of Edmund de Compton.] This noble family derive their descent from Turbill the son of Alwin; who, in the time of Edward the Confessor, resided at Warwick, of which county he was Earl. At the time of the Norman conquest, not joining with Harold, he continued in the possession of his own lands, among which was the Lordship of Compton, and forty seven manors in divers counties. By Leverunia his second wife he had Osbert, who wrote himself of Compton, and was ancestor of the present noble family. His second son was Philip; to whom succeeded his son and heir Thomas, that lived in the reign of Henry the third; and whose eldest son was Philip; father of Robert de Compton, who was knighted before the 31st of Edward the second; and was succeeded by Robert, father of Thomas de Compton. He was one of the Coroners for Warwickshire, in the 23d of Edward the third, an office of great account in those days. It was enjoyed after him by his son and heir Edmund, who died in the reign of Henry IV. He had issue six sons, whereof William the eldest, dying about the year 1431, left issue Robert his son and heir, who died in 1480. His son, and successor was Edmund, who dying in 1492, left issue by Joan his wife, daughter and heir of Walter Aylworth, Esq; William, who is the subject of this article (1).

And for the crest, 'a demi-dragon crazed, gules, within a coronet of gold, upon a tose argent and vert: as by a special instrument under the King's own sign manual, bearing date Novem. 7, 1512, appeareth (2).

the names. The manor of Wyke in Middlesex, formerly belonging to George Duke of Clarence: Lovel's Inn in Pater-Noster Row, London; with divers tenements pertaining therto: The manor of Aldwike, or Holand's, with Baro-Shanke wood, in Northamptonshire; twenty four acres of meadow in Brantfy; twenty four in Swillingholm; all in Aldwinckle, (or Aldwike) in the same county: also the manor of Deyncourt in Buckinghamshire, part of the possessions of Francis Lord Lovel; with the manors of Rocholds, Cobham, and Rishams, part of the lands of Sir Richard Charlton, Knt (3).

[D] In 1514, and 1517, he had a grant—of several manors and estates.] Namely, in 1514, the manors of Elcombe, and Ufscote, in Wiltshire; and the manor of Pole-place in Berkshire, part of the possessions of Francis Viscount Lovel. In 1517, the manors of Salthrope, Chilton, and Blagrave, in Wiltshire: two hundred acres of pasture, called Blagrove, with their appurtenances in Blagrove and Wroughton, in the same county. Likewise the manor of Wythynden, or Myhunden in the parishes of Wroughton, and Lidiard-Tregoze, in the same county; the manor of Elcomb, with the park; the manors of Watlescote, and Westcote; one hundred acres of land, and sixty acres of pasture, in Wigleste, and Wroughton: The manor of Uffecote, two messuages, a thousand acres of land, a thousand acres of pasture, three hundred acres of meadow, and three hundred acres of wood in Broad-Hinton, all in the same county. And eight pounds yearly rent issuing out of the manor of Denford, in Berkshire, late Francis Viscount Lovel's attained (4).

Earl of Surrey, and the Marquis of Dorset, &c. to make incursions into Scotland. This ungrateful office was put upon him by the contrivance of Cardinal Wolsey; who observing how much Sir William was in the King's favour, and fearing he should diminish his authority, procured him to be thus sent into the wars against the Scots. For, Sir William could not bear the Cardinal's presumption, in taking so much upon him to the derogation of the King's prerogative; therefore the Cardinal thought, in his absence, to have work'd him out of favour. But he could not, for the King recalled him soon after to Court (w): and, in 1525, constituted him Keeper of his money and jewels (x), which is the same we now call the Privy Purse (y). Sir William built a very noble house at his manor of Compton [E]: and, in the chapel, erected a beautiful window towards the east; in the painted glass of which, most curiously done, was represented the passion of Jesus Christ. And in the lower part, Sir William himself and his Lady, kneeling, in their furcoats of Arms (z). He died of the sweating sickness, in the year 1528, May 31, aged forty-seven (a); being at that time of the Privy-Chamber to the King, who was then also in great danger (b). His body was buried at Compton; as he had desired in his Will, bearing date March 8, 1522; in which he also desired, that his Lady should be interred in the same place: and, that a tomb of alabaster should be made, by the direction of his Executors, for his father, and set over his grave, with his Arms cut thereon. Likewise, that his mother's body should be taken up from the place where she lay buried, and deposited by his father. Moreover, he appointed that his Executors should found in his name two chantries at Compton; and that every Priest therein should have a yearly salary of ten marks (c) [F]. He married Werburge, daughter and heir of Sir John Brereton, Knt, and widow of Sir Francis Cheney, Knt. by whom he had issue

PETER; who being under age at the time of his father's decease, was put under the Wardship of Cardinal Wolsey (d). He married Anne daughter of George Earl of Shrewsbury; but dying before he came of age, on the 30th of January 1543, he left only one son, forty-nine weeks and five days old (e); named

HENRY, who was knighted February 10, 1566, by the Earl of Leicester; and, on the 8th of May 1572, summoned by writ to the House of Lords, by the title of Baron Compton of Compton. In 1586, he was one of the Peers for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots (f). He is supposed to have died in the year 1589 (g). By his first Lady, Frances daughter to Francis Hastings Earl of Huntingdon, he had, among other children [G]

WILLIAM, his eldest son and heir, who was summoned to Parliament in the thirty-fifth of Queen Elizabeth, and was one of the Privy-Council to that Queen. On the 5th of January 1604, he was made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Charles Duke of York, afterwards King by the title of Charles I (h); and was constituted, some years after, President of the Council for the Marches of Wales (i), and Lord-Lieutenant of the counties of Worcester, Hereford, Salop, and Warwick (k). On the 2d of August 1618, he was advanced to the title of Earl of Northampton (l); and on the 21st of April 1629, installed a Knight of the Garter. He died June 24, 1630: leaving issue, by Elizabeth his Lady, sole daughter and heir of Sir John Spencer Alderman of London, Spencer, of whom we shall speak in the next article.

[E] Sir William built a very noble house at his manor of Compton. The greatest part of the brick used in the building of it, was brought from Fulbrook in the same county (of Warwick) where there stood a ruinous castle, of which the King had granted him the custody. This castle he pulled down, making use of the materials for that building (5).

[F] And that every priest therein should have a yearly salary of ten marks. For the proving of this Will, Cardinal Wolsey (who, under the colour of his Legantine authority, had wrested the probate of wills from the Prerogative court of Canterbury,) exacted no less than a thousand marks; as was publicly declared by Sir Henry Guilford, one of the executors. And this extortion was the cause of making the statute 21 Hen. VIII. ch. v. wherein the fees to be taken for the Probate of testaments, were settled and limited (6).

[G] Among other children. His children by the Lady Frances Hastings besides William here mentioned, were, Margaret, married to Henry Lord Mordaunt; and Thomas, who on the 4th of March, 1606-7, was knighted; he married Mary, daughter of Anthony Beaumont, second son of William Beaumont of Cole-Overton in Leicestershire; which Mary was by King James I. created Countess of Buckingham, July 1, 1618, being the mother of George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, the great favourite of King James, and King Charles I. — The second wife of Henry Lord Compton, was Anne daughter of Sir John Spencer of Alchorpe in Northamptonshire, Knt. by whom he had, Sir Henry Compton of Bramble-Teigh in Suffex Knight of the Bath; Cecily; Mary; and Margaret (7).

COMPTON (SPENCER) only son of the former [A], and second Earl of Northampton, deserves to be particularly remembered. He was made Knight of the Bath, on the 3d of November 1616, at the time when Charles Duke of York (afterwards King Charles I.) was created Prince of Wales; with whom he became a great favourite. In 1622, he accompanied him into Spain, waiting on him in quality of Master of his Robes and Wardrobe, and had the honour to deliver all his presents, amounting, as was computed, to sixty-four thousand pounds. At the Coronation of that Prince, he attended dale in Scotland; and Anne to Ulick Bourk, Lord Dunkellin, son and heir to Richard Earl of Clanrickard in Ireland, and Earl of St Albans in England (1).

as Master of the Robes; and, in 1639, waited on his Majesty in his expedition against the Scots. He was likewise among those Noblemen, who, on the 4th of May 1641, took the Protestation to defend the true Protestant Religion expressed in the doctrine of the Church of England, and his Majesty's Royal person, honour, and estate; as also the power and privilege of Parliaments, and the lawful rights and liberties of the subject (a). In 1642, he waited upon his Majesty at York; and was one of the Lords who subscribed, the 15th of June the same year, a Declaration at that place, wherein they professed before God, and testified to all the world, that they were fully persuaded, that his Majesty had no intention to make war upon his Parliament: but that all his endeavours tended to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant Religion; the just privileges of Parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the law, peace, and prosperity of the kingdom (b). Having, after that, often endeavoured to compose the unhappy jealousies in the nation; but finding his endeavours ineffectual, and that the Parliament were raising forces to distress such as came not into it's measures, he thought it more for his Majesty's service to retire to his native country: where he soon got together such a number of Gentlemen and Soldiers, as awed the country into the King's allegiance, drove the Lord Brook out of Warwickshire, who endeavoured to secure that county for the Parliament; and in twelve skirmishes put a great stop to the Earl of Essex's rendezvous at Northampton (c). After King Charles I. had set up his standard at Nottingham, he raised, one of the first, at his own charge, a troop of horse, and a regiment of foot (d): and, at the battle between Keinton and Edge-hill, brought two thousand of the best disciplined men in the whole army. When that battle (which happened on the 23d of October 1642) was over, the King's army having taken Banbury, a garrison was placed therein under the command of the Earl of Northampton (e): who, by his vigilance and conduct, performed many successful services, and was the life of his Majesty's cause in those parts. He secured most of the arms, ammunition, and garrisons in Warwickshire, Staffordshire, and Northamptonshire; and settling an Association, made the country from garrison to garrison one line of communication (f). Afterwards, with a strong party of horse, and dragoons, from his garrison at Banbury, he relieved the town of Stafford, that was besieged by Sir John Gell; and putting himself into that town, beat up a quarter of the enemies, in which he took and killed above an hundred of their horse. But Sir John Gell having joined Sir William Brereton, and they being near three thousand foot and horse, with a good train of artillery, moved back towards Stafford, imagining the Earl of Northampton would meet them without the walls. And it happened according to their expectation: for, on Sunday the 19th of March 1642-3, as soon as he heard they were advancing towards the town, he marched out with his party, consisting in all of near one thousand horse, dragoons, and foot, to encounter them. He found the enemy in very good order, expecting him, on a plain called Cranock-green, Salt-heath, or Hopton-heath (g), about two or three miles from Stafford. Though their number was more than double that of his Lordship's [B], yet the Heath seeming very fair, the breadth of it being more than musquet-shot from the enclosure on each side, and the number of his horse at least equal to theirs, he resolved to charge them: and accordingly did, with so good success, that he totally routed one part of their horse. Rallying again his men, he charged the other part of their horse, which stood more in shelter of their foot, and so totally dispersed them, that the enemy had scarce a horse left upon the field. He took likewise from them eight pieces of cannon [C]. In this second charge, his Lordship being engaged in the execution, very near, or among, their foot, had his horse killed under him [D]: so that his own body of horse, pursuing the chase with too much fury, he was left encompassed by the enemy. After he was on his feet, he killed with his own hand the Colonel of foot, who first came near him; And, after his head-piece was struck off with the but-end of a musquet, they offered him quarter; which he refused, answering, 'That he scorned to

(*) Memorable

[B] Though their number was more than double that of his Lordship's. We are assured, that the number of their men, was 'near three thousand foot and horse, with a good train of artillery (2).' Some of the Parliament-Historians (3) affirm indeed, that Sir John Gell's army consisted but of about fifteen hundred, horse and foot; and the Earl's of about twelve hundred: tho' they mention afterwards the coming of Sir William Brereton to Gell's assistance, before the fight was ended. But they do not express the number of the forces he brought; in which point, their silence seems to be culpable, as being designed to mislead the reader. Such instances are very frequent in Vicers's Chronicle; which indeed is only a heap of falsehood and misrepresentations, as well as of most shocking hypocrisy, and canting nonsense. Honest Mr Whitelock tells us plainly, and without disguise (4), that Sir John Gell and Sir William Brereton came with three thousand horse and foot.

[C] And so totally dispersed them, that the enemy had scarce a horse left upon the field, &c. This is the Lord Clarendon's account. And Dr Ryves more particularly informs us (*) that in this fight above three hundred of Occurrences in 1642, at the end of Mercurius Rustic, edit. 1646, 8vo.

the rebels were taken and killed; at the least, two hundred more wounded; above three hundred of their horse taken, with four pieces of cannon, and a case of Drakes. And on the King's side, some few slain. On the other hand Vicers affirms (5), that the Parliament-forces repulsed the Earl's horse, — and at least an hundred and forty Cavaliers were slain with him; with the loss of eight or ten only of the Parliamentarians. And 'by the timely coming in of Sir William Brereton, before the fight was ended, Sir John Gell obtained a glorious victory, and drove his enemies quite out of the field.' Such are the frequent contradictions between Historians of different parties. But, on which side the victory inclined, we may judge by the consequence. And that it was in the King, is evident by the Earl of Northampton's forces recovering Lichfield soon after; which the others would never have permitted them to do, had they been victorious.

'take quarter from such base rogues and rebels, as they were.' Upon which, he was slain by a blow with a halbert on the hinder part of his head, receiving, at the same time, another deep wound in his face (b). He was then in the forty-second year of his age (i). The enemy refused to deliver the body to the young Earl of Northampton, and would not even permit his Surgeons to come and embalm it, unless he would deliver, in exchange for it, all the ammunition, prisoners, and cannon he had taken in the late battle (k). However, it was delivered up at last, and buried in All-hallows Church in Derby, in the same vault with his relation the old Countess of Shrewsbury (l). As to this noble Lord's character; we are informed, that he was a person of great courage, honour, and fidelity, and not well known 'till his evening; having, in the ease, plenty, and luxury, antecedent to our unhappy dissensions, indulged himself in that licence which was then thought necessary to great fortunes. But, from the beginning of the civil wars, as if he had been awakened out of a lethargy, he never proceeded with a lukewarm temper. From the time he submitted himself to the profession of a soldier, no man was more punctual upon command, no man more active and vigilant in duty. All distresses he bore like a common man, and all wants and hardships, as if he had never known plenty or ease; most prodigal of his person to danger; and would often say, That if he out-lived these wars, he was certain never to have so noble a death (m). His Lordship married Mary daughter of Sir Francis Beaumont, Knt. by whom he had two daughters, and six sons. The daughters were, Anne married to Sir Hugh Cholmondely of Whitby in Yorkshire, Bart. and Penelope to Sir John Nicholas, Knight of the Bath, eldest son of Sir Edward Nicholas, one of the Secretaries of State to King Charles I, and King Charles II (n). Of the sons, who were all highly esteemed for their eminent abilities, and all inherited their father's courage, loyalty, and virtue; five of them received the honour of Knighthood, namely, James the eldest son and heir; Sir Charles; Sir William [E]; Sir Spencer; and Sir Francis: and Henry, the sixth, and youngest, late Bishop of London, was no less conspicuous. At the battle of Hopton-heath, the three eldest, who were officers under their father, charged that day in the field, when Sir James, the eldest, received a shot in one of his legs (o). At the battle of Edge-hill he was absent; but Sir Charles, and Sir William, tho' neither of them was twenty, charged in the troop with their father; and Sir Spencer, though not able to grasp a pistol, yet in indignation cried, That he was not exposed to the same hazard as his brothers (p).

[E] Sir William.] This brave gentleman had the command of a regiment, wherewith he performed considerable service at the taking of Banbury, leading his men on to three attacks, and had two horses shot under him. Upon the surrender of the town and castle, he was made Lieutenant-Governor under his father; and on the 19th of July, 1644, when the Parliament's forces came before the town he returned answer to their summons; 'That he kept the castle for his Majesty, and as long as one man was left alive in it, 'willed them not to expect to have it delivered:' also on the 16th of September, they sending him another summons, he made answer, 'That he had formerly answered them, and wondered they should send again.' He was so vigilant in his station, that he countermined the enemy eleven times, and during the siege, which held thirteen weeks never went into bed, but by his example so animated the garrison, that tho' they had but two horses left uneaten, they would never suffer a summons to be sent to them, after the answer beforementioned was delivered. At length, his brother the Earl of Northampton raised the siege on the 26th of October, the very day of the month, on which both town and castle had been surrendered to the King two years before. Sir William continued Governor of Banbury, and performed many signal services for the King, 'till his Majesty left Oxford, and the whole kingdom was submitting to the Parliament: and then on the 8th of May, 1646, surrendered upon honourable terms. In 1648, he was Major-General of the King's forces at Colchester, where he was so much taken notice of for his admirable behaviour, that Oliver Cromwell called him the sober young man, and the godly Cavalier. At the Restoration of King Charles II. he was made one of the Privy-Council, and the master-General of the Ordnance; and died October 19, 1663, in the 39th year of his age, having married Elizabeth, widow of Lord Allington of Horthseath in Cambridge, with whom he lived twelve years, but left no issue (7). There is an epitaph erected to his memory in the church of Compton-Winyate, (8).

COMPTON (JAMES) the eldest of the six sons last mentioned, and third Earl of Northampton, taking arms with his father for King Charles I, was distinguished for his bravery and conduct, and performed many gallant acts in those times of confusion. He was at the battle of Edge-hill, the taking of Banbury, &c (a). and waiting upon the King at Oxford, had the degree of Doctor of Laws conferred on him by that university, November 1, 1642 (b). The 19th of March following, he was in the engagement at Hopton-heath, where receiving a shot in one of his legs, he was obliged to quit the field (c). However, he was in a short time so well recovered of that wound, that on the 8th of April 1643, he was with Prince Rupert at the taking of Lichfield, and the surrender of the Close there, the 21st of the same month. Also May 6, the same year, he routed a party of the enemies horse and foot (d) at Middleton-cheney in Northamptonshire, which thought themselves strong enough to attempt the taking of Banbury; and he defeated their horse, killed above two-hundred of their foot, and took as many more prisoners (e). He afterwards commanded the horse at the first battle of Newbury, September 20, 1643, and charged and put to flight the enemy's horse under Sir William Waller. On the 29th of June 1644, he was one of the Commanders at Cropredy-bridge fight, wherein Sir William Walter was routed again (f). Soon after he marched with the King into Cornwall; and at his return raised the siege of Banbury October 26, 1644, routing the Parliament forces, tho' their horse were much superior in number (g). Then joining the King, he relieved Donnington-castle; whereupon battle was offered to the enemy, who declined it, tho'

tho' they had just before obtained advantages in the second fight at Newbury, the Earl being absent in raising the siege of Banbury (b). On the 18th of March 1644-5, he and his three brothers, routed a great body of the Parliamentarians horse of Northampton near Althorp, killed about thirty, and hurt many more, taking twenty-six prisoners (i). But in April 1645, he was defeated by Lieutenant-General Cromwell near Oxford, and several of his men were taken prisoners (k). After which, finding that his Majesty was over-powered by the Parliament, he resolved to go beyond sea, and obtained a pass from the House of Commons for that purpose (l). But, however, he seems to have compounded for his estates, and to have staid in the kingdom (m). Afterwards, the powers in being growing jealous of him, he was imprisoned; but discharged again, the 2d of November 1659, upon security given to live peaceable (n). On the 29th of May 1660, at the Restoration of King Charles II, he led a troop of two hundred Gentlemen, clothed in grey and blue: and, in the reign of that King, was of the Privy-Council, Constable of the Tower of London, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Warwick, and city of Coventry, Recorder of the same, and also of the towns of Northampton and Tamworth. He died at his seat of Castle-Ashby in Northamptonshire, December 15, 1681, and was interred among his ancestors at Compton in the county of Warwick; which church being demolished in the civil wars, was rebuilt at his Lordship's sole expence, in 1665. He was married twice [A]. By his second Lady he had three sons, GEORGE, who succeeded him in his honours [B]; James, that died young; and Spencer, created January 11, 1727-8, Baron of Wilmington in Suffex, and May 12, 1730, Viscount Pevensey in the same county, and Earl of Wilmington (o).

[A] He was married twice.] His first Lady was, Isabella, one of the two daughters and coheirs to Richard Earl of Dorset; by whom he had issue two sons, William, and James, who both died in their childhood; and three daughters, Anne, and Isabella, which also died young, and Alethea married to Edward Hungerford, Esq; this first Lady died Octob. 14, 1661. His second Lady, was Mary, eldest daughter of Baptist Noel Viscount Camden, by whom he had three sons as mentioned above; and two daughters, Juliana who died young; and Mary married to Charles Sackville Earl of Dorset, mother of Lionel the present Duke of Dorset (1).

[B] GEORGE, who succeeded him in his honours.] His Lordship was of Christ-Church in Oxford, where he was created Master of Arts, February 18, 1681-2 (2). Tho' he was under age at the time of his father's death, he was notwithstanding, made Lord Lieutenant and Cusos Rotulorum of Warwickshire. On Queen Anne's accession, he was sworn of her Privy-Council;

and in 1712, appointed Constable of the Tower of London. His Lordship died April 15, 1727, and was buried at Compton with his ancestors. By his first Lady, Jane, youngest daughter of Sir Stephen Fox Knt. which he married in 1686 (3), he had issue four sons; JAMES, the present Earl of Northampton; George, Member in this Parliament for Northampton, and one of the Lords of the Treasury: Stephen, who died young; and Charles, who on the 10th of May 1727 was appointed Consul at Lisbon, and Consul-general in the dominions of Portugal. He had also by her six daughters; Elizabeth, Mary, Jane, Anne, Penelope, and Margaret; of whom the second was married in April, 1709, to William Gore of Tring in Hertfordshire, Esq; and the fourth, on the 16th of October, 1729, to Sir John Roushout of Northwick, in Worcesterhire, Bart. His second Lady, was Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Roushout of Northwick, Bart. relict of Sir George Thorold Bart. who in 1719, was Lord Mayor of London; but by her he had no issue (4).

COMPTON (HENRY) Bishop of London in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, and one of the most eminent Prelates that ever sat in that See, was the sixth [A] and youngest son of Spencer the second Earl of Northampton, mentioned in the foregoing article. He was born at Compton (a) in the year 1632 (b). His father being unhappily slain in 1642-3, when this his youngest son was but ten years old, he was thereby deprived of that paternal care which is so necessary in that tender age. However, (notwithstanding that misfortune) he received an education suitable to his quality. When he had gone through the Grammar-schools, he was entered a Nobleman of Queen's College in Oxford, in the year 1649, and having continued there till about 1652, went and lived with his mother at Gryndon in Northamptonshire. Afterwards he travelled beyond sea (c), where he remained a considerable time; and examined the civil and ecclesiastical politics abroad, but the more he observed them, the more he liked the English constitution: He saw their manners, and was too wise to imitate them. However, what he thought valuable amongst them he brought home, and in particular retained their languages perfectly (d) [B]. After the Restoration of King Charles II, he returned to England; and a regiment of horse being raised about that time for the King's guard, of which the command was given to Aubrey Earl of Oxford, Mr Compton accepted of a Cornet's commission therein, either by his own choice, or the persuasion of friends. But, soon after, discovering a greater inclination to his studies than to a military life, he quitted that post,

[A] Was the sixth.] See above, in the article of SPENCER COMPTON. Mr Boyer says by mistake, that he was the fourth son (1). We are told that he was 'in the field at Edgehill in his cradle; by which is understood, that he was carried to the camp for security when very young (2).' But certainly he could not be there in his cradle: for he was then ten years old.

[B] And in particular retained their languages perfectly.] Dr Gooch informs us (3), that, 'The better to prepare him for that figure he was afterwards to make, he spent some years in travelling; not to suck the Revolution, by N. Salmon, LL. B. edit. 1731, 8vo, p. 300.

He observed and examined the Civil and Ecclesiastical Politics abroad; he made them his study, but not his rule. The more he staid in France and Italy, &c. the more Englishman he was; he came home the better Statesman and the better Churchman; he was proof against all their arts, to debauch either his principles or his practices.' Whilst he was abroad, he is said to have trailed a pike in Flanders, under the Duke of York (4).

post, and dedicated himself to the service of the Church (e). Accordingly he went to Cambridge, where he was created Master of Arts (f). Afterwards entering into Orders [C], and obtaining a grant of the next vacant Canonry of Christ-Church in Oxford, he was admitted Canon-Commoner of that college, in the beginning of the year 1666, by the advice of Dr John Fell then Dean of the same (g). The 7th of April next ensuing, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, as he stood at Cambridge (h): about which time, he was possessed of the Rectory of Cottenham in Cambridgeshire, worth above five hundred pounds a year. Before that, he had a lesser benefice. In both he showed his great concern for the souls of men. He was constituted in 1667, Master of St Cross's Hospital near Winchester, upon the death of Dr William Lewis [D]. On the 24th of May 1669, he was installed Canon of Christ-Church [E], in the room of Dr Richard Heylin deceased (i). Two days after (k), he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (l); and that of Doctor, the 28th of June following (m). Advancing daily in the King's favour and esteem, and in the opinion of all good men, he was, upon the translation of Dr Nathanael Crew from the Bishoprick of Oxford to that of Durham, nominated to succeed him in the See of Oxford: to which he was elected November 10, confirmed December 2, and consecrated at Lambeth December 6, 1674 (n). About July 1675, he was made Dean of the Royal Chapel, on the death of Dr Blandford Bishop of Worcester; and being the same year translated to the See of London [F], in the room of Dr Henschman deceased, was confirmed therein the 18th of December (o). On the 22d of January 1675-6, King Charles, who entertained a just opinion of his capacity and fidelity, caused him to be sworn one of his Privy-Council; which station his Majesty thought fit to continue him in, upon his constituting a new Privy-Council in April 1679 (p). The educating, and well-grounding, of the King's two nieces, the Princesses Mary and Anne (q), in the doctrine and communion of the Church of England, was committed to his care; and that important trust he discharged, to the nation's universal satisfaction [G]. On the 4th of November 1677, he had the honour of performing the ceremony of the marriage of the eldest, Mary, with William Prince of Orange: and on the 28th of July 1683, that of Anne, the youngest, with George Prince of Denmark (r). The firmness of these two Princesses in the Protestant Religion, was owing in a great measure to their learned tutor Bishop Compton; which afterwards, when Popery came to prevail at the Court of England, was imputed to him as an unpardonable crime. During the mutual heats and animosities in the latter part of King Charles II's reign, some of the most learned and exemplary Clergy endeavoured, both in private and publick, to bring the Dissenters to a sense of the necessity of union among Protestants. To promote that good design, our worthy Bishop held, in 1679 three conferences with his Clergy upon the two Sacraments, and upon catechising youth in the true principles of religion. In 1680, he pursued the same design in three other conferences; namely, on the half communion; prayers in an unknown tongue; and prayers to Saints: the substance of which he published in a letter to the Clergy of his diocese, dated July 6, 1680. He further hoped, that it might tend to pacify and reconcile the Dissenters, by bringing in the judgment of foreign Divines against their needless separation. For that purpose, he wrote to Monsieur Le Moyne, Professor in Divinity at Leyden; to Mr de l'Angle, one of the

[C] Afterwards entering into Orders. When he did so, he was not a novice in age, or knowledge; being above a Bishop's necessary years (i. e. thirty years of age), when he was ordained a Deacon: but he did not aspire to, or desire the Episcopal Office, before he was qualified for the good work.—And tho' he might have made high demands upon the Court, and raised himself at once to the greatest dignities, yet he chose to make gradual and regular advances (5).

(5) Gooch, ibid.

[D] He was constituted in 1667, Master of St Cross's Hospital, &c. A fit preferment, as Dr Gooch rightly observes (6), for him, whose house was always a constant hospital! by this his income was considerably increased, (it being above 500 a year) and he had greater opportunities of doing good; the only motive to him to wish for it's increase; this was his greatest pleasure; and here he lived, and enjoyed it: here he would gladly have rested; but Providence had designed him for greater things.

[E] On the 24th of May 1669, he was installed Canon of Christ Church. And when he was Sub-Dean in that church he moderated in the Divinity-Disputations, with such gravity and wisdom, as made those exercises both reputable and instructive (7).

[F] Being the same year, translated to the See of London. Anth. Wood tells us (8), that, 'This translation was much promoted by some of the polite Clergy, because they knew him to be a bold man, an enemy to the Papists, and one that would act, and speak what they would put him upon, which they themselves would not be seen in, as many prime Papists used to say.' We are also informed (9), that this translation was effected through the Earl of Danby's interest; to whom the Bishop was a property, and was turned by him as he pleased. The Duke of York hated him; but Lord Danby persuaded both the King and him, that, as his heat did no great hurt to any person, so the giving way to it helped to lay the jealousies of the Church-Party. About a year after that, Sheldon dying, Bishop Compton was persuaded that Lord Danby had tried with all his strength to promote him to Canterbury; tho' that was never once intended. He was a great patron of the Converts from Popery, and of those Protestants whom the bad usage they were beginning to meet with in France drove over to us: And by these means he came to have a great reputation. He was making many complaints to the King, and often in Council, of the insolence of the Papists, and of Coleman's in particular. So that the King ordered the Duke to dismiss Coleman out of his service: yet he continued still in his confidence.

[G] And that important trust he discharged to the nation's universal satisfaction How well he executed it, as Dr Gooch observes (10), let those confess, who value the memory of the late most renowned Queen (Mary), or have not laid aside all duty to our present most gracious Sovereign (11). They never forgot their obligations to him, but he was always in the esteem of the former, and received marks of favour from the latter. He had the particular honour which no one Bishop ever had, of marrying two Regent Queens to Protestant Princes. They were both confirmed by him January 23, 1675-6 (12).

the Preachers of the Protestant Church at Charenton near Paris; and to Mr Claude, another eminent French Divine; who, in their several Answers [H], agreed in vindicating the Church of England from any errors in it's doctrine, or any unlawful impositions in it's service and discipline; and therefore did condemn a separation from it, as needless and uncharitable (s). But, Popery was what the Bishop most strenuously opposed. For, when it was gaining ground in these kingdoms, under the favour and influence of the heir-apparent to the Crown, James Duke of York; our worthy Prelate, at the head of his Clergy, made a noble stand: and, by his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more strenuously defended the Reformed Religion, than it had ever been; to the shame and silence of their Romish adversaries [I]. The great disservice thereby done to these, and their cause, was remembered, and resenting, when King James II. ascended the throne. To our Bishop's immortal honour, this was his unpardonable crime: and, accordingly, he was marked out, as the first sacrifice to Popish fury (t). The first instance of it, was, his being dismissed from the Council-table soon after King James's accession: and, on the 16th of December 1685, he was put out from being Dean of the Royal Chapel (u). Further occasions were sought, and soon found, of molesting, or entirely ruining him, if possible. For Dr John Sharp Rector of St Giles's in the fields, London, having, in some of his sermons, vindicated the doctrine of the Church of England in opposition to Popery [K]; the King sent a letter, dated June 14, 1686, to Bishop Compton, wherein his Majesty 'required and commanded him, immediately upon receipt thereof, forthwith to suspend Dr Sharp from further preaching in any parish church or chapel in his diocese, until he had given the King satisfaction.' Upon the receipt of it, the Bishop sent an answer, June the 18th, to the Earl of Sunderland, Principal Secretary of State, wherein he said, That 'he should always count it his duty to obey the King in whatever commands he laid upon him, that he could perform with a safe conscience: but in this, he conceived, he was obliged to proceed according to Law; and therefore it was impossible for him to comply: because, tho' his Majesty commanded him only to execute his pleasure, yet in the capacity he was, to do it, he must act as a Judge, and no Judge condemns any man before he has knowledge of the cause, and has cited the party.' But the Court being resolved to be revenged on the Bishop, for his exemplary zeal for the Protestant interest; and intending thereby to terrify all persons (the Clergy in particular) from opposing their arbitrary designs, they caused his Lordship to be cited, on the 3d of August, to appear the 9th of the same month before the new Ecclesiastical Commission. At his appearance, he was charged with 'not having observed his Majesty's commands in the case of Dr Sharp, whom he was ordered to suspend.' The Bishop seemed to be surprized at this; and humbly begged a copy of the commission, and a copy of his charge: but was answered by Chancellor Jefferys, 'That he should neither have a copy of, nor see, the commission; neither would they give

That of Mr De L'Angle is dated from Paris, Octob. 31; and that of Mr Claude from the same place, Novemb. 29, 1680.

[I] By his encouragement, their pulpits and their pens more strenuously defended the Reformed Religion, than it had ever been. This we learn from a Gentleman, who had been his Lordship's Chaplain (13). 'From whatever quarter, says he, or at what time so ever any assault was made upon our Doctrine or Discipline, his vigilance and Christian courage were upon the guard to defend them; of which I shall give only some few instances within the narrow compass of my own knowledge. 1. From hence proceeded that volume of useful Treatises against the Dissenters, to convince them by Reason, Scripture, and Antiquity, of the unreasonableness of their separation, and ill-grounded scruples: never yet replied to, or to be answered. 2. From hence likewise (before, and even under his suspension) came forth the distinct Reply to all the pretences of the Church of Rome, in their day of exaltation and trial; most of them written by the best learned Divines of this City. Join both these together, and you will find enough said to confirm you in the faith and worship of this Church, against the adversaries on either hand; not to separate from our holy Apostolical Communion, out of needless scruple, and the so often baffled pretences of seeking after greater purity, and better edification; nor yet to be perverted to Idolatry, in order to find out the true Church. 3. The danger of Socinianism, and the other Heresies, did not escape his care or remedy, as far as his power and persuasion could reach; to this end, many learned and rational treatises have been published by his Clergy on this subject. And when the dispute about the holy undivided Trinity was managed by some, in new and unusual terms, a

Royal Letter was procured to forbid the bringing in of such terms into that controversy, as were unknown to Antiquity or to Scripture. — By these-like means, our pious Bishop, as the good shepherd of souls, used his strenuous endeavours to hold up the weak, heal the sick, bind up the broken, seek the lost, and bring back the out cast, not by severity even against the irreclaimable, or prosecutions against the deceiv'd, but first and chiefly by argument and conviction: yet not so merciful, as to be remiss against impious Hereticks, and notorious immorality.'

[K] Dr John Sharp — having, in some of his sermons vindicated the Doctrine of the Church of England in opposition to Popery. He received one day, as he was coming out of the pulpit, a paper sent him, as he believed, by a Priest, containing a sort of challenge upon some points of controversy, touched by him in some of his sermons. Upon this, he not knowing to whom he should send an answer, preached a Sermon in answer to it: and after he had confuted it, he concluded shewing how unreasonable it was for Protestants to change their religion on such grounds. This was carried to Court, and represented there, as a reflection on the King for changing on those grounds (14). But in order to understand how this could be imputed as a crime to Dr Sharp, 'tis to be observed, that King James had caus'd the Directions concerning Preachers, published in 1662, to be now reprinted, and reinforced them by a letter directed to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, given at Whitehall, 5 March, 1685-6, to prohibit the preaching upon controversial points (15), which was, upon the matter, forbidding them to defend their religion in the pulpit; when it was at the same time attacked by the Popish Priests with all the vigour they were capable of, both in their Sermons and books. This order was taken from a precedent in Queen Mary II's time; who soon after her accession to the throne, issued out a proclamation, forbidding the preaching upon controverted points of religion; for fear, it was said, of raising animosities among the people (16).

‘ give him a copy of the charge.’ Thereupon his Lordship desired time to advise with counsel; and there was given him ‘till the 16th; and afterwards ‘till the 31st of August abovementioned. In the mean time, he sent his Proctor for a copy of what orders and minutes they had set down concerning his business; but it was refused, tho’ never denied in any Court. On the 31st of August, when his Lordship appeared for the second time, he declared, That the whole world could bear him witness, he had been that whole summer endeavouring with all the power and skill he had, to enforce the King’s letter to the strict observation of his Clergy. Then he offered his plea to their jurisdiction [L]: which being over-ruled, he protested to his right, in that or any other plea, that might be for his advantage: And observed, that, as a Bishop, he had right by the most authentick and universal Ecclesiastical Laws, to be tried first before his Metropolitan, precedent to any other Court whatsoever. But the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would not, upon any account suffer their jurisdiction to be called in question; and therefore did not pay the least regard to whatever his Lordship could alledge, even, tho’ he further insisted upon That in the capacity he was, they were warranted by their commission, to try him only for offences after the date of the commission. But this plea likewise was over-ruled by the Chancellor, who affirmed, ‘ There were general words which gave authority sufficient to ‘ look back.’ Whereupon the Bishop gave in his answer in writing [M]. And, after it was read, he observed, That the word suspend was liable to two constructions. In the first, which is the legal and strict sense of the word, he understood the King’s letter; and was advised by his counsel, That it was a judicial act, and by consequence could not be complied with, unless he had first cited the party, and heard the cause. In the other sense of the word suspend, that is, at large for silencing; he apprehended, he had in effect obeyed the King’s letter. For he sent for Dr Sharp, shewed him that letter, advised him not to preach ‘till he had endeavoured to know his Majesty’s further pleasure; and he had not preached to that day, so that his Majesty’s command was fulfilled. But, notwithstanding all that his Lordship or his counsel could alledge, he was suspended, on the 6th of September following [N], for his disobedience, from the function and execution of his episcopal office, and from all episcopal and other ecclesiastical jurisdiction, during his Majesty’s pleasure (w). Immediately after, the Bishops of Durham, Rochester, and Peterborough, were appointed Commissioners to exercise all manner of ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the diocese of London, during the suspension of the Bishop (x). He acquiesced in this hard sentence [O]: but being suspended only as a Bishop, and remaining still whole in his other capacities, he made a noble stand as one of the Governors of the Charter-House [P]. However, as according to the form of the Ecclesiastical Courts, a person under suspension must make a submission within six months, otherwise he may be proceeded against as obstinate: so, six months after sentence, the Bishop sent a petition to the

[L] Then he offered his plea to their jurisdiction. This plea was chiefly a recital of the statute made in the 16th of K. Charles I. entitled. ‘ A Repeal of the ‘ branch of a statute primo Elizabethæ, concerning ‘ Commissioners for causes Ecclesiastical:’ in which statute of Charles I. it was, among other things, enacted, — ‘ That no new Court should be erected, ordained, or appointed, within this realm of England, or ‘ dominion of Wales, which should, or might have the ‘ like power, jurisdiction, or authority as the said ‘ High-Commission Court then had, or pretended to ‘ have; but that all and every such Letters- Patents, ‘ Commissions and Grants made or to be made by his ‘ Majesty, his heirs or successors, and all powers and ‘ authorities granted thereby; and all Acts, Sentences, ‘ and Decrees, to be made virtue or colour thereof, ‘ should be utterly void and of none effect (17).’

[M] Whereupon the Bishop gave in his answer in writing. The Commissioners question to him was, Why ‘ did you not obey the King’s command, in his letter ‘ concerning the suspending Doctor Sharp?’ In answer to which, his Lordship, after reciting the King’s letter of June 14, abovementioned, says, ‘ I took the ‘ best advice I could get, concerning Doctor Sharp, ‘ and was informed, that the letter being directed to me, ‘ as Bishop of London, to suspend a person under my ‘ jurisdiction, I was therein to act as a Judge, it being ‘ a judicial act; and that no person could by Law be ‘ punished by suspension, before he was called, or without being admitted to make his defence.’ And then goes on to say, That he represented so much to the Earl of Sunderland, in the letter mentioned above. Nevertheless, that he might obey his Majesty’s commands as far as by Law he could, he had shewed the King’s letter to Dr Sharp, who had not preached since that time within the Diocese of London (18).

[N] He was suspended, on the 6th of September following. The Court did not think fit to meddle with his revenues. For the Lawyers had settled that point, that Benefices were of the nature of Freeholds. So if the sentence had gone to the Temporalities; the Bishop would have had the matter tried over again in the King’s Bench, where he was likely to find good justice, Herbert not being satisfied with the legality and justice of the sentence. While this matter was in dependance the Princess of Orange thought it became her to interpose a little in the Bishop’s favour. So she wrote to the King, earnestly begging him to be gentle to the Bishop, who she could not think would offend willingly. She also wrote to the Bishop, expressing the great share she took in the trouble he was fallen into. The Prince wrote to him to the same purpose. The King wrote an answer to the Princess, reflecting severely on the Bishop, not without some sharpness on her for meddling in such matters (19).

[O] He acquiesced in this hard sentence. The Court seemed uneasy, when they saw they had gained so poor a victory: for now the Bishop was more considered than ever. His Clergy, for all the suspension, were really more governed by the secret intimations of his pleasure, than they had been by his authority before. So they resolved to come off as well as they could (20).

[P] He made a noble stand as one of the Governors of the Charter-House. For King James having, on the 17th of December 1686, sent a letter to the Governors of the Charter-House; requiring them to admit one Andrew Popham into the first Pensioner’s place in that Hospital, which should become void, and be in his Majesty’s disposal; without tendering any oaths to him, or require of him any subscriptions, or other acts in conformity to the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England: the Bishop of London, jointly with the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Craven, Danby, and Nottingham, all Governors of that Hospital, and Dr Thomas-Burnet, Master of the same, agreed, not to comply with the King’s illegal and unreasonable command (21).

the King, desiring to be restored to the exercise of his episcopal function: but he made no acknowledgment of any fault. So this had no other effect, but that it stopt all further proceedings; only the suspension lay still on him (y). Whilst he was thus sequestered from his episcopal function, he applied himself to the improvement of his garden at Fulham; and, having a great genius for Botany, enriched it with a new variety of domestick and exotick plants (z). His suspension was so flagrant a piece of injustice, that the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it [Q]; and, upon the dread of his Highness's coming over, the Court was willing to make the Bishop reparation, by restoring him, on the 23d of September 1688 (a), to his episcopal function. But he made no haste to resume his charge, and to thank the King for his Restoration; which made some people believe, he had no mind to be restored after such a manner, or that he knew well enough what passed in Holland (b). And, indeed, he was one of the noble persons who often met at the Earl of Shrewsbury's, and concerted measures for the Prince of Orange's coming over; whose interest he heartily endeavoured to promote (c). On the 3d of October 1688, he waited upon King James, with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and seven other Bishops; when they suggested to his Majesty such advices as they thought proper at that season, and conducing to his service (d). Upon the Prince of Orange's landing, the first share our Bishop had in the ensuing Revolution, was, together with the Earl of Dorset, the conveying safe from London to Nottingham the Princess Anne of Denmark [R]; lest she, in the present confusion of affairs, might have been sent away into France, or put under restraint, because the Prince, her consort, had left King James, and was gone over to the Prince of Orange. Bishop Compton, at his return to London, set his hand to the Association begun at Exeter (e). Nor was he only one of the most instrumental in the Revolution, but also the most zealous in promoting the settlement of it: for, upon the 21st of December, he waited on the Prince of Orange, at the head of his Clergy, and even attended with some of the Dissenting Ministers; and in his own and their name, thanked his Highness, 'For his very great and most hazardous undertaking, for their deliverance, and the preservation of the Protestant Religion, with the ancient laws and liberties of this nation (f).' On the 30th of December, he administered the holy Communion to his Highness, in the Royal Chapel at St James's, according to the rites of the Church of England (g). The 29th of January 1688-9, when the House of Lords, in a grand Committee, debated the important question, Whether, the throne being vacant, ought to be filled up by a Regent, or a King? Dr Compton was one of the two Bishops, (Sir Jonathan Trelawny, Bishop of Bristol, being the other) who made the majority for filling up the throne by a King: for there were upon that occasion only fifty-one votes to forty-nine (h). On the 14th of February he was appointed one of the Privy-Council (i): and made Dean of the Royal Chapel (k). And afterwards pitched upon, by King William, to perform the ceremony of his and Queen Mary's Coronation, April 11, 1689 (l). The same year, he was constituted one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy; in the execution of which commission he laboured with great zeal and earnestness to reconcile the Dissenters to the Church: and also in the Convocation that met November 21, 1689, of which he was President. But the intended Comprehension met with insuperable difficulties [S], the majority of the Lower House being resolved not to enter

[Q] That the Prince of Orange, in his Declaration, could not omit taking notice of it.] In the following words. The said Commissioners have suspended the Bishop of London, only because he refused to obey an order that was sent him to suspend a worthy Divine, without so much as citing him before him to make his own defence, or observing the common forms of process.

[R] The conveying safe from London to Nottingham, the Princess Anne of Denmark.] We have a particular account of this transaction in the following words. When the news came to London, of Prince George of Denmark's having joined the Prince of Orange, the Princess Anne was so struck with the apprehensions of the King's displeasure, and of the ill effects it might have, that she said to the Lady Churchill, that she could not bear the thoughts of it; and would leap out at window rather than venture on it. The Bishop of London was then lodged very secretly in Suffolk-street. So the Lady Churchill, who knew where he was, went to him and concerted with him the method of the Princess's withdrawing from the Court. The Princess went sooner to bed than ordinary. And about midnight, she went down a back stairs from her closet, attended only by the Lady Churchill, in such haste, that they carried nothing with them. They were waited for by the Bishop of London, who carried them to the Earl of Dorset's, whose Lady furnished them with every thing. And so they went northward, as far as Northampton; where that Earl attended on them with all respect, and quickly brought a body of Horse to serve for a guard to the Princess. And in a little while a small army was formed about her, who chose to be commanded by the Bishop of London; of which he too easily accepted (22). So that, as Dr Gooch observes (23), the Bishop thought it then a proper time to resume his care and charge, and to guard the Princess against any attempts on her Religion or her Liberty. This is that so much talked of part he acted at the Revolution. He rescued the Princess Anne; he hid her (as it were) 'till Popish Tyranny was overpast. During that nice and difficult juncture, he was called peculiarly the Protestant Bishop; and, indeed, he was the ornament and security of the Protestant cause.

[S] But the intended Comprehension met with insuperable difficulties.] For, tho' many arguments were used to bring the more stiff of the inferior Clergy, to a charitable condescension, and the much desired union; yet there prevailed amongst them a jealousy and a distrust not to be conquered. This appeared in the choice of a Prolocutor for the Lower house? Dr Tillotson was the person proposed, and desired by our Bishop, and most of his Brethren, and yet Dr Jane had the majority of votes. And when he was presented to the Bishop of London, as President, for his approbation, he made a customary speech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the Church of England as established by Law, above all communities; implied that it wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this sentence, by way of triumph, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. But the Bishop of London, to whom Dr Jane had been chaplain, made a speech in the same language, wherein he told the Clergy; 'That they ought to endeavour, a temper in those things, that are not essential in religion, thereby to open the door

enter into terms of accommodation with the Dissenters (m). King William having, soon after, named Commissioners of Trade and Plantations, his Lordship was made one of them: and the Bishop of London, for the time being, is always to be one, by reason of his superintendency of all the churches in the Plantations [T]. In the beginning of the year 1690-1, at his own charge he attended King William to the famous Congress at the Hague, where the Grand Alliance against France was concluded. But, notwithstanding the great part he acted in the Revolution, and his subsequent services, no sooner was the storm over, but jealousies were infused, and calumnies dispersed, to supplant and undermine him: inasmuch, that tho' the Metropolitan See of Canterbury was twice vacant in that reign, yet he still continued Bishop of London [V]. However, he went on consistently and like himself, despising all other rewards, but the quiet and the applause of his own conscience, and the high esteem and intimacy of Queen Mary, which he preserved to her dying day (n). At the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, he seemed to stand fairest for the Royal favour. And tho' many things were said to disparage him at Court [W], yet nothing could discourage him from paying his duty and attendance there. About the beginning of May 1702, he was sworn of her majesty's Privy-Council. The same year, he was put in the commission for the Union of England and Scotland, but was left out in the new commission issued out in April 1706. Two years before, he very much promoted the 'Act for making effectual her Majesty's intention for the augmentation of the maintenance of the poor Clergy, by enabling her Majesty to grant the revenues of the First-Fruits and Tenths.' He maintained all along a brotherly correspondence with the foreign Protestant Churches, and endeavoured to promote in them a good opinion concerning the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and her moderate sentiments of them, as appears, both by his application to Messieurs Le Moyne, Claude, and de l' Angle beforementioned (o); and the Letters that passed between his Lordship and the University of Geneva in 1706 [X]. Towards the end of Queen Anne's reign, his access became

' door of Salvation to a multitude of straying Christians: that it must needs be their duty, to shew the same indulgence and charity to the Dissenters under King William, which some of the Bishops and Clergy had promised to them in their addresses to King James; and concluded with a pathetic exhortation to unanimity and concord (24). But tho' he made such great advances towards a Comprehension, yet when he observed the perverse and obstinate disposition of the Dissenters; when he found, that not a sense of true and undissembled religion, but interest and humour were at the bottom; and that there was no Comprehension to be proposed, or satisfaction given, but by the expensive sacrifice of truth and order, then he thought it necessary to stop. He wished as well as any body to the Protestant interest, and would gladly have seen it more united: but he was not well-bred enough to betray the rights of the Church in favour of a schism. He had seen so much the effects of popular frowardness and contention, mens awkward dislike to what is settled, and desire to change, that he dreaded the thoughts of innovations (25). His not complying so far as the Dissenters liked, is undoubtedly what made an author who is very favourable to them (26) say, 'that Bishop Compton was a weak man, wilful, and strangely wedded a party: that is, he was not of the same party in that respect as Bishop Burnet.

[T] By reason of his superintendency of all the churches in the Plantations.] Bishop Compton often declared his resolution of going over himself, to settle the Christian Church in those American Plantations; but by his persecution in King James's reign, and the mischiefs of a long war ever since, he could never bring it to effect. Greater then was his care in sending over good pastors; more constant his attention to their lives, manners, and doctrine; by every conveyance, letters sent of instruction, commendation, or reproof; a perpetual correspondence, in answer to volumes of complaints, wants, and requests. And all this carried on by himself, against the perverseness of the inhabitants, the wiles of the Church of Rome, and the subtilties of their societies de Propaganda Fide, till the Society for propagating Christian Knowledge was erected.

It was no small trouble or expence, to find out fit Pastors for that refractory and unbelieving part of mankind: men of integrity; for they could not be under his inspection as to their manners and doctrine, in those remote territories; and men of prudence and constancy, to reclaim the inhabitants from their old embittered leaven of Independency, Antinomianism, and Quakerism: and to reduce the natives from being worshippers of evil demons (25).

[V] Tho' the metropolitan See of Canterbury was

twice vacant in that reign, yet he still continued Bishop of London.] The first time indeed, 'tis no great wonder he should miss of it, since he had for competitor Dr Tillotson the glory of the English nation. But why he should not be promoted to it at the second vacancy is entirely unaccountable, all circumstances considered. And no truer reason of it can be assigned than this, that it was thought, Dr Tennison would be more subservient to all the Court Designs, than Bishop Compton could ever be expected to be.

[W] And tho' many things were said to disparage him at Court.] For then, as Dr Gooch observes (26), was the time for the most artful management. Honesty and integrity will always stand in some mens way. The Bishop of London could neither be corrupted nor removed. But whatever attempts were made against him they moved him not; neither counted he his life dear, while he was doing God and his Church good service.

[X] The Letters that passed between his Lordship, and the university of Geneva in 1706.] What the substance of them was, we learn from the following passage in a letter from that University, to the University of Oxford, dated Feb. 5, 1706-7. Summo gaudio nos perdidit quod de vestra in nos charitate scribere dignatus est illustrissimus Præsul Henricus Londinensis Episcopus. Cum enim accepissemus, nos male audire, & Genævæ famam apud vos deteri; nomine vestro nos docuit, præjudicatum esse & veteres opiniones nondum penitus depositas; & quæ in medium a quibusdam allata erant nos non spectare, verum nonnullos qui ecclesiæ Anglicanæ disciplinam & liturgiam detestantes, nomen nostrum præ se ferebant: illud vero a sententia nostra omnino distitum esse moverat vir illustrissimus, &c. i. e.

' The assurances we have received from the most illustrious Bishop of London of your affection towards us, hath filled us with the utmost joy. For hearing that we were ill spoken of, and that Geneva was odious amongst you, he hath assured us in your name, that those were old prejudices, and wrong notions not yet laid aside; and that what had been said by some, did not concern us, but certain persons, who dissenting from, and railing at, the discipline and liturgy of the Church of England, made use of our name: but he knew us to be quite of another mind.—The compliment paid to his Lordship by the University of Oxford, in their answer to this letter, is both very just and handsome.—Quo nemo aut Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ paternam magis affectu fovet ac tuetur, aut exteres omnes, utcumque locorum intervallis distitas, arctissimo tamen purioris Fidei vinculo conjunctas charitate magis fraternæ prosequitur. i. e. 'Than whom, none hath a more paternal affection for the Church of England, nor a greater brotherly love for the foreign Churches, united by one close bond easier at Court, and he had greater power and interest there. But, whether the times were good or bad, he looked upon all that power and interest only as accidental circumstances that attended the office of a Bishop; and not as an essential part of it (p). In 1709-10, he was one of the Lords who opposed the prosecution then carried on against Dr Sacheverell, and declared him Not Guilty; and likewise protested against several steps taken in that affair (q). His Lordship having for some time been afflicted with the Gout and Stone [r], it turned at last to a complication of distempers, which put an end to his most valuable life at Fulham, on the 7th of July 1713, in the eighty-first year of his age. His body was interred, the 15th of the same month, in the church-yard of Fulham [z], according to his particular direction (r). What few things he published, are mentioned in the note [AA]. As to his personal qualifications: he was in all respects one of the best-bred men in his time; courteous and affable; not full of words, but very conversable; and, as in his ministerial offices, so in conversation too, willing and apt to teach. He was always easy of access, and ready to do good offices. In his friendships he was constant, or rather inflexible. He was a man of the largest and most publick spirit; and liked nothing that looked narrow or stingy. He had no little, artful, selfish designs. He was never seen to be afraid or concerned at danger. In the midst of storms he himself was calm. With regard to his moral character: he was a person of singular modesty, and humility; of great temperance and abstinence; of exemplary piety [BB], and every virtue. Never did such tender and such manly passions meet before in the same breast! never such firmness and fortitude, mixed with so much meekness and condescension! But he was most particularly eminent for his unbounded charity and beneficence: being generous and charitable beyond example. He disposed of money to every one who could make out (and it was very easy to make that out to him) that he was a proper object of charity. He answered literally the Apostle's character, poor enough himself, yet making many rich (s). He had divers ancient people, men and women, whom he supported by constant annual pensions; and several children at school, at his own cost and charge; beside those educated from children, and brought up to the Universities, to the sea, or to trades, &c (t). The poor of his parish were always attending his gate for their dole, and for the remains of his constant hospitable table; which was always furnished, and free to those whom respect or business drew to him. His hall was frequented in the morning with petitioners of all sorts (u). More particularly, he spared no cost nor pains to serve the Church and Clergy. He bought many Advowsons out of Lay-hands [CC]. He gave great sums for the rebuilding of churches (w), and greater still for the buying in Impror-

[Y] His Lordship having for some time been afflicted with the Gout and Stone. 'The Gout and Stone will make the stoutest heart to shrink; yet (says Dr Gooch) in the midst of these tormenting pains, we never heard the voice of murmur; those shocks that would make a beholder tremble, did not make him repine. He never complained against God, nor grew touchy and peevish to his domesticks; (almost every body's case in pain and sickness.) He was firm and constant, quiet and good-natured to the end. When his last illness came upon him, he foresaw and foretold what would be the event on't, with the same composedness as if he had been sure of his recovery. He knew his summons could never be sudden, because he was never unprepared to receive it. He had long ago settled his worldly affairs: indeed he had little worldly affairs to settle; for he had remitted his treasure to the other world and secured an eternal reversion there. He talked of dying with the same unconcernedness, (or with the same pleasure) as if he was only taking a journey; and wished for nothing but an easy passage:— which he obtained; being taken out of this world in the same easy and quiet manner as he had endeavoured to live, and wished to die (28).'

[Z] His body was interred— in the churchyard of Fulham. According to his particular direction: for he used to say, 'that the church is for the living, and the churchyard for the dead.' So that his humility of life, and greatness of mind, above worldly pomp, followed him to his grave (29). Over it there is erected a handsome tomb, (surrounded with iron rails,) having only this short inscription. H. LONDON. EI MH EN TΩ ΣΤΑΥΡΩ. M. DCC. XIII. The Greek words (Engl. Save in the cross) are part of Galatians VI. 14. God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.

[AA] What few things he published, are mentioned in the note. They are as follow. I. A Translation from Italian, of 'The Life of Donna Olympia Maldachini, who governed the Church during the time of Innocent X. which was from the year 1644 to 1655.' Lond. 1667, written originally by Abbot Gualdi, and printed

privately at Paris, II. A Translation from French into English, of, 'The Jesuits intrigues; with the private instructions of that Society to their emissaries.' Lond. 1669. nine sheets in 4to. This was found in manuscript in a Jesuit's closet after his death: and both were sent in a letter from a gentleman at Paris, to his friend in London. III. 'A Treatise of the Holy Communion.' Lond. 1677, 8vo. his name is not set to it. IV. 'A Letter to the Clergy of the Diocese of London, concerning Baptism, the Lord's Supper, Catechising.' Dated April 25, 1679, and printed on one side of a sheet. V. Second Letter, concerning 1. The half Communion. 2. Prayers in an unknown tongue. 3. Prayers to Saints. Dated from Fulham, July 6, 1680. and printed also on one Side of a sheet of paper. VI. A third Letter, on Confirmation, and Visitation of the Sick. From Fulham 1682. VII. A fourth Letter; upon Canon 54. Dated from Fulham, April 6, 1683. VIII. A fifth Letter, upon Canon 118. From Fulham, March 19, 1684. IX. A sixth Letter, upon Canon 13. Fulham April 18, 1685. They were all reprinted together in 1686, 12mo, under this title Episcopalia: or, Letters of the Right Reverend Father in God, Henry Lord Bishop of London, to the Clergy of his Diocese (30). We are informed, that they were part of them printed without his knowledge; but not without a design of bringing more trouble upon his head from King James II, for his opposing Popery, as he doth in some of them (31). X. There is also, 'A Letter of his to a Clergyman in his Diocese, concerning Non-Resistance.' written soon after the Revolution, and inserted in the Memoirs of the Life of Mr John Kettlewell (32).

[BB] Of exemplary piety No one was so strict and regular in his private devotions; no one so constant and frequent in the service of the Church. For, beside the publick offices morning and evening, his whole family began the day with the Litany, and ended it with select prayers from the Liturgy; and at all these times he himself, when he was able, was a constant attendant (33).

proprations, and settling them on the poor Vicars [DD]. There was no poor honest Clergyman, or his widow, in want, but had his benevolence, when applied for. Nor any in the Reformed Churches abroad, to whom he was not a liberal Patron, Steward, and perpetual Solicitor for. The French Refugees drank deep of his bounty for many years; so did the Irish in their day of affliction; and likewise the Scotch Episcopal party [EE] in their grievous persecution (x). He was indeed upon some occasions imposed upon, and bestowed his charity sometimes upon forward and impudent persons; who did not want or deserve it: but that is frequently the case of generous well-meaning persons; and must be owned to be a weakness rather than a fault [FF]. If we consider him as a Bishop: he was not only blameless, but a pattern of good behaviour in every respect. He applied himself more to his function, than Bishops had commonly done. He went much about his diocese, and preached [GG] and confirmed in many places (y). In order not to burden his Clergy with frequent visitations, he was wont to hire houses, and spend every summer in some new part of his diocese, where he rid out, and visited in person the several churches, and parsonage, and vicarage-houses. His method also was, in stated meetings with his Clergy, to propose some topick in Divinity; on which they discoursed together in a serious, familiar, and judicious manner; which afterwards was summed up, and formed into a regular treatise. Many of these discourses are published, under the title of, The Bishop of London's Conferences. At those times, and indeed upon all other occasions, he was extremely civil, affable, and courteous, full of candor and patience [HH]. In a word, by his death the Church lost a most excellent Bishop; the kingdom a brave and able Statesman; the Protestant Religion, at home and abroad, its ornament and refuge; and the whole Christian world an eminent example of virtue and piety (z). His Lordship was never married.

[DD] For the buying in Improprations, and settling them upon the poor vicars.] Particularly the Impropration of Marks-Tay in Essex, for which he is said to have given no less than seven hundred pounds; whereby he raised a very mean Curacy to a competent subsistence.

[EE] And likewise the Scotch Episcopal party.] He provided in particular, for numbers of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy, who fled into England at the Revolution. To Mr Robert Falconer, for instance, he gave the Living of Dunmow; to Mr Tho. Dunbar, that of Keldon, both in Essex, and the like in many other instances.

[FF] And must be owned to be a weakness rather than a fault.] We shall conclude this article of his charities, with these words of Dr Whitfeld (34): 'To his Honour be it spoken! he died poor; having made the needy and miserable his heirs all his life long. His contempt of gathering or leaving riches out of the patrimony of the Church, was worthy of his great mind and station. And he died with that honour, with which he had always lived.'—We must not forget to observe, that he left the third part of his large and well chosen library to the the corporation of Colchester. But, that noble gift was slighted; so that his Lordship's heir was forced to dispose of it otherwise. The two other parts of his library he left to St Paul's Cathedral, and to Sion College.

[GG] And preached.] One author tells us (35), that 'his preaching was without much life or learning: for he had not gone thro' his studies with the exactness that was fitting.' But another who knew him better gives the following account. 'He spake with the affection and authority of a spiritual father; always above the affectation of popular eloquence, but in ' the power of the Spirit, and primitive simplicity, with the majesty of plainness, in the utmost sedateness and good judgement. His weighty reason needed not to be fet off with trappings. The love which his people met his Doctrine, made it superfluous to speak to their passions so easily raised and so soon sinking: he spake to convince their understanding. His deliberate way of utterance, gave them leisure to receive and fix his notions, and brought forth nothing but with maturity of thought, and exactness of judgment.—His knowledge and learning had been well cultivated in his privater station in the Church, and particularly assisted by his friendship with Dr Rich. Allestry Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. His books had always attended him in his most youthful years; nor were they neglected to the last in his fulness of business. [HH] Full of candor and patience.] 'None of his Clergy ever felt his displeasure, but for faults which carried their own mark and evidence. Not any difference of opinion in State-matters, did ever estrange him from a deserving man: that which was good and virtuous in the son, he laid hold on, and cherished with a fatherly tenderness, and passed by his mistaken judgment in that which was amiss. But in those that were bad, no interest, no being attached to the same cause with himself, could ever make him overlook their faults. This was true moderation! candor and charity to good men of all opinions, and firmness to his own just principles (37).'
